CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROVISION FOR REAPPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS—SALARY INCREASES

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Grain Act to provide for the reappointment of grain commissioners and for increases in their salaries; to provide also for the appointment and salaries of three assistant grain commissioners instead of four; and to provide further for certain technical amendments to the statutory grades of grain.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL LIBRARY

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT—APPOINTMENT OF NATIONAL LIBRARIAN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a national library, and for the appointment and remuneration of a national librarian and an assistant national librarian; to provide also for the appointment, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act, of such officers, clerks and employees necessary for the proper control and management of the national library; to provide also for the establishment of an advisory council and for the payment of the travelling and living expenses of the members thereof; and to provide further for the establishment in the consolidated revenue fund of a special account to which shall be credited any money appropriated by parliament for the purpose of acquiring books and of a special account called the national library special operating account to which shall be credited all moneys received by way of donation, bequest or otherwise and that any amounts required for the purposes of the said measure may be paid out of the national library special operating account or out of any money appropriated by parliament for such purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

AIRMAN JAMES FARTHING—HOSPITALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question about airman James Farthing.

Farthing was injured in a collision between two civilian motor vehicles and was admitted to Oshawa, Ontario, general hospital January 26 where he was treated for head injuries. On February 1 he was transferred to the R.C.A.F. hospital at Trenton. His condition steadily improved and on March 5 he proceeded to Vancouver on sick leave. His instructions were to report to the nearest R.C.A.F. medical officer or to D.V.A. hospital if he required treatment during his leave. During his sick leave he experienced trouble with his eyes and reported to the senior medical officer at Sea Island and also to Shaughnessy hospital. He was not refused admittance or treatment. It was recommended that he wait until he returned to Trenton at expiration of his sick leave for further treatment. He agreed to this course of action. On his return to Trenton he was re-examined and it was determined that a further period of convalescence and treatment was desirable. He was readmitted to Trenton hospital and was transferred to Sunnybrook on April 9. He was not seriously ill and is now up and about and in good condition.

Farthing himself made the following statement:

I was not refused admittance to Shaughnessy. It was recommended that I wait until I returned to Trenton. This recommendation was okay as far as I was concerned. I am in far from a serious condition and am very much satisfied with the treatment that has been given me by the R.C.A.F. and by D.V.A.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO COPY OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—CONSTRUCTION IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development if a copy of the agreement entered into with the provinces for the construction of the trans-Canada highway is available at this time to interested members. I should also like to ask if it will be necessary that the entire construction in Nova Scotia be completed at the expiration of the seven-year term dating from the act coming into force, of which about three years have transpired. That would mean that the entire work in Nova Scotia would have to be completed within the next three or four years under that agreement.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I shall be glad to table a copy of the agreement next week. With regard to the second point raised by the hon. member, Nova Scotia signed the same agreement as the other provinces.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): On what date does that expire?

Mr. Winters: Seven years from the date on which the act received the royal assent. Speaking from memory, I think that was December 10, 1949.

Mr. Knowles: Are there any provinces which have not signed agreements?

Mr. Winters: There is one province which has not signed.

Mr. Knowles: Which one?

Mr. Winters: Quebec.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

NEW WESTMINSTER—EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES AND PROVISION FOR LOAN

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 193, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM TERRACE TO KITIMAT, B. C.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 192, respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Terrace to Kitimat, in the province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Construction and completion.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, before this section carries I want to say as a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines that we had a most interesting and informative morning when this bill was being considered. I think it is only right to say that members of the committee were impressed with the study that Mr. Fairweather of Canadian National Railways had given to this problem and with the very complete answers that he gave to every question asked with regard to mineral development, mining, agricultural development and the lumbering potential.

Also I think it is only fair to say that the representative of the Aluminum Company of Canada—I have forgotten his name—who was present fully detailed to the committee the scope of his company's operations and the effect that they would have on the other operations of the company in Canada. He answered to the satisfaction of all members of the committee any question that was asked. I am sure that all British Columbia members are pleased indeed to see this huge development of our natural resources and I am sure they are also pleased with the competent and careful way in which the officials of the Canadian National have considered this question before recommending the bill to the government and for the consideration of the house and committee.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

463. Departmental administration, $1,370,576.

The Chairman: These estimates are to be found in the blue book at page 62. Perhaps I might say at the outset that it is the normal practice to have a general discussion on the first item. I would ask hon. members to make the general discussion as thorough as possible so that they may satisfy themselves and in order that later we may have an orderly discussion strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, it has not been my practice in the past to make a general review prior to the discussion of my estimates but this year, in view of some of the changes that have been made in the preparation of these estimates, I thought I might make a brief statement to the house dealing with some of the major projects that have to do with items that are now under consideration by the house. The 1952-53 estimates for the Department of Transport cover some 70 items and amount in all to the sum of $105,800,638. The transport department proper accounts for about $96·6 million of these and the various boards and commissions that come under the department account for the remainder.

What I propose doing now is to touch on a few of the categories referred to which can be found in the summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories at the back of the estimate book. May I take two or three of those and deal with them briefly. Category 1 deals with civil salaries and wages, and the amount in the estimates this year is $30,136,043 compared with $27,323,373 in the last fiscal year, an increase of $2,812,670. I think the house is entitled to some explanation for that increase.

The amount for 1952-53 covers salaries, wages and overtime payments for 11,541 positions which are detailed throughout the estimates. There is a net increase of thirty-seven positions over last year. This is considered remarkably low considering the nature of our operations. The net increase in positions to which I have just referred is the result of many internal changes in classifications. However, I might mention that seven new positions were provided for our new work boat in Newfoundland, and that eight additional positions were provided for the stand-by weather ship, St. Stephen, on the Pacific coast. These changes can be found if members want to refer to them in vote 470 dealing with marine steamers.

Then there are 38 new radio operators and assistant technicians needed as a result of the assumption by the department of three stations in the north Atlantic international aeronautical service at Goose, Montreal and Moncton. These services were formerly operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines and the details appear in vote 496, telecommunication division.

A significant decrease in positions has been achieved in aids to navigation due to 108 lightkeepers' positions of various classes being dropped because of the electrification of lights or when the attendance of minor lights has been provided for under local arrangement.

Then there is category 8 which deals with telephones, telegrams and other communication services. The amount provided under this category for the present fiscal year is $2,665,850 compared with $2,321,771 for 1951-52, an increase of $344,079. A portion of this increase is the result of the 18 per cent increase in rates authorized for telegraph services by the board of transport commissioners, effective November 1 last. In addition, other increases for telephone services have been approved by the board between 1950 and 1952, ranging between 17·8 per cent and 20·7 per cent according to locations.

In vote 500, Marconi operated radio stations, as the result of benefits granted company employees by a conciliation board in 1951 an additional $80,000 is required for salaries, etc. In vote 513 under the heading "communication networks leased for airway traffic control" there is the sum of $72,960 additional to meet requirements of the Department of National Defence, which accounts in part for the increase.

There are other increases such as $39,168 related to an increase of some 30 per cent in the volume of air traffic during 1951 requiring extension of communication facilities for proper safeguards to air traffic. Then I should like to deal with two other items in the estimates of the department. Perhaps I might take a few minutes to discuss them. In the estimate for category 16, "equipment—construction or acquisition", an amount of $9,906,394 is required compared with $6,786,060 in the last fiscal year, an increase of $3,120,334. I think the committee is entitled to some explanation of these increases. They are due to new equipment ranging anywhere from tugboats to the icebreaker for the Department of Transport and the new ferry to operate between North Sydney and Port aux Basques in Newfoundland.

May I go over these rapidly. In the canal service we re(re two tugs, one for the Ontario-St. Lav ence canals and one for the Welland canal at about the same cost of some $200,000 each. In marine services the icebreaker now under construction at the Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company Limited is to cost $7 million. Up to March 31, 1952, we had provided in the estimates for this purpose $2,900,000 and this year we have included $3,770,000 for this vessel. Then we require a new lighthouse supply and buoy tender vessel to operate out of the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, as a replacement for the present ship, the C. G. S. Franklin. The size of the new vessel will be 210 feet by 38 feet by 17·6 feet. To build a new, modern ship to replace the Franklin will cost in the vicinity of $2,200,000, for which the sum of $300,000 is included in these estimates. We also need for Saint John, New Brunswick, a smaller vessel to operate out of that port.

The Department of Transport has now assumed responsibility for the maintenance of lightering equipment taken over from the United States air force at Coral Harbour and Frobisher Bay by the R.C.A.F. Then we must make substantial repairs to the C. G. S. Lady Laurier, and we anticipate that because of the present condition of this ship repairs will be required to the extent of some $150,000.

It will be noted that no appropriation is made in the estimates of the Department of Transport this year toward the construction of a vessel to operate between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor, Maine. I had hoped it would be possible to proceed with this vessel this year, but after careful consideration it was decided that in view of the still tight steel situation construction of the ship should be delayed for the time being. I assure the committee, however, that as soon as the supply of steel is sufficiently improved the government proposes to construct this ship. All the plans and specifications have been prepared and the department will be in a position to proceed on short notice. This year my colleague the Minister of Public Works will purchase the necessary land at Yarmouth to build whatever works are necessary at the terminal of the ferry there. I believe some survey work has been undertaken already, and it is hoped progress will be made during the present fiscal year.

The last item in the vessel construction program is the provision of $4,015,000 for the auto ferry vessel for service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The estimated cost of this ship is $6 million. It is being built by Canadian Vickers in Montreal, and delivery is expected late in 1953. So far only $50,000 has been spent on this ship, but it is anticipated that during the present fiscal year it will be possible to proceed much more expeditiously.

Then may I deal with the last category, No. 13, which is next largest in amount to that dealing with the civil service classification. This has to do with the construction or acquisition of buildings and works, including land. The provision in the estimates under this heading for 1952-53 is $24,167,306 as compared to $20,799,018 during the last fiscal year, an increase of $3,368,288. This is represented by the construction of the Atwater tunnel under the Lachine canal in Montreal, for which we have provided $2,893,000. The estimated cost of this project is about $7 million, one-third of which is to be paid by the city of Montreal. There is also the St. Remi tunnel, construction of which was begun two years ago and for the completion of which there is a small amount in the estimates. I might mention that in the Welland canal we are at last going to build a still-water berth at Port Weller for the protection of our gate-lifter, which is a very expensive piece of equipment that could not be replaced today for less than $2 million.

There are a substantial number of other, smaller items with which I need not deal at the moment, but I would like to say a word in connection with the dredging of the St. Lawrence ship channel. In the estimates this year we have provided $2,821,326, an increase of approximately $800,000 over last year. The committee will remember that in the estimates last year a substantial amount was provided for the cleaning up of the contract entered into with Marine Industries Limited of Sorel. In June of 1950 a committee of five engineers was appointed by the Department of Transport to make recommendations as to the program of work to be followed both in the immediate future and over an extended period in regard to the deepening, widening and straightening of the St. Lawrence ship channel, having in mind the ultimate completion of the St. Lawrence deep waterway and the future development of the harbour of Montreal. By the late summer of 1951 the committee reported, advising that the channel is well designed except at certain places where experience has shown that cross currents, sharp bends and lack of adequate anchorage areas present some difficulties to navigation. Certain improvements were recommended to be undertaken as soon as possible. Because of this it was decided to prepare plans and specifications for the work, which the committee estimated would cost $12,540,000. Tenders were called early in March of this year and two firms submitted bids, Canadian Dredge and Dock Company at $13,943,000 and Marine Industries Limited at $13,021,000. The contract was awarded to the latter firm, and I announced this to the press sometime ago. It is a contract for a period of five years, for the work indicated above.

Then I should like to say a word about the strait of Canso project, concerning which I made an announcement in the house yesterday. For the causeway across the strait of Canso we are providing in this year's estimates $1,800,000, an increase of $800,000 over the amount voted last year. The situation with respect to this major undertaking may be summarized as follows. The causeway and lock project recommended by the reconvened board of engineers in their report of June, 1951, at an estimated cost of $22,760,000, is being undertaken by the government. The services of O. J. McCulloch and Company, consulting engineers of Montreal, were retained in October, 1951, to design and supervise construction of the project for a lump sum fee of $525,000, covering a construction period terminating in December, 1955. The project is to be awarded in four main contracts:

(a) Rock fill causeway and mainland approaches to subgrade level; total amount of rock fill estimated at 5 million cubic yards; work advertised for tender April 3 and tenders called for May 13, with completion date set for December 31, 1954. I announced yesterday that this contract has been awarded to a Vancouver firm, Northern Construction Company and J. W. Stewart Limited, at $5,800,000 odd.

(b) Lock, entrance piers and excavation for the lock and entrance channels; expect tenders to be called late in 1952 for work to commence in the early spring of 1953.

(c) About 13 miles of railway diversion on the mainland from the causeway to Linwood Junction and about three miles of rehabilitation of the existing Inverness line, to be called for tender by the Canadian National Railways in the spring of 1953.

(d) Railway and highway swing bridge over the lock, and steel gates for the lock, for which tenders are expected to be called in 1953.

Then, there is a substantial item in the estimates of $1,180,000 to continue the enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney. This is a decrease of $480,000 as compared to last year's estimates. As the house knows, that contract has been awarded to T. C. Gorman, of Nova Scotia, with the work being done under the supervision of the Department of Public Works. The new dock and terminal facilities at Port aux Basques are estimated to cost $3,700,000, and the work is still under way.

There are substantial expenditures under this category for telecommunication services, and there are as well increases over last year's vote in our telephone and telegraph services. The items are distributed in the various provinces of Canada. While I am on that I think I should communicate to the house that the expansion in the interior part of British Columbia has reached such a stage that the government is of the opinion that a commercial company should now provide telephone and telegraph facilities in that area. We do not feel the federal government should be the agency to serve the public in well developed and industrial areas. Arrangements will be made to dispose of our facilities in British Columbia to any commercial company which may be interested in continuing the operation as it presently exists, and at a standard of service no lower than is provided at the present time.

There is, too, a substantial program for the development of airways and airports, and it amounts to the sum of $7,267,000, or an increase of $427,000 over last year. Roughly speaking the projects cover runways at Gander, $200,000; Regina, $950,000; Grande Prairie, $150,000; Prince George, $930,000; Vancouver, $1,600,000 and terminal buildings at Moncton, $200,000; Ottawa, $50,000; lakehead, $100,000; Saskatoon, $100,000 and Winnipeg, $75,000. There are a number of categories with which I could deal if need be, but I believe I have given the house sufficient information to justify the increase in these very important items.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for giving the committee the statement which he has just read. It should be very helpful in the discussion of the different estimates of his department. I noticed that in each category of expenditure the motto seems to be "higher still and higher". No doubt many of these increases are necessary, but I would point out to the minister that we shall expect greater things from his department during this fiscal year than we did in the past year because of the extra money being allotted to him.

Mr. Chevrier: We have been doing fairly well in the department.

Mr. Green: If the minister is to get all these extra millions, then I believe we are entitled to expect better results from him and his department.

The item now under discussion is the general item, and today I propose to bring up two or three matters and other members of the official opposition will be doing the same thing. We would ask the minister to deal with these different questions when he speaks again on this item, rather than delaying his answers until some particular item is before the house. I ask that because last year, for example, we had the experience of raising the question of Canada's shipping policy on the first item; the minister said that would be dealt with when we came to the vote for the Canadian maritime commission. Unfortunately, by the time we got down to that vote the session was practically over, and there was no opportunity for a careful discussion of the policy. I think it would be much wiser if we could have these main questions of policy cleared up in the discussion on the administration item.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, and I have no objection to dealing with it in that way. I want an understanding from the hon. member, however, that when we come to the particular item we will not then have a second discussion on it. It is as broad as it is long, and I could deal with it at the outset if that is the wish of the committee, but I do not think I should be asked to deal with the matter again when we come to the item for the maritime commission or whatever it may be.

Mr. Green: I think the minister will find we shall be only too glad to co-operate with him when these items do come up. We have no intention of having a repetition of the arguments, and we are just as anxious to get the session ended in a businesslike way as the minister and the other members of the government.

First of all I ask the minister to make a statement of the policy of the government at the present time with regard to the Canadian merchant navy. I refer, of course, to ocean-going ships. I notice that in the estimates of the department there is a new item, No. 492, which reads as follows:

> Degaussing and strengthening of sea-going merchant ships of Canadian registry of 1,000 gross tons and over, $500,000.

In the explanations which were given to the press by the Department of Transport concerning the item, we find that this is supposed to commence equipping Canadian merchant vessels for service during a war; that the idea of the degaussing is as a protection against submarines, and the strengthening of the ships is so that they may be able to mount guns. In the press dispatches given at the time the estimates were brought down, we also find a statement that 79 ships in Canada's deep-sea trade will be equipped, along with 72 over 1,000 tons in the coastal business. The dispatch goes on to say that another group of Canadian-owned ships under British registry is expected to be handled the same way by British authorities and that there are about 80 vessels in the British registered group.

I do not know whether or not that figure of 79 ocean-going Canadian ships is correct today. That is one piece of information we should like to get from the minister. I would point out to the committee that at the end of the war Canada had 258 ocean-going vessels. I believe that there are now some 93 of these Canadian-built vessels which have been transferred to United Kingdom registry. Many others were sold. Apparently we are now in a position where our merchant navy has been reduced to 79 ships, or approximately that number. Furthermore, I understand that these ships are all old, slow cargo vessels. They were built during the war and none of them are fast, modern freighters, although the merchant navies of the other maritime nations, in these intervening years, have been receiving fast freighters. That is a situation which calls for serious consideration by the Canadian government and the Canadian people.

I need only point out to the minister that the subject was dealt with by the Canadian maritime commission in more than one of their reports. I have here the second report covering the period from April 1, 1948, to March 31, 1949, and at page 21 of that report we find the following statement with regard to the type of ships which Canada must have in her merchant navy. I am beginning to read at the foot of page 20 of the report which points out:

> For the second time in twenty-seven years a Canadian government was faced with the problem of what to do with a large number of merchant ships acquired through the exigencies of war. The ships were of standard types designed to meet a wartime emergency.

And this is the part I wish to emphasize.

> Their high fuel consumption, slow speed, and lack of refrigerated space unfitted them to hold their own against fast, modern, more economical cargo-liners which shortly after the war began to appear in British and foreign merchant fleets. It was obvious that, once the world-wide shortage of shipping had been overcome, the ships would not be able to compete with more efficient foreign vessels. Undoubtedly, the proper course was to replace the ships, and to that end, on the advice of the commission, the government evolved a replacement plan which is outlined later in this report.

I would point out that that replacement plan seems to have failed completely to bring about the construction and the acquisition of fast vessels. Then further down on the same page we find the commission pointing out the decline in shipping after the first world war. They say that was not necessarily due to the adoption of a policy of government ownership and operation but that a more important factor was the failure to replace obsolescent ships. That was after the first war. They were dealing with the failure after the first war. I believe we are making the same failure again after the second war.

The history of the Canadian merchant navy is one of building up and then allowing the ships to disappear or to fade away. We had, nearly 100 years ago, the great wooden shipbuilding industry in the maritimes. At that time the men from the maritimes were the outstanding seamen in the world. Their ships were built at home. They sailed the seven seas and made for Canada, in the era of wooden ships, a reputation that has never been beaten. Then, as hon. members know, steel ships came into use and the wooden shipbuilding industry of the maritimes faded away.

In the first war we built many steel cargo vessels; but after that war our merchant marine again faded away. I hope I am wrong, but it seems to be doing the same thing now. A year or two after the end of this recent war the world shipping situation became extremely difficult. Business was not very lucrative and there were more ships than were required. In order to help, the government adopted different policies. There was this replacement plan, to which I referred a few minutes ago, under which owners of Canadian vessels were allowed to sell their ships to foreign countries, provided that the proceeds were put in a replacement fund held in trust by the government, and from which it was planned that funds would come for the construction of new vessels.

Then we had a plan of subsidizing. Provision was made, for a period of one year, for the subsidizing of, I think, 40 Canadian vessels so that they could continue in business. Furthermore, a plan was devised under which a total of 123 Canadian vessels could be transferred to British registry so that they could operate in the sterling area. At the present time apparently there are 80 or 90 —I think the figure is somewhere about 90— of such Canadian-owned ships, operating under British registry doing business in the sterling area and manned by British crews.

With the outbreak of war in Korea that shipping picture changed and the shipping business became lucrative again. I believe that the shipping companies are now doing fairly well. The Canadian merchant navy, however, seems to be fading away. Certainly there is little evidence of any fast, modern cargo vessels being acquired.

Mr. Chairman, this tense world situation is not one which will be over in a month or a year. I do not think there are many members of the present House of Commons who will live to see the end of the present period of tension unless something happens in Russia in the meantime. We are in a situation which will probably last for a good many years. The only thing that would change it would be a third world war; and nobody in his or her senses wants that. But here we are in this present world situation. Canada occupies an important position in world affairs, partially because she is on the North American continent, and shipping is extremely important. The products of this continent will have to be carried in someone's ships if trouble develops. Without adequate shipping the North Atlantic Treaty Organization nations could easily get into serious difficulties. Here we are with a Canadian merchant navy made up of old ships, just sitting ducks for the fast modern submarines of which Russia has a far larger number than the Germans ever had. Our Canadian navy will be used to protect freighters, and the whole picture is such that we must modernize our merchant fleet. I believe this is the time to do it. Certainly this is the time to be making a start; and I hope the minister will be able to tell us that his department has some plans to bring about such modernization.

Another factor to be considered is the St. Lawrence waterway. We have set up a St. Lawrence seaway authority. The house is committed almost unanimously to the construction of that waterway. It is hoped that ocean-going cargo vessels will be sailing to Fort William and Port Arthur. I sometimes think that the keenest advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway expect to see the Queen Mary dock in Toronto harbour some fine summer morning. In any event it is hoped that there will be many ocean-going vessels using that waterway. This is one development which should change our attitude toward the Canadian merchant navy.

We now have iron, and we should be able to make the steel to build these vessels. We have the oil with which to fuel them. We have the coal. We have uranium, and those other facilities required for the development of atomic energy. Hon. members will have noticed that within the last week or ten days it has been announced in the press that the United States has laid down the keel of the first submarine to be powered by atomic energy. Those are facts which Canadians should bear in mind when considering a Canadian merchant navy policy.

Five years ago, in the session of 1947, we passed an act setting up the Canadian maritime commission. At that time we had high hopes that the commission would be able to give a lead toward the modernization of the Canadian merchant navy. We find that in that act section 6 reads as follows:

> The commission shall consider and recommend to the minister from time to time such policies and measures as it considers necessary for the operation, maintenance, manning and development of a merchant marine and shipbuilding and ship repairing industry commensurate with Canadian maritime needs.

There was a provision for the setting up of advisory committees to help the commission work out a policy for Canada. The act also gave very wide powers to the chairman of the commission. In effect, he was given the status of a deputy minister, and I believe was to be responsible directly to the Minister of Transport. That was a very fine start, and the commission was duly established. A chairman was appointed from the city of Vancouver, our most distinguished marine lawyer in the person of Mr. J. V. Clyne, now Mr. Justice Clyne of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, where he is doing an excellent job, just as he did as chairman of the commission.

Mr. Clyne resigned on July 7, 1950, almost two years ago, after having done a splendid job as chairman. One need only read the earlier reports of the commission to realize what an excellent job was done. The whole history of the Canadian merchant navy is therein set out, and recommendations are made. I think each of the plans to which I have referred was recommended by Mr. Clyne and other members of his commission.

What has happened since then? Mr. Clyne resigned on July 7, 1950, and the deputy minister of transport, Mr. J. C. Lessard, assumed the chairmanship of the commission on December 13, 1950, five months later. I have no criticism to make of Mr. Lessard. I think he is an excellent deputy minister, doing a first class job in a department which presents just as many difficulties as any other department of government. He continues to be chairman of the commission to the present time. This can only mean that it is impossible to have the same consideration given to this policy as was given during the regime of Mr. Clyne. Mr. Lessard is frightfully busy in the discharge of his departmental activities. Certainly he is not in a position to work out a shipping policy for Canada under the present difficult conditions; and it will never be possible for the Canadian maritime commission to function as it was supposed to function until we have a full-time chairman. I should hope that the department would wake up and appoint a chairman, the best man they can find in the shipping industry, and that the appointment would be made without any further delay. I do not believe that under the present set-up the commission is being given a proper chance. Mr. Lessard and his fellow commissioners are not being given the opportunity to do a first class job. Something should be done to remedy this situation.

The annual reports of the commission are getting smaller and smaller. It appears that the commission is becoming just another branch of government; and in the last report which covers that period to the end of March 1951 there is no mention whatever of the need for a modernized merchant navy, or of any method of meeting that need. So much for the merchant navy policy.

There is another subject about which I should like to hear the minister speak, and that has to do with the national harbours board. Here we have a board set up in 1936, I believe it was, to take charge of the great national harbours of our country. That is a very important job. Yet we find a similar situation existing in the national harbours board. The annual report for the calendar year 1951 states that the vice-chairman of the board, Mr. J. E. St. Laurent, C.M.G., M.E.I.C., retired on July 1, 1951. Apparently he has not yet been replaced. Here we have a board which is not being carried on in the manner intended by the original act. For nearly a year now the board has been functioning with two members instead of the full membership of three.

We are becoming worried in Vancouver, which is one of these national harbours. We have a wonderful natural harbour there; we believe the finest on the west coast of Canada or of the United States. We have been surprised to learn in recent weeks that the entrance to that harbour needs dredging an additional five feet or otherwise the newest oil tankers and cargo vessels will be able to enter the harbour only at high tide. Already some of these vessels have had to wait outside the harbour until the tide was right to permit them to come in.

These ships are being built larger all the time. For example, they have 25,000-ton cargo vessels and I believe they are building 40,000-ton oil tankers. The Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company are now in the process of constructing a pipe line from Edmonton to the west coast and they have stated that it may not be possible to erect dockage to serve oil tankers in Vancouver harbour unless the first and second narrows are dredged.

The result has been that various public bodies, including the city council, have united to urge that this additional dredging be done without further delay. We understand that a dredging program was developed by the Department of Public Works or the Department of Transport before the second war. We urge that that plan be taken out of the filing cabinets; that dredges be put to work and that these narrows be deepened by a further five feet as well as widening the harbour entrance.

The whole economy of Vancouver is based on the harbour, which is also the outlet for most of the province. British Columbia has been expanding at a tremendous rate. You will have noticed that a bill received third reading today authorizing the building of a branch line from Terrace to Kitimat on the Canadian National Railways line to Prince Rupert. That Alcan project is only one of many huge developments that are under way in the province and to most of these Vancouver harbour is essential.

Thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of supplies go through the harbour each day destined for Kitimat. We believe that with the installation of the oil pipe line and the construction of refineries there will be a greatly expanded trade in and out of the harbour. I suggest to the minister that he confer with his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to see if some arrangement cannot be made to get this needed dredging done at once.

This brings up another point. Before the national harbours board was set up the different ports were operated by local harbour commissions, just as the port of New Westminster is now operated. With the setting up of the national harbours board the local people lost control. I have always contended that there should at least be advisory councils in the interested cities. As far back as 1931 and 1932 a survey was made by Sir Alexander Gibb, the British port authority, of all our national ports including Vancouver. He recommended strongly that while there should be a national harbours board in charge of all these ports, there should also be local advisory councils. I should like to quote from page 31 of his report where we find the following recommendation:

> It is essential to avoid emasculating the local administration, since no centralized control can replace an efficient and active local administration, or the special knowledge and initiative of the local business community, both of which are vital to a port's prosperity.
> For this latter reason I strongly advocate a local advisory council. There are very many aspects of port working which such a council can properly care for, such as the representation of the interests of private wharf owners, of local merchants and distributors, of local consignees and exporters, of the labour view and of the attitude of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, corn exchanges and other such trade organizations, in addition to shipping.
> It serves very usefully to identify the community with the port; and to secure the support and interest of local members of parliament, the city council, or provincial government in schemes, and so anticipate and meet criticisms from any such quarters, or action that might be prejudicial to the port.
> It is invaluable in exploring the possibilities of local markets, in carrying out advertisement and propaganda and in co-operation with interests likely to promote industrial developments. Finally, a local council provides a useful check on the tendency of more or less permanent officials to become stereotyped or arbitrary.

I do not believe the present difficulty would have arisen in Vancouver harbour if there had been a local advisory council operating which would have been in position to realize that this problem of accommodating new and larger freighters was developing.

This brings me to my final point, the attitude of the Department of Transport to some of the airports in the country. Outside Vancouver one of Canada's great international airports is located on Sea island just a few minutes drive from the southern boundary of the city. From that airport planes take off every day to fly in every direction including to the Orient. I note that Canadian Pacific Air Lines is now proposing to ask permission to institute a service from Vancouver to South American ports. Sea Island airport is in the same category in the west as Dorval is in the east. It was founded by the city of Vancouver and for some years now there has been a lot of haggling and horse-trading going on between the Department of Transport and the city about the dominion taking over the airport. I believe the Minister of Transport has offered $420,000. That is the highest figure I have seen published. On the other hand the city has asked for $2,175,000, although I think it has been intimated that it would sell for considerably less than that figure.

The city has a great deal of money in the airport. It has bonds outstanding which were issued to help finance the airport amounting, I believe, to at least $300,000. I do not understand why there should be all this delay in getting the question settled. The suggestion has been made that the process of expropriation should be used and that the exchequer court should decide what is a fair figure. Whether or not that is the right way to settle the difficulty I do not know, but certainly it is hard to imagine such a situation being allowed to continue so far as either Dorval or Malton airport is concerned. It may be because we are so far away from Ottawa that the people here just shrug their shoulders and do not worry very much about getting a question like this settled, but here is something which is the responsibility of the Department of Transport and it should be settled without further delay.

Another difficulty with respect to the airport is that all the traffic to and from must pass over a rickety old wooden bridge known as the Marpole bridge. The federal government, the provincial government and the city council are snarling at each other and suggesting that the other fellow should make a start on getting the bridge replaced. This has been going on for two or three years and nothing has happened. People going to the airport are delayed and sometimes miss their planes. Little tugs by the dozen are going up the waterway every day and the bridge has to be opened to let them through. Hon. members will recall that when we raised this question last year the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said that he had driven a milk cart over the same bridge when he was a very young man. That makes us realize the great need for some improvement.

Incidentally, I should like to pause for a moment to say how delighted I am, and I am sure I speak for all members of the house, to see the hon. member for Vancouver East about the building again. He has had a long and trying illness. I met him in the building this morning. While he has not been in the house he is able to come to the building. His fellow citizens of Vancouver are particularly pleased because there has never been a member from that city who has been more highly respected than the present member for Vancouver East. He is the senior member from British Columbia. He has been here since 1930, has always been sincere and conscientious and has had the admiration of all his fellow members whether or not they agree with all his views. Personally I am very glad that he is able to get around again.

The question of the Marpole bridge is another problem that should be solved, and I do not think anybody except the dominion government can take the lead. I hope the minister will initiate steps that will lead to a solution of the problem. Because of the shipping involved and because of the airport, the problem is of more concern to his department than any other.

I will not trespass on the time of the committee further. I hope the minister will deal with these matters before this vote is passed. May I suggest to him in all kindness that, with Canada moving ahead as it is in these days, he might very well consider getting his department out of the rut and making it a vital force in the development of the nation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first of all I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will be most grateful for the very kind words with reference to him which were expressed a few moments ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. We who are perhaps a little closer to the hon. member for Vancouver East because we are his colleagues know how thoroughly true are the things that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said about our distinguished colleague. We all appreciate deeply what has been said. Like other hon. members who showed their appreciation when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra spoke so kindly and so highly of our deputy leader, we are indeed pleased that he is making such good progress toward health. We hope that in addition to his being able to be about the building it will not be long until we will have him with us again in this chamber.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport is to be commended for the way in which he opened the discussion of his estimates today. He made a general statement with particular reference to the changes that have been made respecting his estimates and with reference to a number of innovations. It is a statement which will be helpful to us as we proceed. I hope he will not mind if during the course of discussing his estimates he finds us asking questions about some of the matters he dealt with in his general statement. It would be helpful to have some of this information put upon the record in closer relationship to the items that we will be discussing as we go along.

Like many others, this is a department which asks for a considerable sum of money to be voted by parliament, and it is our duty before voting a sum of money approaching $100 million to examine its estimates in detail. It is our task as we go along to scrutinize each estimate and to make sure, so far as we can be sure from the information we can obtain, whether or not the increases asked for are justified.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, as the minister was making his statement, and indeed during the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I could not help feeling that this department is a very good example of what government spending really is. Here we have not just a case of spending money for the sake of spending it, but rather a case of providing on a community or co-operative basis many important aids which individual persons or firms or companies could not provide for themselves. A very large portion of the money we are being asked to vote to be expended by the Department of Transport is for aids to travel by land, by sea and by air. There is also a fair amount of money for telecommunication services of one kind and another and another sum of money for meteorological services which are of benefit to the whole country in many ways.

There are those both in this house and outside it who at times like to prate about the glories and virtues of private enterprise, which is supposed to be able to stand on its own feet. But here we have a very good example of things which even that vaunted private enterprise which we have in this country cannot do for itself. There are things of the kind dealt with in these estimates which can be provided only by community or co-operative effort, and that is what we are doing in voting the money that pays for these various aids.

As one goes through the estimates of this department he cannot help recognizing what a valuable service is being performed, and I believe we all take a particular pride and interest in the work of the Department of Transport. It was interesting today to hear the number of new steps being taken, of the progress in connection with the ferry service from Yarmouth across to the New England coast, of the progress in connection with the construction of the causeway across the strait of Canso, of the progress of the St. Lawrence project, and the progress in connection with tunnels and bridges in various parts of the country. This is a story of helping to develop our country, a story of the people doing it themselves through the instrument of government. But, as I say, Mr. Chairman, despite any satisfaction we may have over what this really means, as I have tried to spell it out just now, it is nevertheless our duty to examine these estimates closely as we go along to make sure no money is being asked which is not fully justified.

In view of the way we are handling these estimates it is necessary that any of us who have particular matters we want to draw to the attention of the minister do so at this time. There is one subject I have taken up with him repeatedly—and he would be the first to accept that word and underline it—which has not yet been solved. That is the problem of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways whose pension consists only of the basic $25 a month. I believe I know the story fairly well. I know the origin of that basic pension and of the whole pension set-up of the Canadian National which provided for different kinds of plans. I know the story of what has happened in recent years, how the matter has been discussed on the floor of this house, in the committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, and so on. I know there have been discussions between the company and the men themselves at various levels, and that the whole question was discussed in particular by the pensions committee of the Canadian National Railways. I know, too, that a new set of rules has been promulgated recently which provide some potential improvement for those still in the service. They also provide improvements for some of those already retired, namely those on pensions that were at least in part contributory, in other words the men who have pensions of something more than $25 a month. But nothing has yet been done for those already retired whose pension is only that basic amount of $25. The number of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways in that category is something over 3,000.

For the last two or three years one of the answers given when we have brought forward the plight of these men has been the suggestion that something would be done for them if and when the means test were removed from the old age pension. That has been done, of course, and any of these men 70 years of age and over qualify for that pension regardless of what other means they may have. I submit, however, that this has not discharged the obligation of the final employers of these men to those who are on these small pensions. I used the phrase "final employers" advisedly. Despite the contention that in a sense the Canadian National Railways is a separate entity which handles its own affairs, in the last analysis the entire system is owned by the people of Canada. That means the government, indeed this parliament, must be regarded as the final employer of these people, and I feel we must yet find some way to supplement and increase the amount of that basic pension.

Although I am not a member of the committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, I have followed the proceedings of that committee with interest and attention. The matter has been raised there, but about all that has come out of the discussion in that committee is the fact that the president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, sees no possibility of the Canadian National itself dealing with this problem. It seems to me that makes it clear that if we are going to get action on this anywhere it will have to be at the level of the government itself; and the only way we can get action from the government, it seems, is for us to exercise our right in parliament to draw this matter to the attention of the government until something is done.

I remind the minister, as I have done on previous occasions, that there is a precedent for this in one of the items we will be called upon to vote a little later. I refer to the item that relates to the railway employees provident fund. That is a case in which a statute stipulates that the pension is to be the sum of $20 per month. The statute still says that pensions shall be $20 a month, but for many years now—in fact it must run to something like thirty years—there has been an item in the estimates every year to supplement that $20 up to a figure of $30 a month. This supplementary benefit was first provided in the form of an estimate shortly after the close of world war I, when it would seem to be obvious that the people of that day realized that with rising costs it was not fair to ask these people to continue on pensions of only $20 a month. I do not wish to be interpreted as being satisfied with that figure of $30 a month. No one would suspect that. I am merely quoting it as a precedent, showing that the government of Canada can step in and by means of a special estimate rectify a wrong of this kind.

I feel it is grossly wrong and unfair to these more than 3,000 retired employees of the Canadian National Railways that there should be no improvement in their basic pension of $25 a month. I plead with the minister, just as strongly as I can, to take this whole question under advisement at the ministerial level and indeed at the cabinet level. Let him not say to us again that it should go to a committee or that it should be discussed with the Canadian National Railways. This is a problem that is now on the doorstep of the minister, and of the government itself. I feel it is their responsibility, in the name of parliament, to introduce an item in the estimates or whatever legislation may be necessary, to see to it that those who have only that basic pension of $25 a month get an increase to some more reasonable figure.

A few years ago, when I first started to present this case, I suggested a minimum figure of $40 a month. Certainly, that is still a minimum. But with what has happened to living costs and to the problems confronting these people, perhaps an even higher amount than that should now be stipulated as the minimum. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I raise this question now, and I press it upon the minister as a problem that should be considered by him and by the cabinet for action by the government without further delay. It is a matter of extreme urgency to those who are affected.

Another subject upon which I hope we can get some information as we proceed has to do with the subject of grade crossings. On one or two previous occasions we have had a little difficulty discussing that item in the detailed portion of the estimates, because of the way in which the item is set out. Actually, it is a statutory item, though it does seem to come under the provisions of the administration item with respect to the board of transport commissioners. Perhaps to avoid any procedural difficulty at that point, we might have something on it from the minister at this stage of the estimates. I do not ask that he deal with it immediately following my remarks or even today, but that he include it in whatever organization he is making of what he is going to say before the first item passes. We should like to know how many projects for the elimination of grade crossings have been undertaken during the past twelve months, and how many have been completed. We should like to know what projects for the elimination of grade crossings are now in the process of construction. We should like to know how many applications for the elimination of grade crossings are before the board of transport commissioners today, and what consideration is being given to them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, most of the other items with which I have to deal can be dealt with as we proceed with the estimates in detail. Before I sit down, however, there is one rather minor matter, but still it has an element of importance, which I should like to draw to the minister's attention. I have in my hand copies of three forms. The numbers are 2068/2-43; 2036/2-49 and 2038/5-45. These forms are all printed under the name of the Department of Transport and relate to the application for a certificate for proficiency in radio. On one of these forms entitled "Application to attend examination for certificate of proficiency in radio", I find a number of requirements. In the lower half of this form I read that this application must be accompanied by the following documents, and then there is a list following that. No. 3 in that list reads:

Two reference letters, from persons of British parentage (not being relatives) testifying . . .

My question is as to the reason for that phrase "British parentage" as being required before a person can write a letter of reference for one making this application. It so happens that the person from whom I received these forms, on making his application went for one of these letters of reference to the minister of his church. The minister happens to be a well known and highly respected minister of one of the churches in the city in Winnipeg. He looked over this form and said, "Well, I am afraid I cannot sign it because my parents are Icelandic." I am sure that this wording is not in accord with whatever was the intention of the department. I do not know what the version of this phrase is in the French translation of this form, but I presume there is one. I do not know what happens in that case, but it should be quite interesting.

At any rate, I have drawn it to the attention of the minister, and perhaps he will look into it. At some stage in the discussion he could tell us why that phrase is there, or preferably tell us it has been changed to something else. It seems to me that what counts when you ask for a letter of reference is the qualification of the person who is writing the letter, and not something with respect to his parents. I hope that matter will be looked into as well as the others I have drawn to the minister's attention, particularly the problem of the Canadian National retired pensioners on $25 a month.

Mr. Johnston: I wish to take part in this debate at this time, Mr. Chairman, because the subject which I have in mind does not seem to come under any particular item of the estimates. A serious national problem has arisen regarding transportation. This problem concerns the very existence of an important and essential part of our national life. The continuance of truck transportation is being threatened by the railways entering into agreements with western oil companies, namely, Imperial Oil and North Star Oil Company, under the agreed charges section of the act. These agreements cover about 75 per cent of their products, and set exceptionally low rates in that area lying west of Winnipeg. This low rate would force truckers out of this field entirely. This becomes an exceptionally serious problem, Mr. Chairman, when we of the western provinces must depend upon truck transportation for the greater portion of our transportation facilities.

The other day I had occasion to read an article with regard to this subject in the magazine entitled Bus and Truck Transport. This magazine is edited by Mr. Arthur F. Hailey who is not in any way connected with the trucking industry. I believe this magazine is published by the Maclean publishing establishment and that it is a well recognized magazine throughout Canada. This young man, Mr. Arthur Hailey, has spent a large part of his time in becoming thoroughly acquainted with trucking problems and has been appointed editor of this magazine. In the issue of March, 1952, at page 44 he has this to say:

New Rail "Agreed Charge" Threatens Tank Truckers

A new "agreed charge" plan for petroleum products is likely to have a big effect on western Canadian tank truck operators. In some cases the truckers may be forced out of business altogether.

The agreed charge proposal was announced March 1 by the Canadian Freight Association on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railways, and Northern Alberta and Winnipeg River Railways.

The contracting parties are Imperial Oil Ltd., and North Star Oil Ltd. All shipments of both companies between the head of the lakes and the Pacific coast will be affected.

Then he goes on to speak further about the matter.

This agreed charge, to which reference is made in the article which I have just quoted, is part of the Transport Act which was first brought down in this house in the discussion in 1937, and was enacted in 1938. Part V is the section which deals with the agreed charge. When the royal commission on transportation was having its hearings, it had to do with this section on agreed charges, and at page 88 of that report "agreed charge" is defined in this manner:

An "agreed charge" is a rate agreed upon by a carrier for the transport of all or any part of the goods of any shipper or group of shippers.

As I said a moment ago, this Transport Act, of which agreed charge is a part, was passed in this house in 1938. In the United Kingdom there is a similar act, called the Road and Rail Traffic Act, which was passed back in 1933, and which has to do with a similar problem. The great difference between the United Kingdom act and our act is that ours is much more restrictive and can come to the point where it eliminates competition rather than meet that competition. If I am informed correctly, the United Kingdom act does not go that far. The country to the south of us, a great admirer of free enterprise—and we say that we are too in this country—is also a country of free competition; and we pride ourselves in that respect also. But in the United States, as I have been informed, they have no such act as we have here in Canada.

The purpose of the agreed charge was to meet competition. I remember that, back in 1937—because I was on that committee—this section was strenuously opposed by me. I could see quite clearly then that there was a possibility that the railways, if they saw fit to use the power which was being given to them, could eliminate any competitor in the field of transportation. There is some reference to that matter at page 92 of the report of the royal commission. I say at this point that it is my opinion that the railways are endeavouring even to tighten the act so that they will be able—I was going to say—to meet this competition, but in effect the result would be to eliminate their competitors rather than to meet them on fair ground. At page 92 of the report, in summing up the submissions made by the railways, the commission has this to say:

> If the agreed charge is aimed chiefly at the trucks (and this is what the railways say) it is hard to see what there is to prevent the railways and the water carriers from entering together into agreed charge contracts on the basis of proper traffic differentials.

The danger is that when the railways and the water carriers—although the latter do not enter into my argument so much as do the railways—these two large transporting concerns, get together under an agreed charge, there is nothing to stop them from eliminating their competitors entirely. It does not in any sense provide competition. I think that competition is a highly desirable thing. I am going to say that, because of the increased competition from trucks, there has been an endeavour, at least on the part of the railways, to modernize their methods of transportation in order to meet this competition.

The railways claim that the reason they must have this agreed charge is that the truckers are draining off the more profitable business and are leaving the railways that business which is less profitable. I have here before me a clipping which I took from the Calgary Albertan of Saturday, January 26, 1952. It refers to the increases in freight rates. The heading is: "4½ Per Cent Freight Rate Increase Granted." "Place Time Limit on New Schedules." This is the important subheading that I wish hon. members to note:

> Jump brings to 70 per cent the increase in rail freight tolls from 1948 levels; board places some restrictions on firms.

With the tremendous increase in freight rates as indicated in that article, it would seem to me that the railways are not so badly in need of increased revenues as to make it necessary to eliminate their competitors. There is every ground for believing that the railways should be in a position to meet competition. But when you go to the extent of eliminating your opposition entirely, free enterprise ceases to exist. This problem has come to the fore particularly in Saskatchewan, but it affects Manitoba and Alberta as well, and probably British Columbia also.

I have here a circular which was sent out by the Saskatchewan motor dealers association. I have no intention of reading all of it, but shall put only a small portion of it on the record. It says:

> Item one on bulk oil freight rates: We understand that the railways have offered the oil companies operating west of Fort William a special agreed charge on the condition that they use only rail facilities. According to information we have received the following figures furnish the picture:

And then they set out three columns, about seven rows each. I would ask the permission of the committee to have part of this document put on Hansard, so the hon. members may be able to compare the rates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why not read it?

Mr. Johnston: It would be awkward to read. However, I shall read some of it. With the permission of the committee I would ask to have this one section of the document placed on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Johnston: It is as follows:

	Present rail rates (per 100 lbs.)	Proposed rail rates (per 100 lbs.)	Present Sask. truck rates (per 100 lbs.)
20 miles	22	5	13
50 miles	34	11	18
75 miles	45	16	23
100 miles	53	21	31
150 miles	63	30	39
200 miles	76	40	46
300 miles	95	68	61

It will be noted that this table gives in the first column the present rail rates per hundred pounds, the second column the proposed rail rates, and the third column the present Saskatchewan truck rate. The first column also gives mileage figures. For instance, for a distance of twenty miles the present rail rate is 22 cents per hundred pounds, and the proposed rate as set out in the second column is 5 cents. The present Saskatchewan truck rate for the same weight is 13 cents. For a distance of fifty miles the present rail rate is 34 cents; the new rate rail will be 11 cents, and the truck rate 18 cents.

I use these two examples to show how the new agreement under the agreed charges, into which the railways are entering, would affect the situation. I understand the approval of the board of transport commissioners has not yet been given, but that negotiations are being carried on, on the assumption that there will be approval. Why a railway company could make that assumption and proceed to complete its contract, I cannot understand. But apparently that is what is happening.

Mr. Chevrier: That is what they have to do under the act.

Mr. Johnston: I am sure the minister must be right; but it does seem to me that before the railways could complete that arrangement they should first have to get the permission of the board of transport commissioners to make these charges. Apparently however that is not so.

It will be noted that in the first instance the railways are now charging 22 cents per hundred pounds for a distance of twenty miles, and trucks are charging 13 cents, or a difference of 9 cents. If the railways were sincere in meeting competition—and the royal commission has said that that was the purpose of the act—they would be lowering their rates from 22 cents to 13 cents, and competing from a service standpoint. But they are not doing that. They are lowering their rate to 5 cents. Yet I think the Railway Act states specifically that the railways shall not haul any commodity whereby they effect a loss.

If the railways have been charging 22 cents and are now prepared to come down to 5 cents, they must have been making an exorbitant profit in the first place—an unwarranted profit—on the transportation of oil and oil products in western Canada. As I said before, I have no objection to the railways meeting competition by the use of this agreed charge; but when they come to the point of lowering their rates by 17 cents per hundred pounds, for a distance of twenty miles, it seems to me most clear that they are endeavouring to push the trucking industry out of western Canada.

Hon. members will see at once the position western Canada would be in if this were done. We are not so favourably situated as the people in eastern and central Canada, where there is effective water competition. And so in large measure we are going to have to depend in the future upon transportation by trucks.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not interrupt the hon. member because I knew he wanted to speak about agreed charges, and that he wanted to discuss the matter generally. However, he has had a pretty fair opportunity to do that. I would remind him that this matter is now sub judice; it is before the board. I believe the hearing is to be either in Regina or in Moose Jaw either this week or early next week. While I have no objection to a general discussion, the hon. member is now dealing with a matter with which a court of record will be dealing in the near future. In view of that I should hope that perhaps he might think he has met his purpose by placing on record the observations he has made thus far. I intend to reply, but I do not wish to deal with matters before the board.

Mr. Johnston: I do not pretend to be a lawyer; I did not know this matter was before the board. However, I was only leading up to a suggestion I wished to make to the minister—and I am sure the board will not take seriously anything I am saying, anyway. I think the minister need not be unduly alarmed in that respect.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not alarmed.

Mr. Johnston: I doubt whether the railways will take any notice of it either, but I do hope the minister will. The matter to which I shall now refer is one which I suggest merits consideration by the minister, and I would hope that he would see that something might be done in connection with it. I am sure the board is not dealing with the matter I am about to discuss.

Up to the moment I have been placing certain facts on the record. At this time, if I am permitted, I should like to say that under the Transport Act—and I am sure the board is not dealing with that—there is the possibility, as the act now stands, of doing a great injury to western Canada. It was never the intention of the act, when it was being discussed by the committee in 1937, to make it possible for the railways to eliminate their competitors. That would be a serious thing indeed.

We will recall that during the last war the trucking industry in Canada performed a worth-while task in the conveyance of war materials from one part of Canada to the other. They did their job with a degree of convenience and rapidity the railways could never hope to equal. Then we will recall that during the railway strike about a year ago the trucks carried on. It would have been serious for Canada if we had not had a properly organized trucking system capable of transporting fuel oil products from one end of Canada to the other. We are in a very vulnerable position in this country, particularly in the event of war. One of the first things that would be knocked out of commission would be our railroads. If you eliminate the tank trucks used for carrying oil and oil products we would be in a most vulnerable position. I do not think we should ever permit ourselves to get into such a situation.

So serious has this become that the Saskatchewan government has taken some part in it and a resolution was passed in the legislature regarding this matter. I should like to quote from an article in the Western Producer of April 3, 1952, reading as follows:

Saskatchewan Backs Truckers' Case

The Saskatchewan legislature this week approved a resolution urging the federal government to amend the Transport Act so that highway truckers can appear before the board of transport commissioners to present their views on agreed charges.

The resolution, which was moved by A. H. McDonald, Liberal, Moosomin, received support from all house members but one—V. P. Deshaye, Liberal, Melville.

Mr. McDonald said there were 20,000 trucks for hire in the province and any group of that size should have the right to be heard before the transport board.

I want to speak about the right of the truckers to appear before the board of transport commissioners and object to contracts being entered into under the agreed charges clause. Somebody may say that I am arguing to have the trucking industry brought under the board of transport commissioners and under federal control, but I am doing no such thing.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, you are.

Mr. Johnston: Oh, no, I am not. I think it would be wrong to have our trucking transport system placed under federal control, and I think the minister realizes that that would not be a proper thing to do. What I am talking about is the privilege that should be accorded to the truckers to appear before the board of transport commissioners which is accorded to the railroads by the provincial bodies. Trucking today is under provincial jurisdiction and is regulated by provincial bodies. However, the railroads have the right to appear before those bodies to make their submissions. Then the board dealing with the matter of rates and so on is in position to say whether the rates are fair and equitable and to judge whether the rates used by the trucking companies will endanger the life of the railroads. That is the way it should be.

[Mr. Johnston.]

That being so, why are not the truck transport carriers accorded the same right to appear before the board of transport commissioners to present their arguments? That does not mean to say that the board of transport commissioners shall be bound by their submission. They are perfectly free to come to any conclusion which they think is wise. To allow the trucking organizations to appear before the board of transport commissioners would in no way jeopardize the position of the railroads but it would give considerable enlightenment to the views of the board of transport commissioners. This is the thought of the royal commission on transportation, because at page 93 of the report we find this:

It is important also that shippers and carriers should have an opportunity of being heard, so that the board may be made aware of all aspects of the question.

That is exactly my point, that the board of transport commissioners should be made aware of all the aspects of the question. I do not know just what rewording of the act would be necessary to permit the truck transport association to appear before the board of transport commissioners to make their presentations without becoming bound by the terms of the act. That is a lawyer's problem and I am sure that there are enough in this house to see that we get the proper wording if the government decides to amend the act accordingly.

This question is of such importance to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia that the government should consider amending the Transport Act in such a way as to permit the truck transport carriers to appear before the board of transport commissioners to present their case so that board shall be made aware of all the aspects of the case. This could be done without placing the truck transport business under federal control. Something must be done if we are to permit this great trucking industry to survive.

I want to refer to one other conclusion of the royal commission. I said before that when this bill was brought before the committee in 1937, of which I was a member, it was never the intention of that committee to permit any major industry to eliminate its competitor. The royal commission has this to say at page 95 of its report:

It appears obvious that parliament did not intend the agreed charges to be a weapon to destroy or eliminate competition but rather to enable the railways to meet competition.

It does not take a Philadelphia lawyer, it does not take any lawyer, and it does not take even an Ottawa lawyer, as has been indicated to me, to understand that if we allow this act to continue in its present form, if we permit the railroad companies to cut rates so low that the trucking industry will be put out of business entirely, then we create a condition which requires the attention of every member of this house. It is something so important nationally that I hope the minister will give it due consideration.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to compliment the minister upon the splendid way in which he has introduced his estimates this afternoon. I feel quite sure that as a consequence the study of the transport items will be much more orderly and successful. I do not intend to take very long this afternoon but there is one thing I should like to discuss and I hope the minister will be able to afford some comfort when he speaks in reply.

Before I introduce this subject I should like to say to the minister that I noted how manfully he struggled against very strong forces in this house and the country last fall when his Bill No. 12 was being considered. I thought he stood up admirably to all those forces and I want to compliment him on the way that he conducted his affairs in connection with the passage of that bill. I know what he was up against. I know what he was trying to do, and I think he achieved a great thing by the passage of the amendments to the Railway Act introducing the principle of equalization of freight rates and the one and one-third rule. However, I am quite sure the minister must feel, as I do at the moment, somewhat disappointed at what has happened since that time.

If I am well informed—and if I am not I am sure the minister will set me right—the railways hastened to file with the board of transport commissioners a new schedule of transcontinental rates, particularly one that applies to the transport of certain commodities from eastern territory to the Pacific coast. My information is that the board approved the new schedule. I presume that the railways in filing the schedule presented arguments which must have swayed the board to induce its members to give their approval.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact the board cannot do anything about that?

Mr. Low: I am given to understand that they did, and that is the thing that rather puzzled me. There is a new schedule of rates which I shall deal with in a moment, and to quite an extent it nullifies the effect of the legislation passed by the house last December. Not very much time has elapsed and there must be some reasons for the haste other than those that I can see. For a good many months prior to this spring the railways had been able to maintain the old schedule of transcontinental competitive rates. As far as we can gather, no thought had been given to increasing those rates until the one and one-third rule was under consideration by parliament last fall.

Veiled threats were made in the committee by the representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Those who were members of the committee will remember all too well that veiled threats were made that the railways would file a new schedule of transcontinental rates with the board, and that those rates would be increased as a means of sort of beating out—I am not putting it in blunt words—the minister's valiant efforts to bring a measure of relief to certain areas of Canada that for a long time had been the victims of rank discrimination. The Canadian Pacific Railway evidently did not waste any time. As a matter of fact they did not wait until they had built up enough experience under the one and one-third rule so that they could really make a case. Evidently they based their arguments before the board in support of the new schedule entirely on what they put forward as a potential need and not a real need to balance their revenues with expenditures.

The question that has bothered my mind is why the railways could not have restrained their impatience at least until sufficient experience had been recorded to indicate definitely whether in fact an increase in the transcontinental rates was necessary to keep their revenues in balance with their costs. By their impatience, and through what I think is the weakness of the board, much of the relief that was won for the prairie provinces under the one and one-third rule has been snatched away from them. I am going to give an example to show what I mean by much of the relief being snatched away from them.

A good deal has been said in the discussion of freight rates over the past several years about many items, but perhaps the most representative of those involved in the discussions would be the rate on canned goods from eastern Canada to intermediate points in western Saskatchewan and Alberta. I am going to give the old competitive rate as it was prior to the time the one and one-third rule was initiated. The rate was $1.57 per hundredweight from Ontario points to Vancouver.

Mr. Green: On what quantity?

Mr. Low: On a carload lot, basis 80,000 pounds to the carload. The Alberta rate to either Calgary or Edmonton for the same quantity was $3.23 per hundredweight at that time. The one and one-third rule was instituted as a result of the amendment to the Railway Act last fall. Under that rule the new rate would be $2.09 per hundred pounds on the same canned goods to Calgary or Edmonton. But the Canadian Pacific Railway rushed in and filed a new schedule which hiked the transcontinental rate to $1.89 from $1.57. Therefore under the one and one-third rule the rate to intermediate points, particularly Calgary and Edmonton, would be $2.53 per hundred pounds. That is an increase of 44 cents per hundred pounds on canned goods.

That is just a sample. The same sort of thing applies to other commodities transported to the intermediate points from eastern Canada. I said I was puzzled about the haste with which the Canadian Pacific rushed into this thing and filed their new schedule. I am quite certain from all the facts I can gather that in the intervening months since the house passed the amendments to the Railway Act under Bill No. 12 there had been no change whatever in the competitive situation. I doubt very much if the experts of the Canadian Pacific Railway can show that there was a change in the competitive situation.

I am not going to argue that they could not make some sort of case for a potential change projected some time into the future, but we do not make freight rates—or should not—on the basis of a potential that reaches years into the future. Freight rates have been and should be based on the facts of the situation as they obtain at the moment. Any change that takes place ought to be as a consequence of a change in the competitive situation, and I am speaking now particularly about competitive rates. As I say, I am very puzzled and not a little disappointed at the attitude of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but when I say that I must also say that I am very much puzzled and very much disappointed by the attitude of Canadian National Railways, our own national railway. All through the hearings of the committee last autumn Canadian National Railways remained silent and allowed the Canadian Pacific Railway to speak for the railways. But the Canadian National did take the position that there would be no need to increase the transcontinental rate immediately or in the foreseeable future. They thought we could get by quite nicely, and the record will show that to be so.

What the Canadian Pacific might do, of course, would cause me no surprise at all after listening to the attempts of their representatives to beat down our efforts to put through the amendments to Bill No. 12; but I contend that railway alone could not have devised a new schedule, filed it with the board and had it accepted. They would require the wholehearted support of the Canadian National, and evidently that is what they got. That is the reason I am so bitterly disappointed at this moment. Certainly the Canadian National must have changed its position materially within a period of three or four months, during which time they cannot show any change whatever in the competitive situation. What changed their minds? Did they go to the minister and ask his advice? If they did, what was his advice?

Mr. Chevrier: They certainly did not.

Mr. Low: Well, after the valiant efforts made by the minister in putting through that bill, valiance which we commend most highly, and after the silence they maintained throughout the hearings, it seems to me very peculiar that they would not go to the minister and ask his advice on a matter so important, which has the effect of completely contravening the intention of the bill put through by the minister, which is the law. If they did not consult with the minister somebody ought to be reprimanded. Remember, this is a government railway. Remember that this new schedule of transcontinental rates never could have been approved by the board without the complete support and approval of the Canadian National, the railway that said there was no necessity whatever for an increase in the competitive rates in the foreseeable future.

That is a serious situation. If we are going to allow these companies to thwart the efforts of the representatives of the people and in effect therefore to dictate to the parliament of Canada, we have come to a very pretty pass in our history. I say I am bitterly disappointed in what has happened. Surely one could reasonably expect the two companies to wait at least until they had gathered sufficient experience to justify a request for an increase in the transcontinental rate schedule. They did not do that. It would be very interesting and enlightening to a good many of us to know why. The people of my province had been led to expect that they would find substantial relief under the one and one-third rule from the discriminatory rates they had been paying for so many years. So had the people of western Saskatchewan, who have also suffered.

Mr. Green: Your rate was reduced, was it not, even with the transcontinental increases?

Mr. Low: Yes, it was; but to a substantial degree the relief was snatched away by the filing of the new schedule, by rate increases which were completely unjustified at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman is not arguing, is he, that the benefit of the one and one-third rule has been wiped out by these increased transcontinental rates?

Mr. Low: Comparatively, no; but really, yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Only a limited number of rates have been increased, whereas the one and one-third rule applies to all.

Mr. Low: That is quite true, but what I am trying to get at is this: If the railways are successful in contravening the intent of this law by filing and having approved a new schedule that applies to even a few of these rates, is there not danger that they will be able to do the same thing for all the rates? I am protesting against the fact they were able to get that new schedule at all at this time. As I said, canned goods now form a very important item in the diet of our people in the prairie provinces, especially during the winter. They do get large quantities of canned goods from eastern Canada, and that is one of the items included in the new schedule. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. Chevrier: I point out that the railways did not require the approval of the board for the increase in the transcontinental rates, because they are competitive rates.

Mr. Green: They are lower than the standard rates.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right; and for that reason I do not think it can be said that the board was in error in taking away, if this in fact has taken away, some of the benefit of the one and one-third rule. I shall deal with that later, and I think I will be able to establish that it is not nearly as bad as my hon. friend anticipates. Certainly I agree with him that the Canadian National Railways at least led me to believe there would be no increase.

Mr. Low: As they did me. May I say to the minister I certainly look forward to having the information he can give, because I am not talking with a profound knowledge of it. All I have, of course, are the details concerning the schedule of rates and the changes which have been made. I am in the dark as to why they were made. I am sure the minister must admit one thing, however; that without the support of the Canadian National Railways that new schedule could not have been filed and approved. The Canadian Pacific could not do it alone. Therefore today the Canadian National stands accused.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am sure the minister must be pleased with the compliments he has received on the remarks he made at the opening of this discussion this afternoon. I suppose his work is so onerous and so extensive that he might be pardoned if he were not aware of some of the points brought out by the previous speaker. When we think of the Department of Transport, which is under the control of the minister, dealing with airways, steamships, railways and now going into trucking and bus services, we can easily see that the minister is becoming an emperor in the transportation field in Canada. We have T.C.A., Canadian National Steamships, Canadian National Telegraphs, overseas communications, and so forth; and I am sure everyone sympathizes with the minister in the great responsibilities he has to carry, and they are very pleased to see him so courteous in dealing with them. Therefore it is to be regretted that sometimes we have to criticize him.

Mr. Chevrier: I await the rest.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Well, I have not very much to criticize the minister for today. I am particularly interested in what is going on in Newfoundland, and the reports I have from there are very favourable.

When the delegation from Newfoundland was in Ottawa considering the terms for confederation, they placed before the representatives of the federal government a statement dealing with railway affairs in that province, the operation of the railway itself and the steamship lines under its control. The representatives of the federal government, probably including the minister, felt satisfied that the service being given down there was very good and did not need very much extension at the time. They did realize, of course, that the railway was not in very good shape and that the steamships needed replacement; they were old, and had been in service for many years.

However—and this is a point I have brought up here several times, though perhaps hon. members do not fully appreciate it—when union went into effect on April 1, 1949 there was a complete transformation in the import trade of the country and the railway services became far from adequate. Our trade with Canada previously had been brought partly by water and partly by rail. But it doubled; and now the passenger traffic has doubled. Of course, the railway was not built to cope with this development in freight and passenger traffic over the line, and it has fallen behind. The people in business, especially in St. John's, are complaining about the inadequacy of the service. I am glad to see that the vice-president and manager of the Atlantic region has been in St. John's recently and conferred with representatives of the board of trade. He indicated that the Canadian National Railways are going to spend a good deal of money in the improvement of the rolling stock, the roadbed, and services generally.

It was decided in advance that Newfoundland would become part of the Atlantic region with headquarters in Moncton, so that the railway has been governed from Moncton, New Brunswick, ever since. Previously, when we had the Newfoundland railway it was operated from a general headquarters in St. John's. I am wondering if after three years' experience the minister is satisfied with the arrangement that has been carried on up to the present, because it means that various officials have to be going from Moncton to Newfoundland to see how things are being done. I believe there would be a better esprit de corps if the management and their representatives in St. John's had full charge of the Newfoundland service. Newfoundland is an island, and one would naturally think that it would be on its own and not tied in with New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

I noticed that the estimates generally have increased by about $10 million. This is not surprising in view of the increases in costs for the various services.

In regard to the improvements which are to be made in the services to Newfoundland, I want to refer especially to the steamer across the Cabot strait. Last year there was a vote of $2·5 million put in the estimates for this service. The minister told us this afternoon that not $50,000 has been spent of that item as yet. I wonder how much has been spent and what progress has been made. I hope that if he feels it convenient to reply he will tell us exactly what has been done, and what money is to be voted this year. Will it be like last year, with only about 1/50th of it being spent? I have in my hand an item appearing in the press which is dated January 9, and it says that the contract for the construction of this vessel was awarded about a year before, that is at the beginning of 1951, to the Canadian Vickers Company in Montreal. The article goes on to state that the keel of the ship had not yet been laid and nothing had been done. In fact, it was doubtful if anything would be started before next summer—that is this coming summer. We were under the impression that it had been started, and the excuse given in January was that there was a shortage of steel. I hope that situation has improved so much that the contractors feel confident enough to go ahead with this construction of the steamer.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

The same thing applies to contracts that are going to be let for two other steamers to be used in the coastal service around Newfoundland. Construction of two coastwise steamers of the Bar Haven type has been authorized and tenders have been called. It is anticipated that the contract covering the building of these ships will be awarded in the near future, according to an article in the press dated May 1, 1952. I wonder if those tenders have been let and when the contract is likely to be awarded.

Although the improvements that are being made are very extensive and deeply appreciated by the trade and the public generally in Newfoundland, there are still other things needed. I have in my hand an editorial from the Daily News of May 3, 1952, which points out that importers in St. John's have complained of the long delays in the receipt of shipments from mainland centres during the winter season. Many instances have occurred of mislaid freight which must be due almost entirely to deficiencies in handling and storage facilities. Local shippers also find that the system of taking freight for special routes only on certain days often involves them in high costs and inconvenience. An advertisement will be put in the paper that freight for Bonavista will be taken on Friday or Saturday, and you must have it ready on that particular day or it will have to remain over a long period of time. Shippers feel that they should be permitted to bring the freight in in advance, and that they should not be tied to a date.

Some shippers are also complaining that they are not given sufficient notice of the time limit for freight delivery. Frequently advertisements appear in the paper that the time for freight to be delivered to such and such a place will close at nine o'clock tomorrow morning. I am not sure of the time, but the idea is that the shippers do not have time to get their freight ready so that it can go on any particular steamer. In justice to the minister I should say that this editorial does admit that when the Canadian National took over the railway in Newfoundland it took over a headache. It was only to be expected that, with our inadequate revenues and the comparatively small amount of freight that was going over the line at that time, we could not keep it in the condition that is necessary now.

I should like to refer to a matter of interest to a great many people in Newfoundland, and it concerns the small sailing vessels. Since we joined with Canada we have come under the Canada Shipping Act. Small vessel owners are complaining that the regulations which apply to ocean-going steamers are being made to apply to them. Looking through the statistics contained in one of the numerous reports from this department dealing with shipping in Canada, I find that Newfoundland has the second largest number of sailing vessels, but they are very small in size in comparison with those in British Columbia or even in Nova Scota. The average size of sailing vessel in Newfoundland is about 30 tons, whereas the average size of the sailing vessel in other provinces would be three times as great. It has been the practice in Newfoundland for sailing vessels of that type to take a lot of freight into the small coves where large vessels cannot enter. This has been the custom of the country for well over one hundred years and Newfoundlanders have as high a reputation as skilled seamen as the men in the maritime provinces. They have built their boats and sailed their boats. Probably one hundred years ago they built bigger vessels than they are building today.

It is quite a common thing for a man to build a small boat himself. It might take two or three years to build, but then it is used for freight service and for fishing. There are 1,055 such vessels and they only amount to 38,000 tons, whereas in British Columbia there are 1,178 vessels which amount to over 234,000 tons. These small vessel owners are complaining that they are governed by the same conditions that apply to large vessels, that is they have to have the same safety equipment, life boats and so on. These small vessels cannot carry the ordinary life boat, so they carry dories. Anyone who knows much about the sea knows that the dory is an exceedingly safe boat for men to be in. Dories can stand the roughest seas. They float like a bird on the water. Under the circumstances I feel that the minister should give consideration to an extension of the time, at any rate, before these rules are made applicable to small vessels. At present the vessel owners are afraid they are going to be driven out of business altogether.

From the report of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, I notice that the radiotelephone business with Newfoundland is in a healthy condition. With regard to the Newfoundland telephone service the report states:

> This section of the corporation's business shows an important increase of 20 per cent in the number of paid minutes during the year as compared with 1950 and indicates a healthy condition for which extra capacity will be necessary in the near future.

The minister, of course, told me the other day that steps are being taken to improve the service between Newfoundland and the mainland and also that consideration was being given to reduction in the rates which are now extremely high. It costs $7.50 for three minutes, without any reduction for Sunday or night telephone communication. I believe that such a reduction will be beneficial. I believe that it will not result in any loss but rather that it will result in increased traffic and give greater profit than has been shown up to the present time. Those who have had dealings with Newfoundland by telephone have been complaining of the service.

I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that those who have had the advantage of making a trip on the coastal boats of Newfoundland that have accommodation for tourists return highly pleased with their experience, with the services they received and the courtesy extended to them at the hands of the master, the officers and crew.

Last year my wife and I had the privilege of making a trip on the S.S. Northern Ranger which runs from Corner Brook to St. John's. I would like to say that there is a possibility of increased revenue for the steamships if the C.N.R. would cater to tourists by providing them with cruises of that kind. I do not see how anybody else can do it. I therefore think it would be worth while for the management to consider providing more accommodation of that sort than that which exists at the present time.

The scenery around Newfoundland is beautiful and most interesting. This was the first time that I had ever gone around Newfoundland and to Labrador and I found it very interesting. I must say that if the trip interested me, I feel certain that it would interest those people who are not familiar with Newfoundland coastal scenery. The scenery, especially in White bay, was most beautiful and it would be most attractive to artists many of whom know little about the beautiful scenery that Newfoundland offers. I would therefore recommend the trip to anybody who happens to be listening to me or who reads what I have to say. If they are looking for a nice cruise of about a week's duration, they could not do better than to make application for reservations for the trip from Corner Brook to St. John's, or from St. John's to Corner Brook because the ship runs the two ways, calling in at little places which are hives of activity and sometimes the scene of great industry.

I drew to the attention of the minister the complaint of the master of the Northern Ranger with regard to Flower's Cove, I think it was, where he complained about the beacon being inadequate for a fairly large ship; I mean, in comparison with vessels that usually go into these places. I do not think he meant a light. I think he meant the post that was placed inland and lined up with another post on an island. He thought that was inadequate and he asked me to draw the matter to the attention of the minister. I did so, and I was advised that this year the government was trying to improve the present facilities—I think that is what he said—and could not do anything about this matter. But this is a small item. If the minister would get his secretary to look up his file, I think he would see that it would not cost much to do what is asked and it would gladden the heart of the masters of the vessels that have to call in there. These men work hard. Sometimes they have to work in foggy weather and under hard conditions in the fall of the year. When they make a recommendation they do not make it frivolously, and I feel that it should be given every consideration.

There is only one other matter that I wish to make reference to, and it is going to take me a few more minutes to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder whether I could break off now.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

GULF PULP AND PAPER COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 91, respecting Gulf Pulp and Paper Company—Mr. Brisson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Borrowing powers.

The Chairman: Perhaps I might inform the committee that this bill was considered carefully and reported without amendment by the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation from the sponsor?

(Translation):

Mr. Brisson: Mr. Chairman, the Gulf Pulp and Paper Company was incorporated by special letters patent in 1902. Under its charter, the company is not authorized to acquire shares in other companies. The Gulf Pulp and Paper Company has today the advantage of establishing a power plant on the Ste. Marguerite river, in partnership with the Iron Ore Company, which is developing iron ore deposits in New Quebec; consequently, it is asking parliament to amend its charter so that it may enjoy the privileges granted under the Companies Act, 1934.

Mr. Green: Thank you.

MORAVIAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

The house in committee on Bill No. 185, respecting the board of elders of the Canadian district of the Moravian church in America—Mr. Decore—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1.

The Chairman: This bill has already been considered and reported by the committee on miscellaneous private bills, without amendment.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GERTRUDE MINTZ DANKOFF

The house in committee on Bill No. 159, for the relief of Gertrude Mintz Dankoff—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I understand this was a contested divorce case. Apparently it was contested in the committee of this house, to which it was referred, although only counsel for the different parties appeared. No evidence was taken. I wonder if we could have a report from the chairman of the committee as to what did happen in respect of this particular bill.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, counsel for the respondent asked to be heard before our committee. Likewise, counsel for the petitioner was heard. After deliberating, the committee decided the bill should pass, and be reported back to the house.

Mr. Knowles: Was that decision unanimous, or on division?

Mr. Winkler: The decision was not unanimous. It was voted on and carried by a large majority.

Mr. Green: On what basis is the case heard in this manner? Apparently all that happened was that counsel for the two parties appeared and made statements, following which the committee reached a decision. Is there no provision for the calling of witnesses by the committee? Surely it is not right to have a case decided merely on statements of counsel.

Mr. Winkler: This was not a court case, so far as we were concerned, unless the committee decided to make it such. The decision of the committee was that it was not necessary to hear witnesses. It made its decision accordingly.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Bill read the third time and passed on division.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 13, 1952, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, at nine o'clock on Tuesday night I was completing my remarks with respect to the incorporation of this particular company and I should like to continue on that same subject. Being a member of the committee which studied this particular bill I think it is only fair that I mention what took place in the committee. An expert witness, a Mr. Herring of the Fish Engineering Corporation, Houston, Texas, appeared as an expert witness. Looking back on my experience in committees since coming to the house, I think what occurred in this committee was the first indication of an overwhelming government majority endeavouring to apply closure on the proceedings of a committee.

I regretted that very much as a member of this House of Commons. I think it is about time that the rights of members of parliament were recognized. At that particular time we were endeavouring to obtain further evidence from Mr. Herring. The hon. member for Calgary West made what I think was a masterful speech in the House of Commons in which he outlined the common-sense policy that should be followed in the Dominion of Canada in respect of gas and oil. In the committee the hon. member conducted a very thorough examination of this witness. In this country we are all interested in the proper development of our natural resources. We recognize that a province may have prior rights to any other province in connection with natural resources, but we recognize also that our natural resources are for the good of Canada as a whole. We also feel that if any bill coming before a committee is to have proper scrutination and study—

Mr. Gibson: Scrutiny.

Mr. Murphy: Thank you. I wish the hon. member had been on that committee as he might have supported the opposition for once. If we had been in a hurry, there might have been some excuse, but there was no other matter to come before the committee. I think this was the fourth session, but whether it was the fourth or the sixth session makes no difference.

I resent vehemently the attitude of the government members on that committee in stifling the production of evidence which was necessary in order to reach a proper conclusion. It simply shows the people of this country what happens when we have a government with too large a majority.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Murphy: I know it is rubbish. When you have too large a majority, it certainly is rubbish.

An hon. Member: You are blushing when you say that.

An hon. Member: You have not said anything yet.

Mr. Murphy: I enjoy these interruptions because I can go on until nine o'clock as long as time is allowed.

An hon. Member: Is that not what you expected to do?

An hon. Member: You have not said anything yet.

Mr. Murphy: If you had ears you could listen.

An hon. Member: You have not said anything.

An hon. Member: If you had brains you could say it.

Mr. Murphy: If you just keep still I will say something in a minute. I realize that the Grit members on the other side will not like what I am going to say. I think it is about time that we of the opposition had our rights recognized in committees and in the House of Commons. We should not be stifled as we were in that committee.

Mr. Gibson: You cannot sink a battleship that way.

Mr. Murphy: I enjoy these interruptions, but I hope you are watching the clock, Mr. Chairman. I know the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is just back from a fishing trip which he seems to have enjoyed. We had not finished the examination of Mr. Herring when one of the huge government majority on that committee moved a motion to stop further discussion. As a matter of fact the questions were beginning to get very embarrassing. It seemed to me and to others in the opposition that no matter what bill was proposed by a Liberal member it was going to pass the committee no matter what we said.

An hon. Member: More rubbish.

Mr. Murphy: In the middle of this examination a motion was moved by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, and I quote from page 73 of the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines as follows:

> Mr. Cannon moved that sufficient evidence has been obtained for the committee to decide as to the economic practicability of the pipeline under consideration; and that the question be put on the preamble without further examination of the witness. After discussion and the question having been put on the said motion, it was agreed to on the following division:

I might say that there was one good Liberal who voted in opposition to that particular motion.

An hon. Member: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Gibson: You will never be a senator.

Mr. Murphy: Not likely, and a lot of you people are going to have faint hopes after the next election. I would have been in agreement if the motion had been worded a little differently. It might have been possible that even those without political motives would have been agreeable to granting a charter to this particular company in spite of what the hon. member for Bow River said the other night that he hoped a number of companies would be incorporated in order that the province of Alberta could bargain. I would have been satisfied to move a motion that we had heard plenty of evidence after the hon. member for Calgary West read the letter that afternoon which he received from the manager of the Winnipeg Electric Company, and to that I wish to refer.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you move it?

Mr. Murphy: With respect to the motion to cease hearing any more evidence I wish to go on record as having taken exception at that time, and I said, as found on page 91 of the proceedings of the committee:

> I would like to say a word before you put that motion. In the first place, I dislike very much this railroading which is apparent—

Continuing later I said:

> I know there has been a lot of examination. There is going to be more; at least, I hope there is going to be more because I come from Ontario and I am very much interested in getting Alberta gas, and I think the members from Quebec are very much interested in getting Alberta gas. I think it would be very unfair to us in Ontario or Quebec to have any stifling of evidence, because we are not in a hurry.

Certainly there was a stifling of evidence when that motion was put before the committee.

> This is not a matter of minor detail. It is a matter of the development of natural resources of Alberta, and I hope of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and other provinces also; and it opens up a very large field. I am quite sure that the members of the committee would be reasonable enough to have some patience because this examination is too important to cut off in such a peremptory manner; and that evidence produced this morning may not be to the liking of some members of the committee. Mind you, I am of the opinion that when the picture has developed later it will have a great bearing on what we are going to do. What we are doing today will have a great bearing on what is going to happen later on, and I for one want more information; and I think that what Mr. Nickle was endeavouring to establish was that there is contradictory evidence which I think, in the interests of every member of the committee, should be put on the record. If Mr. Nickle has evidence which does not substantiate that given by the witness we, as a jury, have to consider that evidence. Mr. Nickle now has reports from other reputable engineering firms contradictory to what has been given by the witness; and, with all due respect, I think he is a marvellous witness . . . But there are these figures Mr. Nickle desires to submit which have been prepared by responsible engineering firms, and I think that he should be entitled to put them on record in answer to the evidence given by this witness, even if he has to go on the stand and put it in himself.

Mr. Laing: When are you going to say something?

Mr. Murphy: Because of that particular examination having been delayed somewhat and the hour of one o'clock having been reached we adjourned. At the opening of the afternoon meeting of the same committee Mr. Nickle had a letter which he had obtained from the manager of the Winnipeg Electric Company.

Mr. Laing: Promise to say something.

Mr. Murphy: Oh, I have not heard you say anything yet so just keep still.

An hon. Member: What has electricity got to do with gas?

Mr. Murphy: I am going to quote Mr. Nickle's statement to be found at page 101 of the proceedings of the committee. Referring to the letter he had received he said:

This is a letter which I received this afternoon by air mail from Mr. A. H. Harris, manager, gas utility, Winnipeg Electric Company, in reply to an inquiry directed to him a few days ago; and the specific nature of our inquiry was to find out his views of the various estimates made of industrial and commercial loads in greater Winnipeg, more specifically on the figure of 10·95 billion cubic feet —roughly 11 billion cubic feet—given in the consumer load survey of the Boundary Company. That figure of 11 billion for industrial interruptible load represents over 65 per cent of the Boundary estimate of the total greater Winnipeg consumption and represents approximately 40 per cent of the total fifth year estimate of demand for the entire Boundary pipe line system.

Mr. Laing: Good reading.

Mr. Murphy: I continue:

In reply to this inquiry this is what the Winnipeg Electric Company says—and I point out that this is the company which distributes or will distribute the natural gas in Winnipeg for domestic, industrial and commercial purposes.

Mr. Laing: You read well.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Nickle continued as follows:

He has submitted a lengthy brief here which I think will be of interest to the committee.

I am going to quote a couple of paragraphs because I think it is very important.

An hon. Member: Let Howard take over.

Mr. Murphy: This is a part of the letter from the Winnipeg Electric Company, and it reads as follows:

In reply to your inquiry on the fuel situation in Winnipeg including coal consumption, natural gas sales, etc., we are unable to find anything approaching a 10 billion cubic foot natural gas interruptible load in this immediate territory.

Then Mr. Nickle read the final paragraph of the letter which is as follows:

Incidentally, we have had no recent inquiries from anyone concerning prospective natural gas consumption in this district, and we doubt if accurate figures could be determined without consultation with us. It would appear that the 10 billion cubic foot interruptible load referred to has been pulled out of the air.

In the face of all that evidence the committee recommended the bill for adoption.

Mr. Laing: Five Tories in the house.

Mr. Weir: Six now.

Mr. Laing: Now we have got six.

Mr. Murphy: I should like to say to some of these people who are more constipated in one end than they should be in the other that they should be still for a moment. This is not the type of evidence which would warrant the incorporation of any company. When we had such contradictory evidence before the committee I think we are entitled to consider the measure for what it is worth, and I see no reason why we as members of the house should grant a charter to this particular company. I think it is an absurd thing to do when we only had evidence from one man who was a very capable witness for the Boundary Pipeline Corporation—

Mr. Laing: Seven now.

Mr. Murphy: —but who contradicted himself so much and whose evidence was certainly contradicted by the very people through whom he expected to distribute so much of his product. That fact should be weighed with grave consideration by those who were members of the committee as well as all other members of the house. We in Canada, whether we live in Alberta, Ontario or British Columbia, are interested in the development of the natural resources of the country. We do not feel that these pipe line companies should be incorporated for their nuisance value. It may be that is the policy of some people but I am inclined to take the attitude that we should oppose that sort of practice whether it comes from Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg or anywhere else. I am not in favour of granting a charter to anybody who applies for it for the sake, as the witness in this case said, of getting his toe into the gas fields of Alberta with the idea no doubt of selling his charter to someone at a later date who would probably obtain a franchise to export gas from the province of Alberta.

I think it is quite well understood that we are going to have two pipe lines from the Alberta gas fields, one to the east and one to the west. This particular company is endeavouring to obtain a charter to build a 16-inch line. Certainly that is no good for the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec. We in these two provinces want natural gas, and if it can be obtained we want to get it from the province of Alberta, or later from the province of Saskatchewan, the province of Manitoba, or wherever it can be obtained. We want to get it at the cheapest possible rate. We in southwestern Ontario are now getting some gas from the United States but as Canadians we would be very glad indeed to obtain all our gas from the western provinces if we could. I hope that circumstances will be such that we will be able to obtain natural gas from that region at a price competitive with that of gas imported from the United States. Neither now nor at any time in the past have we ever been assured of a definite amount of gas from the United States for a definite period.

At the rate we are developing industrially both in Quebec and Ontario we need a great deal of natural gas, and we want an assured supply. We have one company incorporated, Trans-Canada, which proposes to deliver gas in Ontario and Quebec by means of a 30-inch pipe; but I am afraid a pipe line even of that size will be sufficient to look after only a portion of the future needs of these two provinces. We also have Interprovincial, which goes from Alberta to Superior, Wisconsin; the same can be said about it. I believe every hon. member feels the time will come before too long when we in Ontario and Quebec will require a great deal more than is now coming through the Interprovincial pipe line. I believe we all share the feeling that Canada has a wonderful future ahead during the next few years. With that in mind we must realize that if this company is incorporated to build this little 16-inch pipe line and obtains permission from Alberta to transport gas to Winnipeg, in the long run that will probably prevent Ontario and Quebec getting a pipe line which will service us with that most important product. No doubt these people hope to go south with their gas; but I believe it is in the interests of the province of Alberta that we get gas from that province as cheaply as possible, and get as much as we can. With such a small pipe line, however, no area in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, let alone the eastern provinces, will be able to get gas economically.

We in southern Ontario are interested in getting gas; and if we cannot get it from Alberta or the other western provinces, where I am sure they are going to have great developments, of course we will have to resort to United States gas. The other night I said, and I am going to repeat, that I think there should be a reciprocal arrangement between the two governments at the highest level, so we could obtain from the United States as much gas as we ship there. I said the other evening that we are now shipping to a defence area in Montana some 10 billion cubic feet of gas per year; and when the pipe line goes through to the west that will be greatly increased. We must remember that the United States has always considered its own interests first. That is only natural; but we as Canadians must also consider our own interests. If the United States is not prepared to enter into some fair reciprocal arrangement with respect to both oil and gas, then I believe Ontario and Quebec would be quite prepared to take gas from Alberta or Saskatchewan or Manitoba even at a higher cost, because I believe the natural resources of our country should be developed for the use of Canadians. Perhaps only in that way can we make those on the other side of the line understand that we have sufficient resources to take care of our own requirements. However, we would prefer a reciprocal arrangement under which in certain areas we could obtain the cheaper United States gas, while in other areas the United States would take gas from us. I believe we are entitled to as much gas from the United States as we ship to that country.

I am just going to sum up what I have said in three or four paragraphs. This proposition falls far short of meeting Canada's best interests for the following reasons. First, it would open only a limited market for the rapidly growing gas reserves of western Canada. It would not open a market of sufficient volume to allow the great Pincher Creek field and the allied petro-chemical industries to develop on an economic basis. Such small scale eastward export from Alberta would not meet the increasingly urgent need for markets for Pincher Creek and the long list of other gas fields in southern and central Alberta. I might comment there that we hope and expect the opening up of Pincher Creek will bring about the development in that area of great chemical industries, even if they do compete with those in the city of Sarnia.

Second, acceptance of the Boundary transmission project would penalize the consumers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. A small scale line such as proposed by Boundary would have to sell gas in these prairie provinces at substantially higher prices than would a major project, such as that proposed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines or Western Pipe Lines Limited.

Third, acceptance of the Boundary project could delay, perhaps for years, the securing of gas in large volume for Ontario and Quebec, either by direct pipe line from western Canada or by gas exchange with the United States.

Fourth, the Boundary project, on the basis of such evidence as was submitted to the railways and canals committee, would not be economic. In other words it could not serve a large enough market or deliver gas at a price low enough to compete with other fuels, and obtain adequate revenue to cover its cost if it stops at Winnipeg.

Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, at the request of the United States defence authorities and with the approval of the Alberta and Canadian governments, recently commenced export of 10 billion cubic feet per year of Alberta gas to the Anaconda Copper Company in central Montana. This export is under a five year agreement calling for total delivery of 50 billion cubic feet; and as I said the other night, I have no doubt that at the expiration of the five years the export will be continued, as I hope it will be.

Westcoast Transmission Limited recently was granted an export permit by the Alberta government, and during June will be seeking approval of the Canadian government and the United States federal power commission to permit it to build a pipe line from the Peace river area of northern Alberta and British Columbia to cross the Rocky mountains in British Columbia and serve Canadian gas to interior communities of that province and Vancouver as well as Portland, Seattle and other communities in the United States Pacific northwest states. This plan is dependent upon export to an American market which would consume about 80 per cent of the Canadian gas carried by the pipe line. Vancouver and other Canadian cities could only absorb about 20 per cent of the gas to be transported. Five years after completion of the line it is anticipated that the annual demand will be 56 billion cubic feet, of which 44 billion cubic feet would have a United States market. The situation at the Pacific coast is comparable in some ways to Ontario. Vancouver's only hope for gas depends upon Canada's willingness to allow the bulk of the gas carried by the pipe line to go to the United States, and upon the willingness of the United States to accept Canadian gas in lieu of building a line from its own Texas and New Mexico gas fields.

Mr. Riley: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the hon. member is quoting from.

Mr. Murphy: My own speech, if you would like to know.

Mr. Riley: That is what I thought.

Mr. Murphy: Inasmuch as three years would be needed to construct a pipe line eastward from Alberta to Minneapolis or Ontario, this province still faces a very critical problem, and the Canadian government must take what steps it can to provide Ontario with United States gas at least during the interim period. The government therefore should support by direct representations to Washington the efforts of Consumers Gas and Union Gas, two Ontario companies, to obtain United States gas in a volume at least equal to the Canadian gas now going to Montana defence industry and that which we hope will be going to the markets of the Pacific northwest. We have 10 billion cubic feet a year going into the United States and, as I said the other night, only about 2½ billion cubic feet a year coming back into Canada from the United States, and that is coming in through Ontario. At the present time southern Ontario is now getting from the United States only about one-quarter of the volume of gas now moving from Alberta into Montana.

The disadvantage of a natural gas pipe line extending across Canada from Alberta to the eastern provinces, so far as the consumers of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, is that the cost of gas to eastern consumers would be somewhat higher than the cost of gas which might reach these markets from the United States. Speaking in terms of the volume of gas a single major pipe line could deliver, the difference in cost to Ontario as between United States and Alberta gas would be reckoned in millions of dollars yearly. The higher cost of Alberta gas would stem from the comparatively limited markets en route to eastern Canada, a distance of over 2,000 miles, and the nature of terrain and climate that would make construction and operating costs higher than for a line from mid-United States. The door to gas or oil exchange, in the best interests of the two countries, should not be closed, and every effort should be made at top government level to work out, to the greatest extent possible, an exchange of oil and gas that will bring the greatest possible benefits to the areas of production in the two countries, to the consumers in the two nations and to the economy as a whole.

I might say that the Alberta Liberal party is the principal opponent to any export of gas, and as a result the people of Canada can blame the Liberals in a considerable degree for the delay in making use of the gas resources of that province.

Mr. Riley: You are reading that too quickly.

Mr. Murphy: The trouble with this country is that the Liberals in one province do not ever get together with the federal Liberals to agree on anything. The Liberals in Alberta are completely opposed to gas export, and they are doing their utmost to keep gas from going out to any country. I would suggest that the Liberal party, to help the nation, should at least adopt a uniform policy on gas and should, if it is sincerely desirous of seeing the nation's economy grow, take some drastic steps. There is a pressing need for a decision. Do not close the door on a trans-Canada route. The main point is to get as much gas used as possible, and at as low a cost as possible.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am going to say without any hesitation, in spite of these pleasant interruptions from some of my good friends, that I am going to oppose the incorporation of this company.

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Mr. Blackmore: In a general way Alberta is disposed to keep out of this controversy concerning pipe lines. As the member for Bow River has said, we rejoice that the great Creator has put these gas deposits in the area which has happened to be Alberta. We rejoice that these deposits have been discovered and are being developed in this particular generation in which we live. We are anxious that all the people of Canada should share in the good things that the Creator has given us. How best to share those good things I think we shall have to leave to the people outside of our province to argue until they finally come to a decision.

One thing that I have wondered about while I have listened to this controversy is whether or not the people throughout the country and the members of this house would not like to know something about how these gas and oil developments occurred in our particular generation, and what the principles are upon which the development has been based. In this way the people could form some sort of idea as to whether or not there is permanency in the industry, and whether or not there is a likelihood that there will be extensive developments in the days yet to come.

It seems to me that before we decide to grant a charter to too many companies we ought to give some thought to the problem of whether or not there is an adequate supply to justify the granting of so many charters as are being granted. After all, there is this aspect of the question: It is quite conceivable that some of those companies are asking for charters with no intention whatever of proceeding in a straightforward manner with the development or the delivery of gas and oil, but merely as a financial device to make a good deal of money out of the Canadian people through selling shares. Now, if any such motives should be actuating any of these companies, it seems to me that it would be the duty of this house to give some thought to the necessity of protecting the interests of the Canadian investing public.

I believe that it is quite in order that I spend a few minutes tonight giving the house an idea of how this wonderful oil development in Alberta took place. Oil and gas were in Alberta for generations, but had not been developed to any great extent until recent years. I do not wish to claim undue credit for the administration which is in Alberta at the present time, yet I do not see how any fair-minded Canadian could deny them a large measure of credit for the development which has taken place since 1935 when the Social Credit government assumed office.

The first thing that government did towards developing the industry was to set up a conservation board in 1938, and give it legal standing. The object of this was as follows. In the Turner valley there was a vast amount of gas escaping from over the oil that was in the chamber. This gas was burning with a brilliant flare which lighted the sky for hundreds of miles. This great flare was destroying the oil industry potential of Alberta at a rate which was positively appalling.

The setting up of this gas conservation board was a step designed to put out the fire that was burning that gas from on top of the oil, because it was realized that if the gas was sufficiently exhausted from above the oil in the chamber it would be impossible to get the oil to come up to the top. The oil would, therefore, lie in complete waste. This was an important measure. As soon as it was adopted every prospective company thinking of coming into Alberta realized that here were measures which would protect the oil productive potential of the fields if the fields were developed. I believe this had a very important moral effect in bringing companies into Alberta to try to find oil and develop it. In a short time the wastage of gas was discontinued as a result of the measures recommended by this board, and the wastage of oil through possible failure of recovery was discontinued. Oil production increased immediately. Again, this would have a moral effect on the companies who were thinking of coming into Alberta.

Now the next important step the administration took was this: They reduced the fees on leases for prospecting. Up to that time the government of Alberta had charged a high fee for the privilege of prospecting, which, to any ordinary individual, would be obviously absurd because certainly we did not want to penalize people who would come in and prospect for oil. We wanted as many people to come in to prospect as possible. Thus the reduction of the fee on prospecting leases was an important step.

The next important step was that after 1941 the government increased the royalty from oil production and placed it on a graduated scale from 5 per cent to 15 per cent. Instead of having a flat scale of royalties on oil brought out of the wells, the royalty charged would, after that move, depend on the productivity of the well, the cost of recovery, proximity to markets and a number of other factors that would tend to affect seriously the prosperity or non-prosperity of the oil well. This, of course, is quite obviously another measure which would encourage companies from all over the continent to come into Alberta to prospect for oil. Also, to companies who wished to go into the matter on a rather large scale, an offer was made that if they desired to pay a 12½ per cent royalty on their gasoline up to 1951, they could have the privilege of recovering gasoline for a 12½ per cent royalty. This was a measure that had quite a good deal to do with the development of Alberta oil.

There exists throughout the country a fallacious notion that somehow or other this oil industry of Alberta descended from the sky. It was a "windfall", I think one of the Ottawa papers recklessly called it the other day. It was nothing of the kind.

Mr. Byrne: International finance.

Mr. Blackmore: It was the discovery of the means of using great resources which had lain there for generations. The discovery was made because of wise, carefully designed and calculated measures aimed at producing exactly the result that was produced.

Mr. Laing: Is that actually a good government out there?

Mr. Blackmore: The best answer I can think of is what the Saviour said, namely, "By their fruits ye shall know them!" Certainly the fruits, as far as oil is concerned, indicate that it is a mighty good government.

An hon. Member: I do not like oily fruit.

Mr. Laing: How did they get the oil in the ground?

Mr. Blackmore: The result of all these measures was that by 1948 there were over 60 different companies drilling for oil in over 100 different areas in Alberta, and they were spending $1 million a month trying to find oil. I will ask this question: Do you think you would be able to get 60 different companies, including the very strongest ones in America, to go into a province where the administration was unsound and where the advice adopted was unsound? Such men having tens of millions of dollars of financial reserves do not throw their money away.

Mr. Byrne: What would happen if Social Credit was not there?

An hon. Member: Do not keep us in suspense.

Mr. Blackmore: Another interesting comment on the development is given by Mr. John F. Fairlie, manager of the co-ordination and economics department of the Imperial Oil Company, speaking before the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, in Toronto, June 26, 1951. In his speech he estimated that the amount of money that was being spent on exploring, drilling and development with regard to oil in Alberta during 1951 would be roughly $200 million. Those are the fruits of Social Credit government, admitted by those who can judge.

Mr. Riley: They are going to find out in British Columbia, are they not?

Mr. Laing: One man made half of that.

Mr. Blackmore: The policy of the Social Credit government embraces five main considerations. I am now going to read from "They Belong to You", a document by Hon. N. E. Tanner who had the largest amount to do, I would say, with the formulation of the policy which resulted in the highly gratifying development of the oil industry. He was writing to the Alberta people about their oil resources in 1948.

Mr. Laing: Is he Social Credit?

Mr. Blackmore: Hon. N. E. Tanner said:

That policy—

The policy of the Social Credit government.

—"embodies five major points to which the government is committed and from which it will not deviate.

1. To take all reasonable steps necessary to encourage orderly development to meet the ever increasing demand for petroleum products and to make Canada less dependent on other countries for these essential products.

2. To insist that all development is carried on according to the best known engineering practices, thereby preventing waste and assuring the greatest ultimate recovery.

3. To establish prospecting and leasing regulations designed to effectively prevent monopoly, and encourage individual enterprise. Only by the existence of wholesome rivalry where free and competitive enterprise is carried on, can we expect to get the most active development.

4. To obtain for the people of the province as a whole, a fair share of the returns resulting from the production of oil.

5. To assure to the owner of surface rights fair and generous treatment in determining and awarding full and proper compensation for any loss, damage and inconvenience.

The soundness and fairness of this five-point policy will commend it, not only to those interested in oil development, but to the public as a whole."

If hon. members and the people throughout the country want to know why this spectacular development of oil in Alberta took place at this particular time, they can refer to that document.

Mr. Byrne: The fiscal policy of the Liberal government!

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay East is so eager to talk that I marvel he has not made a dozen speeches of his own already. He interferes with other people more than does almost anybody else I ever saw.

Mr. Nickle: Those on the government benches do not need Alberta gas; they are generating enough of their own.

Mr. Laing: Ten Tories in the house.

Mr. Knowles: One hundred and fifty Liberals absent.

Mr. Blackmore: The Alberta government, a Social Credit government, believes in private enterprise. The fact that it believes in private enterprise, and that the people of Alberta have shown that they believe in private enterprise, has had a great deal to do with the development of oil. I ask whether any man having a $1 million company in his charge would take his money in to invest in a province where the people had elected a government that had committed itself pretty well to robbing private enterprise of what it had.

The Chairman: Shall I call it nine o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

463. Departmental administration, $1,370,576.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, for a short while I was greatly puzzled to find the report of the Canadian National Telegraphs, but I believe I am right in stating that it is contained in the report of the Department of Transport under the division called telecommunications. The last item refers to:

Construction, maintenance, and operation of the government telegraph and telephone service.

I want to make a plea for the extension of telephone and telegraph service in Newfoundland. The minister is already aware of the recommendations which I have made in regard to the radiotelephone on Colinet island. The government accepted that idea and extended it to many other islands throughout Newfoundland. But it seems to me that on the mainland of Newfoundland there is, in isolated districts, a need for an extension of telephone or telegraph service. In the report of the department dealing with this subject, under the heading of "Telegraph and Telephone Service"—and I am speaking of the annual report for 1951—at page 150 I find the folowing:

The chief function of this service is to provide telegraph and telephone service in remote or sparsely populated sections of the country where, due to economic considerations, commercial companies are unable to operate. In addition technical and, in certain circumstances financial assistance is given to small rural telephone companies which are usually established on a co-operative non-profit basis.

Today we heard the minister state that in British Columbia the telephone business was being given up because it had extended beyond the capacity of the C.N.P. and was being taken over by a private company or was ready to be taken over by a private company if a private company was interested. I notice here reports from different provinces, where a similar service is being provided. The report states that, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, in Cape Breton the work of improving existing circuits was continued with new construction for the year being confined to short extensions for new subscribers. It states that the various submarine cables along the coast line of this province gave reasonably reliable service, although several are in need of replacement owing to age, and plans in this connection were made for the next fiscal year.

Referring to New Brunswick, the report states that direct telephone service was established between the Point Sapin area and Richibucto and proved to be of considerable benefit to those concerned. The report goes on to say:

That radiotelephone link between Grand Manan Island in the Bay of Fundy and the mainland at St. George, N.B., the establishment of which had been undertaken during 1949-50, was put in commercial operation in March, 1951.

Then it states that—

The local submarine cables and landlines which serve the islands in the Grand Manan-Campobello area, suffered relatively few interruptions during the year and service was generally satisfactory.

Referring to Quebec the report states:

A long distance radiotelephone link was inaugurated between Grindstone, Magdalen Islands, and the mainland at North Head, Cape Breton. This made long distance telephone service available to the residents of the islands for the first time and was immediately put to extensive use.

And then this paragraph:

The expansion of the local distribution system on the islands was continued during the year but the demand for service continued to out-distance the enlargement program and there is still a substantial number of outstanding applications for telephones—as is the case today with the majority of telephone systems in the country.

I happened to be in the library before 9 o'clock, and came across the April issue of Trade News, published by the Department of Fisheries. On the first page there is an article with respect to Magdalen islands fisheries, in which appears this paragraph:

> The islander has a telephone, for which he pays $1 per month. The service was installed years ago by the federal government and last year was linked up with the mainland so that long distance calls are now possible. He has a battery radio and the federal Department of Transport operates a wireless station.

There are many places in Newfoundland, especially in the riding I have the honour to represent, which have no rail communication, and no steamship service. They have nothing supplied by the Department of Transport, except in some places along the route where there may be a telephone or perhaps a telegraph station. But there are many persons who would like to be subscribers to a telephone system.

I understand that this year the Canadian National Telegraphs is making provision to have its lines extended. I hope it will be able to extend them throughout that riding, because there are roads and I believe it would not be very difficult to arrange for the erection of poles, in the light of the fact that there is plenty of lumber in the neighbourhood. All that would be necessary would be to string wires.

There is one point about the telephone system now there which, I think, is worthy of mention, and that is that it is not very private. Sometimes there may be 15 or 20 telephones on one circuit. When one goes to the telephone he will hear several clicking sounds. I do not know if that is the experience in other parts of Canada, but it is a known fact in my riding that other people can listen in to conversations. I do not know just how far that condition can be eliminated.

However, the chief point is that in these isolated places there should be some means of communication. In this modern age of telephone and radio it seems to me that those isolated places that can never hope to benefit from most of the amenities found in the cities should have at least the advantage of communications of that kind.

I am glad to see that the service is being extended to the Magdalen islands, because they are near Newfoundland. In their isolated position out in the gulf I am sure this extension must be a great comfort to them. If the minister is responsible for the extension, I am sure he deserves congratulations and gratitude.

I hope the minister will be able to answer the questions I have asked with regard to the progress that has been made in connection with the steamer to be built to give a service across the gulf. I should like to know if the contract has actually been let for the two boats to be added to the coastal service. And, if the minister is in the right frame of mind, perhaps he would be able to answer the question I asked yesterday regarding the progress that has been made in connection with the construction of radiotelephone apparatus to be used on the islands of Newfoundland.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, in the estimates of the Department of Transport the railway grade crossing fund is entered, of course, as a statutory item. I am taking this opportunity, in the discussion on the general item, to say a few words in connection with matters general and matters local with respect to this fund.

I suppose that throughout the years there has been greater interest shown in the safety factors of the grade crossing fund than in almost any other feature connected with highways and railways in Canada. I think it has become apparent that the perfect protection at the intersection of a busy highway and a railway is that of the subway or what is technically known as the grade separation. There are other means of protection, and I have no desire to reflect upon their usefulness or utility. I do say however, and I believe the committee will agree, that the grade separation provides protection in its final and most perfect form.

As the minister and the committee will recall, in 1950 there was an amendment to the Railway Act extending the possible maximum contributions in respect of the grade crossing fund from $100,000 for any single work up to $150,000. This of course brings one back to the historical background of the fund. In 1909 it was instituted. Under the provisions of the statute of that year 20 per cent of the total was set as the maximum the federal government would pay.

In 1919 a change was made through a statutory amendment whereby 25 per cent of the value of any work was set as the maximum, with a total value of $15,000 as the top level. In 1926 a further change was made, with 40 per cent as the maximum federal contribution, and a dollar value ceiling of $25,000 for any one work. It was further changed in 1928 to $100,000 as a maximum, with the percentage increase left as it was.

Then we come to 1950 when there was an amendment to increase the maximum amount from the federal treasury to $150,000. One of the interesting features is that from 1909 until now—and I think my figures are correct—around $14 million has been paid out of the grade crossing fund and the federal treasury for this purpose. This means that those who would contribute under the scheme, including the railways, the provinces, municipalities and the federal fund have paid something like $55 million toward the elimination of dangerous level railway crossings. When the fund was first set up there were several objectives and purposes in mind, the most important being public safety, and then there was a matter of public convenience. These matters, concerned legislators at that time and influenced their decision with respect to the measure. Consideration was also given to the rapidity of movement both by rail and by highway and it was realized that grade separations permitted this movement in a way no other method would.

It is interesting to study the statistics in connection with accidents at railroad and highway intersections. Of course the great majority of accidents occur at crossings which are unprotected, but a rather startling fact is that a considerable percentage of accidents occur at crossings where protective devices such as gates, automatic signals, bells, wigwags, flashing lights or even watchmen are to be found.

One reason why I raise this is the fact that in 1909 we had in Canada roughly 5,000 automotive vehicles whereas today we have just about 2,500,000 rubber-tired vehicles. That means that for every one vehicle using the roads at that time there are today five hundred vehicles, travelling at speeds greatly increased from the speeds of those days. No matter how far we have gone in providing protection at intersections, and we have gone a considerable distance, I think it is generally realized that protection has not kept pace with the needs which have arisen by virtue of the greatly increased traffic and the greatly accelerated speed at which it travels.

The problem has become most acute in many areas such as my own constituency of Peel. The population of that county has increased from 28,000 in 1931 to just about 56,000 today. In the south end of the county there is practically a city of over 30,000 people known as Toronto township. The problem with respect to intersections has become most serious in that particular area. In previous days the railroads were running almost entirely through countryside whereas today they are running through densely-peopled urban localities. All this has greatly exaggerated the problem that must be faced.

There are several very dangerous crossings in the county I represent which call seriously for attention and no doubt there are similar dangerous crossings in many other constituencies across Canada. One particular crossing is where the Canadian Pacific main line intersects the Dundas highway just east of Cooksville. Both the highway and the railroad carry heavy traffic. Not only is this a dangerous crossing; in addition great inconvenience is caused to the travelling public every few minutes throughout the day and night.

There is another intersection in the county over which there has been a good deal of controversy. I feel that I should bring this to the attention of the committee. The Canadian National line from Toronto to Hamilton runs through the south end of the county. The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo division of the Canadian Pacific has running rights over this line. I imagine that it is about the busiest railroad line with the greatest frequency of traffic to be found in the entire dominion. Crossing this line at the northern limits of Port Credit is highway No. 10 which is also one of the busiest thoroughfares in the province.

The combination creates a problem which is of great concern to the people in that section. Hon. members will be interested to know that this crossing is protected by flashing signals, wigwags, gates, bells and a watchman. While there have been no fatal accidents in recent years, there was one within the last six years even with protective devices. From the standpoint of public convenience and the avoidance of delay, as well as consideration for public safety, this intersection creates a problem which calls for immediate attention.

When a subway was first proposed in 1910 the estimated cost was about $26,000. Within ten years, in 1920, the estimated cost is said to have risen to as high as $83,000. I am not able to give the present estimated cost of a subway nor do I think anyone else has the figure in any accurate detail, but the indication is that with applications cited by the C.N.R. as having been made in 1910, 1920, 1931, 1935, and the recent application which has been turned down by the Canadian National Railways, the matter of a subway is becoming and will become a much more expensive matter and of greater concern to those who would be making a contribution toward its cost. The longer it stands the greater the cost.

The municipalities concerned have asked the Canadian National to enter into negotiations with respect to the building of a subway at that point. Only the other day a letter was received by the municipality from Canadian National Railways saying that the railway was of course opposing it and would not enter into negotiations of that kind. In addition, the railway had made a count of the traffic, and according to their figures 10,000 automobiles and trucks crossed over that intersection inside of forty-eight hours. There were also 187 trains which went by and 89 switchings with all the inconvenience and delay such a procedure normally causes. Of course these figures are disputed by those who are convinced that they know better than the railways what the real situation is. They want another count. They also want to know how long traffic is held up and the number of vehicles that are affected by these delays from time to time. The Port Credit Weekly, which is a very reputable newspaper with one of the widest and most influential lists of subscribers of any comparable area in Canada, has this to say:

> In this report the Canadian National Railways said there were 89 switchings during the 48-hour period. We didn't see any statement of how long traffic was tied up by the switchings or the number of vehicles delayed by trains across the roadway. We would suggest that the railway or somebody vitally interested in the project take another count from this standpoint. We have seen cars lined up for blocks at this crossing not for a few minutes but in some cases for as long as a quarter of an hour.

Feeling is running strong, and when I say it is running strong I am very moderate in the term I use. The situation has reached a point where I felt I ought to bring the matter to the floor of the house because there is such frustration in the minds of so many of those in the area. I want to say to the minister and to the committee that I do not think Canadian National Railways should have brushed off such a reasonable proposal as was made on that occasion. I express the hope that the matter will be pursued by the municipalities and the provincial highway department so that the board of transport commissioners will have the opportunity at as early a date as possible to make a thorough inquiry and to deliver a judgment giving us our subway on what we hope will be equitable terms. I only rose on this occasion because I am so impressed with the seriousness of the traffic and safety situation at that point.

Mr. Wright: There are two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister at this time. Earlier today we passed Bill No. 192 which provides for the construction of a branch line of the Canadian National Railways from Terrace to Kitimat in British Columbia. Last session we passed a bill providing for the construction of a branch line of Canadian National Railways from Sherridon to Lynn Lake in Manitoba, a distance of some 150 miles.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can see what is coming.

Mr. Wright: These two branch lines are to be built to develop known natural resources of the dominion and the house consented unanimously to the passage of the bills providing for railway extensions to develop known mineral resources which should be developed. A few years ago we passed a private bill granting a charter to a private company to build a railway line from seaboard into northern Quebec and Labrador for the development of the great iron ore resources there. Some of us on this side would have liked to see that development undertaken by Canadian National Railways, but although we objected to the method we agreed that the line should be built.

I want to point out to the minister that there is a known agricultural resource in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan and northwestern part of Manitoba which cannot be developed further until such time as there is an extension of the present railway lines in this area. Some twenty-five years ago two railway branch lines were built, one from Melfort to Carrot River and the other from Reserve Junction to Arborfield. When these branch lines were constructed it was expected by the people who had settled there and were living in the area—in fact it was stated by the railway at that time—that the lines would be continued through to The Pas in Manitoba to connect with the Hudson Bay Railway. Unfortunately just about the time the lines should have been extended the war broke out and for over five years we were so busily engaged that extensions of railway lines were forgotten.

I point out now that seven years after the last war the lines are still at the point to which they were built some twenty-five years ago. Since that time settlement has extended some forty to fifty miles to the east from this area. Immediately after the war hundreds of returned men settled there under the Veterans Land Act, many of them being from thirty to fifty miles from the closest railway point. I do not know whether members realize just what that means, but the cost of hauling grain to railhead runs from half a cent a mile per bushel to a cent a mile per bushel. When you try to develop land forty miles from the railhead it means that it costs you 20 cents a bushel to deliver every bushel of grain to your closest delivery point.

On the other hand, once the grain has reached that point it is hauled from there to the head of the lakes, and in the case of Arborfield and Carrot River the cost is 24 cents a hundred or 16 cents a bushel. The grain is hauled approximately 1,000 miles for 16 cents a bushel while it costs the producer who is growing the grain forty miles from the railhead 20 cents a bushel at the lowest estimate to deliver it to the railhead. That simply means that development cannot take place. It means that the people who have settled in the area under the Veterans Land Act and those who have settled there privately have a handicap which I think Canadian National Railways should do something about. It simply means the extension of these lines, and if the railway is not prepared to extend them right through to The Pas at the present time they should at least be extended for another forty or fifty miles to give an outlet to the many settlers in the area. They were promised that when they settled there.

The good land in the area is not confined to the forty or fifty miles that are settled but extends right through to The Pas in Manitoba. If these lines were extended it would mean the development of up to a million acres of new land which cannot be brought under cultivation under present conditions. Therefore I urge the minister to use his influence to see that at the earliest possible date some immediate consideration is given to the extension of these lines. They will pay for themselves. The traffic will be sufficient to justify the expense just as I am sure the traffic over the branch lines which are under construction into mining areas at the present time will justify the expense in building them.

I do not know whether the department or the railways have made a survey, or whether they have any statistics; but the history of the west has shown that when these lines are extended they pay dividends. They transport new agricultural products to the head of the lakes and other parts of Canada, and they bring in a great deal of equipment the new settlers must have in order to carry on production. So I think it is good business that we in Canada should be developing these new areas at this time.

I expect the minister will guess the other matter I wanted to bring to his attention; that is, the port of Churchill and the extension of the season there. I think the time has come when it is quite feasible to extend that season for at least another two weeks in the fall. Last year we had the largest movement of grain out of Churchill to date, and I have seen indications that the number of vessels coming there is expected to be larger this year than ever before. If the season is extended I am sure the number of vessels can be greatly increased, and the port and railway made to pay. Sometimes hon. members think a lot of money is invested there, but I would point out that this government has invested more in defence works at Churchill in the last ten years than the entire cost of the railway and port development. If we can spend those amounts for defence—and I think they were necessary—surely we can also spend the amount necessary to develop that port, extend the season and make it a success.

Mr. Fair: I am not going to make a long speech this evening, but I do want to support the two projects mentioned by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I have been in northern Saskatchewan and discussed this matter with some of the farmers and businessmen there, and I do know the necessity of making greater use of the port of Churchill.

I also want to support the plea made this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River that trucks be given a squarer deal than is in prospect for them at the present time if the claims of the railways should get very far. No one argues that the railways do not have their proper place in the economy of the country, but neither should anyone argue that the trucks do not also have their place in the country's business. As was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member, the trucks showed their usefulness a year ago last August and September when the railway people went on strike. At that time they kept the economy of the country rolling; they kept people from being deprived of their food, and I am sure proved their worth. These agreed charges, if put into effect—as I hope they will not be—would deprive thousands of truckers of a living, and perhaps at a later date would prove a great mistake for the country. Trucks have their place and I hope the minister will see to it that they are given the right to carry on as they have done in the past.

Speaking of the agreed charges leads me to another matter, which was brought up by the hon. member for Peace River. That is the increase in transcontinental rates, which bear very heavily upon my province in particular. I hope the minister will see to these matters and give them the consideration to which they are entitled, in the interests of the prairie provinces.

Mr. Dinsdale: I want to speak briefly on two matters in this general discussion on the Department of Transport estimates. The first has been mentioned already by the two previous speakers, and I realize it is a perennial topic even though this is the first time I have discussed it in the house. I am attracted to the subject because I note in the estimates an increased deficit payment this year with respect to the operation of the Hudson Bay railway. I find that rather difficult to understand in view of the expansion that has taken place in the west and the buoyancy of the Canadian economy in general. Because of its importance I think this topic can stand much repetition. I am rapidly discovering that with respect to even major projects it is necessary to become somewhat repetitious if they are to be eventually achieved. I am also reminded of the old adage that it is the noisy wheel that gets the most grease. We who represent the prairie provinces, who are a relative minority, are looking to the day when there will be an equalization of opportunity right across Canada, particularly in reference to economic matters.

In addition to the query that comes to mind as a result of the increase in the deficit payment as indicated in the estimates, I mention this topic because of the realization that Manitoba and the prairie provinces generally are gradually coming into their own, and they are winning the struggle with a minimum of outside assistance. They used to pull the legs of westerners a few years ago, and perhaps they still do, by saying that all wise men come from the east. The westerner who was on his toes would immediately reply, "That is true, and the wiser he is the faster he comes." But obviously that has not been the case, because the prairies have been suffering a decline in population which has been highlighted by the current discussions on redistribution. However, we are gradually making progress in this uphill struggle against vested interests and prejudice. We are getting there slowly!

This was pointed up rather dramatically the other day, so much so that according to comments in Manitoba newspapers even our own citizens did not quite accept the statement at face value, when the hon. member for Churchill made the claim that in the not too far distant future northern Manitoba would become the nickel capital of the world. He went on to say, and this was news to me, that we have four potential Sudburys in the vast area of northern Manitoba which at present is little more than a wilderness. That was news even to Manitobans, and I am sure it was rather startling information for members of the house.

A further reason I bring up this topic is that the success of the Hudson Bay railway and port is very closely connected with the realization of those potentialities which were outlined by the hon. member for Churchill. Then, too, last July it was my privilege to join the Manitoba government in an excursion. The "Northern Light" excursion up to the port of Churchill was my first contact with that part of our province. We visited the well known mining developments at Flin Flon, Snow Lake and had a chance to see first hand the development taking place at Lynn Lake. I was quite amazed to see the promise for the future, and also the realization of the present in these mining developments.

Another aspect of the future of northern Manitoba that appealed to me was the possibility in the tourist trade. Actually, the excursion undertaken by the members of the Manitoba government was in connection with the opening of the highway to Flin Flon. This means that road transportation is available fairly well up into the northern part of our province. With the opening of the highway we now have good road connections all the way from the peace garden on the international boundary—about which we have heard earlier in our discussions in this house—through Manitoba's national park, Clear lake, right through to The Pas and Flin Flon. Each one of these parts of Manitoba offers a major tourist attraction which is only now being realized by that great source of tourists, our neighbours south of the border.

Both The Pas and Flin Flon have been very enterprising in this regard. The Pas has its annual trappers' festival which is becoming well known across Canada, and last summer Flin Flon observed its first trout festival. This festival drew a good number of United States tourists who took part in the special festivities, and the venture was so successful it is to be repeated and enlarged this year.

The Chairman: Do tourist matters come under this department?

Mr. Dinsdale: I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that I believe that is one of the reasons why the Hudson Bay railway is of tremendous importance, not only to Manitoba but to all parts of Canada, for the railway carries the tourists right through to Churchill with its historic sites, beluga industry pioneered by the hon. member for Dauphin, and many other attractions. Another reason for its importance is the military developments taking place at port Churchill. I was quite amazed to find the extent of this development. There had been rumours of activity in that area, but because of the necessary demands of security, we had not heard too many details. It amazed me that, even though we were only able to look at it from the outside, the obvious development has not provided more revenue for the operations of the Hudson Bay railway.

I go on to state other reasons for introducing this subject tonight. It is tied up, of course, with the whole matter of the decentralization of industry about which we have heard repeatedly from western and maritime members. It is tied up also with the necessity for developing power projects which lie in great potential on the Nelson river. For example, the Nelson river alone, I am told, has a potential power source of some 2,500,000 horsepower.

My chief reason for introducing this topic tonight by way of general discussion as I have said is to inquire concerning the deficit on this railway which has increased by $75,000 during the past year. Admittedly, the development of the Hudson bay trade route has been slow. It goes all the way back to the Selkirk settlers in 1813. The difficulties in this development have been discussed many times in this chamber, such as the problem of vested interests and the difficulty of breaking the trends that have been under way in this country for a good many decades. There is the difficulty with insurance rates, discrimination in freight rates, and the perennial matter of diversion charges, all of which have been raised in discussion. Then, too, there has not been as much interest as might be expected when we make an objective appraisal of the possibilities of the Hudson bay route. Excellent work has been done by the Hudson Bay Railway Association, but still we have the myth of the frozen north deeply implanted even in the minds of the people of southern Manitoba. This myth must disappear when we see the tremendous industrial developments that are taking place in northern Russia, a geographical area similar to our own northern regions. These are developments we must parallel if we are to keep pace in the struggle between east and west which is only too apparent at the moment.

It might be of interest to the members to know that there are 800 people living at port Churchill at the present time. This is an increase from 40 over a period of twenty years, and does not include the military personnel resident in that area. With all these developments I say we should be approaching the position where the operation of the railway becomes profitable, particularly in the special circumstances that arose in connection with marketing last year's wheat crop. Instead of that, we find an increased deficit. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the problem can only be solved on an export and import basis. An increase in export and import activity through the port facilities should be a relatively easy matter if Canada's economy is expanding as rapidly as so often claimed by the members of the government. I am told that if we were able to export 15 million bushels of wheat through the port of Churchill, for example, the port would pay for itself and there would be no necessity for the annual inclusion of the amount in the estimates to pay for the deficit.

The export side of the solution, of course, would include the use of the port for carrying commodities other than wheat, and those commodities are well known to those concerned most with our export problems. On the import side, it would appear that the present difficulties we are facing in regard to the export of our agricultural products would be entirely solved with the increased use of the port. The route to Great Britain is shorter by some 1,200 miles, and we seemingly are moving in the direction of closer trade relations with Great Britain because of the lack of other markets. By drumming up a "buy British" campaign, I feel that the deficit problem could be easily overcome, Britain taking our agricultural products in exchange for her manufactured articles.

The final and ultimate reason for bringing this matter to the attention of the minister is because, in the circumstances now prevailing, the solution is largely in the hands of the government. On reading over previous discussions on this topic, I find that the minister has always expressed a sympathetic interest in and an understanding viewpoint with respect to this problem. For example, last spring when the topic of diversion charges—an exceedingly difficult one—was raised by certain prairie members in the house, the promise was then given that this discriminatory matter would be given some attention and that some solution would be attempted. It would seem that that problem still has not been overcome. Those who export grain through port Churchill still find it necessary to pay a certain diversion charge to the grain outlets in the east in payment for facilities that they do not use. That is a rather remarkable state of affairs, to say the least.

Also, on reading over previous debates, I find that the house, along with the people of Canada generally, has manifested an interest in the greater use of the port. In 1946, when a resolution was introduced suggesting that greater use be made of port Churchill, all members of the house voted overwhelmingly in favour of that resolution. That was back in 1946. You can therefore see, Mr. Chairman, that by gradually wearing down the rock of inertia, eventually these excellent port facilities will come into their own, particularly as Manitoba and the other prairie provinces overcome the handicap that has long been theirs with regard to diversified economic activity.

In concluding my remarks on this subject, may I say again that because of the fact that the harbour board, the wheat board, the C.N.R. and the board of transport commissioners actually have the full control over the use of the facilities of the port, the solution largely rests in the hands of the government. I think it is right to expect that the situation which has existed since the opening of the port will be overcome and that instead of there being a deficit we shall find the export-import activities through port Churchill realizing a handsome surplus and making a major contribution to the development of our total Canadian economy.

The other matter with which I wish to deal is strictly a local one, but this seems to be the occasion on which to present it. It relates to the necessity for a new administration building at the municipal airport at Brandon, Manitoba. This airport was taken over from the air force after the commonwealth air training scheme was closed down following world war II. Since that time it has been operated by the city of Brandon. The activities have been carried on in the temporary building that was left standing by the air force.

There are three major phases of those activities. One is the flying club which engages in the typical activities of a flying club, as well as making a contribution to the training of army personnel, particularly pilots of light observation aircraft.

I should point out that the manager of our flying club is a highly competent individual by the name of Mr. Ed. McGill, a former flight commander from the well-known 418, City of Edmonton squadron, which made for itself such an excellent reputation in intruder activities over the continent during the war. Mr. McGill is responsible for this army training activity. While I am on the subject of flying clubs, may I say that it was during my maiden speech that I first expressed our interest in the opportunity to take part in the Chipmunk training scheme. As yet that opportunity has not been afforded. We have a large group of reserve pilots who are most anxious to keep up their flying skills so that they might be prepared, as much as possible, for any military emergency. The flying club is just one part of the activities at the airport. We have Brandon Air Services which operates chartered flights, and assists local businessmen in getting around the area. It has also made emergency flights during the winter, bringing people from the surrounding rural area to hospitals when the highways are closed. Brandon Air Services has become an important part of the activities at the Brandon airport.

Finally, we have coming in daily T.C.A. flights which also make use of the airdrome facilities. Unfortunately, the temporary administration building is gradually collapsing, as would be expected. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Transport officials, and although no provision is made this year, I bring the matter to the attention of the minister as a situation requiring some action in the near future.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister certain needs in the country which I love, the country in which I have grown up and which I now represent. I refer to the constituency of Kootenay West. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I am quite sure that in what I have to say this evening I shall receive the support of all parties. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will support everything that I have to say this evening, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Skeena will do the same. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, you have in this chamber three Kootenay boys who grew up in that country at the same time. I happen to live there still, but I never go anywhere without being asked, "How is Howard getting on?" or "Is Teddy still as bad a boy as ever?"

Before I make a few requests, I want to try briefly to impress the minister with the importance of the district which I represent. I might say that when I first came to Ottawa in 1945 I had occasion to speak to the minister about a matter concerning the Arrow lakes, and I was positively appalled when the minister said, "Where are the Arrow lakes?" That day is past. The Arrow lakes are known throughout the whole of North America because of the great developments that are taking place at this time.

In my constituency, Mr. Chairman, over $30 million is being spent for the construction of a power dam and a power plant. Over $5 million has been spent recently on the construction of a power line from Trail to Kimberley and the Riondel mine, including a two-mile overhead cable across Kootenay lake. I understand it is the longest one in the world. In addition to that, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are spending over $30 million in extensions to their plant. The mining industry is spending, this year or next year, $10 million in further development. There is now under consideration, and almost at the point of commencement, the construction of a $65 million pulp mill. In addition to that, the joint international commission has been making surveys in the Columbia river basin since 1946 and has been spending an average of some $150,000 a year on those investigations with a view to finding suitable locations for dams on the Columbia river. Already they have found a site above Revelstoke; this will mean the building of a dam over 500 feet high and equal in size to the Boulder dam. In addition to that, owing to the necessity to feed the increased population, there will be a rapid extension of the farming industry in the area.

I make these few observations in an effort to impress the minister with the importance of the area I represent to the Canadian economy at this time. I know the minister is fully aware of the fact that one of the most important defence industries in Canada is located in the riding of Kootenay West. I find that under the new procedure now established, Mr. Chairman, I have to make what might be termed a Mulligan speech. I have to put everything together under this first item, and then trust to the Lord that I will receive answers later.

Anyway, I do wish to bring to the minister's attention the situation with respect to the Castlegar airport, which he knows so well, and which is owned jointly by the city of Nelson and the villages of Castlegar and Kinnaird. It is a very worthy co-operative municipal effort. That joint effort has produced a first class airport at the junction of the Columbia and Kootenay rivers, on a large portion of land formerly owned by the Doukhobors. Last year the airport committee, representing the municipalities, asked for a grant of $25,000 for paving and surfacing, and a further grant of $10,000. They received a total of $35,000 from the minister's department, for which they wish me to say they are most grateful. The money was carefully spent, and a great deal of work was done for that $35,000.

However, they still have considerable paving to do, and they have asked the minister for a further grant of $50,000. When I hear these other grants to airports I realize that that is not a large sum. I have always been somewhat timid in asking for grants of money; but I find that the longer I come to Ottawa the less timid I become. I will say that this airport is of tremendous importance to the southern interior of British Columbia. It serves a district 100 miles to the north of the Arrow lakes, between 30 and 40 miles to the west, from 75 to 80 miles to the east; it is the meeting place of the Kootenay and the Columbia, and the crossroads of the railways. This district serves a large area, and is most important from that point of view.

On those grounds alone I would support the application. Secondly, owing to the immense industrial development in the area, there is a heavy passenger traffic coming from points on the coast, including Seattle, and from Calgary and Edmonton, into our area. As a matter of fact I might point out here that my constituents would welcome a visit from the minister. I do not think he has ever visited that portion of British Columbia. Most of the ministers travel along the main line, go as far as Vancouver, make one speech and then return. But my people would welcome more visits from members of the cabinet. I am sure if they took time to visit the Kootenay country they would have their eyes opened, and there would be the possibility of their emigrating to that district.

In addition to that, this is a most important defence area. Therefore I hope the minister will give further consideration to this request from the Castlegar airport committee for a grant of $50,000. This amount is necessary, and I know the money will be spent carefully. The minister's department could not spend $50,000 to greater advantage, for the number of people concerned, than by giving a grant to the Castlegar airport committee.

I have other airport questions to bring up which, although on a smaller scale, are important. It is obvious that in mountainous areas places for aircraft to land are very necessary. The city of Nelson has made excellent efforts in recent years to build a small airport for light aircraft on the waterfront between the north arm of Kootenay lake and the city boundary. The city has used excess dirt from cuts and dumped it into the proposed airport location. Complete plans are drawn. I understand officials of the minister's department have approved the plans as being acceptable for a landing field for light aircraft, and have advised the city council with regard to the development.

When I was last talking to the mayor he said that he appreciated very much the co-operation and advice they had received from the minister's officials. This, of course, is on a much smaller scale than the matter to which I referred earlier; but a landing place at Nelson for light planes is necessary, to facilitate flying back and forth from local and other points. It is necessary because of the development of the survey services, because of the needs of the forest service in British Columbia, because of the development of the tourist traffic, and because of the non-scheduled flights serving the local residents of such points as Creston, Cranbrook, Trail, Grand Forks and other places. The Nelson city council are not asking for a great deal. Even a small grant would be very welcome to assist them in the completion of this important airport to be used by small planes.

While I am on the topic of airports I shall wander farther afield. I know the hon. member for Kamloops is here this evening, and will be speaking. However, the mayor of Revelstoke has asked me to support the hon. member for Kamloops in his effort to obtain a grant of $5,000 for a municipal airport at Revelstoke. I know the hon. member for Kamloops has been working on this for some time and has been doing all he can to obtain a grant for the airport at this point. I wish to support his efforts in this connection. The airport is necessary because of the increased logging operations and the development of the pulp and paper industry which has necessitated the landing of aircraft carrying survey crews and workmen from the north Columbia area who would take part in general logging operations.

This small airport has become of particular importance because of the proposed pulp and paper development in the Columbia river basin. One realizes how great this development is when it is pointed out that the licence for the company will extend over an area with an average width of 50 miles and 300 miles in length, from which there will be cut in perpetuity over 200 million feet of lumber a year. I offer my support of the hon. member for Kamloops at the request of the mayor of Revelstoke, and other persons in that city. This small airport is another link in the chain of small airports necessary to the interior of British Columbia, if our industrial activity is to be serviced adequately with the type of plane required to go up the mountain gorges to survey timber limits, to carry men to isolated locations, and so on. I trust the minister will give further consideration to this request.

Now I change my tune. I brought this subject up on several occasions, but thus far without results. In the interior of British Columbia we suffer from very poor radio reception in certain areas. We can hear Canadian stations fairly well during daytime hours; but once darkness falls and the sun goes behind the mountains it is impossible to hear anything but American stations. I am one who, like many others in my constituency, would like to hear the C.B.C. news, and would like to have an opportunity to hear the minister when he makes an occasional address over the radio. However, it is impossible for us to do that now because we cannot bring in Canadian stations after nightfall. This condition prevails throughout the greater part of the Arrow lakes area, the greater part of the Kootenay lakes and of East Kootenay. I do hope that something more will be done to see that these people have better radio reception.

I wish particularly to refer to radio interference, a subject that has been mentioned before. I have taken it up with the department throughout the years, and many of my constituents have written the department, the inspectors, and officials in charge at Vancouver. I suppose they have been doing their best. They come in with their cars or trucks and make investigations with their instruments, of which I have little knowledge. I have very little mechanical ability except perhaps to oil a wheelbarrow. As I say, they have done their best to locate the causes of this interference but without much success to date.

I suggest to the minister that it is not a good policy for the Department of Transport, radio division, to drive into a small community with a small truck marked "Department of Transport, radio division." When that happens many people who have small motors and other gadgets without the necessary attachments to stop interference shut them down until they are told the inspectors have left the village. I suggest that these inspections should be made without unnecessary advertising.

I am also of the opinion that the inspectors have far too much to do. I understand there is an inspector located at Kelowna who handles all the interior of British Columbia. That is far too much for one inspector to handle. It means that he can make only infrequent visits to the smaller communities. I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to increasing the number of inspectors in the radio division in British Columbia, particularly in the area which I represent. Also something more should be done to detect the causes of this radio interference. Some regulation should be enacted to require people who are causing interference to get the proper appliances to eliminate that interference.

I know of the inconvenience caused by this interference from personal experience. My own ranch is six miles from my nearest neighbour on the one side and twelve miles on the other. There are no roads and therefore I must travel by launch or steamer. Like many others in the area I depend a great deal on the radio for outside information and entertainment. The men going into the back woods with their families to do logging work, the men working in the mines back in the hills, the men who are trapping or prospecting, the farmers in small communities along the lakeside within my constituency, all these people are entitled to just as good reception as that prevailing in the urban areas. They pay the radio licence fee and I think every effort should be made to provide proper reception for these people who are willing to go into isolated places to provide the production so necessary to our country.

There is another matter which I have mentioned on several occasions in the house, the Arrow lakes steamship service. I think by this time the minister knows where the Arrow lakes are. It is most necessary that this steamer service be continued during the transition period. I suggest that the provincial government has some responsibility and that this steamer service should be kept operating as a result of financial co-operation between the provincial and federal governments.

As I have said before, if the Canadian Pacific Railway would only advertise the beauty of the route over which these steamers sail I am sure that they would be loaded to capacity during the summer months and well into the fall. The steamer operating on the Arrow lakes is called the Minto and the one operating on the Kootenay lake is called the Moyia. I understand that these vessels were built in 1898 and they are two of a rapidly dwindling fleet of stern-wheelers and I am sure many people would be interested in the romantic experience of sailing on these ships. I bring this matter again to the minister's attention because it is most important with the developments that are going on at the present time that these steamers be kept running. I think that there should be co-operation between the provincial and federal government in connection with this steamer operation until the needs of the area are met by some other means of transportation. That is all I have to say this evening and I trust I have impressed the minister.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the committee, but I should like to discuss one matter which is of great interest to my part of the country. It has been agreed that the minister should make a general statement, then hon. members would bring up matters in which they are interested, and the minister would reply. In view of the many requests made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the interesting and constructive requests made by other members, I am sure that many will get lost before the minister replies. Personally I think the old practice was the best where one item was taken up at a time and disposed of.

Mr. McLure: We can still do that.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The Department of Transport is a most important department having to do with transportation by land, sea and air. It is especially important to Nova Scotia and the maritimes. As I have said before, we would never have entered confederation if it had not been for the advantages we expected to receive by way of improved transportation facilities. Heretofore the railroads have used a large percentage of the coal produced in Cumberland and Pictou counties, perhaps a greater percentage of the production than that of any other section of Canada. I brought this matter to the minister's attention when the motion to set up the committee on railways and shipping was before the house.

This matter was discussed in the committee by the president of the Canadian National Railways. I appreciate the effort made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but I am not satisfied with the replies of the president of the Canadian National Railways. I feel that it is the duty of the Minister of Transport and the government to see that the rights of the coal miners in Nova Scotia are not prejudiced by the increased use of oil to operate these locomotives. From the information I have received more diesel engines are being used in the maritime provinces than even in central Canada. It has reached such a state that diesel locomotives are being used to move coal from Springhill and other coal-mining sections in Nova Scotia to be used for industrial purposes in Nova Scotia. I appeal to the minister and the government to see that the rights of the coal miners in Nova Scotia are not prejudiced by the introduction of diesel locomotives, even though they mean a small saving.

The Canadian National Railways own many locomotives which could be used for years to come. These locomotives should be used in the maritime provinces. They should be operated as coal burning locomotives and diesel engines should not be used.

There is another matter that is creating some uneasiness in my part of Nova Scotia, and that is the threatened closing of some of the railway stations. From a purely economic standpoint there may be some slight saving to be made by closing these stations but I say it is a right of the people who live in these communities to have these stations. They have been open to them ever since the railway was constructed seventy or eighty years ago, and the management of the railway has no right to issue orders that these railway stations be closed. I know they have to get the permission of the board of transport commissioners but the matter should not be dealt with purely from the point of view of economy.

The people in my constituency and in Nova Scotia generally have had these rights ever since the construction of the Canadian National Railways years ago. I appreciate the response I have had from the minister to the representations I have made as the member for Cumberland on behalf of the municipality of Cumberland, which has passed resolutions, and on behalf of certain citizens who are uneasy about the closing of these stations. As I understand the situation, no hearing has yet been held and no decision has been reached. I want to point out very strongly to the minister and the committee that the people of Nova Scotia have rights so far as keeping these railway stations open is concerned. The railway must not be allowed to close the stations merely because a few dollars may be saved. I put the responsibility on the minister and the government.

Last year the taxpayers of Canada made up a deficit of Canadian National Railways of over $15 million, and since that is so we in Nova Scotia have prior rights with respect to the privileges we have had for so many years. Then there is the necessity of double-tracking the Canadian National railway line from Moncton to Truro and through to Sydney, especially the line from Truro to Sydney. That matter was discussed in the special committee on railways and shipping but there was no very sympathetic response from the officials of Canadian National Railways.

I want to make a short reference to the canal situation. Almost $400 million has been spent in central Canada on canals. In the minister's estimates this year there is a total appropriation of $9,793,793 for the maintenance of these canals. Practically no money will be expended for that purpose in the maritime provinces. The house has agreed to an expenditure of $300 million on the St. Lawrence seaway. There is an appropriation in the minister's estimates of $12,541,000 for improvements to the St. Lawrence channel. Last session the minister submitted figures as to what had been expended up to date on dredging the St. Lawrence channel. I have not the figures before me but up to date it has amounted to a very large sum.

Then there is the proposal to build the Chignecto canal which I have put before the house repeatedly. Strong, determined delegations have come to Ottawa asking that that work be undertaken as was promised at the time of confederation and on many occasions since. While the minister is always very genial and courteous, I do not think he has given serious thought to the granting of the request of the people interested in that project. The hon. member for Westmorland had the honour and responsibility of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the opening of this session. He was requested to do so by the Prime Minister and the government. He put forward a proposal for the construction of this canal but at another location, namely, from the Petitcodiac river through to Shediac.

He made a proposal for the building of a large tidal power plant at the head of the bay of Fundy, the Cumberland basin and the Petitcodiac river. He has put this proposal before the house on different occasions. He has had a sympathetic response from the Minister of Resources and Development but as far as I know nothing has been done. There has merely been a vague promise that sympathetic consideration would be given to the suggestion. I do not think that is quite good enough. When a member acting on behalf of the Prime Minister and the government makes such proposals time after time to the house I think we should have a statement from the minister as to what he proposes to do with respect to the building of the Chignecto canal and the development of the two million horsepower project at the head of the bay of Fundy.

There have been references to airports and air services. In the minister's estimates there is a total amount of $42,051,165 for air services. In the estimates of the Department of National Defence there is a total appropriation of $759,310,300 for air services. I suppose the town of Amherst made a greater effort and contribution than any other municipality in Canada during the last war in co-operating with the government in the building of an airport. When the war was over the government refused even to maintain the Amherst airport. They threw it to one side just as they would a squeezed orange or an old shoe. That airport, like airports in other parts of Canada, is of great value to the air services of Canada. There was a gathering there only a few weeks ago. While the airport was in very bad condition planes landed and a number of people had a conference there with respect to the development of air services. I understand that after great effort the minister induced the town of Amherst to take over the airport inasmuch as the government refused even to maintain it. It is intolerable that such an airport, one of the best of its kind in all Canada, should be allowed to fall into disrepair because of a few thousand dollars a year. This department is spending this large sum; the air force under the Department of National Defence is spending $759 million this year; yet there is not money available to keep that airport in repair.

There are other subjects I should like to deal with under this department. The trans-Canada highway does not come under the minister, but the grade crossings do. I would ask if, in connection with the agreement with Nova Scotia, arrangements are being made to construct grade separations at all the railway crossings in that province. I would like confirmation of the route this highway is to take. I think it should go direct to Halifax. I believe it should go along the Sunrise trail, the Northumberland strait and then down to North Sydney, in order to serve the people of Newfoundland. There are a number of railway grade crossings along this route, and I think it should be a condition of the construction of that highway that no level crossing shall be left in its entire length.

We from Nova Scotia were pleased at the announcement by the minister that a contract has actually been entered into for the construction of the causeway across the strait of Canso. I have always favoured a causeway in preference to a bridge. I would not care to recommend a bridge over water 180 feet deep, with the ice conditions, the tidal conditions and the wind conditions prevailing there. I do not think there could be any assurance that such a bridge would be made safe. Therefore I support the decision of the department to construct the causeway. I understand the executive assistant in Nova Scotia, Mr. McColough, and the deputy minister, Mr. Belliveau, came out strongly in favour of the causeway. I was associated with those gentlemen for a number of years, and I would have been very much surprised and disappointed if they had approved the construction of a bridge, in spite of the fact that it was recommended by some outstanding engineers.

I would ask the minister whether provision will be made in the construction of this causeway for a passageway for fish. Fish have been moving through the strait of Canso in enormous numbers for hundreds and thousands and probably millions of years, so I feel a passage should be left for them and the causeway should not be built in solidly. At least I believe the minister should secure the opinion of the Department of Fisheries before permitting the strait of Canso to be completely blocked by this causeway. I understand that at times the fish form an almost solid body in the water.

I would also ask the minister for some information as to the contribution of the province of Nova Scotia toward the cost of construction of this causeway. It has been rumoured that my province was required to contribute up to $5 million.

Mr. Chevrier: $5,500,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The federal government has the responsibility for the construction of the causeway and is getting credit for it, but I feel this government has driven a pretty hard bargain with Nova Scotia if it is exacting $5 million from that province so Nova Scotia may have a roadway across the causeway. I would like also to ask what contribution the Canadian National Railways are making. I feel that in view of the benefits they will receive they should be very large contributors to the cost of this causeway. Perhaps the minister will advise us on these matters when he replies.

I am interested in the tenders, nine in all, that were received by the department. Some of them are very reasonable, more so than many people expected. One cannot help noticing, however, that the contractors in the locality are outbid by these big companies. It seems that any good big plum of a contract goes to someone outside the maritime provinces. It is only fair that contractors who have their head offices and their shareholders in those provinces should be given a preference in the letting of these contracts. At the same time I would like to put in a word on behalf of Canadian contractors in connection with the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway when the minister is in a position to undertake that project, which I hope will not be too long delayed.

I might also say a word with respect to shipbuilding. At the time of confederation and after Nova Scotia was one of the great shipbuilding districts of the world. I believe naval ships and those being built for this department should be built in the yards in the maritime provinces. I notice an invitation has been issued to hon. members to visit Sorel sometime within the next few weeks, where a ship called Chignecto is being built. I think it would have been very appropriate if that ship had been built in the maritime provinces, where we have been urging the construction of the Chignecto canal, though the minister has not given us any encouragement. It is almost adding insult to injury to build a ship up here and call it by that name. Apparently that is all we are to get as far as the Chignecto canal is concerned. I am quite sure, however, that it will be a good ship and will give the department good service in the years to come.

As I said a few minutes ago, this is a department of very great importance to the people of Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces. There are many appropriations we may discuss as they come before the committee, but that is all I am going to say now. I am looking forward to some recognition by the minister of the inquiries I have made, as well as those that have been made by other members on this side of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I apologize to the hon. member who was about to rise, Mr. Chairman, but I am sure the committee will expect me to deal with some of the questions that have been asked and some of the matters raised during the course of this discussion, which has gone on since almost 3.30 this afternoon. I can hardly do so in the time that is left at my disposal, but I should like to attempt to deal with some of the matters which I consider of major importance. In any event it would be impossible for me, and I am sure the house and the members who have raised the questions, will not want me to refer to all of the local points that have been raised during the course of the discussion this afternoon.

First of all, I should like to say how grateful I am to the house for the very impartial, fair and constructive manner in which the estimates of the Department of Transport have been discussed this afternoon. I believe that out of the discussion there is bound to come some benefit for all concerned. The member for Vancouver-Quadra dealt with a number of matters. He will not expect me to respond to all of them, but there are some which I think are of sufficient importance to deal with at this time.

The member was somewhat critical of the attitude of the government and the conduct of the maritime commission with reference to shipbuilding, ship repair and policy generally. I would remind the hon. member and the house that the government established the maritime commission some years ago for the purpose of advising the government on matters concerning the maritime industry. That was the reason for the establishment of the commission, and that is exactly what the commission has done. For instance, the commission recommended the establishment of the replacement plan. The hon. member was critical of that, but I am sure he would not have been had he known what the position is so far as that plan is concerned. It has been a good plan.

By virtue of the recommendations of the commission to the government, which the government has adopted, there have been no less than 62 ships sold since the beginning of the plan, and the proceeds from the sale deposited in escrow. The proceeds to the escrow fund amounted to $36·2 million. Of the $36·2 million, $25·5 million have already been assigned for shipbuilding and reconversion in Canadian yards, while a large portion has been used as an aid to encourage the replacement of outworn coastal and lake shipping vessels. Contracts have recently been awarded for two 28,000 ton oil tankers which will be the largest ocean-going ships built in Canada. It is hoped that this recent order may be the forerunner of similar orders for ocean-going dry cargo ships. At the present time consideration is being given by other owners to building in Canada for ocean-going trades.

There are also forty-five 10,000 ton ships and twelve 7,500 ton ships remaining under Canadian flag. This brings me to the other recommendation which was made by the Canadian maritime commission, namely that having to do with the transfer policy. The transfer policy came at a time when ocean freights were low and hard to get. Some 97 Canadian-owned ships were assigned to United Kingdom registry under a special transfer arrangement made with the United Kingdom. This transfer policy is operating satisfactorily at this time.

Then, the commission recommended the subsidy plan. This plan was announced by the Prime Minister in December, 1949, by virtue of which the sum of $3 million was to be paid on ships that were in difficulties because of the decline in freights and the movement of cargoes. Under this plan some 37 Canadian-registered ships made contracts with the commission and each was paid $75,000. The full amount of $3 million was not expended. The subsidy plan was of tremendous assistance until the time came when, as the hon. member mentioned in his remarks, because of Korea and for other reasons, freight rates again rose and made the position more tenable for the operators. In any event, the subsidy was very helpful in tiding these ships over a difficult period.

Then, as the hon. member knows, the commission has responsibility in connection with the construction of new ships and ship repairs. In Canada the shipbuilding industry has reached today a post-war peak. Employment is increasing month by month, and orders on hand for new construction to date have a value of over $234 million. While it is true that the greater portion of this sum is for naval shipbuilding, about $64 million have been placed for merchant shipbuilding. The average employment in these yards at the end of March, 1951, was 12,015, an increase of 44 per cent over the previous year. The average employment for March, 1952 is 17,515, which is a tremendous increase over the average monthly employment figure up until the end of March, 1952.

In the ship repairing branch of the industry, 2,141 merchant ships and 63 naval vessels were overhauled or reconditioned, at a total expenditure of $24,335,180, which is an increase of 41·5 per cent over last year. This gives some indication of the work done by the maritime commission. The hon. member and the house will recall that earlier the maritime commission recommended in one of its reports that there should be a nucleus of 7,000 men continually employed in our yards. Well, the figure I gave indicates that for March of this year the employment is 17,515, which is away above that suggested nucleus.

Again the maritime commission recommended that shipyards should be located in various strategic areas of Canada, and that has been done. In fact, the regions were: the Pacific coast, the great lakes, the St. Lawrence river and the Atlantic coast. Those yards have now orders, both for defence and for private purposes, for a substantial number of ships.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if he can tell us how many of those are fast cargo vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: With respect to that, I mentioned earlier that there are two 28,000 ton tankers.

Mr. Green: They are for the great lakes?

Mr. Chevrier: No, those are two 28,000 ton tankers for deep-sea operation. Of course, there is a large number of coastal and great lakes ships. The reason why there has been no greater number of deep-sea vessels is due to the fact that the costs of construction in Canada are much higher than elsewhere, particularly compared to Great Britain where the costs are 50 per cent lower than they are in Canada.

I wanted to say something with reference to another recommendation which was made by the maritime commission and which the government adopted, namely that for the establishment of a committee to study the requirements of the cargo liner trade with respect to ship design, keeping in mind the requirements of national defence for the movement of materials of war. That committee has been formed. It is composed of Canadian ship owners from the east coast, Canadian ship owners from the west coast, ship owners associations, shipbuilders' associations, the Royal Canadian Navy and other groups. Its object is to make a study of designs, scale drawings and data which will be prepared and studied by a technical section of the maritime commission.

I therefore think it can safely be said that the maritime commission is fulfilling its purpose. Even though my hon. friend may think that the deputy minister of transport has sufficient work and should not at the same time be chairman of the maritime commission, I can give assurance that his presence both as deputy minister and as chairman of the maritime commission is of great assistance to me, because it is an advantage to have an official who is conversant with the operations of the department and who at the same time sits in with the two other members of the Canadian maritime commission.

My hon. friend dealt with the national harbours board and the fact that a successor to Mr. St. Laurent had not been appointed. That is true. Mr. St. Laurent resigned in July of 1951. Since that time careful attention has been given to an appointment. A number of names have been considered. While I am not in a position to make any announcement now, I hope that it will be possible to do so in the not too distant future.

Then my hon. friend dealt with the recommendation of the Gibb commission. The Gibb commission did, in fact, recommend advisory councils but the government saw fit not to accept that recommendation. As a matter of fact, there are many recommendations made by royal commissions, some of which are accepted and others not. In this case I think we were wise in not acting on that particular recommendation.

Recently I had the opportunity of visiting two ports, namely Halifax and Quebec. In both instances I found that persons interested in port questions have decided to establish an organization. In the case of Halifax, they are establishing a body composed of local men who will make recommendations to the national harbours board. In Quebec city there is being established by a certain group of interested persons there an organization which, equally, will make recommendations. I think it is far more satisfactory, at least for the national harbours board, to deal with groups of that kind than it would be for them to deal with a body such as that recommended by Sir Alexander Gibb.

My hon. friend also dealt with the question of the airport at Vancouver. He was critical of the delay. I can tell him that the delay is not due to the officers of the Department of Transport. We prepared a report, or had prepared for us, a report on the questions of the assets, land, buildings, equipment and the like at Vancouver.

Mr. Green: What was the figure?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not that figure available, and I should not like to trust to my memory. In any event the report dealt with the two subjects. Following that report we made an offer of something in the vicinity of $400,000—perhaps it was $450,000—to the Vancouver authorities. We made that offer on the assumption that we were not purchasing the land; because in other municipalities —in fact in all other municipalities—a contribution of some sort has been made for the land.

Mr. Green: Is that true of Dorval?

Mr. Chevrier: Dorval is the one exception. All other airports have made a contribution for the land. The exception of Dorval was because of the fact that the operations at St. Hubert during the war were transferred from that port to Dorval, and the government during the war thought that the proper procedure was to purchase the land. That is the only exception. In all other airports the communities have made a substantial contribution; and the departmental authorities felt that such should be the case for Vancouver. In any event, I understand that the negotiations are to be resumed in the near future and I trust—in fact, I have the assurance—that a satisfactory solution can be found to that problem.

Mr. Green: The minister did not mention the deepening of the harbour entrance.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not mention it because it is not a matter concerning the Department of Transport. The national harbours board do not, as a rule, dredge their harbours. They call upon the Department of Public Works to do so. The plan to which my hon. friend has reference is, I understand, a plan which has been given consideration by officers of the Department of Public Works. As to dredging itself, I do not know whether or not representations have been made by us to the Department of Public Works; but in any event I have made a note of the representations made by my hon. friend.

Mr. McLure: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: I have just started to deal with the items. There are several others.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, there are quite a few other questions which the minister has not had an opportunity to answer; and some of the members on this side of the house had some further subjects to deal with. I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will move to go into supply and call four departments. Then we will proceed with the resolution respecting the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947; Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian forces; Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act. Then if we have any time left, we could probably take up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister, to provide for the establishment of a national library, and the resolution to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. McLure: When shall we have transport again?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As soon as possible.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

MONTREAL AND SOUTHERN COUNTIES RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Boivin:

Following the changes made on November 25, 1951, in the Montreal-Granby-Waterloo service, via Marieville, what arrangements have been made by the presidents of the Canadian National and the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway unions concerning the old employees of the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway?

Mr. Benidickson: Prior to the change in service, negotiations were carried on with representatives of organized labour who represent the employees concerned. The interested labour organizations could not reach an agreement between themselves and the new service has been manned by employees of the Canadian National Railways. This action has not resulted in any reduction in the number of train service employees of the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway.

2. If so, what were the names of these films, when were they produced, and with what product or products did they deal respectively?

SURPLUS NAVAL STORES

Mr. MacInnis:

What equipment and furnishings were declared surplus and destroyed in naval stores, Esquimalt, British Columbia, during the months of November and December, 1951, and January, 1952?

Mr. Blanchette: No surplus equipment and furnishings were destroyed by naval stores, Esquimalt, B.C., during the months of November and December, 1951, and January, 1952, but were handed over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal.

NATURAL GAS—EXCHANGE BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Nickle:

1. Has the government negotiated with, or is it now prepared to initiate negotiations with, the United States government, in order to determine whether or not a large-scale, long-term firm agreement is feasible for exchange of natural gas between Canada and the United States?

2. In the alternative, is the government prepared at this time to urge that the United States authorize export of American natural gas to southern Ontario, in a volume equal to that of Alberta gas (ten billion cubic feet yearly) now being exported to defence industry in Montana, and for at least a similar short-term period (five years)?

Mr. Dickey:

1. No. The principal supply of natural gas is controlled by the government of Alberta and the Canadian government has no natural gas at its disposal that could be used to implement any such agreement, if made.

2. The Canadian government has made representations on behalf of the Union Gas Company's application to import natural gas into Ontario.

UNITED STATES—CANADIAN CURRENCY RATES —EXCHANGE BORDER STATIONS

Mr. Ross (Hamilton East):

2. If so, with what result?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CENSORSHIP OR BANNING OF BOOKS

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What officer or officials of the Department of National Revenue are responsible for the censorship or banning of books seeking entry into Canada?

2. What qualifications do they possess for these important duties?

Mr. McCann:

1 and 2. No officer is responsible for the determination as to what books shall be classified under tariff item 1201. Before any books are so classified they are passed upon by the Minister of National Revenue personally.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS— ST. MALO AND RIVIERE DU LOUP

Mr. Pouliot:

Referring to answers made by the then minister of railways and canals on May 7, 1925, and May 25, 1925, Hansard, pages 2928, 3479, 3480 and 3481, of 1925:

1. What are the names and the values of each of the pieces of machinery which were returned from the workshops of the Canadian National Railways at St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup?

2. When did such transfer take place?

3. What are the names and the respective occupations of the employees of the Canadian National Railways who were transferred from St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup?

4. On what date did each of said transfers take place?

5. What are the names and the values of each one of the pieces of machinery which were at the Canadian National Railways shops at Riviere du Loup (a) immediately after the transfer above referred to in paragraph 1 took place; (b) on May 1, 1952?

He said: This question was drafted in the English language. In the first paragraph I used the word "returned" with regard to the names and values of the pieces of machinery that were returned from the shops of the Canadian National Railways at St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup. In French the word "transportées" is used instead of the word "retournées". I should like to have the words "ont été retournées" used instead of "avaient été transportées" in the first paragraph. Then I should like to amend the third paragraph by adding the word "back" after "transferred" so that it will read, "who were transferred back from St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup" in English. In the French language the third paragraph should read:

Quels sont les noms et les occupations respectives des employés du National-Canadien qui sont revenus de Saint-Malo, ville de Québec, à la Rivière-du-Loup.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

INTERNATIONAL SALMON FISHERIES COMMISSION —EXPENSES AND ALLOWANCES

The question being called:

Mr. Pouliot:

What is the total of travelling expenses and living allowances paid each Canadian member of the international salmon fisheries commission since 1937?

He said: I rise again on a point of order. This question belongs to the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Fulford: This is my question.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NATIONAL DEFENCE—ORDERS FOR LAMPS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Have orders been placed for the Department of National Defence for boudoir, table, trilight and bridge lamps?

2. If so, how many such lamps have been ordered?

3. Have tenders been called for a supply of these lamps?

4. If so, has any tender as yet been accepted?

5. What is the estimated cost of these lamps?

6. On what basis are they to be issued to the services?

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

STALLING OF ELEVATOR IN PEACE TOWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can he make a report to the house on the four-hour elevator incident in the Peace Tower yesterday, and will he tell us something about the inspection service and whether or not precautions will be taken so that this sort of thing will not happen again?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): On Sunday May 18 at approximately 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon elevator No. 1 carrying thirteen passengers and the elevator operator left the first floor level and stalled at about 25 feet down. The maintenance crews worked for a period of four hours in order to raise the elevator back to the upward position when the occupants of the car were released. The car is ordinarily known as having a capacity of 1,500 pounds, which is spoken of in the industry as being a 10-passenger car. An examination of the car showed that the emergency safety device had come into operation owing to the overload, and this particular device could not be released under such conditions until the car was taken back to the upward position which, as stated, required a period of about four hours.

The car was in charge of one of our regular elevator operators, Mr. Charles Michaud, who has operated the car for a period of two years. Yesterday previous to the incident the car was working satisfactorily. While there is a card in the car saying that the load is to be nine people, the elevator operator used his own discretion in estimating the load with regard to the weight of the people rather than the number, feeling that he had not exceeded the 1,500-pound limit. In this particular case the load was heavier than the operator estimated, and this caused the safety device to automatically come into action and stop the car. The service maintenance contract for the care and successful operating of the machine is under the Otis Fensom Elevator Company, who were the manufacturers thereof.

LIVESTOCK

INQUIRY AS TO LIFTING OF UNITED STATES EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has any communication been received from the United States government that the embargo against Canadian cattle will be lifted within two months if there are no further outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Messages could have come to someone other than myself. I have seen no such message, but the law of the United States is that the embargo can be lifted two months after the certificate of final clearance is given by the United States secretary of agriculture.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

THEFT AND FIRES IN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS —AMENDMENT, MR. DREW

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, today I intend to present a motion such as is made possible at this stage of the proceedings of the house. It is one which I hope will receive consideration from members on all sides of the house having regard to its subject matter and also to the importance of the subject at a time when we actually have before the house the consideration of estimates for the Department of National Defence which it is anticipated may come close to $2½ billion with the supplementary estimates that will be submitted later. Without going into the details of any matters now before any committee of the house, it is only necessary to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that since this subject was last discussed only a few days ago attention has been drawn to still further examples of widespread theft and looting of government property in military establishments across this country.

If these things were happening in an isolated camp, or even in one or two camps, there might not be the same reason for returning once again to a subject which goes to the root of the confidence which can be placed by members of the house and the people of Canada in the administration of a department which is seeking an allocation of public funds that will amount to almost half of the total raised by taxes from the people of Canada during the coming year. Members of the house have been well aware for some time of the concern that has been expressed in the press and elsewhere about losses, thefts, incendiary fires and looting in government camps and storehouses throughout the country.

Our attention was directed to this subject very dramatically by the nature of the thefts that occurred at Petawawa. Since that time there have been further thefts in Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax, British Columbia and elsewhere throughout Canada, all of a nature which suggests a complete break-down of the administrative supervision of public property by the Department of National Defence. Nor is it simply a case of this concern being expressed by laymen. It would seem that this concern is being expressed in equally forceful language by those in uniform. The Calgary Herald of May 13 reports the contents of a letter written by Colonel J. S. Ross, officer in charge of administration, western command, to the heads of branches and staff, to the heads of services and to units and subunits under his authority. As reported in the Calgary Herald of that date the letter contains the following statement by Colonel Ross:

> The adjutant-general has expressed sincere concern at the apparent laxity revealed by the current scandals at Montreal and Petawawa. The trials resulting from these episodes may bring substantial penitentiary sentences to guilty parties.
> However, such action will not necessarily redeem lost confidence in the army by the minister, the members of the house, the press or the general public.
> There have been numerous incidents of a similar nature, all of which indicate a very distinct lack of higher level supervision. Further, it is apparent that some of the younger officers have not grasped the fact that they are custodians of crown property, and that their action in becoming involved in various fraudulent enterprises displays a moral laxity which can only be described as shocking.
> The most recent scandals involve officers and men in the sale of government stores and the appropriation of government stores for their own personal use.
> It is of the utmost importance that such irregularities be curbed forthwith. Accordingly you are directed to impress on all officers under your command the necessity for increased vigilance and good personal example.
> Drastically increased supervision is to be exercised immediately.
> Unit, subunit and detachment commanders are to fully understand their personal responsibilities.
> The line of responsibility within your organization is to be clearly defined so as to ensure a clear-cut disciplinary course in the event of slackness or dishonesty coming to light.
> Heads of services, units, subunits and detachment commanders will be answerable for future irregularities developing within this command.

That is the end of the quotation in the Calgary Herald of May 13 from a letter attributed to Colonel J. S. Ross. I have pointed out that I am reading from this newspaper report, and that is my only source of information in regard to this letter. I would point out, however, that unless it is disclosed that such letter was not written by the officer in charge of administration, western command, then this house has reason to pay particular attention to certain words contained in that letter written by an officer occupying a position of considerable responsibility in the Canadian armed forces.

May I refer hon. members to one particular sentence in the letter—and I quote again: "There have been numerous incidents of a similar nature, all of which indicate a very distinct lack of higher level supervision". That quotation suggests reasons why hon. members of this House of Commons should seek in every way in their power to bring about reforms which will examine with the most complete and searching inquiry every detail of the supervision, protection and accounting in relation to these vitally important public stores.

These are not just ordinary stores. These are not simply valuable pieces of public property. This is property which is part and parcel of the costly and vitally important preparation for the defence of Canada in case our security should be threatened. Therefore any method that is followed should be one which will assure that supervision either at the lower or at the higher level, as mentioned by Colonel Ross, will be examined dispassionately, judicially and completely.

Since this matter was first under discussion in the house during the present session, not only have there come to the attention of hon. members and the people of Canada incidents in particular camps, but there have become available reports of theft, looting and fires, some of them incendiary, which have resulted in the last two years in a loss estimated by the Department of National Defence at a figure of more than $7 million. There may be some question however as to whether those figures in themselves even approach the actual value of the losses to the people of Canada. It will be recalled that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) spoke of losses at Farnham as being in the neighbourhood of $3,500. If the accounting methods of the Department of National Defence report a loss of only $3,500 at Farnham, then the statement given of the total loss as in the statement prepared by the department, showing a loss of more than $7 million, should contain figures very much higher than it actually does.

What prompts me to raise this question with some sense of urgency this afternoon is that within the last few days it has been disclosed that the individual who was asked to undertake some form of inquiry into what had occurred at Petawawa is not actually in Canada at this time. One of the reasons why this in itself should call for immediate attention is that Colonel Currie's reputation, both as an accountant and as a man of great personal integrity and ability, did convey to the public a measure of confidence when the statement was made that he had undertaken to do this work.

No one would question either the accounting ability or the personal integrity or the high standing, in the esteem of Canadians who know him, of Colonel Currie, whose name was placed before us as the man who had been asked to carry out certain inquiries about which we are not too clearly informed.

It has been pointed out already in this house that, no matter what Colonel Currie's personal standing may be, that in itself is no substitute for an inquiry conducted under appropriate terms of reference which would give the inquiry the opportunity to go into every detail of the situation which has been described in such forceful terms by Colonel Ross in the letter quoted by the Calgary Herald. Since it has been stated that Colonel Currie has left Canada and is in England, and that this was with the knowledge and permission of the Minister of National Defence, and that such inquiries as are being conducted are being carried forward by his staff, then it does seem appropriate that we should examine with the utmost care just what measure of authority the staff in Colonel Currie's office really have to conduct an inquiry into laxity in administration which, according to the letter of Colonel Ross, if that is correctly reported shows a distinct lack of high-level supervision over government stores.

When the Minister of National Defence was asked under what authority Colonel Currie has been appointed to conduct an inquiry he replied that it was under section 4 of chapter 43 of the statutes of Canada, 1950, volume I, at page 473. This is known as the National Defence Act. Section 4, which is the section the minister put forward as the statutory provision under which Colonel Currie acquired his authority through a letter from the minister, reads as follows:

> The minister shall have the control and management of the Canadian forces, the Defence Research Board and of all matters relating to national defence including preparation of civil defence against enemy action, and shall be responsible for the construction and maintenance of all defence establishments and works for the defence of Canada.

That is the whole section and it contains no reference, by implication or otherwise, to an inquiry of any kind. This is the section which says that the minister shall have the control and management of the Canadian forces. Under the authority of that section the minister has written to Mr. Currie to ask him to do certain things at the Petawawa camp. It was said before, and it should be repeated, that under the letter written to Mr. Currie by the minister, Mr. Currie has no authority whatever to call for the production of documents, to compel the attendance of any witness or generally to do any of the things that are essential to the conduct of an inquiry such as I am sure most Canadians thought had been initiated when they read the announcement by the minister. The section merely says that there will be a minister.

Mr. Speaker, without getting away from the real consideration which should be in the mind of every member here, may I suggest that this does reflect the superman complex with which we seem to be dealing so frequently in this house. There is a minister appointed, and according to him he has the authority to do anything, therefore it is not necessary to bother about the public Inquiries Act or any other act that was designed by this parliament to authorize the kind of inquiry which should be under way at this time. In fact, one might almost hear the minister say, in the words of Gilbert and Sullivan:

> The law is the true embodiment,
> Of everything that's excellent.
> It has no kind of fault or flaw,
> And I, my lords, embody the law.

The minister is appointed. He is in charge of the establishment, and therefore he embodies the whole law, and his wish expressed in a letter to Mr. Currie is adequate to conduct an inquiry, which certainly would be one of the most important inquiries conducted in this country if it were carried forward with the measure of authority which such an inquiry should possess.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to present a motion, and in doing so I wish to refer to certain arguments which indicate an attitude toward inquiries provided by the public Inquiries Act which seems to be strangely inconsistent, not only with the attitude of this government on other occasions but also with the history of inquiries of this nature both here and in Great Britain, from whose records we gain so much when we seek precedents of value in dealing with matters of this kind. When it was suggested on another occasion that an inquiry under the public Inquiries Act should be conducted, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) belittled the suggestion that an inquiry of this kind could serve any useful purpose. He stated on an earlier occasion that a group of experts had been brought in from Chicago.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gather that the hon. member is referring to another debate during this session. If it took place during this session, I request that he do not do so.

Mr. Drew: I had no intention of quoting, but in any event I can put forward my argument without any further reference to what was said on another occasion. The attitude has been adopted on a number of occasions that the calling in of experts is not what is helpful in producing reforms. At the time that matter was under discussion I did not have the opportunity of replying because I had introduced a motion. If I had I would have pointed out that on a number of occasions the failure of people brought in without full authority has been demonstrated, and that is exactly what should be in the minds of hon. members in this house if the arguments which have been put forward against the appointment of a body to inquire under the public Inquiries Act are to be regarded as valid. Those arguments themselves demonstrate the unsatisfactory nature of inquiries conducted without the appropriate authority to obtain evidence, to obtain the production of documents, and that is exactly what has been suggested in this house and elsewhere. It has been suggested that, no matter how high the standing may be of any individual or group of individuals asked to inquire into certain matters of importance to the public, that inquiry can produce no satisfactory result if such individual or individuals do not find themselves cloaked with adequate powers under the public Inquiries Act.

Any suggestion that it is a derogation of the authority and responsibility of members of the house to suggest the appointment of an appropriate body to conduct a public inquiry under the public Inquiries Act is surely answered by the fact that this government has on so many occasions seen fit to appoint bodies to conduct inquiries into matters which ultimately could only be dealt with by this house and by parliament, and have, in fact, claimed a substantial measure of credit for adopting that course.

May I, Mr. Speaker, anticipate the possibility that we would once again hear any suggestion that it would be a derogation of the responsibility of the members of this house and of parliament to express their opinion that an appropriate body should be appointed under the public Inquiries Act. May I point out the occasions on which the appointment of such a body has been of vital importance not only here but at Westminster, from which we draw so many of our valuable precedents.

I think it may be worth while pointing out that our whole present system of public accounting and the presentation of accounts and reports to parliament is the result of the recommendations of a royal commission appointed in 1831 by the parliament at Westminster to inquire into their general methods of accounting, the preparation of accounts and, generally, the business methods of the government in relation to those subjects. Not only were the reforms effected at Westminster which produced their modern system of accounting but since we became, to use words that have been so often employed, "the transcript of Westminster", we adopted the same methods that were the result of recommendations of a royal commission in 1831.

Then when we are told that our treasury system is so perfect that it could gain nothing from such an inquiry, may I remind hon. members that another commission appointed two years earlier by the House of Commons and parliament at Westminster conducted an inquiry into treasury matters—it was known as the treasury commission—and our present treasury methods are largely the result of the recommendations of that commission.

Then, to bring the examples closer to the subject matter under discussion, I know that most members will recall—and most certainly the Minister of National Defence will do so—the Esher commission of 1904, which was a judicial commission headed by Lord Esher and which made recommendations that resulted in a complete reorganization not only of the British army but of the department of national defence and of the allocation of tasks within the department of national defence. May I remind the hon. members who have not recently read the findings of the Esher commission—when there is any suggestion that the appointment of such a commission is a derogation of the responsibilities and duties of members of parliament—that the Esher commission even went so far as to recommend what duties the prime minister of Great Britain should perform in relation to the supervision of national defence, and that commission outlined generally the duties of ministers, the duties of the general staff, of the adjutant general's branch, of the quartermaster general's branch, and of the whole military organization. Those recommendations brought about reforms without which it would never have been possible for the United Kingdom to go into the war of 1914 with an organization which was capable of performing the great services it rendered to Great Britain and to the whole free world.

Here in this country we have had commissions which have dealt with subjects that most certainly come under the authority and the responsibility of members of parliament at some point. Only a few days ago, I have reason to believe, approval was expressed on both sides of the house of an indication that the government proposes to carry out another recommendation of the Massey commission. The very fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was making this announcement indicated that this subject is one which must be dealt with by parliament if it is to be dealt with effectively. I have seen no suggestion that there was any derogation from the authority and responsibility of members of parliament when the Massey commission was appointed to inquire into subjects which must be dealt with by this House of Commons and by parliament if the recommendations are to be implemented.

Then at a time when we have reason to examine the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it perhaps is appropriate to remember that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is simply the Canadian broadcasting commission under a new form and that the Canadian broadcasting commission was set up as a result of the recommendations of a royal commission appointed by the government of Canada. In addition, there are a number of members who will recall that a royal commission conducted an inquiry into certain episodes connected with customs in this country, and that, as a result of the recommendations made at that time, there have been for a great many years no major scandals connected with customs.

There also have been a number of commissions appointed to deal with railways, shipping and other matters of the kind. In every single case those commissions were called upon to deal with subjects which ultimately would call for examination by the House of Commons and parliament if anything effective was to be done.

May I point out what a strange conclusion we would be led to if we accepted the proposition that the government has on some occasions put forward. If the government believes that it is a derogation of responsibility to appoint a royal commission to inquire into something that relates to the duties of government, then what does the government say about its appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the irrigation project and the power project in Saskatchewan which has been requested so frequently and with such vigour by the members on this side of the house?

If the government does not think that such a royal commission should be appointed, surely it is to be hoped that this thought was not in their minds when they appointed such a commission to deal with that tremendously important project at a time when the members of this party, and of all other parties in the house, were urging the government to act, and to act promptly, to carry forward this great and very beneficial undertaking.

No, Mr. Speaker, the history of royal commissions is a history of inquiries which have produced many of the major reforms in our administrative system, as well as in the detailed duties of government and of parliament. Granted, there have been in this country and in other countries royal commissions which have not done all that was expected: the fact remains nevertheless that over the years most of the major reforms in the organization of government, in the reorganization of military services, have been the result of inquiries of this kind. It was in fact because of the inquiry conducted by what was known as the Otter commission that there was a re-organization of the militia in Canada prior to the great war, which made it possible for the Canadian forces at that time to take such an effective part so early in the first world war.

I have mentioned the history of these commissions to anticipate any suggestion that an inquiry under the public Inquiries Act would be any derogation of the responsibilities, duties and authority of the members of this house, and at the same time to urge the hon. members on both sides of the house to approach this subject with a recognition of the fact that each one of us should be seeking some method by which confidence will be restored in a department which is seeking approximately half of all the heavy taxes which will be imposed upon the people of Canada at this time, and which has the responsibility for preparing our defence forces in the hope that their effectiveness, along with the effectiveness of the defence forces of other free nations, may in fact avoid the necessity of employing these forces again at any time in the future for war itself.

How can the members of this house, the members on either side of this house, say to the people of Canada that they are confident that everything is being done, when step by step what has been done challenges our confidence in every way? No matter what view may have been expressed on other occasions, any arguments I have put forward as to the arguments raised against royal commissions are put forward only with the hope that arguments raised on other occasions may not be raised at this time against what seems to me to be the only possible device by which we can get a satisfactory inquiry that will restore confidence to this house, yes, restore confidence in the minds of the members on both sides of the house, and in doing that restore confidence to the people of Canada that something effective will really be done, and that if, as Colonel Ross is reported to have said, there is in fact a distinct lack of higher level supervision we shall know where that lack of supervision really is, no matter how high it may be.

I am sure that the members of this house have confidence in the chief of the general staff, in the chief of the air staff, in the chief of the naval staff. I am sure that they have confidence in these officers who are responsible for the strictly military aspect of our defence problems. But, Mr. Speaker, no matter where the break-down may have occurred, I think the members of this house and the people of Canada are greatly in need of restored confidence right up the line in those duties which have to do with accounting supervision and protection.

The Minister of National Defence is well aware that for several years efforts have been made within the Department of National Defence to bring about a more efficient method of accounting. I am sure the Minister of National Defence is aware that there have been suggestions that a central accounting organization which also had the most modern type of accounting methods, adjusting its inventory as any business would, would be able both to direct more effective supervision of accounting duties and at the same time to report on any problem relating to accounts in a manner which does not now seem to be possible.

Surely the members of this house must have been impressed with the length of time that, on a number of occasions, it has taken to provide information to the defence expenditure committee, as well as to this house, in regard to details which could have been provided within a few hours if the same accounting methods were in operation in the Department of National Defence as would be required in any big business in this country today.

Over and over again an almost plaintive story has been told of the number of officials required and the length of time that would be involved in preparing details of something that should have been available simply by examining the end entries under any effective system of accounting that was consistent with modern accounting practices. Surely it is something about which the Minister of National Defence can agree without being indignant that it might even be hinted that the Department of National Defence could be improved in any way. Surely the time has come when the constant recurrence of these thefts, losses and incendiary as well as other fires should have impressed upon the Minister of National Defence—even if it were only to reassure himself personally that everything is being done that should be done—that an inquiry of this nature would certainly be justified.

Both in the Supreme Court of Canada and in the supreme courts of the provinces are judges of great reputation, men who served in one war or the other with great distinction. I can think of certain judges who had experience in both wars. I am not suggesting that they alone would be highly qualified, but at least some of them would have available in their own memories a knowledge that would be extremely valuable in approaching a problem of this nature.

The people of this country have indicated through the press and in other ways that they want reassurance, and this government has on many occasions indicated its own belief in the procedure provided by the Inquiries Act, and it is for that reason that I propose to present this motion. I ask the Minister of National Defence, in his own interest from the point of view of avoiding constant requests of other kinds, and also all members as representatives of the people of Canada, to indicate their desire that this subject be dealt with by a judicial inquiry. Now that we learn that the inquiry, which is not really an inquiry as that term is ordinarily used, is nothing more than an office accounting procedure because of the absence of Colonel Currie in England—that absence in itself indicates an extended delay before any satisfactory answers can be given to this house and to the people of Canada—I am proposing that a judicial inquiry at the very highest level, such as has brought about great reforms in the past, should be instituted to deal with something which now relates to the whole subject matter, not only of accounting but of the national defence of this country.

With a department which is going to spend in this year alone such fabulous sums as those before us, with a department which is responsible for preparing the defence of Canada and our common participation under the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we should be assured of an administrative system, of an internal organization and of supervision of accounting which will guarantee that we have in this country as efficient and as effective an organization dealing with that vitally important matter as can possibly be made available. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the government should consider the advisability of undertaking a judicial inquiry into the organization of the Department of National Defence and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to investigate the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property by the Department of National Defence with particular reference to losses of property by theft, looting and fire; the nature of supervision over the army stores and as to whether there has occurred any dereliction of duty on the part of any of the personnel of the said department whose duty it is to safeguard the public property of Canada.

The judicial body thus appointed to have all the powers of a royal commission under part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament."

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has based his appeal to this house to adopt this motion on charges of "wholesale looting" in the Department of National Defence. He has made this charge before. He made it first on April 21 when he moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. He repeated it when he spoke for the first time on this subject on May 1. He repeated it in a broadcast of the program "The Nation's Business" over the trans-Canada network on May 6.

This charge is a serious charge. So far as I can learn from the speech of the leader of the opposition this afternoon it is based on thefts at Petawawa, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax and in British Columbia. He seemed to derive some comfort and support from the fact that Colonel Ross directed a letter to the staff subordinate to him urging a more careful supervision. Why, this letter was the right kind of letter for an officer in command of men to write. That kind of letter has been sent through the years every time there is occasion. This is the kind of action that should be taken by commanding officers and in so far as anything that is brought to my attention is concerned, I see that it is taken.

I do not suggest that the leader of the opposition has said this, but the implication of these wholesale charges of wholesale looting is that great quantities of stores, out of all proportion to the value of the stores concerned, are being removed wholesale from the warehouses, storerooms and depots of the Department of National Defence and the armed forces. He himself used a figure of over $7 million as the amount of loss through theft and fire. That would be a very large figure but that is not in accordance with the facts before the defence expenditures committee. I will come to that in a minute.

What are we concerned with in the Department of National Defence and the three forces? We are concerned with an operation involving real estate valued at something over a billion and a half dollars, with equipment, supplies and stores having a value of perhaps another billion dollars, quite apart from ships and aircraft.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the minister mean by "real estate"? Does he mean the purchase of land, and so on?

Mr. Claxton: Buildings and land, but the land we occupy is not nearly as valuable as the buildings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister mentioned a billion and a half for real estate.

Mr. Claxton: A billion and a half for real estate and something approaching a billion dollars for stores, equipment, and the like. I have made as careful comparisons as I can on the basis of the information available on the subject of fire losses. As I said in the house a few days ago, we compared the experience of the Department of National Defence with the experience in six major cities in Canada. The experience in the Department of National Defence for the years 1950 and 1951, the last for which we have figures, was about the same as it was in 1949. The incidence of loss through fire in the Department of National Defence was just half as great on a fair basis of comparison as the loss to civilian property in these principal cities despite the fact that in national defence we are engaged in operations using inflammable and explosive materials, despite the fact that the camps and air stations are located at isolated centres and do not have the advantage of mutual protection, and despite the fact that a large part of the property is of wartime construction and is highly inflammable and very difficult to extinguish once a fire has started.

I ask the leader of the opposition or anyone else to establish before the defence expenditures committee that the rate of loss by fire in the armed forces is higher in proportion than it is in civilian life. This is a fair comparison, and no figures have ever been put before me which disclose the contrary. The leader of the opposition referred to the number of fires of incendiary origin. So far as it has been established in a court of law, there has only been one fire of incendiary origin. That was the last fire at Plouffe park and the soldier responsible was sentenced to two years less a day. Every fire is investigated by fire marshals and by the special officers of the R.C.M.P. In some cases civilian investigators are brought in. I suggest that to have one proven case of arson for the whole Department of National Defence in the last five years is far smaller than the record of arson in civil life.

The amount of loss by theft is not the gigantic figure mentioned by the leader of the opposition or implied through his reference to a figure of over $7 million. A return filed before the committee on defence expenditures gives a summary of losses due to theft or fraud, fire and other write-offs for the three services from April 1, 1950, to March 31, 1952, a period of two years. Losses due to theft or fraud less the amount recovered came to $85,809.75. I think every hon. member of the house has enough information from his own experience of fires and fire losses, of theft and losses by theft, and particularly with respect to property like that in the Department of National Defence and the services involving camps where construction is going on and large stores widely distributed among almost a thousand units throughout the country, to realize that a loss of $85,000 odd in two years by theft or fraud is extremely small.

I have the figures on prosecutions for theft in the civil courts in cases where civilians were convicted, cases where servicemen were convicted and also cases where servicemen were convicted by courts martial for the same offence. The last period for which we have figures is from October 1, 1949, to September 30, 1950. In the civil courts charges in which civilians were convicted totalled 6,643. The number of servicemen convicted in civil courts was 94, and the number of servicemen convicted in courts martial was 31. The total male population of Canada between 18 and 45, which are the ages corresponding to those of practically all members of the armed forces, was 2,722,201 at that time. The mean population of the armed forces during that period was 61,799. The incidence of theft by civilians was ·23 per cent and the incidence of theft by servicemen was ·20 per cent, so that on the only figures that have been put before me the record of service personnel is better than that of civilian personnel.

Put in another way, during this period the service population was 2·22 per cent of the male population between the ages of 18 and 45, but service personnel were convicted either by civil courts or courts martial of committing 1·9 per cent of the offences of theft committed in the country, considerably less proportionately than the civilian population. In the armed forces today there are over 97,000 individuals. Employed in civilian occupations by the Department of National Defence and the armed services there are another 40,000 civilians making a total population employed full time of 137,000 people.

It is no part of my reply, Mr. Speaker, to say that the 137,000 are all perfect. Unfortunately, in such a large group there are a considerable number of individuals who have been tempted to do wrong. When we find them out we prosecute them; and we have I believe in the provost corps and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which make investigations into every loss in which theft or fraud is suspected, a group comparable in efficiency and honesty with any group of civil or other police in this country.

That we should have any losses is deplorable. It must not be taken in any way, shape or form that, in making this reply, I am endeavouring to whitewash or to show complacency about the present situation, anything that has happened or anything that may happen. Our job is to use every means possible so as to ensure that the utmost care is taken in safeguarding public property and in preventing loss, whether it be by fire, theft, fraud or any other means.

Toward that end from time to time we have the assistance of officers of the treasury. We have of course within the department itself an internal audit with a travelling group of auditors. We have the control of the Auditor General, to whom these audit reports are sent; and also from time to time we engage outside assistance to look into the question of systems and the like. We have the advantage of making comparisons with the systems and results in other countries, and in particular the United States and Great Britain. There has never been put before me any figure which would indicate that our losses by these causes are any greater than in the armed forces of those countries. As I indicated the other day in the house, the experience in connection with theft, in the Canadian National Railways, which carries on very large operations, showed losses which, in proportion to the amount involved, appear to be greater than those in the Department of National Defence.

Some general assertions have been made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and I must make some corrections. The use of round figures of large size should be indulged in with a sense of responsibility; and when the errors are large one can't help wondering how sound are the charges based upon the figures used to back them up.

I mentioned a few moments ago a statement placed before the committee on defence expenditures which showed losses due to theft in two years amounting to $85,809.75 and losses due to fire of $5,205,970.54—a long way from the figure of over $7 million. The other figure is for "write-offs" of $2,112,931.15. There is no evidence yet put forward to show that this resulted from theft, fraud or fire, or to suggest that they were not proper write-offs largely of an accounting nature.

The committee on defence expenditures is sitting. It has had these figures put before it. The witnesses are available. They have answered questions with respect to the figures. And I understand, from the last information coming to me, they have dealt with the write-offs, fires and thefts in so far as the navy is concerned, and that they are proceeding with the others. And I suggest that is the right place to do it.

The leader of the opposition referred to the cost of defence this year as of the order of two and a half billions of dollars. There is provision for two billions in the estimates and he spoke of another half billion in the supplementaries. How anyone can anticipate supplementaries of that magnitude at this stage, I do not know. There is no basis for it. With the exception of the year 1951-52, the Department of National Defence has come within one per cent of spending the amount appropriated. It would surprise me if there were any supplementaries this year for the defence department.

But another figure was given. In his broadcast the leader of the opposition, making much the same argument as he made today, said:

> Let us see just how some of these figures are made up. In the estimates of the Department of National Defence there is for instance a figure of $17 million for publicity. This sum does not include the salaries of the well-trained civil servants who perform the regular duties in connection with information and ordinary publicity.

Note that additional sentence—"This sum does not include the salaries of the well-trained civil servants who perform the regular duties in connection with information and ordinary publicity"—which tends to give a sort of corroborative detail as evidence to support the $17 million figure.

When I read this I must say I was astonished. I was not astonished at the figure, because I knew the figure was wrong; but I was astonished that it should have been given. I looked at once at the statement available to every hon. member, contained in the envelope at the back of the estimates, in which is set out a summary of standard objects of expenditure, under all the different categories, and arranged on a similar basis for each government department. I find there that the item for publicity for national defence is not $17 million but $2,875,460.

Mr. Sinclair: The usual error.

Mr. Claxton: This item which appears under national defence is entirely for recruiting publicity, which comes under the heading, "Films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity", set out as column 10. The total for all government departments is $10,461,641. Then there is the heading of "Publication of departmental reports and other material", set out as column 9. Here there are over forty items listed for all departments, totalling $6,987,136, and the item for national defence is $2,485,900. It is, as the leader of the opposition has said, in addition to salaries and pay.

Now, sir, the leader of the opposition has made another charge that the need for this inquiry by a royal commission is indicated by the time it takes to get information from the Department of National Defence and the armed forces. We are not performing miracles in the department but I follow the questions on the order paper very carefully, and I venture to say that, having regard to the number of questions, their nature and the size of the operation, answers are given about as promptly as one could expect. As for information requested before the parliamentary committee, I ask hon. members who sit on that committee what information they have been refused, and what delays there have been in making the information available. I have read the proceedings of the committee, and I have seen a number of charges about not getting information. But when the charges are made—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it might be better if the minister did not refer to the proceedings in the committee.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. In the house itself, those charges have been made about lack of information. I venture to say that more information has been, and is being, given about defence and matters relating to defence than in any parliament in the British commonwealth. I ask any hon. member who questions that statement to prove his contention. I have here references to the debates on defence in the British House of Commons for the session corresponding to this one. I have the number of hours already spent, and the number of speakers who have taken part in the debate. I wish some hon. members who make these charges would read British Hansard to see how the debate on defence compares with the debate here. The government set aside one day in December for general debate on defence. There was one day for debate on the estimates on each of the service departments, the navy, army and air force, and one day on supplementaries. That is all there has been, and that is all there is likely to be this session.

There is a committee on estimates, but during the last year and a half it has not met for as many hours as our committees on public accounts and defence expenditures have devoted to defence matters. That committee, and the house at Westminster, have not had before them one-tenth of the information that has been placed before this house on defence matters. I suggest that it is time those who make these charges about lack of information should prove them.

It is time that the operation of national defence be regarded as an operation on a scale which is comparable with that of anything there is in the country today. At the present time, in addition to the 137,000 men and women engaged full time in defence, there are nearly another 60,000 in the reserve. There are well over 500 units, and there has been an increase of strength of over 100 per cent in two years. When you have an operation involving that number of people and the amount of property and equipment that there is in the services, the record compares favourably with that of any operation about which we know and are able to obtain information.

The leader of the opposition was interesting when he said that he had confidence in the chiefs of staff, of the navy, army and air force, and others responsible for the strictly military operations. I was not surprised to hear him make this statement because he must know, and the house must know, that the sweeping charges of "wholesale looting" tend to cast aspersion on all members of the armed forces, officers and men alike. He must know, and the house must know, that the service personnel keenly resent these charges, because they believe that they are as honest and decent a group of men as there is in Canada. To anticipate this, the leader of the opposition says he has confidence in the chiefs of staff—well, so have I. I have confidence in the chiefs of staff who are responsible for the operation of the three services.

Under the general supervision of the chief of the general staff of the army comes the quartermaster general, who is responsible for the store of the ordnance corps and its administration; the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, and its administration; medical and dental stores, the Royal Canadian Engineers, and the Army Service Corps. Those are the branches concerned with the business of taking in stores, issuing stores, keeping stores and accounting for stores. They have had a very large job. Today the engineers are concerned with 513 major contracts across Canada. The engineers were concerned with plans and specifications and, to a certain extent, looking after this very large operation. This has been accomplished without any very substantial additions to personnel of the engineer corps. We are trying to handle this big operation without building up a large overhead which we would not need after the peak has been passed.

Now, I have mentioned these branches of the service which are responsible, and when the adjutant general, the quartermaster general or the chief of the general staff or the corresponding officers in all the three services, find that there has been a theft, he draws to the attention of the officers under him the need for effective supervision. When Colonel Ross was referring to a distinct lack of higher level supervision, he was referring to supervision at a level subordinate to himself.

We have had before us a motion that all this should be the subject of a royal commission. This is not the first time that the leader of the opposition has made suggestions of this kind. I have not a full list, but I have some notes indicating that he made similar proposals back in 1949. On October 26—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has spoken about outside persons being asked to investigate. Before he turns to the subject of a royal commission, I was wondering whether this would not be the time to answer the question that was put on the order paper with regard to Mr. George Currie.

Mr. Claxton: I will come to Mr. Currie.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine. I thought the minister was going to another subject, and that this might be a good opportunity.

Mr. Claxton: As I say, those suggestions have been made. On October 26, 1949, was made one of the numerous recommendations for a committee, denying that committees delegate parliamentary responsibility; April 26, 1950, demand for examination of government business by experts; May 30, 1950, suggested royal commission on government organization; April 28, 1950, demand for royal commission; June 12, 1951, demand for committee on estimates.

Mr. Drew: And we got that.

Mr. Claxton: You got no committee on estimates.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes; we have.

Mr. Claxton: Well, I have followed the matter and I have not seen any committee on estimates.

Mr. Drew: Are not the defence estimates sent to a committee?

Mr. Claxton: No. The defence estimates come before parliament. As recently as May 12 we had from the hon. gentleman another request of a similar character. Parliament is the place where this kind of operation should be carried on. This is the place where the estimates of the Department of National Defence have been examined at length every year. Parliament has set up a committee on defence expenditures which has been going into the expenditures since the date fixed in its terms of reference, March 31, 1950. There is the committee on public accounts and I understand that it will be looking tomorrow at the report of the Auditor General in so far as it relates to defence expenditures. Then we have pending, before the courts, the prosecutions at Petawawa. In addition, as I announced in the house on April 21, there is the appointment of Mr. George S. Currie, C.A., who has the terms of reference which I stated to the house at that time; and those show that he will have such other powers as he finds are necessary to carry out his job. What more could be done than that, if Mr. Currie is a man of the capacity described by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), I think it was, and if he is a man of the integrity described by the leader of the opposition? And I agree that he is. Then if he wants extra power to do the job that has been given to him, he knows he will get it or else he will not try to do the job.

When this situation at Petawawa was drawn to my attention, I felt that the methods of accounting, stockkeeping, their operation and the responsibility for the losses at Petawawa or losses of that character elsewhere should be looked into by the best person we could find in all Canada. He was communicated with and he agreed to take the job. He at once told me that he would have to be away on the other side on business but that that absence would mean no delay because, in the meantime, partners and members of his firm would carry on the investigation so that it would be completed just as soon as it would have been had he been here throughout. That is the way he wanted to operate, that is the way he operates, and it seems to be a perfectly reasonable way to operate.

I am not going to delay the house further, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the motion of the leader of the opposition is not much different from the one moved on May 12, which may be found at page 2105 of Hansard, when he asked for a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations for improving the organization and general efficiency of government administration; because in his speech he referred particularly to the Department of National Defence and the Department of Agriculture. This is a narrower field, related to one department. The house indicated its attitude to that proposal on that occasion and took the view—quite properly, I submit—that parliament is the body to which the government is responsible for its administration. That is the view that has been taken consistently by this side of the house and we do not see any reason for changing that view because of anything suggested this afternoon.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the concluding words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) were substantially the words with which I was going to begin what I had to say. The proposals for royal commissions by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on former occasions, particularly the one he made a week ago today, were of a wider and a more general character than the one we now have before us.

Last week I pointed out that the motion involved the abrogation of the duties of this house since it dealt widely and generally with government administration. This afternoon the leader of the opposition has introduced a motion of quite a different character. The motion today is specific and deals with one department. Then it restricts itself to certain matters in connection with that department that are of public concern.

We are asked to approve a judicial inquiry into the organization of the Department of National Defence, to investigate the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property. Those requests are quite specific, I think, and in spite of anything that may follow in the amendment, they ask us, in view of the disquiet that is widespread across the country, to approve of a royal commission to investigate specifically the matters referred to in this amendment.

It is true that the motion speaks of theft, looting and fire. It does not use extravagant language. It does not say there has been wholesale looting but rather speaks of theft, looting and fire which we, as members of this house, know to be a fact that has been established not only before a committee of the house but in the courts of this country. And therefore, this being a proposal of a different nature, I feel that the attitude of the house should be different toward it. Speaking in the house last week in regard to the amendment to which the minister referred, I said something like this: that if members of parliament had any real function it must be that we control the finances and administration of this country. Then I went on to say that since the amendment involved the whole field of governmental administration we would be abrogating our functions if we agreed to it.

In the course of his remarks this afternoon, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred quite properly to a number of royal commissions that had resulted in reports that were of general interest to this house and to the country. But I would point out that every one of these reports and every one of the subjects investigated were of a specific nature: arts and sciences, the Massey report; the inquiry into radio which resulted in the C.B.C.; the customs scandal in connection with the Department of National Revenue some years ago; the inquiry into the operation of railways, and again into the feasibility and desirability of the Saskatchewan river project. All these were of a specific character, and the house generally approved of these commissions. But, as I said before, last week we were discussing something of a general nature, but today we are discussing something that is quite specific.

I listened with care to the leader of the opposition and to the Minister of National Defence, and I noted the defence that the minister made of some matters that had been under discussion and criticism in this house and before the committee. For example, I noted that he spoke of the rate of loss by fire among the civilian population of the country and among the military. I did not think that that argument was a particularly sound one, because after all in civilian life buildings, equipment and so on are not under constant supervision and constant patrol, which I understand is undertaken by the military in their warehouses, storehouses and so on across the country. Consequently, we should expect that the fire hazard in military establishments would be very greatly minimized by the constant patrol and supervision that exists. After all, $85,000 loss in theft and looting in two years is a very considerable amount, particularly if you look at it in the aggregate, but even if you break the amount down to losses of $3,500 a month or thereabouts, it is a considerable amount.

Mr. Claxton: $50,000 of that was at Petawawa.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; at Petawawa. That is a very considerable loss. Then the comparison made again with civilian thefts and thefts in military establishments is one that strikes me as not being particularly sound. We have always thought of the military as being under constant regulation, constant inspection and so on, and that care is exercised when supplies are drawn, or anything leaves the military camp; therefore we would expect that again thefts at Petawawa and at other camps would be minimized in that way.

I want to say this to the minister. The department and the minister may be right, but the thing is that the people must be assured that the minister and the department are right. At the moment, anyone who travels across this country will realize that the public putting up this vast sum of money for defence at the present time are not convinced that everything is right. It is true that the leader of the opposition used the estimate of $2,500 million. The minister answered that that was an exaggeration. Whether it is $2,500 million or not, it is $2,106 million, which is a very considerable amount of money to be dealing with.

I hold in my hand the estimates of the departments of national defence for the United Kingdom for the year 1950-51, not the current estimates. As hon. members will see, they consist of three volumes, the army estimates, 196 pages; the naval estimates, 304 pages; the air force estimates, 229 pages. Though the printing is somewhat different, and therefore the amount of printing probably in the books which I hold in my hand may not comprise as many items as a similar number of pages of our estimates do, yet I would point out that in our estimates this year there are only 14 pages of explanatory notes. In every one of these volumes you have the estimates, and on the opposite page there are usually explanatory notes of what the estimates involve. Possibly that does account, to some extent, for the fact that the debate in the House of Commons at Westminster is rather more restricted than the debate in our parliament in Canada regarding such estimates.

I want to say to the minister—and I am not going to labour the point this afternoon—that in my opinion, in the interests of the department and in his own position as minister, I believe the government would be well advised to accept the proposal involved in this amendment and to give the people of Canada the assurance that there is nothing fundamentally wrong with the administration of the Department of National Defence at the present time.

I have said before that when I have been moving across this country I have heard many criticisms of what the ordinary man considers to be lack of supervision, extravagance, the tremendous movement of men on the trains, and so on. We hear the railway men discussing that matter quite frequently. They see cars around being used for all sorts and kinds of purposes, or at least people think they are being used for all sorts and kinds of purposes. That also leads to a considerable amount of criticism. Then of course, we have these recent cases of fire, theft and the disappearance of public property. When you put them all together they make a very impressive loss in the mind of the average person in our country.

I take it all hon. members in this house want the people of Canada to feel that in making these vast expenditures—and they are vast—for the defence of our country, and, as we sometimes put it, for our way of life, great care is taken to see that every dollar that the people of Canada are asked to provide shall be carefully and economically expended. That I think is the duty of this parliament, since the question has been raised, not only here but all across the country, as to the efficient organization and administration of the Department of National Defence. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, a similar royal commission was appointed many years ago in the United Kingdom to inquire into phases of government administration and organization. I believe the government would be well advised to accept this present suggestion of a specific nature, and the house would be well advised indeed to support the amendment now before us.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will not be embarrassed unduly if I say that I agree with almost every word he said.

Mr. Coldwell: Not this time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to enter into a battle of decimals with the minister. I listened to his decimals and I am not going to enter into that. Incidentally, the comments made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on that comparison were very sound indeed for the reason he gave. Surely a closely knit unit like military forces should be able to have supervision of a type which we could hardly expect in ordinary civilian life.

The reason I am on my feet is to stress—again I quote the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—that it is not only necessary that things should be right; it is necessary that the people believe they are right. There is no question whatever but that up and down this country there is not only a feeling of alarm and disturbance at the present time that we have to find this huge amount of money; there is a feeling that this money is easily come by, so far as the armed forces are concerned, and is not being husbanded as it might be.

I want to be as fair on this as we can ever be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I mean as fair as we can ever be to each other in this house. Let me be very specific. There is no doubt that it is extremely difficult to control the expenditures of the armed forces. Economy is not in their minds. I think there is another thing besides supervision that is needed; we need example. In saying that I am not one whit behind my leader in the praise he gave to the heads of the military services, but I do say there is a feeling abroad that money is spent on the armed forces in a way it is not spent on anyone else. I am speaking of those in offices.

I had a letter the other day from a civil servant who said that a military officer of not very high rank lived a few doors from him and he saw a car come to fetch him every morning. I am not informed, and perhaps we may be, as to what level of rank a man must reach before he becomes entitled to a car. There may be perfectly proper cases, but I have a feeling which I think is widespread that cars in the army are easy to come by. When I was in the army myself I used to be very uneasy at the way people floated about the country in cars, but it was more excusable then, in wartime, than it is now.

We have this proposal before us. I would be better pleased to vote against this motion because I do not like the idea of royal commissions. I think we should usually deal with matters like this within the four corners of this house. However, if we are honest with each other I think we must admit that when you have a committee with its inevitable government majority you cannot have the same free and detached and unhampered discussion that would be possible with a commission. It seems to me we are just fooling ourselves if we pretend we can. That is not said with any desire to be critical of anyone; it is simply that when you have a thing of this kind you may as well face that reality.

What are people feeling? What is the ordinary man feeling about these expenditures? He cannot have any opinion when you show him an item for $90 million for ships, or for hundreds of millions for aeroplanes, but when it comes down to some of the smaller things he can understand them and I think he becomes uneasy. I apologize for bringing up this matter again, but it just happens to be something that came to my attention. I refer to the order for serving forks. I simply want to bring to the attention of the house the manner in which this was dealt with.

So far as I can discover there is nothing to indicate that the department was in any way embarrassed when it found out that it had made a ridiculous request. In a moment I will read the answer I got in this connection. Secondly, nothing has been said to suggest that anyone was disciplined or reprimanded or that anyone felt there was anything that required disciplining or reprimanding. As a matter of fact what upset me even more was the fact that I was informed —I am afraid you will have to take my word for this because I cannot quote my informant —that very high up in the department the whole thing was pooh-poohed. Somebody said, "That cannot be true." That made me out to be either a very gullible fellow or a liar, and I do not want to be either.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Let me give you the simple facts with regard to that contract. The amount involved is trifling compared to the millions and billions we are spending, but if this is an example of the way they are dealing with these larger things then all I can say is that the people of Canada have every right to be uneasy and that they should have some kind of independent inquiry. In December last I brought to the attention of the committee— I suppose I may just mention that a committee existed—the fact that some 63,000 serving forks had been ordered. Serving forks are described as the forks used by cooks in roasting meats and also in dining halls for the serving of meat from platters. I am not getting on to forbidden ground beyond that and I hope you will not call me to order.

On the order paper last December there was a correction; the 63,000 was corrected to 42,000, I think. Then they had another look at it and I got an answer. It took only four months to prepare. This was not one of the cases where they were very prompt, but no doubt there was a reason. After all it was only an inquiry from a member of parliament. The answer was as follows:

An order has been placed by the Department of Defence Production on behalf of the Department of National Defence for 14,500 serving forks.

The total quantity is made up of 10,000 for current use by the army based on an actual issue of 4,500 in 1951—500 for the Royal Canadian Navy and 4,000 for mobilization stockpile.

I still believe that the 14,000 should have at least one zero knocked off, or perhaps two. I am told that a large hotel would use only a score or two of these forks. I am disturbed when you probe and find a soft spot like that. So far as I know after four months nobody seems disturbed about it. True they have reduced it to 14,000, but I still think that that is ten times or one hundred times too many.

However, let us assume that it is 14,000. They came down from 60,000 to 40,000 to 14,000 and as far as I know no one has been criticized. While that may seem a trifling thing it gives me a disturbed feeling about the whole affair. We hear all kinds of rumours. The air force is full of them. It is not a rumour but a fact that 20,000 trunks have been ordered. We do not ordinarily have trunks in the army.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, every man has a trunk.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Well, that is all right if every man has a trunk.

Mr. Claxton: A box at the foot of his bed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We will pass over the trunks. I am not an expert on trunks. I apologize for bringing up another humble ordinary utensil of the kitchen. The other day I brought up the question of the ordering of between 29,000 and 30,000 teapots; two-quart teapots, not just little ones. I do not know whether that is reasonable. It does not seem so to me. I am not so sure about that as I am about the forks but it seems a lot unless the Canadian army is a tremendous consumer of tea at a rate of which ordinary people would not be capable.

I must not take too much time, but we also have the question of boots. We have 1,304,000 pairs of boots, which seems a lot. Maybe that is stockpiling, too. I offer no comment except to point out the large amount involved.

The other thing that I think is disturbing the people is the reports of losses by theft, and in this case the figures differ widely. The minister gave us what seemed a fairly conservative figure. I was struck by the figure he gave us the other day with respect to Farnham. As I recall it he said the loss was $3,500 after what was recovered was taken into account. I am assuming—if I am wrong I will be corrected—that is not worked out on the basis of what we originally expended at Farnham, but that there was a liberal writing down due to the passage of years, which I think would be reasonable to a point. On the other hand I have the feeling that it is very easy for a court of inquiry to fix the value of something that has been lost at a very small figure. As to the incidents now before us, that of Petawawa is before the courts, and we have heard a lot in the committee which I must not mention about the sacred principle of sub judice. Apparently we cannot talk about that without being put in jail, but the minister actually talked about it on April 21. I should like to recall what he said at the time Mr. Currie's appointment was announced. Speaking of the select committee the minister said, as found at page 1424 of Hansard:

> In conclusion I would like to add that if in the course of its work the select committee on defence expenditure would like to look into the stockkeeping, accounting or auditing procedure, or any other matter relating to its work, on the spot and anywhere, all facilities will be provided.

Apparently in our simplicity we read that all wrong. We thought that meant we could inquire and get information with regard to Petawawa and other places, but apparently we were wrong. The court of appeal in the committee that I must not name was against us. Actually—and here I wish to speak with restraint—it seems that we have to spend most of our time in a very pleasant discussion about abstract matters of accounting with a lot of details as to what has happened under the system of accounting, but we find difficulty in coming to grips with the cases where it would seem that the system has most obviously broken down. I am not going to pursue the matter further. I repeat what I said at the outset, that I think the people of Canada are disturbed about this matter and that though I greatly regret to have to feel obliged to vote for the motion nevertheless it seems to me for the reasons I have tried to give, and those which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave in addition to those given by my leader, that this measure, unusual as it may be although there are many precedents for it, is warranted at the present time.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and his parliamentary assistant are both friends of mine. Nevertheless I believe this is the time for me to voice my opinion about certain matters pertaining to the expenditure of taxpayers' money by the Department of National Defence. The minister commented on certain statements of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and compared losses by fire in military camps with civilian fire losses. Such a comparison would seem to me to be almost ridiculous. We all know that in civilian areas there are children and old buildings with worn-out electrical wiring systems, whereas the defence installations are new construction with new wiring systems. There should also be a constant patrol of military property by guards. I do not think the minister should have made a comparison with civilian losses from fire, because it is not appropriate at all.

We of the opposition know that it is our duty to guard the taxpayers' money whenever possible by bringing to light what we believe to be maladministration of the people's affairs in the Dominion of Canada. That is our duty. We are not trying to run the government. We are trying to show the government where they are not running the people's affairs correctly. I should like to refer to a particular incident. The leader of the opposition mentioned looting, but I want to refer to something that I would describe as looting on a large scale. It has never been mentioned so far, and in my opinion it constitutes looting on a large scale.

A week ago some buses full of young girls and boys pulled up in front of the parliament buildings. Upon inquiry it was learned that these young girls and boys came from a small town, a beautiful spot I understand, in the province of Ontario. They were transported a distance of 185 miles to the parliament buildings and back at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada and with the full knowledge of the Department of National Defence, which is trying to run a war in Korea and trying to provide implements of war, soldiers, sailors and air force men in an attempt to bring about peace. I want to show how far the government is going with the taxpayers' money.

The press is a pretty mighty weapon in Canada, and I hope the people of Canada will learn that their money is being spent in this manner. I asked certain questions of the Department of National Defence. The first one was:

For what purpose were army bus 103, licence No. 6011F and army bus 105, licence No. 6115F used on the 2nd day of May, 1952?

The answer I received was:

Transporting royal Canadian army cadets of Finch high school, Finch, Ontario.

That would be fine if these buses did not belong to the taxpayers, but wait till I read the other questions. The second question was:

Were they used out of Ottawa on the 2nd day of May, 1952?

The answer is "Yes", with no hesitation about it. They were used out of Ottawa. The third question was:

If so, what trips were made and what was the total mileage?

The answer is as follows:

From Finch, Ontario, to Ottawa and return. Total mileage on each bus was 185 miles.

The expense of travelling 185 miles with army men as chauffeurs was paid for by the taxpayers.

Wholesale looting!

Then question No. 4:

At whose request were such trips made?

And the answer:

Headquarters, eastern Ontario area, Kingston, Ontario.

Whom have we in Kingston or any other part of Canada who should make a request to Ottawa to pay for the transportation of these young men and women spending the money of the taxpayer to tote them back and forth, to and from the capital of Canada? Who are these people? Then question No. 5:

What were the nature of the military duties on which they were engaged?

And this is the answer—and just listen to this, for "military duties"—

Visit war museum and House of Commons.

On that basis, every American tourist is a soldier. It would seem that we are trying to train them how to defend our country by having them visit the House of Commons or, as it says, "visit war museum and House of Commons". Well, that must make a veteran laugh, when he feels that he must be encouraged to support his country, both in peace and war, by being toted up and down to the parliament buildings of Canada and to the war museum, where they have on display exhibits from the past two horrible wars.

What a training scheme! There was not a man in uniform either in the first great war or in the last one who ever needed to be taken to Ottawa and shown the war museum before he was prepared to get into uniform. He had a job, and he did it well. No man needs that kind of training, mentally or otherwise. Looting!

Then question No. 6:

Was any charge made for the use of the buses for such trips?

And what is the answer? It says, that no charge was made. No charge was made—except the charge I am making right now. And then, coming to question No. 7:

Are similar arrangements to those made in this case available in every part of Canada?

And question No. 8:

If not, what are the conditions under which applications for such arrangements must be made?

And just listen to this silly, nonsensical answer:

Transport to assist in carrying out training programs is provided for royal Canadian army cadets in all parts of Canada where it can be made available.

This, it says, is to assist in carrying out training programs. And the training program in this instance was a visit to the House of Commons, by a group from a Liberal member's constituency—free of charge—except on the taxpayer. Looting! Looting! That is another word for it. It will be noted that question No. 8 says:

If not, what are the conditions under which applications for such arrangements must be made?

As part of a joint answer to questions 7 and 8 we find the statement that where it is possible these facilities will be made available.

I come from a grand part of this country the county of Simcoe and the town of Collingwood, as well as Barrie, Ontario. I know those thriving and prosperous municipalities. I do not know what the answer would be if I were to ask the department this question: Would you transport the high school students of my area down here to Ottawa, to see the parliament buildings and the war museum?

An hon. Member: And the member.

Mr. Ferguson: Well, they could learn a good deal from the member and so could you, if you would only listen, regarding your duty to the taxpayers.

Now, if that is not wholesale looting and unmitigated gall on the part of this government, then I have never heard of it. I only hope that members will make this known across Canada so the people may judge for themselves, and see where their defence money is going. I will admit that there may be some in the army and some civilian personnel who may stray from the narrow path and appropriate to themselves property which does not belong to them. But this is not done by men recruited in the armed forces. This looting is not done by civilian personnel. This is done with the authority of members of the House of Commons. This is done with the authority of the government. This is done by Liberal politicians. And I challenge the government to show that it is not wholesale looting, and absolutely unnecessary expenditure.

I do not think any member would rise in the House of Commons and say to any prospective soldier that he would be permitted to tour the parliament buildings and the museum at the expense of the taxpayer. I believe a trip through the museum would be enough to prevent anyone volunteering for the armed forces. These expenditures are one reason why the people begrudge paying taxes to support this government's defence program. To see the results of war, its devastation and destruction, would not encourage recruiting. The people know that defence expenditures have to be made if their freedom is to be preserved; but this kind of expenditure has nothing to do with the preservation of freedom.

Members of the House of Commons: in my opinion that is gross, flagrant and callous looting by this government, with the full knowledge of its supporters, of the taxpayers' money. When we need so badly every cent to defend this country, in the interests of peace, I resent this expenditure, even though it may be a small one, on free transportation. But in the midst of all the gross, flagrant and nonsensical expenditures, this one shows conclusively that the government has an utter disregard for its duty towards the taxpayer.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have very little intention of following closely the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) who has just taken his seat, the volume of whose effort did not conceal successfully the lack of material behind it. But I would extend to him our sincere thanks for one valuable contribution he made to the debate. At last we know what the opposition means by the word "wholesale". Apparently a wholesale raid upon the treasury of this country is one which involves the cost of a bus trip from Kingston to Ottawa. Apparently that is a wholesale raid.

I was more anxious to speak concerning the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who said, and I think rightly, that one of the main points today, particularly in regard to the administration of the Department of National Defence, is not only that it should be done right but that the country should feel that things are being done right. In other words he pointed out that there should be at least a reasonable measure of confidence in our armed forces and their administration across this country.

The hon. member for Greenwood indicated that in his opinion that confidence did not exist today to the extent it should. If there is a lack of confidence today in the Department of National Defence, what has brought about that lack of confidence? It certainly has not been caused by the way the men in the armed forces have met any task to which they were assigned. I doubt very sincerely whether any such lack of confidence has been caused by the way in which the average—and I define "average" in this instance as 99½ per cent—civil servant in the employ of the department has carried out his duty. If such a lack of confidence exists in this country today, it is largely because certain people have made sweeping statements and resounding charges without any factual data to back them up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to overstep the rules of the house. I understand from Beauchesne at page 104, citation 246A, that a member may not refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion. The question of the so-called wholesale looting in the Department of National Defence I submit is now under discussion, and I trust that I may have the right to refer to debates dealing with this specific subject at this session.

Before I do that, I was talking about the cause of possible lack of confidence in the Department of National Defence. I place the blame for that lack of confidence, if it is growing, squarely at the door of the opposition in this house. I would say to the opposition something that they know. If they choose to start a concerted attack upon any department of this government based on sweeping statements and little data and keep it up long enough, they will be—perhaps they will—able to arouse across the country a feeling that something is wrong in that department. It is well known that if you keep on attacking, particularly if you hint or insinuate without producing the type of factual data required to establish a charge, you can arouse a lot of doubts in the minds of a lot of people.

I believe the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) this afternoon gave an outstanding example of that when he said quite frankly that a certain matter of forks was, and I quote, "a trifling thing". Knowing that it was a trifling thing he has brought it to public attention time after time. I would suggest to him that if he has urgent matters of major criticism against the Department of National Defence he should find something other than what he himself terms a trifling thing. Do hon. members opposite think they are assisting in building up confidence while they pursue tactics of that sort?

I referred to sweeping statements and resounding phrases without factual data, and unless I am stopped, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote the words of the leader of the opposition when he was discussing this subject on April 21, and which are to be found on page 1425 of Hansard. If he so desires I will read all of what is in that column, but I particularly wish to point out the following: The leader of the opposition referred to...

> . . . the accounting methods, of the Department of National Defence, the laxity of which has been revealed by the wholesale looting of military property, and by continuing incidents such as:
> (a) the looting and disappearance of the Farnham military centre down to and including the buildings, disclosed as early as December, 1949:

Paragraph (b) was not quite so sweeping, but paragraph (c) reads:

> The theft by carload lots of hundreds of tons of supplies including such military equipment, according to press reports, as a baby tank;
> (d) The theft of property at various military establishments throughout Canada, with the revelation that officers had been ordering men under their command to assist in acts of theft and fraud:

I should like to read that one again.

> . . . the revelation that officers had been ordering men under their command to assist in acts of theft and fraud.

If that is not so worded to try to indicate to the country that such ordering was a matter of common practice, I do not know what it does mean.

Paragraph (e) reads:

> Fraudulent government inspection of military property;
> (f) The outbreak of incendiary fires in military storehouses, significantly timed in such a way that they could have hidden the extent of any looting and thefts which had taken place in these storehouses.

Let us look at paragraph (f) for a moment. It refers to the outbreak of incendiary fires, plural, in military storehouses, plural. As long as statements of that sort, in that type of terminology, are made by people whose very position entitles them to the ear and attention of this country, how can some people get up and say they hope this country will have confidence in that particular department of government while they deliberately tell the country, by their actions today, that in their opinion things are so bad we need a judicial inquiry.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Applewhaite: Someone says "that is right". That is their opinion of the Department of National Defence, but it is not my opinion and it is not yet the opinion of the country. This country is not going to be carried away by a lot of sweeping statements for which, although plenty of time has been allotted, no supporting evidence has been forthcoming.

My good friend—I wish he would not stay out when I am speaking—the member for Greenwood referred, in terms that were intended to be sarcastic, to the stockpiling of certain items such as boots. It is not so long ago that it was being suggested by those who politically are not favourable to this government that we were not taking a serious enough view of the world situation; that we were not prepared. In other words either we did not know our duty or if we did know it we were not doing it. The Department of National Defence now decides to stockpile certain goods so that, if what we hope will not happen, does happen, and some serious outbreak occurs, we shall be ready to mobilize immediately. The department stockpiles and is then accused of extravagance. You cannot win. If you do not buy these goods you are lax, and if you do buy them against the time when you may need them you are wasteful of the country's money.

Mr. Ferguson: Forks.

Mr. Applewhaite: I do not think anyone, despite the fact the member for Simcoe North finds it hard to restrain his impatience—

Mr. Ferguson: I cannot understand how a kitchen fork is a good implement to fight a war with.

Mr. Applewhaite: It is very difficult for me to hear the member's interruptions if I keep on talking. I do not think any member on this side or the other side of the house has any desire to whitewash the Department of National Defence or any other department. I should be very much surprised if somewhere within the Department of National Defence there are not weaknesses, if somewhere things have not been done which should have been done. I hope we can locate them, but I am not of the opinion, and I do not think the house is, that the Department of National Defence is in the situation today where we should tell the country there is nothing more parliament can do about it, that we have to have a judicial inquiry. In fairness to our armed forces, in fairness to our very public-spirited and hard working citizens, both classes of which are vital to the opposition as well as to us, and in fairness to the minister himself, I should certainly hope this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will detain the house but a few moments. I have listened with interest throughout the afternoon not only to the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and particularly those by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) but also to the considered reply given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). No one wishes to undermine confidence. No one wishes to raise issues that ought not to be raised. But the events of the last few weeks are the answer to the Minister of National Defence when he says that all is well and nothing needs to be done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I did not say anything of the kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, possibly for once I could have just a little bit of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the aimless interruptions; but I sat here this afternoon and listened, and asked but one question. Apparently what I am saying does not please the eggshell sensibilities of some of my hon. friends. But what I have to say is going to be said just the same. I think the Minister of National Defence would have welcomed the opportunity for a judicial investigation. I am one of those who, throughout the years, have stood most firmly against royal commissions composed of judges unless there is no other means to investigate matters which in any way might be termed political. I have taken that stand throughout the years. But I cannot see that there is any means other than a royal commission available to clear the situation in this dominion today. Certainly a committee of parliament will not do it. I have sat on some of those committees. Whenever a matter arises that in any way might cause any political repercussions as against the government, one can be sure that the matter terminates as soon as it is raised. Furthermore, committees of parliament are meaningless, for the majority simply passes on the situation; they make the report, and no minority report is allowed. A committee of parliament meeting on this matter could have its result predicted even before it commenced to sit. With no minority report allowed, the application of a coat of whitewash would be the inevitable result of any committee.

Passing on from there, what other method could be followed? The government has seen fit to have the matter investigated by Colonel Currie. It does not regard the situation as very serious for it appoints a man to investigate while at the same time allowing him to go on vacation or go away on other business while the investigation is taking place. A few days ago I asked a question with regard to this matter. The answer is not forthcoming as yet, though the minister today pointed out that the man who is to investigate, who is to be the spearhead of the investigation, has left the scene or the place where the investigation is to take place. It is all very well for the minister to say that while he is away things are going to be done. That is not what he was appointed for. He was appointed to direct the investigation. He was appointed to be the conscience of the minister; for the appointment is made under the section of the Defence Act that has no reference whatever to the making of appointments of investigators or of commissions to investigate. The minister says: All is well; we have the most perfect accounting system; there is no reason at all why anything should be done.

Mr. Claxton: The minister never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, that is the implication.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is my interpretation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could you call for order while I proceed for a moment or two? The minister says there is no need for a judicial inquiry into the organization, and in particular to investigate the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property by the Department of National Defence. I simply bring to the attention of the house the evidence that was brought out the other day to the effect that in the fall of 1950 various supplies at Petawawa were removed. These are not the kind of things whose disappearance is not noticeable. Let me mention a few. One hundred and nineteen heavy kitchen ranges disappeared in the fall of 1950. This accountancy system did not find out about it until 1952. Fourteen to twenty stove heaters, a scale, 50 steel drums and 50 shower stalls also disappeared; and they did not find out about the scale for a year and a half under the accountancy system now in effect in the Department of National Defence. Let me point this out. The Fairbanks-Morse weigh scale with a capacity of approximately 20,000 pounds—

Mr. Rowe: It was the best accountant of all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say about the investigation is that it was sieve-like. All I can say about the accounting method in a military camp which allows the disappearance of a great scale such as that is that it reveals the lack of that supervision which the people of Canada today have a right to expect, with the hundreds of millions of dollars that are being spent on defence.

Let me proceed from there. Another witness said that he helped to load two or three railway cars with 52 box stoves, 38 ranges which weighed about 3,200 pounds each, and many lengths of old pipe. One can understand the disappearance of the old pipe. Also another helped to load parts of a railway. Rails 28 to 30 feet long were removed from the camp.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the hon. member is to be allowed to refer to a matter that is sub judice at Petawawa, may we reply to it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing sub judice in this matter, I submit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the matter is sub judice, neither the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) nor anyone else may refer to it at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true enough, Mr. Speaker. I know that. But the question of the lack of supervision is not sub judice and that is what we want to make sub judice by the setting up of a royal commission. All that is sub judice is the fact that certain people are charged with the theft of these things and with receiving stolen property. I am not dealing with that matter. I am dealing with the fact that these things could happen, that the articles so far referred to were removed from the camp, and that this is the magnificent supervisory system which the minister tells us took one and a half years to find out about their removal. Is there any wonder that Colonel Ross found it necessary, in his letter of instructions to the western command, to say this:

> The adjutant-general has expressed sincere concern at the apparent laxity revealed by the current scandals at Montreal and Petawawa.

He called them scandals, and the minister said it was a letter he agreed with. I continue:

> The trials resulting from these episodes may bring substantial penitentiary sentences to guilty parties.
> However, such action will not necessarily redeem lost confidence—

Then he goes on to say what in his opinion should be done, and that is the issue here. The fact is that what happened at Petawawa, what happened at Montreal, what happened in British Columbia, was during the time the minister took the stand that the supervisory system and the inspection facilities were what they should be. It is because these facts have come to light and the army, under the direction of the minister, has not been able to do anything to prevent them that we ask for the judical inquiry.

Mr. Claxton: Who brought them to light?

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were brought to light one and a half years after they took place. They were brought to light because the wife of one of the soldiers revealed them. And after they were so revealed, then the minister and his staff, this supervisory staff of which he speaks, finally went to work.

Mr. Rowe: And the members say you should not talk about it.

Mr. Abbott: When are you going to make your speech?

Mr. Rowe: Any time you want it. I should like to hear you, too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister's attitude is that no matter what is revealed, if there is any criticism it is improper. He regards this as a personal affront. The people of Canada are not concerned about what he regards as personal affront. They have a right to know what happened at Petawawa, what happened at Montreal and what happened in these other camps, and they are concerned as to whether it will happen again. They are concerned in knowing whether there has been laxity and inefficiency.

I have come to the conclusion, undesirous as I am of seeing royal commissions set up, that there is only one thing that can possibly clarify the situation, and that is a judicial body charged with the responsibility of ascertaining whether the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision is what it should be, to the end that Canadians will be reassured. I would have thought the minister would grasp at the opportunity; for if there is nothing wrong, if there is no justification for the criticism that is being made, a judicial body would clear it up; every alleged wrongdoing in the matter of supervision would be seen in its proper light, and any suggestion of a lack of confidence in his department would be removed.

Let there be an investigation. The events of the last year and a half indicate that an investigation is long overdue. I base my opinion on this fact, if on nothing else; that when the government has all these administrative officials in the Department of National Defence, and a scale disappears, and a portion of a railroad disappears, and all of these other things disappear, that today are being considered in a trial; when these things can disappear and not be found out by the present supervisory system, then there is something radically wrong somewhere. A judicial investigation would determine whether or not there is reason for the lack of confidence I believe the Canadian people as a whole have today in the supervisory administration in connection with defence expenditures.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Unfortunately I was not able to be in the house when the minister spoke in reply to the speech of the leader of the opposition. I was called out for another meeting, and therefore did not hear what the minister had to say. But I did hear what was said by the leader of the opposition in moving his amendment. I heard most of what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party and by all those who have spoken since.

When a similar motion was moved in this house a week ago I indicated my support of it. I have no reason to change my mind because of what I have heard this afternoon in the discussion of this amendment; but I am tempted to say just a few things, Mr. Speaker, that have occurred to me as a result of listening to the speeches made this afternoon. I am quite sure any fair-minded person would not charge that the opposition hunted up and made public the discrepancies in the stores at Petawawa. I never heard of any of the members on this side of the house having done so. The first we learned of this theft at Petawawa was what we read in the press, and because of the fact that we had read it in the press we became interested, just as the ordinary citizen across the country would become interested, and we thought it our duty to raise the whole question in the house and ask for some inquiry. Now we are being charged with trying to undermine the government.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the people of this country are losing confidence—and I suggested even last week that I thought they were—it is not because of anything that the opposition has done. It certainly must be because of something the government has left undone, and I do not think there is any way of arguing around it. It is perfectly true, and I say this for the particular benefit of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), that the members of the opposition have done their level best to induce the government to have a judicial inquiry into all the things that have been publicized across the country, and which came to be known by the people some time before the members of the house had it in their possession. Therefore I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, how any hon. member can charge that we are merely trying to undermine the government.

Of course everybody knows that one of the ancient and honourable political pastimes is to try to undermine the government; but that is not the thing we are trying to do in asking for the inquiry that has been asked for in this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: They do it themselves.

Mr. Low: Yes; they do it themselves. We did not burn down the depot here in Ottawa, although to listen to the hon. member for Skeena you would think we were being charged with having done so as a means of undermining confidence in the government. We did not tear up the railway track up there and sell it to secondhand dealers. We did not get rid of those stoves we heard about, and I did not see any of those serving forks that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) mentioned. We merely came into possession of certain information which we feel it our duty to follow up.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was in the process of discussing the statements which had emanated from the Liberal side of the house to the effect that the opposition were doing their level best to undermine the government and create throughout the country a lack of confidence in the government. The general charge seems to be that we on this side of the house concern ourselves almost entirely with small things which we magnify into large things and try to make the people of the country believe that everything is rotten in Denmark when it is not.

I was in the process of saying to the house that it was not the members of the opposition who tore up the rails at Petawawa. It was not the members of the opposition who burned down the ordnance depot. None of us on this side of the house got away with any of the numerous stoves that were taken from somewhere and sold. I do not see any loot and I deny any complicity in the plot.

Mr. Graydon: Take your hands out of your pockets.

Mr. Low: I take my hands out of my pockets so I can speak both with my hands and voice. When the hon. member for Skeena

(Mr. Applewhaite) made the statement he did this afternoon I felt quite sure that he must have overlooked completely the implications contained in a certain letter spoken about by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) when he introduced the amendment this afternoon. I understand that this letter was admitted by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as having gone out from Colonel J. S. Ross, officer in charge of administration, western command, to the heads of branches of staff, to the heads of services and to units, subunits and detachment commanders.

Just to refresh the memory of the hon. member for Skeena and others who are inclined to charge that members of the opposition spend their time carping and magnifying little things into big things with the object of undermining the government and creating a lack of confidence in the government on the part of the people, I should like to say to the hon. member that in his letter Colonel J. S. Ross made statements indicating concern at the apparent laxity revealed by the current scandals at Montreal and Petawawa.

I have not heard of Colonel J. S. Ross being a member of the opposition in this house. He certainly is not now. He is a prominent commander in the army. He speaks in these terms, referring to scandals, concern, apparent laxity. He then goes on to say:

> However, such action will not necessarily redeem lost confidence in the army by the minister, the members of the house, the press, or the general public.

The confidence of the people across this country was lost as a consequence of those scandals, not as a consequence of anything we of the opposition have said. I remind the hon. member for Skeena and others who are inclined to pass this off lightly that Colonel Ross had other things to say. He said:

> There have been numerous incidents—

Not just one incident involving some serving forks which the hon. member for Skeena ridiculed this afternoon.

> —of a similar nature, all of which indicate a very distinct lack of higher level supervision.

Mr. Knowles: How high?

Mr. Low: As the leader of the opposition asked this afternoon quite pertinently, just how high does this lack of supervision really go? Colonel Ross goes on to point out to the commanders and unit officers across this country as follows:

> The most recent scandals involve officers and men in the sale of government stores and the appropriation of government stores for their own personal use.

Without carrying on too long with this matter, let me remind members on the government side of the house that it was not members of the opposition who went out across the country and attempted to magnify little things into big things to create scandals; it was the action or inaction of the government itself and it was certainly, as Colonel Ross said, laxity in supervision, even in high places. These things were taken up by the newspapers across Canada and were very properly carried to the people. If there has been a lack of confidence, and I claim there has been, it has been as a result of the incidents which came to the knowledge of the Canadian public through the press. It was not because of any effort on the part of members of the opposition to scandalize.

I think it is the height of hypocrisy for government members to charge that because there has been laxity, because things have gone wrong and there have been this long list of incidents and scandals, that when we on this side attempt to do our duty we are stooping to petty criticism and are making an effort to undermine the government. That in my judgment is the height of hypocrisy.

The words of certain officers in the army have tended to confirm the suspicions that have been in the minds of the general public for months past. I have already said that in time of peace when the government of any people of the numbers of the people of Canada collects over $4 billion in any year and attempts to spend half of it or more on defence, you can just put it down in your little book that a good many of the people of the country are going to be perturbed and uneasy and are going to want their members of parliament to be much more vigilant than they have ever been in the past. It is only because we are attempting to be vigilant that we bring forward such things as were brought forward by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon, an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply asking for the appointment of a judicial body of some sort to hold an inquiry into the organization and so on of the Department of National Defence.

We want and are determined to do our duty by the Canadian people, but let nobody get the idea that because we do attempt to do our duty we are merely sweeping up the filth and the rot in an attempt to create scandals. That is not the point at all. I for one do not intend to try to take one little incident of any kind and attempt to magnify it. I am trying to look at the whole picture. I am trying to measure up to my responsibility to the people who sent me here. We are placed on the opposition side of the house just as you are placed on the government side of the house. We expect to do our duty and discharge our responsibility to the people, but when we do let us not have the hypocritical cry that we are just doing it for the purpose of trying to create a scandal so we can cause the people to lose their confidence in the government.

I have already said there are certain means within the reach of the members of the House of Commons by which they can investigate things. The chief of those of course is the committee method, but in a matter such as this, the question of an inquiry into the Department of National Defence, its organization, its provision for control, its bookkeeping and all that sort of thing, the committee method simply would not yield results at all. I have already said that I believe the committee method would not and I have said why. Therefore I have not the confidence in the committee method of investigation that a lot of other people may have, particularly those on the government side of the house who would depend upon the government majority to see to it that a report was brought back not unfavourable to the government. That is not what we need.

I have already said in other debates that I think some sort of judicial inquiry should be held. I think the people of Canada would want such an inquiry, and I think the government owes it to the people to set their minds at rest. If there is no laxity why hesitate? If there is laxity it is about time we had a judicial inquiry so it may be made known to the people. If a government are not capable of exercising proper control over the people's property then they ought to be turned out. There ought not to be any confidence in them. If the government are so sure they are not at fault then let us have the judicial inquiry called for, place the facts before the people and let them be the judges. I for one intend to vote for the amendment because I think what we need is a thorough and continuing inquiry into the organization and administration of the Department of National Defence.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for trespassing on the time of the house but because of a certain charge that was made this afternoon I feel some reply should be placed upon the record. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) made the charge that a group of Finch high school students came to the parliament buildings and the war museum at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers. The charge was made in such language that I am sure after the hon. member has read it and knows the facts as I propose to put them on the record he will realize that the charge is no credit to him. The language used was something like this.

Mr. Ferguson: I don't know—

An hon. Member: Sit down and take it.

Mr. Ferguson: I will take it.

Mr. Chevrier: He said that the fact these students came to visit the parliament buildings in an army bus was looting, was wholesale looting, was spending the taxpayers' money, and in fact that on that basis every American citizen who came here was a soldier. Here are the facts for the hon. member's information and also for that of the house, because I happen to be in possession of them. The students who came here were eighty in number. They are members of the Finch high school cadet corps, one of the finest cadet corps in eastern Ontario. There were both young men and young women, all of them in uniform. They were under the command of Captain A. Egan. They are affiliated with the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders, and I need not give the record of that regiment.

Mr. Ferguson: That is no answer.

Mr. Chevrier: They have been in existence for five years and have been affiliated with the S. D. and G. Highlanders for the last four years.

Mr. Ferguson: Fine.

Mr. Chevrier: Over and above that, there also came to Ottawa to visit the same parliament buildings and the same war museum the Avonmore cadet corps, which is also in the constituency of Stormont which I represent in the house, and which has been successful in obtaining a number of outstanding trophies for its proficiency in cadet corps work. That group travelled in the same kind of bus as the Finch high school cadet corps. They too are affiliated with the S. D. and G. Highlanders. When they came into the house they sat in the gallery wearing the tartan and kilt and received an ovation from the house. After the orders of the day they were spoken to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) who commended them for their appearance and efficiency. He spoke very highly of them. Furthermore, their commanding officer, Captain Powell, has now left or is about to leave Avonmore high school and, I am informed, has gone or will go to a high school in Carleton county in the constituency of the leader of the opposition. If he desires to bring the high school students here I am sure he will be entirely welcome and be perfectly free to do so. I should like to quote from a history of the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders which has just been written by Lieutenant-Colonel W. Boss and which was formally presented to the officers of the Highlanders no later than Saturday evening of last week. In it he has something to say about the cadet corps and their participation in the eastern area command. It is as follows:

> Steps were now taken towards the affiliation with the regiment—

He is referring to the S. D. and G. Highlanders.

> —of all cadet corps established in the area. The Cornwall collegiate and vocational school cadet corps had been allied with the regiment since 1927, but now those organized at the high schools in Alexandria, Maxville, Williamstown, Morrisburg, Chesterville, Avonmore and Vankleek Hill, and the Cornwall public school cadet corps were added. This policy had a twofold advantage. The battalion's full-time instructors (A. & T. staff) were made available with weapons, carriers, etc., to help in the cadet training. There was a platoon or company headquarters in each place where there was a cadet corps, so when the youngsters came of age they were fairly well qualified to either join the battalion or enlist direct into the arm of their choice.

I also add that affiliated with the S.D. and G. Highlanders are two other high schools in the constituency of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). They are Morrisburg and Chesterville. I am sure these high school students, these members of the cadet corps, if they desire to make a requisition—and if they have not already made it—for a visit to this parliament, will be treated in the same way as the high school cadet corps of Avonmore and Finch.

Mr. Ferguson: I still think it is wrong. It should not be allowed. You have no right to do it, either.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says he still thinks it should not be allowed. Well, I do not think it is in his judgment to determine that. He may have the right to rise in the house and criticize it, but I should think it is in the judgment of those who command these young men and women, and particularly in the judgment of the area command at Kingston.

Before either of these two cadet corps came to Ottawa they sought the advice of their headquarters officer in Kingston, and made requisition upon the headquarters officer in Kingston who, in the last analysis, determined whether they should come; and they were given a permit to come, in that manner. So I think it ill becomes my hon. friend to rise and make the kind of charge he has made.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask the minister a question? Has any commanding officer of any district the right to take the taxpayers' money to transport cadets? I would like an answer to that question.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not a military expert; but I will tell my hon. friend this, that if in any high school in Ontario, or anywhere else in Canada, there are young men and women who want to take the trouble and to make the sacrifice of working extra hours to enhance their training, then I believe that, with the consent of their officers, they are entitled to come here to Ottawa to visit the war museum and parliament buildings as part of their training, not as a field exercise but as related to that training. And it is not for me nor for my hon. friend but for the commander of the cadet corps to determine that, and the superior officers in Kingston; and it was they who determined it.

I say it ill becomes my hon. friend to make a charge, particularly when he uses the word "looting" as he did this afternoon. He has done himself no credit, and certainly he has done his party no credit.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: You have spoken.

Mr. Ferguson: It is a good thing I spoke before, and cannot speak again. It is just too bad.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention whatsoever, until late this afternoon, of entering this debate. I must say I was somewhat surprised, as was the minister who has just spoken, to hear certain observations made in the chamber this afternoon. I cannot help referring to my good friend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson); and I am serious in the belief that if he will recall the days he went to Sunday school, as did the rest of us, he will remember that we learned there—and possibly also at our mothers' and fathers' knees—that it was a fine thing to "suffer the little children to come unto me". That is an axiomatic truth, and it is a very deep rooted opinion in the hearts and minds of a lot of us. And despite the fact that a protest has been made, I do think it is quite in order, when young men and women are augmenting their training, that some slight reward of the kind indicated should be given to them by way of recognition.

Again this afternoon the question about boots was raised.

> Boots-boots-boots-boots movin' up and down again!
> There's no discharge in the war!

That brings my mind back to the years when I served in His Majesty's forces. We had boots, of a kind—boots that were no credit to the Canadian taxpayer or to the government of the day, boots that were a very abomination to the men who had to wear them. If in this question of the stockpiling of boots we are robbing the Canadian taxpayer to provide for a potential emergency, then I candidly believe the government is to be commended rather than condemned for its action. We can recall that during the years of the second world war, between 1939 and 1945, quite a number of the men who now serve in the government held high positions in the government of that day under the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. They did a tremendous job for the taxpayers of Canada, and there has never been even a breath of scandal with respect to any contract whatsoever.

It seems to me that is a record of which those who support the government can be justly proud. The fact is that we came through the second world war, one of great magnitude, with a clear record, a record that was unblemished, with implements of war in full supply, and with ordnance never dreamed of in the war of 1914-18. Having in mind the accomplishments of those who carried the terrific load during the second world war, and who are now members of this government, I do not think the taxpayers of Canada will be particularly perturbed about certain items that may be dug up and classified as wasteful expenditures.

Let us get down to brass tacks. I think it is generally admitted by all sections in the house that putting a man in uniform is not going to effect a complete change overnight, if in civilian life he has not been high-minded and honest. Let us suppose that we have about 120,000 in the services today, and compare what goes on in that group with what goes on in any community of like numbers in any province, whether it be Ontario, Quebec, in the maritimes or on the Pacific coast. There is no community of comparable size in which there are not some men and women who are not wholly honest. In any civilian community we will find a constabulary, a jail and a judge.

In the 120,000 connected with the services it is only natural that there may be some who are not completely honest; but this does not condemn every man and woman in the services. I do not think the proportion of crime is any greater there than in civilian life. I am sure all members of the opposition will agree with me when I say that whether we are preparing for peace and spreading over our heads an umbrella of freedom, or whether we are preparing for imminent war, such preparation in a time of either peace or war is wasteful and unproductive. I think that is almost universally the understanding amongst the Canadian people, and amongst the people of all democracies, that the preparation for national defence is a wasteful procedure. It is wasteful; it is non-productive. But is there anyone in this house who would say that, because of a certain amount of wastefulness attached to those preparations, we should entirely forgo the building up of our armed services in all the branches we now maintain and expect to enlarge?

In addition to that I believe we have to bear this thought in mind. Because the preparation for war is wasteful, and because certain things are done during those preparations that might be off colour or not entirely honest, should we as legislators make a blanket condemnation of many people who are completely innocent of breaking any law of the Dominion of Canada, either civil or criminal? With that idea in mind, what have we to look forward to? I think it is generally recognized that had we not made the allocations this parliament has made for defence preparations, the government would not only be condemned by certain of its followers—of whom I would have been one—but also condemned by all the members of the opposition groups, and rightly so. If that is a correct judgment of the thinking of the Canadian people, then it seems we ought to expect that some defalcation is going to crop up at one time or another, just as it crops up in civil communities large and small right across Canada.

If we are going to maintain this umbrella of freedom we shall have to spend money. In the expenditure of that money there is going to be waste. But in the final judgment, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have to accept that small amount of wastage in order to get what I believe they want to have, a properly balanced and integrated armed service or, on the other hand, they will have to completely forget about it and at the same time lose the potential striking power we might have created if we had made this expenditure. It was only today I believe, sir, that His Excellency the Governor General, speaking to the Canadian Legion in Montreal, stated that times have changed considerably since the first Legion convention. Unquestionably that is true. The things that we got and paid for, and the things that we fought for in the first world war are today basically the same. No one in this house, however, would want our armed services to go on the rate of pay those of us who fought during 1914-18 received, $1.10 per day. No one would want to see the married personnel of the integrated forces of Canada, under our climatic conditions, housed in a pup tent where you all sleep with your feet towards the centre pole.

In the Dominion of Canada we have outgrown that period, as has been stated by no less an authority than His Excellency the Governor General. On top of that we have to appreciate that we have a completely new status. This status is vastly different from what it was in 1914-18, and is considerably different from what it was in 1939. So far as our naval protection was concerned, in 1914-18 we leaned upon the United Kingdom government for that protection, and we received it. As a result of our experience in the first world war, and after the Statute of Westminster of 1931, we gradually developed into nationhood. It is true that our expenditures in connection with national defence are extremely high. There is no doubt in the world about that. I ask hon. members why they are so high today. It is because we supply for ourselves the naval protection that was supplied in 1914-18 by the British government. We have grown up, and it is only natural that we should assume the responsibility for our own protection in so far as that is humanly possible.

We ought to be proud of the fact that we have grown up. I believe the people of Canada are proud of their new status and that they are willing to subscribe to the new era through which we are now passing. So far as the people of Canada are concerned, they feel the burden of heavy taxation. I shall not dispute that. But how much better it is to feel the burden which is caused by our reliance upon our own ability to defend ourselves, rather than to have to depend upon others to volunteer to protect us in time of war. During Easter I took a trip through to the Pacific coast. I did not hear any great wailing at the wailing wall by taxpayers. They did feel that they would like to have a lesser tax burden, but who amongst us does not feel the same way? I do not think anyone particularly relishes the payment of taxes. This expenditure is necessary, however, if we are going to maintain ourselves as an independent democracy, free and untrammelled. Now, when we have high income and great production, it is necessary that we make sure we are going to be able to produce the equipment for any emergency in order to save us from becoming the slaves of those who plot and scheme behind the iron curtain.

I shall conclude, sir, by saying this. I believe Canadian nationhood is something of greater value than the expenses that must be borne by the taxpayer in order to bring to Ottawa young Canadians who are giving up their time, augmenting their training, and showing an interest in Canadian national development. In bringing them here, at the request of their commanding officer, I think we are rendering a service to nationhood in Canada. By having those young Canadians come here, not only were they able to visit the House of Commons but also were able to get an insight into some of the remarkable things we do here in a remarkable way.

Mr. Ferguson: It will make them fighting mad.

Mr. MacDougall: I dislike having to disagree with my good friend the hon. member for Simcoe North, but I must disagree with him on that point. Instead of putting our heads against the wailing wall I think that we might, with justifiable pride, hold our heads high, take a good breath of Canadian fresh air, fill our lungs and shout that we are proud of the fact that we are Canadians, able to defend our institutions, and able to manufacture and operate the necessary instruments of war required by any freedom-loving people in order to protect their freedom from those who would destroy them. God save the Queen!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before you put the question, Mr. Speaker, may I say it seems to me, particularly after the last speech or two, that it might be well for us to get back to what we will be voting on. The question before us is not the whole range of defence policy to the extent to which it has been discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall).

Likewise, I would suggest that we are not voting on whether or not it was a good idea for that group of cadets to be brought to Ottawa. After all, that was a matter that was decided upon in a perfectly open and above-board fashion. Indeed there is something to be said for the idea that young Canadians should have the opportunity to see the capital city. However, that issue is not before us, and it would seem to me most unfortunate if the vote, which apparently is about to be taken, were thought to be in any sense a vote upon that particular question.

The issue before us is set out in the amendment that was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). It relates to the uneasiness and concern in the country over reports of loss of public property by theft, looting and fire. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) pointed out a while ago, this uneasiness does not arise from any course of action pursued by members of the opposition or by any members of parliament. It arises from information which has been given to the public in fact through the channels of the Department of National Defence. Because of that uneasiness and concern on the part of the public, I suggest that it would be a good idea to have the matter cleared up by the appointment of a royal commission. As my leader pointed out this afternoon, and as others have pointed out in the course of this debate, if everything is clear and proper there is no reason on the part of the government to resist such a judicial inquiry. On the other hand, if there is something that should be brought out, there is every reason why we should have such an inquiry. Therefore, I hope that before we vote on this motion we shall in our thinking get back to the essential terms of it and vote on those terms.

I would remind the house that, though on most occasions when there is an amendment to the motion to go into supply it is regarded as a motion of non-confidence in the government and is treated accordingly by government supporters, there have been at least two occasions to my knowledge in the last ten years when such amendments have carried. One occasion was on August 27, 1946, when an amendment was moved to a motion to go into supply—and it was moved from our group—having to do with the subsidy on milk. After considerable debate the government, through the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), announced that so far as the government was concerned it was not to be regarded as a vote of non-confidence but was to be a free vote. As a result, a number of government members voted with the members on the opposition side and that amendment carried. The next step was the moving again of a motion to go into supply, and the result was that the business of the session went on.

The next occasion when this happened was on June 12, 1951, when the present leader of the opposition moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply, that amendment having to do with the desirability of appointing a committee to consider the procedure of this house. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) saw fit to accept the terms of that amendment, with the result that, after a few short speeches on it, the amendment carried. That event did not bring down the government nor did it even bring the session to a close. On that date the next step was for another motion to be made to go into committee of supply, and we went on with the work of the session.

I suggest that consideration might be given to pursuing the same course on this occasion. The proposal in this motion is one that would clear the air. Despite the opposition that has been expressed by government members thus far in the debate, I suggest that the government might even now give further consideration to the proposal for a judicial inquiry. In my view it would be well for the government to accept this amendment and then we can proceed with the business of the session in the way I have indicated.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, as one who cherishes dearly the good name of the services, I cannot help feeling that the revelation of these thefts and irregularities that have occurred during the past two years has to a large extent hurt the services themselves. I believe that every sailor, soldier and airman who is today serving in the forces of Canada deeply regrets that these irregularities have occurred. Why they have occurred, we do not know. They are abnormal. I do not believe anybody wants to try to close his eyes to them or to deny the fact that they are going on. But the people of Canada are hurt because the honour of Canada and of the armed services of Canada is at stake.

Today my leader suggested that possibly a special inquiry might be set up. Let us do something to clear the name of the services. Let us do something to clear the names of our gallant sailors, soldiers and airmen. If it is not a question of setting up a special inquiry, perhaps from the services themselves there might be somebody who would be reporting direct to the minister, somebody who is independent and who is above the question of promotion in his own service. In days gone by there used to be an inspector general. The inspector general reported to the minister direct. That was a check on many of the commands. But I do feel that something has to be done. We have to clear the good name of our servicemen; and if this is the best way to do it, then I am all for getting this matter cleared up, and then let us get on with the job of preparing for and maintaining the peace of the world.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition today saw fit to launch another of his violent attacks on the Department of National Defence. I submit that in so doing he followed a pattern which he apparently laid out for himself quite some time ago, and which he followed in this house on April 21, on May 1, subsequently in a radio speech and again in this house on May 5. I submit that each of those speeches was full of sound and fury, that each was long on assertions and on charges and longer still on innuendoes, but that each was equally short on fact. I submit in following this line of conduct he has assumed a very serious responsibility. I say that because if these charges, assertions and innuendoes are true, and are substantiated, then they impugn the whole defence effort, a matter which is of vital and continuing concern to every man and woman in this country.

If that is to be done there must be facts; there must be substantiation, and there must be proof that the conditions to which he has referred exist and that they are of general application, that they are flagrant and outside of any normal situation which might be expected in an effort as vast as the effort being carried on by the Department of National Defence today.

If they are not so substantiated, Mr. Speaker, then I say they are irresponsible statements; I say they are unjust and unfair to the Department of National Defence, to the government and to the public in that they create suspicion, distrust and uneasiness in the public mind not only in this country but in the other free nations of the world which are looking to the effort we are making to help assist in maintaining the peace of the world, and to 95,000 to 100,000 men and women who are wearing the Canadian uniform in Korea, in Europe and throughout Canada. I refer particularly to one quotation which was permitted to be quoted this afternoon in which the leader of the opposition said, as reported at page 1424 of Hansard of April 21:

—the revelation that officers had been ordering men under their command—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member referring to a debate which took place this session?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Campney: It was quoted this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I have touched on the matter. No objection was taken this afternoon. It is the same wording, the same quotation.

Mr. Speaker: I did not allow the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to quote from a debate of a week ago.

Mr. Drew: It is the same debate.

Mr. Campney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to page 95 of Beauchesne's second edition, where it would appear that a member while speaking may not refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion. It would seem to me that the same subject is under discussion at the present time.

Mr. MacDougall: It is under discussion today.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me, the purpose of the rule is to prevent obstruction by the quotation of long excerpts from a previous debate in the same session. But there is nothing to prevent any member of parliament referring incidentally to any debate that has taken place during the session for the sake of the argument. We can use the argument of comparison to compare what is happening now with what happened before in the session, without using long verbatim quotations of previous debates. The purpose is to prevent obstruction; it is not to prevent argument in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Before you get involved in the question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether or not the occasion which is being referred to was a debate. It was an attempt by the leader of the opposition to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31. Your Honour denied him that right.

An hon. Member: Well put.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was quoting from a debate that took place in the house last week. If that is so, I did not allow the leader of the opposition to quote from it, and I could not allow the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to quote from it.

Mr. Campney: I am referring to a statement made in the house on April 21.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it refers to the same debate in regard to which Your Honour made a ruling this afternoon.

Mr. Pouliot: It was not a debate; it was an abortion.

Mr. Hodgson: Beauchesne is right again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I find that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is referring to a motion that was made in the house on April 21, when the leader of the opposition moved the adjournment of the house under standing order 31. The motion was not allowed, and there was no debate. My interpretation of the rule is that it is for the purpose of preventing the reviving of a debate on a subject that has been closed.

Mr. Abbott: The amendment has done that already.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre is not reviving a debate. I do however want to make it quite clear that debates of the same session must not be revived. The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Campney: The quotation, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Campney: —is from Hansard, April 21. On that occasion the leader of the opposition used these words when he was speaking.

An hon. Member: Old straw.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campney: He referred to the "revelation that officers had been ordering men under their command to assist in acts of theft and fraud." I used the words of the leader of the opposition to illustrate what I said, namely that if these assertions and statements are not fully substantiated they are in fact a reflection on every man and woman wearing the Canadian uniform unless he or she can come forward and prove his or her own innocence. I do not think it is good enough, Mr. Speaker, for any member, and especially the leader of the opposition, who probably has a greater responsibility than most of us, to make statements which are based on rumour, hearsay and generalization, without supporting them fully with the facts, the dates, the times, the places and the persons concerned, because these are serious matters. They are serious to everybody concerned. They are serious to the department; they are serious to the government, and above all they are serious to every individual concerned with the operation of the Department of National Defence, whether in uniform or not.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Abbott: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Drew: On a point of order, the hon. member is referring to something that has been raised here before. Since he raises a question of this kind I would point out that what he has just referred to was given in sworn evidence at Pembroke last Friday and reported in the press.

Mr. Campney: The statement of the hon. member was made on April 21; and if he now seeks to justify it by something that was produced in evidence yesterday I do not think that has any particular relevancy to the line of argument which I am following. When you squeeze all the verbiage and high-sounding phrases out of the statements that come along with such regularity from the leader of the opposition you find a few facts which have been explained several times concerning Farnham and Petawawa. In addition there have been two or three arrests here and there. On that small foundation we have the leader of the opposition and the opposition generally seeking to raise a superstructure that affects the whole defence effort of this country, as well as the government and the Department of National Defence.

May I quote another paragraph from the statement of the leader of the opposition to which I referred as an indication of what I mean. I refer to what he said on the same date, April 21, 1952, as reported on page 1425 of Hansard. I think this is a gem. I quote:

> the outbreak of incendiary fires in military storehouses, significantly timed in such a way that they could have hidden the extent of any looting and thefts which had taken place in these storehouses.

If that is not the best way of conveying a broad and damaging innuendo without adducing a single fact, I stand to be corrected. He said:

> The outbreak of incendiary fires in military storehouses, significantly timed—

By whom?

> —in such a way that they could have hidden the extent of any looting and thefts which had taken place—

Did any take place?

Mr. Cardiff: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Abbott: Tell us about cheese or butter.

Mr. Cardiff: Does he deny that there have been thefts or fires?

Mr. Campney: No, I am not denying that there were thefts; I am not denying that there was stealing or thieving or fires. I am just saying that the leader of the opposition made an innuendo that is very damaging to the services and to the department without adducing a single fact to support his statements.

Mr. Sinnott: Ask another question.

Mr. Rowe: A little looting, but we should not mention it.

Mr. Campney: I noticed that today the leader of the opposition tended to modify his general statement. This word "looting" has great significance apparently in the minds of members of the opposition. I remember when they used the word "looting" in reference to some petty thieving here or there. I notice that when the leader of the opposition gave his long interview to the Ottawa Journal on Tuesday, April 22, he referred to the wholesale looting of military property. Today he refers to widespread looting. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) was not going to have any minimizing of the looting so he played it up and said that it was gross, flagrant and colossal looting. The facts upon which he based that statement have been very well dealt with by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Ross (Souris): Just peanuts.

Mr. Campney: I suggest that the words "gross, flagrant and colossal looting" are good circus language. Perhaps the opposition is coming to regard itself as a political circus. A lot of other people are of that view, no question about that.

Mr. Hodgson: You are on the wrong side of the house for that.

Mr. Sinclair: One of the chimpanzees.

Mr. Campney: I suppose pending by-elections do things to people and are apt to cause them to do things which they would not do under normal circumstances. Frankly I was surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He suggested that a royal commission should be appointed just in case something was wrong; that it would restore the confidence of the people of this country in the government if nothing was found to be wrong. I submit that that assertion arises out of his reaction to the charges, innuendoes and statements that have been made without the production of any evidence, statements that have been going out across the country for the last six months. I am surprised that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would be impressed by that sort of argument, but it shows what might possibly happen to the people of the country who are not as conversant with all these political moves as he and who would be consequently much more impressed with such unsubstantiated information and statements.

I say it is a serious thing to impugn public confidence in a matter so imperatively urgent as the activities of the Department of National Defence unless there is abundant proof to substantiate every charge that is made. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), following the line of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, said that not only is it necessary that things should be right, the people should believe that they are right. I submit that if anyone alleges that they are not right they should produce some evidence to substantiate what they say and not to do as the hon. member did. His contribution was that somebody had told him about someone whose neighbour was called for by an army car every morning. I do not think that is the sort of statement upon which to base general charges of inefficiency and gross, flagrant and colossal looting, such as were made by the hon. member for Simcoe North.

I am sorry I did not hear the whole speech made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), but I heard what he said just before the recess at six o'clock. He said he had not heard the minister's speech but he had heard the leader of the opposition and other speakers. He left a clear indication in my mind as to what he was proposing to do. When I came in this evening he finished it up by saying that he was prepared to vote against the government. The only other reference I heard him make was to a political pastime, which I think hardly appropriate in a matter so serious.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) came in tonight with some sweet reasonableness and said that if everything was O.K. there would be no harm in having a royal commission; if it was not O.K., then it was not O.K. It was just as simple as that. Is that the way we are going to investigate departments of government? If we feel like it, if we drum up enough enthusiasm, will we look into every department? Apparently the hon. member thinks it would be all right to carry on such a procedure. That is the line he suggests we should take in approaching the activities of any department and in conducting this house.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) took much the same line, but he did say something which I appreciated and which I am sure everyone in the service will appreciate. He said these statements are going across the country and that their effect will be most harmful to the prestige, the morale and the esprit de corps of the armed services. I suggest to the hon. member that he should have said that to his leader some months ago.

I do not want to dwell on this particular side of the matter, but we all know that the people making up the armed services and those on the civilian side are just like other people. There are good, bad and indifferent people to be found there; they are no better and no worse than the average. There is bound to be some stealing; there is bound to be some slipping from virtue. The point is whether these things are normal in relation to the amount of money involved and the extent of the activities. When they are normal as compared with other activities there is then no occasion for sweeping statements such as have been made. Certainly there is reason for vigilance. Certainly there is cause for continual attention, for strengthening procedures and for prosecutions wherever they are called for.

I should like now to mention a couple of points that I think might be mentioned, and which I do not think have been referred to so far. The first is that all these stores, merchandise and equipment are scattered from Korea to Germany and all over Canada in small isolated places as well as in large centres. In some parts they are distributed in almost inaccessible places, and that adds somewhat to the hazard of looking after such stores and equipment. I would also mention the fact that where you have enormous quantities of merchandise, goods or equipment stored in a given place there are added difficulties, when the people concerned in the supervision of such goods and equipment do not own them.

I have had some experience in that sort of thing through participation in companies engaging in that type of business and also because I was chairman of the national harbours board for three years. The national harbours board operates warehouses filled with goods, elevators and so on. There is no question in my mind but that to try to maintain vigilant and active supervision and protection of goods such as those with which I was concerned as chairman of the national harbours board is vastly more difficult than in a private enterprise where you have a localized congested area and your goods and merchandise are under close control. I think that is obvious. There is a greater tendency for people to conspire with people outside. You have to be vigilant at all times. In spite of everything we could do, during the three years I ran the national harbours board we had substantial losses, and in many cases we could not put a finger on the culprits.

Banks have great losses. Department stores have huge losses which they have to write off every year. Nobody likes that. It is deplorable; but we should be reasonable, and I submit we should not take isolated facts in the face of what we all know are difficult situations with respect to protection and base far-reaching assertions on them. I think we should be fair. The Department of National Defence through the use of the provost corps, the corps of commissionaires and its own internal organization is doing everything possible to protect what is entrusted to its care and to see that any time the system can be improved or strengthened in any way that that is done. That is the department's duty. I submit the department is endeavouring to do that to the very best of its ability. I submit further on the facts adduced today by the minister with respect to thefts and fires that relatively speaking in comparison with other enterprises—there is no other enterprise that is as large—the Department of National Defence is doing a first-class job. I do not think the odd police court case and the odd fire, some of them large, it is true, prove otherwise.

In Vancouver last month a large storage warehouse burned down with a loss of half a million dollars. An elevator structure was destroyed by fire with a loss of $1,500,000, and a shingle mill burned down. They were all privately operated and the fires took place within three weeks. I do not think anybody thought there was gross negligence on the part of either the owners, the operators or their employees. These things happen. Nobody likes them, but we ought to be reasonable about them.

I should also like to say that the Department of National Defence has had to build up an enormous organization at the same time that it has been expanding its fighting forces rapidly. It has had to take on people in large numbers. It has had to sort them out and train them quickly. The rapid expansion of its organization in conjunction with the growth of the fighting forces certainly has been a strain on the department. If you associate that fact with the percentage of loss by fire and theft I think you can say that the department has done an excellent job. I do not propose to suggest that the Department of National Defence is perfect in every meticulous detail or that all the individuals who make up its service and civilian forces are infallible. The department has grown rapidly and has sought to create its own internal organization at the same time that it was building up its service organization.

That has not been easy. Qualified personnel are difficult to obtain in the numbers that have been required. I submit that having now arrived at the point where there are 135,000 people in the services and on the civilian side, these people are as good a cross-section of Canadian personnel and Canadian enterprise as can be found anywhere. I want to make one further observation. I believe that the end result of the department's activities is the troops that are produced. I do not think we should ever lose sight of that, and I refer not merely to numbers but also to quality. I do not wish to engage in a fulsome eulogy of the members of our forces. We do not need that and they do not need it, but I do wish to say in all humility and with great pride that the resourcefulness, courage and deportment of the 25th brigade now serving in Korea, which I had the honour to visit with the minister in January, would gladden the heart of any Canadian who could have seen them and would make him proud to be a Canadian.

After all, that is the reason for all these expenditures. The reason we require heavy taxation is to provide troops, and I maintain that our troops in Korea, in Europe and in Canada are the finest type that any man in any country could wish for at any time.

I should like to make one other observation. After close association with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for the past year, I want to support the tribute that was so justly paid to him by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) when speaking in the house in April last. In directing the most important matter of our national defence the Minister of National Defence bears tremendous responsibility. His vision and determination, and his quick understanding and appraisal of problems are well known. I who work with him every day can bear testimony to that. His energy and devotion to his task are proverbial. Because I think it should be said, I want to say that when all the smoke of battle, both military and political, has cleared away I believe that he will stand out clearly on the pages of history as a very great minister of national defence.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary assistant referred a few moments ago to our Canadian troops in Korea. There is no member of the house who is not intensely proud of the manner in which these young lads have represented our nation, and the same can be said of the young Canadians who are serving in Germany. However, surely these young men are entitled to have behind them in Canada the very finest system that it is possible to have in the defence department. There is the nub of our complaint.

We say that steps should be taken here in Canada without further delay to strengthen the organization at home. The parliamentary assistant has claimed that there should not be all this rumpus raised about a situation which he says is, in effect, just the odd police court case. If that were the whole story there might be something in his argument. But this is far more serious than one particular police court case. When we see freight-car loads of government property being stolen from a government camp, that cannot be described fairly as just a little side issue. That is a very serious happening. Not only were carloads of equipment taken away from Petawawa, but railway tracks were torn up and, I suppose, taken away for scrap metal. Then we know of the unfortunate incident involving the stealing or the disappearance of buildings at Farnham camp.

I know the effect on me, personally, has been that during these last weeks I have been greatly worried to learn that this sort of thing has been going on. We all deprecate it; no one approves of it. But it has been going on. There has been mention of it in the press, and it has been admitted within the last few moments by the parliamentary assistant that these thefts have taken place.

All we are asking is that there be a thorough inquiry by a judge. There can be no doubt that the results would be of benefit to the defence department and the country at large. I am surprised that the minister and his parliamentary assistant have taken the attitude that this question should not have been raised in the house, that it should have been hushed up, that even by discussing it we are injuring or in some way hurting Canada's defence forces. I suggest to the minister that the far more reasonable approach to the question would have been for him to say, "Certainly; I am only too glad to have any suggestions which will help me strengthen our defence organization here in Canada." That would have been an approach completely different from the one he and his parliamentary assistant have taken.

I believe when they take the attitude that they must not be criticized, that those of us who complain are not patriots and that we are doing an injury to the country, the minister and his parliamentary assistant are, in effect, undermining the efforts of this country to build up a strong defence force. I believe they are not being fair to the young men and women who have volunteered for service in the Canadian forces, and are failing to appreciate the fact that we are not in a situation which is going to be over in a month or a year.

We face many years of tension in the world today. The whole policy of the freedom-loving nations is to build up their forces on a long-term basis and to become so strong that the communists dare not start a third world war. This is a policy which will have to be carried on for perhaps twenty years, perhaps longer than that; and now is the time to remedy the defects in our defence set-up. This is the time to get things right; and here we have a situation which obviously is wrong. I need only point out to the house what was purported to have been said by the adjutant-general of our forces. Surely his statement should carry some weight with members on all sides of the house.

We have this editorial published in the Calgary Herald on May 13, just six days ago, in which reference is made to a letter forwarded by Colonel J. S. Ross, officer in charge of administration, western command, to the heads of branches and staff, to the heads of services, and to units, subunits and detachment commanders. I need read only this one sentence from this letter by Colonel Ross, because I think it sums up the whole picture. He wrote:

> The adjutant-general has expressed sincere concern at the apparent laxity revealed by the current scandals at Montreal and Petawawa.

Hon. members will note that the adjutant-general expresses concern, that he refers to apparent laxity, and also that he uses the word "scandal". Just take that statement from the adjutant-general; surely that, without anything else, without all these other details, should be sufficient to convince us in the House of Commons that it is our responsibility to see that a thorough and complete check is made at the present time in order to stop this sort of thing, and to help the men in our defence forces. I suggest the best way that can be done would be by having an impartial inquiry. Frankly I do not know of any way by which we could assure that such an inquiry would be impartial and quite removed from any political consideration, other than by having a judge appointed to inquire into the methods used in the defence department in caring for stores.

I have had complaints from Vancouver to the effect, for example, that there is no proper method of inspecting goods when they are sent out to a command. We have seen these tenders called stipulating that a certain quantity of equipment must be sent to one camp, and a different quantity to another, and so on right across the country. My informant may be wrong, but I am told there is no efficient method of checking goods when they are delivered to respective camps. A camp may receive a box full of rock, let us say, instead of equipment—and that, of course, would be an extreme case.

Mr. Claxton: It does not exist.

Mr. Green: That is one complaint that has been made to me; it may be right or it may be wrong. But we are engaged in a pursuit entirely different from that which engaged our attention during the war. Here we are building up forces, not rapidly as we did during the war, but much more slowly. In addition we are stockpiling to an extent we did not do in wartime. In those years when we manufactured goods the greater proportion of them would be shipped overseas for use, with the result that we did not have the problem of stockpiling that now confronts us. With the larger quantities and the more numerous types of equipment and defence stores in Canada, there is obviously a greater need for some efficient system of keeping track of what happens to the stores. We have the proof that at least some of the stores have gone astray. There has been wrongdoing and I urge upon the members, in all sincerity, that we would be wise to have an inquiry such as that suggested in this motion. I am going to read it again, because I believe it points to an effective remedy. It is in these words:

"The government should consider the advisability of undertaking a judicial inquiry into the organization of the Department of National Defence and without restricting the generality of the foregoing to investigate the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property by the Department of National Defence with particular reference to losses of property by theft, looting and fire; the nature of supervision over the army stores and as to whether there has occurred any dereliction of duty on the part of any of the personnel of the said department whose duty it is to safeguard the public property of Canada.

The judicial body thus appointed to have all the powers of a royal commission under part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament."

If that recommendation were accepted, then we should have this question removed from the house and put into the hands of one of our senior judges in Canada. I am confident that the results would be greatly to the benefit not only of our forces but also of the nation at large.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the debate this afternoon as I was attending the Legion convention in Montreal and just returned in time to hear the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney). I was quite surprised at his speech, and that is why I am on my feet at the moment. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who is also the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), tried to defend the government and the administration of the Department of National Defence by attacking the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Surely that is as weak a defence to any of the charges which have been made and about which he complains as could possibly be put forward by a spokesman for the government.

The hon. member said that criticism of the Department of National Defence was hurting the good name of the services, and by inference at least also stated that any criticism of the affairs of the Department of National Defence was having an adverse affect on our defence preparations. If we are to accept that attitude, the logical conclusion would be that we should say nothing in this house about defence unless we can praise something which has been done by the minister or his assistant. In other words, it is just not consistent with our conception of parliamentary government. The duty of the opposition is to bring to the attention of the government, and the Canadian public generally, things which we believe are wrong so far as the administration or general policy of the defence department or any other department is concerned, and as a result try to remedy those deficiencies which may exist.

I resent the implications of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that those of us on this side of the house who have criticized defence matters are hurting the good name of the services. I am just as concerned about the good name of the defence service as any other member who has been active in defence matters or defence criticism. On this side of the house we are just as anxious as anyone else in Canada to maintain the good name of the services, and to maintain the efficiency of our services. I doubt whether the hon. member for Vancouver Centre or any other hon. member opposite would directly state anything to the contrary. It seems to me, however, that the good name of our services, the efficiency of our services, can best be maintained, not by keeping anything secret or by stifling criticism where criticism is justified, but by rooting out improper practices wherever they may have occurred. It is the only way by which we are going to get a defence service that is as efficient as possible. Trying to keep these things secret is not going to help in any way so far as the general efficiency of the service is concerned. Surely, it must be apparent to anyone that the shedding of light upon any situation which happens to exist in our armed forces produces better results than any attempt which may be made to hush things up.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre attempted to excuse any deficiencies which have occurred by saying that every commercial concern has large deficiencies, fire losses and so forth. Well, that is quite correct. No one has ever said they have not. However, that is still not a good excuse, particularly when you have matters coming to light as we have had in recent weeks, such as the Petawawa affair and various others which were reported to the committee now investigating defence expenditures. As a matter of fact, the general attitude of the government seems to have been that whatever the situation may have been, let us not say anything about it; let us keep it quiet. If we keep it quiet, the good name and efficiency of the services will be maintained. I believe exactly the opposite effect will be produced, Mr. Speaker. It is only by proper criticism of these matters, which I maintain we on this side of the house have made, that the efficiency of the services will be improved. This is true of other government departments as well.

Unfortunately, in the defence expenditures committee the government has followed this same idea of saying "Let us not investigate this or that if it is felt it is going to bring to light something which might prove embarrassing". As the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said a little while ago, the best way to meet the situation would have been for the minister, as soon as there was any indication of impropriety, to frankly say to the country that these things had occurred; that they were sorry they had occurred and immediate steps would be taken to prevent their recurrence.

Mr. Claxton: That is what I did.

Mr. Harkness: If that sort of approach had been made by the minister—

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Harkness: You would not have had all the criticism you have had about it. The difficulty is that that has not been the approach. There has always been this attempt to keep things quiet, and hope nobody would mention them. At the moment my sincere advice to the minister would be to bring these things out into the open and state definitely the steps that have been taken to correct them. If that were done I believe that many of the complaints and criticisms by hon. members and in newspaper editorials would rapidly disappear.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to keep the house for more than a moment, but after having heard the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) I think some clarification should be made for his benefit. He admitted that he had not heard any of the debate today, and then proceeded to take the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) to task for some of the things he had heard the hon. member say—

Mr. Harkness: It was just symptomatic of what he has been saying right along.

Mr. Dickey: He proceeded on that basis to make certain inferences. Fortunately he said he was making inferences, and I want to say to the hon. member for Calgary East that his inferences are out of order and completely unfounded. He suggested that from what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) had said the inference he took was that we were complaining about any criticism of the Department of National Defence, and that from what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre had said it was a logical conclusion that the opposition was not in a position to criticize at all.

That certainly is not an inference that could be properly made from anything the hon. member said in his speech. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was not complaining about criticism from the opposition of the Department of National Defence. What he was complaining about was the repeated broad, sweeping suggestions of wrongdoing, wholesale looting and all that sort of thing in the services, which suggestions have been repeated time and time again inside this house and outside of it, but so far have not been substantiated by one jot or tittle of evidence.

There has been no attempt to hush up any substantial charge or suggestion made by the opposition or anybody else with respect to wrongdoing. Such matters as Petawawa, Farnham or other individual cases that have been raised have been dealt with by the minister in this house in debates and in statements to the house, and hon. gentlemen opposite have not made any attempt to deal with those explanations. They have simply gone on the other tack of making wild generalizations so that it is not possible for the minister or anybody else to protect the members of the services from the general and serious allegations that are made against them all. These generalizations are things from which the members of the services cannot protect themselves, nor can they be protected from them. What we are complaining about here is not criticism or the bringing forward of any facts or figures that would be embarrassing to the government. What we are complaining about is simply the broad generalizations which constitute an attack on the members of the services.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I put the question, perhaps I should tell the house that I have my doubts as to whether or not this amendment is in order. I may say immediately, however, that I accept it. In order to help the movers of future amendments, however, perhaps I might offer these remarks. Last Monday an amendment which I think is similar to this was offered to the house. It is found at page 2112 of Hansard and reads as follows:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"consideration should be given to the matter of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of examining and making recommendations for:

1. Improving the organization and general efficiency of government administration . . .

And so on. If that amendment had been carried by the house, it seems to me that a commission, if appointed, in looking into the improving of the organization and general efficiency of government administration, would have looked particularly into the Department of National Defence, amongst others, and would have investigated—if anything had been found to be incorrect—the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property, as is now requested by this amendment.

In this connection, I should like to quote citation 332 of Beauchesne's third edition. It reads as follows:

It is a rule in both houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties that no question or bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

Basing my opinion on what I have just said, and particularly on this citation, and having analysed both the amendment which was moved on Monday last and the one which was moved today, I say that I have doubts as to whether this present amendment is in order. However, since the house is ready for it, I will now put the question.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), moves:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the government should consider the advisability of undertaking a judicial inquiry into the organization of the Department of National Defence and without restricting the generality of the foregoing to investigate the accounting, inspection and administrative supervision of public property by the Department of National Defence with particular reference to losses of property by theft, looting and fire; the nature of supervision over the army stores and as to whether there has occurred any dereliction of duty on the part of any of the personnel of the said department whose duty it is to safeguard the public property of Canada.

The judicial body thus appointed to have all the powers of a royal commission under part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament."

The question is on the amendment to the main motion. Those who are in favour of the amendment will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those who are opposed to the amendment will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH FROM CERTAIN DISEASES

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act.

Mr. Green: Will the parliamentary assistant make a statement?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to give some further explanations on this bill when it reached the committee stage. If my hon. friend wishes me to do it now I should like to answer the questions he raised when we were discussing the resolution which preceded this bill. The hon.

member asked this question, as reported on page 1975 of Hansard of May 7:

> Will the proposed amendment be wide enough to cover the case of a rehabilitation officer of the Department of Veterans Affairs who develops tuberculosis through contact with patients say in one of the military hospitals?

A little further on he made this comment:

> There would probably be similar cases in the Indian affairs branch, in which some government official would come in contact with tuberculosis but would not be eligible for assistance under the act.

This type of case is one which could be considered for compensation under the amended section. The question of whether or not compensation would be payable would depend on the facts of the case. The degree or extent of the exposure of an employee to disease in carrying out his duties as rehabilitation officer or otherwise would be a very important consideration. There is a considerable difference in the amount of exposure to disease by an employee such as a nurse or doctor or attendant who devotes the major part of his time to the care of tuberculosis patients and is thus thoroughly exposed to the disease, and the case of an employee, for example a rehabilitation officer, whose duties may bring him into contact with patients in a hospital at much less frequent intervals. Since the degree of exposure in the latter case is much less there would probably be greater difficulty in establishing that the employee contracted the disease through contact with patients in the course of his employment. I hope that answers satisfactorily the questions raised by my hon. friend.

I do not think this bill is very controversial. Its purpose is to extend the coverage of the act. This act has worked satisfactorily in the past. It was enacted in 1918 and has been amended only twice since, in 1931 and 1951. I do not think there is anything I can add to what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) said when he introduced the resolution on May 7.

I would remind hon. members that under the provincial workmen's compensation acts there are types of disease which are not fully covered. The definition of industrial disease contained in the Ontario act is the widest in scope that we could find. We could get along with the Ontario act and the acts of the provinces west of Ontario and provide the coverage that we are interested in securing for certain types of employees in connection with diseases which they may contract in the performance of their duties but with this amendment the governor in council will have the authority and power to extend to the maritime provinces and the province of Quebec the privileges now enjoyed under other provincial legislation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Regulations re compensation for disability or death from certain diseases.

Mr. Green: Unfortunately I could not hear the parliamentary assistant very clearly when he answered the questions which I had asked on May 7, but I understood the tenor of his remarks to be that a case such as I mentioned then would be covered by this amended section. I would ask him whether it would not be wiser in line 15 to have the word "and" changed to "or". The section would then read:

> The governor in council may make regulations prescribing the conditions under which compensation is to be payable, the amount of compensation payable and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined, in respect of any employee who is disabled or whose death is caused by reason of any disease that is not an industrial disease but is due to the nature of his employment or peculiar to or characteristic of the particular process, trade or occupation in which he was employed at the time the disease was contracted, and compensation shall be awarded to such employee or to the dependents of such deceased employee in accordance with the regulations.

With the word "and" in there it seems to me the employee would have to show both that he contracted the disease due to the nature of his employment and that it was peculiar to or characteristic of the particular process, trade or occupation in which he was employed. The first classification seems to be much wider, namely, that it was due to the nature of his employment. I think that would let in cases which would not be allowed in under the second qualification. Would it not be possible to change "and" to "or"? Otherwise I am afraid a case such as I mentioned the other day, that of the rehabilitation officer who went to consult a tuberculosis patient about rehabilitation and contracted the disease, could not possibly qualify under the act.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): In reply I might say to my hon. friend that the case he submitted the other day has been carefully studied, and it is expected that the regulations to be drafted for the operation of this section will be wide enough to do justice to meritorious cases of the type mentioned by my hon. friend. Of course we want to guard against any liability on the part of the government with respect to cases where only casual exposure to patients in sanitaria has preceded contamination of any such rehabilitation officer. Therefore we cannot open the door too wide. The case has to be put forward and argued on its merits, but certainly the regulations will be wide enough to cover any justifiable case. I would not think it would be wise to amend the section in the way my hon. friend has suggested, but I am sure his remarks will be taken into consideration and the best possible drafting will be given to the regulations in order that as many cases as possible will be covered.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister spoke on the resolution preceding the bill he indicated what the intention was in rather precise terms. As indicated on page 1974 of Hansard, the intention included the covering of diseases not regarded as compensable under provincial law. The intention also included in particular the coverage of employees in federal government laboratories, particularly in animal disease laboratories and in animal disease field inspection work where they may be exposed to virus infections in the course of their work. We welcomed the statement of the minister that the purpose of the amendment was to cover cases of the kind to which I have just referred by quoting from what the minister said. When we get the bill it is noted, however, that section 8 as it read previously was specific in its reference to a particular disease, namely, pulmonary tuberculosis. On the other hand, the new section 8 proposed by the amending bill does not name any particular diseases. The reference to pulmonary tuberculosis is gone and there is no reference to the diseases which the minister suggested in his remarks on May 7. I take it that what is now intended is to cover the kinds of diseases that were covered before in section 8 and these additional diseases under regulations to be passed under this section. Can we be assured that those regulations will cover on the one hand everything that section 8 previously covered and on the other hand everything that the minister referred to in his remarks of May 7?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Without any hesitation I can give that assurance to my hon. friend.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was there any special case that gave rise to this amendment? Have there been actual difficulties that have arisen out of the interpretation of the old section, or has any case arisen where the person contracted a disease in the course of his employment and was not covered by the act?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): To my knowledge no pensionable case has arisen, but there have been indications that some might arise in the future. Therefore we are putting forward this amendment to cover any potential case that would be pensionable under the act.

Section agreed to.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO YEARS 1952 AND 1953

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Prudham that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify the provisions of subsection five of section three so as to provide for the assistance intended when this subsection was enacted in 1951.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I believe it would be a splendid gesture in the year of the coronation for Canada to strike golden coins in certain denominations to mark that great festival.

The Chairman: Order. I think the other day the hon. member made the same suggestion and, if he will recall, I pointed out to him on that occasion that he was not in order. He is not any more in order this evening.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The position is this, that I am from a riding in which gold mining is an industry just like cattle ranching, lumbering or any of the other great natural industries. Any measure at all which could assist in improving the price of gold would certainly be of value to that part of Canada, and indeed to every other part in which gold mining is a great and basic industry. That would take in many parts of Quebec, northern Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, right across the country. I hope to see the day when Canada is released from any commitment under the international monetary fund. I hope to see the day when gold will command its proper price throughout the world. This would be of great benefit to our country, stimulating not only the gold mining industry but many others dependent upon it.

We have heard about the great development of iron in Labrador. The project now being carried out would have been impossible had it not been for the genius and experience of men who had operated in gold in northern Ontario, who had acquired capital and the ability to participate in the development of that great iron ore industry in Quebec. In my own province, gold miners having acquired wealth in that industry have spent their money in many other industries, and have developed ranching, as well as mercantile and other activities in Vancouver, Victoria and elsewhere. In fact, the story in British Columbia is that the mining of gold has been fundamental to the success of that province.

Our north Atlantic allies should have a common coinage as well as a common monetary system. I had thought this might properly be considered under this resolution, but I believe I am ruled out of order, so I must be content to retire to a discussion of conditions within the boundaries of my own riding. We should continue this subsidy and increase it. By increasing the production of Canadian gold we can stimulate the business of all our people.

France hoards gold; the United States buys gold. Let us, then, follow the policy so well outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to sell our commodities in the best market. If France, United States and other nations wish to buy that metal product, then let us go into those markets and, as I say, free Canadian gold from control at the hands of men who, while their intentions may be good, direct institutions such as the international monetary fund. With all due respect to our own Minister of Finance I say those persons are often advised by theorists and by those who are not practical in the handling and directing of industries and the meeting of problems in the development of the northwest.

I do not wish to speak at greater length. I would point out, however, that during the last few months I have been in many of the new centres of northern British Columbia, as well as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories where, despite the low price of gold, development is going on. Large purchases are being made and a great market exists for the business houses of Vancouver, Edmonton, Toronto and elsewhere.

We are most fortunate in having a minister in the department who, I believe, shares the views I have endeavoured to present this evening. I commend him for continuing the subsidy to an industry which is vital to the success of our country.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the length of this discussion and its very thoughtful nature indicate that all hon. members have become aware of the fact that the gold mining industry has been made a sick industry through the restrictive policies now being followed by the government as a result of our adherence to the international monetary fund. I say the gold mining industry has been made a sick industry because any industry is sick when its welfare depends directly upon the continued favour of the government and the continued support of the public treasury.

When I refer to favour of the government, I do not have in mind industries the existence or continuation of which can be wrecked by sudden changes in domestic, fiscal or tariff policy, but rather industries the existence of which on a solvent basis depends upon subsidies from the treasury. It is the seriousness of that situation and the growing awareness that it should not be allowed to continue which have given rise to this thoughtful discussion.

I believe we have to support the resolution and the bill which will be based upon it because, for reasons given by the minister and others who have taken part in the debate, it is hoped that the measure will improve somewhat the present position of this vital industry. But the mere fact that we support the resolution and the bill will not be taken, I hope, as any indication that we are in favour of the general policy now being followed which, in effect, amounts to a continuation of restrictive barriers built up around the industry and against trading in the commodity it produces.

I am not going to repeat the arguments set out in the excellent and timely speech of the hon. member for York West, in which he prescribed in some detail measures which would lead to a cure of the present conditions from which the gold mining industry suffers. But it seems to me that anyone who thinks cannot avoid being struck by the folly of the situation in the world today where we find large numbers of people in this country and in South Africa—to name only two of the largest gold producing countries—busily engaged in digging this valuable commodity, out of one hole in the ground and shipping it to the United States where on the other hand a large number of people is busily engaged in burying and guarding it in another hole in the ground.

This is a commodity which is valuable not only because of its intrinsic worth, but also because of its use in international trade. When it is placed in the hole in the ground in the United States it can serve no useful purpose; the only purpose it serves is to preserve the artificial price set for gold, and to continue a situation where the gold producing countries are denied the price and the place which would be theirs if international trade in gold were once again freely to take place.

Yet this situation, under which a commodity is dug out of one hole in the ground in one country and buried in another hole in the ground in another country, thus bringing about an artificially depressed price for gold, means that the price which our producers receive for the commodity—a price which is forced upon them by the present restrictive policies resulting from the international monetary fund to which, as yet, we continue to subscribe—bears no relationship to the price or the value which would attach to gold if it could be freely owned and used in trade. I join particularly with the hon. member for Eglinton in his statement the other day that he fully realizes and appreciates the difficulty of changing that situation. It cannot be lightly suggested that any country should withdraw from international agreements and obligations into which it has freely entered. But I do press strongly the point of view that unless we can see indications that these policies will be relaxed progressively, and that the relaxation will commence at an early date, we should serve notice that we may be compelled, in the discharge of the duty which is described as the prime function of this parliament—that is to consider first the interests of Canadians—to take measures which could only be taken if we did withdraw from that arrangement. Some of the remedies suggested perhaps do not involve immediately going that far, and I think they should be considered carefully; if it is at all possible they should be adopted whether or not we in fact withdraw from the fund.

It is for that reason we should see if it is not possible to allow the private ownership of gold in this country. Above all, we must take steps now leading to the restoration, at as early a date as possible, of the free market for gold. I believe that nothing plays into the hands of the communist countries and communist policies so much as the restrictions on the free movements of money and people which, as we see them in effect today, restrict the trade between ourselves and the sterling and other western European countries. The present conditions give a fair indication that if the restrictions are to continue, and particularly if they become any more serious, some form of economic breakdown will confront the western world. Nothing could contribute more to the furtherance of communist policy than that economic breakdown. In the last few years, on a number of occasions, we have only narrowly averted such a breakdown, the consequences of which would be more far-reaching than the breakdown of our military strength. It goes without saying that military strength cannot be maintained unless there is a sound economy behind it.

When we see the difficulties which confront this country in selling its produce in the markets of the world because of currency restrictions, impediments to convertibility; when we see the complexity of difficulties which we experience in bringing into Canada immigrants of the type that we want and who want to come here, because those immigrants cannot bring their money with them; when we see these artificial restrictions on the free flow of money and people, then I think we have to realize that some parts of the world are being forced to adopt the same policies which we so vigorously condemned when they were adopted by the dictator countries. One of the first things Hitler did was to prevent the export of money and then to prevent the movement of people out of Germany. Having done that, he then said they had too many people in Germany and had to have more living space; that was one of his main pretexts for military expansion. I cannot see the sense of condemning those policies in others, and then permitting a similar situation to arise as a result of these restrictions now being imposed on movements of this type today.

I am convinced that one of the prime tasks confronting the North Atlantic treaty nations, and one quite as urgent as the building up of their military strength, is the restoration of the freedom of people to cross international boundaries and the freedom to move money and goods across international boundaries. I believe one of the first requisites to the restoration of those freedoms would be the restoration of a free market for gold. It seems to me that an international commodity which is accepted everywhere as a basis of values would at least permit the start of the process which would lead to the restoration of convertibility.

Now, those general statements are as far as I dare go into the field of international finance, and I make even those statements with some trepidation. But I am convinced that these general principles are applicable, and that the considerations arising out of them are urgent.

I come then to the other set of circumstances which, as I have said, lead us to support this measure—although we take exception to the continuance of the general restrictive policy—that is, the immediate welfare of the gold mining industry. At the moment, this depends upon some additional assistance along the lines which will be provided by the bill to be based on this resolution. Other members with greater knowledge of the mining industry have spoken of those factors, and I do not intend to repeat them. I do intend, however, to say that, having two large gold mines in the constituency which I represent, the Pioneer and Bralorne mines in the Bridge river valley, and knowing something in a general way of the difficulties which those mines are facing, the difficulties which they have found in keeping men and the conditions facing the men because of the difficulty in paying wages which are commensurate with wages paid in other branches of mining, I know that even the temporary and limited relief offered by this measure is something we must support.

Again, though, I urge the minister, for the sake of the welfare of the mining industry as well as for the sake of the welfare of this country and all western countries who must restore freedom in international trade, to lose no time in going further than this temporary measure and making his main effort the restoration of the value of gold and the free trade in it as a commodity.

Mr. Abbott: I know this is not the time to enter into a discussion of the functions of gold in a world economy, but I think perhaps I should say just a word in view of the inference of the hon. member that the difficulties which are now facing the gold mining industry of this country, and other gold producing countries, are due to what he has referred to as the restrictions imposed by the international monetary fund. The causes of those difficulties are very much more deep rooted than that. The very thoughtful speech which was made by the hon. member for York West the other day—I was sorry I was not here to listen to it—and the speech given by the member for Kamloops, show that they must have given a great deal of time and study to the history of gold as a foundation for currency.

The traditional role of gold, however, has been as a means of settling international balances and as a storehouse value. It has retained that position because it has had a stable value, not a fluctuating value. In the past it has been fixed by statute as a unit of national currency containing so many ounces of gold of a certain standard of weight and fineness. That is the traditional role of gold, and that is the only way we shall maintain gold as a metal having the value it has today. Gold itself, as was so rightly pointed out by the member for York West, has very little intrinsic value. Its uses in the arts are extensive, but they certainly would not account for one moment for the gold produced in this country alone, let alone that of South Africa and many others. The traditional value of gold, therefore, depends upon its being accepted as a suitable medium of exchange. Really to oversimplify it, the present value of gold today depends upon the willingness of the United States treasury to take it and to give $35 an ounce worth of goods and services for it. If the United States treasury ever stopped doing that, I can tell you that the Canadian gold producers would be in a much more serious position than they are at this moment.

There is a good deal of talk about this free market for gold. Those of us who have followed this question have been rather interested in what has happened since there have been these relaxations with regard to the sale of gold, in processed form, it is true, but in very slightly processed form. The fact that Canada and Southern Rhodesia have entered that market along with South Africa has had the effect of sharply depressing the price. I venture to say that if the so-called shackles were all done away with, if we offered the $110 million worth of gold production we have in this country freely and if South Africa and everybody else did the same thing, the United States would be reluctant to give $35 worth of automobiles, steel or what have you for our gold production, in view of the fact that they now have some $23 billion or $24 billion worth of non-productive gold, as my hon. friend has said, down in the vaults at Fort Knox, Kentucky. I would therefore not take it for granted, as some people do, that Canada gets no benefit from being a member of the international monetary fund.

This is a question on which opinions may differ. That may not be the best medium for maintaining the stable, traditional role of gold in the world economy, but it is one means. The international monetary fund is participated in by most of the major trading countries of the world with the exception of soviet Russia, and by all the major gold producers. I think that statement should be made here. As I have had occasion to do under other circumstances, I again remind hon. members that the continued value of gold and the future of the gold mining industry is dependent, under today's conditions, upon the United States treasury being willing to purchase it. Whether the price of gold will be raised from its present value of $35 an ounce to something else, as was done in 1933, is a matter on which opinions may differ. I am perhaps saying the obvious when I say the policy of the United States treasury would be a rather important factor in that eventuality.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in what the Minister of Finance has just said. I disagree with him in the statement that the price of gold depends entirely upon what the United States treasury is prepared to pay, for this reason. At the present time the United States treasury and the other monetary authorities are merely purchasing some 15 per cent of the world's total output of gold. The rest of it is going not to treasury sources but to sources outside the monetary funds of the various nations. As a matter of fact, according to the United Nations, production last year was some $856 million, based on $35 an ounce, of which $130 million went into monetary funds. The rest went to sources not controlled by the United States treasury. Therefore if you have an organization that is prepared to pay a price for a commodity, and by paying that price can purchase only 15 per cent of the world's output, I think it is incorrect to say that that purchaser controls the price of that commodity.

My point is simply this. The return to a fixed value for gold which is accepted by the people of the world is desirable. It is not happening at the present time. The way to arrive at that price at which gold will be accepted—the whole 100 per cent of the production, the whole gold that is in hoards, doing no good to anybody or at least very little—is by some method in which you take the restrictions off owning, holding, importing or exporting gold. Those methods are, of necessity, complicated. However, that is the only way in which the true price for this commodity can be arrived at. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, if the United States were willing to say that gold is worth $35 an ounce, they would offer to sell it against their own currency for $35 an ounce, and to their own nationals; but they are not prepared to do that. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to you, Mr. Chairman, that there would be a great drain on the hoard at Fort Knox, which the United States treasury could ill afford to stand despite the fact that they are today the world's greatest creditor nation.

Just in this week's New York Times there is in the magazine section an article by Hoffman, the economic correspondent of the Times, saying that there are some $6 billion of gold in Europe alone and that the freeing of that hoard and the putting of that hoard to work would, in his opinion, go a long way towards solving the exchange problems of the European continent.

Mr. Abbott: How do we do that?

Mr. Adamson: That is his article. I will give it to the minister.

Mr. Abbott: He does not know any more than we do about it.

Mr. Adamson: It is his article.

Mr. Abbott: How do we do it? That is the big question.

Mr. Adamson: If gold were free; if restrictions were taken off gold—because gold is merely a form of capital—and if it were allowed to move freely, the situation would be like that portrayed in the old fable by Aesop of the man with the coat, the sun and the wind. Both wanted to get him to take his coat off. The wind tried to blow the coat off, and the man held his coat around him tighter and tighter. The sun came out and made things warm and pleasant and he took off his coat because he did not need it any more. What we must do is make international climatic conditions so financially pleasant that people will not hold gold but will put it to work.

In another article in the same paper it is estimated that there are some 10,000 ounces a day of gold going into the black market through New York channels—they call it the black market but it is in fact really the free market or the open market—and that gold smuggling has reached such an extent that less than one in fifty of the gold smugglers are caught. I mention these things because I appreciate the minister's point of view. But, Mr. Chairman, we must take steps to free currency and exchange. We are not doing it at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: We have.

Mr. Adamson: We freed our dollar.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: I think we should take the next step and free gold. The minister says we freed our dollar. That is something I advocated many years ago, and I think we should have done it long before we did. I think we should have had the courage to do it many years ago, as we should now have the courage to free gold. I think we should have had the courage to do it many years ago. At the same time I think we should have the courage, as I said on Wednesday, to take the steps to free our exchange and establish an open gold market in this country. I believe it would be the beginning of more freely convertible exchange conditions. You have the situation, Mr. Chairman, where 15 per cent or less of the gold at the present time is going into what no doubt the minister will say are useful channels. The rest of it is going into what the minister would probably say is a black market, hoards, which is undesirable.

What are the steps to be taken to make gold the useful monetary commodity that it once was? In my opinion the first thing you have to do is free it. The first thing you have to do with any type of exchange is endeavour to free the trading in it. If the free market is not the way, if anybody can suggest a better way, I would be interested. At the present time we are going from bad to worse. We are destroying our industry, and nowhere do you find trading becoming easier in the world.

The final argument, Mr. Chairman, is that unless we in this country for our own good, let alone the good of the free world, and especially international trade, do this, we are going to further compartmentalize trade, we are going to continue currency blocs, restrictions and all the other devilish devices of scarcity, and by so doing we are not restoring the trade of the world.

I believe gold is a weapon we must use, and we must use it as a freely exchangeable commodity without any strings of any kind attached to it. That is my plea, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister one question? I am concerned about the number of workers who are engaged in the gold mines of Canada. Parliament had better consider their situation pretty carefully. I have listened to the remarks that have been made by hon. members and because every one of whom knows so much more about the subject than I do I take their word for many of the things that in some other debates I might be looking at with a more critical eye. I have listened to the debates very carefully, and I have been very much impressed with what has been said. The thing I am concerned about is this. If the gold mines of this country are in the condition which it has been said they are, and if the future under our present system is so uncertain, then I think parliament had better give very careful consideration to the people whose very lives are tied up in the question of work in these mines. You cannot just uproot working people and push them around. They have gone into this mining work with the idea of making it a livelihood, a vocation, and not just a temporary one, but a permanent one. For my own satisfaction I should like to know how many are involved in gold mining in Canada, because I think that is a figure we ought to have in this debate.

Mr. Prudham: I have not that figure with me, but from memory I think it is 26,000 people, but I could be wrong.

Mr. Adamson: It is 36,000.

Mr. Prudham: The resolution we have before us tonight proposes amendments to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We have had a very interesting and I think profitable discussion of this resolution. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was never designed to cure the ills that beset the industry. It cannot deal in any way with the international monetary fund or with other problems in the realm of finance. It is designed solely for the purpose of providing emergency assistance to the industry over a difficult period. Subsequent amendments, and the amendments that we now propose, do not alter the original intent of the act in any way, and I think we all understand that.

The discussion has all been very helpful, and I hope the committee will see fit to pass the resolution tonight so I can have these amendments before the house. I can also say that I expect that we shall have the report of last year's operations of the act in the hands of hon. members before second reading.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask one question before the debate ends, of either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In your opinion what is the future of gold mining? You know the picture behind it. I think we are entitled to know just what the picture is, because there has been a good deal of debate here tonight. You two experts over there ought to be able to answer the question I am asking.

Mr. Prudham: I think the gold mining industry is going to survive. I just recently returned from a very interesting and educational trip into northwestern Quebec. The Minister of National Revenue and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) were also in the party. I was very much pleased to see the thriving communities, the modern towns with every convenience, paved streets and beautiful public buildings and permanent homes. The mines are practically all in operation. Of course, there are casualties. You always have casualties in the mining industry. Mining is always a wasting industry but we saw many new mines coming into production. We saw two or three on that short trip. One thing that is perhaps overlooked by some hon. members is the fact that the government gives a three-year exemption of taxes on new mines. A great many of them are taking advantage of that and are bring new mines into production.

The engineers are a fine group of young businessmen, as fine a group as you will find anywhere in Canada. They are applying their energy and skill to developing better methods of production, better methods of treating the ores, and they are developing new economies. I think they are going to pull the industry through.

Mr. Graydon: You think it will go back to where it was?

Mr. Prudham: Well, your opinion is as good as mine. I think it will.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Prudham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 242, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister to provide for the establishment of a national library; then the resolution to amend the Canada Grain Act; then Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act; Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian forces. There are three bills in the name of the Minister of Justice: Bill No. 63, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 196, to amend the Supreme Court Act and Bill No. 197, to amend the Interpretation Act. If we have time we will take up the resolution to approve the supplementary extradition convention.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 20, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

EMERGENCY POWERS

RESULT OF APPEAL IN ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA AND CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD V. NOLAN AND HALLET AND CAREY LIMITED

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think members of the house would be interested in an up-to-date report upon the proceedings between Jeremiah J. Nolan, Hallet and Carey Limited et al, and the Attorney General of Canada and the Canadian Wheat Board. The most succinct statement I might make in that connection is to read a self-explanatory wire which we have just received from our agents, Charles Russell and Company of London. The wire reads as follows:

Nolan appeals allowed.

The reference here is to the attorney general's appeal against the judgment in favour of Mr. Nolan. The wire proceeds:

Orders Supreme Court Canada court appeal court Queen's bench Manitoba in both actions set aside except as to costs. Judgment dismisses action commenced by Nolan and as regards action commenced by board judgment is for board against Nolan for amount moneys remaining in court.

Actions remitted to court appeal and court Queen's bench Manitoba for order payment out to board of moneys in court. Costs proceedings Canada and privy council in accordance with terms granting special leave. Airmailing reasons.

The wire is signed by Charles Russell and Company.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the petition of Frank Ashworth for a bill of divorce, presented on May 19, 1952, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on May 20, 1952, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable in relation to standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c).

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

RELIEF FUNDS FOR HIGH WATER LEVEL AREAS—DEDUCTION OF SUBSCRIPTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I regret that I have not had an opportunity to give him notice of it but he may take it as notice now. Have subscriptions to relief funds for the rehabilitation of persons who have suffered from high water levels of lake Ontario, specifically the fund raised in the municipality of Long Branch, been allowed or disallowed as deductions from income for tax purposes?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): It is a question of dealing with each application upon its own merits. Those who are interested would have to make application to the department—it is an administrative problem—and an answer would be given in due course. I shall take the hon. gentleman's question as notice and give him a more detailed answer tomorrow.

BREAD

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF CONFERENCE ON USE OF COLOURING MATTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he is yet in a position to make a report on the conference which was to have been held recently respecting regulations to make sure that brown bread is whole-wheat bread and not white bread dyed brown.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am in a position to make a statement, but I shall be very glad to deal with this when my estimates are up for discussion.

NATIONAL LIBRARY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a national library and for the appointment and remuneration of a national librarian and an assistant national librarian; to provide also for the appointment, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act, of such officers, clerks and employees necessary for the proper control and management of the national library; to provide also for the establishment of an advisory council and for the payment of the travelling and living expenses of the members thereof; and to provide further for the establishment in the consolidated revenue fund of a special account to which shall be credited any money appropriated by parliament for the purpose of acquiring books and of a special account called the national library special operating account to which shall be credited all moneys received by way of donation, bequest or otherwise and that any amount required for the purpose of the said measure may be paid out of the national library special operating account or out of any money appropriated by parliament for such purposes.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have a statement to make but it seemed to me that it might be more convenient if I made it when the house was in committee because then questions could be asked and answered to elucidate the statement and to give such further information as I might have available. There is another reason for my preference to do it that way. This is a motion under standing order 60 and that standing order provides:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

The motion being moved at this time is merely a motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair so that the standing order can be complied with. There cannot at this stage or until the committee has considered the resolution be any vote of the house upon its substance. So that it would not seem to be in accord with the standing order to discuss at this time the merits or demerits of the resolution. That has to be considered first of all in committee before there can be any expression of opinion by the house upon its merits or demerits.

I do not want to start a long discussion about procedure at this time, but I think it is a matter worthy of consideration. There is the practical advantage that if I make my statement when the house is in committee hon. members will have the opportunity of asking me for further information about any points I may be suggesting in support of the resolution.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is a most important subject and it is desirable to proceed upon the basis of a statement from the government as to its general intention. I am certainly of the impression that when we have had similar motions before us in regard to other matters statements have been made and that it has been customary for other members to express their opinions in regard to the matter under consideration.

I would point out that if a statement is made now by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to the general intention of the government in connection with this important matter it will then be possible for hon. members to ask questions when we have gone into committee. I think what should be borne in mind in connection with this is that the subject matter is something about which I am sure there is no dispute. I feel sure that all hon. members welcome the decision to proceed with something which has been requested for a great many years.

I think it would be helpful if hon. members had a statement from the government as to the way in which they propose to proceed with this matter. Doubtless other hon. members besides myself will wish to say something in the light of what the Prime Minister would say. Then, if the motion is adopted, as I trust it will be unanimously, it will be possible to ask any question that may suggest itself when we have proceeded into committee. I respectfully ask the Prime Minister to follow that course.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it would take some time perhaps to reach a definite decision as to what standing order 60 really means because of the practice which has grown up in the past I have no objection to making my statement now. But I make it under reserve of my request to His Honour the Speaker to consider standing order 60 and at some future time give us the benefit of his opinion as to its proper construction.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, I am sure that there will be no one in this house who will not consider that this matter is of sufficient importance to warrant taking up the time of the committee of the whole to consider whether a bill should be introduced. I think it is safe to assume that all members of the house will be glad to see some step made toward the realization of a national library for the Canadian nation. I think it is also safe to say that there was nothing included in the speech by which His Excellency opened this parliament which was more decidedly commended than the announcement that there would be introduced at this time legislation preliminary to the establishment of a national library.

The leader of the opposition is right in saying that for some time past a number of requests have been made that steps be taken toward establishing this kind of public service for the Canadian people. Late in 1946 a brief was presented to the government by a group of societies, including the Canadian Library Asssociation, the Royal Society of Canada and others, asking that the first preliminary steps toward the organization of a national library in Canada should be taken at the earliest moment.

In September, 1948, the newly appointed dominion archivist was given the special assignment of preparing the way for the establishment of a national library, and a national library advisory committee was appointed under his chairmanship. On the advice of this committee the government approved the establishment in 1950 of the bibliographic centre which was intended to be the first unit of the national library. This centre is temporarily located in the public archives building.

Then in 1949 the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences was appointed and asked to consider the national library question. The purpose of the bill to follow this resolution is to carry into effect the recommendation of the royal commission that a national library be established without delay.

Just a word about the present plan. The bill to be introduced if the committee approves the resolution will give ample authority for the organization of a full-fledged national library. Of course this is not something that is going to be realized overnight. It may be that under existing conditions some time must necessarily pass before the project is well advanced in implementation. In the first place, defence requirements make the immediate construction of a new building impracticable for the time being and a national library cannot function with maximum benefit to the community without suitable quarters.

In the second place a great amount of cataloguing of books and other preliminary work must be done before the national library itself can begin to lend books, to give an adequate reference service to inquirers and perform other functions of a public library. It is this essential preliminary work which the government is proposing should be pushed forward immediately, in the hope that the day when a suitable building can be erected will not be too far distant.

I should like now to say a word as to the character of the library. Hon. members who have read the recommendations of the advisory committee which was tabled on March 3 last, and which the government has accepted in principle, will know that the proposed national library promises to be somewhat different in character from the national libraries in many other countries.

It is axiomatic that no modern government can function without books, and the government of Canada is no exception. Since no national library has been in existence, essential book needs have had to be met from other sources. The library of parliament has done its best to fill partially that gap, and the public archives have for many years been performing services normally associated with a national library rather than with archives. Many of the department libraries came into existence originally because there was no national library to furnish the services that were necessary. It is not proposed that the new national library should absorb all these collections, but that it should complement them where needed, and by pooling their catalogues should make them into a more closely knit library system so that what is already in existence elsewhere will become available to those who might require the information from those books through the national library.

In making its plans for the national library the government has assumed that there will be the closest possible co-operation between the new library, the library of parliament, the libraries of government departments and agencies, and also between the national library and many of the public libraries throughout the country. We want to reduce to a minimum unnecessary duplication. For example, there is no thought of building up new scientific collections that would rival or duplicate those already in the library of the national research council. Those books will be included, however, in the general catalogue, and on proper occasions they will be made available through the services of the national library to students who may require to consult them.

One basic objective of any national library, I think, is to become the most comprehensive library in the world on its own country. It is proposed that Canada's national library should try to reach that objective, but that in working towards that end it should co-operate with other government libraries, and with a large number of other institutions throughout Canada. The bill to be introduced, if and when the resolution is adopted, will contain a deposit law. The Massey report recommends that the national library should secure as complete a collection as possible of books published in Canada, books published by Canadians and of books on Canadian themes, all to the end that it might be the most comprehensive collection of books in the world relating to Canada.

In other countries corresponding publications are secured mostly under the provisions of their respective copyright or deposit laws which require the publishers to send copies of new books, pamphlets or maps and so forth to the national library. The proposed bill would establish a deposit system in Canada, but perhaps not as stringent and rigorous as the systems that exist elsewhere, at least not initially.

This deposit requirement is not entirely new. There is already a partial requirement for deposit under section 11 of the Copyright Act amendment of 1931, which directs that two copies of every work copyrighted in Canada should be sent to the library of parliament. In drafting this bill, care has been taken to avoid any clash between the copyright provision and the intended provision with respect to deposit under the new act. A deposit law supplementary to the copyright law is, I think, very desirable, because a considerable number of publications which the national library will wish to secure and preserve are not formally protected under the copyright act. Some of them could not be copyrighted as they consist mainly of material already in the public domain.

With respect to imported books, the government is well aware of the large proportion of books, listed on the catalogues of Canadian publishing firms, which are printed in other countries and imported into Canada. Most of these originate in Great Britain, in France and in the United States. Those publications number many thousands each year, and although they are published in Canada, in the sense that they are released here for public distribution or sale, the firms handling them are actually acting more in the capacity of agents than publishers. It seems to me it would be unfair to claim two free copies of all these thousands of titles, and it is proposed that regulations will be made under the new legislation which will provide suitable exemptions and will, in fact, confine the deposit requirements to books wholly or partially produced in Canada, books published by Canadian authors and books the contents of which relate in some significant way to Canadian affairs.

To cite a theoretical example, a history of Canada published in Great Britain and imported through an agency in Canada for distribution and sale would have to be sent to the national library. A history of China, however, similarly published outside of Canada and of which some copies might be imported for distribution, would not be required to be deposited in the national library.

It may be well to point out at once that the deposit provision in the proposed bill is much less onerous than similar provisions existing in many other countries. In France, where the law of deposit has been in effect for more than four hundred years, both the printer and the publisher must deposit copies and an additional copy must be sent in every time the book is reprinted, even though the reprint may not contain any new material. In Great Britain, where deposit is made under a copyright law, as many as six copies may be requested. The Oxford university library, the Cambridge university library, the national library of Scotland and other institutions have, by law, the right to claim copies under the British Copyright Act.

By contrast, the bill we propose to introduce would require a maximum of two copies, and if the work exceeds a certain retail value this requirement is reduced to one copy. The retail value suggested is $25. If the retail value of a book is more than $25, the requirement provided by the bill would be that the deposit of one copy would be sufficient.

I should like to say a word about the union catalogue. I believe that one of the most important duties of the proposed national library will be the preparation of a union catalogue. As this name implies, it is a catalogue in which the individual catalogues of many libraries will be combined in a single alphabetical system. Work on such a program has been in progress in Ottawa for the last two years.

The catalogues of most of the libraries in Ottawa are now included and those of half a dozen important collections elsewhere have been either completely secured or partially secured. The ultimate aim is to build up a complete key to the contents of every important collection of books in Canada. With such a catalogue in its possession the national library will be able to tell anyone in the matter of a few minutes whether a copy of any particular book is to be found in Canada, and if one exists, the name of the library in which it is located. It is hoped that there will be organized a service whereby the national library will be able to have that book sent here so that it may be available to the inquirer.

The national library would have the task of preparing and maintaining a national bibliography. By that, as hon. members know, is meant a complete and systematic listing of all new publications issued in Canada, written by Canadians or relating in any important way to this country. Work on this project has been in progress since the beginning of 1951, and the bibliography is already being published monthly under the title of Canadiana. I should like to table a complete set of the monthly bulletins that have been issued so that hon. members may see that already a great deal of valuable work of lasting benefit to the Canadian public has been accomplished by this germ of our national library, with the modest funds that have so far been voted by parliament to that end.

The bill proposes to continue in a formal way the somewhat informal national library advisory committee which has been in existence since 1948-49. This committee has over the last three or four years been meeting twice a year, and it is not anticipated that the new advisory council would need to meet more frequently than a couple of times a year. It is proposed that it be made up of twelve members, that there be at least one member for each of the ten Canadian provinces, and two others selected at large.

As to the operating policy, it may be well to note that ultimately the new national library is intended to serve both the government and the public. The value to the government is obvious enough. But the library is also planned to serve any citizen of Canada who has need of the information available in the national library itself, or in one of the libraries throughout Canada represented in the union catalogue.

Service to the public will normally be given through another library. If, for example, a person residing in Vancouver has need for certain books that are in the library in Ottawa, he will apply to the Vancouver public library or to the library of the university of British Columbia, and the librarian there would borrow the books from the national library here, instead of the national library here sending them direct to the inquirer. By arranging the loan in this way, the responsibility for borrowing the material will be taken by an institution which knows the person concerned and which will be in a position to supervise his use of the book and to make reasonably sure that no abuses will be committed in that way. I think there is already a mutual arrangement between the university of British Columbia and two or three United States universities whereby their joint library treasures are available to the public of the various communities they serve, and that it is done in that way.

The Canadian Library Association has emphasized many times the importance of having adequate photo-duplicating equipment available in a national library. The reason they give is that many requests will be received for rare or valuable books, or for material which it would not be prudent to allow out of the premises. Photographic copies of these, which can be made very cheaply, would be furnished instead of the books themselves. Such a procedure would safeguard our rare books and yet make their contents available to those who have a real interest in securing such information. I understand that that is also something which has had the benefit of practical experience in other institutions where union catalogues are used.

With respect to a building, the proposed legislation has been modelled in large part on the legislation respecting the national gallery which was enacted at the last session of parliament. The gallery, of course, is a corporation having its own board of trustees whilst, under the proposal to be submitted following the adoption of this resolution, the library will be under the direct responsibility of a minister of the crown, the national librarian and the assistant national librarian, but its operations will be largely parallel to those of the national gallery. This will also probably be true in the case of building policy.

The government last year authorized the board of trustees of the national gallery to take appropriate steps looking to the erection of an appropriate building to house the national gallery. Hon. members know that a competition for the selection of an architect has been established by the board of governors of the national gallery. The site for the national gallery has been selected. The site that has been selected is Cartier square where are to be found the temporary buildings now housing much of the Department of National Defence. This competition gives every promise of having excited the interest of the best architectural talent in Canada. The competition is to run until the autumn. It is a competition not necessarily to select the plans for the gallery but to select the architect who will draw the plans; and it is expected that the sketches that will be submitted in this preliminary competition will reveal to the board examining the sketches the qualities of the architect who will prepare them, and his competence or otherwise to carry out the undertaking of providing a suitable national gallery.

There has been no definite selection of a site for the library, but the report suggests that an appropriate site might be on the banks of the Ottawa river at the end of Bank street where a building could be erected with several storeys below the street level, which building would provide valuable and reasonably safe stack space and would be connected with the library of parliament by an underground passage that would provide a physical connection between the two places where the books were being kept. That question has not yet been definitely decided, but it is hoped that it will be possible at an early date to select at least tentatively an appropriate site for a building.

The present thought is that it would be desirable to have a competition open to all

Canadian architects to submit sketches from which selection of an architect to prepare the plans could be made, and that the plans could be got ready, so that, as soon as circumstances warranted the expenditure and the use of the manpower and material for the erection of the appropriate building, it could be proceeded with and the hazards to which this valuable collection housed in the parliamentary library are subject could be substantially diminished. There is great congestion in the parliamentary library. It contains many many books that could not be replaced at any cost, and I think it is desirable to look upon the provision of proper safekeeping for these treasures as a matter worthy of pretty high priority.

With respect to administration, the bibliographic centre and such national library activities as are being carried on at the present time are conducted under the direction of the dominion archivist. If this proposal meets with the approval of parliament, it is the intention to make the dominion archivist the national librarian, and to continue the policy of developing the national library under his supervision.

The Massey commission expressed the opinion that ultimately the national library and the public archives should develop separately under independent heads. That may be desirable, but the commission went on to say, however, that it felt "it would be unsuitable at this time to break the personal union between the (bibliographic) centre and the archives." And I think some practical experience of joint administration of these two services would appear to be desirable before there is any policy determined with finality with respect to separating them.

There are a good many points in favour of the closest possible relationship between the national library and the public archives, perhaps particularly in view of the special conditions under which we find ourselves here in Canada, and of the fact that public archives are the material upon which many of the books that will come in future into the national library will be based.

In order that the national library may adequately serve the needs of those who habitually work in both official languages, it is proposed to make the first assistant national librarian at this time French-speaking because the librarian will be English-speaking. It is hoped that that kind of precedent would be considered seriously with respect to future appointments. I think it might very well be, as provided in the rules of this house, that the principal assistant to the librarian be perfectly familiar with the tongue which is not the mother tongue of the librarian.

There is also a provision in the estimates for a small amount for continuing this bibliographic centre's work. It is probable that if the house looks favourably upon this proposal there will have to be another modest provision made in the supplementary estimates. It would be a provision that would be substantially below $100,000 this year; but the amount that is already provided in the estimates would not appear to be sufficient to do what the dominion archivist feels could be accomplished to good purposes at the present time.

I hope that the reaction of all hon. members to this proposal will be much like the reaction of the press since the introduction of the resolution has been announced in the press, and that everyone would feel that this is a matter of national consequence that should be proceeded with with reasonable dispatch and should have among the civilian activities of the Canadian people a high priority.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, I am sure that all hon. members will welcome the first step in what would appear to be the fulfilment of a dream that has engaged the imagination and the hopes of Canadians for a very long time.

Ever since this country became one nation at confederation there have been repeated suggestions that a national library would be in keeping with the status and dignity of the nation which had been brought together in that way. One of the things which undoubtedly present a special problem is that the very size of the country itself makes it difficult to determine exactly how far a national library will go in providing books which will be available for all Canadians in every part of Canada.

It is inevitable that a very large proportion of the people of Canada will not find it possible to avail themselves of whatever facilities are provided in the city of Ottawa. For that reason it would seem of very great importance that from the very beginning the thought should always be in the minds of those who are planning the procedure and acquiring the books that whatever is done should be done in a way that will, on the one hand, establish a library truly national in its structure and in the contents of that library itself, and at the same time make it something that as far as possible is available to all Canadians who seek the opportunity to gain knowledge from the books that are stored here and made available under some procedure such as that outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

If anyone examines the things that have been said about libraries he will find that there are two very widely separated points of view. To the cynic, a library is merely a cemetery of books. To the person who wishes to dominate the minds of the people, a library is a danger. We have seen in recent years that those who sought to set up dictatorships in different countries in Europe and elsewhere burned some of the great library collections so that those thoughts which might in themselves give heart and vigour to the people who loved freedom would disappear from the country. That has gone on for many centuries, and we read of the similar destruction of libraries even as long as 2,000 years ago. It does seem, therefore, that what is essential in planning this library is that at the outset there be a very clear understanding of the real function of this library in the national life of Canada, and the manner in which it will be made available to the people generally.

A library can either be a mere cemetery of books or it can be a repository of the living thought of the ages depending upon the procedure that is followed in establishing a direct contact between that library and the people themselves. The great task of the highly skilled librarian is to develop an interest in the books of the library, to keep before the people the availability of those books and to encourage their use for whatever purposes they may be sought.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the cataloguing of the books and the setting up of appropriate plans which will lay the foundation for the future acquisition of books throughout the years ahead. A clear determination now of what is to be placed in the national library, and what is to be acquired for that library, as distinguished from the many great public libraries across the country is essential at this time.

I was very interested in the Prime Minister's statement that, following the recommendations of the advisory committee, it was hoped that a site such as that which could be found at the end of Bank street, on the banks of the Ottawa river, might be chosen; because it would then be possible to connect that library by a passage to the library of parliament. In those words the Prime Minister answered a question I had in my own mind. I was interested to know what the future of the library of parliament was to be, and I take the statement he has made as an indication that the library of parliament is to be continued, and that its work will be closely associated with that of the national library. I believe members of parliament will welcome that information, because it would be a great inconvenience to them if those books which are normally required by members were not readily available in this building.

On the other hand I am sure there are in the parliamentary library at this time precious volumes it would be wise to move to the new national library building, for purpose of safekeeping. One of the points raised in the report of the Massey commission is that there are in the parliamentary library extremely valuable volumes which are not adequately protected against the danger of fire.

Also at this time I should like to pay my own tribute, one in which I feel sure every member of parliament will join, to the librarians and the staff of the parliamentary library. I feel sure that every member of the House of Commons has shared my experience in this respect. It would be impossible anywhere to find greater courtesy, greater industry and a greater desire to be of service to the members when they seek information which can be obtained in that library. I have had some experience with libraries in different places, and I must say that I have been deeply impressed with the way in which the librarians, and those associated with them here, are able to find quotations and references in a very short space of time, when requisitions are made to them with a sufficient indication of what is really sought to make it possible for them to use their excellent indexing system. I mention this not only to pay a well-deserved tribute to these splendid public servants, but also simply to emphasize the fact that in building up a national library here we have the advantage of long years of experience and a skilled staff close at hand who can be of immense help in considering the plans that should be made in connection with the early purchases for the new library, and the plans for acquisitions to be made in future years.

I was happy to hear what the Prime Minister said with regard to the preparation of a union catalogue. In this vast country—and sometimes I think we are inclined to forget how vast it is—there is great difficulty in integrating activities of a similar nature. Nevertheless it is doubtful if anything could be more helpful to Canadian students of all ages than a union catalogue which will make it possible for them to learn where they can obtain information on any subject in which they may be interested.

The Prime Minister touched upon an important point when he referred to the close association of the archives with a national library. The archives will provide a considerable amount of material which can be used by those Canadians who will write our own history and those works of fiction which, in themselves, in due course become a part of our history.

There are many exciting examples of what our archives have already meant to us. For that reason I should like to recall what seems to me to be one of the most romantic examples of the value of public archives well indexed under various subheadings, so that people may know where to seek certain information. I mention this only in the hope that this particular part of our recent history in Canada may stand as a challenge to the imagination of Canadian youth, when they are told that they will have available to them not only the archives but a national library of this kind.

Our thoughts have been directed in recent years, and in most dramatic circumstances, to the importance of uranium and the various products of pitchblende. For that reason it is of more than passing interest to Canadians to recall how the great radium mine on Great Bear lake came to be discovered. Only a few days ago in the house, in an entirely different type of discussion, reference was made to the fact that the Eldorado mine was discovered by those who had been associated with a gold mine that had ceased to operate profitably, with the result that they had begun to seek a new mining property. It is not very often that a mining company finding itself near the end of its resources in one area goes out and succeeds in finding another mine. These men were looking for another gold mine. They found something that turned out to be infinitely more important, but the way in which they came to find it has a direct bearing on the importance of archives and the indexing not only of the contents of the archives but of the national library which is to be associated with it.

When Gilbert La Bine decided to seek a new mine he recalled having heard something about the discoveries of Samuel Hearne in the Arctic when he was travelling through that region in the 1760's. He recalled some reference to mineral deposits in that northern region. He came here and in the archives at Ottawa he found a reference to evidence of a shining metal that Hearne had seen on a promontory which might well be on the shores of Great Bear lake. It was for that reason that he engaged the services of one of the great pioneer bush pilots to fly him to the shores of Great Bear lake. There he sought the mineral deposits of which Hearne had written so many years before.

Of course there was no map at the time Hearne was there which even gave an indication of that enormous lake in the distant northland which is larger than lake Ontario or lake Erie. They were leaving the area in which they had sought to find a mine and were flying south at a time when the sun was fairly low. They saw the gossan which indicated mineral deposits. It was approaching the time of the freeze-up. They flew farther south and then arranged for dog teams. They went back, and to make an exciting story of Canadian adventure short they found what would appear to be the very mineral outcroppings that Hearne had seen so long ago. That discovery became one of the vital factors in Canada's important part in the recent struggle for freedom.

I mention that incident because it is quite possible that hidden in the archives at this very time there may be other equally interesting references from the past which may well be the guiding star for some Canadian of imagination and enterprise at some time in the future. But whether it be in the field of material achievement as in the case of the discovery of the Eldorado mine or whether it be in the achievements of the mind which in the years ahead will be still more important, the archives and the library will lay the foundation for Canadian development and for the improvement of the life of the country in its most important aspects.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the possibility of employing photography to make copies of important documents. I would hope that those documents which are distinctly a part of the early history of Canada would be photographed and made available in all the main libraries throughout Canada. It can be done at moderate expense and in a way that will make all the information available while leaving the original documents safely in Ottawa under the type of protection which should be afforded to the basic history of Canada.

In this respect may I recall that our history has been closely associated with the building up of collections of books. So far as I can ascertain, the first collection of books that might be regarded as a real library was to be found in the early settlement of Port Royal about 1606. It was a private collection which became a source of great satisfaction to the people of the community in those early days. I understand that the first lending library of which there is a record was one established in Quebec by the Jesuit fathers who created a library of some 2,000 volumes. The very existence of these libraries indicates the extent to which those who built the country paid attention to the importance of books and literature in the building of the culture and fabric of the nation.

In more recent years what are described as free libraries have become commonplace throughout the whole of Canada. At this time there are nearly 700 public libraries throughout Canada circulating close to 25 million volumes of books a year without charge. These are circulated to approximately 1,200,000 registered borrowers. One of the things I should like to emphasize in this connection is how much we are all indebted to the unselfish service of librarians throughout Canada who too often have not received the remuneration that their great responsibilities really merit. I sometimes think that perhaps we have not emphasized sufficiently the great extent to which the librarians in each community are responsible for the quality of the reading of the people of the community. They are not only the individuals who hand out books that are requested but they are the individuals whose advice is sought respecting the type of books that should be read so far as particular subjects are concerned. Their advice is sought frequently in regard to the general type of reading that should be undertaken, and particularly in the case of our children we are greatly indebted to the unselfish service of these librarians across Canada who without very much regard to the amount of money they receive have performed a great service in advancing the culture of this country.

Mr. Speaker, up to this time Canada has been one of the few countries of our stature, wealth and general development which have not been able to claim a national library. Perhaps in times gone by it was thought that there were other things that called for more immediate attention, but after all a library does provide the bread and butter for the mind. In the long history of human conflict the inspired thoughts to be found in the books which record the history of nations have provided the inspiration for the preservation of the things that we thought were worth while. Without in any way seeking to place more importance on one man than upon any other, I should like before closing my remarks to suggest that perhaps there is no case on record where a nation owed so much to libraries as did Great Britain in the days of the war just past.

In this respect I apply my remarks particularly to one man. Perhaps it may be some encouragement to many students today, particularly students who at this time are looking forward to impending examinations without too much confidence, to learn that the greatest writer of this day in the English tongue, perhaps the greatest writer of English apart from Shakespeare, was a most uncertain and unsatisfactory student at school. It is a matter of record that Winston Churchill developed his facility in English and his capacity for writing from a collection of books which had been sent to him in India from a library at a time when he wanted to fill in the spare moments he had out there.

In his reading, we are told, particularly of history, he laid the foundation for a grasp of history that qualified him, not only as the greatest historian of our day but as a man whose every act has been inspired by the confidence that has come from the record of history throughout the years. I like to think that at the time when all the arithmetic of war made it clear that there was no reason for Great Britain to survive in the spring of 1940 it was knowledge gained from the pages of history, which was in Churchill's mind, that right has given might in the years that have passed, that gave him the fortitude and courage and spirit to give leadership to the whole free world in those desperate days.

The words that he spoke to the British people and to the people of the whole world over the radio at that time came from the pages of history. Even those classic words "blood, sweat and tears" came from an ancient volume which he had read long years before. The thoughts of those who built this nation are thoughts that should be carried into the mind of every Canadian. The high hopes, the great aspirations and the clear moral purpose that inspired our forefathers in the building of this country can best be passed on to the youth of Canada and to the coming generations by making available to them in this way the best that is past and the succeeding thoughts of the present.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the house join in expressing appreciation of the moving of a resolution which foreshadows the establishment in Canada of a national library. I think it has long been a reflection on our national life that Canada was one of the few important nations in the world without a national library. The Massey report made a recommendation which is being carried out, at least in part, today. It was:

> That a national library be established without delay; that a librarian be appointed as soon as may be expedient; that the national library advisory committee be reconstituted as a board of trustees of the national library with the librarian as chairman ex officio; that the librarian be charged with the direction of the bibliographic centre which shall be responsible through the librarian to the board of trustees.

National Library

That is substantially the intent of the resolution before the house. As hon. members know, I have long been interested in the establishment of a national library. Indeed during the war, when there was some discussion of a suitable war memorial for Canada, I suggested on more than one occasion that the time had arrived when we might establish as a memorial, not a pile of stone but something that might be regarded as a cultural centre for a national library, a national gallery and a national theatre.

If I had been asked at that time to suggest a suitable site for such a memorial I would have suggested a site in the neighbourhood of the present printing bureau, after that bureau had been removed, and close to the archives. However, this afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) suggested another site near the supreme court building. I believe that suggestion is a particularly good one. As the Prime Minister pointed out, there are physical features to that site which would make it possible to house, to care for and to protect valuable books. It would also be in close proximity to the parliamentary library. I understand that in connection with the heating system there is a partly completed tunnel which would provide quick means of transporting books between the national library and the parliamentary library as such books were required.

I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the Prime Minister that there should be no thought of displacing the parliamentary library as the library of parliament. I join with other members of the house in expressing personal appreciation to the librarian and the staff of the present parliamentary library. I wonder how they can carry on with the very inadequate facilities that exist. A short time ago I read that when the library was built it was built to accommodate some 60,000 volumes. I am told that today nearly three-quarters of a million volumes are housed somehow in and under the parliamentary library. Anyone who has gone into the basement or the vaults, as they are called, under the present library, with its wooden shelves and structural inadequacies, must be impressed with the danger to the very valuable volumes that are housed beneath the floor of the present library of parliament, and indeed which occupy the shelves of the library itself. Consequently, in the interest of the preservation of the valuable volumes for future generations, it is well I believe that we are taking this initial step to establish a modern fireproof library in Canada.

I hope that, while this establishes a national library, thought is being given to the building of a national gallery more suitable than the rather dismal and dark halls in which the very valuable pictures owned by Canada are housed today, and that we may be able to round that off in the not too distant future with a national theatre where drama, opera, symphony and cultural activities of that description may be available to the Canadian people, and perhaps through the magic of television carried from that central theatre to even the remote parts of this country. A library, then, is something that the nation requires, and I am sure it will receive public support. I believe it was significant that when the Massey commission on arts, letters and sciences was hearing representations some 90 or 100 briefs were submitted by organizations pointing out the desirability of founding a national library for Canada. In that library could be gathered together the important books of the nation.

I understand that today many of the important volumes are scattered in various departments. I am told that there are something like 200,000 books and valuable pamphlets housed beneath the supreme court building. I am told that there are thousands of books scattered around the departments of government and with the national research council. Not all of those books need be included in a national library, but undoubtedly many of them are volumes that should find a suitable place in a library of this description. I hope that that library will contain all kinds of books. I am a bit alarmed when I hear about the censorship of books. I think a good case can be made out for preventing the circulation of salacious and pornographic literature, but when I look over the list of books I see, for example, books that may be instructive to us or contain warning of the dangers to our way of life which are banned from entry into Canada. If I may mention one without, I am sure, being misunderstood, there is the "Problems of Leninism", by Joseph Stalin.

Now, if we are going to fight Stalinism, if we are going to fight Leninism and communism, we have to know something about them. I am a bit leery of preventing the importation into this country of books which deny to us an understanding of the kind of thing that we may have to fight in Canada. I remember very well reading during my student days, and subsequently, Milton's great work pleading for freedom from censorship, called "Areopagitica"; that plea still lingers in my memory. I remember the remarks of Voltaire when he saw his books being burnt on the streets of Paris. He said, "They can burn my books but they cannot burn my ideas."

I say to the house that I hope in a national library there will be no limitation as to the kind of books that are included in that library, so that students may get a complete understanding of what we may have to cope with in the future and may not be blinded by some kind of censorship. If I may recount a personal experience, some few years ago—I have forgotten the year but about 1924 or 1925—I had a friend in the city of Regina who sent to a secondhand book dealer in Great Britain for a number of books. When these books arrived one was missing. Upon inquiry he was told that the book had been sent back to Ottawa to see if it was fit for importation into Canada. The book was entitled "Socialism, Critical and Constructive", by James Ramsay MacDonald, who had been a prime minister of the United Kingdom. Consequently, when we have any sort of censorship we should make sure that the matter is gone into very thoroughly and very carefully, and those who exercise the censorship should not be, for example, an overworked minister of the crown, as an answer to a question I placed on the order paper indicated yesterday, but persons who are both thoroughly competent and who can devote the necessary time to making an appraisal of the books that may be suggested for censorship.

As I said, the parliamentary library lacks a good many modern facilities today, facilities for students who want to use the library—yes, even for members of parliament. Sometimes members of parliament find it difficult when they go into the library to consult volumes to find a suitable place where they can be quiet and alone to conduct the research they desire to do. Ordinary comfort facilities for the staff are lacking in that library, and consequently we need something more modern. At the moment, we are getting copyright books in the library and that should give us a complete set of the volumes written and published in Canada for which copyright is taken. But as the Prime Minister said, there are written and published outside of Canada many books which deal with Canadian affairs. They should be assembled, cared for and catalogued.

I understand that the work of cataloguing the library has been going on for a couple of years, but it is still incomplete. Moreover, what we need is a catalogue not only of the books in our own national library and parliamentary library but a catalogue of the books scattered around the country in many other libraries. There are some wonderful volumes here and there across Canada. A year or two ago when I was in Fredericton the legislative librarian said she would like to show me one of their great treasures. I was shown one of the few large authentic copies of the Doomsday book. That is a treasure for which the province of New Brunswick cares, but which would find a place in a catalogue of valuable volumes in Canada. I also saw one of the original copies of the Audubon series of books, illustrated. I think it is regrettable that in so many of our provinces, in years gone by, we have not had a library or archives where the letters and books of some of the old-timers and settlers could have been assembled and kept for future generations.

In my own province of Saskatchewan I know that it has only been in the last few years that a competent archivist—and an exceedingly competent one, incidentally—has been appointed and when the records of that province which were lying scattered in the basement, subjected to destruction by mice, moths and other insects, have been properly assembled, sorted out and preserved for the benefit of future generations.

The archives and the library must work together. In this city I have spent days in the archives of Canada, although I have not been there lately. In it there are some wonderful volumes. We have there interesting letters, including correspondence of former prime ministers of Canada, some records of the early explorers and so on. I am happy indeed to hear the Prime Minister say that the present archivist is to be, at least temporarily, the chief librarian and that the two offices are to be combined in one exceedingly able and capable gentleman. I think that is an excellent idea.

I am also happy to support the Prime Minister in the suggestion that the assistant librarian should be one who speaks the language of the other great language group in Canada. As an English-speaking person myself, I realize that that is as it should be.

The leader of the opposition mentioned, as did the Prime Minister, the necessity of photographing documents. A great deal of microfilming has been done already in connection with the present library. With the modern microfilm and the modern process, it will not be necessary to pile up vast quantities of old newspapers. They can be microfilmed and still be available for generations yet to come.

I therefore think that this is a splendid project. I hope the government will be able to proceed with it as rapidly as possible. I hope that we may have a suitable building as soon as conditions permit. I also think that the idea of an advisory committee representative of all the provinces and the official language groups in our country is an excellent idea. I hope that that advisory committee will be chosen by the government not because somebody would like to go on it from a certain city, perhaps a friend of the government in power—not necessarily this government, but succeeding governments—placed there as a sort of recognition of political support for a party in power. I would hope rather that persons will be chosen for that advisory committee because of their knowledge of and their interest in books and libraries. I think that is quite important.

Now I have said all that I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking not only on my own behalf but on behalf of those associated with me when I say that we welcome this resolution and we hope that the idea will be brought to speedy fruition.

The leader of the opposition mentioned the great contribution that the Right Hon. Winston Churchill had made to the winning of the war because of his knowledge, and his gift in the use, of the English language. I do not think that fact can be overestimated. The more we can encourage our rising generation to understand their own language, be it French or be it English and to be able to speak their own language well, be it French or be it English, the better it will be. It would be better still, of course, for them to be able to speak both languages equally well, as does the Prime Minister, but they should be encouraged to understand at least their own mother tongue and to appreciate its beauties. French is a charming and beautiful language; English, too, is a stately and a beautiful language. Some of us look back over the years to our early training in the English tongue and realize how few were the books that we read. I often say that any gift I may possess I owe not only to my mother tongue but to my mother, at whose knee I learned the beauties of the English language through three simple books, namely the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer and the Pilgrim's Progress.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those happy occasions on which all parties in the house find themselves in agreement. I am glad that in this particular instance it was on a resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that we could find such happy agreement. We also welcome the resolution, containing as it does the program for the establishment in Canada of a national library.

We want to compliment the Prime Minister on the initial good progress that appears to have been made toward achieving the objective that is outlined in this resolution. From what he said this afternoon I think we can all feel quite happy about the progress that has been made.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

At this moment, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up any great length of time because I am afraid that it would be merely repetition. I should like to leave the matter pretty much as it is, because the speeches that have been made this afternoon have been eloquent and have fairly well covered all phases of the problem that confronts us.

The suggestion that the site for the building be down at the end of Bank street is, I think, a happy one. It seems to me quite clear that the future of the parliamentary library has been assured. For the convenience of members of parliament I think it would be a good thing to have a connecting passage between the library of parliament and the new national library when it is completed. I therefore say that the suggestion that the site be at the end of Bank street down near the Ottawa river is a happy one. I have no better suggestion to offer. I can say that.

As to the advisory board which it is proposed to set up, I should like to make this suggestion. I think Alberta has a representative on the present board; but if my information is correct, that representative is not a well-known person interested in national libraries. Also, if I am correctly advised, that person has not attended the meetings of the board. I should like to see appointed from each province someone who has indicated in the past a real and sincere interest in the development of the national library and who will make it a point to attend meetings when they are called and to contribute, out of his experience, to the achievement of the fine objective that we have set before us.

In connection with the provision of a building, it must be remembered that we are a young country; and we do not want to repeat the experience that we have had with the parliamentary library. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already pointed out, it was originally anticipated that the parliamentary library would perhaps accommodate 60,000 volumes. But today it is called upon to accommodate, to administer and to take care of something like 750,000 volumes. It seems quite clear that because we are a young country and have much time before us and great development ahead of us we ought to plan carefully so as to provide adequate space to take care of our needs for many many years to come.

I think that that is about the only suggestion I might make in connection with the provision of a building. I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that there are many services which the national library could extend to the people of Canada, and especially to the struggling community libraries all across this great country.

The idea of a union catalogue is a splendid one; in fact it is one which I am sure has within it a great many more good things and possibilities for our country that we now envision. I am very happy to learn that steps have already been taken to start the registration in such a union catalogue.

Let me just conclude by saying, Mr. Speaker, that we in this party feel that priority should be given to this great project, and that the work should go forward with that speed that is consistent with the importance of the project itself.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I cannot let this motion pass without saying a word or two on this subject, which is very dear to my heart. It is unusual to speak in an atmosphere of such accord, and I should simply like to endorse most, in fact I think nearly all, of the things which have been said by previous speakers. The only thing I might find fault with in what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said is that he said that existing conditions may cause some delay in the carrying out of the fulfilment of what has been up to the present a dream to many. I know it has been a dream of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), ever since I have known him. As a matter of fact, before I was associated with him at all I heard him make a speech on this particular subject.

I was particularly interested in the Prime Minister's statement, and it is to that that I might address my remarks. The Prime Minister said there would be, he hoped, the closest co-operation of the new library with many of the public libraries throughout the country. That is perhaps one of the most important things that he said in his very pleasant announcement.

There has been a word or two of protest on the part of some of my correspondents as to the location of the national library. Their view was that perhaps Ottawa, with the national gallery and other cultural things, might be getting more than its share. I may say that my view does not coincide with that of those correspondents, because if we are to have a truly national library, then Ottawa is the place in which it will have to be built.

When I speak of the great assistance that a national library can be to outlying centres I would like to point out that most of our library facilities are in the city. That is no doubt natural but perhaps unfortunate. Libraries and books are to me, and I think to all of us, the greatest source of adult education. May I say, without any disparagement, that we are in need of adult education. It is true, as I said in another speech the other day, that 50 per cent of the people in Canada today have a grade VIII, that is a public school, education standard, or less. For a country with our potentialities, with our present wealth and potential resources, I do not think that is a good record. In these days one needs something better than a public school education, although many of the men who served this country best did not have anything more.

There is an unfortunate feeling around, and I think particularly among high school graduates, that those who attain the standing of a university entrance, or grade XII as it was called, have more or less completed their education. I think, sir, we should agree that they have only begun their education; that they have only become equipped with the tools through which they can gain an education for themselves which after all is the best way and the only way that one can gain it in any case.

I think reading is the greatest thing, the greatest asset, the greatest instrument of that education. We have not been noted as a nation of readers. I was looking through an interesting lot of statistics, a survey of libraries, issued by the government of Canada for 1948-50, and I was startled by some of the figures that I found there. I was looking at the summarized expenditures on public libraries for 1949. On page 9 I find for example—and I do not want to enter into any particular disparagement of any particular province; I can only give the figures as they come—that on books and periodicals the expenditure in the different provinces in the year 1949 was as follows. I will give merely the round figures. In Prince Edward Island, $6,000; Nova Scotia, $5,000; New Brunswick, $6,000; I shall now give some of the higher ones: Ontario, $582,711; Manitoba, $39,000; Saskatchewan, $36,000; Alberta, $56,000; and British Columbia almost $100,000. Those figures are amazing to me. Perhaps it will come out more clearly when I give the table which is found on page 12. This is a table on service and support of city libraries by geographic areas. The table is given in expenditure per capita. I would have you note, sir, that it is not in dollars, but in cents. The expenditure per capita on libraries in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick combined is 28 cents; on public libraries, in the province of Ontario, $1.03. Then we come to the prairie provinces and we find that it averages 90 cents. As I say, I am not bringing these out for any invidious comparison as between provinces, but generally to show the condition all across the country, a condition of which I am not particularly proud.

We are on the eve of, if we are not already in, a great period of expansion, a period in which more leisure may be anticipated. It is a fact that our working hours are shorter. We have a five-day week in many places; we have a clear week end; and there is one thing we need to learn, if we need to learn anything: we need to learn how to use our leisure time properly, how to spend it. As one solution to that problem we should put books in the hands of the people. Classical and standard works should be available, not just in some places, not just in cities, but everywhere. At the moment there is a deplorable lack of facilities for reading.

At this point I would give another example and, again, I must go to one of the maritime provinces. I do not recall the name of the town—and, even if I did, perhaps I would not give it; because I have discovered in the house that one is likely to get into difficulties with members representing the places named. However, I do recall that the town in question was on the bank of a river—and I believe it was either in or not far from the constituency represented by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters).

I was there one Friday evening and on the following Saturday morning had some time to spend. With the time available, I took a walk around the town. I would have said, looking at that town, that perhaps it was one of the most prosperous in Canada. There was an excellent high school, and it occurred to me that on a Saturday morning I would meet large numbers of children returning from the public library with great bundles of books in their arms—just as I see them coming from our own public library, and its various branches, in Saskatoon.

I did not see any of that. I met an old gentleman on the street and said, "Could you direct me to the public library?" He looked at me in astonishment and said, "We have no public library here." In conversation with him I said, "What do you do when you want to read? You must find it expensive to buy all your own books at present prices." He said, "I assure you we have no reading facilities here." He did point out to me that a group of ladies—I believe it was the I.O.D.E.—had a few books in their clubroom for the use of their members, but apart from that there were no other reading facilities. I have never forgotten that little experience.

It was the experience I had in that town that prompted my search for the statistics I have just placed on record. Then, if we are to have a national library, as well as efficient branches throughout the country to co-operate with it, we must have more and better trained librarians. I do not know what the experience has been in the different provinces, but I know in my own province we grant scholarships to send young people east to learn to be librarians. But that is only a drop in the bucket.

Then, we have travelling libraries serving the scattered rural areas. In the pioneer days we found those most beneficial. The travelling library, set up by the provincial government, may establish a local branch in a store or some other place that would be handy for those people wishing to borrow books. I think it is part of the responsibility of the government to see that there is a wide dissemination of books. I believe it is the responsibility of any government to encourage the cultivation of public tastes. I have no doubt there will be disagreement with that statement. I may be told that this is a free enterprise business, that there is no demand for books, that they will not find their way to the market, and so on. With that in mind I shall be content to let the statement go as I have made it.

The people of Canada find difficulty in obtaining books. I know that, because I have lived in country places and have known a total absence of books. In some places the only reading material available is a weekly newspaper; there is not even a daily paper. Then, there may be a dozen or so books to be found in the little country school library.

In this respect there is a remarkable difference between Canada and Britain. Everywhere one goes in Britain he will find book stores. That is one of the most noticeable features. There are book stores everywhere, in every little town—book stores handling secondhand books, and those handling new books. There are available first-class cheap editions of classical and standard works, which used to sell for sixpence, but would now sell for perhaps a shilling. For the expenditure of that sum one can get good reading material.

We have now made in Canada a beginning in literature and the arts. We are the heirs of those who have gone before us, of the thousands of years in the development of civilization. For the creation of things now and in the future we are dependent upon those of the past. Even original creators must have those things available to them as a basis for their ideas. That is true of the expression of ideas by the great minds of our time and of all preceding times.

As my leader has said, I believe there should be freedom in reading. With him, I am concerned about censorship, and particularly political censorship. Were it not for the youth of the country, and those for whose choice of reading material we are responsible, I would be inclined to say that, outside the provisions of the Criminal Code, there should be no censorship at all. I realize that in this respect there is a problem, and that in some cases we are dealing with people whose judgment is immature.

Generally speaking, however, I would like to see the table set with a generous diet of all types of literary food; and I have enough confidence in the good sense of the Canadian people to believe that they will pick those things for their intellectual nourishment rather than those which would be injurious.

The mind must be free; the intellect must be free. The adult at least must have liberty of choice in his literary diet, so that he may choose those things which are good for him. No one, least of all some customs officer, should be able to prescribe the things the citizen shall or shall not read. I have said the need for books in Canada is great and that books are the greatest concern in national education. They are only the Cinderellas among its agencies. They have not the glamour of the radio or of the comic strip or of the movies, or the potentialities of television. Books must be made available; they must be on the shelves, and should be there in cheap editions. They should be in the public libraries of every town, of every hamlet and of every village across this country.

Yes, the need for libraries is great. They deserve all the support the government can give them, and the support and co-operation about which the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon which may be accorded to them by the national library. I would like a measure of federal aid to the humanities in somewhat the same proportion as it is being given to science. Education through books is the common concern of all parts of this nation; for the stature of the nation will ultimately be determined by the physical, spiritual and intellectual well-being of its citizens.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I shall have a few questions to ask but, without making a speech at this time, I shall ask them in committee.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express personally and on behalf of the government, and I think also on behalf of the people of Canada, appreciation of the attitude taken by the leaders of the different parties in the house, and those for whom they speak, in regard to this resolution which has for its purpose the establishment of a national library for the Canadian people.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. McIvor: I must admit that before I heard the statement of the Prime Minister and the discussion I was critical of the resolution for two reasons. In the first place I was critical because of the amount of money it would take from the taxpayers. However, the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other groups have not said a word about extravagance; therefore it must be all right, and that satisfies me. In the second place I thought there would be some overlapping. In Ottawa we have the parliamentary library, the public library and certain other libraries, but the Prime Minister has indicated that there is to be a national library and that there will be distributing centres—if I am wrong I should like to be corrected—in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Fort William, let us say. Will these books be made available free of postage to those who want to become acquainted with Canadian affairs? I do think that the national library will provide an opportunity to sell Canada to Canadian citizens, and I think that is one of the glaring needs today. Our citizens want to know about the greatness of our land. High school teachers and university professors will welcome this library.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not able to give the hon. member the assurance that no postage stamps will be required on correspondence with the national librarian, but I am sure experience will show what is the best manner in the interests of the greatest number to make the national library of service to the development of our pride in Canadian citizenship, and that whatever experience shows to be desirable will be considered at the appropriate time in order to make the library fulfil the purpose for which it is intended.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: There are a few questions I should like to ask the Prime Minister. They are based on complete support of the proposal for a national library, support which has been expressed already by all those who have spoken on the resolution. First of all I should like to ask a question or two relating to the matter of the building itself. I listened with interest to what the Prime Minister had to say, which was of course based very largely on what is set out in the Massey report and in the progress report of the national library advisory committee. We are all interested in the suggested site for the building, and it does seem to have a number of points in its favour. In fact the national library advisory committee in discussing the matter says that it has come across only one objection to the proposal, namely that it would do away with a certain amount of parking space available there at the present time, but the committee immediately points out that even that problem could be solved in a way that the committee suggests.

We are all conscious of the problem that arises in connection with any building project at the present time because of the shortage of steel and other building materials. But I should like to emphasize the fact that the national library advisory committee in its progress report and recommendations made in November, 1951, did pronounce rather strongly on this matter. I point out that this report was made after the Massey report, and it was made in the light of present conditions. Recommendation No. 3 reads:

> In order that the national library proper may be able to function effectively at the earliest possible moment, three steps should be taken without delay:
> A site for the national library building should be chosen, and the committee recommends strongly that the building be placed on the bank of the Ottawa river, immediately to the west of parliament hill.
> An architect should be appointed to design the building.
> Construction of the library, or of a first unit, should be begun as soon as is consistent with the needs of the defence program.

The question I should like to put to the Prime Minister is whether the legislation forecast by this resolution provides authority to go ahead with the selection of the site, the appointment of an architect and perchance the construction of the building itself. Would further legislation be required for these steps or can these steps be taken under the legislation now proposed?

Mr. St. Laurent: The legislation now proposed would give authority to go ahead when parliament will have appropriated funds. The only further requirement would be a vote by parliament of the funds required to carry out projects for which there would be authority to make proposals to parliament in the present legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I take it the statement of the Prime Minister that the government accepts the progress report and recommendations of the national library advisory committee means that the government is in sympathy with the views expressed as to the desirability of proceeding with the building as soon as possible.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is quite true. I thought I had emphasized that in expressing my concern, which I am sure is that of all those who know the facts, about the safety of the valuable records that we already have. I think it would be very desirable just as soon as it can be arranged to have safer storage quarters for those things that could not be replaced if we were so unfortunate as to lose them.

Mr. Knowles: My next question relates to something the Prime Minister spoke about earlier. He referred to recommendations both in the Massey report and in the national library advisory committee's report that the library should provide certain services such as microfilming, duplicating books where necessary, getting copies of them in from other parts of the country and so on. What I should like to know is whether this legislation will cover all these various services. My reason for raising the question is because of the wording of the resolution which says in part that there is to be "a special account to which shall be credited any money appropriated by parliament for the purpose of acquiring books." I should like to know whether that fund can be used for these other purposes and services to which the Prime Minister referred, or is it contemplated that they will be taken care of in some other way?

Mr. St. Laurent: Of course there is nothing very definite about it, but it is contemplated at the present time that there might be votes by parliament for the acquisition of books and that those votes should not lapse at the end of the fiscal year but should be like the votes that are made for the acquisition of pictures by the national gallery. If a vote is made for the national gallery for the purpose of acquiring pictures or objects of art it does not lapse. It is available until it has been expended, but the ordinary normal administration expenses are provided for each year by a special vote.

Mr. Knowles: My next question relates to the recommendation of the Massey commission that the present national library advisory committee should be reconstituted as a board of trustees. I note that the resolution indicates, and the Prime Minister did likewise when he spoke, that rather than a board of trustees, and rather than an advisory committee, we are to have an advisory council. I realize that the Prime Minister did comment on this. For example, he referred to the situation with respect to the national gallery as compared to the national library. Would he comment further on why the government decided to have an advisory council rather than a board of trustees as recommended by the Massey commission?

Mr. St. Laurent: This is intended to take care of the experimental stage. The Massey commission recommended that ultimately there be two separate organizations for the national library and the archives, but that provisionally it might be better to have the two administrations under the same head. The government accepts that recommendation. The archives, the library of parliament, the library of the national research council and those of various departments will be called upon during the organizational stage to contribute to the establishment of the national library. It was felt that during that period it would be more desirable to have it part of the civil service of the Canadian government rather than to have a board of trustees for the national library at a time when a large portion of the organizational work would be done through agencies of the civil service which exist already.

It may be that when the set-up has been completed it will be found desirable to have it under a board of trustees, but it was felt that for the organizational period it would be better to keep it part of the ordinary civil service under the direction of the gentleman who is now the archivist and who is most competent as such. We think he would be most competent too to direct the organizational work of the national library.

Mr. Knowles: Is it the intention to appoint as members of this advisory council the same persons who are now members of the national library advisory committee?

Mr. St. Laurent: No consideration has been given to the personnel of the advisory council beyond the fact that it was felt that the two librarians of parliament should be members of that advisory council.

Mr. Knowles: I hope it will not hurt her chances if I recommend that you keep the person who has represented Manitoba. Miss Elizabeth Dafoe is a most competent person in this field.

What steps are being taken to carry out the recommendations of the Massey commission with respect to rearranging things in our own library of parliament? I have in mind the specific recommendation that the books and works there might be divided into two groups. There is one group of books and works that are referred to more regularly and then there is a large group of books and material which are not looked at very often but which are kept there because of their value and for safekeeping. I realize that when the whole program is carried out eventually that problem can be dealt with, but I was wondering if there is any plan to deal with it in the immediate future so that even now the library of parliament may work along the lines suggested by the Massey report?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, the only planning that has been done at the present time has been to have this union catalogue completed at the earliest possible moment. That will be most helpful in determining the place where books belonging to the Canadian people through the Canadian government should be placed. When there has been a cataloguing of those books and sufficient stack space has been provided it will be a matter for the librarian and the advisory council to determine where it will be most convenient to have these books kept.

There is no doubt that there are too many books in the library of parliament for convenient access and the proper carrying out of the work of the librarians and their assistants. At least two-thirds of those books should be kept elsewhere. A selection will have to be made. That selection will be made in the knowledge revealed by this cataloguing of all books belonging to the people and now distributed throughout the several government offices.

Mr. Graydon: The Prime Minister may have dealt with the matter I have in mind during the short time I was out of the chamber when he was speaking, but I should like to ask what provision is being made for the safekeeping and preservation of information in the way of recordings both on records and film. In recent times this information has assumed a significance that never was thought of a few years ago. Many of these sound films and recordings will have a historical value in the years to come and they will have to be stored somewhere. Perhaps as years go by there will be an even greater volume of this type of information which will form part of our history of today in the days of tomorrow.

Over the week end I listened to a recording of the life of the present Queen Elizabeth which in my opinion was one of the finest of its kind, both from a historical standpoint and from the point of view of current history. I am wondering if attention has been drawn to the importance of the matters I have mentioned and what is proposed to be done about it.

Mr. St. Laurent: Up to the present time all sound recordings have been kept by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They have at the originating studios a large number of recordings. I have not looked at them recently, but I know they have a system of cataloguing because when I have applied for certain recordings it never took them very long to tell me where they were. With regard to sound films, the film board has a catalogue of everything that it is keeping as part of its accumulation of treasures. It may well be that the time will come when certain of these things will not be looked upon as current, and will be housed merely for safekeeping in some kind of structure that will protect them against destruction from one cause or another.

I know that not very many months ago, in connection with the film board, we were very much concerned over the danger of the destruction of some films and the danger of fires or explosions resulting from the accumulation of these films at the film board studios in Ottawa. Premises were secured in a remote area where provision was made for the proper storage of the films, to protect them and to avoid having them be a source of danger to their surroundings. No doubt that is a matter which will have to be dealt with some day, because we cannot go on accumulating films in the operating studios which are not apt to be referred to at all frequently. In this legislation no provision is being made for anything but writings and books and the like. The other matter will no doubt press forward for consideration as time goes on. We have had to provide storage facilities for films because there is a danger of their being destroyed and they are, themselves, dangerous after a certain period unless they are properly cared for.

Mr. Graydon: In connection with the national library when it is finally established and in operation, will it be working in conjunction or in collaboration with any of the other libraries across Canada? If so, what will be the degree of co-operation that may be expected between the central library and other libraries?

Mr. St. Laurent: Their relations will be on a contractual basis, and a contract requires at least two parties to make it. Their relations will be the result of a contractual arrangement between them, and the only thing I had in mind was the illustration I gave about the exchange system that has been developed between the university of British Columbia and three or four universities in the United States. They have a union catalogue, and if someone in Vancouver wants something that is not available in the library of that university but is available in one of the associated libraries, the librarian of the university communicates with the library where the book is to be found. It is sent to Vancouver on the responsibility of the university of British Columbia, and there the librarian makes it available in the manner he feels fitting to the person who wants to consult it. In some cases that person is not allowed to remove the book from the reading rooms of the library, and in another case it can be removed as if it were a book belonging to the library of the university.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

There is also frequent recourse to this procedure: instead of sending the book a microfilm is made of the pages or material that is required and the microfilm is sent. The intention is to have this developed by expert technicians, making use of the experience of others, to establish and operate a system that will make the organization as beneficial to as many as possible.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the Prime Minister indicate in a very general way at this stage of the resolution just what this is going to cost us? Would he indicate how much the building is going to cost and how much the general administration is going to cost?

Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot indicate how much the building is going to cost because building costs are not very stable at the present time; and I cannot indicate when the building is going to be started, nor even what its dimensions are apt to be. The pattern is very apt to be the same as has been followed by the national gallery. If the hon. gentleman will get a copy of this booklet which is available, "The National Gallery of Canada Competition", he will see how the board of governors of the national gallery is proceeding with that competition to choose an architect, and what is apt to follow the selection of the architect.

With respect to the increase in expenditures over what is provided for in the estimates which are before the house, the estimate for the bibliographical service now is $48,109, and that is to carry on the same work as has been going on for the last two years. The actual expenditure for 1950-51 was $30,339; in 1951-52, it was $37,151. Dr. Lamb estimates that the additional work for a full year might amount to something of the order of $60,000, making about $108,000 in all. That would be the expenditure that would be incurred for the organizational work until we get around to the point of either purchasing new books or putting up a new building; that would be for the completion of the work required to publish this union catalogue, which it is hoped to complete within five years; to add to this "Canadiana" which is now being published monthly, other departments making it a full fledged national bibliography, and to organize the first unit of the cataloguing department of the national library proper in order that work may start on the task of cataloguing the thousands of books now under the supreme court building and elsewhere. The additional expense that is apt to be required for the current fiscal year might be of the order of $50,000 or $60,000.

Mr. Thatcher: Very respectfully, I wonder if no estimate has been made whatever of what this project is going to cost the taxpayers; that is what I should like to get at.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, Mr. Chairman, no estimate has been made of what this project will cost the taxpayer. It is felt that it will not cost the taxpayer more than its intrinsic, monetary value, and that its developmental value for the Canadian people will be beyond its intrinsic monetary value or cost.

Mr. Thatcher: I agree that probably it will. But it seems strange that the government of Canada should come before parliament asking for a project and not give us some idea of what the cost is going to be. I should like to be respectful but may I at the same time ask this question: Is this going to be another project—like, for instance, the Prime Minister's house—where we start out, keep adding and adding, and do not know where we are going? I think an estimate should be made. I do not see why it should be difficult for it to be made.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, when there is the prospect of going ahead with the work an estimate will be prepared and there will be a request to parliament to vote the money. If the hon. member is here at that time, he can criticize it and vote against it if he thinks it is extravagant.

Mr. Graydon: As a matter of information, may I ask the Prime Minister how many books there are now in the present library of parliament? Perhaps the Prime Minister did not come prepared to give that information; but if he has it, we should like it to be given.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should not like to be positive about that figure. At the present time about 2 million books are listed in what has been done so far on the union catalogue, most of those books being in libraries in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. I do not know how many belong to the Canadian people and how many belong to the other libraries of the number that are comprised in this figure of 2 million that have already been catalogued.

Mr. Graydon: If the Prime Minister can get the information, perhaps he might give it to the committee some time. It is a matter of some interest. Those who go through the library from time to time ask how big the library is and how many books are in it. This information would, I think, satisfy the curiosity of the members of the house. There is a wide area covered by the books that are in the library. As the Prime Minister knows, they go all the way from children's books to books on Einstein's theory of relativity. That illustration shows the extent of the fields they cover. I had occasion to find that fact out for myself through a rather interesting experience some years ago when one of the junior members of our family was down here and found herself in the library taking out a book which satisfied her extent of learning. Some six months later I was amazed to be billed for the book. The communication I received stated that Mr. Graydon had taken out a volume entitled "The Bobbsey Twins in Toyland" and that I ought to return it at once. I therefore have occasion to speak with some measure of personal experience with regard to the capacity of the library to satisfy readers of all ages.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) mentioned about three-quarters of a million books. I think that figure is somewhat exaggerated. The figure I get from Dr. Lamb is that there are about 550,000 books in the library of parliament. The other information I had was that the cataloguing that has been done thus far comprises something over 2 million books in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, which it is hoped by this system to make available. There may be quite a lot of duplication in the 2 million volumes that have been catalogued but the effort will be to avoid unnecessary duplication. There are, of course, some books that it will be desirable to have in all these libraries; but there are others the presence of which in one library may be sufficient for the needs of those who apply to libraries elsewhere.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, a number of references have been made this afternoon to the large number of books in the parliamentary library and to the difficulty that confronts any of us who go there if we try to find certain books ourselves. Nevertheless, I think a tribute should be paid to the staff of that library for the efficient service they give us. They seem to be able to find almost any book we can possibly ask for, and they are able to dig it out quite readily. The service is of the best, but even so, I am sure we all agree that the facilities, for their sake and ours, should be greatly improved.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Peel and the Prime Minister were discussing the question of films and recordings of one kind or another. I noted that the Prime Minister's reply was to the effect that at the moment it is not contemplated that the national library collection should go beyond books and similar items. I should like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that this question was discussed in the Massey report. On pages 104 and 105 there is a record of the representations made to the commission on these matters. Then there is a recommendation over on page 332 of the Massey report. In the earlier part of the volume it is pointed out that representations were made that the national library might be a depository for, amongst other things, maps, music, art, photographs, films and recordings. When one hears art mentioned, he realizes that is something that would seem to be better in the national gallery. But at page 332 of its report, the Massey commission made this recommendation:

> That the board of trustees be empowered to add to its collection Canadian music, in printed or manuscript form, and such records, films and photographs as are considered necessary supplements to the printed collection of books, pamphlets and newspapers . . .

And so on. I do not press it as an argument at this time, but I think it should be on the record at this point. I trust that the authorities will bear in mind this recommendation when the national library is being set up. Indeed, if it is recognized that one of the functions of the national library is to be that of a repository not only of material that is referred to day by day but of items that tell the story of Canada across the years, it would seem that items of this other kind should be there along with books and similar documents.

I wish to say one other word, Mr. Chairman. I make this suggestion on behalf of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who had to leave the chamber in order to attend another meeting; it is in connection with the building itself. We all understand that the motion before us does not provide for the erection of a building. In answer to a question of mine earlier, the Prime Minister made it clear that authority will be provided by this resolution to look into the question of the site, the engaging of an architect and the collecting of designs. I express the hope —and in doing so I support the recommendation of the national library advisory committee and others—that as little time as possible will be lost in proceeding with the project of the building itself. The national library will not be a reality until we have a building. Let us hope it can be erected soon.

The suggestion that my leader was anxious to make, had he been able to stay, was to the effect that consideration be given, when the plans for the building are in contemplation, to both the artistic and the functional aspects of modern architecture. There are libraries that go in for the artistic type, and there are libraries which are designed on functional lines; there are many of the latter in the world today. It would seem that there is room for both considerations. We hope attention will be given to both of those aspects when the time comes—and we hope that time is not far off—to consider the project of the building itself.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 245, respecting the establishment of a national library.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROVISION FOR REAPPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS—SALARY INCREASES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Grain Act to provide for the reappointment of grain commissioners and for increases in their salaries; to provide also for the appointment and salaries of three assistant grain commissioners instead of four; and to provide further for certain technical amendments of the statutory grades of grain.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the minister be making a statement?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The proposed amendments to the Canada Grain Act fall into four general categories.

The first relates to the salaries and appointments of the members of the board of grain commissioners, and of the assistant grain commissioners. The present salaries, fixed in 1930, are no longer adequate. The lack of any specific provision in the act for reappointment of the commissioners is being corrected. The number of assistant grain commissioners is being reduced from four to three.

Secondly, there is a revision relating to section 85 of the act which specifies the form in which certain records maintained by the elevator operators must be kept.

A further amendment is intended to give authority to the governor in council to issue regulations. In the act, as it is now, only the board of grain commissioners may make regulations or orders.

Finally, there are some amendments to the definitions of statutory grades which are set out in the schedules to the act.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer briefly to the work of the board of grain commissioners. Usually when wheat matters are being discussed in this house, attention is centred on particular marketing or delivery problems. Because the board's work is of a detailed and technical nature, it is very easy for the public to overlook the importance of it and the competence with which it is being done. We all speak frequently of the high reputation enjoyed by Canadian grains in the markets of the world, a reputation which is a direct result of the efficiency of the inspection and grading system administered by the board of grain commissioners. I am happy to have this opportunity to pay tribute to their work.

Referring again to the amendments which are being proposed, it should be noted that they include no amendment with respect to overages at country elevators. This question has been referred to frequently in this house, particularly during the last two sessions. Representations have been made to the government that overages arising as a result of country elevator operations should be confiscated and the proceeds distributed through the wheat board to producers. After careful consideration the government has come to the conclusion that such a proposal could lead only to greater difficulties. Moreover, it would not provide a satisfactory solution for the individual farmer who feels that he has special ground for complaint. All that such a farmer would receive by way of recompense would be a minute addition to his participation payment.

The record shows that, year in and year out, shortages or overages are an extremely small fraction of the total quantities of grain handled. In a return tabled in the house recently it was shown that during the crop year 1950-51 gross overages of all country elevators were only ·08 of 1 per cent of total quantities received at country elevators and net overages were only ·28 of 1 per cent. Under the exceptional conditions of the preceding five years the net overage for wheat was ·24 of 1 per cent. Some elevator houses, of course, experienced shortages.

In the light of all the information it has had available, the government has not felt justified, without having the soundness of such a course much more clearly established, in putting forward an amendment which would carry out the recommendation that country elevator overages should be confiscated and delivered to the wheat board. The matter of finding the best solution of this problem is a difficult one, and I hope it will be given thorough study in the agriculture committee.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is my intention to recommend that the bill which will be based on this resolution, after it has obtained second reading, be sent to the agriculture committee for study.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to hear the minister announce that the bill will be referred to the agriculture committee for study. I think that should reduce considerably the comment at this particular stage.

The duties of the board of grain commissioners are very important. They have a heavy task. I was also glad to hear the minister pay a tribute to the commissioners for the very onerous work they have had to perform in the past. Many people in this country do not realize what the duties of the grain commissioners really are. In fact many grain producers get the grain commissioners mixed up with the wheat board, whose functions are very different. For example, the board of grain commissioners are responsible for the grading of grain; the weighing of any grain; the deductions made from any grain for dockage or shrinkage; any shortage appearing upon the delivery of any grain into or out of any elevator; the unfair or discriminatory operation of any elevator; the deterioration of any grain during storage or shipment; the refusal or neglect of any person to comply with any provisions of the act or of any regulation made or licence issued pursuant thereto. Then they are also responsible to some extent for the transportation of grain and the allocation of cars and so forth.

When the matter is referred to the committee on agriculture for further study, I would hope that some of the officials responsible for grading, and even the chief chemist, might be available for questioning before the committee. I say that because some doubt has arisen as to whether the weather conditions of the past couple of years or anything else have been responsible for difficulties in grading. There is some doubt in the prairie provinces as to whether we have the best system of grading wheat and cereals in this country. Just across the border in the United States their wheat is graded, I think, more on the protein content than in this country. Therefore I think it will be very useful if the minister or his proper officials would arrange to have Dr. Anderson, I think it is, the chief chemist of the board of grain commissioners, and such officials as that available for questioning before the committee, because it certainly would be very instructional to the members and to the producers of wheat back home who have a very vague understanding, and in some cases a misunderstanding, of this whole undertaking.

Since the measure is to be referred to the committee I do not wish to take up any further time. I hope the minister will make these officials available to the committee so we can obtain information and try to come to an understanding as to whether we really have the best system of grading grain at the present time in Canada. It is a very vexed question, and I hope that will be done.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to say a very few words at this stage of the proceedings. I am glad the minister is having this bill referred to the agriculture committee, and also the annual report of the board of grain commissioners, where they can be discussed and we can get further evidence. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) with regard to having certain officials of the board before the committee is very good. The board of grain commissioners for years have had the reputation of being the watchdog of the farmers' interests in the grain trade. Sometimes I think, particularly during the last few years, they have lost contact with the farmers. Just whose fault that is, I do not know. I think sometimes the duties of the board should be given more publicity by the board itself, so that they may keep that direct contact with the farmer.

The result of this is that there has been considerable criticism of the board in the last two or three years with respect to the matter of overages, and certain other matters. The minister has stated that the government have considered the representations made to them with respect to overages and decided that no further amendments should be made in this matter. I suggest that before he closes his mind on the subject some of the farm representatives should be heard before the committee on agriculture. I do not think any harm could be done by that. If they have a case, well and good; if they have not, then the committee on agriculture would be able to listen to their evidence and to the evidence given by the handling firms in the trade, and come to some conclusion in the matter.

The present amendments are not major amendments. I think through the years we have to take the Canada Grain Act at certain intervals, and go over it to see that it is up to date and in line with our present methods of handling crops in western Canada. There has been a revolution in the last ten years in the marketing and handling of western grain. The combine has displaced the old threshing machine, and trucks have displaced the wagon in which grain used to be delivered. Today crops are handled much faster and under conditions quite different from what they were ten or fifteen years ago. This has created problems, and those problems can be ironed out only through consultation with farm organizations and handling firms. That is why I think we should have a thorough discussion of this whole grain handling question before the committee on agriculture.

The matter of the car order book has been to the front in western Canada. The controller has discontinued the use of that book, and he may have very good reasons for doing so. In western Canada, however, there has been criticism of this procedure, and I think we should hear representatives of farm organizations before the minister comes to any firm decision. Witnesses should be called from handling firms and farm organizations in western Canada. If out of that discussion come some further amendments which the committee believes should be included, then they should be placed in this measure before it is returned to the house.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to support the resolution, and I am also pleased that the minister proposes to refer the matter to the committee on agriculture. As was stated by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), I hope the agricultural organizations will be permitted to make their submissions to the committee. When the matter is being dealt with I hope the minister will allow a full discussion of matters connected with the Canada Grain Act, and that we will not be tied down to a discussion of only the amendments in the measure.

Mr. Howe: I do not think I could, even if I tried.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad to have that assurance. I realize the question of overages is a difficult one. On the other hand I am sorry there is no amendment proposed to deal with the matter. I have always felt that to a large extent the solution lies within the hands of the farmers. They sell their grain to the pool elevators, and the benefits of the sales of overages come back to them in participation dividends.

I realize, of course, that it is not possible for all farmers to sell grain to the pool elevators, because if all grain were held there we would find congestion. I have always sold to the pool elevators, and the question of overages has never worried me because I feel I will get back any adjustment there may be, or at least my proportion of it, when the participation dividends are paid.

As I am a member of the committee, I shall not say more at this time.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, with other members I welcome the minister's announcement that this bill will be sent to the committee on agriculture. I hope and expect that in that committee, under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we shall have a full, fair and ample discussion of all the matters referred to it. I am certain we will not be in the position we have been in that committee in the last few weeks, when discussions have been curtailed and much information withheld.

I noted that the minister said he did not think anything would be done in regard to overages or shortages. I am not an expert on the Canada Grain Act or the provisions dealing with shortages and overages; but as I read the act it would seem to me that the overages in eastern elevators shall become the property of Her Majesty. If that section is not followed, or if it is not going to be followed, then I suggest it should be removed from the act. So long as it remains in the act I suggest it should be respected in every way.

I agree that the car order book should be returned at the earliest possible date. The obtaining of the car order book by western farmers was one of their great early achievements in their endeavour to have fair trading practices in connection with the selling of their grain. I believe one of the reasons there was so much objection to the cancellation of the car order book system was the importance farmers attach to that achievement.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you would call it six o'clock.

Mr. Sinnott: It is three minutes to six; go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps with the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member would wish to continue, if he has only a few more observations to make.

Mr. Argue: No, I am not asking for unanimous consent. I am asking that you call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

HOTEL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson) moved the second reading of Bill No. 225, to incorporate the Hotel Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. Green: Would the sponsor explain the bill?

Mr. Welbourn: The purpose of the bill is the incorporation of the Hotel Mutual Insurance Company by a group of Albertans, namely Douglas Earl George, bank manager, of Edson, Alberta; and Eugene Pechet, hotel proprietor and Russell Driscoll, barrister, both of the city of Edmonton. These three men are the provisional directors. After the formation of the company a board of directors will be elected consisting of not less than nine and not more than twenty-one members. The capital stock of the proposed company will be $3 million of which $250,000 shall have been subscribed before the general meeting is called. Business may be commenced only after $500,000 of the capital stock has been subscribed and $300,000 paid thereon.

Section 6 of the bill sets out twenty-six classes of insurance for which the company may make contracts. Section 7, however, lists the types of contracts in which the insurance company is immediately interested. The company will operate under the general rules and provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932. As the name of the company would indicate, its main purpose is to insure hotels. However, it is to be both a mutual and a stockholders' company. The policyholders as well as the shareholders will participate in the profits. Persons who buy a policy of not less than $5,000 will be entitled to attend the annual meeting and vote for the election of directors.

This bill has had first and second readings in the Senate, has passed the Senate committee, has been given third reading in the Senate, and is now referred to this house. The bill has the complete approval of the superintendent of insurance. It is my hope that after second reading the bill will be referred to the House of Commons standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Blackmore: On the night of May 16 when this bill was last before the house I had considered it advisable in the interests of all concerned to say something as regards the stability of the oil industry in Alberta so that all those interested might be able to form some sort of estimate with respect to whether the industry is a fly-by-night affair. I presented some evidence to show that the Alberta oil development is not a windfall but that it has taken place as the result of very careful, wise and prudent planning based upon fundamental principles which have been laid down as a consequence of the most thoroughgoing inquiry and study, and which have been adhered to religiously. They are principles to which the Social Credit administration now in power in Alberta is committed. It committed itself definitely in a statement by Hon. N. E. Tanner, minister of lands and mines at the time in the Social Credit government, who probably more than any other one man in Canada was responsible for the drafting and laying down of the policy and the administration thereof as a result of which the spectacular development of the oil industry in Alberta has taken place.

From a statement made by Mr. Tanner to the people of Alberta in 1948 I had read the five fundamental principles upon which the policy for the development and maintenance of the Alberta oil industry was established and was to be maintained. I think it well to give a few more details along the same line I followed the other night.

Referring once more to the question whether the Alberta oil development was a windfall, I might liken it to an irrigation district. After an irrigation project is thoroughly established and in operation it may be said that it was a windfall. It is true it was a windfall in so far as the fact that the water was there, the land was there and money was spent to develop the irrigation canals, distribution ditches and all the other things; but to say it was a windfall would give an altogether wrong impression as to the part played in the development of it by the men whose responsibility it was to bring about that development. Therefore I think we are safe in saying that the Alberta government earned the oil development just as thoroughly as the group of men in charge of the irrigation project earned that project by doing the work and spending the money involved in developing it.

I had begun to refer to the question of private enterprise. The Alberta people believe in private enterprise. Social Credit believes in private enterprise. Social Credit believes that public ownership of industry in a general way is a false principle and that it is not in the best interests of any economy. It is largely as a result of the attitude of the Alberta people and the Social Credit government in this respect that those with great sums of money to invest in the development of oil have been encouraged to come to Alberta, spend the great amount of money they have spent and remain there to proceed with the development. I should like to read another excerpt from Mr. Tanner's statement from which I quoted the other night, and which was made in 1948:

> The government is convinced that only by the existence of wholesome rivalry where free and competitive enterprise is carried on, can we expect to get most active development. As a result of this policy over sixty different companies are carrying on prospecting activities in over 100 different areas. At the present time the oil companies are spending over $1 million per month trying to find oil.

One of the great elements in the success of this oil industry has been having so many companies developing over so wide an area in so many fields and spending such vast sums of money every month. What happened in connection with the development is pretty well set forth in another passage in Mr. Tanner's statement as follows:

> The companies spend the money in the search for oil and the government takes no risk. If the company finds oil the government always stands ready to take its fair share of the returns as well as the $1 per acre per annum for all provincial land held under lease.

This is one of the secrets of success in finding oil. Those who are enamoured of government ownership contend that the government should do the development work, spend all the money and take all the losses. The danger of losses is something they never quite realize until they get right up against the facts. I understand that a certain group in Canada already have got up against the facts. Another passage in Mr. Tanner's statement is as follows:

> To date more has been spent—> —in the search for and production of oil than has been received from the sale of the oil produced. During this time the government has continued to collect its rentals and royalties.

That was June 30, 1948.

Exactly the same thing applies to gas, although Mr. Tanner is talking particularly about oil. It must be remembered that gas was discovered in the search for oil. Frequently it was found at the same time as the oil, or at times before the oil. Consequently all that I am saying applies equally to gas production in Alberta. What system was followed in working forward? I think it would be well to read another quotation from Mr. Tanner in this respect:

> All development in Alberta is carried on under the authority of leases which set out the terms under which development must be carried on.
> The government is always in the position where it can change its form of lease and the terms of the lease as conditions change so as to assure proper development and fair returns.

May I pause there to comment briefly by saying that there is a great deal of fallacious and foolish propaganda engaged in, frequently for ulterior motives. An attempt has been made to establish in people's minds that Alberta has sold out the oil resources of that province, that all rights to oil lands have been handed over to the big companies from the United States. That idea is entirely erroneous. I do not see why people cannot inform themselves a little better before they say such foolhardy things. As is indicated in the quotation I have just read, the Alberta government leases the oil fields. It allows oil production to go forward only under lease. As that statement indicates, the government is free to cancel a lease if it sees fit. The result is that every square foot of oil-producing land in Alberta that was ever owned by Alberta is still under the outright and unchallengeable ownership of the crown in Alberta.

Here is another extract from this statement which indicates how the money is made by the province from the oil industry, and I quote:

Any company or individual may obtain a maximum of two 100,000 acre blocks on which they may explore for petroleum and natural gas on the following terms:

I would point out that by preventing any one company from leasing more than a certain amount of land the government prevents the development of monopolies and gives the little fellow, the in-between fellow as well as the big fellow a chance to have free access to the oil industry of Alberta under the terms which the government lays down. The statement continues:

(a) First year $250 permit fee plus deposit of $2,500 for each 20,000 acres or part thereof to guarantee required work being done.

It will be noticed that there is no possibility of absentee landholders delaying the development of the oil industry. That abuse has been carefully guarded against. The statement continues:

(b) Second year. Providing they do the required work extensions of three months each may be obtained by paying seven cents per acre for the first three month period; seven cents for the second three month period; eight cents for the third and eight cents for the fourth three month period.

It will be noted that there is no possibility of any company getting a stranglehold on any considerable portion of the oil lands of Alberta. The statement continues:

(c) Third year—providing the company drills a well and continues exploratory work they can obtain further three month extensions by paying 10 cents per acre for the first period, 15 cents per acre for the second, 20 cents per acre for the third and 25 cents per acre for the fourth period.

The above is what the company pays for the privilege of searching for oil.

You will notice once more the precautions that are taken against two abuses: First, that a company might get too much territory and thereby edge out other companies and, second, that a company might hold land indefinitely without carrying out the development which it is in the people's interest to have carried out. The statement continues:

Leasing privileges. If the company thinks it has found a structure it may lease not more than half the 100,000 acres and that in blocks of not more than 9 sections. This may be leased on a checkerboard pattern or if the company leases a block in the centre of the reservation the government sets up crown reserves at least one mile wide completely surrounding the leased block. This results in one of the following patterns:

There is a diagram in this statement showing a checkerboard, which I suppose cannot be put on Hansard. There is another diagram showing a square completely surrounded by another square. The inner square indicates what may be held by a company and the square all around the inner square indicates what is held in reserve by the provincial government. That establishes that it is obviously impossible for any company to obtain a monopoly or exercise undue pressure on any other company. The statement continues:

By this means the government retains at least half the area to be disposed of by sealed tender to the highest bidder as and when and on terms and conditions set out by the government. This tender is for the right to lease and produce oil. These blocks which are called crown reserves are usually offered in quarter sections and the successful tenders on the last three quarter sections offered were——successful tenders on the last three-quarter sections offered were, $30,330; $50,171; $81,591.98 respectively for the right to lease in addition to which the companies must pay the regular rentals and royalties.

This was at the time he wrote, June 30, 1948.

By this method the government is preventing monopoly and obtaining all possible out of the development of its natural resources. The lessee pays $1 per acre per year for all land leased and a royalty of from 5 to 15 per cent according to production or a straight royalty of 12½ per cent. Royalty on existing leases can be raised to 16⅔ per cent.

Now may I make this comment? It is quite obvious from this statement that all those who carry away the idea or endeavour to establish the idea that Alberta loses control in any degree over these oil-producing lands are simply misrepresenting the whole situation.

Mr. Laing: How did this one man make $90 million.

Mr. Blackmore: I would imagine he would do that by ordinary dealings. There is a good deal of speculating possible, even under the arrangements made out there, but that does not mean the man who made that money—he might have bought speculation stock and sold it—had any control over the oil-producing lands of the province. They went on under these regulations just as rigidly as the sun rises according to the time of year. There is no deviation from the principle which I have laid down.

Mr. Laing: He is reported to have had property.

Mr. Blackmore: Just what those properties were, I do not know. He may have had freehold property. It must be borne in mind that a considerable amount of Alberta's oil-producing land was alienated from the province before the natural resources of the province were given to it in 1932. In former times, even before 1905, the federal government at Ottawa was in a position to alienate this land. Some of the land would naturally be in the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company, some in the hands of the Canadian Pacific and some in the hands of the C. and E. Corporation. Where oil was found on property belonging to any of these people possessing a prior right, it is not under the same regulations as are the lands which belong to the province. Is that clear?

Mr. Laing: Is an individual limited as to acreage?

Mr. Blackmore: That is an individual company that comes in to obtain crown lands within these regulations?

Mr. Stick: Are the hon. members addressing the chair or carrying on a private conversation?

Mr. Wylie: We did not hear a word you said.

Mr. Blackmore: This regulation, of course—

The Chairman: The conversation that is being carried on at the other end of the chamber must be very interesting. The members at this end and the chairman would like to hear it.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I thought I was speaking loudly enough to enable everyone to hear everything I said, even though I was directing myself towards the person who was asking the questions. There were persons who were endeavouring to get accurate information about the situation. Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I shall be guided by your suggestion. I believe I have made it quite clear now how that man could have made money in spite of these regulations which apply to all crown lands. Of course the province of Alberta has only indirect control of lands which have been alienated to the Canadian Pacific, the Hudson's Bay Company and other concerns.

Mr. Laing: He made a little more money than the province.

Mr. Blackmore: That was not the fault of the province but the fault of the dominion government that had alienated the property. It must be borne in mind that in the case of the two provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, a great amount of the natural resources were alienated even back as far as 1885, before the provinces were organized.

The next important matter in which I think nearly everyone is interested, and which I believe has a bearing on the general matter we are discussing tonight, is how much money has been made by the province as a result of these oil developments. Some people act as though they thought something like billions had fallen down in a cloudburst of financial returns, but no such thing is true. Those are only rainbow dreams. I give these figures, not only for the sake of those who desire to know about that, but to show the rate at which the oil industry has developed, thereby indicating the possible development for the future.

Alberta received in revenue from oil in 1948-49, $10,340,000. That was the first year after the amazing development took place following the discovery of the oil in the famous Leduc field. In 1949-50 she received $26,550,000; in 1950-51, $32,768,000; in 1951-52, to December 31, 1951, $20,262,000. Those figures will be found in Premier Manning's 1952 budget speech. This indicates that no such unbelievable streams of money flowed from the oil industry. The estimate for 1952-53 is $38,300,000, which will include $12 million from crown reserves and $10,300,000 from oil royalties, $12,500,000 from fees and oil lease rentals. For the facts pertinent to these statements we can refer to Premier Manning's 1952 budget speech, and those who want to read it can find it in the Lethbridge Herald of March 8, pages 1 and 19, which can be found in our reading room. These facts show that all those who attribute the whole of Alberta's financial success to the oil industry are just a little wide of the mark.

It is important to bear in mind, summing up in a general way, that thus far the Alberta Social Credit government did everything it could to help those who came to develop her oil industry, realizing the value of the companies who came in and not making it difficult for them. In the first place, the government learned all the known facts about the oil industry. Then it set up a source of information to be available to all comers, so that any company entering the field could go to the fountain of this information and get millions of dollars worth of valuable facts about the sort of thing that might be encountered, before it did a tap of prospecting or drilling. The very best experts were available at all times to give the finest advice that could be obtained.

This is one of the great things to the credit of the administration of Alberta in respect of the oil development.

I have already referred to the information that answers the question: Is the Social Credit government permitting the big oil companies to commit abuses? I have pointed out that "no" is the answer. No Alberta oil lands have been alienated from the crown. All development is purely on a lease basis. No monopolistic development is permitted. No special privileges are permitted. No injury to owners of the lands is permitted without compensation. It can readily be seen that if companies are allowed to go rambling all over the province drilling here, there and everywhere, spoiling men's farms, knocking down their crops and all that kind of thing without any remuneration to the property owners, in all probability the people of Alberta will become weary of that sort of thing and turn out a government that would permit it. The government is not permitting any such thing as that. People will be interested to know what the Alberta government does concerning the surface rights. I read again from Mr. Tanner's statement:

> The government has set up a right of entry arbitration board to see that farmers get fair and generous treatment where oil wells are drilled on their farms. If the oil company and the farmer cannot make a satisfactory settlement it is referred to the board for settlement.

I might say there are no costly court cases in respect of this matter. The people concerned get around the table with the referee and stay there until they come to a friendly agreement.

> The following are examples of rulings made in the Leduc area for each well and in many cases there are four wells on one quarter section.

First year's payment	$1,592.50	$1,292.50	$2,000.00
Annual compensation	532.00	470.50	700.00

Mr. Cannon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Might I suggest that the hon. member who is now speaking talk about the bill before the committee, which is a gas pipe-line bill and which has nothing to do with the oil policy of the Alberta government.

Mr. Wylie: It is the same thing.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this bill not only asks for the right to pipe gas but also to pipe oil. I would suggest that the hon. member should read section 6.

Mr. Cannon: Even piping it has nothing to do with the policy of the government of Alberta.

Mr. Wylie: Surely it does.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I might dispose of the point of order by informing the hon. member for Lethbridge that he has now spoken for more than forty minutes.

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate tonight, I want to assure you at the outset that I will not ask for the privilege of having my time extended beyond the forty-five minute limit.

I am opposed to this bill in the first place because the line stops at Winnipeg. The incorporation of this Boundary Pipeline company would mean that it would build a pipe line to Winnipeg. I am anxious that we receive this power in Ontario; we need it now in Ontario to develop the province. Industry here is short of power. Therefore we need this gas which belongs to Canada. We need it in the eastern section of Canada now.

In the first place, this small pipe line going to Winnipeg was intended to go to the boundary, but certain objections were taken in the committee and the applicants withdrew that part of it, and said: We will stop at Winnipeg. There is no doubt in my mind that this pipe line was meant to go to the boundary and then be taken over by some other company which would deliver gas to the different parts of the United States. I think it has been proven that throughout the years we have been the suppliers of natural resources for the large cities of the United States. That is probably one reason Sir Wilfrid Laurier's dream has not come true yet, when he said that the nineteenth century belonged to the United States but the twentieth century belongs to Canada.

If we are going to develop Canada, we must have cheap power and we have to develop our natural resources here at home. This is one potential source of power we must make use of. We can make use of it to the great benefit of this nation. I do not see the United States shipping to us over here anything they require first at home. That is probably one reason they have developed so much faster than we have over the past seventy-five years. They are a great nation and a developing neighbour. But I should like to tell this committee that the greatest asset they have is not the Atlantic ocean, the Pacific ocean or Mexico but rather this northern boundary alongside of which lies Canada which is supplying them with gold, iron ore, pulpwood, timber, lumber and nickel which is necessary in any kind of a war, machine or defence program.

Mr. Gibson: They are the best customers we have, too.

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, they have been good customers of ours; but this is not a one-way street. I think we should protect Canada and Canadian interests first. Do not forget that our large cities along the border will need this gas and this power in order to compete with the large cities that lie along the border in the United States. Are we going to go on developing those large cities of the United States, or are we going to make possible more employment and more industry in Canada?

The pipe line is to be a small one, to start with. I think it has been proven in committee—it was to me, anyway—that the potential market for what power will be used from the oil fields to Winnipeg will not warrant, financially, a pipe line of any kind, but it might have the effect of stopping the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company, which was granted a charter last year, from coming on through Ontario, Quebec and the eastern provinces, because it will absorb the market provided by all the towns and cities from the oil wells to Winnipeg. Therefore the pipe line for which we have already granted a charter, to be built right across Canada and which I think is most necessary, might not have enough market to warrant its construction for some 1,200 or 1,300 miles before it would get one customer. The first customers would be in northern Ontario, and would be such large cities as Fort William and Port Arthur.

An hon. Member: There would be a monopoly.

Mr. Hodgson: Talking about monopoly, we talked out this same pipe line last year and your city of Vancouver was one that benefited by our talk last year.

Mr. MacDougall: I didn't make any remark.

Mr. Hodgson: The pipe line we talked out last year would have gone down through the United States, and Vancouver would not have had any oil for the next twenty years.

An hon. Member: It still would not.

Mr. Hodgson: However, it is not that pipe line we are talking about. It is the one going through Ontario I am interested in. The Boundary pipe line is out so far as I am concerned. It is only a detriment to a bigger and better line going across Canada and one that I think should be built as quickly as possible. They have spent a great deal of money and have done a great many things toward getting ready to build that line. We do not want to pass this bill in respect of which it has been proven that the market will not warrant building it, financially.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Hodgson: In the committee; or it should have been. It will probably be the means of blocking a bigger and better line. If you take away the nearest market, then the other line has to build across that 1,200 miles before it reaches its first customer, as I said before. There are great cities in northern Ontario. The hon. member for Fort William speaks about Fort William every time he has the opportunity to do so in this chamber. He has also spoken about this line and has mentioned the fact that he is extremely anxious that oil or gas go to Fort William. It has also been proven that the potential market in Port Arthur and Fort William will not warrant the building of a pipe line. Therefore those cities in northern Ontario must have a line that goes on through to the larger cities of Ontario, Quebec and eastern Canada, to make it a sound proposition.

In northern Ontario we have such cities as Fort William, Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie, North Bay, and the towns and cities along the line to Toronto. Then west from Toronto we have London, Hamilton, Sarnia, and to the east we have Brockville, Kingston, Ottawa, and then on to Montreal and Quebec. It was explained to us many times in the committee that you cannot pipe gas in the same way you string telephone and electric wires. The gas that goes into a pipe has to be pumped, and it must go to towns and cities where there is a large population to use it in volume. It will never go into individual houses throughout the country; it must go to towns and cities.

We need gas in Ontario to develop hydro-electric power. We are short of electric power in Ontario. We need cheap fuel in order to generate electricity to be used in the rural districts of Ontario and Quebec. Do not forget that when you turn on a light in a home in the country you not only turn on a light in the kitchen or living room of the house, but in the heart of the housewife.

I can tell you why we are short of power in Ontario, and why we need this gas. In Ontario we have had a great hydro development going on for the last eight years. Power lines, dams and power projects have been built as fast as the Hydro Electric Power Commission could get steel, wire, cement, machinery and things to do it with. It has been a wonderful development. However, it has not caught up with the shortage of power, and it has not coped with the speed of industrial development throughout the province. I do not mind telling the committee why there is a shortage of power in Ontario. In 1934 a Liberal government came into power in this province. One of the things the premier, Mr. Hepburn, who was elected at that time, fought the election on was the building of power lines. He said the building of power lines and power dams was a waste of money, and that Ontario had enough power to do it for a hundred years. But he was very shortsighted because before 1940 we had caught up with all the power we had developed and needed more.

In 1943 the government of the day began a program of hydro development, and it is still developing as fast as it can. The hydro commission built some steam plants to try to cope with the situation. In Ontario today the Hydro Electric Power Commission has steam plants using from 900 to 1,000 tons of coal a day. If anybody tells me that we do not need gas for cheap power in Ontario I will tell them that they do not know what they are talking about. They certainly do not know anything about eastern Canada.

That coal is coming in from the United States. Just think of the amount of foreign exchange that could be saved in Ontario if instead of buying that coal we could buy Alberta gas. The money we saved in that respect could be passed around among Canadians. The same thing applies to Quebec, which is rapidly becoming short of power. Perhaps one of the reasons is that they had a Liberal government down there too long.

Mr. Gibson: You have a good point there.

Mr. Hodgson: We are not going to get gas in Ontario with any help from some of these hon. gentlemen around me; we are going to get it with the help of friends of Canada from one coast to the other. We cannot divide Canada into provinces; we cannot divide one section from another. We do not want to divide our people; we want to stand together as one nation. The things that are good for the east are good for the west, and if gas is good for the west it is good for the east. So far as I personally am concerned, I would rather be using gas from Alberta in Ontario than buying coal from the United States, even if it cost the same. There is no doubt about that. Any engineer will tell you that gas will be cheaper than coal in Ontario. It will mean cheaper power; so when we are talking about exporting our products we have to get the cheapest power we can in order to be able to compete with the nations of the world. We have to take care of our trade and our industry, and this is one way to do it. The way is to process our own natural resources in Canada with our own natural resources. The gas in Alberta was discovered more or less suddenly. There is no doubt in my mind that the government in Alberta has given great encouragement to the development of gas and oil wells. Therefore we have a natural resource in Canada that is the best that could be obtained anywhere. If we had anything in Ontario that was needed in Alberta I would be the first one to give it to them, and just as cheaply as possible. Someone has said that it is a poor hand that will not wash the other. Let us get on with this job; let us get the trans-Canada pipe line built from one end of Canada to the other. I feel sure that the development of gas and oil in Alberta is such that it warrants marketing in the east.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to participate in this debate tonight, but in view of some of the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Lethbridge, I feel compelled to make some reply in connection with the oil development in Alberta.

The hon. member for Lethbridge has stated, or he tried to impress upon this committee, or even to convince it, that it is erroneous to state, or even to suggest, that the Alberta Social Credit government has sold out the oil industry to big interests and foreign corporations. Let us examine the situation. My submission—and I challenge the hon. member for Lethbridge to disprove this—is that since the discovery of the Leduc field at least 75 per cent of the proven oil reserves in that province—and it may be as high as 90 per cent—are not in the hands of Albertans, not in the hands of Canadians, but in the hands of foreign corporations. As I say, I challenge the hon. member to disprove that.

Mr. Johnston: What corporations are they?

Mr. Decore: United States corporations.

Mr. Johnston: Name them.

Mr. Decore: There are many of them; I am not going into details now. So much so, Mr. Chairman, that if the United States army had invaded the province of Alberta and in the field of battle we had been decisively beaten, and if there had been a treaty, as there usually is after all battles, then I submit we would not have been given a worse deal than the deal we are getting now from the Social Credit government with regard to the oil industry in that province.

Mr. Blackmore: I want the hon. member to tell us what he means by being "in the hands of". What do you mean by being "in the hands of"?

Mr. Decore: When the hon. member is suggesting that the Alberta Social Credit government are the champions of private business, my submission is that they are not the champions of private business but that they are the champions of big business, so far as the oil industry is concerned in Alberta. I must also say this, that the farmers in that province have made repeated demands from time to time urging that the farmers who have no mineral rights be given some consideration. Up to now that government has turned a deaf ear to the representations made by these farmers, through their organizations.

We have heard all kinds of wild statements in the house and in other places, for instance statements such as those made by the hon. member for Macleod, that the oil was underneath the ground, that the Lord waited until such time as a good Christian government came into power, and then that oil was developed. That is what is being said throughout Canada, and particularly in British Columbia today, as well as in Saskatchewan. Sometimes we hear it in this house.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Vegreville. I was glad to see a member of the Liberal party taking part in this debate. I am sorry, however, that thus far only two Liberals have taken part in it, and neither of them has devoted his remarks to anything relating to the Boundary Pipeline bill. Neither of those Liberal members has spoken a word about the very basic effect of a national gas policy for Canada.

In the few minutes left before nine o'clock I should like to say something about what would seem to be confusion with respect to Liberal policy on natural gas and oil, and I shall refer specifically to the Liberal party in Alberta, private Liberal members in this House of Commons, and to the Liberal government of Canada.

The Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member will confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Nickle: I shall be dealing specifically with the bill in relation to government policy. Before going any further, however, let me say a few words in connection with statements made by two members of the Social Credit party who come from my own province of Alberta. I would refer first of all to what was said by the hon. member for Bow River.

I regret deeply that in his statement in the house last week he made some observations in relation to oil and gas in Alberta and the developments going on in that province which indicated an attitude of provincialism. In other words he took the view that western members may stand together, and that they owe nothing to the east.

Mr. Johnston: I did not say that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nickle: In that connection, let me quote from memory what the hon. member for Bow River did say. He said, first of all, that British Columbia should have the first right to Alberta gas, and then would come the province of Saskatchewan, and then Manitoba and then, eventually, perhaps eastern Canada.

Mr. Johnston: That is better.

Mr. Nickle: Of course that statement must be taken in relation to present political activities in the west. The Social Credit party is naturally anxious—and again I am quoting what has been said by a Social Credit speaker—to unite the west under the banner of social credit.

Mr. Johnston: It has pretty nearly accomplished that now.

Mr. Knowles: More gas.

Mr. Nickle: Let me say only this, that the natural resources of all parts of this country are, in my opinion, resources belonging to the entire country, and should be put to use for the maximum good of the whole country. And to get back to the hon. member for Vegreville, he made the statement that 75 per cent of the oil of Alberta is under foreign control.

Mr. Low: He said 90 per cent.

Mr. Nickle: The only thing I need say about that is, thank God that a great many foreign oil corporations or individuals were willing to join Alberta, and other Canadian risk capital, to get out and explore and discover those resources in my own home province.

And may I add that, unlike the hon. member for Lethbridge, I do not give credit to the Social Credit government for all that has happened in Alberta by way of oil and gas development. I think the great bulk of the credit must go to those Canadians and those foreigners who have been willing to risk their money in the development and exploration of my home province, as well as other parts of Canada.

Now, as to this business of confusion of Liberal policy on natural gas: First of all, of course we have the Alberta Liberal party which has taken a most unfortunate stand for that province and for Canada—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nickle: —a stand in complete opposition to any export to any other province, or anywhere else, of natural gas from Alberta.

An hon. Member: Let us hear about the Tories.

Mr. Nickle: Now, as to the Progressive Conservative private members in this house: the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Lambton West have made statements in the house as to proceedings before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It is obvious, upon reading the minutes of those committee meetings, that either the Liberal members on the committee were confused with respect to natural gas and pipe lines, or they had no policy to start with.

As was previously mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, two members of the Liberal party in this chamber, who come from Quebec, moved the resolution which barred any further cross-examination of witnesses for the oil pipe line company. I regret that that took place because those two members, in effect, have given their considered view, apparently, that the province of Quebec should not get natural gas from western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

The Chairman: It is nine o'clock. Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will revert to the business at hand before six o'clock.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Grain Act to provide for the reappointment of grain commissioners and for increases in their salaries; to provide also for the appointment and salaries of three assistant grain commissioners instead of four; and to provide further for certain technical amendments of the statutory grades of grain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had expressed the hope that the car order book system would be reinstated at an early date, and I trust that conditions might be such this year that there will be no question in anyone's mind but that the car order book system should be maintained. Another aspect of box car distribution in western Canada that I should like to mention is this. The experience I have seen from one elevator marketing point to another is that the elevator houses themselves are filled up early in the crop year, perhaps a few days or a week after harvesting becomes general. Then when railway companies bring in box cars to the elevator points they are usually divided on an equal basis amongst the elevator companies doing business at a particular elevator point. On the surface such a distribution of box cars may appear fair, but I believe that at the vast majority of marketing points most farmers would like to market their grain through their own co-operative elevator system. Therefore I suggest that to allocate box cars on the basis of the same or nearly the same number of cars per elevator company is not fair. I should like to see the wishes of the producers surveyed—and I believe their wishes could be ascertained before the season commences—to find out at any given marketing point the percentage of producers who wish to deliver their grain to each elevator company provided space is available.

I would say if three-quarters of the producers at a given elevator marketing point indicate that they would like to deliver their grain to their own co-operative elevator, then the co-operative elevator, that is the wheat pool at that particular local point, should get three-quarters of the cars spotted available for that point. As long as cars are spotted on the basis of dividing them approximately equally between all the elevator companies the farmers' wishes to deliver their grain to their own elevator company will not be met.

Because it is at the printers, I have not seen the last annual report of the board of grain commissioners. I pointed out on one occasion previously during this session, and I should like to point out again to the minister, that the Canada Grain Act requires that in the month of January the minister shall receive a report from the board of grain commissioners. The minister indicated earlier that the report had not been received by him some months after the beginning of the year and the report has not yet been printed. I am not attempting to blame anyone for the fact that it is not printed and is not available, but I would hope that in future the minister will receive the report on time and that members of parliament may receive it shortly thereafter.

I should also like to suggest that in the report of the board of grain commissioners there should be more detailed information on overages and shortages. The question of overages and shortages is very much in the minds of western producers. The three prairie farmers' unions have taken great interest in the subject, and I believe have written to all western members of parliament asking that certain information be obtained. I think it would be more satisfactory if that information were placed in the report of the board of grain commissioners each year.

The minister mentioned the figures for overages and shortages in the elevators operating in the prairie provinces. On May 12 a return was tabled in answer to a question of mine as to the reduction in quantities of wheat, oats, barley and flax resulting from drying operations. As a result of drying, I would say from quick calculation that the reduction was some one and a quarter million bushels. A part of the answer to my question reads as follows:

No reduction or loss in weight occurs in the natural drying process whereby tough and/or damp grades are dried by mixing with grain of straight grade.

That was one of the pieces of information the farmers' unions wished to secure. I also asked if the books of the elevator companies for their terminal operations reflected a change in inventories at the end of the year and this is the answer I received:

Elevator book stocks are adjusted for any drying loss through the cancellation of warehouse receipts covering the quantities of tough and damp grain to be dried, and by the registration of new warehouse receipts for the amount of the dried grain in accordance with the board's regulation No. 15, section 6 (g).

If at all possible I believe that kind of information should be placed in the annual report. I do not know whether or not it is in that report, since it has not been printed and distributed, but I believe that is the kind of information the prairie producers would like to obtain.

There is one other matter I should like to raise at this time, the question of introducing a protein factor into the grading system for wheat. As the minister knows, over the years farmers, particularly in the drier sections of western Canada, have advocated the grading of wheat on a protein basis. I have noticed that the chief chemist of the board of grain commissioners, Dr. J. A. Anderson, has given a good deal of thought and study to this problem. Reports have appeared in the press from time to time with respect to papers he has delivered to meetings of various farm organizations. I think he has done a service to western Canada by the study he has made of a protein grading system. It is his opinion that a protein factor introduced into the grading of wheat would be advantageous to western wheat producers in that it would likely result in a greater economic return for wheat.

He outlines the way such a protein factor could be introduced into a grading system for wheat. He goes on to explain that there is no quick method of ascertaining the amount of protein in any given sample of wheat, and because there is no quick way of obtaining the protein content it is difficult to grade wheat on a protein basis when the wheat must be moved quickly to marketing positions. Dr. Anderson goes on to point out that a study is being made of possible methods to quickly determine the protein content of wheat. I hope that the minister, the national research council and other government departments have been working with Dr. Anderson and giving him every assistance possible so that a mechanical device to rapidly determine the protein content of wheat may finally be invented. From Dr. Anderson's comments apparently that is the only major hurdle that needs to be overcome to place the grading of wheat on a protein factor basis.

As I have said, he points out that such a protein grading system would increase the economic return to western producers, would probably be more satisfactory for most milling companies in Canada, and should result in Canadian wheat obtaining a somewhat better price on the world's markets. For this reason I hope Dr. Anderson will be given every encouragement and assistance in his very valuable work.

Motion agreed to, resolution considered in committee, reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 246, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ZONING OF AIRPORTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for airport zoning. I will now endeavour to deal at some length with the principles embodied in this measure.

Airport zoning consists of the promulgation of comprehensive zoning regulations dividing the area surrounding an airport into zones, specifying the uses of the land permitted in these zones, and regulating and restricting the height of structures and trees. The parliament of Canada having exclusive jurisdiction over air navigation and airports, it appears that enabling legislation of this parliament is required in order to deal with this pressing problem.

The bill to amend the Aeronautics Act may be considered under two heads. The first deals with the authority for making zoning regulations and the second with the procedure to be followed and the payment of compensation in respect of property injuriously affected by the application of the regulations.

The layman is apt to think that an airport consists solely of its material features, its runways, taxiways, loading areas, lighting equipment, buildings and other facilities. But all of these would be of little practical value if the airport did not have adequate aerial approaches. Aircraft ascend and descend at a very gradual rate. A clear slope must be allowed for in approaching the field and in departing from it. Moreover, the clearance must not be such that the planes will just scrape over the tops of obstacles. The margin allowed should be such that normal landings and take-offs may be made with the planes always some distance above the tops of buildings, power lines, trees and other obstacles.

It must be evident that the effective size of an airport is determined as much by its surroundings as by its own ground area. The erection of buildings and other structures in the vicinity of an airport which are an obstruction to aircraft using the airport would threaten and perhaps destroy the utility of the airport and the large investment of public funds it might represent. But this is by no means the only or most serious consequence of such obstruction of an airport approaches. Of even greater concern is the fact that an approach obstruction endangers the lives and property of flyers and their passengers as well as those of occupants of land in the vicinity. Obstructed approaches are the cause of many aeroplane crashes and a contributing factor in a great number of others.

The problem presented by this necessity for clear aircraft approaches is not only one of removing, lowering, marking and lighting existing airport hazards but one of preventing the establishment or creation of additional hazards. Unless ways are found and steps taken to limit to the extent necessary the height of future buildings, transmission lines, other structures, and objects of natural growth located on property in the vicinity of an airport, it may be expected that many such structures and objects will be erected or allowed to grow to heights making them obstructions or hazards to aircraft using the airport.

Air transportation in the past few years has increased at a phenomenal rate and the future promises further expansion. Since this expansion is bound to bring with it rapid industrial or residential development of areas near airports, it will become increasingly more difficult to deal with the problem of preventing obstruction of airport approaches if the present situation is allowed to continue. The more airport obstructions that are permitted, the more difficult and expensive will be the task of eliminating the existing obstructions and preventing the establishment of others.

The international civil aviation organization has studied this problem and has recommended certain practices in respect of airport zoning to which Canada has subscribed and which the government proposes to follow so far as the circumstances in each case will permit. The requirements vary somewhat according to the use to which an airport is to be put and the type of aircraft that will be using it under a variety of conditions. On the major civil airports certain runways may be designated for use on instrument landing approach. The requirements in respect of these particular runways are naturally more exacting than in the case of those that are limited to the use of visual flight rules. On certain military airports the characteristics of the aircraft using them are such that severe limitations in the matter of airport zoning are necessary.

There are several methods by which airport approaches may be protected against obstructions. One is for the owner of the airport to obtain title to the property in the vicinity of the airport upon which obstructions might be erected. Any hazards already in existence could then be removed or lowered and the land retained or sold subject to restrictions limiting the height of buildings and other objects that might be constructed thereon. In the case of federal airports resort may be had to expropriation if the land owners are unwilling to sell. However, the expense involved is the principal drawback to this method of zoning as the acreage required would be many times that necessary for the airport proper.

At this point I should like to repeat what I said then when speaking on the resolution. It is not the intention of the bill to provide for the removal of existing obstructions. This will be taken care of by the normal procedures of acquiring lands or easements by purchase or expropriation. The zoning regulations contemplated by this legislation would apply to prevent the future erection of buildings or other structures which might become obstructions to aircraft.

The method of zoning by regulations as provided for in this bill is the most satisfactory solution to the problem in that it may be applied to all airports whether government, municipal or privately owned. It is the least expensive method, but at the same time provides for adequate compensation to property holders whose lands are injuriously affected. It avoids separate dealings with a multitude of property holders. Few steps are of such urgency and few steps are so essential to promote safety.

Generally, the nature of the proposed zoning regulations will follow a plan which will be somewhat as follows. From the centre of an airport a circle may be described having a radius of thirteen thousand feet. Within this circle no structure will be permitted to have an elevation above 150 feet.

In addition to this restriction, the approach flightways which commence at the end of the runways and extend outward from the boundary of the airport will be restricted to structures not exceeding one foot in height for every fifty feet that these structures are located from the boundary.

There will also be restrictions on the lateral slopes on each side of the flightways extending outward and upward at a ratio of one foot in height for every seven feet of horizontal distance. This is rather technical but I think it conveys the general idea of what restrictions may be expected. As each airport has different characteristics, the zoning regulations will be adapted to the plan of the individual airport.

There may also be odd cases where the use of land adjacent to an airport may have to be restricted. For instance, it would be dangerous to have machines in the vicinity of an airport which give off smoke or fumes hazardous to aircraft.

It is proposed to take immediate action, if this measure becomes law, in respect of certain airports operated by the departments of Transport and National Defence. Over a period of years it will be necessary to give this protection to all government airports. At the present time there are 114 of these, not including military airports. In due time it will also be necessary to deal with the zoning of municipal airports where the problems will have to be discussed with the municipalities concerned. There are now 17 airports on the transcontinental airways system operated by the Department of Transport which require immediate protection.

I turn now to the second part of the bill. Provision is made for adequate publication of the zoning regulations which in the case of civil airports will be made by the Minister of Transport and approved by the governor in council. The plan and description of the lands affected by a zoning regulation will be signed and deposited in the land registry office in the same way as is now the practice under the Expropriation Act. A copy of the regulation will be published in the Canada Gazette and in two successive issues of at least two newspapers serving the area where the airport is located. This should give sufficient publicity to the regulations.

As I have stated, the bill provides for payment of compensation in cases where property is injuriously affected by the operation of the zoning regulations. The yardstick for measuring compensation will be the amount by which the property is decreased in value by the enactment of the regulations, less the amount by which the property has increased in value after the claimant became the owner, and is attributable to the airport. This is a well known and accepted principle of compensation, and is to be found in the Exchequer Court Act where the court is directed to take into account any advantage or benefit that accrues or is likely to accrue from the construction or operation of a public work.

I have already indicated my view that in the long run owners of property in the vicinity of an airport will benefit from the orderly development of the area under a zoning plan. I recognize, however, that cases will arise where a property owner may be prevented from proceeding with plans for the development of property which will have to be altered or abandoned. In these cases claims will be dealt with by negotiation and fair settlements made. If the parties are unable to agree, the claimant has recourse to the exchequer court which will settle the compensation.

The bill provides for a time limit for making claims of one year from the date of deposit made in the land registry office. It is not proposed to pay out public moneys to claimants unless they come forward within a reasonable time to make their claims.

In the preparation of this legislation considerable study was given to action taken by the United Kingdom and the United States to meet this problem. In both these countries provision has been made by legislation for zoning airports. The physical details concerning the limitations to be imposed are based on international recommendations.

I consider this bill to be a forward step in the field of aviation. It should be enacted as a necessary protection for those who travel by air and those who dwell near airports. The development of the aviation industry in Canada is proceeding rapidly and deserves the support of all members of this house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): When the resolution preceding this bill was under debate some days ago, Mr. Speaker, I understood that the minister had agreed to have the bill considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may interrupt the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I perhaps should have indicated, following my statement, that after this debate I do propose to move that the bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Green: In view of that fact there is very little I wish to say this evening on behalf of the official opposition. We shall reserve our judgment on the bill until it has been considered by that committee. Generally speaking we are in favour of any reasonable safety measures being taken. There is no doubt that safety must be the main consideration in dealing with the questions raised by this bill. But I suggest to the minister that it would be worth while if, before the regulations are deposited covering an airport, he have his officials confer with the municipality or municipalities concerned. As he has said, conditions will be different for different airports. For example, one set of problems may arise at the Uplands airport in Ottawa while an entirely different set may obtain at Dorval, Malton or Stevenson field in Winnipeg, or at Sea Island where we have the Vancouver airport.

Mr. Knowles: That is on the other side of the Marpole bridge?

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister might even do something about the Marpole bridge.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely not under this bill.

Mr. Green: The government has failed to do much under any other measure, so perhaps this is our last hope.

Mr. Knowles: It may be a hazard to air traffic.

Mr. Chevrier: It must be a lift bridge, then.

Mr. Green: I do suggest that an attempt be made to reach an agreement with the municipalities concerned with regard to the zoning regulations which are to apply to these different airports. Here we have a clear infringement of property and civil rights, although possibly there is power to take this step under the "Aeronautics" decision. It would avoid a good deal of trouble, and help greatly in the administration of the act, if some attempt were made to get the co-operation of the municipalities.

Then we are of the opinion that the compensation provisions set out in the bill are not fair to the people who will be affected by these zoning regulations. There will be many people across the country who have property near an airport. I believe the minister mentioned a distance of nearly three miles from an airport for one type of regulation, so there will be many people holding property in the vicinity of these airports who will be affected by the zoning regulation. We believe they should be given a reasonable opportunity to get proper compensation. It would be far wiser to leave it to the discretion of the judge to decide what reasonable compensation would be.

Instead of doing that we find a provision written right into the bill that the compensation shall be the amount, if any, by which the property was decreased in value by the enactment of the regulation but with the qualification that it shall be less the amount by which the property increased in value after the claimant became the owner. Now, that is a very indefinite provision, and may well have the effect of depriving many people of the compensation they should receive.

Mr. Chevrier: That is written into the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. Green: We believe there should be a wider discretion left to the judge who will have to decide the case. After all, it is not an easy or cheap procedure for the claimant to go to the exchequer court to have his claim adjudicated upon, and we think no handicap should be placed in his way.

Then the other provision which seems to be much too drastic is the one which says that unless the owner takes action within one year from the time a zoning regulation is filed in the land registry office, he has no claim whatever.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is discussing the details of the bill at this time; that, of course, is something that is not permitted on second reading.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, these very details have just been discussed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and I submit that I am entitled to answer.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that, on second reading, a detail such as the time for filing a claim can be discussed. That is definitely a detail which must be considered in committee. If the hon. member wants to refer to it I will not stop him from doing so; but I hope that he will not discuss it at length.

Mr. Green: Your Honour, there are only two features to this bill. One is the power to make regulations and the other is a provision that the person who is injured by the regulations can claim compensation. I am dealing with this second subject at the moment. Surely I must be permitted to bring out the fact that the bill does not give the owner a reasonable time in which to make his claim for compensation. That is all I am trying to do.

Mr. Speaker: I said that I would allow the hon. member to refer to the matter, but I hope he will not go into it in too much detail.

Mr. Green: It all depends on what Your Honour considers to be too much detail.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member understands the rules, and I am sure that he will abide by them.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we suggest that claimants should be given a longer time than one year. The plan set out in the bill is that the Department of Transport files this copy of these regulations in the land registry office and then inserts two advertisements, I think it is, in a local newspaper. The owner may not learn about that for many months. He may be away. There are a dozen different possibilities which would prevent him from taking action within a year. There is the very fact that the minister has said it is the intention to negotiate with these owners before they have to take action. I have been involved in some negotiations with the Department of Transport at different times, and certainly in my experience they have never broken any speed records.

Mr. Chevrier: My recollection is that they have dealt very fairly with you.

Mr. Green: That is true; but it takes a long time for them to make a decision. It may be months before the poor claimant can find out what the department is going to offer him. Just to sum up, we believe that a longer period should be provided within which the claimant may take action. We think it is only fair that there should be a longer period.

Then there is one other point. When the resolution was under discussion I asked the minister whether or not the municipalities would be required to pay any of this compensation. I have here the exchange of questions and answers, which is to be found at page 1972 of Hansard. It is as follows:

Mr. Green: Is there to be some responsibility on the municipality for the payment of compensation?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think so.

Mr. Green: The government is not paying all the compensation?

Mr. Chevrier: I hesitate to answer that at this time. I think that is really a matter which should be considered when the bill is before us.

An indication was given by the minister that the municipalities would have to pay some of this compensation. I suppose it would be in a case where the airport is owned by a municipality; but there is nothing whatever in the bill to indicate that there is to be any contribution made by the municipality. I would ask the minister, when he closes the debate, to indicate whether or not the municipalities are to be expected to contribute something toward the compensation paid. It does not seem to be reasonable that they should have to do that. If they have purchased and developed the airports, I doubt whether it is fair that they should have to pay compensation because of the effect of government regulations. However that may be, we ask the minister to make that point clear when he closes the debate.

As I said in opening, we reserve our judgment on the bill until there has been an opportunity to hear the departmental witnesses in committee and to give consideration there to the different terms.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take just a few minutes to confirm the support of this measure which we indicated at the time the resolution was before the house. As I said on that occasion, all of us are extremely proud of the safety record we have in this country in the field of aviation; and any measure that is designed to protect that safety record, and indeed to improve that position in the years that lie ahead, is commendable.

We feel that it is well to take measures of this kind in advance rather than to wait until the areas surrounding airports have been completely built up. In fact I could not help but wonder the other day, when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) was speaking on the resolution, why there had been such a long lapse of time from the days when similar regulations under the War Measures Act went out of existence.

I listened with interest to the explanation the minister gave tonight. As he spoke it became clear that what looked like a simple bill—it has just one section—in fact contains a good deal. The meat of the bill, of course, is in the power that is conferred for the making of regulations to zone areas surrounding airports. In that connection we appreciate the fact that the minister tonight indicated in some detail the nature of these regulations, and they seemed to be based on common sense. I noted his reference to the fact that these regulations are in line with the commitments we have made as a member of the international civil aviation organization.

With regard to the question of compensation, on which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has had something to say, we shall await with interest what the minister says in closing this debate on second reading. Likewise we look forward to an opportunity to have that aspect of the matter discussed a little more fully in the committee. However, looking at the bill as it stands, I confess that I am not unduly concerned. It seems to me to suggest that compensation is available so long as a party can establish the fact that there has been a net loss in the value of his property as a result of the operation of these zoning regulations. I trust that we shall be given the assurance that a person who has any disagreement, shall we say, with the government over what the actual loss is, will have the usual recourse to the courts. So long as that right is guaranteed there is something to be said for wording the bill rather carefully and cautiously, as it seems to me has been done.

I do not wish to make any final commitment on the compensation aspect of the bill, but I do feel I should say that the terms of it do not worry me in quite the way they seem to worry the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). Nevertheless we shall wait further information on that aspect of it. But certainly with regard to the first part of the bill, the part that deals with zoning for the purposes of safety, on that score the bill has our wholehearted support.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to say a word in connection with the bill. I listened to the minister's explanation with interest, and I must say we favour the type of measure which is included in the bill for improving the safety of air travel in connection with the location of buildings, structures and so on in our airports. I feel, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does, that anything we do to increase the length of time during which we continue to have an enviable record here in Canada is justified.

I think the first provisions of the bill are perfectly justified. However, there are some things in connection with it on which we may wish to gather more detail, and for that reason I am glad the bill is being sent to the standing committee.

My only concern about a bill of this kind is always in connection with the compensation clauses. I cannot discuss them in detail here, but it is not clear to me just what sort of set-up is envisioned to enable a claimant to get compensation that is due him. I simply hope that in committee we shall be able to get the details of that set-up, and before the minister closes the debate it may be possible to get them here. All I am saying is this: I hope it is not made too difficult for a claimant to get justice. Too often when compensation clauses of this kind are included in bills we expect the claimant to go before the exchequer court, or some other court, which is often a long drawn out and costly procedure, and all too often I am afraid that the claimant does not get just treatment.

I should like to have the minister explain, if he can without breaking the rules, just a little more in detail what he has in mind in respect to the compensation as provided for in clause 8. If he prefers not to, we can get that in committee. That is my only concern in any of these bills. We commend the minister for bringing in the measure at this time and getting in on the ground floor before a good many airports are approved, extended or established. That is the time to have your regulations set up. Then you do not have too many claims for compensation. I would just like to register my one concern before the bill goes to committee.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Before the minister closes the debate I want to say a word in connection with the legislation which is now before us for second reading. In my constituency is the Malton airport, which is one of the largest if not the largest, and certainly the most important, of any of the airports in Canada. I want to make some observations with respect to the effect or probable effect of these zoning regulations on the area surrounding that airport.

When the legislation was first brought into the house last year a considerable amount of public interest was displayed in it in the area which I just mentioned. The question at that time of course resolved itself into two parts. One was the question of the jurisdiction of the federal government with respect to the property and civil rights which are normally enjoyed by provincial jurisdictions in matters of this kind.

My understanding is that some questions were raised in connection with this jurisdiction in other areas of Canada, but it was not pursued so far as the Malton district went. I take it that the minister is now satisfied with respect to the rights of the dominion to legislate in connection with this type of restriction. However, at that particular time I had a conference at the request of adjoining owners and those who had neighbouring properties near the airport in the Malton area. The whole matter was discussed very fully and in a very friendly way at that time, as to the possible effects of these zoning regulations. I think it only fair to the minister and to the house to say that there was no disposition on the part of anyone who attended that conference, despite their individual interests being so important, to suggest that there should not be something in the nature of regulations with respect to the safety of those who were travelling by air and the safety of those also who might be affected in the event of accident in the immediate vicinity.

I suppose since that time public consciousness has been aroused, and certainly has become more manifest, by virtue of the series of very unfortunate plane crashes in thickly settled areas of population in and around the city of New York. That I think has to some extent, in any event, made it advisable for the government to see that every possible means is taken by the department and by others to see that this kind of disaster shall not be experienced in any major way by our own aircraft and our own system here in Canada. It is always a matter of pride to the Canadian people at large that we have so far escaped any major catastrophe so far as air travel on Trans-Canada Air Lines is concerned. The best possible advertisement for an air line is to say that they transport their passengers in safety. Perhaps that is the best advertisement our Trans-Canada Air Lines can make, and they have been continuing to make that assertion with an almost unbroken record since the line was first instituted, I think in 1936, if my memory is not faulty.

However, to return to the question of zoning which of course is connected very directly with the question of safety, I think it can be said that in some of the areas such as Malton there has been a rather close relationship in the past between the Department of Transport and those who are responsible for the planning of the area under the Ontario planning act. I believe there has been fairly close liaison between those two bodies, and in the meantime that may have made the situation somewhat less difficult in connection with the acceptance of reasonable regulations at this time.

During the last couple of weeks I took the trouble to communicate with municipal and other representative people in the area so as to gain some idea of their views with respect to the regulations the minister has in mind. No grave objections have been raised, so far as the general principle is concerned; but when the matter is before the committee, if they find it necessary or advisable they might like to have the opportunity of coming to Ottawa to give their evidence, or to make their suggestions, as the case may be.

Mr. Chevrier: By all means.

Mr. Graydon: I am glad to have the minister's assurance on that point; because if there are difficulties remaining to be solved I think we ought to have the suggestions and advice of those who are directly affected.

Let me point out that at our conference a year ago the chief apprehension seemed to centre around the matter of compensation. I must say there is still some apprehension on that score. It is all very well for the minister to say that fair settlements will be made. I have no doubt that is in the forefront of his mind at the moment. Nevertheless the fact that some have had to enter into costly arbitrations and court actions to enforce their rights has constituted a type of discrimination against those who, in many instances, cannot afford to have prolonged lawsuits and negotiations, with all their attendant expense, when they are faced with a suit against the government.

I look with some concern upon the minister's suggestion that a judge of the exchequer court would be bound by two restrictions which the minister seems intent upon including in the regulations. The first one, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), was the time limit placed upon the filing of claims. I would be the first to admit, with the minister, that there ought not to be a wide-open field for the making of claims, years and years afterwards, and that there should be some finality and some area of restriction in the matter of time as to the date upon which a claim might be filed. Nevertheless I would not like to have included in the regulations an iron-clad restriction or limitation as a result of which, no matter what the circumstances might be, and regardless of the position in which people might find themselves, a judge would not have the right at least to take into consideration equitable factors which might obtain in a particular case.

I think there ought to be some way of meeting a situation with which both the government and those who may have claims might be faced. I am optimistic in my view that a position midway can be found whereby owners would not be given carte blanche rights to claim against the government all through the years, but at the same time the government would not leave itself in a position where it would be completely and perfectly protected the minute one year had expired.

The minister is a distinguished member of the bar and I should think he would be the first to admit that, in all these instances, there is the odd case where a great deal of injustice might result from the too stringent application of a time limit. I think there ought to be something in the regulations which would give a judge of the exchequer court some latitude when dealing with a case where extreme hardship is shown as the result of the one year limitation.

Then I should like to deal with a matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and which I wish to emphasize. I refer to the question as to how compensation is to be arrived at or adjusted. I cannot see why a court should be put in a position where it is in a strait-jacket when it comes to the manner in which it can arrive at proper compensation. In the first place the minister indicates that the regulations will call for compensation as a result of damages flowing from the zoning regulations in the vicinity of an airport. At the same time, while he gives with one hand he takes away with the other. He indicates that consideration must be given also to the fact that, while in the hands of the owner, the properties may have increased in value by virtue of the location of the airport.

I take objection to the stand taken by the minister, and hope when the committee sits he will not be adamant in the position he has taken in this regard. I have a feeling that this restrictive portion of his regulations, which he proposes to enforce through the exchequer court, might easily have the effect of rendering an injustice to many land owners whom, normally, the court would wish to help.

I would suggest to the minister, who has given a great deal of study to this matter and who has not pressed the legislation too hastily—and I must give him full marks for that, because there has been a considerable lapse of time to give those who are interested an opportunity to come forward and make their suggestions—that these are two points to which he might give special attention. When he comes before the committee I hope he will not appear as an adamant defender of the regulations he now proposes. I would hope that he would be amenable to suggestions and would see, in the name of sweet reason and justice, just how important these two suggestions are, coming as they do from people representing those who may make claims in the future.

Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who has spoken officially on behalf of the official opposition, I would hope that in having this matter placed before the committee these two changes might be made, in the interests of those who may be dealing with the government as a result of zoning regulations in the days ahead.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, if I may take a minute, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has spoken for about thirty minutes on behalf of a very small airport near Toronto. I should like to say something about the Vancouver international airport which is a much larger operation. I think the minister is quite conversant with some of our problems on the coast. Two members of the Richmond council came to Ottawa a couple of weeks ago and had a meeting with the parliamentary assistant to the minister. May I pay tribute to him for his understanding with respect to our problems on the west coast. There are some homes close to the Vancouver airport which constitute a great problem. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) will agree with me that there are six or eight properties close to the new airstrip that should be taken care of by the Department of Transport immediately. They should not wait for the institution of the regulations under this legislation. I have stood in one or two of these homes when large airplanes have flown over the immediate vicinity and I have noticed that dishes on the shelves and other cooking implements have suffered by reason of the large engines used in these planes.

More particularly, some of the young people owning these homes have small children. In some cases they are V.L.A. properties. I do not think anyone in the house will mind my speaking about these people because I think the matter comes under the bill. For instance, I stood in the attic of one house one night where a man and his wife and a couple of little children live. I certainly would not want to live there. I hope the minister will not wait until the bill is on the statute books, because help is needed now. The minister and his parliamentary assistant understand this matter, and I hope we will not have to wait for the bill to become the law of the country. Let us do something about these young people who are living near the Vancouver civic airport.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I add a brief word largely along the line of the speeches made tonight by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

Every member of the house of course supports the principle of ensuring as far as possible safety around our airports, particularly in the light of the recent disasters in the neighbourhood of Newark. However, attention has been drawn very properly to the features of the bill which pertain to compensation for those whose use of their property is going to be detrimentally affected by the regulations which will be made in pursuance of the powers conferred by this legislation.

In my submission the language of the bill with reference to the basis of compensation is unduly narrow. Account should be taken of the fact that power is given by the bill to limit or restrict not simply the height and location of buildings but their use. If the use of buildings is interfered with it may give rise to a form of damage which cannot be measured in terms of the reduction in the value of the land. It must be measured also in many cases in terms of loss of business profit or the prospect of business profit. I am sure the minister is well acquainted with the problem that arises in compensation cases where in one class of case the claimant is limited to the reduction in the value of his land and in other cases is permitted to make a claim as well for loss of business profit.

It seems to me this is a situation where the widest basis of claim should be permitted, and where anyone who happens to suffer a business loss, quite apart from reduction in the value of his land, in consequence of zoning carried on in pursuance of the powers conferred by the bill, should be entitled to compensation for that type of loss as well as for the reduction in the value of his property.

My second observation relates to the period of limitation of claims. There are not a few statutes, both federal and provincial, where a similar period of limitation is imposed upon claims. In this case it is one year. I think if you will examine most of these other cases you will find that the date from which the period of limitation runs is a date clearly defined and by its nature bound to be known at once to the person who is about to make the claim. That is not the type of situation we have under the bill. The year begins to run not from the date of some physical injury sustained by the claimant, some incident that impresses upon his mind at once that he may have a claim, but, if you please, the period of limitation runs from the date of deposit of the regulation. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra points out that it is not even from the date of the advertisement.

The deposit of the regulation is something that may not come to the attention of a person who has property in the vicinity of the airport for months and months afterwards. It is not something that impresses itself upon his mind. It is not something that comes directly to his notice. Therefore the circumstances contemplated here are not at all to be compared with the circumstances upon which periods of limitation fixed by certain provincial and dominion statutes are based. Accordingly I would urge that these provisions, both in defining the scope of compensation, which is unduly narrow, and the period of limitation, which is unduly short, should be reviewed and revised when the bill goes to the committee. Otherwise I predict now that hardship is going to be suffered by many people. It may be that the government is animated in this situation by the best of intent, but what would happen is what has happened in other situations where cases of hardships arise and are put before the department. The minister will feel he is bound to take this stand: "This is what the legislation says, and I cannot make exceptions. It is true that hardship results, but I am powerless to deal with it unless I am going to open the door to a great many claims for compassionate consideration."

A period of one year, Mr. Speaker, is very short. It is altogether too short in normal cases unless the nature of the claim is such that it impresses itself forcibly upon the mind of the person in whose favour the claim arises. That is not the situation here. Therefore I would urge not only that some better definition be written into the act of the time from which the period of limitation is to run but also that the period of limitation be extended. I am sure I am not alone in this house in having had professional experience of the way in which these altogether too short periods of limitation in our statutes very often work to the detriment of people who have otherwise legitimate claims. It cannot be said that these unduly short periods of limitation are necessary to protect the public interest. Very often it is simply a case of cutting off claims on an arbitrary basis so that government departments will not have to be bothered by the possibility of claims hanging over the department for a period of time beyond a year or so.

It seems to me that what we should have uppermost in our minds is the desire to do justice to people who are sustaining damage as a result of steps taken in pursuance of statutory authority by the government in the general public interest. It seems to me that the language in which the bill is drawn in that respect at the present time is bound to create hardship in many cases. I offer these suggestions in the hope that the minister will give them serious consideration, and that when the bill goes to the committee it may be revised accordingly.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, may I commend the minister for this bill. These problems would seem to arise in the southern part of Canada and do not apply to that part of British Columbia which I have the honour to represent. So far as my riding is concerned, the heaviest air traffic north and south is from Vancouver north through Cariboo and Whitehorse to Fairbanks. This is a good piece of legislation. It will eliminate the difficulties which other hon. members seem to think will have to be cleared up.

The large airports in our part of the country are not located near municipalities as the airports at Toronto and elsewhere are. Naturally there will be developments near these airports and this bill will prevent the creation of obstacles to aircraft. Therefore it is good legislation and the minister is farsighted in bringing it forward. I am sure he has in mind the northwest staging route for which he and his department are responsible. The main airports on that route are Prince George, Quesnel, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, and other points.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, there are just one or two comments I should like to make. It would seem that this bill applies only to land airports because the words used are "on lands adjacent to." I am thinking of an incident which arose this week in my riding having to do with the mooring of ships adjacent to a marine landing and I am wondering if that would be covered.

Mr. Chevrier: It is wide enough to cover sea bases.

Mr. Gibson: There might be other floating objects to consider.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in order to cover all the points that have been raised this evening by hon. members I suppose I would have to infringe the rule you laid down, but I think the house will want me to deal generally with some of the objections that have been raised. In doing so I shall try to keep in mind the ruling of His Honour the Speaker.

This is a simple bill. While the zoning regulations may be somewhat complicated I am afraid there is some misapprehension about the application of the restrictions. I should like to deal with that because it is dependent upon the matter of compensation which follows. There seems to be an idea in the minds of hon. members that this legislation is going to affect far more people than in fact it will. It is intended by this bill to create three zoning areas or restrictive areas surrounding airports. The first is that within a radius of 13,000 feet from the centre of an airport no building shall rise to a height of more than 150 feet. My information is that at airports such as Malton and Dorval no building exists that would be in contravention of that zoning regulation.

The second zoning restriction is that in the approaches at the end of the runways having a width of 1,200 feet at the runway end, by a depth of 10,000 feet, and a width of 4,000 feet at the outer end, no building shall rise more than one foot for every 50 feet out. In the third area on the lateral slopes of the flightways no building shall rise more than one foot for every 7 feet out.

I am not able to say how these restrictions will affect different airports such as Vancouver, Malton, Dorval and the like, but it is my understanding that the results of this legislation will not be nearly as serious as seems to be the thought of some hon. members.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), when dealing with compensation a while ago, said that adequate or fair compensation should be paid for the use of the property.

Mr. Fleming: Not paid for the use, paid for the interference with or the restriction upon the use.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to enter into an argument with my hon. friend but he did use the word "use". He may not have intended to use it. The point I want to make is that these regulations do not interfere, broadly speaking, with the use. They are easements in connection with the area at the end of runways and on the side. In other words, they are in effect avigation rights, as they are called in the United States.

Mr. Graydon: How do these compare with the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: I am going to come to that at a later stage in my remarks.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if he has considered the opening words of section 1 (1) (j) which gives the power to make regulations and where the words "use and location of buildings, structures and objects" are used?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should say at this point that we should not deal with the bill section by section on second reading.

Mr. Chevrier: That confirms my impression of my hon. friend having used the word "use". I do not want to get into an argument with him about what he said or did not say. I am simply trying to be helpful. If there are any buildings that must be taken down they will be taken down in the ordinary manner. They will be expropriated under the ordinary rules of expropriation and compensation and will be paid in the ordinary manner. There should not be any difficulty as to that and I presume that is why the word is used in the section to which I have no right to refer.

The three zoning areas that will be established will, as I tried to indicate a while ago, create what are known as easements over property or avigation rights. It is proposed to compensate to the extent mentioned in the bill for those rights. My hon. friend has said that the time limit is not long enough and that the compensation provisions are not fair. We gave this matter careful consideration and we think they are fair having regard to the law elsewhere.

This is a departure from ordinary practice. We are entering into a new field. There is no provision for compensation under the law of the United States. I understand that the federal government there has no zoning regulations; it is the states which pass legislation authorizing the municipalities so to do. Airports are zoned there in the same manner as municipal buildings are zoned and no compensation is paid. I am informed that the practice is somewhat different in the United Kingdom and that in certain cases compensation is paid in accordance with the statute which defines the method of compensation. Our officers have studied the methods of procedure in those two countries, and have come to the conclusion that this would be as fair a method of dealing with the situation as can be found.

Mr. Graydon: You did not enlarge on the United Kingdom regulations.

Mr. Chevrier: I could; but I should like to go on and deal with some other points that were raised.

It has been suggested that this is a clear infringement of property and civil rights. If there were no Aeronautics case, if there were no Johannsen versus the rural municipality of St. Paul case, it would be. In view of those two decisions, it is not. According to those decisions the federal government, under the sections of the British North America Act mentioned particularly in the latter decision, has the right to zone airdromes.

The member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked whether the municipalities will be required to pay compensation. I should like to answer that question in this fashion. We propose to proceed with the zoning of a number of federal airports almost immediately, that is the main transcontinental airports that perhaps require zoning more than others. This might well include a number of municipal airports. In the case of the Calgary, Fredericton and Saint John airports, no question will arise at all because I do not think—I say this subject to correction—anyone will suffer because of the three zones to which I referred earlier. I am not able to speak with the same authority in so far as Edmonton is concerned. At that point another problem arises because the airport is used partly by civilian aircraft and partly by military aircraft.

In that case it would be unfair, I think, to ask the municipality to pay compensation when the traffic is in part military. But on the other hand it is expected that the municipality will pay a portion of the contribution. How much will it amount to? In some cases it may amount to absolutely nothing. In other cases it may be a very small amount. In any event it will be impossible to determine the amount until such time as the regulations have been made for each and every airport separately. In order to answer my hon. friends I must qualify any definite yes or no in that fashion.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question. If it is the intention that the municipality should pay a portion of the compensation, why is there no provision in the bill covering that payment?

Mr. Chevrier: We do not think that is necessary, any more than it is necessary—

Mr. Green: To clarify my question may I say that the right is given to sue the crown for compensation. There is no such thing as suing the municipality, and yet in some way or other the municipality is to be dragged into this picture to pay part of the compensation. What puzzles me is why there is no provision in the bill to make that possible?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no provision in the bill for two reasons. First, because in some cases the municipal airport lies outside of the boundary of the municipality. Certainly that is the case in one municipality I have in mind now, and it probably is the case at Vancouver although I am not sure.

Mr. Green: Yes, it is.

Mr. Chevrier: That is one difficulty that lies in the way. Another difficulty is that I believe it is not an ideal way of drafting legislation to spell out all the eventualities that may arise.

The hon. member asks whether we shall confer with municipalities. Yes, of course; it is the intention to do that just as soon as a regulation covering an individual municipal airport has been drafted. We hope and believe that it will be possible to negotiate not only with the municipalities but with most of the property owners without the necessity of going into court.

There seems to be a great deal of objection to the time limit of one year. Again I am afraid I am infringing the order of the Speaker, but in order to answer that I shall have to deal to some extent with the bill. I shall try to avoid it if I can. If the bill is read carefully it will be seen that the one year does not begin to run until such time as the plan is deposited in the registry office. The plan is not deposited until, first of all, the regulations have been made covering the individual airport, and next those regulations have been published in the Canada Gazette and in two newspapers serving the area.

For instance, in the case of Malton, the property owners have been dealing with these questions for some months, in fact some years. They have gone ahead on their own, and I commend them for it. Unquestionably those people will immediately be notified of what is happening by the discussion in parliament, by the notice in the press, by the deposit of the plan in the registry office, and so I do not think they will suffer because of the time limit of one year. Surely there has to be a limit to the time within which a property owner can make his claim for compensation.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister explain how people are going to know that the regulations have been deposited against their titles? The mere deposit of the regulation does not bring it to the attention of the property owners.

Mr. Chevrier: No, but the notice in the press, the notice in the Canada Gazette, the discussion in the house, the fact that the bill came up here over a year ago and has been held ever since then, surely is some indication that the government intends to deal with zoning. Furthermore, the pressure that has been exercised by municipalities and various other public bodies upon the Department of Transport and the government to zone airports is, in itself, some indication of that intention.

I believe I have covered the ground as adequately as I can, Mr. Speaker. The bill will be referred to the committee where there can be a more minute and detailed discussion. I am sure the discussion which has taken place in this house will be of great benefit to the members of the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

DISCIPLINE AND ADMINISTRATION—COURTS MARTIAL—PENSIONS, SUPERANNUATION, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian forces.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I do not know whether the parliamentary assistant to the minister intends to make a statement on this bill. Might I suggest that when we go into committee, since the bill deals with amendments to four separate acts, an explanation be given for each of these sections as we come to them. For instance, the first section deals with the National Defence Act. When we start with the paragraphs dealing with that section, perhaps the parliamentary assistant would make a statement. Then the next part deals with the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the third with the Defence Services Pension Act and the fourth with the Senate and House of Commons Act. Rather than have a general statement now, perhaps it would simplify things if we had in committee a statement on each of those sections.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

The Chairman: In order to meet the wish of the hon. member for Nanaimo, may I ask if he wishes me to call each section as a whole?

Mr. Pearkes: I think you would have to call each section, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pearkes: But when we come to section 2, for instance—

The Chairman: I mean by subheadings. For instance, since the parliamentary assistant will make a statement on the amendment having to do with the National Defence Act, does the hon. member wish to have all clauses of the bill under that subheading considered at the same time?

Mr. Knowles: There is only one clause under that heading.

The Chairman: Yes, there is only one; and there is only one having to do with the Civil Service Superannuation Act, only one having to do with the Defence Services Pension Act and only one having to do with the Senate and House of Commons Act. Then, shall clause 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 1—Definition of "service estate".

Mr. Campney: If I may make a suggestion, I should like to do so. As the section to which we are now addressing ourselves contains I think seventeen subsections, and they deal with a number of different matters in relation to the National Defence Act, it might be more helpful if we took each subsection by itself and dealt with it on its own.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we should follow that procedure?

Mr. Knowles: There are 18 subsections.

Mr. Campney: Yes, there are 18.

The Chairman: Is that suggestion agreed to?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I think that is agreeable. Would the parliamentary assistant like to make a general statement now covering these amendments or is he going to explain each subsection?

Mr. Campney: I think the minister on the resolution, on two separate occasions—on May 7 and 13—covered the scope and purport of the bill. It might be more expeditious therefore if I dealt briefly with each subsection as it is called.

Subsection 1 of section 2 is a minor amendment. The National Defence Act defines "service estate" and sets the procedure as to how service estates shall be handled. It has been found in practice that there are occasionally portions of a serviceman's or a servicewoman's estate which it is not convenient to deal with under the administrative provisions of this act such as trust benefits or something of that nature, which are in the hands of other administrators. The purpose of this subsection is to permit the governor in council to exempt from the present definition of "service estate" any specific item in any instance in which it is deemed in the interests of the estate that this should be done.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 2.

Mr. Campney: I should like to suggest that subsections 2 and 3 stand until we come to subsection 17 because it also deals with the Geneva conventions which I think can be more appropriately explained at that time. May we allow those two subsections to stand for the moment?

Subsections 2 and 3 stand.

On subsection 4.

Mr. Campney: The purport of subsection 4 is to eliminate from the National Defence Act reference to the summary of evidence. The new regulations under the National Defence Act do not provide for a summary of evidence as experience shows that summaries of evidence tend to lead to error and sometimes may even prejudice an accused. This is due to the fact that summaries of evidence are prepared in many cases by persons without legal training. The amendment in subsection 4 of section 2 brings the National Defence Act in line with the regulations in that respect.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 5.

Mr. Campney: Subsection 5 does two things. Some years ago a system of progressive increases in rates of pay was established. A new punishment known as "forfeiture of service toward progressive increase in pay" was provided for in the National Defence Act. Regulations governing the administration of this punishment proved to be impracticable and consequently, when the Queen's regulations under the National Defence Act were promulgated, it was decided that the punishment should be abandoned. That is the first point covered by this subsection. The second is that in the descending scale of punishments set out in subsection 1 of section 121 of the National Defence Act, "severe reprimand" and "reprimand" are placed below punishment by fine. Experience has demonstrated that a fine in fact should be treated as a lower punishment than either a reprimand or a severe reprimand and it has therefore been decided to have its position in the scale changed accordingly. It is felt that about the most minor punishment that a commanding officer can give to a soldier for an offence is a fine of $5 or $10, and that a fine ought to be treated as less serious than a reprimand or a severe reprimand.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 6.

Mr. Campney: Subsection 6 is a consequential amendment dealing with the same matter.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 7.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, subsection 7 in conjunction with subsections 8 and 9 is inserted in the act for the purpose of extending, under certain restrictions, the categories of officers in the three services who can approve of punishments. Under the present regulations such an officer must be of the rank of commodore in the navy, brigadier in the army or air commodore in the air force. It has been found that, especially in view of the growing numbers of persons now in the services, quite occasionally a man of suitable rank is not quickly available to deal with and approve of punishments. It is sought by this subsection to make it possible to create an approving authority in the navy of a rank not below that of captain, in the army, colonel, or in the air force a group captain, in each case to be designated by the minister. The amendment is proposed in the interests of facilitating approval of punishment.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsections 8, 9 and 10.

Mr. Campney: Subsection 10 merely increases the authority of the commanding officer to delegate his powers to officers under his command within the limits set out in the subsection.

Subsections agreed to.

On subsection 11.

Mr. Campney: This is a consequential amendment dealing with the same subject I have previously referred to and which changed the order of punishment in regard to reprimand and fine.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to ask a question on subsection 10. Does this mean that a junior officer, for example a flight commander, can now give up to fourteen days' detention on the delegation of powers by a commanding officer?

Mr. Campney: The provision to which this subsection is an amendment itself qualifies that by saying that the commanding officer may, again subject to regulations made by the governor in council and to such extent as the commanding officer deems fit, delegate his powers.

Mr. Sinclair: It may be possible for a junior officer to sentence a man of that rank to fourteen days.

Mr. Campney: If he was so authorized by his commanding officer.

Mr. Goode: I should like to know if the parliamentary assistant can clarify this. I should like to know how far a commanding officer can go in delegating his authority. I have known a lot of second lieutenants in the army who should not have that authority. How far can a commanding officer go down the line before it stops?

Mr. Campney: The power of delegation is limited; the most serious punishment which can be given by a delegated officer is detention not exceeding fourteen days, and lesser punishments, namely severe reprimand, reprimand and fine not exceeding basic pay for fifteen days and what are termed minor punishments.

Subsection 11 has already been dealt with by me. It is the same point, the relative position of fines, reprimands and severe reprimands.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 12.

Mr. Goode: I am still not satisfied. I had quite a little to do about this, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Coast-Capilano had also, and that is why he asked the question. How far can this go? I would like an answer from the parliamentary assistant. If he cannot give it now perhaps he will let me know in a couple of days how far the commanding officer can go down the line before he reaches the point where he cannot delegate the authority to a junior officer. I would not want to think that this house was going to pass an amendment under which a second lieutenant, or a lieutenant in a junior command, could give a man fourteen days. I would like to have that information.

Mr. Campney: It is my understanding that the commanding officer, subject to approval, can give punishments up to 90 days detention, but under this subsection as it is now proposed he cannot delegate the giving of punishment by a junior officer beyond 14 days detention, and the lesser punishments to which I have already referred.

Mr. Sinclair: Does the accused still have the right to ask for a court martial in this case? If there is a summary trial before the commanding officer or a junior officer where he is going to be sentenced to detention, has he the right to ask for a court martial?

Mr. Campney: As I understand it under the new code of service discipline, a private has no right under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano to ask for a court martial, but a non-commissioned officer would, as detention automatically involves reduction in rank.

Mr. Sinclair: My recollection of the last war is that in a case where the commanding officer was going to pass punishment which affected the man's pocketbook, as a detention does, he asked the man this question: Are you going to accept my punishment? The hon. member for Nanaimo will confirm me in that, I am sure. Then, with respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond and myself, in the case of a man being sentenced to 14 days, has he not the right to ask for a full court martial as he had before? Then there is the other point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, to how junior an officer can these powers be delegated to put a man away for 14 days?

Mr. Goode: Before this subsection passes I should like an undertaking that we will get some information on it. I am surprised that the hon. member for Nanaimo has not raised some question on this because no one in the house has more experience in these matters than he has. I have taken men up in front of junior officers for punishment, and I would not want to see this power delegated to those ranks by any amendment. Before this amendment goes through I should like to have a full understanding from the department that this authority is not to be delegated to junior officers.

Mr. Campney: The regulations provide that the authority may not be delegated to officers below the rank of captain in the army and an equivalent rank in the other services.

Mr. Goode: I would take it that this amendment has to do with captains handling these matters, and that is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Mutch: Would that delegation of power apply in the case of a detachment commander of lower rank than a captain?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that under the Queen's regulations the detachment commander has the same power as the C.O., subject to the C.O. in his case having approved of his having that power.

Mr. Mutch: So that in such a case the detachment commander can be and very often is an officer junior in the army to a captain or a similar rank?

Mr. Campney: It could be in that case, yes.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 13 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 17.

Mr. Pearkes: We would like to get an explanation, because this is the most important subsection of these whole amendments.

Mr. Campney: In August of 1949 the Geneva conventions were entered into. I think they were instituted under the leadership of the Red Cross and resulted from a conference held under the aegis of the Swiss government. They provided for, I think it may be said, the creation or the definition of a series of new crimes called grave breaches, such as torture, biological experiment, and generally a type of crime that I suppose arose in the second world war from the activities of the nazis and from the same type of crime perpetrated by the communists, and which have come to be quite widespread. These conventions provide that countries which subscribe to the conventions agree to enact legislation to enable them to bring persons guilty of such crimes before their courts. In other words the people who have charge of such persons are to be charged with the responsibility of bringing them to trial. Canada has not yet subscribed to the Geneva conventions; but in the event that such action is taken it will be necessary to have certain provisions in the National Defence Act to establish the authority of Canadian tribunals to try alleged offenders. In the opinion of the authorities in the departments of justice, of external affairs and of national defence, such trials, if held in Canada, should take place in the civil courts. The two subsections I had stand over, and this subsection 17, seek to provide the legislation which would make the sanctions of the Geneva conventions operative, if subscribed to by Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Is it not rather unusual to put on the statute books legislation in connection with an international treaty which, I understood the parliamentary assistant to say, had not been ratified by Canada?

Mr. Campney: The last section of the bill provides that those sections dealing with grave breaches under the Geneva conventions of 1949 will not be effective so far as Canada is concerned unless and until brought into effect by the governor in council. That, of course, would only be in the event that the Geneva conventions are ratified by Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Would these regulations apply to a person who was not a citizen of Canada, but was residing here? I am referring to a foreigner who is not one of our nationals, but who committed a crime in Canada? Would it also apply to a Canadian national, if the crime were committed outside Canada? In that event, would that Canadian national be tried by a Canadian court martial, or would he be tried by the court of the country in which the crime was committed?

Mr. Campney: If the foreigner were in Canada he would be tried here in Canada by the civil courts. But if a Canadian citizen were abroad, then under the terms of the Geneva convention he could be tried by the country by which he is held in custody if it, too, were a subscriber to the conventions. Or he could be handed back to Canada, or tried in any way the country in whose custody he was—that country being a signatory to this convention—should see fit.

Mr. Pearkes: Well, may I have a clearer interpretation? Let us say there is a Canadian soldier in Korea or China at the present time who is accused of committing one of these crimes. I think the parliamentary assistant suggested something in connection with germ warfare, when he explained the nature of the crimes. Then do I understand we are agreeing that the Canadian soldier could be tried by a Chinese court, and punished while he is in China? Surely that is taking a very different attitude from that which is being taken now when the United States, or perhaps I should say the United Nations, object to the returning of prisoners of war who do not wish to be returned. This, it seems to me, is going in the very opposite direction. We are saying here that a Canadian who is charged with such a crime as this may be tried by an enemy court, or a court of a country which may at least be only a neutral.

Mr. Campney: My understanding is that if a citizen of one country that is a party to these conventions, whether he be a soldier or a civilian, were in another country which is also a party to the convention, he could be dealt with by the country in which he is located in regard to these grave breaches of the article of the treaty to which I have referred.

Mr. Green: That is, if China were a party to the convention—

Mr. Campney: Yes; both countries have to be parties to the convention, of course.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the parliamentary assistant tell us which countries are signatories to the convention?

Mr. Campney: So far the following states have ratified: Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, the Holy See, India, Italy, Yugoslavia, Lebanon, Monaco, Norway, Pakistan, Switzerland, Liechtenstein and Jordania.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice that neither the United States, the United Kingdom, France nor Canada have signed.

Mr. Campney: Canada has not ratified.

Mr. Pearkes: Then I suggest that we are moving too quickly in this matter. A great deal more consideration should be given to it. I asked some questions at the resolution stage, as to whom this applied, and I think we should have some further detailed explanation before we agree to allowing our nationals to be tried in foreign courts for these grave breaches of the Geneva convention. Apparently none of the major nations of the world have agreed to a similar condition.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Have it stand.

Mr. Green: Eleven o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall this subsection stand?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it carried?

Mr. Pearkes: No. 18—but not No. 17.

The Chairman: Then I understand that subsection 18 will carry, and 17 stand.

Subsection 17 stands.

Subsection 18 agreed to.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will proceed with the following bills and resolutions: Bill No. 63, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 196, to amend the Supreme Court Act; Bill No. 197, to amend the Interpretation Act; the resolution to approve the supplementary extradition convention; Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan; and the resolution to approve ratification of the convention respecting the crime of genocide.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister whether it is understood that if second reading is given Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan, the bill will then be referred to the standing committee on external affairs?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is what I think, although I have not consulted the interested minister. However, to date every proceeding that has come from his department has been sent to that fine committee on external affairs, and if he consults me I will advise him that it may be a good thing to refer it to that committee.

Mr. Fleming: I understood there was an arrangement to that effect.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not the minister interested in that department but I will do my best to convince him that it should go to that committee.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952. This is the English copy. The French copy will be ready in a few days.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if the report on the operations of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, which he has just tabled, will be available in quantity for distribution among the members before the second reading of the bill is proceeded with?

Mr. Prudham: I am informed that it is now coming off the press, and should be ready within the next couple of days for distribution.

QUESTIONS

ST. MARGARETS, N. B., DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. Brooks:

1. Did the Department of National Defence or any other government department issue contracts for a development project at St. Margarets, near Chatham airport, Chatham, New Brunswick?

2. If so, was the contract on a cost plus basis, and what was the cost?

3. Did the contract include the clearing and cutting of lumber on this area?

4. If so, how much lumber and pulpwood was cut, and what credit did the government receive for the same?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. The contract is on a cost plus fixed fee basis in the total amount of $2,600,000, of which $119,000 represents the fixed fee.

3. Yes.

4. Approximately 75 cords of wood have been cut. The contractor is using the wood to meet his fuel requirements. So far, none of the wood has been sold but if any is sold the government will be credited with the proceeds.

TORONTO ISLANDS—EROSION AND FLOODING

Mr. Hees:

1. Has the government received a report from the engineer sent to investigate the damage caused by flooding and erosion to the Toronto islands?

2. If so, what is the recommendation of the engineer for protective works to prevent further deterioration?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1 and 2. Matter under investigation.

GRANTING OF CONSUMER CREDITS BY BANKS

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. Are chartered banks in Canada in any way restricted in the granting of credits to vendors of household furniture, household appliances, motor cars, electrical equipment or other consumer goods?

2. If so, in what way?

ELEVATOR COMPANIES—GRAIN HANDLED FOR WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Wright:

1. What are the names of the elevator companies who handled grain for the wheat board, during the five-year pool?

2. How many elevators did each such company have: (a) country elevators; (b) terminal elevators?

3. What was the amount of grain handled by each company for the wheat board, during the five-year pool?

4. What was the amount handled for the wheat board by each of these companies, for the crop year 1950-51?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I am told this question cannot be answered for two reasons: One is that the information asked for in Nos. 3 and 4 is not available from the privately-owned elevators, and there is objection to giving the answer for publicly-owned elevators since that answer would disclose the competitive position of each elevator company. I ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

INDIANS ON RESERVES—PAYMENT OF CHILDREN'S ALLOWANCES

Mr. Wright:

1. Is it the custom of the Department of Health and Welfare to pay children's allowances in cash directly to Indian mothers on reserves?
2. If not, how are such allowances paid?

Mr. McCusker:

1. In 86·4 per cent Indian cases, family allowances are paid directly to Indian mothers.

2. In the remaining cases, allowances are paid either to the Indian agency trust account (2·3 per cent) or in kind (11·3 per cent).

TRAFFIC INFRACTIONS, ETC.—QUESTIONING OF OFFENDERS REGARDING RACIAL ORIGIN

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. In apprehending motorists for minor traffic infractions do members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police question the offender concerning his racial origin?
2. If so, is this a general practice in connection with all minor legal infractions, and for what purpose is the information needed?

Mr. Garson: I shall answer this question orally. The answer to question No. 1 is no.

Question No. 2 is answered by No. 1.

UTILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS SANDS

Mr. Nickle:

What progress has been made over the past year by scientists working under the direction of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in matters related to the bituminous sands of north-eastern Alberta, with particular reference to economic mining of the sands, separation of bitumen from the sand, and processing of bitumen into usable products, and any other progress towards utilization of the bituminous sands?

Mr. Prudham: The question asked relates to the work during the past year of the scientists of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys on the problems of utilizing the bituminous sands of Alberta. In this period the scientists have designed, installed and operated a small low-pressure hydrogenation plant and in their experiments have successfully removed the high sulphur content from gas oil derived from bitumen. The gas oil is a field product that would be distilled from bitumen derived by either the cold-water or hot-water method of separating the bitumen from the sands and it is necessary to design a further step or process in which sulphur is removed before the oil, which would otherwise be very corrosive and unacceptable, is pipelined to refineries. The application of hydrogenation provides one of the important fundamental answers required by industry and Mr. S. M. Blair, the technical consultant employed by the Alberta government. This work on hydrogenation is being pursued intensively to obtain proper data for its commercial application and when put into practice there would be important by-product recovery of sulphur, a mineral in very short supply.

During the year the mines branch of the department has also proceeded intensively with the obtaining of equipment and its installation in a laboratory designed for extensive fundamental research in hydrogenation at variable pressures up to an extreme high pressure of 20,000 pounds per square inch. This plant will work on the Alberta bitumen problem and it may be that the eventual most economic utilization of the tar sands for production of gasoline and other high-grade fuels will involve a wider use of the hydrogenation process than its mere application to sulphur removal.

One of the laboratories has also been engaged in fundamental studies of the constitution of bitumen and throughout the year the federal scientists have been in close consultation and collaboration with the technical consultant of the Alberta government. At the symposium on the bituminous sands held in Edmonton last September, which was largely attended by representatives of the oil industry, the department was represented by its director general of scientific services, Dr. George S. Hume, who is a leading oil geologist and by a group of scientists from the federal mines branch. These scientists took a leading part in the conference by their presentation of papers on the work the dominion government has carried out to assist exploitation of the bituminous or oil sand resources of Alberta.

It is necessary to a proper understanding of the present work to have some background information. Following many years of work by mines branch on surface exploration of the deposits and on preliminary studies of uses for the bitumen, the dominion government in 1942 embarked on a project to definitely find workable deposits for their oil content and to determine the practicability of producing gasoline and high-grade fuels. This program on the one hand consisted of extensive drilling. A method had to be found which would properly sample the deposits at depth and when successful core-drilling had been accomplished the method was applied over extensive areas. This work during 1942 to 1947 produced the first information on which actual exploitation of the deposits could be based. Its most important finding was the location in the vicinity of the Mildred-Ruth lakes, 20 miles north of Fort McMurray, of a deposit of better grade sands containing, in an area of four and a half square miles, 900 million barrels of oil or sufficient to operate a twenty thousand barrel per day oil plant for more than one hundred years.

Concurrently with starting the drilling for workable deposits the federal scientists and engineers joined efforts on the economic aspects of exploiting the oil sands with Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited and Abasand Oils Limited, the latter the only organization with a plant for separation operations.

Oil froth separated from the sands was shipped to Universal Oil Products Company in Chicago and pilot plant tests there gave the first definite information on the possibilities of the bituminous sands for producing standard commercial petroleum products. It was still necessary to develop an efficient method for separating the very heavy oil from the sands and a field process to remove its heavy characteristics and sulphur.

The Abasand Oils Limited plant was rebuilt with federal aid and tests were made of the McClave hot-water process. Before the plant was destroyed accidentally by fire in 1945 a start had been made at developing a cold-water process which was later fully developed by test runs in a pilot plant installed at the mines branch in Ottawa, which plant was also used to develop means for reducing the heavy oil to a light gas oil.

Thus the scientists of the department have been engaged in a consecutive, co-ordinated investigation designed to assist the oil industry and the Alberta government in determining the best and most practicable means of utilizing the oil in the bituminous sands and through the current work is providing an answer to the problem of how to remove sulphur from the intermediate gas-oil product.

UNIVERSITIES—FEDERAL AID

Mr. Eudes:

For a copy of all correspondence and agreements between the government of Canada or any member thereof, and the conference of Canadian universities, and/or provincial authorities; also for a copy of all orders in council and regulations, relating to federal aid to universities, since June 30, 1951.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BY-LAWS PASSED IN VIRTUE OF CHAPTER 172 OF THE REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA

Mr. Pouliot:

For a copy of the by-laws passed by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company in virtue of chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927.

He said: May I say one word please, Mr. Speaker?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a correction in the French version of this motion. The English text mentions "by-laws", while in the French text the word "statuts" is used. It is the word "règlements" which should have been used. I do not wish to have the statutes of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways; what I am asking for is their by-laws.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the hon. member would allow this motion to stand?

Motion stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION AS TO AUTHORIZATION OF SEVEN-DAY WORK WEEK IN WESTERN COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister approved a western army command order for a seven-day work week placed in effect last Monday, under which all ranks of the Princess Patricia's based at Calgary have been required to move from their homes into barracks, these including many Korean war veterans who have already spent a year separated from their wives and families.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have had no notice of the question, but I shall be glad to look into the matter.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO TICKET OF LEAVE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 63, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Before the motion is carried, Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear a statement from the minister about the rehabilitation of prisoners.

Mr. Garson: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I can state more comprehensively or succinctly the purpose of the bill than the manner in which it is set out in the explanatory note. As the hon. member for Temiscouata has just implied this bill will work towards the rehabilitation of prisoners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Ticket of leave.

Mr. Fleming: I have a question on section 1 of the bill. I am aware, of course, that the language of the proposed new section 159A quite closely parallels the language of the present section 107. May I ask the minister, as a matter of practice, what type of person is authorized by the minister, in that behalf, in the language of line 18—which is also in section 107 of the present act—to participate in the issuance of those licences.

Mr. Garson: I have not had any occasion to sign any such authorization within the last couple of years, but the whole process, which is one of actual remission, would be handled in our remissions branch. The applications are so infrequent they would be pretty well on an ad hoc basis.

Mr. Fleming: How extensively has the licensing power been issued in the case of the Good Shepherd reformatory, say in the last year or two? Has the licensing power been quite extensively used?

Mr. Garson: Not very extensively. I have not the number of cases, but I can get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask a question or two about this inter-provincial home for young women. I take it that is a government institution?

Mr. Garson: It is an intergovernmental institution of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are there any other institutions besides the one mentioned in the bill to which this act will apply?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is this the first alteration since the revised statutes of 1927?

Mr. Garson: There are no other institutions to which this particular bill will apply, but there are a number of other institutions to which the act which this bill amends applies.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The same principle?

Mr. Garson: The same principle.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO DATES OF SESSIONS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 196, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is one point that I would ask the Minister of Justice to clear up for the house on this short bill. Reference is made in the explanatory note to the fact that the amendment is made in pursuance of a recommendation made by the judges of the supreme court. May I ask if the recommendation or the request of the judges of the supreme court was for precisely the two changes which the bill provides for in the calendar of the court?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the answer to my hon. friend's question is yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

INTERPRETATION ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO REPORTS TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 197, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Reports to parliament.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering what gave rise to this particular bill. One can easily see the object of it, but have there been any cases where the effect of the law as it stands at present would have required the tabling of any report at two sessions of parliament in the same year?

Mr. Garson: Yes. If my hon. friend will examine, for example, the Department of Insurance Act, 1932, chapter 45, section 9, he will find that it reads as follows:

> The minister shall lay before parliament within thirty days after the commencement of each session thereof the annual report of the superintendent made to the minister under the provisions of each of the acts specified in the schedule to this act.

A literal interpretation of that section would require, I think, an annual filing of the report in question and of all subsequent reports.

Another example is in the Penitentiary Act, 1939, chapter 6, section 14, which provides:

> The minister shall submit to the governor in council an annual report upon the penitentiaries, prisons and other institutions under his control, to be laid before both houses of parliament within the first twenty-one days of each session thereof . . .

These are just drafting errors which it is the purpose of this present bill to cure in all cases in which they have occurred. This bill will require the tabling, as I think was the intention of parliament, of each of these reports in one session, namely the session which takes place next after their preparation.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps it is not unreasonable to observe that the matter out of which this bill arises draws attention to the desirability of our not having any more second sessions in any year.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether any other cases of need for amending the Interpretation Act have been brought to his attention? It is a long while since this act was amended. We at times run into experiences which make us wonder what certain words mean. Have any representations been made to the minister for amendments to clarify the meaning of some of the words defined in this act?

Mr. Garson: If by his question my hon. friend means to ask whether there are other statutes of Canada in which there are sections relating to the tabling of annual reports, similar to those which I have just quoted, the answer would be yes. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, for example, contains another of such sections. But if by his question he means to ask whether other examples have been brought to my attention of other drafting errors in other statutes, the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles: That is not quite what I mean. What I meant was this. Are there in the Interpretation Act any definitions which have turned out to be ambiguous to such an extent that they have required amending or is this the only amendment that seems to be required in the Interpretation Act, out of current experience?

Mr. Garson: This is the only case which has been brought to my attention or of which I know at the present time.

EXTRADITION

APPROVAL OF SUPPLEMENTARY CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA SIGNED ON OCTOBER 26, 1951

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the supplementary extradition convention between the United States of America and Canada, signed at Ottawa on October 26, 1951, amending the supplementary extradition convention between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, signed at Washington on December 13, 1900, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make several brief comments on this extradition treaty. I have no doubt that it will receive general support in the house. Nevertheless I think there are two or three observations which may perhaps usefully be made.

Those who sat in the house in 1945 will not soon forget the extradition convention of that time which was submitted to this house for ratification and was then referred by the house to the standing committee on external affairs for study and review. In the committee that extradition convention was found to be one unworthy of the support of the house. The committee held extensive hearings during the course of which they heard many representations, all of them adverse to the convention.

The distinguishing feature of that particular extradition convention was a long list of extraditable offences which were created, which had no counterpart in the criminal law of Canada, and which would in effect have created, for the purpose of extradition to the United States, offences which were then not offences under the criminal law of Canada.

I think it is worth observing, sir, that the standing committee on external affairs at that time rendered an important public service in providing an opportunity for many persons and organizations interested in the subject to make their representations to a public body or organ of this House of Commons; and in arriving at the conclusion that the committee could not recommend the ratification of that convention I consider the committee also rendered an important and useful service.

Now, sir, the convention before the house at the present time is a very different-looking document from that of 1945. To that extent it is a substantial improvement. Actually it purports to introduce two amendments only in section 11 of the extradition convention between Canada and the United States of December 13, 1900. These two amendments, sir, do have counterparts in the criminal law of this country. We were assured in the committee that the proposed new section 11A of the convention has its counterpart in sections 404 and 444 of the Criminal Code, and the proposed new section 11B has its counterpart in section 209 of the Criminal Code.

Sir, there has been a good deal of publicity given to negotiations leading up to this convention; and it may not be amiss to point out the limitations on the scope of this convention. Considerable publicity has been given to the operation of certain Canadian stock salesmen who use the mails or the telegraph or the telephone in the course of their efforts to sell stocks to United States buyers, and whose communications, in the course of those efforts, pass the international boundary.

I think there are some sections of the public who have come to the conclusion that this extradition convention will have the effect of making it an extraditable offence to convey certain forms of representations in connection with the sale of stock by Canadian salesmen speaking in Canada over the telephone to persons in the United States, or sending telegrams from Canadian points to persons resident in the United States. At its meeting on May 13, the committee on external affairs had an opportunity of clarifying the effect of this convention. And may I again point out, sir, that as in 1945, and as on a good many other occasions, the standing committee on external affairs has rendered an important and useful service in connection with this convention.

The matter was clarified to this extent that when Mr. Varcoe, the deputy minister of justice, was asked questions with reference to the limitations of the convention, the matter was summed up finally in this question and answer at page 283 of the proceedings of the committee on external affairs on May 13. I asked this question:

> It is quite clear that representations made across the border by someone in Canada by telephone, telegraph, radio or television would not be within the scope of this treaty and would not be an extraditable offence?
> Mr. Varcoe: I would think it would not.

And, sir, that answer, as well as answers given to other questions in the course of the hearing in the committee, make it quite clear that the only form in which misrepresentations become the occasion of the commission of an extraditable offence is when those communications are committed to the post office, and when the United States mails, in the course of transportation of those written communications, are used in the course of forwarding or delivery.

There is one other matter, sir, that did interest the committee, and it does interest a number of Canadian dealers in securities, who are carrying on a quite legitimate and proper business. I am sure hon. members are aware of the difficulties that have confronted a great many issues, oftentimes small issues, of Canadian securities at the hands of the securities exchange commission of the United States, whose standards are exceedingly rigid, and were written with regard to the fact that in the United States the securities business relates more—at least to a greater extent than in Canada—to the securities of established enterprises, and much less than in Canada to the securities of corporations and syndicates issued in the course of pioneer development work, or as we speak of it, enterprises involving the use of risk capital.

There has been under discussion for some time a proposal on the part of the securities exchange commission of the United States for easing its requirements with reference to small issues of stock which Canadian corporations may desire to market in the United States. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), when appearing before the committee, very properly drew attention to this fact, and to the prospect held out of some alleviation for smaller Canadian stock issues proposed to be marketed in the United States of the very rigid requirements now imposed on all such issues by the securities exchange commission.

At page 286 of the proceedings the minister had this to say:

> Hon. Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want unduly to influence the decision of the committee at this stage, but I think that I should point out that the brokers who are in business of raising this money in Canada were rather interested in getting a short term of registration in the United States, and the chairman of the American Securities Commission giving evidence in the United States the other day concerning this supplementary extradition convention with Canada said:
> "I think the committee should be aware of the fact that the commission is giving consideration to providing some kind of short form registration for small Canadian offerings, and upon ratification of this treaty by both nations would probably proceed to do something along those lines."
> I think it would be very much in the interests of the investment industry here that this should be approved as soon as we can, and then they could proceed to get this short-form of registration which is so much desired by the investment fraternity in Canada.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that observation was very properly put before the committee by the Minister of Justice, and in further questions and answers the minister did give assurance to the committee that the government would make representations in this behalf in order that this desirable easing of the strict requirements of the securities exchange commission should be brought about in so far as the marketing of small issues of Canadian stocks and securities in the United States is concerned.

Sir, there is one final matter I should like to mention. It does not arise directly out of the terms of the convention; nevertheless I think it is a proper matter for comment in the discussion of this measure at the present stage.

There are some who, when hearing of sales of Canadian stocks to Americans, under conditions of high pressure, leap to the conclusion that there are many Canadians engaged in this nefarious form of the sale of securities, and who seek to put all, or at least many, Canadians who are engaged in the securities business in the same category.

I wish to enter an emphatic protest against conclusions of that kind because, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, they are not warranted. Those engaged in Canada in the securities business are, in the overwhelming majority, people who are honest, and who are carrying on a perfectly legitimate and useful trade. Simply that there happen to be a few renegades, or high-pressure artists, is no reason whatever for heaping opprobrium and suspicion upon the great majority of those who are properly engaged in this very legitimate and necessary business.

And, sir, there is one aspect of the subject in which in the past the actions taken by certain American governmental officers have been highly improper. It is not unusual for Canadians in recent times to receive from officials of the American government or state governments, subpoenas delivered in Canada, if you please, to appear before commissions or officials in the United States, and to bring with them the books and records of Canadian corporations. Situations of that kind have been brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I know he has intervened in such cases, pointing out to the American authorities that their writ does not run in Canada, and that when officers of any American government, whether federal or state, undertake to issue orders to Canadians in Canada either to appear personally before American boards or commissions or to produce books and records in that country, they have no right to do so.

Think of the position in which Canadians have been placed by the issuance of such unauthorized orders and subpoenas, when they are served in Canada without any authority or warrant. When Canadians have chosen to ignore these unauthorized subpoenas and orders, as they are quite entitled to do, it has meant that if at any time in the future they enter the United States they have thereby rendered themselves subject to detention.

That has been a high-handed action on the part of many American governmental officers against which I think it is quite proper in this place to protest very strongly. It is not to be supposed that these subpoenas and orders have been issued simply in the case of Canadian salesmen who have been attempting to sell their securities by high-pressure methods. Far from it. In many cases these have been served upon Canadians only by registered mail, Canadians who are carrying on a perfectly legitimate business here in Canada, and without any offence under the laws of either Canada or the United States.

[Mr. Fleming.]

I hope Canadians will not be subjected to high-handed and unauthorized interference of this kind. It should be made clear to all American governmental authorities that the American writ does not run in Canada. The only writ that runs in Canada is the writ of Canada or of any province.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as a witness who appeared before the committee on external affairs, I should like to deal with some points of law connected with this resolution, and to express my appreciation of the attitude shown by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, not only in the speech he has just delivered in this chamber but in the constructive analysis he made of the resolution when it was before the external affairs committee.

With the greater part of what he has said today, and what he said then, I find myself in agreement. I think it should be rather difficult to imagine any argument more convincing for the support of this resolution than the one he has just made. There are however one or two points he raised about which I should like to make a few observations, in order to complete the picture for those members who are not lawyers.

He has said that on previous occasions the effort of the United States government has been to secure an extradition treaty covering these matters, in which the principle of single criminality would be observed. That is to say, the United States government previously wished to extradite Canadian citizens from Canada to the United States to stand trial there for an offence which was a crime under American law but not under Canadian law.

Thanks to the stand taken by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), that position of the American government was resisted, with the result that we have here an extradition treaty in which the principle of double criminality has been strictly observed. Under this treaty no Canadian can be taken from Canada under an extradition order until application has been made under the treaty to a Canadian court, and until lawyers representing the United States government can convince that Canadian court that there is evidence establishing a prima facie case against such Canadian under the law in Canada which is analogous to the American law for an alleged breach of which the Canadian citizen would be tried if extradited to the United States. In that way a Canadian citizen has ample protection against being extradited, unless and until a Canadian court has first been satisfied that a prima facie case has been made out against him here.

When the Canadian citizen is extradited to the United States he can there be charged under the American analogue of the law in Canada under which the extradition application in the Canadian court was made. If he is found guilty, of course he has to bear punishment. If on the other hand he is acquitted there he must be released and cannot be charged in the United States for the breach of any other law of that country.

It can be seen from this that no legitimate businessman, who has not been guilty of an offence against the laws either of Canada or of the United States, stands in any appreciable jeopardy of being extradited under this treaty. Indeed the interests of all the legitimate investment dealers have been greatly served by the conclusion of this treaty because, as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said, one of the things which the legitimate businessmen in Canada have long desired in order to get American risk capital for investment in this country has been some method whereby it would be possible to put Canadian stock issues upon the market in the United States without going through the very expensive and cumbersome regulations of the securities exchange commission of that country.

The rule in that country is that the securities exchange commission have the discretionary power to exempt issues not exceeding $300,000 in any one year of United States companies provided that they complete the short form application only. That is a much more simple and economical method than having to comply with the very stringent regulations of the securities exchange commission. The position which the United States authorities have taken consistently up until the present time is that they are not desirous of extending the privilege of selling stock issues in that country under the short-form registration unless they are satisfied that they have available in their law in connection with the sale of such issues sanctions against fraud or other such forms of irregularity. As they put it, the existence of these broad sanctions is the premise upon which the grants of exemption from full compliance with their long-form regulations by the securities exchange commission is based. The securities exchange commission has taken the position in the United States in relation to domestic stock issues, and it takes the same position with regard to foreign stock issues, that under the law they could not properly extend exemptions to any situation where these sanctions against fraud did not exist. They obviously do not exist in the case of an offerer of stock residing in a country with which the United States does not have an extradition treaty with a reasonable fraud coverage. The United States contention has been that the fraud coverage which prevailed formerly under the treaty of 1900 was not sufficiently wide to cover them in the case of short-form issues.

It follows from that by a process of logic, which they have not attempted to deny or resist, that if such treaty should be agreed upon, and especially if the requisite sanctions against fraud could be made possible, the commission would give sympathetic consideration to such a request for a short-form registration, and would endeavour to work out for legitimate business in Canada a method by which they could have recourse to this short-form registration in the United States. This is a privilege which I think I am safe in saying is considered of great value by Canadian promoters and investment dealers.

The quotation which the hon. member for Eglinton referred to in his remarks of a few minutes ago as having been used by myself before our external affairs committee was from a statement by commissioner R. B. McEntire, of the securities exchange commission in the United States. He made the following statement in March of this year before the committee on foreign relations of the United States Senate:

> I think the committee should be aware of the fact that the commission is giving consideration to providing some kind of short-form registration for small Canadian offerings, and upon ratification of this treaty by both nations would probably proceed to do something along those lines.

It seems to me that this is going as far as any civil servant could go under the circumstances under which this statement was made. For these reasons, especially the ones which the hon. member for Eglinton has so eloquently put forward, I think it is distinctly in the interests of the legitimate businessmen of Canada and of Canada itself—it is against only the interests of fraudulent promoters and stock salesmen—that we should pass this resolution as soon as possible and thereby endeavour to secure this short-form registration privilege to which we attach considerable value.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words on this resolution. A rather extraordinary thing happened in the 1945 committee. The report throwing out the treaty was not introduced by the government, it was spoken to by myself. The objections to that treaty were four in number and I think it would be of interest to state at this time what those objections were and why that previous treaty was so unacceptable. I should like to quote from my remarks as they appear on page 3711 of Hansard of December 17, 1945, as follows:

> Basically the principles which the treaty violated were these. First, it did away with the time-honoured and, I believe, historic principle of dual criminality.

And again:

> The second fundamental point which the committee felt was detrimental to the acceptance of this instrument was that the treaty by its various clauses greatly enlarged the offences for which extradition might be sought . . .

And again:

> The third reason—and this was an important one—was that we were not satisfied that the treaty and protocol as drawn were not ultra vires of this parliament with regard to the rights of property and civil rights as vested in the provinces under the British North America Act.

Finally:

> Then—and this is not a legal point; it is perhaps a physical point—we felt that the restrictive clauses which were mentioned in the treaty, subsections 26, 31, 32, article III, article IX and article XII, section 1 of the treaty, would definitely restrict the opening up of our great natural resources.

I went on to state the reasons why the treaty was thrown out. That treaty completely abrogated many of the sovereign rights of Canada. It was just about as bad a treaty as could be imagined. I think this instrument is acceptable because it overcomes these four cardinal sins, if I can so term them. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said, it opens up the possibility of short-form registration privileges being granted to Canadians.

I submit that that is most important. A normal prospectus under the S.E.C. may run anywhere from fifty to one hundred pages of small type and be so involved and so labyrinthine in character as to defy most lawyers getting to the bottom of its meaning. As a matter of fact, I have heard it said that they are made as complicated, as long and as involved as possible so that the actual facts can be submerged at times in a tidal wave of verbiage. They defeat their own ends.

I see no objection to this treaty. From what the minister has said, I think it will be of assistance to the legitimate Canadian businessman. First of all, a prima facie case must be made out that the law of Canada has been contravened and broken. Second, and this also is of great importance, if extradition is granted the person so extradited cannot be charged for any other offence. As a matter of fact that was one of the great dangers of the first instrument in that, if extradition was asked for, one state after another could then bring subsequent charges for other offences which might entail the ruination of the person so extradited or his incarceration for almost the rest of his natural life. Having said that, I believe that this is a step that should be taken. I think it will assist development in many ways. Many of our development companies start off in a very small way. There are chances of a small investment, particularly in the mining and oil fields, leading to very great profits, but that type of investment is of necessity hazardous and extremely speculative. Nevertheless it is an essential part of the economy of Canada, and to restrict it in any way would in my opinion seriously jeopardize the continued prosperity of our industry.

Motion agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE (JAPAN) ACT

PROVISIONS FOR CARRYING TREATY INTO EFFECT

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 210, to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of peace between Canada and Japan.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I made a short statement on this bill, its principles and its purposes, at the resolution stage. I do not think it is necessary for me to add anything now to what I said then. It is a bill, as its title implies, to authorize the government to take the necessary measures to implement the treaty which has already been ratified by the government. If second reading is given now it would be my suggestion that the bill be sent to the standing committee on external affairs where its clauses can be given detailed examination. Possibly some other questions which are not directly related to the bill could be discussed before that committee. On that understanding, and if it should commend itself to the house that the bill should go to the standing committee on external affairs, I do not propose to say anything more at this stage.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, there is no particular reason why there should be an extended debate on the bill. It was arranged previously that after second reading it would be sent, as the minister indicated, to the standing committee on external affairs for consideration there. During discussions in the external affairs committee, and also in the debate in this house on a prior occasion relating to the treaty of peace and the protocol, I raised the question of having not only the provisions of Bill No. 210, which is now under consideration, sent to the committee for attention but also the treaty of peace and the protocol. I fancy that the bill now under debate will not furnish as much meat for discussion in the committee as will the treaty and the protocol.

I am hopeful that when we give second reading to the bill it will be the understanding of the house that in the proceedings of the standing committee on external affairs the treaty, the protocol and the bill will be open for full discussion, and that at the appropriate meetings of the external affairs committee the minister will arrange to have witnesses available for examination who will be competent to give information with respect to various points which I imagine come to one's mind in connection with the Japanese treaty. There are matters of trade, immigration and so on that were mentioned in the previous debate. We are hopeful that they can be fully covered and that witnesses will be able to give such information to the committee as may be in the possession of the government. I do not think there is any point in debating the motion for second reading in view of the fact that the real discussion will take place in the external affairs committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too appreciate the fact that this bill is to be referred to the standing committee on external affairs. We are also grateful for the suggestion of the minister that the terms of reference when the bill reaches that committee may actually be wider than the bill itself. Even so, and even though it seems generally agreed that there is no need for an extended debate at this time, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) avail himself of the opportunity to close the debate and in so doing answer one question that I should like to put to him.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke at the resolution stage he indicated the constitutional position that makes necessary a bill like this, and in particular gave us the contrast between our position in Canada and that of the United States. In other words, the bill simply gives to the government, or technically speaking the governor in council, the power to do anything that is necessary arising out of the treaty, and also the power to provide for penalties for any infractions of any regulations made by the governor in council on that basis. Could the minister indicate to us, if he chooses to reply at the end of this debate, any examples of the kind of regulations that might have to be made? Likewise, could he give us any examples of the things that might be infringed and lead to penalties of one kind or another as provided in the bill?

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions in my mind about the bill, particularly sections 3 and 4. However, since the minister has indicated that the bill will be submitted to the standing committee on external affairs for more detailed study, I will leave those questions until the bill is before the standing committee. I should like to join with others in expressing the hope that the terms of reference will be wide enough to permit some examination of the protocol and the treaty. As a matter of fact I am quite certain that, when we get before the committee, members will find it difficult to confine themselves strictly to a discussion of the terms of the bill. I am sure they will find themselves referring at different stages to the treaty and the various things that arise out of it. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that the terms of reference will be fairly wide. Our experience in external affairs has been, I think, quite a happy and profitable one. In my judgment it would not aid to confine the discussion on a bill such as this to such a narrow orbit that we would not have the same happy and profitable discussion in the committee.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to deal very briefly with one or two of the points that have been raised. Of course, it is our understanding that there should be a fairly wide discussion of this whole question in the standing committee. I do not believe there will be any effort on anyone's part to restrict the discussion to the terms of this particular bill, because when we discussed these matters in the standing committee before, it was understood that there would be an occasion for a further examination of the treaty of peace, even though the treaty had already been ratified. At that time there was need for speedy action in order to bring the treaty into effect, and that was appreciated by the members of the committee. It was also understood by them that there would be an opportunity for further discussion. If it is submitted to the committee, this bill will provide that opportunity.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked me if I could indicate generally the kind of regulation which might be issued under this enabling legislation. He mentioned the question of penalties. We will have at the committee meetings, Mr. Speaker, legal, economic and other experts who will be able to go into this in considerable detail. Provision for penalties has been embodied in the legislation in case penalties may be required. But up to the present, for instance under the analogous legislation implementing the treaties of peace with Italy and certain other countries which was passed a couple of years ago, it has been found necessary to issue only two orders in council and no penalties have been required in the light of those orders in council. However, as this bill is designed to make effective upon Canadian nationals certain obligations contracted by the government of Canada and approved in due course, I hope, by the parliament of Canada, it is usual in such cases to provide for a penalty clause against emergencies.

As to the type of regulation which may be required, I might give two examples which would indicate to the hon. member what may be necessary under the treaty of peace with Japan. Article 14(a) of the peace treaty, for instance, exempts certain property from the general provision mentioned in an earlier part of the treaty, that all Japanese property should be turned over to the Canadian government and could be utilized for the payment of compensation. Exempted from that clause is certain diplomatic property. Regulations may be required to make that exemption effective in our domestic legislation. This bill to implement the peace treaty may, in effect, bind Canadians, and for that purpose certain orders in council may be required.

To take another example this time from the treaty of peace with Italy, a lump sum settlement was negotiated to clear up all our claims against Italy and all Italian claims against us. Order in council P.C. 5818 of November 6, 1951, was issued under the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland) Act of 1948 and it was known as the "war claims (Italy) settlement regulations". It contained a provision by which the payment to Canada by Italy of the agreed lump sum constituted satisfaction by Italy of its obligations to Canada and to Canadian nationals. The effect of this provision would be to prevent a Canadian from suing in a Canadian court to recover a war claim. A similar kind of regulation may, in the future, be required under this proposed legislation if it becomes effective. That is the type of thing that may be done under an order in council, and when this matter is discussed before the standing committee on external affairs, other detailed examples can be given by the experts who will be present.

Mr. Low: Perhaps the minister could answer this question. I presume that at no time are regulations passed by order in council which would not be ordinarily enforceable within the country?

Mr. Pearson: No. No such regulations could be passed, nor could such regulations be passed under this act as would infringe on provincial jurisdiction, for instance. This bill is no assertion of a constitutional principle of any kind. It is merely the authority from parliament to the government to do by order in council certain things which parliament might do by specific legislation if it so desired.

Mr. Knowles: There would have to be a basis for any such regulation in the treaty of peace?

Mr. Pearson: In the treaty itself, that is right.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

GENOCIDE

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION SIGNED BY CANADA ON NOVEMBER 28, 1949

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide as signed by Canada on November 28, 1949, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to say a few words about this resolution. It is much too important to let pass without some comment. Here is an attempt to have the conscience of the world express itself through law. We should remember that it is only an attempt, and nothing more. There are no teeth in this legislation by which we could make it operative, but at least it is a start to something better. There are those who profess to scorn attempts such as this which they say are merely gestures. But a gesture perhaps has its importance in the world today. Furthermore what is looked upon as merely illegal can eventually become immoral.

I remember reading in history of the situation which prevailed in the United Kingdom over a hundred years ago when it was regarded as right and proper that women and children should work for ten and twelve hours a day in the coal mines. Some people were horrified at what was happening. Eventually legislation was passed prohibiting this practice. It was then illegal, and has now become immoral as well as illegal. In time I hope that the intent of this resolution will be accepted throughout the whole world, and be just as illegal as it is immoral. There can be no question at all that the people of this country support the resolution. This I would say is especially true of one particular group, organized labour, for genocide has not been practised only against people of certain religious views or certain ethnic groups. It has been practiced against social groups, and modern history relates that the working class groups in Europe have suffered under this form of mass murder.

The ratification of the resolution will mean that the crime of genocide is always before us. That is a good thing, for our memories are short. I wonder how many of even my generation remember the crimes which were perpetrated at the beginning of the century against the Armenians. Most of us have forgotten them. I wonder how many remember the crimes which were perpetrated against the Ukrainian people in soviet Russia in the early thirties when, through deliberate policy of the men in the Kremlin, millions of Ukrainians were exterminated in what the Russians conceived to be their national interest. I have heard the number put as low as 6 million and I have heard it placed as high as 15 million; but I think at least 8 million Ukrainians were exterminated in the early part of the thirties. That was a crime which was not perhaps internationally illegal then but which we now hope to make illegal.

We remember, after the war, when tens of thousands of Poles and Lithuanians were exterminated, again as acts of policy on the part of the Russians. We remember what happened to the Sudeten Germans as a group. I think the world particularly remembers the horrors which happened to the Jewish people under nazi Germany when some 6 or 7 million of them were exterminated, again in the name of national policy.

The question, however, is whether the next generation will remember these horrible things. Many of them will forget; but I am certain that in my constituency they will remember, for 50 per cent of the people whom I represent have been affected or afflicted in one way or another by this wretched crime of genocide. Not only does genocide destroy bodies but, what is just as bad, it can destroy minds. If it can destroy minds, it can destroy cultures; and wherever a culture is lost to the world, to that extent all of us are impoverished.

Even though this legislation be nothing more than a pious aspiration just now, nevertheless in the long run, as it becomes accepted, we can hope that it will raise general standards throughout the world; for today—and this applies not only to those who are behind the iron curtain—there are groups so harassed that they can think only of survival. They have time to think of nothing else. If we can make this resolution become operative throughout the world, these groups will be given some security so they can devote their energies to building up a better life.

We are glad to have before us this resolution to ratify the convention. We are glad to see it ratified, but ratification by 32 nations, Mr. Speaker, is not enough. It must be ratified by all countries in the world and I should like to see it done—although at the moment it is impossible—without any reservation whatsoever. Meanwhile those who refuse to ratify this convention must stand condemned by the world.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, this resolution is one that received considerable attention in the external affairs committee a few days ago. One of the members of the official opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), has given a great deal of close and sympathetic attention and study to this convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide. I greatly regret that he had to leave Ottawa last night on extremely urgent public business, in order to go somewhere in the vicinity of Oshawa.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps some may think the business was made more urgent by the fact that the minister himself has not been here for the last couple of days. I hope neither one of them has been engaged in anything that indicates a question of political genocide. In any event, I wanted to indicate to the minister why I am taking the part I am taking in connection with this debate today.

I have followed closely the discussions in the external affairs committee, and I think everyone has been of the opinion that Canada, in becoming a signatory to the convention on genocide, found herself in the position of agreeing to something which was, in a sense, half a loaf rather than a whole one. I think we all realize that even though we ratify the convention on genocide, it goes only part way in executing what Canadians generally would like to see accomplished and achieved in this matter.

I suppose there is no other country in the world whose people are more quickly outraged by news of this kind of mass extermination of groups. It is so foreign to the Canadian way of thinking that perhaps we are apt sometimes to look at it from afar. But there are in Canada many people whose relatives have suffered under this kind of persecution. Even though the convention does not go nearly as far as Canadians would like to see it go, so far as its effect is concerned, I think it would have been a great mistake if Canada had not taken her stand. I think that we in Canada were wise, both at the United Nations and also here in the external affairs committee, to take our stand against this kind of international outlawry and try to do our part as best we can to establish some measure of law, order and simple justice for people the world over.

That is one of the reasons we support this convention. It is not as effective as it might be. As members of the house and of the external affairs committee will agree, it has grave limitations. Nevertheless it at least provides a moral if not a legal sanction with respect to this type of injustice wherever it occurs. I should like, however, to point out that with respect to the ratification of this convention, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) a moment ago, only some 32 out of the 60 members of the United Nations have endorsed it so far as their parliaments are concerned, or have signed the convention itself.

Strangely enough, the three so-called leading powers in the world have not so far become actual ratifying parties to the convention. The United States congress has not yet come to any conclusion with respect to this convention. There have been debates there of a rather extensive nature in connection with it, but so far the ratification has not been completed. In addition to that, the United Kingdom has not only not ratified the convention, but has not become a signatory to it. Then there is the further fact that the soviet Union—as one perhaps might now be led to expect in matters of this kind—in ratifying and signing the convention put in so many joker clauses by way of exempting their country from its operation that it is not of great importance so far as that nation is concerned today. It seems to me that behind the iron curtain is perhaps the very place where we need this law applied, and the iron curtain countries evidently have taken the position that they are going to have so many reservations in the convention that it will not matter a great deal to them whether it is law or not. That is not a very satisfactory arrangement from Canada's point of view. It is a disappointing situation because surely we have gone far enough in our thinking and in our actions that all the nations of the world ought to be able at least to come to one conclusion, namely that it is wrong and unjust for this kind of international crime to go unpunished, as it apparently has in the past.

It sometimes makes one despair of world opinion when he realizes that we seem to be able to go only such a short way in trying to rid the world of such a menace as this. However, in the committee on external affairs the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) entered into a discussion with other hon. members and with the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At that time I understood a point had been reached in connection with that part of the convention which, in defining what genocide means in subsection (b) of article II, mentions causing bodily or mental harm to members of a group, where some question arose with respect to the words "mental harm." I understood that was a matter which had engaged the attention not only of the United States congress but of some other nations as well, because of the varying degrees of interpretation which have been placed upon these words.

Perhaps there is no great reason why we should not ratify it even with those words in it, but I would ask the minister, when he closes this debate, to take into consideration such undertaking as the parliamentary assistant gave in the committee so it will be made clear to parliament and to the world just what the Canadian parliament means when it endorses the convention with these two words included in it.

I have no very strong feelings myself with regard to the inclusion of those words. In my mind it is only a question of how we can make the most effective and workable convention and have it ratified by this parliament, so it will go forward to the world as a message that after all the Canadian people are taking this means, perhaps a feeble one, but nevertheless the only means that seems to be at hand at the moment, to tell the world that this country is shocked, startled and concerned over crimes of this kind which have been perpetrated in the past, and that it is not going to stand for any repetition in the days that lie ahead.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly glad of the opportunity which is presented here for me to discuss the genocide convention, which I consider of great importance. I feel sure the house will unanimously endorse the convention. The world now and then requires reminders of acts which it would rather forget. The memory of man being what it is, it is necessary from time to time to repeat some vital matters that perhaps would better be left unsaid.

This convention on genocide strikes at the very root of the problem which is facing the world today. It is a problem bound up not only with the interests of persons but with the interests of groups throughout the length and breadth of the world, those who hold different religious views and different political points of view. It is particularly bound up with the possibility of peace throughout the world.

The United Nations, which exists for the specific purpose of trying to get the nations of the world to iron out their difficulties is, in my opinion, one of the most effective methods of eventually destroying the possibility of war. The general assembly of the United Nations on December 9, 1948, adopted a convention to outlaw genocide. That convention was accepted unanimously.

Genocide is mass murder. It is a modern name for an old crime. It means the destruction of whole groups of people just because they belong to particular groups. The group may be radical or national, or it may be religious. It may be a particular ethnical or racial group. The destruction may take various forms. Genocide has destroyed some 20 million persons in the last fifty years. I quote these figures with great humility. In the first half of the twentieth century alone the crime of genocide was perpetrated against the following human groups: Armenians, 10,000 at the turn of the century; Jews, several hundred thousand in 1902 and 1905 in Russia and in other European countries; Armenians, 1,200,000 in 1915 and 1916; Greeks, about 500,000 in Smyrna in 1922; Ukrainians, millions of them since the occupation of their territory by the Soviet; Jews, under the nazis, 6 million; Serbs, 800,000 in the so-called independent state of Croatia; Poles, 3 million since 1939; Lithuanians, 600,000 since 1941 and still continuing; Latvians, 400,000 since 1941 and still continuing; Estonians, between a quarter and a third of the entire population since 1941 and still continuing.

I am not going to read the rest. You have a fair idea of what the record indicates has happened almost within our own lifetime. In modern days the nazis developed their technique which was use particularly against racial and religious groups, the Jews, and against the national linguistic group, the Poles.

The crime of genocide is not new; it has been practised under different names since the destruction of Carthage by the Romans. Throughout the middle ages there were the Jewish pogroms, the mass killings in various countries of Europe. In the last century, the mass killings of Armenians and again in this century the persecution of the Armenians in the Ottoman empire were horrible examples.

Individuals, groups, yes, nations, and Canada amongst them, were often aroused to protest against these massacres, but nothing more was done about it. It was the systematic brutalities practised by the nazis that shocked the conscience of the twentieth century. The twentieth century conscience refused to accept the dictum that the horrible atrocities they committed on these people were matters within domestic jurisdiction. So the world decided to concern itself. It was recognized at Nuremberg that there were crimes against humanity, that these crimes must be punished by law, and they were so punished. It is true that at Nuremberg those charged and convicted were tried on a basis of retroactive law. There was no law in existence which specifically covered these crimes. I believe the world is still firmly of the opinion that no injustice was done at that time.

It became clear that international law would have to be developed to deal with the international crime of genocide. There are already examples of laws for dealing with certain international crimes: Slave trade, illegal production and trade in narcotics, piracy, trade in women and children. International conventions have been signed on these crimes, and anyone guilty of them can be tried and punished not only in his own country but in whatever country he escapes to, provided that country has adhered to the convention. This convention is merely extending an international convention to genocide.

We in this country have a long and distinguished record for being in the forefront of humanitarian efforts. Canada was one of those countries that officially protested against the treatment of the Jews and others by the nazis. Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as he was then known, was the prime minister who boldly and courageously spoke for Canada in words that rang throughout the world as a clarion call for freedom and justice when he protested against the treatment the nazis were dealing out to these people. It follows that the prevention of genocide is in line with the overwhelming opinion and feeling of the people of Canada. It has great and deep appeal to many of our minority groups.

I speak with some knowledge. I have seen some of the things with which this convention deals. I have seen the victims of these happenings. I have met and known men and women whose whole families have been sent to the gas chambers and who have seen them tortured and afflicted. I have seen the gas chambers. That kind of thing we cannot tolerate.

I recall the first time I saw a gas chamber. I wondered what it was, but I soon found out. Today, years later, I still shudder as I recall vividly those gas chambers. It was a horrifying experience long remembered which burns and sears the memory. It was in the early days of 1945, when we were moving across Europe rather quickly, with the Germans in retreat. I remember the first camp in which there was a gas chamber. I recall particularly the meticulous records the nazis kept. Nothing was left to chance. Nothing was hidden. The records were perfect. On one side of the ledger the heading was Juden; on the other side were inscribed other unfortunate persons of all nationalities. The side of the ledger headed Juden was by far the largest. But there were far too many on the other side, also.

So I am particularly happy today to know that this House of Commons will make a decision, which I have already indicated in my opinion will be unanimous, to endorse this convention, which is in keeping with our position as one of the leaders of the middle nations. We are giving leadership, as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has pointed out, both to the United States and the United Kingdom, neither of which has yet ratified the convention, though neither is ever likely to be charged with the offence of genocide. Sometimes even that is doubtful, in view of the germ charges made by the communists and their stooges, which are false, dishonest and even worse than that. But it indicates that these matters have an importance beyond their immediate perspective.

This genocide convention is a step against jungle law. It is a recognition of the wrongs which have been inflicted on helpless people. It is a proclamation that the rights of man do not belong to the strong alone, or to the privileged few. For that reason this document or any other document cannot compensate for the loss suffered, not merely by the innocent victims but by the world.

We are all responsible in some measure for the terrible persecutions of our time, which I indicated to the house a few moments ago. Those of us who stand by and permit these crimes to be committed cannot escape some portion of the guilt. So this genocide convention today is an admission and a recognition by us of our responsibility, and our solemn pledge that the sins of the past will not be allowed to repeat themselves. At the same time we must keep one inescapable fact in mind: No country and no association of countries can guarantee international law and morality by means of a convention alone. As we well know, the last thirty years are strewn with the remains of burned-out and abandoned treaties and conventions. They were framed in a spirit of the highest idealism. By means of them the free nations sought to hold in check the black flood of barbarism which threatened, as it does today, to engulf the world.

The nations failed twice in our lifetime to restrain naked force by peaceful means. We learned, to our bitter loss, that a nation which signs a convention can also repudiate it. That is why we cannot let this genocide convention, or any international convention, lull us into a false sense of security. It is not an insurance policy against the future. And yet it can be a real weight to throw into the moral balance of the world. It carries the seeds of a new order for humanity. But those seeds may be barren, unless the free nations cultivate the ground for them.

I think the house has been told on another occasion that the free world has not been sleeping since 1945. Step by step we are building what may yet emerge as a new social order in the international sphere. Let me remind the house of UNRRA, the United Nations, the Marshall plan, ERP, NATO, the Colombo plan, and today the genocide convention. All these are steps along the road to international justice and morality.

I agree with those people who say we cannot impose democracy and liberty upon the beaten and backward nations of the world. We must first build them up to our level economically and socially. We must continue to strike at the causes of injustice, so that in time a convention like this should not be necessary.

In the light of past and present history it can be stated that this convention has been overdue for centuries. The genocide convention is now law-binding upon all nations that ratify the convention. It signifies humanity's determination once and for all to substitute the law of civilized society for that of the jungle.

I am happy to join with the house in endorsing this convention. We are thus giving leadership to those nations with whom we are usually associated in matters such as this. I pay tribute to the minister of external affairs for his efforts at the United Nations and his persistence and insistence that this government and this parliament ratify this convention.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) has already indicated the heartfelt support which we accord to this motion for the adoption of the convention for the prevention of the crime of genocide. This is an occasion of really great importance in the history of mankind as we endeavour to move forward from what the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) referred to as the law of the jungle to the light of full civilization. With the hon. member for Spadina we all hope the day will come when conventions like this may no longer be necessary, but we all recognize that by agreeing to a convention like this we are helping to sharpen the conscience of the world against what is referred to as the crime of genocide.

One of the reasons I felt I should like to say a few words at this time is that some of us feel that we must concern ourselves not only with the overt crime of genocide, against which we stand in all its forms; we should also take a stand at every possible opportunity against certain other practices which are inconsistent with a stand against the crime of genocide but which can be just as injurious and serious to the groups affected.

The definition of the crime of genocide in the convention we are now given the opportunity to endorse includes not only the overt destruction of racial and other groups as such, but any action injurious to a group or to a section of a group, or calculated to bring mental harm to any such group. I am reminded on this occasion of the words well known to all of us in the sermon on the mount. We remember how the Master suggested that the commandment of old, thou shalt not kill, did not mean in His view that people should only refrain from the overt act of murder; it meant that they should also refrain from hating their brothers or being angry with them in ways equally harmful. So I suggest that when things happen in other countries which we do not like, for example in South Africa today, and against which we might feel very strongly, we should feel equally strongly about any act of discrimination against any groups within our own country.

We need not go into the details of the form and type of discrimination that still takes place. I listened, as the house did, to the sad story given by the hon. member for Spadina and the many blots there have been on the story of mankind. The incidents he mentioned stand out and horrify us, whether they come from ancient times or from the days of the nazis. I hope this attempt to sharpen the conscience of the world, this attempt to sharpen our own conscience, will make us all feel equally sad at the realization that there are forms of discrimination against various groups, ethnic, racial, religious, social and economic, still being practised within our own country.

We who support and vote for this convention today, if we are to be consistent with our vote, should take a stand at every opportunity against discrimination of any kind. If we are to see the day, if we are to have fulfilled that hope expressed by the previous speaker, when a convention like this may no longer be necessary, it is not only necessary that there be progress toward that ideal in other parts of the world; it is necessary that progress be made toward that same ideal in our own country.

I rose simply to express once again our wholehearted approval of this motion for the ratification of the convention to prevent the crime of genocide, and to express at the same time the hope that we will take all the steps we can in this country to do away with the forms of discrimination that still exist against various minorities and groups within our land.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, knowing the temperament of this parliament and of the Canadian people at large, I am not surprised to hear from every section of the house that there is unanimity of opinion in connection with the resolution submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for the ratification of the genocide convention. This resolution not only merits but calls for our every consideration because there are still clouds on the international horizon that threaten to create explosive situations which will produce horrible cases of mass killings which under the definition of the convention would be genocide.

Some countries unfortunately are still actively obsessed with a lust for power and domination. Other countries flagrantly ignore all human considerations and international regulations. Not only are they encouraging conditions which will produce genocide in the future, but they are actually committing the crime of genocide almost continuously. These conditions no doubt press upon the conscience of the free and peace-loving peoples of the world, the urgency to address themselves vigorously to safeguarding the common objectives, not only to prevent genocide but to help to make this world a better place in which to live.

The proposed legislation in my humble opinion is a definite step forward in that direction and will no doubt be unanimously approved by this parliament. We will then, Mr. Speaker, be able to take great pride in the fact that, in this, as well as in other similar international proposals, our country will be in the vanguard in setting an example for the rest of the world to follow.

It is perhaps necessary that in considering this legislation we should examine for a few moments the comparatively new expression not heretofore commonly known to the general public, but which is now referred to as the crime of genocide, so we may better grasp the full significance and importance of ratifying this convention.

The term "genocide", originating as it does from two Latin words, means simply "the destruction of a group of people for no other reason than the fact that they belong to that particular group", which fact has already been so ably mentioned by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). The definition itself is found in article II of the convention. It reads:

> In the present convention genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group as such:
> (a) killing members of the group;
> (b) causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
> (c) deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
> (d) imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
> (e) forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

The diabolic reason for the slaughter may be a fanatical surge of racial, national or religious emotions; or it may be purely political; or it may be for reasons wholly unknown; or, as in most cases, it is committed without any reason whatsoever. The destruction may take the form of massacres, mass executions, starvation, restricting the birth rate, sterilization, segregation of the sexes, or the destruction of special characteristics of the group by various means.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the summarized and simple meaning of genocide; and the convention, by its own language in the preamble, "seeks to liberate mankind from this odious scourge."

As I had occasion to say during a previous debate in the house, the crime of genocide, although not known by that name, is not new in world history. Long before Carthage was destroyed by the Romans the crime of genocide had been committed. The Pharaohs of Egypt were wantonly guilty of the crime. The Roman destruction of religious groups in the lions' arena is a poignant and painful example of genocide. The Spanish inquisition, the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, are examples of a crime which long should have been outlawed.

This horrible crime was committed not only in ancient days, or during the middle ages, as has been so fully described, but what is very sad is the fact that the crime has been frequently committed during our own lifetime. Many of our contemporaries witnessed the wanton massacres of the Armenians by the Ottoman empire on several occasions and the massacre of Christian Assyrians in Iraq, as well as the long list of victims already mentioned. More recently, we have witnessed the Ethiopian massacres by Mussolini, the Chinese massacres by Japan and the Jewish massacres by the nazis. Acts such as these throughout the centuries have left black pages in our history books. We search the records in vain for some action by world leadership to prevent the commission of acts of genocide or to punish the guilty.

It is of record, though, that not only in the past, but even quite recently, civilized peoples did not altogether condone the brutalities of those guilty of genocide. They never failed piously to utter protests, hold some meetings, offer some prayers, and a few foreign governments even showed some courage by sending diplomatic notes. Nothing more direct or more vigorous was ever done.

Under the guise of its being a matter of domestic jurisdiction, these crimes were repeatedly committed while civilization stood aghast and shouted "shame", but unfortunately did nothing more.

Human beings are normally disturbed by a calamity in which one or more persons are killed. The degree of shock and distress is increasingly accentuated by the number of fellow human beings who are accidentally killed. Imagine, therefore, Mr. Speaker, the frightful shudder that goes through a person when he hears of wanton mass murder involving over ten million innocent victims. It is no secret, and it has already been mentioned several times today in the house, that modern civilization cringes in shame when we hear of crematoria, mass graves, gas chambers and other such hideous implements of murder.

The studied, scientific and systematic brutalities of the nazis shocked the conscience of the twentieth century. It required an upheaval such as this, almost a volcanic violation of human sensibilities, to shake and shame the decent world into seeking means more vigorous than gasps, vocal protests and pious diplomatic notes, to prevent the commission of such crimes in the future. Is it, therefore, not a natural consequence that modern civilization should press for the creation of international machinery to prevent a repetition of these acts? The genocide convention is for the time being a partial answer to this anguished demand.

It is in my humble opinion not merely the product of international statesmen or the wisdom of their cool and calculated thinking. It is rather an outcry from the grass root level of human beings whose emotions have been violated and are not tempered by delicate, legal, diplomatic or international niceties.

The call for a genocide convention is urgently being pressed for and supported by the most important religious, labour, veteran and civic groups in the leading countries of the world. In the United States, for example, the convention is being pleaded for and supported by every humanitarian organization in the country. I have before me a list of over sixty of these international organizations, the most recognized and most important in the country. To indicate the types of these organizations I should like to mention only a few. They are: the national conference of Christians and Jews, the Catholic association for international peace, the federated council of churches of Christ in America, the American Federation of Labour, the congress of industrial organizations, the American Legion, the world Jewish congress, the American veterans' committee, the general federation of women's clubs, the young women's Christian associations of America, the Catholic association for international peace and countless others.

In our own country, and in other countries, similar groups have likewise urged the adoption and the ratification of the genocide convention. It is today a universal outcry, and at long last it is being seriously dealt with.

The theory of non-intervention in a matter of so-called domestic jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, to which I referred a few moments ago, is no longer tenable with respect to crimes which are universally acknowledged as inhuman and immoral, and this notwithstanding the fact that traditionally criminal law has been considered as an expression of the right of a state to define and punish acts, which in its judgment are contrary to public order within its borders. International law of modern times has recognized certain crimes which it declared to be international, and regards them as directed against public order not of any one given country, but as against public order of the entire family of nations. The crime of piracy, for example, the crime of international slave trade, the illegal production of and trade in narcotics, white slavery and similar crimes belong to that category. These are the subject matter of various charters, conventions, treaties and pacts under the United Nations Organization, and are governed by international law.

Within the past number of years we have been forcibly reminded by the Nuremberg judgments that to this category of international crimes also belong war crimes and crimes against humanity. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, with the advance of civilization, the crime of genocide should be similarly classified and outlawed. Our country should, of course, be amongst the first to support this view.

Someone once very appropriately said that important lessons are frequently learned from great sacrifices. Martyrdom in history is perhaps the most formidable example we have to prove that the sacrifices of these saintly men and women helped pave the road for the creation and preservation of those principles that civilization holds dear today. Men and women were burned at the stake, tortured to death, and gave up their lives rather than swerve from their beliefs and their convictions. We have indeed learned great lessons from them.

I should like to refer for a few moments to sacrifices made to a degree heretofore unheard of in the annals of history, and which were not made in the dim past but during the past two decades, in our own lifetime. Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what lessons, if any, we have learned from these sacrifices, whether millions will have died in vain without contemporary history having reaped any lessons from these sacrifices.

Before and after 1939 the democratic countries witnessed the commission of the crime of genocide both in Ethiopia by Mussolini and in Germany by Hitler. Civilization stood idly by. Perhaps it gasped in sympathy; nevertheless I repeat it stood idly by. This should never occur again. If, for example, the nations of the world had seriously warned Mussolini or Hitler that what they were doing would be internationally challenged, and their countries would be isolated from the rest of the world by the imposition of international sanctions, we might not only have prevented the most flagrant case of genocide in history but we might have been able to avert world war II. What the world suffered for not doing so could almost, in the judgment of devout believers, be a lesson in retribution.

If, for example, sanctions had been threatened and effectively imposed between 1934 and 1939, the world would have known where dictatorships were going. In my judgment it is doubtful whether, with the complete isolation of these bandits early enough in their careers of crime, they would have been able to secure the materials and supplies to create their weapons for conquest, which they were otherwise able to build up between 1934 and 1939.

It is therefore my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, that the convention should go further than it does. By its present terms it threatens trial and punishment of the guilty, but refers rather weakly in article VII to the possibility of arresting the commission of the crimes once they are commenced. By the time the perpetrators can be brought to trial, it may be too late. Some vigorous provisions should be included which would prevent the commission of the crimes or stop them once they are started.

The security council of the United Nations, which is continually in session, should most cautiously scrutinize every act or manoeuvre which might lead to the suspicion that genocide is being committed or is about to be committed. They should be given adequate power and authority to call for an immediate cessation of those acts which may lead to, or in fact may be, genocide. Moreover the council should be given express authority, without the necessity of waiting for a meeting of the plenary session of the general assembly, to threaten effective international sanctions if their directives and orders are disobeyed. This would be a direct attempt to prevent acts of genocide, and to arrest them if started.

I respectfully urge our representatives to the United Nations to deal with this matter just as soon as the appropriate opportunity presents itself. Such action would be consistent with our country's views in matters of this kind and would, I am certain, be hailed by all the freedom-loving peoples of the world.

The United Nations has, for example, an opportunity today to prevent the crime of genocide which is being committed in several countries. During the past twenty-four months Iraq has been, and is now, in the process of committing acts which are genocide under the interpretation of the convention. Dangerous indications appear in a number of other countries, and unless the United Nations Organization takes the situation firmly in hand, acts of mass murder by violence or by means set forth in the definition of genocide may be committed in the countries of North Africa, Egypt, Iran, Aden, South Africa, Greece, North and South Korea, in Yugoslavia and the Baltic states.

A short time ago Greek reds kidnapped 28,000 Greek children and took them behind the iron curtain, solely because of their nationality. Chinese reds and North Koreans have slaughtered whole groups of clergymen and children because of their religion. In the Baltic states more than a million persons have been killed or exiled because of their national origin. These acts, Mr. Speaker, are preambles to genocide, if they are not indeed genocide according to the convention. Such horrors need little enhancement to ripen into the planned destruction of an entire group.

Preventive provisions in the convention, in my opinion, are therefore even more important than punitive provisions. I am hopeful that this phase will be given active consideration by international statesmen.

[Mr. Crestohl.]

Some preventive steps may be found in articles III and IV of the convention. Article III sets forth that the following acts should be punishable: (a) genocide; (b) conspiracy to commit genocide; (c) direct and public incitement to commit genocide; (d) attempt to commit genocide; (e) complicity in genocide. Article IV sets forth that persons committing genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III should be punishable, whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals. This is perhaps the first time in the history of international affairs, Mr. Speaker, that a warning is proclaimed that constitutionally responsible rulers are no longer immune, even in their own domains, from the responsibility for committing crimes. In other words the myth in international law that "the king can do no wrong" has been substantially modified.

No responsible head of a state will be able to commit with impunity acts which are being labelled by this convention as crimes against civilization.

I should like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the machinery for implementing the convention as set out in article VI appears to be, in my judgment, a little vague. I now read from the convention itself:

> Persons charged with genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the state in the territory where the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those contracting parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction.

It is, of course, not difficult to conceive that a criminal court of any particular state might have a problem in trying its ruler, leader, statesmen or anyone else. Domestic courts can unfortunately be tampered with or neutralized by legislation, as we see in the case of South Africa today.

A procedure much more definite and much more independent is therefore required if clause VI is to have any effective meaning. Consequently I direct attention in clause VI to the following words: "such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction" and so forth. This wording implies the use of an international penal tribunal.

I understand that the creation of an international criminal court has recently been recommended. I hope it will be established. The committee on international law appointed by the Canadian Bar Association has given the matter much study. This is one of the most important committees of the Canadian Bar Association, since it is composed of past presidents of the association and is presided over by Chief Justice McRuer of Ontario.

It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this committee will not only recommend amendments to our own Criminal Code to enable our courts to deal with those charged with the crime of genocide, but will also support the establishment of an international criminal court and recommend a procedure making it possible to bring before it, try and punish offenders, irrespective of their station and importance in their own country. The establishment of such a court might really put some teeth into the convention and would make of it something more than an instrument of mere wishful thinking, noble as that in itself might be.

The genocide convention, Mr. Speaker, was originally brought to the attention of the United States as early as 1946, shortly after the United Nations Organization was first convened. The convention was adopted unanimously on December 9, 1948. Its coming into force, however, was suspended until at least 20 member nations, by acts of their respective parliaments, would ratify the convention. Those ratifications were, unfortunately, rather slow in coming in. Finally on January 12, 1951, it being the ninetieth day after the twentieth instrument of ratification was deposited with the Secretary General of the United Nations in accordance with the terms of the convention, the convention was finally ratified.

Since then many more countries have ratified the convention and I believe there are at the present time some 36 nations which have approved it. Our own country was among the first to sign the original instrument, and our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is now submitting this resolution for Canada likewise to deposit with the Secretary General of the United Nations the requisite document indicating that the people and the parliament of Canada have ratified the convention which it signed on November 28, 1949. This step is consistent, as I said at the commencement of my remarks, with the high moral level of our country and the reputation which it enjoys in the eyes of the civilized peoples of the world.

This example, I hope, will now be followed by the rest of the members of the United Nations who have not yet ratified, so that the entire civilized world will not only declare its abhorrence of the crime of genocide, and condemn it, but will also declare itself ready to punish all individuals, groups and even nations who will resort to the unspeakable crime of mass murder.

I have one more point that I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, and it is this. Since our country has acquired a position of pre-eminence for its humanitarian views and as a fearless champion of justice, it is all the more important for our parliament to ratify the convention, because those countries which have not yet approved it may look to us for guidance and leadership. Our hesitation to sign, or suspension of this action, will cause much eyebrow raising amongst those countries, who will wonder why Canada has not yet signed.

There have been some questions raised as to why the United States, Great Britain and other democracies have not yet adopted the necessary legislation to approve the genocide pact. There appears to be no explanation other than casual indifference, or a belief, to some extent, that the pact is not necessary, or that it may be inoperative. No reason whatsoever can justify a refusal to declare the crime of genocide repulsive to civilization. What are these delinquent countries waiting for? Have their sensibilities not yet been sufficiently violated? Or has the passing of only a few years already dimmed their revulsion at what has occurred? Surely those democracies who cling so jealously to their ideals should be the very first to vigorously urge universal condemnation of the crime of genocide. Hesitation obviously has the effect of giving encouragement to those countries which practise genocide in our own days.

I am therefore hopeful, Mr. Speaker, and sincerely pray that with the adoption of this legislation by our parliament, the necessary stimulus will be given to the rest of the democracies who have not yet approved this convention and that, in the not too distant future, twentieth century civilization will be able to record the universal condemnation of a crime that has plagued human history, and the fact that henceforth the crime of genocide will be effectively outlawed and never again practised by man.

Mr. Stick: Before the hon. member finishes his speech, there is something to which I should like to direct his attention. I was following him as closely as I could, and I think in his speech he mentioned South Africa, with the implication that genocide was practised there. I hope that is not so. There may be racial distinctions there, but I greatly doubt whether the crime of genocide is practised. If that is implied in the hon. member's speech, I hope that he will reconsider that part of it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Pearson: —I think I should say a few words on this important resolution and express the view of the government with respect to it. Before doing so, however, I should like to deny the soft impeachment of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that my absence from the house over the last day or two has had anything to do with what he called political genocide. Genocide, Mr. Speaker, is mass destruction or the intention to commit mass destruction. My purposes, during my absence for the last few days, have been entirely constructive.

The resolution to approve the Canadian ratification of the convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide, as the previous speakers have pointed out, has already been considered in detail by the standing committee on external affairs and has been reported to the house without amendment. The genocide convention which is before us was the first convention to be prepared by the United Nations and opened for signature by states throughout the world. The text was unanimously adopted by the general assembly of the United Nations on December 9, 1948. Canada's representatives at the first part of the third session of the general assembly in Paris in 1948 were among those who supported the principle that the genocide convention should receive the widest possible application. Canada signed the convention on November 28, 1949, and it came into effect on January 12, 1951, 90 days after the deposit of twenty instruments of ratification or accession without reservation. As has been pointed out, a total of 36 states have now ratified or acceded, thirty without reservation and six, unfortunately, with reservations. The states which annexed reservations are: Bulgaria, Roumania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and the Philippines. The genocide convention is important not only because of the nature of the matter with which it deals but because it is the first international convention, prepared at any time, which seeks to define an international criminal offence. This means essentially an offence to be prevented and punished by all the states which adhere to the convention and for which they may be held to account by other states.

The crime is defined in article II, which has already been read to the house. It reads:

> Acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such...

As it has already been done very eloquently, Mr. Speaker, I do not need to recall to the house some of the horrible examples of genocide we have had in the past, especially the recent abominable instance of the practices of the nazis during the 1930's and during the war. Their systematic and ruthless policy, designed to uproot and exterminate a whole people, the Jewish people, makes one of the most tragic chapters in the whole of human history. A glorious footnote, however, has been written to that chapter, in the emergence and the establishment of the state of Israel.

There have been other examples. Perhaps I might read at this point a communication which indicates that genocide is not yet eradicated from the world, especially from that part of the world behind the iron curtain. This communication for obvious reasons, which will commend themselves to the house, will have to remain anonymous. It is addressed to me, and reads as follows:

> My wife and I recently spent a week end in X—
> X being a city in Russia.
> —where we were shepherded around. An incident occurred as our train was leaving the city which I thought worthy of recording.
> Our train was forced to stop a moment as we were pulling out of the station. I looked from my window and saw, six or seven tracks away, a line of cattle cars, but they were not filled with cattle; they were filled with women. There was an aperture of about a foot and a half between the sides and the roof, and from this opening peered hopelessly out the emaciated faces, framed by clawing hands, of numbers of women. There were soldiers at the track side with fixed bayonets so there could be no mistaking the meaning.
> It was just a moment's pause. Then our train moved on, but it was as if the corner of a curtain had been lifted, permitting a brief glance into the cesspool. Where these poor unfortunates came from, or where they were going, we can only guess —perhaps from Estonia; destination, just the east.

It is that kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that this convention, inadequate though it may be in many respects, is designed to prevent or at least to make more difficult. The human race has, we must hope, become more civilized, and the inherent rights of the individual and of minority groups have become more important; they have become protected under domestic law, particularly under the laws of democratic states. We must hope that in the future that protection under domestic law may be reinforced by international convention and international law. This convention is designed to do just that. Up to the present these rights have not been protected as a matter of international law, and I hope this convention will at least be helpful in that essential process.

The contracting states under the convention undertake to prosecute persons guilty of genocide in their own countries or, in the alternative, to surrender them to an international penal tribunal if and when such a tribunal is established. This latter obligation does not arise at once in any case or by virtue of the ratification of this treaty, since the contracting parties would also have to agree by a separate convention to accept the jurisdiction of such an international tribunal. For practical purposes, then, and particularly because the establishment of such an international penal tribunal is problematical at this time, it may be said that the scheme of the convention is that contracting states accept genocide as an international crime and undertake to punish offenders in their own courts.

As has been pointed out, however, the convention contains one provision in article IX, which has some teeth in it, in the sense that it affords a means by which one contracting state can bring another contracting state before the international court of justice. The international court of justice—which has no jurisdiction over individuals as distinct from states, and which also has no criminal jurisdiction of any kind—would have no power to pronounce on the guilt or innocence of any person, but under this article it might give a declaratory judgment as to whether the respondent state was, in fact, carrying out its obligations generally under the convention.

The communist countries have consistently refused to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the international court of justice, and in line with this general position these countries —and also the Philippine republic—have made reservations refusing to be bound by this article.

A few countries objected to those reservations, and the objections which were made have been responsible for hesitation and some delay on the part of certain states to ratify this treaty. To clear up these difficulties the Secretary General of the United Nations asked the general assembly for a directive at its fifth session in 1950 in regard to the significance of reservations of this kind. The assembly then, as many hon. members know, decided to refer the question to the international court of justice, and it was hoped that the court would give an opinion which would clarify the whole situation. This hope was not, I confess, entirely realized in the event. The court by a majority decision merely stated that any state could be regarded as a party to the convention while maintaining a reservation, notwithstanding the objection of other states, if the reservation could be considered as "compatible with the objects and purposes of the convention." The court refused to state whether or not the reservations in question were "compatible," and said that this depended upon a subjective appraisal of the effect of the reservation by each state.

Therefore the decision in one sense did not carry us much farther forward. The present position then is that if Canada were now to object to the communist reservations on the ground that they were in fact "incompatible" the communist countries, as well as some other countries, might maintain that they were "compatible." In these circumstances—and we gave a great deal of consideration to this difficulty—it appeared desirable to the government that Canada should now ratify the convention without reference to the reservations even though this might involve our acceptance of them by legal implication.

The language of the reservation is such that no country which has made the reservation under article IX can hale a non-reserving country on a charge under the convention before the international court of justice without the non-reserving country's consent. That is a very important consideration. The reservations made under article IX are identical, and I shall read the terms used by Bulgaria:

> Bulgaria does not consider as binding upon itself the provisions of article IX . . . and declares that, as regards the international court's jurisdiction . . . Bulgaria will . . . maintain the position that in each particular case the agreement of all parties to the dispute is essential, for the submission of any particular dispute to the international court for decision.

In other words it seems to me to be clear from the wording of that reservation that Canada, for instance, could not be brought before the international court of justice on a charge of violation of the convention we are now considering, by a country like Bulgaria, which has made this reservation, without the consent of Canada itself.

The genocide convention is possibly the most important source of new international criminal law which has developed since the last war. Other sources of this law are the Nuremberg principles based upon the charter and judgments of the Nuremberg tribunal, which were formulated by the international law commission of the United Nations, and also the proposed code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, which is still under consideration in the United Nations.

Since it is desirable, I think, that there should be world-wide acceptance that genocide is a crime, and since the force of the convention as a source of international law depends upon its general acceptance by states, the conclusion may be logically drawn that it is best to have the widest possible acceptance by states of this convention as a source of law, even although there may be a refusal by some states to accept the enforcement provision in article IX.

The following question has arisen, causing some anxiety I believe in the committee, and it has been referred to today by the hon.

member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). The question is this: Is any legislation required in Canada to implement within our own borders the obligations which our country will undertake under the convention? On this important matter I should like to qucte the opinion of the deputy minister of justice, to whom this was referred for an opinion. He wrote as follows:

> You have asked for my opinion as to the nature of the legislation, if any, that may be required to implement the convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide to which Canada will, I understand, shortly become a signatory—

This letter, by the way, was written before we actually signed the convention, and not in connection with its consideration for ratification.

> You also asked for a confirmation of your assumption that no legislation on the part of the provinces would be required to implement the convention.
> Dealing with your last query first, in my view, the provinces are not required to introduce legislation to implement the provisions of a convention which relates in its entirety to criminal law.
> I am further of the opinion that no legislation is required by Canada, at this time, to implement this convention. In this connection, I would direct your attention to the wording of article V of the convention. I do not think any legislation is "necessary," inasmuch as I cannot conceive of any act of commission or omission occurring in Canada as falling within the definition of the crime of genocide contained in article II of the convention, that would not be covered by the relevant section in the Criminal Code.

It was only after we received this opinion back in 1949 that we signed this convention which is now before the House of Commons for approval.

There is another point which has been of equal concern to members of the standing committee on external affairs, and which also was mentioned by the hon. member for Peel. I refer to the meaning of the words "mental harm" in subparagraph (b) of article II of the convention. This article defines the offence as I have already quoted it, and I shall repeat the definition for convenience:

> Acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. . .

These are the governing words of the definition, and consequently they control and limit the effect of the specific list of acts which follow those governing words. The second of these listed acts reads:

It is the words "mental harm" which have caused some uneasiness in some minds. My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that the words "mental harm" cannot mean anything but physical injury to the mental faculties.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), who has taken a keen interest in this convention, pointed out before the standing committee on external affairs that these two words were originally introduced into the definition at the request of the Chinese delegate to the United Nations who was concerned with the practice of the Japanese of administering opium to the Chinese people as a means of weakening their resistance in the Sino-Japanese war.

Of course the administering of opium to a racial group which would involve physical injury to the mental faculties would come within the definition I have just quoted. I cannot myself conceive that mental harm can be caused to persons with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, without physical injury to the mental faculties of such persons.

I therefore suggest to the house that the use of the words "mental harm" would and should be interpreted, as a measure of both our domestic and our international responsibility, as meaning "physical injury to the mental faculties".

My attention has also been directed to another point which I think might be cleared up at this time. I refer to a decision handed down by the United States supreme court concerning the constitutional validity of a law of the state of Illinois. It concerned a statute of that state and it was not a decision on the interpretation of the genocide convention. However, the judgment did comment on the genocide convention and might have given the impression that while genocide is of course, literally, the murder of a race, by extension it could be applied to any act detrimental to the welfare of any identifiable group, whether the lines of identification are religious, racial, cultural or national, and that it might apply to crimes against such groups short of extermination and might therefore really be aimed against any concerted determined discrimination against a minority.

While I do not think any of us would condone discrimination of this kind in any way, shape or form, I think that interpretation of this convention is going too far; that is, that it could be interpreted as applying to discrimination against a minority.

Mr. Graydon: Some Canadians have taken that interpretation.

Mr. Pearson: That is not the interpretation we would give it. And while I would not have anything I say on this point interpreted as approving or condoning discrimination of this kind in any shape or form, we would have our own way, I hope, of dealing with such discrimination. I think it would be undesirable to leave the impression that it could be brought under this convention, or that this convention could be used properly for this particular purpose.

In conclusion may I say that the possibility of the crime of genocide being committed in Canada seems to me to be extremely remote. I stress the fact that the broad purpose of this convention is to bring the law throughout the world up to the standard which I think we may say without boasting happily exists already in our own country. In approving this convention unanimously, which I hope parliament will do, we will be proclaiming throughout the world that genocide is considered by us to be a monstrous crime. We will be doing something to make it more difficult for any other country to commit that crime.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

DISCIPLINE AND ADMINISTRATION—COURTS MARTIAL—PENSIONS, SUPERANNUATION, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 224, respecting the Canadian forces—Mr. Claxton—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 2—The National Defence Act.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening subclauses 2 and 3 and 17 of this section were under consideration. These subclauses were included in the bill to provide for the carrying out of Canada's commitments in the event that the Geneva conventions should be ratified by Canada. Last evening some hon. members expressed doubt as to the desirability of having such legislation passed before the decision on ratification is taken. As these subclauses would not be required unless and until the Geneva conventions have been ratified, I am instructed by the minister to ask that the bill be amended by deleting these three subclauses.

Section 6, which has not yet been reached, provides that subsections 2, 3 and 17 of section 2, to which I have just referred, shall not become effective until proclaimed by the governor in council. Of course, that would happen only in the event that the Geneva conventions were in fact ratified by Canada. For the same reasons as those which I gave in connection with the three subclauses of section 2 I am instructed by the minister to seek an amendment to the bill to delete that section.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclauses 2 and 3 of clause 2 be deleted and subclauses 4 to 16 be renumbered as subclauses 2 to 14 and that subclause 17 of clause 2 be deleted and subclause 18 be renumbered as subclause 15;

That clause 6 and the heading thereto be deleted.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the government is well advised in withdrawing these subclauses which proved objectionable to hon. members. The official opposition could never have agreed to having legislation placed on the statute books based on a convention which had not been ratified by this house, a convention which had been passed more than three years ago but which had not been ratified by the United Kingdom or the United States and with the terms of which hon. members were not familiar.

With the withdrawal of these objectionable subclauses the objection of the official opposition to the amendment to the National Defence Act would be removed.

On section 4—The Defence Services Pension Act.

Mr. Pearkes: When this section was under discussion during the resolution stage I directed attention to an injustice which has existed for many years in relation to junior warrant or petty officers or junior commissioned officers. I suggested that that injustice should be removed by the removal of the limitations placed upon the earnings of retired officers who find employment in the civil service. I had hoped that consideration would be given to my suggestion.

As the amendment now stands it would be possible for two or three men to retire on the same day with the same length of service and take exactly the same positions in the civil service. If one of those men was a senior officer, a brigadier or admiral, his pension would be greater than that drawn by an officer of the junior rank. If the brigadier took a position in the civil service he would be entitled to draw pay from the civil service along with his pension to the extent that the combined pay and pension did not exceed the pay of the rank which he had held at today's rates of pay and allowances.

The same thing would apply to the captain or warrant officer, but if this man took a similar position with the civil service you would have a ridiculous situation created. The senior officer would be able to draw his entire pay from the civil service as well as his entire pension because the combined amounts would not reach the level of the pay and allowances for his rank, but the warrant officer or captain taking a similar position would find that he was entitled to a much smaller amount because the pay of a captain or warrant officer would be considerably less. He would draw his pay from the civil service but his pension would be reduced because the combined civil service pay and pension would exceed the pay of that particular rank at the present time.

This irregularity and injustice has existed for many years, and I had hoped that the minister would be prepared to remove it when bringing in his amendments. I hope consideration will still be given to doing this. I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to say that the limitations have either been removed altogether or that there will be a fixed limitation which will be equitable to all ranks of retired persons. I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to make that announcement today as well as the very satisfactory announcement he has just made concerning the other clauses. Then I would have no further objections.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry that I cannot completely satisfy the hon. member on both counts. His representations with respect to the point he has just raised were brought forward on the resolution. The matter is not quite as simple as he has stated it. After all, when people are active in the service and then retire on a pension, both their pay in the service and the pension thereafter are based on each man's or woman's particular rank which is supposed to represent his or her status in the services. On the other hand, when people enter the civil service they may have duties comparable to those they had in the services or the duties may vary as between different people, and they may not vary in the same proportion that their service duties varied. This amendment is designed to take account of present conditions. The hon. member's proposal would introduce a new principle which it was not found desirable to accept. I think the minister dealt with that at the resolution stage when he said in reply to the representations of the hon. member for Nanaimo, as found at page 2193 of Hansard for May 13:

> . . . I must say that the advisers of the government do not see how we can go any further in this direction without making it profitable for some officers to retire and take up positions in the civil service, if we are to enjoy their service.

Therefore it has not been found possible to accede to the representations the hon. member has made. While I am on my feet on behalf of the minister I should like to make a correction for him.

Mr. Knowles: I hoped that was coming.

Mr. Campney: At page 2195 of Hansard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked whether, in the case of a man who had a pension from one of the services and was later in the civil service, the pension was paid first with the balance being paid by the civil service, or whether the civil service payment came first with the balance being paid out of the pension fund. The minister said:

> I am subject to correction in the answer I make because I have never had the question raised before. My view is, however, that he gets his pension from the defence services pension fund to which he has contributed. Then he would receive the balance of his pay from the department. However I should like to check on that before giving a final answer.

The matter having been checked, the minister has asked me to say that he found the opposite is the case.

Mr. Knowles: I believe that is clear from the wording of the section now before us.

Mr. Pearkes: I hope that at some future date the amendment I have suggested may be given further consideration, because I feel that the advisers whom the minister consulted were probably financial advisers rather than service officers.

Mr. Campney: I am sure the hon. member for Nanaimo will gather from the first remarks I made today that any representations he makes are always given consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we would like to proceed with Bill No. 242, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We spent a day or more on it at the resolution stage, and we hope it will not be very controversial. Then we will take up the estimates of the Department of Transport. If we are fortunate enough to complete those we will take up public works.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF HOLIDAY ON MAY 24

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I announce to the house that, after consultation with Your Honour, it was decided that the members of the staff of the House of Commons would be given a holiday on May 24.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION AS TO AUTHORIZATION OF SEVEN-DAY WORK WEEK IN WESTERN COMMAND

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) asked about an order issued by the general officer commanding western command under which, it was said, all ranks of the Princess Patricia's based at Calgary had been required to move from their homes into barracks. I find this is not the case. During the period from May 17 to September 13, units in this command will be undergoing intensive training. Married officers and men can live out after duty hours, but must be back for the first parade.

QUESTION

GENERAL HOWARD KENNEDY

Mr. Low:

1. What was the total amount paid to General Howard Kennedy as chairman of the eastern Rockies forest conservation board, for (a) salary; (b) expenses or other allowances, for each of the years 1947 to 1951, and to date in 1952?

2. How many days in each year since 1947 did General Kennedy devote to duties in connection with the eastern Rockies forest conservation board?

3. Is General Kennedy employed on a full-time basis, or in a consultant capacity only?

4. Did General Kennedy hold any other position during the period January 1, 1947, to date?

5. If so, what position or positions (a) with the federal government; (b) other than with the federal government?

1.

Fiscal year	(a) Salary	(b) Expenses
1947-48	$ 8,484.00	$2,588.53
1948-49	12,000.00	3,718.66
1949-50	12,000.00	3,327.43
1950-51	333.00	Nil
1952-53 (1 month)	625.00	Nil

2. General Kennedy combines work of and for the eastern Rockies forest conservation board with that of operating a private practice as consulting engineer. Some portion of virtually every day is devoted to work of the board. This varies from interviews with personnel of the Department of Resources and Development, the Auditor General's department or the treasury department, to correspondence and preparation of material for reports, study of legislation, etc.

In addition to the foregoing, General Kennedy devoted his full time to the work of the board on the following number of days:

Fiscal Year	Days
1947-48	84
1949-50	102
1950-51	7

(He was on leave of absence without pay from April 1, 1950, to August 7, 1951, but nevertheless attended and served as chairman at board meetings in June and October of 1950.)

3. The basis of General Kennedy's agreement with the Department of Mines and Resources in 1947 was that he would serve as chairman of the eastern Rockies forest conservation board and give as much time as was necessary to carry out the work of the board and to direct its affairs. He serves as chairman and in the formative stages of the board he acted in the capacity of both chief engineer and chief forester.

4. Yes. General Kennedy served as director of the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees from April 1, 1950, to June 30, 1951. During this period he was on leave of absence without pay from the eastern Rockies forest conservation board.

5. (a) In addition to the position with United Nations, General Kennedy has served as chairman of the forest insects control board. He also served as chairman of the associate committee in forestry of the national research council. No remuneration was paid for these two positions. (b) Not available except for No. 4.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC PUBLIC BUILDINGS, WHARVES AND HARBOURS—FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. Catherwood:

1. What was the total amount spent by the federal government on new public buildings in Ontario and Quebec, in the year 1951?
2. What was the total amount spent by the federal government on wharves and harbours in Ontario and Quebec, during the year 1951?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may we have this passed as an order for return. I understand that the information requested by these questions is all contained in the report of the public works department, the only difference being that my officials will have to get to work and prepare that. Perhaps the hon. member could easily find those details in the report.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether the departmental report does not go only to the end of March, 1951, whereas this question is for the whole calendar year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is where the difficulty will start. We do not keep the books open that way. We follow the fiscal year, so that is still more work, but I shall try to get the staff to do it.

ARMED FORCES—ALLOWANCES, PAY AND PENSIONS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What basic pay and allowances are received by officers of the various ranks between WO II in the army and equivalent ranks in the other services, and brigadier?
2. After twenty years service, what pension would be received by the ranks mentioned in (1), upon retirement?

Mr. Blanchette: Return tabled.

PURCHASE OF CARS FOR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How are new cars purchased for the various government departments?
2. Are these cars purchased directly from the factory or through retail distributors?
3. If purchased through retail distributors, are tenders called for?
4. If tenders are called for, how is information circulated among dealers so that all interested parties might have the opportunity to submit a tender?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, TO GIVE POWER TO BOARD TO BORROW FROM MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That is is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to provide for a number of administrative changes under the act; inter alia to give power to the Canadian farm loan board to borrow money from the minister to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council approves for the purposes of the board; to permit first mortgage loans up to 60 per centum of the appraised value of the security and up to a maximum of $10,000; to provide for the appointment, duties and remuneration (out of the revenues of the board) of an advisory board to be known as the Canadian farm loan advisory board; to provide with respect to short term loans secured by second mortgage that they may be made for the same purpose as first mortgage loans and up to one-third of the amount of a first mortgage loan; and to provide further for aggregate maximum loans secured by first and second mortgages up to $12,000 and up to 70 per centum of valuation where chattel security is taken or 65 per centum where it is not taken.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

SALARIES OF VICE-CHAIRMAN AND OTHER MEMBER OF BOARD

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Tariff Board Act to provide that there shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund an annual salary of twelve thousand dollars to the vice-chairman of the board and an annual salary of eleven thousand dollars to the other member of the board.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THEFTS IN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS—FURTHER PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether any further prosecutions are being planned or prepared now, in respect of thefts either at Petawawa or elsewhere, as the result of any recommendations of Mr. Currie's staff or otherwise?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to anticipate events, but I will tell the hon. member that I expect further prosecutions to be laid.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister in a position to say how soon?

An hon. Member: How can you tell?

Mr. Claxton: Just as soon as the legal advisers of the Department of Justice think it is desirable.

Mr. Fleming: I have one other question. Are those in respect of thefts at Petawawa or elsewhere?

Mr. Claxton: Unfortunately, as I indicated in the house the other day, there are a number of prosecutions laid every year; but the only ones I know about are at Petawawa.

Gold Mining

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO YEARS 1952 AND 1953

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 242, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments before the house will provide for the extension of the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for two years. It will also clarify the application of the formula for cost-aid as it applies to the last quarter of 1950, and in the years 1951, 1952 and 1953.

We had a very full discussion on the resolution. I was pleased to note that the speakers without exception indicated their intention to support the amendments. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) referred to gold mining as a dying industry. I know that the industry is experiencing serious difficulties at this time and is, in fact, struggling for its very existence. I will not, however, agree that it is a dying industry.

The legislation now before us is designed to assist the industry over the present difficult period. At no time has it ever been suggested that this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and subsequent amendments are intended as a cure-all for the ills that beset the industry. They are only intended to help meet the emergency. In my opinion the difficulties that the industry is now struggling against will produce some benefit. The very fact that the price of gold has not been high enough to make it profitable is a challenge to all engaged in the industry.

As I said on a previous occasion, I recently had the pleasure of visiting the gold mining area of northwestern Quebec. There we saw at first hand the miracle that has taken place during the last few years. A short time ago the country was nothing but a vast wilderness. Today there are in existence thriving and prosperous towns; they are not the temporary makeshift communities that some people would expect to find on a wilderness frontier but are permanent, modern towns with all conveniences, well planned, with permanent and beautiful public buildings and fine homes. This has all taken place within the last twenty or twenty-five years. Similar history is being made in many other provinces in Canada and in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Around the towns agriculture is developing on an ever-expanding scale.

The spark plug of all this development was, and still is, gold. Many of the communities to which I have referred are largely dependent on one or more mines in their vicinity. Some mines are producing base metals as well as gold. Here and there base metal mines are being developed and these are adding stability to the region. I am informed that in almost every instance the original development was for gold.

These mines use an enormous amount of steel, electrical goods and products of the factories, forests and farms. They also contribute to the prosperity of our railways and other transportation facilities.

I should not pass on without saying a word about the contribution that aviation has made to the development of the north. Aviation has speeded up the exploration and development work tremendously.

The search for gold is the spearhead of civilization rolling back the wilderness and revealing and contributing to the development of the great riches of the Canadian shield. I could go further and tell you about the prospectors who brave the hardships of the wilds—black flies and the discomforts of the trail—as they go forth to discover and unlock the secrets of Canada's great storehouse of wealth, namely the Canadian shield. I could tell you about the engineers who plan the development and operate the mines and whose ingenuity and resourcefulness have evolved new and better methods, and more economical production.

It is this fine response to the challenge of adversity that has enabled the mines to continue under the present difficult circumstances.

I could tell you of the miners who daily face the dangers and hazards of underground operations. I believe, as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) does, that any man who works underground should receive a good wage for an honest day's work.

One partner in this great Canadian enterprise that is often forgotten, or to whom little credit is given, who I think should be recognized, is the investor, the provider of the risk capital, the men and women who provide the capital that makes possible the large scale very expensive enterprises that are necessary for successful operation under present-day conditions.

We all know that the prime reason for investing in mining enterprises is the hope of making a profit. As long as we believe in free enterprise we believe in the profit motive. We also know that free enterprise to operate successfully requires co-ordinated effort of capital, labour and management. In the gold mining industry at the present time we have an outstanding example of that co-ordinated effort.

I have been impressed during my trip to northwestern Quebec by the evidence of sincerity and public responsibility on the part of the owners and management and by the miners themselves. To their credit, they are investing large sums in recreational and social facilities for the old and young. They are building beautiful churches and schools.

We visited one splendid community centre that had been donated to the town by one of the mining companies. In another centre we visited a large community hall that had been built and completely paid for by the employees of a mine.

I am confident that the gold mining industry, and our mining industry in general, will survive the present difficulties and show the way to a greater and more prosperous Canada. The industry will be stronger than ever because the people in the industry are meeting the challenge of the present day with the spirit of hard work, enterprise and ingenuity.

The people of the gold mining industry are not looking for a handout. They are only asking for a chance to work out a solution to their problems. I am firmly convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if Canada is to be a great nation, as we all hope, we must maintain that spirit of adventure, enterprise and industry that is so clearly exemplified by these northern communities.

By these remarks I have endeavoured to show that the mining industry, although facing difficulties, is meeting the challenge and without a doubt will survive the emergency and be stronger for the struggle.

The extension of the cost-aid for another two years will give the mining industry a chance to cope with their problems. We all hope, and I know that the industry hopes, that they will not have to ask for further aid. However, that can be reviewed when the time comes. As I said before, this is not intended to cure the ills, but merely as a temporary aid to assist the industry in working out their own problems.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): In his remarks the minister used the word miracle in describing what he had seen in northwestern Quebec. May I say with all due respect he is hoping for another if he hopes that this gold mining area will continue to live in face of rising costs, with a fixed price for its products, that is in front of it today.

To go over the situation with regard to gold production for the last fiscal year, we find a very serious deterioration has taken place. The costs for straight gold mines have increased in the last twenty months, rather less than two years, by no less than $4.20 an ounce produced, or 12 per cent as a gross cost.

As I mentioned in my remarks last week, the Hollinger had an increase based on a ton of gold of $1 a ton. The grade at Hollinger may run $11 or $12 a ton, and the profit is a comparatively small amount. If this increase in costs per ton continues the gold mining industry even for the most profitable producer is doomed, and doomed in a comparatively short space of time.

The figures of production for last year published by the Canadian Metal Mining Association are as follows—they are in round figures: Thirty per cent of the gold is now being produced by mines whose costs are over $35 an ounce. The assistance from this act is $6 an ounce on the average. Even with this assistance these mines are operating at a loss at the present time. Thirty per cent of the straight gold mines have an average price of $32.50 an ounce, and the cost-aid averages $3.50 an ounce. At the present time these mines are just breaking even. The remainder, or 40 per cent of the straight gold mines, have an average cost of less than $30, and the cost-aid is 70 cents an ounce. These mines are still able to make money.

If costs go up in 1952 an amount similar to the increase in 1951, two-thirds of the Canadian gold mining industry will not be able to produce an ounce of gold for the statutory price of $35 in United States funds by the end of the year. And despite cost-aid on these figures, by the end of this fiscal year, practically two-thirds of our straight gold mining companies will not be making a profit on what they are producing. If that does not mean that the destruction of the industry is facing us, and facing us in the very near future, then I do not know what it means. The statement the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has made, that gold is the magnet, the metal that has attracted our frontiers north, is one with which I agree. But that just reinforces my statement that the gold industry today is in a perilous condition.

There is one other point I wish to make, and that is to deny the assumption that the United States treasury is the main market or even the control over the price of gold. The premium on the Canadian dollar is due not so much to inherent strength in our currency as to a weakness in the United States position, or a flight from the U.S. dollar. No matter how great or how rich a nation is, it cannot defy the laws of economics continuously. The United States policy of deficit financing is dangerous, not only to that country but to the whole of North America.

Annual deficits, particularly deficits which are suspect of being caused by and for internal political policies, are weakening the economic structure of the United States, and causing a great danger to the entire free world. The U.S. dollar, because of this policy, cannot be other than a wasting asset in terms of goods and services. For us to sell gold for this currency is basically unsound for this reason alone; but to sell it at a price below the world price, even stated in terms of U.S. dollars, is, to put it mildly, the supreme folly. No matter what the prosperity, no matter how great the production, no matter how high the standard of living, no country can survive continuous deficits in its national accounting.

I say that without any desire to criticize a great and friendly government. But the whole policy which is being followed, the whole economic policy, makes the gold industry in Canada hostage to American inflation. And, as I pointed out before, today less than 15 per cent of the gold is going into useful channels; it is being placed in hoards. That is the one thing we are trying to prevent. The one thing that we are trying to do is to put gold back into useful circulation. To fail to do this would be as dangerous as any national policy we could follow.

I spoke at length on this subject last Wednesday, and I do not propose to repeat today what I said at that time. But I wish to deny as emphatically as I can any suggestion that the United States either controls the world price or is the main market for gold. We should examine carefully the whole policy of selling gold to this market at the present price.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, when this measure was in the resolution stage we stated we would support it, to give assistance to the gold mining industry, because we recognize the important part that industry plays in the Canadian economy. First of all, we are producing gold and, secondly, gold plays an important part in helping us to meet our unfavourable balance of payments with the United States.

For a number of years we have been in the difficult position of not being able to balance our trade with that nation; and therefore gold does help us to balance our payments. On the other hand I would say that we would be in a far happier position and would be making a greater contribution to the welfare of the world if, instead of expanding the production of gold, we were to expand the production of some other useful commodity the United States was willing to accept. In that way not only would we be able to balance our payments with that country but, in addition, we would be making a real contribution to the wealth of peoples throughout the world.

During the last four years I believe we have paid over $40 million to the gold producers by way of assistance. I understand there are in the neighbourhood of 26,000 workers in that industry. I mention that only to remind those hon. members who, at the time we were discussing another measure, one which gave $65 million to the wheat producers, opposed it. Let me point out in passing that that $65 million was paid over a period of five years, and that over 250,000 grain producers benefited from the payment. So the amount of the subsidy now being given to the gold producers is far greater than the assistance given to the wheat producers. Further, the price of wheat was controlled in the same manner as the price of gold is now controlled. I mention that only in passing, and in the hope that in future, if measures come up to give assistance to wheat producers, a more reasonable attitude will be adopted by some of those very people who are so insistent now that this assistance be given to the gold producers.

When the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) spoke at the resolution stage he said that a return to the gold standard was desirable. He made it clear that he realized this could not be brought about overnight and that certain preliminary steps would have to be taken. On the other hand he left no doubt that he supported the idea of the restoration of the gold standard; and, in view of the fact that he spoke first for his party, I am assuming he was speaking on behalf of it, and that the Progressive Conservative party supports a restoration of the gold standard.

Let me add that not only the Progressive Conservative party is advocating the restoration of the gold standard, because in his mail every member receives a great amount of propaganda from various interests advocating the same thing. Let me make this clear. If we in this group thought for one moment that assistance under this bill was aimed at the restoration of the gold standard, we would not support it for one moment. On the other hand I have no reason to believe that that is the attitude of the government. As a matter of fact statements made from time to time by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicate clearly that that is not so. Apparently at the moment the government believes in a managed currency, which I believe is far more beneficial to the country than any effort to operate under a gold standard.

I found the speech of the hon. member for York West most interesting. With some of it I agreed, and with some I did not. I was interested in what he said with regard to the White plan brought down prior to the Bretton Woods agreement. Of course gold plays a large part in the Bretton Woods agreement. It holds a preferred position. It is the only commodity that a debtor nation has the right to demand that a creditor nation accept in payment of its obligations. A member nation's currency is valued in terms of United States dollars, and United States dollars are valued in terms of gold. So gold does play a very important part, and holds a very preferred position under the Bretton Woods agreement.

The hon. member for York West pointed out that Dexter White, who apparently wrote the White plan, had been called by Chambers a fellow traveller. Apparently he was a communist. The reason why that interested me is that at the time we were discussing the Bretton Woods agreement some of the strongest supporters of that agreement in this country were communists. At that time we were the only group in this house opposing the agreement and they criticized us bitterly and called us fascists and a few other names because we opposed it.

At that time we had in the house as a member a prominent communist. It so happened that he sat beside me. I said to him one day that I could quite understand why the communists were so anxious to push other nations into the Bretton Woods agreement because they felt that it was going to be a tremendous handicap to any nation that joined it and therefore Russia was all too anxious to get as many nations into that agreement as possible. I told him at that time that I was satisfied that Russia would never join the Bretton Woods agreement. He insisted they would, but what happened? Russia supported it up to a certain point and then dropped it. I think that was all by design; I do not think that was accidental.

It is very interesting to note that today one of the main reasons why Great Britain is having to trade with nations behind the iron curtain is to be found in the provisions of the Bretton Woods agreement. I do not think anyone should criticize Great Britain at the present time because she is trading with nations behind the iron curtain because it is a matter of life and death with her. She has to get food. She is able to get food from Russia. Apparently we are not prepared to sell her food unless she pays for it in dollars and she has not the dollars. She must buy that food from nations which are willing to trade with her on a barter basis or in return for sterling.

The hon. member for York West has advocated a return to the gold standard. I would say that any person who asks for a restoration of the gold standard is playing into the hands of the Kremlin to an even greater extent than were those who supported the Bretton Woods agreement. If the gold standard is ever returned it will mean strikes in this country from one end to the other; it will mean a very serious depression.

I say that for the simple reason that the gold standard cannot work efficiently where you have built up a degree of stability, where there is resistance against a fall in wages or a fall in the prices of agricultural products, where there is stability in incomes. In order to have the gold standard work efficiently that stability must be broken down.

Perhaps I should explain why I say that. I think we are all familiar with the principle of the gold standard. We know that under the gold standard currency is based upon gold; the gold reserves automatically control the internal prices in relation to the external prices. When prices within a nation rise to a higher level than the prices of other nations, gold flows out, exports fall off and we have an unfavourable balance of payments. The gold must flow out in order to adjust that adverse balance of payments. When the gold flows out your gold reserves are reduced and therefore there has to be a general restriction in the amount of money in circulation in order to bring it back into conformity with the reduced gold reserves.

When you reduce the amount of money in circulation it has a tendency to reduce prices. When you reduce prices there is a tendency to reduce wages and increase unemployment. That is supposed to go on until your prices fall to a level either lower than or equal to the prices of other nations. Then those other nations are supposed to buy your production and goods and gold will gradually come back into the country. That is supposed to be the automatic feature. Theoretically it works quite nicely.

As I said before, the gold standard can work effectively only when the social structure is amenable to these automatic features. Fortunately that is not the case in Canada. I am not trying to pat the government on the back, but we have built up in this country a certain degree of stability. We have a certain degree of stability in wages due to wage agreements. We have a certain degree of stability in farm prices through price support. If the gold standard is to apply you would have to break that structure or lose gold and thus have to restrict the amount of money in circulation. In a very short time you would either be forced off the gold standard or you would have a very serious depression.

I know that some will say that I am not giving a fair interpretation and therefore I should like to quote an orthodox economist, a man who I think has been recognized as an authority on the gold standard. I refer to Mr. T. E. Gregory, professor of currency and banking, University of London, and of the London School of Economics. I intend to quote from his book entitled "The Gold Standard and its Future", pages 32 and 33, as follows:

> It is more profitable to turn to a consideration of the general nature of the post-war economic situation and to discuss how and why this situation has complicated the working of the gold standard.
> Thirdly, the world economic structure has become rigid to an unprecedented degree. Owing to the much greater pressure which organized business and labour interests can bring to bear on government, there has been a general advocacy of "stability" which has in practice meant that particular groups could stabilize their own position without any, or enough, attention having been paid to the result of such stabilizing action on other parts of the economic field or to the long-period results of such action. Raw material producers have been allowed, with the aid of governmental or quasi-governmental assistance, to "stabilize" the prices of particular raw materials, without regard to the fact that consumption might thereby be discouraged and production encouraged . . . In the sphere of labour there has been in certain countries a development of unemployment insurance schemes or similar relief measures which have prevented wage rates from falling, whilst in others public opinion, reinforced by government propaganda, has had very much the same effect . . . From the standpoint of the working of the international gold standard, such a rigidity of social structure and of the scale of money income implies that the adjustment, which might under more elastic conditions have been made by movements in the domestic price and income structure, is at best delayed, with the inevitable effect that gold movements, or, what is in the modern world very much the same things, changes in the holding of foreign exchange assets at the command of the Central Bank, take place on a larger scale than would otherwise have been necessary.

I think that explains it in a more lucid manner than the way I described it. It indicates exactly what I was saying, that you cannot expect the gold standard to work efficiently so long as you build up buffers against a fall in wages, a fall in agricultural prices and a decrease in the general degree of well-being. Consequently your gold standard either has to go or you go down into a serious depression.

In this regard I always think that the best way to learn is to study the mistakes we have made in the past. During the past we have been on the gold standard on various occasions. I was interested in a report issued by the United States department of commerce in 1944 entitled "The U. S. in the World Economy" in which they review the reason for the quick recovery from the 1920-21 depression, the reason for the duration of the depression in the thirties, and the reason why we got out of the depression rather quickly in 1937-38. As I say, I am only going to quote enough to explain what effect the gold standard had in these movements. On page 2 there is the following:

> The major factors contributing to the relative ease and speed with which our international transactions weathered the strain of the 1920-21 period appear to have been the following:
> As pressure emanated from this country through the fall in business activity and prices, declining imports, and cessation of government lending, other countries were able to absorb part of the strain by permitting their exchange rates to depreciate and thus avoided becoming enmeshed in excessive deflation in their own economies. This was possible because the pegged exchange rates maintained among the allies during the war had been abandoned and the international gold standard had not yet been restored. Few countries, if any, attempted at that time to maintain fixed rates on the United States dollar.
> Also largely because they had not yet recommitted themselves to the gold standard . . .

With respect to the longer depression in the 1930's there is the following on page 5:

> The major factors accounting for the duration of the decline and the severity of its consequences were in many respects the reverse of the more favourable conditions noted with respect to the 1920-21 period. Among these factors were the following:
> In further contrast to the more flexible situation at the beginning of the decade, the world at large had returned to a regime of fixed exchange rates under the reconstituted international gold or gold-exchange standard, which had won general adherence by the end of the twenties. The initial endeavour to defend their exchange parities and reserve positions let the task of readjustment in their external demands fall full force on their internal economic life, thus strengthening the forces of depression and deflation throughout the world generally.
> One can only speculate as to how much deflation other countries would have had to enforce and endure if the adjustment had been carried all the way through in this manner. The principal measures of adjustment resorted to by other countries, most of which involved a radical departure from the gold standard and the previous world commercial system in general, were as follows:
> (1) Abandonment of gold parities and depreciation of foreign currencies with respect to the dollar.
> (2) General tariff increases aimed at curtailing total imports and promoting domestic production.
> (3) Preferential tariff and commercial arrangements designed to foster trade among the participants and to divert trade from other sources of supply.
> (4) Direct trade and exchange control through quotas and licensing requirements for the purpose of forcing trade along selected channels and restricting the use of foreign exchange to the available supply.

May I interject there that very often we hear the charge made that these controls and restrictions were largely responsible for the depression. Note that the depression was the reason that these controls and restrictions were implemented, and it was largely as a result of these controls and restrictions and the abandonment of the gold standard that we were finally able to pull out of the depression. With regard to the 1937-38 depression there is the following on page 10:

> The reasons for the short duration of the decline in our international transactions in 1937-38 and for its failure to have more serious repercussions seem to be as follows:
> Of basic importance with respect to the supply of dollars, prompt and energetic action was taken by the national authorities to prevent the development of the domestic recession into progressive and cumulative deflation along the 1929-32 order and to insure revival. In addition to the greater flexibility of exchange rates in general, by the time of the 1937-38 recession many foreign countries had developed intricate systems of trade and exchange controls and other techniques which helped them to absorb shocks from the outside without transmitting undue pressure to their internal economic structures.

I think it is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that we did not benefit by the experience that we gained in those years when we were drafting our post-war proposals with respect to financial policy. If we had given due regard to what had happened during those years, I think we would have been very hesitant about signing the Bretton Woods agreement because under that agreement, as I have already stated, we did place gold in a preferred position. We made gold the only commodity in the world today which a debtor nation has the right to insist that its creditors shall accept in payment of its obligations. Second, we gave exporting nations the right to demand payment in their own currencies instead of accepting the currency of the importing nation without placing any obligation whatsoever upon the exporting nation to buy the other nation's goods so they could obtain their currency.

If they are not able to obtain the currency of the exporting nation with which to pay for these imports, then of course they either have to go into debt or meet these payments with gold. Most of the nations that need our goods are not in the fortunate position of having gold. Not satisfied with that, we also supported a policy of non-discrimination which even denied those debtor nations the right to determine their sources of supply. Naturally when they had an adverse balance of trade with the dollar area the only way they could correct their balance of payments was to try to reduce their imports from the dollar area and buy elsewhere. They were denied that right under the principle of non-discrimination, although at the present time, realizing that they cannot possibly get on in any other way, we have allowed them to discriminate.

Another point that the hon. member for York West advocated was a free market for gold as a preliminary step to the setting up of a gold standard. So far as this group is concerned, we would have no objection to a free market for gold provided that gold was divorced entirely from the monetary system and made a commodity the same as anything else. Make it a commodity the same as other goods, provide a free market and make it subject to the law of supply and demand, speculation or anything else you like; but as long as gold is used as a yardstick we consider it very unwise to make it subject to speculation. As long as gold is used as a base for establishing the exchange rate between the currencies of the nations or as a gold base, then of course the price of gold should not be subject to speculation.

What would one think if our weights and measures were subject to the law of supply and demand? What would one think if every time there was a surplus of goods we agreed to put 24 ounces in a pound in order to move them, or if every time there was a surplus of cloth we agreed to put 40 inches in the yardstick instead of 36 in order to make it possible to move those goods or to meet the law of supply and demand? I think everybody would realize that our weights and measures would no longer be a yardstick of value. In exactly the same way, if you are going to make gold the basis of your currency and the basis for the exchange value between currencies, and then at the same time make the price of gold subject to the law of supply and demand, you have not got a yardstick at all.

I quite realize that some people may not agree with my viewpoint, and I believe the hon. member for York West would pay far more attention to the leader of the Conservative party in Great Britain than he would to me. Therefore I should like to quote what Mr. Churchill had to say on that particular point in a speech he made in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom on April 21, 1932, to be found at pages 1661 and 1662 of the official report of their debates. He said:

> When I was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard I was assured by the highest experts, and our experts are men of great ability and of indisputable integrity and sincerity . . . that we were anchoring ourselves to reality and stability; and I accepted their advice. I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice.
> But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability. The price of gold has risen since then by more than 70 per cent. That is as if a 12-inch footrule had suddenly been stretched to 19 or 20 inches; as if the pound avoirdupois had suddenly become 23 to 24 ounces instead of—how much is it?—16. Look at what this has meant to everybody who has been compelled to execute their contracts upon this irrationally enhanced scale. Look at the gross unfairness of such a distortion to all producers of new wealth, and to all that labour and science and enterprise can give us. Look at the enormously increased volume of commodities which have to be created in order to pay off the same mortgage debt or loan. Minor fluctuations might well be ignored, but I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

If any change is to be made in the price of gold while it is being used as a measure of value, then unquestionably that change should be made by statute and not be made subject to the law of supply and demand or speculation.

The member for York West further stressed that the free market would loosen trade in the sterling area. I was very interested in that. Perhaps I had better quote his words because I do not want to distort what any member has said. I refer to page 2212 of Hansard for May 14, 1952, where I read:

> The return to the gold standard is the only measure which, by making currency both a medium of exchange and a store of actual value, will prevent inflation . . .

That is an interesting statement, but this is the one I really meant to quote, on page 2210:

> If therefore the owners of the soft currencies were provided with the machinery by which they could exchange these currencies, through the medium of our gold market, into gold they would have a much more useful counter, no matter what it was called. There would have to be of course a buyer for the soft currencies, but the productivity of the sterling area in itself indicates a market for those currencies for those who wish to buy in that area.

I think that is a somewhat peculiar statement, because after all if anyone in Canada wants to buy sterling he can pay for it in dollars instead of gold. In so far as Great Britain is concerned she will be able to buy just as many things from Canada or the United States with dollars as with gold. In order to make it possible to buy sterling, you certainly do not have to have the restoration of either the free market for gold or the gold standard. I would have agreed with the hon. member had he advocated that we in this country should be willing to make some concessions to the sterling area by accepting payment for our goods in sterling, instead of demanding payment in dollars.

If we received a greater degree of sterling than we could use in the purchase of goods from that country, then we could hold those surpluses for future purchases or, if we considered that we would not need that surplus for future purchases, then I think we would be justified in investing that currency within the sterling area in order to encourage productivity, and thereby make it possible for that area to export more goods to us.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but does he think that would be better than lending the money directly to the United Kingdom, because of course it is a form of loan. It would be a loan without interest.

Mr. Quelch: I am interested in the minister's observation there, because I had a dispute with a former minister of finance when I said the same thing about United States investments in Canada. I characterized the United States investments in this country as being a form of debt, and he said that was not a debt at all.

Mr. Abbott: I did not mean that making investments in the sterling area was a loan, but does the hon. member think it would be preferable to make a loan by buying sterling, and perhaps investing it abroad, rather than to make the loan directly to the United Kingdom government as we have done in the past?

Mr. Quelch: No, this is a suggestion by the member for York West. I am not suggesting for one minute that we buy sterling. I suggested that when we have goods to export to England, and they are not able to pay us in our currency and at the same time they require our goods, then we should be willing to accept sterling. Having obtained that sterling, it could either be used for the re-purchase of goods produced within the sterling area or invested within the country. I agree that, in effect, that would be largely the same as a debt to us, but I think it would be a good way and would help both Canada and the sterling area.

It would certainly affect the agricultural producers of this country, because at the present time the agricultural producers of this country are being warned that if they expand their production there will not be a market for it. I believe it is nothing short of a calamity that any industry today should be reducing the production of food when there is so much starvation in the world. I believe it would be a good thing, therefore, to make it possible for Britain to buy our agricultural products and pay for them in sterling, and then we could take that sterling and invest it in that area. After all, we would be doing only the same thing that the United States has been doing in Canada. United States people are making quite large investments in Canada and we are using the dollars that come from those investments to increase our dollar and gold reserves and to meet our unbalance of payments. In any event, gold does not need to enter the picture at all. It is merely a question of Canadian dollars and United States dollars.

In closing, I would say that so far as I can see the government of this country intends to adhere to a managed currency. In my opinion a managed currency is far superior to the operation of the gold standard. Under a managed currency you have some of the best brains doing everything in their power to make the amount of money in circulation meet the needs of the Canadian people, and under the gold standard you make the amount of money in circulation dependent upon the size of the gold reserve, regardless of the amount that may be needed to maintain a high level of employment and well-being in this country.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, having spoken in the debate on the resolution stage of this measure on May 14, I do not propose to repeat anything I said at that time, although I shall press for answers to some of the questions I asked on that occasion which have remained unanswered. But I have a special wish to deal with some of the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who I regret to say has just left the house, when he spoke at the resolution stage on May 19.

Before I come to those statements, I have only one observation to make on the speech the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has made. He has expended a lot of effort and a lot of words in answering a case which I believe was not offered in the house. I do not know that anybody is suggesting that the restoration of the gold standard is even within the realm of possibility under present international conditions. What we of the Progressive Conservative party are urging is a revaluation of gold, because that will serve the interests of Canada.

Mr. Quelch: That is not what the member for York West (Mr. Adamson) said.

Mr. Fleming: I think if the hon. member for Acadia will read again the speech made by my colleague the member for York West he will see that he is reading into that speech a great deal more than the hon. member said.

Mr. Quelch: Will the hon. member permit me to read point No. 8 from page 2213 of Hansard for May 14, 1952? It reads:

> A gold-backed currency is the only sure cure for inflation. The return to a gold standard is desirable but is not an immediate prospect.

Mr. Fleming: It is not an immediate prospect now, and under present conditions it would be quite impossible.

Mr. Blackmore: Under any conditions will it be desirable?

Mr. Fleming: I do not say that under no conditions would it be desirable. Unless certain conditions which do not obtain today were present in the international sphere, I would not suggest for one minute that restoration would be desirable. But I would want to see those conditions obtain before I would commit myself on that subject.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I do not intend to be led off into a theoretical discussion which my friends to the left love so well, and which I am afraid would be unprofitable for all concerned.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member means a realistic discussion, not a theoretical discussion.

Mr. Fleming: No. I am talking about a theoretical discussion when I refer to the theme that interests my hon. friends greatly.

I wish to deal with a very real subject, a subject of very real and direct interest and importance to Canada, namely a realistic policy on gold having regard to the interests of the Canadian nation. I propose to deal specifically with some of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he spoke in this debate on May 19. Some of us who spoke prior to the Minister of Finance in the debate had pressed for some statement of policy on the part of the government in relation to the price of gold and also for some statement of government policy with relation to the international monetary fund. What the Minister of Finance had to say falls short of a statement of policy with regard to either of those matters.

Let us then examine what the Minister of Finance had to say about gold in relation to the policy of the United States. At page 2367 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

> Really to oversimplify it, the present value of gold today depends upon the willingness of the United States treasury to take it and to give $35 an ounce worth of goods and services for it. If the United States treasury ever stopped doing that, I can tell you that the Canadian gold producers would be in a much more serious position than they are at this moment.

And further down in the same column:

> . . . I again remind hon. members that the continued value of gold and the future of the gold mining industry is dependent, under today's conditions, upon the United States treasury being willing to purchase it.

Everyone will concede, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of the United States government with reference to the purchase of gold is a factor of high importance in the position of gold throughout the world. But, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has not said one word about what the government of Canada is seeking to do by way of influencing the policy of the United States government or seeking to obtain on behalf of the gold producers of this country an adequate price for their product. Indeed, one could only interpret the remarks made by the Minister of Finance which I have just quoted as suggesting that there has been some fear gripping the minds of the Canadian government, namely the fear that the United States policy with regard to gold may somehow be offended if the Canadian government asserts the interests of the Canadian gold producers, and that this fear has somehow restrained the Canadian government from putting forth a proper effort to defend the rights of the Canadian gold producers.

I ask in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, why this fear? How serious is a fear of this kind? Let us examine that matter for a moment. I submit to the house that there is no likelihood whatever of the United States government's abandoning its policy of buying gold. In the first place, while these figures are bound to fluctuate from time to time, the last figures I saw with reference to the gold holdings of the United States government indicated that the total held is some $22 billion in gold, of which $16 billion is required to give backing to the currency of the country, according to the laws of the United States. Mr. Speaker, is the United States government going to adopt any policy that is going to throw away or reduce the value of that national asset? Of course they are not.

In the second place, the policy of the United States government has shown a firm belief in gold as the final and universally acceptable means of settling international balances. Indeed it is fair to say that the policy of the United States government has been based upon that view. There is available today no evidence whatsoever to indicate that there is any change of viewpoint on the part of the United States government.

In the third place, all nations of the world still seek gold—even Russia. There is not one country in the world today that would not increase its supply of gold if it were within its power to do so.

In the fourth place, it has been and continues to be the policy of the United States government to keep gold out of private hands. I think that fact has a direct bearing upon government policy in Canada; and I think that anyone who suggests that the United States government is suddenly going to cease buying gold is not facing the situation realistically.

Then in the fifth place, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is quite clear that governments are going to have to enter the gold market and to rebuild their currency reserves; and I suggest that the United States government is not going to be the last among the governments of the world in doing that. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in his contribution to this debate the Minister of Finance has done nothing more than set up a straw man as an excuse for apparent inaction of the government of Canada in the face of a policy of the United States government which limits the price paid to the Canadian gold producer to $35 per ounce United States funds. This price is not meeting the cost of production of the majority of producing Canadian mines today, and is having the effect of grinding this important Canadian gold industry between the upper and the nether millstones, the upper stone being a fixed ceiling price for gold and the lower stone being the constantly rising cost of production.

What did the Minister of Finance have to say on May 19 with reference to the policy of the Canadian government with respect to the international monetary fund? As reported at page 2367 of Hansard he said:

> I would therefore not take it for granted, as some people do, that Canada gets no benefit from being a member of the international monetary fund.
> This is a question on which opinions may differ. That may not be the best medium for maintaining the stable, traditional role of gold in the world economy, but it is one means. The international monetary fund is participated in by most of the major trading countries of the world with the exception of Soviet Russia, and by all the major gold producers. I think that statement should be made here.

Mr. Blackmore: Whose words were those?

Mr. Fleming: They were the words of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Blackmore: When?

Mr. Fleming: When he was speaking in this debate on May 19. They are to be found at page 2367 of Hansard, in the second column.

Mr. Speaker, to my ears that statement sounds like a very lame and feeble defence of the international monetary fund. If that is the best that the Minister of Finance or the Canadian government can say for the international monetary fund, then there is little indeed that can be said in favour of that fund.

On previous occasions when the subject of gold was under discussion, I have said that the whole basis upon which the international monetary fund was erected was certain assumptions which were written into the preamble of the fund. To read the preamble today is to read something which will invite not comparison but complete contrast with many conditions that exist in the world now. The way in which international relations, international trade policies and international currency questions have developed since the days of Bretton Woods in 1945 has to a large extent, unfortunately, invalidated the bases upon which the international monetary fund's structure was then erected. What is the Canadian government doing about it? Here is a situation where international policy, as reflected in the international monetary fund, runs counter to the interests of Canada.

It is not to be argued, I think, Mr. Speaker, by anyone—certainly by anyone in this house—that when that fund runs counter to the interests of Canada as a gold producer it is not running counter to the fundamental interests of the Canadian nation. Well, then, what are the compensating advantages that Canada is receiving from the international monetary fund? The Minister of Finance hinted vaguely that there might be some compensating advantages, but he has scrupulously abstained from attempting to state them. If there are those advantages let us know about them.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I have said on previous occasions, namely, that the international monetary fund has become to an increasing degree an instrument of the fiscal policy of the United States. And to that extent it has run definitely counter to the interests of Canada as a leading gold producer.

We are still faced with a situation here in Canada, Mr. Speaker, where the government continues to subscribe to international policies which are definitely damaging the interests of Canada as a gold producer. If there are some compensating advantages that Canada is receiving, then let us know about them, because they are certainly not apparent to many of us.

When permission was given by the international monetary fund last fall for the step taken by Canada at that time to make provision for the marketing of gold of a fineness of 22 carats or less, other nations took advantage of the occasion to make some statements of policy, and I think that probably the most important of those statements was the one made by the government of South Africa, because after all it is the world's leading producer and exporter of gold. The statement issued by the South African treasury on October 3 closes with this paragraph:

> While the union government will naturally watch this market closely,—

It is speaking now of the market for gold which can be called or was called in this statement the limited free market for gold.

> While the union government will naturally watch this market closely, and take its decisions from time to time in the light of developments, it desires to state that it does not intend to use its release by the fund from its self-imposed restrictions in such a way as to embarrass the market. It has recently sold as much as 40 per cent of its current gold production in the industrial market. This percentage was of its own choosing, and it will not hesitate to reduce it if circumstances necessitate such action. On the other hand—

I ask the house to note this closing sentence, Mr. Speaker.

> —the union government appreciates the fact that the new market will continue to be in a highly fluid state and it reserves to itself complete freedom of action to judge its course as circumstances may dictate from time to time.

This is a highly important statement of policy on the part of the South African treasury with reference to the marketing of South African gold. Does the Canadian government believe that it ought to reserve to itself complete freedom of action to judge its course as circumstances may dictate from time to time? Certainly the interests which the South African government indicates that it will seek to serve in fashioning its policy are the interests of South Africa, not without regard for the interests of the world as a whole and for the desirability of maintaining stable trading relations between nations; but nevertheless the interests that it will seek to serve will fundamentally be those of the South African nation.

Can it be said, sir, that the Canadian government has followed or declared such a policy? The fact of the matter is that we have had from the Canadian government no adequate statement of its policy with reference to gold. Today we are invited to give second reading to a bill which is no doubt acceptable to the house as far as it goes, but it does not go very far. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys said today that this bill is not intended to cure the ills of the gold industry; it is merely intended to aid the industry to work out its own remedy. I think that was the expression, or the thought to which he gave expression.

Sir, how can this industry be left to work out its own salvation when it is forced on the one hand to sell monetary gold, or fine gold, at a fixed price, a price which is fixed by international action to which the government of Canada is a party; and, on the other hand, the only opportunity given to it to market gold freely is on the basis of debasing it by a cumbersome method which requires the Canadian gold producer to debase his product, presumably by adding copper to it, and sending it abroad where it is immediately refined—a cumbersome, clumsy and most inept procedure? Now, sir, in the face of a situation like that, all of it the result of government decision, all of it the result of government policy, how is it possible then to talk realistically in this house about leaving the Canadian gold producers to work out their own remedy and their own salvation?

We recognize, as the minister said today, that this measure does not purport to be a cure for the ills; it could not be. All that this measure does is to offer a subsidy for a limited period; in this case it is proposed to extend the period for another two years. It is properly called an emergency measure. The minister referred to the emergency today, and properly said that the gold mining industry in Canada is fighting for its life. I was very glad indeed, sir, to hear some of the remarks made today by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, because he has come closer in some of those remarks, it seems to me, to recognizing the seriousness of the plight confronting the gold mining industry than has any minister on the government side as yet. He certainly stated the plight of the industry in much more realistic terms than the way in which the Minister of Finance dealt with it on May 19. The Minister of Finance did not come any closer than referring in a general way to what he called the difficulties now facing the gold mining industry of this country. I suppose everybody faces difficulties of one kind or another, but the Minister of Finance did not show a very realistic appreciation of the plight of this great Canadian asset today, the gold mining industry.

Sir, it is going to take a great deal more than stopgap and inadequate measures of this kind to meet the needs of the gold mining industry. We are not saying this, Mr. Speaker, simply in narrow terms with a view to keeping alive a particular industry. We are thinking in terms, sir, of a great many people who depend upon these gold mines for their livelihood; we are thinking of many communities that directly owe not simply their prosperity but their very existence to the prosperity and well-being of the gold mining industry, and we refer also, sir, to the fact that in this gold mining industry we have one of the bastions of the Canadian economy. It may not be adequately recognized in that role today by the government, but it should be, and the time may yet come when the Canadian government will have to realize, as Canadians did realize in the 1930's, how much the prosperity and well-being of the gold mining industry does mean to the economic well-being of all of Canada. And measures of this kind certainly do not hold out any promise of rectifying the fundamental ills and problems that confront the industry.

The Minister of Finance conceded that, but he sought apparently to wash his hands of responsibility for meeting these ills and problems of the gold mining industry. Well, sir, the government cannot in any light way like that shed the responsibility that it bears today for the condition of the gold mining industry. The price is set by international action. The price is set by the United States government and by an organization which surely the Canadian government ought to have some voice in seeking to influence. We do not find the Canadian government fulfilling its responsibility to this industry by making any attempt to direct or encourage a change of policy on the part either of the international monetary fund or of the United States treasury with respect to the price of gold.

Sir, we again ask: What is the policy of the government? What is the government doing to bring about the one sensible and complete solution of the problem, namely an increase in the price of gold? What is it doing? What has it been doing? What representations has it made to the United States government? What representations has it made to the international monetary fund? When we ask those questions we are met only with a stony silence. We can only conclude that the Canadian government has not measured up to its elementary responsibility to Canada and to the gold mining industry by seeking to encourage a change of policy on the part of the international monetary fund and the United States government.

In the meantime no change is indicated in the policy of the government with reference to the marketing of debased gold in the so-called limited free market for non-monetary gold. Apparently the step taken last fall, which was a good step so far as it went, is not to be improved; because apparently the government is going to insist that every producer make a firm and binding choice as to whether he will market his gold on the monetary basis at $35 an ounce or whether he will market it on the so-called non-monetary basis. He is not to be permitted to make a selection from time to time or to divide his product between two markets as may suit his interests.

Apparently also there is to be no relaxation in the rigidity of the regulations laid down by order in council last September in regard to the marketing of this so-called non-monetary gold. Apparently every producer is to be compelled to make a decision which will be binding for the calendar year. This rigidity, I submit, is inexcusable. It has hurt the effect of what was a good step, albeit inadequate, last fall.

Why, when a step like that is taken, should the beneficial effects be compromised by the introduction of this intolerable rigidity? I submit that what the government needs to do is to work for a release of this Canadian gold mining industry from the straitjacket into which it has been put by the policy of this government, and by international policy to which this government has apparently been a willing party.

(Translation):

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I was quite moved, a few moments ago, to hear the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) speak so enthusiastically of his recent trip to northwestern Quebec, that is to that part of the province wherein lies my constituency. I was also very gratified to hear him speak of the satisfaction he had felt while visiting the mines in our district and our—shall we say—recently established towns, that are no more than five, ten, fifteen or twenty-five years old. I was even more gratified to hear him speak in glowing terms of the young engineers who are at present directing operations in those gold mines now open in the northwest section of the province.

In this connection I would like to quote an article published in the newspaper La Frontière on the occasion of the minister's visit to our district. Here is what this newspaper wrote in welcoming the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys:

> The Hon. George Prudham, Minister of Mines in the St. Laurent government, will be the guest of honour of the prospectors' association of western Quebec next Thursday evening at Noranda.
> La Frontière is happy to welcome the federal Minister of Mines. To our knowledge, this is the first time he has, officially at least, paid a visit to the main mining region of the province of Quebec.
> He will notice, among other things, that in twenty-five years at the utmost, and in much less than that as far as Val d'Or and Malartic are concerned, we have witnessed here, in our province, the development of a district whose economy is based almost entirely on mining, especially copper and gold mining.
> It will therefore be readily understood that the federal Minister of Mines will certainly be well advised to meet with the prospectors who ensure the continuity of our mining industry. We express the hope that the discussion he will have with them as well as with the mine managers will lead to a better understanding of the difficulties which stand in the way of prospecting and mining operations. Canada has to depend more and more on its mines. We may therefore hope that this visit, sooner or later, will bear fruit.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we see today that the minister's visit has certainly borne fruit, since he is now moving second reading of a bill which provides for the extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said, I believe personally that the Canadian government is doing all that is humanly possible to convince the directors of the monetary fund, as well as the United States government, of the necessity of raising the price of gold. I have every confidence that before long the price of gold will be raised. There is no other means of allowing our producers to meet the present requirements.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this debate; I would like, however, to add a few words in order to underline the fact that the measures taken in previous years by the government in favour of our gold mines, have turned out to be an excellent investment. When we read in the last report of the department of mines about the moneys granted to our gold mines under this assistance act, we see that Canada has paid to those mines grants totalling $42,100,000. Again, in the statistics which were recently released in connection with gold mining, we can see that from 1947 to 1950—not including 1951—our gold mines have disbursed $22 million for salary increases. I will admit that a few moments ago I was wrong in comparing these figures with $42 million; actually, during the three years comprised between 1948 and 1950, the federal government granted about $32 million in subsidies and our gold mines paid $22 million in salary increases.

It seems to me that this argument amply justifies the government's present attitude, in wishing to extend this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the years 1952-53.

(Text):

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of this industry to the 26,000 workers who are engaged in it, and because as matters now stand gold is playing a part in our economy, we accept this bill. However, we wish to make it clear that by so doing we do not concur in the views that some have expressed with regard to returning to the gold standard or the necessity or usefulness to our economy or the economy of the world of trying to get an increase in the price of gold itself.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) thought that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was knocking down a straw man because he made the excellent case he did against returning to the gold standard.

Mr. Blackmore: For not returning.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Nevertheless, it is quite clear that the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) considered the return to the gold standard as being desirable under certain conditions. In his speech on May 14 he made it clear that there was at least one condition which he wished to have fulfilled before returning to the gold standard, and he spelled that out two or three times on pages 2212 and 2213 of Hansard of that date, when he said:

> The gold standard is desirable, but we cannot arrive at a gold standard until we determine the price at which gold can be traded in terms of our own currency.

He then went on to list some ten points. In dealing with point No. 7, he said, as reported on page 2213 of Hansard:

> The return to a gold standard must be preceded by the operation of a truly free market to establish a price for gold which can be maintained.

Then in his next point he said that to return to the gold standard was desirable. The hon. member for Eglinton says that he and others of his party are not at the moment making a case for a return to the gold standard, but the hon. member for Eglinton is working for that condition precedent which the hon. member for York West indicated the other day. That seems to suggest clearly that if the hon. member for Eglinton could get what he calls a realistic price for gold the next step would be the step advocated by the hon. member for York West, namely, a return to the gold standard.

It seems to me that what those who take that position fail to admit is that they are asking to have it both ways. They are asking for gold to be the basis of our currency, which gives it a protected price, and at the same time they are asking for such advantages in terms of price as they think can be achieved by a free market for gold. As the hon. member for Acadia so well stated in the excellent speech he made this afternoon, it would be all right to ask for a free market for gold and to take whatever price can be obtained on that basis if you put it in the same light as other commodities, but to ask that gold be the basis of our currency, with a guaranteed floor price, and then on top of that to ask that gold have the advantage of a higher price by having it sold on the free market is, I submit, asking for it both ways.

Complaints are made, such as was made by the hon. member for Eglinton, that the price of gold is fixed. The inference from that complaint is that, in the hon. member's view, it is fixed too low. Actually that fixed price is a floor price; it is not a ceiling. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said the other day, it is fixed as a floor by the fact that the United States treasury is prepared to pay $35 an ounce. Here you have these protagonists for gold in effect complaining that the floor is too low, in other words wanting the guaranteed floor to be higher, and then they want a free market on top of that.

I submit that there is so much that is fallacious about that reasoning that it simply cannot be agreed to. It was good to hear the comments on this subject made the other day by the Minister of Finance, and I feel that the hon. member for Acadia rendered a real service by making the speech he made this afternoon. Someone might say, in the light of the complaints that I am now making against the argument for a return to the gold standard, that that should lead us to vote against this measure. As I have pointed out already, gold is playing a part in our economy as matters now stand. It plays a part in our exchange position with the United States, particularly when the United States treasury is prepared to buy it at $35 per ounce. Thousands of workers are involved in the industry and for these reasons we are prepared to accept and vote for the measure now before us. Nevertheless, as the hon. member for Acadia felt constrained to do, we feel that we must make it clear that if support of this measure were taken to imply that we were consenting to any steps designed to achieve the return of the gold standard, then the measure would not have our support.

As the hon. member for Acadia pointed out, if you go back to the gold standard you then submit your currency and your whole economy to the control of what amounts to blind economic forces. We in this group believe in a planned economy. We believe that it is our right and our duty to try to relate our natural resources, our productive capacity, and the goods and services we can produce by applying our labour power to our resources, to the needs of our people. We believe that in that process it is our right and our duty to control and manage our currency so that it will facilitate the greatest possible production and the most equitable distribution possible of the goods and services produced by our people.

We share with the hon. member for Acadia satisfaction—and I was glad to hear him express it this afternoon—that we have made some social progress in this country. We have moved to the point where there is definite resistance against the lowering of the standards of either our workers or our farmers. As it has already been put, there is definite resistance against the lowering of wages, not only monetary wages but real wages in terms of purchasing power. There is resistance against the lowering of the incomes, the real incomes of our farm population. Similarly I am glad to say that support has been built up in this country for the principle of social security, and there is very strong resistance against any moves that would lessen the value of such social security measures as we now have. Indeed, the whole trend of the thinking of the people of Canada is that our social security measures should be improved and that we should move forward in terms of improving our standards of living on all these fronts. You cannot do that if you are going to tie yourself to a gold standard. The only way we can really take full advantage of our natural resources and our productive capacity in such a manner as to provide a high standard of living for our farmers and other workers, and to provide adequate measures of social security, is to control our currency in the interests of these objectives, rather than letting our currency control us. It is for these reasons that we resist very strongly any move to return to the gold standard. It is for these reasons that we favour a managed currency as part of a program which we refer to as a planned economy.

While I am on my feet, I must say I have found it hard to reconcile some of the things that are said about gold and the gold industry. It was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton as one of the bastions of our economy. There came in the mail to members today a reprint of a speech made recently on the whole question of gold and gold mining in which it is said:

> Gold still has all the qualities which for centuries has made it the only lasting international money, representing a permanent and indestructible form of wealth, and providing sound backing for national debt and currency.

As I say, we get comments of that kind telling us that gold is a bastion, that gold is indestructible, that it is something wonderful, all but eternal; we are told that the gold industry does not want a handout, and yet it has to come to parliament and ask for assistance, indeed for legislation, which during the past four years has resulted in subsidies amounting to some $40 million. The request now before us is that the payment of this subsidy continue for another two years. I have already indicated the reasons why we are prepared to accept the measure, but I plead with the house that we understand what we are doing and realize that we are dealing with a particular case, a particular industry, which is merely one amongst many. Let us not think we are dealing with something that is basic to our whole economy.

After all, the factors that are basic in our economy are those factors that make possible the production and distribution of wealth, and if we have got any common sense and grey matter as human beings we are going to organize the production of that wealth and see to it that it is properly distributed. We are going to see that our monetary set-up facilitates that process. We are not going to tie ourselves down to some blind force which will deny us the right to make social and economic progress.

There is one other thought that we have given utterance to before from this corner of the house, and I am sure it is a thought that is in the minds of many people of this country from coast to coast when they learn of the amount that is being spent to subsidize this industry. If we can afford to subsidize the mining of gold out of the federal treasury, surely we can by making payments afford to subsidize other primary producers when it is necessary, and likewise subsidize desirable social objectives for the well-being of our people. I fully agree with the comment made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he compared this subsidy with the payment to western wheat producers a couple of years ago. May I add in that same vein that during the past seven years the total amount paid out by way of subsidies to maintain floor prices for farm products is in the neighbourhood of only $10 million. We have paid only $10 million in seven years to support floor prices for agricultural products compared with $40 million for gold in the last four years. We now have a measure that will tell the gold industry where it stands in relation to this subsidy for the next two years. On the other hand, the floor under beef is being set for a month at a time and the floor under pork for a year at a time.

Another subject that we frequently raise in the house is the question of housing. Again I say that if it is possible to provide sums like these to help a particular industry and group of workers, surely this parliament should not object to or resist our appeals in the name of the people of Canada for subsidies for housing for our Canadian people, which is one of the greatest needs of our time.

The whole question of whether we control our economy or are controlled by it is at stake in a discussion of this kind. I feel very strongly that those who would try to get us back to the gold standard or who would talk in terms of gold as though, instead of being just one of several commodities, it was something basic to our whole economy, are getting us away from the fundamental fact that what we want out of a monetary system is not a form of enslavement that will carry us down to another depression but rather a medium that we can control and manage so that it will facilitate the production of the greatest possible volume of useful goods and services and the distribution of those useful goods and services amongst our people in the highest standard of living that is now possible.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Calculation for 1950.

Mr. Adamson: I cannot allow the remarks that have been made this afternoon to go entirely unanswered. A plea was made—and I am glad it was made—which marks the great cleavage and shows that the Social Credit and C.C.F. parties stand together in favour of a managed currency. They believe it is within the power of a national government to manage its currency despite all the evidence of history, despite the fact that every time any government has persisted throughout the years in attempting to manage currency it has inevitably meant inflation. I would suggest that they bring on the tumbrils and set up the guillotines because that is what will follow. Churchill's speech was quoted today. Churchill made the cardinal error in October, 1925, I believe, of trying to return to a gold standard at the 1914 price of 80 odd shillings per ounce despite the fact that the paper currency base and national debt had been tremendously inflated. There was not enough gold to make it operate. Consequently the value of the pound in purchasing power was greatly debased after the 1914-18 war, and to try to return to a gold standard based on a 1914-18 price for gold was obviously suicide. Before any attempt is made at returning to the gold standard there will have to be a period during which the price of gold can adjust itself as a free commodity. How long that will be I do not think anyone in this house, or in fact anywhere, can say; but that is the preliminary step which must be taken. The one step is that the market must regain its equilibrium as a free operation.

We have tried the device of pegging the prices of commodities. We have tried, within one country, setting the world price of certain commodities, whether it be wheat, copper, zinc, lead or anything else. Eventually those attempts have inevitably failed. To try to do the same thing for gold will also fail, as is being proven at the present time.

Constant inflation is apparently the policy advocated by the groups on the left. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any group that will be destroyed by constant inflation it is the working class in industry and the farmer. The one thing that will stabilize, and make that individual secure, is to know that the value of the money he can save, the value of the pension, the value of his insurance, will remain constant and not depreciate through the years. If that is the policy of the two groups to the left in this chamber, I am delighted to hear it, because I shall know what to say. If you want to maintain security for the individual you have to give him a counter that is going to maintain its purchasing power. With a managed currency or with any idea of some commodity basis for currency, that can never be done. We must take the steps necessary to safeguard the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, irrespective of what it is quoted at in terms of any other currency.

There has been in history and there is now no machinery that has ever been able to maintain the purchasing power of a national currency except the exchangeability into gold at a fixed price. We realize that it may take some time. There may be a long period of adjustment, but eventually it must be taken if the security of a national currency is to be maintained. This cannot be done by decree or by decision of this parliament or the parliament of any country in the world. It has to be done by the freely accepted opinion of the producers and traders of the world and the laws of supply and demand.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the hon. member who, to judge from the opinions he has expressed, must be the best authority on gold and its history in the house, can give us the price at which gold was being sold in the United States from 1925 down to 1935?

Mr. Adamson: What was the hon. member's question?

Mr. Blackmore: What was the price at which gold was being sold in the United States for each of the years from 1925 to 1937?

Mr. Adamson: It was $20.67 until the demand for gold forced the United States off the gold standard.

The Chairman: According to our practice at this stage a general discussion of the bill is allowed. We should not have, in the first place, a recurrence of the debate which took place on second reading. In the second place, I think we should bear in mind that this is an amending bill in only two particulars. Discussion may be general as to the two particulars in which the bill amends the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. At this stage I do not think hon. members should go through the whole picture of the gold mining industry, the value of gold as a basis for currency and so on, as some hon. members seem intent on doing.

Mr. Green: With all due deference, the rule here is that we can have a pretty wide discussion on the first section of the bill. I see no reason why that rule should be abandoned in the case of this particular bill. I really believe that if the discussion is allowed to take its normal course that will not only be more nearly in line with the rules of the house but will save us considerable time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I wish to intervene at this stage. We spent a half day on the resolution without being able to complete it. We continued a day or two later in committee, and that discussion lasted quite a long time. We have spent the time from the opening of the house until now in the debate on second reading. We have had a fine general discussion on gold and I have become interested in it, though I have not seen any for a long time.

Mr. Knowles: There has been a gold robbery, now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps that is inciting the people to get more gold, but I believe that right now we should apply the rule which is applied in committee, that remarks should be relevant to the item.

Mr. Green: This is something—

The Chairman: Before anything else is said, may I say that I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and myself are in agreement, but where we differ is that he seems to believe that what is before the committee at the moment is an act called the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, but what is before the committee is a bill to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. If he looks at the explanatory notes he will see that. There may be a general discussion as to these two amendments, and that is quite in order.

On the first section of the bill in committee, however, we always cover what is in the bill. I think hon. members generally will agree with me on that score. We cannot have a general discussion on gold because we have before us a bill amending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We may have a general discussion on the amending bill but not on the sections of the bill.

Mr. Green: Of course the first section of the bill, as a matter of fact, deals primarily with assistance to the gold industry, and that opens up the whole question. I submit that the hon. member is quite in order in asking the question he has just asked of the hon. member for York West. We always have this trouble, Mr. Chairman. We have had the Minister of Public Works, who is the house leader—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not troublesome.

Mr. Green: —and he is an efficient and amiable house leader—rise whenever he thinks sufficient time has been spent on debate. We have him or some other member of the government getting to his feet and saying that now we should cut off this debate. He said today that because there was some extended debate at the resolution stage, the debate at this stage should therefore be short. The two have absolutely no connection. It is just the urge on the government side to cut off the debate and, I suggest, the urge on the opposition side to bring out all the facts. I submit that the hon. member for Lethbridge is quite in order in asking the question which he has asked.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree. What I should like is for the chairman to see that the rules of the house are complied with once in a while. Generally I so greatly enjoy the speeches that I do not object; but I have heard a great deal about gold. If it is the intention to start the debate over again, I think it would be against the rules to do so. We are in committee. We have before us section 1 of the bill which provides for a change in the rate of assistance to the gold mining industry. I think an hon. member could discuss that rate. If he is not satisfied with it, but wants it increased or decreased, he would be quite in order to discuss that matter but it would not be in order for him to enter upon a review of the gold situation in the world generally. I think a discussion of that kind would be out of order.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the reason for my asking the question is simply this. The hon. member for York West is advancing, as one reason for passing this bill, the fact that the gold standard ultimately is important to Canada and that consequently we should take care of our gold industry. My question is directed to examining the basis for his general assertion that gold, as a backing for currency, has been a stabilizing factor throughout the world and the only anchor which could be used in relation to money. That is the only reason that I am asking the question. The question goes right straight to the core of one of the major reasons advanced by the hon. member for passing this bill. It is not my desire to repeat the arguments which have been advanced, but certainly when a member like the hon. member for York West, with the position he holds, makes a statement in this chamber which in the opinion of other hon. members is fallacious, the other members should have the privilege of probing into the extent of his knowledge. That is the reason I asked the question. I will just say this. No doubt he has got off balance. He just has no information on this matter.

He wants to put the price of gold on the speculative market. I will just use one illustration and then I will say no more unless he provokes me. All you have to do in order to know what happens to the price of a commodity when it is on the open market is just remember what used to happen to the wheat crop in western Canada when the price of wheat was on the free exchange in Winnipeg. What the hon. member in effect is advocating is that gold should be put on the open market and that the price thereof should be determined not by supply and demand but by speculative supply and demand which results in the organization of bulls and bears, with all the drastic fluctuations that can take place in price. When the hon. member is ready to answer that statement let him come forward and do it, and not make general statements.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question or two. I was interested in listening to the exposition of the point of view of the hon. member for York West. I heartily disagree with his statement that it would benefit the Canadian people to have a return to the gold standard. I support what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said.

I want to draw to the minister's attention the suggestion that came from another direction and was unique, and I want to get his opinion on it. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, when speaking on this subject in the house on February 12, 1951, made a most interesting and original contribution to the debate.

Mr. Gibson: Somebody has to have some intelligence around here.

Mr. Herridge: He suggested that if gold were staked out in ore bodies, the government could issue a certain amount of currency against the gold in the ground. That was not a frivolous remark, Mr. Chairman. I am sure it was made as the result of a good deal of thought and meditation on his part.

Mr. Fleming: It would be the first time.

Mr. Herridge: The suggestion came from a distinguished member who sits on the front bench, a gentleman with considerable business experience, one with a good parliamentary record and who is an original and creative thinker. I want to ask the minister this question. Has the minister given consideration to the proposal made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni? If so, what objection would he have to an economic system or monetary and fiscal policy such as that suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I do not see that this question is directed to, or deals in any way with, the question that is before the committee.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I think I should try to clear up some of the misapprehension in the mind of the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Knowles: Are you speaking for your party?

Mr. Gibson: I am afraid the hon. member for Kootenay West has not read his Hansard. I am sure he can read; and I am quite sure that his powers of analysis are such that if he read a quotation from my speech at that time he would realize that what I said was this. We were setting up a manpower council at that time in order to try to allocate manpower to most essential uses in Canada. I said that if we were short of manpower for the defence of our country, I thought probably the first thing we could divert was the manpower from gold mines in Canada. I still believe that to be so. Happily, however, since that time we found that we had sufficient manpower to maintain our gold mining as well as our other projects as far as national defence is concerned.

The hon. member will also recall that I did not say that paper should be issued against gold lying in the ground. I said that if it was necessary for Canada to have gold backing its paper dollars—and that is something for which I am quite prepared to take the word of the economists on the government benches—if we were short of manpower, I thought possibly we could take proven gold ore reserves in the ground and use those at their net value for the issue of paper currency. I still believe that to be possible.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys several questions. The first is this. What proportion of the gold production has been going into the so-called free market for non-monetary gold since the policy was inaugurated last fall?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Prudham: The production figures for the last quarter of 1951 and the first quarter of 1952 for auriferous mines were 1,126,738 ounces and 1,071,930 respectively. The percentage sold in the free market—

Mr. Adamson: I would prefer it if the minister called it the premium market, because it is not truly free.

Mr. Prudham: The percentage of total production going into the free market in the last quarter of 1951 was 25·7; in the first quarter of 1952 it was 32·5.

Mr. Fleming: What does the government estimate to be the effect on the production of Canadian gold of the inauguration of the so-called free market for non-monetary gold last fall; the effect on the total production?

Mr. Prudham: A possible increase or decrease? I would not like to express an opinion on that. I do not suppose it makes any difference. Some mines are taking advantage of the free market. Eleven mines during the last quarter of 1951 and I think twelve at the present time have elected to use the free market.

Speaking to the resolution the hon. member for Eglinton I think made the statement that the order in council governing the free market permission was too stiff; that a mine electing to go on it was forced to stay on it. Well, as a matter of fact, a mine may elect at the beginning of any one quarter to go on the free market, and the only restriction is that it must stay on the free market for the balance of the calendar year. In other words if it elected at the end of the first quarter it would be nine months before it would have the privilege of going back on to gold mining assistance again, and so on.

Mr. Fleming: That was my next point, Mr. Chairman. Why should that be? Why not allow the mine free choice each quarter as to whether it will market its gold production on a monetary basis or on a non-monetary basis?

Mr. Prudham: If a mine sees that it is advantageous to go on the free market it should be able to make up its mind two months in advance.

Mr. Fleming: Is that the settled decision of the government in this matter, that they are not going to open this up at all to allow a free election each quarter?

Mr. Prudham: They now have the choice, a free election, at the beginning of any one quarter, and at the end of any one quarter, and I think that is quite generous.

Mr. Fleming: Then I take it that it is not the intention of the government to alter the present plan, or to permit an entirely free election each quarter on the part of each mine?

Mr. Prudham: Well, if a mine wanted to wait until the end of the third quarter they would then have the privilege of changing; they would have the privilege of changing their mind at the end of the first quarter after election.

Mr. Fleming: That does not answer my question. I understand what the minister is saying about the present basis. If a mine does elect to go on the non-monetary marketing basis it is bound for the balance of the calendar year, no matter in what quarter of the year it so elects?

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: I am asking if it is the fixed intention of the government to continue that basis, or whether the government is prepared to meet the wishes of the mines that are urging that they be permitted to make a free and unqualified election at each quarter as to whether or not they will go on the non-monetary marketing basis.

Mr. Prudham: To the best of my knowledge no mine has requested a change in that provision. For the time being at least we do not contemplate any change in that regulation.

Mr. Fleming: I am amazed to hear the minister say that, because obviously he has not been reading the statements made by very eminent figures in this field. When I spoke on May 14 I made reference to the speech at the annual meeting of Noranda Mines, one of the biggest gold producers in the country, by Mr. J. Y. Murdoch, the president of the company, than whom I am sure no one holds a position of higher respect in this industry. Speaking on this very matter, Mr. Murdoch said:

> I do feel that for greater effectiveness and in order to encourage more mines to forgo "cost-aid", the present regulations could be improved. As it now stands, once a gold producer elects to sell in the free market it must continue to do so for the remainder of the calendar year. This provision makes it difficult for certain mines to properly appraise the situation and decide what is best for them to do. In all fairness, as it is solely a matter of administration I would strongly advocate that arrangements be made to permit the mines to "elect" each quarter.

What could be plainer than that, and from what more eminent source could a responsible opinion on this subject be sought?

Mr. McCann: Did he make representations to the government on that ground?

Mr. Fleming: If I asked that question the minister would say it is privileged, and he would not even answer.

Mr. Prudham: I do not intend to read all the speeches that are made outside the house. I am quite sure that no application has been made to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for that change.

Mr. Fleming: Why does the government insist that gold marketed on the so-called non-monetary basis should be debased to a fineness of 22 carats or less, in finding its way to this so-called free market?

Mr. Prudham: To the best of my knowledge that is the way the customers want it.

Mr. Fleming: To what customers is the minister referring in making a statement like that? The essence of this matter is that the Canadian gold producer, in order that his gold may go to this so-called free market for non-monetary gold, must debase it to a fineness of 22 carats or less. It simply means that he has to add copper to it. Then when it is sent out of the country to the purchaser it is refined. What sense is there in that? Why should not the Canadian gold producer be permitted to sell gold on this free market on the same basis as he sells it for monetary purposes? Why introduce this requirement of debasing, knowing that when it reaches the foreign purchaser it is simply going to be refined again?

Mr. Prudham: The gold that is now being sold on the free market is supposed to be sold for commercial purposes, not for monetary purposes, and I understand that the commercial market does not require the fineness that is required for monetary purposes.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask a question? Is that restriction imposed by the monetary fund? Is the requirement for debasing the result of the restriction of the international monetary fund?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask the minister if the government persists in its present policy of refusing to allow gold to be held in private hands in Canada?

Mr. Prudham: I do not see that that question relates to the amendment before the committee.

Mr. Fleming: With all due respect, I do. One of the reasons this measure is being sought, this subsidy, is that effective marketing at adequate prices is not available to the Canadian gold producer. The question I have asked has to do with one suggestion that has been frequently put forward for easing the lot of the Canadian gold producer. To let people in Canada hold gold, even in coinage form, would at least increase your market, improve the price and provide a hedge for the Canadian gold producers. Surely that is a matter of very direct interest when we are dealing with a bill which proposes to continue a subsidy as one method of meeting the problems of the gold producers.

The Chairman: What seems to be very pertinent on this first clause is a discussion of the calculation for 1950. I am not in a position to say whether the question the hon. member for Eglinton has asked of the minister has anything to do with this first clause. That is a matter between the minister and the hon. member. The minister says it does not come under this clause. The hon. member disagrees. It seems to me it is a matter of opinion. Shall the section carry?

Mr. Fleming: No. Is the minister prepared to enlarge upon his answer? I am trying to be helpful. I can assure the minister I am not trying to make trouble for him, but we do want the information.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member of Eglinton is just as familiar with the present regulations regarding the holding of gold as I am. I know of no change in government policy.

The Chairman: Does the section carry?

Mr. Fleming: Has the government made any representations to the United States government within the last year with a view to seeking an increase in the price that government is prepared to pay for Canadian gold?

Mr. Prudham: Once again I do not see how this question relates to the matter before the committee. If the hon. member wishes he might discuss that matter when the estimates of the Minister of Finance are introduced. I am sure he would have a much better chance of getting an answer then.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the minister has chosen to refer to the Minister of Finance. When a measure relating to gold is before the House of Commons, involving as it does many questions affecting this industry, I submit the Minister of Finance should be here to answer such questions as might properly fall within his department rather than that of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. This is probably the one occasion this session when we will have a measure before the house dealing with gold. In my submission this is a matter of the highest importance. The Minister of Finance was in his seat for a short time this afternoon, but he left. In his absence all I can do, in seeking essential information which has a very direct bearing on the whole measure, is to put these questions to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. If he feels they are outside his scope, then surely it is not impossible to have the Minister of Finance in the house to answer such questions as relate to the Department of Finance. Certainly from some quarter, one or other of those ministers, information should be forthcoming.

Mr. Howe: If I may intervene, there is a bill coming before the house, sponsored by the Minister of Finance, which deals with the Foreign Exchange Control Act, which comes up for amendment this year. My hon. friend is talking about currency, whereas this bill deals with the mining of gold, two totally different subjects. I see no reason why the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys should be prepared to discuss currency when currency is not involved in this bill.

Mr. Fleming: It is obvious that this bill deals with the production of gold. What I am saying, and the point to which my questions are directed, is not connected with currency; it has to do with the price to be paid for gold produced in Canada and sold in the United States.

Mr. Howe: Sold to the United States for currency.

Mr. Fleming: Sold, I presume, directly for currency; and in the last analysis it will be used as a basis for settling differences in the exchange position. But surely I would have thought that when we are talking about the price of gold, this subject could be discussed. I asked simply what representations, if any, the Canadian government had made to the United States government with a view to seeking an increase in the price paid by the United States government for Canadian gold.

The Chairman: Would that in any way affect the manner in which it is proposed to make a calculation for the year 1950, as provided in section 1?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

The Chairman: As the hon. member knows, it is difficult for me to assess what may be in order, if a discussion is to be related strictly to the section before the committee. I have been reading this section, and if I were taking part in the debate I do not think I would expect the latitude the hon. member thinks he should have. I would confine my remarks to the manner in which it is suggested, in this section, that the calculation should be made. The section states:

> Notwithstanding anything in this section, the sum that may be paid in respect of gold produced from a mine and sold in the designated year nineteen hundred and fifty, shall be the amount calculated as prescribed in subsection 2, 2(a), 3 or 4—

And so on. I would be perfectly in order if I were to confine my remarks to that subject.

Mr. Sinclair: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just explained that an act is to be amended shortly, and will be brought before the house, at which time some of the points brought up today by the hon. member can be discussed properly. Therefore it is merely a matter of deciding whether he would insist upon it now—that is, insist upon having replies to his questions—or whether he should wait until that time. If he insisted now, he would be out of order.

This bill has to do with a subsidy to aid in the actual cost of producing gold, for the present market price of gold. We have had other measures of assistance. The effect on the market price is something quite beyond the range of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out that later in the session the Minister of Finance will introduce a measure to amend the Currency Act, at which time the value of gold, so far as currency is concerned, can be debated. I submit that so far as this bill is concerned, it is a measure to assist the mining industry and has no connection whatsoever with the price of gold either as a commodity or as a basis for currency.

Mr. Fleming: I think the observations of the parliamentary assistant clarify the matter adequately. He has pointed out that a measure to which he has referred, but which has not yet been introduced, will relate to the gold backing for currency. But I am not discussing that matter here at all. What I am discussing is the price paid for Canadian gold production by the United States government. I am not talking about the gold backing of Canadian currency at all. I am talking about the price paid for Canadian gold production by the United States government, which buys it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That does not relate to this section at all.

Mr. Fleming: If this were not the first section of the bill, perhaps the Minister of Public Works would have some grounds for his observation. But may I remind the committee that this is an amendment designed to extend for a period of two years a bill which otherwise would lapse at this time, a measure designed to give a particular type of assistance to the gold mining industry. It is a type of assistance by way of subsidy, and would not be necessary if the kind of measure I am proposing were put into effect, namely an adequate price for Canadian gold, when it is sold. That is the purpose of my question.

I note that the Minister of Finance has now returned to the house. Perhaps we could save time if I were to put the questions to him. If I am permitted to do so, I think we would move along quickly.

Mr. Laing: All mixed up, just like in housing.

Mr. Fleming: We have just heard from someone who has just come in, and who knows about as much about the subject under discussion, and the background of it, as someone sitting away in a far room in the building.

Mr. Laing: Just the same as housing.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member should not refer to housing. He supported a delay by the government last year in building veterans' houses at Fraserview which cost this country ten months' delay and $400,000 in additional cost.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that I have tried to be fair, in order to give him an opportunity to ask his questions. Now, someone has to make a decision; we cannot carry on forever a discussion as to whether or not some question should be asked, or whether replies should be made now or later. If on the one hand the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance claim that it is not in order for the hon. member to put some of the questions he has asked, then I believe that would give me sufficient support to decide that the questions are not in order on this section.

Mr. Green: May I—

The Chairman: Order. There are ministers and other members on the government side who have a knowledge of these matters. If they say the questions are not in order I am inclined to accept their statement. The hon. member has tried to get further replies to his questions and they do not seem to be forthcoming. He has asked me to co-operate, but I submit that the discussion should be strictly relevant to the section before the committee.

The hon. member has said that a general discussion is relevant under section 1. It seems to me that the general discussion on this bill has taken place and then he has proceeded to ask questions. He asked a few questions to which he received replies, and then the question arose as to whether his later questions were in order. I think the general discussion has been terminated and as soon as hon. members are through asking questions this section ought to carry.

Mr. Green: I would point out that the Minister of Finance has come into the house since the statements were made by his parliamentary assistant and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think that alters the whole picture, as the Minister of Finance is obviously able to answer these questions.

Your Honour has not ruled that the questions are not relevant to the bill. The fact that another minister has said that they should not be asked is not proof that they should not be asked.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sponsoring this bill. My function so far as this bill is concerned is to see that there is enough money in the treasury to pay for this assistance. I am sure that my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is quite able to answer any proper questions which are asked in connection with a measure he is sponsoring.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has not been able to answer the questions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is what you say.

Mr. Green: I submit that we should not be met with a blank wall to the effect that because this is his bill and he cannot answer the questions, therefore we are not to have them answered.

Mr. Dickey: They are not relevant.

Mr. Green: These parliamentary assistants should not be chipping in.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order—

Mr. Green: I am speaking on a point of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought you were speaking about gold.

Mr. Green: This question has been asked and it should be answered.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What question?

Mr. Green: Time and again we have had the experience of a minister not being able to answer a question and a colleague sitting in the house will help give the answer. There is no reason why that should not be done today. This is a complicated matter and I quite understand that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys may not have the answers to all the questions that properly could be raised. I submit that the sensible thing to do is for the Minister of Finance to answer the questions and get this over with.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suggest that the sensible thing to do is to follow standing order 58 which states:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We have had a general discussion on this bill. You cannot make me believe that after having spent two days talking about gold there has not been a general discussion. The chairman has ruled that the general discussion is through.

Mr. Green: The chairman has not the power to say there can be no more general discussion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suppose you are the one who is going to decide what the chairman can do?

Mr. Green: All the chairman can do is rule whether the question is proper.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I ask the chair to decide whether we are following standing order 58 which I have read. I think that would settle the matter. If the chairman has not the power, I suppose the committee has the power.

Mr. Green: That standing order merely says that the discussion must be relevant to the question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To the clause.

Mr. Green: To the clause. It does not say Your Honour can rule arbitrarily that there shall be no more discussion. I am sure Your Honour does not intend to make any such ruling.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not what we are asking for.

Mr. Green: We have the situation here that the minister who can answer the question is present. I suggest that he answer it and get this over with.

The Chairman: The point at issue at the moment is not whether someone in the cabinet is capable of replying to a question that has been asked; the point is whether the question asked is in order. I do not think hon. members would expect the chairman to have a complete knowledge of every bill coming before the committee. I listened to the debate on the resolution which preceded this bill, and I listened to most of the debate on the second reading, and I know the discussion was quite wide. When we commenced proceedings in committee the hon. member for York West spoke in general terms, as did the hon. member for Kootenay West. Then the hon. member for Eglinton began to ask a series of questions. Hon. members know that generally the indication that the general discussion is over is some hon. member beginning to ask a series of questions. Once such questions are asked and the minister begins to reply I consider that the general discussion is over.

That does not mean I am ruling that the general discussion is over, and the hon. member is quite right when he says I cannot arbitrarily decide that. I have never done that. I think hon. members will agree when I say the indication that general discussion on the first clause is terminated is when some hon. member begins to ask a series of questions and solicits replies from the minister.

Then as to whether the questions asked by the hon. member for Eglinton are in order, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys says they are not; the Minister of of Trade and Commerce says they are not.

Mr. Green: Very poor authorities.

The Chairman: What would the hon. member do if he were in my place?

Mr. Green: I would rule that the questions were in order.

The Chairman: That is what the hon. member would like me to do. The ministers on the other side contend that I should rule they are not in order. The minister sponsoring the bill should know more about this bill than I do.

Mr. Green: He should know the answers to the questions.

The Chairman: I think he does know. Therefore the questions are not in order and there will be no answers forthcoming. I think it must be admitted that we have spent enough time on the proceedings, and hon. members must agree that I should give a ruling on this matter. My ruling is that the questions asked by the hon. member are not in order.

Mr. Knowles: The proposed amendment makes a change in the basis on which assistance is to be calculated. Can the minister say what will be the cost of this change?

Mr. Prudham: Subsection 5 of section 3, enacted in 1951, was intended to modify the assistance payable in respect of the last quarter of 1950. Experience has shown that some mines would receive less assistance than was intended. Those mines whose rate of assistance was less than $3.50 were penalized because there was no provision in the formula to allow their actual rate of assistance to be used rather than $3.50. There are five mines affected by this change and the amount of money involved will be nearly $37,000. The mines will receive that much additional assistance.

Mr. Knowles: Is that assistance for one year only?

Mr. Prudham: It is for the last quarter of 1950.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that the provision is for the last quarter of 1950, why is it provided in this bill that this section shall be deemed to have come into force on the 15th day of June, 1948?

Mr. Prudham: That is when the act was first passed.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask the minister what the government is proposing to do concerning the present policy of the international monetary fund with respect to the marketing of gold.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think this is completely outside the scope of this clause.

Mr. McCulloch: He knows it, too.

Mr. Fleming: This question is very important to this present measure.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It may be important but it is out of order.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad the Minister of Public Works is not, among his other attributes, chairman of the committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am a member of the committee and I say it is out of order.

Mr. Fleming: I am not going to accept his rulings.

Mr. McLure: Don't take any back talk from him.

Mr. Fleming: I don't intend to. I am asking a quite relevant question on a matter of great importance in relation to the bill. I deplore the length of time that has been taken up here today by the government in fending off questions which were quite simple and admitted of ready answers. We could have been through with the bill long ago if we had had a little co-operation from the ministers.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I know why the hon. member is delaying the passage of the bill.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I asked a question of the minister.

The Chairman: If the hon. member is asking for a ruling, I will rule that in my opinion his question is not in order on this clause. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: No. What steps, if any, is the Canadian government contemplating taking with respect to freeing the marketing of Canadian gold?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I maintain that question is also out of order. If the hon. member asks what is the policy of the government under clause 1 of the bill it is written in the bill, and the minister would answer to that effect, but I think we should not cover the whole field of monetary reforms and banking practices throughout the world on this clause.

Gold Mining

Mr. Green: This bill deals with assistance to the gold mining industry. I submit the question the hon. member has asked is perfectly in order and in line with questions—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Let us take a vote.

Mr. Green: —asked earlier in the afternoon. I cannot understand why the house leader should now get up and arbitrarily take the stand that the question is out of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think it is unparliamentary for a member to say that the chairman is acting arbitrarily.

Mr. Green: I did not say that the chairman was acting arbitrarily.

The Chairman: I did not understand the hon. member to say the chairman was acting arbitrarily.

Mr. Green: I said the house leader.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then I object because that would really be unparliamentary.

The Chairman: It seems to me that some hon. members have important questions to ask relating to gold and assistance to the gold mining industry in Canada. They are very important questions to these hon. members, but they should not try to get all their replies on this bill, which is an act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. There will be other occasions on which they can ask their questions and get replies. Why should they insist on having important replies to their important questions on this particular clause? I have listened to the line of questioning of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He was perfectly in order, and if hon. members want to have a model as to how they should conduct themselves—

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, spare us.

The Chairman: —they should follow his example. He was perfectly in order.

Mr. Knowles: Members to your right, Mr. Chairman, please note.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra says the questions asked now by the hon. member for Eglinton are along the line of questions asked earlier. Those questions were asked by the hon. member for Eglinton, and it is his questions that have brought about this whole discussion on procedure. It is his questions concerning which so many points of order have been raised. If hon. members still insist on asking questions which are thought by the minister sponsoring the bill or somebody else on this side of the house not to be in order, I will have to make a ruling. In my humble opinion this clause has to do with the calculation for 1950. Questions will be relevant only in so far as they relate to that clause, and I do not think some of the last questions asked by the hon. member for Eglinton are strictly relevant to the clause under discussion.

Mr. McLure: Introduce closure.

Mr. Sinclair: Here is the model, Tennyson's brook.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly make note of your recent remark and will probably have occasion to refer to it later.

Mr. Green: I would not count on it too much.

Mr. Gibson: Don't take it too seriously.

Mr. Sinclair: We all make slips, even the chairman.

Mr. Knowles: Careful, now; that is out of order. May I ask the minister whether the five mines which will get the $36,000 as a result of this new calculation are mines which have already received amounts of money in the lower brackets, middle brackets or upper brackets, as set out in the report of the operations under the act? Perhaps the minister would indicate what amounts these companies have already received and what amounts they will now receive.

Mr. Prudham: Possibly I can dig that out. It will take some little time to locate it. I do not wish to divulge the names of the mines because I do not think that is called for.

Mr. Gibson: That would be in the public accounts.

Mr. Knowles: I was not asking for that now, but I would assume it would have to be divulged sooner or later. After all, they are all listed in this report and that information would be published sooner or later. However, I was not asking for it now. In terms of the principle, I was asking whether the money will go to mines that have received some of the larger sums listed in the report or to mines which have received smaller amounts?

Mr. Prudham: If it is agreeable to the hon. member, I would be glad to dig that out and show it to him later. I have the chart here but it will take some few minutes to make comparisons. I do not know exactly what he means by the upper brackets and the lower brackets. These mines all need assistance or they would not be applying for it.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that we call it six o'clock so that at eight o'clock—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Section stands.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

463. Departmental administration, $1,370,576.

Mr. Chevrier: When the committee adjourned on Friday last I was dealing with some of the points that had been under discussion during the consideration of these estimates. I believe I can cover the remaining points in a very few minutes. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre again raised the question of pensions for retired employees of the Canadian National Railways, and frankly I must say to him that I cannot see the point in his argument nearly as well as I could a year ago. The position I have taken all along is that this is a matter for the officers of the Canadian National Railways to determine with its employees.

I say that I cannot see the point of the hon. member bringing it up again this year, because the position is entirely different now than it was then. For instance, the hon. member said he must draw the attention of the government to it until something is done. Something has been done; something very tangible has been done. The pension rules of the Canadian National have been revised very substantially and very favourably, I understand, to the men. They have been revised in two ways: First, by amendments to part I. Part I provides a basic pension and the opportunity of contributing to a supplementary pension. Employees may also transfer from part I to part II. Second, by part II of the plan which was designed to give employees the opportunity of increasing their pensions.

I think I could do no better than to put on the record a statement made by Mr. Donald Gordon, the president of the Canadian National Railways on Tuesday, April 29, in the committee on railways and shipping, which appears at page 111 of the report. He said:

> Now, these men you are talking about did not choose to take advantage of that opportunity and that is why when their services terminated they received this small basic pension.

He is referring to the $25 per month basic pension.

> That pension is now augmented to an extent by the old age pension and that brings the amount received up to as much as $65 a month. And now, as regards the C.N.R. increasing the basic pension, that would be meaningless, it would simply mean that the C.N.R. would be paying the additional sum instead of the provinces paying it. Most of these people would become eligible at age 65 or over. In connection with that I may say that the labour representatives supported our view on this point and in that respect I would like to quote to you from a letter.

Then he is asked about the date of the letter, and he says the letter is dated March 31. I should say that this letter is from Mr. Hutchinson, who is chairman of the brotherhood committees. The letter reads:

> The expressions of opinion appeared to be almost universally in approval of the improvements which have been made.
> Some of those who did not contribute toward annuities expressed disappointment that their lot is not improved but could not seem to impress the meeting that they were entitled to very much consideration on account of the fact that they had not made any effort to improve their lot.

Then Mr. Gordon goes on as follows:

> Now that, as I say, is the view of the men themselves in a meeting assembled on this specific point. And so far as the C.N.R. management are concerned, we do not feel that we have any obligation in logic to recommend an increase in these so-called basic pensions by reason of the changed position arising out of the old age pension plan; because, again I emphasize that with a means test involved, if we were to increase the pension then it simply means that the C.N.R. would be paying the increase and not the provinces.

So much for the attitude of the management of Canadian National Railways.

Then the hon. member says this question must be considered by the minister and by the cabinet for action by the government without delay. Well, the cabinet and the minister considered this very thing. The management of the Canadian National Railways submitted a revision of their pension plan. We saw no objection to it, in fact we approved it after giving it careful study and said, "Go ahead; we think it is an improvement." The hon. member says it is for me to act. I do not think it is. The Canadian National Railways management means something or it does not. It has been appointed to administer the system and the affairs of its employees, and surely there must be a division of things. There may come a time when further changes are suggested. When changes are suggested, as I have said in the house and as I repeat now, it will then be the duty of the government to consider the requests or recommendations made by the officers of the Canadian National Railways. If the men, in conjunction or in co-operation with the management, want to submit to the government an additional plan to increase or revise the basic pension, the government will give it consideration. The government will not necessarily turn it down. The position I have taken all along is that it is for the management to determine what action should be taken. They have determined the action that should be taken, they have referred it to us, and we have approved of the position. For the time being I think the matter should be considered in that light.

Then the hon. member discussed the question of grade crossings, and asked that I put on the record some facts. I believe I can do it fairly quickly. With reference to the grade crossing fund, the amount available for expenditure as of April 1, 1952, was $1,985,000, roughly. The commitments against that fund as of the same date were $1,246,000, leaving a balance of, roughly speaking, $800,000. The hon. member wanted to know something about the commitments outstanding. There are sixteen commitments outstanding against the railway grade crossing fund at the moment, amounting in all to $1,246,000, which provide for an estimated amount of work totalling $5,170,000. Perhaps my hon. friend would like to have them broken down by provinces. These commitments are as follows: British Columbia, $28,000; Alberta, $201,000; Saskatchewan $18,000; Manitoba, $29,000; Ontario, $414,000; Quebec, $426,000—I may say I am giving round figures here—New Brunswick, $37,000 and Nova Scotia, $89,000.

Mr. Knowles: Are those commitments for projects being proceeded with at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to be clear on that point. Those are commitments against the fund. Those are judgments handed down by the board of transport commissioners. A judgment might be handed down today and the municipality might decide not to go ahead with it; but that is still a commitment against the fund. In the list that I gave there are at least two such cases.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister have readily available the number of projects involved in each province, in lieu of these commitments?

Mr. Chevrier: I gave the total number as sixteen. I could tell the hon. member—I have the figures here—but it would take me some time. For instance, here is one for Nova Scotia. There are two for Toronto. There is one for Alberta, one for New Brunswick, one for the city of Oshawa and another for the province of Saskatchewan.

May I now come to two other matters that are extremely embarrassing to me because they are before the courts, Mr Chairman. They were raised by the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Lethbridge. One has to do with the question of agreed charges and the other with the question of freight rates and the one and one-third rule, both of which questions are now pending before the board of transport commissioners. As to the first one particularly, the board is sitting on it today in the city of Regina.

Mr. Green: Did they not make a ruling yesterday?

Mr. Chevrier: They made a ruling on one point only. I am prepared to deal with it. I want to bring it to the attention of the committee. I interrupted the hon. member the other evening and said that I thought perhaps he had put enough on the record and hoped he would feel that he had gone far enough; but the hon member proceeded, and I was not going to raise the point. But the hon. member knows that this matter is now being discussed in Regina by a court of record, namely the board of transport commissioners. He having put the case on record, I feel I should take some time to dispose of it; but I am in your hands, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Does the minister feel that this question is sub judice?

Mr. Chevrier: Unquestionably it is.

The Chairman: If it is sub judice, he cannot refer to it. I do not remember the incident. I think it might have taken place while I was absent from the chair. I do not recall the point of order having been raised.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that one matter the hon. member for Bow River raised was the fact that the trucking association was not given a hearing or might not be given a hearing before that board, and whether or not an amendment to the Transport Act should be brought down at this session in order that the board of transport commissioners might hear the trucking association. I would point out that, according to a Canadian Press dispatch this morning, the truckers have been refused a hearing. It has already been decided, by a ruling of the board of transport commissioners, that the trucking association cannot be heard before that board. Because that ruling has been made, I would say that particular aspect is certainly not sub judice now.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to deal with that point because the board is still sitting and will sit tomorrow on the case. I happen to know that. In any event, that was one point only that was decided before the case proceeded to the evidence stage. But since those people made representations to me personally I think I could deal indirectly with them without perhaps touching on the points that are now before the court. It will not, however, be a complete answer to my hon. friend.

The point arises out of an agreement made between the railways and certain oil companies in the province of Saskatchewan for the transportation of their oil and petroleum products. The requests of the truckers, to me at least, were that they should be allowed to appear before the board. The statement of the hon. member for Bow River was to this effect: Why should not the truckers be allowed to appear when the railways are allowed to appear before municipal boards in the various provinces? Of course, the answer to that is quite clear. The act indicates who is a carrier, and it was the act passed by this parliament. The provincial municipal board also defines those who may appear, and in the case of the Canadian National Railways it so happens that they own trucking operations in some of the provinces and are therefore free to appear. The definition is quite clear, I think.

Then it was suggested that the government should amend the Transport Act in order to allow them to appear. The government gave careful consideration to that suggestion after the representations made to them by the Canadian Automotive Transport Association, with a particular representation from the province of Saskatchewan. Here I pause to say that no one made stronger representations on behalf of them than did the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Regina, in support of the contention that these truckers should be allowed to come in and make their case. The government carefully considered the point and came to the conclusion that it would soon have to determine the broader question of whether or not, following the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation, it should take over interprovincial and international trucking or in other words regulate those forms of trucking. Since a decision on the one question would have meant a decision on the broader question, we thought that, at this time at least, we should not decide in favour of allowing them to come in as a carrier. If we had done so, I think there was a neat constitutional point in that we might well have been told that we were infringing on provincial rights since, by the definition of carrier, we were attempting to regulate to some extent provincial operations of truckers.

Then again the act, to which I do not want to refer in detail, clearly covers the point raised by my hon. friend, namely that anybody who, being a carrier or a shipper, feels that he is aggrieved or affected, can protest before the board of transport commissioners; and I understand that is what is being done now. There are a number of shippers who are not parties to the agreement with the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway and who are at the moment protesting against it. I cannot go any further because, as I say—

Mr. Johnston: May I just ask a question of the minister?

Mr. Chevrier: May I just finish my statement. As I say, I cannot go any further because the case, as my hon. friend knows or should know, is before the court.

Mr. Johnston: The question I wanted to ask the minister was this. While some of these companies are appearing before the board, it is only through the courtesy of the board that they can do so, it is not? They have no legal right to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have covered that point. My hon. friend was not in his seat when I did so. Perhaps he will look at my remarks as they appear in Hansard.

Mr. Johnston: I did not know the minister was going to be on tonight or I would have been here earlier. I was in my room, and I came down as soon as I knew he was on.

Mr. Chevrier: The other point raised by the hon. member for Peace River is one that I feel I should deal with because I think he has—and I say this with great deference—and for the lack of a better word let me say magnified the dangers to the province of Alberta in so far as the present position with regard to transcontinental rates is concerned. The position as I understand it is this. The one and one-third rule has not been disturbed in the slightest degree by any decision of the board. The one and one-third rule still remains. What has been done is that a very small number of transcontinental rates have been increased by the two railways.

Mr. Low: Can the minister say how many?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I would think roughly eight or ten, but I am guessing when I say that.

Mr. Green: The key commodities, though.

Mr. Chevrier: On commodities such as iron pipe, canned goods and fish. My hon. friend says "key commodities". The categories of key commodities have been changed. For instance, while carloads could be moved on a transcontinental rate from one part of the country to the other, in certain instances it is not possible to move a carload of 60,000 pounds but one may move 30,000 pounds or 40,000 pounds. This I think does not entirely eliminate the benefit of the rates that existed before. The point I want to deal with is this. The benefit of the one and one-third rule still remains. I think what my hon. friend was aiming at was the fact that the board heard and determined the application made by the three or four western provinces with reference to the $7 million subsidy. It heard that, and there was a difference of opinion between Manitoba, which argued in favour of a per 100 pound basis subsidy, and the other provinces, which argued in favour of a percentagewise subsidy. They maintained that since freight rates had increased by percentages, they should also decrease in so far as the subsidy was concerned by percentages. The board found a formula which took into account the 100 pounds idea and the percentage idea. It was a compromise which seemed to be agreeable, as I understand it, to all the provinces save Alberta.

I am informed that Alberta launched an appeal against that decision. Since then I am told the province of Alberta has withdrawn its appeal, which would indicate to me that the advantages to be gained by the decision of the board under the $7 million subsidy are satisfactory to the province of Alberta.

There is one other point I wanted to make, namely that the board is still continuing the investigation under P.C. 1487. It is hoped that under that it will be possible to equalize freight rates, and undoubtedly out of the equalization the province of Alberta, as other western provinces, stands to benefit a great deal.

The hon. member for St. John's West raised one or two problems with reference to the Port aux Basques ferry. That work is proceeding satisfactorily. There was a change in the design which caused some delay, but since then that has been ironed out, and I am informed by our officers that the plans for construction are going ahead quickly.

With reference to the two coastal steamers of the Bar Haven type, the Canadian National Railways, who are charged with the responsibility of operating those steamers, have asked for tenders. Those tenders are being considered now and the contract has not been awarded.

There are a number of other detailed questions which the committee would not expect me to deal with at this moment. I think I can dispose of them at a later date.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister about the questions asked by the hon. member for Cumberland?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; the hon. member for Cumberland dealt with a number of questions, one of which was in regard to the closing of certain stations. All I can say there is that stations are closed by order of the board of transport commissioners. Hearings are held before the board, and no doubt the particular station to which my hon. friend has reference was dealt with in that way. I presume that before the station could be closed the railway in question, the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway, would have to make application to the board; and it is the board, not the department, that determines the question.

He also dealt with the dieselization of locomotives and the protection of the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia. Well, that is a broad question, with which the president of the Canadian National Railways dealt at length in the committee on railways and shipping. I would refer my hon. friend to the sessional committee of railways and shipping, and particularly the hearing on Tuesday, April 29.

He also asked that I make a statement with reference to power resources and development in the province of Nova Scotia, as raised by the hon. member for Westmorland. I would not attempt to deal with that. The Department of Transport is not charged with the responsibility for power development. True, it is interested in questions of that nature, but it would not be a matter for me to handle in this department.

With reference to the contribution of the province of Nova Scotia to the causeway project, about which the hon. member inquired, it is $5,500,000.

Mr. Green: If I may clear up these questions, he also asked about the possibility of double tracking the Canadian National line from Moncton to Truro and through to Sydney, referring particularly to the line from Truro to Sydney. In addition, he asked for a statement about the position of the Chignecto canal and about the Amherst airport, and then about shipbuilding in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it is pretty difficult to cover all of that.

Mr. Knowles: We will give you another forty minutes.

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the double tracking, that is a question which comes up fairly regularly in my estimates. Again, it was dealt with by the president of the Canadian National Railways, I think fairly effectively, at the sittings of the committee. All I can say now is that the fact it has come up in the house requires me to bring it again to the attention of the officers of the railway, which I shall do.

With reference to the Chignecto canal, there is no change. A reference was made to the royal commission on transportation, and I need not repeat what the royal commission found in so far as that project is concerned. They made a recommendation. The committee is familiar with the report. Everyone has the report, and the recommendation can be found there.

With reference to the Amherst airport, if I remember rightly that airport is being turned over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. Green: It is a municipal airport.

Mr. Chevrier: My recollection is that the airport in question has been requested by the municipality. In other words they want the return of the land so that they can use it for municipal purposes. As I remember the correspondence with the hon. member for Cumberland and the mayor of Amherst is to that effect. I may be wrong. My recollection of the whole matter is that the land in question is to be assigned to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation so they may return it, sell it or dispose of it to the municipality.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister can check that. I take it from the purport of the hon. member's question that what he was asking for was help for the airport, an improvement of the airport.

Mr. Chevrier: I will check on it.

Mr. Low: I should like to say a word or two in connection with the statement the minister has made. I thank the minister for the information he has given in connection with the freight rates situation, but I think perhaps he was in error when he suggested that Alberta had withdrawn the appeal against the board's division of the subsidy because we appeared to be satisfied with that division. Actually the reason the Alberta government withdrew its objection was that the Canada Steamship Company appealed the case against the board. That case is proceeding now, I understand, and therefore I cannot discuss it. As a matter of fact we in Alberta feel that when the board made its decision in respect to the division of the $7 million subsidy, partly on the basis of percentage and partly on the per 100 pounds involved basis, they were yielding to the interests within the city of Winnipeg and were considering their welfare in preference to that of the whole of western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan and Alberta. That matter was argued fully before the committee; and I am quite sure the people of Alberta feel that was an unfair division of the $7 million.

There was another point I wished to mention to the minister, and it is this: The whole burden of the main part of my statement the other day was that, without any change in the competitive situation in the past six or seven months, the Canadian Pacific Railway did file with the board a new schedule of transcontinental rates on seven or eight key items and that the Canadian National Railways, which all through the committee hearing last fall took the position the railroads could get by without increasing the transcontinental rates and could apply the one and one-third rule without it affecting their revenue, changed their position.

It was not very long, in fact the ink was not dry on the legislation we passed, until the Canadian Pacific had somehow or another inveigled the Canadian National into supporting it in posting a new schedule of rates. As I said the other day, the Canadian Pacific could not have done so alone; they had to have the support of the Canadian National. Here is our own Canadian National system rushing in before they had even given the new one and one-third rule time to be tried, to find out what the experience would be. They proposed, with the Canadian Pacific, a new schedule of rates which we think is completely unjustified.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said, this affected a considerable number of important items, such as canned goods. Whereas the merchants in Alberta under the one and one-third rule in the transcontinental rates in effect until early this year could receive their canned goods from Toronto or other Ontario areas for $2.09, it has now jumped to $2.53.

Mr. Laing: Some of us predicted that in committee.

Mr. Green: But British Columbia is paying the most.

Mr. Low: The fact that it came about was not, I suggest, as a result of the prophetic powers of the hon. member so much as because of the weakness of the Canadian National Railways in permitting themselves to be led around by the nose by the Canadian Pacific. That is the protest I was making the other day. I say they went in, with indecent haste.

Mr. Laing: You would not expect them to have different rates, would you?

Mr. Low: No, I would not expect them to have different rates, because the Canadian Pacific simply would not dare operate under a different schedule of transcontinental rates from the C.N.R. That is why I say the culpable people are the Canadian National people; they could have held the line by simply saying, "Look here, you Canadian Pacific people, we took the position we could get along; and we would like to wait until we see what the experience is going to be. In any event it will not be serious for the time being. When we discover what the experience is, and how it will affect our revenue, we will be in a position to say whether or not we will join you in posting a new schedule of rates."

That is all that was necessary. Certainly the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific cannot, under the circumstances, try to operate on different schedules. That is why they got together. As I said the other day, before such an important step was taken, even with a small group of items such as the eight or ten mentioned, in view of what happened last fall and the position taken by the minister I think the Canadian National people should have gone to him and sought his advice before agreeing to join the C.P.R. in posting new rates.

Mr. Laing: You could get those canal boats running again.

Mr. Low: We ought to get something going. I do not know what the outcome of the Canada Steamship Lines case will be; but when that has been decided Alberta will make her decision with respect to her position.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, the last time this item was before the committee for consideration I had hoped to say a word or two about the Hudson Bay route. On that occasion I yielded to the minister, who wished to answer some questions already put to him on other subjects.

At the convention of the Hudson Bay route association held some months ago one of the delegates made the amazing statement that western members in the House of Commons were not assiduous enough in their pressure upon the government on behalf of this route. They did not state what members they meant, and of course I can speak only for myself. I may say that the remarks I am going to make now are not made as a result of that inaccurate comment, but simply as a continuation of what I have tried to do at every session since I came to the house in 1945.

I think the minister will have some conception of what I mean when I suggest that I believe I have devoted more time to the discussion of this particular subject than to that of any other subject with which I have been concerned. However, that is only a small matter. I can say that I have attended meetings of the association at various times, and made a personal trip to the port to look things over for myself.

Last summer I had the opportunity of interviewing representatives of Dalgleish and Company in Newcastle, the firm who have shipped most of the wheat out of the Hudson Bay port. Further than that, I had an interview at Saskatchewan House in London with Mr. Graham Spry, the Saskatchewan government trade commissioner over there. I am pleased to learn that we have had steady but slow progress in the matter of the use of that port.

I think I should outline this evening one or two of those things which give me satisfaction in this connection, and also to list three or four things which I think we might still remedy. First of all, I think there has been some lessening of eastern prejudice against the use of the port. Whether that prejudice ever existed is one point open to dispute; but I do know that a very common feeling in the west is that there are interests not too far from the city of Montreal who have always set their face against the development of a seaport for western Canada. I believe that prejudice, if it ever existed, is dying down. After all, these people should realize that the amount of wheat that is or ever can be shipped out of Churchill, due to the weather conditions at that port, can be only a very small drop in the very large bucket of the total wheat export of Canada. There has been an increase in wheat exports over the last number of years and I think we got up as high as 7,000,000 bushels the last crop year. But that is not enough. We would like to see the facilities used during the full period, which should result in at least 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 bushels being sent through the port in one year.

Another matter that has caused me satisfaction is the lowering of the insurance rates. This is vital to the success of that traffic. Another thing is the lengthening of the season to some extent. I believe the season could be lengthened still more by being stretched out at the end of the present season. It is perhaps a fancy of mine and may not be practical, but I have never understood why the period covered by insurance in any given season should be unalterable. Surely with our meteorological facilities we should be able to have a more flexible season.

When I was at the port a few years ago I had luncheon with a captain who was in charge of one of the ships coming to that port. He was quite disgusted because during two days of perfect weather and calm seas, with no ice in sight, his ship was compelled to lie to, waiting immobile for the hour when he would be covered by insurance. It seems to me there should be some way of remedying this inflexible situation. I do not know whether my suggestion is practical, but I give it to the minister for what it is worth.

I am glad some use has been made of the grain drying facilities at Churchill. So far as I know they have never been used until this year. This is one of the finest elevators on the continent, and it was a good thing these drying facilities were available in order to help meet the crisis this year. There are those who say that it could have been handled to better advantage. There are others who say that some of our damp wheat could have been shipped up there and placed in annexes or even piled outside the elevator and use made of the drying facilities to an even greater extent. I think the nation, the government, the wheat board and everyone concerned got a break, if I may use the vernacular, in connection with our wheat this year. The damp wheat situation apparently is being coped with but success in this connection is perhaps due largely to the weather.

An hon. Member: No, to C. D. Howe.

Mr. Knight: I am quite prepared to give the minister credit for almost anything, but not for the weather. I am prepared also to pay a tribute to the government and the minister for the encouragement they have given to the use of that particular route. Some hon. members appear to be intensely political in connection with almost any matter raised in this house.

There are one or two things which still militate against the use of this route and which I think could be remedied. I believe there are about four altogether. If this port is to be successful there must be import as well as export trade. Import facilities would seem to be limited during the time export operations are being carried on. Nevertheless I believe there are import facilities at the port which are not being used to their full extent. I would urge business firms, chambers of commerce and boards of trade throughout the prairies to encourage the use of this port. It is their own port and they should make greater use of it.

The Saskatchewan government has done something in the way of setting an example. In connection with bringing in heavy machinery or other imports from England they have ordered them brought in through that port. This created some savings to themselves and to the taxpayers of the country. If private business firms would follow that example greater use would be made of the port. Of course they are doing that to a limited extent.

Then there is the matter of the necessary annual importation of stevedores, dockers and other labour to take care of the loading of the wheat and the unloading of imports. The solution of this problem is the further development of the whole north. I think Canada's future lies in the north. When the north country is developed in whatever way it can be developed there will be more population. There would be a greater population at Churchill and we would have a native supply of labour to handle loading grain in what is an all too short navigation season.

At present these men must be brought in from Montreal; and while I am ready to admit that they do the work satisfactorily I have heard of one or two instances where they have seemed to regret having to work at a little place like Churchill. They have indicated that they thought it was rather small potatoes. I think we would do better if there was a labour force living right there and taking some pride and interest in the port.

Then another thing is the lack of feeder lines to the port. If one looks at the map he will see there are certain gaps. We would like to see a network of east and west lines leading into The Pas in Manitoba, which is the railway centre through which the grain is shipped. In his remarks the other night the hon. member for Melfort referred to two lines, one from Reserve Junction to Arborfield and the other from Melfort to Carrot River. We look forward to the time when those lines can be extended to The Pas.

Another thing which is hindering the use of this port by grain companies and individuals is the diversion charges on grain passing through Churchill. My own definition of these charges is that they are money paid for services not rendered. The savings made by using Churchill, and they are very considerable, are cancelled out by these diversion charges. I do not know what the amount is, but I believe it is about a cent and a half per bushel. I want to say in the strongest words possible that these charges are unnecessary and iniquitous. They should be abolished. In connection with this hindrance to the use of this route I should like to quote from the Alberta wheat pool budget which under the heading of "Churchill Savings" states:

On wheat exported through the port of Churchill on Hudson bay during the 1950-1951 crop year the wheat board received an average premium of 4·96 cents a bushel on wheat sold under the international wheat agreement and 3·05 cents a bushel on class 2 wheat, over the Fort William-Port Arthur price. The board made a saving of $132,217.22 on freight on grain exported through this port but paid $139,560.91 in diversion premiums. This information was given in the House of Commons by Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

My hon. friend referred to him a moment ago. When I raised the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce he did not agree with me that these charges were iniquitous. There is one other short quotation on the same subject which I should like to give. It is from our local paper, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. In an editorial on April 5 it expresses the view held by most western people with respect to this matter. The editorial reads as follows:

> The existence of a diversion charge is bad enough in normal times. It means that the western farmer is making a donation to the terminal elevators at the lakehead and receiving nothing in return. It is one of the numerous obstacles that have been placed in the path of the development of Churchill, thereby preventing to some extent the growth of trade through the port with its consequent saving to prairie wheat growers. In short the farmer is paying to have himself kicked. But in this year when every facility of the trade has been necessary to move the crop it is a national scandal to pay money for service which the lakehead terminal could not provide in any case.

I say this impediment to the use of the port of Churchill should and must be removed. As I said before, I am grateful for such support of the route as has been given by the Department of Transport and the wheat board, and I urge that this support be continued and increased. Not only do I say this on behalf of my own city and my own province but also on behalf of all Canada, because a doubling of the present use of the facilities at Churchill with respect to the shipment of export grain would relieve the Canadian public of the present deficit which it has to pay. It is true the deficit has been decreasing, but it is still a considerable amount.

Mr. Murphy: I only wish to take a very few moments. As usual my comments are non-political.

An hon. Member: At this time?

Mr. Murphy: I see the parliamentary assistant to the minister laughing. I think he should know better because as a good friend of mine and also a very capable parliamentary assistant he will not mind my having made that reference. I do not think there will be any controversy about what I have to say. I wish to deal with two particular items. Like other backbenchers in the house I welcome the opportunity provided by the estimates to discuss a matter which I think is of interest to every hon. member. I want to refer first to transportation by private airline companies.

[Mr. Knight.]

Only today I received a letter from the minister in answer to one of mine. I might remind him that when I am attending the house he need not send my letters to Camlachie. The word is hard enough to pronounce, let alone spell, but when I am here he might address letters to me at the House of Commons. I know he will not take exception to that remark.

The matter I wish to raise concerns more than the particular case I have in mind. Recently a lad from Sarnia booked passage on the Queen Charlotte Airlines from Vancouver to some place a little farther north, though I thought Vancouver was far enough north for any white man to live. I see no exception is taken to that statement. The plane crashed and the young lad was killed. The minister was good enough to send me the general order of the air transport board covering the situation. The lad was a passenger on a private airline, and the same situation might arise with anybody's son or daughter or even with ourselves.

In looking at what material was available to me, I was rather disturbed to find that people taking transportation by such companies were limited in the amount of any claim they might make, and probably more so than any of us may have thought was the case. I know the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but it does not seem fair to me that a private airline company operating anywhere in the Dominion of Canada should be so privileged as they seem to be under these regulations. The liability of the air transport company is limited to a passenger liability of $20,000 per seat. I have had occasion at different times to travel on some of these private transport planes when I was in a hurry to get some place, and there were more passengers than there were seats. I think that in itself is important, though I do not say they should not be overloaded because at times we all want to get some place and we do not worry about it. I do not think that such a limitation on liability is fair to the people who travel by private airlines. I more or less felt that in taking transportation by such means people were fully covered. If I am wrong I know the minister will correct me, but I do not think the limit is high enough.

I have no explanatory notes covering this particular matter, but I cannot see why there should be such a limit in the case of any transportation company. Certainly most people carry some insurance, and I have always felt that when people travelled by air in this country or elsewhere the transportation company was liable for damages to the degree that might be held fair in a court of law, and that the family of the person involved would be entitled to receive damages to that extent in any court in the land. I know the minister will investigate this case further, but I should like to point out that under general order No. 3-51 so far as public liability is concerned the limit for one person is $20,000 with a total of $40,000 per aircraft. I am going to say quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think that is fair. I do not think it is a businesslike proposition to place before the Canadian people. I am inclined to the idea that this sort of legislation may have originated when air transportation or even sea transportation were in their infancy, but I should like to see a complete revision of the legislation. I do not think it is fair to the Canadian people or to anyone else who might be travelling on a Canadian line.

The other item to which I wish to refer, Mr. Chairman, concerns property damage. Under this same general order No. 3-51, there is a limitation of $5,000 per aircraft per accident. I shall moderate my language in describing that limitation, and say that I believe it is extremely unfair, that is if I am interpreting the order correctly. All too often in recent months we have found property damage running much higher than that when accidents have occurred. I am not going to pursue that argument because I think it is so apparent to everyone in the house that this order should be overhauled in order to permit a guarantee that would be in keeping with Canada's status. It would be regrettable if an accident occurred in which some people suffered damages as high as $25,000 or $50,000, and this limitation enabled the company to set its liability at such a small amount. I am not going to pursue the matter, Mr. Chairman, but I think it is one of those things to which we should give some study today. While it may not have been drawn to the attention of the department before, it seems obvious that this order needs revision.

The other point to which I shall refer, Mr. Chairman, is something that I think applies to all of us. I rather hesitate to mention any particular incident—I am not going to refer to the item when it is called—but I should like to refer to the subject of damages that might accrue to any person or persons as the result of a fire or other accident to a passenger boat. Not so many years ago there was such an unfortunate occurrence, apparently through no fault of the captain, who was a most capable officer. Perhaps I should refer to the particular incident so hon. members will know to what I am referring. I refer to the fire which occurred on the steamship Noronic while it was docked in Toronto. Court actions were instituted both in Canada and the United States. Most of the passengers were United States citizens. In this country we welcome the United States citizens as tourists, whether they come by car or any other mode of travel.

The point I am making is this. I believe the liability of a steamship company for damages is limited according to the tonnage of the boat. In this particular instance the ship was carrying several hundred passengers and a certain amount of freight. While any court in the Dominion of Canada may have found damages, and rightly so, to the extent of several millions of dollars, we find that under our present legislation the steamship company's liability was limited on some tonnage basis. It has occurred to me that perhaps the limitation was proper years ago when we had sailing vessels, but it seems to me that in this advanced stage of our development we must recognize our responsibility. I believe the government has a responsibility to see that any passengers who desire to take a vacation on a Canadian ship are not faced with such a limitation on liability as this legislation seems to impose.

Mr. Robinson: There is no limitation in the case of gross negligence, is there?

Mr. Murphy: It is a long time since I studied any law, so I am not going to enter into an argument as to whether or not there was gross negligence. That would be a matter for the courts to determine. The point I am making is this. I am not going to argue the point about negligence, but wherever a disaster occurs the people should not be faced with such restrictions with regard to liability as are now apparent. I think that is unfair to any passenger who may embark on a cruise, no matter whether it be in Canadian or international waters. I may be wrong in my assumptions but after all, Mr. Chairman, I know from my personal knowledge that because of the limited liability in the particular disaster to which I referred some families who were left with two or three dependents received only $2,000 or $3,000 as damages, whereas in our own courts, for whom we have the greatest respect and where there is no limitation for damages in actions other than those of this sort which are limited by order in council or by a statute, they could have received a great deal more.

If I have misappraised this idea I am sorry, but I am now only going on what I know has happened. I feel that we in Canada should take it upon ourselves through the government to see that regulations and restrictions with respect to damages arising from accidents, either on airlines or on the sea, be revised at an early date.

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Chairman, may I take a few moments to speak on a subject which was mentioned by the minister when he spoke in the chamber on Friday last. I refer to the question of a water connection between the town of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and a port in the New England States. I do not intend for a moment to review, as I have on previous occasions, all the various factors affecting this situation; but I think the committee should realize that when I raise this matter I am discussing a service that has been in effect between Yarmouth and the New England states for over fifty years.

When world war II came along the service was discontinued because of the need for ships for overseas purposes. Following world war II the service was re-established on a part-time basis. The service operated only in the summer months, whereas prior to 1940 it had run both summer and winter. Following the war the ships had only been in service for a year or so when the owners, the Eastern Steamship Lines, announced that they intended to sell their ships at the first opportunity.

When you have had a water service for some fifty years or more you can imagine what it does to business in that area when it is learned that the service may be discontinued. All avenues were explored and on December 7, 1949, the Minister of Transport announced that an automobile-carrying ferry would be built to operate between Yarmouth and a port in the New England states. Of course that announcement was a great relief to Nova Scotians in general and particularly to those of us who live in the southwestern end of the province.

Then in June, 1950, the Korean outbreak took place. Some two or three months later it was necessary for the minister to announce that, because of the steel shortage, it would be necessary to postpone the building of the ferry. Then, in the early spring of this year the papers in the province of Nova Scotia and in the New England states were filled with articles to the effect that the sale of the Eastern ships had been practically consummated, that the ships would not run this year, and there would be no service between Yarmouth and Boston.

Prior to that time, during that period and since then the provincial government, municipal councils, boards of trade, town councils and various service organizations have all passed resolutions urging that the new ferry be built as soon as possible so we may be assured of a continuity of service. It is easy to imagine how upsetting it is to business—retail business, wholesale business, hotels, motels and to everyone who is in any type of business—when it is realized that a ship may or may not run; that you may or may not have tourist traffic from the United States to Nova Scotia; that you may or may not be able to travel from the United States to Nova Scotia by water; that you may or may not be able to ship your goods by water, because you do not know—and we do not know—from one month's end to another what the situation is going to be.

It was not until May 8 of this year that Eastern Steamship Lines announced that they were running their ships again this year, but there is no guarantee for next year. The length of service is cut down this summer to two and a half months, and no one knows what is going to happen in the summer of 1953. As I said before, this situation is very upsetting to business.

No thinking person questions for a moment the fact that there is a shortage of steel. Despite articles and editorials in many of the papers by those who purport to have some information on the subject, I think there is general agreement that there is a shortage of certain types of steel, particularly of steel plate, in structural shapes. I think that is the term the engineers use.

The minister has announced that there is nothing in the estimates this year for the ferry. This is most upsetting to Nova Scotia. We realize that there is a steel shortage, particularly of structural steel plate.

I should like to make this suggestion. The minister has already mentioned the fact that plans and specifications are completed and that we—"we" being the government—will be able to get under way quickly once the steel shortage eases or is over. May I say that it has been my experience—rather short though it may have been in this field—that after an announcement is made, it takes many months before advertisements are placed, tenders are called and the contract is awarded. I should therefore like to suggest to the minister, on behalf of Nova Scotians in general and those of us who live in western Nova Scotia in particular, that notwithstanding his previous statement, he discuss this matter with his colleagues and give serious consideration to calling for tenders at an early date.

I believe it cannot be gainsaid that the amount of steel plate required between now and the end of the present calendar year, that is if one were to start to build the ferry within the next two or three months, would not be very great, in fact it would be negligible. If I am not mistaken the statement was made in this chamber, by a colleague of the Minister of Transport, that by the end of this calendar year there will be an easing of the steel situation, that steel production in Canada will have increased by about 25 per cent and that early in 1953 the short or tight steel situation should be over.

All I ask of the minister is that he seriously think of reconsidering his statement of last Friday, that he do not give me an answer tonight, but that he rise in his place within the next few weeks and say: "I think that was an excellent idea, and we will call for tenders."

Mr. Argue: I first of all should like to agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I believe that more use could and should be made of the port of Churchill. It has certainly meant a saving in the shipment of wheat, apart from the diversion charges. The people in my part of the province, with regard to the shipment of wheat, do not benefit to any extent from the port of Churchill but I believe the people in western Canada feel that the port of Churchill is their port, no matter to what extent they may use it, and the people in the three prairie provinces would like to see the port of Churchill used to the greatest possible extent.

The government is deepening the St. Lawrence waterway system. The country is spending a good deal of money on that project. Unless positive encouragement is given to the use of the port of Churchill I am afraid the St. Lawrence seaway development may spell doom for that port. For the life of me I do not know why the diversion charges are maintained. It does help the elevator companies but certainly it keeps the port of Churchill at a disadvantage, as compared with other ports, with regard to the shipment of grain. As the hon. member for Saskatoon has said, I believe every possible thing should be done to see that in the navigation season the port is used to the fullest possible extent.

I should like to deal for a moment with the statement of the minister that an amendment was not being made to the Transport Act in order to give the trucking association the right to appear before that board. I do not intend to refer to anything that is sub judice. I do not intend to refer in any way to the agreed charges which that board is now considering, or to say whether they are too low, too high or anything else. All I want to press for at the moment is an amendment to the Transport Act whereby the trucking association as of right may appear before that board when an agreed charge is being discussed which affects the trucking industry. I do not think any association, or any group of people, should be condemned to economic loss without a hearing. Because of the way the act reads many truckers are condemned to economic loss without a hearing. Many of them are condemned to economic ruin, because they are small operators owning only one or two trucks, and at present they are not able to appear before that board and present their case.

The minister said that if an amendment were brought in to allow the trucking association to appear before the board of transport commissioners, then the government would have to give consideration to bringing the whole trucking industry under the Transport Act. Well, I do not think the giving of consideration to one amendment needs to be postponed or delayed because the minister or the government perhaps would like to bring in the broader amendment. If at any time in future the parliament of Canada feels that the trucking industry from one end of Canada to the other should be brought under the Transport Act, then that proposition can be dealt with at that time; but I hope that the government will now give further consideration to amending the Transport Act so the trucking association may have the right to appear before the board of transport commissioners whenever an agreed charge is being discussed that affects them very disastrously.

When I was home at Eastertime I discussed this matter not only with truckers, but more particularly with the consumers in Saskatchewan, the farmers of that province. While the farmers in our province may gain from any agreed charge, whether it is a matter of oil rates or some other agreed charge, nevertheless I believe I am correct when I say that these consumers are very much concerned that the truckers, their neighbours in the little towns who depend upon trucking oil and gas and other commodities, may at this time, or at any other time, be forced out of business because of an agreed charge. And they said to me without exception they felt that the truckers should have the right to state their case, and they added the further hope that any agreed charge that is entered into should be of a long-term nature and should not be raised after the competitor is put out of business. That is all I rose to say, Mr. Chairman. I want to impress upon the minister again the need for an amendment to the Transport Act so that at this time the trucking association will not be condemned to economic loss without a hearing.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I will take only a moment or two of the time of the committee tonight to bring to the attention of the minister two or three items that we in western Ontario are particularly interested in. Last winter, just prior to the beginning of this session, representations were made to the board of transport commissioners regarding a dangerous crossing one mile north of Hyde Park, where the Canadian National Railways cross No. 2 highway. The representatives of the board of transport commissioners, the Canadian National Railways and the Ontario department of highways, together with the deputy reeve of the township of London and myself met there, and it was generally agreed that, all other systems of accident prevention having failed, steps would be taken to instal a warning light system. I have looked through the estimates and cannot locate any funds for that purpose, but I am hoping it will not be too late to include them in the supplementary estimates, if they are not in these estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell my hon. friend that they would not be in these estimates, in any event; if it has been approved by the board, the Canadian National Railways or the body ordered by the board to do it would do it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Thank you. The other item dealing with crossings has to do with a dangerous subway west of Melbourne known as the devil's tunnel. The Ontario department of highways have been improving highway No. 2 both east and west of this particular subway, but nothing has been done there, no doubt because of the fact that some changes are or will be contemplated at that particular spot. It involves a bit of an S turn, and the subway is too narrow for two cars or a truck and car to pass. I am hoping that will be taken care of in the not too distant future.

Then there is the question of the Canadian National Railways shop at London, Ontario. Railways seem to be a bit of a law unto themselves, apparently. The provisions of the Ontario factory act do not apply to that shop, apparently. I have received complaints of some of the conditions there. Provision should be made so that the Ontario factory act will be applicable, and an inspector sent in so that industry, which is no different from any other steel or heavy industry, would be subject to the same provisions and regulations as any other industry. No doubt the minister will look into this, and an improvement will be made.

I should now like to deal with a subject that was brought up earlier; and here I join the hon. member for London who brought the matter to the attention of the minister in the first place. I have refrained from saying anything about it because I was hoping that the proposed weather station at London, Ontario would also be taken care of. I understand from items in the newspapers that such is not the case. Many groups all over western Ontario feel the need of an improved weather service at London. I am going to mention agriculture first. The western Ontario district has more and more gone into the growing of cash crops. All these cash crops are dependent on weather in the spring and fall, in the spring for planting and in the fall for harvesting. They are very dependent on knowledge of when frosts are likely to occur. The city council, the county councils and the aviation officials all have pointed out to the department, I believe, the need of such a station there. I have a long brief here from the fruit and vegetable growers of Ontario. I am not going to take time to read it to the committee at this point. However, it does set out in detail the needs of the industry in that area. I am hoping that further consideration will be given to the matter because the people in western Ontario are vitally interested in it.

Then, returning again to the railways and the Canadian National shops, there is the question of vacations with pay. This of course revolves around the length of service a man has given to the company. But there is a certain amount of dissatisfaction in the matter. I mention it to the minister so that he may look into it.

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, under this general administration item of the Department of Transport I am afforded the opportunity of placing on record a few questions which, at a later time, the minister may choose to answer. They concern the Canadian Pacific railway crossing in North Rosedale section of Toronto.

Within the last twelve months in Toronto at least 500 of my constituents filed a petition with the mayor and board of control complaining about noise, vibration and other alleged nuisances attendant upon railway operations connected with the crossing at MacLennan Hill in the area known as North Rosedale in my constituency. This petition was passed through me from the mayor of Toronto along to the board of transport commissioners, with the result that an investigation was launched immediately.

The exact details of the investigation have not been revealed fully. If at a later date the minister chooses to do so, I would ask him to tell the committee something about that investigation by the board and its officers, as well as the findings made. It has been said, to the credit of the board, that a short-term remedial solution has been found for the complaints of my constituents. Among other things reference has been made to a fifteen mile an hour slow order placed against trains operating at the crossing. Those are trains of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe, too, that some prohibition has been laid down concerning whistling.

However I would ask the minister to confirm on the records of this committee just what has been ordered by way of a short-term solution, and to give any other remedies the board has seen fit to order in the matter by way of a solution.

Then, too, my constituents are most interested in a long-term solution of the problem. It has been stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway plans discontinuing its present yards feeding the railway line in question, and to remove the yards from Lambton to some other location. I have been unable to get more information on this point. If at a later date the minister could see his way clear to report to this committee, I know it would be appreciated by my constituents. At the moment the leader of the petitioning group states that the matter is settled on a short-term basis to the satisfaction of those who associated themselves with him in bringing the matter before the board of transport commissioners. However, the long-term solution of the problem, that is the removal of the yards from Lambton to some other place, is a matter which I shall leave for the attention of the minister.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, on Friday last when the estimates of the Department of Transport were first before us, due to the interest I have in transportation matters it was my intention to make some extended remarks. However, after listening to so many speeches, I noticed that the minister was not paying too much attention. I took my cue from that and, after making a sort of gentlemen's agreement with him, decided that I would wait and ask my questions when the several items were called. I interviewed the chairman at that time and understood from him that I would have an opportunity. It was pointed out to me that, so long as my questions were relevant, I would receive answers.

Therefore I shall not take my forty minutes on this occasion—and in this I know I shall please the minister very much indeed.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

Mr. Fulford: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, through this committee, a matter that has been raised in committee before both by myself and my predecessors. At the last session of this parliament I placed a question on the order paper, and repeated it at the beginning of this session, with reference to the union station at Brockville. I received an answer finally on March 19 confirming what I had already known. The answer showed that this matter is indeed worthy of consideration both by the railways and the board of transport commissioners.

According to the answer I received, the station was built in 1860. Well, as a matter of fact it was built a few years before that. In fact, if it were not such a homely, decrepit, worn-down, dirty, old brick building, I believe I would call the attention of the Minister of Resources and Development to the fact that it might be designated as a national monument. But one does not designate relics of that type as monuments.

Beginning in 1875 the union station at Brockville was used by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, the latter of which, as we know, is now absorbed in the Canadian National Railways system. I consider the station not only a disgrace to the Canadian National but also a menace to the town of Brockville. The facilities for mail, baggage and express are inadequate and obsolete, and make for very difficult working conditions for those who have to operate these railway services. Brockville is now a junction point for pool trains running between Toronto and Ottawa and Toronto and Montreal. At Brockville Canadian Pacific passengers leaving Ottawa on the day train to go to Toronto have to change to the Canadian National, while passengers on Canadian National trains in the afternoon and evening, from Toronto to Ottawa, have to change at Brockville to the C.P.R. The facilities for passengers who have to change cars constitute a hazard to the travelling public.

I consider both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National lucky in that they have not had to pay heavy damages for personal injuries. I saw one man slip under a C.N.R. train coming into the station; and had it not been for a trainman standing right beside him there is no doubt both his legs would have been cut off. That is not good enough for the middle of the twentieth century; that is not good enough for a railroad system which is competing with bus and air transport. If the railroads insist on giving service like that they are bound to lose more and more of their passenger traffic.

From the standpoint of those living in Brockville the worst aspect is that when trains enter the station, especially eastbound passenger trains, the main artery of traffic leading from the south end of Brockville to the north is blocked. I want to pay special tribute to the train crews for their valiant efforts to do everything humanly possible to either split the trains or get them moving as fast as they can. But the fact remains that road traffic is blocked, sometimes over the legal limit, which I believe is eight minutes when a main artery of traffic is concerned.

Brockville is a progressive, fast-growing community. Because of our location on the bank of the St. Lawrence river our growth must be to the north. The new housing developments are north of the main line of the Canadian National. Should a serious fire break out in this new area—and we have had two serious fires in Brockville within the last two years—I hate to think what the consequences might be if the fire department could not get across the tracks. I realize that they would split the train, but it might take a few minutes and it does not take long for a fire to spread. Then if there was a case of emergency illness and an ambulance was held up, either on the way to pick up the sick person or on the way back with the sick person to the hospital, a delay of a few minutes might mean the difference between life and death. Another particularly bad feature is that our children have to go to the other side of the tracks to get to school, and they are continually passing back and forth.

One method of relieving the situation would be to build a subway. In 1945 the municipal council applied to the board of transport commissioners and a plan for such a subway was devised. Brockville is built on pre-Cambrian granite and as a result the cost of such a subway would have been in the neighbourhood of $1 million, the town's share being $300,000.

Another solution would be to move the station further east so that trains would not block this main artery of traffic. If that were done, not by the wildest stretch of the imagination could that old derelict which the Canadian National chooses to call a station be moved. It would mean a new station, which expense would have to be borne entirely by the Canadian National Railways because the Canadian Pacific use the facilities of the station on a lease basis.

Some other method might be devised, such as an overhead bridge; or another location might be picked. In fact another location has been picked, but it would be a little out of the way. However, it would be much cheaper than what was suggested by the engineers of the board of transport commissioners and the Canadian National Railways.

I understand there is a possibility that the province would help in the construction of a subway or overhead pass where the road concerned is an integral part of a provincial highway. Perth street, Brockville, is definitely an integral part of highway No. 29. The fact remains that no matter how this is done, the time has now been reached when this hazard must be eliminated. I am not prepared to say how it can be done. As I say, the town did apply through the usual channels in 1945 to the board of transport commissioners, but the cost was found to be prohibitive.

After all, the municipalities of Ontario are hit hard enough as it is. Our tax rate at the moment is 86 mills, and to undertake anything like this would increase the mill rate. The town is not in position to undertake any such financial deal. I implore the minister to explore every possible channel in an effort to devise means of eliminating hazards such as this. I have no doubt that similar hazards exist elsewhere in Canada, but I think I can guarantee that there is no worse menace to be found anywhere in the dominion than exists in the county which I have the honour to represent in this house.

Anyone who has taken the pool train during the day from Ottawa to Toronto or from Toronto to Ottawa will agree with what I have said about the conditions prevailing at the Brockville station. I think they will admit that I have not exaggerated in any way. Anyone who has travelled on highway No. 29 and has had occasion to use Perth street, Brockville, I think will admit that I have understated the hazard that exists.

There is one other matter which I should like to bring to the minister's attention, a matter which I have mentioned before. I refer to the necessity of having a weather station somewhere in the upper St. Lawrence valley. Totally different weather conditions prevail in the St. Lawrence valley from those in the Ottawa valley. At the present time the Brockville radio station broadcasts the weather reports issued for Haliburton, simply adding twelve hours to the report. I do not know what method is used by the local newspaper, but I can assure you that it is equally unsatisfactory.

When the St. Lawrence seaway is completed it will be vitally necessary to have a weather station in the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence valley. Inasmuch as this station will have to be built eventually I urge that it be built as soon as possible so that our farmers may have the benefit of accurate weather forecasts.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to bring one or two matters to the attention of the minister, matters which I have discussed before. One is in connection with the Canadian Pacific Air Lines plane which was blown up in Quebec. The widow of the pilot of that plane who lost his life lives in my constituency, and she has asked me to find out from the minister just what is the responsibility of Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited. She lost her husband. I wonder if any of the other passengers or crew members on that ill-fated plane have received compensation. She applied for some expenses and was turned down. I believe she was promised employment with the Canadian Pacific, but she thinks she is entitled to something for the loss of her husband. At the present time the only compensation she receives for herself and her boy is from the compensation board of the province of Quebec. When the minister is answering questions I should like him to go into the details.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. Bryce: I am sorry. When the minister begins to answer questions I would appreciate it very much if he would go into that matter a little bit and tell me what it is possible for this lady to do. She is a widow with a son to raise, and I should like to know if any of the other passengers or crew members have received compensation. It is an unusual incident. The plane was blown up. It was the plane with which Guay was involved.

Mr. Chevrier: I am familiar with the case.

Mr. Hansell: I will detain the committee for only about three minutes for the purpose of asking the minister if he can exert some influence in a certain direction. We recognize that the minister has tremendous responsibilities. His department is large, and as it has to do with transportation by rail, air and boat, with all the ramifications that are involved, his work is great and his responsibilities are heavy. I rise at this time to point out one little need in a certain part of the country. I refer to the Canadian Pacific railway station at Calgary, Alberta. I am well aware that the minister has no particular jurisdiction over a private railway company, but I am also well aware that as Canada's Minister of Transport a word from him in the right direction will do wonders.

I am not raising this question because I desire to embarrass the Canadian Pacific Railway. I happen to be an old C.P.R. man. I had a happy relationship with the company when I was one of the ticket clerks in the Calgary C.P.R. depot thirty-five years ago. I renew acquaintances every time I go through that depot; but, Mr. Chairman, it is the same kind of depot now that it was thirty-five years ago. Hardly a stick of wood in the whole place has been replaced. Perhaps the bars have been taken down from the ticket windows, and I think there are one or two new telephone booths. It is not only a matter of the building itself. The accommodation available for passengers is the worst of any station from Montreal to Vancouver, and I have visited them all.

There is no underground passage to enable you to reach a train on track 2, 3 or 4 if there happens to be a train parked on track 1. Let me give an illustration that may sound astounding to the minister. I arrived in Calgary one night on my way to Edmonton. The train was a little late because it was wintertime and nearly all the trains were late. I came in on the northbound train from Lethbridge and arrived at Calgary at about 10.30. The berths were made up on the midnight train to Edmonton. Do you know that I had to remain in the depot for nearly two hours before I could get on the Edmonton train and go to sleep. There was no underground passage, and as one train went out another train came in. For some reason the officials did not split any of the trains in the middle so that one could walk over the tracks. Therefore we had to wait there for two hours before we could go to bed because we had to cross to track 3 or 4 and there was a train on track 1 or 2.

Somebody may say that I should have complained to the railroad officials. I could have done that but if I had, perhaps I would have got some worker into trouble. However, my heart was brimming over with compassion, and instead of getting anyone into trouble I stayed in the depot and suffered for a couple of hours. I have actually seen people climb up the steps of railway cars, pass through the entranceway and step down on the other side in order to reach their trains. I have seen trainmen boost rather stout ladies up the steps so they might get over to track 2 or 3 in order to get their train on the other side. I do not know what the regulations are, but if an accident should happen when that was being done I am afraid there would be an awful mess not only on the platform, but someone would get into trouble and there would be a mess in that respect.

I know I am sometimes given to a little levity in the house, but I am serious when I say that a city the size of Calgary, which has doubled its population in the past ten or fifteen years, still has the same passenger accommodation as far as depots are concerned as it had thirty-five years ago.

Mr. Fulford: We have the same as we had ninety-two years ago.

Mr. Hansell: Then I will back my hon. friend in getting a new station if he will back me in getting a new station at Calgary.

Perhaps there will be a double amount of influence there. I am serious about this matter. It may be there are some things that I do not know anything about. Perhaps they are negotiating for a union station. If they are, for goodness sake let the negotiations be speeded up and some conclusion reached. So far as the C.P.R. is concerned, Calgary is on the main line. Every transcontinental train on the Canadian Pacific Railway passes through Calgary in addition to numerous local trains running north, east, south and west. That is the situation which exists. Therefore I say to the Minister of Transport that I wish he would look into the matter and use all the influence he can to get a new railway depot that will be adequate to supply the needs of a city the size of Calgary, Alberta, the oil capital of Canada.

An hon. Member: Hurrah!

Mr. Hansell: Hurrah!

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, when the minister's estimates were first being considered I asked him some questions concerning Canada's merchant navy. He was good enough to give a brief reply that same evening, but I should like to get one or two points concerning that statement cleared up. On page 2321 of Hansard for May 16, 1952 the minister is reported as having said that there are now forty-five 10,000 ton ocean-going cargo vessels and twelve 7,500 ton vessels sailing under the Canadian flag. This would make a total of 57 ships. Is that the correct figure at the present time, and are all of those ships the old, slow vessels which were built during the war?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that is yes, plus other ships such as the "Lady" boats of the Canadian National Steamships, diesel passengers and some tankers, making a total of 80. They are all the Park vessels of wartime construction.

Mr. Green: And there are 97 Canadian-owned ships of the same type which are operating under the British flag, I understand. Is that the correct figure?

Mr. Chevrier: That is correct.

Mr. Green: The other evening the minister mentioned that two large modern tankers are under construction here or for which contracts have been let. Could he tell the committee what company is building those tankers, where they are being built, and on which coast they are to operate?

Mr. Chevrier: They are for deep-sea operation on the Atlantic coast. They are being built by Davie Shipbuilding for the order of the Andros Company.

Mr. Green: Into what service are they going, out of what port?

Mr. Chevrier: For the Atlantic and Mediterranean service.

Mr. Green: They will not be operating out of east coast ports.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they will be operating out of east coast ports. They will operate out of Atlantic ports and in the St. Lawrence, depending upon where the cargo is going.

Mr. Green: In my remarks the other night I brought up the replacement plan which was proposed by the Canadian maritime commission some years ago. The main purpose of that plan, as I read it in the second report of the commission—and I am referring particularly to page 52—was that Canadian owners, having sold these old, slow wartime ships, would pay the money into a trust fund held by the government or some government agency and with that fund it would be possible to build modern, fast cargo vessels to compete with the modern vessels of other maritime nations.

For example, on page 52 of the report we find these two statements:

> The object of the plan is to reduce and modernize the Canadian flag fleet.

Then again:

> The funds, however, must be used for the purpose of replacement or modernization of Canadian shipping, and for the acquisition of vessels which are economic to operate.

Incidentally, the minister himself is on record in different speeches two or three years ago to the effect that Canada must have a modern cargo fleet. I have here a quotation from a speech he made at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto in October, 1949, in which he said:

> It has been the policy of the government to endeavour to maintain a merchant marine under a Canadian flag, owned and operated by Canadians. It is not the intention to support a large fleet, nor is it a question of national pride of ownership. It is considered that a small, efficient, modern fleet of ocean-going vessels would be of benefit to Canada, not only as a contribution to the national economy but for the purpose of national security.

That statement is in line with the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission. However, the policy seems to have changed, particularly with regard to the replacement fund. Of course there is the fact that no single modern cargo vessel has been built for the Canadian merchant navy, either from that fund or any other fund in Canada to date.

I have here the fourth report of the Canadian maritime commission; the one that was tabled in the house last year. There we find that the replacement fund is now being used for other types of shipbuilding. There appears to have been some provision made for assigning these funds, for example, to operators on the great lakes rather than insisting that they be used for the building of modern ocean-going cargo vessels. We find on page 6 of the report that the commission's policy is to allow only a proportion of the cost to be met by assignment of the funds held in escrow under its replacement plan where the assignment of funds is destined for the building, conversion or acquisition of other than ocean-going ships.

What I should like to know is what steps have been taken at the present time by the Canadian maritime commission or by the government, either under this replacement plan or under any other plan, to help bring about the construction of modern fast cargo vessels for the Canadian merchant navy. The minister will answer that question later, will he?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: I raised also the question of the Canadian maritime commission. I was protesting that a chairman had not been appointed, except for the deputy minister of transport. I should like to repeat that I have a great respect for the deputy minister, and I think he is doing a grand job. But it was never our understanding that an important commission such as the Canadian maritime commission should have as its head the deputy minister or any other officer of the department. There is no parallel situation. For example, the board of transport commissioners is an independent body. There is no suggestion that the department should have any representative on the board. While the air transport does not have the independent status of the board of transport commissioners in that it is directly responsible to the government, nevertheless that air transport board has a separate chairman whose only job, as I understand it, is to act as chairman of that board.

We believe that the Canadian maritime commission should be in the same position. We believe there should be a chairman who has no other work to perform than that of supervising the business of that commission. Since the discussion the other evening I have been reading the annual report from the deputy to the minister, and at page 7 I find this statement:

> By order in council P.C. 6063 of December 13, 1950, the undersigned was appointed a member of the Canadian maritime commission and made chairman thereof, thereby knitting more closely together the advisory and operational responsibilities of government with respect to marine transportation.

That statement would make it appear that it is the policy of the department to operate the Canadian maritime commission with the deputy minister or some other officer of the department as the chairman. I should like to know whether that is to be the fixed policy of the government. If it is, I am afraid it is an unsound one. I think shipping is of sufficient importance to this country for us to have a full-time chairman of the Canadian maritime commission. If it is of sufficient importance to have a commission at all, then there should be a full-time chairman.

I would point out to the minister that in the report of the Turgeon commission on transportation we had a finding with regard to these three important bodies, namely the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission. The Turgeon commission explained the importance of each of those bodies to Canada, and went on to recommend that there should be only one body to deal with transportation, including the railways, the shipping and the airways.

I do not agree with that recommendation with respect to shipping. Coming as I do from a seaport, I consider that the shipping problems of Canada are of sufficient importance for us to have a separate commission. We are greatly worried because of the fact that, instead of having an independent commission to carry on the good work that was started, we now have one which is absolutely operating under an officer of the Department of Transport. The result is that the commission is, in effect, only a branch of the department. I would ask the minister to explain whether that is to be a permanent policy or whether we can expect to have some person appointed as the full-time chairman of this commission.

I repeat the recommendation I made the other night, namely that the minister try to get one of the leading shipping men of Canada, a leading marine lawyer, or someone whose life has been devoted to shipping. If that is done I think great benefit would accrue to shipping and to the country at large. I repeat that I am not for a minute questioning the ability of the deputy minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Did the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra say that he had another question?

Mr. Green: I have one other question on shipping. Then I have a question on an entirely different matter. This other question has to do with the notorious Ming Sung ships. As the chairman knows, they were, and perhaps still are, owned by a Canadian company known as the Ming Sung Industrial Company which is controlled by Chinese citizens in communist China. I should like to know whether those ships are still on Canadian registry or whether there has been any change in that registration. Can the minister answer that question?

Mr. Chevrier: I think my hon. friend should proceed in the usual way.

Mr. Green: All right.

Mr. Chevrier: I think he should ask his questions; then when he is through, I will deal with them.

Mr. Green: All right. If they are still on Canadian registry, then as I read the Canada Shipping Act they are not only entitled to fly the Canadian flag but are bound to do so; if they do not, they break the Canadian law. I would refer the minister to section 89 of the Canada Shipping Act. If I am correct in that statement, it seems to me that something should be done about it by the Canadian government. If these ships are Canadian vessels then, as I say, they are entitled to fly the Canadian flag and are entitled to the protection of the Canadian navy, if you please—and I presume to the protection of the British navy and possibly of the allied navies. Yet the latest word we had of them was that they were in Canton, which is a communist-held port, waiting for a chance to make a break up to Shanghai, another communist-held port.

I realize that the situation is difficult, but I believe some steps should be taken to clear it up. I believe there is power to do so under the Canada Shipping Act. If not, there is certainly, under the Emergency Powers Act, power to deal with that unfortunate situation. I would ask the minister if he would explain the present status of those ships.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that cover the questions my hon. friend wishes to ask?

Mr. Green: That covers the shipping questions.

Mr. Chevrier: Are those all the questions my hon. friend has to ask?

Mr. Green: The other question has to do with the great lakes. I was surprised to read in the press of May 16—and I am reading now from a report in the Globe and Mail—an article which is headed: "Damage $1 Billion; Truman Calls on Army to help Lower Lakes." That dispatch was from Washington. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> President Truman called on army engineers today to provide a remedy for high water damage to property on the shores of the five great lakes.

The article also gave particulars of the damage that was being done, and ended up with this paragraph:

> Canada has agreed to the rediversion of one of the two rivers flowing into Superior. It announced within the last few days that the Ogoki river would be diverted, on a temporary basis, to the Hudson bay watershed.

Today I picked up the current issue of U. S. News and World Report. It is dated tomorrow, as a matter of fact, May 23. I find an article in it entitled "Great lakes: new flood threat. Damage already big. Billion loss in sight." The article commences:

> Flood damage around the great lakes this summer may get up to $1 billion or more.
> There's a great, creeping flood under way. Water, rising steadily, is expected to be 5 feet and more above the 1934 level by summer. Big areas already are flooded or threatened.
> What to do is a big question now worrying U.S. and Canadian governments.

Then the article goes on to give details which were not in the press dispatch from the Globe and Mail, and makes it pretty clear that the situation is extremely serious from the point of view of the United States, and I presume it is just as serious to Canadians. One paragraph says:

> The threatened areas are finally getting Washington excited about it, too. Congressmen are needling the government for aid. The army corps of engineers is making surveys. The U.S. weather bureau is tightening up its storm-warning system on the lakes.

Then we find this significant sentence:

> The state department last week got Canada to agree to a review of the problem.

The minister certainly should make a statement with regard to that, and let us know whether it is correct.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely my hon. friend would not expect me to make a statement on a matter like that. I can deal with the problem generally, but that surely is a matter for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, particularly in view of the sentence he just has read.

Mr. Green: Then the article goes on to deal with Canada's Long Lac and Ogoki power projects having diverted 5,000 cubic feet of water per second, and it also refers to Canada's Gut dam in the St. Lawrence river rapids just below lake Ontario which, it says, slows down the flow of Ontario's water to the sea, and thus adds several extra inches to the lakes' levels. Apparently the situation is extremely serious. I would ask the minister to make a statement to the house tonight in connection with this matter.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in reply to the remarks the minister made at eight o'clock—in other words, since it is now nearly half past ten I have been exercising the virtue of patience for over two hours—with reference to the need for augmenting the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees, particularly in the case of those who have only the basic $25 a month.

I spoke about this last Friday when the estimates of the minister were first called, and I endeavoured to make it clear at that time that there have been some improvements in the situation since we last discussed this matter in the house. I pointed out then, but it seems I must repeat it now, that although there are improvements for those still in the service, if they choose to avail themselves of those improvements, and although there are potential improvements for those already retired where their pensions were in part contributory, and therefore are more than $25 a month, it still remains that there is no improvement by virtue of the recent changes in the Canadian National pension rules for those already retired who have only the basic pension of $25 a month.

I respectfully suggest to the minister that to remind us of the improvements that have been made for others does not solve the problem or deal with the plight of the men who have only $25 a month. It is that group in particular whose case I continue to plead with the minister.

When he concluded the remarks he made at eight o'clock this evening the minister expressed the hope that what he had said would bring this discussion to an end, and that that would be the last word on it. I am sure he did not think that would be the case; I am sure he did not expect that I would cease pleading the case of men left in this most difficult position and drawing, as far as their railway pension is concerned, only $25 a month. My purpose in rising now is to express the hope that the minister will yet give further consideration to the situation of these retired employees.

The minister, as has been done on other occasions when this question has been raised, referred to the improvements in old age pension legislation that have taken place since we were discussing this same problem of the C.N.R. pensioners a year ago. Let me point out again that those improvements are available to other people as well, but in my view that does not relieve the Canadian National, which is owned by the government, of its obligation to these men, an obligation which arises in part from the fact that there has been such a tremendous increase in the cost of living since this $25 basic pension was first established.

The minister said tonight that under the new old age pension legislation it is possible for those men who are getting only $25 a month from their C.N.R. pension to get a total of $65 a month by going on the old age pension as well. For simplicity's sake I presume he was speaking of single men, and I will do the same. I would point out to him that in the case of those between 65 and 69 they cannot get a total of $65 a month. There is a ceiling in the old age legislation which limits total income between ages 65 and 69 to $60 a month, so the $25 railway pension limits them to the amount they can draw under the Old Age Assistance Act. I would also point out that some of these men do have small homes, or some other asset, that they have been able to build up across the years; and if that is the case that other asset, together with their $25 a month, in many cases denies them the opportunity of getting anything out of the old age assistance legislation whatever.

Then there is the case of those over 70, and there are quite a few of them. I ask the minister to note this situation which I think is most unfair. Let us take the case of two C.N.R. pensioners, one we will say, for example, drawing $100 a month C.N.R. pension and the other drawing just the $25 a month. They are both over 70. They both qualify for the old age security pension of $40 a month. In the case of the C.N.R. pensioner with the $100 a month who gets $40 old age security, it is still possible for him, with his $100 railway pension, to take advantage of the new rules and augment that $100 pension to a slightly higher amount. But the C.N.R. pensioner who is getting only $25 a month, when he gets his $40 old age security, cannot do anything to increase that $25 basic pension. It is there, and he cannot get it increased by any means under the new rules. So you have on the one hand a C.N.R. pensioner with $100 a month getting an extra $40, which puts him up to $140, and he may increase that amount a bit further. On the other hand you have the railway pensioner on $25 getting $40 old age security, which puts him up to $65; and he cannot get any more out of the C.N.R. pension fund, even under the changes that have come into effect at the present time. The unfairness to the $25 pensioner is surely obvious.

In passing I should point out that when we talk about retired employees with pensions of more than $25 a month being able to augment those pensions, it should be noted that this possibility depends upon whether they can make a certain contribution. Thus for many of these people it is a theoretical possibility which it may be hard for them to turn into a reality.

However, there is not even a theoretical possibility of any increase for those men who are on the basic pension of only $25 a month. As I have already pointed out on several occasions, their number is something over 3,000 and I feel that the government still has a responsibility to those people.

In view of the statements the minister made tonight, I am not asking him to comment further at this time. I should prefer to hear from him in more favourable terms, and I hope he will give the matter further consideration. Surely he knew, when he expressed the hope that what he said tonight would be the end of this matter, that his hope would not be realized. Surely he would not, on second thought, ask any group of men on $25 a month to sit back and be satisfied with such a pension under today's conditions. And I know he does not expect those of us who have pleaded the case for these men to stop pleading it because of the kind of arguments that were put forth tonight.

The problem is still there; the plight of these men is there; the unfairness still exists; and I hope that even yet consideration will be given by the government to raising the $25 pension, particularly in the case of those already retired for whom there is no chance of improvement under the rules as they now stand.

Just one other word, and it is this: The minister suggested that this was a problem to be threshed out between the men and the Canadian National Railways. I agree that most aspects of employer-employee relations are best dealt with in that way. But it just so happens that, in the very nature of the case, once these men are retired and no longer working for the company, the normal negotiations that go on between employees, through their representatives, and the company, somehow or another do not seem to include the same attention for the plight of the retired men as is given to the needs of the men still in the service.

The minister must recognize that these men do need a voice pleading on their behalf and, what is more, that they need a ministerial ear to pay attention to that plea.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: I understand there has been some agreement that at 10:45 there will be further discussion of the matter under consideration before six o'clock. I should like to reply to what has been said.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member's question could be asked on an individual item.

Mr. Johnston: Did I understand the minister to say that this discussion will stop now?

Mr. Chevrier: No; what I would like my hon. friend to allow me to do is to reply, and then perhaps we could pass the first item. Then the hon. member could ask his question on one of the subsequent items.

Mr. Johnston: If it is simply to allow the minister to answer the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and then allow the item to stand, I would be content.

Mr. Chevrier: No, no; I cannot consent to that. I think my hon. friend has already spoken twice on the question of trucking, and I presume that is what he wishes to bring up again. I have no objection to his discussing the matter again, but I do say it could be brought up under one or another of the succeeding items.

Mr. Johnston: No. I did wish to make passing reference to what the minister had indicated. However, I had intended to speak for a moment with respect to another item, one which I do not think comes up under any particular item in the estimates.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to deal with it briefly, perhaps he could do so now.

Mr. Johnston: It would take only a moment or two. I wish to give some support to what was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Macleod about the possibility of having a union station in Calgary. He outlined the conditions as they apply to the C.P.R. What I had in mind was not so much those conditions—although I agree with what the hon. member said—but rather that the C.N.R. station in Calgary is a disgrace to any city of its size and importance.

I am sure the minister must have visited the C.N.R. station when he has been in Calgary. It is an old building which was renovated many years ago. Any visitor to Calgary who travels by Canadian National does not receive a good impression of the city upon landing there. The station is an old and dilapidated building, in the poorest part of the city, on the outskirts. Anyone who visits Calgary, arriving at that station, must of necessity take a taxi to his home. Calgary is in great need of a union station, and I hope the minister will give consideration to that fact.

Then I would make reference to the minister's suggestion that he was fearful that if the Transport Act were amended to allow the truck transport industry to appear before the board in a legal capacity to protest against charges, it would be dangerous because it might bring them under the control of the act. I made passing reference to the fact the other day that in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, where the trucking industry is under the control of the provinces, both railways are permitted by law to appear and not only to appeal against the rates the trucks are charging, but also to appear in protest against any franchise they may be given.

Mr. Chevrier: Because they own bus companies, and come in under the act.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, they might do that. But that does not in all cases, particularly in Alberta, bring them under the control of the act. All we are suggesting is that there may be some way—and I am not familiar with what the legal technicalities might be—whereby the truck transportation concerns could have the right to appear and protest so the board might become fully conversant with these matters, and so the trucking industry would have at least a fighting chance to survive.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be allowed to deal with the question—

Mr. Gillis: Is it the minister's intention to answer the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and then to close off the discussion on the first item?

Mr. Chevrier: I have no such intention. I am not in control of the committee; the chairman is in control. But I had understood that perhaps after I replied to the hon. member, and answered his questions, we would pass the first item and then proceed to the others.

Mr. Gillis: I have no objection to that, provided I am given the undertaking that I may be permitted under another item to ask a question about that section of the corps of commissionaires who work at the airports. If I am given the undertaking that I may discuss this matter under item 496, I shall be prepared to let the first item pass.

Mr. Chevrier: I will gladly give that undertaking—and there are several other items, too.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra dealt again with the question of the policy of the Canadian maritime commission with reference to the deep-sea fleet, and Canada's merchant navy. The policy of the commission has not changed—the hon. member seemed to be under the impression that it had—since the commission was established. It is true that the replacement plan has been altered, but that was because the shipping companies felt that it would be more profitable to build ships in Canada for St. Lawrence river and great lakes operation than to build fast cargo vessels for deep-sea operation. The cost of building deep-sea ships is far greater in Canada than in the United Kingdom and certain continental countries, and that is why it was found necessary to alter the original replacement plan. Had it not been altered a substantial number of orders which have been received by the shipyards would not have been received.

Mr. Green: That is for great lakes and St. Lawrence ships?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. My hon. friend dealt with the question of the dual capacity of the deputy minister acting as chairman of the maritime commission and asked whether that was a firm policy of the government. That is not a firm policy of the government; the government has determined no policy in that regard. It so happened that at the time of the resignation of the former chairman conditions and circumstances were such that it was found advisable to operate the maritime commission under the arrangement which was then adopted. That action was supported by the fact that a large number of our ships had been transferred to United Kingdom registry, which meant much less work for the maritime commission than it would have had if the one hundred or more ships had remained under Canadian registry. That does not mean to say that should they come back under Canadian registry we will immediately change this policy, neither does it mean that the government is committed to continuing the deputy minister as chairman of the maritime commission.

My hon. friend wanted to know whether the Ming Sung ships were still under Canadian registry. As far as I know they are. If they were not there would be no way of protecting the mortgage.

Mr. Green: There is not much way of protecting it now.

Mr. Chevrier: That remains to be seen. My hon. friend wants a statement and he should let me make it. This is a matter which concerns external affairs, but I will give as much information as I have available. It would be a mistake to remove the Ming Sung ships from Canadian registry because we would then lose forever the mortgage which we hold against those ships. There may be some other method of saving the mortgage, but I do not know.

The hon. member asked whether the ships were still flying the Canadian flag. I am not able to answer that and I am sure nobody else is. I do not know where the ships are. I presume they are in Chinese communist waters, but I do not know what flag they are flying. Then my hon. friend wanted to know what steps are being taken to clear up this situation. That is easier said than done. Steps are being taken and careful consideration is being given, and has been given, by the government to the whole matter. I am not able to go beyond that because other ministers are dealing with the question.

I can assure my hon. friend that the Canada Shipping Act has been carefully studied. The Department of Justice has been taking an active part, as has the Department of Finance and the Department of External Affairs. The government would like to be able to say that the matter is being cleared up, but there are international difficulties that do not make it so easy.

The matter of high water levels on the great lakes and the upper St. Lawrence river pertains to another department. This department is concerned in so far as the Gut dam is involved. It is a serious problem, and is created by precipitation and the diversion of waters into the great lakes, and to some extent by the Gut dam. All the artificial causes added together are but a drop in the bucket compared to the precipitation or other natural causes. If the Gut dam were removed the effect would be to raise the level about five and one-half inches; but if that were done, particularly at this time, it might cause serious trouble downstream, particularly if the Ottawa river rose as it did last year and some years ago. Serious flood conditions might occur in the downstream areas.

This is unquestionably an international matter, and it is being considered by the two countries. Were the minister of external affairs here he could say how far the talks between Canada and the United States have gone. There is provision under the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway proposal to guard against this kind of situation by means of regulatory methods provided for in the plans and specifications.

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO YEARS 1952 AND 1953

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 242, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act—Mr. Prudham—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Calculation for 1950.

Mr. Prudham: Just before six o'clock the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked about the mines that would be affected by this amendment. There are five mines which will receive an additional $36,976.64, as follows:

Mine No. 1	$ 6,986.69
Mine No. 2	1,900.25
Mine No. 3	11,407.78
Mine No. 4	12,558.88
Mine No. 5	4,123.64
	$36,976.64

Mr. Adamson: What is the cost per ounce of those five mines?

Mr. Prudham: I could get it, but it is scattered through the report. I would prefer not to give the names, but if the hon. gentleman insists perhaps I had better do so and he can look it up:

1. Hallnor Mines Ltd.
2. Broulan Porcupine Mines Ltd.
3. Porcupine Reef Gold Mines Ltd.
4. Cochenour Willans Gold Mines Ltd.
5. Rycon Mine (C. M. & S.)

Mr. Adamson: I was wondering in what category they would come.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Application of act to 1951, 1952 and 1953.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to clause 2, I note that it extends the application of the act for two more years, but in addition to that it seems to make certain changes so that the basis of computation will be different than it was previously. Can the minister say whether the changes for the next two years will result in the paying out of more money or the paying out of less money than would otherwise be the case?

Mr. Prudham: The purpose of this amendment is to extend the application of the act to the years 1952 and 1953 and to clarify the conditions under which a mine operator may elect as a base year the calendar years 1948, 1949 or 1950. The intent of the present act was that the year chosen as the base year should be one in which the mine had been in operation for a full calendar year and had during that time been in production for more than six months. As the act at present reads, a mine whose first year of production commenced subsequent to January 1 and prior to June 30 of any of the above years may choose that year as its base year, thus gaining an advantage that was never intended.

There are five mines in this category and each elected as its base year the first year of operation which in every instance was less than twelve months. This amendment will mean a decrease in assistance payable of $69,456. The mines affected are Howe Sound Exploration Company Limited, Quesabe Mines Limited, Giant Yellowknife

Gold Mines Limited, Campbell Red Lake Mines Limited, and Consolidated Duquesne Mining Company Limited. The last mentioned is not affected financially. Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines Limited will gain $2,960 and the others will lose substantial amounts.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

Business of the House

He said: Tomorrow we will continue with the estimates of the Department of Transport. When those are concluded we will take up the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. If we finish those two departments we will then take up public works.

Mr. Green: You are pretty safe on that.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 23, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move:

That William Alfred Robinson, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Simcoe East, Ontario, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

I am confident that members of the house, especially those who have been members of committees presided over by the hon. gentleman, will feel, as I do, that he will carry out the duties of deputy chairman of the committees of the whole house in the same able and impartial way as he has presided over some of the standing or select committees of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

TABLING OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table copies of the trans-Canada highway agreement as signed between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Nova Scotia.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act to provide that the chief electoral officer may be paid a salary of not less than eight nor more than twelve thousand dollars per annum to be fixed by order of the governor in council.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GREAT LAKES LEVELS

JOINT REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE BY GOVERNMENTS OF CANADA AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have there been any discussions between the Canadian and United States governments concerning the present flood threat on the great lakes? If so, will the Prime Minister make a statement thereon?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the question is a timely one and is based upon an item in the U.S. News and World Report of recent date which contains the assertion that the state department last week got Canada to agree to a review of the problem.

The United States government has requested the Canadian government to make a joint reference on the question of the high water level of lake Ontario to the international joint commission for study and for recommendation of appropriate remedial measures. The Canadian government has agreed in principle to this reference on the understanding that it will be drafted in such a manner that the international joint commission will not delay consideration of the St. Lawrence project, which it has also been agreed to refer to the commission immediately. Our purpose is that the St. Lawrence project be not delayed by the consideration of the reference on the matter of the high water level. Officials concerned are now drafting a reference on this subject to the international joint commission, to be submitted to the governments for approval.

INDIANS

STATUS UNDER OLD AGE ASSISTANCE ACT AND BLIND PERSONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister state what the position is with respect to the status of Indians under the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act in the various provinces?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of this question. The position is that in eight of the ten provinces applications are being accepted from Indians for old age assistance and blindness allowances on exactly the same basis as from other provinces. There is no discrimination of any kind. In Alberta and Saskatchewan the provincial legislation and the agreements between the province and the federal government contain no provision for the exclusion of Indian applicants.

I understand, however, that some question has been raised in these two provinces as to the admissibility of Indians to the benefits of their legislation, and that up to the present time no action has been taken by these two provincial authorities to deal with requests for old age assistance or blindness allowances from Indian applicants. I have already written to one of the provinces and I am today writing to the second province with regard to this matter. The position of the federal government is of course that, in the absence of any provision in the provincial law to exclude Indians, they are entitled to the benefits of this legislation on the same basis as any other residents of the province.

With regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question, of course, in the light of custom, I would have to consult with the provinces concerned before tabling any correspondence between the two jurisdictions of government. I will seek their concurrence or their wishes in the matter.

KURT MEYER

QUESTION OF CANADIAN JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with a matter that was discussed by the Canadian Legion convention in Montreal. Have there been any recent communications either from the British government or from the British-allied German commission on war criminals, relating to whether or not Canada still has jurisdiction over the person of Major General Kurt Meyer? It is a matter that has aroused some interest, to know whether or not there have been any recent discussions. That is the reason I have asked the Prime Minister, even though I have not been able to give notice of it.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Had I had notice I might perhaps be able to be a little more precise in my answer, but I think I can give a satisfactory answer without referring again to the pertinent documents.

As hon. members know, there is a draft treaty that is now under consideration by the occupying powers and the government of Western Germany. There are provisions in that treaty for the treatment of prisoners under the jurisdiction of those who will be parties to the treaty. There has been correspondence to make it abundantly clear that the treaty will not of itself have any effect on the jurisdiction of the Canadian authorities over the war criminals who are purging sentences imposed by Canadian courts; that the provisions will not exclude the possibility of their being brought under the treaty; that the treaty itself will not have the effect of changing the present position in any way. The present position is that the two prisoners still purging sentences are under the jurisdiction of the Canadian authorities, and are being held by the United Kingdom authorities as custodians.

It may be that some change will have to to be made in that situation after the United Kingdom has signed this treaty with Western Germany; but care has been taken by those who are to be parties to the treaty to see to it that it does not go beyond the rights and jurisdiction of those who are to be signatories to the treaty.

FOREIGN TRAWLERS

ENTRY INTO CANADIAN PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries. Will he explain why foreign trawlers are not permitted to enter Nova Scotia ports to secure supplies, as they are in Newfoundland ports?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member for Halifax was kind enough to leave in my office this morning notice of his intention to ask this question. I also received a telephone call from the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. MacLean) on this problem.

Section 10 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act prohibits, under penalty of forfeiture, the entry of foreign fishing vessels into Canadian ports or territorial waters, unless otherwise permitted by law or by treaty.

We have no treaties with any countries providing for port privileges to foreign fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast. However, under section 3 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, as amended by section 9 of the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act, the governor in council is empowered to authorize the issue of licences to—(a) United States fishing vessels enabling them to enter any port on the Atlantic coast of Canada, and (b) any fishing vessels, enabling them to enter any port in the province of Newfoundland for the purpose of:

1. The purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies, and

2. The transshipment of catch and the shipping of crews.

Under this section, the governor in council annually issues an order authorizing the licensing of United States fishing vessels to enter Atlantic ports and any fishing vessel to enter the ports of Newfoundland to purchase bait and other supplies.

In the case of the United States vessels, this privilege dates back to 1888 when a reciprocity treaty with the United States was being negotiated. Pending the negotiation of the treaty these privileges were granted to United States fishing vessels as modus vivendi. The treaty was never ratified by the United States but the modus vivendi licences were continued on a yearly basis until this date.

In Newfoundland, foreign vessels, particularly those of Portugal, traditionally came into port for the purchase of bait and other supplies. When the terms of union were being arranged it was part of the agreement that these privileges would be continued and that the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act would be amended accordingly.

Mr. Balcom: May I ask a supplementary question? Will steps be taken by the Department of Fisheries or the department concerned to correct the situation so far as Nova Scotia is concerned?

Mr. MacNaught: I think that is a matter of government policy, and if any decision is made thereon, no doubt it will be announced in due course.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask a supplementary question? What is the situation on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MacNaught: I understand that on the Pacific coast they have what is known as reciprocal port privileges.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO FARM MACHINERY PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the unanimous request of the Saskatchewan legislature that the federal government appoint a special committee of this house to examine into the present prices of farm machinery, and farm machinery repair parts, will the government appoint such a committee at this session with powers similar to the 1936-37 committee on this matter?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I hope I am not of too suspicious a nature, but I do sometimes wonder whether, when there are certain provincial election campaigns going on, there is not some effort to get ammunition out of questions and answers or other forms of debate in this House of Commons. I hope that is not the purpose of this question.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Page the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. St. Laurent: The answer of course is that the federal government does not appoint any committees, special or otherwise, of this house. Sometimes the government makes proposals to the house with respect to committees, but any decision or appointment is made by the house itself.

Whenever the government has decided to make such a proposal an appropriate notice is put on the order paper. No decision along the lines suggested in the question has yet been made by the government. If and when a decision is made for such a proposal, notice will be put on the order paper in the usual way.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF STEEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, particularly in view of the Prime Minister's reference to elections. Has the Minister of Public Works secured the steel for the post office at Oshawa, a picture of which appeared in the Oshawa local papers yesterday, together with a telegram saying that this was to be completed as soon as steel was available? Is the steel available?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): The Oshawa public building is causing me a little annoyance, because I am receiving communications from people of that riding of every tint and colour of political creed. I answered one from an outstanding C.C.F. person some time in March. That started off a series of letters, telephone calls and questions, and I have tried to give everyone the same answer. The specifications are nearly completed. If the steel situation eases, tenders will be called for, and a contract will be awarded as soon as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Coldwell: I think this telegram was addressed to a gentleman named Lay.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The letter to which I referred was that of a Mr. Fenwick; I think my hon. friend knows him. I have been answering telephone calls and addressing letters—but when the by-election is over I am sure I will have no other letters or telegrams.

[Later:]

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I had intended to ask of the Minister of Public Works a question already asked by another hon. member. Perhaps I might be permitted to ask this supplementary question: Would the minister care to clarify the situation regarding the availability of steel for the construction of public office buildings of a type proposed for Charlottetown and Oshawa?

Mr. Speaker: I think there is no urgency in this question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am surprised that the senior member for Queens (Mr. McLure) did not put this question before the junior member put it. I would give the junior member the same answer I have given for years to the older one.

Mr. Knowles: What about Victoria-Carleton?

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works when the town of Barrie may expect its new public building, which has been on the board for months.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest the hon. member might have asked that question during the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSFER OF ACCOMMODATION FOR KOREAN WAR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Were orders issued by western army command, effective last Monday, requiring married Korean war veterans of the Princess Patricia's to move from their homes at Calgary into barracks?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the minister, may I take the hon. member's question as a notice.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOLIDAY ON MAY 24—APPLICATION TO HOUSE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works relative to a statement he made in the house yesterday. May I ask him if all members of the staff of the House of Commons are to be granted a holiday tomorrow, or does it apply only to certain members of the staff?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I would rely upon His Honour's judgment and discretion in this matter. I think every one would be satisfied with his decision.

Mr. Shaw: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Public Works kindly suggest to His Honour that possibly we could close the cafeteria and restaurant tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As a rule I do not answer questions from the chair. However, I think perhaps I might inform the house that a decision has been reached as to the closing of the cafeteria and restaurant. After consultation with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and other officials of the building it was decided that the cafeteria would be closed all day tomorrow. The restaurant will be open for breakfast and luncheon, but will be closed for dinner. The cafeteria will be open again on Sunday.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Canal services—

464. Administration, $119,043.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if for a few moments I might be permitted to discuss a matter which might have been discussed under the item for departmental administration. I see no other item under which this subject might be properly discussed. For reasons that everyone will suspect, I was not here yesterday. Therefore I was unable to make these observations. If the minister would permit me—

The Chairman: Of course, I do mind; but if it is the consensus that it be done, then perhaps the hon. member might proceed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): If the matter the hon. member wishes to mention is the one I think it is, it could be discussed under one of the air items. There is an appropriation for air services at the various airports in Canada. If the hon. member would not mind, I would prefer to have it that way, because the first item has passed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The matter is not directly connected with air transport, although air services would form part of the subject I wish to discuss. The matter I have in mind really relates to three departments, and requires a degree of co-operation among them. Having regard to the fact that there has been a request from a number of organizations in Edmonton, Saskatoon and on to Winnipeg, by various boards of trade and the like, I should like the opportunity to speak now. I doubt whether what I have to say would be more applicable at a later time than it would be now, if I were permitted to return to item 463, which deals with departmental administration.

The Chairman: I do not think we could return to item 463, because it has been passed. This could not be done unless there were unanimous consent. It often occurs, however, that supplementary estimates are introduced; and if there is a departmental item at that time the hon. member would then have his chance to make his representations or perhaps it could be done under the item to which the minister has referred. I believe it would be easier to do it that way than to do it now.

Mr. Chevrier: It could be discussed under the item for air services.

The Chairman: If that is agreeable to the hon. member, we will proceed to the discussion of item 464, which deals with canal services.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will it be satisfactory to have the discussion then?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already discussed the matter with the minister. When we reach the item to which he referred is it understood that the discussion may take place then?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister indicate the reasons for the total increase of $11,909 in this item. I do not ask for a breakdown into all the various categories, but into main groups. At the same time, how much of the amount appropriated for the previous fiscal year was actually spent?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase in the canal services vote is due almost entirely to increases in salaries. The increases amount to $11,909, of which $7,000 is for increases in rates of pay announced in December, 1951. There is $1,560 for the reclassification of six engineers and $2,088 for one assistant technician, grade II, transferred from the Quebec canal services. A total of $97,400 of last year's estimates was spent.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that $10,000 of last year's estimate was not spent, is the minister satisfied that the total increase is really required?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I believe it is.

Item agreed to.

465. Operation and maintenance, $5,061,650.

Mr. McLure: The first item here shows a deficit in operation of about $4 million and I was wondering what revenue is received from these canals.

Mr. Chevrier: The revenue for the last fiscal year was $1,408,746.

Mr. McLure: That would leave a deficit of about $4 million.

Mr. Chevrier: If you want to consider it in that light.

Mr. McLure: I want to consider it in that light. Later on we will be dealing with another item in connection with which I was never able to establish to my own satisfaction the difference between deficit and service. I understand that this canal item covers a service, and when we come to item 485 I shall want to know the difference between deficit and service.

Mr. Knowles: This item shows an increase of $383,543, and I note from the details that approximately $229,000 is necessary for increases in rates of pay. That leaves a difference of something over $150,000, and I should like the minister to give us the reason for that increase of over $150,000.

Mr. Chevrier: There were annual increases granted to 357 employees amounting to $23,296; other changes in rates and even with a reduction of 15 positions there was a net increase of $13,306; there were replacements for employees granted one week of summer vacation leave after five years in the service which amounted to $15,000; then there was additional labour requirement and increased rates of pay over 1951-52 amounting to $22,267; then there were overtime and increases in relation to the increases in rates of pay authorized during the fiscal year 1951-52, amounting to $10,070; there were also increases in the costs of material and supplies amounting to $37,052; there was an increase in the cost of repairs to buildings, works and equipment amounting to $39,000.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has not answered my question quite in the form in which I put it but perhaps the answer can be put together by examining the figures he has given. When I asked my question I recognized that $229,000 of the increase was for increases in pay.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not deal with that in my reply; I eliminated that.

Mr. Knowles: The figures which the minister gave relate only to the other $154,000?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the same question I asked on the previous item? How much of the 1951-52 vote was actually spent?

Mr. Chevrier: Roughly speaking, $4,600,000.

Mr. Knowles: We have here another case where last year's vote was not spent, yet we are being asked to vote more money this year than was voted last year. The minister probably recalls the compliment which I paid his department when the items were first called the other day. I said that this was a well-run department and that it was a good example of the kind of service the government should render.

At the same time it seems to me that we should be given some detailed explanation as to why we have increases of this kind. It is not my intention to ask this kind of question on every item throughout the entire estimates, but I think on some of them at any rate we should be treated as a committee that has the right to be satisfied, just as the minister has to satisfy the treasury board, as to the reasons for increases of this kind. I press the point in the light of the fact that the total amount of money voted last year was more than was needed; it was not all spent. Yet we are now being asked to vote a greater sum of money. I wonder if the minister would just imagine that he is before the treasury board and justify this increase.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, what must always be kept in mind with reference to these votes is that they are estimates, much the same as the Canadian National Railways estimated budget which is dealt with every year and which never in fact corresponds with the actual expenditures. As a rule the estimate is much higher than the actual expenditure. If I were to make an estimate covering a construction job it might be for $1 million, but by the time the work was done it might cost $1,200,000 because of increases in prices and increased wages. Conversely, there might be savings to the department in connection with some of the items contained in the estimates now before the committee.

There are times when we are short and have to go to treasury board for authorization to take money from one vote and use it under another. That does not happen very often in the department, but from time to time that procedure must be followed. The best explanation I can give is that this is the best judgment the officers of the department can use when preparing the estimates for the following fiscal year, which as a rule is six to seven months prior to the expenditure taking place. Many things can happen during that time to account for a change in cost or a variation of conditions and the like.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the position taken by the minister, but I would point out that although these are only estimates, it is the sum total of these estimates which the Minister of Finance must raise by means of taxation. That means that it is our duty to check these estimates item by item. I wonder if the minister has information available with respect to this item from which he could tell the committee what the experience has been over the past number of years. For example, has this item always been over-estimated during the years the minister has been in charge of the department, or have there been years when it was under-estimated? Has it averaged out from year to year or have we have been voting too much money?

Mr. Chevrier: As a rule it has averaged out much as I have indicated. For instance, in this particular case the expenditure is within 2 per cent of the estimate. Then my hon. friend speaks of the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and what he does. It is true that the Minister of Finance is very careful to take all the water out of these estimates and to make sure that we do not over-estimate, but when you come to an estimate of this amount and it is within 2 per cent that is pretty close estimation. We like to be as accurate as we can but there are times when we fall short of the goal.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the water taken out of the canal or the estimates?

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Knowles: It is possible that the minister has not available the material and information with which to answer the question I asked, but I would appreciate it if he would be prepared, on the assumption that we may still be on his estimates this evening, to pick out some item and deal with it. Let him take the item that has not been concluded at six o'clock and tell us what the experience has been with reference to it over the last six or seven years. Let us get the picture as to the nature of the estimating that is being done. I fully agree that a 2 per cent figure is a very close one, but if there has been an over-estimate of 2 per cent every year it would appear that the time has come to reduce the estimate by 2 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

466. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $4,553,100.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item? I understand that quite a large portion of it is for the construction of two tunnels under the Lachine canal. I should like to have an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: There is just one of these items that is for the construction of a tunnel under the Lachine canal. While it is true that in the original statement I made I referred to both the Atwater and the St. Remi tunnels, I think I did say that the St. Remi tunnel was practically completed, and that only a small portion of this amount was for completion of that tunnel. The larger portion is for the Atwater tunnel under the Lachine canal. It will cost $7 million, and there is provision in these estimates for $2,892,000. One-third of the cost of the project is being paid by the city of Montreal.

With respect to the St. Remi tunnel, these estimates only provide for $30,000 which is the final payment on the project. The total estimated expenditure for that project was $4,200,000, one-third of which was also paid by the city of Montreal.

Mr. Green: Was the St. Remi tunnel also under the Lachine canal?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: On what basis is it decided that these tunnels will be built? Are they highway tunnels running under the canal, or what is the purpose?

Mr. Chevrier: They were built to eliminate swing bridge operations. There was tremendous traffic on St. Remi street which I saw myself in company with officials. The traffic at times was so heavy that cars were lined up for as many as five and six blocks on either side of the swing bridge. The people of that area had to put up with the condition for a long period of time. The city of Montreal made representations to us, and after some time we decided that we would eliminate that traffic bottleneck by building a tunnel under the canal. It was after consultation and agreement with them that it was decided to share the cost on a one-third-two-thirds basis.

Mr. Green: What will be the total cost of the two tunnels?

Mr. Chevrier: $11,500,000.

Mr. Green: I would suggest that the minister go and stand on the Marpole bridge some day and he will probably see a greater traffic jam. It might be a good idea to build a tunnel under the north arm of the Fraser river. It would not cost so much, and I am sure the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia would be only too glad to co-operate. The situation in the case of these Montreal tunnels seems to be somewhat similar to that which exists on the north arm of the Fraser river with respect to the highway leading to and from the airport.

Mr. Chevrier: I have seen the traffic jam there on more than one occasion. It has been brought to my attention by members of the house and a senator who accompanied me on one occasion, but the position there is entirely different from that at Lachine. It is the responsibility of the canal services to provide access over their canals. There is not the same responsibility with respect to the Marpole bridge. There is no canal system there that I am aware of.

Item agreed to.

467. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal services and investigations, $60,000.

Mr. McLure: This is not a large item but there is a large increase over last year. The amount this year is $60,000, an increase of $45,000. I should like the minister to give a short explanation of the item. It seems to be mostly composed of travelling expenses. There is an increase of $29,000 in travelling expenses. I should also like to know what is involved in professional services where there is also a large increase. Then there is a small amount for sundries which shows an increase of $2,500.

Mr. Chevrier: The large increase is due to the appointment of the board of engineers under legislation passed by the house with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway project. A board of engineers was appointed whose duties are to co-ordinate the application of the province of Ontario to the international joint commission. The board of engineers has been sitting fairly regularly since this appointment in an effort to co-ordinate the application to be made by Ontario to the international joint commission.

Mr. Green: What is the membership of that board?

Mr. Chevrier: The members of the board are Mr. R. A. C. Henry, the chairman, Mr. Guy Lindsay, director of special projects, Department of Transport; Mr. Norman Marr of the water surveys branch of the Department of Resources and Development; Mr. West, who has just left the chair; Mr. Rene Dupuis, who represents the Quebec hydro commission; and Mr. R. L. Hearn who represents the Ontario hydro commission.

Mr. Green: What steps have been taken to set up the St. Lawrence seaway authority?

Mr. Chevrier: No steps have been taken to set up the authority because it has been deemed advisable to wait for the formal application of the two governments to the international joint commission before appointing the authority.

Mr. Green: I can find no other vote in the estimates which has any connection with the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I take it this is the only vote, and that would indicate that there is unlikely to be very much progress made during the present fiscal year with the St. Lawrence seaway plan. I hope I am wrong.

Mr. Chevrier: You are.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could give us some further information.

Mr. Chevrier: The fact that there is no other vote in these estimates concerning the St. Lawrence seaway is not at all an indication that there is likely to be no progress. On the contrary, I would say that progress has been remarkably good with our neighbours to the south. Following the appointment of the board of engineers, the representatives of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec met and agreed upon the form of application which should go to the international joint commission.

Mr. Green: That is for the power project.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Later the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself visited the White House at Washington where we were given the assurance by the President of the United States that he would join with us in an application to the international joint commission for the development of power, it being understood of course that Canada would undertake to develop the navigational facilities on its side of the line. That we did undertake by means of an exchange of notes.

Mr. Green: Have they been tabled?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know. Then, a group or team composed of legal experts and engineers representing Canada went to Washington, and there discussed with an opposite team the details concerning the United States application to the international joint commission. Those talks have been going on extremely satisfactorily.

Now, there are still some difficult points to iron out, and the committees are negotiating with each other. I am unable to say when it will be possible to file the application with the commission, but I trust it will be soon.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: The application to which the minister refers is an application for permission to instal a power project as distinct from the seaway, is it not?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: What progress has been made with regard to the seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: With regard to the seaway, a large part of the work was in part completed under the original plans, and meanwhile the officers of the Department of Transport, the special projects branch under Mr. Guy Lindsay, are proceeding with plans for the completion of the canal. There have been a number of sites considered for the location of the canal. Borings have been practically completed, or they have been started if they are not completed, to determine the nature of the soil in the vicinity of the area where locks will be constructed. If the international joint commission were, for instance, to decide tomorrow in favour of the joint power project, our plans are in such shape that they could be completed in a fairly short period of time to allow us to go ahead with the navigational features.

But I would remind the hon. member that the navigational features could not be completed or begun, for that matter, until the main dam at the Long Sault, the control dam at Iroquois and the power houses at Maple Grove were completed.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention of the government to wait for some further time in the hope that the United States government will agree to the joint seaway scheme?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that I can answer that except in this manner. We are negotiating with the United States now in the hope that it will be possible to iron out the details of the joint application to the international joint commission for the power project.

Mr. Green: There is no intention of Canada going it alone with regard to the seaway at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, that is what I have been saying all along. I hope I have not left any other impression. That is the object of launching the joint application with the United States to the international joint commission, that is for the development of power. We have given the assurance that if that is approved by the international joint commission we will proceed with the navigational features.

Mr. Green: In what vote do we find the expenditures for these borings? They could not be in this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, in this vote, in which there is a $45,000 increase, and that provides for the expenditures of the joint board of engineers. There is no other vote providing for additional expenditures for plans for the navigational features to which I referred. The supplementary estimates will be tabled later, and if progress is such as to warrant a vote in those estimates we will have that done.

Mr. Green: I bring that up because these borings and other preliminary work to which the minister referred cannot be very extensive if the whole of that expenditure, as well as the expenditures of this board, are covered in the $60,000 item which we are now considering.

Mr. Chevrier: I would remind the hon. member that most of the personnel are permanent employees of the government and are being paid under other votes. This covers telegrams, telephones, office expenditures, and so on to some extent.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

468. Marine services administration, including agencies, $571,414.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask the minister how many steamers are operating in this service in the maritime provinces. I should like to ask also whether the coast guard service comes under this item or items 469 or 470.

Mr. Chevrier: May I answer those two questions under the next vote?

Mr. Green: Is this not the branch of the minister's department which has charge of the search and rescue work?

Mr. Chevrier: No, the Minister of Transport is no longer responsible for this work. It has been transferred to the Department of National Defence, R.C.A.F., search and rescue branch. It was assigned to them following an investigation made by a committee on which the Canadian maritime commission was represented and which was then under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Clyne, and the recommendation, which was adopted by the government, was that the service would be better looked after by the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Green: The Department of Transport has some responsibility, because on page 9 of the last annual report of the department it is stated that departmental vessels, both large and small, form part of a fleet of some 200 government operated ships which have been co-ordinated into a general marine search and rescue system in Canada, and which co-operate with the R.C.A.F. and civilian aerial search work. What we would like to know is what part the Department of Transport plays in that work.

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of Transport plays the same part as any other departments that own or operate ships. The initiation of search and rescue operations lies with the R.C.A.F. They call upon the various ships of government departments, as they call upon us, and we would go to the assistance of a distressed vessel if our ship happened to be close to the scene at the time; that is the extent of the responsibility of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: For example, in January of this year there was a plane crash just off the airstrip at Sandspit. Most of the occupants of the plane lost their lives. Some were rescued by a small boat which put out from the shore. The accident occurred within a comparatively short distance of the shore, and there was severe criticism of the government owing to the fact there was no crash boat at that airstrip. That, of course, would seem to be the responsibility of the Department of Transport. I am wondering whether steps have been taken since that accident to have some lifesaving service established, because the airstrip is in a position where an accident of this kind might easily occur and it is used quite frequently. This was a tragic disaster, and those lives might have been saved had there been a crash boat there.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know whether or not I made myself clear a moment ago. To what I said perhaps I should have added this. There are across Canada places where the Royal Canadian Air Force maintains certain air rescue operation centres. From those centres it works by radio, by telegraph, and by telephone the moment it is advised of a casualty. I know something of the disaster to which my hon. friend refers because it was brought to my attention by the air services branch of the department. It was unfortunate that at the time there was no vessel that could go to the rescue of this plane immediately. Notwithstanding that, I think the air force had planes in the air to see what could be done to assist those who were in danger. The recommendation of the committee, however, was that the R.C.A.F. would co-ordinate the services of all departments. We try to serve at their direction.

The hon. member will recall that we discussed coastguard services at some length, but we felt that this perhaps would be the better of the two alternatives, having regard to the cost of maintaining and building cutters. It is true that it does not work out well in all circumstances; but I can refer to other cases in which it has been exceedingly helpful to have our ships in the vicinity of an accident. One never knows when or where an accident is going to strike. We do our best to meet the situation.

Mr. Green: Has a crash boat been placed at Sandspit airport since the accident? In this particular accident these people got out of the plane. They apparently got out of the cabin of the airplane and then it gradually sank. Eventually nearly all of them lost their lives. The only ones who were rescued were picked up by some ordinary rowboat or some sort of home-made affair which happened to be available on the shore. I would hope that by this time some lifeboat has been placed there. Perhaps the minister could tell us what the situation is. He knows the place in question is on the Queen Charlotte islands in an isolated spot. If a lifeboat has not been put there since, I hope it will be possible to have one put there without much further delay.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask my hon. friend to await the answer to that question until the air service officers are here? I am not able to say of my own knowledge.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

469. Marine service steamers—administration, $63,435.

Mr. McLure: The minister was going to answer my question on item 469.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member was anxious to get a list of our ships in the maritime provinces. They are as follows: In the Newfoundland agency, the Sea Beacon; in the Dartmouth agency, the Bernier, the Cornwallis, the Lady Laurier, the Halifax harbour launch and the Sambro, lightship No. 15 and the lightship No. 14; in the Charlottetown agency, the Brant and the Sorel; in the Saint John, New Brunswick, agency the Dollard, the Franklin and the Lurcher No. 2.

I think the other question of my hon. friend has been answered already.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the Sea Beacon the boat that was being built last year? Is that a new boat?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Marine service steamers—

470. Operation, maintenance and repairs, $4,670,783.

Mr. Pearkes: I think this is the right item under which to raise a question I am anxious to speak about, namely the damage to one of the weather ships which occurred during the winter storms last year on the Pacific. One of the vessels was damaged, and I believe it has been partially repaired. The point I want to make is that the crews of these vessels suffer a great deal of hardship owing to the exposed nature of their work. The station is in the middle of the Pacific, in difficult climatic conditions. During the storm I understand that the crew of the vessel had an exceedingly trying experience. It has been suggested that better accommodation could be provided on the ship itself. I know of the good work which the crews of these ships are doing. They are rendering a valuable service. All sorts of agencies rely upon the weather report. I also know, however, of the unpleasant nature of their task, in that they are stationed in the middle of the ocean and are obliged to put up with very inclement weather. I would ask whether any consideration is being given to the matter of whether it is possible to improve the living quarters and general facilities on these weather ships whose crews endure great hardship during winter storms.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree with my hon. friend that the life of those who have to stay for long periods of the year on lightships is sometimes a monotonous one. I visited a lightship at the mouth of the Saguenay—

Mr. Pearkes: I was referring to weather ships.

Mr. Chevrier: I know that; but the lightship at the mouth of the Saguenay gives to the layman some idea of the life of people who are stationed on such ships. My hon. friend referred to a lightship on the west coast.

Mr. Pearkes: I was speaking about weather ships.

Mr. Green: Out in the middle of the Pacific.

Mr. Pearkes: One of those ships that the minister inspected about two years ago, as he will recall, when it was moved.

Mr. Chevrier: The position of the crew has been substantially bettered by the vote which we had in the estimates last year and part of which I believe is in this estimate. That is the one which provides for an alternate ship, the St. Stephen, which will be based at Victoria. It will be a sort of stand-by ship and will enable those who are out some 500 miles northwest of Victoria, in the other two weather ships, to be relieved from time to time. Provision has been made for recreational facilities, and living conditions for the men are being considered from time to time by the superintendent of marine services. I know it is a rather monotonous life; in fact, it is a monotonous life. We try to make it as interesting as possible and as I said before we have now provided three ships to operate the weather station.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not so much the monotony of the life to which I refer. I believe that the conditions are almost hazardous during the winter storms. If the minister will look into the matter and see whether something cannot be done to improve the actual conditions of the crew while they are on stations, I should be glad. I know that everything possible is done when they come back into port. But while they are actually on stations I suggest that, from the information I have received, improvements can be brought about in their condition. I hope the minister will look into the matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): At page 521, in the details of services there is an item, "charter of aircraft for aerial ice survey, $15,000". Can the minister tell me what those aircraft are used for and where they are based?

Mr. Chevrier: Those aircraft are for the survey of ice in the Atlantic. The object of these surveys is to ascertain what the ice conditions are so that our people can have some idea of when navigation is likely to open.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where are those aircraft based?

Mr. Chevrier: They are based at Charlottetown.

Item agreed to.

471. Construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment, as detailed in the estimates—capital, $4,351,000.

Mr. Green: In this vote there is an increase of nearly $2 million. It has been practically doubled since last year. Can the minister explain why that was necessary?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This is due exclusively to a program of new ships. I dealt with it in my original statement, but briefly it is due to an item of $3,770,000 which is entirely new, which we expect to spend this year on the ice breaker which is now under construction at the Davie shipbuilding yard at Lauzon. It is also due to an item of $300,000 for a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the Saint John, New Brunswick, agency, which will cost $2,200,000. We do not think it will be possible to spend more than that amount on the Saint John vessel this year, that is, more than $300,000. Then there is for construction and acquisition of equipment for repairs to the Lady Laurier and certain installations the sum of $246,000, which totals up to $4,351,000.

Mr. Green: The equipment item on page 521 of $246,000 is just about ten times the amount voted last year. Why should there be that increase for equipment?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it is not an increase in equipment so much as it is for repairs. For instance, for the reconditioning and fitting of the Lady Laurier, there is $150,000. That is more than an ordinary item, because the Lady Laurier is in pretty bad shape, which my hon. friend would know if he had seen it. She is an old ship, and will have to be replaced in due course, but we feel that if we spend this amount upon her it will keep her in operation for some time.

There is $45,000 being provided for five radar installations; $8,000 for two echo sounders; $3,000 for three radiotelephones, and two generators, which will cost $40,000.

Aids to navigation—

472. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,819,338.

Mr. Green: I notice there have been a great many lightkeepers let out, or they may have been transferred to some other work. Can the minister explain why that was done, and also what disposition was made of these men?

Mr. Chevrier: Most of the men who have been let out were assistants to the head lightkeepers who are civil servants. They were under contract and not really civil servants or employees in the strict sense of the word. They were contractors. Some positions have been re-established, but others have been dropped.

Item agreed to.

Aids to navigation—

473. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $1,439,210.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On aids to navigation, when speaking the other evening I drew the attention of the minister —and I wrote to him last year—to the entrance into Flower's Cove, where there are posts sticking up, one on an island and one on the land, a very primitive arrangement for entering into a harbour. Has anything been done to improve that situation since?

Mr. Chevrier: I have a memorandum covering my hon. friend's point, which he raised earlier, but unfortunately I cannot lay my hands on it. Perhaps I can give it to him a little later on.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When I wrote to the department I got an answer back saying that nothing could be done to it during the current year—that is last year. It seems to me that the expenditure will not be very heavy, and it might be the means of saving a ship some day. That is a very bad port, with a lot of shoals around, and the captain has to be very careful going in. He cannot go right inside. There are just two poles sticking up at the present time, and not very high. He asked me particularly to draw the attention of the minister to this matter, and I hope he will give it consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I have it now. Representations were made on behalf of the master of the Northern Ranger that range lights be established at Flower's Cove to mark the anchorage.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: The captain of the ship discussed the matter with the agent at St. John's, Newfoundland. He pointed out that the light maintained at Capstan Point would be much more useful if moved to Harbour Rock. That is being done. He also recommended that in addition range lights should be established, and that is being considered for next year.

Mr. Stick: I made representation last year to the department about navigation lights going into Bay Roberts harbour. I understand it is to be carried out this year. I do not know whether that has been done yet or not.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to tell my hon. friend whether it is in this year's estimates or not, but I can assure him, in view of his representations, it will be carefully considered, and if it is not in these estimates perhaps consideration can be given to putting it into the supplementaries.

Mr. Stick: It is only a small item. I think the cost would be in the vicinity of $1,000. A great deal of shipping goes in and out of there all the time, and it is vitally necessary for navigation.

Mr. Dickey: I do not want to hold up the committee, but I should like to express a word of appreciation of the consideration that the officers of the department who deal with these matters of aids to navigation give to the representations that are made by the fishermen and others who depend on these aids. The officers do not always agree with the requests that are made, but it has been my experience that they always give them very fair and considered attention, and that certainly in most cases, even if they cannot meet the requests in full, they find some acceptable compromise that meets the situation.

There is one phase of the matter that I think could be given some consideration, and that is the maintenance contracts for spar buoys and other small aids to navigation. These services are carried out by the people of the areas concerned under arrangements made by the department. I think in most cases the amounts paid under present conditions are not sufficiently high. The individuals supply their own materials and there have been increases in cost of paint and that sort of thing. I know that the minister and the department have been giving attention to this matter, but I would urge that the whole matter be given careful consideration to see whether some slightly higher scale could be brought into effect for this year.

Mr. Green: The minister did not explain why it was necessary to increase item 473. It is more than double.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I explained that it was because of the new program for ships.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Item 473 is different.

Mr. Chevrier: The large project of the ice breaker for the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: That is not item 473.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The details are given on page 524 of the estimates.

Mr. Green: It reads:

Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment.

Details are found at the bottom of page 524.

Mr. Chevrier: There is a substantial increase there, due to the construction of a pier and tower at Gross Cap reef on lake Superior, twelve miles above Sault Ste. Marie, at a cost of $350,000, and the Agency wharf at Halifax is being rehabilitated at a cost of $180,000, and work is being done at Quebec at a cost of $70,000. That makes up the total of the increase.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is the one on lake Superior?

Mr. Chevrier: Twelve miles west of Sault Ste. Marie.

Item agreed to.

Nautical services—

474. Administration, $158,952.

Mr. Green: I believe the training of merchant seamen comes under this item. What plans are now in effect for the training of young merchant seamen? Is there still any rehabilitation of merchant seamen who served in the last war?

Mr. Chevrier: We are contributing certain sums of money to the training of merchant seamen at Vancouver, Halifax, Yarmouth, Saint John, New Brunswick, and in addition St. John's, Newfoundland.

Mr. Green: On what basis is that done? Does the department contribute to a vocational training school, does it operate a training school of its own—or just what is the program? How many young men are being trained in this work?

Mr. Chevrier: We pay 50 per cent of the cost of operation of the schools. I am informed the provinces operate the schools. I have not the numbers available.

Mr. Green: Could the minister get that information?

Mr. Chevrier: I can, and I shall send it to the hon. member in writing. We will have to get the information from the provinces.

Mr. Green: Is the scheme sufficiently broad to ensure a steady stream of young men qualifying for service in the merchant navy?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that it is. I have in mind one school I visited last summer. It appeared to be up to date. They have a number of students whom they train to serve as able-bodied seamen, engineers and for other divisions of the merchant navy, including masters, mates and the like. We make a contribution to the operation of the schools. Sometimes we help in the provision of equipment. I was informed by the director of the school I visited that there are more than enough young men going through there to provide for the demands of that district.

Mr. Green: Which district was that?

Mr. Chevrier: That was Quebec. I visited the school in Vancouver three years ago, and I believe it is one of the most up to date in Canada. It is operated on the basis of a contribution from the federal government. While I do not know of the exact position in Vancouver, I believe I would know if a satisfactory number of merchant seamen was not being provided, because the shipping companies would call upon us for assistance.

Mr. Green: Are there still some veterans of the recent war taking training?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed there are still a small number.

Mr. Green: Is the scheme being closed off?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I had intended to ask what was being done in Newfoundland, but I thought that would come under the next vote.

Mr. Chevrier: It would; but I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Item agreed to.

475. Operation and maintenance, including grants and contributions, as detailed in the estimates; rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidies to salvage companies, and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 296 of the Canada Shipping Act, $318,364.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not see any amount here for Newfoundland. Is there one? I see one for Vancouver and another for Kingston.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed there is no vote here for Newfoundland. Negotiations are being concluded with the provincial government for the establishment of such a school. That is why it is not here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to know the details. Is it just by correspondence?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What does the minister mean when he says that arrangements have been made?

Mr. Chevrier: I was saying, in effect, that negotiations had been entered into with the provincial government, and my understanding is that they have been concluded. I do not know what the terms of the arrangement are. I would presume however that they would be the same as in the other provinces, namely that Newfoundland would establish a school, maintain and operate it, and we would make a contribution to the extent of 50 per cent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Let me advise the minister that we have had a school down there for many years, one which was operated by the Dominion of Newfoundland, when it was a dominion. We had a much higher standing than exists in other schools of navigation in Canada. Our masters had tickets from the board of trade in London, and those tickets are rated higher than the Canadian ticket. Does the minister expect there will be a vote for Newfoundland in this connection in the supplementary estimates this year? Does he expect negotiations will be concluded in time for that?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say at the moment; but if they are concluded I can assure my hon. friend that there will be an item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The school down there has been operating for a number of years and has been doing remarkable work. It would be useful if encouragement were given.

Mr. McLure: In item 475 there is reference to rewards for saving life from vessels in distress. Did I understand the minister to say that the Atlantic coastguard service does not come under his jurisdiction.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. McLure: I believe the matter about which I shall now speak would come under the minister's jurisdiction. Last winter, it will be recalled, the Winnie Anne was lost off the coast of Nova Scotia on January 28. The gallant crew of the Gladys E. Sweeney, under Captain Ernest Wilson, went to the rescue of the Winnie Anne, when none of the coastguard boats would venture out. Captain Wilson and his crew, in one of the worst storms ever known on the Atlantic coast, had no difficulty in getting a crew and manning the Gladys E. Sweeney. At the risk of their own lives they snatched from the jaws of death the captain and crew of the Winnie Anne. Had they had proper gear, such as the coastal service should have, they could have saved the Winnie Anne. What is going to be done for the captain and his men?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to look into the case which my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the committee. I remember having seen something in the press about it, but I am not familiar with the details. I shall be glad to look into it and perhaps I can tell him later what provisions if any can be made to cover this case.

Mr. Catherwood: I notice that there is a decrease in this item and I hope that does not mean a lessening of the services with respect to the protection of our seamen.

Mr. Chevrier: The decrease is brought about by the dropping of eight positions. These positions have been abolished because schools have been established and it is not necessary to carry these instructors.

Mr. Catherwood: There will be no lessening of the service?

Mr. Chevrier: It will not affect the service at all.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is an item in the details of $13,200 for professional and special services; what does that cover?

Mr. Chevrier: That is for the payment of legal fees, assessors' fees and court reporters' fees in connection with investigations held under the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Gillis: Would the minister satisfy my curiosity about the meaning of the phrase "and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen."

Mr. Chevrier: Section 296, subsection 5, of the Canada Shipping Act reads:

(5) For the purpose of this section, excepted expenses are expenses incurred in cases where the certificate of the proper authority obtained on leaving a seaman behind states, or the minister is otherwise satisfied, that the cause of the seaman left behind is desertion, or disappearance, or imprisonment for misconduct, or discharge from his ship by a naval court on the ground of misconduct, and expenses incurred on account of the return to a proper return port of a distressed seaman who has been discharged at the port at which he was shipped, or at some neighbouring port.

Mr. Gillis: A seaman who belongs to Vancouver may be stranded in London and be shipped back to Halifax and still be as far away from home as ever, since he would have approximately 4,000 miles still to go. We have had people ask for donations to help someone who belongs to Vancouver but who has been landed in Halifax. Would not repatriation in this case mean repatriation to the seaman's home port rather than landing a man who belong to Vancouver at Halifax or a man who belongs to Halifax at Vancouver? If the department assumes responsibility under the act to repatriate a seaman from some other part of the world, should it not also be responsible to see that he gets back to his home port?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that it would be covered by the articles of agreement. If he signed articles at Vancouver, he would be repatriated there if he did not come under the exceptions in section 296. Otherwise he would be repatriated to the port where he had been taken on.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are there regulations under that section? A master might declare a man to be a deserter when he was not a deserter in fact. A master might dislike a seaman, put him ashore and say that he was a deserter, and log him as a deserter.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that there are no regulations, that the matter is governed exclusively by the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much money was spent last year out of this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: It is not broken down in such a way that I could tell my hon. friend, but I will find out and give it to him later.

Item agreed to.

476. Pilotage service, including authority for temporary recoverable advances not exceeding $20,000, $421,264.

Mr. McLure: Has the department considered providing a small tug in connection with the pilotage service at Charlottetown, or is this service to be conducted under the same old system?

Mr. Chevrier: This vote provides for pilotage service and other assistance to pilotage districts in Montreal, Halifax, Saint John, Sydney, Quebec and Vancouver. There are many pilotage operations in Canada which are not carried on under districts. These places have their own pilotage commissions, and this applies to Charlottetown.

Item agreed to.

477. Steamship inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $543,764.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice on page 10 of the report of the department for 1951 reference is made to the board of steamship inspection, and this statement is made:

> Similarly, meetings have been held with a view of applying the provisions of the regulations to sealing vessels and other ships used in Newfoundland.

The minister may remember that the other evening I referred to fears that are current in Newfoundland that sealing vessels are going to be put out of business through the strict enforcement of the regulations. Has the minister anything to say on that point?

Mr. Chevrier: The new steamship regulations will apply also to Newfoundland. I am informed that our steamship inspectors have been in negotiation with the operators of small vessels in Newfoundland and our understanding is that they are perfectly satisfied with the method we are going to adopt in bringing these regulations into effect.

Mr. Green: I note that there is an increase in this item of $82,356. Can the minister explain this increase?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase in rates of pay announced in December, 1951, amount to $31,000; $68,817 is for 67 annual increases; $33,768 is the additional cost of eight added positions of ship inspectors. My hon. friend will remember that representations were made for additional ship inspectors during the last discussion of the estimates of the Department of Transport. These are the inspectors who will be required and provision is made for them. Not all of the eight have been employed yet but that is the estimate that we expect that we will have to pay. Basic salary rate increases for specific classes due to changes in classification of ship inspectors amount to $3,670, and there is a decrease of $899 for other net salary decreases which brings about the total increase to be found in the estimates.

Mr. Green: Were these additional inspectors required because of the new fire regulations which resulted from the Noronic disaster?

Mr. Chevrier: In part, and also for other reasons.

Mr. Green: What is the position now with regard to the enforcement of these new fire regulations?

Mr. Chevrier: I would have to take some time to deal with that fully, but to respond briefly to my hon. friend, we have put into effect all the recommendations of the Kellock commission which followed the Noronic disaster, and we have put into effect some of the recommendations of the Choquette investigation following the disaster involving one of the Canada Steamship Lines ships in the province of Quebec some time ago. As the house will remember, these recommendations were fairly stringent. They imposed the responsibility on ship owners of spending considerable sums of money in order to instal sprinkler systems, fireproof bulkheads, and fire alarm systems. All the operators on the west coast, the great lakes and the St. Lawrence and on the east coast have complied with the regulations.

Mr. Catherwood: How often are inspections made of these ships with respect to fire protection facilities? Are they made periodically each year?

Mr. Chevrier: They are made or should be made practically every time a ship comes into port.

Mr. Stick: In Newfoundland we have what is known as the Lloyd's surveyor. When a ship is damaged he examines it to see if it is seaworthy for insurance purposes. Would his inspection be accepted by the inspectors operating under our regulations?

Mr. Chevrier: Our ship inspector will accept the survey of the Lloyd's surveyor because that firm is recognized throughout the world. There is another firm whose survey or recommendations our inspector accepts, but the name escapes me at the moment.

Mr. Stick: Will Lloyd's accept our inspection? We have inspectors to inspect ships. Would Lloyd's have to survey them or would they accept our inspection?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand they accept our inspection.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have you an inspector in St. John's?

Mr. Chevrier: We have.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Then there is no need for a Lloyd's surveyor there now. I take it you have taken over the position.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is some ships are registered with Lloyd's and other ships are not. We send our own inspector to inspect them.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you know who your inspector is there?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I will have to get the name for you.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel service—

479. Administration, operation and maintenance, $981,300.

Mr. Knowles: Item 479 is one where there is a decrease. I note that the decrease of $440,000 odd has been achieved despite the fact that there is an increase of $5,200 for increases in rates of pay, with which I agree. Would the minister indicate the basis of this commendable accomplishment? Does it set a pattern that he might have followed in connection with other items?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I might take this opportunity to congratulate the new deputy chairman who has just taken the chair. I take pleasure in doing so not only because he is an able colleague in the house but because he was also a classmate of mine at Osgoode Hall. Nothing pleases me more than to see him occupy this position. I know how successful he was as a student in those days, and I am sure he will preside over our deliberations with fairness and with equal success. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was inquiring as to the reason for the decrease. In the last supplementary estimates we included an amount of approximately $500,000 for maintenance dredging. It was not found necessary to include that item this time, and that accounts for the decrease.

Mr. Knowles: Was that sum of money expended last time?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it was.

Mr. Green: Would the minister give the committee some more detailed information concerning the votes for the St. Lawrence ship channel? Referring to the annual report of the department, I find that the ship channel is 200 miles long and extends from Montreal to below the island of Orleans. I note that it has a depth of 35 feet. I do not know what moneys are voted by the Department of Transport for this channel and what moneys are voted by the Department of Public Works, but perhaps the minister could give us the over-all picture of the situation. Apparently items 479, 480 and 481 all deal with the St. Lawrence ship channel.

Mr. Chevrier: Vote 479 is for the administration of the ship channel. Some years ago a branch was set up within the Department of Transport to deal with the maintenance of the ship channel. The channel is now dredged from a point thirty miles below Quebec city to the harbour of Montreal to an approximate depth of 35 feet. It is not fully that but it is almost 35 feet. Various committees have recommended improvement of the channel from time to time. It was not nearly as deep or wide five, ten or fifteen years ago as it is now. Provision has been made for that. That is taken care of in another vote, but this vote is for the purpose of administration expenses, including salaries of the headquarters organization. There are eighteen members of the technical, engineering and office staffs. Connected with the operation of the ship channel is the operation and maintenance of four inspection survey vessels, including the Ernest Lapointe, for a period of seven months of the year, also three sounding scows and two stone lifters, with a total of 104 full-time and seasonal crew members. Then for maintenance dredging under contract there is the sum of $400,000. Then there is maintenance of beacons and gauges for the ship channel, and expenses of dredging inspectors on the contractor's dredging equipment for which there is the sum of $12,200 odd. That first vote, number 479, deals with the administration of the ship channel.

The next vote is a contract capital vote, and by that I mean that a contract is given by the Department of Transport to widen the channel and build anchorages. For instance, after a Department of Transport committee had for some months given consideration as to whether or not the channel should be widened, additional anchorages provided and the channel deepened in certain areas, it was recommended to the department that a contract involving a certain list of work which is mentioned in the next vote be let. I referred to that in my opening remarks on the discussion of my estimates. This contract has since been awarded to Marine Industries Limited of Sorel for approximately $12 million. The work will be performed, I believe, at the rate of a quarter each year over a period of four years. I am informed that it is over a period of five years.

Mr. Green: What is the total amount for that contract dredging?

Mr. Chevrier: The total amount is $13,021,000. Perhaps I might give the committee the places where the work is going to be done, as recommended by the committee. At Bellmouth Curve, there is 1,100,000 cubic yards of dredging material to be removed; at Ste. Anne, 1,900,000 cubic yards; at the head of lake St. Peter, 475,000 cubic yards; Nicolet-Port St. Francis, 1,750,000 cubic yards; Cap de la Madeleine, 400,000 cubic yards; Becancour shoals, 140,000 cubic yards; Bastiscan, 1,500,000 cubic yards; Grondines channel, 800,000 cubic yards; St. Antoine, 222,000 cubic yards; St. Augustin, 650,000 cubic yards: making a total of 8,937,000 cubic yards of material which is to be removed.

Then, the last vote under this section provides for work contemplated for 1952 by the St. Lawrence ship canal and the Montreal harbour committee in the nature of subsurface exploration and rock boring in the main river channel near the De Boucherville islands.

Mr. Green: I thank the minister for that information. It is quite clear that there are large sums of money being spent now, and to be spent, in order to keep this ship channel 200 miles long dredged out, to widen it and make various improvements. Naturally, as those improvements are made the annual cost of dredging will increase, because there will be a much bigger area to keep in shape. I am not quarrelling with that at all, because there is no doubt that Montreal is one of our great ports. I presume it is as a result of this expenditure in pursuance of this plan that the Empress of Scotland was able to come up the river from Quebec within the last few days and dock at Montreal. I understand that she is the largest passenger vessel, probably the largest vessel of any kind, that has ever been able to make that trip.

Of course, this is a good thing for Montreal, but it is rather hard on the port of Quebec. I am surprised that Quebec has not made some protest about it.

Mr. Chevrier: They have. They came up here in a delegation.

Mr. Green: However, I would point out that the port of Montreal—I am quoting now from the national harbours board report for the year 1951—had a total of 4,423 incoming vessels in the year 1951, of which 1,188 were deep-sea vessels and 3,159 were coastal or inland commercial vessels including fishing boats, and 76 are described as "others". The total tonnage handled in Montreal harbour last year amounted to 14,917,040 tons, and the total grain receipts amounted to 110,143,566 bushels. I bring those figures out because there is a similar problem arising on the west coast with regard to Canada's other great harbour. I refer, of course, to the harbour of Vancouver. Here in the east we have millions of dollars being spent to maintain a harbour at Montreal, and with that I am not quarrelling. The minister said that under this plan there are to be capital expenditures of between $13 million and $14 million, and in addition to that there is the huge annual expenditure for dredging.

The port of Vancouver has more ships incoming and outgoing than the port of Montreal. The figures for last year show a total of 30,789 incoming, as compared with Montreal's 4,423. We had 1,231 ocean-going ships, as compared with Montreal's 1,188. In cargo tonnage we were somewhat smaller, our figure being 11,157,900 tons as compared with the 14,917,040 tons for Montreal. With regard to grain, the figures for Vancouver are 88,156,729 bushels as against more than 110 million bushels for Montreal. These two ports handle by far the largest proportion of the grain. They are far ahead of all the other ports in Canada put together in business handled.

Unfortunately, we have only a 35 foot channel through the narrows into Vancouver harbour and in order to accommodate the largest ships, and particularly the largest new tankers, we have to have the harbour entrance dredged a further 5 feet.

When I raised this matter the other night, the minister said he was not sure whether his department had made any representations to the Department of Public Works. Perhaps he has been able to check up on that in the meantime. I cannot urge too strongly that the Department of Transport make strong representations to the Department of Public Works that this dredging be undertaken at the earliest possible moment.

I would hope that a vote could be included in the supplementary estimates so we will not lose another year. We expect to have an oil pipe-line terminus built in the Vancouver area shortly, and there are plans for tank farms on the harbour shores. Unless these tankers can go in through the narrows, the port is going to be severely handicapped. As I said, I do not quarrel with Montreal. I am glad to see that they have their development. I feel sorry for the port of Quebec. I think it has had a pretty raw deal down through the years. It is a great tragedy—and it is brought home to me whenever I go to that most interesting city in Canada—that so much of the water traffic has passed it by and gone to Montreal.

On the west coast we have this extremely serious situation with which I am sure the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond will agree, as these tank farms are to be installed in his riding. I hope the minister will make representations to his colleague about this dredging and that we can expect something to be done along that line.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not able to say a great deal the other evening because the members of the harbours board were in Vancouver. They had been there for some weeks on a regular inspection trip. I will find out what the position is. They have probably discussed it with the port manager. Perhaps I can have something to say when we get on the national harbours board item later on.

Mr. Green: May I point out to the minister that the distance to be dredged is not great. It would not be more than half or perhaps three-quarters of a mile. The cost is small change compared with the money that is being spent in keeping up and developing the port of Montreal.

Mr. Goode: I would bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the tank farm of the Trans Mountain oil line will be situated in my riding and that there is a situation with regard to the second narrows bridge. I fully agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he points out the seriousness of the situation with regard to the first narrows bridge. The minister has said that he will make an investigation into the matter, and will refer to it under another item. But the matter goes a little further than that.

The situation at the second narrows bridge in Vancouver harbour will most materially affect the Trans Mountain oil line. As the minister knows, it is practically impossible to bring a ship of any size through that bridge at the moment. I understand there are some plans in the process of formulation whereby boats are to be taken through there. But I point out to the minister that these supposed tankers of some 40,000 tons that are to come into Vancouver harbour will not be able to approach the termini of the Trans Mountain oil line, a situation which will mean considerable extra expense to the company. When we come to the national harbours board part of the minister's estimates I hope we shall be able to discuss that matter a little more fully.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When was this contract for $30 million made with Marine Industries in Sorel?

Mr. Chevrier: A month or so ago. I announced it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The new contract?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Catherwood: Has this company, Marine Industries Limited, begun operations yet on this contract?

Mr. Chevrier: Not yet, no.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Dickey.]

Railway and steamship services—

482. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $54,700.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This is an annual item that is put in the estimates for the cost of operation, maintenance, running repairs and general overhaul of five official railway cars. These cars are assigned to the Department of Transport for administrative services. Cars Nos. 1 and 2 are for the use of the governor general. Car No. 100 is assigned to the Prime Minister. Car No. 101 is assigned to the cabinet ministers and distinguished visitors. Car No. 104 is assigned to the Minister of Transport. There are seven car stewards paid from this appropriation, and it may be broken down as follows: total salaries, $21,200; materials and supplies, $4,000; repairs and upkeep of equipment, $27,500; sundries, $2,000. There is an increase of $2,700 which is attributable almost exclusively to increases in salaries and cost of materials.

Mr. Green: Surely this is one place where there could be some saving. As I remember it, we had only four of these cars a year or two ago.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no. The position with reference to these cars has not changed since I have been in the Department of Transport, and I am sure there was no change for a long time before that. There are five cars.

Mr. Green: I have no quarrel with the cars for the governor general and for the Prime Minister; but why on earth should we have to have a car for the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Gibson: Is there no gravy at all in this job?

Mr. Green: Or why should we have one for the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, I have no car.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works has a right to the use of one. The ministers get in this car and ride around the country any time they want to, and so do other members of the cabinet. We have travelling expenses. We have the cabinet going by air. When the Minister of Transport travels, I imagine he usually goes by air. When the Minister of National Defence travels, he seems to go by R.C.A.F. I suggest that the time has come to take another look at this vote. We are apparently keeping these five cars and keeping the staffs. In addition to that, somebody has to pay for hauling these cars on the railways.

Mr. Chevrier: They are hauled by the railways at their expense.

Mr. Green: Do the railways have to haul them free?

Mr. Chevrier: They do not have to do it, but they do it.

Mr. Green: There is no provision, legally, under which the railways must haul these cars free, but they do it as a courtesy?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: I do not want to hurt the feelings of the Minister of Transport, but I suggest that ordinary cabinet ministers could just as well travel by drawing room.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On foot.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the Minister of Public Works could go by foot. If he does not have a few more bridges built, he will have to swim.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could do that too.

Mr. Green: I suggest that this is an unnecessary expense and that this item, instead of being increased, should be cut down.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra should be given further consideration. I wonder whether we are not just carrying on a tradition that has been established, and doing so for no other reason than that it is established. There was a time when it was thought that certain important people should have special opportunities and privileges such as these. But with the way travel in ordinary sleeping cars has been improved, together with the improvements in air travel and in automobile travel, I wonder whether it is necessary to continue to maintain, at public expense, five official cars for use in this private way. The Minister of Public Works denied that he ever got a chance at these cars. I am not at all surprised—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When I need one, I ask for it and I get it.

Mr. Knowles: Well, which is it? Does he, or does he not, use these cars? I imagine that most of the travel that is done by most of the ministers is not in private cars but just in ordinary sleeping car accommodation, or by air or by automobile. The conditions of travel have changed tremendously since the early days when this tradition was established. I do not know when this practice was first inaugurated; I suppose it was as early as we had railways in this country. Possibly it would be indiscreet to go the whole way and say "Cut them all out," although I feel that way. But perhaps we should keep the one for the governor general.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Two.

Mr. Knowles: Two, is it? I am not sure that even these need to be kept. At any rate, let us take another look at this practice. If we keep one or two, or even three, surely that is enough. I suggest the item is one in connection with which some saving could be effected, and I think it would be more in keeping with the spirit of the times, rather than keeping up this ancient tradition.

Mr. Dickey: I just thought I might say a word on this. After all, this is not a very large item in the estimates. Of the cars involved two of them are for the governor general. Personally I think most Canadians would agree that that is certainly a proper provision. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said he had no quarrel with the Prime Minister having a car. I certainly agree with that. Therefore the question really reduces itself to whether or not we should spend any money to keep the other two cars which are available for the other members of the cabinet.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that on balance I think it is probably an economic thing to have these cars available for the members of the cabinet. The possibility of using a private car for a trip on departmental business gives the minister an opportunity to do a certain amount of work and necessary business.

Mr. Knowles: What about parliamentary assistants?

Mr. Dickey: The parliamentary assistants do not get private cars. I am not speaking for myself.

Mr. Green: Not yet.

Mr. Dickey: No, and I do not think there is any possibility that they ever will.

Mr. Knowles: Why discriminate?

Mr. Dickey: The responsibilities of a minister and the demands on his time are very much greater than those on any parliamentary assistant, and I think we can get along very well.

Mr. Green: Don't forget that.

Mr. Dickey: Because of the responsibilities the ministers have, and the demands on their time, it is an economic thing and in the national interest to make it possible for them to travel with the facilities and in the comfort provided by a private car.

We hear a great deal of carping criticism in this house about travelling expenses of ministers. I can speak for the people of Halifax, I think with confidence. They like to see the ministers travel around this country and get firsthand knowledge of what is going on in Halifax, and Vancouver. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra does not want them to go out to Vancouver, I am sure his constituents would like to see the ministers of the crown taking an interest in what is going on in the parts of this country that are far removed from Ottawa. The money they spend on travelling expenses is very well invested in the national interest.

Mr. Johnston: Just before the minister replies I would like to say a word. I must agree with the two hon. members on this side of the house who have spoken. I do not underestimate for a moment the value of privacy for members of the cabinet when they are travelling across the country to do necessary work, but I think the argument put up by the hon. member for Halifax who just took his seat is not very sound. I can recall that since I have been here a great number of cabinet ministers have gone to different parts of Canada, and they did not use private cars. I do not mean to suggest that when they do very important travelling without the use of a private car they neglect their work. I am quite sure they would not do that.

Certainly people in different parts of Canada like to see their ministers travel around and visit them and see what is going on. I would like to see the Minister of Transport visit Calgary and spend an evening at the C.N.R. station. If he did that I would not have to argue so much for a new station. But I do not think he needs a special car; in fact I doubt very much whether he would want one on such an occasion. It does seem to me that it does not add to the prestige of a minister because he happens to travel in a private car. In fact I think it would improve his popularity if he were to take a compartment in a train. He should have that; he should have some privacy where he can conduct his business. Certainly it would not cost the country as much for a compartment or a drawing room in a train as it would to carry a special coach. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a suggestion, and I think the department would do well to reconsider this item and see if some expenditure could not be saved in this country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has the minister any information on hand as to the number of times each of these cars was used during the past year and the number of miles it travelled? I have a great deal of sympathy with the minister because on occasion I suppose he must travel with the general manager and the chief engineer in order to inspect the railway. I do not know whether he does that, but I know that in Newfoundland we had one car which was used for that sort of thing, and it was very useful. Can the minister tell me the number of times these cars have been used, and the number of miles travelled in the past year?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I cannot answer that question, but I can answer it in another way. I can answer it in such a way that I think it will make those who have opposed this vote look rather foolish. I hesitate to do this, but I warn my hon. friends that I am going to do it, and they will take the responsibility for it.

I have been in the department for almost eight years. This is the first time in my experience that this vote has been opposed.

Mr. Green: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. There have been questions on it, but this is the first time it has been opposed in this manner. While I am not going to argue in favour of the position in so far as I am concerned, I am going to say this. Out of this vote of $54,700, $20,000 only is provided for the car used by the Prime Minister, car 101 used by others in the cabinet and car 104 for the Minister of Transport, so we are arguing about $20,000; that is all we are arguing about. That vote has been far more than it is today. It has been as high as $83,000 in the past, and it has been reduced considerably. A private car was provided in former days for the deputy minister of transport. That has been eliminated. Are we going to quibble about $20,000 in so far as these cars are concerned, particularly when very often it is necessary, in fact it is important, for the Prime Minister and other ministers to have a private car at their disposal so they can, as the hon. member for St. John's West said, bring railway officials with them.

I am embarrassed by having to defend this vote, but I do want the committee to know that it is not $54,700 we are arguing about; it is $20,000. That is what we are arguing about. If my hon. friends want to argue about that, let them go to it.

Mr. Knowles: What bothers me about the minister's remarks just now is that it does not matter what suggestion we make for saving a few dollars we are met with resistance. We are often told—somebody over there is saying it now—that it is small, that it is only $20,000. Well, to most people in Canada $20,000 is still a fair chunk of money. We are told frequently that the savings we would suggest are only one or two per cent—and I hear the hon. member for Regina City talking about peanuts.

Mr. Sinnott: Peanuts for the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: Even peanuts, when they are added up by this government, become millions of dollars. In my opinion, instead of saying something that was going to be hard for us on the opposition side to take, I think the Minister of Transport strengthened our case. He admitted that across the years there has been some reduction in the amount of money spent for this purpose. I suggest that is a policy which should be continued. I do not know what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had in mind, or whether I am stealing his thunder—and I am quite prepared to let him have it—but I have written out an amendment which would reduce this item by $20,000.

The Minister of Transport says that is what we are quibbling about. All right, I will accept his terms, that $20,000 is what we are seeking to save, and I think that is a step in the right direction. The total amount in the estimate is $54,700. That is for the maintenance of five cars. I suggest that reducing it by a little less than two fifths of the amount is a suggestion on our part that the time has come to reduce the number of private cars to three.

I move, as I indicated—

That item 482 be reduced by $20,000.

Mr. Green: My understanding of the statement by the Minister of Transport is that if this vote were reduced by $20,000 there would still be provision for two cars for the governor general and a car for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chevrier: No; if this amendment were to pass the car of the Prime Minister and the other two cars would disappear. There would be provision only for the cars of the governor general.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us how much it costs to maintain three cars, two for the governor general and one for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Last year the cars for the governor general cost $34,216. You can figure out the rest; it would be $20,000 for the remaining three cars. So if the amendment passes, three cars disappear.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Green: No. I do not think there is any necessity at all for having two cars for the cabinet. I am not quarrelling at all with the provision for the cars for the governor general or for the Prime Minister. But here we have the position that the moment we suggest there could be a saving of $10,000 or $15,000, someone gets up and says, "Oh, there is nothing to that. It is too small. You are very petty in bringing it up", because that was the inference to be drawn from the remarks of the hon. member from Halifax. Someone else will say that this is just carping criticism. Well, the answer to that is that this is all money that has to be found.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Does the hon. member express the views of the official opposition on this matter?

Mr. Green: We believe that this vote could be reduced. We believe it could be, reasonably.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Does my hon. friend speak for the opposition?

Mr. Green: We believe that this vote could be reduced.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Who are "we"?

Mr. Green: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is prepared to make his figure such as not to interfere with the cars of the governor general and the Prime Minister then I, personally, would be prepared to support him. The hon. member for Halifax talks about the great welcome the citizens of that city will give the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Public Works if they arrived in Halifax in a private car.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I arrive on foot they will not notice me.

Mr. Green: I am sure they would notice the Minister of Public Works, no matter how he arrived. He would just have to give them one of those big smiles of his, and he would outshine the sun and the moon. I suggest the argument offered by the hon. member for Halifax is not sound. Here is an opportunity to do a little saving; and, perhaps even more important, here is a chance to impress upon members of the cabinet that they should be economy-minded. It might help save them from becoming too conceited, which seems to be a tendency among cabinet ministers.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would reduce the amount he mentioned to a size which would still allow cars for the governor general and the Prime Minister, I would support him. I would suggest that he reduce the amount to say $10,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Make your motion.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I would rather save $20,000 than $10,000; but I would rather save $10,000 than make no saving at all.

Mr. Prudham: Upper berths cost money, too.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles: If the committee will permit me to do so, I shall change my amendment, so that it will read—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand the hon. member can change his amendment only with unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: If it is beaten, then I can move another one.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Green: I move—

That the amendment be amended by deleting "$20,000" and substituting therefor the following: "$10,000."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And that is the sub-amendment of the official opposition.

Mr. Gibson: Have we lost our sense of proportion around here? We are running a four and a half billion dollar business in Canada, and that is a lot of money. It takes a lot of time and effort to spend that much money intelligently. When I think of nineteen top executives, apart from the Prime Minister, in connection with whose travelling we are trying to save $10,000, I am forced to the conclusion that it is just simply ridiculous. I know of many company executives in British Columbia who do not do a hundredth part of the business these men do, but who are permitted to spend far more money for private automobiles and private travel than we allow our cabinet members.

When I look over at the government benches I often feel grateful. Let me add, in passing, that I am not in the habit of polishing apples; but when I look over there and see what these gentlemen do for the small salaries they receive; when I think of the miseries they endure, all for $18,000 a year, I think the whole thing is ridiculous. And if, by any chance, those gentlemen keep their jobs and work for such small salaries, even if some money is spent for private cars for their use, I think it is the cheapest form of salary we could pay them. In short, I think we are paying them in brass instead of gold.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I believe one point is being missed in this discussion, and that the stand taken by hon. members on this side of the house has been misinterpreted. It should be remembered that perhaps fifty years ago private cars were about the only means of long-range travel which could be put at the disposal of members of the cabinet. At the present time, however, there are other means of travel which have come into widespread use. I am reasonably certain that the cost of transportation of cabinet ministers has increased considerably in the last fifty years. Even the suggested reduction would not bring the amount to anything near as low a figure as it was fifty years ago.

Other means of transportation are frequently used, and perhaps used more efficiently. I have in mind air transportation, and transportation by automobile. To have a balanced view of the whole matter one should take all these means of transportation into consideration. My feeling is that the use of private railway cars has become almost obsolete as a means of travel. Considering what is paid to maintain it, this means of travel is not used very much. The benefit derived by cabinet ministers is out of all proportion to the cost.

Amendment to the amendment negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 34.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 4; nays, 35.

Mr. McLure: I was paired with my sympathy for the few ministers sitting over there, and I did not vote.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay Railway—

483. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1953, not exceeding, $325,000.

Mr. Knight: I notice there is an increase of $75,000 in this vote, and I was wondering if the minister could give us some particulars.

Mr. Chevrier: The operating revenues were $2 million; gross operating expenses were $1,925,000; net operating revenues were $74,000; other charges, such as equipment, rents, taxes and the like, $399,000; making a deficit of $325,000. The increase of $75,000 is due to an increase in the amount required to maintain the railroad and facilities, the cost of materials, as well as some implementation of the forty-hour week by Canadian National Railways on the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. Knight: How many bushels of wheat were shipped through Churchill last year?

Mr. Chevrier: About seven million bushels.

Mr. Knight: As compared with the year before?

Mr. Chevrier: That was an increase of almost one million bushels over the previous year. It is estimated that there will be a movement this year of 7,500,000 bushels.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay Railway—

484. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $136,500.

Mr. Johnston: In view of the fact that an item has just been carried in connection with which it was decided to spend an extra $20,000 my conscience is clear as to what I am about to say. The other day I mentioned the necessity of having a union station in Calgary. I do not think I would be hurting anybody's feelings if I said that the Canadian National station is a disgrace to a city the size and importance of Calgary.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the hon. member want to discuss a new station for Calgary?

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member cannot discuss it under this item, which covers capital construction for the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. Johnston: I was looking through the estimates trying to find an appropriate item.

Mr. Chevrier: That was the first item which was passed and the hon. member spoke on it three times.

Mr. Johnston: I do not think the minister expressed an opinion as to whether it would be possible to have a union station in Calgary in the reasonably near future. This is very important from the standpoint of the people in the west.

Mr. Knight: What are these buildings covered by this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: There is $58,000 for an express office and shed at The Pas; there is $7,000 for a roadmaster's dwelling at Gillam; there is $4,000 for an extension to the engineers' bunk house at Gillam; there is $41,000 for track material consisting of 80,000 rail anchors to be installed between The Pas and Churchill; there are other small items ranging from $1,800 to $4,500 making up the total of $136,500.

Mr. Knight: Can we assume from the fact that improvements are being made that an increased use of the road is anticipated?

Mr. Chevrier: Not necessarily, but it is anticipated by the statement I gave a moment ago that there will be an increased use of the facilities.

Mr. Knight: What does this item of $2,700 for construction or acquisition of equipment cover?

Mr. Chevrier: There are two track motorcars costing $800 each for The Pas.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—

485. To provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1952-53 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year, 1952, $1,485,000.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have had an opportunity to ask a question under your chairmanship. I was glad to hear the minister give you such a nice recommendation. Among other things he said that you were a colleague of his at Osgoode Hall, but we will not hold that against you. This item of $1,485,000 is in connection with the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, and is to provide for the payment to the Canadian National Railways for the services they render under contract with the government. I have always taken objection to this being called a deficit. Earlier in the day I asked about the difference in connection with the canal system which is operated more directly by the government. The canals do not pay their way by any means, but the difference is not charged against the provinces. In that case the amounts go through the public accounts year after year as a deficit.

We all know that the car ferry pays well for the service rendered. While we cannot get a statement, I am of the opinion that if the car ferry were given credit by the railroad, as it should, for the proportion of the long-haul freight it brings to the Canadian National Railway, there would not be this deficit, as they term it, of $1,485,000. In addition the terminals are included, and they should not be a part of the operating cost. When the terminals were built a capital account should have been set up for them so there would not have to be yearly charges, although small charges might be made. I am also glad to see that they have changed the heading this year and that the vote is under "railway services", but then they spoil that by saying the payment is to be made to the national company to meet the deficit, as certified by the auditors of the national company, in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry. It is also provided that the applications for payment must be approved by the Minister of Transport. In that case he would have his own auditors conduct an audit to see whether the audit made by the company's auditors is correct.

I do not believe we have the correct figures for the freight that is hauled. The Canadian National Railways secure a large amount of freight that originates in Prince Edward Island, and they get it for nothing, so to speak, because they have not one nickel invested in the boat or anything else in connection with it. It is a connecting line that brings in a big revenue. Therefore a higher percentage of the freight charges should be credited to the boat than merely on the basis of the carriage of freight for a distance of eight or nine miles.

The word "deficit" is only used once, and I do not see why the word "service" could not have been used in the description of the item. The federal government is duty bound to render this service to the province of Prince Edward Island if they want to live up to the agreement made in 1873. I have brought this matter up time and time again. Someone may say: What does it matter whether or not it is called a deficit? It matters a great deal. When one goes to the Minister of Transport or his department and asks for something the officials say: Look at the deficit you have already. I have said dozens of times that there is no such thing as a deficit involved. I take objection once more to the word "deficit" being used. It is not necessary. It should be referred to as a service. The same thing applies to the details of the item. The word "service" should be used instead of "deficit". For the reasons I have given I think the change should be made.

Item agreed to.

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited—

486. To provide for the payment from time to time to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called "the company") of the amount of the deficit occurring during the year ending December 31, 1952, in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company, and upon applications made by the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport, not exceeding $734,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many ships are operating on this route?

Mr. Chevrier: Speaking from memory, I think there are eleven now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understand they carry sugar from the West Indies and bring flour and other provisions. Has any attempt been made to enter into the fish trade so far as the transportation of salt codfish from St. John's and other ports in Newfoundland to the West Indies is concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that any special attempt has been made, but I know that Canadian National Steamships are anxious to carry any cargo that is available.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You do not know if they carry any fish cargoes from Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware that they do.

Mr. Stick: I think the fish exporters of Newfoundland do make connections with these boats for the purpose of transporting some fish to the West Indies, and also with boats from New York. I do not know the amount, but I think they ship fish in casks to Halifax which is then shipped in these boats to the West Indies. I do not know the quantity.

Mr. Balcom: I note that the deficit under item 486 is just about half the deficit under item 485. I understand it is proposed to sell these Canadian National West Indies steamships. I would not draw any inference from that, but I would ask the minister if it is planned to complete the sale of these West Indies steamships this year, and if so will the calling of tenders for their sale be confined to Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: My understanding from the officials of Canadian National Railways is that it is their intention to dispose of them this year, and I think that tenders will be open to all comers.

Mr. Dickey: As I understand it, the proposal is to sell the two remaining "Lady" boats, as they are popularly and familiarly known in the West Indies trade. These are delightful small passenger and cargo liners that have maintained a very fine passenger and freight service between the eastern ports of Canada, Montreal in the summertime and all year from Halifax and Saint John, to Bermuda, the West Indies and South America. The removal of these fine ships from service will be a source of great disappointment to the many people who have enjoyed cruises on them. The fact that the freight service will be maintained by Canadian National Steamships with their other cargo liners does not really satisfy the objections that have been raised to the restriction of the passenger service. Can the minister tell us whether or not there is any sign that a new agreement, of the type originally made between the Canadian government and the West Indies governments under which these ships were built and put into service, will be made in the future so that new boats may be built and put into service, thus maintaining the fine passenger service as it has been in the past?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not. The reason is that the type of ship to which my hon. friend refers was very popular at one time but because of the fact that people travel so much now by air these two ships have been operating at a considerable loss. In order to maintain their service to the West Indies it was felt that the Canadian National Steamships fleet should be reorganized on a cargo basis with accommodation for passengers. I understand the cargo vessels will have accommodation for some twelve passengers.

Mr. Dickey: What is the proposal with respect to the sale of these vessels? Is there any possibility that they will be used in Canadian service? What is the plan of Canadian National Railways with respect to them?

Mr. Chevrier: The plan is to put them up for sale by tender and to accept the tender of the highest bidder.

Item agreed to.

488. Enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, N.S.—capital, $1,180,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am wondering if the work is going ahead at North Sydney. It seemed to me to be stopped last fall, and I notice that only $440,000 or one-quarter of the amount that was voted has been spent. Can the minister tell us if that work is going ahead this year?

Mr. Chevrier: The work at North Sydney is practically completed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You will notice that only $440,000 out of $1,600,000 was spent.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should say there were a number of contracts included in this item for $1,180,000. There was a contract which was awarded to T. C. Gorman Company for dredging and dock work. This did not include the sheds, elevators, parking lot and railway trackage. This work has been practically completed. The exception to that is the transit shed, elevators, dock extension, station and other buildings. The work on those items has not yet been completed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think the minister has just made a slight error. The $1,180,000 is for this year; there is nothing completed on that because only $440,000 was spent last year.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I misinformed the committee. What I meant to say was that the contract for dredging and dock work has been practically completed. This item is to cover another part, the transit shed, elevators on the dock and extension.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The work is going ahead now without any interruptions?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and satisfactorily, I am told.

Item agreed to.

489. Construction of new dock and terminal facilities at Port aux Basques, Nfld.—capital, $1,810,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The same thing applies to this item for the work at Port aux Basques?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it does.

Mr. Stick: When does the minister expect the work at Port aux Basques to be completed?

Mr. Chevrier: What we expect and hope will take place is that the three items, the terminal at Sydney, the terminals at Port aux Basques and the ferry will be completed at about the same time so we can put them into operation.

Mr. Stick: The minister cannot say just when that will be?

Mr. Chevrier: It is expected that it will be about the fall of 1954 or early 1955.

Mr. Stick: I asked that question because of something which is connected with the next item as well, and that is the situation at Port aux Basques. This has been the cause of great worry to our merchants who import goods chiefly from the mainland of Canada. There is a bottleneck of freight and passengers at that port, which has been brought about by the increased amount of passenger and freight traffic which enters Newfoundland that way. This situation has been of such concern to the merchants who import goods through that port that they have switched to express service to try to get their goods on time. That is a hardship to our people.

I know the situation is being considered by the railway authorities, but the traffic has increased by leaps and bounds so it is difficult to estimate what the traffic will be six months or a year from now. I know consideration is being given to the matter, but I should like to see the work at these two terminals and on the ferry speeded up so this bottleneck for freight and passengers can be eliminated as soon as possible. The remedying of this situation would be to the advantage of Canada, because our merchants have had to switch their buying from the United States to the mainland of Canada. That is the reason the huge amount of freight enters through this port. I should like the minister to consider the advisability of chartering a few steamers to eliminate this serious bottleneck.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to bring it to the attention of the officials.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The other night I asked the minister about the construction of the ferry. Has any work been done on that?

Mr. Chevrier: I dealt with that matter last night, and if the hon. member recalls I said there was some delay because of a change in the design of the ship. This has been straightened out, and plans are progressing satisfactorily. The keel is going tc be laid shortly.

Item agreed to.

492. Degaussing and strengthening of sea-going merchant ships of Canadian registry of 1,000 gross tons and over, $500,000.

Mr. Goode: Will the minister call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, as I want to discuss this item?

The Chairman: Is the committee prepared to allow item 492 to stand and deal with item 493 in the last three minutes at our disposal?

Mr. Green: I would suggest that we call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

HOTEL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 225, to incorporate the Hotel Mutual Insurance Company—Mr. Welbourn—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should remind the committee that this bill has been carefully considered by the banking and commerce committee and has been reported without amendment. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Green: I notice that the applicants for incorporation are all from the province of Alberta. Can the sponsor tell the committee whether it is the intention to confine the activities of the company to that province or whether the applicants are planning to do business in British Columbia, the other prairie provinces and eastern Canada?

Mr. Welbourn: Mr. Chairman, as set out here the sponsors of the bill are Douglas Earl George, who has had twelve years with the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company, besides being a bank manager; Eugene Pechet, and Russell Driscoll. As this is a federal charter, I would assume that they are going to do business in provinces other than Alberta.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Classes of insurance authorized.

Mr. Goode: May I ask the sponsor of the bill what the difference is between aircraft insurance and falling aircraft insurance?

Mr. Decore: The hon. member should have asked that question in committee.

Mr. Goode: That question is not frivolous at all, and I hope that it will not be considered as such by the sponsor? What I had in mind were these artificial applicators at the airports by which United States companies are selling insurance to people who are travelling on Canadian airlines. I was hoping that this company was going to cover that phase of insurance.

Mr. Welbourn: The question was as to aircraft insurance and—what was the other one?

Mr. Goode: Falling aircraft insurance. One is under item (c) and the other one is under (i).

Mr. Welbourn: The only answer I can make to that question is that this clause 6 is based on what is known as the model bill which I understand is a bill that is drafted by the superintendent of insurance for the Dominion of Canada. It is on their recommendation that these clauses are listed under this bill. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond the fact that clause 7 lists the classes of insurance that this company is immediately interested in.

Mr. Goode: Then may I ask the direct question? Would this company be interested in selling airplane liability insurance in the airports of Canada?

Mr. Welbourn: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot answer that question. I believe that is a question that should have been raised in committee when the witnesses were there. Without conferring with the principals who are making the application, I am not able to answer the question. I have no knowledge with respect to it.

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano) moved the second reading of Bill No. 239, respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should say, to start with, that I am sponsoring this bill as the member for Coast-Capilano and not as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company is a publicly owned company whose shares are held jointly by the city of North Vancouver, the district of North Vancouver, the district of West Vancouver and the city of Vancouver. The company owns the bridge which is commonly called the second narrows bridge, which spans the upper end of Vancouver harbour connecting Vancouver and North Vancouver. The bridge was built in 1925 and was the first connection with the north shore by bridge. The central span was knocked down in 1930 by a steamer, and the Vancouver harbours board then advanced $900,000 to reconstruct the bridge and change the bascule span into a lift span. The Vancouver harbour commission took over the operation of the bridge until this debt should be repaid, and that was only last year; so the bridge has only recently returned to the possession of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

The main reason for this bill is that the company is at the present time negotiating with the Canadian National Railways for a twenty-one year lease of the rail lines across that bridge to the C.N.R. The company intend to keep in their own possession the roadway on which tolls are charged. Section 2 of this bill is in its present form to show quite clearly that charges on the rail right of way and on the road right of way can be separated. The only other point is that the representatives on the board of directors until now have included the mayors or reeves of each of those towns. They would rather have the decision left to the council concerned whether it should be the mayor or some alderman.

Then in the third clause they have changed the name "Vancouver Harbour Commissioners" to "National Harbours Board," which has taken over the Vancouver harbour commission's operation of many years ago, and they give the proper description to two other railway companies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY OF THE HOUSE OF PROVIDENCE

Mr. John Decore (for Mr. Henderson) moved the second reading of Bill No. 240, respecting the Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation.

Mr. Decore: In the absence of my colleague and deskmate, the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Henderson), who is away, I have been authorized to proceed with this bill and to give a word of explanation in reference to its provisions.

The purpose of the bill is merely to change the name from "Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence" to "Sisters of Providence of St. Vincent de Paul". The Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence were incorporated by a bill passed here last session, but owing to the possibility of confusion of names which might arise, this religious order has applied for a change of its name.

A notice of this bill was carried, I understand, in the Canada Gazette and also in the Kingston Whig-Standard in several editions, and no objections have been raised to the adoption of the new name. This bill has gone through the Senate committee. It will be noticed that the bill sets out in paragraph 1 that the change in name shall not in any way impair, alter or affect the rights or liabilities of the incorporation. Therefore I ask that this bill be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

THE GARRETT CORPORATION

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 241, respecting a certain patent application of the Garrett Corporation.

He said: This is a bill to validate a patent application filed by one Max R. Brauns in the Canadian patent office and assigned to the petitioner, a United States corporation, carrying on business at Los Angeles, California.

The house will recall that I sponsored a similar bill last year. On account of the provisions of the Patent Act, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that during the war years certain applicants could not file applications for patents in Canada, or were delayed in filing on account of war conditions. In 1947 parliament passed an act which amended the provisions of the Patent Act to enable applicants to file within two years after the close of hostilities, provided two things were done: One, that such application was filed not later than November 15, 1947; and two, that the applicant attached to his application a request to the commissioner of patents to extend the time.

This is another case similar to the bill I presented last year, where the applicant did file before November 15, 1947, but did not attach, let us say: "I want to avail myself of the extension provided by the Patent Act as amended in 1947." Therefore this is a mere formality. The commissioner of patents has no objection. As a matter of fact, he recognized that the provision was too severe. The bill is simply introduced to enable this applicant to have his application examined, because he did file, as a matter of fact, in time under the Patent Act as amended.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Nickle: In the few minutes at my disposal on Tuesday evening I referred briefly to the apparent confusion among members of the so-called Liberal party—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): How do you mean?

Some hon. Members: How do you mean?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It has never been called anything else.

Mr. McCusker: The dean of the house.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Changes its name every six months.

Mr. McCusker: Go back to Calgary.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Sit down.

Mr. Nickle: —as to the utilization of western Canadian natural gas. That apparent confusion is fully pertinent to this matter of the proposed incorporation of Boundary Pipeline Company—

Mr. Sinnott: Gas is coming out now.

Mr. Nickle: —because this incorporation bid must be weighed in relation to the broader question of a national gas policy.

On May 2 I outlined the basic principles of a national gas policy to this house, and explained why—

The Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members to refrain from speaking or interjecting, because if I am to follow the remarks which are being made by the hon. member I must at least hear what he has to say. From what I hear I am almost of the same opinion as I was when the hon. member was speaking to this clause in a general way on the last occasion. I have listened to him again this evening. He introduced the subject by saying he was going to speak about the confusion of a political party having regard to the national policy on gas. I am quite willing to give him as much latitude as other hon. members have taken on this clause, but I do not think that we should hear a review of the policies advocated by the various political parties in this house.

Mr. Nickle: My remarks have a very important bearing on this bill we are now considering. I explained on May 2 that under a national gas policy the Progressive Conservative members of parliament are opposed to the incorporation of the Boundary Pipeline Corporation.

One of the basic tenets of a national policy on gas is that natural gas, like all the other host of natural resources in Canada's ten provinces, should be utilized to bring the maximum possible benefits to the provinces containing the resources, and maximum benefits to Canada as a whole. We recognize, of course, that provinces containing natural resources have every right and every duty to fully protect their own long-term supplies before making their surplus available to other provinces or other outsiders. The Progressive Conservative party in Alberta is already on record as supporting gas export.

An hon. Member: Never heard of it.

Mr. Nickle: The rate of gas discovery is such that we believe the time has come to make the fast growing surplus available to others. The reasons for supporting gas export are partly selfish, for we know that exports will bring to Alberta a measure of industrial growth and prosperity dwarfing that which could or might come from any "keep the gas for Alberta" policy. The Alberta Liberal party, on the other hand, has through its leader, Harper Prowse, and other spokesmen, been damning gas exports and calling them the great betrayal of the people of Alberta.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member tell me if he seriously thinks that what he is saying now is connected with the bill? I do not see how the policy advocated by the various political parties, either national or provincial, could have anything to do with this particular bill. We are not discussing the principle of pipe line bills generally. We have not before us now the statute introduced a year or two ago, when it was decided that pipe line companies would have to come before this parliament to be incorporated. At that time the hon. member might have been in order if he had discussed the views of the various political parties throughout the country on this important matter.

But as it stands today, even if a general discussion is allowed I cannot see how the policies advocated by the provincial parties or national parties in the House of Commons can have anything to do with the bill before us. The national policy in this connection is not under discussion.

Mr. Green: Your Honour did not question the statement on this subject by the hon. member for Vegreville when this bill was last up for discussion. At that time he dealt with nothing but the political policy in Alberta.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: May I say once again that I am reliving an experience I have often had in the House of Commons. Hon. members take a certain latitude. Once they have taken that latitude, and the chairman asks them to come closer to what he considers to be in order, it is pointed out to him that if he allowed a certain latitude at one time he must continue to allow it.

What the hon. member is saying at this time is that if the previous discussion was out of order but allowed, it should be allowed to carry on. I do not accept that. I remember what the hon. member for Vegreville said in reply to a statement made by a previous speaker.

Mr. Low: Not in reply, no.

The Chairman: Perhaps not, but it was by way of comment on a speech which had been made by the hon. member for Lethbridge. I think hon. members will agree with me that in the hours we have spent in committee on this bill a certain latitude has been taken. The chairman has not ruled perhaps as often as he should. But I do think that at one time or another hon. members will have to be reasonable and, when taking advantage of the general discussion allowed on the first section, see that their remarks are related to the bill.

Mr. Nickle: My purpose in referring to Liberal policy in Alberta was merely to establish some of the reasoning behind the stand of the present government in Ottawa, and some of the private members who sat on the committee on railways and canals.

The Chairman: May I comment immediately, in order to indicate to the hon. member what I have in mind. I have told him that if he intended to discuss the bill in the way he indicated he would not be in order, because the policy of one national party or another is not before the committee at this time. In the course of his remarks the hon. member might make some passing reference, but no more than that. He should not devote his whole speech to the various differences which existed or which might exist between the policies of political parties in the various provinces.

Mr. Nickle: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. In outlining the Conservatives' national gas policy in a previous speech I stated that one of the basic requirements for approval of incorporation of a pipe line company by parliament should be adequate proof of the sound economics of the pipe line proposal. The obtaining of that proof is a specific duty of the committee on railways and canals.

So far as the Boundary company is concerned, that proof was not obtained by the committee; and, in fact, the Liberal majority on that committee rode roughshod over the minority party members to prevent the hearing of cross-examination and evidence that I believe would have clearly established that the Boundary project is not economic.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I resent that statement. It is very much out of order. The suggestion that the steam roller has been used is very much out of order. The majority on the committee did not do that at all, and I deeply resent the fact that these statements are made.

Mr. Green: If the hon. member for Charlotte feels that the statement is not correct, then he may speak for himself. But at the moment the hon. member for Calgary West is surely at liberty to make his speech.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I object to the statement that the steam roller was used. It is out of order. There was no steam roller in the committee. The majority took action there, and that is all. The suggestion should be withdrawn.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlotte rises to a point of order. So far as I can recall, similar statements have been made in the house and no objection has been taken. The hon. member for Charlotte may feel that the statement of the hon. member for Calgary West is not exactly correct, and that it is unfair to him and to other members of the committee. But the only problem I have at the moment is as to whether the expression "steam roller" is parliamentary.

Mr. Nickle: I did not use that expression.

The Chairman: I have not before me the citation which applies in this instance. However, so far as my memory goes I do not think any expression used by the hon. member so far has been termed unparliamentary. However, if as between one member and another the hon. member for Calgary West wishes to please the hon. member for Charlotte, he could use another expression. I do not think, however, that according to the rules it is unparliamentary. I do not recall that the expression has been so ruled.

Mr. Nickle: The term I used was "roughshod". I might say that steps were taken to prevent the hearing of cross-examination and evidence that I believe would have clearly established that the Boundary project is not economic. The Liberal member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine suddenly moved, during the cross-examination of Boundary's engineer, that the committee——has obtained sufficient evidence to decide on the economic practicability of the pipe line under consideration and that the question be now put on the preamble without further examination of witnesses.

His motion was seconded by the Liberal member for Notre Dame de Grace, and the motion was put through by the Liberals, despite the opposition of every member of other parties on that committee, and the opposition of one good Liberal member, the hon. member for Hastings South. The Liberal majority thereby forced approval by the committee of incorporation of a pipe line company which on several grounds fails to meet the best interests of Alberta or Canada.

In opposing incorporation of Boundary, the Progressive Conservatives are not attempting to delay eastward gas export from Alberta, or delay gas supply to the provinces east of Alberta. Two companies, with eastward pipe line plans much larger than those of Boundary and much sounder economically, have already been incorporated; and we believe the choice should be between the two alternative routes they offer, in order to get gas to eastern Canada in addition to the eastern prairies.

The backers of both these incorporated companies, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and Western Pipe Lines Company, have already spent many millions of dollars in western gas exploration and development, and are still busily engaged in discovering gas reserves to supply part of their expected requirements. The backers of Boundary have provided no evidence that they are contributing anything to the discovery of gas for the pipe line they propose. There are good reasons for doubting that a pipe line from southern Alberta to serve the cities and towns of southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba would be economical. In other words it is doubtful whether it could serve a large enough market or deliver gas at a low enough price to compete with other fuels and obtain adequate revenue to recover its cost.

To be more specific, Boundary presented a brief setting out costs of its Alberta to Winnipeg line at just over $28 million. Without presenting any proof whatsoever of its figures for the gas market, and without in fact even making a detailed economic survey of the potential markets, Boundary assumed it could sell gas for an average wholesale price of under 28 cents per thousand cubic feet. Using Boundary's own construction cost figures and basing the gas market upon the detailed economic studies made by Western Pipe Lines, I advised the railway committee that in order to earn 6½ per cent on its investment Boundary would have to charge an average wholesale price of 81½ cents per thousand cubic feet during its first year, and by the fifth year would still have to charge over 37 cents. When it is considered that Boundary's principal market would be industries in Winnipeg which now get lignite coal at a delivered cost equivalent to only 30 cents per thousand cubic feet of gas there seems to be little hope that gas delivered by Boundary's line going no further than Winnipeg could capture the market from coal.

On the other hand, if Saskatchewan and Manitoba cities were provided with gas from a major pipe line extending to large markets in eastern Canada or the United States the delivered cost of gas to prairie communities would be considerably lower. Such major pipe lines would give Saskatchewan and Manitoba domestic and commercial markets gas at reasonable cost, though it is doubtful that even a major pipe line could capture from cheap lignite coal and hydro power the larger industrial market of Winnipeg.

I indicated earlier that Boundary has not made what could be called an adequate economic survey of its proposed route to Winnipeg. Fortunately several detailed economic surveys of potential gas markets in Saskatchewan and Manitoba have been made over the past two years by sponsors of other pipe line projects and by the distributor of artificial gas in Winnipeg.

Mr. McCulloch: Should the hon. member for Calgary West be allowed to read his speech? He took three hours in the committee asking questions and he talked for fifty-six minutes the other night.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Reading the same speech.

Mr. McCulloch: Yes, reading the same speech.

Mr. Nickle: When I am dealing with figures I like to present those figures accurately.

The Chairman: The hon. member says that he is using notes because he is quoting figures. That is a privilege of which many hon. members take advantage.

Mr. Nickle: I am referring to notes, not reading my speech. As I stated, economic surveys have been made by other pipe line companies and the company which now supplies artificial gas to Winnipeg. Those surveys were presented before Alberta's oil and gas conservation board long before Boundary's promoters conceived their plan. Therefore, those economic surveys cannot be construed in any way as being an effort to block the Boundary incorporation.

Boundary claims that in the fifth year of operation it will have a market for over 26 billion cubic feet between Swift Current and Winnipeg, of which over 17 billion would be interruptible industrial load, that is industrial consumers who could be cut off or given gas at will, dependent upon the widely varying seasonal demand of domestic and other year-round customers. For the same cities Western's economic survey showed a fifth year total market of 15½ billion cubic feet, only 60 per cent of Boundary. Trans-Canada calculated its fifth year needs for the same cities at 9½ billion, only 40 per cent of Boundary's estimate.

Boundary's engineer admitted under questioning that the economics of his project depended upon the large interruptible load they hoped to get. Yet the only evidence he submitted that such a market might exist were a few telegrams from people, including a girl worker in a Winnipeg industrial house, stating the peak summer day consumption of coal or fuel oil for certain industries. The Boundary engineer thereupon converted the coal or oil consumption into the natural gas equivalent and assumed that the industries concerned would gladly and completely change over to natural gas. He submitted absolutely no evidence of the willingness of the industries to convert to gas nor did he submit any evidence that Boundary could deliver gas at such a competitive price as to justify conversion.

The Winnipeg Electric Company, which operates the present artificial gas distribution system in Winnipeg and which would be the distributor of natural gas when a pipe line from Alberta is built, has a detailed knowledge of the present and future fuel market in its own city. Its careful calculations show a total market in Winnipeg of 9¼ billion cubic feet after the introduction of natural gas to the city. The Winnipeg Electric is unable to find any large interruptible load industrial market that could be switched to gas from its present low-cost lignite coal.

Boundary's promoters have not even bothered to consult the Winnipeg distributor, yet they claim they would have a Winnipeg market of 16 billion cubic feet, 7 billion more than the company with detailed knowledge believes possible. I might add at this point that Mr. Herring, Boundary's engineer, stated during examination by me that he had letters from five key industries supporting his figures for the gas market, plus detailed day by day figures for demands of a Regina power plant, plus detailed information compiled at his Houston, Texas, office concerning the over-all industrial markets he proposed to serve. His statements appear on page 57 of the minutes of the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee for April 22. Mr. Herring promised to deliver all this information to the committee at its April 24 meeting. He delivered none of it, but instead submitted the telegrams to which I have already referred.

Despite these facts the Liberal majority on the committee ruled on April 24 that adequate evidence to support the economics of the Boundary pipe line proposals had been given to the committee. I would suggest that the Liberals on that committee present to this house the proof that they declared was adequate. Let me conclude with three other reasons which, in addition to the absence of proof of a sound economic basis, determined the opposition of the Progressive Conservatives to the incorporation of the Boundary company.

First, the project would open up only a limited market for the rapidly growing gas reserves of western Canada. It would not, for example, open a market of sufficient volume to allow the great Pincher Creek field of southwest Alberta and its vast petrochemical industries to develop on an economic basis. Small-scale export eastward would not meet the increasingly urgent market needs for Pincher Creek and a host of other south and central Alberta gas fields. These are very probably the fields which will be cleared next for export by the Alberta government.

Mr. Prudham: Does the hon. gentleman think the amount of gas allocated by the Alberta government for export to the Pacific coast justifies the building of a pipe line?

Mr. Nickle: The answer to that is no, because the percentage allocated from the Peace river district coupled with roughly a trillion cubic feet of gas now believed proved in the Peace river area of British Columbia plus, I hope within a very few months or maybe sooner, approval of more gas from the Peace river area of Alberta, will justify that Pacific coast line. Second, the Boundary project, even if it were economic, would penalize consumers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. A small scale line would have to sell gas at substantially higher prices than would a major project such as those proposed by Trans-Canada and Western. Third, acceptance of the Boundary project could delay, perhaps for years, the securing of gas in large volume by Ontario and Quebec either by direct pipe line from Alberta or by gas exchange with the United States.

As a member of this parliament I shall not be a party to approving incorporation of a pipe line company that has failed to establish a sound economic basis for its project. As an Albertan I shall not support a project which could both delay and reduce the industrial development of my province. As a Canadian I shall oppose Boundary's incorporation because I prefer that Saskatchewan and Manitoba shall get lower priced gas than Boundary could offer, and believe that Ontario and Quebec should not be barred from the advantages of a reasonable cost, highly convenient fuel such as natural gas.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member for Peace River would allow the hon. member for Charlotte to have the floor. He wishes to make a few remarks in reply to the points that have been made.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I wish to take a few minutes to refer to the proceedings of the committee that has been mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West, and of which I was a member. He has made statements tonight about the Liberal members of that committee riding roughshod over the opposition members. We have also heard words used such as "bulldozing" and "steamrolling". I should like hon. members to realize for a minute that the people of the Dominion of Canada elected a Liberal majority in this house.

Mr. Green: They are sorry they did.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They elected them to put Liberal policies into effect, not Progressive Conservative policies. Each and every committee of the house has a Liberal majority. Why do they have a Liberal majority? Because the people want it. They do not want a Progressive Conservative majority or a C.C.F. majority. They want a Liberal majority. That is exactly what we have had in all these committees. The hon. member for Calgary West has referred tonight to the evidence given before the special committee considering this bill. Qualified engineers appeared as witnesses before the committee. The hon. member has his opinion as to the value of the evidence they submitted, and I have mine. I believe each and every one of them is much better qualified to speak about pipe lines than the hon. member for Calgary West.

Some may feel that we have an oil expert in the House of Commons. The hon. member has certainly taken that attitude since he came here, but I for one do not want to be told that I have not judgment enough to listen to evidence in a committee and make up my own mind. I do not want the hon. member for Calgary West to make up my mind for me. After listening to the evidence I can make up my mind as to how I feel I should vote if there should be a division in the committee. Words such as "riding roughshod", "bulldozing" and so on that have been used mean nothing to me because we are conducting the business of the house and of our committees in exactly the way the people of the Dominion of Canada want us to conduct it.

Mr. Noseworthy: You mean the Liberal government.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The citizens of the country sent Liberals to the house to look after their rights and interests.

Mr. Knowles: Forty-nine per cent of them.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There is one other thing I want to say before I sit down. As far back as I can remember—and I can remember the period before the election of 1911—this flag waving has taken place. In fact it has been going on since confederation. When members stand up in the house and suggest no truck nor trade with the Yankees I and most other maritimers resent such a statement. Since the turn of the century and up until the last few years the people of Alberta depended exclusively on the United States of America for the gas and oil they consumed. Right across Canada we were faced with the same situation. Did you ever hear anyone in the United States say: No gas or oil for the Dominion of Canada; keep it under the ground down here.

During the last war, which is not too long ago, the allocation of oil to Canada by the United States was more liberal in many cases than what was provided for their own citizens. I said in the committee and I repeat now that I remember reading in the press on many occasions during the last war that the people of Boston were sitting in their homes in fur coats because of a lack of fuel oil for their furnaces. To my knowledge that situation did not arise in the maritime provinces from where I come. We were provided with oil, gas and fuel oil by our good friends to the south.

Just a few nights ago I listened to a radio address by the mayor of Calgary. I should have liked a copy of his address so I could put it on the record. He stated definitely that the only way gas could ever be provided for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec was to bring in the gas from Texas and export the surplus gas of western Canada across the border to the United States. Any fair-minded man who looks at the situation knows that is the only thing that can be done. Reciprocity is the only consideration at the present time. The idea of oil and gas only for Canadians and no truck nor trade with the Yankees just does not go with maritimers. I have the same opinion now that I had when I sat as a member of the committee. I believe the witnesses who appeared there presented a good story. I believe the evidence they produced was authentic, and I believe it carries more weight than the evidence produced by the hon. member for Calgary West. I do not believe there was any steamrolling at any time, or that anyone was run over roughshod. We had a Liberal majority in the committee and we carried on in exactly the way the people of this country want us to carry on.

Mr. Cavers: On a question of privilege, as vice-chairman of the committee that has been referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West I should like the opportunity to refute some of the statements made by him in the house tonight.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Cavers: I did not have the opportunity—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: It is not a question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lincoln rose on a question of privilege and began to state his question of privilege by saying that as vice-chairman of the standing committee he wanted to refute some of the points put forward by the hon. member for Calgary West. I must inform him that does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity of speaking on this measure at any stage, though I am keenly interested in the subject matter of the bill. I must say at the outset that what the hon. member for Calgary West had to say was very largely founded on what I would call keen and logical thinking, and was certainly a citation of very good reasons why any man should be opposed to the incorporation of the Boundary Pipeline Company. I very much doubt if the pipe line proposed by this company will ever carry one cubic foot of gas or one gallon of oil from the province of Alberta for the simple reason that in my judgment the whole scheme is uneconomic. In the second place, unless a lot of people change their way of doing things there just will not be any gas or oil to export.

We in the province of Alberta have been keenly interested in the development of our great resources in such a way as to contribute to the strength of Canada and the well-being of the Canadian people because we felt it was in the interests of Canada and its people to do so. We have wanted to develop the gas and oil resources so that all parts of Canada can benefit from them. We do not look upon these resources as belonging entirely to the people of the province of Alberta, not by any means. Nor do we for one moment, Mr. Chairman, make the claim that it was solely through the genius of the Social Credit government of Alberta that the development occurred, although some people have attempted to make that claim. Let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that this pipe-line company will not be able to gather and bring gas into eastern Canada unless, in the first place, sufficient reserves are developed in the province of Alberta to justify the outlay of something like the $28 million described by the hon. member for Calgary West. In the second place, the company will not be able to get gas unless the confidence of the people in my province remains unimpaired.

I doubt very much if the political situation will ever make it possible for the gas to be exported from the province. Altogether too much of an irresponsible nature has been said in this house and elsewhere about the export of gas from Alberta. It is seriously interfering with logical thought by people everywhere and, as I said, may result in no gas being made available. This would be a serious situation, if gas surplus to the needs of Alberta is found in reserve. I say it in all seriousness, and I should like to see a whole lot less foolish and irresponsible talk and a lot more careful thought given to this problem.

The Liberal member for Charlotte just a moment ago mentioned that a certain speech had been made by the mayor of Calgary, who I want to point out was the Liberal candidate in Calgary East in the last federal election.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He will win it next time.

Mr. Low: I am glad to hear that. Let me ask this question. The mayor said the only possibility of getting gas into eastern Canada would be to exchange Alberta's gas with some western state in the United States, in return for gas to be brought into Ontario and Quebec from Texas or some other part of the United States. I want to know where the Liberals actually stand on this question of the export of gas. The Liberal member stands up in this house and quotes the mayor of Calgary, using that speech as evidence of Liberal party interest in the export of gas. The Liberal leader in the province of Alberta goes around the country saying that he is inexorably opposed to the export of one cubic foot of gas from the province. I should like to know where the Liberal party stands. It is precisely because not one of them has had the courage to stand up in this house and do anything but make irresponsible speeches that—

The Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Peace River not to refer to matters of policy of the various parties. The hon. member has referred to those policies, and I would ask him not to carry on along that line. There is another statement which the hon. member may want to revise. He said no member in this house has had the courage to stand up and make a statement of policy. I do not think the hon. member will want those words to remain in the record.

Mr. Low: I would not want to offend the tender consciences of any of the members in this house. If that is too tough a word for them I withdraw it, and I shall form my judgment as to whether they do have the courage by what they do henceforth. I expect them to stand up on the floor of this house and declare themselves with respect to the export of gas. If they do not—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that the remarks I made were not government policy. They represent my own opinion. I do not know how the Liberal leader in Alberta feels about the export of gas. I do not know what government policy is. I know what my policy is, and that is to trade with our neighbours to the south of us, the same as we have tried to do as Liberals for centuries.

Mr. Low: During the course of his speech here this evening the hon. member said that the committee hearing this evidence on the pipe line bill had followed Liberal policy, and I presume from that it is Liberal policy to support the incorporation of this Boundary Pipeline Company.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You have been a member of each committee in which a pipe line was discussed. Did you ever oppose the application of a pipe-line company before?

Mr. Low: In every single instance where I have acquiesced in the passing of a pipe-line bill in this house it has been because I felt that the application and the whole set-up were economical. This one, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I might ask a question again. Have you ever opposed one in the house or in the committee before?

Mr. Low: I am speaking at the present moment on the Boundary Pipeline bill, and I am expressing my opposition to it.

Mr. Decore: Why don't you answer the question?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask a question again—

Mr. Argue: Sit down; you have made your speech.

Mr. Low: If the adolescent members for Vegreville and Charlotte will just contain themselves and not be hysterical, I am quite sure we will get along.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlotte has asked a question.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They do not want to answer it.

The Chairman: It is the privilege of the hon. member to give a reply or to not give one; therefore I should like hon. members to maintain order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If he did not understand the question, I would be pleased to ask it again. The question I should like to ask is this. On many occasions you have supported pipe-line applications, but you are not supporting this one. What is the policy of your own party? That is what I should like to know?

Mr. Low: I will answer the question. There has not been a single instance where we have supported a pipe-line bill when we did not think it was an economic proposition. This one is not.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Why?

Mr. Low: It is for that reason I am opposing it. I am speaking now entirely on my own. I am not committing my party to anything at all, as I am speaking on my own.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Oh, that is different.

Mr. Weir: That is the same as the member for Charlotte.

Mr. McIvor: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is now nine o'clock.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since it is nine o'clock, this house will resume the business which was under consideration at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway and steamship service—

492. Degaussing and strengthening of sea-going merchant ships of Canadian registry of 1,000 gross tons and over, $500,000.

Mr. Chevrier: May I reply to two or three questions that were asked earlier, and get them out of the way. The hon. member for St. John's West inquired as to the names of the steamship inspectors. There are three, Mr. De Valliant, Mr. Barrett, and one whose appointment is still pending. Then I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South wanted a breakdown of the expenses including those for Canadian distressed seamen. The total is $6,240.58 of which $2,080.56 was paid by ship owners under distressed seamen's regulations and the balance by the department.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wanted me to take one of the items of the department and indicate to what extent we had spent the money estimated in the previous year. I took the item of canals, the one concerning operation and maintenance during the last five years. In the fiscal year 1947-48 the estimates were $3,224,000. I may say that I am giving round figures only. We spent $3,215,000. In 1948-49 the estimate was $3,705,000; we spent the full amount. In 1949-50 the estimate was $2,908,000; we spent the full amount. In 1950-51 it was $4,328,000. We spent $4,248,000. In 1951-52 it was $4,678,000 and we spent $4,596,000.

Mr. Goode: At six o'clock I asked that item 492 be left over until now because I think this half million dollars in this estimate means some addition to government policy. Some of us know about degaussing from the last war. In looking at last year's estimates I do not find in them a dollar to cover the matter of degaussing. Before I ask a couple more questions, will the minister explain just what the government's policy is on this matter?

Mr. Chevrier: Since the end of the war there has never been in the estimates any item for degaussing; but in September of last year we decided that ships of 1,000 gross registered tons or over, being built for Canadian registry, should be fitted at government expense with degaussing equipment as a protection against magnetic mines and with under-deck stiffening above which defensive guns could be mounted in an emergency. As a result of this decision we are fitting with this equipment five ships, three of them now building in Canadian yards and two in United Kingdom yards for Canadian registry; and we are at the same time undertaking a survey of all other ships to ascertain what the cost will be. By "all other ships" I mean the 44 war-built, 10,000-ton Park vessels and the twelve 4,700-ton freighters. These vessels were all fitted with this equipment during the last war. The point is to what extent the equipment is serviceable at this time. That survey has not been completed. The object of this estimate is to have the funds available in case of necessity.

Mr. Goode: I think the minister is to be complimented on his foresight in this matter. As I say, some of us on the west coast, from our experience during the last war, know just what degaussing did for our merchant navy. As I say, I think the minister is to be complimented on his forward outlook in this whole matter.

Mr. Gillis: Would the minister mind putting on the record a definition of the word "degaussing".

Mr. Chevrier: My understanding of it is that ships are to be fitted with equipment for the detection of mines. During the last war this equipment consisted of an electric cable which sets off a current and thereby does not attract the mine.

Mr. Green: As I understand the minister this evening, this vote covers only work to be done on five new ships, three of which are building in Canadian yards and two in United Kingdom yards. That is contrary to the press reports at the time the estimates were brought down. They indicated that all the old ocean-going ships were to be fitted with degaussing equipment and were also to be strengthened, and that some of the coastal ships were to be improved in the same manner. May we have that point cleared up?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not seen the press reports to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Green: It was when the Minister of Finance brought down his estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: This vote covers not only five ships but all existing ships that will be built after the date of the approval of the policy, which was in September of 1951; that is, ships of over 1,000 tons gross register. I refer to those five because they are new ones. There will be other new ships that it will also cover. The intention is also to cover existing ships. A survey is being made to ascertain what will be the cost. That survey is in progress now.

Mr. Green: What about coastal ships? Are they to be handled in the same way?

Mr. Chevrier: If they come within this definition, they would be. If they are new ships, yes.

Mr. Green: I do not understand where the minister draws the line between doing this work on new ships and on old ships. Is he planning to do it on the present old cargo vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: What I am saying is that the decision covers ships to be built in the future, and a survey is being made to ascertain what the cost will be on the other ships I have mentioned. When that cost is known and that survey is completed, a decision will be taken as to those ships.

Mr. Green: Then I understand that at the moment the policy is only to do the ships which are built after a date in September?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: How are these expenses met? Do the owners of these ships have to pay anything or does the government bear the whole cost?

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as new ships are concerned, we are paying the whole cost. In so far as other ships are concerned, we shall have to determine that question when we get the report.

Mr. Green: Why does the government assume that cost? Under what law can the ship companies be compelled to have this work done to their ships even though the government pays the cost?

Mr. Chevrier: We did it during the last war, and we did it on the basis of national defence. It is on that basis that we are proceeding now.

Mr. Green: Will the ship companies be under any obligation to turn their ships over to the government in time of war? Is there some string attached to it in the event of a war breaking out?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not.

Mr. Green: Is the navy to have anything to do with this plan, or is it being handled entirely by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: It is being handled by the Department of National Defence, and we cover it by an estimate in our department.

Mr. Green: Then the Department of National Defence is having this war work done on these ships but the vote comes through the Department of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: Why is that not a defence vote?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume because the ships are part of the merchant navy.

Mr. Green: How many ships will this amount of money cover?

Mr. Chevrier: That is what I am not able to say. I can tell from time to time how many ships it will cover, because we have a record of them, but I cannot tell how many old ships it will cover until the survey is over.

Mr. Green: Is there a set figure of cost for each ship? The vote is for $500,000. How many ships is it expected will be covered by that vote?

Mr. Chevrier: It should cover about ten new ships, and some of the ships that the survey will report upon.

Mr. Green: Do these 10 ships include passenger ships, or are they all cargo vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it would include all the ships, I should think, that the survey would report upon, and I presume that will include all ships of the Park vessel type, and the 4,700 tonners.

Mr. Green: New passenger ships as well as freighters?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: The item reads:

> Degaussing and strengthening of sea-going merchant ships . . .

Does that mean setting up the gun emplacements?

Mr. Chevrier: Gun stiffening, yes.

Mr. Green: That is what is meant?

Mr. Chevrier: That is correct.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Is any of the degaussing equipment that was installed in merchant ships during the war still in serviceable condition, or has it been dismantled?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there is quite a considerable amount on ships. Some of it is in pretty fair condition; on others not, and that is the object of making the survey.

495. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1952, to March 31, 1953, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $13,350.

Mr. Knowles: May I once again call the minister's attention to this item. It is an item of which I approve. The statute in regard to these particular employees provides that their minimum pension is to be $20 a month, but long ago it was recognized that that was not good enough, and by means of putting amounts in these estimates for over twenty years it has been supplemented by $10 for each pensioner. The amount, of course, that we vote is decreasing because these men are passing away. Nevertheless we have here the principle of supplementing an inadequate railway pension. I contend that if this can be done in one case, it should be done in the other; and I should like to know what the minister thinks about it.

Mr. Chevrier: The difference between this vote and what my hon. friend has in mind is that these are pensioners of a government railway, a crown-owned railway. There is a distinction.

Mr. Knowles: Who owns the Canadian National?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National is comprised of different companies. What I mean is that the Canadian National is an amalgamation of several companies; whereas this was to cover the employees of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway which is still owned by the crown.

Mr. Knowles: But who owns this amalgamation to which the minister referred as the Canadian National Railway?

Mr. Chevrier: It is owned by a corporate company, the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Knowles: Is that not owned by the crown?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a distinction between the two. One is an incorporation that has been established for the operation of these various companies; whereas this is still in the name of the crown. The Canadian National Railways is not incorporated in the name of the crown; it is in the name of the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that at times each session we vote money for Canadian National purposes, does the minister think the distinction he has tried to draw is a sufficient reason for not treating the retired employee in the same manner?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I have nothing to add other than what I said on at least two occasions, once in this debate and another time in a former debate when the resolution establishing the railways and shipping committee was under discussion.

Item agreed to.

Air services—
Telecommunications division—
Airways and airports—radio aviation services—

496. Administration, operation and maintenance, $3,081,429.

Mr. Gillis: I have been waiting for this one. I should like to bring a specific problem to the minister's attention, having to do with a small group of employees who come within the scope of his department. I refer to the section of the corps of commissionaires who are employed at airports under the Department of Transport.

The corps of commissionaires consists of quite a large group of ex-servicemen over forty years of age. They are employed by different departments of government. The income tax department employs some of them. All these categories working for certain departments of government enjoy certain rights and privileges. At the airports that come under the Department of Transport all the employees who are working for transport, if they commute to work, have the right to receive $11.40 a month as a rebate in lieu of transportation, with the exception of the corps of commissionaires. There are not many of them. There may be half a dozen around each airport.

I have taken this matter up with the department. It is not new. I have taken it up on a couple of occasions. The last occasion was on March 6 of this year. The minister wrote to me and said that while he was sympathetic, this particular group of corps of commissionaires employed by the Department of Transport on airports were working under the R.C.M.P., and he was referring my communication to the Department of Justice. Well, that was on March 6. I have heard nothing from the Department of Justice on the matter. I am bringing this to the minister's attention because I do not think that group of commissionaires, who are working for transport on these airports, should be the responsibility of the Department of Justice. They work directly for the Department of Transport and should be under the supervision of the officials of that department and those in charge of the local stations.

I do not see where they have any connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at all. In view of the fact that there is a regulation in his department that reimburses the employees at airports for transportation, my suggestion to the minister is that he should give some consideration to bringing this group, who work on ramps and look after the general supervision of passengers and have much to do with the T.C.A. and the general protection of the buildings that come under that department, directly under his department. Some consideration should be given by his department to bringing these employees, who work directly for transport, within the scope of the Department of Transport, and they should be treated as other employees in his department are treated.

Some consideration should be given to divorcing completely the security guard of the corps of commissionaires at these airports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do not think it is a good arrangement, because the mounted police visit that section only once in a while. These men are at all times in direct contact with and work for the management of the station. The minister should undertake the establishment of the same conditions for these employees as are established for other employees at the airports across the country. I am still asking the minister to do that. I know that under present regulations the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have supervision over that small group, which is growing across this country. It consists of older veterans. I have two suggestions to offer. My first suggestion is to try to have the corps of commissionaires at a station under the supervision and direction of the management of the station. I want the minister to pay particular attention to the grievance of that small group which is losing $11.40 a month in commuting back and forth to work, an amount that is paid to every other person working for the Department of Transport at those air stations.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to give consideration to the hon. member's representations, but it is a fact that the corps of commissionaires are not employees of the Department of Transport. For reasons that are known to him, and I am sure to other hon. members in the committee, it was found that because these persons are employed as security guards not only in the Department of Transport but in other departments as well, it would be better if they were under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice or, in other words, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I know the point the hon. member raises is one he takes seriously. When I referred his communication to the Minister of Justice the minister did not turn it down, but took it up with the treasury board. They, in turn, felt that under the circumstances the suggestion could not be carried out. However, in view of what the hon. member has said, I shall be glad to ask our people to take another look at it.

Mr. Gillis: I would like to make this point, that while it is true they work for all other departments of government, in no other department do they come under the R.C.M.P. for supervision and discipline.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, they do, in the Department of Public Works. The corps of commissionaires look after public buildings, as they do for the Department of Transport.

Mr. Gillis: I have come in touch with them in connection with the income tax branch, and other departments of government. In those cases I can iron out the difficulties with the Department of Labour, without reference to any other section. The only place I have run into supervision by the R.C.M.P. has been in connection with airports under the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: And the hon. member would rather have them with us?

Mr. Gillis: I certainly would.

Mr. Chevrier: We will see if we cannot help you.

Mr. McLure: May I bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the hourly rates of wages of these employees are different from Charlottetown to Vancouver. Different scales of wages are employed in different places. They start out at so much an hour and there are certain deductions off that, all the way through. Between British Columbia and Charlottetown there is a difference of forty cents an hour.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have been struck by the terrific expense occasioned through large-scale aerial search for small private aircraft from time to time in thinly populated areas. I was wondering if consideration could be given to issuing such aircraft with small, portable emergency radio transmission equipment, of the Gibson Girl type.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member has raised a good point, but I must point out that it is not done through the Department of Transport. The Department of National Defence operates the search and rescue service.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I understand that. But since the Department of Transport controls civil aviation, I thought they might see fit to issue special emergency equipment to small private aircraft.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry I did not answer the question of the senior member for Queens, when he referred to the prevailing rate. I have no doubt he had the airport at Charlottetown in mind. Those rates are not fixed by the Department of Transport, but rather by the Department of Labour. The rate fixed is that prevailing in the area.

Mr. Green: There is a substantial increase in the item. Would the minister explain why?

Mr. Chevrier: This vote is for the operation and maintenance of radio service. There is an increase of $373,000. For instance, it will provide for the aeradio station which will come into operation at Embarras in the northern part of Alberta. I see that $30,860 is set aside for that. Then at Nanaimo, British Columbia, an aeradio station for the extension of services in that area will cost $6,399.

Mr. Green: Is this under item 496?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Then there are substantial increases in salaries. There are increases in rates of pay for classified positions, following the announcement made in December of 1951, amounting to $245,000. There is also an increase in the basic rates of pay of 278 radio operators and 67 radio technicians amounting to $26,004. Then there are a number of annual increases, 586 of them, amounting to $77,976.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe arrangements have been made for the installation of a radiotelephone service for the islands of Newfoundland. Is the minister in a position to say what has been done? Twelve months have elapsed since the vote was passed. Have they been installed? I am referring to the small radio sets.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no money under this item for that purpose. I have no doubt my hon. friend has in mind radio and telecommunication facilities operated by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. I did see the president of that company yesterday and he reported to me that substantial progress was being made in the cases to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister referring to telephones on the small islands off the mainland of Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: I am speaking of the main system that operates between Newfoundland and the mainland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not speaking of that, I am referring to about a dozen islands off the mainland. A vote was included in the estimates last year to instal small receiving sets and transmitters to operate the short distance across two or three miles of water. It was too expensive to lay cables for telephones.

Mr. Chevrier: That is operated by the Canadian National Railways. I suppose they would have something in their vote for it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is it not in this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister gave the list last year.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps because I had it in front of me at that time.

Item agreed to.

Air services—

497. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $1,750,000.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain the kind of buildings and works covered by this vote.

Mr. Chevrier: This vote covers, for instance, six instrument landing systems which will be constructed or relocated at airports such as Gander, Sydney, Ottawa, Regina, Patricia Bay and Vancouver, for which $274,000 is set aside; I.L.S. equipment to be installed at northern locations, $145,000; V.H.F. equipment to be installed at all stations, $49,531; voice recording equipment, $136,000; at Gander airport, a ground control approach radar, first stage, $123,000; at Mecatina, reconstruction of buildings, and the reconstruction of a low frequency beacon, $180,000; at Terrace, radio range, and four dwellings, $100,000; at Nanaimo, construction of a low frequency radio range, $68,000; living accommodation at Teslin, $10,500; Embarras, $40,000; Fredericton, $20,000; Goose Bay, $60,000; Beaton river, $65,000; Prince George, $35,000—making a total of $230,500 under that heading of living accommodation.

Mr. Green: That is for living accommodation for the staffs at these airports?

Mr. Chevrier: In isolated places.

Mr. Green: To what extent have instrument landing systems been installed in Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: They have been installed at practically all the main airports with the exception of one or two. We have instrument landing systems at Sydney, Ottawa, Dorval, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Lethbridge and Gander. We are installing them at the five airports I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Green: What is the intention with regard to the eventual installation of instrument landing systems at all subsidiary airports?

Mr. Chevrier: They will be installed at all major airports. No decision has been arrived at as to installing them at subsidiary airports. If the traffic warrants the time may come when we will have to instal them there as well.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is a radio range station north of Seven Islands on the air route into northern Labrador where the iron mines are located. Is that radio range station owned or operated by the department or by the private company?

Mr. Chevrier: It is owned by the private company.

Item agreed to.

Radio Act and regulations—

498. Administration, operation and maintenance, including contributions as Canada's share of the administrative costs of various international radio, telegraph and telephone conferences, as detailed in the estimates, $1,009,074.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister been able to look into the question I asked the other day with regard to the form used when applying for a certificate of proficiency in radio. I drew the minister's attention to the fact that this form calls for two reference letters from persons of British parentage. I asked what the translation was on the French version of the form. Is it really intended to read that way? When you are asking for a letter of reference surely it is not necessary to inquire into the parentage of the person giving the reference. I know of one particular applicant who went to the minister of his church in the city of Winnipeg. When the minister looked over the form he said, "Although I am a minister and a Canadian citizen, I cannot sign that because my parents are Icelandic." Has the minister any comments to make?

Mr. Chevrier: I asked one of the officers of the department about that and he assured me that such interpretation is certainly not put on those words. The words "British parentage" are meant to mean British subject. There would be no difficulty if an applicant obtained references from two people who were British subjects. It may be that the form is obsolete, and I have asked our people to look into it.

Mr. Knowles: I would point out that the form does not simply ask that the people who sign the letters be British subjects or of British parentage, it asks that the parents of the people signing the letter be of British parentage. But do I understand that the minister is going to look into the possibility of revising this form?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Chevrier: I shall have our officers look into it.

Item agreed to.

Radio Act and regulations—

499. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $206,400.

Mr. Green: What type of works and buildings are covered by this item?

Mr. Chevrier: The construction or acquisition of buildings and works such as the moving of the ionospheric measurement station which was established on the Prescott highway to the Connaught ranges. Then at the Ottawa monitoring station we are replacing the antenna at a cost of $7,000. In the case of moving the ionospheric station, the cost was $25,000. Point Grey monitoring station, $18,000; that is the replacement of frequency measuring equipment. Quebec monitoring station, establishment of radio frequency measuring station, $3,000. Then at Edmonton, for monitoring, $39,000. At Resolute, for ionospheric equipment, $6,000. At Baker Lake, ionospheric station and power line extension, $22,700. Fort Chimo, $10,000, installation of generating plant. General replacement of obsolete frequency standards, $5,000. Radio receivers, and installation of fire alarm system at various stations, $8,500. There are a number of smaller items of construction or acquisition of equipment which run into $12,000.

Mr. Green: What is the difference between the work covered by these two votes described as under the Radio Act and regulations and the two previous votes called radio aviation services?

Mr. Chevrier: The first is for the payment of the radio operators who keep in contact with the planes when they are in the air. These are located at the various airports from one end of the country to the other. There are over a hundred of these and it is for administration and payment of salaries that those votes are included. The other is a construction vote.

Item agreed to.

Radio aids to marine navigation—

500. Administration, operation and maintenance, $2,035,699.

Mr. Green: About a year and a half ago the minister sent two of his officers to the west coast to make an investigation into whether or not some change should be made in the regulations concerning radio operators on ships. This has been quite a contentious point for some years, whether the regulations were sufficiently strict in connection with requiring full-time radio operators. Some ships have been permitted to have their freight clerk, their purser or some other officer look after the wireless in addition to his other duties ,and I believe in some cases the ship was allowed to depend upon the radiotelephone. What was the result of that investigation? We have had two or three wrecks on the coast which brought up this question. I think in one case the person responsible was not watching the radar, and in another the radiotelephone equipment was out of order. All this would seem to support the argument that there should be full-time radio operators on more of these ships.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I do not remember what the report indicated, as it was some months ago. My recollection is that the report indicated that perhaps some improvement could be made along the lines suggested by my hon. friend. It might require an amendment either to the Canada Shipping Act or the Radio Act. Consideration is being given at the moment to amending the act.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Can the minister tell me if radar equipment is installed on the Prince Edward Island car ferry operating between Borden and Cape Tormentine, to enable it to dock in foggy weather?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there is radar equipment on that ship.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): What action has been taken to instal radio equipment on the Northumberland ferries operating between Wood island and Caribou, to enable them to operate at night?

Mr. Chevrier: Those ships are not operated by the Department of Transport, but I am informed they are installing it now.

Radio aids to marine navigation—

501. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, lands and new equipment, $300,000.

Mr. Herridge: When I made a few remarks the other day on item 1 I brought to the minister's attention the peculiar difficulty many residents of my constituency have with radio interference. I notice that in the estimates there is provision for 41 radio inspectors. I presume these are the men who make inspections with respect to radio interference. I wish the minister could see his way clear to increase the number of inspectors because my experience so far as the southern interior of British Columbia is concerned is that the one man there has far too much ground to cover to do the work efficiently and effectively. I should also like to ask the minister to give consideration to making certain that persons use proper appliances on electrical equipment, so as to cut down radio interference as much as possible.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing first with the latter point, we have a number of districts where there are interference cars. There is a vote dealing with that a little later, but perhaps I can answer my hon. friend now if I am permitted to do so. We do a considerable amount of work all across the country. We send out these inspectors when advice is received that there is interference. The inspectors go first to the complainant. Then they go about the area with their car to try to identify the equipment that is causing the interference, and about 80 per cent of the time they succeed in doing so. They report to the complainant, and then they indicate as courteously as they can to the person who is responsible for the interference that it should be removed and how it can be removed.

My hon. friend raised the question of additional inspectors, particularly in the district of Kelowna, British Columbia. It is a fact that the inspector at Kelowna has a large territory to cover. However, it is a costly matter, and it would be uneconomical to provide inspectors throughout Canada in sufficient numbers to visit every community frequently. The department of course depends to a large extent upon the co-operation of electrical equipment dealers and public utility companies who make reports from time to time to our inspectors in the area. However, I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's remarks under consideration and see if we cannot assist that particular area.

Mr. Low: May I suggest that the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Public Works might get together and send an inspector around some of the corridors of the parliament buildings to try to detect some of the inferior electric razors that are being used throughout the building.

Mr. Quelch: What powers do these inspectors have to enforce action to eliminate interference? After they have gone out and located the interference, what powers have they to see that the person who is responsible takes action to correct it? I have in mind a case in Alberta where a complaint was laid. The inspector arrived and finally located where the interference came from but apparently that was as far as he went. He notified the person that his little power plant was responsible for the interference, but no action was taken.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is that I do not think the inspectors have any powers. They do it as a service. They act because they are so requested, and I do not think they could tell an offending person that he must eliminate the interference. All they can do is to communicate to the complainant what is the cause and point out to the offending party the way to eliminate it. I think if they were to go any further they would be interfering with property and civil rights.

Mr. Low: Perhaps the minister can say whether there is any authority within a province that could be used to induce a firm or a person to remedy the interference.

Mr. Chevrier: There might be, but I do not know under what legislation it could be enforced. I think these things have to be done by education and by asking people to co-operate with us. We find that out of the large number of cases investigated 80 per cent, if not more, do co-operate.

Mr. Herridge: I have one more question arising out of the remarks I made the other day. This matter has been brought to my attention by a number of people, and I have had personal experience with this sort of thing on one or two occasions. Your officer arrives in a small community in a very nice van marked "Transport department, Canada, radio division". It is very soon mooted around the community that the gentleman is there, and many of the offending machines do not go into action until the owners know that he has left the village again. Do you think it would be possible for these people to travel with less publicity?

Mr. Chevrier: I will ask our people if they can do anything.

Mr. Herridge: I make that suggestion.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): My experience is that a large number of operators of radio receiving sets are unaware that anything can be done about radio interference. Even if they do know, they do not know how to go about getting it under control. Could consideration be given to printing a statement on radio licences, if they continue to be issued, informing operators of receiving sets whom they should communicate with in order to have interference dealt with?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand there is quite a bit of publicity in connection with our operations. We carried on a series of programs over the air indicating that this service was available. We also advertised it to the public by means of circulars. When radio dealers sell equipment they advise the purchaser. I could add another indication, the fact that as a rule my correspondence contains letters from people who write from all parts of Canada and say that there is interference in this, that or the other district. I think the public is gradually getting to know that we have this service.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Suppression of radio interferences—

502. Administration, operation and maintenance, $408,495.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I gather that most of the discussion for the last few minutes has actually been on item 502.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right. It has been on this item.

The Chairman: Item 503 also has to do with radio interference. Does the committee wish to consider the two items at once? They both have to do with radio interference.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

503. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $31,600.

Mr. Knowles: The case of interference which I should like to mention is a little different from the type of interference discussed by the last few speakers. It relates to the way in which one station in Winnipeg seems to prevent people from hearing another station. May I say to the minister that I have taken the matter up with Mr. Dunton, the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and he indicated to me that the matter is really one that comes under the Department of Transport. Nevertheless he was familiar with the problem and wrote me in reply to my representations. I appreciated Mr. Dunton's letter, and I appreciate the fact that the matter of allotting channels so that everyone will get a hearing seems to be a problem that is difficult to solve. The Winnipeg station to which I refer particularly is CKY, which is at 580 kilocycles. To give the whole picture perhaps I should indicate that the Winnipeg stations are CKY at 580; CKRC at 630; CBW at 990; CKSB at 1250 and CJOB at 1340. So far as I can ascertain none of these Winnipeg stations interfere with each other. They are well placed, and that is fairly good considering that this adds up to five stations in the Winnipeg area. However, there are Winnipeg people who like to be able to tune in on one or other of the major United States networks. The nearest outlet for the NBC network is KFYR in Bismarck, North Dakota, at 550. The nearest outlet for the Columbia network is KSJB at 600, which is in Jamestown, North Dakota. It is in connection with KSJB at 600 and CKY Winnipeg at 580 that we get into difficulty. In the other cases there seems to be no difficulty, but the people who want to listen to the Columbia network through KSJB at 600 tell me they are frequently prevented from doing so because of interference from CKY at 580.

As I say, I have taken the matter up with Mr. Dunton but as yet no solution to the problem seems to have been found. It is a case of interference which is different from the other types of interference members have been talking about. Mr. Dunton does say the matter comes under the Department of Transport. Can the minister say whether his officials have looked into this matter and considered whether any other arrangement can be made or anything done to rectify this situation?

Mr. Chevrier: Indeed they have, Mr. Chairman, but it is a very difficult problem and one which is not easy to solve. It is a difficult problem because it arises in every country, not only in Canada and the United States. The best method of reaching a solution is through the international conferences which take place from year to year. There is the North American regional broadcasting conference which sat at Montreal for some time and dealt in part with this question. It sat at Washington last year, and we have delegates to that conference whose duty and responsibility it is to try to iron out these difficulties. These conferences give consideration to the general question of interference between stations in the same country or between stations in one country and stations in another country. I believe that with the new technical developments it may be possible to stop the interference, but I do not know. I can assure the hon. member that our officers are seized with the problem and are doing the best they can to solve it.

Item agreed to.

504. Issue of radio receiving licences (Transport department only), $769,752.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if he will indicate to the committee the basis upon which radio receiving licences are now being issued. The reason I asked this question is that last year, in the special committee on radio broadcasting, I understood that a recommendation had been made that the plan for collecting radio licence fees be changed. It was my impression that whatever that plan was, it was to be implemented, but so far as I can ascertain no change has been made as yet. Is it intended to change to the plan recommended by the committee, and if so, when? Or on the other hand is it the intention to continue as at present?

Mr. Chevrier: In the first place, there has been no change in the system of collecting radio licence fees. Radio licences are still sold by house to house canvass, through post offices, radio dealers and the like. In so far as the committee is concerned my opinion, although I was not a member of the committee, is that they made no recommendation. As a matter of fact I recall the chairman of the committee discussing the matter with me and telling me a recommendation had been made to the committee, but that the committee had not seen fit to accept it.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps we had better both check and find out what happened. If my memory is correct, I think it happened this way. The Minister of National Revenue, who was a member of the committee, indicated to the committee that the change was to be made.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is the other way around. I believe a witness suggested that the change might be made, and my recollection is that the Minister of National Revenue thought it would be unwise to make the change.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I notice there is an increase of a little over $50,000 this year in this item. I presume that is due to the fact that there are more radio receiving sets in use now than there were. However, there are certain things in my mind which I should like the minister to clear up.

It seems to me that this is an extremely inefficient method of taxation. I realize that the minister's department is concerned only with the issuing of licences and collecting of the fee, and that the necessity for doing that is a matter of policy. It would seem to me that radio licences are issued primarily for the collection of the fee, and not for any regulatory purposes. Since it requires an amount of $769,000 each year to collect the fee, representing something like 30 cents per license, and since from the nature of the thing it is relatively easy to evade the tax, I feel it creates inequalities. There are certain sections of the country where the services provided by the CBC are not as readily available as they are in other sections. Then some language groups do not have the same service as other language groups. In view of these facts, has consideration been given to the possibility of eliminating the radio licence entirely, especially since it has become necessary to vote large sums out of the general taxation revenues to the CBC? The funds available from the sale of radio licences are entirely inadequate.

In a short time further complications will arise due to the fact that television will be coming into operation. At the present time television receivers do not require a licence, since there is no television service provided by the CBC. When such a service is provided, another problem will be created as to what the cost of a television licence should be as compared to a radio licence.

Mr. Chevrier: This is not nearly as inefficient a method of collection as the hon. member might think. While $769,000 is a lot of money, still about half goes for payment of commissions and half for salaries. Collections this year amounted to $5,816,000, which means that if the $2.50 licence fee had not been available the CBC would have received that much less money for programs and its services generally. It might on the whole appear to be a large percentage for collecting that amount but we have been unable, so far, to devise a better scheme. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to recommendations that were made to the committee; but the committee saw fit not to accept them, so we simply carried on with the same method.

Then with reference to the question of policy, there has been no decision made to change it, and the intention is to carry on with the fee as it is now.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to consider items 505 and 506 together? They are on telegraph and telephone service.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Telegraph and telephone service—

505. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,519,852.

506. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $552,000.

Mr. Low: Will the minister explain to the committee just what the department's policy now is with respect to the maintenance of telephone and telegraph service in various parts of the country?

Mr. Chevrier: The policy is to assist those people who reside in isolated parts of Canada. I do not want to select any one part more than another. We try to maintain telephone and telegraph services in remote sections, so as not to deprive any part of Canada of service, until such time as a private corporation can step in and take over. In certain areas of Quebec and the maritime provinces it has become a regular policy to assist municipalities and sometimes private corporations. On the west coast in British Columbia we are trying to divest ourselves of these operations because there is one company—if there are not two—showing interest in taking it over. If we can get a reasonable price for our facilities we will sell them. The main policy is to assist these isolated areas until such time as they can operate their own services.

Mr. Low: I have reference now particularly to the lines in the Peace river country. I wanted first to tell the minister how much those lines have meant to the people up in that great north country. For the past seven or eight years I have been fairly well acquainted with the work the transport people are doing up there.

I wonder if the minister has been made acquainted with the situation up at Keg River. I imagine it would take a little while to get the information on it, but here is the situation. The line runs across country from Peace River. It was intended, of course, to penetrate the great northwest and give service and communication on up into the Great Slave lake area. This little settlement—I do not know whether you would call it a settlement or not; it is not a village, just a settlement—at Keg River is one of the principal terminals on the route. It happens to be about ten miles off the main highway leading from Grimshaw north into the Slave lake area. As a consequence the line is not nearly as valuable in maintaining communication with the outside world as it might be if they had followed the main highway north a little bit more closely.

I know how costly it might be to change the location of the line. But here is your Mr. Herrington, who is the operator—and he has been in there for a good many years—living at the Keg River settlement, carrying on his work, sending in his weather observations every few hours, keeping in touch with the Peace River headquarters and all that sort of thing, and transmitting the information that needs to be transmitted back and forth. But the people who are travelling through that newly-opened country are passing along the highway ten miles to the east. At various times of the year it is difficult to get to that line or to any terminal in case of necessity. It is the only line up there. I was wondering whether some consideration might be given to moving the terminal up to the highway east of Cape river, so that better use could be made of it.

I want to compliment the people up there who are doing that work. They have done a fine job. That has been a service the people have greatly appreciated. I just wondered whether any consideration had been given to moving the line up along the highway.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware of the particular case to which my hon. friend refers, but I will take it under advisement now and will ask our officers to see if it cannot be done.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take just a few minutes to thank the Department of Transport for the installation within the last two years of a radiotelephone system between the mainland of Charlotte county and Grand Manan island. For many years we had a submarine cable system between the mainland and the island, a distance of about 20 miles. During the winter months, when the weather was rough, they would find that their cable would be out of order. Then businessmen on the island were obliged to go 20 miles by water in order to make telephone or telegraph communication in connection with their business.

Two years ago this matter was discussed with the New Brunswick Telephone Company and through their co-operation and the co-operation of the Department of Transport a radiotelephone system was installed which today is working very successfully. It is appreciated by the people on Grand Manan island. It is a system of such a nature that, should anything happen in the winter months or in the summer months, it could be repaired without taking up the cable in rough water. For that reason it is considered to be very reliable and it means a great deal to the businessmen and citizens in this locality.

Mr. Green: When the minister spoke the other night and again this evening, he mentioned that the department is planning to dispose of a portion of the telephone and telegraph system in British Columbia. Can he give us some more details of the portion involved? Does he mean merely that portion which is in the Cariboo district, or will it include the lines at the coast on Vancouver island?

Mr. Chevrier: It is the whole system.

Mr. Green: And north of Hazelton up to the Yukon?

Mr. Chevrier: The whole system.

Mr. Green: Everything in British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: Is there any agreement under negotiation at the moment?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not.

Mr. Green: That could only mean turning it over to the British Columbia Telephone Company, could it not?

Mr. Chevrier: In part to the British Columbia Telephone Company and in part to the Canadian National Telegraphs.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know the minister is getting tired and I do not want to pester him too much. I notice that this telephone and telegraph service is operated by the Department of Transport. That is separate and distinct from the Canadian National Telegraphs?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the Department of Transport operate any telephone or telegraph system in Newfoundland? I do not think it does.

Mr. Chevrier: No, we do not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before union in 1949 the government down there operated a telegraph system, with some telephones connecting up with the telegraph, and this system always paid. It was part of the department of posts and telegraphs, and it was the paying section of that department. Since 1949 has the Canadian National Telegraphs adopted the policy that is referred to here:

> The chief function of this service is to provide telegraph and telephone service in remote or sparsely populated sections of the country . . .

In other words, in conformity with what the minister said a few minutes ago, to try to unite the country. I know of areas where there is no telephone communication. I know lots of people who would be glad to get a telephone in their homes if they could get it at such a reasonable rate as that granted to the people on the Magdalen Islands. Has the minister ever thought of that policy?

Mr. Chevrier: Their policy is not necessarily the same as ours. As my hon. friend knows, the Canadian National Telegraphs try to operate their business as profitably as possible; but they do try, accordance with a formula, to extend their telephone and telegraph services. I understand they have a plan which they intend to put into effect by degrees. I think that would be a matter which could be more properly discussed in the committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was not aware of that. It is not the department's intention to go into the business, I take it?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They will leave that to the Canadian National Telegraphs?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): So whatever representations are to be made should be made to that body.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Items agreed to.

Northwest communication system—

508. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $365,514.

Mr. Green: I think we have not got that far, Mr. Chairman. I think we are on item 506.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought we were carrying both of them together, but it is all right.

Mr. Green: Is there to be any extension this year of this telephone and telegraph system operated by the government.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, we have some money in this estimate for British Columbia in which my hon. friend is particularly interested: Dawson Creek and Pouce Coupe, $35,000. There is a continuing development of exchanges and distribution facilities which will cost, as I say, $35,000. At Quesnel we are purchasing and erecting a telephone cable to connect the radio range and the transmitting station with the airport, a distance of five miles, at a cost of $25,000. At Port Alberni to Ucluelet there is an extension of the telephone and telegraph facilities between these points, a distance of 125 miles, at a cost of $50,800. Then from Sechelt to Pender Harbour there is improvement and expansion of telephone facilities between these points, a distance of 35 miles at a cost of $29,000. There are a number of other items in Cape Breton, and in Alberta, and so forth.

Item agreed to.

Northwest communication system—

507. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1953, $276,596.

Mr. Green: What part of the northwest does this communications system cover?

Mr. Chevrier: It is parallel to the Alaska highway.

Mr. Green: I see that the vote this year is more than double what was required last year. Why is that?

Mr. Chevrier: It is because of wage increases, which amounted to $43,461; increased material costs, $62,608; labour costs, due to an increase of 3 cents in wage awards and the operation of the 40-hour week to which the northwest communications system is committed, $34,764. Then there is a general and miscellaneous item of $8,763. That makes a total of $199,000.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological division—

509. Administration, operation and maintenance, $6,484,500.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question with regard to this item. I note that although this is referred to as the meteorological division, it is included in air services. Is this just for air, or is this the weatherman for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: It is, although air services include not only meteorological services but also radio and civil aviation; and under this vote come the weathermen, those who operate our weather station. It also includes those who prognosticate the weather from day to day.

Mr. Knowles: That is a good word for it.

Mr. Chevrier: It is responsible for providing meteorological services for all civilian and military purposes in Canada, for shipping in adjacent ocean areas; on the great lakes, and for international aviation over the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. It includes a pretty long list of items, because it is a substantial vote; for instance, the issue of public weather forecasts and the summaries that are given two to four times a day for 76 public weather regions. And it also covers 982 climatological stations, 241 surface weather reporting stations, 28 radiosonde stations, 2 aviation forecast offices and 11 main forecast offices situated in the main districts of aviation in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I note that the item includes a contribution to the world meteorological organization. Can the minister tell us how universal is that organization? Are all nations co-operating? If not, which notable exceptions are there.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I do not know of any exceptions. I think all the nations that are members of the United Nations Organization are also members of the world meteorological organization, including Soviet Russia.

Mr. Knowles: Is it a specialized agency of the United Nations, or does it stand on its own feet?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a specialized agency of the United Nations.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In this connection I speak subject to correction; I am not absolutely sure, but I think the Department of Agriculture, where they have experimental stations, keep weather data. I do not suppose they forecast the weather, but they certainly keep weather data. Is there any co-operation or liaison between the weather service of the Department of Agriculture and the meteorological service?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

511. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $831,861.

Mr. Bryce: Would it be convenient for the minister to answer my question now?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the question which my hon. friend asks of me is really a difficult one to answer. I remember speaking to him about it, and I remember this correspondence.

It is a difficult one, because it is complicated legally. When I received his question I wrote to Canadian Pacific Air Lines to get some information from them, and when I inquired from my officers today there had been no reply. A telephone call was made to see if a reply could be obtained so I could give it in the house, but unfortunately it was not forthcoming. Therefore the only assurance I can give my hon. friend is that I have it under advisement, and I shall try to get him an answer as quickly as I can.

Mr. Bryce: I want to thank the minister for the trouble he is taking. He can understand how anxious I am to do something for this widow whose husband lost his life in that plane accident. Surely there should be some compensation, or something done for the woman. I thank you, and I hope you will continue to try to get some information.

Mr. Chevrier: I will try to get something for you.

Mr. Bryce: She is not able to afford legal assistance.

Mr. Green: This afternoon I brought up the question of the possibility of having a crash boat or some life-saving service established at Sandspit on Queen Charlotte islands, and the minister was going to check on that point and let me know when this item came up for discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I have not had an opportunity of doing it. As this discussion goes on perhaps I could speak to one of the officers here.

Mr. Green: Another point has to do with the situation in Canada in so far as transport planes are concerned. I think that was raised during the discussion of the estimates last year. About a year and a half ago there was a good deal of concern because Canada had no reserve of transport planes available in the event of trouble. There was a discussion at that time of plans by which the government might acquire transport planes and turn them over to civilian operators on a loan or lease basis. Other plans were also considered. Can the minister tell us whether any such scheme is in operation or contemplation?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The government has that matter very seriously under consideration and it has done a number of things to assist the operators of commercial transport planes. I am not free to discuss them fully, because I hope before this session is over it will be possible to bring in an amendment to one of the acts, which will be of assistance. Then I believe we did take action in the budgetary resolutions to facilitate the importation of planes from the United States. There is also under study now the question of whether or not it will be possible to assist the purchasers of these planes by way of additional depreciation. We feel that the suggestions I have indicated would be better than if the Department of National Defence were to buy them and hold them, or in the event of emergency turn them over to private companies.

Mr. Green: Are we still very short of transport planes in Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: There has been a steady but slow increase in the number of these planes coming in.

Mr. Green: But it is a definite policy of the government to take steps to increase the number of transport planes?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is.

Mr. Green: One other question: I understand there has been an application by Canadian Pacific Air Lines for permission to fly from Vancouver to South America. Would the minister tell the committee whether that application has been granted?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no such application. There is some talk of Canadian Pacific Air Lines flying to South America via the west coast. That, I presume, when it is determined, would have to be decided after agreement with the countries of South America. No formal application has been made, and we have made no representations to the government of Mexico. There has been no formal approach, although there has been some correspondence between the Department of External Affairs and the state department, or its equivalent, in Mexico. The matter is very much to the fore.

Mr. Green: The government would approve the inauguration of such service?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Item agreed to.

Operation and maintenance—

512. Civil aviation services, $9,325,320.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the department officially make investigation with respect to accidents to commercial aircraft?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, we do. There is provision in the Aeronautics Act for the appointment of an investigator when a crash takes place.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will there be any announcement of results before the publication of the annual report of the department? Do they appear anywhere else?

Mr. Chevrier: They appear in public statements made by the minister. When the report has been completed and sent in to the air transport board, they communicate it to the minister, and a public announcement of the findings is made.

Item agreed to.

513. Airway and airport traffic control, $1,425,396.

Mr. Green: The minister made reference to item 513 when he opened discussion on his estimates. I believe he said some of this expenditure was being made on behalf of the Department of National Defence. Why is that necessary? Why is it handled in that way?

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of National Defence have asked us to take over a number of airports, and they do ask us to take over airports from time to time. That is why a portion of this covers those airports. This obtains generally where there is traffic which is partly military and partly civil. In these airports the Department of National Defence asks us as a rule to take over the civil air operation of the airport.

Mr. Green: Then I asked the minister if he could give us the valuation placed on the Vancouver airport by his valuator. He said he did not have that information at hand at the moment, but I understood he would make it available at a later date.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I can make that report available. It was a confidential report to me. I was asked for that same information by the mayor and municipal authorities of Vancouver; and, so that they would feel that nothing was being hidden, I sent them a summary covering I believe all the information they required. They seemed to be satisfied, because they did not ask for the report itself. In that summary is contained the figure for which the hon. member is asking. I cannot recall what it was, and would not like to give it from memory.

Mr. Green: Press dispatches indicated that it was $1,503,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I would think that is probably correct.

Mr. Green: Is it approximately correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I believe so; but I am speaking from memory, and it is several months since I have seen it.

Mr. Green: What is the minister's objection to having this long-standing dispute referred to arbitration, or decided by the exchequer court. It seems to me unfortunate that it should drag on for three or four years without reaching any agreement. One result is that the city has not the money available to help build a new bridge to replace the Marpole bridge. I believe the council plan to use the money they get from the department for that purpose. What is the objection to having it arbitrated?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is anything to arbitrate. I presume the city think we should buy the land. We have indicated to them we do not think we should. We are willing to pay a reasonable price for the buildings. It was on that basis that the offer was made. It may be that a compromise can be found. As indicated the other night, I understand some of the officials from Vancouver are coming down to discuss the matter further, and I shall welcome any discussion. Beyond that I cannot say more.

Mr. Green: Why is a different position taken by the department with respect to that airport from that concerning the airport at Dorval, which I believe was paid for entirely by the department?

Mr. Chevrier: I indicated the other night that the position is the same with respect to all airports in Canada, where municipalities have contributed something. The only exception is Dorval, because of the transfer that was made from St. Hubert, which was a military airport, to Dorval. The government in those years felt it should purchase the land, and it did. That is the only exception.

Mr. Green: The government has paid everything in connection with Dorval?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand it has.

Mr. Green: How much has it cost, approximately?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not have that information on this item, but I can get it.

Mr. Green: What about Malton?

Mr. Chevrier: A substantial contribution has been made there by the city of Toronto and, I believe, by the harbour commission. In fact, a large part of the property is still owned by Malton.

Mr. Green: I do not wish to take up more time on it, but the minister knows that the Vancouver airport is an international airport. It is far beyond the position of being only a municipal airport. I do suggest the department should not stick to the position that it will pay nothing whatever for the land. It should be possible to reach some agreement.

Mr. Chevrier: We are giving it our best attention.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a few words about the matter which has just been discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in connection with the Vancouver international airport. I am partly in agreement with what he says. I certainly am in agreement with his statement that the Vancouver international airport is a very important airport. The figures given by me by Mr. William Inglis, the manager of the Vancouver airport, show that for the first three months of this year passengers out of that airport totalled 92,211, an increase of 16 per cent over the same period in the previous year; airmail amounted to 702,281 pounds, an increase of 23 per cent; air cargo amounted to 823,966 pounds, an increase of 14 per cent, and aircraft movements, which are the real indication of the business carried on by an airport, were 40,929, an increase of 45 per cent.

Great things are going on at that airport and I want to compliment the minister upon what he has done in the way of improvements. At the present time we are building a runway which will be the longest in Canada at a cost of something like $2 million. The investment of the government of Canada in that airport at the present time far outweighs the investment of the city of Vancouver.

I think the minister is making an error in attempting to draw a parallel between the Vancouver international airport and the development which has taken place at Malton or Dorval. In 1929 the city council of Vancouver, with far more foresight than they dreamed at that time, purchased some 475 acres of land to form the nucleus of what is now an airport consisting of some 1,400 acres. They own only 475 acres. In the case of Malton there was an agreement between Toronto and the department under which Toronto supplied the land and the federal government provided the investment necessary for capital improvement. I think more or less the same arrangement applied in the case of Dorval and Montreal.

As I say, the history of the purchase of Vancouver airport goes back to 1929. In 1945 the city decided they wanted to retain control of the airport and it was returned to them at that time by the government. The city has been operating it since. They now wish to dispose of their interests in the airport, and they are asking for only the money which they have put into it.

I am informed that they are agreeable to accepting $1,100,000 as a discharge of their investment. The minister has indicated that the city authorities are coming down to see him shortly, and I hope at that time he will feel disposed to take over full control of this airport and pay the city $1,100,000. I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra realizes that there has been a dispute among the city authorities. He must realize that a bylaw would have to be passed in connection with this, and the authorities wanted to arrive at a figure which they could recommend to the citizens of Vancouver.

As he knows, the first suggestion they made was that they should be paid $2,500,000. That sum was quite in excess of the investment of the city in the airport; it was quite in excess of the compounded losses, interest charges and retirement of debt on the bonds. As I say, I am informed that they are now agreeable to accepting $1,100,000. I must compliment the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra upon the agility he has shown from time to time in confusing the airport with the bridges which give access to the airport and which he and I both know are solely the responsibility of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Green: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Laing: If my hon. friend will study the agreement I think he will agree that at least the initiative must be taken by the province of British Columbia because the existing bridges are their full responsibility.

The Chairman: Let us confine ourselves to airports.

Mr. Laing: I am just concluding. I do hope that when the city fathers come down here shortly the minister will give them every consideration. We in that area are extremely proud of this airport, which is beginning to be heard about not only in Canada but throughout North America. It is going to be one of the great airports in North America. Next year Canadian Pacific Air Lines will begin service to the Orient, flying Constellations to Hawaii and then jets to the Orient. We should pay some attention to what is going on in the United States, where a recent merger has occurred between Capital Airlines and Northwest Airlines. I understand United States lines are in position today to sell through tickets from Florida to Tokyo.

We are justly proud in Canada of the great strides aviation is making. A report made recently by one of the ministers indicates the great primary work done by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in expanding Canada's air facilities. Canada is now the second nation in the world in point of air travel outside the country. That is a very proud position to have and we must see that we maintain it on the west coast as well as on the east coast. We can do that by continuing the excellent degree of improvement and the providing of new facilities which is being carried on at the present time at Vancouver international airport. It is my thought that this work could be carried on more effectively if the government had full control.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—Construction services—

515. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—capital, $7,517,450.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the revenue for the use of airports collected by the department?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and paid over to the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It does not reduce this in any way?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Balcom: As most members know, Halifax means practically everything east of Moncton but it is without an airport able to handle the heavy transport planes. This means that a person going to Montreal from Halifax must shuttle back and forth in the smaller planes. We were greatly pleased when we heard the announcement that Halifax was to have a new airport and I was wondering if the minister could tell us the present status of these plans.

Mr. Chevrier: All I can say is that our people have made a survey of the site and it must be determined whether the weather conditions are such that we can operate at that site. That determination has not been made, but it is progressing.

Mr. Dickey: I should like to associate myself with what my colleague has said with regard to our satisfaction at the statement the minister has made. Can the minister state whether the arrangements for the purchase of the site have been made, or just what the status is?

Mr. Chevrier: All I can say—no doubt my hon. friend knows this—is that the city are willing to make a contribution toward the purchase of the site. I cannot state exactly what that is.

Mr. Dickey: There has been nothing further?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to help out my hon. friends from Halifax on this particular matter because I have raised it in the house on one or two occasions. I am not completely satisfied with the answer of the minister. The matter of an airport for Halifax has been in the slings for some considerable time, and I think it is pretty nearly time the department got around to doing something definite about it. As the minister knows, the city of Halifax as such has no air facilities. There is no airport at all. If you want to get out of Halifax by air you have to cross over to Dartmouth and travel down to Eastern Passage airport which at the present time is managed and owned by the naval service. The airport at Eastern Passage is such that North Stars and other large planes cannot land there. It is a naval station and is used almost exclusively for that purpose. The city of Halifax as such has no airport whatsoever.

I think the members from that area have been patient and long-suffering because the answer we got from the minister tonight is the answer we have been getting for at least three years. He says the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is correct. I am sure my hon. friend does not want to make that statement. The first question I had about the Halifax airport was from my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, and that was less than a year ago.

Mr. Gillis: If you will look at the records you will find that I raised the question at least three years ago and made a detailed statement with respect to the expansion of the airport at Eastern Passage or the building of a new airport in Halifax proper.

Mr. Chevrier: There was no question of building it at that time.

Mr. Gillis: The matter was under consideration then and the minister was going to have a look at the proposition. The minister took a look at it and a site was purchased. From the minister's answer tonight, the project is still in the embryo stage and it is all very vague. I belong to the province of Nova Scotia and I am interested in that province and in the city of Halifax from the standpoint that an airport for the city should be considered at this time as part of the national defence program. Halifax is one of the most important shipping ports east of Montreal. In the event of war it would be a very vulnerable city. It is not only very vulnerable, but if anything happened to it people would find it almost impossible to get out of the city. The members from Halifax are well aware of that.

If there was a disaster of any kind and the city had to be evacuated it certainly could not be done by highway or train. The highway is practically blocked because of the bottleneck around Fairview. Only one car at a time can get through the narrow viaduct over which the railway travels, and there would be a mess if people had to get out of the city in a hurry. From the standpoint of civil defence the only chance of evacuating people from the city would be by air, and there is nowhere in the city a plane can land. On the other side of the harbour at Eastern Passage there are no facilities for a plane of any size to land.

I think the department should give serious consideration to the building of an airport at Halifax from the standpoint of national defence and civil defence because it is absolutely necessary for those purposes. I am not trying to browbeat the minister at all. I know he is a very co-operative minister and will do what he can, but on this matter he is not getting the co-operation behind the scenes that he should get. There are appropriations in the estimates for improvements to airports all over the country, and no section of Canada is in greater need of an airport today than the city of Halifax. I suggest that the minister should try to reach a definite understanding on the matter.

I raised the question before with the Minister of National Defence from the point of view of improving or expanding the facilities already at Eastern Passage. My understanding at that time was that it was a naval station, that they were only interested in improving it for that purpose, and that the matter of establishing a civil airport was one for the Department of Transport. As soon as the minister possibly can I think he should make a detailed examination of the necessity for an airport there, considering it from the point of view of civil defence and national defence, and try to give the house some definite undertaking. I know there is great anxiety in the city of Halifax on this matter, and I should like to see the minister give the house something more definite than he has been able to give so far.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I was vague and indefinite in the statement I made a moment ago, but I can tell my hon. friend that a decision has been taken to establish an airport at Halifax. Before the airport is built and the strips are put in we have to get a site. The mayor of the city of Halifax came to Ottawa and assisted by the two members from that city made representations. We indicated to him that if he would make a contribution we would be glad to consider the matter. The mayor then indicated he was prepared to make a contribution and advised me of that fact. I said to him in reply that I would want to look at the site that he had in mind. Our officers have that site under consideration. They are studying it with reference to climatological conditions, and if the atmospheric conditions and the like are satisfactory after study and detailed survey we will go ahead with votes in the estimates for the construction of the airport.

Mr. Stick: I understood about a year ago that consideration was being given to a new terminal building at Gander. The minister is familiar with the terminal building there. It is a converted wartime hangar. As everybody knows, Gander is one of the most important airports in Canada. Royalty are arriving there, and persons from the east. They are travelling back and forth. There is no decent terminal or hotel. I think consideration should be given to providing a decent terminal together with a small hotel to accommodate these people. Passengers arrive there in the hundreds every day. Has the minister anything to say on the matter? Would he give it consideration? Numerous people in Newfoundland have requested that some consideration should be given to a new terminal at Gander.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter is under consideration now.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As has been pointed out to the minister already, I believe, considerable concern has been expressed by the city of Charlottetown about the inadequacy of the airport there. It is used as the chief operating centre of a very progressive airline company and its runways are inadequate to such an extent that the aircraft now in use have to cut their pay loads in order to operate under the existing limitations. I understand that the city of Charlottetown is prepared to acquire and put at the disposal of the department any land which might be required in a program of extending the runways. I would be interested to know if there is provision in this item for any expansion there.

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not. The mayor of the city of Charlottetown has made representations to me, and others have as well. We are sending two of our officers there to look at the airport.

Item agreed to.

517. Contributions, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities in the development of and improvement to airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities, $67,000.

Mr. Herridge: When speaking on item 1 I brought to the minister's attention a fact which he already knew, namely, that the people of Castlegar have asked for a grant of $50,000 in order to complete the runways of their airport. I also pointed out that the municipality of Nelson has asked for a small grant for the airstrip by the lakeshore, and the city of Revelstoke has asked for $5,000 toward the completion of their small airport. I brought to the minister's attention the great importance of these facilities in increasing the development of the area. I notice there is no provision in the estimates for these airports. Can the minister tell the committee if further consideration has been given to these requests by his officials?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. They are for the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

518. Contributions, as specified in the details of the estimates, to other governments or international agencies for the operation and maintenance of airports, air navigation and airways facilities, $275,153.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In connection with this item 518, would the minister be kind enough to explain in greater detail than is shown here the exact use to which these contributions are put?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. These are contributions that ICAO makes on behalf of the government to Iceland; for contributions that are made to the government of Denmark, and for contributions to facilities at Grand Marais, Michigan, an airport on the transcontinental route. Roughly speaking the total is $275,000.

Item agreed to.

Administrative division—

519. Air services administration, $235,047.

Mr. Green: Since this is the last air item, has the minister the information concerning Sandspit?

Mr. Chevrier: That is the matter with reference to the crash boat? The information I have is that the departmental officials feel they could not provide a crash boat for the airport in question. If they did, it would be a provision which would have to be made for a number of other airports on our coasts that are in similar circumstances, and a policy in that regard has not been looked upon favourably, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Fair: Perhaps I had better bring another airport to the attention of the Minister of Transport. It has been taken up with the Minister of National Defence on several occasions, because it is being used and has been used for the past few years by officials of the defence department when on their way to the Wainwright military camp. At the present time there is another big military camp under construction in the lake district, and the airport is useful in that connection. It has also been suggested that should there be a bombing attack on Edmonton, and the facilities of that airport put out of business, then Vermilion would certainly be the next airport to be used. This airport has been used by planes on their way to Lloydminster, because on a couple of occasions that airport has been flooded. The regular planes have gone on to Vermilion, and then the passengers have been taken back to Lloydminster by automobile. I should like the Minister of Transport to consult with the Minister of National Defence on this question.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Fair: Quite a little money has been put into this project by the board of trade of Vermilion and the town council. The airport certainly has been of great value in the past, and should be of great value in the future if some of the things I have mentioned should take place. It would not take much money to make this an emergency landing strip of great value.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Has there been any request for or consideration given to grants to glider clubs?

Mr. Chevrier: There has, yes, but we have had to turn them down, because they are more of a recreational nature than anything else.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): They are very useful for teaching the basic principles of flying. Other countries have made great use of gliding, and it is much cheaper than flying powered aircraft.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but on the other hand there are so many demands for air services from all parts of Canada that we feel the money could be better expended.

Item agreed to.

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

521. Administration, operation and maintenance, $850,364.

Mr. Green: This is the board of transport commissioners item, and could the minister explain the increase in that vote?

Mr. Chevrier: It is in part consequent upon the increase in salaries given the members of the board, which I brought down in the house earlier in the year.

Mr. Green: But that is statutory, is it not?

Mr. Chevrier: The increase in salaries amounts to $53,144, and special assistance amounts to $116,000, totalling $169,144.

Mr. Green: In the details for this special assistance, it is described as special assistance in connection with the standardization of railway accounting procedures and general freight rates investigation. Does that refer to the general investigation the board is making leading to an equalization policy?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it does; and it also refers to some of the amendments which were made to the Railway Act having to do with the implementation of certain policies such as uniform accounting, and so forth.

Mr. Green: When is it expected that they will be through with their equalization inquiry?

Mr. Chevrier: The last time I was able to talk to the chairman, he indicated to me that he would like to have some hearings at various places in Canada. I am not able to say when.

Mr. Green: When will the hearings be held?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Maritime Commission—

Steamship subventions for ocean services—

Pacific ocean—

524. Canada, New Zealand and Australia, service between, and if either or both the governments of Australia and of New Zealand should request or authorize the Canadian maritime commission to act on its or their behalf in contracting for this service, the Canadian maritime commission is hereby empowered so to act, $166,667.

Mr. Green: Under this vote, could the minister tell us the present position with regard to subsidizing the Aorangi, plying between Vancouver and Australia?

Mr. Chevrier: The subsidy arrangement is being renewed for this year, and this is to provide for our share.

Mr. Herridge: I do not know whether I am quite in order on this item, perhaps it should have been on 522; but I should like to ask the minister whether he has received any representations from the government of British Columbia or any cabinet minister, suggesting co-operation between the province and the dominion government in subsidizing the Arrow lakes steamship service?

Mr. Chevrier: Not in the last few months.

Mr. Green: Is the agreement for the Australian service merely on a one year basis, or is there some longer term arrangement by which the service will be continued?

Mr. Chevrier: It is on a year to year basis.

Mr. Green: Which governments are associated?

Mr. Chevrier: New Zealand, Australia and Canada.

Mr. Green: Each puts up one-third?

Mr. Chevrier: Canada contributes two-thirds of the subsidy.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

525. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1952 on any or all of the following accounts: (a) retirement of maturing debentures—Saint John, $667,954; (b) reconstruction and capital expenditures—Halifax, $455,150; Saint John, $1,000,000; Quebec, $900,000; generally—unforeseen and miscellaneous, $100,000; less amount to be expended from replacement funds, $273,500, $2,181,650.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have any representations been made to this government by the government of Newfoundland regarding the setting up of a national harbour board?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but not in the last seven or eight months.

Mr. Green: The other day when the minister was speaking about local committees in the cities where there are these national harbours I think he mentioned that there was a committee in Halifax and also in Quebec. I understood from his remarks that these were committees which had been set up by interests in the cities to co-operate with the port management, and I presume to make recommendations and so on. Is that the actual picture?

Mr. Chevrier: In the case of Halifax, it is a corporate body that is being established by the provincial legislature. In the case of Quebec it is a group of people who have banded themselves together in an organization which is unincorporated.

Mr. Green: Would the national harbours board and the Department of Transport co-operate if a voluntary committee were to be set up for the port of Vancouver, made up of various bodies such as the merchants' exchange, the board of trade, the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the shipping people?

Mr. Chevrier: Of course the national harbours board would co-operate; but the Department of Transport is not concerned with the operations of the port of Vancouver.

Mr. Green: There would, of course, be no legal status for such a committee; but I should like to know whether the board would, as a matter of policy, co-operate with a committee of that type.

Mr. Chevrier: If they represented a group of citizens, they would; yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will proceed with the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister respecting the Emergency Powers Act and the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance respecting the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act. Then we will move to go into supply and call only two departments. Having disposed of those matters we will take up the other three resolutions: one to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the second to amend the Tariff Board Act and the third to amend the Canada Elections Act. Hon. members will see that they are minor matters. Then we would take up all the finance bills, but in what order I do not know.

Mr. Green: What are we going to do after that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Prorogue.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 26, 1952

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BASEBALL GAME BETWEEN MEMBERS AND PRESS GALLERY MAY 28

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege: it has been said the light that shines farthest shines brightest at home. We have heard a good deal about taking care of the home front. On Wednesday of this week there is to be a big game when the press gallery expects to put it all over the house. The game is to be a benefit for the sake of the page boy who broke his leg on Thursday evening. The privilege is that those who do not attend the game can contribute. It would be worth any man's while also to see the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the mound doing his stuff, the Speaker swinging at it, and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) trying to stop everything.

REDISTRIBUTION

CONSTITUENCY CHANGES IN MANITOBA—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My point of privilege is based on citation 198 of Beauchesne's third edition:

> Scandalous charges or imputations directed against members of a select committee are equivalent to libellous charges brought against the house itself.

In Saturday's issue of the Winnipeg Free Press there appears a story with respect to constituency changes in Manitoba. I read this sentence:

> In drawing the redistribution map the Manitoba chairman said he and his fellow members had worked "on a scientific basis".

The chairman referred to is the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau). My point of privilege is that as one of the alleged fellow members of that committee I had nothing whatever to do with the drawing of the map. It was presented to the committee by the chairman. The same newspaper publishes two maps, one of the province as a whole, one of the city of Winnipeg, and says that they are the proposals of the provincial subcommittee. As a member of that subcommittee I protest against this affront. They are only the proposals of the chairman himself.

Mr J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of personal privilege, I wish also to refer to these constituency changes in Manitoba, without repeating what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. He read the sentence which says that in drawing the redistribution map the Manitoba chairman said he and his fellow members had worked "on a scientific basis". I was a member of that subcommittee for Manitoba. The article also points out that this map is the proposal of the provincial subcommittee on federal redistribution. My matter of privilege is this. At our second subcommittee meeting we were handed a map by the chairman. There were only three of us present, the chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. We were told that this map was final and would be presented to the committee. I had nothing whatever to do with the drawing of this map, and I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had either. We are not parties to the proposal which will be presented to the general committee, so that this article from that point of view is absolutely untrue.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Sixth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT—DECISION OF COUNCIL

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, several days ago, questions were asked about the recent meetings of the international wheat council held in London. The eighth session of the council, which was opened on April 17 to consider an extension of the international wheat agreement, adjourned on May 9.

At the conclusion of the meetings, a short statement was issued by the chairman of the council summarizing the proceedings which should, I think, be placed on the record. I quote:

> The council has carried out a review of the provisions of the agreement and has decided that certain changes in the agreement would be desirable.

On the major question of price, the council concluded that fuller examination was required of some of the factors affecting the maximum and minimum prices to be incorporated in an extended agreement. The council wished to examine further, among other things, whether at stated intervals there should be an automatic variation of maximum and minimum prices based on some index which would reflect changes in the general price level.

The council decided to set up a continuing committee to investigate this question of flexibility and other matters which require to be further explored before the council can reach conclusions upon them. This committee will report to the next regular bi-annual session of the council which will begin on the 1st July next.

Under a provision of the present agreement, the council is under obligation to communicate to the exporting and importing countries, not later than the 31st July, 1952, its recommendations regarding the extension of the agreement beyond the 31st July, 1953, when the present agreement expires. It will therefore be for the council during its regular session in July to make recommendations on this subject. These are expected to be of an interim character and the council's detailed recommendations on amendments to the agreement, including those on maximum and minimum prices, will be for decision when the council resumes its eighth session late in 1952.

That is the end of the official statement by the council. May I add a word or two about the attitude taken by Canada at the meetings:

The Canadian delegation went to London prepared to negotiate a renewal of the agreement. For that purpose, the government appointed five advisers from the principal producer organizations in the prairie provinces to be available for consultations on the spot.

With the unanimous agreement of all the advisers, the Canadian delegation took the position that a substantial increase in prices was justified in a renewed agreement and made proposals along that line. The United States and Australia, the two other principal exporters, also put forward proposals for a substantially higher range of prices.

It soon appeared that there was a wide gap between the respective views of the exporting countries, on the one hand, and those of the importing countries, on the other hand, as to the level of the price range for a renewed agreement. This disparity in views was not altogether surprising considering that a renewed agreement would not come into effect until August, 1953, some fifteen months hence.

At the meeting just concluded, no country indicated that it was not prepared to continue the agreement. It was agreed, as the official statement indicates, that full-scale negotiations should be resumed at a later date, towards the end of the present calendar year, when all parties will have a clearer impression of the conditions which will prevail at the time that a renewed agreement would come into operation.

May I say in conclusion that the government is particularly grateful for the assistance given by the advisers from the farm organizations who, I am glad to say, gave complete support at all times to the views and proposals put forward by the Canadian delegation at the conference.

KOREA

USE OF CANADIAN TROOPS AT KOJE ISLAND PRISONER-OF-WAR CAMP

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement in regard to reports that Canadian troops have been moved to Koje island, in Korea, to participate in the guarding of communist prisoners of war on that island.

On the afternoon of Thursday, May 22, the chief of the general staff received a telegram from the officer commanding, 25th Canadian infantry brigade, Korea, to the effect that he had received an order from the first (commonwealth) division issued in accordance with a request from the United Nations command to post a company from the brigade to guard duty at the prisoner-of-war camp on Koje island, and that he was accordingly assigning a company from the Royal Canadian Regiment for this duty.

On receipt of this message an inquiry regarding the order was immediately made in Washington. The inquiry confirmed that the order had been given, and that orders had also been given for the posting of units from certain other national forces under the United Nations command to similar duty. It also appeared that the movement of the Canadian troops in question was under way.

The government feels that it is essential that the Canadian policy in respect of the breaking up of the Canadian brigade for miscellaneous duties in Korea should be made clear. A note has accordingly been presented to the state department in Washington.

The following is the text of this note:

The Canadian government recognizes the importance of re-establishing and maintaining effective control over communist prisoners of war captured in Korean operations. The Canadian government also recognizes that custody of prisoners of war is a military responsibility which should be performed in accordance with military requirements.

It has, however, been a long established policy of the Canadian government that Canadian forces dispatched abroad for military operations should remain under Canadian command and control and that, except in the event of a military emergency which does not permit of time for consultation, no part of these forces should be detached therefrom except after consultation and with the agreement of the Canadian government.

The Canadian government therefore views with concern the dispatch of a company of the 25th infantry brigade to Koje island without prior consultation with the Canadian government, and hopes that it may be possible to re-unite this company with the rest of the Canadian brigade as soon as possible. Meanwhile, the Canadian forces concerned will, of course, carry out loyally the orders of the unified command with respect to participation in guarding prisoners of war on Koje island. The Canadian government also wishes to be reassured that, if it is proposed in the future to detach any Canadian forces from Canadian command and control for military or other duties, this will be done only after consultation and with the consent of the Canadian government, except in the event of a military emergency which does not permit of time for such consultation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a question arising out of the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs? In view of the part Canadians are playing in connection with the custody of prisoners of war, whether for a temporary or a prolonged period, will Canada have a voice in other matters with reference to prisoners of war, particularly in relation to the truce talks?

Mr. Pearson: I do not wish at this time to add anything to the note I have just read. However, in regard to consultation, I should point out that there are regular meetings in Washington in which Canadian representatives, as well as the representatives of other countries with forces in Korea, participate. In those meetings we are kept generally informed as to the progress or lack of progress of the truce and other negotiations in Korea; and included in those negotiations of course is the question of prisoners of war.

Mr. Knowles: That is, we are informed but not necessarily consulted.

QUESTIONS

GRAIN—DIVERSION TO WESTERN MILLS

Mr. Argue:

1. How many bushels of wheat, oats, barley, flax, were diverted to mills in western Canada in the crop year 1950-51?

2. What was the rate and the amount of the diversion charge?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. As the diverting of wheat, oats and barley to mills and other processors in western Canada is a matter of negotiation, arrangement and settlement between elevator companies and the mills, processors, etc. concerned, the record of such diversions and diversion charges paid are not the subject of accounting by the Canadian wheat board.

2. As pointed out in answer No. 1, diversion charges are a matter of negotiation between the handling companies and the western mills, processors, etc. concerned. In 1950-51 the diversion charges agreed upon between the handling companies and the mills, processors, etc. were as follows:

Wheat—2 cents per bushel on grades No. 1 hard, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 northern, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 C. W. Garnet, No. 1 Alberta Red Winter, Nos. 2 and 3 Alberta Winter, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 C. W. Amber Durum, C. W. White Spring, and 2½ cents per bushel on all other grades; with an additional 1 cent per bushel on wheat grading tough No. 4 northern, and an additional ½ cent per bushel on all other grades of tough wheat, in accordance with arrangements between the companies and the mills.

Oats—3 cents per bushel on all grades in accordance with arrangements between the companies and the mills, and exclusive of quality premiums.

Barley—3 cents per bushel on all grades in accordance with arrangements between the companies and the mills, and exclusive of quality premiums.

Flax—As the Canadian wheat board does not handle flaxseed, it has no knowledge of diversion charges applicable to flaxseed.

For reasons stated in answer No. 1, the board has no knowledge of the total diversion charges paid.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STATION BUILDING AT WINDSOR

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. Have any instructions been given for the drawing of plans for a new Canadian National station at Windsor, Ontario?

Questions

2. If so, have any such plans been drawn or prepared for a new station at Windsor, Ontario?
3. If not, is it the intention of using any plans already prepared for any other location in the erection of a Canadian National station at Windsor, Ontario?
4. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to build a new station at Windsor, Ontario? If so, when?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. General layout plans have been completed.

3. No.

4. Faced with the necessity of making large capital expenditures in a period when key materials and labour are in short supply, the Canadian National Railways have been following the policy of giving precedence to projects designed to achieve economies and improve the efficiency of operation. The desirability of replacing the old station at Windsor will not be lost sight of in future planning of capital expenditures.

EQUIPMENT FOR NATO—CHECKING ON ARRIVAL

Mr. Pearkes:

How were the arms, stores and equipment which were sent from Canada to NATO checked and accounted for on arrival in Europe?

Mr. Blanchette:

Canadian army personnel in conjunction with the shipping agents check by means of ordnance issue vouchers all equipment and stores as they are loaded on the vessel.

Ocean bills of lading are prepared by the shipping agent of company concerned.

One copy each of the ordnance issue vouchers and the ocean bills of lading are retained by the captain of the ship.

One copy of the ordnance issue vouchers and the ocean bills of lading are forwarded to the official representative of the recipient country.

One copy of the ocean bills of lading is retained by army headquarters as a receipt for the equipment and stores shipped.

The recipient country is financially responsible for the movement of the equipment and stores overseas and therefore responsible for its checking and accounting on arrival in Europe.

If the hon. member wants those by-laws they are available; otherwise there would be no return under this order.

Mr. Pouliot: I would be grateful to the minister if he would let me have them for a start.

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE OF SECTIONS ONE TO THREE UNTIL MAY 30, 1953

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the following resolution:

That, whereas section four of the Emergency Powers Act, being chapter five of the statutes of 1951 (first session), provides that sections one to three of that act expire on the thirty-first day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-two, provided that if at any time while they are in force addresses are presented to the governor general by the Senate and House of Commons, respectively, praying that they should be continued in force for a further period, not exceeding one year from the time at which they would otherwise expire, and the governor in council so orders, they shall continue in force for that further period.

And whereas it is desirable to continue the said sections in force up to and including the thirtieth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-three.

The following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General, and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Excellency praying that sections one to three of the Emergency Powers Act be continued in force up to and including the thirtieth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-three.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to have parliament consider whether or not the special responsibility put upon the government to deal with possible emergencies which might arise because of the threatening world situation should be continued beyond the initial period provided for in the Emergency Powers Act, being chapter 5 of the statutes of 1951. The preamble of chapter 5 of the statutes of 1951 contains the following recitals:

Whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada;

And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations, to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence and to stabilize the economy and to safeguard it from disruption that may result from defence preparation in Canada or from emergency measures taken in other countries, in order that defence preparations may not be impeded;

And whereas it is preferable that the necessary emergency powers be exercised under special authority from parliament rather than that the War Measures Act be brought into force so long as present efforts to avert war are continuing and, moreover, it is not desirable that the wide powers conferred by that act to interfere with the fundamental liberties of the individual should now be brought into operation:

Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

The powers which it was made the responsibility of the government to exercise if and when necessary were expressed in section 2, subsections 1 and 2, which I think we should have on the record at this time. Section 2, subsection 1, is in the following terms:

2. (1) The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

(a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;

(b) control of communications and means of communication;

(c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada; and the movements of vessels;

(d) transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things;

(e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture; and

(f) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control.

Subsection 2 qualified these powers in the following way:

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained therein, the powers conferred on the governor in council by subsection one do not include power to make orders or regulations in relation to

(a) arrest, except as incidental to proceedings under section three; detention, exclusion or deportation of any person;

(b) censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings; or

(c) expenditure of moneys otherwise than in accordance with an appropriation by parliament except expenditure of moneys from any fund or account established by order or regulation in connection with a scheme of control for the purposes of that scheme of control.

Subsection 4 of the same section provided that any order or regulation made under the act would be tabled within five days from the date thereof if parliament was then in session, or within five days from the opening of parliament if it were not in session at the time. Subsection 5 provided that any order might be annulled by resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons within forty days from the tabling thereof. It will be remembered that an undertaking was given by the government that if there was any desire to propose such a motion an opportunity would be provided for its being dealt with expeditiously. Section 4 of the act provided that it would expire on the 31st of May but might be extended for a further period of not more than twelve months on resolution of the two houses of parliament. The resolution you have just read, Mr. Speaker, provides parliament with an opportunity to determine whether or not it should be so extended.

When the act was passed I think most members will recall that some were inclined to look upon it as a provision whereby the government was taking from parliament the right to exercise powers which normally belonged to parliament. In reality the purpose was to increase the responsibility of the government, subject to the control of parliament, to meet such emergencies as it might suddenly become necessary to deal with in order to preserve the peace, order and good government of the country in the then threatening international situation. It was not that the government wanted greater powers. It was passed because it was deemed to be a wise precaution to make it the responsibility of the government to act quickly if and when prompt action might be necessary, and to be able to take such action without proclaiming the more sweeping War Measures Act unless it became absolutely necessary to put that act into operation.

Fortunately for the people of Canada as well as for the government, since the Emergency Powers Act came into force it has not been necessary to have recourse to its provisions very often. In all, nineteen orders have been made under it. Five of these orders have to do with the great lakes seamen's security regulations. They are P.C. 1439 of March 22, 1951, P.C. 2101 of April 26, 1951, P.C. 2847 of June 4, 1951, P.C. 3855 of July 24, 1951, and P.C. 2306 of May 2, 1952. All these orders of course have the same aim and purpose. The reason why there have been five is that modifications have been made from time to time as experience showed that the existing order might cause some inconveniences in the trade which were not really necessary from the point of view of the security purposes envisaged by the regulations.

The Department of Labour and the Department of Transport have been in constant touch with ship owners operating on the great lakes and with the labour unions representing the men working the ships. These interested parties have from time to time recommended modifications. These have been considered by our security officials, and in many instances it has been felt that the representations could be recommended for modifications without imperilling the purpose for which the regulations were made.

As to the other fourteen orders, three have to do with the establishment of priorities control and the appointment of controllers. The orders are P.C. 2399 of May 16, 1951, P.C. 2621 of May 24, 1951, and P.C. 5645 of October 22, 1951. The first one created the order with respect to controls. The other two had to do with the appointment of officials to exercise the powers directed to be exercised by the regulations.

Then there were two orders, P.C. 4535 and P.C. 4558 of August 29, 1951, having to do with transport control and the appointment of a transport controller. It will be remembered that was done to facilitate the distribution of the required freight cars throughout the prairie provinces in order to move more expeditiously the grain that was destined for export.

There was also P.C. 1234 of March 3, 1952, made to control the export and import of cattle and meat products to and from the United States consequent upon the embargo resulting from United States laws when it was ascertained that foot-and-mouth disease had broken out in Canada. This order could probably have been made solely under the Export and Import Permits Act, but reference was made as well to the Emergency Powers Act so as to make it perfectly sure that the validity of the order could not be successfully challenged.

Then there was a security order, P.C. 3486 of July 4, 1951, which was exempted from publication for the reasons which I explained in the house on October 24 last in answer to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Interested members may find this explanation with respect to that order in Hansard on page 342.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the only one that was exempted from publication?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the only one that was exempted from publication. I had a word with the leaders of the various groups in the house in order to explain the general purpose of the order and the reasons why it was desirable that it should not be published. There was one other order made, P.C. 3484, of August 8, 1951, concerning the operation by agencies of the United States government and the United States defence forces of radio stations in Canada in connection with our joint arrangements for effective protection of the North American continent.

Another one of very small importance but which it was found very convenient to be able to make was P.C. 6598 of December 6, 1951, exempting from customs duties personal gifts of a value not exceeding $25 from members of the Canadian forces serving abroad and addressed to relatives or friends in Canada.

Those orders are still in force, and with the exception of the one dealing with the exportation and importation of livestock and meats, depend for their validity upon the Emergency Powers Act. That one might probably be sustained under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act.

There were five other orders which were passed under the Emergency Powers Act to put into effect at once provisions that it was intended to have enacted in a permanent form by legislation at the first convenient opportunity. They are as follows: P.C. 2932 of June 7, 1951, extending the provisions of the Defence Services Pension Act to members of the regular forces granted temporary commissions; and P.C. 3417 of July 4, 1951, concerning the disposition of offences committed prior to the coming into force of the code of service discipline. Both these orders have since been replaced by legislation included in the statute adopted under the title of the Canadian Forces Act, 1951. On July 31, 1951, there was an order made, P.C. 3415, concerning the agricultural products board which has since been established in legislative form by the Agricultural Products Board Act. On April 4, 1951, there was an order made, P.C. 1608, which it was hoped to replace by legislation before this time. It was to substitute other metals for nickel, because of the scarcity of nickel, in the Canadian five-cent piece. That is being covered by a proposal included in a bill to be introduced at this session concerning the currency and exchange fund acts.

On September 26, 1951, P.C. 5122 was made operative postponing the weigh-over of grain required by the Canada Grain Act. That was intended to be covered by legislation and there is a section to that effect in the Canada Grain Act amendment now before parliament.

Those are the nineteen orders that were made under these emergency powers. Hon. members will recognize the fact that no one of them has been challenged as improper by any member of parliament; and I think this list shows how fortunate we have been during that period in not having to deal with any more serious or troublesome emergencies than those to which the orders refer. It also shows how careful the government has been not to exercise the power to do anything not urgently required for the peace, order and good government of the country.

That has been a fortunate situation since the statute came into force, but the factual international situation set out in the preamble to this statute is much the same today as it was when that statute was adopted. When we are appropriating billions of dollars to meet the dangers of that international situation, we are doing it not because we expect to have our forces engaged in actual warfare but as a deterrent and so that they might be ready should the deterring purpose not be realized. We have thought that, while we are doing that, it is desirable that there be ready for use, if required, some extraordinary powers, though we sincerely hope that they may not have to be used. However, that is a matter for the houses of parliament to decide. It means placing continuing additional responsibility on the government.

I feel it is the government's duty to recommend to parliament that the provisions of this act be continued in existence for a further period of twelve months, giving all the same undertakings that were given when it was originally enacted as to making opportunity for bringing to a decision any resolution or vote designed to set aside any regulation that might be made. Under the present international situation I think it would be taking undesirably some risk in not having an instrument capable of being used expeditiously if conditions developed that required it to be used.

I trust that the experience of the last fourteen months—it is fourteen months now since the act was passed—will satisfy the uneasiness any hon. member might have felt at the possible danger of its being in the power of the government to discharge responsibility to meet an emergent situation rapidly. I can assure hon. members that there is no desire by the government to have extraordinary powers; but we feel that we would not be fulfilling our duties if, as the government, we did not recommend to parliament the desirability of having those extraordinary powers in reserve at a time when we still feel that the international situation requires the appropriating of these large sums of money to build up defence forces to meet what might arise, although we sincerely hope—and I think with some confidence after these many months—that it will not arise. I therefore recommend for the serious consideration of hon. members the question as to whether or not these powers should remain available for another period of twelve months.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in support of the motion the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has laid before the house the general provisions of the act itself and has indicated his own belief that the wording of the motion is one which should be accepted by hon. members of this house. The words of the motion which really raise a question for the consideration of all hon. members are as follows:

> . . . it is desirable to continue the said sections in force up to and including the thirtieth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-three.

The question before this house, Mr. Speaker, is whether it is appropriate for the representatives of the people, who were sent here to do the business of the people, to delegate their authority to the government, no matter what assurances the government may give as to its intentions to employ the terms of that act. This is not something that can be disposed of simply by a statement that the act has been in force for a year, and that it has only been used on eighteen occasions to pass laws by way of order in council. I submit that what should be considered by hon. members on both sides of the house is what the effect of this act is, and whether under any conditions which now exist the members are justified in delegating to the executive practically all of their responsibilities, subject only to the restraint that the government may exercise in employing the powers given by such an act.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said in effect, and I do not quote his exact words, that the purpose of this resolution is to determine whether the government should have the emergency powers to deal with situations which might arise in this uncertain world in which we are now living. I believe the question which should be determined by the members is a much more fundamental question than that. The Prime Minister has said that the government has no desire to possess extraordinary powers. He has given the assurance that it is not the intention of the government to employ these powers in any manner that would derogate from the authority of parliament. He has pointed out also that there are provisions for the tabling of orders in council, and that assurance has been given that if it were desired to present a substantive motion for the purpose of having the house consider any order in council the government would be ready to expedite the hearing of that motion.

I am not questioning the desire of the Prime Minister to interpret what might be in his mind in regard to the employment of an act of this kind. I can only repeat that it is the duty of every one of us to examine this act and say to ourselves, is the power conferred by this act a power which should be conferred upon any government in a time of general peace? Is this an act which should be passed by a parliament which is still able to maintain ordinary contact with those people whom it represents? Is this an act that should be passed at a time when there is no dislocation in our communications, and no threat of any dislocation in our communications? Is it an act which should be passed at a time when we realize that no matter what grave threats may impend, and no matter how very real the struggle may be for those who are now engaged in Korea, the life of our people is one which has the general appearance of peace? Those are the questions which should be in our minds. It is no answer to say, as some hon. members are inclined to say, that they have complete confidence in the government.

The question is whether this is an act which should be passed, no matter what government may be in power. It is that test which should be applied to any legislation which receives the approval of this house. The Prime Minister has spoken of the fact that the government has been careful not to employ the powers of this act too frequently or too extensively. I would point out that a number of the powers which have been exercised are powers which could have been exercised quite conveniently in another way. It seems to me that the very fact that some of those things have been done demonstrates how readily any government falls into the habit of a more convenient procedure which does not call for debate in the House of Commons.

As has been explained, several of the orders in council relate to the great lakes seamen's security regulations. As I understand it, the effect of these regulations was largely designed to provide a method by which communist activities amongst great lakes seamen might be dealt with. They were designed to provide a method for screening those who might have communist sympathies. At this point no one in the house will forget the number of occasions upon which I have sought amendments to the Criminal Code, so that in the form of clear and definitive law there might be a provision which would make it possible to deal with communists here in Canada. I do not believe that communist activities, which are designed and intended to undermine the strength of the state at a time when we are spending so much money and putting forward so much human effort to prevent communist aggression, should be permitted in this country. I have made it clear on every occasion that I have raised this subject that I do not think there should be arbitrary action in regard to communists. I believe in the rule of law. I believe we should define the offence. Unless the government is able to define the offence, then it should not be passing orders in council which relate to that offence which they say they cannot define. If there is some offence which can be described as communist activity or a specific activity of that nature, then it is either definable or it is not. If it is definable, the offence should be clearly stated in the Criminal Code. If it is not definable, then it should not be the subject of arbitrary provisions adopted behind closed doors.

I find that there was an order in council passed to deal with the five-cent piece. This was not a case where the famous quotation could be used, "not a five-cent piece". This was one case where the five-cent piece was regarded as being of sufficient importance for the government to deal with it, and they dealt with it by this order in council under the act because it was convenient to deal with it in that way. The question arises as to why this was not dealt with by an amendment to the Currency Act. The date indicates the reason this government conveniently dealt with it in that way. That order was passed on April 4, 1951. The house was sitting at that time. An amendment to the Currency Act could very conveniently have been introduced in this house and the members of parliament could have dealt with it in the ordinary way.

Then also there was an order passed on March 3, dealing with the importation of cattle and animal feed into Canada from the United States. True, it may have been convenient to pass this by order in council, but again may I point out that the house was sitting. Just a few days before we had been asked to deal expeditiously with a measure which was related to this subject. It was an act to provide compensation for those whose animals were destroyed as a result of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. The house by unanimous consent set aside other business and proceeded to deal with this measure. It would have been quite as easy to have dealt with that measure in the house. If it had been dealt with, it probably would have been suggested that this subject be given more consideration than was given to it at the time. It might have been suggested that the use of this measure, which looked a little like retaliation, was not exactly the way to gain the good will of our friends in the United States at a time when we had every reason to seek their good will to solve some of our unfortunate difficulties.

As one goes through these orders in council one finds that most of them do deal with matters that could very much better have been dealt with by amendments to existing legislation. In fact, it would seem that every one of them, except the one which provided for secrecy, in regard to certain orders in council, could best have been passed in that way. When I say except that order I do not mean that that order could not have been placed before the house. I think that is the very kind of order that should have called for an act of this parliament. If any order in council is not going to be published, is not going to be communicated to the members of parliament or to the public, then most assuredly the circumstances under which that power is to be exercised by the government should be stated in the clearest terms, and only in the most express wording should this parliament confer such extraordinary powers upon this or any other government.

Having dealt with the kind of orders in council that were passed, may I point out that when the Prime Minister speaks of the protection that is available by virtue of the fact that the orders in council, except those cloaked with secrecy, and the special order I have mentioned, should be tabled in this house, and that the government would entertain a motion to discharge any of those orders if such a motion were presented, the possibility of such a motion offers very little real opportunity to deal with this question. I can think of very few cases where the government would not immediately say: This is a challenge to the government; this must be dealt with as a want of confidence motion. And it would be a want of confidence motion; it would be a motion which declared that the house did not have confidence that the government had properly exercised its authority. The history of the voting of hon. members during the life of the present parliament is not such as to suggest that, from the practical as opposed to the theoretical point of view, the opportunities provided by the possibility of such a motion have any real value to hon. members.

True, we learn about these orders in council in due course. True, the orders in council, except the one providing for secrecy, do not appear to have dealt with subjects of major importance, unless perhaps in so far as the order in council in regard to the importation of animals and feed products from the United States may be regarded as important. But I think we should examine the attitude of this government in regard to orders in council generally before dismissing too lightly the possibility that anything might occur in regard to which there would not be general approval in this house.

Even if under this act up to this point there may not be substantial grounds for objection, I would like to point out the attitude of this government in regard to the exercise of some of its powers by order in council. It will be recalled by all hon. members that at the time the question was raised about the possibility of General Kurt Meyer's release during the session of this house last fall, the government dismissed in rather peremptory manner any suggestion that there might be concern that General Kurt Meyer, who had been whisked so surprisingly away from Canada back to his homeland, might in fact be released at any time by the Canadian government without this house knowing about it.

Now, while this was done under another act, I must confess that I for one found a great deal more importance attached to the fact that the order in council had been passed which released Wilhelm Ossenbach than I did to the actual fact that this man had been released, because at the very time that we were raising the question about the possibility of Kurt Meyer's being released, another German prisoner, who had been sentenced to fifteen years in prison in connection with the shooting of a Canadian prisoner of war, had been released by order in council as of October 3 last. That order in council was not tabled until November. By that time Wilhelm Ossenbach had been at large for more than a month. There may have been reasons why this was done, but the question does arise as to exactly what the difference in principle would be in the case of Wilhelm Ossenbach and in the case of Kurt Meyer, except that Kurt Meyer had been brought over to Canada. The only reason that Kurt Meyer happened to be brought to Canada was that he had been found guilty and sentenced to death. It was because of the commutation of the sentence that he was brought back to Canada under rather unusual circumstances. Then, as hon. members will recall, he left Canada under equally unusual circumstances, and the next we heard of him was that he was in the bosom of his family back in Germany. By the time that hon. members knew anything about it, it was so much a matter that had already been done that the possibility of undoing it was indeed very remote.

Then again, to refer to something that hon. members seem to think has been mentioned so often that we do not want to hear about it again, may I refer to something that does need to be cleared up, and that has not yet been cleared up, but which again illustrates the manner in which the government does employ its powers by order in council. I refer to the fact that this government by order in council, under an act other than the one now before us, saw fit to permit communists to man and operate ships, and to continue to man and operate ships, under the Canadian flag. The company to which that privilege was granted was a Canadian company incorporated for the one purpose of giving Canadian identity to those who hold nominal ownership of the ships built in Canada for the Ming Sung company. That Canadian corporate ownership was provided because the head office of the company was in communist China, where it still operates.

It has been said that it was not desirable to withdraw the right to Canadian registry of these ships under the control of a communist company operating in waters where they might well be carrying contraband that would be used against Canadian armed men. The explanation given was that an attempt was being made to recover the money which had been advanced very generously by the Canadian government to make these ships available for the Ming Sung company. So far as we know, those ships, now entirely under communist control, are still flying the Canadian flag. So far as we have been informed, this government has not yet seen fit to restore the dignity of the Canadian flag in those waters by taking the very simple steps available to it of repudiating and rescinding this most unusual favour accorded to a company operating in that area.

I mention these orders in council because what happened in those two cases—and a number of other illustrations could be given to show what has occurred in other respects—do not suggest that the House of Commons should be too ready or too willing to extend blanket powers to this government on the basis of its actual record in dealing with public business by orders in council in some other cases.

I hope hon. members will consider this matter from the point of view of the atmosphere in which the measure was presented originally and the atmosphere in which we are considering the resolution now before the house. At the time the measure was originally presented conditions were very different from what they are today. As I recall it, the United Nations forces had just liberated Seoul after a very threatening communist sweep through Korea. Enemy resistance along the 38th parallel was building up. There was every reason to believe that a great offensive against our forces was under way. The whole atmosphere was entirely different from what it is today.

At that time we did oppose the adoption of these wide and unrestrained powers. At that time we did point out the danger of dealing with the subject in this way rather than by giving specific powers in certain specific fields. We did raise those objections, however, remembering what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) had said at that time when setting out the reasons why it was important to have such a measure adopted. On February 1 last year, as reported at page 29 of Hansard, the Prime Minister indicated that a bill of this kind would be introduced. These are his words as they appear in Hansard of that date:

> We will seek, by the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne, to secure powers additional to those the governor in council already has. By proclaiming the War Measures Act on the ground of apprehended war we could have all those powers, but we prefer to leave it to parliament to say whether there is a sufficient emergency to justify a departure from regular constitutional procedure and the regular constitutional distribution of powers between the federal and provincial authorities.

The Prime Minister clearly indicated something about which I have expressed concern on a number of occasions. He expressed concern about departure from regular constitutional procedure and the regular constitutional distribution of powers between federal and provincial authorities. From the Prime Minister's own words there can be no doubt whatever that the measure now before us does depart from the normal constitutional distribution of power between the federal and provincial authorities, and that it does constitute a departure from regular constitutional procedure.

In saying that, there is of course the reservation that it constitutes a departure only to the extent that the government may exercise the powers conferred upon it. Nevertheless, in the words of the Prime Minister himself, it is perfectly clear that this measure does give to the government powers to disregard the constitutional division of responsibility and authority between federal and provincial governments as laid down originally in the British North America Act.

There were other reasons given for the introduction of the measure. As reported at page 185 of Hansard for February 8, 1951, the Minister of Defence Production said this:

> In closing, I would like to say a few words about price control. The speech from the throne indicates the intention of the government to introduce a bill which will, if approved, confer upon the executive powers to impose price controls and other related controls for the purpose of maintaining economic stability.
> These broad powers are being introduced to the end that the government will be in a position to take whatever action appears to be necessary from time to time.
> Introduction of this legislation does not mean that the present intention is to impose over-all price and wage controls, although there is always the possibility that events will develop in such a way that general price and wage ceilings are appropriate and workable.

While it is true that the Minister of Defence Production indicated that it was not then the intention to introduce price controls, he clearly stated that one of the purposes of the introduction of this measure was so that they might be in a position to take such further steps by way of controls as would become necessary under the emergency.

Since that time events have taken a course which rightly or wrongly the government has interpreted as justifying the removal of certain controls which they did introduce. As an example, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced that the credit restrictions were being removed it was with the assurance that there had been such a return to normal conditions that he was justified in following that course. Moreover, at the time that other restrictions were removed the same explanation was given. The whole attitude of this government has been that in recent months there has been an improvement in the situation which makes it possible to relax controls. That being so, there certainly is not the pressure for the almost unrestrained powers that there was at that time.

I would place before members of this house principles which it seems to me are challenged by this legislation to an extent that did not seem necessary elsewhere under the very uncertain conditions then existing. I wish to emphasize the dangers that are inherent in legislation of this nature, dangers which have been examined by the most competent constitutional authorities and which have also been indicated by responsible writers in the press of this country as well as certain members of parliament on both sides of the house.

Most hon. members have read a book written some years ago which I think bears careful rereading today. I refer to "The New Despotism" by the late Lord Hewart of Bury. In that famous book he examined the danger of legislation by order in council as distinguished from laws passed by the representatives of the people. He pointed out that with the change that had taken place over the years certain administrative laws had become necessary to deal with the fast-moving and increasingly complex society in which we now live. He then made this further significant comment, and I quote from page 21 of that book:

"With us," as Professor Dicey says, "every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen. The reports abound with cases in which officials have been brought before the courts, and made, in their personal capacity, liable to punishment, or to the payment of damages, for acts done in their official character but in excess of their lawful authority. A colonial governor, a secretary of state, a military officer, and all subordinates, though carrying out the commands of their official superiors, are as responsible for any act which the law does not authorize as is any private and unofficial person."

It may well be said by someone who is mentally at this moment justifying the introduction of this, "But are you aware that this act is an act which was passed by parliament and that what Lord Hewart was referring to at that point was the responsibility of everyone from the Prime Minister down to be answerable under the law?" My point is that the protection of the citizen described by Lord Hewart in those words is denied by the adoption of laws of this kind. It is only when clearly stated laws exist that the citizen has any protection against the Prime Minister or officials or others who may do things that may be contrary to his best interests. If we believe in the rule of law as opposed to the rule of dictate then we must be concerned with any measure which removes from the citizen those rights against anyone in authority which were so clearly described by Lord Hewart as being the very foundation of our free democracy.

I go on to further quotations from Lord Hewart where he deals with the dangers of legislation of this kind. He pointed out in his book that in Great Britain there had been those who justified the extension of administrative law by comparing the administrative law in Great Britain with the droit administratif of France. But Lord Hewart went on to point out that the administrative law of France was something entirely different. He pointed out that under the different system which accepted that kind of law as a matter of tradition, nevertheless they had placed safeguards over the employment of laws of that kind which were not provided in Great Britain or any other corresponding parliamentary jurisdiction where administrative law was adopted.

He pointed out that the administrative law of France was placed under a tribunal of the highest standing which reviewed those laws from time to time impartially and without any relation to the political complexion of those who had passed the law. Then he went on to say that in so far as these laws were concerned it was not enough to find out who were the individuals who were passing the law and then feel some measure of confidence that the men then responsible would not abuse them. He pointed out that laws that are passed should be regarded from the impersonal point of view. They should be examined as laws that might be administered by any government, and at no time should anyone seek to hide the dangers of administrative law by virtue of the fact that the men then exercising that power might be men who commanded general confidence.

The interesting thing, however, is that when Lord Hewart wrote about this subject some years ago he was merely dealing with administrative laws passed under acts which most clearly set out the subject matter that would be dealt with by the government. Having regard to the strength of his language in condemning administrative laws which supplant the rights of parliament, one can only guess that even Lord Hewart of Bury, with a tradition of carefully chosen words, would have written in a most explosive manner about an act which places practically all powers in the hands of the government subject only to their own idea as to the reservations that they might make upon the exercise of their powers.

Nor has it been only at Westminster that those charged with responsibility have warned of these dangers. In this house the present member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has discussed this matter on different occasions. I find that he discussed it on one occasion on March 21, 1946, as found at page 169 of Hansard. The hon. member for Quebec South, who I believe is the dean of the House of Commons, and who has demonstrated a deep and profound knowledge of the constitutional background of our proceedings, was dealing with this very subject of administrative law and emergency powers which confer sweeping authority of that kind. He pointed out that in his opinion neither the then prime minister nor the then minister of justice would in himself be likely to seriously abuse powers that might be conferred in that way. Since the hon. member for Quebec South has so often spoken on behalf of what he believes to be the real principles of the Liberal party, may I recall what he said on that occasion after stating very clearly that he did not think that the prime minister of that time or the minister of justice of that time, who is now the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), would himself contemplate any abuses. In spite of that statement of his own conviction this is what he said, as found at page 171 of Hansard:

> But may I point out that neither of these men has any guarantee of immortality. Neither is there any guarantee in our political life that the political wheel of fortune may not some day turn. And the numbers brought up on that political wheel of fortune may not always be the numbers of men in whom this country has the same faith and confidence as it has in the men who are now at the helm of affairs.

Then he went on to outline the dangers inherent in legislation of this kind, dangers that could not be dismissed by expressing confidence in the individuals who would be charged with the responsibility of administering legislation of this nature that might be adopted. Then he used these words, to be found at page 172 of Hansard for March 21, 1946:

> We have fought a victorious war after four years. We have talked glibly of the new order which was to follow it, and it almost appears to me as though we the victors had taken on the manners and customs of the vanquished.

These words were not spoken by any member on this side of the house. They were spoken by one who had been a member of the government during the years of the war. He was referring only to the employment of similar powers, but at a time when stronger arguments for the employment of such powers could have been put forward he said that it almost seemed to him as though we the victors were taking on the manners and the customs of the vanquished. Moreover, the same member for Quebec South had this to say in an article published in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 22, 1948:

> When it is made clear that special extraordinary powers are absolutely necessary in order to deal with certain contingencies, let parliament delegate these powers, but only to the minister who shall be specifically mentioned in the legislation, and who shall be answerable to parliament for the exercise thereof. Moreover, the special authority conferred should be for specific purposes and the objects clearly stated in the legislation. The authority itself should be limited in extent to that which is required for the specific purposes—no omnibus clauses with a little more for good measure "in case they were needed." Finally, this authority granted to the minister should be limited as to time and the law itself reenacted at each session of parliament if the contingency continues to exist.

May I point out that this hon. member, who was a member of the government and served in a very responsible post during the war years, touches two vital points with regard to the adoption of any legislation of this kind now or on any other occasion. First, it should only confer powers upon a specific minister in relation to a specific subject. Second, that power should be clearly defined, the objects for which the legislation is presented should be clearly stated, and the circumstances under which the minister can employ such power with the support of the government should be described in the clearest and most limited terms.

I submit that the hon. member for Quebec South has stated a proposition that should receive the support of every hon. member in the house. Nor has the argument been confined to members in the house. I want to quote some of the things that have been said by others outside the house because I regard the principle now under consideration as one of fundamental importance, and one which perhaps did not receive as complete and vigorous attention as it deserved last year. Actually, in the hands of those who were prepared to abuse such power, this bill could mean the end of parliament itself, nothing less. It could provide someone with the opportunity to repeat the famous speech of Cromwell when he wound up the parliament of Britain. There is no use saying that no hon. member in the house would think of doing that.

Hon. members of this house have seen some strange things done. They have seen some remarkable examples of government reluctance to produce information, and they have seen some rather remarkable orders in council passed under other legislation. But whether or not there were a single example that should put this house on guard when they are asked to extend this power at this time, may I remind the members of this house that not only have we the arguments and the advice of a man like Lord Hewart of Bury, not only have we the advice of a man who has served as a member of this House of Commons and who has the longest experience in parliamentary procedure of any member now in this house, but we also have the expression of opinion of responsible individuals and members of the press outside.

At a time when this matter was under consideration last year Toronto Saturday Night, for instance, had this to say in regard to this very act which was passed then at a time when there was a much greater atmosphere of emergency and urgency than is apparent in any action of the government at this time. I quote from what appeared on March 20, 1951 in Saturday Night:

> It is good that Canadians should wish their government to have all the powers it needs to ensure our making a fair contribution to the western alliance. But it is disquieting that the public should appear so little concerned about the ultimate right of parliament to have knowledge of, to enquire into, to criticize, and if necessary, to overrule any use that the government may make of these extraordinary powers.

Then after further discussion of this measure in an objective manner the Toronto Saturday Night has this to say:

> Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Garson and the other legal talent on the government side have shown an alarming failure to realize that the consciousness of their own good intentions is not an adequate safeguard for the liberties of the people of Canada.

Then in the Calgary Herald of March 1, 1951, I find this statement:

We are not suggesting that the present government in Ottawa has any intention of using these emergency powers in the same way.

It was referring there to the way in which the German Reichstag took over emergency powers after it had been elected under a democratic procedure. The Calgary Herald continues:

But the democratic process, and still more the freedoms which that process enshrines, is a more delicate plant than we generally realize; and freedoms once surrendered are singularly hard to win back.

Then after further discussion of this subject it goes on:

But the chief criticism of the emergency powers bill is that it is altogether too general. It pretends to be specific while in fact it is nothing of the kind. It seems to us that if the government wants emergency powers in certain fields, then the necessary legislation ought to define those fields with absolute precision, the government ought to state in writing exactly what powers it proposes to use and how it proposes to use them, and if the government needs wider powers later on, then it should have to come back to parliament and get them by due process.

Mr. Speaker, in terms that are clear and understandable, the Calgary Herald was saying exactly the same thing as was said by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Then there was another paper which was discussing this subject at the same time. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 5, 1951:

An emergency is a proper time for wide powers in the hands of the government. But it is also a proper time for wide powers in the hands of the courts. The present bill at Ottawa has the dangerous feature of establishing power at the expense of the courts.

The time when our liberties must be defended seems a poor time in which to undermine their essential guarantees.

Mr. Speaker, those were statements by responsible publications of different points of view and from different parts of Canada. Then I perhaps might properly quote the words used in a discussion which took place at the annual meeting of the advisory council of the National Liberal Federation of Canada in Ottawa on Tuesday, February 27, of last year. At that time Professor J. A. Corry, who is professor of political science at Queen's university, was discussing this very subject, and I quote briefly from what he had to say:

The discretionary powers exercised by our government nowadays in time of peace are wide enough to cause concern. The practical certainty of cold war, if not actual shooting war, for an indefinite period means a still further substantial increase in the powers of the dominion government. What is our answer to Abraham Lincoln's question: Is a government which is strong enough to deal with serious crises not also going to be too strong for the liberties of its citizens?

Then Professor Corry went on to say much the same as has been said by some of the others to whom I have referred, to the effect that confidence in individuals is not in itself enough. He went on to say this:

If, as seems likely, we are to have a considerable measure of order in council government again, we should also be considering seriously the establishment of one or more committees of parliament to examine, not the substance and policy of the orders in council but the effect that the powers and procedures contained in them will have on individual rights and freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, it was quite clear that Professor Corry was suggesting exactly what Lord Hewart of Bury was pointing out earlier, namely that to the extent that administrative law must be exercised, it must also be brought under some measure of control, such as does not now exist; some measure of supervision by parliament before the event, not after; some measure of control which will make it possible for parliament to express its opinion before the government has taken its decision in a manner that would make any challenge of that decision an expression of want of confidence.

Mr. Speaker, I have put forward arguments made in this house, in the press and even at a meeting of the National Liberal Federation last year, in order to lay the foundation for the suggestion that the government itself might well consider at this time the abandoning of this legislation and the statement that it will deal with these matters by such legislation as may be required from time to time. If, as the Prime Minister says, the need is not very apparent for legislation of this kind immediately, and it has not been necessary for the government to use it very much, that is all the more reason why we should return to normal procedure;—and it is the Prime Minister who indicated that this is not the normal constitutional procedure—all the more reason why we should return to the proper division of authority between the dominion and provincial governments, at a time that our whole federal constitution is under strain; all the more reason that we should return to the principles upon which this country became one nation in 1867.

I have put forward arguments which in no way can be disposed of as being arguments from this side of the house which might conceivably be put forward with some idea of embarrassing the government, as is so often suggested whenever we make an argument which is not entirely in accord with the view expressed by the government itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has referred to the act, but let no one be in any doubt that this act does confer almost unlimited powers upon the government of Canada, not upon an individual group of men who, no matter how much we may wish them long lives and happiness are, in the words of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), not gifted with immortality. We are dealing with the law as an abstract question. We are dealing with an act which confers upon the government certain powers, and which in no place says it is this Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), this Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or this Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), even if all the confidence expressed in them by members on the other side were fully justified and were shared more generally throughout the house than may sometimes be apparent.

Let us see exactly what this act does permit the government to do. It permits it to do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations as the governor in council may, by reason of the existing international emergency, deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated; then that section of the act sets out the following:

(a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;
(b) control of communications and means of communication;
(c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels;
(d) transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things;
(e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture; and
(f) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control.

Where is there any specific definition such as was requested by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), such as asked for by Lord Hewart of Bury, the great exponent of common law and parliamentary procedure? Where is there the specific provision asked for before the National Liberal Federation last year? Where is the specific provision asked for by leading writers in the press of this country? There is none. Neither is there any specific definition of powers, nor is there any suggestion as to which minister shall exercise these powers.

It is true that there is some suggestion of restraint in subsection 2 of section 2 where it says:

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained therein, the powers conferred on the governor in council by subsection one do not include power to make orders or regulations in relation to
(a) arrest, except as incidental to proceedings under section three, detention, exclusion or deportation of any person;
(b) censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings; or
(c) expenditure of moneys otherwise than in accordance with an appropriation by parliament except expenditure of moneys from any fund or account established by order or regulation in connection with a scheme of control for the purposes of that scheme of control.

Never was a reservation with more illusory protection put before this or any other house with a similar measure of authority and responsibility than the one now before us. It does seem that last year, very conscious of the grave situation with which we were confronted and the uncertainty as to how that grave situation was to be met—an uncertainty which may not be greater today, although the general situation is quite as grave and perhaps more grave—there may have been some tendency not to examine these things in the way they should now be examined when, with all the dangers, at least we have found some pattern of continuing action through the long period of emergency which lies ahead.

When this act says there shall be no provisions in regard to arrest except as incidental to proceedings under section 3, then we refer to section 3 and find that by order in council the government may prescribe penalties by way of fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. This section is wide open in regard to determining what those powers shall be, and that is a very illusory protection. Section 3 does deal with seizure, detention, and forfeiture of goods by order in council, so the protection afforded in that section is not very satisfactory.

Then mention is made of censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings. There might be some protection there, except for the fact that this government has such control over newsprint today that if it saw fit—again I am dealing with the government of Canada and not the individual—under its present powers it could very effectively deal with any newspaper.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member if he means by his last statement that the government could exercise censorship over what a newspaper publishes by means of its control over newsprint?

Mr. Drew: I am suggesting that the government of Canada—as I have pointed out before, not the present Minister of Justice, no matter what measure of confidence may or may not rest in him—under its present powers could exercise a very real censorship over the press by the allocation of newsprint. Do not let the Minister of Justice or anyone else in this house be so naïve as to suggest that allocation is not a very powerful weapon at the present time, whether it be of newsprint or anything else.

Then we have paragraph (c) of subsection 2, which deals with the expenditure of moneys otherwise than in accordance with appropriation by parliament, except the expenditure of moneys from some fund set up under this order in council. I cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, that this government would find it very difficult to conceive of a plan for some fund, if they really wanted to set up something outside of any ordinary appropriation, which would give them the financial resources they needed, even if they felt themselves under restraint, which I have not seen particularly noticeable in some of the items that have come up by way of supplementary estimates.

Whatever the reservations are, they are contained in these very limited terms. Otherwise wide open powers are given. The Prime Minister has made it quite clear that these powers do abridge the constitution, that these powers do change the plan of responsibility and authority in existence as between the dominion and the provincial governments under the British North America Act. Last year we pointed out that, with full recognition of all the dangers that exist, we opposed the bill on the ground that no argument had been presented which justified this immense delegation of power, especially in a time that the government still prefers to describe as a period of general peace. I am not quarrelling with the government in the use of that expression, but if the government is going to employ that expression then let it act in accordance with the expression it chooses to use. If we are to conduct ourselves as far as possible as though we were going to live reasonably normal lives over a long period of years, under the pressures of the international situation which now exist, most certainly we should try to carry on our system of government and our parliamentary procedures in a manner which continues the traditional practices that have been built up over the centuries.

Whatever may have been said at that time last year, this house should not renew this act today when we have had nothing placed before us which suggests any reason whatever why this government could not deal effectively with any questions which may arise by amending certain of the acts which now exist. After all, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, most of the subjects which have been dealt with in the last year could have been dealt with either under existing acts or by such existing acts with some slight amendment which would have extended their application and given them clearly defined administrative authority such as is contained in other legislation.

I submit, however, that these immense and sweeping powers should not be extended, and that the government would be well advised to reconsider its position in putting this forward at this time. In view of the words he used this afternoon I do not believe the Prime Minister will suggest that this act does not delegate powers to the government which could cover almost any field of legislative jurisdiction either in this house or in the provincial legislatures. Moreover, this act does delegate to the government powers to pass laws behind closed doors, such as parliament itself should be most reluctant to support even if they were put before us in the most explicit terms. Those laws could have the effect of completely destroying the checks and balances between the dominion and provincial governments; and in the Prime Minister's own words, which I have quoted, in fact there is recognition of that possibility, if any government sought to exercise that power. Those balances between the dominion and provincial governments were wisely provided in the covenant which made this nation possible, and they should be preserved, most particularly at a time when democracy generally is threatened.

No one can deny, no one should deny, that extraordinary conditions undoubtedly may call for extraordinary remedies. But even the most extraordinary conditions should not be used to enlarge the constitutional powers of the dominion government, and should not carry into the council chamber the business that was intended for this House of Commons and the parliament of Canada by the fathers of confederation who drafted our constitution.

This act, subject only to the very limited reservation to which I have referred, represents a complete surrender by parliament of its powers to the executive. It authorizes for the government of Canada—an undefined body from time to time, the executive of this parliament—star chamber procedure that has been repudiated for centuries under our parliamentary traditions. Instead of representing the judgment of parliament this act expresses no judgment at all, except that we say to the government: you do anything you think wise either with the business ordinarily in our hands or ordinarily in the hands of the provincial legislatures.

This act places the fate of our people in the hands of the government of Canada, the executive, undefined, without reference to any particular minister, without any specific declaration of any kind as to the terms under which it can be employed. Instead of prescribing rules of conduct defined by the people's representatives in parliament it authorizes the government to enact codes which will prescribe the rules for our daily life in any manner the government in its secret judgment, without the advice of parliament, may decide.

No matter what arguments may have been presented in the past, no matter what good intentions the government may possess, no matter what superficial justification may be offered, the inescapable fact remains that such a delegation of legislative powers to the executive in council is utterly inconsistent with the constitution adopted by those who drafted the British North America Act after so much discussion, study and earnest effort.

This act constitutes a delegation of legislative power to our government such as has not existed since the star chamber of old passed into historic disgrace. This act is in fact delegation running riot. The fathers of confederation envisioned the rule of law, and they envisioned a government of our people under laws approved and receiving consent through the people's representatives in the House of Commons. This constitution never contemplated at any time that we should have government by the whim of men meeting secretly behind closed doors in the council chambers.

It is no answer to say that this act has been in force for a year and no harm has been done. Much harm has been done to the principle of a free and sovereign parliament, if we now accept this act as something that is going to be continued indefinitely on the statute books. It never was desirable that the act should have been passed in the first place. Whatever justification there may have been in the minds of the government at the time it was passed, however, no sound reason has been offered, I submit, that—and I quote the words from the motion—

—it is desirable to continue the said sections in force up to and including the thirtieth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-three.

It is true that these orders in council are not of a kind likely to alarm hon. members. Perhaps that in itself is a danger, because it takes our eyes away from the important thing, which is the fundamental principle at issue. There may be reasons for some provision of this kind, reasons which have not yet been stated. If there are, they should be clearly explained to the house. This house should then only authorize the government under the most clearly defined and limited circumstances to deal with those subjects—and I refer particularly to the one order in council which was passed permitting secrecy. That certainly is one which should be dealt with by a separate act of this parliament. It should be dealt with by an act that stated in the most express and clearest terms exactly under what circumstances the government might retain the veil of secrecy over anything that affects the daily lives of any Canadians.

I suggest that to delegate such sweeping powers as these, no matter what confidence may be expressed in the individuals who temporarily would be called upon to exercise them, is one of the most dangerous propositions ever enunciated in this house. The acceptance of this means that parliament will not only have agreed to the delegation of its power to a star chamber; it will also have agreed, by acceptance of what has been done already, to such a limited measure of protection as may be afforded by the subsequent publication of things into which they have already gone fully. Even though the government has done what it may regard as relatively unimportant business under this measure to date, we must consider what this or any other government could do along that line.

While it is not for us to be guided by what happened in other countries, I do not think any Canadian can be unaware of the fact that a major constitutional issue is being fought out in the United States at this time. That major constitutional issue is as to whether or not the executive has the power to seize one particular industry in that country. I am not expressing an opinion one way or another as to what the real power of the executive may be in the United States. Nevertheless it surely is of interest to Canadians that—since, though under a different system it is true, they live lives so similar to our own—such strong feeling should be expressed by outstanding lawyers and constitutional experts in regard to the exercise of authority of that kind.

No such question, however, would arise in this country with the passing of this measure, because there can be no question about the fact that this government could seize any industry. It also states specifically that the government can take power over any production; and that means farming, fishing or anything else. There is no single type of production that cannot be taken over by the government, if it sees fit to do so.

Do not dismiss that by saying that this government would not exercise such powers. There were those in other countries who supported laws of a similar nature and who today have lost all freedom as a result of the expressed belief that the governments of those countries would not abuse the power conferred upon them.

No, there would be no doubt here about the power of the government to seize any industry or to take over any operation. Under this no question would arise in connection with the nationalization of trucking, the nationalization of shipping or the nationalization of railways, if the government wanted to do it. Of course that is the qualification. But it is there in express terms—

> Transportation by land, air or water, and the control of the transport of persons and things—

—by land, sea or air.

I do not know where there are such wide powers today in any country that still calls itself a democracy.

Mr. Croll: It has been there for seven years.

Mr. Drew: Oh, this act is much less explicit than the act passed in a time of war and which it replaces. Even in a time of war the government felt there was some necessity to give some appearance of defining powers and specifying subjects to an extent that does not appear in this measure at all. And may I say to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) that I am not suggesting for one moment that these powers were wisely conferred at that time, except under the impact of war itself; not merely because of the necessity of fighting the war but because of the impact of the events of war upon the daily lives of our people. That is one of the reasons such emergency powers as were introduced here, and were continued with some reservations, were accepted. People recognized that there were great limitations upon the daily activities of our people. No one will question those limitations, which are not now imposed upon the people, and which the government has wisely or unwisely refused most emphatically even to consider, though in some cases there were some who thought this might have been done with advantage to the people of Canada.

In that respect I would point out that one of the chief reasons given for the introduction of the measure last year was the possibility that the government might be called upon to exercise price control. The government now makes it clear that it has no intention of doing so, so that argument has lost its validity, and is disposed of as a reason for the continuance of the measure, even if it ever represented a sound argument.

This discussion might well remind us that there was a very interesting point raised in the argument presented before the supreme court of the United States. I cannot help feeling that there was historic significance in the fact that counsel arguing the case there against the exercise of such powers as were exercised by the President of the United States cited section 39 of Magna Carta, which reads as follows:

> No Freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any way harmed, nor will we go upon or send upon him, save by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

Section 39 of Magna Carta is one of those great sections in the charter of our freedom signed at Runnymede in 1215. And there are two more provisions in that section which I submit should be in the minds of hon. members at this time when they consider delegating their responsibility in this manner to the government, without any defining restraint. There is the provision, first of all, that no freeman shall be disseized without the decision of his peers, and that no man shall be taken or imprisoned or disseized, except by the law of the land.

The act before us, in the powers it confers, denies the right assured by Magna Carta. It is not an answer to say, "Oh, no; this government would not exercise them." This government is creating those powers; this government is creating a precedent which others will find extremely convenient if at some distant time in the future there should be those in power who would believe in a much greater exercise of authority by the state than this government has demonstrated, great though its belief in its own omniscience and its own power has been.

Mr. Croll: Do you not trust yourself?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I do not sit opposite each other for the first time. For that reason I take in good spirit the interjection he has made, and I would remind him that this is not the first legislative chamber in which he has heard me express the same views.

Mr. Sinnott: It sounds like it, though.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I accord to the hon. member for Spadina considerable knowledge of the law. I hope he will impart some of that knowledge to one hon. member opposite, when he has the freedom to do so.

I do not think this is a strictly academic subject. I think it is time for hon. members to be as careful about the provisions of Magna Carta as are some of our friends in the United States; to assert our belief in those principles, and to assert our belief that, except under the most express terms and the most explicit safeguards, there shall be no departure from that historic section of Magna Carta.

Ever since those days that fundamental principle has always been observed. It has been challenged, it has been denied, but in turn the people have overridden that denial. It was the denial of that right that brought a king of England to the block. It was the denial of that right that lost another king his throne. It was the denial of that right that lost to the British crown the provinces which constitute what is now the United States. It was the denial of that right that over and over again has challenged the great legal brains in this house as well as elsewhere. It was the possibility of the denial of that right that challenged one of the best parliamentary brains in this house, and I am referring to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

I submit that without questioning the good faith but simply examining this as a matter of principle, the issue is clear and it goes to the root of democracy itself. Where law ends, tyranny begins. When it will begin, no one can tell. Others in other lands were very sure it would never begin, but today they have no right to raise their voices and point out that when they supported arbitrary laws of this nature they relied upon the government never to exercise its power.

The protection of our people must depend upon the rule of law provided by the people's representatives. The law itself must ever be a declaration of the people's representatives in parliament. If there is to be a real democracy in this or any other country then the laws must be made by those elected to make them and not by the executive sitting behind closed doors under a delegation of powers such as is contained in this act.

If our parliamentary system is to survive through the vicissitudes of the years ahead, then our laws must be the expression of the will of the community as approved by the elected representatives of the whole community. Our people have the right to know what the law is at any given time; and before they are bound by laws they should have concurred in the adoption of those laws through their own decisions in parliament before the laws were passed, not after they had been passed and were in effect.

The rule of law is the rule of freedom. Men have the right to know to what extent their representatives have said they must obey certain injunctions. Even then there may still be doubt; as we all know, competent lawyers often give conflicting advice on different points of view. We have just recently seen a case where the Supreme Court of Canada held a different view from that of the privy council, although of course the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) believes that we should not in any way rely upon the privy council. Without in any way questioning the confidence he has expressed, this indicates that very competent judges, let alone very competent lawyers, may hold diametrically opposed views as to the effect of orders in council. But what should be remembered is that the privy council, in which the Minister of Justice has now imposed his ultimate confidence, has said that orders in council, no matter how loosely drawn by a government, if they conform—

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend seen the recent judgment of the privy council? If he has not, how can he state what they have said?

Mr. Drew: The ordinary systems of communication are available to people other than the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: May I ask another question?

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice will be free to reply.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the leader of the opposition does not resume his seat he indicates that he is not giving consent.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend does not want to—

Mr. Drew: All right, ask your question and then sit down.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend seen in any of the means of communication any statement that the orders in council were loosely drawn?

Mr. Drew: The orders in council were so loosely drawn that there was never any question about it from the beginning. That was one of the points upon which the whole argument rested at various stages throughout the long proceedings. I may assert without any question that they were extremely loosely drawn and that was what presented the difficulty from the very beginning. Nevertheless the privy council has now made it perfectly clear that if any parliament is to delegate wide powers, then those wide powers can be exercised in a manner which the courts will be most reluctant to limit in any way. With that judgment of the privy council we are much less safe in passing these sweeping powers than we were while we still had the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. I might have preferred the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada; the Minister of Justice prefers the privy council. The Minister of Justice has that judgment, but that judgment is a warning to every one of us that we should be careful as to what powers we confer upon this government. The previous judgment did suggest that there might be some restraint exercised by the court.

The Minister of Justice may well emphasize to us the expression known as the glorious uncertainty of the law. He exemplifies it. Nevertheless there is a difference between that glorious uncertainty of the law which is common to all legal proceedings—that is what I have sought to emphasize; it is not only the Minister of Justice, but I pointed out the glorious uncertainty as between the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council—and the certainty that no one is going to know what the law is until it finally emerges some time much later from the star chamber where it has been adopted by the government. That kind of law passed into disrepute centuries ago and it should be disposed of by this house at this time.

There can be no security if laws are uncertain and if people do not know in advance what the views of justice really are going to be. Strong arguments were presented against this bill when it was introduced. I should like to refer to what was said a year ago because I want to leave no doubt as to our position in regard to this act, and to show that it has been consistent in regard to the principle which is in issue. I should like to quote from page 952 of Hansard of March 6, 1951, where in regard to this very measure I am reported as saying:

> To the statement that I have just made the Prime Minister can answer that this bill will terminate next year.

I went on to discuss how bills of this kind have a habit of being repeated, of being renewed and of becoming embedded in our ordinary practices and procedures. Then I went on to say:

> The Prime Minister may also say: This is in the hands of parliament. In answer I would say that we have not seen too much evidence, during this session or preceding ones, that there is that measure of independent expression of opinion by the large number of supporters of the government in this house which would suggest to those who are concerned about the trend we now see that we might hope that within this house there would be a vote which would place any effective restraint upon a government which commanded a majority of that kind. Unless we return to established and tested principles of parliamentary democracy we may in fact at this hour be in the twilight of freedom here in Canada, no matter how much we believe in freedom itself. We Canadians can pay the penalty of surrender just as other people have paid the penalty of surrender of those principles which protected the freedom in which they believed.

[Mr. Drew.]

I repeat these words but with a greater sense of urgency today, because none of the arguments that could have been presented at that time can properly be put forward now in support of this measure. Assuming the utmost good will in the mind of the government, the fact remains that it is the duty of every one of us to consider what could happen if men of evil intention had the opportunity to exercise the powers conferred by such an act. That is the only test which can properly be applied to legislation of this kind. Freedom has disappeared so often in recent years when that test was not applied. Examining only what could be done and not what any of us might suggest would be done by this particular government, I do not see how anyone can deny that a full and unlimited exercise of the powers contained in this act could become the death warrant of democracy in Canada.

At a time when we are seeking to preserve the spirit, the form, the living body and the traditions of democracy, I most earnestly urge the government to withdraw this resolution. It can withdraw it in the same way that it has on other occasions when other measures have been presented and the government became convinced that it was not desirable to proceed. That does not mean it cannot deal with any cases which it thinks should be dealt with. It is only necessary for the government to examine what was done during the past year under this act and anything that conceivably could be required during the coming year, and then introduce simple amendments to existing legislation which will permit them to deal with the matter under clearly defined and limited terms.

May I also say that, if circumstances should arise short of war which call for wider powers, we have seen that this parliament can meet within a few days and pass whatever laws are necessary. In the event that the most unhappy possibility of war should become a reality the government need not be concerned because it has the powers already.

I hope these arguments will not be brushed aside with the suggestion that this government would never consider doing anything so improper as the possibilities that might be presented. I only ask the government to examine with care the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), by an expert on constitutional law who spoke before the National Liberal Federation in Ottawa, by Lord Hewart of Bury whom I am sure the lawyers of this house respect, and by others outside of the house, as well as the great lawyers and jurists of Canada; and without taking any argument from the opposition I think they would come to the conclusion that the delegation of power of this kind is extremely unwise.

Members of the house who are lawyers remember well that in a democracy we only exercise on behalf of the people the powers delegated to us by the people themselves. Every lawyer in the house remembers that ancient Latin maxim, delegatus non potest delegare. We only have power delegated to us by the people of Canada, and it is not our right to delegate to the executive meeting behind closed doors the business of the people of Canada which has been entrusted to us under our free democratic processes. Therefore in these times, which the government is finding sufficiently normal to deal with so many things in what they regard as a normal manner, may I urge that they return to normal. May I recall what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself said. He made it clear that this legislation departs from the normal constitutional procedure of the House of Commons. He made it clear that this legislation destroys the constitutional balances between the dominion and provincial governments. I am only asking, with respect, that all members on both sides of the house give due consideration to the importance of asserting their belief in the Canadian constitution at this great testing time for democracy throughout the whole world.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the Emergency Powers Act was before parliament in the first session of 1951 we in this group supported it. We did so because we recognized the existence of an emergency and because we felt that, in addition to steps that might have to be taken to meet that emergency from a defence point of view, there were also steps that might have to be taken from an economic point of view. Indeed, we argued very strongly at that time that the Canadian people were suffering because of rising prices and a lowering of their real standards of living. We argued that the institution of a system of price controls and subsidies, where necessary, was required. We supported the Emergency Powers Act in the realization that it would make possible the institution of such controls, and we urged the government as strongly as we could to take advantage of the right which parliament was conferring on them in order to protect the interests of the Canadian people.

In our view a state of emergency still exists. In fact we are not sure that it has lessened from what it was a year ago. The state of military activity in Korea may be different from what it was then, but the situation is as explosive as ever not only there and throughout the Far East, but in other parts of the world. For example, we in this group are concerned over what is being done this very day with respect to the taking of a step which in our view divides Germany into two armed camps. What may flow from that step is a matter of conjecture which it is not too pleasant to contemplate, but I mention it at this time merely to indicate that in our view the world situation is still one of emergency.

The economic situation is likewise still one of emergency so far as our people at home are concerned. The government has boasted over the fact that the cost of living index may have dropped a fraction of a point, but the plain fact of the matter is that the cost of living is still beyond the reach of the workers and farmers of this country who are producing the nation's wealth in terms of a gross national product in excess of anything that we have known in our history. And yet our people are suffering because they cannot afford to buy the goods they produce. That to us is a ridiculous situation, and in our view it is still important that certain direct economic controls should be instituted.

We firmly believe that man was not made for economic orders but that economic orders are supposed to be made for man. We do not believe in submitting our people to the suffering that comes from the play and the control of blind economic forces. We believe it is consistent with, and is a part of, the whole principle of democracy that our people should control not just a limited sphere of the things that concern us but should control completely that which concerns our people perhaps most of all, namely economic affairs. We believe that to leave these things to blind economic forces is to accept economic anarchy.

Because this measure which the government asks to be continued for another year not only would make it possible for the government to deal, within certain limitations, with emergencies of a defence nature but also with the economic emergencies that our people are facing in this country, we take the same view we took when the same bill was before the house in 1951. We shall support the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the continuation of this act for a period of another twelve months.

Had it not been for the very long speech to which we have just listened—and hon. members are, I am sure, glad to know that the rules of the house prevent me from speaking at the same length—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is good to get approval once in a while. As I was about to say, had it not been for that speech, based largely on argument by the use of extravagant language, it might not have been necessary for me to say much more than I have already said. But because the arguments against this measure by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) have been based largely on what he described as principles of parliamentary democracy, for those of us who believe in parliamentary democracy as firmly as do we in this group it becomes necessary to answer some of the arguments which the leader of the opposition has put forward.

May I say, as I have already implied, that we take second place to none in our concern for the supremacy of parliament over the government. We take second place to none in our opposition to the abuse by the government of the power to do certain things by order in council. We take second place to none in our opposition to the way the government sometimes uses its majority in this house to ride roughshod over views which opposition members feel express the wishes of the Canadian people.

Mr. MacDougall: Those are harsh words.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, they are harsh words. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) will probably hear more harsh words from us before the session closes. If he would like to know what those harsh words may be about, may I say that he already knows.

When we assert our concern for parliamentary democracy and when at the same time we accept the fact that we are in a state of emergency, does it not become necessary for us to find some sort of balance, to find some way to make our parliamentary way of doing things fit the needs of the emergency in which we find ourselves? It was because this legislation, when it was brought down a year ago, was an attempt to find that balance that we are prepared to accept its continuance for another year.

May I point out that the legislation which was brought down a year ago did not pass this house in the exact form in which it was first presented. Proposals were made on the floor of the house and some suggestions came from members of the Progressive Conservative group, some from our group and some from others. Some of those suggestions were accepted by the government and written into the statute. Their purpose was to ensure in so far as we could do so, the control of parliament over the government in its use of the powers conferred upon the government by this statute.

At this point I might perhaps deal with one of the most important elements of protection which we won from the government on that occasion. We won it both in the form of an amendment to one of the subsections and in the form of a clear-cut undertaking which the Prime Minister gave to this house. In his opening remarks today the Prime Minister said that he repeated all of the undertakings that were given last year. It is for that reason I want to put on the record one of the undertakings which the Prime Minister gave last year; and I take it that what he said this afternoon is a confirmation of this particular undertaking. When this bill was before the house last year we were concerned as to how effective would be the provision in what is now section 2, subsection 5, for the annulment of any orders, passed under the act, which parliament might wish to have rescinded.

I may say that when the government put that section in the bill it was an innovation. It was a provision that we did not have in the War Measures Act or in the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and that sort of legislation we had after the war. Here, for the first time in Canadian legislation, we had the counterpart of something which has been in existence at Westminster, namely a provision that the Senate and the House of Commons could, by resolution, annul or rescind any of the orders passed under this act. The way of doing that was indicated in the act. Nevertheless, despite the assurance given to us because of the fact that there was in the act that provision for annulling any of these orders, some of us were concerned as to whether it would be effective and whether we would have an actual chance, on the floor of parliament, to do anything about it.

This matter was discussed on March 1, 1951, as recorded at pages 828 and 829 of Hansard; and I am going to take the liberty of reading most of a column because I believe this undertaking which the Prime Minister gave on that occasion should be on the record again now in the context of his having said today that he again gives the same undertaking. I quote from Hansard, at the pages already indicated:

> Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister indicated that some consideration had been given by the government concerning the possibility of writing into the statute a provision so as to make it clear that any member of the house or Senate could propose such a motion for annulling an order passed under this act. Now, assurance was given by the Prime Minister earlier today that the government would facilitate any motion, if one were made. I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to tell us how he pictures such a course would be pursued, if it should happen. I realize it is hypothetical, and I realize the government is going to mind its p's and q's, and try not to bring in anything which parliament would want to annul. I do believe it would be helpful if he would tell us how he thinks this would work in actual practice if an instance should arise.

Mr. St. Laurent: If there were a notice or a motion on the order paper it would be proper to suggest, at the end of the day preceding the expiry of the forty-eight hours, that the house should consider immediately after routine proceedings, the motion on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: No matter where that motion might be on the order paper?

Mr. St. Laurent: No matter where it might be on the order paper, that it would be convenient to consider that after the routine proceedings on the day on which it would mature.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister would favour that course being followed?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would favour that course, and I would ask those over whom I had any influence to agree to that course being followed.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the Prime Minister does not mind our appearing to try to get an undertaking out of him on this point. But it is very important, and a definite undertaking would be appreciated.

Then the Prime Minister gave this final, definite undertaking which dealt with the point about which I was concerned, namely the difficulty of getting unanimous consent for consideration of a private member's motion. Here are his words:

Mr. St. Laurent: If there were not unanimous consent to that procedure being followed, if there were objections to that procedure, I would give an undertaking to put a notice on the order paper as a government notice that such a resolution be dealt with at the earliest opportunity.

It was on the basis of that undertaking that we accepted this measure last year as being one that gave parliament a clear-cut and definite way of annulling any order passed under this act, if parliament felt that such should be done. I submit that for that undertaking to be repeated today, as the Prime Minister has done, is to cope with this situation in the best possible way.

Not only does the act provide for annulment of regulations or orders that may be passed by the government, but it does impose very definite limitations on the fields in which orders can be passed. Likewise, the act was limited last year in that it was to expire as of May 31 this year, subject to the possibility of it being continued for only one more year. The motion we now have before us takes advantage of that provision, but there is no provision anywhere in the act for it being continued any further after the end of May, 1953. Thus there are very definite limitations in this legislation, and I suggest that to speak of this as going back to star chamber methods, as surrendering the rights of parliament and all the rest of it, is indeed using extravagant language.

Perhaps the strongest point the leader of the opposition makes is that he does not like merely to have the opportunity to pass upon laws after they have been given effect by the governor in council. I agree that I do not like that having to be done, even under ordinary legislation. But if we are going to admit it is an emergency situation, we have to give some responsibility to the government. May I point out that there are other measures, namely the taxation changes which take place, year by year, which become effective before parliament has the right to pass upon them. Parliament, however, still has the right to negate those changes if it wishes to do so. We still have the right under this act to negate, annul or rescind any of these regulations which the government might introduce. As I say, Mr. Speaker, this is a line of argument that I did not expect to use at all in my remarks today, but speaking on behalf of a group which is deeply concerned over parliamentary procedure as well as over parliamentary democracy and the rights of the members of this house to represent the people, it did seem necessary to deal with some of these arguments that the leader of the opposition has put forward.

The leader of the opposition is concerned about the rule of law. He came back to that phrase time and time again. I do not see the relevance of the argument. We are not saying to the government that it can pass any kind of laws it wants. We are giving the government certain limited powers, and we spell out those powers. We make it clear also that they can be effective for only a limited period of time. We require that any regulations or orders passed under this act shall be given publicity, and shall be tabled in parliament within a certain period of time. It seems to me that, all told, not too bad a job is being done in dealing with the problem of an emergency situation.

If we want the government to accept its responsibility to deal with the emergency situation on the defence side, if we in this group in particular want the government to deal with economic problems that face our people and want, as we do, the institution of price controls and the payment of subsidies to help our people cope with the cost of living, we have no alternative but to confer upon that government some means by which they can carry out the things we ask them to do.

We have had today, as we have had so often, the argument about the British North America Act and the whole question of the division of jurisdiction between the federal government and the provincial governments. I shall not take time to go into that at length. We still feel as a former colleague of ours, the late Frank Jaenicke, used to point out so well, that there was real validity in the judgment of the privy council in the Canada Temperance Act case. I refer to the judgment in which their lordships said that any question, which by its inherent nature was tied in with the welfare of the whole of Canada, was a subject upon which the parliament of Canada could legislate. We have in mind as well the decisions that have been made by the courts to the effect that when parliament in its wisdom declares a state of emergency, it is not for the courts to look behind that declaration. We believe there is a state of emergency. The leader of the opposition believes that. He tried to say it was less severe than it was a year ago, yet at one time during his remarks he said it was as grave as a year ago or perhaps even more grave.

Because of these constitutional arguments I have put forward, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are quite within our rights, as a federal parliament, in passing legislation of this kind. I go further and suggest it is not merely a question of whether or not we are within our rights. Indeed, as a federal parliament we have certain responsibilities to the people of Canada. Our responsibility to them at this time of international crisis, and at this time of economic crisis in our own country, is to set up the machinery to enable the government—which at all times is responsible to this parliament and we will always hold them to that responsibility—to deal with this crisis.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks before six o'clock I think I made it clear that we were not impressed by the arguments used by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in opposing the motion now before the house.

We of this group supported this legislation a year ago, and we feel it is desirable that it should be continued for another year. Nevertheless we wish to make it clear that we are not satisfied with the record of the government in its use of the powers conferred by this legislation. Our complaint against the government is not that they have used these powers too freely but that they have not used them for the purposes to which many people in this country hoped they would be put when this legislation was brought into parliament a year ago.

The people of Canada have not suffered from abuses under the Emergency Powers Act. The people of Canada have suffered because of the failure of the government to use these powers to control prices and protect the living standards of the Canadian people. In supporting the continuance of this legislation we do so in the hope that the government will reconsider the whole question of its attitude toward prices, and toward economic controls. The people of this country still believe it is their right to expect from the government protection of their living standards, particularly when it is because of a time of crisis, and when it is to a large extent because of defence spending that we are experiencing inflation as we are at the present time. So, Mr. Speaker, we give our support to this legislation; we turn aside the arguments against it, as I sought to do in my remarks before six o'clock, but we call upon the government to make better use of this legislation in the interests of the people of Canada during the twelve months that lie ahead than has been the case during the twelve months that have just gone by.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke this afternoon he gave an account of the government's stewardship under this legislation. He is to be commended for having told us the whole story of the number of orders passed under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act; but I thought as he gave that list, particularly when he recounted the last five to which he referred, that it must have been apparent to him that to a certain extent this legislation had been used as a matter of convenience. Indeed, the last five which the Prime Minister discussed were hardly measures that could be described as matters of emergency. He admitted it was simply a case of using this legislation to deal with these matters until such time as there could be appropriate legislation.

It is our contention that in giving these powers to the government parliament is not simply giving the government a convenient way of dealing with ordinary matters; parliament is giving the government power to deal with extraordinary matters. The extraordinary situation, both on the defence front and in terms of economic matters here at home, is the reason for legislation of this kind. We support the legislation, but we call upon the government to make use of it in the interests of the Canadian people.

Motion agreed to.

CONSUMER CREDIT

MOTION TO EXTEND OPERATION OF ACT TO JULY 31, 1954

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That, whereas section five of the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act, chapter three of the statutes of 1950 (second session), provides that that act shall expire on the thirty-first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty-two; provided that, if the governor in council so orders, it shall expire on an earlier day designated by him; and provided further that if, at any time while that act is in force, addresses are presented to the Governor General by the Senate and House of Commons, respectively, praying that that act be continued in force for a further period, and the governor in council so orders, that act shall continue in force for that further period.

And whereas it is considered desirable to continue the said act in force until the thirty-first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-four.

The following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General, and Commander in Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Excellency, praying that the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act be continued in force until the thirty-first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-four.

He said: On May 5 I informed the house that an order in council had been passed effective May 6, revoking the regulations under the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act. I also stated that the government would during the present session invite both houses of parliament to present addresses to the Governor General praying that the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act be continued for a further period.

The act was passed by parliament in September, 1950, and authorized the governor in council to make regulations concerning the control of consumer credit. At that time inflationary pressures were building up rapidly all over the world, and were a cause for serious concern to all of us in this house. There had been a very rapid expansion of consumer credit during 1950. Further expansion of this type of consumer buying would have added to these upward pressures on prices.

The first consumer credit regulations under the authority of the act were passed by order in council October 25, 1950, and became effective November 1, 1950. Under these regulations a down payment of 33⅓ per cent was required for motor vehicles and 20 per cent for other consumer goods. The minimum down payment and monthly payment were each $5, and the maximum period of payment 18 months. In the early part of 1951 the effects of inflation upon the price level became much more pronounced and in March the regulations were sharply stiffened by raising the down payment to 50 per cent for motor vehicles and 33⅓ per cent for other consumer goods, by raising both the minimum down payment and monthly payment to $10, and by reducing the maximum period of payment to 12 months. In January of this year the regulations were relaxed by extending the maximum period of payment to 18 months, and finally the regulations were revoked effective May 6 when it was felt that the need for them had passed.

There is no way of measuring the exact effect of consumer credit control over this period. But the statistics show that cash sales of durable goods expanded more rapidly during the first few months of 1951 than did instalment sales, a reversal of the situation in 1950 when the consumer credit regulations were not in force. There can be very little doubt that combined with the government's other anti-inflationary measures they were of considerable importance in first limiting and then levelling off the upward spiral of prices. Perhaps the best evidence of their effectiveness lies in the volume of requests we received for their removal or relaxation.

At present the direct limitation of consumer credit seems not to be necessary. Preliminary indications are that the total of consumer credit outstanding as at March 31 of this year was less than a year ago in spite of higher average prices and incomes. Nevertheless we must remind ourselves that the economy is still subject to some very heavy demand and that we have not yet reached the peak of our defence program. The international situation is still uncertain, and we must be in a position to deal promptly with unexpected events. While the probabilities are against a renewal of inflationary forces as powerful as those which beset us in late 1950 and early 1951, we cannot ignore the possibility. Defence expenditure is still increasing, projected capital investment for the current year is above last year's level and incomes are high and rising. It would not take much to upset the balance. If such a situation should develop we should not hesitate to reintroduce credit controls, but the effectiveness of any such measures depends upon their prompt application.

The consumer credit act, as originally passed by parliament, was given a two-year term of life, with a proviso that it could be extended for a further period of life on the presentation of addresses from this house and from the Senate. The government recommends that the act be extended for a further period of two years, that is until July 31, 1954. This date coincides approximately with the time set for the achievement of our present defence program, and therefore covers the logical period during which the government should have these special powers.

It is with these considerations in mind that I move the address for the extension of the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act for a further period of two years. I think there is a good chance that we shall not need to use the authority which such an extension of the act would grant. I hope that this will be the case not only because such restraints are naturally irksome to both buyers and sellers, but because the necessity of again resorting to such restraint would mean that the general relative stability which now prevails had been seriously disturbed. But the possibility that control of consumer credit may again become necessary in the course of the next two years cannot be ignored, and if the necessity arises the measures to be taken will be more effective and can be less drastic if they can be applied quickly.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we have here a resolution proposing that a measure passed in the autumn of 1950 known as the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act be extended for two years. I draw attention immediately to the fact that it is proposed that this be extended for two years, whereas the Prime Minister's resolution moved this afternoon was for an extension of one year only. I shall revert to that, because it seems to me it is very difficult to make an argument for two years in this case, as against one year in the other. I shall suggest in an amendment that the term be reduced to one year.

I should like now to make a few general observations about the act itself. We remember very well the situation in the autumn of 1950, when we came back for a short session. We remember that at that time the war news from Korea was very bad, and that the defence spending spurt which had taken place during the summer had produced an inflationary situation, which the minister has described, and which in fact led to the initiation of the measure passed in the autumn of 1950.

At that time, as I think the minister himself more or less conceded in his following budget speech of April, 1951, the regulations had very little by way of teeth in them. Actually they had done little or nothing to improve the situation by the time of the budget speech in 1951.

Indeed, it was worse than that, because the whole action of the government during the autumn and winter of 1950-51 was to stimulate rather than to curb spending. As a matter of fact we all remember the spending splurge that took place at that time which, to some extent, was due to the fact that the government had created a feeling that there were likely to be shortages, without really having taken any worth-while steps to curb spending. And so we had that tremendous splurge.

Then we came along to the first session of 1951, when the situation was getting rapidly out of hand. We had then the interesting speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in which he told us so vividly and so frankly that the situation really, in a sense, had got largely out of hand. As he described it, the people who were in the business of selling goods had got themselves, in his words, "all set", and he thought at that time very little could be done about it.

Well, very little was done about it until the situation got bad. As we know, it went on for many months. And then with, I think, some assistance from this measure, which was tightened up and given more teeth in the spring of 1951, the situation has for the moment steadied. The minister has given us a picture of that. At the same time he feels he should be armed with this weapon, in case it is necessary to use it again.

I shall not take much of the time of the house to recall the unfortunate situation that developed. We had in the autumn of 1950, just after the Korean debacle, a situation where too little was done. Then in the spring of 1951 we had the minister's drastic taxation measures, which we all remember very well. My own guess, and I think it is more than a guess, is that the improvement in the military situation which took place in Korea immediately after the adjournment of the session in the autumn of 1950, eased the minds of the ministry—perhaps particularly the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—so that, as I say, little was done during the winter. In fact what was done was actually inimical to the situation.

Then in the spring of 1951 we had the taxes, which have been so fully discussed—taxes which bore so heavily on certain of the industries, including the motor car industry and others. At the same time heavier taxes were introduced, stronger teeth were put into the instalment buying provisions. So the two things went along together until we had this very, very unsatisfactory situation during the last year, which the minister has striven to cure by backing away from his consumer controls, and removing them until we are given to understand, at any rate it is common gossip, that deferred depreciation will also go by the boards.

My feeling about this is that it is a device which has been badly used. At the same time, with the possibility of heavy buying and further inflation I dislike to go the length of opposing it entirely. I content myself therefore, at the moment, with moving that the two-year period be reduced to one year. There is no reason whatever why the period should be two years. If we give an extra year we can take stock of the situation when the twelve months have expired just as we intend to do in connection with the Emergency Powers Act. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton):

That the word "fifty-three" be substituted for the word "fifty-four" where the latter appears in the resolution.

In other words, that the extension of the act be for one year and not for two.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, let me say at once that I have not the slightest objection to making it for one year rather than for two years. The reason two years was suggested was that two years was provided for in the original act. If anyone would rather have it one year, the government has not the slightest objection.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

PUBLIC SERVICE—FIVE-DAY WEEK

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before Your Honour leaves the chair I should like to say a few words about a matter which is of interest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I am glad he is in the house at the present time so I can direct my remarks to him, and I hope get his attention. The question I have in mind is that of the five-day week. I think I overheard the minister utter those words even before I got them out, so no doubt he realized what was coming.

Mr. Abbott: I am a mind reader at times.

Mr. Knowles: As the house knows this is a matter of considerable interest to the civil service and other workers in this country, and has been discussed a good deal of late. As hon. members know, with regard to the civil service the matter of the five-day week has been presented to the government in various ways and various answers have been given on different occasions. Recently the indication has been that the Minister of Finance is prepared to meet representatives of the civil service at an early date to discuss this matter. In the meantime a number of statements have been made which suggest that the minister's mind is somewhat made up already. My purpose in taking advantage of this opportunity to speak on a grievance is to express the hope that when the minister meets the representatives of the civil service he will meet them with an open mind.

The fact of the matter is that quite a number of people employed by the government now have a five-day week. Therefore in asking for a five-day week for the civil service we are not making a request for something brand new. I think the minister realizes from what I have just said that I am speaking about employees of other emanations of the crown and agencies of the government apart from the civil service. As I say, there are a number of employees in that category who are on the five-day week.

This is shown by sessional paper 180 which was tabled in the House of Commons on April 21, 1952, having been brought down in response to some questions of mine which were passed as an order for return on November 28, 1951. This sessional paper indicates the following employees in the following organizations as being on the five-day week, and it shows the number in each case:

Bank of Canada	1,186
Canadian Arsenals Ltd.	3,271
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation	1,300
Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation	1,944
Defence Construction Ltd.	26
Eldorado Mining & Refining Ltd.	228
Industrial Development Bank	95
Polymer Corporation, Ltd.	2,100

This sessional paper also indicates that employees of Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, Canadian wheat board and Trans-Canada Air Lines are also on the five-day week although the return does not give the number of employees in these cases. I believe the same holds true for employees of the national research council and of the defence research board.

Another interesting return was tabled on Wednesday, May 21, 1952, being sessional paper 113C. This was brought down in answer to questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who inquired specifically as to whether the five-day week was in effect in any department of government, any crown corporation or government agency and, if so, what departments, corporations or agencies.

Public Service—Five-day week

The sessional paper is rather bulky, being made up of some 33 pages, but as one goes through it he finds that in addition to government employees outside of the civil service, to whom I have already referred, who are now enjoying the five-day week, there are quite a number of civil servants as such who are also enjoying the five-day week. In particular it appears from this return that practically all civil servants in the Toronto district are now on the five-day week. I need not take up the time of the house to go through this return page by page, but it includes answers from the civil service commission and from quite a number of departments which indicate that practically all the civil servants in the city of Toronto are on the five-day week, and that there are some civil servants in special situations in other parts of the country who are likewise on that work period.

I understand that representations have been made to the government by civil servants in other precise localities. For example, civil servants in Windsor have asked that they be put on the five-day week in the same way as civil servants in Toronto. In other words we are not breaking new ground in making this request. We are not asking for an innovation. The five-day week is already in effect in a good many instances. In addition to the fact that there are such groups of people who are on the five-day week the year round, there are other departments of the government whose civil servants have enjoyed the five-day week during certain periods of the year, particularly in the summer on certain occasions. Despite all these facts which indicate some progress toward the five-day week, the government maintains an attitude of resistance toward representations that it should be extended and made really general in the civil service. The return from which I was quoting a few moments ago, sessional paper No. 180 of April 21, 1952, in addition to giving the factual information asked for also dealt with my fifth and sixth questions which were as follows:

5. What consideration has been given to such representations?

6. What progress is being made by the government in getting ready for the five-day week for all civil servants and all government employees?

The answers to these two questions were incorporated in one answer which is as follows:

The treasury board and its staff, the civil service commission and the national joint council of the public service have studied the developments and proposals relating to the five-day week in the light of other considerations bearing upon the possible adoption of it as a general policy. The five-day week has been adopted in certain units of the public service where it would promote efficiency and could be introduced without reduction in hours of work or service to the public and without increasing staff. In view of the need to economize in labour and expenditure, and to secure maximum national productivity at this time of abnormal requirements arising from the defence program, the government has not, however, considered it desirable to adopt the five-day week for the civil service as a whole.

The government of course was not surprised when the publication of that answer was greeted with some disappointment by civil servants generally. In fact their representatives spoke rather strongly about the attitude of the government, particularly in view of the fact that not long before that sessional paper was tabled the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had said in the house in answer to a question of mine that the matter was being studied, that representations would be considered, and that it would not be necessary for all the different civil service organizations to make separate representations.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that included in these critical comments made by various civil service representatives were those which appeared in the May issue of one of their publications, the Canadian Civil Servant. There is a paragraph on page 7 which reads as follows:

Indicating an unwavering determination to see the institution of the short work week throughout the civil service he claimed—

The "he" refers to Fred Knowles.

—that its inauguration would result in a higher level of productivity, efficiency and morale than now exists.

It is that sort of approach that I plead with the Minister of Finance to consider. In my view you cannot look at the question of the five-day week simply as a matter of ordinary cold mathematics. It is not a correct analysis of the situation to assume that if you cut down from five and a half days to five or from six days to five it automatically is going to mean a loss in productivity or a commensurate increase all across the board in other personnel. Beyond doubt there will be some cases where, in order to maintain public service six or seven days a week if necessary, additional people will have to be employed; but it seems to me there is no question but that in a large area of the government service there could be a reduction in the total number of days of work or total number of hours of work per week without lessening of production.

Indeed, you might even get an increase in production arising from a higher level of productivity, efficiency and morale than now exists. My plea to the Minister of Finance is that when he meets the representatives of the civil servants to discuss this matter he meet them with an open mind and consider just such points as were made in the statement by Fred Knowles, to which I have just referred. As the minister knows, other representatives of civil servants have made similar statements.

I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that in addition to such progress as is being made in the government service in terms of the five-day week, it is becoming fairly general in Canada as a whole. On December 3, 1951 certain questions of mine regarding the five-day week were answered in Hansard at page 1510. My questions were these:

1. Has the government any statistics as to the number of (a) industrial workers; (b) office workers now on (i) a five-day week; (ii) a five and a half day week; (iii) a six-day week?

2. If so, what are the number of each of the above groups of workers who are working for each of the periods indicated above?

The answer given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour is in the form of a table which I shall not endeavour to place upon Hansard again, but when the minister is getting ready to meet the civil servants I would ask him to look at the table on page 1510 of Hansard for December 3, 1951. I may say that I was pleasantly surprised myself, when these figures were given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour, to discover the extent to which the five-day week is now the rule among industrial and office workers in Canada generally. I find from the table that in terms of plant workers there are 510,000 whose work week is more than five days, be it five and a half days, six days or whatever it may be, but there are 537,000 who are already on the five-day week. In terms of office workers, there are 81,000 who are on a work week of more than five days compared with 107,000 on the five-day week. In other words, the majority of both industrial and office workers are already on the five-day week. Incidentally, I asked specifically later on whether these figures included bank employees, quite a number of whom have since gone on the five-day week because of enabling legislation passed by parliament. I was informed that these figures did not include bank employees. In other words the situation is actually better than is indicated by the figures I have given.

The whole idea in advocating the five-day week is that with the increased productivity of our modern economy it is axiomatic that a share of that increased productivity should be passed on to those who produce the nation's wealth. You do that in various ways. You do it by the scale of wages, by the prices that you pay for farm products. You do it by social security and in various other ways. You also do it by reducing the number of hours or days per week that people have to work, thus making it possible for people to enjoy a little more of the life that they are working to make possible. It is good to know that this trend is developing in Canada generally; but in my view there is still a long way to go, and I certainly feel that the federal government should give a stronger lead in this respect with regard to its own civil servants.

I want to say in passing that the federal government should also consider its own labour legislation with respect to the five-day week as it affects employees generally. For example, we have in this country the position that employees of Canadan Pacific hotels in some cases enjoy a shorter work week than do employees of Canadian National hotels. The reason is that, by a decision of the privy council, employees of the Canadian National hotels are regarded as coming under federal labour jurisdiction whereas employees of Canadian Pacific hotels are regarded as coming under provincial labour jurisdiction. In some of the provinces there are work-week laws that give to employees of Canadian Pacific hotels the protection of a shorter work week, but employees of Canadian National hotels are denied that protection because there is no such work-week limitation in federal legislation.

That is just in passing, Mr. Speaker, to point out that those of us who are concerned about the work week of our people are concerned about it on all fronts. My particular purpose in raising the matter at this time is to express the hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his officials who will go into this matter will consider it from all angles. Let them consider the extent to which government employees outside the civil service already have a five-day week. Let them face the fact that in Toronto, for example, civil servants already have the five-day week.

Mr. Fleming: As do city of Toronto employees.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) reminds me that the employees of the city of Toronto have the five-day week. That is true in some other cities in Canada as well. They would be covered in the figures with respect to office workers and others which I quoted from page 1510 of Hansard of December 3, 1951. If he will consider all those aspects of the situation and the arguments the civil servants themselves have put forward, I am sure he will agree with me that this is a subject which he should not approach with a closed mind, but rather that he should meet these people in good faith and listen sympathetically to their representations. He knows—but I repeat it—that they have my support and the support of those of us in this group. I earnestly hope that something will come out of the discussions which are scheduled for the near future between the minister and the civil servants with respect to this important question of the five-day week.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, if the five-day week were granted, then the proposal would be made that we must have a four-day week. It seems to me that we have lost sight of an important point with regard to the civil servants here in the great capital city of our nation. I am not one who would say whether they should have a five-day week, a six-day week or a seven-day week; but I would say that each hour they spend in their work should be spent profitably, happily and with enthusiasm, working for this great country.

Coming as I do from a far removed part of our nation, when I come to Ottawa I wonder that people live in such a circumscribed area. I find in the city of Ottawa today the same limits that were set when I was here as a boy forty years ago. I wonder whether, here in the city of Ottawa, there is not some kind of influence that is holding the limits of the city within narrow bounds with the hope of extracting from the civil servants the ultimate in rental for premises occupied. It is unfortunate that I should say this, but I know people in the civil service who are enjoying very small incomes and pay more for a suite than I could afford to pay, even with my income. They are limited to apartment houses, duplexes and so forth. They pay $100 and $125 a month for a suite whereas out in the Cariboo country we should be glad to have $10 a month for similar premises.

I have a suggestion which I am going to give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He is one of the younger members in this house, with a bright future before him, and in his heart he must have hope for the welfare of this nation. Ottawa is the brains of Canada. Within the boundaries of Ottawa, this capital, are the people who administer the affairs of Canada. Is it not therefore desirable that these civil servants should be given every opportunity to live full, happy and wholesome lives? I suggest that the Minister of Finance should start tonight to plot out a city for the future, a great subdivision that will extend from the Ottawa river right over to Prescott—it could be extended by degrees from time to time—in order to allow these people to get out of the heart of these purlieus and into the beautiful countryside of Ontario; to get an acre or half an acre of land, with water laid down, sewers, hydro and paved streets. A man earning $150 a month could then go out 20 miles from this town and there live a good life, raise his family, and give them the advantages of school and church and other opportunities.

We live here in the midst of plenty. In fact I am reminded of the story of the man in the boat who was seeking fresh water and who said: Water, water everywhere and not a drop to drink. He was told: Drop your bucket on the other side and you will find there is lots of water.

We are here in the centre of eastern Ontario, with all this land in this productive valley of the Ottawa and the Rideau. No part of the world is more productive and more beautiful than this part of the country contiguous to Ottawa. Yet our stupid people allow a few real estate agents to confine the boundaries of the town within narrow limits. We should have a great highway from here to Prescott; it should be a four-lane highway. We should lay out subdivisions on either side of it where there would really be an opportunity to make homes for all our civil servants. No matter how small their incomes might be, they would share with us the free air, the good food, and good water and all the amenities of life to which every Canadian is entitled.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, TO GIVE POWER TO BOARD TO BORROW FROM MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to provide for a number of administrative changes under the act; inter alia to give power to the Canadian farm loan board to borrow money from the minister to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council approves for the purposes of the board; to permit first mortgage loans up to 60 per centum of the appraised value of the security and up to a maximum of $10,000; to provide for the appointment, duties and remuneration (out of the revenues of the board) of an advisory board to be known as the Canadian farm loan advisory board; to provide with respect to short term loans secured by second mortgage that they may be made for the same purpose as first mortgage loans and up to one-third of the amount of a first mortgage loan; and to provide further for aggregate maximum loans secured by first and second mortgages up to $12,000 and up to 70 per centum of valuation where chattel security is taken or 65 per centum where it is not taken.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister going to say anything at this stage? I appreciate the fact that these are more or less changes in detail, yet they are important changes and there seems to be a pattern at work. Will the minister make a statement, perhaps reviewing the operation of the act and stating what general principles, if any, are behind these rather important changes?

Mr. Abbott: I proposed to make a brief statement, but I thought it might be made in the committee and then the members could ask questions as to the detailed administration of the board, if there is no objection to that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is no objection to that.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: This resolution seeks authority to introduce a bill to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act in order to bring the act more up to date, and make it a more flexible and efficient instrument for financing the mortgage requirements of Canadian farmers. The act was originally passed in 1927 and has not been amended since 1935. Conditions have altered substantially since that time, and it is desirable to make certain changes to enable the board to fulfil more effectively its function of providing mortgage credit for Canadian agriculture.

The most important amendments are designed to enlarge the board's field of operations by increasing the aggregate amount of loans which may be made to any one borrower on a first mortgage, and on a first and second mortgage together, by enabling the board to lend on a more generous scale in relation to the value of the security, and by adding to the purposes for which second mortgage loans may be made. At present the board cannot loan more than $5,000 on a first mortgage and $6,000 on a first and second mortgage together to any one borrower. The new bill will increase these limits to $10,000 and $12,000 respectively, that is $10,000 on the first mortgage to any one borrower or $12,000 on first and second mortgage combined to any one borrower. The reasons for this proposed amendment will be obvious. If lending limits of $5,000 or $6,000 were reasonably sound in 1927 and 1934, the development of Canadian agriculture since that time, the rise in the value of farm land and in the cost of farm equipment and so on should make the proposed new limits not inappropriate.

The present act also limits a first mortgage loan to 50 per cent of the actual value of the land and buildings to be mortgaged, buildings being considered only to the extent to which they add to the actual value of the land as farm land. If a summer cottage is built on the farm, therefore, it is not eligible so far as valuation is concerned for lending purposes. Furthermore the act limits the aggregate of first and second mortgage loans to be made to any one borrower to two-thirds of the appraised value of land and buildings in provinces where chattel security may be taken, and to 60 per cent of the said value in provinces where chattel security cannot be taken. In the new bill authority is sought to increase the limit of a first mortgage loan to 60 per cent of the value of the security, and the limit of first and second mortgage taken together to 70 per cent of the value of the security in those provinces where chattel security may be taken, and to 65 per cent in those provinces where no chattel security can be taken. I think it will be generally agreed that the board has had a sound lending record, and this record has only been possible because it has not been unduly generous in the amount of credit it has extended or unwise in the selection of its risks. I do not think we wish the board to make unsound loans and become a burden on the general body of taxpayers, but I hope it will be agreed that the lending limits in relation to the board's appraised value of properties can now be raised, as the bill provides, without assuming an undue measure of risk.

The other way in which the scope of the board's operations is being enlarged is by extending the purposes for which second mortgage loans may be made. At present they cannot be used to purchase land, but I see no reason for this restriction and experience has shown that it can be safely removed, and wisely so in the general interest.

There are two other proposed amendments to which I may call special attention at this time. One provides for the establishment of a national advisory board to consider from time to time, discuss with the board and make recommendations to the board concerning the lending policies of the board, the principles underlying the valuation of farm property and the conditions affecting or that may affect lending policy on outstanding or future loans. At present there is provision in the act for the setting up of local advisory boards, but this provision has not appeared to be practicable and has not been implemented. I hope the new provision may serve a useful purpose.

The second provision to which I shall call attention is one relating to the audit of the accounts of the board. At present this audit is in the hands of a private firm. Under the new bill which this resolution seeks authority to introduce, it is proposed to have the Auditor General of Canada act as the board's auditor. This change is, of course, in line with the general principles of our new Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister give us a few figures showing the size of the operation and the results to date?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. I have in my hand the report of the Canadian farm loan board which is tabled each year in the house, and I believe the one for this year has been tabled. I do not suppose the hon. member wants me to give all the details here, but some of the figures are rather interesting. This covers operations to the end of March, 1952, since the inception of the act. The number of loans totals 35,992; amount of loans disbursed, $72,538,000; number of loans presently outstanding, 16,497; amount of loans presently outstanding, $28,168,000. Those figures I am giving are for first mortgage loans. The amount of interest arrears totals $63,700, and the percentage of interest arrears to principal outstanding is ·226 per cent.

In so far as second mortgage loans are concerned, the number of loans totals 12,139—again since the inception of the act —the amount of loans disbursed, $6,882,000; the number of loans outstanding at present, 2,815; amount of loans outstanding, $1,234,000; amount of interest arrears, $11,700; and the percentage of those interest arrears to principal outstanding is ·948 per cent. The balance sheet of the board, as shown in the annual report which has been tabled, gives other details as to the cash on hand and that sort of thing. Speaking generally, the operations of the board have been very satisfactory. The provision in the balance sheet for possible losses is $1,744,017.19.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Built up how?

Mr. Abbott: Built up as a result of profits which have been accumulated over the years; earnings.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the minister says "profit" he means surplus over the cost of borrowing the money and lending it?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One other question. Are the figures which the minister gave as to arrears subject to any qualification of any kind? What I mean is, have there been any foreclosures? Does that tell the whole story?

Mr. Abbott: Over the years there have been foreclosures and sales. At present the number of properties on hand is nine, with a book value of $10,420. There are 208 agreements of sale outstanding with the amount due under these agreements of sale $240,600. This would represent, of course, properties taken over and subsequently resold. The interest arrears on those properties amount to only $2,850. I think it is safe to say that the board is in a very sound position at the present time.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Has the board not operated almost without loss? There has been no loss since this plan has been put under way?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think the record is quite as good as that. I think the losses have been very small.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The attitude of the board ought to be a little more generous; and there ought to be provision for a little loss. I do not suggest that we should encourage great losses or extravagances, but I would suggest to the minister that he should keep that in mind. I know the man who set this thing in motion. He was a former premier of British Columbia, Hon. John MacLean, a very able man. He came from Prince Edward Island. He was a very thrifty man, and very close in all his dealings. He set this thing going on a sound basis. Up in our end of the country, north of the Peace river, very few loans have been made because of the unwillingness of the board to take any chances whatsoever. You should relax your program so as to permit a farmer to borrow money to clear land, to clear off scrub, and so on. The attitude should be a little more generous. The government of Canada can afford to take a little loss on a tremendously useful program such as this.

Another thing I hear from many people is that they will not accept the loans because they have to sign so many papers. They have to give their age and the age of their wives, when they were married, and all about this, that and the other thing. They have to give their fingerprints. So many papers have to be filled out that they feel it is not worthwhile, so the loans are limited to very good risks, to people who are very objective, and so on. This thing is fine; it is helping the banks out, and in some places it is taking the place of banks, but it should be widened a bit to take in the newer areas where people are taking chances every day. They should really have the benefit of this fine financial set-up.

Mr. Fair: The record of the small losses suffered by the Canadian farm loan board must be accepted as another testimonial of the honesty of the farmers of Canada. If anything can be done to lower the interest rate it should be done without further delay. There are methods by which that interest rate could be lowered, and I believe our producers should be given the full benefit of those methods.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not just sure that I understood exactly about the arrears of interest. Did I understand that was all on active mortgages now, or is there some portion of it which had accrued on mortgages on properties which have changed hands.

Mr. Abbott: All the figures I have given are interest accrued on first and second mortgage loans outstanding, and the last figure I gave is interest on agreements of sale, which represent the sale of foreclosed properties. When a property is realized on, the loss, if any, is charged against the reserve for losses. If the property is sold and realizes a profit, then of course that profit is credited to the same account; and the item I gave of $240,600 as representing balances due on agreements of sale would represent the balances due on the sale of property which had been foreclosed, and on that item the amount of interest arrears is $2,850.

Mrs. Fairclough: That amount is included in the $63,700?

Mr. Abbott: No; that is a separate item. The amount of $63,700 is the arrears on the first mortgages, $11,700 on the second mortgages, $2,850 on agreements of sale, or a total of close to $80,000 on the three items.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister available the borrowing and lending rates, the rates at which the board borrowed, and at which it lent over the years? What is the present rate?

Mr. Abbott: The present rate? I think I have it here. I wonder whether my hon. friend would let that stand. I will give it to him when we are in committee on the bill itself. I should have it, but I have not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister familiar with the set-up in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland? I understand there is no agent of the board in Newfoundland, and anyone who wants a loan has to make application to the Halifax office. That entails considerable delay. Now that these loans are to be made more liberal I wonder whether consideration could be given to setting up an office in Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: I should be very glad to bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the management of the board. I imagine that up to the present time the volume of business offering in Newfoundland has not been considered sufficiently great to justify the overhead which would be involved in establishing a separate office; but I shall be glad to see that the situation is looked into.

Mr. Quelch: Has all the capital provided been private capital?

Mr. Abbott: All the capital that has been provided has been put up by the government.

Mr. Quelch: No private capital?

Mr. Abbott: No private capital, no.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the business of the board been steadily on the upgrade, or has the minister got any sort of rough figures over the years, not year by year.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I have here the year by year increase, but the increase has been steady, although not unduly rapid, perhaps owing to the, shall I say, sound lending policies of the board.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 275, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

SALARIES OF VICE-CHAIRMAN AND OTHER MEMBER OF BOARD

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Tariff Board Act to provide that there shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund an annual salary of twelve thousand dollars to the vice-chairman of the board and an annual salary of eleven thousand dollars to the other member of the board.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, as the terms of this resolution indicate, the primary purpose of the bill founded on this resolution is to increase the annual salary of the vice-chairman of the board to $12,000 and the annual salary of the other member to $11,000. In addition there is a provision that a section in the act relating to investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, which is now covered under that act, is to be repealed; and the section with respect to the secretary of the board is to be repealed, and his salary established in the usual way.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What are the salaries now paid?

Mr. Abbott: It is $10,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To these two?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, they are each $10,000. The vice-chairman is to be paid $12,000, the other member $11,000; and the salary of the chairman, which is now $15,000, is not to be changed.

Mr. Fleming: What is the salary of the secretary?

Mr. Abbott: I believe it is either $5,000 or $6,000.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 276, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act to provide that the chief electoral officer may be paid a salary of not less than eight nor more than twelve thousand dollars per annum to be fixed by order of the governor in council.

Mr. Graydon: This is a good night to talk about elections.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Especially salaries.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this resolution relating to the salary of the chief electoral officer. I wish at the outset to say that the present incumbent of the office, like his father before him whom most of us knew, enjoys the fullest confidence of all members of the house. I am sure nothing we might say regarding his salary will be regarded by anyone as detracting in any way from what I have just said. Indeed, there is no question that, in the light of his responsibilities and the way he discharges them, any proposal for a reasonable increase in his salary would meet with the approval of members of the house.

However I am somewhat surprised at the way in which this resolution reads, particularly in view of the rather warm discussion we had in the house last year regarding the salaries of the civil service commissioners. The Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) who introduced the resolution and bill on that occasion will recall that, prior to last year, the salaries of the civil service commissioners were fixed by statute, although for a number of years they had a supplement by means of items in the estimates.

We had asked on a number of occasions, in keeping with the recommendation by the Auditor General, that that practice should be discontinued, and that the entire amount of the salaries paid to the civil service commissioners should be provided in the statute itself. To our amazement, when the amending legislation came in it took away from parliament altogether the fixing of the salaries of the civil service commissioners and placed that matter in the hands of the governor in council. We protested strongly against that course of action. I still think we were right in our contention that the salaries of the civil service commissioners should be fixed by parliament rather than by the governor in council.

We pointed out at that time that in our opinion there were certain officials who must always be recognized as officials not of the government but of parliament. We included in that category not only the civil service commissioners but the Auditor General and the chief electoral officer. Indeed in our opposition to the proposal to make the salaries of the civil service commissioners subject to decision by the governor in council we gave as examples of a better way to do it the fact that the salaries of the Auditor General and the chief electoral officer were fixed by statute.

Despite the argument we put up at that time against changing that way of doing things, and despite considerable editorial support from newspapers in respect of the stand we took, we now find the government changing the basis with respect to the salary of the chief electoral officer. As a matter of fact we have now neither one method nor the other, but rather a hybrid. It used to be that this salary, like that of the Auditor General and of the civil service commissioners, was fixed by statute. In respect of the civil service commissioners the salaries are no longer fixed by statute, but rather by the governor in council. In the present instance we have a proposal to fix lower and upper limits, leaving it to the governor in council to determine what the salary of the chief electoral officer will be, within those limits. I am not sure whether this is better or worse than the other arrangement; but, on balance, I think it is worse.

Our concern about the whole matter is that these people, who are servants of parliament in a particular way, and not servants of the government, should not have their salaries or anything related to their work handled in such a way as to make them feel that it is the government they must regard as their employer, and that it is the government to whom they must go to obtain increases in salaries.

I deeply regret that the government has taken this course of action with respect to people in this position. I regret it because of the nature of the position itself; I regret it because of the person of the present incumbent, and I do not think this change should be made.

Another feature about the change that puzzles me is that the resolution proposes that the salary shall not be less than $8,000 or more than $12,000 per year. If my information is correct the present salary is $10,000, and I am puzzled as to why we find here this sliding scale with provision for a salary lower than that now received by the present incumbent. That being so, the chief electoral officer just does not know what can happen. He might get an increase from the government but, on the other hand, the government might decide to decrease his salary. I insist that this is not fair. In my view the chief electoral officer should continue to enjoy in all respects and in every way the status he has enjoyed across the years, as a servant of parliament rather than of the government.

I shall be interested in any explanation the Secretary of State may give for this change, either in committee or at any other stage. However, I do feel that this is the wrong way to go about it; and I regret very much that the government has paid so little heed to what we on this side of the house thought was a pretty strong and effective argument put forward last year. At that time if the measure which had been brought before the house had been changed, the prestige of the government might have been damaged. On the other hand, I remember the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) agreeing to a change when persuaded by the house that he had made a wrong move.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And tonight.

Mr. Knowles: Tonight the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) accepted a suggestion from the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) with respect to a measure we had before us a while ago.

Mr. Fleming: We are making history.

Mr. Knowles: Whatever may have been the motives that kept the government from acceding to our request last year it does not appear to be wise on their part to make this change in the way of dealing with this matter.

I say quite categorically that in my view the responsibilities that devolve upon the chief electoral officer and the splendid job that person is doing merit a larger salary than the $10,000 he is now getting. In no sense should my remarks be interpreted as being in opposition to an increase in salary for this gentleman. As a matter of fact it cannot be said that the resolution provides for an increase in his salary; it provides for a possible increase or for a possible decrease, whereas we favour an increase.

Parliament should have the right to indicate what the salary of this person will be. The resolution we adopted just a moment ago dealt with the salaries of people who are not as much servants of parliament as are the Auditor General and the chief electoral officer; yet in the case of members of the tariff board it was felt by the government that the way to deal with their salaries was to fix the amount in the statute. I am wholly in support of the salary being more commensurate with the responsibilities of the chief electoral officer. I regret that the government has decided to do it on this basis, rather than by fixing a definite amount in the statute.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this resolution changes the present law in two respects. One is to displace the fixed salary provided by the statute and to substitute a floor and ceiling, the floor being lower than the present statutory salary and the ceiling being higher. The other change is to remove from parliament the responsibility for establishing the salary and to vest that responsibility and power in the governor in council.

I do not think anyone in this house is going to argue that parliament should set the salary of every public official, but there certainly are some outstanding cases where parliament and not the governor in council should set the salary. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, that applies eminently to the Auditor General. He is an official of parliament, and parliament should establish his salary. There should be no power left in the governor in council in respect of the amount of salary to be received by an official like the Auditor General who must enjoy complete independence of the government.

The same thing can be said about the official whose salary is under debate at this moment, namely the chief electoral officer. Independence in the administration of the duties of his office is just as important in my submission as independence in the administration of the duties of the Auditor General. Why this office should be singled out now as one in which the governor in council should claim the right to fix the salary is something I cannot follow.

This resolution does not propose to create a new office. We are not dealing with a situation where there has been no history. Here we have an official whose independence of the government has been guaranteed by the fact that his salary is fixed by parliament in a statute. The government can take nothing from him. Why change? That is the big question: Why should a change be made now? It would be quite possible within the limits proposed in the present resolution for the governor in council to apply pressure upon the salary hopes of the official holding this high office.

It seems to me entirely unsound to propose that any measure be adopted which will qualify or modify in any degree the independence of the chief electoral officer. Let us compare this proposal with what was involved in the resolution which has just been disposed of by the house. In that case the house decided that the present provisions of the Tariff Board Act by which the salaries of the vice-chairman and the third member of the board are fixed shall continue. No member of this house I am sure is going to suggest that the independence of the chief electoral officer is one whit less important than the independence of the vice-chairman and the third member of the tariff board.

I submit that what is involved here is inherently wrong. If the government is convinced that there should be an increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer I am sure the house will be glad to consider such a proposal on its merits, and consider it sympathetically, but to make an occasion of that kind the pretext for removing from parliament the right to guarantee the independence of the chief electoral officer from all government influence seems to me to be a very different matter, and a move which the government ought not to make.

It seems to me also this measure uses what may be considered the occasion of a proper increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer as an excuse or pretext for establishing, in lieu of parliamentary authority, governmental authority to establish that salary. That would be a retrograde step. I hope the government will withdraw this resolution. If there is occasion for increasing the salary of the chief electoral officer let us proceed to do it by a proper amendment to the act, not by this move which I submit is inherently wrong and unsound.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a rather difficult resolution to discuss at this time. Not having been taken into the government's confidence I do not know just what the government is doing. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act to provide that the chief electoral officer may be paid a salary of not less than eight nor more than twelve thousand dollars per annum to be fixed by order of the governor in council.

That to me is a rather intriguing thing in some ways and a rather mysterious thing in other ways. Perhaps the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), who is sponsoring the resolution, will give us the actual reasons for bringing it in at this time.

It has been stated here this evening that the officer under discussion is now receiving $10,000 by statute. As far as I am concerned, I do not want to see that salary reduced. I appreciate the good work that has been done by our chief electoral officer as well as the good work done by his father who was his predecessor in office. I believe in economy in government, but I believe also in paying a good salary for good work performed.

As I said before, it is very difficult to speak on the resolution when one does not know the reasons for its being on the order paper in its present form. Nevertheless I am compelled to support it. I do not want to see the salary of the chief electoral officer reduced. We want competent administration in that office, and I believe the present incumbent has given service that has been satisfactory to all.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister will want to let the hon. member for Greenwood speak before he does.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to what has been said so far and I regret the moderation of the speakers who have preceded me because it seems to me that this is a most astounding performance. We may get reasons which will make it look different, but I confess they will have to be very good ones. First of all, let me associate myself with what has been said about the chief electoral officer personally. He is a worthy son following a worthy father. However, if this action is to be taken I see no reason in the world why we may not next have a measure saying that the salary of the Auditor General is going to be fixed by the government. I do not think we could feel secure from something like that happening if we tamely submit and allow this measure to go through.

This general question came up last year, but it was not in such an extreme form. With the great importance of the duties of the chief electoral officer and the desirability of his being independent, is anyone going to stand up and say seriously that a man whose salary is fixed by the government is really independent? Will anyone have the effrontery to stand up in the house and say that? I do not believe they will. What is happening is that we are tampering with the independence of the chief electoral officer. Let us face what we are doing. It is hard to be indignant about the matter when we look at the gentlemen opposite and they ask us to believe—and of course we more or less do believe—that there is not an evil thought in their minds.

Mr. Fleming: We know better.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) quoted the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) this afternoon to the effect that we have no guarantee of the immortality of the delightful gentlemen who sit opposite us. There have been countries and cases where people with positions corresponding to the chief electoral officer have been tampered with. The Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) may have such divine eloquence that he will be able to persuade us tonight that we are all wrong, but if he does not I hope there will be men in the house who will fight this thing tooth and nail because, like the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I think it is wrong.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I too am opposed to the motion, not on the ground that I do not favour an increase in salary from $10,000 to $12,000, if necessary, for the chief electoral officer, but because I think the resolution should call for an increase from $10,000 to $12,000 to be fixed by statute. From what experience I have had I feel that the chief electoral officer is doing a very excellent job, as his father did before him, but this resolution is an apparent arrogant attempt on the part of the government to control the chief electoral officer. If there is one officer in this country who should be independent it is the chief electoral officer. I am quite confident that the people of the country will not favour the government putting the chief electoral officer under their thumb so his salary may be increased or reduced at the whim of the government. It is on that basis that I oppose the resolution.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to say a word or two in opposition to the proposal. Like previous speakers I have nothing but the very highest regard for the chief electoral officer, as I had for his predecessor.

An hon. Member: For the record.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, it is for the record, and I do not boast about the years I have been here without ever making a speech in the house. I am quite sincere in what I say, and it is for the record if the hon. member wants to put it that way. As I said, I had great respect for his predecessor in that office, his father, but I think the principle that the government may increase or decrease the salary of the chief electoral officer is quite unbecoming in a democratic state. As was pointed out, the next thing the government may want to do is seek authority to increase or decrease at will the salary of the Auditor General and others holding offices of an independent nature who are responsible to parliament rather than to the government. On that basis I am very much opposed to the resolution in its present form.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, before the debate goes any further perhaps I had better dissipate the misapprehensions under which a good many members of the house appear to labour. There is no intention on the part of the government to do anything which would in any way place the chief electoral officer under their authority except in a proper and legal manner. There is no intention whatever to endeavour to use any duress upon him or any inducement to commit those offences of which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house seem to be in deep dread. As a matter of fact we are not changing the law in that respect at all. At the present time the act reads as follows:

> The chief electoral officer shall rank as and have all the powers of a deputy head of a department, communicate with the governor in council through the Secretary of State of Canada, devote himself exclusively to the performance of the duties of his office and be paid a salary of not less than eight nor more than ten thousand dollars per annum to be fixed by order of the governor in council...

All we are proposing to do is to change the word "ten" to "twelve".

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: Would the Secretary of State say whether any consideration has been given to fixing the amount of the salary in the statute rather than leaving it to be fixed at the discretion of the governor in council, which has created the misapprehension which the hon. gentleman has himself said probably existed on that side of the house as well as on this side. It seems to me it would go a long way toward assuring the independence of the chief electoral officer if his salary were fixed by parliament so it could only be altered by parliament, rather than leaving it this way. I am not saying it has ever been arbitrarily changed in the past because I do not know, but it certainly seems to me that it could be, in accordance with the terms of the resolution and the terms of the present act which the Secretary of State has just read. If the intention is to increase the salary to $12,000, which I would now gather is the purpose for which the resolution is introduced, what is the objection to making it $12,000 in the statute instead of leaving it as a fluctuating amount to be determined by the governor in council?

Mr. Bradley: May I suggest the old principle: evil to him who evil thinks. So far as I and my colleagues on this side of the house are concerned, we have no desire whatever to raise any fears in the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side. We are perfectly content to fix the salary at $12,000 a year.

Mr. Fleming: In the statute?

Mr. Fulton: In the statute?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Good. We need some more by-elections.

Mr. Abbott: There is no change in the principle of the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand exactly how this will read? The Secretary of State has just made a statement. I greatly appreciate the gesture which is being made, if I understand it correctly. What he said, however, does not in the least alter the merits of this situation. Do I understand that this resolution will now read:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act to provide that the chief electoral officer may be paid a salary of $12,000.

Is that what I am to understand? In other words, am I to understand that parliament is fixing his salary at $12,000?

Mr. Bradley: If the hon. gentlemen on the other side are content to take my word for it, and if the resolution might be allowed to pass as it is, I will undertake that the statute will contain a provision that the salary of the chief electoral officer will be $12,000 a year.

Mr. Abbott: I think I might say a word on that matter. The principle has been that there is a range for the chief electoral officer as amended by the section. It may well be that a new electoral officer who is appointed might not have the experience, the qualifications and so on of the present one. I think it is desirable even in this office in certain respects to have a range. That is the reason that principle was maintained. I think it might have been logical to substitute "ten" for "eight" and "twelve" for "ten"; but I think it is desirable to maintain that principle, which no doubt was put in the act for good reason. There is, however, nothing fundamental about the thing. If we want to introduce the rigidity of "twelve" into the act, certainly the government has no objection. The amendment is brought in to pay the present electoral officer $12,000. That is the purpose of the amendment. I think we might leave it until the bill is brought down.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Bradley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 277, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the first time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Bradley moved the first reading of the bill.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there is just one small point that I wish to mention. I am not in any sense endeavouring to question the undertaking which the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) gave, but if the bill is read for the first time I imagine we shall be reading it in the form in which the Secretary of State has indicated.

Mr. Abbott: Any amendment would be made in committee.

Mr. Fulton: It would be the proposal to amend it in committee?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. That is where you have to amend it.

Mr. Fulton: That might be simpler.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 209, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this measure has come before us somewhat unexpectedly. Will the minister recall to our minds just the general nature of the items that are covered? My recollection is that the amendment has to do chiefly with plastics.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. There is really not much I can add to what I said in my budget speech, which I realize was given a month or two ago. There are really three things here. One is to implement certain reports of the tariff board as to tariff changes; one is to incorporate in the tariff schedules themselves certain changes which have been in effect for some time by order in council; and the third covers proposals for improvement in wording and classification to remove anomalies and to keep the items in line with recent developments, but without changes in substance so far as the tariff items are concerned.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder whether the minister would indicate to us to what extent representations have been made since the proposals with respect to changes in the customs tariff were announced by him in his budget speech. One can assume that some representations must have been made once the proposals became known to the public. Will the minister be good enough to indicate the nature and extent of any representations by persons who might be affected by those changes?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The principal representations I think have been in connection with the glass tariff. One main representation was that the change, whereby the drawback provision was removed, the tariff reduced to 20 per cent from 25 per cent and a 5 per cent tariff put on plate glass from most-favoured-nation countries, would prove injurious to the manufacturers of laminated glass since that glass is not made in Canada and the materials for it have to be imported from outside. At the present time none of those materials come from the United Kingdom whence they would come in free, but come from the United States. It was suggested that this change might cause some injury to the laminated glass manufacturing industry here. Laminated glass is used in the manufacture of automobile windshields.

After looking into the situation I decided to recommend that the duty of 5 per cent be suspended for one year. Then we will see. If at that time the imports are mainly from the United Kingdom, the suspended rate may be reimposed. I think that matter was satisfactorily taken care of.

Then there were some representations that the lowering of duty on window glass would be injurious to domestic manufacturers; but after considering these representations I arrived at the conclusions that the injury was more imaginary than real.

In the plastics field we have had some representations that the reductions in certain categories of duties would prove embarrassing to the manufacturers of certain types of plastics. However, after considering the report of the tariff board with the chairman of the board, the commissioner of tariffs and others, I have come to the conclusion that those fears are probably unfounded. In any case we shall continue to watch the situation. This is an extremely complicated field. The tariff board made an exhaustive investigation extending over some time, as the committee is aware. I would be reluctant at this time to vary the findings of the board. We shall see how it works out over the next year or two. If it is found that further changes are needed, they can be introduced.

I think those are the main representations, speaking generally. I have had no other serious representations as to the proposed tariff changes.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I know that all members of the committee have a great deal of confidence in the chairman of the tariff board. I do not think there is a more responsible or more devoted public servant anywhere than Mr. Hector McKinnon. I am wondering what the position will be in the light of what the minister has just now said about re-examining the situation in the light of the effects of the proposed changes in the tariff. Will there be any complications in the way of restoring the present provisions, or in other words of neutralizing the proposed changes? For instance, will there be any complications as a result of our international agreements if it should be found that the effects of the changes now proposed are not as happy as the minister indicates?

Mr. Abbott: We shall watch the situation fairly closely. The principal complaint I have received about the plastics schedule is as the result of an import reduction in the type of plastics known as phenol plastics for making laminated board, bakelite and that sort of thing. I have concluded, as I say, that those fears are not too well founded, but we shall have to see. This recommendation represents the considered view of the tariff board. As the committee knows, the board has recommended some reductions and some increases, and the reason is that this is a very complex field. Technical processes have been changing over the last ten or fifteen years since the tariff schedules were written with respect to it.

I do not know whether any hon. members have seen the editorial in the most recent issue of the magazine Canadian Plastics. I do not want to take the time of the committee to read the whole of the editorial, but perhaps I shall read one paragraph from it. It says:

> We have had a chance to read the copy of the report of the tariff board re the plastics industry, and in the opinion of your editor, it is perhaps one of the most credible documents ever compiled on any industry, by any board, at any time.

I shall leave out the next paragraph which refers to the members of the board, and then the article continues:

> It is impossible for any board on tariff matters to recommend a course which will not cause a "backbite" from certain individuals who might be adversely affected. Undoubtedly, this report will have its hecklers.
> Albeit . . . but when the report is read, digested, analyzed and finally comprehended in its full intent . . . there will be few . . . if any at all . . . who will refute the fact that the board was interested only in fostering the most healthy national development of the plastics industry in all its phases.

That is in general terms, but it does give some indication of the appreciation of the report and recommendations which have been made by the board.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister deal with the other point I raised, as to the possibility of our hands being tied by our present international agreements should it be found that the effects of the present changes are not as expected.

Mr. Abbott: I did not fully appreciate the import of the hon. member's question. We can go back to where we were before the introduction of this measure. Nothing we do in this measure will tie our hands so far as reverting to our former position is concerned. I think that answers what the hon. member had in mind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say a word about the situation which exists as between the United States administrative officials, who are actually carrying out the tariff measures, and those in charge of government policy? We have been told from time to time that it is very difficult to get the administrative people to carry out the intention indicated by the government. We are often told that, by delays running into weeks or even months, they impose what is in effect something much more effective than a tariff. Can the minister indicate the situation in that regard?

While I am on my feet I should like to ask him to deal with this in his answer. There are a good many indications that United States business is becoming more tariff-minded than it has been for years. For a good many years, at any rate, we have been happily freer than we were before from tariff considerations, but I understand there is now evidence of a considerable return on the part of business to the authorities who have these matters in hand, asking for tariff assistance. Perhaps the minister would deal with this question.

Mr. Abbott: On the first point, I assume the hon. member is referring to the United States customs administrative practice, and not to our own. I have never heard any serious—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry I did not make it clear. I referred to the United States.

Mr. Abbott: Over the years there has been a good deal of difficulty arising out of what might be described as the rather rigid restrictive administrative practice under the United States customs legislation. For some time there has been before congress a customs simplification bill which, I am told, is making good headway. There is a better than reasonable prospect that it will be adopted in the very near future. When it is we have reason to believe that this practice, which the hon. member has indicated amounts to almost a concealed discretionary tariff, will be improved.

As to the other question, the committee may have seen that on one or two recent occasions when making speeches in the United States—although the member for Eglinton does not like me to do it—

Mr. Fleming: It's all right at the right time.

Mr. Abbott: —when making speeches in the United States to groups of businessmen there I have expressed some apprehension about what I conceived to be a certain resurgence of protectionist sentiment in the United States. I do not believe for a moment that it represents the majority opinion in the United States, but such things as the rider that was attached to the defence bill putting a quantitative restriction on cheese imports, the increasing number of applications to the tariff board for increases in tariffs and that sort of thing, indicate that the protectionist sections of the United States are once again attempting to get increases in tariffs. I do not believe they will succeed. I took occasion, under the circumstances to which I have referred, both in Washington and the mid-west, to issue a friendly warning against what I believed would be the unfortunate consequences if such a policy were followed. Further than that I do not think I should go at the moment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the situation in regard to cheese?

Mr. Abbott: There is a measure before the United States congress, sponsored by the administration of course, to repeal that provision. There is a reasonable chance that it will be successful.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I suggest to the committee that the lower the tariff imposed upon glass and these similar products, the better it will be for the people of Canada. The poultry industry is a great user of glass, and out in the west glass is very essential in home building. The use of these newer windows, the idea of letting the sunlight into the homes, calls for more and more glass. I suggest that the minister consider lowering the tariff on glass to the very lowest limit so the people of Canada can get large supplies from those people who can produce glass very cheaply. It means a great deal to the health of Canada, and I shall point out to the minister also that in the time of Henry VIII there was a tax on window panes—

Mr. Knowles: Did he live in a glass house?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If I did I would not throw rocks, like the hon. member. There was a tax on window panes, and we smile at that and think it is ridiculous; yet in 1952 our friend is seriously advocating the idea of putting a huge tax on any glass window that goes into a house in western Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister or the Minister of National Revenue what the up to the minute news is on dumping. I know the Minister of National Revenue made a statement a short time ago, and it read all right in Hansard but I do not think it convinced the boys back home. I ask the minister if he feels he is on top of some of the devious means which are used by means of intermediary companies, and by means of, shall we say, rather fictitious sales or not typical sales in the United States, to get goods in here at an entirely unrealistic rate and thereby create a situation which is very hard on our own businessmen?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I believe I made a statement earlier in the house which still holds good. So far as the investigations which have been made by the Department of National Revenue are concerned, there is no dumping in this country within the meaning of the act. If goods are sold in the country of origin at a fair market value and they come into this country, then that is the invoice on which customs duty and sales tax are charged.

Prior to the war we had in the Department of National Revenue investigators or appraisers who made it a point to look into the imports which came into this country from foreign countries, and they were able to give us a fair appraisal of what was the fair market value in the country of export. Recently in the department, as far as one commodity is concerned, textiles, we have had the services of an up-to-date appraiser in that particular line of goods, and we have made arrangements for the appointment of four or five others, who will give appraisals of the cost of the goods in the country of export.

I do not feel that more needs to be said at this time. Perhaps that answers the hon. member's question as to what constitutes dumping.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want the minister to think I am being critical, because I know this is a very difficult job; but when he says there is no dumping I think he is a little optimistic, though of course he goes on and says no dumping within the meaning of the act. I know the sense in which he says that, but again let me say that there are a lot of people who find that what is actually going on is unsatisfactory; and it is unsatisfactory for one of two reasons: Either they are able by legal devices to legally get around the act, which there is considerable reason to believe is happening in certain cases; or it may be that the minister's investigations as to fair prices in foreign countries, however well intentioned and however sincerely made, are not adequate.

I should like to have a little more information as to just how these investigations are made. For example, I am told that a company in the United States that wishes to get rid of a surplus product will adopt ingenious methods of making sales, genuine enough sales, at prices which are artificially lower, for a certain area in the United States, an area broad enough, so it is suggested to me, to satisfy an investigation made by our department. Therefore the argument is that company A, a large company which wants to dump its products, will sell in a certain area in the United States at a lower price. They will then provide evidence whereby they will satisfy the minister's agents that the price which is being quoted in that area is a fair price; but in fact, if you look at the essence of the transaction, as represented to me, it is not a fair price, because they are selling at an artificially low price in a comparatively small area in order to establish a low price.

Will the minister say a little more as to the method of investigation? How many sales does it need to establish a price? How widespread do these sales have to be? Would two sales in one American state, for example, establish a price; because I understand these special prices are quoted in fairly large areas, let us say a whole state. Perhaps a large state will be treated in that way. Will the minister say something on that?

Mr. McCann: As far as the investigations made by our auditors in exporting countries are concerned, I might say that they are very thorough, considering the staff we have; and we have had no objections on the part of manufacturers or exporters to Canada, particularly in the United States, to giving us all the information which we require. That inquiry is made over the territory in which the particular line of trade is carried on. For instance, if it is in the textile industry, the hon. gentleman probably knows that the chief points at which textiles are made in the United States are upon the eastern seaboard and down in the northern central states; at least, that is where most of the exports come to Canada from.

The investigation is widespread in all the mills in those particular districts. We do not take as the price at which these goods are invoiced the price for any one particular sale. We take it over a series of sales over a certain period of time. That period may not be specific, but it is over a length of time. For instance, in the textile industry there are certain things that affect it. For instance, there are climatic conditions, differences in style and all that. Manufacturers of women's summer dresses in the United States probably have them ready for the trade by January 1 for people who can afford to buy them and want to go to Florida or California. They sell those dresses to their own trade perhaps two or three months later. Naturally they can be bought earlier. These same styles, as the hon. member for Hamilton West would know, across the line are probably in vogue in Canada somewhat later on in the season. All these things have to be taken into consideration in the establishment of what is known as a fair market value; and a fair market value is a value at which these goods are sold in the country of origin under comparable conditions and to the same type of people in the trade.

What I mean is, you get the retail price and you get the jobber's price, and you get the manufacturer's price. If a jobber in the United States is selling to a jobber in Canada, then it would be the jobber's price that would govern. If somebody goes over there and brings back half a dozen dresses, then it is the retail price that governs the invoice. I want to repeat that after thorough investigation of the invoices of different types of commodities that come into this country we have not been able to find evidence of dumping.

Just recently an order was passed having to do with what is known as fixing the value. That has to do with furs, particularly muskrat and rabbit skins, that come into this country from Russia. We have hesitancy in fixing the values of that country because we do not do an awful lot of trade with them and they are not members of the GATT. Under that agreement it is the most-favoured-nation tariff that works, and a country like Russia would come under the general tariff.

I do not know that there is any further explanation I can give, except to restate that we have augmented our appraisers, and in the department we engage the services of people who are expert in the particular line of business. For instance, the people who put valuations on textiles are textile-trained people.

Mr. Lennard: They were not a few years ago.

Mr. McCann: I am talking about now.

Mr. Lennard: You had a hardware merchant on that.

Mr. McCann: Probably it is the government of from 1930 to 1935 that the hon. member has reference to.

Mr. Lennard: No, it was not.

Mr. McCann: That does not obtain at the present time.

Mr. Lennard: It did in 1940.

Mr. McCann: Our textile appraisers are versed in the textile business. The people who make the appraisals on machinery that comes in here know the machine business, and so on along the line; so we are in a position, with the experience of these people and with the information we get now from the exporters in the country of origin, to determine what are fair market values for imports.

As I said in the remarks I made in the budget debate last year, there were attempts at dumping into the country; but by raising the invoice price and collecting the tariff on that, and the sales tax on top of that, we took in over $1,500,000 in tariff alone on goods that were shipped into Canada in which there was an attempt to dump. But dumping into Canada has not been carried out successfully.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister began to say a word about the situation when we are dealing with countries behind the iron curtain, but he did not discuss the matter in detail. I should like to know more about how we arrive at prices, for example, in Czechoslovakia and other countries. How does the department arrive at a fair market value?

Mr. McCann: I will admit we have difficulty in getting information from countries behind the iron curtain. At the present time negotiations are under way between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and representatives of Czechoslovakia to see if they would admit our officers into their country to find out the costs of their manufactured articles.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the minister says he has had difficulty does he mean he does not get the information?

Mr. McCann: That is right. I said we have difficulties; but I wish my hon. friend would not try to misconstrue my words. If he would just listen—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just asked a question. The minister need not be so touchy.

Mr. McCann: I am not touchy at all. I am the least touchy of anyone here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCann: Laugh, if you like; it is just like water off a duck's back so far as I am concerned. But I said we were making attempts to do it and I admitted immediately that we have not been successful. But that does not deter us from continuing in our efforts to achieve the objective we would like to attain.

Mrs. Fairclough: That being so, I submit the fair market value prevalent in Canada should be the determining factor, if we have any difficulty whatsoever in procuring evidence as to the fair market value in the country of origin.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, we have not yet had an answer.

Mr. Abbott: That was an assertion, not a question.

Mr. McCann: It is spelled out in the statute. It is the fair market value in the country of origin.

Mr. Abbott: I have had occasion to say it before, but I shall say again that Mr. Fielding introduced in 1909, 1910 or 1911 provisions in the tariff respecting dumping, and those have been the bible of Canadian manufacturers since that time. The provision is that the dumping duty shall be the difference between the fair market value in the country of origin at the time of export and the price at which it is invoiced. That is the statute. I think it would be found in the manufacturing side of the industry that there would not be too many people interested in tampering with that statute.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister say something as to the program now before the tariff board? There is a broad situation being reviewed, and I think it might be of interest if we were told about it.

Mr. Abbott: I have made one or two references to the tariff board, but offhand I do not recall just what they were. Of course the tariff board is continually occupied with its statutory responsibility of hearing appeals from importers or others who feel that the tariff is not properly interpreted, or some other question appealed to the tariff board from a decision by the Department of National Revenue.

The tariff board has cleaned up these matters. The committee will recall that in my budget I recommended a small increase in shot and grit, for the reasons there stated. I thought I should consider the matter further before acting upon it. That is shot and grit used in the manufacture of castings.

Mr. Fleming: There will be less Grit after tonight.

Mr. Abbott: I was wondering whether my hon. friend would wish to make one of his witticisms.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As we look at the international trade situation, would the minister state whether there is any likelihood of further trade conferences, or if we have caught our breath since the last one. What is the situation?

Mr. Abbott: There is no immediate prospect of any further conferences, such as those at Geneva, Torquay and Annecy. The field appears to have been pretty well exhausted for the time being. In view of the fact that this is a presidential election year in the United States, and for other reasons, I doubt whether there is any immediate prospect of any further general conferences of that kind.

As my hon. friend will recall, the agreements run until the end of 1953. Of course the whole situation will have to be examined prior to that time.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 208, to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister propose to say anything now, or in committee?

Mr. Abbott: There is very little I can say on the motion for second reading. As I indicated in my budget speech there are no major questions of substance in this bill. The principal provisions, as will be seen, are to correct drafting inaccuracies and anomalies which have been shown up as a result of the experience of the last few years.

As I said in my budget speech I am hoping, if time permits, that it will be possible to do a major job of revision on the Dominion Succession Duty Act, now that we have had experience with it for a few years. However, it was not possible to do it this year.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister give us a brief history as to the yield of the tax.

Mr. Abbott: I shall try to get that information in a moment. I do not have it readily available. It will be noted that section 1 is purely a drafting amendment. We are simply substituting "Income Tax Act" for "Income War Tax Act", which was in the original bill. We are merely taking advantage of having opened up the act to correct that. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue has the revenue statistics with him and will be able to give that information.

Mr. McCann: The collections for succession duties in 1951, the last year for which we have statistics, were $33,599,089.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister figures for any previous years?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. McCann: In 1950 they were $29,919,000; 1949, $25 million; 1948, $30 million; 1947, $23·5 million.

Mr. Herridge: Last session the Dominion Elections Act was retitled "Canada Elections Act." Why was one act treated in that way when this act is still left as "Dominion Succession Duty Act"? Can the minister tell the house what is the government's policy in that respect.

Mr. Abbott: I am grateful to the hon. member for calling the matter to my attention. I think it would be quite proper to change the title of this act. The general policy has been that where an act is opened up and the descriptive word is "dominion", that word is changed to "Canada". It was simply an oversight on my part that that was not done in this case. Perhaps we can take care of that next year when we are dealing with the general revision.

Mrs. Fairclough: Further to the remarks I made during the debate on the budget, may I say that I have been very interested in what this bill might provide. I recognize the difficulties under which the minister is labouring in presenting these amendments and I appreciate also that an over-all revision of the act is imminent. Nevertheless I want to take advantage of this opportunity to urge upon the minister once more that when the major revision is under consideration he give attention to the incidence of double taxation which has occurred in the past in connection with such cases as I mentioned before. I shall not go into them again, but inasmuch as the revision of the act is under consideration and plans are being made to that end I hope this matter will be taken under consideration and not overlooked in the general revision.

Mr. Abbott: I should indicate that consideration was given to this. My parliamentary assistant told me that my hon. friend had raised this question. The present provisions of the law covering the taxation of pensions have been developed after a great deal of consideration. We have had a number of representations along the lines of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hamilton West. They have been studied, but it is considered that the present law is a fair and workable arrangement for handling a very complicated part of any tax system.

When a widow is in receipt of a pension she is regarded as receiving the right to income which may be valued having regard to the terms of the pension and her life expectancy. It is considered fair that such value be part of the estate for succession duty purposes because an equivalent value of property to provide a similar income for the widow would be liable for succession duties. When the widow receives income, whether from a pension or in any other form, she is subject to income tax in the same way as any other taxpayer. However, that point will be further considered when the act is under general revision.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is only the fact that with the application of the succession duty to the value of the pension the net income to the widow is reduced in the first instance. Then when income tax is applied on subsequent income from the estate, whether it be from a pension or from other property, there is a type of double taxation which I would urge the minister to study very carefully when the act is being amended.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if in connection with the revision of the act consideration is being given to the present so-called "notch" provision, and whether the government will consider applying an exemption of $50,000 instead of simply exempting estates under $50,000. I do not think I need to enlarge any further on the subject. It has been discussed here before.

Mr. Abbott: I am aware of the situation.

Mr. Fleming: There are many complications as a result of this present provision. I shall not enlarge on it, but I do hope the matter will be given serious consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I think every aspect of the act will be considered.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Marriage consideration.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister considered whether the community property law in Quebec as between husband and wife may have any effect on this section?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think the community law provisions would enter into this section. This is a loophole section. We had a decision in the province of Quebec which interpreted the section of the act as it now stands in a way it was felt parliament never intended it to be. As the explanatory note points out, this amendment together with the amendment to section 8, which is carried out by section 4 of the bill, we believe will make it quite clear that property transferred or agreed to be transferred in consideration of marriage will be exempt from succession duty only if such transfers or settlements were actually executed or fulfilled more than three years before the death of the deceased.

The general rule is that such transfers must be effected within a certain time limit if they are to escape the provisions of the act. This amendment is to make clear what it was thought had been made clear in the original act, but which the courts held had not been made clear. I do not think the community rights in the province of Quebec will be affected in any way.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the relative situation in the various provinces? Are there different provisions for different areas?

Mr. Abbott: The general rule is that a conveyance, whether as a result of a marriage contract or a gift or anything else, must have been made more than three years prior to the decease in order to not be included for succession duty purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that a general provision?

Mr. Abbott: That is the general provision which applies to all transfers throughout Canada. If they are to avoid the application of death duties they must be made a certain period of time prior to the decease. Transfers within that period of time are by law deemed to be made in contemplation of death.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Where gift tax already paid.

Mrs. Fairclough: In this section, and also in section 7, there is no mention of a time element. Will the minister say whether it is intended to go back over any number of years to reclaim a duty which might be imposed in excess of a gift tax which had been levied at the time the gift was made?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that if anything which is subject to gift tax is also subject to succession duty, then there is no limit as to time. The only change made in this particular subsection, as my hon. friend appreciates, is to add the words "the Income Tax Act".

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course that is true, but does it not seem unfair that there should be no time element on gifts of that nature?

Mr. Abbott: It is a purely relieving measure. In other words there is never a double tax. If the gift tax has been paid and succession duty becomes payable with respect to the same property, then the gift tax is offset against the succession duty to the extent that it should be.

Mrs. Fairclough: The gift might have been ten or twenty years ago.

Mr. Abbott: That may be, but so much the better for the taxpayer. He gets the benefit.

Mrs. Fairclough: In that event is the gift valued at its valuation at time of gift or is it valued at the valuation at time of death?

Mr. Abbott: Offhand I do not know what gift made twenty years ago would be subject to succession duty—

Mrs. Fairclough: Real estate.

Mr. Abbott: —because the Succession Duty Act did not come into force, so far as the federal government is concerned, until 1942, and of course any gifts made prior to that time are not affected in any way.

Mrs. Fairclough: There might be a great difference in the valuation of a gift within that time, particularly if the gift was real estate or securities.

Mr. Abbott: But the valuation for succession duty purposes would be made at the date of death, and if the gift had been made ten years before—

Mrs. Fairclough: It does not seem right. Suppose the deceased made a gift of a house valued in 1942 at $5,000. Any house valued at $5,000 in 1942 is worth almost three times as much today. Do you mean to say that, although the gift tax was paid on the $5,000, at the time of decease the estate would have to pay succession duties on $15,000?

Mr. Abbott: On the facts as my hon. friend has put them, there could be no succession duty whatever payable today on gifts made in 1942. It is now 1952. Unless there was some reservation of interest I would say there could be no succession duties.

Mr. Fleming: The gift would have been made more than three years ago.

Mr. Abbott: It would have been made more than three years ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is no mention here of the three year limit.

Mr. Abbott: That is in another section.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is covered.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Allowable deductions.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister enlarge on the change proposed to be made by this section? The note indicates that the amendment provides for deduction from the dominion duty to the extent of all the duty imposed by a province or provinces or one-half of the dominion duty, whichever is the lesser, in respect of all property which has been subjected to duty by both the dominion and a province or provinces. I suspect that the gist of the change is in those concluding words. Would the minister enlarge on that, particularly in the case of a gift made four years prior to death where it is not included in the estate for purposes of dominion succession duty because it was made more than three years before the date of death, but would be included in the estate for provincial succession duty purposes because it was made within the five year period before death?

Mr. Abbott: There would be no credit in that case, no double tax.

Mr. Fleming: It is not a question of double tax. It is a question of whether the dominion allows as a deduction one-half of the amount paid. I take it in that case the dominion would not allow one-half the amount paid but only one-half the provincial tax on that portion of the estate which would be taxable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Fair market value.

Mr. Dickey: Would the minister explain the effect of this section so as to indicate what the situation would be in the case of a private company, the owner of the company not having taken advantage for a period of two or three years of section 95A of the Income Tax Act, having accumulated undistributed profits in the company, and then dying? Would the effect of this amendment be to have the successor pay the succession duties on the undistributed profits, a part of which would eventually be paid over in the form of income tax by the company or by the successor?

Mr. Abbott: In reply to my hon. friend's question, that is one of the reasons section 95A was introduced. It was realized in the case of certain private companies, where earnings had been allowed to accumulate and had not been distributed or reinvested in the business, that upon the death of the shareholder the value of the shares would include capital in the company and the accumulated profits. In order to get those profits out they would of course, when distributed as dividends, be subject to income tax. It was for that reason section 95A was enacted. This amendment is to spell out in our act, as I know it is spelled out in the Ontario act, the provision that under such circumstances no account shall be taken of a possible liability for income tax when profits are distributed. For obvious reasons I think that could not be taken into account because the amount of income tax which would be payable would depend upon the bracket in which the individual shareholder happened to be, what other income he had, and so on. Therefore there is a means now available in the law to enable people in that position to protect themselves against excessive liability for both succession duties and income tax.

In answer to my hon. friend's question, it is and always has been the law that the fair market value must include whatever is in the assets of a company at the time of death and that no account shall be taken of any potential income tax liability.

Mrs. Fairclough: Why was this clause necessary? Were there certain circumstances under which the income tax payable was deducted twice?

Mr. Abbott: There was a case in one of the provinces, I believe British Columbia, where it was held that might be the result of our law as enacted at the present time. This section is putting into our law what I know is in the Ontario law.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 207, to amend the Excise Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—"Spirits."

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister give us an expert opinion as to just what the effect of this change of wording is?

Mr. Abbott: I am not an expert in the material which is included in this section; but I think the explanatory note indicates clearly the purpose of the section. It is as follows:

> The purpose of this amendment is to require that the provisions of the Excise Act in respect to alcohol shall be applicable to all spirits produced whether by the ordinary process of distillation or other means.

I am informed that, as is indicated in the explanatory note, this definition has been contained in the schedule for some years and is now being merely transferred to the definition section of the act.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Offences for sale of spirits unlawfully manufactured, etc.

Mr. Fleming: I have one question on clause 6, under subsection 3 of section 169. This is the subsection which applies to the forfeiture of vehicles in which are found spirits which are sold or offered for sale and which have not been lawfully manufactured or lawfully imported and so on. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to some review of the provisions of the act generally in regard to the forfeiture of vehicles. I think there must be a good many cases in which the innocent owner of a vehicle has been grossly imposed upon by someone who has taken advantage of him for the purpose of obtaining transportation for goods of this kind. The same thing applies to tobacco which has been unlawfully manufactured or unlawfully imported.

The sections of the act at present are extremely severe, it seems to me, with respect to forfeiture in these cases. As long as there are such sections on the statute books I presume the officials concerned are not going to have a free hand in these matters; they are going to feel obliged to proceed with severity as long as the terms of the statute themselves are severe. I should like to ask the minister whether consideration is being given or study is being applied to the provisions of the act generally with reference to the forfeiture of vehicles. I am satisfied that there are innocent owners of vehicles who are imposed upon by people who are found to be carrying goods unlawfully imported or unlawfully manufactured.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend appreciates, this section relates only to spirits which are taken from bonded premises and which are sold.

Mr. Fleming: I appreciate that. My question was with respect to subsection 3 of section 169, and to forfeiture generally.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is probably thinking of the fellow who innocently carries in his car a few cigarettes that have been brought in from outside Canada.

Mr. Fleming: When the passenger in his car has cigarettes in his bag of which the innocent owner of the car is not aware. There are cases where innocent owners of vehicles are imposed upon by their passengers.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that the number of innocent victims of that kind is comparatively small and that such cases are rare; and that in any case where it is established that they are innocent, the minister takes steps by proper remission to release the car. I am told that no consideration has been given to relaxing the provisions of the law with respect to seizures. In view of the assertions that have been made in the House of Commons as to the increase in smuggling in certain products, I think it would be unwise at this time to relax the provisions of the law which provide enforcement officers with a reasonable opportunity of enforcing the law.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps you will have to find a better means of dealing with the problem.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to section 5 for a moment in order to ask the minister this question. What is the significance of the reference to the Unfair Competition Act, and what is the necessity for reserving this discretion with regard to the form and wording?

Mr. Abbott: There is no change in this section except for the words "and the Food and Drugs Act".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I realize that.

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question, but I will see what information I can get from my officials. I am told the purpose of the amendment is to inform the people who are in the business of packaging and so on that there are these three acts to be considered.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): While I appreciate that it is not a change in the act, will the minister indicate what is the practical need for the reservation of a discretion in the minister as to form and wording? Does that in fact take place?

Mr. Abbott: I am told it is meant to ensure that no false and misleading statements are made on the label which is put on these products.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Penalty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Before we pass clause 7, Mr. Chairman, I want a chance to look at it. This is of assistance to the ordinary private citizen, apparently. Is the minister coming to his rescue and trying to—

Mr. Abbott: This is homebrew. The former definition did not cover the man who made beer out of extracts or other synthetic products.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Apparently if you press this wording strongly, a man cannot make beer for himself alone. It has to be for himself and his family. Would that be the interpretation of the wording?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that he can make application to the collector and get permission to make beer for his own consumption, but he must not get into the commercial field. I have never tried it myself.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 206, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Furs.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to welcome a bill that makes reduction in taxes. I should like to ask the minister a question on this bill in general, with reference to the 1952 increases applied under the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Abbott: 1951.

Mr. Fleming: I refer to the increases in rates from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. Are all those increases with respect to all commodities to which they applied now removed by this bill?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct, they are all reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent.

Mr. Fleming: The other part of my question is with respect to taxes which last year were introduced at the rate of 15 per cent on the commodities then designated. Is that 15 per cent tax now removed with respect to all the commodities on which it was applied by the 1951 amendment?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I believe the minister made some comment earlier in the evening regarding Russian furs which are a menace to our northern trappers. I understand they reach the Canadian market, and I wonder if this section would not be of assistance in that respect?

Mr. Abbott: That was with respect to custom duties on Russian furs. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue indicated that with respect to those importations fixed valuations were being applied for customs duties purposes.

Mr. McLure: Is this 15 per cent tax on raw furs or processed furs?

Mr. Abbott: On processed furs.

Mr. McLure: I want to know who places the market value on them.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that usually the value taken is the invoice of the purchaser to the dresser and dyer, but if the officers of the Department of National Revenue have reason to believe that is not the fair value they may put an appraised value on them.

Mr. McLure: The reason I mention this is that I have an invoice which was made out just before this amendment, and it shows that a lady purchased a silver fox skin for $10. Then she sent it to the processor, but the government would not accept the valuation of $10, for which she had a receipt. The government officials valued the skin at $24, and the 25 per cent tax was then imposed upon that valuation. I have always argued that the government had no right to put a tax on the raw skin, but that is overcome by saying that the skin is going to be processed and when it is processed it is not a raw skin. This lady was charged $6 on this skin. When the article was made up she had paid the government $14.40 in taxes, which was nothing less than pure robbery.

I used a stronger word the other day and the minister took me up on it by letter. I used the word "gyp" so this time I used the word "robbery", which is not so strong. Why should the government put a different valuation on the skin which is sent in to be processed when a person has an invoice for $10. They charged her the tax on their valuation of $24, and I want to know whether or not an invoice should be accepted?

Mr. Abbott: It usually is. The law requires that the tax be imposed on the current market value. If the invoice is for less than the current market value, then the skin has to be appraised at what is, in fact, the current market value.

Mr. McLure: I think there should be some definition of "market value". If it is going to be the market value, then why should it not be the price which this lady paid for the skin? I do not think the government or any of its officials should say that it should have been a higher price. When the lady received the article for which she had paid $10, she found that she had to pay the government $14.40, so she said she would not take it. If the government had taxed her on the $10, as they should have, then it would have made quite a difference.

Mr. Blackmore: While we are on that subject, will the minister state by what criterion the government does determine the market value?

Mr. Abbott: It is set out in the law, and I shall be glad to inform the hon. member of it. The regulation reads:

> The "current market value of furs" referred to in subsection 1 of section 80A of The Excise Tax Act, means in addition to the cost of the raw furs to the owner, all costs of freight, cartage, exchange in effect on the date of shipment, insurance, royalties and duty for delivering the furs to him, and in addition, the charges for dressing and dyeing.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Repeal.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is the section, I believe, which covers automobiles, is it not?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to speak about the situation which arose with the reduction of the tax, as related to automobiles which were in the hands of dealers under consignment contracts, upon which the department insisted on collecting the tax despite the fact that a legal contract had been drawn and the cars had been shipped by the manufacturer and were on the premises of the dealers. I understand that the department's attitude was that the goods having moved out of the manufacturer's warehouse and into the premises of dealers, that constituted delivery. I should like to draw attention to the fact that at this time the dealers were well stocked up with cars, and on the other hand the manufacturers had more cars on hand than they had space in the warehouses. This situation was the subject of considerable discussion between the manufacturers and the dealers.

With a budget imminent and the knowledge that it was quite likely something would be done about the tax, the dealers were very reluctant to take delivery of automobiles. In an effort to relieve the congestion at the manufacturers' warehouses these contracts were drawn, and in good faith the dealers took delivery of cars which they placed in warehouses. This contract was not recognized by the government, and I submit that it was wrong to assess the dealers a tax on property which they had not legally acquired. The contract had been drawn up and legally executed, so it should have been acknowledged by this government. I submit that it is wrong, and that these dealers have been subjected to a hardship.

Mr. Abbott: The matter is one of some concern. It is a question of law, and was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice. One company in particular, General Motors, did this consignment. The Department of Justice gave the following opinion, and this is the deputy minister of justice speaking:

> I am of opinion that the agreement entered into between General Motors and its dealers is an agreement to sell and, consequently, the dealers are purchasers under the agreement.
> Excise and sales taxes under sections 80 and 86 of the Excise Tax Act are payable at the time of delivery of the goods to the purchaser and I am of opinion, therefore, that the taxes are payable in this case when the goods are delivered by General Motors to its dealers.

In the light of that opinion the Department of National Revenue had no option but to collect the tax. The other companies evidently had some doubt as to the legality of the procedure and did not adopt it.

I appreciate the position the dealers were in, and I indicated to one who came to see me the other day that if in their opinion the Department of Justice were wrong, then they should lodge an appeal. We would facilitate a test case, and if the opinion of the Department of Justice were overruled, and it was held that no tax was legal, we would be very happy to make refunds. Whether or not that is going to be done I do not know.

Mrs. Fairclough: The difficulty is that by the time the dealer takes his case to court he will probably spend as much in legal fees as he would save in tax.

Mr. Abbott: I think General Motors ought to look after the case for him.

The house met at three o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

SIGNING OF THE NATO-EUROPEAN DEFENCE COMMUNITY PROTOCOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister make a statement on the signing of the agreements concerning Germany yesterday and today, and how it affects Canada—if Canada is affected. I regret that I have given the minister only short notice.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make a short statement on this important question of the signature of certain documents in Bonn yesterday and in Paris today, and their effect upon this country.

Today in Paris members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization signed a protocol to extend the guarantees under article 5 of the treaty to the European defence community. The protocol was signed on behalf of Canada by Mr. A. D. P. Heeney, the permanent representative of Canada on the North Atlantic council.

Hon. members will recall that on March 21, when reporting on the Lisbon meeting of the North Atlantic council, I mentioned the approval in principle by the council of this extension of security guarantees, which means in fact that, if the international undertakings are all ratified, our guarantees will cover the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany and the forces of the Federal Republic serving in the European army when in the area covered by the North Atlantic treaty. The European defence community, for its part, gives a reciprocal guarantee to NATO. In other words, the European army, of which German forces will form a part, will be available for NATO defence in western Europe and, in fact, will come under NATO command.

The exchange of guarantees will be brought about by the ratification of a series of agreements. If hon. members will permit, I should like to mention the various related agreements, for although Canada is a party to only one of them, all these undertakings bear on the final result.

The first group of documents are commonly known as the contractual arrangements, and consist of agreements between the three occupying powers—France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, on the one hand, and the Federal Republic of Germany, on the other. They are designed to replace the occupation statute because Russian tactics in the four power conferences have prevented agreement on a formal German peace treaty. The effect of these peace contracts, which were signed in Bonn yesterday, will be to restore West Germany's autonomy except in certain limited spheres which are reserved to the former occupying powers.

Today the second series of documents, the European defence treaty and its related protocols, have been signed in Paris by representatives of France, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, and the Federal Republic of Germany. The main purpose of this treaty is to establish the European army, to which each of the signatory powers will contribute forces. Canada is not, Mr. Speaker, a party to the European defence treaty and our forces in Europe will not form part of the European army. One of the protocols to the European defence treaty, however, extends the security guarantees of the treaty to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, of which we are a member.

Also today in Paris, as I have just indicated, NATO members have signed the NATO protocol to reciprocate this guarantee. This is the only document in this rather complex series of international undertakings to which Canada is formally a party. If hon. members are agreeable, I would suggest that the text of this protocol, which is quite short but which is very important, be printed as an appendix to Hansard. These international undertakings are, as I have said already, subject to ratification and in due course, before ratification by Canada, indeed I hope during the present session, parliament will be given the opportunity for a full discussion of this NATO-European defence community protocol.

Hon. members may wish when we are discussing the NATO protocol to discuss the other related documents which I have mentioned. Of course, they will not be before the house for approval. Nevertheless, as they have an important bearing on our commitments under the NATO protocol, I shall arrange for copies to be available to hon. members as soon as they can be obtained for distribution.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the minister when it is expected that the legislative body of the West German republic will have this matter up for ratification?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know whether I can answer that question. It is hoped that these documents will be submitted to all the parliaments concerned with the least possible delay and that ratification will be accomplished before too long. When that will be is of course in the hands of the legislatures of the various countries.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, May 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 206, to amend the Excise Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 4—Repeal.

Mr. Fleming: Section 4 refers to schedules I, II, and III to the bill. On page 8, as part of schedule III, there is reference to the four drugs which were added last year to the list. In view of the interest of the house in what I would hope will some day be an extension of that list, I wonder if the minister would acquaint the committee with the experience thus far of the department in connection with the administration of the act in so far as these four drugs are concerned.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The officials of the Department of National Revenue will be here in a moment, but so far as I am aware no difficulty has been encountered in administering the act with respect to those particular drugs. Possibly the Minister of National Revenue has some other information. He confirms what I have just said.

Mr. Fleming: I think the information which the minister has given to the committee will help to dissipate the fears which some hon. members seemed to have or which apparently were entertained by the government in connection with exempting drugs of this kind. Without proposing to launch into a debate on the subject may I express the hope that in the light of the past year's experience with these four drugs the government will give serious and early consideration to an extension of this list to include other similar drugs.

There are many people who are under a heavy burden of expense as a result of being required under medical advice to take certain forms of drugs constantly. Some of these drugs are exceedingly expensive and in the case of chronic sufferers who are under heavy expense it seems to me that there is a clear case for an extension of the exemptions in the field of drugs.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to place on the record a short memorandum dealing with the operation of the Excise Tax Act. I am not doing this in the hope that anything can be done at the moment but simply to have it on the record for consideration. It points out an anomaly which exists according to the way in which merchandising is done.

Under the existing sales and excise tax regulations, the base upon which taxes apply is the price at which the merchandise is sold by the manufacturer. This is known as the ad valorem method of tax calculation.

Under this method a tire manufacturer who sells a special brand tire to a tire merchandiser accounts for his tax on the basis of his selling price which probably takes the form of a cost plus a profit factor. The special marketer then does not pay these taxes on his selling and administrative expenses or on his profit.

The manufacturer that markets his own name brand tire must account for his tax on the higher price at which he sells his merchandise to his dealer trade and thus must pay the tax on both his selling and administrative expense and his profit.

Just what this differential might be in terms of cost plus tax would work out differently but it is our opinion that the special brand marketer is handed about a 5 per cent cost advantage over the standard brand marketer simply as a result of the method of application of tax to the basic buying price.

Thus by the means of use of tax application, the manufacturer finds it actually cheaper to market his products through a marketer who uses other than his own name brand and this seems most inequitable.

As I say, I place this on the record, not in the hope that it will be dealt with today but that it will be considered by the department in due course.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Coming into force.

Mr. Abbott: There is a minor amendment to be made to paragraph 15 of schedule I which I will ask one of my colleagues to move.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That item fifteen of schedule I of Bill No. 206, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, be amended by adding after the words "in dry form," in the last line of the said item, the following words: "except where the mixture or product is advertised or sold for making soft drink beverages or imitations for sale."

Mr. Abbott: The purpose of this amendment is to make the application of the paragraph more clear and to remove any misunderstanding and doubt. Since the first reading of the bill representations have been made by the trade for some such clarification. The additional words remove the doubtful possibility of the tax being applied to mixtures or products which are purchased by soda fountains and other dispensers for the making and sale of soft drink beverages or soft drink imitations. I think the section as it now stands is probably adequate, but we have agreed to the section being amended by the addition of these words.

On schedule III—Foodstuffs.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to indicate to the minister that we appreciate very much the consideration which the government gave to representations made by the logging and lumbering industry in British Columbia with regard to tires and tubes under section 411 (a). I am sure it will be a matter of great importance to the industry. On page 8 we come to the schedule having to do with marine and fisheries. I note in the first paragraph the following words:

> . . . articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats.

It becomes a matter of some concern whether the word "equipment" covers fishing equipment on fishing vessels.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sure what sort of equipment my hon. friend has in mind. I do not know whether he means spoons, gear, plugs and that sort of thing. If that is the case, it is not covered by this section. That is not considered as equipment of the boat itself.

Mr. Gibson: I see. The schedule also refers to rope and cordage of cotton, hemp, manila or other vegetable fibre. Has consideration been given to the inclusion of nylon fibre? That is a product that is coming into more frequent use so far as the employment of gill nets is concerned.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that comes under the description, "other vegetable fibre".

Mr. Gibson: Not nylon.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that is the case.

Mr. Pearkes: On page 7 of the bill there is a reference to nursery stock. Does that refer to plants, bushes and general horticultural nursery stock, or does it refer to animal stock?

Mr. Abbott: It refers to general nursery stock such as my hon. friend outlined in the first part of his question.

Mr. Pearkes: Horticultural.

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Knowles: Schedule III on page 8 includes certain drugs which were being discussed a moment ago by the hon. member for Eglinton and the Minister of Finance. May I remind the minister that when this matter was discussed on the budget resolutions his parliamentary assistant indicated that certain precise drugs were being studied to ascertain whether or not the list of exemptions might be extended to include them. The drugs set out in the schedule as it now reads include ACTH, cortisone, insulin and radium. The parliamentary assistant said, as recorded at page 1996 of Hansard for May 8, 1952:

> Some of the recent drugs which have been suggested for exemption include substitute blood plasma, aureomycin and streptomycin, and vitamins of high concentration. The minister is giving continual study to these requests and as the opportunity offers the list of drug exemptions is extended.

Will the minister indicate at what stage in this continual study he has arrived so far as these specific drugs are concerned and any others that he may be studying?

Mr. Abbott: The stage is that generally speaking it is only the more expensive drugs which have been included here. We are advised by the Department of National Health and Welfare when there are drugs that it is desirable for people to have and which have got beyond the experimental stage and can properly be included in this list. I have forgotten which ones they were, but in the course of the budget preparation this year we did consider some other drugs. We have had representations with respect to a number but it was felt that no additions should be made this year.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to ask the minister to have the officials of his department consider the item of rope and cordage of cotton, hemp, manila or other vegetable fibre. The only size that is exempted is rope not exceeding one and a half inches in circumference. That would be rope half an inch in diameter. That rope is used to a great extent by lobster fishermen but it is of very small size. With modern fishing equipment there is a lot of rope of larger size that is used to the same extent as the smaller rope would be. I suggest that the size of the rope be increased. There is probably more of the larger rope used in the fishing industry than the smaller type. I am not clear on the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Would it be possible for the minister to give us some idea of the type of fishing equipment that would be exempt? It mentions boats and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats. Then in the last paragraph it mentions sinkers, and floats including trawl kegs, when for use exclusively in the fisheries, not including these articles for sportsmen's purposes. I would think that particular section might be changed to cover any materials used exclusively in the fishing industry.

Mr. Abbott: I will certainly see that my hon. friend's remarks are considered before the next budget. As he is probably aware, the language used in this schedule with respect to fishing equipment is the same language that has been in the act for a great many years. There has been no change. As he will see from the schedule, the addition this time is preservatives for use exclusively for treating fishing nets, ropes and lines. The committee will appreciate that, where a material can be used for a number of other purposes other than fishing, difficult problems of administration may arise. It is for that reason that it is necessary to be fairly precise in the language of the section in order to see that material which should be subject to tax is not exempt ostensibly because it is going to be used for fishing.

Mr. Gibson: I gather from the minister's remarks that, so far as commercial fishing gear is concerned, it is general government policy to exempt it from sales tax since we are competing in the markets of the world.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that practically all of it is exempt now.

Mr. Gibson: That is the general policy for which the government is striving?

Mr. Abbott: As a general statement that is true, yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Getting back again to cotton and hemp rope, would steel rope, which is used today in many cases in place of hemp, also be exempted?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to look into that more carefully. I am informed it might be if it were a hawser on the boat and was carried as part of the equipment on the boat.

Mr. Stick: On page 7 there is a reference to internal combustion engines for farm purposes. The internal combustion engine is used extensively by our fishermen, and it is not included in the part of the schedule on page 8 having to do with marine and fisheries. Would the minister take into consideration making the same rule apply to fisheries as to farming?

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Abbott: I am informed it comes under the item in the schedule we were discussing a moment ago which reads:

> Boats bona fide purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Before this bill is read the second time I want to make a few comments. This bill of course introduces amendments to the Income Tax Act in order to give effect to some of the budget resolutions. I think it would be well for us to consider for a few moments the terms of this legislation, in the light of Liberal party policy. During recent weeks we have heard a great deal of the way in which the government ignored the wishes of the House of Commons—I shall have more to say about that later. We have heard very few Liberal speakers during the past few weeks having much to say on the announced official policy of the Liberal party, possibly because of the extent to which fiscal policy is ignored in the amendment that is now before the house.

I have before me a copy of a resolution that was adopted by the national Liberal convention in 1948. I think it was No. 14 on the agenda. It is headed, "Sound fiscal policy." The resolution in part has this to say:

> The tax burden should as far as possible be distributed equitably and in accordance with ability to pay. In reducing taxes first consideration should be given to easing the burden of the lowest income groups.

I want to contrast with that resolution the minister's consideration as expressed to this house on former occasions, and as exemplified in the amendments before us.

According to official Liberal policy, in reducing taxes first consideration should be given to easing the burden of the lowest income groups. When the minister was introducing his budget resolutions, as a matter of fact when he was introducing his budget, his first consideration was not that of the lowest income groups, certainly his first expressed consideration was not for that group. The one group for which the minister expressed deep concern, as reported in Hansard at page 1252, was given in these words:

> Quite frankly, I am concerned that conditions make it necessary to maintain in our tax structure rates as high as this on business profits.

If you read that budget speech you will fail to find anywhere in it any consideration for the income tax payer in the lowest income group, such as is expressed in these words for the tax on business profits.

In keeping with the minister's consideration, as expressed in his budget speech, he does provide some small measure of relief for a certain group of corporations. As a matter of fact, one tax reduction—if it can be called a tax reduction at all—that was proposed by the minister was not proposed for those in the lowest income groups, but was for a certain group of corporations. The measures proposed by the minister would place a ceiling of 43 per cent on the tax paid by that special group of corporations under the Income Tax Act.

I said earlier, and I repeat, that neither I nor any of us in this group feel the same concern for the corporations' need of tax relief as does the minister or as in fact do the members of the official opposition.

The statistics presented by the dominion bureau of statistics in a booklet entitled "National Income" show us that in 1951 corporation profits before taxes were paid were $2,850 million, the highest in Canada's history. These gross profits were $400 million greater in 1951 than in 1950, a percentage increase over 1950 of 16 per cent. The dividends paid to Canadians in 1951 amounted to a flat $300 million, again the highest dividends paid to Canadians in any year in our history.

The undistributed profits of all these business concerns are included in the dominion bureau of statistics figures. The undistributed profits in 1951 amounted to $710 million, and were exceeded by only two other years in our history, namely 1948 and 1950. The profits retained in Canada after payment of taxes and after the distribution of dividends outside of Canada amounted to $1,037 million, again the highest profits retained in Canada by Canadian business in the history of our country, the highest on record.

It is in the light of these statistics that we feel the minister's concern was slightly misplaced; that instead of being concerned for those who, according to the national Liberal convention, should have his concern, he was much more concerned for the interests of the corporations and their taxation.

Corporation taxes collected by the minister in 1951 exceeded his own estimates by about 12 per cent; and the minister himself admitted during his budget speech that much of his surplus, which has been so much criticized across the country, resulted from the excess of corporation taxes over the minister's own estimates.

If you compare the position of corporations in regard to taxes in Canada with that other great capitalist country to the south, the United States, you will find that Canadian business and Canadian corporations come off fairly easily. In the United States corporations pay a regular federal tax of 52 per cent, apart from their state corporation tax, plus an excess profits tax of 30 per cent. It is estimated that the average United States corporation pays a 60 per cent corporation tax, as compared with Canada's top federal corporation tax of 43 to 45 per cent, or a top of 52 to 54 per cent when provincial corporation tax and old age security tax are added.

It is in the light of those facts, Mr. Speaker, that I am of the opinion that the minister not only ignores the wishes of parliament, but feels sufficiently secure to completely ignore the resolutions by the national convention of his own party. There is no such concern expressed in the minister's speeches for those in the lower income groups as I have pointed out was expressed on behalf of the corporations. There was a phony decrease announced. At page 1254 of Hansard for April 8, 1952, the minister said:

> . . . the average taxpayer will pay 6 per cent less than he would otherwise have done under the income tax law as it now stands.

That is at the time the minister was speaking. The minister did not feel that it was necessary to mention the fact that the Income Tax Act as it then stood had not been in effect for a full year, nor did he point out that the so-called 6 per cent reduction in the average income tax actually meant an increase in the 1952 tax over that actually paid in 1951. The minister's concern for corporations took the form of some slight relief granted, but his concern for the lower income groups, to whom his party's annual convention called attention, took the form of an increase in the 1952 taxes over those imposed in 1951, and that without taking the special social security tax into consideration.

As proof of that, of course, it has been pointed out that a single person with an income of $2,000 paid $165 in taxes in 1951, while in 1952 the same person with the same income will pay $175. A married man with an income of $3,000 and without any children is in exactly the same position. Whereas his 1951 tax was $165, his 1952 tax will be $175. As though the minister wanted to add insult to injury so far as those in the lower income tax groups were concerned, he has not been content with raising the income tax for those groups but he increases the tax in the lower brackets at a higher rate than he does in the upper brackets. For example, a married man without children earning $3,000 of income finds his 1952 tax increased over his 1951 tax by 12 per cent. A married man without children in the $20,000 income bracket finds his 1952 tax increased only 6 per cent over his 1951 tax.

Before this bill is adopted, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is worth calling attention to these facts, and the extent to which the minister can ignore the so-called sound fiscal policy of the national Liberal convention. I submit that the minister's disregard of the policy expressed by that same convention may be seen in the 2-2-2 formula for financing old age security. We are told that 42 per cent of the funds necessary to finance old age security will come from the sales tax, a tax which is particularly burdensome to those in the lower income groups. It would seem to me that if the minister had the same concern for those in the lower income groups that he showed for the corporations, he would at least have made some concession, either in a reduction in the sales tax or in some other adjustment in his 2-2-2 formula. We are told that 16·1 per cent of the necessary funds to finance this old age security will come from the personal income tax, only 14·9 per cent from the corporation tax and 27 per cent from the general revenue fund.

The removal of the $60 maximum payment, and a graduated income tax for the support of the old age security program, would have been much more in line with the policy enunciated by the national Liberal convention than is the policy which the minister is following today. There is no reduction in the sales tax, but a slight reduction in corporation taxes. Apparently the wishes of the national Liberal convention can be disregarded by the minister with the same abandon as are the wishes of the House of Commons. I need only refer in passing to the minister's disregard of the express wish of the House of Commons in the matter of the 4 per cent floor on deductions for medical services.

At this point I might say to the minister that in my opinion the government made a mistake in rejecting the express wish of parliament in that matter. While the minister may argue that it was not a directive, that parliament merely suggested the minister should give consideration, nevertheless there is no question in the world but that was the express wish of parliament and that it represented what parliament wanted done. The minister ignored them. Many of us who have followed the debates and the discussions during the recent by-elections must have been impressed by the fact that there was no single more telling argument against the Liberal government and the Liberal policy than the minister's rejection of the wishes of parliament in the matter of the removal of that 4 per cent.

It was unfortunate, of course, that the C.C.F., who introduced that measure, received little benefit from it during the by-elections. It would be just asking too much of ordinary human beings, of course, to give credit to political opponents during the heat of an election campaign. But during that campaign I discovered that the official opposition, from their criticism of the government for ignoring the will of parliament in the matter of that 4 per cent, were able to gain more effect than from their criticism of any other measure.

Possibly the government is still capable of learning something from the course of events. While it is asking too much to expect the minister to make any changes in the amending bill which is now before us, it may well be that we shall find—and we shall certainly hope to do so—some relief for those in the lower income brackets when the next budget is presented, particularly if that should be a pre-election budget.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to delay the progress of the house by dealing at length with the various legislative measures under consideration and therefore my remarks will be very brief.

I wish to say at the outset that I have always liked to comment on the subject of income tax, as a representative of the wage earner. You know that, from the time I have been elected to this house, I have always shown the greatest interest in the welfare of the wage earner and the problem of income tax.

Just lately, I happened to read the report of the 65th general annual convention of the Montreal chamber of commerce. One of the sections of the report, section 8, deals with matters of federal jurisdiction. Here is an extract from that section:

Revision of the Income Tax Act.

The chamber wishes the federal government to base the Income Tax Act upon the following principles:

1. The taxpayer must benefit from an income tax exemption at least equal to the minimum amount required to insure his family's livelihood.

2. All taxpayers must be treated alike with respect to the income tax levied on the income above that minimum amount.

Everybody will agree that I have always advocated these two principles for the benefit of the taxpayers I have mentioned.

Owing to the fact that the cost of living index, which had already hit the 125·1 per cent mark, still had a tendency to rise even higher, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) as early as July 1946 to put the basic exemption back at the $1,200 level for single taxpayers and at $2,000 for married people.

I brought up the subject again the following year when expressing my views on the budget; the statement I made at that time is to be found on page 3344 of the English Hansard of May 22, 1947. I had then quoted figures to show that due to the exemption allowed at that time, much lower than the one in effect nowadays, the single person whose annual income was $1,200 had a deficit of $99 and that this deficit amounted to $215 when the taxpayer with an annual income of $2,000 was a married man with two children. At this time, the cost of living index was still rising; a jump of 8 per cent had brought it to 133·1 per cent.

And as before and for the same reasons I renewed my appeal to the government, in March, 1948, since the cost of living had by then reached 150·8 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, any member who belonged to the working class before he came to this house can much more readily understand that group's plight and that is why I made those comments in March 1949. On their behalf I asked the Minister of Finance to show greater consideration for that section of our population. I did ask for a higher basic exemption, namely $1,500 for the single taxpayer and $2,500 for the married man, and I dare say that those amounts would not have been excessive, considering the fact that the cost of living index had then reached the 159.2 per cent mark.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance looks upon the past year with great satisfaction. Our minister obviously is very busy and he cannot meet middle class people as often as he would like. On the other hand, he is in touch continually with his financial advisers and I am led to believe they know how to give him a rosy outlook on life.

I am the more convinced of the fact from having been made acquainted with the Income Tax Act and the exemptions it allows. There is no encouragement for wage-earners. With their family burdens and the present taxation they can hardly contemplate with much satisfaction, in the light of this legislation, the past year and the year ahead.

The minister has stated once again that our difficulties stem from international affairs. We knew that and, as he pointed out, whether we like it or not, we must unfortunately bear with it for the sake of enduring peace.

Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated the deficit of these middle class people for 1947, when the cost of living index stood at 133 per cent. But at the end of 1951, the cost of living index had risen to 191 per cent. These people must also have been affected by the rise.

I do not wish to elaborate any further on the matter. I feel I have said enough. I dare hope our commitments will not be so heavy in the future and that at the next budget my remarks will be kept in mind with a view to allowing the wage earner of Canada a sufficient exemption to provide for the minimum of income required to sustain his family. This income, unfortunately, he has not today.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have been looking Bill No. 205 over carefully and have been unable to find an item which appeared in the Trade News of April, 1952. It is a short item and I will just put it on the record. It is headed: "Taxation Ruling" and reads as follows:

Canadian deep-sea fishermen, operating as co-adventurers on a share of the catch have been authorized by the Department of National Revenue to average their earnings over a five-year period for income tax purposes, and also to deduct their away-from-home food and accommodation expenses. This applies to all deep-sea fishermen in Canada including captains, engineers and cooks, as well as those fishing on schooners, trawlers and draggers under the general form of agreement in common use in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. This agreement provides for the sharing of catch returns. The individual fisherman will still be required to file his income tax return each year and at that time will pay the tax owing, but at the end of five years he can work out the average of his net earnings and obtain a refund if he is entitled to one.

The privilege to average earnings only applies if the following stipulations are made: the fishermen must file their returns for the previous year by April 30 for each following year, and in the last year of the five-year period they must file their election to average their returns for the previous five years by April 30 following the last taxation year.

I want to point out to the minister and to the house that among those who are selected for this consideration mention is made of captains, engineers and cooks of fishing schooners, trawlers and draggers. In the county of Charlotte from which I come we have a class of fishermen called freighters of sardines. Many of those who are freighting sardines are at the same time engaged in the catching of sardines and in other branches of the fishing industry. For some years the department considered that they were bona fide fishermen, and they were given exactly the same privileges in the matter of averaging income as were the fishermen I have mentioned. But during the last two or three years it has been decided that they should not be given this privilege; and in the office in Saint John, where these men would file their income tax returns, they have been denied this privilege of averaging.

Also the away-from-home cost of living and accommodation has been denied them for two or three years, while it has been given to men in other branches of the industry. For the information of the house I should like to put on record a description of "farming" as applied to this measure. We find that farming includes——tillage of the soil, livestock raising or exhibiting, maintaining of horses for racing, raising of poultry—

And so on. When one considers that a gentleman like Austin Taylor on the Pacific coast can run all over the country with his hay burners, and the fact that he is being given the privilege extended by this bill, one wonders at once why fishermen of the description I have given are not considered at the same time.

This is a serious matter. As I said at the outset, consideration was given for some time to this problem; but under present-day conditions fishermen are being denied the privilege of averaging income or of deducting away-from-home living expenses. The men I have in mind operate usually two to a boat, and some of the boats are 50 to 100 feet long. They are big freighters, and usually carry a crew of two. These freighters are away from home nine-tenths of the time. Many of the crew were fishermen for years, and did nothing but fish. However, owing to their qualifications as navigators they have been chosen to operate in this particular branch of the industry. They work on a share basis; none of the men mentioned would be on wages or salary, but rather on a share of the profits.

I would ask the minister and his officials to give this matter serious consideration, because in the minds of those who have been denied the privilege there is the thought that discrimination is being shown. They are bona fide fishermen; their incomes fluctuate in exactly the same way and to the same extent as other men engaged in the industry. If the sardine catch is good, their incomes increase; if the sardine catch is low, their incomes diminish. Over a five-year period their incomes would fluctuate to the same extent as those of the other fishermen I have mentioned.

Then, I have pointed out that their away-from-home expenses have been denied them. I was on the water a great many years myself, and I realize that away-from-home expenses are, as a rule, much greater than the expenses when one is at his own home. Perhaps only a very few of us are fancy cooks, the majority having to depend on food in a ready-to-eat state, which costs a great deal more than it would at home. I would ask the minister to give this matter his serious consideration, because these men should be given exactly the same treatment accorded the others in the industry.

As I say, when I see the definition of "farmer"—

Mr. Abbott: That is only a loophole section, to prevent the hobby farmer from getting excessive taxation relief.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do not know what a hobby farmer would be.

Mr. Cruickshank: E. P. Taylor.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It uses the expression "maintaining of horses for racing".

Mr. Abbott: I can assure my hon. friend that the purpose of the amendment is to plug a loophole, not to extend a benefit.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am not yet aware where this section comes in. As I said, there is comment in the Trade News of April 1952, and a very fine description of the ruling that applied a few years ago. However, that was changed two or three years ago with the result that there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction. I feel that the men I have mentioned, who make their living exclusively on salt water, should be given the same consideration as draggers and trawlers, and others who are mentioned in this item.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring two matters to the attention of the minister, both of which require amendments if the conditions I shall outline are to be corrected. I believe each of these conditions effects a hardship.

The first is the case of the man, the father of small children, whose wife becomes an invalid and as a result is forced to secure the services of a housekeeper. Under those circumstances he generally has to pay a substantial sum for that service. It would seem reasonable that the cost of the housekeeper should be deductible for income tax purposes.

I believe the situation is best outlined in a letter I received from a medical man, and which I should like to read at this time. He states:

> I wish to bring a fact to your attention which concerns quite a number of female patients throughout this country, who are hospitalized for chronic illness due to tuberculosis, heart disease, arthritis and mental illness, and have dependent children left at home. In such cases the father of the family must of necessity employ a substitute "mother" or housekeeper, for the care of the dependent children remaining at home. To get suitable people to do such work it is necessary to pay more than the ordinary fee that housekeepers demand.
> Under the terms of the present Income Tax Act the husband is not allowed the expenses of the housekeeper (who is an indispensable necessity) and not only must bear this added expense, but thus has no relief under the terms of the act.
> Since this situation undoubtedly affects a large number of individuals it is urged that the matter be brought to the attention of the federal government in order that an amendment for such circumstances may be made.

It seems to me that in circumstances of this kind, where a man with small children is unfortunate enough to have his wife hospitalized, and must go to the expense of hiring a housekeeper, such expense should be deductible for income tax purposes. I do not think this exemption will cost the minister any great amount by way of loss in revenue, and it would certainly afford a great measure of relief to a considerable number of people who, as a result of these circumstances, find themselves in a bad financial condition, and have great difficulty carrying on.

I would ask the minister to give consideration to the introduction of an amendment to cover people in those circumstances. He will note that I have confined my representations only to those persons who have dependent children requiring attention.

The other matter I would bring to the minister's attention is one about which I have spoken previously. Civil servants and employees of large business firms, who contribute to pension plans, have an advantage whereby those contributions are exempted from income tax. On the other hand the man who is building up his own pension plan on a private and individual basis, perhaps through the purchase of government annuities or by way of a pension through an insurance company, finds that the money he uses for such private annuity is not deductible for income tax purposes. It seems to me manifestly unjust that the large number of people who make provision for their own pension plans not only receive no income tax relief but, at the same time, are taxed for their share of the contribution to the pension plans of those who have civil service pensions, and help pay for the pension plans of those engaged in large organizations through increased prices charged for the products of those organizations.

It seems to me some action should be taken to exempt for income tax purposes the payments a man makes for dominion government annuities, and perhaps the same could be applied in respect of payments under annuities schemes set up by insurance companies. I have no idea what this will amount to in revenue, but certainly the situation as it exists at the present time is manifestly unjust.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on the theory that the constant dripping of water will eventually wear away a stone I shall once again direct the minister's attention to a few observations I made to his parliamentary assistant. First of all, I must say that I was very interested in hearing the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), a Liberal member, make a plea for the increasing of the exemptions to $3,000 for married persons. It is interesting to note the effect of by-elections on the succeeding day. I support the member in his plea and I am sure that many members on the opposite side of the house were also pleased to hear this first Liberal member make this plea. I fully expect to see him followed by a succession of hon. members before this debate is over.

I think there are sound grounds for bringing more equity into our income tax structure by doing what the great trade union bodies have asked the government to do and which great numbers of people in this country expect them to do, that is to raise the exemption for married people to $3,000 and for single persons to $2,000. I am not going to add much to what I said before, but I do think that when one realizes the cost of living and the circumstances that exist today with regard to housing, rent and all the things necessary to maintain the human body, it is a most reasonable request on the part of those who have made it. I have not the slightest hesitation in supporting it.

Once again I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the expressed will of the house in the resolution that was adopted and which asked him to consider eliminating the four per cent floor under deductions for medical expenses. I think it was the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) who said that a great majority of the people think the government and the minister acted improperly or wrongly in not recognizing the expressed will of the house and giving effect to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Many of my constituents have written to me on this particular point—not only members of my own party, but members of all parties —and have expressed concern that the minister should ignore the wishes of the house in this connection.

Before going on any further may I say that I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) make a plea for the granting of a deduction for the cost of maintaining a housekeeper in the case of illness and where a husband was left with dependent children. I know of a number of cases in my own constituency where the circumstances are tragic because of the burdens placed upon husbands. In several of the cases I know of, these men are working steadily at reasonably good wages but because they have to keep housekeepers and stand the additional expense of their maintenance they find the burden almost unbearable. I do think that consideration should be given to people in these circumstances. I know personally of three or four cases where men have used up their life savings in order to meet these costs and are now going into debt.

Once again I bring to the minister's attention a matter which I brought to the attention of his parliamentary assistant. I refer to the allowance of travelling costs incurred by workers at the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company who live anywhere from five to twenty miles away from their employment. These men have no other option but to live where they do. If they want to find a house to live in, if they want to have a place in which to bring up their families, they must live at varying distances from the plant.

When I broached the matter before, the parliamentary assistant's reply was that the government considered these expenses as being normal expenses. As I said before, I do not think you can deem expenses which run as high as $20 to $30 a month as being normal expenses. These workers must bear this cost as they are forced to travel from ten to forty miles per day back and forth from their employment. I suggest that the minister give consideration to exempting transportation costs incurred in going to and from employment when they are in excess of 25 or 30 cents per day. That would eliminate the ordinary street car or bus fares or cases where only short distances are travelled by motorcar and would at the same time be fair to people who must travel as much as ten to forty miles a day.

I have personal knowledge of the fact that these men travel mostly in buses owned by co-operative societies which have been formed by themselves. These successful transportation co-operative societies have large capital investments in buses, cars and things of that sort. These societies worked all during the war and they are now providing transportation for these workers at cost. They are performing a good service to the community and the country by reducing expenses to their present point. I am quite sure that if these transportation services were being undertaken by private companies the expenses of the men would be almost doubled. Through co-operative action, through rank and file action by the men themselves, everything possible has been done to lower the cost of transportation. It has been reduced practically to cost and I do ask the minister to give consideration to my suggestion that transportation expenses to and from work above 25 or 30 cents a day be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes.

When the parliamentary assistant was dealing with the resolution I brought up the question of the allowance as a deduction of expenses incurred in forest conservation work. I had proceeded for some time and then I was told that I was out of order. It was suggested that I should bring the matter to the minister's attention on the second reading. I refer to companies and individuals who have rendered great service to Canada by spending money for the benefit of future generations.

They have carried on forest conservation work by planting trees, by thinning timber, by building trails and roads for fire protection. This policy has been advocated by the dominion government and by the provincial governments. It is getting increasing support throughout the country and more and more companies and individuals are carrying on this work at this time. I know of many small holders of timber limits in my own district who throughout the years have spent a considerable amount in maintaining their forest holdings.

I think companies and individuals should receive some consideration for what I would term an acceptance of their social responsibility. They are spending money now from which they will receive no return in their lifetime; they are making an investment for future generations. I repeat that that sort of social responsibility should receive some consideration and I do urge the minister to consider allowing deductions up to a certain point for money invested by companies or individuals in the work of forest conservation and the maintenance of a great capital asset of this country, our forest resources.

The argument that I am presenting seems so logical from my point of view, possibly because I have lived in the bush all my life, that I cannot understand its not receiving consideration. When the minister replies I would like him to tell me if under the present law and regulations arrangements have been made with any companies to permit deductions for the cost of carrying on forest conservation work in the way of building roads and trails, planting of trees and so on. I cannot understand why any government would fail to provide the necessary incentives to this worth-while work.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will not keep the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) very long from what he desires to say to the minister because I am not going to go over ground I have gone over before, however much the minister might like to hear me do so again. Passing the income tax bill is more or less like rubbing salt in the wounds, and I do not propose to drag out that pleasure unduly. I do not think it is necessary to argue any further that the public does not like the budget because I think even the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) would agree that what happened yesterday gives us a very considerable amount of evidence—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Don't take that for granted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —that it is not the most popular thing in the world. However, I am not going to dwell on that. Indeed, I am going to stay with the minister for a moment by saying that when he tells us, as he does, that we have passed laws providing for the expenditure of large sums of money and that having passed these laws we have got to find the money, I do not think there is much answer to that except to be sure that the minister and those associated with him are keeping expenses down as low as possible. I do not propose to spend much time on that either.

Various figures have been mentioned, some of which seem to stand out, and I shall refer to a few in passing. There is a figure of $46 million for what is called removal expenses which seems to me atrociously large although I want to point out that a good deal of that is for the movement of the troops. Then there is another figure of some $17 million for publicity of various kinds, and I have not got language strong enough to express my feelings about that. It just seems to me to be out of this world because we all know what it includes and we are very critical of a great deal of what it includes.

Then there is a third item of $4,900,000, nearly $5 million, which I have mentioned more than once, for telegraphs, telephones and so on in the Department of National Defence. To me that is an outrageous figure. However, when we look at this thing objectively I think we have got to face the fact that if we want a really big saving—

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but is he discussing the principle of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, yes, because one of the principles of the act is to be sure that you are not raising more money than you need to raise. I think the minister will agree with that.

Mr. Abbott: I had no real thought that I could stop my hon. friend, but he has already delivered his lecture so many times that I thought I might be spared on this occasion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister does not know how lucky he is because my speech is only going to take five minutes instead of forty. It is really very ungracious of him to try to interrupt me because he may stimulate me to go on and on. I merely want to say that one place where there is a hope that a real saving can be made is in connection with defence expenditures.

Mr. Abbott: I really think, Mr. Speaker, that it is stretching the principle to which I have alluded very far to bring in defence expenditures on the second reading of a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Far-fetched.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is very ungrateful because I am going to tell him where he can save some money.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will have at least a dozen opportunities later in the session when he will be able to discuss such matters. I respectfully suggest that he endeavour to keep himself within the rules of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I rather think that the minister's point is well taken. I would ask the hon. member to attempt to adhere to the principle of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will attempt to do so, Mr. Speaker, and I hope I will be more successful than you and the minister think I have been up to now. In any event, I am almost through. I merely wish to point out one thing, and I think perhaps the minister will agree with me because if I succeed

I am sure he would be the first one to approve of it. We still have the defence estimates to consider, and I am going to suggest now, as an example of the kind of thing we should keep in mind, that when these estimates of hundreds and hundreds of millions and even billions of dollars come forward this year we should ask with more determination than ever before to be given a break-down of these things so that we shall be in a position to know whether these huge amounts, which if they have to be spent the minister is perfectly entitled to say have to be balanced by taxes, are all necessary. The minister will surely give me credit at any rate for making my remarks short.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to take this opportunity to ask the minister to reconsider the matter of assessment of farmers' incomes. I know he has considered it and I hope that he will consider it again. The average farmer operates as a unit. In my own case I raised four children, and while they were quite small they were doing work on the farm. If they had not done those jobs I would have had to pay wages to a man to do the work. I think some consideration should be given to that factor in the assessment of farmers' incomes. There are so many jobs that boys and girls of twelve years of age can do in the hay field. I have a grandson who can go out in the field and plow. It would cost $120 or $130 a month to hire a man to do the same work. There is no compensation for what he does. The minister need not take time to reply now because both he and the minister sitting behind him have told me before that if such a practice is started they do not know where it will end. I am concerned about justice for the farmer. I should like the minister to give the matter consideration and see if something cannot be done for the farmer who is working as a unit. He is taxed for all the income earned by five or six people, and he should only be taxed on his own income.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I shall only be a minute or two in discussing a point I have in mind which I think comes under this particular bill. I do not think there has been any reference to it so far. Many in the house and throughout the country are concerned about the problem of erosion on the great lakes. I am not one of those who feel that the government is responsible to property owners for loss of property.

Mr. Abbott: I hate rising to points of order, and do not do so very often, but I am convinced that the erosion problem on the great lakes, serious as it may be, has nothing whatever to do with the principle of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Graydon: Oh, yes.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend must show in what respect it relates to income tax. I cannot see how it could be related to it.

Mr. Graydon: I can.

Mr. Murphy: If the minister will take his seat for a moment—

Mr. Abbott: I am going to ask for a ruling in a moment.

Mr. Murphy: —I will try to convey the idea to him.

Mr. Abbott: There is no use trying to change the rules if people will not observe them.

Mr. Murphy: I think when I am finished the minister will see the reasonableness of my remarks, and it is because of the erosion that has taken place that I propose to make these remarks. Many people on the shores of the great lakes, whether they be farmers, fruit growers or other property owners, have been obliged to construct jetties, seawalls or embankments of one kind and another in order to protect their properties. Representations have been made to me by various property owners, and I am sure to other members on both sides of the house, that some consideration should be given to these people with respect to money expended to preserve their property in order that their revenues, for instance, may not be depreciated. I think it is only fair to bring this matter before the house because not only are fruit farmers and farmers generally affected but thousands of miles of lake and waterfront are involved.

The tourist industry is also affected so far as lake and riverfront property is concerned, and that is a matter of no small concern. My contention is that the minister should give consideration to the problem with which these people are faced. In order to preserve their property they have been obliged to build jetties, barricades or whatever may be recommended by engineers in order to prevent their property from being washed away into the waters of the various lakes or rivers. I know that applies to practically all the great lakes. To date the damage has amounted to millions. It is only recently that the property owners have realized that they themselves must do something and not be too dependent on the government. In any tax deductions that take place, consideration should be given to the amount of money that they have to spend, and consideration should also be given to the fact that they will have to spend at least $500 or $1,000 this year and they may have to continue to do that for one or two years more.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister no doubt is getting a bit impatient at having to listen to remarks about the 4 per cent floor so often, but we continue to remind him of it in the hope that even yet he might consider changing the bill now before us when we get into committee so as to implement the desire of parliament that that 4 per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes might be abolished.

The minister knows the history of this matter very well. He will remember the fact that the provision for allowing for medical expenses was brought in by his predecessor. He will recall that, in response to representations from the house, Mr. Ilsley reduced the floor from 5 per cent to 4 per cent in 1944.

Mr. Abbott: I did that.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, the minister is correct. It was as parliamentary assistant to Mr. Ilsley that he did it, but it was actually done on the floor by the present minister.

Mr. Abbott: To cover the use of drugs. It was expressly said that that was why it was reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: It was reduced because it was recognized that 5 per cent would not allow for all the expenses that might be regarded in those days as unusual.

Mr. Abbott: No; it was to cover the cost of drugs.

Mr. Knowles: All right; but our contention is that the philosophy behind this deductibility, as it was announced in those days, needs to be revised. The idea in those days was that it should be for unusual medical expenses; and, as the minister now says, some slight margin was given in respect of drugs, and that was the reason the floor was reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. But surely there is room for progress, and in my view the government should try to keep up with the thinking of the people in this country. There is growing more and more the feeling that it is common sense to try to deal with medical expenses on some co-operative or community basis.

The minister knows that I feel we should tackle that problem in a much more fundamental way, by a nation-wide program of health insurance, but we are having difficulty in persuading the government to move very fast in that direction. Meantime, here is one little step that could be taken to put medical expenses to some extent on a community or social basis. After all, that is what it would do if the 4 per cent floor were removed. The result would be that those who have heavier medical expenses would get a larger income tax saving, and those with lesser expenses would get a smaller saving, whereas those with no medical expenses at all would not get a saving against income tax in that respect.

There is no doubt, too, that the idea of removing that floor has won very wide support. After all, the motion asking that the government consider removing that floor carried unanimously in this house on March 26.

Mr. Abbott: Because it was not opposed by my parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. But the minister, I presume, permitted his parliamentary assistant to take the stand that he did, and that was accepted as a lead to members on the majority side of the house, a lead which they readily accepted, with the result that the motion passed unanimously. I remind the minister that not only did it pass unanimously in the house, but it was greeted with approval generally by the press of this country. The press welcomed the fact that in this instance a private member's motion had been passed by the house, and it particularly welcomed the fact that it was a motion dealing with this particular subject, namely, some relief to our people in respect of medical expenses.

In my view the case for it is unanswerable, and sooner or later the minister is going to have to make that change. I see no reason why he should not make it at this session, indeed right now while we are dealing with this bill. I had hoped, despite the fact that no change was made in the resolution when we were at that stage, that when the bill was introduced a change might be made. Now that we have the bill we find that the 4 per cent floor is still in it. Nevertheless, when we get into committee and reach that particular clause of the bill, it would be possible for a minister of the crown to move the appropriate amendment, and I hope that even yet we may persuade the government to take this important step.

I dare to hope that the events of yesterday might suggest to the government that it was a mistake to oppose the wishes of parliament and of the people generally in respect of this matter. I would suggest that the government should give further thought to this question which is important on two counts. It is important in respect of the wishes of parliament and it is important in respect of its substance, namely, the question of helping our people in so far as we can in respect of medical expenses.

When one proposes changes in the income tax legislation that may result in a loss to the treasury, it does carry with it the responsibility to suggest ways in which that loss might be overcome. I have tried to do that on former occasions. One cannot expect that the Minister of Finance would have read all of the debates that took place on the budget and on the budget resolutions during the time he was away, but one can always hope that the minister read one's own speech, and that it is not necessary to repeat—

Mr. Abbott: If it would abbreviate my hon. friend's speech I can assure him that I read all the debate on the budget that took place while I was away.

Mr. Knowles: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. Martin: Even your speech he read.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, even yours.

Mr. Knowles: Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare read it?

Mr. Martin: I go to bed with it.

Mr. McCann: And lie awake all night.

Mr. Abbott: Stimulating as it was.

Mr. Knowles: Now that we have this admission from two members of the cabinet that speeches from this side of the house are read, it is not necessary to repeat all that one has said but only to underline the high spots.

Mr. Abbott: Only a stern sense of duty compelled me to do it.

Mr. Mutch: It is the easiest way to take it.

Mr. Knowles: The humour the day after by-elections is really refreshing.

I suggested on a previous occasion, Mr. Speaker, that one of the places that revenue might be obtained to make up for whatever it might cost to wipe out the 4 per cent floor would be from corporations. I raised the question as to the disparity between there being a graduated tax on personal incomes and what to all intents and purposes is a flat tax on corporations. That was discussed with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, who of course defended the present position. It is still my view, and it is a view that is expressed in the writings of a number of economists, that the graduated nature of a personal income tax is vitiated, particularly in the case of those in the higher brackets, when you have a flat tax on corporation income which is lower than the rates that apply to the upper brackets of personal income.

After all, what counts in terms of personal income, so far as the wealthy are concerned, is not only the actual dollars they take out of a corporation with which they may be connected, but the increase in their economic power. I submit to the minister that there is room for increasing the corporation tax, and there is room for putting it on a graduated basis more comparable to that which applies to the personal income tax. In my view that would be fairer, and furthermore it would be a means of raising additional revenue.

In connection with this whole question, may I remind the minister that the Monetary Times, in its issue of May 1952, carries a comment on his budget which indicates that corporations generally feel that they are lucky to have the present minister in his portfolio. This comment is entitled "Individuals Pay More", and reads as follows:

> Until the rearmament program is completed there are no grounds for expecting reductions in the corporation and personal income tax rates. With this year's spending program nearing the $4·5 billion mark businessmen have reason to be thankful the Minister of Finance is a staunch free enterprise man, who recognizes that excessive taxation on industry can kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. Though corporate taxes at 50 per cent are high—Abbott thinks it's about the limit—they are not so high as the combined corporate and excess profits taxes in the United States.
> Abbott had to get more money this year and he has chosen the unpopular policy of taking it from individuals rather than loading more on business.

That, of course, is a comment from business which regards taxation of business as something to be avoided, and the comment is that businessmen should feel lucky to have one like the present minister who is a staunch believer in free enterprise in the finance saddle in this country.

Not only would it be possible to make up for what it would cost to remove the 4 per cent floor, or to raise the exemption levels as has been suggested this afternoon by my colleague the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin); not only could that be made up by an increase in corporation taxes or putting corporation taxes on a graduated basis, but I submit there is still room for a considerable increase in revenue if the Minister of Finance and his officials were to examine the whole basis of deductions that are allowed to those whose incomes are on a gross basis. Workers are in a very definite position. Their income is known, and when they have had it, they have had it. For the most part, the tax is deducted at the source, and if it is not all deducted there the chance of being able to claim any appreciable exemptions is on the whole rather slim. But those who earn an income that is described as gross, and who have the right to make deductions connected with the earning of that income, seem to be able to find a good many ways in which to claim deductions. In one of the speeches which I made before—I shall not give it again—I gave figures from the United States as to the percentage of the various grades of income on which taxation is actually paid.

In connection with all this there recently appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune—it was on May 8 of this year—a news report which struck me as very significant. The story gave an account of a ruling given by Mr. R. S. Fordham of the income tax appeal board. Two Winnipeg gentlemen had appealed rulings of the Department of National Revenue, and had taken their cases to the income tax appeal board. These two gentlemen had cases that were more or less identical, so that to simplify the story I shall tell it in respect of just one of them.

This first appellant is a grocery broker and also the president of a company or a firm in Winnipeg. During two recent taxation years he made a fairly substantial sum of money on the side, and he made this money by buying conditional sales contracts from one of the finance corporations of the city of Winnipeg. The report said that this particular corporation was a little short on its bank credit, and wished to make a deal of this kind. This man, therefore, bought these conditional sales contracts and the result was that in the two years in question he made the sum of $12,503 on the side. Now, thinking of some of the interjections that are sometimes made from the other side of the house, that is not peanuts.

The income tax division of the Department of National Revenue regarded this as income, and insisted that this individual should pay income tax on this sum of $12,503 along with the tax that was to be paid on his other income. This particular individual felt that as the income tax law stood perhaps he could avoid paying a tax on this sum of money, so he appealed his case to the income tax appeal board. The Department of National Revenue was represented, of course, as was the appellant. The income tax appeal board ruled against the department and in favour of the appellant. The board ruled that this money which the man made on the side was to be considered as a capital gain, because it arose through a transaction which was not part of the regular business of the appellant. For that reason this individual was allowed to earn this $12,503 in two years without paying any income tax on it.

Part of what I have been saying is a paraphrased version of the report as it appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune. I wish to place on record a few words which I have taken from that report, and I may say that they appeared in the newspaper report within quotation marks. The ruling of the board was to the effect that the reason the Department of National Revenue had tried to tax this man on this $12,503 was that its position, and I quote, "evidently arises from the erroneous belief, still prevalent in some quarters, that whenever a taxpayer makes a financial gain of any kind in a commercial transaction it must be viewed as income".

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a comment which the average income tax payer would find very interesting. Most of us assume that whatever money people make is income so far as the income tax department is concerned. In this case may I say on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue and his department, that they thought this was income and that he should pay income tax on it. The income tax appeal board says not to go away with the opinion that every bit of money a man makes is income for the purposes of income tax. So in this case this individual was given the right by the income tax appeal board to earn this $12,503 on the side in two years without paying any income tax on it whatsoever. Mr. Speaker, anyone who is making $12,503 on the side is not making just $25 or $30 a week as his principal income. Undoubtedly he is up in a bracket were he is paying 50 per cent or 60 per cent on his income; and it is taxes of that order that this gentleman probably saved as a result of the ruling of the income tax appeal board.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is not often that we get information of this kind, in these precise and specific terms. The newspaper reports even gave the gentleman's name, but I have not placed the name on the record. On a number of occasions I have tried to get the Income Tax Act amended so as to lift the veil of secrecy with regard to these matters, and hon. members will recall the difficulty I have had. In fact, my good friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) on one occasion called it peeping-Tom legislation. He did not like it.

Mr. Graydon: I did not want the farmers to have all their business brought into the house.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; that is one of the usual answers. But even when I amended that bill so as to make it refer only to the income tax return of corporations, it still got nowhere in this House of Commons.

Mr. Graydon: We thought you were going to the farmers next.

Mr. Knowles: I am just suggesting that we get little information of this kind. It is only when a case is taken to appeal and a judgment like this is given that we get the information. That leads me to ask this question: How much of this kind of thing is going on? How much income is made by citizens of this country—those people who are on gross—which is exempt from taxation? The amount was $12,503 in two years in the case of one man, and in that of the other man whose case was dealt with at the same time the amount involved was a smaller sum, but even it was $5,805.75. So I ask the question: How many of these people are there who are making this kind of money on the side and are not having to pay income tax on it? My suggestion is that if the law were tightened up in respect of sideline income made by people on gross incomes, there might be a considerable sum of money to be collected by the treasury.

Mr. Abbott: That must have been held to be a capital gain.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. That was the decision.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will look through the reports he will find at least fifty cases, in somewhat similar circumstances, where the gain was held not to be a capital gain.

Mr. Knowles: We do not know how many there are—

Mr. Abbott: It is a pure question of law.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute now, with your talk of a question of law. We get back to that often enough. In mentioning that this is a capital gain the minister is, in point of fact, drawing attention to another of the suggestions that I should like to make.

Mr. Abbott: Tell it to your socialist friends in England.

Mr. Knowles: That suggestion is that we should have a capital gains tax.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, how horrible!

Mr. Knowles: Here is my Tory friend to the right of me saying "how horrible!"

Mr. Fleming: A terrible suggestion!

Mr. Knowles: Yet he joins with me in my proposal that the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses should be wiped out. I do not agree with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that it would cost $48 million; but whatever it would cost, it is our responsibility on this side of the house to make some suggestions as to how that money might be made up. I suggest that here is one field where real money might be found. As I said a moment ago, a taxpayer of this kind is probably up in a 50 per cent or 60 per cent bracket. If we knew all the facts—if there was not the secrecy provision like an iron curtain around this kind of information—we might find that there is really a substantial sum of money available in this way.

The minister said that it is a question of law. I am sure he knows what is coming. A few years ago, when the income tax appeal board on a question of law—pardon me, it was the exchequer court. It was before the income tax appeal board was set up to deal with these cases. The exchequer court, on a question of law, ruled that trade unionists were entitled to deductibility of their trade union dues. The government took the view that that was not the intention it had in its legislation and it immediately changed the law accordingly. As a matter of fact, it changed the legislation within a few weeks after the case was taken to the Exchequer Court of Canada. It did not even wait for the decision to be handed down. If the government feels that it has the right to step in and change the law when the courts have given an interpretation which suggests that the government's intention has not been carried out, then I suggest that it can be done in cases of this kind.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) or at least his department thought that the intention of the law was such as to cover these cases. Let me be fair to the income tax appeal board and say that the income tax appeal board said that it was a borderline case; at least they used language of that kind. It said that if the man went on making sums of money like this from this particular sideline, it would probably have to be counted as income in due course. The inference was that if he made money from different sidelines year in and year out, he could make money of this kind without being taxed on it.

As to interpreting the law, one threat which the government made some months ago has now been washed out. I refer to the Nolan case. The minister knows that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) announced that this case was being taken to the privy council, he said that if the privy council ruled in a manner which was opposed to what the government's intention had been, they would bring in legislation to amend the law, so as to carry out the government's original intention. From the action of the Minister of National Revenue it would seem to me that in this case the government's intention was that this kind of income should be subject to tax. If the income tax appeal board has ruled, on a question of law, that the wording of the law is such that this kind of income is exempt, then I suggest that it is time for the law to be amended in respect of income of this kind.

I urge that the minister go further than just tightening up the law to cover cases of the kind that the income tax appeal board has ruled on. I urge that he re-examine the whole question of the extent to which taxpayers on gross are able to claim deductions, the taxes on which must amount, during the course of the year, to many millions of dollars.

I come back again to what I said a moment ago. In the case of the ordinary worker, when he has had his income and has paid his tax, "he has had it". The deductions he can claim are few. He can claim his trade union dues now, thanks to the change that was made in the act last year. He can claim his donations to charity if he has receipts for them; but in many cases the contributions that a worker makes are not covered by receipts, and he does not get much relief in that way. He can claim his medical expenses if they are in excess of 4 per cent, not of his taxable income but of what amounts, in the case of the worker, to his gross income. That is just about all he can claim. He can make out his income tax return in half an hour. He pays taxes without question on his income. But in this other field, the field of gross income—if we could only get it all out; if there was not this veil of secrecy—I submit there is room for tremendous gain to the treasury.

I urge upon the minister that he do these two things that I have been talking about this afternoon. I urge that, on the one hand, he yet accede to the wish of parliament and of the people of Canada generally, and remove that 4 per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes. On the other hand I urge him to review the position of those who are on gross with respect to deductions that they are allowed, and in particular that sidelines such as those I have been speaking about in the Winnipeg case, with capital gains of that kind, should be subject to taxation.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I do not often raise my voice in an income tax debate, for the reason that I am not an expert on the subject.

Mr. Abbott: That does not deter others.

Mr. Graydon: I know those who take part are professionals in the matter of income tax; but I wish to raise my voice only in a humble way in connection with one matter that has come to my attention through the years, and which I intended to discuss on previous occasions, but failed to do so.

I would direct the minister's attention particularly to small businesses in which perhaps only two or three persons are employed. I realize readily that the minister may have a complete answer to the point I raise, and no doubt has given consideration to it much more fully than I have. For this reason I shall await his answer with interest.

These people, who might be described as the small fry in the business world, are in my opinion being discriminated against in the matter of income tax. Not only are they charged income tax, but they are asked by the government to be the chore boys of the Department of National Revenue. It is bad enough to ask them to be chore boys, but it is worse when they are asked to be chore boys without charge.

I understand that these people are ordered by the federal government to keep extra sets of books, and to figure the amounts which must be deducted, always having in mind the family status of the people working for them. Then the returns must be sent in, and they must be accurate. I am sure the minister knows that the people engaged in these small businesses do not have many dollars to give away. Most of them are having a difficult time to make ends meet. It seems to me that when they are asked by the federal government to shoulder this extra load on top of the burden they are now carrying; when they are asked to be the collection agency for the government, free of charge, some further consideration should be given to this aspect of the collection of income tax.

I do not proceed to argue the point with a closed mind. I am anxious to find out upon what basis the government has adopted its policy, and how it justifies its position; because when it asks someone to do a job the person who does the job makes sure the government pays for it. This would seem to be the only instance where the federal government insists upon the work being done free of charge.

I have no doubt the minister will say that huge corporations and big business should not be relieved of this responsibility. He will point out that if we relieve the little fellow we must include the richer man. Those people in the upper brackets, so far as I am concerned, can speak for themselves. It is the little fellow who has to have someone in the House of Commons who will speak for him. He speaks to his member of parliament and others in the neighbourhood, and naturally comes to the conclusion that he should not have to bear this extra load.

I am not in a critical mood, but I am anxious to have the government consider what I have said. If it can be shown that my presentation lacks merit, I shall be the first to admit it. I do think, however, that there is a case to be made for the little fellow who has done work for the government without charge. An examination of the public accounts would seem to show that he is the only one working for nothing, and I suggest he should not be discriminated against in this way.

When the minister replies he may have a satisfactory answer because, after all, the problem is to place the burden as equitably as possible. I think, however, most hon. members will be struck by what would appear to be an injustice against those having small earning capacity, who have to shoulder all this bookkeeping and accounting work at the request—and, may I say, more than the request; the order—of the federal Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw again to the minister's attention the matter of compensation paid to farmers in Saskatchewan for animals destroyed as the result of the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak. When the matter was before the house in March I asked that the compensation so paid be exempt from income tax, because this is not really a form of income in the regular sense. Many farmers will have lost their means of livelihood for the next few years, or until such time as they can build up other herds. On the earlier occasion the minister listened sympathetically to what I had to say, and said he would give the matter further consideration. I would ask him to give us any information he may have, when he speaks.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in a general way it is my opinion, and so far as I can gather it is the opinion of my constituents, that the income tax structure is now far too high. It is time something was done to relieve the great majority of people—I would say probably 85 per cent of them—who are in the lower income tax brackets.

The vast majority of Canadian people are being progressively impoverished, and this at a time when the Liberals are pleased to tell us that we are more prosperous than ever before in our history. How anyone can put those two facts together and make sense out of them is beyond my understanding; because the prosperity of the people certainly depends not only upon the amount of money they obtain but also upon the amount they are able to keep and to use, either for saving or spending, for what they consider to be the needs of life.

Why should the people of Canada be penalized more severely, the more goods and services they produce? It is forecast that in the present year in the neighbourhood of $23 billion worth of goods will be produced in Canada. No hon. member in the House of Commons, and few people throughout the country, will fail to realize that the amount of goods and services we produce constitutes the real acquisition of wealth of the nation, and should be the basis upon which to determine our prosperity, our well-being as a nation, or lack of it.

If we have reached the point where we are producing $23 billion worth of goods a year, why should something like 85 per cent of all the people in the country be absolutely at their wits' end to know how to get along? Why are they literally groaning with anxiety for fear they may not be able to get along? Setting aside all theories of income tax and all that sort of thing, all theories of revenue, we are faced with this bald, simple and easily understandable fact which I submit ought to be taken cognizance of by every responsible person in this nation.

It is commonly said by a good many people, and was repeated in this house during world war II, that whatever is physically possible ought to be financially possible. That is, the more physical well-being a nation can produce, the more financial well-being it should be able to enjoy. May I submit that the system the minister is following under this bill does not make financially possible what is physically possible. As a matter of fact, many of the imposts which are being levied under this bill are of such a nature in their incidence that they actually tend to discourage production in the nation because they take away from so large a percentage of the people the very income they need to buy the goods industry can produce, thereby destroying automatically the market for the industry. Take the case of the cheese producers, to name only one of hundreds. Thus they tend to destroy production in this land of probably first-rate abundance, potentially. That is another matter which I think needs to be considered.

I do not suppose the minister will take the trouble to state whether he believes that what is physically possible ought to be financially possible. If he does believe that, then the only logical thing he can do is realign his whole system of raising money in this country. I just wished to raise that matter in passing.

I look with great alarm upon the increase of taxes in this nation. As far as I can see, if these taxes continue to increase as they have Canadians might just as well bid good-bye to freedom. If a man cannot have an income and have a little of it left that he himself can dispose of, I ask you in the name of common sense how you can say he has any freedom at all. The very things the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) mentioned a few minutes ago are cases in point. If the government can say to a man running a little business and having the greatest difficulty making a living, "you have to do thus and so and thus and so and thus and so," and as a result of all those "thuses" and "so's" it costs the man $150 extra for services in having his income tax returns made out, for doing the government's "chore-boy" work, as the hon. member well called it, for which he gets no return, you have to stretch your concept of freedom a long way to look upon that man as having any freedom in respect of the running of his affairs. So it is all through the economy as far as I can see.

It will be said that we have to have money. The minister will probably say that we are calling for bigger and better old age pensions, for bigger and better family allowances and so on, and that we have to have the money. I agree that we have to have the money, but my contention is that we do not have to get the money by stealing every dollar of it from the people's pockets. That is just where the moaning cry a few minutes ago of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is shown to be so hopeless. He says you cannot get money anywhere except by taking it out of the people's pockets; that when you have all there is in their pockets, you might just as well give up; it does not matter how rich your country is or how many things you can produce in the way of goods and services, you just cannot go any further; what is physically possible is not in his thinking financially possible, and that is the end of it.

I maintain that is a completely unrealistic attitude to take toward the whole business of financing our country at this time. It is well known, and I do not need to repeat it here, that I have argued time and time again in this house that under appropriate circumstances when there is adequate production in the country, adequate supplies, money can be created by the state debt-free and used for the benefit of the people of Canada. Up to the present time no argument has been adduced in this house to disprove my position. I maintain that no argument can be adduced by anybody in this house to disprove my position.

An hon. Member: That is going a little bit too far.

Mr. Blackmore: I challenge the hon. member to take the floor the first time he gets a chance. There will be no more left of him than was left of the prairie chicken by the time the gatling gun got through with it. As we go into these trying times, and they are terribly trying, why not give thought to this all-important consideration? Why tax our people to the point where they are disheartened and bewildered and wondering whether they have a friend in the world? Why drive them to that position? Why not realize that by the adoption of proper measures, what is physically possible actually can be made financially possible. That certainly cannot be done by taxation.

This is the general statement I wish to make. I do not intend to argue at length, but I am sure that in speaking as I am now I am voicing the opinion, at least the desire, of no fewer than 85 per cent of all Canadian people.

Just one more little thing needs to be said and I shall close. The minister will say, "What you are proposing will bring inflation." Let me ask hon. members on all sides of the house to take the definition which the hon. member for Greenwood gave us a year ago, and which is a good one, as to the cause of inflation; namely, that it occurs when "we have too many dollars chasing too few goods". Is there any conceivable reason why in Canada you cannot have so many goods that you could not get enough dollars chasing them to cause inflation? I ask hon. members to go through the whole list of our products: potatoes, vegetables, fruits, fuel, dairy products, poultry products, livestock products, grain products. Is there any possibility of reasoning that under normal conditions Canada could not produce so many of at least 90 per cent of those products that no matter how much money the people had in their pockets there would not be enough money "chasing those goods" to cause a rise in price?

If the minister is afraid to use the device I have urged upon him because there would be danger of inflation, then let me say that it is all-important that he adopt such measures as will increase the production in Canada of any commodity in connection with which he thinks there is any danger of a serious shortage of supply developing.

I doubt very much if the minister can show that he has conscientiously taken any steps to increase the production of any commodity. The other day we did take steps to increase the production of gold. I wonder if the minister can point to any other single commodity produced in Canada in respect of which we are taking similar steps to increase production. If we were to take steps as striking, as palpable in connection with the production of anything else in Canada as those we are taking in connection with gold production we should get a production increase almost beyond our capacity to contain. Why not try it where necessary?

When we have supply in Canada up to a point where we can feel positive there is no danger of a shortage developing with a consequent rise in price through scarcity, why not use this device of state-created debt-free dollars which I have been suggesting? I close by saying once more that in my judgment the income tax is far, far too high. I did not say very much about excise taxes. I felt like saying something then, but I thought what I had to say would be more appropriate on this bill. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of speaking as I have spoken.

Mr. Hodgson: I want to ask a few questions for my own information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Probably that could be done more properly in committee.

Mr. Hodgson: It will only take a few moments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That does not matter. At this stage we are discussing the principle of the bill. As soon as the motion for second reading is carried then we will go into committee of the whole.

Mr. Hodgson: That is fine.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Abbott: I will be very brief. One or two points were raised in the course of the debate concerning which I want to say a word, particularly the question of the allowance for medical expenses. I have already said what I am going to say, but in view of the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I feel I must repeat it. I feel deeply that it is a fundamental principle of our Income Tax Act that no expense which is an ordinary living expense should be paid out of income before tax. I happen to know that view is fully shared by my predecessor who introduced this measure. That is the reason I have been unable to bring myself to conscientiously recommend to parliament and to the country that this particular type of ordinary living expense, which unfortunately because of human frailty is an expense that sooner or later is incurred by every person in the country, should be wholly deductible from income before tax.

When the measure was introduced early in the war a figure of 5 per cent was suggested, after investigation, as representing what the average family spent for medical, dental and allied expenses. In order to mitigate the hardship of excessive medical expenses, provision was made that expenses in excess of 5 per cent should be deductible, with certain ceilings which were necessary for obvious reasons to prevent wealthy people getting undue benefit. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, that was lowered in 1944 from 5 to 4 per cent primarily to take care of expenditures for drugs which for administrative reasons it was difficult to include in the exemptions.

I do not say that it is, but it may be that the 4 per cent ceiling is too high. Perhaps it should be reduced. I considered that in the budget consideration, but I came to the conclusion that it was not. However, I did come to the conclusion that in the light of changed circumstances the ceilings might properly be raised. While I followed the direction of the house to consider the elimination of the floor and to allow all medical expenses to be deductible, those were the reasons I could not, as I have said, conscientiously recommend that course to the house and to the country.

Responsibility, Mr. Speaker, is a sobering experience. If others had had the experience that I have had of being Minister of Finance charged with the responsibility of raising very large sums of money and endeavouring to the best of my ability to spread the burden as fairly as possible over the taxpayers of Canada, I think they would come to the same conclusion I did. Some reference was made to by-elections. I put that view forward at a public meeting at the city of Kitchener in the constituency of Waterloo North, and that was one of the by-elections in which the Liberal candidate was successful.

Mr. Graydon: I would not crow too much over that one.

Mr. Abbott: I am stating it as a fact. I have repeated why I think it would be unsound, unfair and unjust to eliminate the floor with respect to medical expenses. Other points were raised in the course of this discussion but I think it might be more convenient if I were to deal with them when we are in committee. Members can then ask specific questions as to the points they have in mind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Loan to shareholder.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask a few questions following up what was said by the hon. member for Peel. With respect to the collecting of income tax, excise tax, unemployment insurance and other things of that nature at the source, the cost of keeping the necessary books for small firms, and probably for some of the larger firms, has about doubled in the last few years. They are doing this work free for the dominion government. What I am particularly concerned about is the expression "at arms' length". I should like the minister to outline what that term really means. Does it mean I cannot sell a business or property to my son or my brother?

Mr. MacDougall: Your uncle or your aunt.

Mr. Hodgson: Or to my uncle or my aunt. Where is the line drawn?

Mr. Abbott: I believe there is a definition in a later section, but since the question has been raised I might answer it now. My hon. friend will find the section on page 20 of the bill. Perhaps he might be good enough to look at it. He may not have read it. He will find it in subsection 2 of section 31 on page 20 of the bill. If he will read that I will deal with any specific questions he may have when we come to that section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister say a word or two about the interpretation of the words "bona fide arrangements"? I also want to ask what constitutes payment. Does the giving of a note constitute payment?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose what constitutes payment depends upon the law of the particular province in which the loan is entered into, but I would not think the giving of a note, which would simply be the extension or renewal of a loan, would constitute payment within the meaning of the statute. As to "bona fide arrangements", that would be a question for interpretation by the courts if there were a dispute, but as my hon. friend knows it means arrangements made in good faith.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not my point. The minister says it means a mutual arrangement made in good faith, but is that all it means? Usually in the case of a loan you have something much more than good faith. You have security.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate that there is a wide-open door here for evasion of tax by carrying through the form of making a loan. In order to protect the treasury against that there must be some provision such as this. In the event of a dispute it would be a matter first for the income tax appeal board and later the exchequer court to determine if in fact bona fide arrangements had been made for the repayment of the loan.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate what the minister has said, but I am wondering whether in fact there has been sufficient experience in connection with the act so that precedents have been established which can be ascertained.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate this is a new provision which is extending the operation of the section. It is a relaxing measure. It is permitting loans to be made which up to the present time have not been permitted. We have to be pretty careful about it because it could be abused, and that is why this provision is put in here.

Mr. Graydon: On that same question, a shareholder gets a loan from the company. What difference does it make whether it is paid back that year, the year after or the year after that? There must be some instances where that would work great hardship, actually.

Mr. Abbott: That would be the simplest way to avoid ever paying dividends. In the case of a company, as my hon. friend knows, when dividends are paid they attract taxes in the hands of the recipient, personal income tax. If there was no provision such as this in the act it would be the simplest way to avoid ever making a distribution of profits which should be subject to personal income tax.

Mr. Graydon: I quite appreciate that, and I quite agree with the motive that prompts that section of the legislation. But there must be cases from time to time where a genuine hardship is worked on that same basis, because after all the income tax department must, on numerous occasions, benefit very greatly at the expense of the individual taxpayer, and sometimes in what would seem to be almost a discriminatory way. I should think there must be some way legislation could be framed so that if the taxpayer did not pay the loan back, or part of it in any event during that current year, it could be paid back in another year without working the hardship that would seem to be imposed on the taxpayer in this instance.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend will recall, being a legal man, this is a section that has been in the Income Tax Act and the preceding act for a great many years. Formerly it prohibited loans to shareholders, with virtually no exception. That has been successively relaxed. This represents the last relaxation, and for the good reasons I indicated to the hon. member for Greenwood it has to be hedged about with some considerable safeguards. This section now permits a loan to be made for any purpose, provided it is repaid within one year from the end of the fiscal period of the corporation out of which the loan is made, that is the following fiscal year. So if it were made at the beginning of one fiscal year the maximum period allowed for repayment would be two years. If it were made at the end it would only be twelve months. That I think is a pretty generous revision. The original act said no loans to shareholders at all. The companies which are not in the lending business are not supposed to be lending money. If a man wants to borrow money, under ordinary circumstances he goes to a lending institution, the bank. In other words, loans are not to be used as a vehicle for getting dividends out without paying income tax.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister not agree that there are other alternatives—

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are the bona fide arrangements referred to in (a) which could be paid over ten years.

Mr. Abbott: That is right; that is for a limited purpose. The loan has to be for the specific purpose set out in (a).

Mr. Fair: Can the minister tell us what the official position is with respect to compensation paid to farmers in Saskatchewan on account of the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Abbott: That will depend upon the Income Tax Act. If the receipt is income it will be taxed. If it is a capital receipt, it will not. There are complicated rules, as my hon. friend knows relating to basic herds, and all that kind of thing. The ordinary rules with respect to income will apply.

Mr. McLure: I should like to get an explanation with reference to interest. A merchant doing business nearly always has to borrow money. I know of one merchant who borrows considerable money; in the period of a year his bank loan would run to $25,000, and the interest over the year would amount to a considerable sum. One man I have in mind paid $3,000 to the bank in interest. Would that be taxed or not?

Mr. Abbott: I would think on the facts as outlined by my hon. friend that would be deducted from his gross income as a business expense, because the act provides that interest on money borrowed for the purpose of earning the income is an expense of doing business.

Mr. McLure: He could carry a smaller loan with that amount of interest year after year.

Mr. Abbott: If the bank would allow him.

Mr. McLure: That was a question I wanted settled. I have another question in connection with it. Suppose he is in a certain line of business and he cannot altogether prove that it is necessary for him to borrow that money to build up his business. Suppose the income tax people say to him: You have a frozen loan there, and therefore we cannot allow it. Is that not done in tax collecting?

Mr. Abbott: I would not think so. I always dislike to give free legal advice because I have been out of the business for so long.

Mr. McLure: The reason I asked the question is that the hon. member for Greenwood asked what constituted a payment. Of course if the man were borrowing from two banks and they were going to charge him interest on the income he could pay one back by a note from the other and overcome it.

Mr. Abbott: It sounds like high finance to me.

Mr. McLure: I do not think the minister answered the question of the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Abbott: I thought I made it clear.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 3 has several subsections. May we take them one at a time?

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister comment on subsection 1 of section 3. In that comment will he indicate whether there is any limitation on the amount of money that can be paid out or put into a superannuation fund as a lump sum? I have in mind the fact that the basic section we are amending is section 11 of the act which does provide certain limitations in respect of comparable payments.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. I should clarify that. I am not technically competent to explain what is known as a terminal funding plan but, broadly speaking, I understand that a pension plan will be set up by the employer whereby, instead of making annual payments to the fund as is done in the ordinary case, when the employee retires he pays into the fund, to a trustee, an amount which on an actuarial basis will be sufficient to provide that employee at the retiring age with a pension for the remainder of his life; and that amount which is actuarially appropriate to pay for that pension is paid into the fund at the retirement of the employee, and that is the amount which can be deducted.

Mr. Knowles: Subsection (f) which appears in the act just before where this one will be put in relates to a similar matter, namely an employer's contribution to a pension fund. There is limitation of $900. I should like to know why there is no limitation in respect of this kind of payment. To be specific and perhaps of a suspicious mind, I would like to know whether it is possible for a corporation to provide a healthy pension to some retiring official in this way and escape income tax in doing so.

Mr. Abbott: The scheme has to be approved, and I am informed that the approval would not be given for any plan which is not fair and reasonable. In that connection, the limitation which is now contained in the act with respect to what I might refer to as an ordinary pension, or the more common type of pension plan, would be taken into account. The payment to which my hon. friend refers is of course the annual payment. It refers to payment year after year.

Mr. Knowles: The minister referred to a plan as one that has been necessarily approved. Is it an approval that has been given by the department on some previous occasion or can a special case be submitted for some particular individual and approval be received?

Mr. Abbott: Plans are not approved which do not cover employees generally. That has been standard practice in the department since the requirement for approval has been in force.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand it is perhaps universal now that an individual who is a member of an approved plan gets an exemption on the payments he makes from time to time. On the other hand when he receives his annuity, that is taxable. There are still cases, I believe, where it may be paid in a lump sum, and my understanding is that in those cases the lump sum may be spread over three years. Am I right in that?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct; it may be spread back over the last three years. In those plans the trustees can, if they so desire, pay to the recipient an annuity rather than a lump sum. If it were apparent that the three-year write-off would cause undue hardship from the point of tax liability, then no doubt the trustees would be prepared to have the annuity over the forward period rather than the lump sum.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then do I understand that the question I have raised is really academic, because no man could ever be put in that position? Is that a characteristic of the plan, that he may always choose an annuity, so the three-year difficulty would not arise?

Mr. Abbott: That would depend, of course, on the by-laws of the fund. There may be certain circumstances in which he would have the right to withdraw a lump sum, but in all the by-laws of that kind I have ever seen it is optional for the recipient. If he exercises his option, then he does it knowing what his possible tax liability may be.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it is optional, of course I am completely answered.

Mr. Knowles: Subsection 2 of section 3 relates to the amendment that was first enacted last year concerning the deductibility of trade union dues, and this amendment would include payments made by workers covered by what is known as the Rand formula. I should like to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to making any other what might be called administrative changes in connection with this provision. As the minister knows, the deductibility of trade union dues was a most welcome provision. He has had experience before with some of the things he has introduced being welcomed, but at the same time those who are affected can see room for improvement. In this particular case I find a number of trade unionists are concerned over the complicated nature of the formula that applies to these deductions.

The complication arises out of two main facts. On the one hand it arises from the fact that payments for trade union purposes generally and payments into trade union pension plans, where such plans are approved, are covered separately. In other words they are covered in separate sections of the act. In the end it amounts to the same thing in dollars and cents, but it is very complicated for trade union secretaries particularly to have to issue two separate receipts, and to break down the dues that are paid in a lump sum as between those that are for trade union purposes generally and those that may be for a pension plan. I would point out that at the moment I am talking only about such pension plans as are approved. There are same trade union pension plans, in addition to the supplementary one in Toronto about which I have talked to the minister so often, which have not yet been approved. At the moment I am saying that the division between the two creates complexities.

The other complication is created by virtue of the wording further on in the section we are now amending, which says that one cannot claim this deduction for any purpose not directly related to the ordinary operating expenses of the association or trade union to which they were paid. This means that many unions have quite a time determining just what percentage of the dues that are paid comes under this provision. For example, I am told that if a trade union is renting office premises, the rent that it has to pay is regarded as part of the operating expenses and therefore the amounts paid by members thereto are allowed. On the other hand, I am told that if a trade union is setting aside money to build or purchase its own building, that is regarded in a different light and is not allowed. Similarly, what are sometimes called defence funds are not allowed. In some cases they might amount to quite a bit, but in most cases they do not amount to very much in terms of tax saving.

I can speak with some knowledge on this matter because I happen to belong to a trade union that is affected. The union to which I belong has a pension plan which is approved. If I were to read the minister the formula that has been sent out to the secretaries of the locals across the country for working this out, he would admit it is rather complicated. This complication arises from two facts. The first is the distinction between pension payments and ordinary payments, and the other is that of knowing what expenses of the union are allowed. I wonder if consideration could not be given to combining the two payments into one, at least where the pension plan has been approved. My other suggestion is this. Would it not be possible to simplify the whole matter by making it possible for the whole of the trade union dues to be deducted? If the minister wants to put some kind of limitation on that, something in the nature of a ceiling, I suggest it would be a lot simpler if he were to base it on a percentage of the taxpayer's income rather than in the terms I have already described.

There is one other question I should like to ask. Would it not be possible to arrange for the T-4 slips, particularly in a case where the Rand formula or some other form of union security is in effect, to show these deductions and simplify the work of the secretary of the union concerned?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that the questions raised by the hon. member are now under consideration in the department. The returns are just coming in, and this is the first year in which this provision has been applied. It is another illustration of the fact that when one changes the act to achieve greater equity one introduces greater complexity. Every time we add one of these exemptions from income it does complicate the preparation and filing of returns, both by the taxpayer and by the tax department, but that is probably unavoidable.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On section 4—Chief source of income.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister explain to me these negatives, which I find it hard to understand.

Mr. Abbott: As the hon. member will recall, this was the section which referred to the principal source of income, and then section 13(1) was introduced last year as a loophole section to cover what, for want of a better term, I shall call the hobby farmers—

Mr. Fleming: Gentleman farmers.

Mr. Abbott: Well, gentleman farmers. The idea of the provision was to limit the deduction which a gentleman farmer may take for income tax purposes against other income as a result of farm losses. It was felt it was no longer necessary to have the definition of principal source of income as contained in the original section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, but will the minister explain to me these two words. The section reads in part:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming—

I think I can understand that. Then the next thing is "nor a combination of farming and some other source of income." Is that a single source? Because it goes on to say:

> . . . his income for the year shall be deemed to be not less than his income from all sources other than farming . . .

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps it is a little bit confusing, but almost invariably these gentlemen farmers never make money from their farms. They always lose money; and they write off that loss against income from other sources, such as salary or investment income. The section as introduced last year was of course to limit that write-off to the lesser of the two figures mentioned.

Mr. Graydon: They make money in the city and lose it in the country.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry to be so insistent, but I am still interested in this wording. I want to go back to line 3 of the new section 13 that is within clause 4 of the bill.

Mr. Abbott: There is no change from the wording used last year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What I want to ask is this. I will cite a theoretical case. Suppose a man has an income of $10,000 a year from his profession. Then suppose he loses $10,000 a year on farming; the minister says they all lose money. I had a friend who, as he expressed it, supported a farm and as nearly as he could figure it out, it cost him a dollar to grow a cauliflower. Then let us say that he has an income of $6,000 from some public office that he holds, such as membership on the international joint commission or something of that nature. I do not know whether they are paid or not. How does this thing work out in that event? I presume that he would be able to deduct one-half—it says "one-half his farming loss for the year"—of his farming loss.

Mr. Abbott: Or $5,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He could deduct his farming loss. I have put down his farming loss at $5,000, so he could deduct that.

Mr. Abbott: He could deduct $5,000 from his gross income of $16,000. He has a loss of $10,000, of which he can deduct $5,000. He has income of $16,000. So his income for purposes of taxation would be $11,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No matter how many other sources of income he has it would all apply in the same way?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. McLure: I have one particular case on which I should like to get a little bit of information, namely that of a farmer who is specializing in poultry and sub aqua farming. As to the poultry and sub aqua farming, he does not keep any definite records. But this year he has been asked to pay something on his sub aqua farming which gave him a certain amount of income.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him what sub aqua farming is?

Mr. McLure: The growing of oysters.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you.

Mr. Harkness: "Sub" meaning "under" and "aqua" meaning "water".

Mr. McLure: I thought the minister was up in his Latin.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that, under the act, he is fishing.

Mr. McLure: Other words are used in the legislation that I do not know, such as mutatis mutandis. I thought, however, the minister surely knew what sub aqua farming was. That is what it is always called, and it means the growing of oysters. That is really farming. Those two can be taken as a combination. This man has to make a report on his poultry farming just the same as on his sub aqua farming, and the two of them can be taken together and shown as the income from the farm. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. Abbott: Speaking subject to correction—and as I say, I am always diffident about giving free legal opinions—I am told that he is farming so far as his poultry operations are concerned and that he is fishing so far as his sub aqua oyster operations are concerned.

Mr. McLure: He is not fishing; he is farming. The act says he is a sub aqua farmer.

Mr. Graydon: The minister is sub aqua.

Mr. Abbott: May I quote to my hon. friend section 127 (1) (p) of the act:

> "fishing" includes fishing for or catching shell fish, crustaceans and marine animals but does not include an office or employment under a person engaged in the business of fishing;

Therefore, by definition, sub aqua farming is fishing.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister to explain the real effect of this clause 4? The part that appears here in print is for the most part that portion of section 13 which is being retained.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: What we are actually doing by this is to eliminate the previous subsection 1 and subsection 2. Those subsections indicated that the income of a person for the taxation year shall be deemed to be not less than his income for the year from his chief source of income.

Mr. Abbott: It is no longer necessary. I thought I explained that a moment ago. If you are running a grocery business and a drug business, you can offset the loss in the grocery business against the profit in the drug business. The only case in which we do not allow that is in the case of the gentleman farmer, who is limited as to the amount of loss. It therefore no longer became necessary to put in a provision that the income of a person for the fiscal year shall be deemed to be not less than his income from his chief source of income.

Mr. Knowles: Are there no gentleman grocers or gentleman druggists?

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Inadequate considerations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know the reason for this amendment. Apparently the effect is to change the yardstick which was outlined in the preceding section. Now we have nothing but the word "reasonable" to replace it. What would be the test? Is it considered to be better to leave the thing absolutely at large, merely with the word "reasonable" as a guide?

Mr. Abbott: This is, of course, a loophole section. One purpose was to extend the ambit of the section to include payments as consideration for the carriage of goods or passengers or for other services. It was not in the section as such. Then the phrase "reasonable amount" was put in. This, of course, is a question which, in the event of a dispute, can be determined by the courts and is not within the discretion of the minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; but previously you had a test. Am I right in thinking that previously you had a test? But here you just say "reasonable".

Mr. Abbott: It used to relate to people in the same line of business.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is right.

Mr. Abbott: This section relates to people who are not dealing at arm's length.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Abbott: Yes; clause 5 carries.

Section agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE GREAT EASTERN INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 243, to incorporate the Great Eastern Insurance Company.

Mr. Cruickshank: May we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, this is the standard type of bill calling for the incorporation of the Great Eastern Insurance Company. It is in the ordinary form as approved by the superintendent of insurance. I am informed, and I know, that it follows the regular routine. I might point out, however, that the name "The Great Eastern Insurance Company" does not conflict in any way with another insurance company called Great-West Life Assurance Company. We have already approached Great-West Life Assurance Company, which deals in life assurance, whereas we propose to deal in fire insurance. There is common agreement between the two companies that there is no conflict.

The capital of the company is set forth in section 3 of the bill. The incorporators are set forth in section 1; and one of them, whom I know, is from my own constituency. Another is a personal friend. The head office is to be at Montreal. The types of insurance are listed in section 6. And then, as in all these acts, section 8 says that the company will be subject to the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I have one further question, through you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On second reading only the principle of the bill is discussed. The hon. member may ask questions when we reach the committee stage. After second reading this bill will be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. When it is reported from that committee it will go to committee of the whole, at which time the hon. member may ask questions of the sponsor. If the hon. member wishes to discuss the principle at this time, he is free to do so.

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, I guess the principle is what I wish to discuss. I presume the principle of the bill is to carry on an insurance company along normal lines, as carried out by a similar company in Canada. I presume, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the same restrictions would follow in respect of this company, including those having to do with capitalization. That was the question I wished to ask, because I know one of these insurance companies was incorporated in one of the provinces; but unfortunately due to the failure of the Home Bank—and that was one of the few business failures, due to the good work of the federal government—it failed. If I am not permitted to ask questions at this stage, I shall have to wait. However, I am sure the sponsor of the bill would wish to tell me whether those who are sponsoring and financing the company are going to conform with all the regulations as they have been laid down, and as they have been carried out by similar companies in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Mount Royal speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Macnaughton: That is right, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

THE ECONOMICAL MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Arnold Darroch (Wellington North) moved the second reading of Bill No. 244 respecting the Economical Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

Mr. Graydon: I happen to know that the sponsor of the bill is anxious to make a full explanation, and I hope he will not be denied that opportunity.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And when he is explaining it, would he indicate the special significance of the word "Economical" as applied to this insurance company, as distinct from all others?

Mr. Darroch: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) for his expression of good will, and his confidence as expressed in the thought that I might be able to make a speech.

The bill asks that the word "fire" be omitted from the official caption of the insurance company, so that instead of being known as the Economical Mutual Fire Insurance Company it would be called the Economical Mutual Insurance Company.

I understand this company has been in operation for 80 years and that when they began business they were a fire insurance company. Down through the years however they gradually branched out into other lines of insurance, until now the fire part of their economy or business is practically non-existent. For this reason they wish to have the word "fire" omitted from their official title. The explanatory note sets out all this information much better than I could give it.

Mr. Graydon: That is a most satisfactory explanation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question at this stage.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have several deputy speakers in front of me, giving me advice. I am simply asking a question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): One question only.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member has given an explanation of the bill in which he says the company is eliminating the word "fire" from its title; is that correct?

Mr. Darroch: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then, if I am permitted, I should like to ask why they are eliminating the word "fire". Is it because it was not profitable to write fire insurance? If so, will the shareholders of the company be protected? Surely that is a fair question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point is not as to whether the question is fair, but rather whether it should be asked at this stage. If the sponsor of the bill speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Darroch: The company has complied with all the rules.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, May 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cannon: Even in committee I can raise a question of privilege. I should like to refer to an article in the Financial Times of May 23 which in turn refers to an incident that occurred on April 24 in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, when this bill was before that committee. This article reads:

> What Mr. Cannon did in effect was to gag a committee from getting more evidence about gas pipe lines.

I have read the report of the debates on this bill and I know also that the Financial Times was not the only one that has made reference to the fact that I gagged the committee and prevented it from getting evidence which in the opinion of certain people should have been obtained. I think it is time I made a statement on these accusations.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I submit that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is going to speak on the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Green: The hon. member is making a speech, not speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He is speaking on the bill.

Mr. Cannon: It concerns the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand the hon. member is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Green: May I inquire respectfully what the question of privilege is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Let the hon. member tell you.

Mr. Low: I hold that no question of privilege has been cited.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Wait until he explains the question.

Mr. Cannon: Since the hon. member evidently was not listening, I will repeat it. The question of privilege I have raised is that I have been accused in this article in the Financial Times of having gagged the committee and prevented it from getting evidence about the gas pipe line. That is a serious accusation to make about a member of the committee and I think I am entitled to defend myself on the record of the committee and the record of the house. I should like to explain what went on in the committee.

The committee was hearing a witness by the name of Herring. This witness was before the committee on April 22 and all morning of April 24. Then in the afternoon a further examination of the witness was being conducted by the hon. member for Calgary West. I was of the opinion that the cross-examination going on was not relevant, but I was not the only one of that opinion. I should like to refer to page 61 of the minutes of proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and quote what the hon. member for Winnipeg South is reported as having said:

> The application before the committee at the present time has relationship to nothing east of Winnipeg. Although I have enjoyed it and I do not object, for the last half hour we have been arguing the whole question of exporting gas—a subject which has been argued ad nauseam and which will continue to be so argued. The fact is that the discussion has been informative but bears no relation to the responsibility put on this committee—that of dealing with a specific bill. Of course I am interested in what happens to the country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South there expressed the opinion that the cross-examination and the discussion that was going on was not relevant to the issues before the committee. Then on page 77 of the proceedings of the committee we find this:

> Mr. Cavers: Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted a word; I do not think anyone wants to cut out discussion here.
> The Chairman: I do not think anyone wants to cut out discussion here and I think the hon. member will himself agree that at the last session of the committee probably a wider latitude was given than is usual in matters of this kind.

He was referring to the hon. member for Calgary West having been given wide latitude. Then I quote further from page 87 as follows:

> Mr. Whitman: At the last session of this committee, Mr. Chairman, we had a lot of irrelevant discussion carried on, and after we had finished, certain information was asked to be produced by the witness at the call of the chair; that evidence has been brought here today. Now we have Mr. Nickle coming forward with some information. The witness has gone to some trouble to get this evidence for us. Now, if we are going to carry on in this way, we can stay here all the rest of this day and the rest of next week and get nowhere, merely to satisfy someone who apparently is not in favour of the passage of this bill. For that reason I think, with the evidence we have, that this is the proper time to pass on to the bill.

[Mr. Cannon.]

There we have three members of the committee expressing the opinion that the discussion and the cross-examination that was being carried on were irrelevant. At that moment I made a statement, which appears on page 87, which I should like to put on the record. It was as follows:

> Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word on that also? The other day Mr. Herring was heard at great length. One of the members at that time —Mr. Mutch if I remember correctly—considered that a lot of the evidence was irrelevant, that we were getting too far afield; nevertheless, we did hear the evidence given here the other day, and I was there, and I remember Mr. Nickle saying that if Mr. Herring produced the figures, the documents he asked for, as to the feasibility of the market, he would be satisfied. Well, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Herring has produced those figures here this morning and Mr. Nickle has continued his cross-examination on them. The only reason I make the motion I have made—

That was a motion I had moved already.

> —is that I understand there is no other witness to be heard. Have you any other witness to be heard? I know of no other witnesses. I submit this witness has been sufficiently cross-examined and that any further cross-examination would be just a repetition of facts which have already been brought before the committee and a waste of the time of the committee. I object very strongly to Mr. Green's declaration that I am trying to cut off discussion or that I am trying to protect anyone. I am not trying to protect anyone, and I have no interest in the thing either; but, just as a member of the committee in view of the fact that the evidence presented to us has been very complete, I think that we have now reached the time when it is proper for the chairman to put the question on the preamble of the bill, and that is the reason I made the motion that has been made.

That motion read as follows:

> Mr. Cannon moved that sufficient evidence has been obtained for the committee to decide as to the economic practicability of the pipeline under consideration; and that the question be put on the preamble without further examination of the witness. After discussion and the question having been put on the said motion, it was agreed to on the following division:

The only motion I had made was that the question be put on the preamble to the bill. I should like to refer now to page 2523 of Hansard of May 23 where the hon. member for Calgary West is reported as follows—

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member has completed his question of privilege?

Mr. Cannon: No, this is on the same question.

Mr. Cruickshank: It seems to me the hon. member is trying to talk out this bill.

Mr. Cannon: I am not trying to talk out the bill, but I might as well be taking up the time of the committee as somebody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member for Calgary West is reported on page 2523 of Hansard as follows:

> So far as the Boundary company is concerned, that proof was not obtained by the committee; and, in fact, the Liberal majority on that committee rode roughshod over the minority party members to prevent the hearing of cross-examination and evidence that I believe would have clearly established that the Boundary project is not economic.

The point I wished to make in moving the motion I did was that we had heard sufficient cross-examination and it was time to go on to the preamble of the bill itself. The point is that the hon. member for Calgary West at that time was not in fact cross-examining at all. He was simply trying to get on the record, through the medium of that witness, figures that had been prepared by others. The witness said he knew nothing about them. What was going on at the time was not in fact cross-examination at all. The hon. member was just trying to get something on the record through the medium of so-called examination of the witness.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, quite apart from the hon. member's question of privilege, I submit that he is now attacking the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Cannon: I am not attacking the hon. member. I am answering him.

Mr. Green: If he wants to do that he should do so in the regular course of debate and not by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Cannon: May I submit there are two questions—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand the hon. member is still speaking to a question of privilege. I would ask him to be as brief as possible and as much to the point as possible.

Mr. Cannon: At page 81 the witness had the following to say in answer to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West:

> Not being familiar with the nature of their survey, I cannot answer that question positively; but the way we go about making a survey is to establish the economics of the pipe line, the load required, and whether or not it can meet the competition of the fuels available today.

The witness said in effect that he was not able to express an opinion on figures that were the result of other surveys and which the hon. member for Calgary West was trying to get on the record. At page 84 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines we find that the witness said:

> As previously stated, we cannot prove the basis of our estimate until such time as we have completed the installation and have confirmed it by the contracts. We submit them only as evidence, and we would not be put in a position before this committee that we can definitely acquire every one of those markets, although I personally think we can.

I said to the hon. member for Calgary West on that same day:

> Is it fair to say, Mr. Nickle, that you are presenting another set of figures coming from competitive companies who wish to prevent this company from getting a charter so that it won't compete with them?

The hon. member for Calgary West did not deny that. He merely said, "Please let me explain".

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Cannon: I say one of the reasons I made that motion was that it was unfair to the witness, after the statement he had made, for the hon. member for Calgary West to continue to quote figures from other surveys that the witness knew nothing about, and to try to put those figures into the evidence of that witness who said he had no knowledge of the surveys that had been made.

Mr. Hodgson: Who was the witness?

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Herring. The hon. member for Calgary West was acting as if he was a witness, and that is a point to which I am coming.

Mr. Hodgson: He was as much a witness as Herring was.

Mr. Cannon: If the hon. member for Calgary West wanted to get these figures on the record he had two very simple methods open to him. He could either have called the witness who had collected the figures and knew something about them or else he could have put them on the record simply by making a statement, something he did later on—

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member for Calgary West was asked more questions in that committee than Mr. Herring.

Mr. Cannon: —because at page 103 of the record we find that the hon. member for Calgary West put a letter on the record which he had received from the Winnipeg Electric Company, and which takes up a page and a half. The point I wish to make is that all these claims about my gagging the committee and attempting to prevent evidence going on the record—

Mr. Hodgson: Didn't you move the motion?

Mr. Cannon: Just a minute—are just a lot of hot air, a lot of gas, because if the hon. member for Calgary West had wanted to get those figures on the record all he had to do was to get up and make a statement in the same way that he read the letter from the Winnipeg Electric Company into the record.

Mr. Hodgson: He couldn't do it for you fellows asking questions. He didn't have a chance.

Mr. Cannon: He had every chance had he wanted to convince the committee and bring proper evidence before it in the same way that the sponsors of the bill did.

Mr. Hodgson: You moved the motion to cut off evidence.

Mr. Cannon: Therefore I say on the question of privilege I brought up originally that the accusations that I tried to gag the committee—

Mr. Green: It is perfectly true.

Mr. Cannon: —or rode roughshod over the committee are not at all based on facts.

Mr. Hodgson: Didn't you move the motion to hear no more witnesses?

Mr. Cannon: If these people wanted to get any facts, figures or letters on the record all they had to do was to put them on the record.

Mr. Hodgson: He couldn't for you fellows asking questions.

Mr. Cannon: He did that later with respect to the letter from the Winnipeg Electric Company. There is one other question.

Mr. Graydon: Is this another question of privilege?

Mr. Cannon: It is another question of privilege with which I wish to deal, or the same privilege. At page 2401—

Mr. Hodgson: Read the same thing over again.

Mr. Cannon: Let me say what the question is.

Mr. Hodgson: Read the same thing over again.

Mr. Cannon: At page 2401 of Hansard the hon. member for Calgary West had the following to say about what had taken place before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines:

> I regret that that took place because those two members,—

He was referring to myself and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace who was also a member of the committee and seconded my motion.

> —in effect, have given their considered view, apparently, that the province of Quebec should not get natural gas from western Canada.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a statement which, to put it mildly, is entirely unsupported by the facts.

Mr. Hodgson: Didn't you move the motion?

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. Cannon: Yes, but if you will listen to me for a moment I am going to demonstrate so clearly that even the hon. member will understand that such a thing was as far away from our minds as it could be at the time.

Mr. Knowles: May I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Cannon: This is a company which—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Cannon: This is a company—

Mr. Knowles: You are not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Cannon: No, I am not.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: I did not intervene when some hon. members complained at the start that the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine did not have a question of privilege because I felt that when he was citing something that had been said outside the house regarding his actions as a member of parliament he did have a legitimate point of privilege. But when he gets down simply to an argument with another member of the house I submit that one has to consider the wording of citation 192 in Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

> A dispute arising between two honourable members as to allegations of facts hardly fulfils the conditions of a privilege question . . .

Then there is citation 193 which reads as follows:

> Members often raise so-called "questions of privilege" on matters which should be dealt with as personal explanations or corrections, either in the debates or the proceedings of the house.

There is no question but that the hon. member has the right, when the floor is his, to answer the arguments made by the hon. member for Calgary West and to dispute any facts on which there may be differences of opinion between them, but I submit he should not claim that it is a question of privilege when he is merely arguing over something on which they differ.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine was not at all discussing a question of facts. He was demonstrating how false were the principles enunciated by the other hon. gentlemen. There is all the difference in the world.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine has raised what in my opinion is a perfectly proper question of privilege. I would point out, however, that points of privilege when raised should be as brief as possible. I would therefore ask the hon. member to co-operate by completing his remarks as quickly as possible.

Mr. Cannon: I shall do that, Mr. Chairman. I wish to say that the allegation that the members from Quebec were attempting to prevent gas from coming to eastern Canada is completely unsupported by the facts. The incorporation of this company, which is before the committee at this time, will not interfere in any way with the development of pipe lines to eastern Canada. The object of the pipe line which this company wishes to build is to bring gas from Alberta to Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The other company the hon. member for Calgary West is interested in, the Trans-Canada company, will have a much larger pipe line, if it ever gets built, and will go all the way to Ontario and Quebec.

There is a contradiction in the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary West because at one stage of his speech he said—

Mr. Green: Once again the hon. member is doing nothing more than attempting to contradict the hon. member for Calgary West. If he wants to do that, he should do it in the form of a speech in this debate, rather than using a point of privilege. I must ask you, Mr. Chairman, to give us your ruling on that point. If the hon. member can go on making a speech of this type, then anything can be raised on a point of privilege.

Mr. Croll: It has been.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to speak to the point of order, and I want a ruling. I am asking you, Mr. Chairman, whether an hon. member can rise on a question of privilege and conduct what is commonly known as a filibuster. Many hon. members want to expedite this bill. There are some around me who want to expedite it, but they do not sit in this seat. There are others on the other side of the house who want to expedite it. Is it fair for an hon. member to rise on a question of privilege and make a speech which is commonly known as a filibuster? I want to know, Mr. Chairman. I could go on, on this point of order and make a speech for ten or twenty minutes.

Mr. Hodgson: Go ahead.

Mr. Cruickshank: That would not be quite fair. I want to know whether on a question of privilege an hon. member can go on quoting from a newspaper article written by a man called Tempus. It is a most interesting article. The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, that delightful little island somewhere out in the Atlantic, quoted part of the article. I should like to know whether on the point of order I am permitted to discuss this newspaper article which was used by the hon. member in discussing his question of privilege. I am sure none of us wants to unfairly delay the passing of this bill.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to speak on the point of order. I am not going to make any suggestions that would convey the slightest thought that there is any motive in the mind of the hon. member who has been raising the question of privilege, other than that which he has mentioned. If it were some other hon. member, then he might have a different kind of motive, but I know the hon. member has not. What the hon. member is doing can be used as a device, Mr. Chairman, to stop the hon. member for Peace River from getting the floor and giving his opinion with respect to the pipe line. It is because this device might be used on some other occasion, and this could be looked upon as a precedent, that I am raising the point of order now. I do not think we should allow that kind of procedure or device to be employed in our committee work, because if we do we are going to upset the whole procedure and technique of debate on the second reading of bills generally.

None of us in the House of Commons was born yesterday, Mr. Chairman. We know pretty well that questions of privilege just do not develop into marathons like this. I think most of us understand it.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that particular statement I shall put an end to it now—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine. As I said, I believe he brought forward a perfectly proper point of privilege. However, I do believe that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is well taken, and I would ask the hon. member to co-operate by closing his remarks on the point of privilege very shortly.

Mr. MacDougall: Just say amen.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Let the cannon roar.

Mr. Cannon: I should like to say that I have no intention of making a filibuster on this bill at all because, on the contrary, I should like to see it pass as soon as possible. Also, in answer to the hon. member for Peel, may I say that it was far from my thought to prevent the hon. member for Peace River from making a speech. I regret if I have delayed him so far, but I reserve the privilege of taking part in the debate at a later time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Low: I think it was a nice type of running interference, and I must compliment the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine for doing it so smoothly and so nicely. I have no objection whatever to any person raising a question of privilege, but I always like to see a question of privilege put briefly and succinctly so we all understand it, and get it cleared away, then we can go on with our work.

When the adjournment time came at nine o'clock the other night I was dealing with the whole question of supply in the province of Alberta with relation to the pipe line that is now under discussion, and I believe I said then that whether or not this pipe line ever carried a cubic foot of gas or a gallon of oil would depend to a very large extent on two things: first, whether or not the province of Alberta discovered supplies of gas surplus to her present needs and to future needs for a period of some thirty years; and second, whether or not the psychology of the people of the province of Alberta was ever to come around to the point where they would consent to have gas exported.

The situation at the present time is fraught with grave difficulties and doubts, largely as a consequence of some very, very foolish speeches made here and elsewhere. In the course of his speech last week the hon. member for Lethbridge outlined very carefully the policy that had been followed by the government of Alberta in trying to produce a supply of gas and oil sufficient to take care of the needs of the Canadian people, and such as would justify the building of pipe lines to convey the oil and gas to other parts of Canada should it become the policy to export gas.

Well, the hon. member for Lethbridge pointed out how wise those policies had been, and he also made it abundantly clear to the committee that if it had not been for the wise policies laid down and carefully followed by the government of the province of Alberta there would never be supplies of gas and oil for export anywhere. I believe I said the other night I was not claiming, and I do not think the hon. member for Lethbridge was claiming, that the government of Alberta did it all. What we do say, sir, is that companies came to the province of Alberta upon invitation to risk their capital in searching for and developing oil and gas reserves when those supplies were found. We give credit to those people who came in and risked their capital. It was a joint effort, but I shall tell you this, Mr. Chairman, that if it had not been for the very wise policies laid down and followed by Alberta, these people would not have come in.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I am going to interrupt on a point of order, to say that the Imperial Oil Company spent $30 million in Alberta before the Social Credit people ever came in.

Mr. Low: I am grateful for the hon. member's impetuous interruptions, which he is always guilty of making. It is quite true, Mr. Chairman, and nobody has claimed otherwise, that the Imperial Oil Company did spend a lot of money. The question is, with what result?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): They lost $30 million before they ever brought in a producer.

Mr. Low: For 25 years that company had been fiddling around in the province of Alberta, without any policy and without any result. I am going to quote something for the hon. member's enlightenment in just a moment. After the hon. member for Lethbridge had finished his speech, the hon. member for Vegreville became hysterical as a consequence of something the hon. member for Lethbridge had said, and he proceeded to read some very wild statements. In fact, Mr. Chairman, he repeated the current line of drivel one hears at present throughout the province of Alberta from his colleagues, and particularly from his adolescent colleague the leader of the Liberal party in that province. The speech of the hon. member for Vegreville reminded me of nothing quite so much as some of the speeches that have been made in China and Russia recently by one Dr. Endicott. I would not say those speeches were designed to do harm to our own country, but I shall tell you this; they were designed to bring comfort to the enemy, no matter what they did to this country. The speech the hon. member made the other night was exactly in that class. Nothing could have done more harm to his native province of Alberta than the speech he read here in this chamber.

Mr. Laing: We have heard some funny ones in British Columbia lately.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Low: I have been interfered with sufficiently, and I want to continue my speech.

Mr. Decore: Will you permit a question?

Mr. Low: I shall be very glad to permit a question later—

Mr. Decore: You are afraid to answer a question right now.

Mr. Low: I shall be glad to answer any question anyone wants to ask at the end of my speech. The hon. member for Vegreville proceeded to read this very queer speech. I could not help thinking then, what a reward to the people of Alberta for choosing the hon. member to represent that constituency. What a reward it was!

Let us look at what he said. I want to set this matter straight. It is a matter that has to be set straight. The hon. member went on to say:

> . . . that the Alberta Social Credit government has sold out the oil industry to big interests and foreign corporations.

Mr. Chairman, that is about as close to the truth as Dr. Endicott gets in his wild statements. It was definitely designed to do hurt to an industry that is struggling for the good of Canada, struggling to supply this country with the oil and gas it needs to make it strong. The Alberta Social Credit government has not sold one foot of any resource in that province since it came into power in 1935, not a single foot. The hon. member for Vegreville knows that what I say is the truth. I was a member of the provincial cabinet from 1935 to 1945, and I know. I was there and helped to lay down the policy. When the hon. member says we sold out I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that is a pure, unadulterated fabrication.

Companies of all descriptions, small ones, intermediate ones and big ones were invited to come into the province to risk their capital in the development of those resources, just as the hon. member for Lethbridge said in his very excellent speech the other night. When these people were invited to come in, policies were laid down to govern their activities in the province. I remember back as far as 1937 when the Hon. Mr. Tanner and I made trips to eastern Canada to see all the interests that could be seen, and asked them to come out and risk their capital in the development of that resource. We sent Mr. Tanner, the minister of lands and mines, over to Britain to see everybody he could see over there, and invite the British people to spend their money in Alberta. They did nothing. Since the British people have lost their Iranian oil fields, they have been looking down their noses and have wished they had come in. They wish they had the vision that other people had.

Further than that, there are a lot of people in eastern Canada today who wish they had some vision. There are a lot of people in eastern Canada who did put their money in the development of oil, gas and other resources in the province. We pay all honour to them. We say they share in whatever credit there is for the development of those resources. They are getting a decent run for their money, and they are secure. But when they did come in to risk their capital in the development of these resources, they did not buy a single foot of anything. They bought and paid a very heavy price for, first, the privilege of exploration over a wide area. After they had satisfied themselves in their exploratory efforts, then they were given, for a price, the right to select an area they could develop. They were given a lease on that area and nothing else, a lease which could be revoked at any time if the company did not fulfil every jot and tittle of the terms of the agreement.

The ownership of these resources stayed, and still remains, in the hands of the Alberta government. After the development took place, if the companies found oil or gas they began immediately to pay a top royalty to the government of the province. The starting point—at least when I had anything to do with the policy—was around 12½ per cent. It has been raised now until the average over the province is 14·1 per cent. The ownership of these resources remains in the crown, in the hands of the people of the province of Alberta. The rates for leases or royalties or rentals can be adjusted at any time after due notice has been given of that intention by the government of the province. At various times the government has made such adjustments in the rentals, royalty rates and so on.

These resources are, therefore, still in the hands of Alberta, and they have not been sold out to anybody. Let me just remind the hon. member for Vegreville and others that in the course of inviting people into the province for the purpose of developing these resources, I recall quite well that when certain leases on crown lands were thrown open for auction—not ownership of the land or the property but merely the right to drill and develop, subsurface rights—a corporation called, I think, the Saskatchewan Co-operative Refineries came in and competed with all other competitors for a certain parcel of land. They got it for a price. They proceeded to drill. I understand since that they struck oil, and that oil has been sent through a pipe line to Regina and is being refined there.

Is that selling out to the big people? I remember quite well that when I was in Saskatchewan speaking at some meeting, the people were mad because Alberta made the Saskatchewan Co-operative meet competitors and pay too much for the right to drill on the property. They said: Just look what you did to our co-operative refinery here; you made them pay too much. Well, maybe they did, but I will tell you this. They paid it in competition with all others, and every one of them—small, intermediate and large—had a chance to bid on any properties that were thrown open for offers.

The hon. member for Vegreville went on and carefully protected himself by using this term two or three times. As reported at page 2399 of Hansard he said:

> My submission—and I challenge the hon. member for Lethbridge to disprove this—is that since the discovery of the Leduc field at least 75 per cent of the proven oil reserves in that province—and it may be as high as 90 per cent—are not in the hands of Albertans, not in the hands of Canadians, but in the hands of foreign corporations.

The hon. member for Lethbridge challenged him on two or three different occasions.

> Mr. Blackmore: I want the hon. member to tell us what he means by being "in the hands of." What do you mean by being "in the hands of?"

It is all very well to say "in the hands of", but what does he mean by that phrase?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The Social Credit government of Alberta.

Mr. Knowles: Too much oil.

Mr. Low: Yes, Mr. Chairman; too much oil and gas. If the hon. member for Vegreville meant that the right to drill and to develop the subsurface property in any area is within the hands of large companies or intermediate companies or individuals from the United States and other countries, perhaps he is right. I do not know.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I meant control, for the information of the hon. member.

Mr. Low: I am glad the hon. member has said "control", because now I have him just where I want him. I thought he would bite before we got through. As a matter of fact I am somewhat in the position of the hon. member for Cape Breton South a little while ago, in spanking somebody here in this chamber. If my memory serves me correctly, it was the same hon. member. He said at the time that the hon. member for Vegreville has not been here very long; he is sort of adolescent, and is new to this political game.

Mr. Knowles: A tenderfoot.

Mr. Low: He tends to get himself into serious trouble every now and again. I thought the hon. member for Vegreville would have known better than to jump in with a foolish statement like the one he made the other night, because on two or three occasions he has made foolish statements and the hon. member for Red Deer has drubbed the daylights out of him. I thought he had learned something, but apparently he has not done so. In all kindliness I say to him that I think it is time he began to grow up just a little bit. When he says "control by foreign companies", I say that is absolute tommyrot.

The only control exercised over the resources of that province, which are in the hands of the provincial government today and which were in the hands of the provincial government in 1935, is by the provincial government of Alberta and nobody else. They control the leases, the rentals and the rates of royalties. They draw the contracts. It is they who can change those contracts. It is they who see to it that every term of the contract they make with any company is lived up to fully; and if it is not, the contract is cancelled. Any time the province of Alberta, through the conservation board, feels that it is desirable in the interests of conserving the resources to deal with the oil or gas in any of these wells, they can do so, or even the pipe lines or gathering systems or any one of them. Who controls them? Yet we have the hon. member for Vegreville, a lawyer, a man who has had a chance to study the use of explicit language, getting up and making a foolish statement like that. I think he ought to go back to school and learn some more law, particularly how to describe, in terms that are exact, just exactly what he means.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that nobody controls those resources except the government of the province of Alberta; and they will continue to control them. For the benefit of the hon. member for Vegreville—who, by the way, probably was not born then—in 1935, when we first went into office in the province of Alberta, we found that when the federal government turned back the resources to our province in 1931 approximately 50 per cent of all the subsurface rights, subsurface minerals and wealth, had been alienated from the crown by deeds of gifts to various and sundry people including some close friends of certain governments.

Mr. Blackmore: At Ottawa.

Mr. Low: Yes, of governments at Ottawa. They had been alienated by deeds of gifts to companies like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Hudson's Bay Company and others, leaving, I am told, just less than 50 per cent of those subsurface rights in the province of Alberta. In 1935, when the government that is now in office in Alberta, namely the Social Credit government, went in, it began laying down a specific policy and it said this. Those resources that remain in the hands of the crown that have not been alienated by previous governments, we will preserve and keep as crown lands; and from that day to this they have been called crown lands. Not a single foot of them has been given away or alienated from the crown since that time. There are certain lands there that are called freehold lands that were alienated, as I have already told you, and on those lands the province of Alberta has nothing much to say about the subsurface rights, with the one exception. In 1936 and 1937 we made a survey of the whole situation in the province and found that it was possible to apply a reasonable taxation to those mineral rights on freehold lands; and the government of the province of Alberta applied a reasonable tax on those lands.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, the farmer gets no interest or no value at all.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, the next time these private bills come up for discussion the hon. member from up in the north country will get his answer, I suppose. However, I want to complete this statement. I see it is about nine o'clock. As I said, when it was discovered by the province that they could apply a reasonable tax to the mineral resources on freehold lands, they did so. But that is the extent to which the government of any province can interfere with freehold mineral rights. As to the other rights—that is, those mineral rights on crown land—there has been laid down a definite policy of development, and that policy of development is adjusted to keep the control and ownership solely in the hands of the government; and no one else has any control whatever.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 205, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: The first five sections have been carried. We will now proceed with section 6.

On section 6—New property deemed substituted.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain the purpose of this section, and indicate whether it is a relaxation clause or whether it plugs a loophole.

Mr. Abbott: It plugs a loophole. The suggestion has been made that if the property substituted for the taxable property for which the provision is made in section 22 has been substituted a second time, it might escape the provisions of the act. That was never intended, and this is to make it clear that substituted property means property which is substituted down through a series of substitutions.

Mr. Knowles: No matter how many substitutions?

Mr. Abbott: Correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Medical expenses.

Mr. Knowles: This is the section that relates to the deduction for medical expenses. It provides one or two changes from the basis previously in existence, notably in that it raises the ceiling in two respects, and also makes a slight change in the wording of the preliminary part.

The wording as it now stands requires that, in order to be deductible, medical expenses must be both incurred and paid within a twelve month period ending in the taxation year. From now on it will be possible to claim those expenses, even though they are only paid within such a twelve months period. That change is a welcome one. It does not solve some of the problems I have suggested from time to time, particularly in the case of those who are faced with bills so heavy that it might take them two or three years to pay them off. Nevertheless this is some improvement and, because it is in that direction, it is helpful.

However, while I am on this section I feel I should say a few more words concerning the refusal of the minister to consider at this session the removal of the 4 per cent floor. This afternoon during the debate on second reading he indicated that he had considered the matter again, after my motion of March 26 was passed by the house, but he still felt that he could not conscientiously recommend the abolition of this provision. I believe I am representing faithfully what he said if I say he bases his position with respect to the removal of the floor on the ground that 4 per cent of one's income is the ordinary or average amount a taxpayer spends on medical expenses. If that is so, I take it that it is his contention that there is no great advantage in providing relief to everyone which, in turn, has to be made up by charging those same people taxation in some other form so as to make up for the relief given.

The fallacy in the minister's position is that it is based on the concept of averages. It is one thing to say that the people of Canada spend on an average 4 per cent of their incomes on medical expenses, but it is quite a different thing to say that makes it an ordinary amount which everyone in Canada is paying. If the minister could claim that 4 per cent of one's income is an amount everyone actually pays, then I would say there is some point in his argument. He could claim that since everyone pays 4 per cent of income for medical expenses, the fair thing would be to provide tax relief for those who have to pay more than that floor which everyone has paid. But this 4 per cent figure trotted out as the average amount that people spend is not a floor; it is only an average.

There are many fortunate people in Canada who in the course of a year get by without spending as much as 4 per cent of their income on medical expenses. There will be some extremely fortunate people who get by in a year without spending anything on medical expenses. It may be that those who are fortunate one year will not be so fortunate another year. Part of what the minister said is correct, namely that medical expenses sooner or later catch up with all of us, but not every one of us every year. Again, thinking of all of us, in our lives as a whole, there is an average amount paid. But no one is right at that average point. And it is because of the wide variation between those who have to spend nothing at all on medical expenses and those who are called upon to spend large amounts, that it seems to me the 4 per cent figure for deductibility is unfair.

The minister may say I have admitted that those who are fortunate enough in one year not to have medical expenses do have them in another year. All right; let the income tax arrangements provide relief in the years when one does have medical expenses, and let the taxpayer forgo any such relief in the years when he is fortunate enough not to have those expenses.

There are other aspects of the matter I could discuss, but since we have brought this matter to the attention of the minister time and again, I shall not go into it at greater length this evening. In a sentence or two I would urge that the minister should remember that his definition of medical expenses does not include many things entering into the cost of an illness. That is another reason why, with that restricted definition, I feel there should be no floor at all. But the main basis upon which some of us rest our case for the abolition of the 4 per cent floor is as I have stated, that the 4 per cent figure the minister is using is merely an average; it is not a floor.

What one must consider is that people have these tremendous variations. I hope the minister will even yet reconsider this position and make some change. I feel so strongly that the floor should be abolished altogether that I dislike suggesting any compromise by way of reducing it; but I would rather see it at, let us say, 3 per cent, 2 per cent or 1 per cent than to remain at 4 per cent. At any rate I still hope the minister will do something about the matter at this stage.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, as I have said on former occasions, I too feel that the floor should have been abolished. I was interested this afternoon in the minister's remarks. I feel he is sincere in his contention that a certain floor is equivalent to ordinary expenses, or what he calls ordinary living expenses.

Mr. Knowles: Medical expenses.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister called it ordinary living expenses. I feel there is a point that has probably been overlooked right along. Wherever you have even small expenses with regard to illness there are always extraordinary expenses to be met in the home. Those expenses cannot be called ordinary living expenses. They may be due to the need of extra help, to the necessity of buying luxury foods in order to tempt the ill person to eat, or they may be due to the necessity of travelling to the hospital or wherever the ill person may be. I contend, as I have contended previously, that these expenses amount to far more than the 4 per cent of income which the minister contends is reasonable for the average taxpayer to assume for medical expenses.

I do not wish to belabour this point because I have spoken on it on several occasions and I am sure the committee is quite familiar with my views; but in proposing the amendments to the act I think the minister might very well have made 26 (b) read, "an amount equal to the medical expenses paid either by the taxpayer or by his legal representative."

Most of us are faced with ordinary medical expenses, and I think we all realize that when severe medical expenses must be met any concession is of value. I urge the minister now, as I have on previous occasions, to reconsider this matter carefully and take into consideration the fact that in the last few years living costs have advanced to the point where former considerations are no longer current. We have passed from the era of a few years ago when taxes were low, when exemptions were higher and when the average family faced with illness did not have to contend with the high cost of the services rendered or of the medical supplies that might have to be procured. Under these circumstances I feel that despite the hours that have been spent on this point by the committee, and I am sure also by the department, too little consideration has been given to it.

There is another point in connection with section 7 to which I should like to speak at this time. This was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary East. I refer to the employment of full-time help in a home where illness occurs. This is covered by section 26 (b) (iv) and (v) where deductions are allowed for the expense of employing a full-time attendant for persons who are ill or who are totally disabled or blind.

Mr. Abbott: I suppose my hon. friend is aware of section 26 (b) (iv)?

Mrs. Fairclough: I have not yet reached the point. I am making a comparison between the home which has lost its housekeeper, let us say, either through illness of the housekeeper herself or through her employment in order to earn a livelihood for her family because of the illness of the normal breadwinner in the home. The government has recognized that under certain circumstances deductions should be allowed for the cost of a full-time attendant for a person necessarily confined by reason of illness, injury or affliction to a bed or wheelchair. Then in the next paragraph reference is made to the remuneration for a full-time attendant upon a taxpayer who is totally blind.

That being so, the government should also give consideration to the household which has been deprived of the person who normally keeps house and takes care of the children in that home, either by reason of the illness of that person or the illness of the breadwinner in that home as a result of which the normal homemaker is obliged to seek some sort of employment which will provide her with the means of sustaining her family.

For that reason I support the contention which has been put forward in this committee, especially this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary East, that a deduction should be allowed for the remuneration of one full-time attendant required under these circumstances.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I find myself in full agreement with the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not wish to delay the committee because I have mentioned this matter before. I urge the Minister of Finance and the government to reconsider their position on this matter. I cannot understand their attitude with reference to it. I think it will be admitted that the whole committee is in favour of the elimination of this floor.

In these days when we are talking about social welfare, the welfare state, the necessity of doing so much for so many, surely this exemption is highly justified. If an hon. member wishes to contribute to a hospital he may deduct that contribution for income tax purposes. We are talking about establishing health programs and so on, and I do submit that the cost of illness within the family should be exempt from income tax. I do not think there should be a floor under that exemption.

I am sure we all know of many families who have suffered terrific losses. We must know of young men and young women with small families who have had their plans interrupted, who have had to give up business enterprises, who have been stalled and stymied, who have had their whole lives changed because the wife or husband has been seriously impaired by illness. As the hon. member for Hamilton West says, it is not only the cost of the illness that bears so heavily, it is the complications that are involved in such illness. I would go even further and say that any person who is generous enough to contribute toward the cost of illness in another family is just as much entitled to exemption for income tax purposes with respect to such payment as if he had made a contribution to a hospital. Therefore I urge that the Minister of Finance reconsider his position. I know he is a sympathetic and kindly natured gentleman.

Mr. Gibson: Be careful.

Mr. Stick: The elections are over now.

Mr. Rowe: One of his supporters says the elections are over. They are not over yet. There will be more coming, and some important ones. Coming events cast their shadows before, and if you started to dream last night about the future you should have seen shadows of dangers to come unless you listen to the opposition, which evidently is more popular than you are at the present time. I do not want to embarrass the government. If I had been here last night I might have been impelled to embarrass them, but tonight I feel there is always a calm after the storm. I have seen the hilarious attitude of government supporters when they won one by-election, but they will observe the Conservative quiet when we win four or five.

Mr. Sinnott: You should have been here at three o'clock today.

Mr. Rowe: I am not disturbed by these rumblings. They are the anguish of pain rather than rejoicing. I am not going to chide the Minister of Finance about his misfortunes. He knows them better than I do, but in all seriousness I urge the government to reconsider their position with respect to this matter. Like every other hon. member, no matter how long or short a time he has been in the house, I have had experience with the troubles of our constituents. Whether or not they are our supporters they come to us if we are in public life, and we sympathize with those who suffer from illness. I say again that I cannot see why the cost of illness should not be exempt from income tax without a floor. I think of labouring men who have been embarrassed by having to accept assistance from municipalities, women who have had cancer, children who have had tuberculosis, children with infantile paralysis.

Strange as it may seem, unfortunately I believe it is a fact that the percentage of illness is greater among those who can least afford it financially. I feel that if the Minister of Finance wished to help some unfortunate family in Dufferin-Simcoe his contribution should be exempt from income tax just as much as if he made a contribution to a hospital in Montreal, or a hospital in Toronto. I think it is only sound, and I urge in all sincerity that the minister reconsider his position. He is aware of the support this proposal has had from all corners of the house. If a proposal for health insurance or a welfare state has anything except a popular appeal for political purposes, then surely the exemption of contributions to the cost of illness is merited in the case of those who may wish to assist not only their own families but, if they are fortunate to have no illness in their own families, to assist other families. I think it should be carried that far. It should be just as legitimate and sound to exempt such contributions from income tax as if a person gave $5,000 to a hospital, for which he is exempted from income tax.

I am not going to detain the committee further except to say that to my mind the proposal is sound from every angle. From the way the house supported the resolution before it earlier in the session, I believe it is wholeheartedly in favour of the proposal. Therefore I urge the Minister of Finance to reconsider his position not because there is any political aspect to this proposal but because it has a sympathetic touch, economic soundness and humanitarian logic that no one can deny.

Mr. Abbott: There is not very much I can add to what I said this afternoon, but I was interested to hear my hon. friend say that he supported the proposals made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Knowing his views I was particularly surprised, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quite properly said that when one suggests a loss of revenue, in this case of from $48 million to $50 million, one should suggest an alternative means of raising it, and he suggested an increase in the corporation income taxes. I was not quite clear whether my hon. friend was supporting that portion of the suggestion.

Mr. Croll: He endorsed it in full.

Mr. Abbott: I think he endorsed it in full.

Mr. Rowe: I might add that I happen to be the head of a little corporation from which the government now takes 56·4 per cent, and there is very little left. However, I will quite readily agree to take as much more as is needed to make up the balance in order to help people who are ill.

Mr. Abbott: I wonder if my hon. friend's directors would confirm that statement.

Mrs. Fairclough: I submit that the minister has yet to substantiate his claim that it will cost $48 million to $50 million.

Mr. Abbott: There is one matter I should raise in answer to a point brought up by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. The proposal to entirely exempt medical expenses from income tax only gives relief to income tax payers so far as medical expenses are concerned. There are a great many wage earners in this country who, by reason of marital exemption and so on, do not pay any income tax. I think it is quite proper that a wealthy man like the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe should make a contribution to the Toronto hospital and that I should make a more modest one to the Montreal hospital in order to assist those people in our communities who, by reason of lack of income, are not able to pay their medical expenses, and who perhaps are not income tax payers.

Mr. Rowe: Thanks for the compliment. I did not have enough left to contribute to them.

Mr. Noseworthy: Following the line of argument the minister has just advanced, the very fact that there are a great many wage earners in Canada, who, because they do not pay income tax—

Mr. Abbott: About half of them.

Mr. Noseworthy: —would not derive any benefit from the abolition of the 4 per cent floor, is in my opinion no good reason for retaining it for those who do pay income tax. The reason that half the people in Canada today have no health insurance and no protection against sickness is that the Liberal government, which has been promising health insurance since 1919, has failed to keep its promise.

Mr. Abbott: Do we have to debate health insurance tonight, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Noseworthy: Because of that fact the people of Canada today have no protection against sickness. That being the case, I would say it is all the more argument why the minister should relent with respect to the position he has taken. As the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe pointed out, it is granted that the minister may lose a few million dollars, but we in this group have pointed out how the minister can make up that loss.

Mr. Abbott: You have the support of Dufferin-Simcoe now, too.

Mr. Croll: And the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Noseworthy: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has offered the minister an alternative. He has said that as far as he is concerned he is quite willing to support higher taxation of corporations in order to offset the revenue—

Mr. Gibson: How naive can you be?

Mr. Noseworthy: —that would be wiped out by the elimination of the 4 per cent floor on medical expenses. What is more important, if the minister refuses to wipe out the whole 4 per cent I would urge that he at least consider a compromise. A man in the $3,000 income bracket must have a medical bill of $120 before he can get any relief at all. A man in the $2,000 income bracket must have $80. That is about as much as the ordinary working class people can ever afford for health and medical bills. If their bills are larger than that they will have to go into debt or go without medical service. They will have to keep away from the hospital when they need it. Even a reduction of 2 per cent would be some relief.

Then there is this further point. I doubt whether any measure that has ever come before this parliament has had more popular support throughout the country than the motion which this house unanimously adopted to eliminate the 4 per cent clause. These are the people who are concerned. The people who pay the taxes are quite ready to see that 4 per cent wiped out. I urge the minister to let this clause stand for the time being and give it further consideration. If he is not willing to wipe out the entire 4 per cent, then compromise and wipe out 2 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: I was hoping the minister would agree to that request to let the clause stand.

Mr. Croll: Why?

Mr. Abbott: I have given it the fullest consideration, as I said this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: I was hoping that a little further thought might result in the minister changing his mind. After all, some progress has been made. He did get the support of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in connection with the proposal I made. Surely the minister should not expect everybody else to make moves and for him to make no move at all. The house expressed its view on this matter on my motion of March 26. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe is prepared to pay more taxes to make up any extra cost, and I suggest in all seriousness that this indicates the attitude of people generally toward this whole problem.

I indicated when I was on my feet earlier that I feel so strongly the floor should be wiped out altogether that I hesitate to suggest a compromise. But I said before, and my colleague the hon. member for York South has repeated it, that if the minister is not prepared to go all the way and wipe out the floor, surely he should reconsider reducing it to 2 per cent, or to a nominal figure of 1 per cent. I admit if he did that I would introduce a motion next year to wipe that out, but it would be progress in the right direction. If he is not prepared to consider that compromise may I ask him to consider another one that was sent to him—at least, I trust it came to his attention—from the Windsor chamber of commerce. That body on May 13, 1952, addressed a letter which I believe was sent to all members of parliament, in which they enclosed copies of a number of resolutions on taxation matters, and one of them related to this question of the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

The specific suggestion made by the Windsor chamber of commerce was that the 4 per cent relate not to the total income of the taxpayer but to the taxable income. The minister realizes that this would lower the basic amount that the 4 per cent would produce, because the $3,000 taxpayer, to whom my colleague the hon. member for York South was just referring, must at the present time spend $120 before he starts to get any benefit from it. If on the other hand he was a married man with $2,000 exemption his taxable income would be $1,000 and 4 per cent of that would be $40. As a matter of fact, in the resolution submitted by the Windsor chamber of commerce a couple of examples were worked out, showing that such a change would be of greater benefit to those in the lower brackets. Those in the lower brackets in many instances would find their position improved doubly; whereas those in the upper brackets would find the relative improvement much less.

I can say with respect to that the same as I said with respect to lowering the floor to 2 per cent or 1 per cent, namely that it is only a compromise. It is, however, a move in the direction of wiping out the floor altogether, and I very strongly feel that should be done. But I wonder if as a compromise the minister has considered either of those proposals: reducing the floor to a lower percentage, or the proposal contained in the resolution of the Windsor chamber of commerce which was addressed to the Minister of Finance and, I presume, submitted to him.

Mr. Abbott: I considered those proposals and, as I indicated this afternoon, I considered whether the 4 per cent figure should be lower, but I came to the conclusion that it should not be at this time. The proposals which are made in this section that is now before the committee represent the maximum which I am prepared to recommend at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister comment on the point raised by the Windsor chamber of commerce?

Mr. Abbott: It is exactly the same proposal that is made by the hon. member for York South. In effect it is reducing the 4 per cent, and the principle on which the 4 per cent is based is that it represents the average expenditure by a person of his total income on medical expenses. And as I said before, the principle on which this section is based is that no ordinary expenditures should be paid out of income before taxes. It is only exceptional or unusual expenses, and the logic and the reason behind the provision in the act is that it is only expenditures that are in excess of this national average that are unusual or exceptional medical expenses.

Mr. Knowles: We will try again next year.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): This brings to mind that all hon. members are anxious to assist those who are in distress, the widows, the orphans, the poor; but a time will come when this house will have to decide between Marxian socialism, the gospel of Karl Marx, and that of common sense.

The Chairman: Order. The various doctrines to which the hon. member has referred are not included in the clause under study, therefore I do not think he should refer to them.

On section 8—Dividends not deductible.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Clause 8 is highly technical. I wonder whether the minister will explain in a general way what is behind the deduction and also refer to the limitations that are introduced.

Mr. Abbott: There are a number of subsections here which relate to different matters, as the explanatory note indicates. The first, that is subsection 1, is a relieving provision. It extends the provisions under which a corporation receiving dividends from another corporation may deduct such dividends in computing taxable income to include dividends from certain foreign business corporations. There are not very many of these, but the situation needed correcting. I shall ask to have an amendment moved in a moment to make part of the section effective from 1950. As I say, it is a relieving section. We have had representations from tax foundations and others that this should be made effective from 1950, when the section first came into force. We have looked into it. We feel sure there can be no possibility of abuse, and before the section passes I shall ask that these subsections be made applicable from 1950.

The subsections referred to relate to the block provision which was inserted in the act when we enacted section 95 (a) permitting the payment of a 15 per cent rate on accumulated surplus, and was put there in order to prevent the transfer of surplus of one corporation to another corporation and thereby avoid the payment of tax on this accumulation.

These subsections, which are long and rather technical, are intended, as the explanatory note explains, to clear up an anomaly in the present law where shares of a company have rights to dividends upon winding up which differ from those existing prior to winding up. It is to take care of shares nominally known as class A, class B or some other type of share, which has different rights, depending upon whether distribution is made while the company is in existence or whether distribution is made when the company is being wound up.

I am reminded that the hon. member asked for this or a similar provision last year. I told him that consideration would be given to it, and the officers of my department have studied the matter in the meantime. This long and rather involved section is the result of that examination. The main section, as the committee appreciates, is a loophole section. It is a section to prevent the avoidance of tax, but these amendments are to make sure that in certain special cases such as I have indicated, there will not be any unfair operation of the section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the last subsection—

Mr. Abbott: I am not speaking about subsection 4 now. I should have covered that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is that subsection I wanted to ask about.

Mr. Abbott: That again is a technical section; it is a relieving section. The hon. member will recall that one is allowed to offset losses, but the effect of this section is that the corporation must have owned the share 365 days or longer before the loss was sustained, and the corporation must not, at the time the dividend was received, have owned more than 5 per cent of the issued share capital of the corporation.

The committee is aware that it is possible for what is known as a trading company, trading in securities, to deduct losses on securities from its income, whether that income is derived from profits on securities or from interest and dividends. I am informed this is a relieving provision.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How is the 5 per cent determined?

Mr. Abbott: It is 5 per cent of the issued share capital. It is just to make sure there is not any semblance of control of the corporation from which the dividend is received.

Perhaps my colleague would move the following amendment:

That subclause 6 of section 8 of Bill No. 205 be amended by deleting the figures "1952" therein and substituting therefor the figures "1950."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Croll: How will that clause read with the amendment?

The Chairman: It will read as folows:

Subsections two and three are applicable, where the receiving corporation acquired control of the payer corporation after May 10, 1950, to the 1950 and subsequent and taxation years.

Shall the amendment carry?

Sections 9 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Election.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This section provides that section 39 is to be amended by adding section 39A, and it appears that this section 39A is amending section 20 and seems to deal entirely with the subject matter of section 20. Why is it attached to section 39?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that it is not attached. It would appear to be the appropriate place to put it because it just precedes the division which relates to returns, assessments, payments and appeals. It is under the heading "Rules applicable to all taxpayers", and as the explanatory note indicates it extends the spreadback allowance to corporations as well as to individuals.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Where property owned for non-resident persons.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find that section 17 (4A) reads:

Where all the property of a trust is owned by the trustee for the benefit of non-resident persons or their unborn issue—

Will the minister explain how that arises?

Mr. Abbott: There are certain trusts the beneficiaries of which are non-resident persons, and which receive income from non-resident owned investment companies. The hon. member will recall that these companies are taxed on their income at a special rate but the dividends are exempt from tax, so this section is designed to prevent double taxation on those revenues.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Armed forces regulations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How is this section actually going to work out?

Mr. Abbott: This is the new system of taxation with respect to the armed forces which was introduced last year. The committee will recall that, speaking very generally, the pay and allowances of the armed forces were considered as though they were completely separate income from anything else. Provisions were worked out with allowances for charitable deductions and so on, deductions were established, and a soldier had no further obligation to file any income tax return. The system has been well liked by the armed forces, but as the legal members in the committee will appreciate there were some very serious technical difficulties involved. The officials of national revenue, the armed forces and my department have been trying to get this system codified, but frankly up to the present time we have not been able to do it.

This section gives a discretionary power to establish regulations setting out these details. The alternative would have been to abandon the privilege entirely, which no one wanted to do. The section sets out the principles upon which the tax is to be assessed. The regulations, which I hope we shall have ready within the next month or two though

I shall not make any firm promise on that, will be tabled and published as soon as they are available. I would propose to incorporate the rules which are set out in these regulations in the act next year when they are ready. This is an interim provision to enable the system to be carried on this year until we can work out the full details of the system. The principles are well established, but there are so many quirks that we have not been able to get them all spelled out in detail.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—If personal corporation's chief source of income neither farming nor combination of, etc.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister give us an explanation of this section?

Mr. Abbott: This is a loophole section again. By reason of the description of a personal corporation it might be possible for one of these hobby or gentleman farmers to incorporate a company, put the farm in the company and put enough securities in the company to pay the full loss on the farm. In that way he could circumvent the provisions of the section we discussed earlier, that such losses should be limited to $5,000 or half the loss, whichever is the greater.

Sections 20 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Mining companies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am trying to tie this section in with the budget resolution. Section 74 (1) (b) reads:

> An industrial mineral mine certified by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to have been operating on mineral deposits (other than bedded deposits except sylvite)...

Will the minister explain that amendment and tell us how it ties into the resolution on which it is based?

Mr. Abbott: It is extending the period within which mines may qualify for the new three-year exemption. Sylvite, I am informed, is potash and is a special type of mineral which I am informed is obtained at present in Saskatchewan at considerable depth. That is not to be included under the heading of bedded deposits.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The result of this amendment is that you exclude all the so-called bedded deposits except this one.

Mr. Abbott: Except potash; that is correct.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to ask the minister a question under this heading. I do not know whether it is quite in order because these are mining deductions. On item 1, I should like to ask if it is possible under the present law for a lumber company or persons promoting sylviculture to make arrangements to receive exemptions for money expended for future generations?

Mr. Abbott: I am speaking offhand, but I think it would be for roads or that sort of thing. But it would have to be governed by the general rule that the expenditure was wholly or necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. There would also have to be the usual distinctions between what was an expenditure to get revenue and what was a capital expenditure.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Application of part to crown corporations.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the meaning of the new section 25 of the Income Tax Act? I presume that is the provision to help certain public utility companies. There seems to be some uncertainty as to what effect that will have in so far as the general public are concerned. For example, in Vancouver there has been a question as to whether the British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited should reduce its transit fares by reason of receiving this income tax benefit. Judging from the press reports no one is clear as to whether or not that will be the effect. It would be helpful if the minister could give some explanation of the way in which this amendment will benefit the general public.

Mr. Abbott: It is a little difficult to do that except in general terms, as my hon. friend will appreciate. The net effect of this section will be that the effective rate of income tax on the earnings of certain corporations from certain types of activity—that is, the generation, distribution and sale for delivery in Canada of electrical energy, gas and steam—will be taxed at that rate, but only the earnings from that portion of its activities. If a company were carrying on varied activities—running a railway, running a street railway line, running a mine and doing a lot of other things—it is only the earnings from these particular activities which will be subject to the reduced rate of tax. The reduction is for the reasons I gave in my budget speech, which I do not suppose I need repeat here. The effect would be different with respect to different companies. Broadly speaking it parallels the provision which the committee will recall was contained in our general offer to the provinces in connection with the tax rental agreements, namely that we remit to the provinces one-half of our tax revenues from these sources. That was accepted as being the test. It was the same group of earnings that we considered should be subject to this special rate. The rate can be down to 43 per cent; I am now speaking over-all.

Mr. Green: The money which was turned over to the provinces under the previous scheme would, in effect, be the same as if they had taxed the companies.

Mr. Abbott: No; not quite that. We turn over half of our income. In other words, if we get $2 million, let us say for the sake of an example, from the electric earnings of the British Columbia Electric Company—I just use that as an example; I do not say that we get that amount—we would just turn over $1 million to the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Green: But in this particular case the British Columbia Electric Company will have to pay a smaller amount of taxes. In the earlier case it did not.

Mr. Abbott: Of course. The British Columbia Electric Company—taking that company as an example—would pay a 43 per cent rate on its sales to the public of electricity, gas or steam. It is quite obvious that since we were turning over half of whatever we got from that company, the amount which would be turned over to the province of British Columbia would be somewhat reduced.

Mr. Green: I am not worrying about the amount that would be turned over to the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Abbott: I know that.

Mr. Green: What worries me is whether the people who have to pay for this light and gas will be entitled to any reduction in their rates.

Mr. Abbott: I could not express any opinion on that matter until I saw what the amount of the tax saving, if any, amounted to. I suppose it would be a matter to be taken into account by the public utilities board of British Columbia which fixes the rates of these companies. That was one of the reasons which prompted this rather modest and temporary—I hope and believe—tax concession. It was thought that it might prevent some further applications for rate increases in this type of concern.

Mr. Green: I am glad the minister has made this point clear because from his statement in his budget speech what it was taken to mean, or what I believe the company is arguing, is that this was for the purpose of enabling the company to raise money more readily than it had been doing, and that there was nothing to be passed on to the general public.

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter for the company to fight out, of course, with any rate-regulating body. The essential thing is that any privately-owned public utility must be in a position to raise a portion of the capital it needs for expansion, as equity capital; and it can only do so if it is able to show a reasonably good earnings record. Otherwise it cannot. I think it is generally recognized that it is unsound to have a capital structure—in the case of public utilities or in that of any other company—which is top heavy so far as borrowed capital is concerned. The question as to whether the earnings on equity capital are so great that they justify rate reductions or are so low that they justify rate increases is a matter for the regulating bodies; for the provincial rate-regulating body if it is a utility under provincial jurisdiction, or for the board of transport commissioners if it happens to be a utility that is subject to the jurisdiction of that board.

Mr. Green: But this reduction will in effect result in greater income to these companies?

Mr. Abbott: It should result in greater net income. How much more I am not in a position to say.

Mr. Green: It will result in greater net income; and as far as the minister is concerned, there is in the section nothing which would prevent the companies from giving lower rates.

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter that is entirely within the control of the companies and the rate-regulating bodies. It is not in my control.

Mrs. Fairclough: This clause will have a tendency to bring more nearly into line the activities of privately-owned utility corporations and those of publicly-owned corporations, I presume.

Mr. Abbott: It is bound to have that tendency.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is just one step. It is a small step, but nevertheless it helps.

Mr. Abbott: That is true. The turning back of half the earnings to the province has a similar effect, of course.

Mrs. Fairclough: Although it is no concern of this government, you still have the taxes that are paid by privately-owned corporations to municipalities and to provincial bodies and so on.

Mr. Abbott: That is true.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This section 25 is stated to be giving effect to paragraph 6 of the resolution.

Mr. Abbott: And paragraph 10.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. I am reading paragraph 6 for the moment, which says that crown corporations shall pay tax on income earned. Where are the operative words to be found? As I read section 74A, I wonder whether it is a follow-through from some previous wording in the act which controls. I do not find any operative words there.

Mr. Abbott: Subsection 2 says:

Paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 57 of the said act does not apply to a corporation specified in schedule D to The Financial Administration Act.

Section 57 (1) (d) is the section which now exempts them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One other question. Section 74A (3) says that when the company makes a fresh start and is beginning business as a taxable corporation its capital cost is to be the book value at the commencement of that year.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, for the purpose of calculating capital cost allowances in the future.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But supposing the book value is different from the real value; what happens then?

Mr. Abbott: That is true of any corporation, is it not?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. Perhaps my question is academic, and if so I shall not pursue it. However, the minister says it is to be the book value. Book value sometimes has reserves set up against it, and so on, and may be quite different from true value.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, except all these crown corporations have been under government audit since they were started, and it seemed appropriate to take the value at which they are now carried on the books as the value which should be used for depreciation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It may be the practice is such that no inconvenience will arise; but it occurred to me that, as a statement without any further explanation, it could amount to an unreal situation.

Mr. Abbott: We can take a look at it. I would not think it would cause any serious difficulty; but if it did we could correct it.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

On section 26—Disposal of appeal.

Mr. Croll: I would ask the minister to give me his views concerning section 26. I have particular reference to paragraph (c) in which it refers to "allowing it", and to "restoring the assessment". What is the significance of that?

Mr. Abbott: That is the case where the income tax appeal board would have set aside an assessment, and the exchequer court may restore the assessment.

Mr. Croll: It is an appeal by the government, in other words?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, the minister's appeal.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Application.

Mr. Croll: That is new, is it not?

Mr. Abbott: That part of it is new, yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 28 to 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Mining or exploring for minerals.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The explanation states that this clause also implements paragraph 7 of the resolution and provides a revised working to bring this allowance into conformity with that granted to the petroleum industry. What is the meaning of the reference to a revised wording?

Mr. Abbott: I am told it is in the same language as section 53, which is a section we pass annually and does not form a permanent part of the act, with respect to the petroleum industry generally.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, TO GIVE POWER TO BOARD TO BORROW FROM MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 275, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Member of board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister any comments to make on this section?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think so. The explanatory note is clear.

Mr. Gibson: Has the minister ever given consideration to similar legislation for the fishing industry?

Mr. Abbott: There is similar legislation. The Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act is the corresponding legislation.

Mr. Gibson: Does the volume of business under that act compare in any way with that in connection with farm loans?

Mr. Abbott: There has not been much lent under it.

Mr. Gibson: It has not been pressed to the same degree.

Mr. Abbott: It is a good bit newer.

Mr. Gibson: But the need is there.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps so.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Initial capital.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What amount has been raised by the issue of bonds?

Mr. Abbott: When the board borrows from the government or the public it issues bonds. As shown by the report tabled for the year ended March 31, 1951, bonds outstanding amount to $18,700,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And those are bonds of the farm loan board, guaranteed?

Mr. Abbott: No, they are just bonds of the farm loan board. It is a straight crown agency. It is just the form in which the promise to pay is given.

Mr. Quelch: Who holds the bonds?

Mr. Abbott: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Quelch: What is the interest rate?

Mr. Abbott: The interest rate on both series D and E is 3 per cent. I will see if I have a more up-to-date figure.

Mr. Quelch: What are the present rates charged for farm loans?

Mr. Abbott: Five per cent on first mortgage and 5½ per cent on second mortgage loans.

Mr. Bryce: This provision is to double the amount?

Mr. Abbott: It is to give an increase in the amount as I indicated the other evening.

Mr. Bryce: Where there was provision to borrow $5,000 I understand $10,000 can now be borrowed?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; and where it was $6,000 it goes to $12,000.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The minister has mentioned the fact that there is similar legislation for fishermen. Is that administered by the federal government or by the provincial legislature.

Mr. Abbott: By the federal government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would like to ask the minister what the difference would be if the board should borrow, as compared with a direct government obligation?

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend mean the spread between the rate at which the board borrows from the government and the interest rate paid by the borrower?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The explanatory note says that the board now raises money for lending by the issue of bonds.

Mr. Abbott: In the past the board has obtained its funds for loaning purposes by the sale to the Minister of Finance—this is in addition to capital which I need not go into—of its interest-bearing bonds. The amount of outstanding bonds so issued cannot at any time exceed twenty times the paid-up capital stock subscribed for by the government of Canada. The Minister of Finance is authorized to purchase such bonds, but may not hold in excess of $50 million at any one time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question is answered.

Mr. Abbott: The sole purpose of this section is to have the borrowing done through the Minister of Finance without going to the unnecessary trouble of issuing a formal bond. It is simply one form of evidence of indebtedness. Advances can be made on simple promissory notes, as is done in the case of other crown companies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I misread this. I was surprised to read it as meaning that the farm loan board had obligations in the hands of the public.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Security.

Mr. Lennard: In the past the advertising by the banks has not mentioned the amount that could be loaned, and in many cases this has caused confusion to farmers who have gone through the process of going to the bank and then finding that they could not receive as much as they required to finance the proposition they had in mind. If the department has any control over the advertising by the banks perhaps they could have them put in the maximum amount a person could borrow provided he had the value to support the loan. There may not be this trouble now that there has been an increase.

Mr. Abbott: I will see that my hon. friend's suggestion is brought to the attention of the board.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Advisory board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To what extent have these advisory boards been made use of, or has the work been left mainly to the operating officers?

Mr. Abbott: It has not been found practical to set up provincial advisory boards and they have never functioned. In reviewing the operations of the act it seemed sensible to create a national board on which would be a representative of each of the provinces. That board would examine lending conditions generally, lending policies and make recommendations and suggestions to the board.

Mr. Bryce: Would the farmers' organizations be represented, or would it be made up only of financial men?

Mr. Abbott: I would not want to tie myself down to any particular occupation, but I think the provincial representative should be someone conversant with the needs of farm financing in the province and who would give the board useful information and advice as to the procedure to be followed. He could be a farmer or even a lawyer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister considered whether this advisory board might not turn out to be a great nuisance? What are they really going to do? Obviously they are not going to consider the validity of this or that loan.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are they just going to talk about general conditions? Where are they going to sit, and when?

Mr. Abbott: That will have to be worked out. I would think we would arrange to have meetings of such a board once or twice a year. It is not the sort of board that would need to meet weekly or monthly or even quarterly. I think we will have to proceed on the basis of trial and error. There will be no salaries attached to the board, though there will probably be some travelling expenses.

Mr. Catherwood: The minister has suggested that there would be one representative from each province, but the section provides that the board shall consist of not less than five and not more than ten members.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Mr. Abbott: We shall have to see how it works out. The membership of ten would allow for one representative from each province.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The board has done a pretty good job without this advisory board, and I hope the minister will forget to appoint it.

Mr. Abbott: I have no strong views on it myself. It has been suggested by those who are charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the board that it might be helpful.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I point out to the minister what I understand was once said in a case at law, that nominal damages may mean very real costs. This absence of salaries is no guarantee that there may not be a lot of expenses.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to reiterate my objection to the advisory board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

SALARIES OF VICE-CHAIRMAN AND OTHER MEMBER OF BOARD

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 276, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say something about this?

Mr. Abbott: As was indicated during the resolution stage, this section is now covered by the Combines Investigation Act. There has been no necessity to invoke this provision in the Tariff Board Act, and in opening up the act we decided that it should be repealed.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to remark that this bill has just come into our hands.

While on its face it is a fairly innocuous looking document, nevertheless members of the house have had very little time to study it.

Mr. Abbott: It was distributed yesterday, anyway.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yesterday; and how many bills have we studied since yesterday? We have had very little opportunity to put any amount of study on it, and before the bill is given third reading—

Mr. Abbott: I have not the slightest objection. The motion requires unanimous consent, and I have no objection. Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West did not hear what the minister said. I asked whether the bill might be read a third time now by leave. If the hon. member for Hamilton West objects I will say that the bill will be read a third time at the next sitting of the house. Apparently that is her wish.

Mrs. Fairclough: Very well; I object.

Mr. Abbott: Next sitting.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 277, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I observe that the bill is in a form that follows the resolution of last evening. I thought the Secretary of State told us last night that it was to be amended. Am I right in thinking there is an amendment to be moved?

Mr. Bradley: No, the hon. member is not quite accurate. What I did last evening was to undertake to amend the section during the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Rank, powers, salary and tenure of office of chief electoral officer.

Mr. Bradley: Last night while in committee on the resolution I undertook to have an amendment made to section 1 of the bill under which the salary of the chief electoral officer would be set specifically at $12,000. I will now ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works to be good enough to move the necessary amendment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That the following words be struck out: "not less than eight nor more than" in the thirteenth line and "to be fixed by order of the governor in council" in the fourteenth and fifteenth lines.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think that amendment carries out exactly what I understood the Secretary of State to undertake, and I feel grateful to him. We objected strongly last night to this important official being left with his salary to be fixed by the governor in council. We discovered that it had been done in the past, but that did not make it any more palatable to us. Therefore I am grateful to the Secretary of State for this change, which I think carries out exactly what we asked.

NATIONAL LIBRARY

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT—APPOINTMENT OF NATIONAL LIBRARIAN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 245, respecting the establishment of a national library.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement in addition to what has already been placed before the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not intend to make a statement at this time. I shall be glad to answer any questions in the committee stage that I am in a position to answer. I think the reception this proposal received from the house at the resolution stage shows that there is nothing controversial about it and that all members of the house are happy that at least this initial step is being taken at this time, and are hopeful that further steps may not be too long delayed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister in a position to state what minister is contemplated as the minister who will deal with this act?

National Library

Mr. St. Laurent: At the present time the act will be under the administration of the Secretary of State. At some later stage another minister may be put in charge of this and other like activities of the Canadian government, but for the initial stages it is intended to have this measure, like the archives, under the administration of the Secretary of State.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—National librarian.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question really deals with sections 4 and 5. I should like to ask whether it is proposed to appoint a national librarian immediately and also an assistant national librarian.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is intended to appoint immediately as national librarian Dr. Lamb, who is now in charge of the archives, and to have him organize the preliminary steps. An assistant librarian would not necessarily be appointed immediately. That would be done as and when Dr. Lamb recommends that sufficient advance has been made to require the services of an assistant librarian.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will Dr. Lamb be able to retain his present position as archivist?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. I explained at the resolution stage that, although the Massey commission recommended that ultimately there be separate heads for the archives and the national library, they also recommended that initially the archivist should have charge of the organizational stages of the national library.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Establishment of advisory council.

Mr. Drew: In section 8 there is a reference first of all to the establishment of an advisory council. Then in subsection 2 there is a reference to the constitution of the advisory council. It speaks of the national librarian being the chairman, and then it speaks of the general librarian and the parliamentary librarian. I see that their positions are not defined elsewhere in the bill. Should there not be some definition of their positions?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know that there is a statutory definition, but it is under that designation that the librarian of parliament and the general librarian have occupied their offices for many, many years. Because of the close connection there will necessarily be between the library of parliament and the national library it was felt that these two officials should be part of the advisory council.

Mr. Drew: I agree with the proposition that they should be members of the council. The only question that arises in my mind is as to whether any uncertainty could occur at any time with respect to what these positions actually were. I recognize that it relates to positions that we understand at the present time. I wondered whether there should be a reference to the positions so they would be established in statutory form in relation to this legislation.

Mr. St. Laurent: The law officers had not considered that was necessary. Their salary is provided for in the appropriations that are voted every year under the titles that are used here, and they are the only officials for whom salaries are voted annually by parliament under that designation. I assume that is why the law officers did not feel that it was necessary to provide a statutory definition in this bill. I think if the hon. gentleman will refer to the appropriation acts he will see that each year salaries are provided for officials described in these terms, and they are the only ones who are thus described.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to press the point because I do not think any problem is going to arise in connection with it at this time, but I would point out that the fact that some names were shown in the appropriation acts does not of necessity give the same effect as a statutory definition. I leave the matter now, having called attention to it. I think if any question should arise at a later date we can then return to the subject at a time when the national library will have taken form.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a question to ask. I know the parliamentary librarian very well, in fact perhaps better than he likes me to know him, I fear, because I give him a lot of trouble, but I should like to know who the general librarian is.

Mr. St. Laurent: Dr. Desrochers is the general librarian. The two have equal status, one being the official whose mother tongue is English and the other whose mother tongue is French.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I do know him, but I did not place him under that heading.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Powers and duties of librarian.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that it is not possible in advance to place too exact an interpretation upon provisions that are adopted at this time, but I do recall the point that was made by one of the hon. members when this was in the resolution stage. I would hope this would be the appropriate time to point out that it would be highly desirable that there should be no attempt to exclude from the library books dealing with subjects that might not ordinarily be regarded as subjects that we would wish to have dealt with too generally throughout the country. I am referring, for instance, to the possibility of the books published with relation to systems of government with which we very strongly disagree, or matters of that kind, being excluded. Not only should they not be excluded, but we should do our best to obtain them because we should make available here as complete documentary records of other systems of government and other matters of that kind as we possibly can. I merely make this observation now because I realize that this is going to provide the preliminary setting for the establishment of a national library.

May I for the last time in relation to this point indicate that there may be some possibility at a later stage of defining the positions with greater accuracy, because I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood uses the library as much as any member in the house; and when I find he does not know which officials are described under the terms employed here, then it does suggest to me the desirability of defining these official positions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are rubbing it in.

Mr. Drew: I am not rubbing it in, because I know the hon. member does use the library very extensively. I am using him as the strongest argument I can use to suggest the desirability of defining these positions fairly clearly. I simply want to say what I said before, since we are dealing with the last section of this bill. The officials who are described in this legislation as the parliamentary librarian and the general librarian have been performing a very great and very efficient service on behalf of hon. members, and for that reason on behalf of the people of Canada. I most certainly feel that they should be brought most actively into association with all the preliminary stages in setting up the structure, the indexing and the general plans of the national library.

Mr. St. Laurent: The remarks made by the leader of the opposition will be a part of the record, and I am sure that both the law officers and Dr. Lamb will take those remarks into account. Doubtless at some early date further legislation will be required as the work of organizing the national library proceeds. At that time I am sure the law officers will take into account the remarks made by the leader of the opposition with respect to having the librarians of parliament associated in some permanent way with the work of the national library.

I am sure also that Dr. Lamb will recognize the views expressed in this house as to the desirability of having available, for perhaps only limited use but having available there, books that it might not be desirable to circulate widely to the public, but which should be available for those who are specially interested in problems on which those books will have a bearing. I am sure it will be the desire of those responsible for the content of the library to have it a reliable reference library where students will find the books that it may be difficult for them to secure elsewhere.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to deal for a moment with paragraph (e) of section 10. I think the wording is unfortunate, but there may be some explanation for it. We are told that the national librarian may:

> Generally supervise and direct the work of the national library in such a manner that the facilities of the library may be made available to the government and people of Canada—

Perhaps they might also be made available to the opposition. Perhaps it would be advisable to put in the word "parliament" instead of "government".

Mr. St. Laurent: I think here the word "government" is not used to describe the executive; it is used to describe the whole machinery of government which comprises His Excellency the Governor General and the two houses of parliament. That is the official status of the houses of parliament, the members supporting the executive and the members opposing the executive. I am sure it was certainly not intended to make it available exclusively to those who happen to constitute, for the time being, the advisers to the representative of the sovereign. The wording is used to describe in a rather wider sense the whole social organization for the government of the country.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I accept the Prime Minister's explanation, but I must say that I have said some very nasty things about His Excellency if we accept this connotation.

National Library

Mr. Green: Is there any reason for including the words, "to the government and the people of Canada"?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think there is, but it was to follow out the idea that there would have to be transferred almost at once from various government departments books which are now in those separate departments. They are all being catalogued so they may become available to the general public through this catalogue. I think that was the reason the expression was used here.

It is not intended to duplicate, for instance, the collection of scientific books that are in the national research council; but they will form a part of the union catalogue, and when inquiry is made the national librarian will be able to secure them from wherever they are and make them available to those who have reason to consult them. It was not intended to imply that the members of the government, any more than the members of the opposition, were not a part of the people of Canada.

Mr. Green: Perhaps it is intended to imply they need the books more.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Deposit of books with librarian.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is this section patterned on the practice elsewhere? As I read it, it winds up with a penalty of a fine on summary conviction, which seems a little severe. I understand the requirement of getting books into the library, but I just wanted to ask whether the section in its present form is usual or whether there is a precedent for it. I presume it is common sense to get a copy of every book sent in, and perhaps if it is you need to wind up the section with a penalty.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am informed that this provision is usually in all the statutes creating national libraries. The requirements here are not nearly as onerous as those which exist under the corresponding statute in the United Kingdom, where there is a requirement that books be supplied to the national library, to the university of Oxford, to the university of Cambridge, and I think there is one other university which has the right by statute to have books supplied.

This section is a repetition, perhaps in more precise form, of what is already in the Copyright Act. Section 11 of chapter 8 of the statutes of 1931 provides:

> The publisher of every book published in Canada, within three months after the publication thereof, shall deliver or cause to be delivered, at his own expense, to the librarian of parliament, who shall give a written receipt therefor, two copies of the first edition and two copies of each subsequent edition if such subsequent edition contains additions or alterations either in the letter press or in the maps, prints or other engravings thereto belonging.

When there is no sanction expressly provided, there is a general provision in the Criminal Code that is much more severe than the one provided here. Anyone who wilfully violates a statutory requirement for which violation no special penalty is provided is liable to prosecution—I do not know the number of the section, but under a section with which the hon. member is as familiar as I am—under a section which provides much more severe penalties than those provided here. I believe the reason for including this section was to have the act self-contained, and not have to rely on this provision of the Criminal Code in case there was a violation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My fear was really that the person who would actually have to provide the money would not be the wealthy publisher but the poor author. I suppose the answer is that these expensive books that are referred to here will probably be the exceptional case, and the two copies provided will not be impossible even for a poor author writing his first book.

Mr. Catherwood: This section apparently covers books published in Canada, but what policy is adopted to acquire books from the United Kingdom and the United States from outstanding authors and publishers?

Mr. St. Laurent: If the book is published in Canada—it does not necessarily have to be printed in Canada—or if it is distributed in Canada by a Canadian publisher, he would be required to supply these copies unless exemption was provided. During the resolution stage I explained that it was intended to require the deposit of books by Canadian authors, whether printed in Canada or elsewhere, and also of books which dealt mainly with matters of Canadian concern, so the Canadian national library might become the most complete collection of books published by Canadians or books dealing with matters of special concern to Canada.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to appear to be splitting hairs about the wording of this act, but I am somewhat concerned about the provision requiring two copies of every book that is published. In looking at the definition of the word "book", it seems to me this would cover every conceivable kind of thing that is printed in this country which could be regarded as reading material. In the definitive section of the act the word "book" is described as including library matter of every kind, nature and description. I should think that even the smallest periodical publication, whether it be a daily, weekly or monthly, would be library matter of some kind. Certainly libraries do include that material, but I do not know whether this section would be wide enough to oblige every publisher of some of these scandal sheets, tipster sheets or publications of that kind, which are all too numerous, or even much more serious publications of a very simple nature to be filed in this way.

I should think this would present a very serious problem for the librarians and their staff if it should be that wide. I think we should carefully consider whether or not that is the effect of the combined wording of section 11 and the definition in section 2. It gets back to the inquiry that was previously directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to whether this follows the general pattern of similar statutes in other jurisdictions.

Mr. St. Laurent: I was informed by Dr. Lamb that it was a less stringent requirement than those in the United Kingdom or in France. There is a provision that the minister may make regulations respecting the quality of the copies required to be delivered to the national library of any book the copies of which are not of uniform quality; prescribing generally the classes or kinds of books in respect of which one copy is required to be delivered to the national librarian; and prescribing the classes or kinds of books in respect of which no copies are required to be delivered. That is within our regulations that will be made under statutory authority, which will require to be published under the Regulations Act.

It may be that experience will show that there should be something more specific in the statutory provision. I compared it with the requirement in chapter 32 of the revised statutes with respect to the Copyright Act and this definition did not appear to me to include as much as was included in the definition in the Copyright Act. I relied upon the advice of Dr. Lamb as to the propriety of defining a book in this manner. It was his feeling that this would not include as much as was included in the definition of "book" in the Copyright Act.

It was pointed out to me that we certainly did not want to provide housing space for copies of everything that was published or issued in Canada in writing or picture form. It was for that reason that the provision of paragraph (c) of subsection 4 of section 11 was inserted, namely to prescribe generally the classes or kinds of books of which no copies are required to be delivered to the national librarian.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a word, Mr. Chairman. I was impressed by the point made by the leader of the opposition. I am just wondering whether there might be something invidious in describing the classes of books of which no copies are required and whether it might not have been better to do it the other way and describe the classes of books of which copies are required. I raise that point for consideration. It seems to me that if a list is produced some time, describing the kinds of books of which no copies are required, that might be open to a certain invidious interpretation.

Mr. Drew: I do not intend to labour the point following what has just been said, but I would point out this situation. We are dealing with an act which lays the foundation for the delivery to the national library of publications in Canada which are described as books. I would be inclined to think that with the passing of this act anyone who was publishing even the smallest kind of periodical of any kind and was aware of this requirement—and who, quite apart from the possible fine of $25, did not want the nuisance involved in a thing of that kind—would make inquiries as to whether, in the absence of any specific regulation against his type of publication, he might not be called upon to deliver it.

I must confess that if the Prime Minister were consulted as a lawyer he would likely say: Unless there is some exemption, you are required to deliver it, having regard to the definition of "book" in section 2. If that is the answer the Prime Minister or any other lawyer would give, we are immediately confronted with the fact that until such time as the exemptions have been adopted, defining books that are not to be delivered, the moment this act goes into effect everyone who publishes anything that could come within the wide definition in section 2 would immediately be called upon to deliver it to the librarian unless he wanted to take the chance of getting into some difficulty at some later date.

I am not going to labour that point unduly. I recognize the fact that we are still in the preliminary stages; but it seems to me that this is a good time to avoid any unnecessary piling up of useless material in the hands of the librarian here in Ottawa.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would have to tell him that his obligation was no greater than it had been at any time since the adoption of the Copyright Act of 1931, because that was an amendment of the Copyright Act of 1921 in which the word "book" was defined, as follows:

"book" shall include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published.

I would have to point out to him that in 1931 parliament decreed that the publisher of every book published in Canada, within three months after the publication thereof, shall deliver at his own expense to the librarian of parliament, who shall give a written receipt therefor, two copies of the first edition and two copies of each subsequent edition, if such subsequent edition contains additions or alterations either in the letterpress or in the maps, prints or other engravings thereto belonging.

I would have to say to him: You are not required to deliver to the national librarian anything that you are not required to deliver under the Copyright Act. But under the Copyright Act you see what the definition is.

Mr. Drew: I am afraid it has been largely honoured in the breach.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure it has been largely honoured in the breach; and I am sure there will be no prosecutions required by Dr. Lamb for failure to produce anything that it would not be in the interests of the Canadian public generally to have become a part of the national library collection.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Purchase account for acquisition of books.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): There is provision that all bequests and donations shall be credited to this national library special operating account into which they shall be accepted. What would be the position of a person who wishes to donate, or to give as a bequest, a capital sum, the interest on which only could be used for the national library purposes? Would there be any provision made for this person to have his capital left there and for the revenue only to be used?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure there would be. It would still be used for the purposes of the library. But if the bequest was accepted, it would have to be accepted with the conditions which it bore under the will. It would have to be used for the purposes of the library but in a manner governed by the conditions stipulated by the testator or by the donator. It could not be accepted otherwise.

Section 13 agreed to.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

On section 14—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Just before this last clause carries, may I ask the Prime Minister to indicate what clause of the bill deals with a matter about which I questioned him when we were at the resolution stage? In particular I asked whether the legislation provides authority to go ahead with the selection of the site, the appointment of an architect and the construction of the building itself. The Prime Minister replied as follows, as reported at page 2386 of Hansard:

The legislation now proposed would give authority to go ahead when parliament will have appropriated funds. The only further requirement would be a vote by parliament of the funds required to carry out projects for which there would be authority to make proposals to parliament in the present legislation.

Will the Prime Minister indicate where in the bill that type of authority is provided?

Mr. St. Laurent: Section 3 states that "a national library is hereby established". That is a decision by parliament, that a national library is established. Now it will be the responsibility of the government to recommend to parliament whatever may be required to carry out the decision that a national library be established; and the only way public works are authorized is through the estimates, and voting the money required to provide them.

No statute is passed saying there will be a post office in a certain locality. That is provided by an item in the estimates which makes the money available for that purpose. I do not think, for example, that the hon. member will find any statute making provision for the erection of the supreme court building. That was done by way of an item in the estimates making the amount of money available for that kind of building in the national capital.

Mr. Knowles: In the case of the national gallery, for example, I take it that no statutory authority was required to go ahead and invite the submission of various plans. All I wish to be sure of is that we can get along with this project without further legislation having to be brought in apart from a vote for the necessary money.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member is right. The competition for plans for the national gallery was by way of a vote in the estimates of last year for that purpose. Because of that vote the national gallery of Canada competition was organized and is now under way for the choice of an architect to prepare the plans. That is the traditional way in which public works are provided for. If the object is one parliament has sanctioned, then parliament is asked to vote money for such and such specific purpose. The vote is the only other authority required to proceed.

Mr. Fleming: I presume it is clear that the erection of the building will have to await the voting of money by parliament. But I take it that it is clear that the proclamation of the act, once it is passed, would not have to await plans for the construction of the building. The act could be proclaimed at any time. When does the Prime Minister expect it would be proclaimed?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is intended the act will be proclaimed within weeks or months—almost at once, or just as soon as the preliminary preparations can be made. It is intended that it shall be proclaimed, and that Dr. Lamb shall be appointed national librarian. I would hope he would have a report for parliament at its next session, advising as to what further steps in his opinion can be taken at that time.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up first the third reading of Bill 276, to amend the Tariff Board Act, if you have no objection. Then we will proceed with Bill No. 194, to amend the Aeronautics Act. This bill has come back from the committee. Then we will have Bill No. 246, to amend the Canada Grain Act, and I understand this bill will be referred to a committee after second reading. We will then go into supply, and take up the estimates of the privy council and justice.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

FILM PRODUCTION—NATIONAL FILM BOARD AND DEFENCE DEPARTMENT—ROYAL TOUR

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Has the Department of National Defence a separate unit for making moving pictures apart from the national film board?

2. If so (a) what are the reasons for this apparent duplication; (b) what was the total cost of the unit in the past fiscal year; (c) what is the estimated cost of the unit for the coming year?

3. How many employees are presently working for this branch of the department?

4. Did the unit make a film of the royal tour in addition to the film made by the national film board on the same subject?

5. If so, at what cost?

Mr. Campney:

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CIVILIAN SECURITY FORMS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of civilian security forms CCC 315 and CCC 99A in current use.

[Mr. Lennard.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the parliamentary assistant to the minister about this motion, and I would appreciate it if, by leave of the house, it might be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

C. G. S. "STONETOWN"

INJURY TO MEMBER OF CREW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport to whom I have sent notice. Has he any information regarding the injury to a member of the crew of the weather ship Stonetown which necessitated the dispatch of the cruiser Ontario? I am particularly interested in this question because I called attention to the living conditions of the crews of these ships only last week.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to give notice of his intention to ask this question. Consequently we sent a telegram to Vancouver and learned that H.M.C.S. Ontario did make rendezvous early this morning with the C.G.S. Stonetown and took aboard the injured waiter. I understand that the injury resulted from the young waiter falling on a hydrant and injuring himself near where he had recently had an abdominal operation. Medical attention is being given on the Ontario, and I understand his condition is satisfactory.

FISHERIES

BOUNTIES ON DEPREDATORY SEALS—APPLICATION TO NEWFOUNDLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries or his parliamentary assistant. I have already spoken to the parliamentary assistant about it. There was an article in Sunday's issue of the New York Times in which reference was made to the bounties paid through the Canadian Department of Fisheries for protection of fish against depredations by sea lions on the Pacific coast and by seals on the Atlantic coast. Does that policy apply to the waters around Newfoundland?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member did not follow the usual custom of sending notice of his question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, I spoke to the parliamentary assistant about the matter twice.

Mr. Abbott: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Mayhew: If the hon. member will refer to item 155 of the estimates he will find that there is an amount of $45,000 provided for the destruction of harbour and grey seals. This is an increase of $15,000 over last year. The $15,000 is provided for the destruction of harbour seals in Newfoundland waters.

KOREA

MARTIAL LAW IN SOUTH KOREA—REPORTED DECLARATION BY SYNGMAN RHEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I have given him notice. It arises out of a dispatch in today's press. Will the minister make a statement on the present situation in South Korea with particular reference to Syngman Rhee's declaration of martial law? What efforts are being made by the United Nations commission for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Knowles: —to impress upon the authorities in South Korea the urgent need for the establishment—

An hon. Member: Write a book.

Mr. Knowles: —and the pursuit of democratic processes in that country?

Mr. Speaker: I was not able to hear the question.

An hon. Member: You are lucky.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With respect to the first part of the question, we have received no official information on the reported declaration of martial law in South Korea, on its nature and its scope, and therefore I do not think it would be proper for me to make a statement on this subject at the present time. As to the second part of the question, there is a United Nations commission in Korea—the one referred to in the question—which from time to time offers assistance and advice to the government of the Republic of Korea on the observance of practices in keeping with the democratic form of government of that republic. That commission makes reports to the United Nations general assembly, and if the hon. member would like to see the last report I shall be glad to send it to him.

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not he has found out what has caused the delay in the mails between Ottawa and Washington with respect to some of his recent correspondence with the United States government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As far as I know there has been no delay whatever in this matter. I assume the hon. member is referring to the statement which I made on Monday. That statement was in the hands of the United States state department in Washington, and indeed in the hands of the United States embassy in Ottawa, before it was given to the house.

Mr. Graydon: They must have lost it, then.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPRENTICESHIP IN TRADE AND INDUSTRY—PURPOSES AND RESULTS OF OTTAWA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): I see the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour in his seat. I would ask him to tell the house what were the purposes and results of the recent apprenticeship conference sponsored by the federal government at Ottawa.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving notice of his question. The national conference on apprenticeship in trade and industry had a threefold purpose:

1. To review the facts respecting the alleged shortage of apprentices and trainees in skilled trades in all parts of Canada.

2. To review existing apprenticeship plans and training programs in all provinces with a view to increasing their effectiveness where needed, and extending such programs to a degree which would meet the needs of all skilled trades.

3. To obtain suggestions and recommendations from representatives of employers, organized labour, teachers of trades, and provincial government officials occupied in administration of training, regarding the best methods of increasing the number of apprentices and trainees in skilled trades and of developing co-operative and co-ordinated activities for the promotion and development of apprenticeship training in Canada.

Speaking in a general way, the results of the conference were as follows: The immediate results of the conference have been to bring to the attention of all interested that Canadian industry is not in a favourable position in so far as the number of young men engaging as apprentices and trainees is concerned, and to bring forward suggested plans for improvement. Those who participated expressed satisfaction with the manner in which the conference was conducted, and also expressed the opinion that the conference would be beneficial in all parts of Canada. About seventy-five delegates were in full-time attendance representing employers in the manufacturing and construction trades, organized labour, and provincial and federal officials responsible for the administration of apprenticeship and training legislation. All provincial governments were represented. So far as the specific recommendations of the conference are concerned, wide publicity has been given to them in the newspapers, and we would be willing to give a copy of the minutes of the conference to any hon. member who would be interested in reviewing them.

GRAIN

ASSISTANCE ON FREIGHT RATES FROM WESTERN TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I have not given notice of this question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has any consideration been given to any change in the policy of the government with respect to freight assistance on western grain shipped to eastern farmers?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): No further consideration has been given since the question was asked last.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSFER OF ACCOMMODATION FOR KOREAN WAR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Calgary West asked a question about orders issued to army units in the western command. I think the part of the order which gave rise to his question reads as follows:

> It will rest with commanding officers to ensure that married officers and other ranks occupying married quarters or accommodation elsewhere in the vicinity are available under the same circumstances as those officers and other ranks living in barracks.

That is the end of the relevant part of the order. As I pointed out the other day, it was later made clear that that did not prevent officers and men who were living outside of the barracks from continuing to live there provided they were on duty by the first parade.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

TARIFF BOARD ACT

SALARIES OF VICE-CHAIRMAN AND OTHER MEMBER OF BOARD

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 276, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROVISION FOR REAPPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS—SALARY INCREASES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 246, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on the resolution I outlined very briefly the amendments which are being proposed. I also referred to the work and responsibilities of the board of grain commissioners and to the problem of overages at country elevators. Two or three of the amendments really require very little more explanation than I have already given.

It is proposed to increase the salaries of the chief commissioner and of his fellow commissioners. Their present salaries were fixed in 1930. In view of the magnitude and importance of the board's operations, there can be no question that the increases are well warranted. Certainly they cannot be considered excessive as compared with the rise of general salary levels either in the public service or in business circles.

The amendment to provide for the reappointment of members of the board simply removes any room for doubt concerning the authority to make reappointments. The present section was not considered sufficiently clear in this respect.

The position of assistant commissioner for the eastern division—the lakehead—is to be dropped. Experience has shown that the duties of that position can very well be undertaken by the board and staff at the headquarters in Winnipeg. I am satisfied that the board's operations at the lakehead will in no way suffer as a result of this change. The same amendment proposes that henceforth the salaries of the assistant commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council.

Section 85 of the Canada Grain Act specifies the form in which tickets and other documents used by elevator operators must appear. Hon. members from the prairie provinces will be familiar, for example, with the book in which cash tickets are kept. Some elevator companies now are considering adopting the modern system of a continuous form used in a registering machine which keeps locked-in carbon copies and which has a number of advantages over the current form of book. The present wording of section 85, however, prevents the use of such a machine. It is therefore proposed, by amending section 15, to give the board of grain commissioners authority to permit the use, in the alternative, of such forms as may be approved by the board. At least one operator of a country elevator system is experimenting with the possibility of combining into one operation the issuance of the cash ticket and the wheat board's producer's certificate. At the present time the elevator agent has to complete the cash ticket on one form and the producer's certificate on another. Using the new type of continuous form it is proposed that the original copy will be the cash ticket; copies 2 and 3 will be the producer's certificate and the remaining copies will be the required additional copies of the cash ticket. Thus, in one operation, both forms will have been completed. I have in my office a copy of the proposed set of forms which I shall be pleased to show to any hon. member who is interested.

The Canada Grain Act now provides that the board of grain commissioners may make regulations and orders in respect of a number of matters, but it does not empower the governor in council to make regulations. It is desirable that such authority should be vested in the governor in council in order to permit speedy action to be taken when the occasion demands it. It is proposed, therefore, to provide the governor in council with the powers specified. The explanatory notes to the bill draw attention to the fact that it is occasionally impractical, or even physically impossible, to comply with some specific requirement of the act. There is probably no other major line of business in this country in which more unforeseen contingencies of one kind or another can arise than in that of getting the grain crops forwarded from the harvest fields to commercial positions. Serious emergencies inevitably occur from time to time. For example, in the situation that existed last autumn the terminal space at the lakehead was so urgently needed that it was impractical to carry out the weigh-overs within the period required by the Canada Grain Act. Other emergencies are bound to occur in future but it is not possible to forecast what form they will take.

As regards the questions of regulations, the board's power is limited to regulations or orders that "are not inconsistent with this act". The governor in council is to be given power to meet exceptional circumstances by issuing regulations of a type that the board is not authorized to make.

Hon. members will note that it is proposed that any regulation made by the governor in council, dispensing with a requirement of the act, shall automatically expire on the last day of the next succeeding session of parliament. If, therefore, the difficulty that gave rise to the regulation were of a permanent nature there would be opportunity to introduce at that session an appropriate amendment to the act. In most cases, however, the problems are likely to be of a temporary nature and the regulation by the governor in council would meet the situation without the necessity of subsequent amendment to the act.

Finally there is an amendment to effect some slight but necessary changes in the definition of certain grades of grain. The only changes are to insert the minimum weights per bushel of the various grades mentioned.

I believe the provisions of the bill are entirely non-contentious. There will be differences of opinion about matters not dealt with in the bill. But since this is an overhaul of the Canada Grain Act, after the bill receives second reading it will be referred to the committee on agriculture for further examination. If the committee decides to add to or to amend the bill the government will be prepared to give due consideration to such recommendations.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I certainly am pleased to hear the minister say that the bill will be referred to the committee on agriculture. As is realized, the duties and responsibilities of the board of grain commissioners are important and varied, as they have to do with the trade-in, storing, and transportation of grain in this country.

As I suggested before, I hope the minister will make it possible for the committee on agriculture to hear the views of the chief chemist who acts under the board in connection with the testing of grain, and has something to do with grading. It would be important to have this official appear before the committee, and also that we should hear officials from organized agricultural groups, such as the chief officials of the United Farmers of Canada, the Federation of Agriculture and others. They should be permitted to appear before the committee on agriculture and make recommendations and suggestions as to what should be done by way of amendment to the Canada Grain Act.

Their opinions vary. Some of them are not in agreement with the manner in which the act has been carried out, and I think it would be only right and proper that they should be given an opportunity to express their views. There has been considerable controversy in western Canada about the ultimate disposition of overages. The minister has said there would be no amendment in that respect. Nevertheless these people who have made a study of the matter should be permitted to make their recommendations. This bill is important to the grain producers in the prairie provinces. Because it is being referred to the committee on agriculture, I do not wish to speak at greater length now.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister is going to let this bill go to the committee on agriculture, because this will save prolonged discussion in the house, and give hon. members an opportunity to go into the Canada Grain Act. For some things there will be approval, and for others disapproval; but in committee we will have an opportunity to express our views and to ask questions. I do not think I need to say more at this time.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, like hon. members who have spoken thus far in the debate, those of us in the Social Credit party welcome the amendments to the Canada Grain Act. This act has been developed over a number of years, and the improvements it has brought about have been of great assistance to the farmers, particularly those in the prairie provinces. I am glad the minister has promised to send it to the committee. I hope he will have people there to give us information.

I am glad also that the minister has said that consideration will be given to an amendment that might be suggested by that committee. While the act is not nearly as bad as it used to be, I believe there is still room for improvement. Perhaps by the time the committee and the house are finished with it, it will be in a more satisfactory condition than it is at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

TORONTO ISLANDS—EROSION OF SHORE LINE

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): More than two months ago, Mr. Speaker, I brought to the government's attention the very serious change that is taking place in the Toronto islands by virtue of erosion. I pointed out that if this damage was allowed to continue, the islands would disappear, and without their protection Toronto harbour would cease to exist. I urged the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to send an engineer to see what could be done in the way of building a breakwater and groynes to prevent further deterioration.

On May 9, in order to check up on the progress that had been made in this matter, I put a question on the order paper as follows:

> Has the government received a report from the engineer sent to investigate the damage caused by flooding and erosion to the Toronto islands?
> If so, what is the recommendation of the engineer for protective works to prevent further deterioration?

The answer I received to both of those questions was as follows:

> Matter under investigation.

Having received that return, Mr. Speaker, today I phoned the mayor's office in Toronto to see just what sort of co-operation the city of Toronto was receiving from the federal authorities. I was told that, first of all, the situation with regard to the deterioration of the Toronto islands had become considerably worse in the last two months. Secondly, the government has given no indication whatever that it intends to accept any responsibility in this matter. The reply that I received to my question is therefore simply a parliamentary way of saying that the government is doing nothing in this matter; intends to do nothing; and simply hopes that the matter will be forgotten.

I should like once again to point out to this government that the Toronto harbour is a vitally important part of the St. Lawrence seaway project, and that, without the Toronto islands, the Toronto harbour would cease to exist. The preservation of the Toronto harbour is a federal responsibility. If the Toronto islands are allowed to deteriorate further, many times the cost of protecting them now will have to be spent later in providing protective works to make the continuance of Toronto harbour possible. I take this opportunity, therefore, of once again strongly urging the government to recognize its responsibility, and to undertake, in co-operation with the city of Toronto, the protective works that are necessary to prevent further deterioration of the Toronto harbour.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

PRIVY COUNCIL

315. General administration, $346,391.

Mr. Knowles: There is one question that I should like to put to the Prime Minister. One should not indicate in advance that there might be any doubt as to his question being in order. It is a risky thing to do, but perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will allow this question to be asked at this time. The reason I ask it on this item is that I believe the Massey report did come directly under the Prime Minister, and we are now dealing with the privy council, which is the Prime Minister's department.

Can the Prime Minister say, in more detail than he has by answering questions on the orders of the day, whether consideration is being given to the making of a reasonably generous grant to the dominion drama festival? I recognize that the recommendations of the Massey report with respect to that matter were not too precise or too definitive, but certainly there were suggestions to that effect. There are people in this country who are concerned over what has happened to the dominion drama festival recently because of its shortage of funds. I refer to the offer of certain interests which the festival directors deemed it necessary to accept. There are people who have protested against this acceptance, and I believe some of the protests may have reached the Prime Minister. Could he say whether further consideration has been given to that matter arising out of the government's study of the Massey report?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, consideration has been given to that matter, but it has been found it is not a matter that can be dealt with separately. I do not mean to suggest that there is any intention of waiting until we can propose as general a solution to the problem of culture as was reported in advance in a broadcast that was made Sunday night between 9 and 10 o'clock. But it is not probable that any appropriation will be asked from parliament at this session for the purposes of the drama festival or the encouragement of the Canadian ballet or other kindred matters.

It would not be possible to pick out any one or more of these community activities of a cultural nature until we have been able to look over the whole field, and recommend to parliament general principles according to which encouragement might be extended in a financial way to some and refused to others who would not be within the general principles approved by parliament.

Mr. Knowles: I take it, then, that we can expect in due course further recommendations in the field of culture as covered by the Massey report?

Mr. St. Laurent: I did not quite catch the last words of the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: We can anticipate further recommendations may come along in due course?

Mr. St. Laurent: Further recommendations certainly will come along in due course. There is a realization on the part of the government that there is a wide interest throughout the whole of Canada in that field, but it was not found to be practicable to do anything at once in any other field than that of aid to the universities and institutions of higher learning, which was done on an experimental basis, as the hon. member realizes, by the appropriation asked from parliament at the last session.

With respect to the others, the government has not only its own members but interdepartmental committees trying to devise the kind of formula which could be recommended to parliament and which would make it possible then to recommend grants to certain activities and to refuse them to certain other activities for valid reasons set out in the statement of principles or formula that would have been recommended to and approved by parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I just ask one further question of the Prime Minister in connection with that matter? I appreciate the reason that universities were especially dealt with. I appreciate the difficulty of acting in advance of general principles being laid down. However, I ask the Prime Minister this question. Is it, as I understand it to be, a fact that the drama movement is perhaps, after a good many successful years, in danger not only of falling on evil days but perhaps of even coming to an end because of the failure of its resources? In other words, may I ask whether this may not possibly be an emergency measure different from others?

Mr. St. Laurent: The reasons for treating it as an emergency situation were put to the government and were considered; and the conclusion arrived at was that we were not disposed to take the responsibility of recommending something to parliament until we could state what were going to be the general principles we felt should be established.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At page 378 of the estimates I notice one or two changes in the staff, and I wanted to ask the Prime Minister about them. Referring to page 378, I notice that, compared with a year ago, apparently there is no item for secretary to the office of the Prime Minister nor for an administrative officer, grade 6. Then going further down the page, towards the end, I notice that for 1951-52 there is an item for messengers whereas the designation is now changed to confidential messengers. I wonder whether the work of the messengers is in any way changed.

Mr. St. Laurent: There was no further statutory room for any increases in salaries under the classification of messengers, and really they are confidential messengers, because practically all the messages they have to carry are of a classified character. The civil service commission reclassified the men who were occupying those positions and placed them in the class of confidential messengers so that the appropriation which had hitherto been voted for messengers is being recommended to parliament this time under the heading of "confidential messengers".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At the top of page 379, I notice that last year there was an item of $75,000 for publication of consolidation of statutory orders and regulations and there is no similar item this year. Was that something which was just for one year?

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention at this time because I felt that it was desirable that I have the opportunity of giving some information to the committee about it.

This item of $75,000 was recommended and voted the last time for the French version of the consolidation of the orders and regulations, and it was fully expected that it would be expended before March 31. As a matter of fact, only a small portion of it was expended because the printing office had more urgent work to be done and has not yet completed this French version. When the estimates were prepared it was anticipated that this $75,000 which was voted last year would be expended and that there would be no requirement for anything of that character this year. It so happens, however, that most of it has lapsed and in the supplementary estimates there will have to be an item for that portion of the $75,000 which was not expended and which will come to be paid during the present fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

Federal district commission—

318. To provide for maintenance and improvement of grounds adjoining government buildings at Ottawa, and to authorize an amount not exceeding $142,400 for construction, improvements, maintenance and operation of the parkway system, under the control of the federal district commission which is additional to the sum of $300,000 granted by chapter 55, statutes of 1927, as amended, $433,794.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yesterday in the public accounts committee we had some discussion about the amount voted for the federal district commission, and it was stated by the Auditor General that each year there is a deficit because the grant is not sufficiently large to pay their expenses.

The Chairman: Order. Have the proceedings of that committee been reported to the house?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, Mr. Chairman, they have not; but if I may say so, we are discussing this item at the present time and I am suggesting that if it is not large enough, it ought to be made larger. I was going to point out that I think in the public accounts other revenue was shown from which they apply money to meet the deficit. I did not, however, rise especially to speak on that matter.

I understand that it is part of the duties of the federal district commission to look after the Mackenzie King bridge. I was wondering whether those who were responsible for advocating it could tell us whether the expenditure—which has been a large one—on that construction has been justified by the amount of traffic that is using it at the present time and whether there are any other plans for bringing a greater proportion of the traffic, especially at rush hours, across that bridge. From observations I have made from time to time, it seems to me that the bridge is not used a great deal.

Mr. St. Laurent: The approaches on this side of the Mackenzie King bridge have not been completed. It was hoped that the structures that stand in the way could be taken down early this spring, but the Minister of Public Works has not yet found a place to put those public servants who now have their offices in the buildings. That is the reason why the approaches have not been completed.

I have been over the bridge on several occasions and I agree with the hon. gentleman that if there was not going to be more traffic over it than there is at the present time it would not have been justified. But these approaches are going to be provided just as soon as other accommodation can be found for the offices that are now in the structures that have to be torn down. I hope that will not be long, because in the meantime the public is not getting annual value for the amount of capital that has gone into the construction of the bridge. That situation should therefore not be allowed to continue for any longer than is necessary.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Further on the same subject, may I say that I am delighted to hear from the Prime Minister that no one is going to be put out from shelter which he now has in order to accommodate the traffic which is going over that bridge. I think what he says is manifestly true, namely that up to the present time traffic has been extremely light.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the operation and maintenance of Laurier house is under this item of the federal district commission or whether it is under public works?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman will remember the terms of the legislation which was passed last year. As I recollect it—and of course I am speaking now only from memory—it was public works that was to maintain the structures and the federal district commission was to maintain the grounds at Laurier house; but the legislation requires the Minister of Public Works to maintain the structures that are there.

Mr. Fulton: Any question as to the alterations of the building and the extent to which it is used as a centre of research would probably remain—

Mr. St. Laurent: When Public Works estimates are under consideration would be the time to ask about the alterations to the buildings.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Last year on this item I suggested two things: One, a revision of the federal district statute, which has been amended from time to time. Since that time I have consulted with the chairman of the federal district commission, and he has advised me it is the intention to look into the act and to make a report to the Prime Minister. The second thing I had in mind at the time was that since the work of the federal district commission and the national capital planning committee is very important and rather elaborate, and since the support of the house and of the public throughout Canada is very important toward the development of this district today, I think that not so much to investigate but rather to inform the members of this house it would be desirable that once in every parliament we should have an opportunity to bring the members of the federal district commission who are on the executive side before a committee to discuss their problems, and also their objectives. That was done a few years ago, I think, in two or three meetings before the banking and commerce committee in the other place. The suggestion is worth while, and if that were done hon. members and the public would realize the importance of the work much better than they do at the present time.

Some things have been said about the Mackenzie King bridge. I might be the lone rider on it from time to time, but I think in time the construction of the bridge will be justified. The approaches are not completed and the traffic has not been routed from other parts of the city. There is no doubt that it is a fine bridge and the people of Ottawa are very proud of it. I am quite sure that in time its construction will be justified.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. gentleman will admit that the chairman of the federal commission is doing a great public service in the performance of his duties as such, just as his predecessors did, and the hon. gentleman is in frequent communication with the president. I can assure him that when he and the president come to me and tell me it would be of value to have a committee set up to enable hon. members to get information directly from the members of the commission, I shall be glad to give serious consideration to having that done as soon afterwards as possible.

Item agreed to.

319. Expenses of the national planning committee, $45,000.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that this item was not wholly spent last year, can the Prime Minister indicate what the plans of this committee are for the ensuing year? Does he feel that the full amount is needed? I note from the details on page 380 that the estimate as to the total spent last year was a little less than $30,000, as against a vote of $45,000.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry that I cannot do any better than report to the committee that these estimates for the federal district commission were submitted by the chairman of the federal district commission, and that I know from past experience they do not spend more on the meetings of this planning committee than they feel is fully justified. There was only a little over $30,000 spent last year, but the recommendation was that we should make an appropriation of the same amount of $45,000 for this year. It may be that, as happened last year, it will not be wholly expended; but I would prefer that to be the situation than to have them come and ask for something additional out of the special vote that is always provided in the estimates of the Minister of Finance for unforeseen requirements. We are on the safe side, and I am sure that there will not be unnecessary expenditures, nor any effort to have the expenditure equal the appropriation, if that is not required by proper public interest.

Item agreed to.

320. To authorize payment of the fifth instalment to a special account in the consolidated revenue fund, known as the national capital fund, established under vote No. 809, Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1947-48, $2,500,000.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Prime Minister tell us the state of this fund? This is the fifth payment into it. It would add up to quite a sum of money. Can he tell us how much has been spent and what projects are under contemplation at an early date?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry but I have not got the actual expenditures out of the fund. The amounts were given last year, and there have been certain expenditures out of the fund for the acquisition of further lands since that time. I know that as a fact, because I have to sign the recommendations to council for the approval of the projects that come from the federal district commission. I shall be glad to get a statement of the exact situation at the present time; I am sorry I have not got it in the information that has been supplied to me this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: I certainly will not delay the item. But since there is general interest in the matter, perhaps the Prime Minister will consider having a statement made along the lines of my question and table it some day as a sessional paper.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall be glad to do so, and have the federal district commission prepare a statement and the amounts. At the earliest possible occasion I will lay it on the table of the house.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Perhaps the Prime Minister will note particularly the developments around Sussex street with respect to the two bridges and also the razing of the old statistics building in the near future.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have a note which has just been sent to me and which should have reached me earlier. It will enable me to dispose of the former question at once. It is from Mr. Cram and reads as follows:

It occurred to me that it might be well to insert in the estimates book of the Prime Minister an item of the expenditure made to date from the national capital fund.

Including the fiscal year 1951-52 four instalments of $2,500,000 each have been appropriated by parliament to the national capital fund.

Of this $10 million the following expenditure has been made to date:

1. Acquisition of property	$1,158,600
2. Mackenzie King bridge construction	1,264,700
3. Construction of railway cut-off line in south Ottawa	413,700
	$2,837,000

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the Prime Minister remind me of what I should not have to ask? How long do these instalments go on—indefinitely? I refer to the annual contribution of $2,500,000.

Mr. St. Laurent: It has to be renewed every year. The statement that was made when the first appropriation was recommended to parliament was that it might be advisable during each year for ten years to recommend to parliament the appropriation of an equal amount and this is the fifth time the government has brought the annual recommendation to parliament.

There is no commitment by parliament with respect to future appropriations, but the original general intention was, and it is still the intention, to recommend each year during the period of ten years this grant of $2,500,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): These are substantial amounts that have been spent and I should like to know whether the expenditures are made by the relevant departments, the Department of Public Works for example, or is it done entirely by the planning commission itself?

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that for the construction of this bridge the federal district commission enlisted the services of the Department of Public Works and it was that department that finally certified the plans and specifications and tenders for the implementation of those plans were called for by that department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it from that that the national planning commission does not maintain a separate staff and there is no duplication of any kind.

Mr. St. Laurent: They do not maintain a capital construction staff; they maintain a maintenance staff to take care of the properties entrusted to them.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the planning commission or the district commission intends to embark upon any major undertakings in the near future? It seems to me that this money is piling up. I understand the principal project they have in mind is the removal of the railroad tracks and the railroad station to some distance outside the centre of the city.

Mr. St. Laurent: There has already been expended from the capital planning fund on that project a total of $413,700 for the railroad cut-off in south Ottawa. That is the first step in the carrying out of the project to remove heavy traffic trackage from the centre of the city. I think the intention is to cooperate with the government and other public authorities in timing the public works that the commission will undertake. They do not want to place a heavier drain on materials and manpower than the Department of Public Works feels would be proper in connection with the things under its control, nor do they want to go beyond what we recommend to provincial governments and municipalities in the way of a co-operative effort to discourage inflation.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): This question may not be altogether germane to this particular item, but it would seem to me that the federal district commission is not receiving sufficient money each year to carry out its current duties. Apparently it is spending more than $300,000 a year and I was wondering if consideration has been given to that fact.

Mr. St. Laurent: Up to the present time the fund to which this $300,000 a year is contributed has not been exhausted; it is still in the black, to use a common expression. It is quite true that in the last couple of years more has been taken out than has gone in by way of annual appropriation and no doubt consideration will have to be given to keeping the account in a fluid condition. It has not yet been found by the commission or by the Auditor General that there is any urgency, but the matter is under consideration and the government will not hesitate to take the responsibility of recommending an increase when the commission and the Auditor General feel that an increase is required to keep the account in balance.

Item agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL AND LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

169. Office of the secretary to the governor general, including the salary of the secretary to the governor general at $7,600 additional to salary authorized by chap. 182, R.S. 1927, $120,224.

Mr. Knowles: What progress is being made with a matter that comes under this item concerning which the Prime Minister and I have had discussions on previous occasions? This is another of those items referred to by the Auditor General where a salary is paid in part by virtue of the provisions of a statute and in part by an item in the estimates. At the moment I forget the amount set out in the statute.

Mr. St. Laurent: $2,400.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Here then is a case where the statute says that the salary is to be $2,400 a year but the incumbent receives $10,000 a year by virtue of this supplementary amount of $7,600 in the estimates. I think it is fair for me to say that the Prime Minister has expressed on previous occasions agreement with the suggestion that matters of this kind should be tidied up. What progress is being made in the tidying-up process?

Mr. St. Laurent: I inquired if it would not be possible to make the proper permanent amendments to deal with the governor general's establishment. Certain changes have been made in the establishment which are still on an experimental basis. It was felt that we were not in a position this year to do what would be considered sufficient as an amendment of a permanent character. More than this one item would have to be taken care of, and we were not in a position to say that the matter had had sufficient consideration for us to assure parliament that that would be the permanent situation. In view of the change in the incumbent of this high office of governor general it was felt that we would just carry on under the system that prevails without attempting to make an amendment that would probably have to be completed at another session by further amendments.

Item agreed to.

170. To authorize and provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for expense allowances to the lieutenant governors of the provinces for travelling and hospitality undertaken in the exercise of their duties, $86,000.

Mr. Knowles: I do not intend to debate this item at length, but I do wish to repeat the opposition to it which we of this group expressed when the same proposal was first made earlier this session in the form of a supplementary estimate. That supplementary estimate provided for the institution of these special expense allowances to lieutenant governors for travelling and hospitality. The reason it was provided by way of a supplementary estimate was to permit the practice being made effective as from January 1 of this year.

We opposed that supplementary estimate and our further thought on this matter leads us to feel that we should still oppose a grant of this kind. We feel that if a case can be made for adjusting the salaries of the gentlemen who occupy these posts of lieutenant governor, then that adjustment should be made by statute in the salary itself.

We dislike the idea of the sliding scale that is involved in this matter. By the way, that reminds me that the Minister of Finance answered a question of mine when we were on the supplementary estimates as to why the wording was different in the supplementary estimates from the main estimates. He indicated that an amendment would be made at this time. I take it that amendment will be forthcoming and that it will set out the sliding scale formula. It seems to me that is unrealistic. I feel that to put these gentlemen in the position of having to turn in statements as to what they have spent on travelling and entertainment is hardly compatible with the nature of their positions. As I recall it, the Prime Minister said they were not going to be asked to submit definite vouchers covering every item of expense but rather that they would be asked to submit their own statements that they had spent whatever amounts were claimed. We feel it is wrong in principle to make a provision of this kind. We say again that if it is felt necessary to make any salary adjustments—not that we think any increase is necessary—it should be done by an adjustment in the salary itself rather than in this way. For these reasons we are opposed to item 170.

Mr. St. Laurent: To carry out the undertaking given by the Minister of Finance when the question arose on the supplementary estimates, I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move that the language of the vote, without affecting the amount, be changed to read as follows:

To authorize and provide for the reimbursement to the lieutenant governors of the provinces of Canada of the costs of travelling and hospitality incurred in the exercise of their duties up to a maximum per annum for each as follows:

(a) where the population of the province at the last decennial census did not exceed 500,000, $5,000;

(b) where the population of the province at the last decennial census exceeded 500,000, $5,000 plus $1,000 per each 100,000 or fraction of 100,000 of population over 500,000, but not exceeding $12,000 in any case...

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Knowles: It sounds like a new formula for redistribution.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is a new formula for the distribution of an amount not exceeding $86,000 to provide for the reimbursement of expenditures that the lieutenant governors feel they must incur to discharge properly the responsibilities of the offices to which they have been appointed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to say a word about this item. We have certain questionings about it. There are one or two questions I should like to ask. I take it that the expenses of the lieutenant governors last autumn when the royal party was here were in fact paid either by themselves or by the various provinces.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask whether this action is being taken on the initiative of the government itself simply as a thing which it seemed reasonable to do or if in fact the matter was put forward by the provinces. It is hard for me to believe, for example, that the province of Ontario should not, could not and would not look after an expenditure of that kind. I wonder if we might be told a little more about the background, although the amount involved is quite trifling compared with some of the amounts we pass.

Mr. St. Laurent: It has been brought forward on the initiative of the government itself. Since I have been a member of the government considerable difficulty has been experienced on various occasions in securing gentlemen looked upon as of the right standing in their respective communities to assume the responsibilities of the office. It was pointed out to us by a number who have not become lieutenant governors that they could not afford to do it because they would have to spend very much more than what would be left of the salary fixed by statute after paying income tax. There was one suggestion that they should not be subject to income tax.

It was felt that as long as the requirements of the country were such that there had to be a very wide base for income tax, then exemptions from income tax were not the right thing to recommend. When you start making exemptions for one it leads to another. The officials of the Department of Finance and the minister felt it would be creating embarrassment for future ministers of finance to commence the process of exempting individuals from income tax. However, it is recognized that there are certain expenses that are necessarily incurred to receive the income, and recognition that certain expenses are incurred as a condition of getting the income that is taxed is being extended almost from session to session. The only way in which it was felt it could be done in this case was to recognize that there were such expenditures.

I have no doubt that the lieutenant governor of Ontario is going to expend considerably more than this amount but it was felt that here was something that was comparable to allowances made to ministers or ambassadors abroad, and that an amount of this kind would make it somewhat easier to secure the acceptance of gentlemen who might be approached in the future with the offer to occupy this very dignified and honourable office. I was told in one case, and it was not in Ontario or Quebec, that it meant an annual expenditure of not less than $40,000 out of the personal income of the incumbent to discharge properly the responsibilities of the office of lieutenant governor in the manner to which the people of his province had become accustomed. I felt they had perhaps become accustomed to more than was really necessary but that nevertheless there was a certain amount that was inevitably required to do the things that we frequently ask lieutenant governors to do.

We frequently communicate with them and ask them to take some part in the entertainment of distinguished guests who are visiting our country. Constitutionally the responsibility for the appointment and emoluments of lieutenant governors is a responsibility of the central government. It was felt that if there was a certain amount against which they could say they had made the kind of expenditures that are described in this language as proper expenditures in the discharge of the functions of their office in a dignified way it would be proper to reimburse them not in the form of income but for necessary expenses that they had incurred.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall item 170 as amended carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Item as amended agreed to on division.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

422. General administration, $367,953.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, unless the minister wishes to make an opening statement, I shall proceed to ask some questions, the first of which concerns the manner of payment of the salaries of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think perhaps it would be better to have this discussion under the general item.

It was represented to me that many members of the force, if not all, receive their salaries monthly rather than bi-monthly, and that this imposed upon them considerable financial difficulty in that they do not have enough at one time to meet household expenses as they become due. On the other hand, if they have household expenses at the end of the month, then before receiving the monthly cheque at the end of the following month they experience some financial embarrassment.

I understand representations have been made asking that they be placed on a basis whereby they would be paid twice a month, but that so far nothing has come of it. Is the minister able to say whether this matter is receiving attention? I hope he will tell us that it will be changed so that members of the force may receive their cheques twice monthly.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, it is a fact, as my hon. friend has said, that the members of the force are paid once each month. I must say however that I have received no representations from anyone to the effect that this method has not been acceptable to members of the force. I have asked the commissioner, who is now sitting in front of me, and he says he has received no representations. So, as the hon. member's remarks are the first representations made to us, we shall be glad to look into the matter, to see if they have some foundation.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad the minister has said that, because I was under the impression that representations had been made in writing. My information was on the basis of personal conversation, so I am not in a position to offer substantiation. If the minister will look into the matter, I shall be grateful.

Mr. Blackmore: What provision is the minister making to see to it that the incomes of mounted police are kept in line with the increased cost of living? Have adjustments been made in their incomes?

Mr. Garson: Provision was made in December of last year whereby an increase was granted to the salaries of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at about the same time and, so far as the two bodies are comparable, on the same basis as was awarded to members of the civil service.

Mr. Blackmore: Is there a general feeling among the mounted police that they are being adequately paid to meet the expenses they have to incur?

Mr. Garson: Subject to the feeling all of us have, that we would like to have our incomes somewhat larger than they are, I think there is a general feeling in the force that they have been treated fairly, in comparison with, let us say, the civil service or other bodies with whom they would be comparable. I am sure they would agree, however—as indeed I would myself—that their incomes could be larger than they are. I might say the same about mine, too.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us suppose a member of the force is transferred from one place to another, and upon doing so finds it impossible to obtain living quarters at the rate he had been paying before the transfer. Is there any follow-up item by officials to see that such a situation does not become serious?

Mr. Garson: While I cannot say that all such cases are taken care of, for some years past it has been our practice to increase the number of buildings, residences and the like available for members of the force in the different cities in which detachments are placed. We add to that number as finances and materials permit. In respect of some officers we rent premises, and make them available.

Mr. Blackmore: What provision is made to cover additional expenses incidental to the arrival of another member of the family? This is a serious matter for married people. Is there any provision for additional expense incurred upon the birth of a child?

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I may be permitted to restate my hon. friend's question so that I shall be sure to have it right. Does he refer to the mere addition to the family of a member of the force, or is he referring to the additional cost of moving from one detachment to another arising through the having of a larger family?

I understand we do not defray the cost in connection with an addition to the family of a member of the force. But, inasmuch as we pay the moving expenses in the event of a man's being moved from one detachment to another, naturally these would include the expenses of all members of his family. And of course if he has had an addition to his family, we would pay the moving expenses if any of that additional member.

Mr. Blackmore: The impression is abroad everywhere that we pay our mounted police meagrely, and that they are kept pretty well on a subsistence basis. If additional expense is incurred through an incident such as that I have indicated, or through sickness in a family which would cause a burden of debt to be developed, is some provision made for cushioning any such conditions which may develop, and which would affect the head of the household?

Mr. Garson: In common with all other Canadians, members of the force receive family allowances. When there is an addition to the family there is automatically qualification for a greater family allowance, for that addition. Their moving expenses are paid when they transfer from one detachment to another—and that is more than some Canadians receive when they are moved from one place of business to another. Then, during the last two years the members of the force have received two separate and fairly substantial increases in their pay. In each case the effort was made to keep the members of the force on a basis comparable with members of the civil service, and in a manner which would be fair to the civil service on one hand and the members of the force on the other. When all these factors are taken into consideration I think we can claim that the members of the force have been fairly treated in respect of the matters to which the hon. member has referred.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In the details at page 472 the revenue is set out. Is that revenue received from the provinces by way of payment for work done by the mounted police in those provinces?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is referring to the $2,658,155 on that page?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is the amount for 1950-51.

Mr. Garson: That is made up almost entirely of payments received from provincial and municipal governments in eight of the provinces for police services supplied by the R.C.M.P. under contracts with those provinces and municipalities.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does that money go into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Item agreed to.

423. Operation and maintenance, $25,210,272.

Mr. Fulton: Under this item, Mr. Chairman, there is a considerable increase in the number of personnel on the administrative side—I do not mean the members of the force itself—from 588 to 790. Would the minister say what has been the main cause of that increase?

Mr. Garson: The reply is that the major portion of the increase is accounted for by the naturally heavy increase in security work which is being done by the mounted police consequent upon the condition of cold war in which we are at the present time. This security work, as I am sure the hon. member will realize when he reflects upon it, involves a lot of desk and paper work. In addition to that, we have tried to get civilian employees into all positions in the force in which they could discharge the duties of the office, in order to release as many of the force as possible for active police work.

Mr. Fulton: There is no similar figure given for the actual number of men, non-commissioned officers and officers in the force itself. There is an item here for the pay of the members of the force, but can the minister say what is the present total of the personnel of the force as compared with last year?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I have the figures here. As at May 24, 1952 the force in regular uniform totalled 4,213; special constables, 371; civilian employees, 340; civil servants, 780; total, 5,704.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister said 340 civil servants are included? What are those who are represented by this 340? Are they doing police work or office work or administrative work?

Mr. Garson: They are doing not only office but maintenance work as well, not police work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are they the ones the minister referred to as special constables—I believe that phrase was used.

Mr. Garson: The special constables do special police work of various kinds.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are they in uniform?

Mr. Garson: No, they are not. Just to avoid any misunderstanding on that score, what is referred to as the special branch of the force, which is engaged in security work, would take in uniformed men, special constables, civilian employees and civil servants, so it cuts right across those four categories. As I have said, the special constables do special police work of various kinds.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I might say that from what small experience I have had with them I have been favourably impressed. It has always seemed to me they were considerate. At the same time I should like to know, because it is of such great importance, what the minister can say to us regarding the selection and training of these men. After all, if I understand their duty correctly, they have that extremely difficult task of considering and making up their minds as to the loyalty of Canadian citizens, and they have the responsibility of actually reporting against people.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps I can indicate the degree of care which is exercised in the selection of members of the special force, if I indicate that in the choice of the members of the regular force we ordinarily accept about one-twelfth of those who offer themselves as recruits. There is a very high standard of qualification.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are speaking now of the uniformed men, the 4,000?

Mr. Garson: Yes, of the force generally. With regard to the members of the special branch, we have a higher standard than even the high standard which prevails with regard to the force itself. In the special branch there will be quite a number of university graduates, and there will be also a large number of men whose capacity had been proven through years of experience in the main force. When these men indicate by the manner in which they carry out their duties in the main force that they have special fitness for work in this special branch, they are transferred in order that we might avail ourselves of their special qualities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say how many of the specials come out of the main force? What percentage of the special branch comes from the regular force?

Mr. Garson: Between one-half and three fifths; that would be between 50 and 60 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has indicated that a large number of the special force are university men. Could he say what percentage of the main force are of that background, university men?

Mr. Garson: A relatively small percentage; I would say less than 10 per cent of the main force.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the minister can say a word with reference to the security work done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the work carried on by the civil service itself. I have been quite concerned about this when hearing recently of the security check which is made of civilian employees, for instance, in the Department of National Defence. Then we find the Department of Defence Production has certain security forms which must be filled in before people are employed. The minister has made reference to the security work done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Can he say a word to indicate the co-operation between at least these three branches of the government service which are carrying on security checks, to reassure us that overlapping is being avoided in so far as that is possible?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid my knowledge of the details of the administration of these other departments to which the hon. member refers is not sufficient for me to state at all authoritatively what their security precautions are. Nevertheless I think I can explain quite accurately the relationship between these other departments and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The other departments of government, depending on how vulnerable they may consider themselves to be in the matter of security, ask the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for a report upon any employee concerning whose loyalty they entertain doubt. This report is prepared by men in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are specially detailed for that purpose. After that report has been prepared it is sent to the deputy minister of the department concerned. I should like to emphasize the point that in no case does it contain any recommendation by the mounted police to the effect that the subject of the report should be either dismissed or retained. The report is entirely factual. When it is received by the deputy minister of that other department, the responsibility for reaching a judgment upon the basis of that report and such other material as the deputy minister may have, to the end that he may retain the employee, dismiss him or take whatever other action he may wish to take, is the responsibility of that deputy minister. As far as the mounted police are concerned, their duty is confined in this context to the supplying of factual reports concerning employees of other departments.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister say whether the screening—to use the general word which is used—which is done in other departments is always done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at their request, or whether these other departments also carry on their own screening? For instance, who does the screening for the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. Garson: I know my hon. friend does not intend this as a trick question.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: Having regard to the facilities we can provide in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for work of this character and the probable absence of equal facilities elsewhere in the government service, I believe we are the only ones who provide reports of that kind. As my hon. friend will be the first to agree, I cannot say positively that any other department does not get reports from other sources, but I do not think they do and I do not see any reason why they should. I think we can give reports that are better than any that can be procured from any other source. So far as I know we are the only department of the public service that is asked to produce factual reports of that kind.

Mr. Fulton: There are two other questions I should like to ask. One has reference to newspaper reports I have seen which indicate that the musical ride is being revived. Is that correct?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Then I think the opportunity should be taken to tell the minister, and to let it be known to the commissioner as well, that I for one—and I think I speak generally for most people—feel that is an excellent move and that they are to be congratulated upon that decision.

The other question I should like to ask relates to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police band. Is that band to be sent over to take part in the coronation ceremonies in England?

Mr. Garson: I want to express my appreciation, on behalf of the force, for my hon. friend's congratulations concerning the musical ride. I am hardly in a position to agree with him, under the circumstances; but if I may do so without immodesty, I may say that I certainly agree with him. As to the band, as yet no decision has been reached.

Mr. Fulton: Is it a decision to be made on our own part or is the situation perhaps, if I can put it that way, that an invitation to go over is not yet firm?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I think the situation is probably that the point of discussing this particular topic by any government has not yet been reached.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but I did not quite follow what the minister said.

Mr. Garson: I say I think it is a case where the point in time has not yet been reached when this matter is under consideration or discussion by any government at all. We read in the newspapers about the coronation; and that the tentative, probable or speculative date is some time, presumably, in June, 1953.

Mr. Pearson: It is fixed as June 2 or 3.

Mr. Garson: June 2 or 3 in 1953. But I do not think the arrangements have reached the point where we could as yet say that the mounted police band would be going to the coronation.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the fact that the matter must be in a fluid state at the moment. I would say, however, that I am sure the people of this country would agree that anything along this line, within reason, which would increase Canada's participation in these coronation ceremonies would be desirable and that it would receive the approval of the country. As far as we are concerned, I can assure the minister that if it should be found possible, we would hope that the band might be sent over.

Mr. Garson: We entirely agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister say whether the mounted police force is up to the full desirable strength at the present time or whether there are deficiencies?

Mr. Garson: I think the term that is used is "authorized strength". At the present time the force falls short of the authorized strength in each of those four categories I named previously.

Mr. Shaw: It is my understanding that within the past year or two certain reorganization has taken place within the force itself. For example, I understand that the rank of subinspector has been abolished. Just how far has this reorganization gone and what ranks have been affected?

Mr. Garson: Some reorganization has taken place but the rank of subinspector, to which my hon. friend has referred as having been abolished, has been retained.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may, I should like to ask a question which really covers items 422 to 429. I observe that there are three items as to operation and maintenance, one for land services, one for marine services and the other for aviation services, the amount of the item for land services being $25 million, roughly; the naval item being $1,200,000 and the item for air being $281,000. Does that separation into three items indicate a separation in organization? Does it mean that there are three separate units or is this merely an accounting figure? Will the minister say a word as to the organization of the three separate units and as to the degree of separateness or otherwise?

Mr. Garson: The facts are that the air service is a separate division, that the marine service is a separate division and the land services are separate divisions. Each does work peculiar to itself. For example, the marine service has revenue cutters to prevent smuggling and the like. But although for obvious administrative reasons they are set up separately, they all work together in the force. My hon. friend's second observation, that it is partly for accounting purposes that they are set up in this way, is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just to pursue that one step further, I take it there will be a chief inspector and his other staff would deal with all three, and that it would only be on the lower level that the separation would come into effect. First of all, to what extent are they physically separated? I presume the naval people live on the seacoast.

Mr. Garson: Well, as I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate, it is impossible to have an air service, however small, without having some administrative officers that look after the air service as such. The same thing is true of the marine service. You must have men who are specially trained in running ships to operate that service. But the headquarters staff, including not only the highest officers, but most of the high officers are over and command all these services. In other words, the division between these services is not one that goes right to the top by any means. I should say as a layman that the services are subordinate and auxiliary to the police function of the whole force.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That makes it clear in a general way. Let us take the marine service. Would there be a commanding officer? Would there be a naval headquarters on the east coast and on the west coast, with officers dealing on their own responsibility with things there, or would everything be controlled in Ottawa?

Mr. Garson: No. For example, on the east coast they have an officer in charge who has technical control of these marine operations; but as I was indicating a few moments ago, the highest rank that is in charge of any one of these is superintendent. The other higher ranks come over him. The marine service is not a big empire in itself. It is subsidiary and auxiliary to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police itself.

Mr. Blackmore: Just before the item carries, I am concerned about the fact that the force is not up to the desired strength. What steps is the minister taking to adjust that matter? It seems to me in times like these the force should be better than a little over normal strength.

Mr. Garson: I referred a few moments ago to the increases in salaries we had authorized, two separate increases of quite substantial proportions in the last two years. These increases in pay, coupled with a pretty active recruiting campaign, have resulted, for example, in an increase in the uniformed force from 3,650 in 1951 to 4,213 in 1952. That curve of increased enlistment is still continuing, and we have therefore every hope that within a period of time we shall be up to our authorized strength. As a matter of fact, at the present time, the whole Royal Canadian Mounted Police is only 8 per cent below authorized strength.

Mr. Blackmore: To what extent do the provincial governments rely upon the mounted police to do their policing? What supplementary provincial forces are there in the provinces? Can the minister tell us that?

Mr. Garson: Yes. I might reply to my hon. friend's questions in these terms. In eight of the provinces of Canada, that is, in all the provinces except Ontario and Quebec, the entire provincial responsibility for policing is carried out under contract by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In every one of those eight provinces there is just one police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which does all the federal work, for the federal government directly, and which under contract does all the law enforcement and administration of justice which is the constitutional responsibility of the provincial authorities.

In addition to that we do the work for a number of municipalities in the different provinces. In Prince Edward Island, 1; Nova Scotia 3; in New Brunswick, 8; in Manitoba, 18; in Saskatchewan, 27; in Alberta, 21; in British Columbia, 45, or a total of 123 municipalities, involving 451 members of the force, also under contract, for which substantial payments are made. These are the moneys the hon. member for St. John's West referred to as having come into the consolidated revenue fund from the provinces and the municipalities.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the municipality itself enter into a contract, or does it do that through the province?

Mr. Garson: Each contract is with each municipality separately. It is in most cases between the municipality represented as a rule by the mayor and secretary-treasurer, the province represented by the attorney general of the province, and myself representing the federal government. Each municipality has a contract which it renews periodically under which we look after the policing of that municipality.

Mr. Cardiff: Was it necessary to employ more personnel owing to the fact that we have been confronted with an increased amount of smuggling in the last year or two? Was it necessary to employ any more personnel, or was it taken care of by the staff already appointed?

Mr. Garson: No, it was not necessary to increase the personnel for the purpose to which the hon. gentleman has referred. What we did was to concentrate our anti-smuggling personnel in the force at various vulnerable points along the border at which there seemed to be a concentration of smuggling. In that way we were able to handle it without incurring any additional expense for personnel.

Mr. Blackmore: What is the basis of co-operation between Ontario and the federal government in respect to policing? Does Ontario have some assistance from Ottawa?

Mr. Garson: I think I am quite correct in saying that the most harmonious relationships exist between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provincial forces of both Ontario and Quebec. They are mutually helpful at all times, but Ontario has its own police force and looks after all its own policing responsibility itself. So has Quebec. Other than this mutual help there is no connection between the two forces.

Mr. Fulton: Just to follow up the question asked by the hon. member immediately to my left about the smuggling, we have seen statements in the press from time to time that the volume is so extensive with respect to cigarettes that presumably—I think I have seen this statement—only a relatively small percentage can possibly be caught. Is that correct or does the department or the force feel that it has the necessary personnel and resources to deal with and trace down at least the large proportion of the present volume of cigarette smuggling?

Mr. Garson: That is a rather embarrassing question in the sense that it is hard for any force, no matter how competent it is, to make a positive statement that it has apprehended all smugglers, or a certain percentage of them. I think on the whole, measured in terms of seizures, prosecutions and the like, the force not only feels it has been quite successful in its anti-smuggling operations but has substantial grounds for so feeling.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister going so far as to say he feels that the resources of the force are sufficient to enable them to deal with, perhaps I should say, well over half the actual volume of smuggling, or does he and the force feel that to deal with that percentage they would have to have considerably more resources?

Mr. Garson: I think the answer to my hon. friend's question is to be found in the statement I made a few moments ago, that we were able to deal with this smuggling with our existing personnel by concentrating at the points at which most of the smuggling was taking place. I am quite sure that if the high officers of the force had felt they needed more personnel for that purpose they would not have hesitated to detail them. If I may draw a parallel, when dealing with a heavy increase in its work the special branch did not hesitate at all to add substantially to its membership. Where the work was to be done they did not hesitate to increase their personnel. In dealing with this smuggling the force felt that their trained men properly distributed among the most vulnerable places could cope with the situation as well as any force could cope with it. There never was a police force in history that eliminated all crime. The most that any force can do is deal with an optimum percentage of crime. I think the percentage in this case has been gratifying to the force and that they have substantial grounds for their gratification.

Mr. Fulton: In order that we may have a background for this discussion, has the minister available, first, the number of cases in which smugglers were apprehended during the fiscal year 1951-52 as compared with 1950-51 and, second, the total number of cigarettes which were seized in the last fiscal year as compared with the preceding fiscal year?

Mr. Garson: The commissioner tells me that the crime statistics for the past fiscal year are just being completed. For obvious reasons we have not made a practice of publishing the statistics or boasting about our accomplishments but I would be glad to see that this comparison is made available to my hon. friend as soon as we get the figures.

Mr. Blackmore: Who would be responsible for dealing with smuggling over the boundary between Ontario and the United States? Would that responsibility rest upon the mounted police or the Ontario police?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend knows, the Customs Act was passed by this parliament and therefore the prevention of smuggling is the responsibility of the federal police force. In provinces like Ontario and Quebec where they have provincial forces and a federal police force as well, the prevention of smuggling falls squarely upon the federal police force.

Mr. Blackmore: Are there any other branches of police work which are specifically a federal responsibility?

Mr. Garson: Another one would be narcotics.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to come back to this cigarette business. Now that the Minister of Finance is here perhaps he can give us some expert evidence on this matter. The minister said they were able to deal with this smuggling with the existing personnel. I do not want to fall into the error of accepting every rumour as though it was an authenticated fact, but there is a widespread belief, which I have never heard seriously questioned, that the smuggling of cigarettes was not on a retail basis, that it was on a completely wholesale plan. After discounting the stories one hears as to the ease with which smuggled cigarettes can be bought, the plight of the tobacco industry would seem to give a good deal of support to those stories. If I remember correctly, the minister said that if the force had felt they needed extra help they would have asked for it. I want to know whether in fact the force did state that they were satisfied with the situation. If they did, it would surprise and disturb me. I should like to know whether in fact they were asked and whether they did not say, "Well, we did the best we could with the men we had, but that is not to say we dealt with the problem." It may be very comforting to us to know that they did the best they could with the forces they had, but what I want to know is whether they felt that the problem was being dealt with. It is not only a question of money, it is a question of the observance of law. We know that once you begin to disregard one law it is easy to go on to another.

Mr. Garson: The commissioner has just handed me some preliminary figures which have just been taken off and which I think will illuminate this subject to some extent. The increases in cases in 1952 as compared with 1951 are of this order: Under federal statutes, which would include anti-smuggling, customs work and so on, 42·5 per cent—I am quite sure the hon. member for Greenwood will regard that as quite a substantial increase—Criminal Code cases 37 per cent; provincial and municipal cases, 46·8 per cent; an over-all increase of 42·9 per cent.

My hon. friend says he is disturbed over newspaper reports he has read, and because of the plight of the tobacco industry. That leads me to the conclusion—perhaps this is just an inference I am drawing, and if I am wrong I hope he will correct me—that it is his private opinion that the force should have made available a larger number of personnel for anti-smuggling work. I respect his opinion. But in a matter of this kind I naturally respect perhaps somewhat more the opinion of professional people engaged in police work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may interrupt, I think in a way that is a fair inference, but the minister does not need to infer because I asked a definite question whether in fact the force was satisfied and whether they had asked for any further assistance.

Mr. Garson: I was just coming to that. As I say, I would respect perhaps even more the views of professional men in police administration. I said before, and I repeat, no requests were made by the force for additional personnel for anti-smuggling work because it was thought, as I am informed, that the existing staff of highly trained men, if concentrated at the points at which most of the smuggling was taking place, would achieve what I might call an optimum law enforcement. It is impossible to get 100 per cent anti-smuggling enforcement. As a matter of fact no person knows what percentage the force does get because you do not know how many get through. Men who have been professionally engaged in this type of work for a long period of years can form what at best is only a professional opinion that they can get the optimum result by a certain method. In the present case it was their view they could get that optimum result by concentrating their existing personnel, who would be trained and able people, and not by taking on people who were green at that particular type of work. That is what they did.

Maybe, as my hon. friend rather hints, that was a wrong decision. I myself would think it was a sound decision, and I would not be deterred from that view by any of the newspaper items upon this subject. We have placed in the hands of the two hon. members on the official opposition side of the house who have taken part in this debate the figures as to what was done in the way of seizures and so on. These figures show an over-all increase of 42·9 per cent. That is a very large percentage increase to take place in one year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): These very figures seem to me to raise a serious question. If I understand the figures correctly, they show that the increase in cases in 1952 over 1951 with respect to federal statutes—and the minister said that was chiefly smuggling—was 42 per cent.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He said that the increase in Criminal Code cases was 37 per cent, and in provincial and municipal cases 46 per cent. If I read the figures aright, instead of finding there is a tremendous preponderance in the cases connected with smuggling, actually the increase there is not as big as in provincial and municipal cases. That would seem to me to cast doubt. I take it nobody doubts that there was any amount of material to work on there, yet the percentage is not as high.

Mr. Garson: I submit with great respect that the conclusions which my hon. friend is trying to draw from these figures are invalid.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just a simple seeker after truth.

Mr. Garson: As I am myself; but I do not think by that conclusion my hon. friend is catching up with it. I suggest that when you consider the great variety of traffic offences, government liquor control offences and all the other provincial and municipal offences, you cannot draw a comparison between those and these federal offences. The significant thing, however, is that the real comparison here is between federal offences which took place in 1951 and federal offences which took place in 1952. The federal offences with which the mounted police have to do are limited in number. They are mainly in the field of customs work and narcotics. Where you have an increase in one year of 42·8 per cent, approaching 50 per cent, in federal offences, I would say it indicates a very high degree of stepping up of activity.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would be impressed if it were not for these other figures and the fact that it is not going to be as high as in these other cases where there is no special reason to believe there was an additional amount of crime.

Mr. Garson: I suggest, as I have already suggested, that no conclusions can validly be drawn from a comparison of the increase in provincial and municipal offences on the one hand and the increase in federal offences on the other hand. Taking a rather absurd example, let us suppose that some of the municipalities for which we are acting take it into their heads to overhaul their traffic bylaws and are determined to prevent jaywalking and all kinds of traffic or parking offences. This could produce a great bulge in your statistics of municipal offences which would have no significance whatever for the purpose for which my hon. friend is trying to use it. Perhaps it would have been more judicious on my part if I had not stated the Criminal Code offences and the provincial and municipal offences at all, and had simply directed my hon. friend's attention to the increase in federal offences, because that is really what we are talking about.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate the fact that the minister gave me the facts, although I would expect the Minister of Justice to always do that. However, I still find one argument he has made very unconvincing. He says there are all kinds of crimes that arise under municipal statutes, and no doubt there are; but he has not suggested, and I doubt if he can suggest, that there was any special event which happened which would tend to increase greatly the amount of crime in that category. At any rate, there was nothing comparable to what everyone I have talked to believes has been going on along the frontier in the matter of the smuggling of tobacco. Surely the minister will not tell me that was not an outstanding case of evasion of law; yet we have only a 42 per cent increase. I am sorry that the Minister of Public Works feels so badly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Excuse me. I always enjoy listening to the hon. member.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not want to get into a legal argument. I love to hear lawyers argue one way and the other, but when they are through most of us are no wiser. I should like to ask the minister a question from the standpoint of a layman. Does he not think the amount of smuggling that has taken place across the border was due in part to the fact that the tobacco men reduced their acreage because they could not sell cigarettes?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid this is a field in which a mere lawyer, with all the talents that my hon. friend has ascribed to him, is not competent to express an opinion.

Item agreed to.

Land services—

424. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $500,000, $4,298,491.

Mr. Dinsdale: Did I understand the minister to say that it is the policy of the department to obtain permanent quarters for detachments as soon as possible when circumstances warrant?

Mr. Garson: Yes. What I said was that it is our policy to obtain quarters of that character as finances and materials permit.

Mr. Fulton: In the details in the estimates it appears that while last year authority was given for the expenditure of $4,061,199, the total expenditures to the end of the year amounted to only $2,015,000. In other words, not quite half the actual estimate was spent during the fiscal year. Why? Is there any reason to suppose the experience would be different this time? Is it not possible to reduce this item from the amount of $4,298,491 now asked?

Mr. Garson: From the standpoint of the minister responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I would say we are anxious to have authority to build all the buildings we need, and that we desire to have them built if at all possible. It turns out that in some cases we are not able to have the work completed within a fiscal year and the grant has to lapse. I am sure, however, that upon reflection hon. members would agree that under those circumstances it is desirable to have the original authorization cover all that we wish to build, rather than less than we wish to build.

Mr. Ferguson: From the viewpoint of the Canadian citizen and our understanding of what the R.C.M.P. means to Canada, particularly in these days, no stone should be left unturned to give these men the best possible facilities by way of buildings so they can operate along the lines on which the people of Canada believe they should operate. Anything the government can do to lessen any handicaps in their work, which is so vital in these days, would be acceptable. It is necessary that the government should not spare dollars in doing everything possible to make the R.C.M.P. as efficient as it can be made.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad the hon. member has put into words what I have felt, but what perhaps I did not make clear when I spoke before. However, my question related to the experience of the last year and the anticipated experience this year. I wish to know whether there is any reason why we should be asked to authorize an estimate of $4,298,491. Have we any reason to suppose that the department will be able to spend that much this year, when last year they were able to spend in the fiscal year less than half the amount they sought? I appreciate the minister's desire to have authority to build those buildings considered necessary, but I want to know what basis there is for the assumption that the amount set out in the estimate this year will be spent, in the light of last year's experience.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is addressing his question to the minister in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That minister has asked for the full amount now appearing in the estimates, and that is the amount he wants to have spent. So far as this department is concerned we will do everything we can to see that it is spent. If it is not spent it will not be our fault, because these buildings are badly needed.

I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North when he says that we should provide the best possible facilities for the force.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister says these expenditures are necessary. Surely the people of Canada want to have them made. No other minister should be able to hold up those expenditures, if the minister in charge of the mounted police thinks they are necessary. Is the minister in another department going to deprive the mounted police of the facilities that the Minister of Justice believes are necessary?

The minister is asking us to vote this amount of money. We want to know that the money will be spent, because the minister has said that the expenditures are absolutely necessary. I am sure my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops is concerned as to whether it will be spent. The minister says, "This is the amount we want", but he does not seem very sure that this is the amount which will be spent. This is the point made by the hon. member for Kamloops. It is a logical point, in which he asks that the minister in charge of the department should see that the money is spent when it is obtained, so the buildings may be erected. Surely the minister knows whether any other minister can stop the furnishing of that which he believes to be necessary.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure we are all greatly impressed by the desire of the Minister of Justice to spend money as fast as he can.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not fair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He said he was anxious to spend it and I am giving him credit for it. But we want to know what expectation the minister has of getting the work done. We are all agreed it should be done. Last year for reasons which we have not yet been told, but which no doubt are valid, the amount was not spent. What we are asking is whether the Minister of Justice or his colleague the Minister of Public Works, who seems so restless at the moment, can give us some idea as to what work is going to be done. We do not want money spent just for the sake of spending it; we want money spent for the sake of getting results. I am sorry three of us have had to make this point; but it is important.

Mr. Garson: I do not think the conclusions my hon. friend draws from figures are always valid. I think the last conclusions he has drawn are invalid.

Mr. Fulton: I did not draw any conclusions.

Mr. Garson: What is my hon. friend's reasoning? He looks at page 474 of the estimates and sees that out of an authorized expenditure of something more than $4 million last year there was an actual expenditure of a lesser amount.

Mr. Fulton: Just half.

Mr. Garson: He immediately jumps to the conclusion that the amount we wish to have authorized this year is not going to be spent.

Mr. Fulton: I just asked a question; I did not jump to any conclusion.

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any reason, in logic, for that conclusion. I have already said everything it is possible for me to say, and that is that this estimate has been brought down seriously, that the facilities are needed. We are not anxious to spend money for the sake of spending money in the way the hon. member for Greenwood has indicated, but we are anxious to have badly needed buildings, and the fact that the provision of those buildings involves legitimate expenditures of money is incidental. But when the hon. member says he wants me to give the House of Commons an assurance that the money is surely going to be spent, then I say he is asking me to launch out into the realm of prophecy. The spending of it will depend upon actions of people who are outside the control of our department—contractors who do the work, for example. It will depend upon whether they can get on with their work and complete it in time.

As to the suggestion that any other minister will stand in the way, I say there is no foundation for that at all. These estimates are brought down by the government. They are the government's estimates. They are serious estimates, and we are asking this committee to vote the money. We do not ask hon. members to vote estimates we do not intend to spend. But if, for example, some of the buildings are in northern locations where the frost comes early, and where there might be a freeze-up a month earlier than is normal, do hon. members expect the minister to underwrite that sort of thing by way of a prophecy, just in order to satisfy members of the opposition?

Mr. Fulton: The minister has said I am jumping to conclusions. I have not jumped to any conclusion. I asked him a simple and pertinent question.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps the hon. member was asking me to jump to conclusions, and I did not wish to do so.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has indicated that he was either unable or unwilling to spend more than half the amount which was actually appropriated in the estimates last year. Now, I said, what reason has the minister to suppose—this was my question and if he will think for a minute he will remember this was the way it was put—that this year he will be in a position to spend the total amount asked, because the amount asked this year is even more than he asked last year. That was the question I was seeking to have answered, and I do not think we have had it answered yet because the minister has not been able to give us any facts upon which an opinion can be based. Has the material situation improved, or have the contractors assured him they will be able to do the work this year? I shall ask the minister why it was not possible to spend this amount last year, and whether the situation which caused last year's position has changed?

Mr. Garson: Having regard to the fact that it is not our department that spends this money, I could not oblige the hon. member with the reasons. May I say with great respect that I wonder if we are not labouring a rather obvious point. I have had to do with the preparation of government estimates for some fifteen years now; and with our climate in this country I do not know of any government which authorizes public works items like these that is able in every year to spend all that has been voted by parliament. They all try, as we are doing here, to appropriate what they want to spend. If there is a shortfall, there is a shortfall. It is rather routine business in most governments.

In some cases the grant lapses, and it is just voted again another year, but in other cases it may not lapse. There is no human being who can prophesy, at the time we are voting these estimates, for example, the weather conditions under which they may have to be spent. No person knowing the way in which these estimates are brought up ever says that we should attempt to prophesy—

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, they do.

Mr. Garson: No, they do not.

Mr. Ferguson: We are being asked here to vote a matter of $4 million. The minister who is the head of this department is no different from the head of a department in a private corporation, outside of the fact that he is spending the taxpayers' money. Apparently suggestions come to the ministers of this government, and when their estimates are being considered they walk in and ask for an amount of money. They try to put it through in spite of the endeavour of the opposition to find out what this money is for, and why the taxpayer is being called upon to cough up this amount of money to carry out the desire of somebody, not the minister. The minister is only the railroader of the grant.

Can you imagine the Steel Company of Canada making an addition to their plant at Hamilton, Ontario, and having the man in charge of production come before the board of directors requesting $2 million or $5 million and not being able to explain the purpose for which that money was to be used? We have just had an example of a minister talking about a total amount of $4 million and not being able to explain why $2 million, or about 50 per cent, was not spent. He says it was on account of climatic conditions. We have not heard from the minister that he has investigated this situation to such an extent that he could say that 50 per cent of the $4 million is going to be spent in Alaska or that it is not going to be spent in Alaska. He does not know where it is going to be spent. He has tried to indicate to us, the watchdogs of public funds, that climatic conditions or frost conditions prevented the expenditure. You would think that this country was snowbound from the United States border up to the north pole.

We are looking for an explanation as to why the money which was requested last year was not spent. We have not heard from the minister that it was because the Eskimos could not lay bricks. We have heard that you cannot tell about weather conditions. Just imagine such nonsense. Weather conditions may make it impossible to spend 50 per cent of the money being collected from the taxpayers. If the minister knew anything about why he was asking for this money, we would be fair and decent about the situation. If he could say that 50 per cent of the money about which I am asking is going to be spent in a part of Canada where climatic conditions may not permit $1 being spent, we would say, "Certainly you cannot prophesy about conditions there." We know as well or even better than he does that certain contractors will not even tender in the tough sections of the country.

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ferguson: I let you speak without interruption, and now you let me speak. You may ask me all the questions you like when I have finished, and I shall give you intelligent answers. Here is a man asking us to pass an item which is only $4 million, but which may form part of the $700 million surplus which this government is requesting. I am sure every hon. member in this house must be dumbfounded to find a minister requesting this amount of money who knows so little about the reasons for the request. The only argument advanced in favour of giving him this money carte blanche is that weather conditions may prevent the spending of it. He does not say it is for this or for that.

As I said before, we do not wish to handicap this important department in any way; give them all they need without any restraint whatever, but when the minister asks us to pass an item and only mentions weather conditions during the four times he has been on his feet, then it is time to ask for further explanations. I know that I live in a cold but pleasant country. From the way the minister speaks, you would believe we are snowbound twelve months a year from the United States border to the northern part of the Northwest Territories. My colleagues want to know if the minister has the slightest idea why this money is necessary, and why the money that was voted last year was not utilized. The only argument he has given us so far—I would defy him to refute my statement—is that you cannot tell about weather conditions. Never in my life have I heard such weak nonsense from any minister who was trying to obtain money from the already overburdened taxpayers.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, after this impassioned oration—

Mr. Ferguson: It may be, but I hope it sank in.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Don't take it too seriously.

Mr. Ferguson: That is the trouble, you don't.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member says he wants the details of these expenditures. It did not require a twenty-minute speech for him to get the details.

Mr. Ferguson: It did, from three different members.

Mr. Garson: I shall now give him the details which I forbore giving before because I did not think it was necessary to take up the time of the house to go into details of this sort. I hope he will listen carefully; and if he knows anything about Canadian geography, he will know that weather conditions at some of these places might have a great deal to do with whether this work could be completed before the construction season runs out.

Mr. Ferguson: I have been in every part of Canada, just as you have.

Mr. Garson: I admit that, and that is why the hon. member will understand this reference when I give it. I shall give the places where this construction will take place. The first is Fredericton, New Brunswick; there is no weather problem there.

Mr. Ferguson: That is not snowbound, either.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): No one is trying to stop you from talking.

Mr. Ferguson: If you will listen for a minute you might learn something.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We know how much you know.

Mr. Ferguson: Outside of Quebec, you don't know anything.

Mr. Garson: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that interjections be reserved until we get this list on the record. The places are, Fredericton, New Brunswick; Long Island, Ontario; Rockcliffe, Ontario; Toronto, Ontario; Moose Factory, Ontario; Port Harrison, Quebec;—my hon. friend knows where that is; that is quite far north—Norway House, Manitoba; Regina, Saskatchewan; Stony Rapids, Saskatchewan; Cumberland House, Saskatchewan; Beaverlodge, Alberta; Vancouver, British Columbia; Eskimo Point, Northwest Territories. Perhaps the weather would have some effect there.

Mr. Ferguson: It would.

Mr. Garson: Fort McPherson, Northwest Territories. Would it have some effect up there? I think it would. Liard, Northwest Territories; Cambridge, Northwest Territories; Hay River, Northwest Territories; Aklavik, Northwest Territories. Perhaps the weather would have something to do with it up there.

Mr. Ferguson: It would.

Mr. Garson: Simpson, Northwest Territories; Arctic Red River, Northwest Territories; Whitehorse, Yukon Territory. Newfoundland: construction of detachment quarters all along the rock-bound coast around the whole of Newfoundland where the material has to be brought in by boat and where difficulties not so much of weather but in the matter of communications are encountered. That is the list of the locations. If my hon. friend's knowledge of Canadian geography is as great as he claims it to be—and I believe it is—I think he will agree that when you are talking about Aklavik and all these places I have mentioned here, in which the mounted police function as well as in the cities of Canada, the time of the fall freeze-up and the like would have a great deal indeed to do with whether you could get your money expended within the fiscal year.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, after going over the geography of Canada, may I ask how much of the amount of $4 million being asked is being expended in places that are affected by climatic conditions? Come on; give us the amount.

Mr. Garson: On these Newfoundland detachment headquarters all around the entire coast of Newfoundland, reached only by boat, on that one item alone there is over $1 million.

Mr. Ferguson: Out of the $4 million?

Mr. Garson: Yes; out of the $4 million.

Mr. Ferguson: Is that part of the country weather-bound any time during the 365 days of the year?

Mr. Garson: I suggest that my hon. friend ask his fellow member behind him not as to whether it is weather-bound by cold but as to whether there are not at these places problems of communication, freight shipment and the like, and of getting materials in to do the work.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister say where these headquarters are being constructed?

Mr. Garson: At places all around the coast of Newfoundland. I could give my hon. friend the details.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the minister give the names of the places?

Mr. Garson: Harbour Grace, Hawkes Bay, Ferryland, Glovertown, Harbour Breton, Hampden, Burgeo, Baie Verte, Twillingate, Deer Lake, Stephenville Crossing, Clarenville, Stephenville, Whitbourne, Burin, St. Lawrence and Placentia.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Only two or three of those would be ice-bound during the winter and spring.

Mr. Garson: I am not suggesting that it is merely a question of being ice-bound. I am suggesting that by reason either of cold weather, as in Aklavik for example, or by reason of difficulties of communication, or of their being storm-bound at certain periods, or because of other difficulties which have to do with the ease of construction, when these buildings are to go up in an isolated locality it makes a great deal of difference as to whether we can get men in within a certain period of time, as compared with say Rockcliffe or Toronto.

When my hon. friend stops to reflect he will realize that when we are talking about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment buildings being constructed at these isolated points, we are undertaking an entirely different type of construction problem from that which we would have in a large city. There is the problem not only of weather, but of getting skilled tradesmen out to an isolated area, away from the city where they are now in great demand. Having regard to all the problems which arise in connection with the construction of these buildings, I do not think that my hon. friends of the official opposition, who like to be fair—as a rule they are very fair—would want to question our statement that there is a difficult problem in getting this work completed at these places, and berate me because I cannot get up and honestly say to my fellow members: "I am sure that if you vote $4 million, it is all going to be spent come next January". I cannot do that. No honest man could.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to say only this. I do not think the minister is quite right in saying there are special difficulties in most of these places. Most of the places he has mentioned are well known and are accessible at almost any time of the year.

Mr. Fulton: Places in Newfoundland, you mean?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is places in Newfoundland that I am speaking about. I should say there is no special difficulty with regard to most of those places.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

430. Pensions to families of members of the mounted police who have lost their lives while on duty, as detailed in the estimates, $6,863.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the minister whether, when they took over the Newfoundland Rangers, the men received the pension rights under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and whether their families can also benefit from the pension fund created for the families of the mounted police.

Mr. Garson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. When the Rangers were taken into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police their pension rights were protected, subject to their paying for their service in the other force; that is, in the Rangers force. That was done on the same basis as that upon which—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was the basis the same as that on which the civil service of Newfoundland was taken in?

Mr. Garson: I cannot say whether it was the same as the civil service, but I know that it was the same basis as that upon which we took over the British Columbia provincial police. In taking over those provincial police forces we have to preserve, as regards pension rights, a parity between the various provincial forces. That is where the comparison is made. We applied to Newfoundland the same principle that we had previously applied to British Columbia.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under this item 430, at page 476 of the details I notice that the amounts are quite different. I should like to ask what is the principle on which the amounts are fixed?

Mr. Garson: The pensions are paid to families of members of the mounted police who have lost their lives while on duty, and the amount which is paid is half the pay to which the deceased mounted policeman was entitled.

Mr. Fulton: Have the increases been occasioned by the fact that he would now have been in receipt of more pay had he lived? Is that the occasion for the increase? I am not complaining about the increases, because they are all small. We should just like to know the basis of it; that is all. I suppose it is because salaries have increased in the meantime.

Mr. Garson: No. These are, in substantial part, old cases which have been carried on under this allowance when it was created. There was not always a provision in the statute for a pension of that sort, and prior to that provision being made there was a separate item in the estimates to take care of it. These are a carryover, and the adjustment is as between their previous status and the new status under this new statute.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

173. Departmental administration, $338,505.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister intend to make any general statement on introducing the estimates of his department? I would suggest that if he sees his way clear to do it, he might do so by a particular reference to two subjects: First, the way in which he proposes to deal with amendments to the Criminal Code; and second, the report of the royal commission on combines legislation. I make that suggestion for this reason. If we are to be told, as perhaps we are, that it is still intended to introduce the bill on the Criminal Code during this session, then it would suggest, at any rate, that we do not now pursue too closely any inquiries into the Criminal Code and that whole subject. In the same way if the minister can tell us what the proposal is with respect to the report of the committee on combines legislation, if we did ask questions at least they would be more pertinent to that question than if we just covered the whole field. Therefore I think it would be appreciated if the minister would make some sort of statement on at least these two subjects.

Mr. Garson: I do not know whether it has come to the attention of the hon. member, but a bill on the Criminal Code was introduced in the Senate and is being considered there now by a Senate committee. It will come back to this house in due course and be debated on second reading, and again in committee. Therefore I would be merely anticipating the debate which would have to take place in any case. Indeed I doubt very much whether I would be in order, debating at another time in the house a matter which is already under consideration, having regard especially to the fact that it was mentioned in the speech from the throne and therefore cannot be anticipated in a debate of this kind.

Mr. Fulton: I was really seeking information as to whether it is to be proceeded with at this session.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fulton: There have been rumours to the contrary.

Mr. Garson: They are unfounded. Certainly so far as the Department of Justice and the government are concerned the intention is to proceed with the new Criminal Code at this session. It has been introduced in the Senate; it will be dealt with there, and it will come back here and be passed. A great deal of work has been done on it already. The work of the committee which prepared it extended over a period of three years. They did a really good job, and consequently we should not have much trouble with it.

With regard to the report of the MacQuarrie committee, that has been received and tabled. Only today the Prime Minister and I signed the resolution which is to go on the order paper leading up to the Combines Investigation Act amendment bill. This as a money bill. It will be introduced in the course of the next day or so, and will go through the ordinary routine.

I did not think there was any other part of the Department of Justice that required any introductory remarks by myself, with the possible exception of the penitentiaries. When we get to that item I might make a short statement reviewing the major developments of the last year, which might not be too apparent from a hasty reading of the annual report.

Item agreed to.

175. Administration of justice—miscellaneous expenditure, including expenses of litigated matters, $21,200.

Mr. Fulton: There is a matter on which I want the minister to comment. I am sure he will have read, and with a great deal of interest, the report of an address by General J. A. Clark, Q.C., of Vancouver, the president of the Canadian Bar Association, to the Alberta section of the bar association. The article dealing with appointments to the bench was reprinted starting on page 28 of the January issue of the Canadian Bar Review. General Clark makes a number of most interesting comments. It is late in the day to start a general debate on the matter if, indeed, such should be necessary. But the starting point of my approach to this would be the reference he makes to the resolution passed by the bar association in 1949, as follows:

> That the government of Canada be requested to consult with a committee consisting of the chief justice of the province and the chief justice of the trial division and representatives of the benchers of the law society in the province mentioned before making any appointment to the bench of that province.

As a starter I was going to ask the minister to make some reference to that resolution, and indeed to the whole matter of the article, because it is an important one. It is four minutes to six, and I do not know whether the minister feels that he could cover it in four minutes. I rather doubt it.

Mr. Garson: I do not really think one could cover it in four minutes. As my hon. friend indicates, this is a very important matter, one which is worthy of comment and upon which I would be most happy to make some comments, because while I agree with many of General Clark's observations I do not by any means agree with all of them, and I would very much like the opportunity to indicate the ones with which I do not agree.

Mr. Fulton: Could we call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Is item 175 carried?

Mr. Fulton: No. The minister himself said he did not think he could cover it before six o'clock.

Mr. Garson: Let that item stand, and we can go on with the other items and come back to it.

Item stands.

The Deputy Chairman: Then item 175 stands. Is item 176 carried?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

176. Administration, $165,216.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question with regard to temporary assistance. The details appear on page 215 and show that the salaries for the permanent positions amount to $181,000 and for the temporary positions, $106,000. I would like a word as to that. We know it exists throughout the service. I should like to know the reason for that large percentage.

Mr. Garson: In the department we have two classes of employees. One class is the permanent and the other those who are temporary. I cannot at the moment give a specific definition of the two groups so as to define their characteristics, but I am right in saying that the words "temporary" and "permanent" do not possess in the context the dictionary meanings that we usually ascribe to these words.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is six o'clock. Perhaps when we meet again the minister will be able to let us know what the conditions of employment, salaries and pensions are vis-à-vis one another.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

AVIATION GASOLINE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LIFTING OF RESTRICTIONS ON JUNE 3, 1952

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on May 9 I made a statement regarding restrictions upon the consumption of aviation gasoline. This action was necessary because of decreased production in the United States brought about by a strike in the petroleum industry. I am very pleased to be able to announce that on June 3 the restrictions on the use of aviation gasoline in Canada will be lifted. This action is in line with that taken in the United States. The situation there has improved very materially with the reopening of refineries in that country and it is expected that within due time this situation will be reflected in increased supplies available to Canadian users.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

VANCOUVER HOTEL, VANCOUVER, AND EMPRESS HOTEL, VICTORIA—THREATENED STRIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he assure the house that every effort is being made to avert threatened strikes of hotel employees at the Vancouver hotel, Vancouver, B.C., and at the Empress hotel, Victoria, B.C.?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member advised me that he intended to ask a question in regard to the employees of the Vancouver hotel at Vancouver and the Empress hotel at Victoria. In answering I will deal first with the situation at the Empress hotel at Victoria. There is a dispute as to the terms of a new collective bargaining agreement between the employees and the management of the hotel. This hotel, being operated by a private corporation, is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government of British Columbia and I am informed that the usual conciliation services have been extended by that government. However, I am also informed that the dispute still exists and the representatives of the employees have notified the hotel management that the services of the employees will be withdrawn at midnight on June 3.

In regard to the Vancouver hotel at Vancouver the situation is somewhat different in that this hotel comes under the jurisdiction of the federal authorities because of the nature of its ownership. Here too the negotiations between the union and the management have failed to bring about a settlement of the terms of a new contract. On the recommendation of my officers I appointed a conciliation board following the failure of direct negotiations. Two members of the board made a majority report and the third member made a minority report.

Representatives of the employees have notified me that the provisions of the majority report are acceptable to the employees. The representatives of the management have the matter under consideration. This morning I was advised by the national vice-president of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees and Other Transport Workers that the employees will withdraw their services from the Vancouver hotel at midnight, June 3, 1952. I have some hope that the parties may reach an agreement before the time set for the strike.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON CANAL—REMOVAL OF WRECKAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. What is the reason for the delay in removing the wreckage of the Burlington canal bridge?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): The question of the cause of delay in replacing the Burlington canal bridge recently wrecked is one that necessitated having to give consideration to the problem from two different angles, first the permanent replacement and second the temporary replacement. In this case the location of the temporary replacement, which undoubtedly will have a bearing on the permanent replacement, had to be given consideration. We had to contact interested parties such as the department of highways and the Hamilton harbour commission.

The question of the removal of the wrecked bridge is one that had to be given consideration from the standpoint of whether it was to be scrapped or an attempt made to put it back in its original location. This required considerable investigation of contractors' proposals with relation to both projects.

In connection with the removal we contacted all local qualified contractors and it was necessary to give considerable study to the method suggested and the price asked by each. It was only yesterday that we received a proposal from a contractor whose methods were considered satisfactory and whose price was materially below that of any of the other proposals. A start is to be made within a week and it is anticipated that the wreck will be removed in from three to four weeks. Plans and specifications are now ready covering a temporary pile trestle for which tenders will be called immediately and we will be in a position to proceed with construction thereof on completion of the removal of the wreckage.

STEEL

INQUIRY AS TO RELAXATION OF CONTROLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. In view of recent press reports that there is a good chance for the early relaxation of controls on steel perhaps the minister would care to make a statement.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The difficulty about making any statement with regard to the relaxation of controls on steel arises from the fact that there is a possibility of a strike occurring in the steel industry in the United States. Aside from that there has been some easing in the supply of reinforcing steel and the regulations in that regard have been relaxed for buildings using only a small amount of that type of steel. Controls must be maintained as long as we require substantial imports from the United States under the controlled materials plan. There is no way in which Canadian users can qualify for imports from the United States except through the Department of Defence Production.

Supplies of structural steel and heavy steel plate are still difficult, probably as difficult as at any time in the last two years. Therefore, there is not much hope of relaxing the regulations in that regard until Canadian production comes in during the fourth quarter of 1952. We hope that then the situation of shortage will be materially eased.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a sum not exceeding $263,348,439.58, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $960,833.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 37 and 179, and a sum not exceeding $2,069,454.41, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 21, 24, 39, 229, 232, 234, 236, 237, 238, 241, 242, 448, of the said estimates be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953.

He said: Mr. Chairman, the proposed bill, which is in the usual form, will provide $\frac{1}{12}$th of all the items which fall within the main estimates for the current fiscal year, and an additional $\frac{1}{6}$th of two special items in respect of which charges will come for payment in the early part of the year, notably freight assistance on feed grains from western Canada, and an additional $\frac{1}{12}$th of twelve special items to provide for services of a seasonal nature on which the heaviest payments fall due early in the year, such as branch experimental farms, quality premiums on hogs and various surveys in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

The general proportion of $\frac{1}{12}$th for all services is intended to provide for all necessary ordinary requirements to the end of June. The additional proportions requested for certain special items are necessary owing to heavy seasonal expenses for certain services at this time of year. As I have indicated, the form of the bill is the same as the bill passed at this time last year and for previous years, except that section 5 has been amended to conform with the terms of the new Financial Administration Act which came into force some time ago.

The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time throughout the balance of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have no questions to raise in regard to this usual request, except that I would ask the minister whether the collections of government revenues up to the present time give any indication, as they did a year ago, of a surplus which eventually proved to be quite large. A year ago, almost to this very day, I pointed out to the minister that at that time there was already an indication of a big surplus, and asked him whether he thought that was likely to give a guide for the year. I do not happen to have seen the figures for this year, so I would ask the minister if he could give them.

Mr. Abbott: No, I have not the figures. In point of fact, Mr. Chairman, I was discussing the matter the other day with my deputy minister. We proposed, at one time, to issue the figures for the first two months. There will be some change in the way in which the figures will be presented in this respect. Last year I found that there appeared to be considerable misinterpretation and misunderstanding of the actual results arising out of the fact that the larger charges come in for inclusion in the figures in the latter part of the year. It seemed to me that a more accurate picture would be given from month to month of the public accounts if some of these annual charges could be pro-rated throughout the year. I asked the controller of the treasury to look into that question to see if it could not properly be done.

I understand it is going to be done, and the first statement which comes out will reflect that suggestion. On the first question the hon. member asked me I am informed, although I have not seen the detailed figures, that as usual the first month of the year will show a surplus, since a large part of the payments which are made in that month are charged against the previous year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister, I take it, has not got these figures to give us at the moment?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am interested in the warning which the minister gave us, and which we have heard before. With deference, I would say that last year he was proven to be very wide of the mark.

Mr. Knowles: We can also take it that, as usual, the various items provided in this bill, together with the items provided in the previous interim supply bill, do not in any case add up to twelve-twelfths?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Graydon: Before the resolution carries I should like to take this opportunity, if I may, to raise a question which I raised previously, and perhaps to amplify it slightly. The last time no answer was given, but I have no doubt that inadvertently the minister overlooked it. The question concerns the government use of the services of so many of our smaller business people, in both agriculture and industry, for the purpose of collecting government taxes. I raised the question before, and I raise it again now, to give the minister an opportunity of explaining that situation. I was not raising it in any critical way, but it has been concerning me and I think it has concerned a good many people that the government should be using so many people who can ill afford the expense to which they are put in the collection of government taxes.

I want to add to that another factor which has become more widespread than it used to be, because not only does the small fellow have to collect income taxes at the source for his two or three employees and keep an extra set of books in order to make accurate returns for the government, but in addition to that there is the question of sales taxes. In many instances the employer has to concern himself with these excise taxes as well as unemployment insurance, and it takes a great deal of attention and causes a good deal of expense. On top of that, the bureau of statistics has walked in on the little businessman all over the country. I am not suggesting we should not have the information, but I am wondering whether or not all of that expense should be borne by the little fellows across the country who are having a difficult time to make ends meet.

I do not know whether the minister has seen the questionnaire sent out by the bureau, and I suppose he cannot be expected to look over every publication of the government, but if he does look at one he will find it is very intricate and difficult to answer. The questions not only include particulars about his business, but sometimes seem to go too far with respect to the information requested. All of these things have to be done at the expense of the little fellow, and I am wondering whether or not it is actually becoming discriminatory so far as our taxpayers are concerned. I should like to ask the minister for an explanation of that, but as I say I have not been unduly critical of it.

Mr. Abbott: I apologize to the hon. member. He raised the question the other day and I had intended to answer it but I overlooked doing so. I take it he is referring to the obligation which is imposed on employers, for instance, to deduct taxes at the source and remit them to the Receiver General of Canada. The short answer to his question is, of course, that that is one of the obligations of citizenship. Our tax structure is progressive. The smaller businessman pays a smaller tax, whether he operates as an individual or whether he operates in corporate form. In the case of a corporation a small business, as we know, has a lower tax rate than the larger one.

If the businessman or other employer who is required to deduct and remit these taxes were to be compensated for that, we would have to impose additional taxes in order to pay that compensation. Those taxes would have to fall on him. Since the obligation is rather widespread throughout the country, I must say that I had never thought there was any real inequity in imposing what, as I say, seems to me to be an obligation of citizenship imposed upon those who are engaged in business undertaking. To the best of my recollection my hon. friend is the first one, since I have been the Minister of Finance, who has raised the question in the terms in which he has raised it. I have heard individual taxpayers, chiefly large corporations, complain about the expense they are put to in order to deduct taxes on wages at the source, to remit sales tax and so on. Admittedly that requirement does involve extra accounting and overhead charges; but as I have pointed out to all those who have complained, if we did not do that we would have to increase substantially our overhead charges ourselves and impose taxes to pay for them. On balance I think the system which is in force today, and which resembles that in force in other countries which have tax systems similar to ours, is a substantially fair one.

Mr. Graydon: I can understand the minister's point of view in that matter, but I think a halt must be called some time to the burden placed on people, particularly the little fellow in business, industry and agriculture. Year by year he is being loaded with further burdens. It is not only a question of collection of the income tax at the source but it also concerns other taxes and other reports, to the point that if you are going to be in business now—and nearly the same thing applies in agriculture—you have got to have some kind of accountant at your elbow in order to carry out the requirements and to meet the burdens that the government is imposing on you. I think a review should be made, either by the Department of Finance or by some other department, of the burdens which I have described and as to how they are actually affecting the little fellow across the country.

I am sure the government has not in mind discriminating in this matter. But on the other hand, unless somebody raises this question, this thing may go on to the point that it will become unbearable. I think now would be a good time for the government to call a halt on the burdens and the levies they are making in this way upon businesses generally, and to see whether or not some more simplified method can be found so that these people will not find the burden quite so heavy, both in the matter of expense and in work.

It is all very well for us here to adopt a big, high-level attitude about taxation and such things. But on the other hand, if you are in a little store, or on a farm, you have not all the facilities which government departments have to make these reports. It is one thing for somebody in an office in Ottawa to figure out some nice report that is to be made by somebody several thousand miles away; but that somebody is going to find it rather difficult, sometimes, to make that report especially without some assistance. I think a halt should be called before further burdens are imposed. I think a review ought to be made of the burdens that are at present in existence.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend can rest assured that we are constantly looking for ways to simplify and to improve our methods. May I assure him also that I share his concern about the little fellow.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister comment more specifically on that portion of the observations by the hon. member for Peel which related to the present activities of the dominion bureau of statistics which are increasing the obligations of many small businesses in the matter of making returns? We all regard the dominion bureau of statistics as a valuable governmental bureau; but in my experience, of late I have been receiving more complaints than previously about the multiplicity of returns which the bureau is requiring businesses to make. Does the minister care to comment specifically with regard to the matter?

Mr. Abbott: I am not too familiar with the detailed operations of the bureau of statistics. It may or may not be the case that they are asking for more returns than they need. My hon. friend is as fully aware as I am of the vital part that up-to-date and accurate statistics play in the conduct of modern business and modern government. The completion by businessmen and individuals of returns to the bureau of statistics is an obligation of citizenship such as that to which I referred in regard to tax deductions. I feel sure, however, that the remarks which he has made will be noted by the dominion statistician; I will see that they are brought to his attention. I am speaking broadly now, but I do not believe that the bureau of statistics is unreasonable with regard to the type of information which it asks for from the Canadian businessmen.

Mr. Knowles: While we are on this general item which provides for one-twelfth of all the estimates of all departments, there is a question which I should like briefly to put again to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I note that he is still in his place and perhaps he might deal with my question if he is in a position to do so. It relates to the matter which I raised yesterday on the orders of the day, namely the declaration of martial law in South Korea by Syngman Rhee.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday that he had received no official information and therefore felt that it was not proper for him to comment at that time. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs knows why some of us are concerned about events there, and I am sure that he shares our concern. We all know that the United Nations went into Korea in support of the principle that there ought to be collective resistance to aggression. But happenings in South Korea do have a bearing on the morale of the nations involved in the Korean conflict, and it does seem that the principles of democracy are being rather flagrantly violated by Syngman Rhee.

As the minister indicated to me yesterday, there is a United Nations commission on the unification and rehabilitation of Korea which has made suggestions to the government there concerning democratic processes, but that is about as far as the minister's answer went yesterday. The matter is very much in the news. The reports from South Korea are exceedingly disturbing. I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had, since yesterday, any further report on the basis of which he might make a statement or whether he would comment on what attitude Canada takes toward this matter, and what the United Nations is doing about it?

Mr. Abbott: Before my colleague answers, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might raise this point? I am not sure whether or not it is in order, when we are in committee of supply, to discuss any question which may arise under the estimates. It may be that it is in order. I am not sufficiently expert in the rules to be sure whether it is or not. I have some doubts; but even if it is in order, I would hope that we do not embark upon general debate on interim supply. In my experience it has never been done when we are in committee. Some speeches have been made when the Speaker was in the chair, but not when we were in committee. I realize that we did not have to have a motion to go into committee of supply today; and for that reason I am not objecting to a reply being made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But there are, of course, opportunities to ask such questions either on the orders of the day or when the estimates of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are under discussion. In any case, I am just appealing to the committee to try to keep the general debate down as much as possible and perhaps more strictly in line with expenditures rather than to discuss general questions of international affairs.

Mr. Knowles: I was not trying to take undue advantage of what I think to be our right on this item to discuss almost anything; but the fact is that we are being asked to vote one-twelfth of the items of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: This is a question about which some of us are concerned. I had thought of repeating my question on the orders of the day today but since we were going into committee of supply, I thought it might be more suitable on both sides to ask it at this stage.

Mr. Abbott: That is all right.

Mr. Pearson: On this occasion I do not want to deal at any length with the point which has been raised by my hon. friend, which indeed he raised yesterday. The reason will, I am sure, commend itself to him. We have followed with interest and with concern the reports that have appeared about political developments in South Korea, because we have now a special concern with that part of the world.

But before making any statement on the matter I want to be quite sure—and I know the house would want me to be quite sure—that the reports in the press are accurate, in their essential particulars at least. Therefore we have been making inquiries through sources that are open to us—we have no diplomatic representative in Korea—and we hope to have a report on this matter shortly.

Press reports indicate, as hon. members know, that martial law has been declared in South Korea by the head of the government there, on the ground that communist activity in Pusan and in other places makes such a declaration desirable at this time. Hon. members also know that there is to be an election in Korea in July. The relationship between these two developments is not quite obvious at the moment, but there may be one. However, I would prefer not to say anything more about it until we get a more authoritative report than is before us now. The estimates of External Affairs will be before the house shortly and I may be in a position to make a longer statement on the subject at that time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add a word to what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton. No one has a higher appreciation of the bureau of statistics than I have, and yet, there is a danger that people who are expert and keen in what they are doing may just like to go on and on. I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not oblivious of this, but I would like to feel also that perhaps the finance department is keeping an eye on these things, because unless they are strictly controlled they can go on and on to infinity.

Mr. Abbott: I can assure my hon. friend that his remarks will be brought to the attention of the bureau of statistics; but I can also assure him that the finance department uses the material made available by the bureau of statistics to a very great extent.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $263,348,439.58, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953;

2. The sum of $960,833.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 37 and 179 of the said estimates; and

3. The sum of $2,069,454.41, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 21, 24, 39, 229, 232, 234, 236, 237, 238, 241, 242, 448, of the said estimates; as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 288, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1953.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.
