NATIONAL ANTHEM

DESIGNATION OF "O CANADA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion which I hope will commend itself to the House and give effect to what I perceive to be a desire by members of all parties in this House for a declaration that "O Canada" be the national anthem of Canada.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That Bill C-220, an act respecting the national anthem of Canada, standing in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe South, be called this day on orders of the day, and that, notwithstanding any Standing Order, the bill be considered at second reading, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and considered at third reading, and that no later than 4 p.m. this day all questions necessary to dispose of the said bill be put to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Trudeau: No. What are the words?

RISING OIL PRICES—CALL FOR COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Owing to the fact that Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about rising oil prices, while at the same time oil company profits continue to increase, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That presidents of the various Canadian oil companies be invited to appear before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and be allowed an opportunity to explain the profit picture of their companies and how these profits are spent, and that Mr. T. C. Douglas, former NDP leader, now a director of a major oil company, be allowed to appear to explain his company's high profits.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Who is against Tommy Douglas?

CONDEMNATION OF CFL DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADIAN ATHLETES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Football League has a designated import rule which discriminates against Canadian quarterbacks; and in view of the fact that the result of this rule is that outstanding Canadian athletes, such as Jamie Bone, are excluded from consideration by Canadian clubs and end up having to play for second-rate teams like the Dallas Cowboys; and in view of the fact that CFL Commissioner Gaudaur yesterday announced that the CFL has refused to change this rule, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House condemn the CFL for their failure to treat Canadian quarterbacks fairly, and instructs the minister to contact the CFL and make it clear that if this discrimination is not changed, the government will take strong measures, up to and including legislation if necessary, to force the CCFL—the CCF—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: We are now the NDP.

Mr. Benjamin:

—to force the CFL to abandon its totally unacceptable and ludicrous discrimination against Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INHUMAN TREATMENT OF TAIWAN NATIONALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning Dr. C. M. Kao, general secretary of the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan, who has recently been seized by the Taiwanese police, and also with respect to the fact that a member of his office staff was arrested last January and has been held in solitary confinement ever since, reportedly under the most inhuman treatment and with attempts to force her to confess to whatever she is told to say. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the House respectfully requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to review all available details of this case in order to determine whether a severe violation of human rights as defined under the Helsinki agreement, and police state tactics, have and are taking place, and that the minister be respectfully asked to take whatever action may be within Canada's means to assist these individuals if a violation of human rights is indeed determined.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

P.E.I.—SERVICING OF FISHERMEN'S LIFE RAFTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that some 92 fishermen in the province of Prince Edward Island now have to have servicing to their life rafts done in Halifax, at considerable extra expense, while up to this year they could get the servicing completed in Prince Edward Island, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the Minister of Transport immediately make arrangements with the manufacturer, Beaufort Canada, to reinstate a service department for these life rafts on Prince Edward Island, so that the fishermen of P.E.I. will not suffer due to a thoughtless administrative decision by Beaufort Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—CONTRIBUTIONS OF PRIME MINISTER AND LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the superb and distinguished contribution of the right hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the right hon. Joseph Clark on behalf of their respective national parties in the referendum campaign, and in view of the fact that both leaders have stated in clear, concise terms their respective party's stand on the referendum question, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons):

That this House of Commons applaud their actions during this crucial time in Canadian history and, indeed, lends its unanimous support to their continuing efforts in fostering Canadian unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I suppose we have unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Blais: The NDP said "No".

Madam Speaker: We have not?

DEPLORABLE MAIL CONDITIONS IN CALGARY NORTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, concerning the deplorable mail conditions in Calgary North. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the Postmaster General and this government direct the Post Office to immediately commence regular mail service in all areas of Calgary North where delivery has been lacking for a period longer than 60 days.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PLIGHT OF CUBANS FLEEING TO UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Given the increasing number of Cuban citizens fleeing their country to the United States, and the inability of the international community to take action because these people cannot be classed as refugees under the United Nations' definition, and the deteriorating relationship that has come about between the United State and Cuba, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That this House urge the Government of Canada to consult with the United States government, the Cuban government and other governments in the western hemisphere with a view to forming a consensus that would lead to the resolution of this tragic situation.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE WORLD COMMUNITY

RECOGNITION OF CONTRIBUTION OF ISLAM AND CANADIANS OF ISLAMIC FAITH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas Islam has recently entered the fifteenth century since its founding, an event which is universally celebrated, and whereas Islam is one of the world's great religions, encompassing peoples of all cultures, and whereas Islam strives for a brotherly community transcending the superficial differences of race, history or nationality and is thus being implementary of the spirit of multiculturalism, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy):

That this House take note of the contribution of Islam and Canadians of Islamic faith and wish them success in their continuing pursuits to give reality to a truly multicultural society that is Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House before it could be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SPORTS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT ON SITE OF 1985 SUMMER GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of increasing costs, and the anxiety of the citizens of New Brunswick to have a decision made as soon as possible as to the site of the 1985 Summer Games, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the house instruct the minister responsible for amateur sports and fitness to make up his mind and make the announcement before the Lakehead Games in 1981, so that the host community can commence planning.

Madam Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, unanimous consent is required before this motion can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement by the Minister of Energy yesterday that the Q and M pipeline would go only as far as Quebec, can the right hon. gentleman please tell the House, and especially the people of Atlantic Canada, what factors have changed since his speech on energy before the Board of Trade in Halifax on January 25, 1980, when he promised, among other things, to "take immediate action for the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes", without making any mention of delay because of environmental studies, proven reserves off Atlantic Canada or federal assistance?

Since, in the Prime Minister's own immortal words, "like the railways of the 1880s, energy pipelines in the 1980s have the potential to be a steel link uniting the nation", my question to the right hon. gentleman is this: how can you link a nation when you stop at Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would suggest that the hon. member go back to the drawing board and check what the Prime Minister said in Halifax. I suggest, also, that it is quite inappropriate to try to put on the record a quotation which is not correct. If the hon. gentleman wants to get the right quote, we will answer his question.

Mr. Nowlan: I was really hoping for something more from the Prime Minister. I listened to the Minister of Energy in this House last night when he tried to answer the hon. member for South Shore—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member if he asks a question.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, that is why I deliberately did not put my question on such a fundamental matter of government policy to the Minister of Energy—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: —who was drawing a red herring as a diversion from the fundamental question involved.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nowlan: I will quote from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald.

An hon. Member: A point of order. Get on to the next speaker!

Mr. Nowlan: No wonder you are not the minister of communications.

An hon. Member: No wonder you were never one.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask his question forthwith, without any preamble. I have already allowed quite a long preamble on his first question.

● (1120)

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I will direct a question either to the right hon. Prime Minister or his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like either of those gentlemen to tell me where my question differed, in terms of a fundamental promise made to Atlantic Canada, from what I am about to read, published by the Liberal Party of Canada in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on Saturday, February 2, quoting the speech of the Prime Minister to the Board of Trade.

There would be a natural gas pipeline to ensure all Canadians—

Not Canadians who live in any one part of the country.

—access to their resources. Liberals would take immediate action to begin negotiations for construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes. Initially it would carry natural gas east but when maritime supplies are ready, the pipeline would be like a natural gas railroad with a return delivery facility as well.

Would the minister tell me where I misstated the facts?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am glad that in his further question the hon. member indeed has changed substantially the quote he was attributing to the Prime Minister. He will see in the record tomorrow, if he looks at Hansard, that there is a substantial difference between what he has now said and what he said in his previous question.

In case he has any doubt, I will read to him what has been stated by the Prime Minister and quoted by his own colleague from Nova Scotia who was speaking in the House yesterday and who said, quoting the Prime Minister, that the Prime Minister said in Halifax that Liberals "would take immediate action to begin negotiations for construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes."

This we did when we took office. I have already been in touch with the provinces concerned, and I indicated in the House yesterday that indeed one of the problems that we had to face, and which has been recognized by the National Energy Board, is that the environmental studies required have not been carried out to the satisfaction of the National Energy Board.

Second, before finally proceeding to a decision on the building of the pipeline, it was advisable to assess the resources that are available in terms of natural gas off Sable Island, and the government of New Brunswick, as recently as last week at a meeting I had with the government of New Brunswick, insisted on the position it had taken before the National Energy Board to the effect that all alternatives should be carefully examined before we embark definitively on this project.

We are still of the opinion that the gas pipeline to the maritimes is still the preferred option of this government, but we want to do it in an orderly way and make sure that the consumers and workers of the maritimes and the maritime provinces concerned will all benefit from it.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. No questions of environmental studies were raised when this matter was mentioned and promised by the Prime Minister in January.

My question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who raises environmental studies, is really twofold. Why is such a fundamental question of government policy, i.e., a pipeline to Atlantic Canada, even placed before the National Energy Board, since we all know it is feasible and will need financial help like the railways needed it back in the 1880s.

Also, since he has had other capacities in earlier governments in terms of moving oil across this country, and was at one time minister of federal-provincial relations, can the minister tell this House how, in Atlantic Canada, you can dilute an alienation factor that is there, as it is in other parts of the country, when Atlantic Canada looks to James Bay, which did not have an environmental study at all and now is on-stream and producing power, and when the Government of Canada today is using environmental studies for the first time, which could go on along with the pipeline study and would not have to be used as a scapegoat?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I regret that the hon. member has to resort to such irresponsible statements as the one he has just made—

Mr. Andre: He is right on, and you know it.

Mr. Lalonde: —to try to support his argument. In terms of the James Bay area, which is under provincial control and jurisdiction, the hon. member should know that the government of Quebec did carry out environmental studies. They were carried out by the government of Quebec.

Second, as far as this particular project is concerned, I am amazed, again, that the hon. member would suggest that we would show no respect for the fact that the environmental concerns have not been taken into account appropriately, according to the National Energy Board and, second, that we should ignore and reject the point of view expressed quite clearly, again as recently as last week, by one of the maritime provinces, the government of New Brunswick, which has said that we should be carefully studying all the alternatives.

I am amazed that the hon. member would resort to that kind of argument on an issue which is so important. This pipeline is something for which we have argued and we will keep giving a high priority to it, but we will not do it by running roughshod over the concerns of provincial governments and by ignoring basic issues concerning the environment. I think that is a wise decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DATE NATURAL GAS WILL BE FLOWING INTO MARITIMES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has neatly skirted some of the pertinent decisions that should have been made, and promises that were made.

The minister is reported to have stated that he is optimistic that gas will be flowing into the maritime region by 1982-83, but he has also indicated that he does not expect the pipeline to Quebec will be completed by 1985. Can the minister explain this apparent discrepancy and, under those circumstances, how does he plan to get the gas to the maritime region by 1982-83 if the pipeline to Quebec City will not be completed until 1985?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Indeed, Madam Speaker, it would be very hard to reconcile if I had ever said this, but I do not know where the hon. member got this particular information. I was in the House last night and, unless I was misquoted, I argued that, on the contrary, the realization of the pipeline to Quebec City should take place in 1981.

I said that the realization of that pipeline would help the eventual construction of a pipeline to the maritimes, by which time I would hope we would have had the information concerning environmental issues and on the reserves of natural gas off Sable Island. At that time, the Energy Board would be in a position to make recommendations to the cabinet on the basis of the full knowledge of the facts, including environmental factors.

Also, the fact that the pipeline would be constructed as far as Quebec City would allow for an early completion of this line. I do not think I have ever spoken about 1985 being the deadline for the Quebec pipeline. If there is such a report, it is certainly inaccurate.

Mr. Corbett: Can I take it, then, that the minister is committing himself to the statement that he has made, that gas will be flowing to the maritime region by 1982-83, which would naturally be an extension of the pipeline from Quebec City which, as the minister has just stated, should be completed by 1981?

I would like confirmation of that, however, from the minister; and in case the minister is not aware of the commitments that were made by his government, by his leader, and apparently by every other member of the Liberal caucus during the campaign, I have right here a copy of the ad which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald.

At that time, the commitment was made not only to extend the pipeline to the maritime region but to make it reversible. I would ask the minister to secure that commitment, and to assure the Atlantic region that he will indeed see that that pipeline is reversible so that Atlantic Canada will have an opportunity to be an exporter of energy, should they be in that fortunate position.

Mr. Lalonde: Again, the hon. member is trying to distort the answer I gave him a minute ago. He wants me to say there will be a reversible pipeline by 1982-83, whether or not gas is found off Sable Island. If the exploration proves negative and there are no reserves of commercial value over there, surely he would not argue that we must build that reversible pipeline by 1982-83.

It might be that we will have to build a pipeline with reversible capacity, or provide for the eventual capacity for reversible flow, but that is a very different thing from building a reversible pipeline. Indeed, what we indicated during the campaign and in the Halifax speech in which I quoted the Prime Minister is that we would begin negotiations to take immediate action for the construction.

Indeed, we began those negotiations as soon as we took office. We have the report from the National Energy Board. We will have to ensure that all factors are taken into account again and that the whole project will be to the benefit of the workers and consumers in the maritime provinces. That is our objective, that is our priority and that is what we will keep working at.

Mr. Andre: With whom are you negotiating?

Mr. Lalonde: I want to assure the hon. member that we will keep doing this. As to providing a specific date at the present time, again I think it would be irresponsible, before we have the reports and know how things have been going in terms of submissions by the concerned corporations.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE

POST OFFICE—REPORT OF CONCILIATION BOARD—GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Last night the report of the conciliation board studying the dispute between the government and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers was handed down to the two parties.

I realize the minister probably has not had time to study the report in great detail, but can he indicate whether or not he intends to reopen negotiations with the union, using this report as a basis for negotiations and, more importantly, will the minister now commit himself to a meeting of himself, the Postmaster General and representatives of the union before the union is in a position to strike?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, officials of the interested departments, including Treasury Board, are presently studying the report. The labour relations committee will be meeting this afternoon. The Postmaster General will be present at that meeting, as will the Minister of Labour and myself. I presume we will be making announcements after that meeting as to our posture and what further meetings we intend to have at that time.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, in this is a serious matter. They are in a position now to take a strike vote, and I would imagine that is what is immediately taking place and that within seven days we could be in a strike situation.

An hon. Member: We know that.

Mr. Parker: Is the minister prepared to meet immediately with this group, to sit down with the basis of that report and try to reach a compromise at this very, very crucial time?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it seems to me that I answered that question. Obviously, it is a matter of the highest priority with this government. That is why a meeting has been convened for late this afternoon between the interested members and other officials involved. I can assure the hon. member that it being a matter of the highest priority, we will do everything possible to try to avert a strike.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, in view of the seriousness of this matter—

An hon. Member: You have already said that.

Mr. Parker: —we are getting letters from everyone throughout the province and throughout the country. I want to ask the minister if he is prepared, on a daily basis, to report to this House as to what is taking place with these negotiations.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, this government has a policy of open government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I can assure the hon. member and all other members of this House that all relevant information which should be made available to parliamentarians will be made available.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is known as open-ended government.

BANK OF CANADA

RESISTANCE TO FALL OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and the first acting minister of finance, perhaps I could go to the second acting minister of finance, the President of the Treasury Board.

My question centres on the rather remarkable treasury bill auction which occurred yesterday when the Bank of Canada resisted the fall of interest rates in this country. Bearing in mind that when the government took power, interest rates in Canada were 2.5 points on the treasury bill level behind those in the United States, and now they are 4 points ahead of the comparable treasury bill level in the United States, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate to the House why this is an appropriate course for Canada to be following?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that indeed what he has said is correct, and that the governor of the Bank of Canada has been following a policy of orderly transition and changes in the interest rates. We are very happy to see the fact that since this government has taken power the interest rates have come down some 3 percentage points.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again perhaps I could go to the President of the Treasury Board who, after all, is designated by the Prime Minister as the Acting Minister of Finance in the House.

An hon. Member: That was a mistake.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact that the parliamentary secretary has totally ignored the fact that up to the present time the government has claimed it had virtually no alternative but to allow interest rates to rise in this country because of the rising interest rates in the United States, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate why the government condoned the Bank of Canada action yesterday?

It was described by the governor of the Bank of Canada as one in which the "market pressure was resisted by the Bank of Canada, which acted vigorously, particularly in the last week, to moderate the rate of decline"—in our interest rates. It intervened to the extent of actually causing overnight money, that is, the cost of funds, to go to 18 per cent to 20 per cent just before the treasury bill levels were set yesterday.

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should realize that the Bank of Canada has followed a policy of moderation and smoothing of fluctuations of interest rates for a very long period of time now.

An hon. Member: You said it was floating.

Mr. Evans: In fact, during the period in which the government of members opposite was in power, interest rates were brought from a situation where they were above those in the United States to a position of some 2.5 to 3 percentage points below those in the United States.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true.

Mr. Evans: That means the Bank of Canada in fact resisted pressures of the upward move of interest rates then, and the Bank of Canada is now following a policy of an orderly reduction in interest rates, which is in the best interests of the country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): This is terrible.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Chrétien: Strike two; now he is going for strike three.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, as it is obvious the acting minister of finance is abdicating his role as acting minister of finance, perhaps I could go to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, the parliamentary secretary has misled the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Order.

Mr. Stevens: In fact, on March 5 the Treasury bill rate in Canada was 2.5 points behind the comparable level in the United States. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether he is willing to have the appropriate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that that committee can look into the interest rate structure in Canada, such as the Clark government had under way in the previous Parliament?

Mr. Foster: And look what happened to them.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must take exception to the remarks of the hon. member. He seems to object to any answer that does not satisfy his own point of view.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Certainly, the parliamentary secretary of any minister is enabled by this House to answer in the absence of the minister. Generally, he is closer to the minister than the acting minister because of the very nature of the portfolio. In this particular case, we happen to have a very brilliant economist as a parliamentary secretary—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and I think the hon. member should not complain about getting incomplete answers.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—ABILITY OF PATIENTS IN STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE HOSPITAL TO VOTE MAY 20

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. He is surely aware of the fact that several veterans at the Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue Hospital in Quebec will only be able to vote at home. Has the minister taken all necessary steps to provide means of transport so they may vote next Tuesday?

[English]

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, this has been brought to my attention. People who are on the voters' list have a right to vote. Being in the hospital is not a restriction; they can vote. I might say that for some unknown reason there has been a group of veteran patients in the Ste. Anne de Bellevue Hospital who have been denied the privilege of having their names placed on the revised voters' list. I regret that very much, but those who are able to vote will be assisted to vote in the polling stations set up in the hospital.

Also, I will conclude by saying that our staff in the hospital and the Department of Veterans Affairs will do everything possible to get those who decide to vote, to vote; those who are not cared for by relatives or other people.

ENERGY

SALE OF SURPLUS FUELS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, I should like to go back to the question of the maritime pipeline. I think it is assumed that all of us here are trying to get energy into the maritimes, particularly, at the lowest possible price.

Would the minister consider putting a reference before the National Energy Board, along with the present study, to see whether there is a market in the port cities of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces sufficient to warrant going to the producer companies in the surplus areas of propane and LPG fuels, where they are offering this very fine type of fuel at distress prices; these are the North Sea producers, North Africa, Venezuela and through the Persian Gulf?

Would the minister consider putting that as an additional term of reference to the National Energy Board, to see if there is a market and then get the Commodities Credit Corporation or PetroCan to deal with these producers to see whether we can get access to a 20-year contract for this cheap fuel?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the report of the National Energy Board has given extensive consideration, as a matter of fact, to the markets that would be accessible to natural gas via a pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

As to the suggestion made by the hon. member, I will take note of it and I will certainly give it very careful consideration. I think it is a very worth-while suggestion. I will consult with my officials and examine whether, indeed, there would be some advantage in asking the National Energy Board to give consideration to the point raised by the hon. member.

As the hon. member knows, however, although there may be some surplus, there are countries like Algeria, for instance, that are asking a lot more for their LPG these days, and the question of whether it could be competitive would certainly be a matter that would need to be looked into. I will certainly give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion.

INDUSTRY

CASH REBATE ON TRUCKS AND CARS—AVAILABILITY IN CANADA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In light of the fact that Chrysler Canada announced this week that Canadian buyers of trucks and cars would not be receiving the same cash rebate of $200 to $1,000 that is being offered to buyers in the United States, and in light of the fact that the latest consumer price index increase is due in part to higher car prices, will the minister take steps to ensure that the same rebate program is offered to Canadian consumers?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will look into this and get back to the hon. member. I think it is interesting to note that the total consumer price index in Canada increased by .7 per cent, seasonally adjusted, from the March level. This is appreciably lower than the 1.1 per cent advance registered in the immediately preceding month. Also, the 12-month rise is down marginally from the 12-month rise in the preceding month. I am surprised that the hon. member did not recognize that.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I am glad the minister had the chance to make his statement to the House. In view of the fact that the amount of money coming from this government is much higher, proportionally, than the money coming from the United States government to Chrysler Canada, and in view of the fact that the minister has known that Chrysler Canada was not offering these rebates to us for some length of time, will the minister get in touch immediately with Chrysler Canada to make sure that we, as Canadian consumers, get just as good a deal from Chrysler, especially since it is getting such a good deal from us?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am very glad my hon. friend in the NDP has officially recognized that we have obtained a good deal from Chrysler for Canadian workers and the Canadian people generally. I would like to make sure that is on the record.

Contrary to what my hon. friend says, we are not giving Chrysler money; we are not loaning them money directly; we are not giving them a grant; but we will be putting in place loan guarantees only in 1982, and only if it meets certain important terms and conditions.

As I have said to my hon. friend, I will be very happy to go into the matter he has raised. I must say that I was not aware of the details he has provided on this rebate program; but it is important that it be confirmed by the NDP that we have obtained a good deal from Chrysler for Canadian workers and the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO QUEBEC NOT POSTPONED

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and has to do with the extension of the pipeline to Quebec. Given the great many jobs—some 30,000 person-years, they say—created to carry out this project and also the economic effects that a market of about $1.1 billion represent, for Quebec, has the minister obtained guarantees from Quebec that there will not be any undue and unwarranted delay, as was the case in Boisbriand, in this project?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed I found deplorable the delays incurred in the implementation of this project, at least as regards the section between St-Lazare, Quebec, and Boisbriand, since it would otherwise have been possible to provide access to natural gas to tens of thousands of Montreal area residents and homes as early as this fall. The agencies concerned within the government of Quebec did not give this issue enough priority to allow for the completion of the project this year, at least as far as Boisbriand.

On the other hand, it should be noted that in its white paper the PQ government heralds access to natural gas in Quebec as being a very high priority. I therefore hope that Quebec authorities and agencies will take appropriate action so that this project can be accomplished without further delay and Quebeckers can use natural gas within the proposed time frame, that the project be completed during 1981. I count on the full co-operation of the Quebec government in this matter.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR NEW EMPHASIS ON POLICIES AND INCREASED BUDGET

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for planning and policy regarding civil defence, specifically the Prime Minister in this case.

In view of the concerns expressed by the Prime Minister, by the Leader of the Opposition and, indeed, by the Prime Minister of Japan, that we are entering a dangerous decade fraught with instabilities and deteriorating super power relations, given the prediction by a U.S. congressional committee that in the event of a nuclear attack on United States targets only, there would be up to two million casualties in Canada, and recognizing the acceleration of civil defence planning among those nations who pose a threat, as well as among our allies, is the Prime Minister prepared to place a new emphasis on civil defence policies and planning and increase the budget for civil defence in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had notice of the question. I am periodically briefed on the state of our civil defence. I know the structure is in place and I know that the provincial and municipal authorities, which are essential to the setting up of this structure, are co-operating. I have no cause now, nor have I received a request, to believe that there is need for increased funding. But I will look at the suggestion of the hon. member and make a decision on that basis.

Mr. Wenman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I accept the Prime Minister's response and anticipate a positive investigation. Specifically, I think he will find that the structures, while they might be in place, are decentralized to the point of chaos and that, in fact, the budgets have been decreased substantially over the past few years.

In view of the fact that the Soviet Union spent an estimated $65 billion on civil defence in the last ten years, that the Chinese possess a tunnel network capable of sheltering most city populations in a few minutes, that the French Senate called this week for urgent construction of atomic shelters because of heightened risk of nuclear war, and even United States cities are formulating contingency plans for the evacuation of inhabitants of their major cities, and in view of the reality that Canada has no shelter policy for Canadians, will the Prime Minister inform the House what measures are planned for Canadian cities in the event of a nuclear crisis and, in particular, for cities like Vancouver that sit in the shadow of military and industrial targets at close proximity in Seattle?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I will see if there is not a report which can be released and which may perhaps contain an update of the situation in civil defence. The hon. member complains about its decentralization character. Of course, he is aware—because of his interest in it—that this is the very nature of civil defence, that it must be decentralized. It has been structured on that basis to ensure that in the event of disruption of any one centre, the other centres can continue to operate and carry out their duties.

In a case of the government itself, a former prime minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, had constructed at Carp, not far from Ottawa, an area wherein the government could be carried on. There is provision there for not only the Governor General but the Prime Minister to remain in residence. I had the pleasure of visiting that underground complex some years ago.

Mr. Cossitt: Is there a pool and an $80,000 Cadillac?

Mr. Trudeau: I will see if we can make room there for the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, who certainly would be a very pleasant companion in such a place.

FISHERIES

NON-RATIFICATION OF U.S.-CANADA EAST COAST TREATY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who certainly knows how to talk tough to the provinces when that is required. I wonder if he is prepared to manifest the same degree of toughness with the Americans, now that it seems evident they have shelved for this year ratification of the east coast treaty.

My question to the minister is, in my estimation, no longer hypothetical: what steps is the government taking to protect the interests of the Canadian fishermen on the east coast of Canada in the absence of ratification of the treaty by the U.S. Senate? What steps is the government taking to ensure that these very important stocks, specifically the scallop stocks, are protected from the evident overfishing now taking place by the Americans?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, no later than yesterday morning I was discussing this issue with the American ambassador who was paying the usual courtesy visit. We reviewed this whole matter.

Also my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, informed me yesterday that in his first meeting with Secretary of State Muskie he had raised this very issue. The Canadian government's interest has been very clearly indicated to the United States Administration. As to whether the Senate will proceed, it is difficult for us to negotiate directly with the U.S. Senate, obviously.

As to the steps taken, while not prejudging whether the Senate will or will not ratify in the coming weeks, the fact is that we have made it very clear to the United States that no longer can we hold our fishermen back and see the level of the American catch increase, to our disadvantage. We had hoped that the treaty would be ratified by this time and that both sides would practice good conservation. We cannot hold our fishermen in a position that penalizes them in relation to their American counterparts.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could put a question to the Secretary of State of External Affairs. Last week he gave the House an undertaking that he would take this matter up with Secretary of State Muskie. He has obviously already done that. Can he report to the House on the outcome of his meeting with Secretary Muskie? May I also say to the minister, by way of a question, that the Americans are always talking about fraternity and friendship toward us. Did the minister tell his U.S. counterparts that this would be a tangible way for the U.S. Congress and the U.S. people to express their friendship and fraternity with Canada, by getting on with ratification of the treaty we negotiated in good faith?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, Mr. Muskie is no longer in the American House, so he is not able to speak on behalf of Congress. He now speaks for and deals with the administration. I made the strongest possible representations to him during our meeting.

The prospects for the treaty at the moment in the U.S. Senate are uncertain. The U.S. government, however, is certainly under no illusion about how high a priority we place on this treaty. My colleague and I, and other ministers, are formulating plans for dealing with the present situation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RISING INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to follow the line of questioning put to the right hon. Prime Minister by the hon. member for York-Peel. Is the Prime Minister prepared to confirm that when his government took office on March 5, the interest rates on treasury bills in Canada stood at 13.68 per cent, and that the comparable U.S. rates stood at 16 per cent, some 2.5 per cent higher than ours? Is he prepared to confirm that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as you know, statistical questions are not in order. I would be happy to attempt to answer this one by asking for time and inquiring into it. I will have the answer sent directly to the hon. member by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer. I think the Prime Minister will probably find that this will be confirmed, but I was asking for his confirmation as head of the government. The interest rate on treasury bills in Canada presently stands at 13.09 per cent, while the comparable U.S. rate is 9 per cent, a considerable amount lower than Canada, and Canada seems to be at some disadvantage.

Given that situation would the Prime Minister consider speaking to the Minister of Finance, if necessary, or take some steps himself to arrange for the convening of the standing committee and arrange for the appearance before it of the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, so that these matters can be cleared up?

I ask that question because this is a matter that the government was considering. Would he give it favourable consideration now, and indicate to the House the attitude of the government having those two people appear, so that we can continue the study of the distressing interest rates situation and the differential between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as far as the facts are concerned, I repeat that I do not know, but I take the hon. member's word if he says that figures in the United States and Canada stand as they do, then I assume they do. If he wants to argue the point of why one country should have a higher rate than the other, I suppose it can be tied to the state of the economy in both countries.

It should be clear to the hon. member that the United States have entered a serious recession, which Canada has not yet entered. We are concerned, of course, with the effect if might have on us. This is a matter of economic argument and discussion. In the last two days, the party opposite was free to ask any minister to appear in the House and to ask them questions. It is my understanding that they have not invited the Minister of Finance to discuss these very questions. I will convey to him the concern of the hon. member, but I am sure his answer will be, "I was there; I was available. Why did they not ask me questions, rather than wait for the day that I am not there?"

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary to those questions to the Prime Minister. Since he does not know how our interest rates have changed over time and how the American interest rates have changed, I should like to ask him a direct question.

Governor Bouey said yesterday that it was the policy—I see him pointing somewhere else to another brilliant economist: I am quite satisfied to ask him, and I am sure he is competent to answer this question. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said yesterday that it was now the policy of the Bank of Canada to stop Canadian interest rates from falling and to keep them up at an artificial level.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if that is the policy of his government at a time when unemployment figures announced on Tuesday showed a rise, and when we have had 49 months of unemployment at over 7 per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member suggested that I was pointing at another brilliant economist. I would suggest he should be more modest and hear the answer from the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as has been clear from previous statements, the policy of the Bank of Canada traditionally had been to moderate extreme fluctuations in the interest rate. That has been the policy, it continues to be the policy, and if it had not been for the policy of the Bank of Canada in the past to moderate upward changes in the interest rate, the interest rate in Canada would have exceeded or have continued to exceed that in the United States, which went far higher than that in Canada over the last year.

The policy of the Bank of Canada is to moderate interest rate changes so that we have an orderly market in this country, and that is the policy the Bank of Canada is continuing to follow.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, perhaps one could say that brilliance, like moderation, lies in the eyes of the beholder. My supplementary question is to the President of the Treasury Board. I would like the President of the Treasury Board to reflect on the fact that our artificially high interest rates are causing a run on Canada Savings Bonds which this week amounted to $345 million.

Given the policy of the governor of the Bank of Canada in propping up the interest rate, what is the policy now of the President of the Treasury Board, given the fact that this run on savings bonds is causing tremendous problems in debt management for his government.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I can assure you that in looking for brilliance, I am looking down this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is barren ground.

Mr. Stevens: You will not find it there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Clearly, this question is one which should be addressed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Stevens: You are the acting minister of finance.

Mr. Johnston: The Minister of Finance is not here today. The parliamentary secretary has given very complete answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: A number of us, particularly myself, Madam Speaker, have been in this House for two days answering questions in Committee of the Whole. As, the Prime Minister has pointed out, I do not recall any suggestion that the Minister of Finance should appear; but I am confident that the Minister of Finance will be pleased to respond to the questions put by the hon. gentleman on his return to the House next week.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EXPLODING POP BOTTLES—SOLUTION THEREFOR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the fact that the banning of 1.5 litre size of soft drink bottles has caused uncertainty to distributors, bottlers, retailers and consumers, what steps has the minister taken to come to a long-term, responsible solution of this problem?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I intend to introduce regulations under the Hazardous Products Act which will allow sales of 1.5 litre size of soft drink bottles of an improved safety performance. These bottles will have to pass the department's drop and drill tests. These bottles will also have to have a bilingual label indicating some of the dangers if they are not handled carefully.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—COMMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS ON S.O. 43 MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning a remark made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) who declared rather loudly recently that a motion under Standing Order 43 could not receive unanimous consent from the government because of failure to consult him.

It seems to me that this is a clear infringement on the privileges of any member of this House, whether they are on that side or this side of the House. In particular, he is speaking of his department, but is he trying to tell this House, or a member in this House, that we have to go to him, grovel at his feet and ask him if we have the privilege of moving a Standing Order 43 motion with which he happens to agree? That is an absolutely ridiculous, foolish and incredible statement, yet he made it in this House less than an hour ago.

I should like to say that my privileges are being interfered with if I have to grovel at the minister's feet or at the feet of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—even if he is out at Carp or wherever he happens to be—or for that matter at the feet of anyone else on that side of the House. I feel that I have a legitimate question of privilege because my rights as a private member to move a Standing Order 43 motion for consideration by all members in this House, without bias and with sensible consideration, is being hindered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

If I have a legitimate question of privilege, I would therefore reserve my right to move a motion that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: On proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43, the Chair only determines whether there is unanimous consent. That is the only thing that is relevant to motions under Standing Order 43.

MR. MACGUIGAN—COMMENT OF HON. MEMBER FOR LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe I have a question of privilege because the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) opposite has misstated what I shouted across to him in the House.

I have never challenged his right to present any motion in the House, including a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I was suggesting that if he wanted my consent he might let me know in advance so that I could consider the terms of his motion. If he did not understand that, then he has not spent as much time in this House as he should have.

Mr. Cossitt: On the same question of privilege, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have not given the hon. member the floor. I do now give him the floor. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, the minister has told the House that I did not listen to what he said. I do not know whether Hansard will pick it up, but I do know that when he yelled "No" in a very loud voice and when I asked him why, he said, "Because you did not consult". The minister made it very clear that that was why. In other words, he laid down the regulation that those of us on this side of the House must consult with him if we wish unanimous consent.

That was the point in my previous question of privilege. He has twisted what he said himself into something else entirely in order to try and make it look as if I am raising something that is not so. But he knows what he said. I hope the record will show what he said, and he is very definitely infringing on the privileges of members of this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I think one thing ought to be made clear. What the hon. member just said is not totally accurate. The minister said that if the hon. member wanted to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, he was absolutely free to do so on any subject at all, insignificant though it might be. We are used to hearing silly motions in this House. However, the minister said that as far as he was concerned, if the hon. member wants the minister's consent and not the unanimous consent of the House and if the minister refuses to give his consent, logically unanimity no longer exists. The minister would rather be consulted in advance because in the field of external affairs, most matters are touchy. It is a simple matter of politeness and courtesy.

I do not want to compel my colleague to be courteous and polite, but I would not want him to feel offended if he does not have the minister's consent on issues of external affairs. What the minister said in no way infringes the privileges of the hon. member or of other members of the House. Progressive Conservative members have the right to move any motion they wish under Standing Order 43, it is their privilege as it is the privilege of all members of the House. We have nothing against that. However they should not take exception to the fact that there is no unanimous consent or that they are not getting the consent of a particular member or minister. Every member on either side of the House has the privilege of answering yes or no to these motions.

Again, Madam Speaker, all members are absolutely equal. So if it is true that the hon. member is at liberty to move any motion he wants, insignificant as it may be, it is equally true that all members, be they ministers or Progressive Conservative or New Democrat members are all free to say yes or no. That is the way the Standing Orders of this House are set up.

Madam Speaker: It is clear that we are engaging in a debate on what a minister or a member said or did not say. Therefore this does not constitute a question of privilege.

[English]

MR. HOVDEBO—ROGERS PASS PROJECT—REMARKS OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding an answer given to this House by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). This was an answer to a question about corporate blackmail by Canadian Pacific Railway in threatening to freeze the $300 million Rogers Pass project until Ottawa agrees to reverse the Crowsnest rate for grain shipments. The minister's answer as it appeared in Hansard yesterday is as follows:

Madam Speaker, one of my dedicated assistants was in touch with the CPR this morning, and I am somewhat amused by the result of that call as the CP rail authorities maintain that they have been misquoted on this subject. So, for a change it is interesting to see that businessmen can also be misquoted. This is not what they meant to say.

We have confirmed that the statement which I used yesterday was not a misquote, that the several reporters who were present all came away with a similar understanding. There has been no retraction from Canadian Press, and the Edmonton Journal had an almost identical story yesterday. It therefore appears that the Canadian Pacific Railways misled the minister in suggesting they had been misquoted and that the Minister of Transport inadvertently misled this House by accepting their word.

There seems to be little doubt that what went on was a classic case of corporate blackmail by Canadian Pacific in its attempt to establish transportation policy themselves rather than leave that to the prerogative of the Government of Canada. The minister was misled by Canadian Pacific; he in turn inadvertently misled the House. I believe this is a legitimate case of privilege and if you so find, Madam Speaker, I am prepared to move:

That this matter be put before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections who could ask Canadian Pacific to appear before the committee to explain why they misled the House and how they can justify such blackmail of the Canadian people.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I might just say a few words. This discussion illustrates the difficulty with conversations. What I heard from my assistant and what he heard from the president of Canadian Pacific is very difficult to assess, but I think the substance is clear. Canadian Pacific is confronted with a dilemma. On the one hand, their forecasts of the requirements for traffic in the area are such that they think the tunnel should be built. On the other hand, their revenue situation, presumably because of the Crowsnest Pass rate, is such that they as a private enterprise feel that the returns will not justify the expenditure. This is the dilemma they face. I was trying to report on that. I am sorry if I was a bit humorous. Sometimes, it works, sometimes it doesn't.

Madam Speaker: It seems that here again we are discussing whether a member of Parliament is satisfied with an answer given by a minister. This does not constitute a question of privilege. Moreover, the motion presented at the end of the hon. member's intervention is a substantive one, that kind of motion which can be used to refer questions to any other committee. I suspect the hon. member knows that.

MR. SCOTT (HAMILTON-WENTWORTH)—PROPOSED EXPANSION OF MOUNT HOPE AIRPORT—REMARKS OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise very briefly on a question of privilege. During a somewhat spirited discussion in the House of Commons last night between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and myself, I once again tried to put on the record of this House that the previous Conservative government's commitment of $45 million to the expansion, development and upgrading of Hamilton civic airport was in fact a "go" decision.

The Minister of Transport, I suspect quite inadvertently, certainly not deliberately because I know he would not want deliberately to mislead the House, suggested that the $45 million was simply a commitment in principle; not a firm commitment by the former minister of transport and president of the treasury board, but just a commitment in principle. He suggested that if I had proof otherwise, I could bring it to the House and offer him that proof.

I was not a member of the Privy Council and I was not sitting in cabinet when that decision was made. There are other members in this House who were privy to that decision. I would just like respectfully to suggest to the Minister of Transport that that $45 million was a very firm commitment by the Government of Canada to go ahead with expansion and upgrading of Hamilton civic airport.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, as I was at least one of the participants involved in the previous government with respect to this decision, I naturally read with interest the comments last night of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), particularly those in response to questions put by my colleague whose question of privilege is now before us. I thought I might shed some light on this.

I think we are engaged in a rather unfortunate twisting of terminology. The truth is that on January 25, on behalf of the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the then minister of labour announced that there would be a major expansion of the Mount Hope airport at Hamilton at an estimated cost of $45 million. He went on to state that as a result of the decision, and I quote:

—Transport Canada will shortly request proposals for consulting services involving the design of the terminal building and other related facilities.

Yesterday the Minister of Transport indicated, to use his words, that the decision of the previous cabinet was a decision in principle by the cabinet, and there was a heavy inference that it never received Treasury Board approval. In fact, much to my amazement, the Minister of Transport stated that if it had received such approval, it would be in the present estimates because these are the estimates of the previous administration.

The Minister of Transport is a veteran not only of the House but of previous governments. He knows that main estimates are prepared literally months if not a year in advance. The main estimates that we now have before us are estimates that were finalized in mid-December. The decision to go ahead with the Mount Hope expansion was made in January. It was naturally anticipated that as the funds were required, there would be supplementary estimates needed in order to cover that expenditure.

As far as the previous government is concerned, it is most important to note that cabinet approval in principle was obtained for an investment in the order of $45 million for the Hamilton airport development. Cabinet had also authorised the Department of Transport to proceed with the planning for the airport and to consult with the airline industry, the province of Ontario, adjacent municipalities and the general public in the course of this planning.

The justification for asking Treasury Board—and this has already been put into Hansard—simply for $220,000, which was something to be charged against vote 65, air transportation, capital expenditure, was to get the matter moving at the earliest possible opportunity. The agreement in principle was there. Unless the present government now decides to reverse that agreement in principle, it was fully intended that that airport expansion should go ahead.

I would think that it was anticipated we would have to find within the appropriate envelope system the $45 million that would be needed to ensure that that airport could be built within the time-frame that, incidentally, was referred to in the press release to which I have referred. The press release stated:

—construction is planned to begin in 1980-81 and should be completed by 1984-85.

In short, I think it is unfortunate that the Minister of Transport should have shed some doubt about a firm commitment made by the previous government to go ahead with this airport project at an approximate cost of $45 million. Treasury Board agreed to the only thing it had been asked to agree to up to that point, that is to say, to approve the $220,000 funding for the consulting services which was needed to expedite the project. But it was clearly understood that the Department of Transport would then follow up with more definitive plans which could, presumably, be cleared subsequently by the Treasury Board unless, and I emphasize this, Madam Speaker, the government of the day decided to reverse the commitment it had entered into in principle during our administration to go ahead and build the airport.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my contribution will be very short indeed. We will let the people of Hamilton decide who is right and who is wrong in these matters. I repeat what I said yesterday. To the best of my knowledge, first, this was an election promise, one of many others. Unfortunately, if I were to honour half of the promises which were made during those months of January and February, I would be out of business for the next three years. So, first of all, it was an election promise. Second, it received the beatification of cabinet "in principle". Third, it was not sent to the Treasury Board to go through the rigours of analysis except for the part which had to do with the consultant services; we agree on that. Finally, if the amount of money was in the envelope I must have looked at a different envelope because I did not see it there.

So we will leave it at that and the people of Hamilton will judge the amount of importance, the credibility, to be given to that $50 million promise. However, I want to promise on my own, and I said this repeatedly yesterday, that I have the best of intentions, the best of motives, the best of dispositions with respect to the Hamilton airport, the Mount Hope airport. I mean well. I just want to be responsible and do what needs to be done. If it is $50 million, so it will be. I just do no want to be tied because I think it would be irresponsible on my part to be tied to a figure, either this one or the one previously mentioned.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of clarification—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think I will rule on this question. I think I have heard a sufficient number of interventions.

[Translation]

I believe that again we are dealing with a debate. It is clearly a debate and therefore not a question of privilege. In addition, I should like to point out to hon. members who have risen so far in this debate that I listened to them to the end but that it became very obvious early in their intervention that they were dealing with remarks made last night. Consequently, hon. members had every opportunity of giving me notice of their question of privilege, as our rules require. I had to listen to them today because, of course, the proceedings in progress can give rise to a question of privilege. But that is not the case in this instance, and as a consequence I should have been grateful for getting notice of that question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I naturally acknowledge your decision on the question of privilege but I think it raises a matter of order that the Minister of Transport should have left the impression that all we have been talking about is some type of vague election promise. I am not reflecting on your decision but I want to make it clear as a point of order that the reference from which I was reading is to be found in a document in the minister's own department.

There should be absolutely no confusion in his mind as to what took place under the previous government. Therefore, I ask that he table that document, which is dated February 7, 1980, is addressed to the Treasury Board and sets out this matter in its entirety. I believe the House will see that it was not an election promise but a firm cabinet decision being acted upon. It is most misleading for the Minister of Transport to indicate otherwise.

Madam Speaker: It is not up to the hon. member to correct Hansard. If he feels the minister has not given him an adequate answer, or if the minister feels he should correct Hansard because he has not been properly reported, he could do so himself.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

DEFINITION OF "MINISTER"—INCREASE IN PRINCIPAL AMOUNT OF LOANS

Hon. E. F. Whelan moved that Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Madam Speaker, today I ask this House for its support of Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Basically there are two amendments proposed. First, we want to renew the program for another three years. Since it was introduced in 1945 the program has been extended several times, usually at three-year intervals. These many extensions testify to the continuing need for this program.

The second amendment is for an increase in the total amount a farmer can borrow under the program. The maximum was raised to $50,000 in 1974 and to $75,000 in 1977. Now we feel that rising costs for farm machinery and equipment, land and other items have gone to the point where the maximum should be at least $100,000.

For many farmers this increase in the maximum allows them to make the kinds of improvements the act was designed to facilitate. We are talking here about the purchase of agricultural implements, machinery and equipment; the purchase of livestock including poultry, beef stock and fur-bearing animals; the installation of farm electrical equipment, things like bulk milk tanks, grain handling systems, barn cleaners, construction or repair of farm buildings, other improvements such as irrigation systems, drainage and fencing; and the purchase of additional land. We are talking about the kinds of things that make a farm run.

Farmers who qualify for loans under the act make their own credit arrangements through chartered banks or other lending institutions that are approved by the government. The federal government's role in the transaction is to guarantee the bank or lending institution against losses it may sustain. Under the act the maximum interest rates on farm improvement loans are based on the chartered banks' prime lending rate plus 1 per cent.

However, I should point out that the lender is obliged to make sure the loan is secure and that normal banking discretion is used in issuing the loan. For that reason and because farmers are about the best credit risks around, the farm improvement loans program does not wind up costing the federal government very much in actual cash outlay. In 1977 the net cost to the government was less than $190,000. It rose to $289,000 in 1978, and last year the net cost was $222,000. Compare that with the actual amounts loaned out under the program during those three years; hundreds of millions of dollars were actually loaned. Last year $262 millions was loaned. In all, since 1945 something like $4.3 billion has been loaned out under the program.

We can make a comparison of loss ratio. For instance, in 1979 when $262 million was loaned, the net cost to the government against the amounts loaned out was running at .14 per cent, not even a quarter of 1 per cent. In 1977 the rate was .13 per cent, and in 1978 it was .13 per cent. We hear much about how bad 1979 was, but in 1979 the loss ratio was the lowest ever, .08 per cent. Over 22,000 farmers took advantage of that program.

The extra production that the program generates means more food for Canadians, our trading partners and those who receive food aid shipments from us. I am not pretending that this program is single handedly responsible for big increases in food production, but it is one of the many things the federal government is doing to bring greater stability to the farming sector.

I am sure we are all aware that many other programs are available to farm people under the federal system. We have the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Syndicates Credit Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act which I am talking about at the present time. However, when we look at the other programs that the provinces have, we can look at a food-producing province like Alberta, for instance, see the number of different loan programs and subsidized interest rates there are, and we cannot help but be impressed. For instance, direct farm loans in Alberta are available for any agricultural purpose to producers unable to obtain long-term credit from other sources. The suggested maximum is $150,000 with a 30-year repayment, and 20 per cent equity is required. There are also special direct loans for disaster assistance and financial restructuring.

In the year 1979-80, $60 million was loaned under that program.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Which one is that?

Mr. Whelan: That is Alberta. Every province but one has some kind of program such as this or somewhat similar to this, but many of them are much different. There is such a hodgepodge of lending programs that it is really difficult to say that there are no funds available to farmers who do not have some special subsidization program. It is difficult for me, when I am trying to work out programs for the good of the national interest, when I find the inequity which is in the different programs which in some instances top load our federal programs, subsidize the interest rates we set or subsidize the provincial interest rates for provincial producers.

I have a table of all these programs. If it would be of interest to the House, I would ask that it be appended to the proceedings of the day, if that would be possible.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister mean Hansard?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed by all hon. members?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is offering to table those programs, we certainly would agree to that. I think it would be very helpful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House that these documents be tabled?

Mr. Knowles: I think we should be clear, Mr. Speaker. The minister wanted them made part of the proceedings. That sounds like Votes and Proceedings. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) agreed that they be tabled. What is wanted?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I should have added in my prior statement "and appended to Hansard". Is it agreed that they be tabled and appended to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For tables referred to above, see Appendix for Tuesday, May 20, 1980.]

Mr. Whelan: I was going to read these tables into the record, so appending them is much easier. I think they are a form of education when we talk about the different farm programs. I see the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) is here. I am sure he is aware that provincial governments have subsidies, interest programs, top loading programs, etc. which I am sure many people are not aware of. There are programs in Quebec, and many people point out that Quebec is the only province with subsidized programs.

That is not true. Saskatchewan, for instance, has programs which are called FarmStart programs. Eight hundred loans were made last year to young farmers in Saskatchewan. I believe the mortgages run for 15 years at a guaranteed interest rate of 8 per cent. Those programs are very good but, going back to the one in Saskatchewan again, the one Saskatchewan had was mostly to start farmers into pork production and livestock enterprises. It was geared especially to that kind of enterprise, and most of them are already in financial difficulty because of the decrease in the price being received for those products. So, I just point out that we have been doing some research and trying to come up with a program which would provide equity between farmers who are competing for the domestic market or the international market.

Some farmers are at a terrible disadvantage because of the lack of funds being made available to them. The province of Ontario probably has some of the smallest programs. I will touch on some of them shortly since I think they are beneficial to agriculture in that area. They depend more on federal loans and programs such as the Farm Credit Corporation and farm improvement loans program. As hon. members already know, I talked about the farm credit program which issues long-term loans to farmers and has a tremendous stabilizing influence on Canadian agriculture. FC programs are especially designed for the financial programs which farmers encounter.

Recently when I spoke about the Farm Credit Corporation I said that we had asked them to look especially after younger farmers who find themselves in economic difficulties through high interest rates, and in some areas because of depressed prices for the commodities they are producing. So we asked FCC to place a moratorium on the loans. Some people feel that that is a cancellation of the debt and the interest rate. That is not so. All it does is delay the payment. The Farm Credit Corporation has within the legislation the right vested in them to do that kind of thing. They have been doing it in the past and will do it in the future.

Also the Farm Credit Corporation can be the judge when a young farmer has little collateral but the drive and ability to survive in agriculture, and for that reason FCC is often the only hope which a farmer beginning operation has, except for some programs which are in existence in Saskatchewan and in Alberta which are especially geared to encourage young people to go into the Peace River district. Some of them have been pretty costly ventures for the provinces. Right now about 70 per cent of the long-term credit outstanding in Canadian agriculture is in loans from the Farm Credit Corporation. I am proud of FCC, and indeed the federal government should be proud that it has made such a program available to the farmers of this country.

Also administered by FCC is the farm syndicates loans program under which groups of three or more farmers can purchase jointly machinery, buildings or instal equipment. This program provides up to 80 per cent of the total cost, with a maximum of $15,000 per person, or $100,000 in total.

Another program of which we can be proud—one which brings a large measure of marketing stability to thousands of Canadian farmers—is the advance payments for crops program. This program provides farmers with interest free loans to pay operating and carrying costs for their storable crops. Farmers can then afford to hold more of the crop until the market is right, and that is orderly marketing.

I spoke of interest free loans, but we all know that nothing is free in this world. The federal government paid more than $2 million in interest on loans under that program in the fiscal year 1979-80. As I said, provincial governments have different kinds of programs, and these I have tabled. I spoke a little about Ontario. They have a program which can be used as another example. There a farmer can have up to 75 per cent of the cost of drainage work financed at an interest rate of 6 per cent.

Those are some examples of programs that are available in Canada today to farmers. As I said, they are not available to all farmers; it all depends on the programs that some of the provinces have. If anything, this has a tendency to balkanize the country.

A farm improvement loans program is an important source of intermediate-term credit for Canadian farmers. Most of these loans are for a ten-year term, with some extending to 15 years for the purchase of extra land to expand a farm.

I should point out that the total amount of farm credit outstanding is now something like $15 billion. That is a tremendous burden on the relatively small number of farmers in Canada. The cost of servicing the debt is the cost of production, and when a farmer compares his cost of production with expected market returns and if there is not much margin in between, you can appreciate the effect on a farmer's management planning.

Right now we should be doing everything we can to help farmers maintain the production levels they have achieved to produce more of the food that we would otherwise import, and to take advantage of export markets. Increasingly, the world will need Canadian farm products, and our farmers must have the credit they need to produce this food.

Therefore, I ask members of the House to support the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act as presented, to study all the other sections, and if they have any suggestions, if they think amendments should be put forward in committee, I will be perfectly willing to listen to any constructive suggestion.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I was also pleased to hear the minister give that open invitation for input into the various programs which the federal government sponsors.

This is an act the provisions of which I have taken advantage of over the past 25 years of farming experience. The Farm Improvement Loans Act came into force in March, 1945, for an initial period of three years and was subsequently amended from time to time to remain in effect for additional lending periods. The current lending period expires June 30, 1980.

The stated purpose of the act is to facilitate the availability of intermediate and short-term credit to farmers for the improvement or development of farms and for the improvement of living conditions thereon. To this end, the act authorizes the responsible minister to guarantee against loss, term loans made to farmers by chartered banks, Alberta treasury branches and other lenders designated by the minister, for a wide range of farm improvement projects.

The maximum amount of guaranteed loans which a borrower may have outstanding at any one time is $75,000. This amendment to the act in Bill C-27 would increase that maximum lending limit to $100,000. I will demonstrate in this statement how totally inadequate this lending limitation is in the year 1980. One need only study our recent history to reach the assumption that the inflationary effect will guarantee the complete inadequacy of the maximum which will be allowed three years hence.

During the year 1978, 75 per cent of the loans were to purchase agricultural implements, 10 per cent were for construction, repair or alteration of farm houses and buildings, 8 per cent for the purchase of additional land, and 4 per cent for other improvements, such as the clearing of land, fencing, irrigation and similar projects. Of the 24,000 loans made in 1978, only 809 were made to B.C. farmers. In a period of advancing technology, demanding as it does financing beyond the immediate ability of most farmers, perhaps the shortcomings of the act are dramatized by the small number of B.C. farmers to participate in the supposed benefits.

Unquestionably the principles and practical effects of the farm improvement loans legislation have had significant beneficial effect over the years of its existence on the ability of the farming community in Canada to survive in a very, very tough competitive environment in which it is absolutely essential that Canadian farmers adapt to the most modern advances in farm technology. Agriculture in many ways has been at the forefront of this adaptation to modernization and to efficiency enhancement through increased mechanization of all of the operations involved in crop creation, processing and distribution.

Canadian agriculturists must remain competitive with farm production from countries in the world where farm labour is paid at less than one-tenth of the equivalent farm wage level in Canada. This ability to remain competitive is made possible only as Canadian farmers have the possibility to make acquisition of those costly tools and machines which offer the necessary labour conserving standards. This has been particularly the case in a nation in which the consumers' immediate interests have been paramount to the political forces, with the result that a cheap food policy has been in vogue to the disadvantage of the agricultural community. It is to the credit of farmers that in this hostile environment they have been able to survive and to a degree prosper.

It is not only at the farm production unit level that Canadian farmer survival is subject to his ability to finance acquisition of new equipment such as tractors, spray machines, seeders, swathers, balers, trucks, and for orchardists whom I represent, self-propelled mechanical lift machines. We call them Girettes or Kangaroos. The list of available machines goes on and on and on. Required is the ability to finance the purchase. This act gives some assistance in this financing ability.

In my riding of Okanagan-Similkameen fruit production is largely accepted, handled, packaged and sold by grower-owned facilities. Fruit packing house units have also seen in the past decade a very dramatic leap forward in the application of labour efficient mechanization. Without these changes our industry would have no ability to remain competitive in a world in which survival is measured only in terms of competitive adaptability.

In 1964 the fruit packing house, of which I was president, modernized to the level of that day at a cost of less than $100,000. It was five years ago, while I was a director of the Oliver-Osoyoos Co-Operative Growers' Association, that a major efficiency related project was undertaken. This brought to the Okanagan, and indeed to Canada, for the first time a totally new concept in fruit handling techniques, the most advanced of its kind in the world.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, it is the desire of the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1300)

And being returned:

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Honour, the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, His Honour was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to a certain bill:

Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 1.05 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

DEFINITION OF "MINISTER"—INCREASE IN PRINCIPAL AMOUNT OF LOANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Whelan that Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely sure where I left off prior to the adjournment, so I shall resume my remarks by referring to the fruit packing business.

In 1964 the fruit packing house of which I was president modernized to the level of that day at a cost of less than $100,000.

Mr. Knowles: You told us that before lunch.

Mr. King: I just wanted to make sure everyone here understood my position with regard to that accomplishment.

Mr. Knowles: At least I was listening to you.

Mr. Kaplan: Don't let the NDP intimidate you.

Mr. King: Never—nor the Liberals. Five years ago, while a director of the Oliver-Osoyoos Co-op Growers' Association, a major efficiency related project was undertaken. This brought to the Okanagan and to Canada for the first time, a totally new concept in fruit handling techniques, the most advanced of its kind in the world. This was accomplished at a cost of $1.25 million; to move to that standard of mechanization today would cost in excess of $2.5 million.

I mention these investment patterns in farm enterprises in which I have been very closely involved to emphasize the nature of modern day farming and the absolute imperative of adequate financing provisions such as we are debating today. Government supported legislation is absolutely necessary because the market place is not serving farmers adequately.

Where in the act is there provision to correct the objectionable aspects of the bill which have been the subject of comment on many occasions previously when the act was reviewed? I refer to the fact that banking institutions are entirely free to deny loans to farmers for reasons other than security of loans. The suggestion has been made that if banks are given a guarantee under the act—and they are—then there should be some obligation on their part. Perhaps this is one aspect of the bill which should be given scrutiny during committee examination.

I should like to quote remarks made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson), as recorded in Hansard on May 2, 1977. At that time he said:

The extreme difficulty faced by young people endeavouring to establish themselves in agriculture is... a major problem. So as one examined the provisions of this bill, one finds that it does not seem to include any changes which take into account the difficulties of those engaged in agriculture. The bill does not seem to envisage the taking of new initiatives. No new initiatives are taken in the bill which will expand the availability of assistance to the agricultural community. Therefore, all we are considering, really, is another statement in the form of this bill saying that this program is to be continued.

One could say that loan limits are to be increased. I say that the amount provided by the bill is far less than that which is required in order to enable our agricultural community to meet its problems and finance its operations. As it is, farmers face great difficulty in making ends meet. However, we welcome this legislation in so far as it affects the agricultural community, but urge the government to look at new initiaves and new programs which will meet adequately the needs of those engaged in the agricultural sector of our economy.

It is sad to observe that the above remarks, made three years ago, are entirely current today.

I would like to discuss briefly the matter of farm income. Despite the ever increasing costs of food being experienced to the chagrin of the nation's housewives and budget keepers, the difference between what farmers receive and what consumers pay for food, called the marketing spread, widened nearly 12 per cent in 1979. This is the largest increase in five years. The marketing spread, representing charges for handling, processing and distributing a market basket of farm foods, accounted for slightly over half the 10.8 per cent rise in grocery food prices last year. Increased farm value accounted for about a third of supermarket food increases.

In this scenario, with farm operating costs rising more rapidly than the cost of living index, with farmers receiving a lesser percentage of the consumer dollar spent on food, farmers do not represent the most attractive credit risk to commercial lenders. Some type of government intervention is required if Canadian agriculture is to survive, and survive it must if our nation is to prosper and remain sovereign and independent.

We have allowed this energy rich nation to become subjected to the whims of foreign interests simply because we have neglected our own potential. Both price and supply of petroleum products are now outside our nation's control. We certainly must not allow agricultural production to suffer the same type of gross national indifference by a government more concerned with its own political well-being than it is with the well-being of the nation.

The orchard tractor which I bought last month cost my orchard company $14,300. Today, less than one month later, that very tractor is priced at $15,750. This is an increase in price of $1,450 in less than 30 days.

We are becoming immune to shock when it comes to price increases from day to day. Our wives see and report what is happening on supermarket shelves. But the price of the tractor that I have just purchased puts the whole of this act in more dramatic perspective. To examine what the price of that tractor unit was just three years ago when this act was last amended, the tractor—a 50 horsepower unit—that cost $14,300 last month and which today costs $15,750 was available just three years ago for $8,400.

Mr. Whelan: What did you trade in for it?

Mr. King: I am sure that this pattern of equipment pricing increase is duplicated across Canada in all types of farming activity. It certainly is not a phenomenon endured by fruit farmers alone.

I did not catch the interjection made by the minister, but I will be happy to discuss it with him after.

Thus we can say with some considerable conviction that the increase in the maximum lending limit from $75,000 to $100,000, while moving in the right direction, does not in fact keep pace with the rate of inflation which this government has imposed upon our nation and on our farmers by its undisciplined spending regime. We should, therefore, look at this aspect of the legislation to ensure that we are providing financing adequate to meet the requirements of today's costs and today's farming technology.

The April, 1980, edition of Country Life quotes from the British Columbia federation of agriculture presentation to members of the legislative assembly of British Columbia. It reads as follows:

> The federation delegation told the MLAs that inflation and increasing interest rates are two of the most important issues currently facing farmers. They claimed that agricultural production is particularly susceptible to both because there is no guaranteed relationship between inflation and the level of farm commodity prices.
> Food production is one of the most capital intensive sectors of our economy . . . B.C. farmers have over $1 billion in loans out.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, a contradiction which exists in this government's policies towards farm economics. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) this morning in his address to the House asked for the support of the House in favour of the passage of this bill. I would assume that since this is one of the few matters brought before this House which can be supported without great offence to one's conscience, that passage will be assured within the normal time-frame.

I would, however, like to point out to the minister that the grape growers and wine producers of British Columbia, who can make little use of the benefits of this act, would very much prefer to see the rescinding of the repressive tax measure applied to the wine industry as contained in the recent and infamous mini-budget. The effect of the tax is to directly cost the grape producers the equivalent of $180 a tonne, and this on a commodity worth $400, $500, $600 to $700 a tonne. The B.C. wine industry, which is determined to establish its place in the quality wine market, will, of necessity, pass on some of this added tax burden to the grape producer. In establishing themselves in a market dominated by imported product, our local wine producers are unable to pass the tax on the consumer.

So we have here, Mr. Speaker, a situation in which the Minister of Agriculture proposes to help agriculture, while the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) proposes to make it difficult for this one segment of agriculture to continue.

Let me point out to the House some government financial initiatives which have been of great value to the farming community in the riding of Okanagan-Similkameen. I speak with knowledge of the ARDA program which has been the instrument by which most of the irrigation districts and municipal irrigation works have been upgraded, improved and expanded. Without the joint federal-provincial program, it is safe to say that farmers in the B.C. interior drybelt areas would have been hard pressed to remain in business. It is entirely safe to say that the total economy of central British Columbia has been enhanced and stabilized by the application of ARDA to the water supply systems of that area.

Another federal-provincial program with which I am entirely familiar is the crop insurance program. I was an employee in the ministry of agriculture in B.C. in the crop insurance branch from its inception. I say without equivocation that this program has been of most significant value to agriculture in B.C. and throughout Canada.

The Farm Credit Act has provided the means for farm acquisition and expansion. The cold storage assistance program has had great application in the Okanagan Valley, as the minister is aware, creating jobs and giving the industry an opportunity to progress to its present high state of performance.

Let me use this debate forum to reinforce the fact that as the farm economy in Okanagan-Similkameen prospers, the community at large in that area prospers. In the broadest sense, the same applies to our nation as a whole; as goes agriculture, so goes the nation. The Government of Canada must recognize this fact and must move on many fronts to give the agricultural community those advantages and programs necessary to its continued existence, and to give farmers a place of dignity in Canada's economic community.

● (1420)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. King: I will permit a question. I am not sure if I can answer it, but I will make an attempt.

Mr. Whelan: I have known the hon. member for quite some time I know his background. He talked about the cold storage assistance program. I do not want to create the impression that he intentionally forgot to mention that that was brought forward by the Government of Canada and that his province took advantage of 50 per cent of the funds under the cold storage assistance program for controlled atmosphere temperature storage, jacketed storage and cold storage. It allowed the British Columbia fruit producers, namely apple producers, to export to, I believe, 82 countries last year because they had such a high quality product. Did he intend to admit the fact that it was the Ministry of Agriculture of the Canadian government that made it possible?

Mr. Knowles: Is that a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think the Chair should intervene in the sense that normally debate is not encouraged in the circumstances, but the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King). Other than that, we will proceed to the next member who wants to enter the debate.

Mr. King: Mr. Speaker, having acted for packing houses in the Okanagan which took advantage of this act, I certainly was not trying to exclude anyone from applause because of its availability. I just point out there are acts that can be implemented. There are programs that can be instituted which are of great benefit to the farming community, and this is one of them. We should seek to find more opportunities to enhance agriculture in Canada. The act before us today provides a modicum of such enhancement.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, on this my first opportunity to speak to this House on a formal basis in this session, please accept my congratulations on your appointment as Acting Speaker, and kindly pass on to Madam Speaker my congratulations and expressions of pleasure at her appointment.

It is becoming increasingly obvious that the downturn in the economy of the country is having a disastrous effect on the agriculture industry all across Canada. My colleague, the hon. member for Humbolt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) will also discuss some of the effects of this disaster.

Farm Improvement Loans Act

As a westerner and a representative of a farming area, I feel that I cannot pass up an opportunity to speak to Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I recognize that this amendment is intended only as a relief from the pressure on certain borrowers, raising as it does the maximum level from $75,000 to $100,000 and changing the responsible minister. It is because of those limited intentions in this bill that I feel I must speak out and put before the House some of the shortcomings of this amendment, and put this whole issue of farm credit in the context of what is really happening down on the farm.

This House should be well aware that a crisis exists in agriculture in this country. While the price of what the farmer sells remains static or declines, the price of what the farmer buys outpaces Canada's quite unacceptable rate of inflation.

The general farm input index with a 1971 base of 100 reached 234.1 for the last quarter of 1979 and is now increasing at the rate of 15 per cent per annum, half again as high as the increases recorded in the national inflation indicator, the consumer price index. In just ten years, Mr. Speaker, the farm dollar has shrunk to only 42 per cent of its 1971 self. It is worth 42 cents today compared to what it was worth in 1971.

The price of a key farm input, fertilizer, has increased up to 25 per cent this spring. The reasons for this massive increase can be accounted for simply enough. Higher transportation costs, higher natural gas prices, the decline of the Canadian dollar and increasing interest rates are a few of the reasons that can be put forward.

The federal government can influence all of these factors, and the fact that they have been unable to do so in the past few years is a telling comment on the Liberal party and Conservative party's economic policies. During the past three years all we have been given by these governments are a dozen dry and dusty after-the-fact analyses by academic economists. Farmers do not have the luxury of waiting until after the fact. They must make their purchases for the current crop season now and pay the disastrous interest rates that are the direct result of the international policy on interest rates that is commonly known as the "beggar thy neighbour" policy. While the United States and the European Economic Community play this usurious game, the farmers of North America are sitting on the sidelines wondering how they will pay.

Here is an example of the immediate problems being faced by U.S. farmers in the month of March. The Canadian situation parallels it almost exactly. In that one month fertilizer prices increased 9 per cent, fuel by 3 per cent, machinery by 5 per cent, farm chemicals by 14 per cent. The Canadian situation is almost exactly the same and there is no cheap money to help the farmers offset these increasing costs.

Farmers, like other sectors of small independent businesses, shopkeepers and working people, are among the economically weak in our society who do not profit from inflation.

The government of Saskatchewan is making FarmStart loans available this year at 8 per cent for the first five years and 10 per cent on the final ten years. But FarmStart is a very small program for a very few hundred young farmers. It is really the responsibility of the federal government to enact wider range programs to help all farmers in the current cash shortage resulting from the cost-price squeeze. This act extends somewhat the maximum amount a farmer can get and makes some more money available, but at a cost to farmers of prime rate plus 1 per cent.

Because the farmers of Canada are in up to their necks, Mr. Speaker, they are like those gallant show business people who sing:

Hey, look us over,
Lend us your ear
Fresh out of clover
Mortgaged up to here

Mr. Kempling: Sing it!

Mr. Hovdebo: They are mortgaged to the hilt. Farm indebtedness at the end of 1979 was $9 billion and the interest charges paid on that principal was $1.24 billion, an increase of 71 per cent on the debt payments of only three years ago. In fact, payment of debt is the fastest growing thing on Canadian farms. The Canadian government is providing the fertilizer for this phenomenal growth.

In 1980, debt payment on the anticipated $10 billion outstanding will be the largest single expense to farmers. It will cost more than feed or farm machinery costs and is growing faster than weeds in the back pasture.

The farmer has been placed in a position where he must try and find money at almost any price. Even at these high interest rates it may not be available. Farm Credit Corporation personnel have said they will only be able to meet two thirds of the demand in this fiscal year.

There is an alternative program which any responsible opposition party must put forward. We must recognize immediately and frankly that an emergency situation is facing farmers in Canada. It is a situation which is not of their own making. It is a situation which is causing thousands of them to go to the wall right across the country. In the past three years, the number of farms in Prince Edward Island has decreased by 16 per cent, the number of farms in New Brunswick has dropped by 22 per cent and similar figures apply all across the country.

Mr. Speaker, do not believe the propaganda which seems to have gotten to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)—that farmers are changing their minds about the Crow rates. If you faced the kind of prospects I have outlined here today, would you be asking for a five or sixfold increase in freight rates? Such increases would only mean still greater losses. Western farmers intend to protect their statutory rates. They really have no alternative.

What we desperately need are interim measures, and in this regard the government would do well to consider the recommendations contained in the National Farmers Union farm emergency measures program which was presented to the government on April 22. Among those recommendations were requests for two short-term measures which the government should consider carefully: first, a moratorium on all farm debts which threaten a farmer's livelihood on the land. This kind of federal guarantee, so popular with large operations such as Chrysler, would show that Ottawa places as much importance on the growing of food as it does on the assembly of automobiles. Of equal importance, it would show that the federal government has the same degree of commitment to the farmers of Canada as to the automotive industry.

Second, the federal government should provide credit guarantees to needy farmers in respect of 1980 farm operating costs. Such a move would recognize that many of the inflationary forces adversely affecting farmers at this time are not of their making and that farmers deserve some measure of protection, particularly if their credit needs are not being met by existing institutions.

The bill before us does not guarantee that farmers will get the credit which is available. An investment in the growing of food by the government would help ensure protection against hyper-inflation of food prices six months from now when the effect of reduced production hits the food market. Let us not be fooled. We must recognize that if farmers do not get help now they will be forced to cut back production.

Although I am not opposing the changes put forward in this bill, I hope the government will recognize the present crisis in farming and use this legislation, along with other measures, to alleviate the situation. I say this because the crisis is becoming more acute every day. In the prairie provinces it is being accentuated by the extra factor of a sustained drought. The embattled farmer faces high costs for chemicals, machinery and land. In return, he gets low prices for pork, low prices for the stock he wants to sell. These figures are being pushed down to a considerable extent by the drought as well as by high interest rates.

The grain embargo has almost certainly eliminated the prospect of a final payment on grain this year and farmers face predictably lower prices for grain in the coming crop year, again because of the embargo. Most farmers feel that in the circumstances there is little chance of coming out ahead of the game. They are likely to lose money. They are likely to be selling below the cost of production again this year in all areas. But farmers are optimistic. They will continue to farm even despite this prediction, and Canada can thank them for it. It is a responsibility of the government to deal with this crisis wherever and however it can.

We are considering a bill which will provide some extra money for farmers to borrow. If we lend it to them at the business rate, the prime interest rate plus 1 per cent, we shall be driving more farmers out of business. So I urge the government to give them the opportunity to borrow at a lower rate, possibly at a rate which would amount to only a service charge.

Also, let us make enough money available so all farmers have a hope of surviving. Better still, let us put into effect the farmers' union proposal and bring some hope to the whole industry for another year. As one of the farmers' union signs said a few weeks ago: "It's no joke, we're going broke."

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Madam Speaker, I want to address myself to this bill at this time because it means so much to producers in Canada. But I do not want to take up too much time because farmers in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces are anxiously awaiting Bill C-15, the livestock feed assistance amendments, since in those areas they do not have the opportunities open to us in Ontario and western Canada, particularly the three prairie provinces, to produce their own feed.

I have a few comments to make in relation to the bill before us, legislation I have personally used on many occasions in years gone by when I was becoming established as a farmer. Perhaps I should point out, with reference to the high interest rates which are hurting farmers at the present time, that there have been fewer bankruptcies reported by the Farm Credit Corporation this last year than there were in the year previous to that. I might also point out to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) that since the Speech from the Throne interest rates have dropped in every consecutive week.

An hon. Member: No connection!

Mr. Ferguson: There is a direct connection because the money is lent at bank prime rate, plus 1 per cent. I should like to suggest that if there was more co-operation from the provinces—I refer here to the 800 FarmStarts given Saskatchewan last year—and discussion with the federal government we would not have a lot of the areas of concern we face today. I refer here to the red meat sector where there are problems.

On the other hand, we do have the vehicles available to us here in Canada, legislation passed by Parliament, giving farmers the opportunity through the use of permissive legislation to set their own prices at the farm gate, to establish their cost of production formulas which take into consideration increased interest rates whenever they occur. When interest rates decrease, that is also taken into consideration. I should like to point out that a decrease of one cent per dozen in the price of eggs took place recently. This was due to lower interest rates and increased efficiency on the part of the producers.

We do not have many problems reported in connection with commodities under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, the dairy commission, or in the province of Ontario especially the tobacco board which also negotiates and sets its own prices.

I think what we need perhaps more in Canada in the way of an outward looking economy to create stability in the agriculture sector is planned production, not only for domestic markets but for exports as well. Let us seek out and develop new markets in a positive sense which would benefit all of Canada and not just the farm sector. They would also create new jobs in our work force and benefit society through spin-off effects to all Canadians.

I would like to refer to the national farm products marketing council, the marketing agencies I was connected with for four years and the particular act under which they operate, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. That act is very broad in its context. It is very permissive and would allow the producers of Canada to set up the type of organization which would relate to their specific area of the industry. As a farmer I believe that it is tragic that we have not encouraged our producers to make more use of this particular act and to work together as Canadians to produce, as envisaged by the Fathers of Confederation.

The act before us today has been utilized to a tremendous extent. The net cost to the Canadian taxpayer, as indicated before lunch by the minister, was $220,000. I think it would be remarkable to know what the net benefit was in that act from the money made available and what is done for Canadian society.

Farmers by nature like to produce and they are great spenders. They like to upgrade their homes, their farming operations, their equipment and their facilities. They are very proud. They are very proud to be Canadians, and I think that by increasing the ceiling as proposed in this bill here today we are going to give them that opportunity. However, I want also to see us through other means go even further and give them the opportunity to develop their potential productivity. I speak of potential productivity in the way of renewable resources to sell abroad to a world that is going to be hungry in the not too distant future. There are some areas in the world which are hungry right now.

I believe the loan guarantee in the Farm Improvement Loans Act is among the least utilized in the banking industry. The losses through this are very, very low. I live only a few miles from the state of Michigan in the United States, and I talk to farmers on that side of the border. In April they were paying 20 per cent interest on their loans. They were paying $1.06 for a U.S. gallon of diesel fuel. I had heard they were being subsidized, so I went over to visit a farmer to see if he was in fact being subsidized. He said, "Yes, we have a disaster program; we have subsidization, but that is only if a disaster strikes". I believe the last time they collected on that was in 1977 when they had a terribly dry period across that section of the country.

However, they do not have any similar programs there which compare with what we have here in Canada for farmers. They do not have the advance payment program or the interest-free loans we have here. Nor do they have the progressive legislation we have available to us. In Canada, in spite of the fact that perhaps we have a much harsher climate—certainly in some areas of Canada we do not have the potential diversity we have on the prairies, perhaps, or in sections of Ontario—I think we are very fortunate to have such practical legislation which is of benefit not only to the farmers of Canada but also indirectly to all of society.

I indicated that I did not want to take up very much time because I think it is critical that we get this piece of legislation through, but I hope that this House will give it speedy passage so that we can get on to more pressing legislation such as Bill C-15, to amend the Livestock Feed Assistance Act.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think the House is aware of the fact that this legislation is housekeeping legislation to improve the Farm Improvement Loans Act which has served the farmers of all parts of Canada extremely well for over 30 years at very minimum cost to the taxpayers. I would think that the cost last year would be equivalent to the wages and expenses of four or five civil servants, and that is all. This act is one of the family of acts under which we have asked private enterprise engaged in the financial business of lending money to do the job for us, in this case banks and credit unions.

I think there is no member in any part of the House who would want to hold up this bill in any way, but I do think we have to accept the fact that there is a bad point in the bill. This is through no fault of the minister but through the fault of a theory of government on interest rates which hurts all sections of the ecomony and not just farmers. The same thing was true with the bill we put through a week or so ago on small business. On that bill we used private enterprise to handle the business of lending money to businessmen, as we do with this act to farmers. We ask the banks and credit unions to lend money to farmers, and the Government of Canada gives a guarantee against a portion of the losses to the banks.

The reason it does not cost the government very much in having to pay these guarantees is that one would find it almost impossible to find a bank or credit union which ever lent a farmer any money and did not get it all back. It is as simple as that. There is really no risk taken at all by the banks or credit unions. One has to have more assets and more goodwill by five or six times the amount of money borrowed, so let us not feel that this is a hand-out on the part of the government or the banks at all. The banks are the best protectors of the public interest, if we look on the public interest as the money supply of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), that there could be.

I know the minister agrees with me, but I also think that the minister is well aware of the fact that one of the key things in this new legislation is that for the first time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is allowed to make the regulations. These regulations will go to the governor in council through the Minister of Agriculture. Oh, they have a little stinger in the tail. He has to have the name of the Minister of Finance on the regulations, so in effect what I am asking all members of the House to do is to back up the Minister of Agriculture in taking strong stands on behalf of all parliamentarians, if necessary, against the Minister of Finance, who still hangs on to that residual power of putting his hand on any good thing if he thinks it is going to harm the treasury in any way at all. In this case he does not have too much argument. The Minister of Finance is never faced with very much of a loss each year. It is measured in thousands when we are lending out hundreds of millions.

This act is a remarkable achievement, so I want to make my remarks today ones which I hope the Minister of Agriculture will take in the spirit in which they are meant—of trying to help him with arguments he will have to face with the Treasury Board and with the Minister of Finance.

Even before I go into that part of it, I would think one of the biggest troubles the minister is going to have is with the banks and the credit unions. When this act started some 30-odd years ago, the banks were very reluctant to lend under it. They preferred to lend to the big customers who borrowed large amounts of money and had enough assets that the banks never had to worry. They were reluctant to make these small loans of $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 under this act. It took twice as much time with the small programs as it did with the big sums of money they were lending to big business accounts. Gradually they were forced into it.

To give their side of the argument, let me say that they did run schools for their bank managers and brought in some very knowledgeable people from the agricultural industry who helped to run these schools. Now many bank managers and credit union managers across Canada have a remarkable knowledge of the business of running a farm. Some of the banks have even set up special sections for agriculture. So I would say that the difficulties on this front are not as great as they were 20 years ago.

The second fact in relation to the banks, the credit unions and the caisses populaires is that the financial situation is different now from what it was a few years ago. Banks and credit unions are loaded to the gills with money. They are so frightened with all the money they have that they are ignoring the Bank of Canada and trying to force interest rates down to get rid of it.

So now there is an opportunity for farmers and small businessmen to come to the banks with a chance that they will not meet with hostility. The banks are desperate to get rid of this money because it is a liability to them. That is one thing working in our favour. This gives a chance to the Minister of Agriculture to use an argument against the financial gnomes that hang around capital cities trying to hold back any constructive activity that is different from what they did before. The financial argument is that, since the banks are willing to lend, they should be willing to go the full length in proper lending. If they are going to take time, as they are doing, to find out all about a farmer's assets, including equity, they also should take time to look at his income picture for the last number of years and project it forward into a hypothetical cash flow. I know that many bankers are doing that and I know it is done by the Farm Credit Corporation. This means that they can take a look at a loan of, say, $100,000 and project forward to the time when this loan will produce, say, an extra $20,000 a year in income. They know that this is a real plum to strive for.

So how can the farmer or small businessman get to the position of having this $20,000 as quickly as possible? The answer is to keep the "front end" loading costs down. On front end loading costs, the classic example is the interest charge which is paid the minute you take the loan. It may take you a year or two years before you get a cash flow back from the expenditure of that money. If you keep those charges low, the farmer is able to navigate on his previous income and have a better chance of paying the interest and the principal on his debt. In return for this, if he keeps the front end loading charges low, the farmer or small businessman has to be prepared to share the profit.

So I suggest, as I suggested during the Small Businesses Loans Act debate, that under these regulations the minister should put in alternative clauses which would allow a farmer to borrow money, not at prime plus one, as the present regulation calls for as announced in the press release, but, let us say, at 7 per cent or even as high as 7.5 per cent or 8 per cent, on condition that after the debt is paid off totally, the farmer will put back into the bank part of his extra income he will now earn for a certain number of years, which he will work out together with the bank in a mutual arrangement. That will give the bank or the credit union a market return on the money.

This is not a new concept. It is used over and over again in business, particularly with interest rates as high as they are now. Business uses this as the main technique of getting low interest rates.

I do not want to repeat the entire speech which I delivered two weeks ago, but the same principle applies to this bill, namely, that if the banker or the credit union manager who wants to lend money under this act knows he has a guarantee from the government for any losses, a good deal of which will be paid for by the government, is willing to sit down with the borrower and work out a hypothetical cash flow for one, three, five, ten, or 12 years, whatever it comes to, and take the smallest amount of interest he can get away with—I suggest the figure of 7 per cent or 8 per cent would be reasonable and normal in this period of inflation—and then the farmer would be willing to give a certain percentage of the extra profit for a number of years until the lender feels he has been reasonably well compensated—and you can show that from the farmer's net return each year—they will both be better off.

I would like to have the opportunity to put a big chart out in front of hon. members to show examples of how this works. But all I will do is content myself with the story I told weeks ago. A Canadian company last summer wanted to borrow $30 million on a very risky enterprise. It was proposed to the lenders that the interest should be no more than 8 per cent, so that in the first two or three years of this operation, when the cash flow would be negative, it would not be too heavy a load to break this marginal operation.

The lenders went back and took it up with their own government. They came back two or three months later and they said: "We worked out several of these hypothetical cash flows and we figured out that if we only charged you 5 per cent interest, you could pay the debt back that much sooner and we could get the percentage we talked about sooner. Over the 25-year life of the contract we will make more money out of it by getting you to pay off the debt quicker with the smallest of the front end loading charge."

The benefit of this to the lender was obvious. Naturally the borrower was delighted because in the risky first two or three years of the operation, if the costs are low enough you can keep on surviving each day, and then you get a chance to live long enough at the business to pay both the principal and interest quickly and you do not mind sharing a percentage of the profit afterwards. I know this works for small business if they can persuade the lender to give them that type of deal.

I would not be reluctant, if I were in the minister's position, to try that out on the Department of Finance. I suggest that he should talk to one or two of the banks first, particularly the top-notch agricultural men—and he knows who they are as well as I do—to see if he could not get one or two examples from them. Perhaps he could put it as one alternative in the regulations that the farmer would have the choice of taking the interest rate as prime plus 1 per cent, or the alternative of working out the kind of deal to which I referred. You might find bank managers and managers of credit unions who are knowledgeable in the techniques of farming who would realize that it is better to make more money out of a deal than it is to charge a high interest rate at the beginning and risk trouble for the farmer. I think that the farmer today would be very unwise, with the high price of products nowadays, to borrow too much money at a high interest rate. That is why I think he would tend to take the other alternative. I would like to assure the minister that if he would try this idea on the Treasury Board and would get the regulation through, he would have the support of at least some of us on this side and, we hope, on his side as well. I think this would apply to many other things also.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for letting me have this opportunity to put this viewpoint on the provision which deals with interest rates. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will continue his fight, with the support of all of us in the House, to get back other things for the Department of Agriculture. I still want ARDA back where it belongs. I still want PFRA where it belongs. I still want PFRA made into a national institute servicing all of Canada, not just the prairies. Agriculture in the next two or three decades, as is so clear, will become tremendously important because it is the farmers who will produce the great bulk of the energy supplies of Canada and other nations in the future. They can do so now at prices which are competitive with other sources of energy, and I think we can do so without interfering with the present land use.

These ideas have been in my mind for a long time, as many members know. I think the minister has a great opportunity, at this time in our history when people are worried about supplies of energy and about costs, to take the lead in the fight to get the administrative machinery, which can do all these things which are in place now, back in the department. If the minister did that, the farmers of Nova Scotia could produce all the energy they need down there, without having to drag in this expensive stuff from the west. Likewise, that would be the case for the farmers of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario.

The Minister of Agriculture could make his department the great champion of all the people of the country, if he made it very clear to his colleagues that he is a little bit tired of agriculture being pushed aside in this Parliament as it has been for the last ten or 12 years. He should bring it back up where it should be—the leading productive department of this whole country. Then we will give those guys in the mining business and the forestry business a run for their money. We will take it over for them. That is the attitude which should be there. I have declared my willingness, and I suspect most of the members of this House will support the minister on that.

I would be glad to support this bill. I would hope the minister would take up the idea I have proposed. He should see if he can include a regulation like that as an alternative in this act. I know it happened once before in the Farm Credit Act. No one uses it very much, but at least the alternative is given. If the minister did that and had it well publicized among the banks and the farmers, there might be a few who would prefer going that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing today the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, Bill C-27, an act that has been around every three years since 1945. We are seeking to extend the act for another three years and to increase the loan limit to $100,000 per user from the current limit of $75,000.

The minister has adequately outlined the background to the act, but I should like to spend a minute or two going back to some of the things the Farm Improvement Loans Act does and perhaps try to answer why we have it. As Mr. Speaker knows, it is an act whereby the farmers are able to borrow money from the banks and the credit unions and such loans are guaranteed by the government. Originally the loans were at a lower rate than the usual lending rate was for the banks or credit unions. When it was introduced in 1945, the idea behind it was to assist farmers to retool their operations after the Second World War. Also it was designed to assist the manufacturers in this country and in North America to supply a market for the new machines which they could turn their attention toward manufacturing because the war was finally over. Also it provided guarantees for the lending institutions, primarily the banks, and eventually the credit unions were able to get in on the program as well.

If there are occasional losses because of the loan guarantees part of the program, I think it has been made up for many, many times by the fact that it has created employment for people in the manufacturing industry, the sales industry, the agricultural machinery industry, and to some extent has assisted in increasing the productivity of Canadian farms.

The loans have not always been universally available. At times it is virtually impossible for farmers to get a farm improvement loan because the amount is limited each year. At least that is the story we are told at the banks. For that reason and a couple of others which I will come to, I think probably it is still necessary to continue on in this country having provincial lending institutions aimed at providing service to different types of farms.

The broad economic tools of the Farm Improvement Loans Act can be used to help farmers, manufacturers and banks, but these economic implements are basically effective as they apply to mature farms—farms that have been in business for a while, or farms on which a lot of money is not owed. Generally they are established operations that have been around for some time. Generally they have enjoyed reasonably good crops and reasonably stable production periods just before the point in time at which we measure them. For the beginning farmer or for those farmers who get caught in bad weather or with bad markets, occasionally we need other lending methods or lending institutions. Because it is not easy to make rapid changes in federal laws in federal lending institutions. I maintain the provinces have, of necessity, stepped into this field.

I am fairly responsive to the need of the provinces being in the field because of my own experience in trying to become a farmer 25 or so years ago. I had been attempting to build up some assets so that I could officially become a farmer. I had been farming with my father for three or four years, renting land, renting equipment and, in short, trying to learn the business and build up some equity. Some land became available and I went to the Farm Credit Corporation, knowing that I required the minimum of 25 per cent of my own assets free and clear before I could borrow another 75 per cent to buy the farm. After much bookwork, analysis and trading back and forth between the lending institution and myself, finally it was established that the amount of assets I had managed to scrape together only came to 23 per cent of what was required to set up the proposed farm. It was one of those situations where I could not buy less; farms come in certain discrete sizes. So, for the lack of 2 per cent of equity, the Farm Credit Corporation turned me down.

Fortunately for me—or probably I would not be here speaking to the House as a farmer—there was a provincial program in the province of Saskatchewan which demanded that a young farmer only needed 20 per cent equity in the farm he was trying to establish. So, I had 2 per cent or 3 per cent extra and I was able to borrow the money. At that time it cost me a little more for interest. Instead of 5 per cent, I had to pay 6.5 per cent. But I was able to get it established and was able to get a loan.

It is to cover those kinds of situations that programs have been established in provinces like Saskatchewan, programs which are aimed specifically at helping the beginning farmer who has not had an opportunity to put together a lot of assets, the farmer who needs the kind of assistance that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was talking about. I am referring to the kind of loan which does not have a lot of top loading, which in fact amounts to a subsidy for the first few years of the life of the loan. Essentially that is what FarmStart does in our province and what goes on in a lot of provincial loan programs in other provinces across the country. They are necessary because these are not the kind of programs that are available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, or have been available under the Farm Credit Corporation.

I am aware that there seems to have been a perhaps unspoken but definite change in the internal policy of the Farm Credit Corporation in regard to beginning farmers. I am not sure it is even that well defined within the Farm Credit Corporation Act, but when you look at the record you will see that five or ten years ago 15 per cent to 17 per cent of loans were being made to farmers under age 35, and the current situation is that something over 70 per cent of the loans being made are being made to farmers under age 35. There does appear to be a definite leaning toward assisting the beginning or younger farmer to get established, and I think that is to the good.

The problem, of course, is that in the kind of inflationary period we are currently facing, the total amount of money available through this program never seems to be quite enough. I can remember when we had an upper limit on all of our loans outstanding for farm improvement of $10,000. This was moved up eventually to $25,000. I recall when that move took place and the hand-wringing, hair-pulling and hair-tearing that occurred among those people who suggested that by increasing the amount of loan capital available to farmers we were simply adding to inflation, which was starting to become a worry at that time.

The theory of some people was that if you increase the amount of money available, farmers would only spend it and that would help to bid up the price of equipment; manufacturers would perhaps take advantage of the situation and raise the price of equipment. I do not know whether that was the reason for the increase, but in fact we have gone through that increase and another increase of the upper limit to $50,000, and now we are going to $100,000 from $75,000. Whether we are following inflation or causing it I will leave to someone else wiser than I to discuss. I only point it out because it is a fact we have to live with, and inflation is probably one of the main reasons we are discussing this bill today to increase the amount of funds available to individual borrowers.

The farm debt load that the agricultural industry in this country is carrying is approaching a level where we should be quite concerned about it. A recent article by R.S. Rust entitled "Farm Finance". which came out in the farm Market Commentary, put out by Agriculture Canada, in the December, 1979, issue, points out that:

> Farmer investment in real estate, machinery, and livestock increased from $61,247 million in 1977 to $70,188 million in 1978, an increase of 14.6 per cent compared with a 7.5 per cent increase a year earlier.

Most of that increase is a result of increased valuations of land, buildings and equipment brought about by inflation.

The article goes on to state:

> Farm debt in 1978 increased to $12,327 million from $10,811 million in 1977—

Farm debt figures are always being tossed around, but the estimate for 1978, and this is a relatively official figure, indicates an increase of 14 per cent over the previous year.

A lot of people do not worry very much about the amount of farm debt or the fact that it is increasing at a rate faster than the inflation rate. If they are not worried it is probably because they have what I term the banker's attitude toward debt. They simply look at the market value of the assets against which that debt has been taken.

When you look at the raw figures it does not seem as though we have very much to worry about in that the debt amounts to about 17 per cent or 18 per cent of total assets, being the book value of Canadian farms at this time. However, most farms that are active and growing carry far more than 17 per cent of their assets in the form of debt. Certainly beginning farmers will be carrying as much as 75 per cent of their total net worth in the form of debt. If you do some very rough calculations you will quickly see why some of the people who have been in business for only the past ten or 15 years are very concerned this spring.

For ease of calculation let us use $100,000 as a base, and I realize that the average farm in Canada is two to four times that amount. We can quickly see that if 50 per cent of the farm is tied up in debt, the interest payment each year at current rates will be around $10,000. Therefore, you have $10,000 interest on a $100,000 investment. The very efficient farmers in my part of the country on the prairies are very lucky if they can turn over their capital once every five or six years, and the average is to turn over the capital about every ten years. If we take it on a once in five year base, which is extremely efficient, half of the farmer's total income goes out in the form of interest payments. As I have said before, interest payments represent the greatest expense of most farmers in Canada today.

When a farmer gets into a situation in which markets have been bad for two or three years, or when the market suddenly drops, and I am thinking now of places like the maritimes where potato growers have had three bad years in terms of market prices or the prairies where the U.S. boycott has now cut the price, and considering the prospect of a drought, this increase will probably not be adequate. While this particular change in the Farm Improvement Loans Act will be welcomed, and the funds will probably be used, when we consider the situation that exists in the country more than likely it will not be adequate. Lack of income has to be made up by borrowings so we must have on hand the kind of economic tools necessary to handle that kind of situation.

While I support the amendment that has been made to the act I suggest it does not go far enough to deal with the situation that exists now, this spring. If we continue to see the world grain price decline, along with a drought, this will be totally inadequate, and I would hope we would have some additional legislation, perhaps a combination of amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Farm Credit Corporation Act, to deal with these situations which I foresee developing here and now in this country.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I too have a few remarks to make about Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The purpose of the legislation, which was first enacted in 1945, and the value of it and the use it has been put to since, have been covered by previous speakers and I do not want to prolong this debate by going over them but I think there are a few points that need to be made in connection with the bill.

Farmers today are facing increased costs. The same is true of many other segments of our economy. Farmers today need money in order to operate more than they ever needed it before. They need money for fuel, for fertilizer, repairs to machinery and for labour, in order to get a crop into the ground and then to harvest it. Capital has become a greater factor in the time that I have been part of the farming community.

Farm improvement loans have been very useful to me in the past. The first loan I ever had was a farm improvement loan. At that time the interest rate was 5 per cent and the maximum amount was $7,500. In 25 years the limit has reached $100,000 and the rate is set at no more than one per cent above the prime rate. I do not consider myself ancient or over the hill, Mr. Speaker, but in the time I have been farming things have changed dramatically. This bill proposes to increase the loan limit from $75,000 to $100,000, the increase being over three times the amount available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act when I first sought a loan.

Financing has become a very important part of the farming operation so the bill is very appropriate in that it will help deal with some of the problems that farmers have in coping with increasing costs. Not only have input costs gone up but so have capital costs, machinery costs, and land prices. The increased limit is therefore welcomed.

I could give the House some figures to illustrate how costs have risen in the past couple of years. In the calendar year 1978 they increased 18.7 per cent over 1977 for the country as a whole. The increase for the year 1979 over 1978 was 15.5 per cent. This increase of 15 per cent to 20 per cent per annum shows that there will be a need for increased borrowings of the same magnitude if farmers are to be able to stay in business.

This bill is very relevant to the large rural riding of Portgage-Marquette in Manitoba which I represent, Mr. Speaker. For Manitoba farmers the increase in operating expenses for 1978 over 1977 was 17.4 per cent, and for 1979 over 1978 the increase was 14.1 per cent. These are substantial increases in farm costs, Mr. Speaker.

I see that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is in the House, Mr. Speaker. I was somewhat disappointed that the initial payment was not set higher. True, it is 25 cents per bushel more than it was a year ago. Very soon after the initial payment was set a year ago it was increased by 50 cents per bushel, so really the initial payment announced some time ago for the coming crop year is less than farmers are receiving as the initial payment in the current crop year. That is very distressing in light of the way current costs have increased. There could be a good case for increasing the initial payment given the fact that world prices for grain have, if anything, increased. Prices are certainly not any less now than they were a year ago when the initial price was set at 25 cents per bushel higher than now. I would urge the minister to look at this seriously and as quickly as he possibly can.

Mr. Whelan: He is, and he is very much aware of it.

Mr. Mayer: I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) commenting that he is doing that. I hope the minister will give his support to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) who is responsible in this chamber for the Canadian Wheat Board, in order to see that such an increase is allowed.

Mr. Whelan: It will be done.

Mr. Mayer: If that is the case it is certainly welcome news, and the sooner it is announced, the better. It is one thing to increase loan guarantees through a bill such as this, and it is certainly needed, but farmers need more income. If they can be assured of a higher initial price, that is certainly welcome news. If that is the case, then the sooner the announcement is made the better, and I will look forward to it.

While I have the attention of the Minister of Agriculture I would urge him to bring forward at the earliest opportunity the meat import law referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I do not know whether the minister remembers, but my first contact with him was some three or four years ago on that very issue. It was one cold winter evening in Winnipeg. The beef industry in this country was going through some very bad times in part because Australia and New Zealand were literally clobbering our producers with excess imports. I might say that at that time the minister was not very receptive to our pleas that he control the imports. He had the vehicle to do so. He did not need a beef import law but could have done it under the Export and Import Permits Act. In fact he ended up doing that some time later using the Export and Import Permits Act. Before the restriction was imposed on the massive quantities of beef that the Oceanic countries were sending to Canada, some serious damage was inflicted upon the beef industry. Indeed, the industry has not fully recovered yet from the damage done by those massive imports in 1975-76. I would urge the minister to bring forward legislation as quickly as he can so that our producers can be assured of a future for the beef industry in this country.

This is the type of legislation that farmers need to enable them to stay in business without having to borrow so much money. It is one thing to borrow money and another to pay it back. What we need, in order to pay it back, is a means of generating income. A program to increase the initial payment for wheat which would let producers know that they will receive at least as much as they have this year in their initial payment, and a program to assure the beef industry that there will not be a repeat of the 1975-76 situation, are badly needed. If the minister brings such legislation forward I can assure him that we on this side of the House will support it, provided it is drafted to give some sensible quotas to offshore imports.

It is very important at the present time that such legislation be brought forward because of the serious drought condition in western Canada. It is bad in my part of the country and I am sure it is even worse in southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. There is virtually no grass. At this time of year producers decide how many heifers to keep as replacements, and what the size of their cow herd will be a couple of years ahead in order to supply the consumer with beef even further ahead. The borrowing limit can be set as high as we want and things made attractive for borrowing, but if there is no assurance that the producer can pay it back, and that the markets will be available all is for naught. Legislation should be brought forward quickly so that it can be debated and passed and beef producers assured of a market if they decide to increase their cow herd by breeding more heifers. This is a particularly critical point at this time of year, in view of the grass conditions in western Canada. Roughly three-quarters of the cow herd in Canada is located in the three prairie provinces, so it is an important issue at this time.

Another matter that I should like to touch upon briefly is the question of grain transportation. Western Canadian producers have been missing markets because they have not been able to get their grain to deep sea ports for export. Had they been able to do so, not only would they have been able to contribute to their community but to the whole country.

I have seen conservative estimates of lost sales of something in the order of half a billion dollars for the last two crop years. The possibility of potential sales lost must also be considered because there is no incentive for producers to grow grain if their graineries are full. Had the grain been moved, of course there would have been additional production which would have accounted for another half a billion dollars in sales.

When one considers we should have sold an additional $1 billion worth of grain that not only would have benefited the areas in western Canada but would have been of tremendous benefit to the whole country in terms of helping our balance of payments, helping the value of our money and helping our interest rates, therefore making it less necessary for people to borrow the money. With that kind of income added to our balance of payments, one could make a very good case that our interest rates would not have needed to go as high as they have in the past few months. Therefore grain transportation plays a very important and vital part in keeping producers in business and in seeing that they earn enough money to repay the loans that they make under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

There is one other comment I would like to make concerning the farmers' ability to produce. On the average we are served very well by our farming community in this country. We are among the top two or three countries of the world in terms of food. For instance, on the average we spend somewhat less than 20 per cent of our disposable income on food. This is an average, and it is not intended to imply that there are not people in Canada who are having trouble feeding themselves on the income they receive. But this only tells part of the story, because not only do we spend a small percentage of our income on food, but when we spend it we are able to purchase an exceptional variety of foods, we are able to purchase foods out of season, we get exceptional packaging of goods, and we eat a lot of food away from home in restaurants. This is all included in the less than 20 per cent of our disposable income spent on food.

One of the ways one can define a developed country is to talk about the percentage of gross national product that a country spends on food. If we have to spend 50 or 60 per cent of our working hours feeding ourselves we would not have time for coloured televisions, vacations, and all the things we take for granted here in Canada. We would all have to be hoeing our gardens after supper so as to feed ourselves. I do take a lot of pride in being a farmer when I think that I have had a chance to contribute to the standard of living that we enjoy in this country. If it were not for the fact that we are as efficient as we are as farmers, we would not be in that happy situation in Canada.

I support the bill in principle. I welcome the proposal that the borrowing limit be raised from $75,000 to $100,000. I was pleased to hear the minister say that at committee he would entertain any amendments that would be of benefit to the farming community. That is a very welcome and open attitude, and it is the kind of attitude we have in the agricultural community. There is less partisanship and certainly as much good will in the agricultural community in terms of the political part of it as there is in any other segment of our economy. I think the minister's statement to that effect is welcome, and I certainly intend to hold him to it if there are some amendments that come forward at committee that are likely to be of benefit to the farmers.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I will try to reinforce and reiterate some of the fine remarks that have been made by the members of my party, namely, the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), and the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). We support this legislation. It is an ongoing piece of business but continues to appear every three years. The tone of the remarks made by all sides of this House indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), how important the people of rural Canada feel about the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

This is legislation that has been here since 1945. It has served the farmers of Canada, and the farmers of my region of Canada very well over that period of time. But I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, in the spirit of co-operation that always develops between himself and members of my party, that because of the guarantee that is placed, because of the involvement of the Government of Canada in guaranteeing loans through the Farm Improvement Loans Act, an onus be put on the banks to make this farm improvement loan scheme available to farmers.

There are several different kinds of loans and there are several different reasons for refusals, but usually the refusal is because the banking industry has the ability to make more profit from a different type of loan. Because of the involvement of the government and the guarantees placed by the government on the farm improvement loans, I think it is incumbent upon the government to make a very strong request of the banking community that these loans be extended at all times to farmers who qualify.

I would like to list some of the applications of the Farm Improvement Loans Act and some of the numbers and usages in my province of Saskatchewan. In the year 1978 there were 7,438 purchases of farm implements. There were 276 loans for land clearing under the farm improvement act. There were 238 loans for purchase of livestock. There were 13 loans for major repair and overhaul of implements. There were 1,107 loans made for the purchase of combines, and 179 loans for hay bailers.

When one considers there are 150,000 permit book holders in western Canada and probably 60 per cent of those permit book holders are in the province of Saskatchewan, it is a very small number of people who are taking advantage of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I know that it is not because they want to pay higher interest rates, but because of the needs of the banking industry—and I recognize it as other people do—to make a profit. Farmers seem to be the only ones who go into something for exercise. The banks do not go into things for exercise; their motive is profit. I think those numbers indicate that there may be a need for the government to request that the banks make these loans available to farmers and cattlemen regardless of the interest rate if they qualify.

I agree with the need for a national food policy, but the people who seem to be the most vocal and most persuasive when it comes to a national food policy are consumers. We realize everyone has to buy food, but the problem is that consumers demand cheap food. Again, I think it is incumbent upon the government—and I know that the Minister of Agriculture believes this—to guarantee a stable agricultural community. One cannot do that with a promise of cheap food.

We have a commitment or a trust placed on those of us in Canada because of our wealth and our natural resource of land to assist in feeding the hungry world. The implication that goes with this is a great challenge to producers. But producers will only assist in the need for feeding a hungry world if, at the same time, they make a profit on their operations. The need for a strong agricultural community, be it grain, hogs, or cattle, demands there must be a profit in order for them to maintain their survival as farmers. In this way we hope to contribute to the hungry of the world.

I do condemn the government, for its cheap food policy and I know the Minister of Agriculture cannot take total responsibility because we know he is a man of good faith and has a deep understanding for the farmers' problems. However, we must have the ability to back up the Minister of Agriculture so that he can make his concerns and the concerns of us all felt in the present government. We find that the present government is lacking greatly in concerns for people of the soil. Whether they be in the hog industry, the cattle industry or in any method of growing food. It is of concern to us and I know it is of concern to the minister. Therefore, we must make a commitment here to assist him if he has any trouble convincing his cabinet colleagues of the needs of agriculture.

I would like to talk briefly about farming and small business. Many people who are not familiar with the business of agriculture do not think of it as a business. Small business and farming go hand in hand. Members of the farm community consider themselves small businessmen. They are like small businessmen in other areas of endeavour who are not asking for a handout. They are not asking for something for nothing. What they are really asking for is the ability to be left to function without the heavy hand of government and without the heavy hand of bureaucracy. They want to be given the tools to do the job of feeding a hungry world. They will be able to do that as long as the red tape, the bureaucracy and some of the large things that come from big government that bother small businessmen, are kept away from small businessmen, which includes farmers. There is no way we can consider the tools needed for big business and those needed for small business in the same breath. That is why the Farm Improvement Loans Act along with the Farm Credit Corporation is of great assistance in agriculture.

The Farm Credit Corporation has served us well in Canada over the last number of years, but there has been a problem in interpretation. It should not be necessary for someone starting in the business of agriculture or farming to provide two half sections to purchase one, to put up double security to enable him to be eligible for a farm credit loan. Farm credit loans are there and are given in good faith.

If there was a young farmer in the minister's district who wanted to start farming and he had a quarter, 200 acres, or however land is measured there, the minister would be able to judge this young farmer or businessman. He would be known in the district. The Minister of Agriculture or anyone else in that community would be able to tell the credit supervisor of the Farm Credit Corporation whether that young person would be a success in business.

I would ask the minister to consider having four neighbours of a young or beginning farmer sign a pledge, and maybe put up a $25 bond that they would guarantee and do what they could to assist the young farmer getting into the business of agriculture, rather than make the young farmer put up a half section or section in order to buy a quarter or another half section. If you limit the need for excessive security and have this type of pledging, it would assist the young farmer in his operation. It would go a long way toward guaranteeing and assisting that young man or woman to be successful in the business. I do not want to carry on too long—

Mr. Whelan: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: The minister says "Hear, hear!". I have been very kind. I have not said anything the minister would not say to me if he was on this side. I wish to take a few moments to go back and talk about farming as a business.

Farming today in my constituency and area involves a total investment of $500 to $600 an acre in order to have a viable and operating farm. The average farm is around 800 to 900 acres. It is worth about half a million dollars. You must consider the cost of machinery. Comparing the potential cost of machinery now with last year, machinery prices in 1980 are up 10 per cent to 15 per cent over what they were in 1979.

There has been an increase in the cost of farm labour of about 7 per cent in 1980 over 1979. Petroleum prices have increased. Electricity has increased. The cost of input is greater now than it ever was. As a matter of fact the cost of input in crop production has increased since 1973 by about 105 per cent. It is incumbent upon the Minister of Agriculture to assist his constituents, who happen to be the farmers of Canada, to take a look at the commitment made by his government in the campaign in February, 1979, the commitment that they would endeavour to bring in a two-price wheat system which would add stability to the marketplace and give protection to the consumer.

The commitment was made to the two-price system so the government would maintain it for domestically produced non-feed wheat. I do not know whether the minister had any discussions with the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, but they would like to maintain a protection from high world prices for the consumers, and they would like to give the producers the ability to achieve the same prices as high export prices would give them.

I find some difficulty with the statement that, now that the price of a bushel of grain is being increased $1, the price of a loaf of bread will increase five cents to the consumer. The Minister of Agriculture knows that is not true. He knows, as we know, that it represents only about 2.3 cents or 2.2 cents increase per loaf if you raise the price of a bushel of wheat $1.

I would like the minister to do something else which his government promised during the campaign, that is, establish a commission to give fair and accurate information on the difference between the farm gate price for food produced in agriculture and the retail price.

Mr. Whelan: That's coming.

Mr. McKnight: The minister says that is coming. We on this side welcome it. I would like to talk about something else that is apparently coming. During the mini-budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), one thing among others that was left out came to my attention. After using several of our proposals in the budget that was defeated in December, in their mini-budget, I had hoped they would use another one, to defer up to $100,000 in capital gains for farmers retiring. This would assist young farmers becoming involved in the business. It would decrease, or at least not increase, the cost of entering the business of farming. As it is now, farmers retiring consider the cost of capital gains in the price at which they sell their farm. They take that into consideration. I have not heard the minister say that is coming, but I certainly hope it is.

I conclude by saying that we on this side support the bill. I do not want to make my friends from the Atlantic region feel bad, but I would appreciate it if the minister of Agriculture could increase the upper limits of the Farm Improvement Loans Act to the same degree as the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I think the additional $50,000, from $100,000 to $150,000, would certainly have been a great benefit to the agricultural industry. As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, $100,000 does not go far in meeting the cost of fertilizer, the cost of pesticides, and the increasing cost of fuel. So perhaps the minister would ask his colleagues; we would certainly support him.

One other thing. I would ask the minister to use his good offices when it comes to protecting producers of cattle. I am sure he is aware of what I have in mind when it comes to extending to cattlemen and farmers the right of protection which other producers have in the market place from foreclosures. I am talking about the packing industry and money lent by banks on the word "procure" rather than "purchase" of cattle. I think the minister would find there is unanimous support on this side; I know there is some support on his side, and we gather we may be able to get this change made.

Once again, I endorse this bill with reservation. I commend the minister for his work and commit myself to assisting him in a spirit of good will to making any improvements which may be necessary.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for just a few moments as it certainly is not the intent of the opposition to hold up the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Some have a baker turned into a farmer.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am surprised the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not too familiar with the riding in which he resides from time to time. As he should be aware if he drives outside the area where he and I both live, there is a very large agricultural area. As you yourself are aware, Mr. Speaker, there is a very large area—the city of Nepean itself, the township of Goulburn, the township of Rideau, the township of Osgoode, have some of the finest agricultural land in Ontario. We are rather proud of this, but that is not the reason I rise. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to indicate to the minister that we want him to have passage of this bill today because we think it is important that he has it today. We also want him to have the next bill, the livestock assistance legislation, today, and we do not intend to impede the passage of that bill, either.

I want to point out to the minister and ask him to recall, if he would, the exchange which took place today between the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), as well as the exchange I had with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period. It must be disturbing to Canadian farmers if they follow what was said—and I am sure they will—that the Bank of Canada is intervening with respect to the interest rate situation so that the farmers of the country, as well as others, are not going to have the advantage which exists today in the situation of interest rates going down. In other words, they are being denied the normal attrition of interest rates, which I think is important.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has been with me throughout my constituency, as he well recalls, and he met the delegation of farmers who are very much concerned about interest rates and how they affect them in their operations. I rise to commend that to the Minister of Agriculture as we give approval to his bill and the other one today. These are very important pieces of legislation.

One other matter which I am happy to see—and in this I join the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton)—is that the regulatory power is moving from the Department of Finance to the Department of Agriculture where it really belongs. I hope the government will take into account what my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain said about the appropriateness of gathering these matters in the department where they would seem to have the greatest impact and the greatest place.

I would be grateful if the minister would at least consider that in promulgating regulations under this bill to the extent that it is possible, consideration be given to the advance publication of any regulation that may be made under this statute, or any other statute over which he has jurisdiction, perhaps even in The Canada Gazette—I know that isn't family reading at nights around the dinner table, but in The Canada Gazette or in the farm publications, in this particular case—so that in advance of the impact on the agriculture community it will have the benefit of the opportunity to consult with the government with respect to the impact of regulations made from time to time. As the minister knows full well, that is an important part of the legislative apparatus and it is a part of the legislative apparatus which sort of sneaks up on people. It is not done here in the House of Commons. I wish he would take those two matters into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak just for a few moments in this debate on a matter which is important, and I hope that the speeches which have been made on both sides of the House today will indicate to an even greater degree than has been the case heretofore that the food industry does not begin at the refrigerator door. Indeed, there is a great deal of risk with respect to the food industry that other businesses and other callings do not face. We intend to give passage to this bill forthwith, and if the parliamentary secretary would call the next bill he has on his plate, we intend to deal quickly with that as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion (Mr. Whelan) agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, and just for the record, Mr. Speaker, I think we should agree to stand motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

METRIC SYSTEM OF MEASUREMENT

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION ON VOLUNTARY BASIS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the introduction of the metric system of measurement should be done on a voluntary basis.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring democracy to metrication in this country.

● (1600)

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): For too many years Canadians have been force-marched into a measurement system they neither know, understand nor, in my view, need. In addition, converting to metric has been an irritating, frustrating and very costly experience to many millions of people in this country?

I am serving notice this afternoon that we Canadian consumers do not like the way the previous Trudeau administration imposed metric conversion on this land without any consultation with Parliament, other than in a most strictly formal sense. There was no desire by the previous Liberal government to allow a full debate in this House to assess the human impact of metric conversions. On the only two occasions that I know of that the subject of metric conversion came before the House, it was a time exactly like this, the ghetto hour of Friday afternoon between four o'clock and five o'clock. In fact the last time was in 1975 on a Friday afternoon, March 17, St. Patrick's Day, somewhere around 3.30 or four in the afternoon. One can imagine how much interest and attention were being paid to the subject then.

Any amateur observer of the proceedings of the this chamber will know that a so-called debate during this hour is about as exciting as watching a casket warp. Still, this desperate hour represents the very first time that Parliament has examined the human factor in going metric. I regard this intervention as merely an opening shot in the debate on the need for voluntary metric conversion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): The intent of this motion is to impress on the Parliament of Canada the need to listen to the people of this country regarding their resentment of the way metrication has been imposed on Canadians. I do not think it is widely known that this imposition of metric on the Canadian people has been the greatest intervention by a government in the lives of more than 20 million Canadians since World War II. Total metrication was not only a creature of the former Trudeau government, but it remains a present commitment and, indeed, an indelible commandment of the current administration: proceed, and damn the torpedoes. My notice of motion is, as I say, to bring some democracy and some sanity to the whole metrication process.

Let me refer to the metric overview board's review of the metrication process and recommendations for action, and while mentioning this report which, incidentally, has not yet been made public by the government, may I on behalf of many members of this House of Commons commend its authors, Mr. Gordon MacEachern and Mr. Rex Werts, for their thorough examination of this very important subject affecting the lives of so many Canadians.

This matter of voluntary conversion is one of the greatest importance. Time and time again in the white paper of 1970 when it came before this House, emphasis was laid on the fact that the discussed change to metric was to be achieved by voluntary means. This promise soon became lost in the actions which followed. Metric Commission officials continue to refer to actions being voluntary because the consensus principle was applied. The metric overview board has insisted that due to the actions of government this is only voluntary in the old army sense: you have no choice but to volunteer.

Throughout its work the overview board has upheld the definition of voluntary used by the American National Metric Council: "Voluntary: freedom of choice as to if and when conversion is to be carried out". The executive director of the Metric Commission I have never met, but the commission itself certainly has been almost unaware of the rights and opinions of the people of Canada.

In more recent times the commission has appeared to lose credibility as it chose to ignore the rising opposition to metrication either at home, in the United Kingdom, or in the United States. As the United States is by far our paramount trading partner in every respect, I think it behoves us as a matter of common sense to bring our metric posture into line with America's, and right away. Whether we like it or not, the North American economy is so interlocked with so many pervasive linkages, products, factories, corporations, equipment, communications, information systems, advanced technology, research and development, community of regulations, measurement standards and statistics that, in my view, any basic move to use a different measurement system entirely here is almost incomprehensible. The United Kingdom has recently moved to slam the brakes on metric for the next ten years, and now—would you believe?—Japan, one of our largest importers and exporters, has admitted metric defeat.

During a meeting in July, 1979, in Sacramento, California, a member of the California Metric Conversion Council told the group that he had been informed that Japan had enacted legislation which now legalizes the use of traditional, customary measurement units once again. Some of the old units would be used along with some of the metric ones as they had done before a number of years ago. According to the report, the relegalization of the old units took place only after considerable public pressure was brought to bear on the law makers for the last two years. That is the kind of public pressure that I hope we are able to launch here in this House of Commons right now.

Japan has had confusion in its measurement field for many years, apparently, since it first began to utilize metric in the pre-World War I days. In any event, industries held on to some of the nationalized metric units, but they did not agree with the European metric in a number of ways. They even came up with a metric screw thread in Japan for industry which did not coincide with the French-European metric thread sizes, so export customers like the Americans who purchased Japanese cars and motorcycles later requiring repair parts soon learned that there would be problems if they mixed the two types of metric nuts and bolts.

What did the Americans do? Not agreeing with either system, they came up with a so-called modified metric system, and now we have three different kinds of nuts and bolts, and all three thread types are different and cannot be interchanged.

The nationalization of the metric system has been going on almost as long as metric has been known in many countries around the world. Most nations have provisions for changing metric units to suit themselves. We have a metric system, the system internationale, which is used, to my knowledge, in only three other countries of the world, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, and now we are going into metric, so I do not buy the argument that Canada's going metric puts us in step with our trading partners around the world.

Canadians are not being asked—they are being forced—to abandon a lifetime of tradition, education, knowledge and experience in one measurement field, without any real proof that the new system will be of even marginal benefit. The study our research office did hits the bottom line of concern to many of us on this side of the House. There has been no estimate of how much the switch to metric is costing Canada, but estimates of the cost of going totally metric in the United States are as high as $100 billion—that is with a "B".

There is no question that conversion is very costly for a country which is struggling to keep inflation below the double-digit level. What is happening, in my view, is that a non-elected body has proceeded with plans to convert the country to the metric system, so far without any curbs by the House of Commons. It is costing governments, private companies, corporations, stores, service stations, mechanics and others millions of dollars to convert to a new measurement, all at a very difficult time in Canada's economic life.

If the metric momentum has grown to the point where we cannot throw the process into reverse—and I do not suggest for a moment that we do—then Parliament must have a chance to examine the implications of going totally metric and, at the very least, I believe this government must listen to the people's real concerns, their complaints and confusion about metrication, before the scheduled completion of the timetable in 1982.

One area of metrication which officially concerns me as opposition critic on consumer affairs is the impact the changeover is having on shoppers across this country. My colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), has eloquently set out his community's woes as one of the three metric testing centres in Canada. I assume that the strong feelings of Peterborough's consumers and the business community would be echoed in Sherbrooke and Kamloops, the other two test centres. I certainly know how the vast majority of my people regard metric shopping in Hamilton-Wentworth.

It is not just the inconvenience of mentally trying to convert in the supermarkets that concerns me. It is what more and more consumers are beginning to realize is a substantial rip-off by manufacturers of many products as we Canadians pay through the nose for metric labelling, packaging and handling, and the changeover certainly can dramatically be demonstrated with fluid milk. That has not been a happy changeover. Housewives and the consumers are constantly facing ever higher prices for fluid milk. With the switch to smaller litres which require 12 per cent more cartons and 12 per cent greater handling than pint and quart cartons, consumers in each province found the smaller cartons actually costing about as much as the former larger standard ones.

Every province has the problem and each one has had to find some way to ease the blow of this completely unnecessary new cost, at least for the moment. The cost increase, however, goes on forever and people will pay it. The dairy activities generally come under provincial jurisdiction. The fact is that processors have been involved in the federal metrication sector and they encourage this metric overview board in its report to see if something could be done in Ontario.

As Ontario represents one third of the nation's population, that alone justified the action. Only the one and two litre cartons, which account for 30 per cent of Ontario's purchase of milk, are involved this year. The three quart plastic jugs are scheduled to be changed to four litre jugs in about two years. Nevertheless, the initial change is calculated to cost the people of Ontario about 6 cents to 7 cents a quart in the first full year, or about $25 million in additional expense. It is estimated that this will rise from $55 million to $65 million once the three quart jug is changed. From the processors' point of view, there is nothing but very sizeable costs for new filling and handling equipment, without any offsetting benefits.

I should like to interject here one fundamental point. I think we have to make this very clear to consumers, particularly to parents across this country. Arguing as I am against this headlong plunge into the metric system, I would also like hon. members to understand that I do not wish in any way to interfere with our younger generation's total acceptance of metrication. They are growing up in a metric world, but they have a freedom of choice to operate either in the world of metric or with standard imperial measures—a freedom of choice which is denied to many millions of other Canadians who have not had the luxury of metric teaching. Actually, the parents themselves are often being converted by their kids enthusiasm for the system. One fellow I know in my riding has three children aged 6, 15 and 17, and they think he is an old fogey because he still has to convert to metric.

While I have sympathy for those who come a cropper over metric, these minor irritants over conversion are not, in my view, reason enough to hold it up, or even to stop and re-examine it, although you do run into some interesting situations. I can think of one of my constituents who works at the Flamborough Downs racetrack in my riding who broke people up one morning complaining it was 18 kilometres below zero. I also know of an unfortunate lady in Ancaster who was recently bereaved and had neglected to pay her hydro bill. When Ontario Hydro sent her a reminder of payment, the lady returned the money forthwith, unaware that Ontario Hydro's billing system had gone metric last September. The lady dutifully paid the date—the thirteenth day of the ninth month—$13.09. Hydro still came back at her to forward the remaining $5, which she did, but by now the episode left everyone scratching their heads.

My thanks to Ottawa Citizen columnist Dave Brown for this gem. It happened here in Ottawa recently to Mr. John Shouldice of Crescent Drive. I am not sure if it is in your riding, Mr. Speaker. He was frustrated by a bit of metrication. He was trying to translate a litre into an American quart. He went to the source, the Metric Commission. As happens every time when you go to the Metric Commission with a specific request of this kind, you will get hesitation, and then the answer that nobody knows the answer. So he called The Citizen, and they brought out their handy little pocket calculator. It said that an American gallon equals 3.7854 litres. Our friend went back to the Metric Commission, told them that and they confirmed that, yes, an American quart was exactly equal to one litre less a little bit. Mr. Shouldice, needless to say, was not very impressed.

Millions of Canadians have been metrified about what has been happening to their way of life, but the fact is that metric is a way of life, it is a fact of life in this country. I do not believe that we can put the toothpaste back into the tube, metric size or otherwise. Our government's minister of state for small business and industry, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), has stated that he is convinced that international realities, present and future, "will demand that Canadians accept the fact that metric is here to stay."

It may well be that total metric conversion in Canada is inevitable. But that may take another 20 or 30 years. In the meantime, I see no reason for the Metric Commission and this government to continue to force-march the Canadian people through a total conversion to metric. There is clear evidence of massive public resistence. Metrication is economically unrealistic in many sectors of Canadian society. Many of our middled aged and senior citizens are needlessly bothered, inconvenienced, angered and confused by a system they do not understand and never cared to know about. Above all, the mandatory imposition of metric, I feel, has contributed to this Liberal government's image of bureaucratic interference in the lives of the average Canadian.

It was in the famous debate on St. Patrick's Day on March 17, 1975, that the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), as reported at page 4162 of Hansard, said:

> We should not be proceeding by order in council or resolution; we should be proceeding by means of a bill. We should have a bill which sets out all the details of the program. The guidelines and the program should be laid down so that we may proceed in an orderly fashion. Instead, we have a loosely worded order in council which allows the Metric Commission to proceed as it sees fit. I believe it would have been better to have a bill, to have a full debate and then to have the Metric Commission appear before a committee and reappear each year to justify its program and expenditures. We see in this commission another government body removed from the scrutiny of Parliament. We see it as a group that is a law unto itself and which proceeds as it sees fit.

I am sure that many hon. members who were here during that debate in 1975 quickly approved in principle the guidelines for metric conversion. There was nothing mandatory mentioned there, and then the matter was referred to the other place. The Metric Commission has never looked back since. I think every party in this House must shoulder responsibility for this oversight. We were taking far too much at face value without probing to see what lay underneath.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this metric issue cannot be treated lightly. It is a matter of grave importance to many Canadians. The spirit of my notice of motion is to urge the Metric Commission, through the House, to develop a public consensus as to, and support for, a new metric policy approach for Canada. I believe that this is ultimately the responsibility of Parliament representing all the people of Canada. Accordingly, I recommend that this House give serious consideration to an early and full discussion and debate on metrication in Canada by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I want to see the rest of the Metric Commission's timetable in all the sectors of the Canadian economy brought before hon. members with a view to getting a consensus in the House on current and future metric policy. Above all, I want to see the rest of Canada's metric program made responsive to the needs and the desires of the Canadian people—a voluntary approach to metrication as set out in the 1970 white paper. In short, as I began these remarks, I want to see some democracy brought to metric in this country.

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say that I am a little confused by the remarks of the hon. member on the other side who somehow thinks we can find it in our hearts to sit between two systems. I must also make a confession to the House that I was converted to metric by my own family because I, too, resisted the thought at first, but they convinced me that my thinking was not in tune with the world.

The Weights and Measures Act of 1871 made the metric system legal for use in Canada. It was amended in 1971 to specify the international system of units as the improved system to be used. The policy that metric conversion was inevitable and in the national interest was established with the House leaders of all parties on January 16, 1970, speaking in support of the white paper on metric conversion in Canada.

I think it is well worth noting that the reason the white paper first came to be produced was in response to representations which had been pressed upon the government from widely diverse segments of the nation. These included such groups as the Consumers' Association of Canada, the Canadian Home and School Association, the Agricultural Institute of Canada, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce representing the business community, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, and the Canadian Council of Professional Engineers. These learned groups had given the matter some great consideration. They had become convinced of the practical benefits to be derived from a system with advantages that range from simplifying the learning process in school to improving and consolidating Canada's competitive position in world trade.

We should also keep in mind that there are some 102 voluntary sector committees with over 2,000 volunteer representatives from industry, labour, consumer and governmental bodies. Metric Commission Canada has had the over-all strategy of involving every sector from every region of Canada as early as possible in planning for metric conversion. All sector plans are developed through a consensus process, and voluntary sector committees take the responsibility for monitoring the implementation of their plans. The voluntary participation approach is characterized by plans which are developed by those who will have to implement them. This helps to ensure that the benefits are achieved at minimal costs. This plan is proceeding forthwith.

Sector plans have resulted from voluntary consensus on the means and timing of their conversions. In the case of prepackaged goods, the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act has required a metric contents declaration since March, 1976. A program of guideline dates for metric conversion recommended by Metric Commission Canada, after consulting with industry, labour and consumer groups, was approved by the government and debated in the House of Commons on March 17, 1975. I am not sure of the time of day on which that occurred.

The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs studied this matter at length and voted unanimously in favour of it. It reported back to the House of Commons on December 17, 1976, with a recommendation that the House consider the advisability of adopting this program and also introducing additional legislation to metric conversion. Subsequently the Metric Conversion (Statute Law Amendment, 1976) Act was passed by the House of Commons on July 25, 1977, and received royal assent on August 5, 1977. The Metric Conversion (Statute Law Amendment, 1976) Act which was debated in the House over a period of nine months, gave the governor in council the power to set dates in any sector of the economy after which the use of the customary or imperial system would be illegal.

Out of a total of 33 sectors which have published metric conversion plans, there are only three sectors for which regulations have been issued under the Weights and Measures Act establishing cut-off dates for the sale and advertising of goods in other than the metric system. Regulations were requested by the working group on scales in the retail food industry, by the home furnishing and piece goods industry, and by the petroleum refineries wholesalers and gasoline service stations. These committees have consumer and industry representatives as well as appropriate government representation on them.

The moves to make metric conversion mandatory were initiated by the industries concerned and not by Metric Commission Canada. Where regulatory action has been requested, the industries cited are concerned about achieving an orderly conversion without unfair competition. They preferred government action to ensure that the ground rules for metric conversion are the same for all in the industry, thus reducing the possibility of consumer confusion to a minimum. We respectfully submit that that is a very logical and excellent approach.

To go into one further case, the working group on scales in the retail food industry comprises representatives of food retailing chains and independents, scales manufacturing and servicing enterprises, consumers as well as weights and measures regulating authorities. In 1977 it formally requested suitable regulations under the Weights and Measures Act to deal with advertising as well as the conversion of scales which were deemed necessary for achieving a co-ordinated and orderly transition to metric units. I should like to emphasize the fact that the decision to make metric conversion mandatory in this sector was made by the minister of consumer and corporate affairs and the cabinet on the recommendation of the food retailers and with the full support of the Consumers' Association of Canada.

The information I have provided in my remarks shows that the Canadian metric conversion program is almost entirely voluntary in nature already, and where legislation has been enacted and regulations used, it has been at the request of the interested parties. I should like to submit that we do not need a statute law on voluntary metric conversion because it is mostly voluntary already.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott), I should like to indicate that I am very pleased to participate in this debate.

First, I would like to comment on the statements made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters). The hon. member is not dealing according to fact. When he said that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs was unanimous in the passage of that bill out of committee, he was not telling the truth. I was on that committee and I fought that—perhaps Mr. Speaker is very much aware of that—along with my colleagues. It was not unanimous and never has been.

Early in the debate the government proposed to pass the bill in 1975, 1976, or whatever it was. It was sort of a conglomeration of weights and measures that was passed at that time. As far as I could understand, certainly it was not a metric bill. But the crucial thing in the passage of that bill was that it was done under closure. Had the government not brought in closure at that time, we would still be debating that bill in the House today. At that time it was Liberal government policy that they were going to force that upon Canadian people.

I just find it intolerable to think that Canadian governments would impose themselves, as the Liberal government has done over several years, on the consumers and business people in Canada. It is abhorrent that anyone would do this. This is why there is so much resistance to this in western Canada. I must rise on every occasion that I can in the House of Commons, at every opportunity, to impress upon the government of the day that consideration must be given to the resistance which is inevitable all over Canada, even in Peterborough, Ontario. They are forcing it upon Canadian people all over Canada, and a tremendous resistance is developing.

I read in the paper this morning where it has been said that there is a new group in the Liberal back benches which is willing to take a new approach to some of Canada's problems. I would hope that that new group in the party on the other side would give some consideration to those people, those consumers and business people who want no part of this system.

It has been said and written that one of the great strengths of Canadians is their integrity, steadfastness, strong inherent individualism, and pragmatism. It has been said and written that Canadians have provided ample evidence in the past that they will adapt to change if the change is perceived to be beneficial, but will resist it when it is not. The nub of the argument against the metric system is that the metric system is not perceived to be beneficial among a majority of Canadian people. Is it necessary? I suggest it is not, and it has never been proven to be necessary to the satisfaction of a great number of Canadians.

In the 1970 white paper on metric conversion emphasis was placed on the fact that the change to metric was to be achieved by voluntary means. That is why this motion by my friend and colleague, is so important. Let the Canadian people choose the type of weights and measures they want.

We were told in the debate which took place in 1975-76 that weights and measures for the grain industry were to be changed so as not to cause an extra conversion and in order to avoid mistakes. That was the argument made to us. That is why they wanted to buy grain at the elevators under the metric weights and measures system.

What did we find when we got to the committee? We found that farmers were going to deliver their grain to the elevator where it would be measured under the metric system. It would go through the entire elevator system by the tonne. However, and here is the crunch, the minute the grain went to the railroad and was put into the hopper car it reverted back to the hundred weight. This is what has turned so many people off the metric system, and that error has never been corrected. This posture seems to have been lost in the shuffle and the flurry of executive action which has followed. The system is only voluntary in the old army sense; you have no choice but to volunteer.

Emphasis must be placed on the fact that this system has to be adopted on a voluntary basis. The government and the Metric Commission have demonstrated that they are unaware of the rights and the opinions of the people of Canada. The metric program is losing its credibility because it marches to the tune of a different drummer; it chooses to ignore the rising opposition to metric at home, in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

Today my colleague mentioned the rising opposition in Japan to the metric system there. If this were a universal system it would be different. I have debated this issue with some of those who say we should be selling our grain by the tonne, as is the case all over the world. I have said that it causes problems for the farmers because it used to be that when a farmer sold a carload of grain the weight would have four figures ahead of the decimal, and one following. That measurement was in an easy form for calculation, because the four figures before the decimal were bushels and the one after was one-tenth of a bushel. If the figure was .4, in the case of wheat with 60 pounds to the bushel, that meant four tenths of a bushel, or 24 pounds. That was easy to calculate. Now there are two figures ahead of the decimal and three after, and the three after have to be placed over 2,204 pounds because that is what we have in a tonne. Could any person on the other side of the House calculate that in his head without a calculator or a pencil? I would like to see someone do it. This government has taken away a simple system that worked, and has given us a complicated system that does not work.

This is the point I want to make, Mr. Speaker. The individual I was talking with said we should be selling our grain by the tonne because in Holland, where he was from, they used the tonne. I explained to him the complications this created for the farmers in this country with the three figures after the decimal point having to be placed over 2,204 pounds. He said no, it would be 2,000 pounds. I said that it was 2,204 pounds, that being the tonne we have to deal with. He said that a tonne in Holland was 2,000 pounds. Therefore, anyone who suggests that this is a universal system should take another look at it.

The initial work and planning of the Metric Commission was done in a vacuum, independent of what the people required. What the Metric Commission failed to do was recognize the fact that the United States is not going metric very quickly. Certainly some countries have done so, but the U.S. grassroots have not done so.

When people from the United States come across the border to buy cattle at our auctions they want to know how many pounds an animal has gained per day since birth. They do not want anything to do with kilos. They want to know how that animal has gained in pounds, and that is what affects the price. This is why the auction marts all across western Canada are opposed to this system and what the government has done. I just wish we could have had some members opposite come out west to meet with some of those people who have to spend thousands of dollars they do not have in order to change their scales, when they see no need for it. As I said earlier, if this were a requirement and it provided a benefit, that would be all right, but no one up to the present time has proven that this is a requirement in order to continue in business.

Even leading members of the two United States metric bodies now see a change taking place in the United States. They suggest that this conversion will take anywhere from seven to 20 years; however, the average citizen in the United States says it will never take place.

We have a classic case of Canada being all alone out in left field; everybody else is out of step except our son Johnnie. In the area of 70 per cent of our trade is with the United States, and it is folly to attempt to trade with our major trading partner using a foreign and unfamiliar system of weights and measures. That was the reason given to us for changing to the metric system, in order that we could trade with foreign countries. We now find ourselves using this unfamiliar system in trade with our major trading partner. As one of the metric commissioners said, we are ten years out of step with them. It is utter folly for Canada to allow that kind of situation to develop. The United States is by far our most important trading partner, in every respect, and it behooves us, as a matter of common sense, to bring our metric posture into line with that of the United States.

The North American economy is so interlocked, with products, factories, corporations, equipment, communications, information systems, advanced technology, research and development, measurements and statistics, that any basic move to use a different system out of step is incomprehensible. I fail to see any great advantage in converting to the metric system with such undue haste. We must plan any change in concert with our neighbour and trading partner. If we fail to do so we will disrupt traditional trading patterns and cause turmoil in the marketplace. The net effect is that we could end up losing business, and this, coupled with the high cost of purchasing new calibrating equipment, could be a crippling blow to many small businesses.

People have told me that if they are forced to go to the metric system of weights and measures they will go out of business. They have a hard time just keeping their bank accounts in the black, and if they are forced to accept this they will be going into the red. The very great costs of converting to metric have to be retrieved from somewhere, and guess who pays in the long run—the customer will be the fall guy. Additional costs will be passed on to him in the form of higher prices.

Are there any benefits to be derived in our trading markets by going metric? Outside of the United States, the European Economic Community common markets and the remaining OECD markets, all the rest of the world represent 5 per cent of our finished goods exports. What is the wisdom in neglecting and slighting 95 per cent of our trade to concentrate on 5 per cent? Even if there were some benefits to be gained by going metric for trade purposes, is this cause enough to force an entire nation to change its established and known weights and measures? The response is strong to overwhelming to return to the use entirely of imperial standard measures.

In Peterborough the metric people came face to face with civil disobedience to the metric program, and they backed off. The Metric Commission had the power to back up the mandatory metric system with the use of penalties for failure to comply with the law. But, is it the law? Has the principle of the metric program been given a proper airing in Parliament? I think not. Why did the government choose to bypass Parliament and resort to order in council to achieve its aims? Why is it plowing relentlessly on in a collision course with the people and with public opinion? Why does it not mark time and reassess the damage it is doing to commerce within Canada and outside our borders with our trading partners?

It is not a sign of weakness to admit that you are wrong. Indeed, it is a sign of strength to recognize when you are in error and move to correct an obvious mistake. If more people would recognize error and move quickly to rectify it, there would be less bickering and chaos in our public life.

The Weights and Measures Act of 1971 prescribed the punishment for every person who contravenes any provision of the act or its related regulations. Contravention of the act provides for a fine not exceeding $1,000. Weights and measures inspectors actually attempted to enforce this statute, and only a public outcry caused a temporary halt to enforcement in Peterborough. But the regulation is still on the books. Surely we cannot call a program voluntary when it is backed up by fines of up to $1,000 to make it voluntary.

I want you, Mr. Speaker, to pay special attention to the problems of the many Canadians who are opposed to further implementation of metric weights and measures at this time. I hope that the House will pass this motion proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on this motion because I think it is imperative that we take a very positive position on metrication. Reference has been made to the fact that other nations are not going ahead as fast as Canada. I think it would be only fitting if I read a statement from President Carter, contained in the U.S. Metric Board 1979 Annual Report. He said:

> With all the other industrialized nations of the world already using the metric system—or soon to complete their conversion to metrics—we will find ourselves at a serious disadvantage in selling products to other countries if we do not make progress in our own conversion.

At the movies in the United States or Canada, Mr. Speaker, the films are 35 millimetre. Major United States tire manufacturers back in the 1960s started labelling tires for United States made cars in metric. New United States steel companies on the south shore of Lake Michigan are controlled by metric instrument. Since 1975 some of the United States oil companies have been installing instruments which provide metric readings. Service station outlets are converting as fast as pumps are available to them. Metrication has been taught in the United States school system for more than a decade. So the United States is proceeding, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is wrong if we Canadians stand still.

At the present time the European Economic Community requires that metric conversion information be included on all non-metric products imported into member countries. Some United States tractor companies have already started making machinery to metric specification. The St. Lawrence Seaway, which was completed in 1959, prefers the metric measure. Channel markers are metric, cargo is in metric tons, and tolls are assessed in metric weights. Even the length of ships is calculated in meters. The U.S. conversion to metric is further along than many members realize.

I realize that some people who did not take metric in school will have difficulty in converting and I sympathize with them, but the metric system has been taught in our schools for several years. Even our highways are marked in metric.

As a farmer, perhaps I must make more conversions than the average citizen. At a recent commodity board meeting of producers in Ontario the vote was three to one to proceed with implementation of the metric system. We have a new generation of farmers, Mr. Speaker, in my operation, and I am very pleased that my son who graduated from university was schooled in the metric system. Like the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), when I go to the fields I must admit that I still have to make conversions. For example, if I need to plant 120 pounds of seed per acre, I now plant 135 kilograms per hectare. It is very simple. If we use 400 pounds of fertilizer per acre we now use 444 kilograms per hectare.

An hon. Member: Can you say that without reading it?

Mr. Ferguson: If a field was 50 acres it is now approximately 20 hectares. If we used ten pounds of insecticide per acre now it is 11 kilograms per hectare. A steer that used to be marketed at 1,200 pounds is now 545 kilograms.

Perhaps some livestock producers and buyers need more time to adapt and this may be where the problem is. A buyer goes into the sales ring to bid on a steer at 78 cents per pound and buys it for $936. In metric, 78 cents per pound would be $1.71 per kilogram but the net proceed to the producer is still $936. I believe it is just a matter of time until we adapt and are able to keep abreast of other countries in the world. Perhaps this is one sector of the agricultural industry where patience is needed. Approximately 75 per cent of the agricultural community is already converted to metric. It is wrong to imply that it should be delayed until the rest catch up.

A shift to the voluntary metric conversion process is required. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that conversion to metric is already a voluntary process. Of the 100 sectors only three—gasoline sales by the litre, home furnishings, and retail food scales—are subject to regulation under the Weights and Measures Act of 1971. Only those three are subject to the regulations, so we are in a voluntary process of conversion. In all three of these cases the relevant regulations have been requested from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the industries concerned, with the support of the Consumer's Association of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will not be long. There are a few things that I think we ought to bear in mind in this debate on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott). I was rather staggered to learn here today about the system international which was decided upon apparently as the system which should be used in Canada for the conversion, and to learn in particular that it was applicable only in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

● (1650)

I have had representations made to me about the standards, particularly from the mechanical industries. These pertained to gauges of screws and bolts and the incline of the threads on bolts. There is no universal standard for these particular parts in the mechanical field so that if one were to take a bolt say, from one of the cars imported from Japan, and tried to use it on a nut that had been produced here, both metric size, they probably would not fit because the inclines of the plane of the threads were not identical. There is no standard bolt threading of gauge in metric at the present time. Until those standards are approved, I think it is folly to proceed further.

My second observation has to do with the selling of products by dozens. I do not know how many hon. members have noticed, but when one goes to buy flowers, they are not sold in dozens any more. They are sold by dizaines. The price is the same but there are only ten in a bunch. Those are called dizaines. It is the same for eggs.

An hon. Member: Dizaine!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, dizaine, douzaine, there are douzaines and dizaines but the price remains the same.

[English]

The price remains the same, and this I suggest is one of the influences causing inflation. Had it been the other way and we get 13, I wonder what a baker's dizaine would be. Would it be 11? It could be.

My third comment has to do with this nonsense about voluntarism, or voluntary as in the army voluntary. Actually people have been misusing a term in this House, and I would like to suggest that where we are at this time on the metric is that we are faced with a Hobson's choice. Hobson's choice is generally interpreted as being either this or that. People talk about Catch 22. I think that is where we run into a little difficulty, when you divert from that, you are faced with another difficulty. But Hobson's choice, as defined in the shorter Oxford dictionary is as follows:

—the option of taking the one thing offered or nothing.

It is derived I suppose from what Hobson did. He was an ostler who rented horses in Cambridge. When a person went to rent a horse from him he would say, "There is your horse. The first horse inside the stable." That was Mr. Hobson, and that is your choice. This is the choice we have with metric. I see the first actual reference was 1660 when Hobson's choice was as follows:

—chuse whether you will have this or none.

There are other references to Hobson's choice. So Hobson's choice is what we have in the metric system today.

I do feel that we should be very careful about using the word voluntary in this connection because here we are confronted with this. I wonder from time to time whether the word imperial as connected with the imperial measure has somebody's back up because the imperial regimes that we knew in the British empire, the French empire and so on have ended. Is it because the word imperial is attached to that expression that it has come to be overturned in the Hobson's choice, and by voluntarism we are now in the thick of it and getting dizaines when we buy flowers instead of dozens.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity on my first speech in the House of Commons to congratulate you and your colleagues in the chair. I hope you will carry my felicitations to Madam Speaker who is such an asset to this august chamber.

I welcome the opportunity to speak to this motion in my maiden speech to the House of Commons as a member of Parliament for the riding of Guelph. The rules governing debate at this time do not permit me to speak about my riding as much as I would like to, but the particular subject at hand is one of vital interest to my constituency. My area is heavily populated with small and large businesses that are very much affected by regulations pertaining to weights and measures. The consumer is also very much affected. The Government of Canada has never maintained that conversion to metrication would be a simple matter. Industry in general concedes that the project, having progressed to the present stage, should be maintained. The consumer has seen the effects of metrication appearing around us day by day, for instance, the road signs, the weather reports, and some consumer products.

Representing a riding having a large number of persons born outside of Canada brings me in contact with perhaps a degree of metric acceptance that is not present in some locations.

The Canadian General Electric plant in Guelph, I am told, uses the metric system completely and it owes many of its invasions into the world of commerce to that fact. One of our large freezer plants in the city of Guelph, the Woods Company, owes a lot of its invasion into the export market because they too are completely metric.

When I was listening to my opponents on the other side I had a feeling that I was in the past. I felt somewhat like Edison when people wanted to keep the candle and he wanted to bring on electricity. I felt somewhat like Henry Ford when he was trying to produce the motor car, and I also felt somewhat like Orville Wright when people were standing around telling him that his machine would not fly.

With respect to the definition of the voluntary system, I think their definition is to be able to volunteer not to be able to do something. The voluntary system that we want to see is the voluntary system to do something which we have all agreed upon, but to be able to do it gradually and in consultation. I believe that is the system that we have been trying to put in place.

The first aim was to introduce the metric system and to interpret it in relation to terms that are relevant to daily living. But the older measurements will be with us for a long time to come and, of course, it will be of some inconvenience to make these conversions. I do not want to sound like a put down to those people who will have difficulty making those conversions. But where there is a will, there is a way.

I have been making conversions for some years. Most of the international scientific world deals with the metric system. As the world becomes smaller, we must be able to communicate in a universal language. About 90 per cent of the people in the world use metric measurements for everyday purposes. So it makes sense in the interests of uniformity that Canada should adopt metric measurements.

I am not one of those metricators who is filled with evangelic zeal nor, I hope, are my honourable opponents ferocious anti-metricants, but I am sure that we are all trying to attain the same results. I have said that the hon. member opposite and I have different ideas about the voluntary system and I will not go into details about that again.

For eight years now people have been asking why are we going metric? The simplest answer is that it makes a lot of sense. Every nation in the world—with the exception of some so small that they are not really significant in terms of international trade—is on the metric system or is committed to converting to it. In spite of what hon. members on the other side of the House say, it is simpler. There are seven base units of measurement in the metric system. With the old imperial system there are 53.

In the United Kingdom some of these imperial units, such as the furlong and the bushel, are no longer legal. The situation in Britain regarding the use of metric measurement has been the subject of a lot of speculation.

WATERBORNE MOVEMENT OF ENERGY AND OTHER CANADIAN PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, the urgency of my rising under Standing Order 43 arises directly from the critical stage of present negotiations between the Government of Canada and the governments of Mexico and Japan.

Given the potential of millions of dollars accruing to Canadian interests and the creation of hundreds of new jobs for Canadian seamen which could flow from matters under discussion with Mexico for the movement of oil, and Japan with respect to new coal movements, and recognizing the need for Canada to continue to move toward the objectives of the UNCTAD 40-40-20 arrangements for the seaborne movement of goods, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House urgently asks the government to express in these discussions going on the Canadian desirability of moving toward the UNCTAD formula in all waterborne movement of these energy resources and other Canadian goods.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEASURES TO HELP FARMERS IF DROUGHT OCCURS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the western provinces have had no significant precipitation for over two months, during which time temperatures have been above normal, and in view of the fact that the long-range forecast is for the continuation of dry and hot weather, and also in view of the fact that these conditions have led to shortages of water, extremely poor crop germination and no pasturage for grazing animals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the federal government move immediately to assist to help co-ordinate, through the use of such federal agencies as the PFRA, the activities of the various levels of government that are now under way in the western provinces which are designed to make maximum use of whatever water, feed and pastures that are still available.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT—CONSIDERATION OF BRANDT COMMISSION PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter which truly is of urgent and pressing necessity, not only for Canada but for the world as a whole.

In view of the emergency recommendations in the just published report of the Brandt Commission on International Development Issues, entitled "North-South, a Programme for Survival", and considering the fast approach of the United Nations special assembly on this subject, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House give the highest priority to convening, at the earliest opportunity, a special debate on the Brandt report proposals, so that the Canadian people can be made more aware of the problems addressed so eloquently by the report, and so that the Canadian government can make a strong and enlightened response to the report's emergency program within the councils of the world.

Having received a communication from the 1980 graduating class of Penticton secondary school, in the Okanagan Valley of British Columbia, over the signatures of 570 students expressing their deep concern about Canada's future as a nation of united people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House join unanimously in the words that these young people have composed with great feeling and patriotic emotion, and that the House of Commons pledge with them to commit itself, with the help of our fellow Canadians, to working toward making Canada a nation of united people.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SOCIAL SECURITY

PORTABILITY OF PENSIONS AND OTHER BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

ACID RAIN—TERMS OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to request the unanimous consent of the House to the following resolution.

In view of the plans of the Minister of the Environment to conclude a bilateral agreement on the acid rain problem, and because of the double threat posed to Canadian waters by increased tanker traffic on the west coast and the possibility of LNG tankers plying Canadian waters in the Arctic, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That this House instruct the Minister of the Environment to include in the bilateral agreement he plans to conclude with the U.S. on acid rain, a compulsory bonding system covering vessels entering our waters so that injured parties will have ready access to compensation commensurate with the damage which could occur from oil spills and LNG accidents.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

LIKELIHOOD OF DISRUPTION IN MAIL SERVICE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General, who we thought would be in the House. In his absence, perhaps I could put it to the Minister of Labour, who I gather is a party in the conversations.

Now that the conciliation board report is public and CUPW has indicated that it regards that report as a basis for avoiding a strike, can the minister and the government assure the House that we can expect no mail disruption this spring?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I wish, indeed, that it were possible in the case of unresolved labour disputes to always give an absolute assurance that there would be no disruption. Unfortunately, that cannot be done until negotiations are completed and an agreement achieved.

I can say that the Postmaster General has indicated that he is optimistic about the possibility of a settlement, and that he is hoping to meet, along with certain officials, representatives of the union this afternoon for discussions arising out of the conciliation board report. It is expected that the Postmaster General will be in the House tomorrow and in a position to answer queries in relation to today's meeting to the extent that it is possible to comment without endangering the ongoing negotiations.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, arising out of that answer, since the minister was present at the conversations yesterday, perhaps he could advise what position the government is taking in today's meeting, specifically since there has been at least a publicly reported suggestion that the Minister of Labour is contemplating back-to-work legislation. Can the minister advise whether the government has decided to accept the conciliation board report or to fight it?

Mr. Regan: In relation to the supplementary question. Madam Speaker, I think that, consistent with the best practices in labour relations, the answer I would want to give to the hon. gentleman, through you, would be that the position taken by the government is constructive, hopeful and responsible.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, perhaps it would be out of order to comment at the time whether that is a new position for the government.

My final supplementary question relates to the previous postmaster general's commitment to bring in a bill to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation this spring, a commitment which everybody believes will go a long way toward resolving underlying labour problems in this area. Can the minister assure the House that we can expect to see such a bill this spring, and is that part of the conversation at today's meeting?

Mr. Regan: Again I thank the hon. member. I cannot say whether the question of the establishment of a Crown corporation is part of the negotiations that are going on this afternoon: only the Postmaster General would be able to report after the fact on what is being considered at that moment in time. But I can assure the hon. member that preparations for legislation in relation to establishing the Post Office as a Crown corporation are going forward and that, indeed, negotiations are under way with various groups to soften the impact of the dislocation involved in such a change, including the union groups, in totally separate committee negotiations that are going on and involving my department as well as that of the Postmaster General at present.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

OIL EXPLORATION IN BEAUFORT SEA—DANGER OF SPILLS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On the weekend, the director of environmental affairs for Petro-Canada confirmed the criticism of the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee that the federal government has failed to develop adequate plans or technology to prevent and cope with an oil spill in the Beaufort Sea. This is a matter I raised last week with the Prime Minister.

Considering that this person from Petro-Canada, and also a spokesperson for the advisory committee who helped draft the report confirmed its accuracy on the weekend, I should like to ask the minister if he could tell us why his government has given approval for drilling to proceed at this time in the light of such information?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, first, that the report of the advisory committee was considered by cabinet. The report the hon. member is referring to now, and was referred to when I was in the eastern Arctic last week, is a report of one member who was party to the committee.

Somehow that report was, I guess, leaked; I do not know, and I really do not particularly care, other than to assure the hon. member that the report of the advisory committee itself was thoroughly reviewed by the officials of my department, the interdepartmental committee that judges these matters and by myself. It was taken to cabinet by myself for review. I might say that all the reviews taken with respect to the report of the advisory committee were such as to assure me, and I am thoroughly satisfied that no undue risks are being taken with respect to the program we announced for this ensuing season.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, all members of Parliament received today in the mail an expensive, 44-page brochure called "Under the Beaufort". There are a number of errors in it, two of them very serious in their implications. At one point, the brochure indicates the following:

—there is a complex contingency plan ready to meet the danger and to clean up any oil spill.

That is what the brochure which has been put out by the government indicates; but the report of the advisory committee to which the minister has just referred indicates just the opposite, that there is no such contingency plan. That is one contradiction I should like the minister to clear up. Another one is that in the brochure it is indicated that there were only two fuel spills last year during the drilling. The report of the advisory committee, which the minister has said he looked at with care, indicates that there were no fewer than 22 spills.

Considering that these alleged facts contradict each other—and I, for one, am inclined to accept the report of the advisory committee that there have been more spills than we are now being told, and that there is no contingency plan—would the minister please explain to the House this very serious contradiction?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I would also advise the hon. member that I raised this question. I think the number of spills referred to by the hon. member and those referred to in the report are exaggerated. I am told and advised that there were no serious spills which caused any great damage or concern in the previous season.

The technology has advanced considerably since that time. There are safeguards now with respect to relief-well drilling for this season—technology of the kind that has improved over last year, so that if there was some risk taken last year with respect to the policy, there is even less risk this year as a result of that improved technology. Also, as I understand it, some assurance was given that I would be before the standing committee later this week—I think it is Thursday night—and I would be prepared to go into the matter more fully at that time.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I listened with care to the minister's answer, and at no point did he say that the government has ready a contingency plan that would cope with a spill. This is an extremely serious matter, given the precarious nature of the environment of the north.

I would like to ask the minister, considering that there is no contingency plan, whether he will now take steps to postpone the drilling until such a plan is developed, and withdraw from circulation this extremely misleading brochure.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I do not think there would be much point in withdrawing the brochure, because it has been so widely disseminated already. May I just tell the hon. member I have been assured that the risks are so minimal, as a result of the safeguards built in for this year, and even so minimal based on what was the technology in previous years, that I feel it is safe to proceed. I do not feel I would be warranted in withdrawing the order, in terms of what is required to be done.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO MEET COST OF IMPORTED OIL

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, and it deals with the cost of imported oil. The cost of imported oil landed at Montreal has been averaging $35 a barrel in recent weeks. This cost is now going up $2 a barrel as Saudi Arabia is raising its price $2 a barrel. At the time of the budget of December 11, the cost was $25.75 a barrel. The minister told us some weeks ago that the oil import compensation subsidy was going to go to $3.1 billion.

Will the minister tell the House how he plans to meet the payments on this increased cost of the subsidy? Is he going to face the problem, or is he just going to allow the deficit to increase beyond the $14 billion mark? If he intends to do this by increased borrowing, will he assure the House that he is not going to have problems, in view of the tremendous rate of redemption of Canada Savings Bonds to the extent of $1.1 billion since April 1? How is he going to deal with this increased compensation problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in connection with the borrowing that may be required by the Government of Canada, it is my information that the borrowing that will be needed can be handled. Certainly, it is not my intention—as I indicated on April 21—to allow the deficit to run out of control, and when a budget is brought in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It is out of control now.

Mr. MacEachen: When a budget is brought in, the hon. member will have in detail the over-all picture, including expenditure and possible tax measures.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. minister is surely the modern-day Sam Slick, because he has told us nothing. He did say, "when the budget was to be brought in".

An hon. Member: Give us a date.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has told the newspapers, and those are the only people he tells anything to, that:

"A budget could collapse and be highly embarrassing if no agreement was in place", MacEachen said—

Excuse me using your name, hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The news item goes on to say:

—predicting there would be no new budget until the fall.

Is it now the minister's plan to have a new budget only this fall, and will the minister have a new budget at all if there is no oil pricing agreement?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, it is my intention to have a budget. I hope it will be possible to bring it in before the fall, but the fall is certainly a possibility, as the hon. member knows.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, this is the first firm piece of news the minister has given this House since we opened, that there will be a fall this fall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We had a fall last fall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: In last fall's fall budget there was a special energy tax on the oil and gas industry, the proceeds of which were to be devoted exclusively to energy projects. Will the minister tell us, if there is a special tax on the oil and gas industry this year, in his new budget in the fall, or whenever the fall falls on, will the proceeds of that special tax be devoted exclusively to energy projects and to nothing else?

• (1430)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me his assistance in the preparation of the budget, which will be arduous and which, I trust, will not result in the ignominious fate that surrounded his budget. Nevertheless, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion and ask him to restrain himself and be patient until the budget is brought forth. Then all these matters will be revealed and the universe will unfold as it should.

An hon. Member: That is an ominous prospect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF ENERGY AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND MEXICO

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In arrangements that had been made both by the previous Liberal government and by the Conservative government concerning Mexican President Portillo's visit to Canada next week, the highlight of that visit was to have been the signing of an energy agreement between Canada and Mexico to provide for the importation of up to 100,000 barrels of oil a day into Canada.

We now find that this agreement has been cast into doubt. Would the minister tell the House what has transpired over the last few weeks to threaten the successful conclusion of this very important treaty?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would not say that there is any threat to the treaty. Over the last several weeks the Mexican government has been evolving its policy with respect to a number of countries—including Japan, Canada and the European countries—with respect to petroleum agreements. They have asked for some changes in the prospective agreement. We are discussing those changes with them this week. At the moment, it does not appear to be a matter of substance but, rather, a matter of wording. We want to discuss those changes with the Mexican authorities before we make any further comment.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, if these changes are not a matter of substance, will the minister then give his clear assurance that the agreement will be signed when President Portillo visits Canada next week to ensure that up to 100,000 barrels of oil will be available to Canada beginning later this year? Will the minister give us that assurance, that that is the agreement which will be signed?

Will he at the same time give the further assurance, perhaps, to President Portillo that no untoward events will happen to him following his visit to Canada, since Secretary Vance went home to resign after visiting, the minister, and since Prime Minister Ohira went home to defeat after his visit with the minister? I ask the minister not to make it three disasters in a row.

Mr. Chénier: You were the first.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I believe that we will have an agreement with Mexico. As to the substance of the agreement and whether or not an actual signing will take place during the president's visit next week, I am not in a position to say at the moment.

SHIPPING

ENERGY—CARRIAGE BY CANADIAN SHIPS CREWED BY CANADIANS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not in that agreement or, in fact, in any of the negotiations with Japan, the Government of Canada put forward the position that some of this energy resource should be carried by Canadian ships crewed by Canadians?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the matter of transportation is not one which is covered by the agreement. I am not aware of any discussions on that subject which have been held with the Mexican authorities.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASES IN PRICE OF BREAD—CALL FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture on a matter of importance to all people of Canada. Is the minister aware that there have been two increases in the price of bread since the beginning of the year, without a corresponding increase in the price of wheat? The third increase is planned when the government adjusts the price of wheat.

Since this third increase is already being planned at a much higher rate than the amount of wheat in a loaf of bread would justify, would the minister undertake to investigate the increases in bread prices in 1980, and roll back those that prove to be unjustified?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member knows that a new price reporting system for food prices is being implemented. The index is what the producer actually receives and what the consumer pays for that commodity. We will investigate this matter further. I would just point out that the food price index shows a very moderate increase in the price of food for the last month.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, given that the price of a standard loaf of bread has increased from a minimum of 38 cents per loaf to a minimum of 52 cents per loaf in 18 months—which is somewhat more than a modest increase—will the government give the consumers of this nation an undertaking that bread prices will be stabilized by intense government effort to prevent price gouging by the processors in any future increase in the price of wheat to farmers?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, what I meant by a moderate or modest increase is that, for example, last month the increase was .3 per cent and for the previous month it was .9 per cent, which is not quite 1 per cent. The increase was one of the lowest which we have had. The report which I have on my desk at the moment shows that the main cause for an increase in the cost of a loaf of bread is due to transportation costs, energy costs and those types of costs, not due to the basic product called wheat.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OIL—VOLUME OF IMPORTS FROM MEXICO

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In early February of this year, Agustin Barrios Gomez, the Mexican ambassador to Canada, stated that Mexico will begin shipping 50,000 barrels of crude oil a day to Canada in October, and that the deliveries will be increased to 100,000 barrels a day in 1981.

Would the minister tell the House if that commitment still stands, and will it be part of the agreement which is to be signed with the President of Mexico?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as far as I know that is still the commitment of Mexico, but that was never intended to be part of the agreement as such. I do not believe that those words will be written into the agreement. They were not in the previous agreement which was signed, and I do not think it is proposed that they should be in this agreement.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, if the minister will take the time to read the interim agreement, he will see that there was a firm commitment with respect to a minimum delivery from Mexico to Canada for this year, and that subsequently it was to be increased to 100,000 barrels a day in 1981. Nothing could be simpler.

Would the minister tell the House whether that will be part of the agreement, whether there will be a deviation or whether anything has occurred within the last few weeks to change that firm commitment contained in the interim agreement?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, we are not proposing any changes in the agreement at all, but there is no schedule of deliveries in the agreement as such. There has been talk of goals, but there has been no promise that there will be so much oil delivered on a particular date. We are not proposing that there should be any changes made in the agreement.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO STRENGTHEN DOLLAR AND LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Most financial analysts are of the opinion that interest rates would have dropped last week but for the intervention of the Bank of Canada which felt it necessary to prop up the wobbly Canadian dollar since the minister's micro-budget, which he was able to smuggle into the House, had only a microscopic effect on the Canadian dollar.

When can we expect some meaningful action from the government which would provide strength to the Canadian dollar and allow the interest rate to come down, which would benefit the home owner, the farmer, the businessman and the unemployed, rather than allowing the Bank of Canada to do the unpleasant work for the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member know, interest rates have been coming down relatively rapidly. Indeed, the bank rate came down further last Thursday. However, as the governor of the Bank of Canada stated, they had acted to restrain and moderate that change for a number of reasons, but particularly because of the possibility that these further lower rates may not be sustainable in the long run.

Mr. Korchinski: Madam Speaker, is it the government's policy to maintain high interest rates, and does the support of the Canadian dollar take precedence over a lower interest rate policy which is necessary for an improved economic condition in Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member also knows, the governor of the Bank of Canada has managed monetary policy in a way that there has been a significant drop in interest rates and relative stability in the Canadian dollar. I believe the governor deserves a good deal of credit for that combined result.

DUTY REMISSION ON IMPORTED SAIL-BOATS—EFFECT ON SAIL-BOAT INDUSTRY

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister under renewed pressure from a major boat builder to have the Minister of Finance provide duty remission on sail-boats over 25 feet coming into Canada? If so, what is he prepared to do in this regard?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have received representations on this matter and I am discussing them with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, is the minister making representations to the Minister of Finance on behalf of the 11 small and medium-sized sail-boat builders who say that if duty remission is granted by this government, it will destroy the sail boat industry in Canada?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am particularly sensitive to the concerns of small and medium-sized business in Canada. I will be discussing the matter with the Minister of Finance in this context.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

HEALTH AND SAFETY LEGISLATION FOR URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question today is to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that uranium miners in Elliot Lake and elsewhere are not given adequate protection under either part 4 of the Canada Labour Code or the new draft federal health and safety legislation—an opinion apparently shared by the Minister of State for Mines—and considering that the legislation now being drafted is admittedly based on Ontario's bill C-70, and that the Ontario legislation was largely based upon input from and concerns relating to uranium miners specifically at Elliot Lake—the very group now excluded from protection along with other miners in the uranium industry—will the minister of Labour now give a commitment to the House that he will either turn the jurisdiction of this area over to the provinces, or guarantee that his new federal legislation will offer at least equal protection to uranium miners as that provided by bill C-70 in Ontario with respect to the right to refuse unsafe work, submission to monthly inspections, worker appeal procedures and union escorts for inspectors?

In addition, just when can we expect to see this vital legislation introduced?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for the question, Madam Speaker. May I say to the hon. member that we have set a time period in which to achieve regulations that would incorporate all the provisions of the Ontario bill C-70, and if that does not work out to be satisfactory, then at that moment in time we will take other action.

At the present time, and under the present laws, people working under federal jurisdiction can refuse work because of unsafe conditions; but the present situation in relation to the uranium miners, as the hon. member mentioned, is that they are covered by the referencing by the federal government of the previous Ontario act. The new Ontario act that was passed last fall could have been referenced at that moment in time, but it was the request of the trade union that it work with the department to attempt to draft specific federal regulations that would give exactly the same provisions.

There has been some controversy between some union officials and the department as to whether the intervention of the Department of Justice will give the exact result that they want. We are attempting to resolve that matter. But I certainly give the hon. member assurance that we will see to it that the provisions for the safety of uranium miners in Ontario under federal jurisdiction are as high as they would be under provincial jurisdiction, or as high as they are anywhere else in the country under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his reply. I am wondering, though, whether he can give us a more firm commitment as to the timespan in which we can expect this legislation to be introduced. I understand that there have been some disagreements as to who was responsible for the so-called dragging of feet. I think that matter has been clarified, at least in the press, and I believe that the minister will now agree with the position of the union on that, that its representatives have not really been responsible for the time lag that has occurred.

I also want to be assured that the minister appreciates that when it comes to the matter of workers—

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

SAVINGS FROM CENTRALIZED PURCHASING OF ADVERTISING SPACE AND TIME

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism who, in addition to his awesome responsibilities, is in charge of government advertising. My question relates to his press release of May 9.

I compliment the minister for his announcement of the continuation of a centralized purchasing agency for government advertising, an initiative of the previous government. The previous government estimated the savings, through the centralization of purchase, to be anywhere from 20 per cent to 40 per cent of the previous budget. Would the minister indicate to the House his target for savings under the centralized purchasing of advertising space and time?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good words about our plans for advertising in the Government of Canada. I cannot give a hard figure. I suppose the easiest answer would be that we are going to save every dollar we can. But I estimate between $2 million and $4 million. Our officials are more optimistic than that.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I do not want to be too platitudinous, but the previous government estimated savings of something like $15 million and I would encourage the minister to seek that target as a minimum.

Because the minister's press release indicated a fair geographic and linguistic distribution, because the minister is well aware that Toronto and Montreal agencies have had virtually 100 per cent of the advertising pie, and because there is no commitment in this press release, may I ask the minister: what is this government's policy toward the distribution of advertising space and time among those agencies that are not happily located in either Toronto or Montreal but, indeed, in many other Canadian communities from coast to coast?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, some agencies must be of a size and competence to deal with national advertising. But we have already begun to do our best to give opportunities to agencies across Canada for them to have access to Government of Canada advertising.

An hon. Member: You have been in the business; you should know.

CREATION OF MARKETING BOARDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it government policy that a commodity group can, by a proper election, vote to create a marketing board?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, if I understood the hon. member's question correctly, the answer is yes.

Mr. Thacker: That being so, Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also to the Minister of Agriculture. Can those same commodity groups vote to withdraw from those same marketing boards?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I believe there is provision in most agreements. I believe if they give one year's notice, they can withdraw.

STATUS OF WOMEN—EQUAL PAY FOR WORK OF EQUAL VALUE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the fact that investigators for the Canadian Human Rights Commission have found that 3,000 jobs filled mainly by women are almost identical in value to those filled by men in the general services group of the PSAC, and that these people are receiving as much as $1.80 per hour less, is the minister now willing to take the principle of equal pay for work of equal value seriously by acting on the investigators' report, and guarantee that women public servants receive equal pay for work of equal value, and ensure that public employees do not have to drag the federal government before the Human Rights Commission again and again in order to achieve these goals?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we are aware of approximately six complaints of this kind. I believe one has been settled. The specific case to which the hon. member makes reference is now the subject of discussion between the Treasury Board secretariat and the Human Rights commissioners. We will be discussing what options are available for a proper and satisfactory settlement of the complaint in question.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, it is nice to hear the minister admit that he is aware of some of the problems within his own federal civil service, but what I am concerned about is that the government is not taking leadership in this matter.

Will the minister admit that the oldest and surest indicator of equality is remuneration for work, and thus will the government begin its campaign for equality by offering leadership? One of the ways of doing this is by making sure that the lowest paid groups in the public service, the clerical component, receive a more equalizing increase than the 5 per cent that has been offered at the present time, an offer which is insulting in that it does not meet the cost of living and does nothing but increase the wage differential between men and women in this country.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is now on another subject. I would point out that section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act establishing that principle in legislation was an initiative of this government in the past, so I do not know what he means by not taking a lead. I would say the government has very much taken the lead.

In so far as the other matter is concerned—that is, the clerical and regulatory group—as the hon. member knows from an answer I gave in this House last week, we hope to bring that particular dispute to a fair and equitable settlement in the relatively near future.

TRANSPORT

TRUCKING OF GRAIN FROM MANITOBA TO THUNDER BAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Previously, I asked in a motion under Standing Order 43 what the government's position was relative to the trucking of grain from Manitoba to Thunder Bay. What is the government's position as to the trucking of grain, and will it be continued after June 1?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board has informed me that they are monitoring this movement, but at the moment they do not consider the movement to be of sufficient volume to warrant a change in their policy on delivery quotas.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, do I, then, have the assurance from the minister that there will be no change on June 1, 1980?

Mr. Pepin: Not to my knowledge, Madam Speaker, but I will look into it further to make absolutely sure.

Oral Questions

SPORTS

GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES—FUNDING OF NATIVE ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: —may I pre-empt my question by thanking everyone in the chamber who was so kind in sending so many wonderful letters while I was incapacitated in the hospital. I have lost my gall bladder, but I have not lost my gall.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: I would like to direct my question to the minister in charge of sport. The Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Union—CIAU—received grants totalling $456,000 for its 1978-79 athletic year. These grants were provided to assist the universities in the Atlantic Intercollegiate Athletic Association, the Canada West Universities Athletic Association, and the Great Plains Athletic Conference, with their intercollegiate sport travel costs.

With the great amount of moneys incremental to the minister's budget through the lottery income, and in view of the fact that universities are planning scholarships and internship programs to keep our athletes in Canada, can the universities expect the $456,000 plus in the coming year?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member, I want to say that my first reaction must be of gratitude for the work that he did in the department prior to the time that I had the responsibility to carry on. I think he did a splendid job in the time that he was minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I regret that his illness has prevented me from paying that tribute to him in the House prior to now. In relation to the question that he asked, I must say to him that we are concerned about the funding as a result of the unwise decision of the previous government to divest the federal government of the lotteries, but I certainly think that the purpose of support of the universities, the CIAU, is a laudable cause. I expect to speak at their annual meeting in June, in Halifax. I will endeavour to have an answer for the hon. gentleman in relation to the continuation of that support prior to that date.

Mr. Paproski: In the past several years, Fitness and Amateur Sport has contributed significant sums toward the development of sport and recreation leadership among native peoples. Approximately 35 native organizations throughout Canada receive funding—approximately $1.2 million per annum—designed to enhance sport and recreational opportunity. In view of the fact that the minister will now be receiving, again I say, moneys from lotteries, will the Indian Brotherhood be able to receive the $1.2 million per annum.

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, in relation to the question of support for native sports, I met with the Indian Brotherhood representatives during their recent visit to Ottawa to discuss the manner in which the support of their athletic and recreational undertakings can be continued or improved. I have further meetings scheduled in that regard. When the level of the support is definitively determined, I will be very happy to report that to the hon. member. May I merely say at this time that I am certainly supportive of that particular objective.

Mr. Jarvis: Especially if they have their conference in Halifax; that will help.

DISASTERS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR DISASTER AREAS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, who I believe is responsible for Emergency Planning Canada. Last week, the minister's colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming, presented a motion under Standing Order 43 which was similar to one presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Erie, on the matter of the availability of funds for disaster areas.

I wish to ask the minister whether he is sympathetic with the problems related to funding in disaster areas, and whether he would consider convening a meeting of his counterparts to take a second look at the present federal-provincial agreement on this matter.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is a formula in existence at present by which the federal government makes available assistance to provinces which are unable to bear the burden of a disaster. In light of the hon. member's representations, I will be pleased to take a look at the matter.

Mr. Halliday: I appreciate the minister's sympathetic approach to this. May I ask a supplementary? Does the minister condone the raising of revenues by the federal tax on building materials at the expense of those who have suffered immeasurable loss and grief as a result of natural disasters?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am sure that in certain cases the application of the tax system may have unfortunate effects such as the one he described, but there is not to my knowledge within that system at present a way by which these particular difficulties could be overcome.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

USE OF WEEKLY AND ETHNIC PRESS

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Perth and directed to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) responsible for communications.

Like the hon. member, I compliment the government on this central agency. One of my concerns is that, given the bigness, there may be a tendency to forget the number of weekly newspapers and the ethnic press. We want some direction from government to that agency that the weekly press and the ethnic press will, in fact, be used better than they have been used in the past. Sometimes they have been ignored.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I very much appreciate the hon. member's question. He can be sure that because of the other hat I wear, the ethnic press will not suffer because of my responsibilities for communications. I also hope that, without in any way doing a disservice to many worth-while press operations, we can improve the system from its operation in the past.

I should add, on the question of weekly newspapers and advertising, I am very concerned, from the information that has come to my attention, that they have not been used sufficiently by the federal government in the past, and I plan to change that.

NATIONAL SECURITY

COMPLAINTS BY MEMBERS OF SECURITY SERVICE—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General why it is that members of the security service, at least here in Ontario, are not permitted to carry hand guns in the ordinary course of their duties? May I ask him how he is reacting to complaints from members in the security service and elsewhere that they are being discriminated against because of their activities in connection with the association of 17 divisions, something that I think his colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce asked him some weeks ago?

Is the minister aware that some members of the force are complaining to their commanding officers that such actions may be in violation of section 382 of the Criminal Code, and also the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the complaint that members of the security service are said to have made. I will look into it. As to the carrying of weapons, I will look into that as well. My understanding is that the main function of the security service is intelligence-gathering. Carrying weapons would not be part of intelligence-gathering activities.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I will send the minister copies of official correspondence in both these matters, since he has not seen them. I suggest to him that it is very strange, since ordinary, junior members and other sections of the RCMP carry weapons in the course of their duties, and the security service—which operates on a much more senior level and provides protection when special events take place such as VIP visits, and so on—are not allowed, except under special circumstances, to carry weapons. I hope the minister will look into this.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, the question of carrying weapons is not related to the seniority of the officer, but to the function he is carrying out at the time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MURPHY—CASH REBATE ON TRUCKS AND CARS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, on Friday last in this House I directed questions to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) with regard to Canadian consumers not receiving a rebate of the same amount as the $200 to $1,000 enjoyed by American consumers of Chrysler products. In my supplementary question, as recorded at page 1152 of Hansard, I asked:

> Will the minister get in touch immediately with Chrysler Canada to make sure that we, as Canadian consumers, get just as good a deal from Chrysler, especially since it is getting such a good deal from us?

The minister, in his reply, said this:

> Madam Speaker, I am very glad my hon. friend in the NDP has officially recognized that we have obtained a good deal from Chrysler for Canadian workers and the Canadian people generally. I would like to make sure that is on the record.

Later, as reported on the same page, the minister said:

> As I have said to my hon. friend, I will be very happy to go into the matter he has raised. I must say I was not aware of the details he has provided on this rebate program but it is important that it be confirmed by the NDP that we have obtained a good deal from Chrysler for Canadian workers and the Canadian people.

Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to raise the subject matter again. However, it is my intention to ensure that the minister and all members of this House understand that in no way did I suggest that the Canadian workers and the Canadian people received a good deal. For the record, my remarks indicated the opposite—that it was Chrysler which was getting a very good deal from the people of Canada, and that it had failed to offer the people of Canada the same rebate program as United States consumers are getting. It is Chrysler which is getting the good deal. In no way did I suggest to the House that the people of Canada and the workers of Chrysler are getting a good deal.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am glad the hon. member has raised the point, Madam Speaker, because the workers at Chrysler, at their dealers and their supplying firms will be dismayed to hear what he has just said.

Madam Speaker: I gather that the explanation which has just been furnished by the minister will satisfy the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). I must tell him, though, that this is a matter of the hon. member not being satisfied with an answer he has received from a minister and that a question of privilege does not, therefore, arise.

LOANS TO CUBA

Question No. 45—Mr. Cossitt:

In the past six years, did the government loan funds to Cuba and, if so (a) what was the total amount (b) how many loans were involved (c) what was the interest charged in each case (d) were interest payments received on time and, if not, did the government take any action (e) what amount of the principal of any loan was repaid?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): In the past six years, both the Export Development Corporation (EDC) and the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) have made loans to Cuba.

Cuba has signed eight loans with EDC for a total of Canadian $69.3 million. The interest rate varies on each loan but in all cases meets or exceeds EDC's minimum lending rate at the time of signing. All interest has been received on time and a total of Canadian $14.867 million had been repaid by December 31, 1979.

Cuba has also received one aid loan from CIDA. This loan was for $10 million with terms of 3 per cent interest, seven years grace, and 30 years maturity. All interest payments have not been received on time and Cuba is currently two semi-annual payments in arrears. Cuba has indicated that these payments will be made shortly. No principal is yet due on this CIDA loan.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS CORPORATION—FUNDS FOR CONSERVATION OF COLLECTIONS

Question No. 176—Mr. Friesen:

1. What percentage of funds expended by each branch of the National Museums Corporation goes toward the conservation of their collections?

2. Does the National Museums Corporation have plans to acquire vehicles and drivers to move items to and from various localities to the Canadian Conservation Institute in Ottawa for restoration and, if so (a) how many (b) are suitable vehicles available or do they have to be custom made (c) what is the estimated cost of each vehicle (d) are they available in Canada (e) how soon does the Corporation expect to have the vehicles "on the road"?

3. (a) What is the estimated number of trips budgeted for in the first year of operation by region (b) what is the estimated cost of the average trip to and from each region (c) how much of the transport costs will be passed on to the museum/gallery requesting the service?

4. (a) What is the cost of (i) a museum-mobile unit (ii) an average display in such a unit (b) what were the operating expenses for the year 1977?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

	Percentage
National Gallery	5.3 per cent
National Museum of Man	3 per cent
National Museum of Natural Sciences	2 per cent
National Museum of Science and Technology	9.5 per cent

2. No. The National Museums of Canada operates a fleet of vehicles to transport exhibitions across the country. It is proposed that artifacts accepted for treatment at Canadian Conservation Institute headquarters be transported to Ottawa using the existing fleet. Treated objects would be returned by the same means.

3. (a) A regular schedule of six trips annually across the country is proposed to pick up and return works of art and artifacts.

(b) The operational cost per round trip for the vehicles and drivers is as follows: Pacific Region—$4,500; Prairie Region—$2,500; Ontario—$500; Quebec—$600; Atlantic Region—$1,200.

In many instances it will be possible to combine a pick up for Canadian Conservation Institute for restoration with the delivery of an exhibition for one of the National Museums, in which case the cost would not be borne entirely by Canadian Conservation Institute for restoration. It is therefore estimated that Canadian Conservation Institute for restoration's total annual transportation costs will be approximately $25,000.

(c) No part of this cost will be passed on to the museum or gallery requesting the service.

	Amount
4. (a) Rolling stock Museumobile unit	$351,700
Exhibit design, fabrication and installation	$415,000
(b) Operating expenses for FY 77/78:
(1) Operating and Maintenance	$231,065
(2) Salaries	$212,493

2. (a) Which provinces do not participate in the plan (b) what is the estimated amount of the federal sales tax on the purchases made by these provinces which they would have paid if they had participated in the agreement?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, before you call orders of the day, in the light of the events which are taking place today and which might have an impact on House business tomorrow, might I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council whether it is the intention of the government to proceed tomorrow with the measure dealing with guaranteed income supplements to old age pensioners?

Mr. Collenette: We would certainly be prepared to bring Bill C-16 before the House. I understand there have been discussions which suggest we could expedite the matter tomorrow afternoon. If that is the case we would be prepared to do that.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT, 1980

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-4, respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I thought that in view of the nature of this bill the minister would be making a few introductory remarks on second reading. I was waiting until he spoke. I appreciate the fact that this bill has been around for some time and that it involves a good many municipalities across the country, but in view of the widespread interest in it I certainly thought the minister would tell us, for example, whether this bill, C-4, is identical with the bill brought in by the former minister of finance in the last government as Bill C-3. If so, our discussion might certainly be expedited; a good deal of time could be saved and we could move the bill along and into committee.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I waited because I thought the hon. gentleman was about to rise to speak on this measure. The short answer to the question he has just raised is that the bill is significantly the same as the one to which he referred. Perhaps I should now comment on the bill before us.

I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill C-4, which is intended to provide the federal government with new legislation to govern the program of grants to municipalities in lieu of property taxes. The general intent of the bill is to update and expand the federal system of grants in lieu of taxes. This will be good news to many municipalities across Canada, as the hon. member has pointed out. Many members are aware that the bill is in substantially the same form as the measure which was before Parliament on two occasions, initially under the Liberal administration and then under the Conservative administration in the Thirty-first Parliament. I should like to refer to Hansard of December 3, 1979, which records the exhaustive comments of members of Parliament on the introduction of this bill on the last occasion.

Throughout my ten years as an elected official in local government in metropolitan Toronto, I was convinced that local governments were in need of increased revenues to respond to their mandate as a responsible level of government. It is therefore particularly gratifying to me to have a role in introducing this bill, albeit a third time, with its modest help for approximately 2,000 Canadian municipalities across Canada.

I know that some members will argue that the bill does not go far enough, and I know there are a number of points of which members have spoken before, but I would urge that the bill, which is in substantial form the same as two bills previously before Parliament, should receive speedy consideration by Parliament because it would indeed give modest financial help to affected and qualifying local governments.

The riding of York-Scarborough which I represent and which will receive some benefits from this bill is the most populous in Canada. In the next few years, the existing 108,000 eligible voters will be joined by many thousands of new residents because most of the land left for residential development in metropolitan Toronto is in the riding which I represent. The residents of the riding are people from many provinces and many countries who, in my opinion, face a significant challenge in building what has been described as their instant city into more than just a city but also an attractive community in which to live, work, play and indeed to call home.

Geographically, the riding is comprised of approximately the northern half of the borough of Scarborough, which I represented as mayor, together with a portion of the city of North York, which I represented as metropolitan Toronto councillor. Both of these municipalities have been rapid growth areas in municipal Toronto, each averaging approximately 5,000 residential starts over the past 20 years. In many cases this development has been called an instant city with all the challenges of settling that many people, with both hard and soft services and the challenge to make this part of Canada a good place in which people can live, work and play.

Bill C-4, I realize, is not a panacea to the financial challenges of my riding or indeed of the some 2,000 other municipalities which will benefit from the provisions of the bill. For my part, however, the bill is a recognition of the role played by local government in the total delivery of government services to the public. It is my hope in the upcoming months, when a re-analysis of the respective roles of government is undertaken, that the role and responsibility of local government will find a voice in the restructuring process. It is my view that this government and the provincial governments can only benefit from the combined input of local government, and hence all Canadians can benefit from the input of local government in that process. But topics such as trilevel discussions, revenue sharing, etc., will be for another day.

Bill C-4 now before the House is intended to provide the federal government with new legislation to govern the program of grants to municipalities in lieu of property taxes. I do not propose to make a long statement in support of this bill because, as I have indicated, other ministers on two previous occasions have talked to the bill at length. It would be desirable, however, to summarize the provisions of the bill and comment on the background.

The general purpose is to update and expand the federal system of grants in lieu of taxes. The bill achieves this by enlarging the definitions of real property and real property taxes in respect of which grants are to paid and by establishing how set grants are to be determined, making it clear that they are to constitute a full tax equivalent in almost all cases. The bill also provides for a set of guidelines which are to be observed by Crown corporations in making grants in lieu of taxes on their own properties.

The definition of property subject to grant is being made very broad. It encompasses virtually all lands and buildings that are owned by the Government of Canada. Let me list some examples, which include the Parliament buildings, office buildings, postal terminals, defence bases, armouries, national parks, historic sites, research laboratories, airports, marine properties, warehouses of all kinds including those associated with harbour facilities, communications stations, experimental farms, fish hatcheries, penitentiaries, police detachments, residential properties, hospitals, schools, libraries, and it goes on.

The definition of taxes in respect of which grants will be paid includes the real property tax, local improvements taxes, and almost any other kind of tax levied on owners of real property.

The grants to be paid in respect of the foregoing taxes and in respect of the properties described will be determined on the basis of full tax equivalency in almost all cases. In some cases they will represent more than full tax equivalency because some types of property which will be included are properties of a kind that are often not taxed when owned by someone other than the federal government.

In order to achieve the position which I have described, the bill makes a large number of changes in the legislation which has governed the program since 1957. In fact, the changes are so numerous that new legislation was necessary. I do not intend to itemize the changes, but I could describe three changes. First, as I have indicated, national parks, defence bases in rural areas, the Parliament buildings, etc., will be brought into the grant system. Second, and this is new, most deductions from grants will be eliminated. Third, the establishment of guidelines to govern grants by Crown corporations will be authorized. This will have a significant impact on the amount of moneys actually transferred to local authorities. These changes will mainly become effective for the 1980 taxation year of municipalities. Some provisions are subject to a four year phasing and the guidelines for Crown corporations will apply with a one year lag.

Now I have a few comments to make about the antecedents of Bill C-4. The present Municipal Grants Act is a 1951 statute which was amended in 1955 and 1957, but not since then A sizeable number of representations were made about the act during the decade of the 1970s, and the credit for responding to these and coming forward with a bill must go to my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who, in his former capacity as minister of finance, introduced Bill C-46 in the Thirtieth Parliament. We know that that bill did not proceed when Parliament was terminated. In the thirty-first Parliament an almost identical bill was introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), and that bill similarly did not proceed past the second reading stage. But on December 3, 1979, which was the date of the second reading last given to the bill, although the debate was not completed I am told there were at least two hours of full discussion and eight hon. members spoke to the item. There was a full statement to Parliament to open the debate and this statement is set out in full in Hansard. I encourage members to review that statement.

Bill C-4 incorporates a few changes from the previous two bills. These changes do not alter in any way the amount of grants to be paid. Their general purpose is simply to clarify some of the provisions. However, I would like to refer to one of the changes since it affects me personally. This is the change in the definition of minister in the provision of the act which now assigns responsibility for administration of the act to the Minister of Public Works rather than the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The change in the definition of minister in the act was made because responsibility for administration of the grants program was transferred from the Department of Finance to the Department of Public Works on April 14 of this year. It was done just two days before the bill was introduced into the House. The change of administration was preceded by extensive discussions between the two ministries concerned, and it was approved by the Prime minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the basis of the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and myself.

The program of grants in lieu of taxes began in 1950. It was housed in the Department of Finance at that time. It was assigned to that department because the original program had limited coverage and numerous discretionary aspects. However, over the years the program has been significantly enlarged. The discretionary aspects have been curtailed, and from a managerial aspect the program is similar to the tax payment function of a privately owned corporation. In our opinion, this function is best carried out by those who are concerned with real property management, as is the general case in the private sector. In this way the tax or grantpaying function can best be integrated with all other aspects of property management. The foregoing considerations led the Minister of Finance and myself to the conclusion that the grant in lieu program should be transferred to the Department of Public Works, as I have indicated.

I should like to conclude with two final comments. First, this bill will bring benefits to a large number of municipalities across Canada. As a former mayor of Scarborough, I am very pleased to have the privilege of bringing this legislation before Parliament and of assuming the continuing responsibilities for the administration of the program. Second, there is good reason to believe, because of the history of this bill which I have outlined, that it will receive good support from this House. As I have indicated, there has been extensive public and parliamentary discussion of the issues raised in the bill. I dare say that some of the questions which members opposite may have concerning the bill will have been touched on and have been touched on in the past. I would encourage their support of the bill inasmuch as municipalities have been waiting in anticipation for the passage of this legislation for some time. Therefore I indicate that I am sure there is an appreciative audience for speedy treatment of this bill before the House.

In summary, I feel that I cannot improve upon the comments made by the former minister of finance on December 3, 1979 in his concluding remarks at this point in the previous bill. He was speaking about the bill when he said the following:

> It will tidy up and modernize a statute where changes are long overdue; it is now 22 years since it was changed. It will bring substantial benefits to local governments in all parts of Canada and will strengthen the principle that the Government of Canada is paying its way for the services it receives from municipal government.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too am glad to participate in the debate on Bill C-4. I congratulate the minister for giving this bill priority over other government legislation, as was the case with the last government, and for showing the interest of the government in this bill, the subject matter of which has been around for quite a while, as the minister said.

I frankly do not know when a minister of the Crown perhaps has had such a relatively easy bill to bring in during troubled times. During other debates in this House I gather there has been a disposition for approval in principle mainly because there is a recognition of the fact that municipalities, which contribute so much to the ongoing government of this land, require and deserve much more financial assistance. There has been this anomaly which really stems right from the BNA Act. I find that somewhat ironic in view of the events which are taking place today. Of course, the BNA Act indicates that federal and provincial property shall not be subject to, in effect, property taxation, thereby starting the problem some 113 years ago. Perhaps it did not seem to be much of a problem then, but as the country, the government and the municipalities grew, the need for a proper grant system in lieu of property taxes became quite apparent.

I think the minister has a relatively easy job in his department in piloting this piece of legislation. He is getting his baptism of fire, so to speak, by bringing this bill in. One reason the minister may get off a little easy today is that he has a bill with which we are all sort of generally in agreement. Also, he is dispensing money, which is an easy thing for a minister to do. But this is also my first baptism of fire in that I have the honour of following a minister in sort of a critique role. Being the type of person I am—and the party to which I belong is always constructive—naturally I will try to make my comments not too critical but certainly constructive in nature.

The historic speech of the minister of finance in the last House was not quite as historic as the vote which occurred ten days later. It was on December 3 when Bill C-3 was debated. For members interested, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), as reported at page 1957 of Hansard for December 3, set out in almost extreme detail all the pitfalls and definition problems in this bill.

As the minister said, this bill has had a long gestation period. I suppose my friends to the left who have never really been in a position to be a putative father to any bill might question the joint paternity of this bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) looks at me with his quizzical eye. I say that in the best parliamentary sense.

Mr. Knowles: We have been fathering good legislation around here for decades.

Mr. Nowlan: Certainly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a father of many things in terms of legislation. Obviously he has an interest in this bill which will bring help to over 2,000 municipalities across the land.

I have really one critical comment. I am somewhat sorry in the first sortie of the minister on a bill involving municipal governments that on all days the minister perhaps did not exercise a little more rhetoric in praise of municipalities and the contribution they make to the whole Government of Canada. We know today is a rather historic day. Whether more aid to municipalities will solve some fundamental problems across this land obviously is not a fundamental solution.

I know the minister was very active in municipal government. When I was on the west coast, I was involved in the municipal government for school boards. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) was a reeve for an historic number of years, some 26 years. It is interesting that a lot of members of the House have cut their eye teeth on municipal governments or with municipal governments, be they municipal governments or school boards.

When I first heard this bill being kicked around several years ago, I was surprised that the matter did not move off dead centre and did not really move. Some of the questionable gestation, it is reported, allegedly was an enticement originally in Bill C-46 back in the Thirtieth Parliament when the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), issued a press release on February 19, 1979. It was suggested then—and this is what I meant by questionable paternity—that there was an enticement for the then mayor of Ottawa to throw his hat into the ring. I think Ottawa will benefit from the bill more as a single entity than any other part of the country because there is so much government property here. This was supposed to entice the then mayor of Ottawa into the federal ring.

We now have on my side of the House the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). When he was president of the privy council in the former government and even before, he showed as did other hon. members from the Ottawa-Carleton area, a real interest in trying to reduce some of the financial burdens municipalities have found themselves under, especially compounded by the fact that so much federal government property was not taxed or providing the benefits of grants in lieu of taxes because the definition was rather strict and narrow.

That is why I compliment the minister for bringing this bill forward. In just a slight digression, let me say that the sooner we move this bill off dead centre in terms of the floor of this House and into the committee, the more respect we will show in a concrete way for the job the municipalities of this country are doing in all their phases. We have in this federal system two major levels of government, federal and provincial, but obviously the municipalities, creatures of the provincial system, are really the ones in day to day contact and in many ways have more influence and are seen more often by the taxpayer than those of us who are tucked away here in Ottawa so many months of the year.

For that reason I hope that there will be relatively speedy action to get this bill into committee so that we can deal with some of the fine points to which the minister alluded and into which perhaps the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, went perhaps in a little too much detail. I hope some of those matters can be discussed a little more in the committee.

The very grant program which the minister said started many years ago involves an expenditure to the departments of over $148 million. Grants to Crown corporations I am informed add another $110 million. This bill would add some $25 million to this grant system by widening the definition of the property to get the grant and also changing some of the rates for calculation.

The minister spoke about his constituency. My province of Nova Scotia has several Canadian forces bases, let alone historic parks. We have a very direct interest. I do not want to declare any conflict of interest, but CFB Greenwood, which is really the heart and soul of the NATO air element of the Canadian forces, just happens to be in the heart of my riding. I am glad to see that under the new definition CFB Greenwood, like CFB Shearwater, CFB Chatham and many other bases across this country, is now going to be included in the grant structure. That will be all to the good as far as we Nova Scotians are concerned and as far as members from various municipalities across the country are concerned.

The minister mentioned that Parliament Hill, the National Library and Public Archives, the National Arts Centre, the National Gallery and the National Museum, all in Ottawa, will be included. I am sure the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton will be speaking further about this, about the problems created by this bill and the good the bill will do in the Ottawa area.

Because the bill seems to be positive, hon. members may wonder why it has been around for as long as it has. It has been without substantive amendment for 22 years. I go back to the debate in this House on December 3. The bill is going to accomplish some very positive things, but obviously—and this is one of the reasons I think we should get it into the committee fairly soon—there are problems involving taxation in view of municipal rates and formulae which perhaps can be illuminated and examined in committee, and perhaps the floor of the House is not the place to do it.

In a brief from the Federation of Canadian Municipalities tendered to the government way back in 1977, which was the basic brief on the then bill—and this bill has not been fundamentally changed—I think there were five areas of concern which the federation set out with regard to that bill, Bill C-46. As we know, the provisions of that bill were included in Bill C-3 and now in Bill C-4. Those five areas of concern were the difference between the assessed value versus the accepted value; second, the problem of properties which currently have a tax exempt status; third, the exemption from commercial or business tax; fourth, service deductions which the government made for services it received from the municipalities; fifth—which the minister touched upon—the fact that Crown corporations were rather ad hoc and inconsistent as to how they paid—if they paid at all—grants in lieu of taxes.

As I understand the bill, the first problem, the difference between an assessed value and an accepted value, is still going to be left basically up to the minister, and it will be the minister's prerogative to set the value. I think that is in clause 2 of the bill.

As I read clause 2(1), we still have a problem between assessed value of property of a municipality and its accepted value. According to this legislation, the minister will determine the "effective rate". This will in effect be left to the opinion of the minister. Perhaps in committee we will need a little further amplification as to what the terms of reference or definition of "effective rate" is going to be, because in some ways if an effective rate does not relate to the assessed value, that might destroy some of the intent of the legislation, and that is to broaden the very basis for the grant in lieu of taxes. That is one area on which we need further explanation, and hopefully that can be done in the committee.

As I understand it, the second matter has been largely cured by this bill. With respect to properties which had a tax-exempt status, under the terms of this bill there will be an expansion and a very wide definition of the properties to be covered. Such properties as parks, historic sites, museums, art galleries and the like and defence bases are going to be included, so in large measure I think both this government and the previous government went a long way toward removing the complaint of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities that too many federal buildings were not even involved in the grant program.

As the minister stated today, and as I mentioned, the expansion of the grants in large measure has been clarified, and certainly if the clarification is not wide enough, perhaps by the time we come to the committee other municipalities which feel that it is still a little loose as to whether some property in their areas will be covered by the expanded grant may let us know. This is an unusual bill. Perhaps there will be many bills which will have this joint paternity, but the problem of the exempt properties has been largely rectified in the provisions of this bill.

I think the problem which is left up in the air the most, for perhaps very justifiable reasons, is the third problem which the Federation of Canadian Municipalities brought to the attention of the government in 1977. It has been passing resolutions on it since 1977 at its annual meetings. I refer to the question of the business tax or the commercial tax or the occupancy tax—call it what you will. Under the bill even as it is presently before the House, there is still not going to be, as I understand it—again there is a place, perhaps committee, for further clarification of this—any allowance for a business tax that the municipality imposes.

As we know, municipalities have a very limited source of revenue, be it from real property taxes, business taxes or commercial taxes. I appreciate the reasoning of the federal government that a business or commercial tax is such a variable thing, depending upon the municipality and/or the province, that there could not be a standard set across the country on the basis of which the federal government could give a consistent grant in lieu of taxes. I appreciate there are many variables in this equation. The lack of uniformity in respect of commercial taxes extends all the way through from different assessments, criteria and stock in trade to rental value, sometimes on the basis of square footage, and other times on the basis of storage capacity or assessed value of real property. Often it is done on the basis of a flat rate. Because of these variables in these municipal taxes across the country, the federal government felt there was no way it could pay a fair grant in lieu of taxes.

One of the reasons we have not made progress in respect of this bill is that it has been difficult enough in the past for municipalities to obtain a grant in lieu of property taxes. This bill, in effect, bites the bullet in respect of property taxes. It has, in effect, provided for grants and opens up areas in relation to property that are more difficult to assess in terms of property tax; for example, historic parks and defence bases. The government is apparently prepared to move in that direction, with all the difficulties involved.

The only other real source of income for a municipality is taxes on businesses or commercial endeavours. As I understand this bill, there will be no recognition of grants in lieu of income from business tax.

I do not run a business at my constituency office, but in my municipality I am confronted with a business tax. I objected to paying it, but I found out I was going to have my furniture hauled away if I did not pay it. The tax is assessed on the basis of the fact that I am located on the front, main street of my home town.

In similar fashion, I understand the federal government feels that, because it is not in a business, it should not pay any business tax or give any grant in lieu of such a tax. If that is the case, perhaps the minister will be able to expand upon that situation when the bill reaches study in committee.

Part of the dilemma in that argument is that departments do not carry on businesses, but some Crown corporations and agencies of government do, in effect, carry on businesses, often in direct competition with others in the private sector. Perhaps when we get to the committee stage the minister will be able to distinguish between a department which does not carry on a business and a Crown corporation or an agency of government that does. I can understand the government's argument in respect of departmental activities, but what is the situation in respect of a Crown corporation which carries on a business within a municipality? There is no problem that I see as to why the government has not moved to recognize a grant in lieu of some business or commercial tax in respect of departmental activity; but that reasoning does not apply to Crown corporations or other government agencies carrying on businesses, as I say, often in competition with others in the private sector.

With that situation, should there not be a recognition of some flat rate?

An hon. Member: $100 million.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister mentions from his seat "$100 million". I think Crown corporations are giving grants in lieu of taxes to the extent of $110 million. Is that the $100 million the minister refers to? I know the minister has a problem speaking again in view of the rules of the House, but perhaps when we reach committee he can elucidate for me what I think is a slight contradiction in not recognizing departments in relation to grants in lieu of business taxes because they do not carry on business, and Crown corporations that do carry on business on a competitive basis. I should like the minister to comment further in that regard in committee.

The fourth matter, as I understand it, that the municipalities were concerned about has been corrected by this bill, particularly by clause 8. That concern relates to the fact that there was a deduction for the services a municipality provided to the federal government. The federation made the point in its brief back in 1977, and I quote:

> Two types of service deductions from the main grant are made to reflect:
> (1) the cost of those services provided directly by the federal government; and
> (2) the cost of those services provided by the municipality which are not used by the federal government.

The federation I think finally received some favourable recognition in this regard. The federation went on to state in its brief:

> The federation believes that there is no basis for these deductions, which assume that one only pays taxes for services received. It seems safe to say that no property tax system could operate on that basis.

The federation recommended that these service deductions be discontinued. As I understood the minister's remarks on the bill today, and as I understand the bill itself, in large measure, with very few exceptions, these service deductions will be removed, and that part of the increase in the grants will represent a contribution for those services, other than in some special situations involving educational contracts with municipalities under which special educational services are provided; for example, to defence bases.

The fifth matter which was raised by the federation involved Crown corporations. The minister said earlier that where Crown corporations were very hit or miss, inconsistent, in conferring grants in lieu of taxes, there will now be a more consistent direction, or more consistent directives to Crown corporations to provide municipalities with these grants in lieu of taxes. I think that is a very positive thing. Perhaps again when we reach committee study we will be given some further direction as to how wide these directives will be.

We all know that the increase in the activities of Crown corporations has represented a large part of the growth in government. I am glad to see that grants in this regard are to be brought into some order or under some umbrella so that municipalities will not always be wondering about these grants. In this way there will be some uniformity of grants to municipalities in lieu of business taxes in relation to Crown corporations.

Those are the five matters that caused the Federation of Canadian Municipalities some concern. Whether representatives of the federation or of any other organization will want to appear before the committee during its study of this bill, I do not know at this stage, but I feel this is a step forward. This matter was fully canvassed on December 3, 1979. The principle has favour with members on all sides of this House. Perhaps again, in view of the events of the day, if this place is to become a little more relevant, with recognition for the work that all governments do, especially municipal governments, the best thing we can do is move this bill from dead centre of the floor of the House of Commons, past second reading stage and into committee where some of the more complicated formulae set out in the bill can be explained by the minister. We on this side are in favour of the bill in principle and we want it to move forward.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, we in this party also support this bill and I would like to begin my remarks by outlining some of our reasons for doing so.

In the first instance, of course, there is to be an additional $25 million provided to municipalities by way of grants in lieu of property taxes. That $25 million is a significant amount. This bill, in addition, increases the number and kinds of federal properties which fall within the scope of this legislation. That removes a bugbear that has existed in the legislation.

In addition, the bill provides some direction to Crown corporations regarding grants in lieu of taxes. This improvement perhaps results from submissions and briefs that have been presented to the government in the past. As I understand it, the bill also makes some provision for Crown corporations which are generally independent of the federal treasury, being expected to pay grants in lieu of business occupancy tax. As well, for the first time the bill will provide for the payment of grants in lieu of taxes as it affects defence bases in rural areas, national parks, historic sites, museums, libraries, art galleries, concert halls, etc. There are many improvements in this bill and it, therefore, deserves support.

However, there are also some serious shortcomings which we should not allow to go by without saying something in that regard. Fundamentally, a weakness in the legislation is that it continues to be a grants system—rather than a taxation system. In other words, the authority as to how much tax will be paid still lies with the federal government—rather than with the local taxation authorities. This was certainly the main criticism brought forward by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities when they referred to the difference between the assessed value, which is the value assessed by the local authorities, and the accepted value, which is determined by the federal government.

In principle, the bill is weak. If there is to be an increased respect in this House for local councils and cities, then this bill would be a good start if we were to change the basic principle underlying this legislation.

The other major area of weakness in this bill is the continued exemption of the federal government from paying commercial taxes. Commercial taxes are an important source of revenue for local government, and as long as the federal government gets off the hook by not having to pay, then the local taxpayer must pick up the tab. I am referring to the local property taxpayer and, as we all know, local property taxes are the most regressive taxes and a tax which is really hurting people today.

It is also important to note with regard to the government's continued exemption from commercial taxation that Prince Edward Island has found a way around this situation by combining what was once their commercial tax with their property tax. So, in effect, the federal government is paying a commercial tax in Prince Edward Island. This is a very inequitable situation so far as the other provinces are concerned; the principle should be applied across the country, not just in one province.

If the body involved, such as a corporation or any private profit-making corporation, were in this situation, we would not allow them to get away without paying the tax levied by the local government. There is no reason why the federal government, simply because it is the most senior level of government in this country, should be able to use its authority to get away from paying local taxes.

Another reason that this commercial tax should be paid by the federal government is that if it were not in the building that it occupies, then clearly some other activity would be carried on in that building. This has the effect of creating a lost opportunity for the community, which means loss of revenue. If a private citizen refused to pay a tax levied by a local authority, that person would be dealt with very expeditiously by the local tax authorities; but not the federal government, which is exempt from paying this commercial tax. I see no reason why the federal government should be able to get away with not paying a tax when a private citizen would be made to pay the bill. In fact, since the government does not pay this commercial tax, the local citizen is forced to pay a higher property tax.

Finally, with regard to the continued commercial tax exemption of the federal government, it is at least interesting, if not completely entertaining to me, to read the comments on this bill by the Liberal party when they were in opposition. At that time they seemed to indicate through one of their members that they were in complete accord with the objections or concerns expressed by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. I can think of two specific objections expressed by that organization. The first objection is the reference to the difference between the assessed value and the accepted value; and the second objection, of course, is the commercial tax exemption.

When this bill came into the House, the Liberals while in opposition raised the question as to why there should be a continued exemption from commercial taxes. Now that the Liberals are in office, they have done nothing about the matter. I also noticed that when the Conservatives were in government they were supportive of this legislation. Now that they are in opposition, they refer to the objections raised by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. The Conservatives while in office did nothing with regard to at least a couple of those objections.

There are other shortcomings in this bill, and I will mention a couple more. One refers to the clause whereby regulations must be published before they are implemented. It seems to me that the clause says that the regulations must be published only once. After that one publication, the government could change the regulation and implement it without making the public aware of the changes. The government should publish these regulations until they are in a form in which they can be implemented. This would show a greater commitment to open government than the simple requirement that the regulations be published only once, which of course leaves the government with the option of changing the regulations after that publication.

Another shortcoming is with regard to the phasing in of the grants over four years. That is, in the first period the government will pay 25 per cent, in the second year 50 per cent and on upwards. The bill acknowledges that the government owes a tax bill to the local authorities, but if one owes a tax bill, one cannot get away with paying 25 per cent in the first year, 50 per cent in the second year and so on. Certainly no individual taxpayer could get away with such a proposition. If one owes on a bill, then one should pay that bill in full.

By and large, this is a good bill and it deserves support. Yet much more would have been possible had the government taken the initiative, and much more is necessary. Once again, I hope that, perhaps in the committee stage, the minister and members of the opposition will be willing to push a little further to clear up the concern about, "assessed value" and "accepted value" and about doing away with the commercial tax exemption.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Bill C-4, to establish the Municipal Grants Act, 1980. The hon. minister has indicated that it has been three decades since there has been any major revision in this area. There was an indication that $258 million was paid out in 1979-80, $148 million by the federal government and $110 million by the Crown corporations and external affairs. The hon. member from Annapolis Valley-Hants has indicated some concern over this matter. I assume that his concerns will be cleared up in committee.

There are five major areas which I am pleased to support. Previously the federal government defence bases were not required to pay their fair share of taxes if they provided certain facilities, specifically elementary and secondary schools, police protection, fire protection, garbage pick-up and sewage. Now the government will be required to pay their fair share if the municipality is unwilling or unable to provide those facilities. Previously the government had a preferred rate, and this will no longer exist unless the ordinary taxpayer has a comparable preferred rate.

The minister has referred to the new definition of property, which is important and means an additional $25 million. There will also now be payments direct to Indian bands, and water taxes, particularly in the province of Quebec, will now be included. The bill is fairly straightforward, but there is a great deal of discretion left to the minister. If the discretion is exercised fairly, I cannot foresee any problem. For instance, under clause 3(1), the minister may grant funds out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Under clause 13 no right or grant is conferred by this act. Under clause 6(ii) the minister may deduct an amount for services that, in his opinion, the authority is unable or unwilling to provide. I am sure that if it is exercised fairly there will be little problem with the act.

To ascertain what this meant in terms of dollars, over the weekend in my riding of Sault Ste. Marie, I contacted the mayor, the city administrator and the treasurer who indicated $461,000 was paid out. That represents a population of 83,000, so it gives us some idea of how the money is allocated. There was a suggestion made by the treasurer that for better administration of the bill the federal government pay its bills on time as it expects others to do. For instance, the municipal fiscal year is from January 1, to December 31. The federal government, under this act, is within the same fiscal year as far as payment is concerned, yet the federal government does not pay its bill until the latter part of the year.

As hon. members are all aware, the municipal base of revenue is very narrow. It comes from normal taxation, normal licence fees, grants and subsidies from the senior levels of government and earnings from municipal undertakings. The licence fees and municipal undertakings just barely pay their own way. As far as subsidies are concerned, I do not know of the studies, but the municipal rule of thumb, at least in Ontario, is to try to run the municipality as follows: one third municipal, one third provincial and one third federal.

With regard to local improvement charges, people are paying less under local improvements than what it actually costs municipalities; for instance, for sidewalks. These services are directly attributable to the value of the house. That leaves, as the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) indicated, a regressive municipal tax for most services. I suggest that that is an unfair method of taxation that was right 50 years ago but is no longer in today's modern society. It is unfair because the pensioner pays more than his fair share and the low-income people pay more than their fair share. It is unfair because the renters do not pay their fair share for police, fire and school costs. Yet this system persists.

It would be much fairer—and we are into this with the referendum in Quebec—if the municipalities were under the similar type of system that the federal income system is based upon.

I would like to discuss my city primarily because I am familiar with it. But I think there are other examples in northern Saskatchewan, northeastern New Brunswick or in many parts of this country where there is a medium-sized municipality. Ours is a medium-sized municipality with a population of 83,000 and a stable economy. We have a pulp and paper mill, a steel corporation and a lumber company. Between 1961 and 1975 the area experienced high income and a rapidly expanding population. Algoma Steel, within that period, invested $800 million and with 10,000 employees the population increased. With amalgamation there was a further jump in population. It increased from 43,000 to 70,000. Because the economy boomed during this period, our town boomed. But the federal government came into the area and started a senior citizens program which put a demand on the building trades and a geared-to-income housing program.

Then there were large expenditures for insect pathology and urban renewal. Along came the provincial government and did the same thing in partnership with the federal government for senior citizens, geared-to-income housing and urban renewal. Then came the CAT colleges with regard to higher education and conservation projects. At the same time the high schools jumped on the bandwagon and the city built a new city hall. Also at the same time private development went on the upswing. All in all, the municipal debt doubled from $13 million to $31 million between 1965 and 1978. This example is probably appropriate to most municipalities of this size and nature in Canada.

Today the major industry, Algoma Steel, says that it is going to invest $475 million. This investment has already started. Great Lakes Power is going to invest another $85 million to build a 52 megawatt power generator plant. The spin-off is 5,000 additional jobs and a population increase of 25 per cent to 30 per cent.

A report was prepared and submitted to the province, and which will come to the federal government, showing what this means to a municipality which must provide basic services, such as sanitary services, on this archaic system. It means that municipalities such as ours, which will be receiving half a million dollars under this act, will require $26,590,000 to put in sanitary services that are necessary for this type of expansion, for which we are responsible.

DREE has said—and we are within one of the areas covered by DREE—that it does not have enough money, yet it has done a good job in the past in Cornwall, Dryden, Thunder Bay, Nakina and so on along these lines. We have to watch what DREE is doing with its limited funds.

I think Bill C-4 is excellent legislation and is heading in the right direction. However, I think the time has come, as one hon. member has suggested, when we should go back to the municipalities, as we did perhaps a decade ago, to these tri-level conferences which did an excellent job. We have to realize we are all serving the same taxpayer. There are only two criteria: that we collect the money judicially, and that we spend it wisely.

In conclusion, I support Bill C-4 with these additional thoughts that I think will enhance the development of our tax base at the three levels of government.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have been following the debate on bill C-4, the proposed municipal grants act, with interest. I listened carefully to what the minister, and the spokesman for my caucus had to say, to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) and also to what the member from the New Democratic Party had to say, the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper).

First of all, I would like to say to the member from Winnipeg that the remarks I am making today are essentially those that I had intended to make last December when this bill was brought forward by the government of which I was a part. I was not totally satisfied with the bill at that time. While the member from Winnipeg might say that we were supporting the bill then, and now are quoting the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, I want him to know that although we were supporting the bill, it does not mean that we had total unanimity on all the minor points in that bill. Surely we are large enough in this House to be able to give generous support to legislation without necessarily agreeing on all of the fine points.

I support what the member from Annapolis Valley-Hants had to say in quoting what the Federation of Canadian Municipalities said in its 1977 resolution. The minister says that some members are saying that this bill does not go far enough. When one of his own members points out that the bill is simply a revision of a bill that is approximately now 30 years old, perhaps what we need is more than fine tuning. Maybe we ought to look at some of the principles underlying the matter of grants in lieu of taxes, and maybe broaden them so that they promote equity in the distribution of these grants throughout Canada.

It seems to me that one of the problems of this bill is that it tends to perpetuate inequalities in the distribution of grants. I think that is an inherent problem with the bill. I remember when the spokesman for the Conservative party was speaking that the minister shook his head vigorously when he suggested that Ottawa would benefit more, and maybe it had to do with something regarding the political scene. The minister denied that. Well, he was not reading the Ottawa newspapers at that time because there was quite an upheaval in that Ottawa's tax base was diminishing owing to the wholesale move to new installations across the river.

The fact is that when you look at the proscriptions within the bill, cities that have federal installations, principally office buildings, are going to benefit more than other cities that have other kinds of federal installations. If we are going to look at the principles of the legislation, we have to look at the total package of federal installations and provide for greater equity than what the bill provides at the present time.

Let me just give a "for instance". I refer to page 4, subclause (2)(f). I quote:

—but does not include

(f) any structure or work that is not a building designed primarily for the shelter of people, living things, plant or movable property and, for greater certainty, "federal property" does not include any structure, work, machinery or equipment included in schedule II,

That already narrows it down considerably when you think, for example, of all the government corporations that are operating in some municipalities. The proscription in that paragraph narrows down the possibility of grants to municipalities that are providing a home base for some of those corporations.

Schedule II is referred to in that paragraph. The minister mentioned federal ports are included, and that is true, but he did not tell all the truth because it does not mention all of the installations within those federal ports and it is only certain kinds of federal ports. I want to point out that one of the pieces of discrimination in the legislation has to do with the fact that the National Harbours Board have to pay grants in lieu of taxes but harbour commissions do not. I know that is not part of the responsibility of this particular minister, but if the government is going to take a global look at grants in lieu of taxes and wants to erase some of the inequities that are going on, it ought to look at the fact that commission ports are not paying either taxes or grants in lieu of taxes.

I understand now, on some very good authority from a member of the government party, that the government is quietly shelving the ports act. The ports act would have revised the whole system so that all of the ports would have had to pay grants in lieu of taxes. If the government is considering shelving that piece of legislation, it is again perpetuating the inequity between National Harbours Board facilities and commission port facilities. I hope that when the minister appears before the committee, he will allow some kind of latitude in discussing this legislation so that he can revise some of the aspects and schedules that are listed in the back of the bill.

The minister mentioned ports, but schedule II excludes docks, wharves, piers, piles, dolphins, floats, breakwaters, retaining walls and jetties. I may not be much of a seaman, but my house overlooks the Pacific Ocean and I do know a little bit about ports from that vantage point. I had always assumed that wharves had something to do with ports.

If the minister wants to create equity—and one of the purposes of bringing the legislation forward is to create some equity in this provision—maybe he ought to revise schedule II so that when he is talking about federal ports he is in fact talking about federal ports, not only minuscule portions of those federal ports.

As some of the other speakers have pointed out, the legislation discriminates between federal business installations and private business installations. I recall some months ago trying to press the point regarding a federal harbour commission, like the Fraser River Harbour Commission, in my constituency. In his introductory commercial, his chamber of commerce commercial, the minister mentioned that Scarborough is the largest constituency. That is undoubtedly true. It so happens that mine is the next largest. It is certainly the largest west of his constituency. The municipality that I represent in part has as many electors as he has in his. I am sure the problems in my constituency are the same as in his.

Municipalities continually try to increase their industrial tax base in order to take some of the burden off the home owner.

When you have a port authority like the Fraser River Harbour Commission being exempted from taxes and grants in lieu of taxes and it is not on the schedule, you increase the burden of taxes on the home owner. In fact, the home owner is subsidizing the Fraser River Harbour Commission.

When I was speaking to this point some months ago, the officials of the department were quick to defend the commission ports by referring to all the residual benefits that flow out of those commission ports and all of the social benefits that accrue to the community because the port happens to be there; they told us to think of all the jobs it provides and all the income taxes its employees provide.

I ask these people, what is going on here? I am sure the steel fabricating firm up the river from this port is paying taxes on the total installation. I am sure they are providing some benefits to the community. The plastics plant which is just a few miles away has to pay taxes on the total installation. I am sure they would say they are providing some benefits to the total community. How can the officials of the department have the gall to say that they should not have to pay the same kinds of taxes as private industry because they are providing all of these extra benefits to the community? What extra benefits? Surely by paying full taxes on the property and the business involved in that property, private industry is also contributing to the community.

If the minister feels that this bill really needs to be updated and revised, let us do it root and branch. Let us look at the principles now incorporated in the bill and make sure that they apply fairly to all municipalities, and apply fairly between the government and private industry.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that if you apply the same rules to the Fraser River Harbour Commission in my community that apply to industry, the municipality would stand to gain something like $250,000 a year in taxes. If you apply it narrowly the way the departmental officials want to, those tax revenues are reduced to about $60,000. That is about a $200,000 difference a year. The home owners of that community are supporting the federal government.

I say to the minister that if he is really serious about taking a root and branch look at this legislation so that grants in lieu of taxes are applied fairly, the grants should apply fairly to all municipalities and they should be applied fairly and on an equitable base between federal installations and the private industrial installations, so that the private home owner or the private industrial companies are not subsidizing the federal installations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I will not be very long; I just want to make a few comments on this bill.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Gauthier: No, it is not a filibuster. I just want to make some comments on the differences between the present bill and the bill tabled by the previous government, the former Bill C-46.

Generally speaking, this move has been awaited for a long time by municipalities, especially those I represent, Ottawa and Vanier. As the previous speaker mentioned, no one could have lived in Ottawa very long without having lived through situations such as where our mayors, for example, even threatened to interrupt services if the federal government did not pay the full amount of assessment that they believed it should pay.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to one substantial difference between this bill and the last because of our experience in Ottawa with federal land acquisitions for federal purposes. I just want to relate one example, and that is the habit of the federal government through its agencies to acquire land or buildings, for purposes which are justified. I think of the large amount of space that was purchased in Ottawa by the federal government through DPW, the NCC or CMHC, which we thought was to be used for urban development and for a number of years was turned into parks. I think in particular of LeBreton flats, where several dozens of acres now lie fallow, undeveloped and unproductive as far as the municipality of Ottawa is concerned. I am thinking of the Fournier Park in Hull; a long-term housing development was planned for that area and, as yet, we have seen nothing.

Another example which comes to mind is Woodroffe Park, land owned by the federal government, which comes under paragraph (g)—any real property developed and used as a park and situated within an area defined as "urban" by Statistics Canada. It appears to me the federal government has to come to grips with the problem caused by acquiring properties, leaving them undeveloped and depriving municipalities of the assessments they might have got out of them.

I would refer, also, to clause 12 of the bill. That clause, I notice, follows word for word the former Bill C-3 brought in by the previous government in that the minister, who would have had some discretion, has no more that discretion. I refer to new acquisitions by the federal government. Under Bill C-46, if the federal government were to acquire a piece of property, a building of some kind, for federal purposes, a certain discretion was vested in the minister. I would like to read a few words from that bill.

> The minister of the Crown who is to have the management, charge or direction of such property may out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purchase of that acquisition make a grant to the taxing authority in lieu of real property tax . . . in respect to such property for the portion of the taxation year remaining after its acquisition.

Unless we amend the bill before us, the minister will have no discretion to do this. I notice he did not have such authority under Bill C-3 either, and I question the wisdom of the change. It might well be that a municipality would suffer a loss through the acquisition by the federal government of a property, say, in January or February of the year; ten months of that year would then elapse without the local authority receiving any money in respect of property which, prior to appropriation, was a source of revenue. I find this proposition hard to accept and I hope the minister will ask his advisers to prepare the answers for us in committee, because I am sure members will be anxious to know why this particular provision was removed from Bill C-4.

I think the questions raised by hon. members today were quite interesting. The point which was made with regard to the commercial occupancy tax was sufficient to suggest that we ought not to become involved in that kind of dossier this afternoon, because it is my understanding there are ten provinces with ten different systems in this regard, systems which are not comparable either from province to province or from industry to industry. It would be very difficult for the federal government to come in with one umbrella saying: Yes, we will pay the proportionate taxes which would go with the commerical assessment. I understand, for example, that Prince Edward Island has abolished the commercial tax completely and has imposed one tax for real estate properties and another for all other property, including industrial and commercial. Ontario came close to doing the same thing last year or the year before, but failed to carry it through because of the political consequences this would have had for the Toronto tax base.

I support the minister in his statement that commercial assessment taxes would be most difficult for the federal government to set up, mainly because of the variations which exist between provinces. I guess we will have time to go into many of these points with the minister later; I thank him for the celerity with which he has acted. I thank him for seven years of constant pressure and consultation with everybody in finance. I guess the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) is more efficacious than ministers of finance. He has succeeded in a month and a half in bringing forth a bill which I believe will mean an improvement as far as my city is concerned and which will result in increased grants.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my few remarks will be directed to two or three of the subjects which have already been raised. I say to the last speaker that I share his concern about that provision in the bill which is not quite in accordance with the historical intent. I support the observations he has made, with one further comment. I refer to clause 12 of the bill, which states:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, where Her Majesty in right of Canada acquires taxable property, no grant shall be made under this act in respect of such property for any part of the taxation year during which it was acquired.

This is quite acceptable, I believe, to provinces and municipalities where lands expropriated are properties held in right of the Crown by the province or municipality. The difficulty, as has just been pointed out, arises when the federal authority acquiring land chooses to do so on January 1, exempting itself under this legislation from any obligation, moral or otherwise, to make grants or payments in lieu of taxes to the appropriate provincial authority and thus to the municipality directly concerned.

This is where I find the clause to be deficient. It leaves an individual who has been deprived, or may have been deprived, of the right of enjoyment or of entitlement to property on January 1 liable for municipal taxes and other forms of taxes when, in fact, he no longer enjoys right of enjoyment of that piece of property for whatever purpose.

So I would briefly join with others in indicating to the minister that I am sure this is one area members will want to re-examine. It seems to me that the prorated adventure in this area by most provincial jurisdictions is equitable. There is no need for the federal government to be seen to be taking a slight advantage under a bill like this. The dollars and cents we are talking about are insignificant alongside the potential danger we incur if we follow the intent of clause 4 of the general section of this act.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of minor inequities in the bill. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) has touched on the inequity of exclusions under schedule II, dealing with ports, particularly the commission ports, but, as well, all of those structures, many of which are fund or money-generating facilities owned by the federal government, which fall within Ports Canada.

As the minister will probably be fully aware, Ports Canada does a significantly greater volume of business in this country of ours than do the ports of significance. In other words, the 20 major ports in Canada handle a relatively small part of the total volume of business that is transacted in and out of ports in Canada. I am sure the minister is aware of that. I simply alert the minister to the fact that in committee this will be an area which will be examined, particularly where there is very clear evidence that the Government of Canada in fact profits from the operation of a facility. In this case I am referring to ports under the Ports Canada authorities we have.

My final comment, because all the others have been touched upon, is that all of this is very good. It is like mother love and it has been around for a long time. I do not particularly commend the minister for bringing it on early. Perhaps I could share the sentiment that in other responsibilities he did take some leadership in bringing about change to the old bill.

While I commend the minister for having done so in another context, I remind him that he is no longer a mayor from the Toronto area. He is now a minister of the Crown sitting here in Ottawa, and he has a responsibility to everybody. The sooner he remembers, in a sense, that he has one responsibility and obligation here—that is, to the people of Canada in his portfolio with respect to public works—perhaps the better off we will be.

The final point I want to make is that, notwithstanding all this mother love and everything else, what is probably as important to municipalities and provinces is that the federal government pay its bills on time. There is nothing more costly or aggravating to municipalities, cities or provinces than to budget for funds and then have to go out and borrow those funds while waiting for the federal government to complete its transfer arrangements with respect to these matters. Nothing is more aggravating, and I see nothing in this bill that will change that.

Indeed, I am afraid that the phasing in of the new system in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 before there is a 100 per cent transfer is going to cause enormous problems for cities, municipalities and provinces. The distinguished people in the gallery are very competent.

Mr. Nowlan: Explain.

Mr. Forrestall: There are too many of them for it to be otherwise. They are very competent, and so is the system, and so is the structure; but history tells us that if something can go wrong, it will. I know what we are trying to do and what we are trying to get at. It would be my strongest suggestion that this system not be phased in over four years but, rather, that it be phased in after one year in order to reduce the complications which will arise when the province of British Columbia does a property evaluation and reassessment one year and Nova Scotia another year falling within these four years. I think there are two or three massive re-evaluations to be made, and this is going to cause problems with the computer. All these things are going to lead to problems. When we are dealing with something as technical and complex as this, it seems to me that the cleaner and quicker we do it, the less chance there is for confusion down the road.

If we accept that grants in lieu of taxes are absolutely necessary if municipalities are to get on with their work, then surely part of that or one matter, one understanding or one point without question is that we facilitate the municipalities and the provinces in the utilization of that money with respect to budgeting and so forth.

It is important that we pay our bills on time. In my judgment, the phasing in of this system will tend to complicate that, and if history follows in this case as it does in everything else—I think it was Mr. Murphy's law or someone else's that if something can go wrong, it will—it will in fact confront those in the minister's department who now have to administer this program as well as the recipient bodies, the municipalities and the provinces.

With those two or three points I have mentioned to the minister, and while everybody on all sides of the House welcomes these measures, they are not without fault. There are minor things which I hope the committee system and some detailed examination will help to strengthen, so that what emerges at the report stage in the House and subsequently at third reading stage and passage will be the best that we can do under today's circumstances for the provinces and municipalities, and that it may stand, as did the previous act.

It always augurs well for a bill if it lasts 15 or 20 years. The worst form of pollution is a good idea discarded before it has been fully used. It would be our intention to bring these matters to the minister's attention so that, in the final analysis, the bill is the best we can produce under the circumstances.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to be able to address myself to Bill C-4 which is before us this afternoon relating to grants to municipalities. I have listened with a great deal of interest to all of the speakers, and I concur with the points of view raised. I feel it would not be appropriate for me simply to repeat what has already been said in the spirit of moving hastily to ensure the speedy passage of this bill and getting it into committee where it will be examined in detail. I have confidence that the minister will receive our comments well and see that the suggested improvements to the bill in fact take place.

There are two items, however, which I would like to mention specifically to emphasize the fact that the bill does not recognize seriously the differences in municipalities across the country. Certain municipalities will receive benefits far in excess of benefits received elsewhere simply because of the nature of the taxation base in these various municipalities.

I must also stress the need for some consideration of payment a bit earlier than what has traditionally been the case.

As a member of a city council for a number of years I can say that it was always a disappointment when we had to wait so long to receive the moneys we expected from the federal government. This caused a great deal of uncertainty and concern about the ability of the municipality to pay its bills and meet its obligations in terms of providing services to its taxpayers.

The city I represented as a city council member certainly recognized that there are many, many problems facing municipalities today, not the least of which are financial problems. We found ourselves in a situation where we had to go out and borrow money. At that time we were borrowing from foreign sources, and very shortly thereafter, because of the rapid devaluation of the Canadian dollar, we found ourselves in a situation where we had to be paying off huge foreign debts in terms of Swiss francs, German marks or American dollars. This simply added to the financial problems of the municipality.

This bill is certainly a step in the right direction but, as the minister responsible indicated, it does not go far enough. There are many problems this bill does not address. In this form, of course, it cannot address them. It is not a panacea for all the problems that face municipalities today but a step in the right direction. I suggest it is a small step in the right direction, especially when one considers the major jump backwards that was taken in 1978 when the Liberal government at the time did away with the department of urban affairs, a move which was, in a sense, supported by the Conservative party in their brief time in office.

I suggest that more than ever before there is a need for more active leadership to be shown by the federal government in terms of urban development and municipal affairs. When confederation came into being more than 100 years ago, the composition of our population was significantly different from what it is today. At that time 80 per cent of the population was rural and only 20 per cent was urban. Today we find the situation completely reversed; 80 per cent of Canadians live in urban areas and 20 per cent live in rural areas. Perhaps we could even make a strong case for saying that those living in the so-called rural areas, small villages and towns, are in fact urban dwellers as well and face many of the problems, stresses and challenges of the urban dwellers. One can make a case that 90 per cent of Canada's population today is experiencing urban difficulties and problems. Maybe this bill is the beginning of that process and maybe this is the time for the federal government to demonstrate serious leadership in terms of urban and municipal affairs, to provide the initiative which is presently lacking in many parts of the country.

Many of our provincial governments bear the responsibility for some of the shortcomings. I must say that I feel the federal government, relative to some of the provincial governments, has done an admirable job. However, a great deal of work is yet to be done, a great deal of creativity and innovation is before us, and that opportunity is certainly knocking at a time when scarce public funds require optimum and efficient use, where cost effective measures have never been as needed as they are today. It is a time for the federal government to provide creative, energetic initiative and leadership in Canada when it comes to dealing with urban challenges.

We see a country—and we are reminded of it especially today—of extreme diversity. Yet when you look at the nature of the cities, towns and villages across this diverse country, you recognize that similar problems exist there. The fact that a municipality may be 3,000 miles away does not necessarily mean that it shares different problems in terms of the servicing of expensive suburbs or in terms of experiencing crises in rental accommodation or perhaps vacancy rates in the neighbourhood of 1 per cent, or in some cases down to 0.1 per cent or 0.2 per cent, where housing construction, particularly social housing, is a major challenge facing both large and medium-sized municipalities, providing for expensive urban infrastructure of all sorts, sewage systems, road systems, parks, and so on.

In the whole matter of urban transportation, be it public transportation, rapid transportation, on the kinds of problems that face municipalities from one end of this country to another, the municipalities are left on their own. Either because they have to resort to the private sector or make use of various consulting firms, or essentially have to reinvent the wheel, they are not taking advantage of the experience of sister municipalities in other parts of the country. They are not taking advantage of the experience which other municipalities have had in providing services and recognizing the difficulties which others have already experienced.

It seems that here is an opportunity for us as the federal government to play a role in providing a type of clearing house, in providing a kind of co-operative energy to bring to bear the existing knowledge, expertise and information that many municipalities and many urban centres would enjoy and from which they would benefit. It would save them the expense of finding what they think are unique solutions when, in fact, a few miles away there might be old solutions.

I feel that the challenge of energy cost to municipalities is something which the federal government must address in terms of providing leadership. The municipality which I had the privilege of serving in the past used to expend, a handful of years ago, $50,000 on their hydro charges to pump water to the various parts of the city. In a handful of years, that amount of money has changed from $50,000 to nearly one-third of a million dollars. The responsibility for that was borne, by and large, at the local level in terms of meeting those servicing costs.

With regard to cultural opportunities, we are seeing a great deal of initiative taken now in various communities across the country, initiative which we must nurture, encourage and support, where communities are coming together and building small community centres, theatres, art galleries, facilities to welcome and provide a home for the visual and performing arts, something which, if we are to weld this fine country together in a spirit which every member in the House would like to see, we should encourage.

Again this is another apportunity for the federal government to provide leadership and to show the way, through funding and, perhaps as important, through providing the co-operative energy of bringing together people and ideas to find a solution to these problems. However, we have seen in the past a cutting back in that leadership, a reduction in the leadership where the federal government, in an attempt perhaps to be more cost efficient through the consolidation of various federal programs and the transference of those consolidated programs into the provincial sphere, has given the provinces more responsibility in distributing federal funds.

One has to reflect on whether or not that has always resulted in a better service and a better opportunity for people dwelling in municipalities. For example, the urban transportation assistance program provided the initiative for programs such as railroad relocation to be transferred from the sphere of the federal government to that of the provincial government. Sums of money were made available to assist in urban transportation, which caught a number of municipalities part way along their own planning of expenditures to relocate outmoded and problematic rail transportation yards from the central part of the city to the outskirts. Once the provinces had the ability to decide how those funds might be expended, based perhaps in some cases on their own political motivation, and they chose not to continue a number of those programs, much to the disappointment of those municipalities which had already expended significant sums of money, the municipalities were left holding the bag.

When one considers that leadership in terms of our urban centres is required as it never was before, where a clearing house for information and ideas could be provided by the federal government, one recognizes the importance of our request to the minister that he reconsider, in his time in office, the decision to abandon the department of urban affairs and rethink the role that it could play in a country which is, by and large, urban. This is one of the most urban countries in the entire world.

In closing, let me comment, Mr. Speaker, on another matter which I feel must be addressed. This is the problem which faces virtually all municipalities, both large and small, across our country. It is the whole matter of the preservation of the quality of our environment.

We in Canada are fortunate to be one of those countries which by and large has a clean environment that must be preserved. Yet this clean environment, particularly as it affects our waterways, is being placed in jeopardy almost on a daily basis as municipalities attempt to deal with their sewage disposal problems more often than not in not very creative ways, limited by the amount of funding that is available to them, and as a consequence placing many of our streams, rivers and coastal areas in jeopardy.

I should like to take this opportunity to use as an example the city of Kamloops which is in my riding. It is a city with a population of about 65,000 people. It has traditionally used a sewage lagoon method to treat sewage and then drain the essentially treated effluent into the river system. As the population has increased so rapidly over the past few years with growth rates in excess of 10 per cent, the present system reached its capacity in 1976. With major heavy industrial developments being proposed over the next year or two, we can see a greater and greater strain being placed on our river system, especially the ecology of that very sensitive system.

It is clear that to continue this way would be tantamount to catastrophe in terms of the delicate ecological base of our river system. The cost for an improvement of that system ranges somewhere in the neighbourhood of between $20 million and $90 million for a municipality of 65,000 votes. I suggest that that is placing an unrealistic responsibility on that municipality. I simply use it as an example because the same could be applied to municipalities, large and small, across the country. The $20 million cost would be the cheapest solution, and that is a continuation of the status quo; $90 million would provide an efficient and effective long-term solution which would take the effluent from that city and deposit it, using a land disposal method.

Of course, one of the major problems is not so much the polluting of the river system per se, but the fact that the Thompson River, a tributary of the Fraser River in British Columbia, perhaps is one of the most productive salmon fishery rivers in Canada. Not only is it a system that is part of the salmon migratory route, but it also has very crucial and important salmon spawning grounds. Therefore, it is crucial not only to the salmon industry of the Thompson and Fraser Rivers, but the Gulf of Georgia and indeed the Pacific Ocean itself. We are looking here at a renewable resource in excess of $300 million for the salmon fishery alone. I feel it is something that we must recognize. It is an area where the federal government, through its funding agencies, could play a very significant leadership role in providing the much needed relief.

In closing, may I say that I am very encouraged by the remarks of the previous speakers this afternoon. I am very pleased to see that so much work has gone into a bill in terms of identifying many of its shortcomings. I am optimistic, with proposals like those regarding the reinstatement of tri-level conferences, that perhaps this is a small step, a beginning, toward the leadership role so dearly required at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, second reading was devised to deal with the principle of a bill. I plan to deal with the principle of this bill in so far as it affects penitentiaries, Indian reservations and national parks, at least one of each being in my constituency.

In connection with the penitentiary, there is no difficulty in regard to the assessment because it is in a municipality. However, when the Drumheller penitentiary was built, the city council was so anxious to have the penitentiary situated there that it gave the federal government a special deal in regard to water rates. As a result, the people of the city of Drumheller subsidized the federal government for a number of years. That situation has been corrected partially, but I hope this bill will enable the minister to ensure that the federal government pays its own way in regard to the penitentiary and that it not be subsidized by the citizens of Drumheller.

In connection with Indian reservations, I am a little more concerned because of the fact that there is no assessment and possibly no appraised value in the general sense of the word. I hope this bill will not be a means of passing money from one department to another department or out of one pocket into another pocket. I hope the bill will benefit the actual people on the reserves because our Indian band councils and the Indian people on the reserves certainly need some help if they are to help themselves.

In connection with national parks, we have no municipalities in many of our national parks. I would like the assurance from the minister that the money will not be passed from one department to another department, but that it will actually benefit the people who live in the town sites in our national parks.

The fairness and equity of the bill will be shown, in so far as it affects the people of an area, in equalizing taxation and bringing about fairness through taxation. I hope in the case of the Drumheller penitentiary that some provision will be made to help compensate for the large amount of money the people of Drumheller subsidized the penitentiary by in the early years of that institution. They say the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I think the proof of this bill will be in the regulations and the administration of it. I hope the objective will be to provide fairness to the people who have been paying the bill so far.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of saying a few words at this time on this bill. It is a very important bill as far as the municipalities are concerned. In view of the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), I want to bring to the attention of the House that where government establishments are placed in rural communities, that is in counties or in rural municipalities, we find the rural area is subsidizing that establishment to the differential which will exist between the assessed taxes on the land around it and the taxes being paid by the federal government.

The hon. member for Bow River mentioned that the citizens of Drumheller were subsidizing the penitentiary there. No doubt the citizens of Drumheller will derive certain benefits as a result of the placement of that penitentiary within its boundary. But what about the establishment that is placed in the central area within a county or a rural municipality, such as the Bowden penitentiary, where the county itself will not derive any benefit whatsoever? Certainly the towns within that vicinity, where people will live and buy their necessities of life, will derive that benefit. But there is no recurring benefit to the rural municipality. Therefore, I think it behoves the government to ensure that the tax paid by the government establishment coincides with the tax any other business would pay.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

FEDERAL COURT ACT

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS IN ACTION INVOLVING CROWN

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-202, to amend the Federal Court Act (disclosure of documents), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few comments with regard to my bill, which seeks to amend the Federal Court Act by deleting subsection (2) of section 41 of the said act.

Over the last few months, as you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the House know, we have been very much preoccupied with the debate which would lead us to greater freedom of information in this country. Indeed, the former government had a bill before the House which was initiated and sponsored mainly by our former colleague, the former hon. member for Peace River.

The term "freedom of information" is to be defined as meaning information held by government and kept secret; in other words, information that is not available to private citizens.

All of us agree that excessive government secrecy is in no way consistent with the most basic rights and fundamental principles of a society such as we espouse ours to be. The private individual does not like his or her government to keep information about him or her which could later on affect him or her in his or her career, relationships with government or, indeed, relationship with friends and neighbours. I will have something to say a little later by way of giving some practical examples of how excessive secrecy can affect individuals in our society.

Information selectively released by a government can, and I am sure has in the past—perhaps not deliberately—frustrate the orderly process of elections, and it certainly has from time to time influenced the judgment of voters when a government has had certain information that was not available to all the electors and has chosen to release that information selectively.

My bill, C-202, speaks of a different kind of secrecy or executive privilege, namely, information which is held by the government and may be withheld from the courts, or from the judiciary, under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act.

I am a layman, not a lawyer, and at times I consider myself fortunate in not having had any legal training. In the words of a very renowned law professor, that might have sharpened my mind to the point where it would be so narrow I would not be able to comprehend what goes on in the rest of the world around me. Why should I as a layman raise this matter when over half of our friends and colleagues in the House of Commons are lawyers? I have pondered this question from time to time. Nevertheless, I am taking the initiative in raising this matter in the form of a private member's bill and I will give my reasons.

I have been startled as I progressed with my research by the fact that so little attention was paid to this bill when it was introduced in the House of Commons. Government members dealt with it rather flippantly, and I must say that my learned friends on this side of the House in the opposition as well paid very little attention to it. The debate was very short and very reserved. In fact, when the bill got to committee there was no great outcry from members of the legal profession that section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act could in some way seriously restrict the rights and freedoms of individuals in our society.

The Federal Court Act received Royal Assent on December 3, 1970 and came into force on June 1, 1971. Generally section 41(1) provides that if a minister certifies to a court that a document should not be released on grounds of public interest, the court may still examine the document and order its release. Subsection (2), however, gives the minister absolute right to refuse disclosure of documents which he certifies would be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, federal-provincial relations, or confidences of the Privy Council, without any examination by the court.

This is a provision in our Federal Court Act which is unique in the western world. There is not another country in the western world that has built this kind of a privilege into a federal court act. Let me quote section 41 with its two subsections. It is short and this will not take too much time. It states:

41. (1) Subject to the provisions of any other act and to subsection (2), when a minister of the Crown certifies to any court by affidavit that a document belongs to a class or contains information which on grounds of a public interest specified in the affidavit should be withheld from production and discovery, the court may examine the document and order its production and discovery to the parties, subject to such restrictions or conditions as it deems appropriate, if it concludes in the circumstances of the case that the public interest in the proper administration of justice outweighs in importance the public interest specified in the affidavit.

In other words, sir, if a minister or the cabinet decides that a certain document which has been subpoenaed by the court may be injurious to those things, the minister may sign an affidavit, give it to the judge, explain his reasons, and the judge could, and most often does, concur and keep the document secret.

Incidentally, the debate in 1970 centred on this business of federal-provincial relations. Why should the federal government have any secrets about its relationships with the provinces? That was the only thing that seemed to offend our learned friends who participated in the debate at that time. In any case, because of the very unique position the Federal Court has in a democracy, or in a system such as ours, it can make that decision, and the only other person who would know about the contents of that document would, of course, be the judge.

Subsection (2), which was inserted in 1970 and which became law in 1972, states:

(2) When a minister of the Crown certifies to any court by affidavit that the production or discovery of a document or its contents would be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, or to federal-provincial relations, or that it would disclose a confidence of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, discovery and production shall be refused without any examination of the document by the court.

Subsection (2) clearly introduces an entirely new dimension to the relationship between the judiciary and the government, and the judiciary and Parliament. I suggest that this new dimension is extremely and exceedingly dangerous, particularly since it is so open to abuse. It raises suspicion. Too much secrecy always raises suspicion and gives an indication that someone has something to hide. Indeed, I would like to think that we are coming to the end of the era in which the order of the day was secrecy and in which there was a paranoia throughout the land about subversive elements threatening the orderly enforcement of law and the integrity of our system from within.

There is no doubt that much of the feeling of alienation from the truth is now finding expression in terms of separatism and dissent and that events around us in the last few days and which will culminate today in fact are very much attributable to the stubborn, aloof and secretive attitude of the Trudeau government since 1968. In the last few days we have been reaping the harvest of the seeds of suspicion which were sown in the era of the 1970s.

Even though members of the law profession did not speak out when this bill was first introduced and when changes were made and subsection (2) was added to the Federal Court Act, others have. I am drawing on a reference made by one Justice Deschênes who, as hon. members know, heard the case of the two young ladies who were wrongfully dismissed from the Olympic committee during the 1976 Olympics in Quebec. Judge Deschênes had this to say:

Indeed, it is one of the strange contradictions of the Federal Court Act that an act which generally gives the courts greater authority over the excutive branch of government, should at the time show a lack of faith in the integrity of the courts to responsibly adjudicate in all cases on claims of Crown privilege and protect the genuine security interests of the state.

Justice McDonald, who is chief commissioner of the McDonald commission, had similar reservations about section 41(2). He questioned how he could discharge his responsibility if ministers of the Crown forbade him access to important documents which were obviously required by the commission before it could make a judgment with respect to the relationship between the individual, our society and the law.

Let me give a couple of examples of how individuals can be affected by this particular section of the Federal Court Act. I would like to refer briefly to the case of one Walter Rudnicki. This is not the first time that I have mentioned Mr. Rudnicki in the House or the problems he experienced in connection with his dealings with cabinet and which ended up in court. Again it was a case of wrongful dismissal. Mr. Rudnicki eventually won the court action, but the reasons for his dismissal were never made public. I suppose only Mr. Rudnicki, a couple of my colleagues and a number of ministers of the Crown and I know why Mr. Rudnicki was actually fired from the public service. Mr. Rudnicki's name was included on a list of names which was termed "extra-parliamentary opposition". It was a list of people who were considered subversive to our system and who were plotting to replace our represent political system with radical alternatives.

Anyone who knows Mr. Rudnicki or any of the other 21 names mentioned on that list would know that it was just so much nonsense. In fact, Mr. Rudnicki may have been in extra-parliamentary opposition to the then Liberal government, but he was certainly a visible supporter of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. In no way was Mr. Rudnicki planning to replace this system of government with any radical alternatives. Nevertheless, his name was included in this list which a former solicitor general chose to circulate to senior public servants and his colleagues as a means of warning them about Mr. Rudnicki and his tendencies.

As a result Mr. Rudnicki was fired. How was he to clear his name? I have attempted in this House to clear his name and to help him with his plight. I would like to read a short reference to what happened in the House on May 24, 1977. I said:

—during the question period, the term "extra-parliamentary opposition" was first introduced into the records of the House. The then minister of state for urban affairs was questioned about the existence of a blacklist connected with this term. He asserted that the blacklist charge was very serious. Fortunately though, he added, it was without foundation.

On January 24, 1977, I questioned the Prime Minister . . . about the list. He responded by saying, "I have not the slightest idea what the hon. member is talking about". The very next day the Minister of Transport . . . said he had never heard or seen such a list. The President of the Privy Council . . . also pleaded total ignorance. On January 26 the Solicitor General . . . said no such thing existed, nor did it ever exist.

The reason I had asked all these people in succession was because the bottom of the list had indicated that they were the people who were receiving the list when it was first circulated. So all these people knew and, of course, the House knows as well, that the list did exist, that is was not only circulated to those ministers and the Prime Minister and discussed in the cabinet committee on security and intelligence, but that there were literally dozens of lists like it which were not only circulated within the cabinet but within certain departments among senior public servants and which were also given to foreign countries to add to their records on subversives.

How was Rudnicki ever to clear his name? First he would need the money for a lawyer who would then be required to subpoena certain documents and ministers of the Crown to appear in court to show indeed that there was such a list, that his name was on it and that that was the reason for which he was dismissed from the public service.

Of course, there are literally hundreds of such cases to which one could make direct reference. Another such case is that of one Ursula Najder. She fell victim to another secret practice which relates to security clearance of persons who apply for positions in the public service and in some cases in the private sector as well. I would like to quote from a page of a secret document which deals with the practice of security clearance:

Authorities concerned should be aware of the fact that there are certain categories of persons which are not normally clearable, at least beyond the level of CONFIDENTIAL, not because of doubts as to loyalty or reliability but because of circumstances such as:

1.1 close relatives living within the borders of such foreign nations as may cause him to be subjected to intolerable pressures; or

1.2 recent residence (within the past ten years) in foreign countries where no check of activities is possible.

In the case of Ursula Najder, she is a Canadian by birth, but her parents came to Canada from Poland. Ursula Najder still had an aunt in Poland which she had met, I believe, twice in her life. Because she had an aunt in a country in which Canada cannot carry out normal security checks, Ursula Najder, and probably 25 per cent of all Canadians who came from parts of the world where security checks cannot be made, was denied a job with the public service, to which she was entitled.

● (1720)

It goes further because one can be with a firm that has a contract with the federal government having to do with procurement of armaments or whatever. In other words, where a certian degree of secrecy and confidentiality is required. Ursula Najder could not get a job at that private company because the same kind of security clearance applied. How is she to fight for her rights if an effort that she might make before a court could be frustrated simply by the fact that a minister's statement says that a document which she might need to state her case is not available to the court because it is injurious to cabinet secrecy, federal-provincial relations or whatever?

At the outset I said that there appears to be a general inclination to move toward greater freedom of information. It is clear to me that it is essential and necessary—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to have the opportunity of speaking on Bill C-202, to amend the Federal Court Act. I think the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) has brought forth a very timely bill before this House of Commons, one whose substance has been talked about for a considerable period of time. I am disappointed that he could suggest, maybe inadvertently or otherwise, that there are too many lawyers in the House of Commons and none saw fit to bring this bill forward. However, I might point out to him that many lawyers have been working on this problem for a considerable length of time, and as the hon. member knows, because he has looked at the statutes and the cases, there is a great deal of case law on it at the present time which supports something that goes a great deal further than what he has mentioned here in the House today.

This bill proposes to amend section 41 of the Federal Court Act so as to leave with the courts exclusive authority to decide whether documents ought or ought not to be disclosed in the course of litigation when objection is taken to their production on grounds of protecting the interests of the state.

The present provisions of section 41 formed part of the original Federal Court Act enacted in 1970 and were intended to reflect the results of judicial decisions up to that time on so-called Crown privilege. Those decisions made it clear that the judiciary were to be the final arbiters of the public interests involved: that is to say, the courts were able to look at the documents objected to and determine whether the public interest favouring the proper administration of justice on behalf of the litigants was or was not outweighed by the public interest in favour of the interest of the state. This formulation of principle was translated into section 41(1) of the Federal Court Act, as the hon. member knows.

However, those cases also indicated that this general principle perhaps had no application to extremely important state documents dealing with such matters as international relations, matters of defence, cabinet matters and communications between ministers and senior civil servants. The absolute exclusion of documents falling into any of these classes of highly sensitive state information was provided for by section 42(2) of the Federal Court Act, which was read into the record by the hon. member.

In the past few years, subsection (2) in particular has received a good deal of criticism, and rightfully so. One criticism is that the courts are well equipped to balance the public interests at stake and have a traditional role in doing so. The mere fact that the Crown may, on occasion, consider that some documents are more sensitive does not mean that this role should be removed entirely from the judiciary. Adding substance to this criticism is the fact that under these provisions a minister of the Crown is able to deny the courts any authority to look at the documents in issue.

These criticisms have been given additional weight by virtue of recent decisions of the highest courts of the land in Great Britain, the United States and Australia, to name only three countries, which have confirmed that the courts in all cases—and I am sure the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) will be glad to hear this—have the power to examine the documents objected to and to balance the public interests at stake.

At the same time, a good deal of thought and attention was being paid to proposals for freedom of information legislation. While the importance of disclosure is far more important in the case of Crown privilege, access to government documents by members of the public is essential to both. It is not surprising to find that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, of which I was a member along with the hon. member for Saskatoon West, agreed unanimously in its report in June, 1978, that:

> Your committee finds that section 41(2) (of the Federal Court Act) is inconsistent with the principles to be established in a freedom of information statute and therefore recommends that it be repealed.

This more comprehensive approach to dealing with section 41 of the Federal Court Act seems to me to be the wiser course to take and is the one that the government has proposed. In the Speech from the Throne it is stated:

> Members of Parliament, whatever their party, agree on the need to guarantee to Canadians greater access to information of concern to them. Freedom of information legislation will be introduced to provide wide access to government documents. The right accorded to ministers to withold government documents from courts of law under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act will be repealed.

I note that in the statement in the Speech from the Throne it may be considered an inconsistency that it refers only to documents, whereas the present section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act refers to documents or a document or its contents. This may be semantics to some extent, but on the other hand it could be rather important.

I note once again that the member from Saskatoon West referred to a question on section 41 in the House of Commons recently. I do not know whether he was referring to that specific aspect of it, but it could be important. Also when one takes a look at section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, which refers to discovery and production, there is quite a difference between discovery and production in the context of a document or its contents. I merely point that out for hon. members.

As for the substance of the bill now before the House, I believe there are a number of matters which bear comment. First of all, the bill confines itself to disclosure of documents. However, Crown privilege extends to all forms of evidence and, consequently, the bill would retain a limitation already present in section 41. It is for that reason that the proposals in the freedom of information bill of the last Parliament, of which the hon. member who presented this bill was a member, replaced the word "document" with the more general term "information". I think this may be considered very important, particularly since, as I mentioned before, section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act refers to a document or its contents, and now we are talking about a document or information. So this too is an important aspect to be considered.

Secondly, the bill applies only to court actions. The production and discovery of information is, of course, not confined to courts, and in fact there are decisions on the basis of the word "tribunal", which is the term in the French version of section 41, which have held that this provision applies to administrative bodies acting quasi-judicially in the exercise of their power to compel the production of documents. It is because of the doubts and confusion that surround the reference to "court" alone in section 41 that the proposals in the freedom of information bill would use wider language encompassing not only courts but as well all bodies having the power to compel the production of the sort of government information that may require protection from disclosure on the ground of state interest.

Thirdly, the bill would retain the classes of documents listed in section 41(2), which the hon. member and I have read into the record. These have raised so many objections in the past that they must be addressed at this time. It is true that the bill would permit a court to examine the documents in question, but by distinguishing between these special classes of documents and any other public interest of the state, the bill may well be perceived as attempting to make a basic qualitative distinction between the two and unnecessarily favouring documents in the list of classes. It certainly might be suggested that such a distinction would create non-confidence in the courts to recognize the special importance of certain kinds of government information. If the courts of other common law jurisdictions have been able to handle these classes of information without the benefit of special legislation in their favour, it may be asked whether this aspect of the bill is really necessary.

Fourthly, some very real procedural difficulties are ignored in the bill. If, as the case law on section 41 now holds, "court" includes tribunals exercising quasi-judicial powers, it may be asked whether the members of such bodies should have the same powers as the courts to examine such potentially sensitive and injurious information. The same question may be asked about the courts themselves; should a justice of the peace or provincial court judge or magistrate be entrusted with the same powers here as, for example, a superior court judge?

We do not have time to go into all the details and ramifications of that, but it is a serious and important question to be asked, whether in a very simple case before a minor court official such as a justice of the peace or junior magistrate, one should be bringing forth a matter so important that in the past it was considered a matter to be addressed to a supreme court judge.

Whatever the answers to these questions may be, there is also the problem of what procedure ought to be followed if, for example, the trial court or the tribunal orders production. Should not the Crown have the right to pursue the matter on appeal before the document has been disclosed to the parties and to the public thereby nullifying the practical effects of an appeal and, more important, making public some possibly very sensitive information? The bill says nothing about this critical procedural issue.

I would suggest to the hon. member that he might look at this when he is doing further research.

Fifthly, clause 41(1) of the bill appears to be an attempt to codify the rules of disclosure and discovery of documents. It has no equivalent in the present provisions of the act, and for good reason. Such a provision is usually to be found in rules of court where it is subject to a variety of exceptions and to the flexibility that matters of procedure like this must retain. In statutory form and subject only to the exception in subclause (2), this discovery and production provision may well be far more absolute than anyone, including the sponsor of the bill, would wish. For example, is subclause (1) subject to solicitor-client privilege? This is a very important matter.

When we talk about privilege, I note that the province of Newfoundland recognizes the right of religious advisers as well as the question of solicitor-client privilege between a solicitor and client. Quebec gives more extensive protection. Indeed, the code of civil procedure of Quebec grants privilege to clergymen, lawyers, notaries, physicians and dentists. I do not know how far we go in this, but so far Quebec is the only province to go quite that far. Is it subject to other privileges and exceptions in this area? Is it subject to the non-disclosure provisions in other statutes?

It seems to me that this subclause is both dangerous and unwarranted. It adds little or nothing to what the bill seeks to achieve. And it is therefore understandable why no such provision was included either in the present section 41 or in the redrafted version proposed in the freedom of information bill, Bill C-15, in the last Parliament.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest, first, that there are specific aspects of the bill that require a good deal of thought, and, second, that the very limited objectives of the bill have been overtaken by events that require section 41 to be examined in the context of access to government information in general. It was no doubt in recognition of this that the previous government proposed the changes to section 41 which were contained in their freedom of information bill introduced during the last session which certainly went further than the changes proposed in this bill.

On page 31 of Bill C-15 presented by the last government, an act to extend the present laws of Canada that provide access to information under the control of the Government of Canada and to amend the Canada Evidence Act, the Federal Court Act and the Statutory Instruments Act, clause 70 reads:

> Section 41 of the Federal Court Act is repealed.

I note the hon. member does not go that far. This indicates to me he intends to retain section 41(1) and only remove subsection (2) of section 41 of the Federal Court Act. When we look at it from that point of view, it seems that he is not following the present law as enunciated by most of the courts of jurisdiction in the number of countries that I mentioned, and others as well. It certainly does not follow the suggestions made in the Speech from the Throne that I mentioned previously. I am sure it does not comply with the suggestions made by the hon. member's own party.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to say a few words on this bill. At first glance this is a bill which is designed to increase the access of citizens to government information. It is a freedom of information bill, one of a long and honourable series of attempts in this House to open the doors to government files, to shed some light on the information at the government's disposal.

Seen simply as a freedom of information bill, I must say that I and my party are sympathetic to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) and his intentions. If he is joining the long fight to create a right of access for the citizens who pay for government information in the first place, then I congratulate him for joining a most worthy cause, and I welcome him to make further efforts in this direction.

I am happy to point out that the first freedom of information legislation to be introduced to this House was also a private member's bill, brought forward by the New Democratic Party member Barry Mather from New Westminster, in 1965. The torch was thrown to the former hon. member for Peace River, Mr. Baldwin, who kept the issue alive through many years, culminating finally in the introduction of a government bill last year, Bill C-15.

I wish to remind this House that the NDP supported Bill C-15 last November 29, and agreed to a speedy second reading so that the bill could quickly go to committee for further study. We had many reservations about the details of the bill. The exemptions were drafted too broadly, for example, and needed to be tightened up. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), said that you could drive a truck through some of the loopholes in Bill C-15 and that this must be rectified. But we supported the principle nevertheless, and that is why I congratulate the hon. member for his sentiments in introducing a bill along the same general lines.

I well remember that night in the House of Commons during the first session of Parliament that I had the privilege to attend. For me it was one of the highlights of that session. It was an exciting moment when the then hon. member for Peace River demonstrated to me and a lot of other new members the force of a member who has an idea and the willingness and perseverance to follow it through. On that occasion he spoke eloquently about his fight in this matter and stated that that probably was the last piece of legislation with which he would be involved. That, historically, proved correct as the House came down within a matter of days.

We believe that any move which will foster the exposure of the truth in society is beneficial. Whether we are are defending a free press, free speech, or free access to government information, we are defending the cause of truth. In this particular area, my experience living and working in many other countries makes me realize that this is one of the key issues involving the whole question of a person's rights. Truth, simply put, makes people free, if it is truth total and whole. However, when legislation, whatever kind it may be, is used in such a way to hold back total and complete truth, instead of making people free what happens is that they become slaves, and the power that is given over the those in charge takes away the freedom of individuals. I have seen that happen.

The legislation proposed in Bill C-202 before the House this afternoon is not exactly what we had in mind for freedom of information legislation for this country. The bill attempts to do through the back door what Bill C-15 would have done through the front door. It is half a step toward freedom of information. Actually it is less than half a step. And for that reason I have my doubts about the bill. We believe that the issues should be faced squarely in a separate freedom of information act, not in an amendment to the Federal Court Act. We expect the new government to honour its commitment given in the throne speech to introduce a freedom of information bill in this session. I am surprised that it has not been introduced already. I do expect it soon. At that time we can get down to the serious business of working out the precise wording of the new law. I am sure that all parties welcome the chance to pick up where we left off last fall.

Part of the new legislation will have to deal with section 41 of the Federal Court Act. There is no doubt that section 41 needs to be changed. At present it is an unwarranted hindrance to the rights of litigators. It is an affront to our belief that citizens should have access to government information with only the narrowest of exceptions. But to amend section 41 right now in the absence of a comprehensive freedom of information act makes no sense. It is not just litigators who should have a right to access but all citizens regardless of the purpose for which they would use the information sought. An amendment such as the one proposed in the bill before us is more likely to hinder full freedom of information than to help it, and for that reason I doubt the wisdom of introducing it at this time.

Bill C-15 of last year simply repealed section 41 of the Federal Court Act. No section was to be substituted, it was just scratched. I like this approach. Once the rights of all citizens are decided in a freedom of information act, then the rights of litigators before the Federal Court fall into place. This is fair and just, and I support the approach taken by Bill C-15 in this regard.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Would the hon. member accept a question? He states quite categorically that in Bill C-15 which was being presented by the former government, section 41 of the Federal Court Act would be repealed. But has he looked at the rest of the bill to determine whether some aspects of that section creep back into the bill through the back door?

Mr. Ogle: I believe that is possible and that the section will creep back in. But I think a serious study of the bill in committee by all parties with an open mind would ensure proper handling of that kind of thing. The hon. member's former colleague from Peace River, Mr. Baldwin, proposed a slightly different approach to section 41. But he, too, would have made a freedom of information act paramount.

The hon. member's proposal would put the courts in a difficult spot. In every case they would become embroiled in substantive questions of freedom of information law and procedure. This would slow down the court process and confuse the issues. We say that the question of what government documents a citizen should get is a prior question which should be decided by an over-all freedom of information act, not on an individual basis in the course of each trial.

In some other respects, I disagree with the approach taken by the bill before the House. For example, in subclause (2)(b) the words "national security" appear. What is meant by national security? I could speak at length about that particular phraseology as it is understood in some other countries where everything that happens finally comes under some form of national security, and human rights of all kinds disappear as this notion of national security is interpreted by those in charge of law making and the courts. I am sure these words will be used as a pretext by government and the courts for withholding all sorts of information which should rightly be in the public domain.

The danger of using words such as "national security" has been clearly set out by Professor Murray Rankin in a paper entitled "Freedom of Information in Canada; Will The Doors Stay Shut?" I agree that the words "national security" should not be used; a tighter definition must be presented which will safeguard the public's right to know. That is what I and my party stand for—a complete freedom of information act which will guarantee truth for all at all times.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be brief. I listened with interest to participation by the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), and to the response of the parliamentary secretary which, frankly, raised some question in my mind with respect to the government's intention with regard to its commitments made in the Speech from the Throne.

I commend the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), that great centre of all good, truth and justice, for his comments and his support for the principle of freedom of information. The hon. member referred to the fact that he had lived in a number of countries around the world where information of any sort is hard to come by. He has experienced at first hand some political regimes in which there is denial of the right of individual citizens to obtain information from government. I am sure it was by inadvertance that the hon. member omitted to tell us that he now resides in the province of Saskatchewan. We know the position which has been taken by the provincial government of that province when requested to bring in freedom of information legislation. They unanimously refused to follow that course of action. So I am sure he and I will work together in Saskatoon to prevail upon the provincial government, the NDP government there, to bring in freedom of information legislation, because they are among the last hold-outs in terms of such legislation in Canada. The policy of the government there is against the concept of freedom of information. So I look forward to joining arms with the hon. member and facing the challenge of bringing truth, justice and right thinking to the government of Saskatchewan in this area. I know I will have his unqualified support.

My reason for entering this debate, though, is the response given by the parliamentary secretary with respect to the particular initiative upon which I commend my hon. friend. The fact is, he has been vigilant and insistent in his support of the principle of freedom of information. He has been trying to bring about amendments to the Federal Court Act, to section 41 and to section 41(2) in particular.

When we recall the wording of the Speech from the Throne we are reminded there was a paragraph in part four about strengthening national institutions. I want to quote from that particular section of the speech in which the government, through the Governor General, stated that "the right accorded to ministers to withhold government documents from courts of law under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act will be removed." As I understand it, that was an unqualified commitment on the part of the government. However, I got the impression from the parliamentary secretary that a different approach might now be taken and that perhaps a reversal of that position might be expected—that rather than removing this right from ministers the government is considering amending the provisions of section 41(2) because of considerations which have occurred to them subsequent to the preparation of the Speech from the Throne and that the intent of the commitment might not be followed through.

I hope that that is not going to be the case, and I am very interested in finding out whether we now have a departure, so soon after April 14, 1980, by this government, having regard to the fact that in the House of Commons in the course of question periods the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and, in fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself at other times, have indicated that freedom of information is the prime commitment of this government and that the operation of government is going to proceed, until that legislation is brought forward, on the basis that the principles of freedom of information will be observed. I take it impliedly that the commitment with respect to the right of ministers to withhold documents from courts will also be observed by this government.

I have raised in the House of Commons the case in which, shortly after the new government was sworn in, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) invoked the provisions of this particular section to withhold documents from an inquiry in the Federal Court before Mr. Justice Gibson with respect to the policies and practices of the Canadian Dairy Commission.

What concerns me about this—and I take no issue with the idea that freedom of information and the provisions of the Federal Court Act are necessarily associated—and what I would like to find out today, is whether or not the government is in fact retreating from the commitment made in the Speech from the Throne because, if that is the case, we are going to have a battle royal in this House on the basis of one of the greatest reversals in policy on a matter of fundamental importance, that we have seen for many years in the House of Commons. I think it is unacceptable for the government now to try to change its position.

I simply make these comments, and if we want to have an indication now by the government that in fact—

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has gone on at great length about the government's changing its position. Let me assure the hon. member that the government has not changed its position one iota from that stated in the Speech from the Throne.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would entertain a point of order, but that is mostly an argument or point of debate with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): I thought he was asking me a question and wanted a reply.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak any longer on this because I trust that the parliamentary secretary is in fact stating the position here, but the legalistic explanation he gave with respect to the position of the government relating to this issue struck me as very much an explanation of a change of position and a weaseling out of a commitment which was quite unequivocal in the Speech from the Throne.

I want this matter to come to a vote so that we can find out where people stand with respect to the provisions of the Federal Court Act. I am going to conclude my remarks now, but I simply put the government on notice that if there is any intention of fiddling around or fooling around with respect to the commitments made in the Speech from the Throne, the government will have to justify that on the floor of the House, and it is in for a very substantial opposition from this party.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for—is it Saskatchewan East or Saskatchewan West? I am not certain. It used to be Saskatchewan-Biggar, I believe. Saskatoon, I am sorry.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not normally do so. I am not sensitive to the situation, but just on a question of geography, Saskatchewan is the province and Saskatoon is a city in the province. The hon. member is quite right, but it is Saskatoon West and Saskatoon East.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his lesson in geography and for having situated me in the right city which he obviously shares with the hon. member for Saskatchewan East.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Daudlin: Saskatoon East. I have done it again!

Mr. Knowles: It is too bad you fellows do not know about western Canada.

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is an able parliamentarian who has attempted in the last ten minutes to create a subterfuge and a nest from which he hopes to be able to launch an application now. He hopes to launch outside this House, and perhaps from within this House, an application in terms of trying to set up all kinds of fear and trepidation with respect to what it is the government may or may not want to do.

The intention of the government is quite clear to anyone who chooses to read the throne speech to which the hon. member for Saskatoon West refers. It states quite clearly and categorically that section 41(2) in fact is to be repealed.

What the hon. member now is attempting to create by referring to anything the parliamentary secretary has said beforehand, I suggest without trying to cast any aspersions on the hon. member's motives, is a complete subterfuge and a complete embroiling of the facts to the point where he is going to have the opportunity now to suggest that there is some basis for putting the position he tried to put in the last ten minutes.

The government has said quite clearly, quite unequivocally, and without any retraction whatsoever this afternoon by the parliamentary secretary or any other government member, in question periods or otherwise, that in fact the government intends to proceed with the freedom of information bill. I, like the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), look forward to the introduction of that bill at an early date. It is my information that in fact that will take place and that in fact the government intends to repeal—I think that is the correct word—and not remove section 41(2) without any suggestion that we are going to carry on with some other type or form of section 41(2). That, quite frankly, was the difficulty I was having with Bill C-202 this afternoon.

With a clear indication on the record through the throne speech that we are moving to repeal section 41(2), through a private members' bill we now appear to be moving not toward a repeal absolutely but, rather, a repeal with a replacement. I, as well as the hon. member for Saskatoon West, have practised before the courts, and they have the habit—indeed, the chore—after this place has created a point of legislation, to spend the next few years trying to determine what we as legislators really meant and to create what will be the law for all practical purposes once we have passed it.

I would not want—

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) if he would permit a very short question.

Mr. Daudlin: Certainly.

Mr. Oberle: I would just like to ask the hon. member what he sees the difference to be between my Bill C-202 and the statement in the throne speech that the right accorded to ministers to withhold government documents from courts of law under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act will be removed. If it is the intention to repeal, as the hon. member chooses to describe it, section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, why does the hon. member not sit down and let us get it over with?

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member anticipates me. If he would just sit in his place for a moment or two, I would be very glad to show what I anticipate and what I see as the distinction between what he is doing and what the government might or might not propose to do as the matter comes forward.

Mr. Knowles: There is only one minute left.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Question.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I believe, as does the hon. member for Saskatoon East, that the intent of any freedom of information legislation is something which all hon. members in this House have already indicated, either by themselves or through their colleagues, as something we all wish and desire.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MUNICIPAL GRANT ACT, 1980

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-4, respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock p.m., the motion for second reading of Bill C-4, respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes, was under consideration and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) had the floor.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House will agree with me when I say that today is probably one of the major historic evenings in the history of Canada. I think I am fairly safe in saying now that the No vote will win, which will mean that there will be future talks relating to confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: One of the things about which we must be very cautious—and I have to caution the government on this—is that the government must be much more sensitive in the future than it has in the past because many of the problems that Canada and Canadians have had over the past several years have come as a result of an insensitive administration. You cannot ride roughshod over a people or a region, and I hope that in any talks that will be held in the future, consideration will be given to the manner in which our government will be operated on the three levels of administration.

Today the debate has to do primarily with the municipal level or the third level of administration. We must realize that this level of government is much closer to the people than either of the other two levels, and therefore I feel that consideration must be given to that body of people which operates within that sphere. I do not think the federal government has been particularly careful so far as the municipal level is concerned and so far as taxation is concerned. I recognize that the bill has to do with government institutions and, as I mentioned earlier, so far as jails are concerned those institutions take away a great deal of the tax base on which rural municipalities rely.

As I said earlier, prior to the private members' hour, taking that base away from the municipal bodies means that they have less money on which to function when the federal government does not pay its share. I also feel at this time that we should give some consideration to Crown corporations, and I would like to take a few moments to deal with one of those Crown corporations, namely, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have a notice of motion before the House. I do not know whether or not there will be an opportunity to debate it, but I would like to bring it to the attention of the House at this time. It reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of increasing the grants made to municipalities in lieu of property taxes for the use of property by Crown corporations and agencies so that these grants equal the sums paid by private organizations.

We have a case in my constituency where the CBC is in competition with two other private bodies. The private bodies have to pay the assessed rate of tax and, at the same time, in paying their taxes, they subsidize their competitor, which in this case is the CBC. Also, the CBC does not have to pay its fair share of the taxes, or an equal portion of the taxes that these other private companies have to pay. In this case, according to the assessment, the CBC should be paying $4,480.53. What are they paying? They are paying $617.92. To me, that is not justice. I took this case up with the CBC, and on November 2 of last year I sent a memo to the corporation. This is the question I asked:

> Has the CBC legislated authority to establish its corporate policy, or is it obliged to abide by rates of other radio stations in the same locality?

This is the answer I got:

> In response to your memorandum of November 2, I am pleased to forward to you, the following information.

● (2010)

> The CBC, a Crown corporation, is exempt from municipal property taxation. In 1951, the federal government decided to compensate municipalities, by way of grants in lieu of taxes, for the fact that federal government properties were exempt from taxation, but the resulting Municipal Grants Act (1951) excluded the CBC.
> In 1957, the board of directors of the CBC adopted a resolution to pay grants in lieu of taxes in a manner similar to the terms of the Municipal Grants Act.
> There is legislated authority to exempt the CBC from paying anything in lieu of taxes, but CBC policy does permit a grant on the assessed value of land, buildings and heating plant only. In accordance with the terms of the act, movable property such as the tower and equipment would be excluded from the assessment.
> There does not seem to be much that can be done in this situation, but I am enclosing a number of newspaper clippings from the Library of Parliament to give you some background on how similar problems have been confronted in other areas.

This communication was signed by Kay Marshall.

In these clippings from the Library of Parliament I find that this problem goes back to 1974. After six years of debate, confrontation and requests, surely the government should be able to deal with this situation and come to grips with it. I say the government must be sensitive in this particular area. I believe this is one of the main ones, primarily because of the fact that rural municipalities are deprived of the taxation base that is theirs and should be theirs, one which I think they are justified in expecting to receive, and are not. In whatever talks, debates or discussions take place in the future, I would hope that consideration is given to this so that these municipalities can have their fair share.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose all of us are debating this bill on an evening when the attention of the Canadian public is directed elsewhere to momentous events which are occurring in one of our provinces. I think all of us who watched the results coming in on television were gratified with the results thus far in the referendum in the province of Quebec.

There seems to be a large commitment on behalf of the people of Quebec, at least at this stage of the proceedings, to the idea of federalism. Perhaps it is important that there be that kind of commitment. I suppose it would not be found out of favour with Mr. Speaker if I said, at this point in time, that this large commitment by the province of Quebec to federalism has its counter engagement with respect to a great commitment that is expected of the rest of Canada regarding renewed federalism. I suspect when the results come in, if the present trend holds, that the people of Quebec will be looking to the rest of Canada to ask them about what is their commitment to renewed federalism. They will be looking to the premiers who have spoken so importantly about renewed federalism. They will be looking to the members of this House of Commons who have spoken in the course of debate and talked about the importance of renewed federalism.

We must make no mistake; the results tonight are important to this country. While they are important to the country, there is a much greater period of time ahead of us in terms of perhaps constitutional change and certainly of renewed federalism that will be of far more significance in the long run to the future of Canada, and that is the relationship among the governments of this country in the years to come.

When I rise to speak for the first time this session in debate on a major bill in the House of Commons, though I have been on my feet from time to time, I must take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate Madam Speaker on her ascension to the chair. I have enjoyed working with her in the course of my duties as House leader. Also I have enjoyed working with you, Mr. Speaker. We share neighbouring ridings; we share many of the same problems. I hope Mr. Speaker will forgive me if, in the course of the debate, I quote some of your words to the government with respect to the issue before us and perhaps one other issue with which we might be dealing later on in the evening.

I am very pleased to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) in the House tonight. It is a refreshing change to have a minister of the Crown staying in the House while his or her bill is being debated. It may be because the minister got his early training in municipal politics, which is a very demanding field. I do not agree very often with the things the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does, but I think it is important that the Minister of Public Works has some municipal background.

While this bill certainly affects municipalities all across the country, it has a profound effect upon one municipality directly in this area. It is a municipality which I do not represent. In part it is represented by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), in part by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), and in part by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), but it has a spin-off effect on the municipalities which I represent. So, it is important in that area.

I think it is rather appropriate that a former municipal politician who came to his senses and came into the relatively easy field of federal politics is piloting this bill through the House of Commons. I say that in the best of faith. I have never served in the municipal field. There are some members in this House who will say, "Thank God for that". But I served in another way when I had the privilege of practising law in this area. I acted for a large number of municipalities locally. I saw the pressures to which municipal politicians are subject, very direct pressures with respect to a minimum amount of financial clout in terms of the ability to raise the money themselves, a great dependence on the provinces, tremendous problems which have to be solved, and a very difficult job of priorizing.

This bill which will provide additional moneys to 2,000 municipalities in this country will be extremely helpful. As I say, I think this bill is important, and I think it is quite fitting that this bill should be introduced by a politician who came into public life via the municipal field.

I do not want to be partisan, because people know I am not partisan by nature. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier is sitting across the way. He knows me not to be a partisan person. But I must remind the House of some of the history of this legislation. When the present Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) was minister of finance back in the Thirtieth Parliament, a similar bill to this one was numbered C-46. That is a long way down the pecking order. It is getting close to the numbering system we use for private bills in this House. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, as he then was, or the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, as he now is, together asked question after question in the House as to when they would bring forward this legislation. Nothing happened, except that the bill was introduced. I do not believe it was even debated in the Thirtieth Parliament.

Then came the Clark government. The Clark government had as its minister of finance a man of extreme kindness, understanding and concern, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He was prevailed upon with respect to the importance of this kind of legislation for local government, the kind of government which I described as having a great part of the burden to bear in terms of the difficult job of priorizing—priorizing the use of funds in an area of diminishing returns. As a result of the priority he put on it, lo and behold, in the Thirty-first Parliament with the Clark government that bill ascended in the pecking order and became Bill C-3.

I want to thank the hon. member for St. John's West for giving it that priority, because he gave some leadership in respect of the problem of the financing of municipalities. He gave some leadership to the extent that this reincarnated government we have before us in this Thirty-second Parliament has numbered this bill C-4. That is a great improvement. It is an improvement of ten times, from C-46 to C-4. We are now debating this bill and hopefully we will see it through the second reading stage in a relatively short period so that it can be studied by the committee and eventually passed.

This is the kind of legislation which recognizes the importance of local government, and recognizes its financial inadequacies from time to time having regard to the mandate it has. Unfortunately this delay from the Thirtieth Parliament to today has caused Canadian municipalities to lose the benefit of this legislation, from the time it was first mooted as important and accepted as a commitment by the Liberal government which preceded this one. I say this to you in historical terms. It is an important piece of legislation and we are happy to see it here.

I do not have to stress to the Minister of Public Works the tremendous costs involved in providing services to government buildings, and providing services generally in communities, especially a community like the one I represent, and there are others across the country in equal shape.

When you look at the scope of the bill you see that it updates the Municipal Grants Act under which the government now pays, I think, $148 million each year in grants on federal properties located in about 2,000 municipalities. These grants will be increased by $25.5 million during a four-year phase period starting this year. The coverage is extensive. It covers such things, as far as we are concerned, as Parliament Hill, as the National Library and Archives, the National Arts Centre, the National Gallery, and the National Museum, all of which are in Ottawa. It covers a whole host of defence and other installations all across this country, from Greenwood and Shearwater on the one end and Victoria on the other end of Canada. This is truly a good piece of legislation.

I am a little bit worried about the exclusions in the bill. I say to the minister, with respect, that I am concerned about the exclusions, and the arguments put forward for excluding such things as parklands, Indian reserves, and what he described as structures, and concerned to the extent that they are excluded from this bill on the basis set forth by that magnificent and generous former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West.

The grounds were, of course, that they were excluded because of the nature of the items, and because the local cost of providing services is minimal. However, to the extent that services are provided by local municipalities to these kind of installations, even those that may be described as minimal, there is a withdrawal of the ability of the federal government to contribute to the cost of local government.

I feel that while we can regard this bill as the second word, the first word having occurred some 22 years ago when the first bill came forward, I do not think we can say we have reached the end of the road in terms of the generosity of the federal government. We should regard this bill as the second word in respect of municipal grants legislation, but we anticipate as we go ahead that we will hear the third word, which will involve greater coverage of these structures; jetties, canal locks, aircraft runways, and a number of other things which do impact upon the finances that a municipality has to carry out its mandate.

There are some who say the national capital is a very fortunate area, and I think it is really quite a fortunate part of Canada. Those of us who live in it are grateful, quite frankly, for the fact that it is such a fortunate part of Canada. This is a unique city. The city of Ottawa, the national capital area generally, is unique because it is the national capital. As a national capital it has to exhibit some of the nation. The nation is not all government; there is industrial and business development that ought to be encouraged in the national capital area.

It is a fact, and I think you know this, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will go a long way to ameliorate the differential in municipal tax rates which has been in place for some period of time. There has been some difficulty in attracting to Ottawa some of the diversification potential that must occur if this city is not only to be a microcosm of Canada, as Mr. Danson once described it, or what it should be on the one hand, and an area that provides a variety of employment for young people, on the other hand.

As a result of this differential that has existed, there has been a great tendency to rely on the federal government as the sole employer. I know there is high technology industry developing here. This bill will make it attractive to other people to come here because the tax differential will be right and we can do some work on direct air connection to Chicago, New York and Boston, and a few other things such as that which would not cost the federal government any money. We can perhaps consider at some stage upgrading the Ottawa International Airport. The Minister of Public Works might consider that as being helpful in enhancing this place as the national capital.

By and large this bill in terms of its area of potential is important for local government. Some people in local government say it is not enough. I would be inclined to agree that anyone who represents an area that is getting the benefit would say it is not enough, but it is a good beginning. I think the minister should be commended for bringing it forward once again and for giving it such high priority. It is something that the commercial and industrial corporations in the Ottawa area, the Board of Trade, the Nepean Chamber of Commerce, the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton and others have been seeking for some considerable time.

There is a hang-up about this legislation, and that is the term "business tax". Members have spoken about it, and I think we are hung up on the language. If it were called anything else but business tax this government and the experts of the Department of Finance, some of whom are here tonight, might be able to take a different view of it. I would hope they could, and I am looking to them and entreating them to take a different view.

There are services that are provided by a municipality which are not covered by the general tax rate levied against the property. There are, in fact, even departments of government which, under some examination, might be deemed to be carrying on a business. Certainly Crown corporations do, and there is a differential in regard to businesses being carried on by the government through Crown corporations and those in the private sector, as some hon. members have shown.

If the federal government is going to carry its full load, then we have to look at the operations of departments. If there is a hang-up in government in considering a contribution toward what would otherwise be called "business tax", in order that it is carrying its full load in all municipalities, not just this one, then let us take a look at some other semantic. Let us not be hung up on that phrase "business tax", so that we will be considering increasing the contribution to the municipal good will as a result of the service which must be supplied to government and which government should pay for just like everyone else.

I hope that at the committee stage of this bill the municipal leaders and organizations in Canada will be called by the committee to come and review the bill. I do not think that consideration should be long, but I do think that Parliament should have the best advice it can get from the people who deal with the municipal problems, to see whether any of the matters which were discussed and which were important at an earlier stage have changed and whether there are not new considerations involved of a different nature. In this way the government will know the general feeling with respect to this bill, and when it contemplates further legislation, that further legislation will be as up to date as the public purse will allow, and the municipalities will have the benefit of the government carrying the freight.

I would like to talk for a moment about the good fortune which I feel and which every person who lives in this area feels because of the presence of the federal government in the area. Not only is it a place for employment, but the federal government, through the auspices and good will of the people of Canada, has contributed a great deal to the development of this city and the area.

I have never met a group which has come to visit Ottawa and the Parliament Buildings to which I have not expressed my thanks as a resident of the area. These are the people who foot the bill to a great extent for what we as residents have here and what members of Parliament who come to this city enjoy. It is a city of amenities, the likes of which are provided nowhere else. On either side of the Ottawa River these amenities can be found. There is the tremendous parkway system on the Ontario side and the magnificent Gatineau Park on the Quebec side. These developments did not come out of the federal government alone. They were contributed to by the taxpayers from across this country.

The Minister of Public Works has a tremendous responsibility, as the minister who answers in this House of Commons for the National Capital Commission, to continue the work which was begun with the planning of Mr. Greber. Prime ministers have also shown an interest in the national capital area. The prime minister who took perhaps the greatest interest at the outset was Mackenzie King. That interest has been taken up by successive prime ministers who were interested in the development of a national capital. The Right Hon. John Diefenbaker during his government in 1958 brought in the National Capital Commission Act. This is a fact which none of us should forget. It declared the area on both sides of the Ottawa River to be the national capital region.

The British North America Act was not changed, the area was simply declared as the national capital region. As a result of this declaration the government was in a position to make tremendous contributions to the development of a system of amenities on this and the other side of the river which all of us enjoy. I hope the Minister of Public Works will consider, in his capacity as chairman of the National Capital Commission, that while there seems to be fairly good co-operation between the local government and the federal government agencies at the staff level, somehow or other at the policy level the consultative atmosphere is not as good as it should be. I do not know where to assess the blame, nor do I think that it is the job of any of us to assess the blame, but it is a fact which exists.

It would be in the best interests of the federal government, of the local government, and in the best interests of planning, development, and the future of the national capital, if the minister gave earnest consideration to a proposal which was first put forward by a member from our side, Mrs. Jean Pigott, when she was the member for Ottawa-Carleton, with regard to membership on the National Capital Commission of the chairmen of the two regional municipalities on either side of the river. Whether we are talking about the development of a tax policy, a sharing policy, or whatever it is, those people from across this country who are commissioners would have the advice of those local people. I hope that this idea will be considered.

There is a tremendous regulatory process in this piece of legislation, as there is in every piece of legislation that seems to be brought forward by successive governments. I hope, as regulations are made, as new regulations are promulgated to replace those that are made, and as the process goes on, that before regulations take effect they will be published in The Canada Gazette in advance for the benefit of those groups, associations, municipal governments and others which will be affected.

However, well meaning public servants may be, however well meaning ministries or ministers may be, slips can happen and misjudgments can be made. It serves the process well if, before a regulation takes effect, the government will publish it well in advance. This would be very helpful in the development of the process. There are tremendous areas of land to be developed. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier mentioned LeBreton Flats with regard to the development and what might be done with the funding that would be available to the local municipality. I have some views, as I am sure you do, Mr. Speaker, on LeBreton Flats with regard to the use of that land. There will be differences of opinion, both locally and federally.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier also mentioned the development of Fournier Park in Hull and the Woodroffe demonstration project in our own area. There have been great negotiations between the federal government and the local government on this project. The federal government was represented by CMHC. The matter now seems to be in trouble. There is even some talk that the land will go to a private developer. I hope that that is the last thing that will happen to that property. I hope that that property stays within the public domain. To repeat it so that the minister understands my view, I hope that that property stays within the public domain, unless there is no alternative to that development. There are residents living close to that development who are counting on the land use remaining the same in terms of the future. It is a very important piece of property.

Later on we will be considering the relocation legislation. The federal government should take a look at that piece of property at the corner of Woodroffe and Baseline in terms of a federal development on that land. I suggest to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), who was in the House a moment ago, that I have always felt that that property would be a good spot for a new taxation data centre. Everyone knows that the present facility for Revenue Canada at Confederation Heights is overutilized. I knew that when I was minister, and we were considering a place to put that data centre. That property is one good place which ought to be considered. Such a commitment to that valuable piece of property would be in keeping with the whole development of that area, the western parkway, and a whole host of other areas. Incidentally, it would improve the assessment base in the local municipality.

There is no job more difficult than satisfying the conflicting demands of various organizations which are put upon the Minister of Public Works, particularly in an area which is perhaps over governed in terms of levels of government. I sympathize with the minister completely. The minister has taken some of the burden off the local government sector through this piece of legislation. I wish that this legislation could have been introduced earlier, but now that it is here in the House I think that it should be supported and that it should go very quickly to committee where it can be dealt with in detail.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity that I have had to participate in the deliberations of this House. I would like to preface my remarks by first congratulating Madam Speaker on her election as Speaker, and yourself and your other colleagues on your appointments.

Second, I would like to inform hon. gentlemen opposite who are displaying anxiety symptoms about post-referendum Canada that the administration and party with the courage and conviction to fight and win the referendum will display the intellect and sensitivity necessary for successful constitutional reform.

I am pleased at this time to rise in support of Bill C-4 because I endorse the principles which have shaped it, namely, the expansion of the numbers and types of federal properties which will generate grant revenue for municipalities, the redefinition of the granting formula to approximate more closely the revenues which would have been generated by taxes on those properties, the creation of guidelines for Crown corporations to make them more sensitive to the demands of their respective municipal environments, the transfer of authority for these aforementioned responsibilities to the Ministry of Public Works, the speedy implementation by the federal government of the majority of the proposed reforms within the year and all of the reforms within four years, and most important, the funnelling of more money, approximately $25 million, to a level of government whose services to all its constituents, governmental, business and residential, are as important as they are costly.

My support is not unequivocal. There are reservations. The definition of grant revenue properties may have to be expanded further. Grant rates might have to be increased and the retention of the arbitration authority by the federal government should be reinvestigated, for I believe a party to a dispute should not be permitted ultimately to settle a dispute.

These are matters of substance or content which will be properly and thoroughly reviewed by the appropriate standing committee, and should not deter any member from supporting this bill this afternoon and evening.

In conclusion, this bill has been before the House on three separate occasions within a short span of one and one-half years. Anything that can be said about it has been said. Let us not delay any longer. It deserves the speedy and unanimous support of this House.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. First, I want to deal with the principle very quickly and, second, I want to deal with a couple of details contained within the bill.

I do not know why it is that we perpetuate a system that places the Crown in a different position from the public. I do not know why we have not adopted recommendations made years ago to allow for tax to be levied against buildings owned by the Crown, whether owned federally or provincially, and the tax therefore to be paid in the same way as all other taxes are paid. Also, a problem tends to arise in municipalities with regard to accurate assessment of Crown-owned buildings. There is also the power that is used by the government in this bill of setting out the exemptions on which it will not pay tax.

It is interesting that the government decides that, for whatever reason, it just simply will not pay a grant for certain kinds of structures. That, of course, makes me wonder what would happen if some private individual were to build a similar structure. The individual would be taxed and would have to pay the tax. I do not quite understand why the Crown takes a different position.

I can remember when Chief Justice McRuer studied the property tax system in the province of Ontario and made many recommendations, many of which dealt with the right of the municipality to expect to derive revenues from all of the buildings and structures within its bounds, whether they be owned privately or publicly. I ask the minister to respond if he would agree. By doing so, the minister will save me from going through a long series of questions in the committee if he could respond or even hear what I am saying with regard to one clause of the bill which befuddles me. I do not understand why it says in clause 2(2)(k):

except where otherwise prescribed, any real property leased to or occupied by a person or a body, whether incorporated or not, that is not a department is exempt. I do not see how it fits and I do not know how it could be interpreted because it is open to such wide interpretation. If the minister could take a moment and look at that clause, perhaps in his closing remarks, if he intends to make any, he might address himself to what exactly that means. That gives considerable power, to the minister and to the Crown, power to rule out many of the things that may well have been included in some of the preceding sections.

As other members have said, and it is a point I meant to make on rising that I did not make, there is a tendency on the part of everyone—I share it as much as anyone else—to feel somewhat elated at the train of events and the obvious victory of the No forces in the province of Quebec this evening. However, I do want to offer a caution. The caution is this: there were a very large number of people in the province of Quebec tonight who voted Yes. We must, therefore, make an extra special effort to find out what it is about the federal system which has made those people feel that it would be appropriate for Quebec to have a degree of sovereignty, if not total sovereignty. I applaud the No side, and I supported it all the way through, but I am going to suggest that we must be very cautious. When 40 per cent of any group are so dissatisfied as to opt for the Yes side of the question, that is Yes to separation, then there is something dramatically wrong.

An hon. Member: Separation?

Mr. Deans: Yes, separation, and we have to take a serious look at why some people opted for that side.

That aside, I say to the minister—and I have been listening and taking part in the debate—

Mr. Crosby: That is probably why they voted that way.

Mr. Deans: No, I suspect not. I think they probably voted that way because of the record of the Conservative and Liberal administrations over the years.

In any event, I want to ask the minister whether he could address himself to the question as to why it is that we feel it necessary to impose a grant structure when, in fact, direct taxation would be much more sensible and much less cumbersome. The Crown would then have to go through the same procedures as everyone else in dealing with any disputes. It would be required to go through with due process in determining whether or not the taxes being levied were fair, and it would not sit both in judgment and as a taxpayer at the same time. That is a point the minister might consider in some future legislation.

Also, perhaps he could consider the areas in the bill where there are to be exemptions. Some of the exemptions make no sense. If someone else were to build storage tanks on a piece of real property, the individual would pay tax. If someone else were to put in a swimming pool on a piece of real property, that individual would pay tax. Similarly, if a person were to build a snow shed on a piece of real property, that person would pay tax. I suggest to the minister that he take another look at some of the exemptions. I think the exemptions in fact probably speak to a large number of real property questions and areas, where there are buildings used for the purpose that this bill is intended to encompass and incorporate, that will be exempted.

I also want to say to the minister that he should bear in mind that such things as conveyor belts and conveyance systems should be given careful consideration. As he well knows, they are used extensively in the mining industry. It is entirely possible that they are the only valuable part of the development that takes place. To exempt them under a piece of legislation such as this really does not make a lot of sense for some northern communities in which they might be situated. If the minister could give some thought to these few comments, I could feel better about the bill in general.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I suppose we all realize that the eyes of the nation are not upon us this evening, but I am sure we all rejoice in the results that we are watching over television; 60 per cent for the No and 40 per cent for the Yes. I think the caution mentioned by the member from the NDP who just resumed his seat about the 40 per cent who are discontented has to be borne in mind. There can be no further delay in coming to grips with the problems of this country.

It is appropriate, nonetheless, that we should be discussing this bill tonight. It is one of those bills that ought to have been dealt with many, many moons ago. I understand this is the third time it has been before this House. Had it been dealt with earlier and been given a higher priority, it is quite possible that that 40 per cent would have been even lower, because we are dealing with something that is very close to the people who have to pay municipal taxes and those who run the municipalities, the mayors and the councillors. Therefore, while we may not be the main focus of attention this evening, we are dealing with a matter which is fundamental to the issue that is being determined now in the province of Quebec.

I stand this evening because in the riding that I represent there are a number of federal establishments. They are worth mentioning. Some of them are known right across this land and some are of a more local nature. HMCS Esquimalt is one. The western naval base is the one that is perhaps best known. There is also an oceanograhic institute of much more recent establishment on Patricia Bay. I suppose the national observatory is one of the oldest establishments on the Saanich peninsula. The forest products laboratory is also a federal institution, as is the airport, the experimental farm, and the Work Point barracks.

All of these occupy lands in one or the other of the five municipalities which comprise the riding of Esquimalt-Saanich. Therefore, the municipal authorities in my area are very, very much reliant upon the grants in lieu taxes that are paid into the municipal treasuries for the financing of municipal works.

Royal Roads used to be in my riding, a magnificent park, now the Western College, a military college for all services, which held its graduating ceremonies only last week end. That is an unorganized territory.

There are one or two matters related to this bill that I feel I ought to bring to the minister's attention. One of them has been the delays that have occurred in the payments of the grants in lieu of taxes. On more than one occasion I have had to make representations to one department or another because the municipality has been in touch with me, frantically indicating that it was notified nine months ago that the grants were due and there had been no sign whatsoever of those grants showing up. The bills still keep rolling into the municipalities inevitably. Therefore, while this is a more generous extension of grants in lieu of taxes, I hope that this other matter, not just the generosity but the timeliness of the payments, will be taken into account by the minister. I hope I can get that assurance from him when he stands up to conclude debate on this bill.

The grants in lieu of taxes, of course, have their historic origins, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, with the Crown at one time being exempt from taxes. Gradually the municipalities are catching up on the Crown and this is the next stage in that catch-up, so to speak. Perhaps the time will come one day when municipal establishments will be paid the same assessment for the property that is occupied as any ordinary institution would pay.

It is sometimes difficult to make a comparison except perhaps on the basis of square feet, square yards, square hectares, square metres, or whatever will be used, between an airport and a business establishment such as a warehouse. There just is no comparison. However, I think a formula can be worked out so that the municipalities feel they are getting a fair deal.

This brings me to the question of assessments. An extraordinary situation was brought to my attention within the last two or three weeks which I would like to mention to the minister. I have written to one of his colleagues. It might be useful if I would send a copy of my letter to the minister, because there is an unusual relationship being built up by municipal assessors or regional district assessors. In this particular case, a private property is claiming a farm rate of assessment. The assessor is seeking a waiver to his income tax returns so that the regional district may have access to those returns in order to assure themselves that the statements in so far as the individual being assessed is concerned make him eligible for the farm rate of taxation.

I am sure the minister would not want this practice to go very far. I hope he would not. As far as I am concerned, and I hope as far as he is concerned, the income tax returns of the citizens of this country are a matter of confidentiality between those who submit the returns and the Department of National Revenue. However, as I get the story, the regional district assessor is doing his utmost to secure this waiver from the person being assessed. I do not know under what authority he can do that. I hope he will be appropriately reprimanded by the authorities who sent him out in the first place.

To my way of thinking, that person should be able to submit an affidavit to say that his income from the farm that he claims to be running is X number of dollars. That should be enough to guarantee his eligibility for a farm assessment rather than a residential assessment. If the assessor is not satisfied with the affidavit, then he should question it in the courts. The individual being assessed would then be able to prove by extracting a certain section from his income tax documents, if necessary, but not to open up his whole income tax return to any municipal authority.

I hope the minister agrees with me on the basis of stories I have given to him that that is a very improper practice for any authority to engage in and that, when he gets the information which I should be able to send him within the next day or so, he will be in a position to assure me that this is a practice which is certainly not acceptable to the government. So my first comment concerns the delay, and the desirability of an assurance from the minister that greater promptness will be forthcoming. I believe we should provide for an automatic triggering mechanism at a certain period of the year which municipalities can count on to ensure receipt of their grants in lieu of taxes without fail, year after year. I should like to see such a provision written into the bill, even through I am not sure whether that would be possible. We might examine in committee, whether there is a means of introducing into the bill an amendment establishing a date on which grants in lieu of taxes would be paid out to the municipalities. That is the first point.

The other point I underlined had to do with the abuse by a regional district authority in requiring a person being assessed to release his income tax returns to the regional district so that the officials concerned could reassure themselves because they were not prepared to take an individual's word that he was entitled to a farm rating rather than to a residential rating.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to go into all the details of the legislation before us, for it has been adequately and well discussed during the debate we have had this afternoon and this evening.

A good deal has been said, naturally, about Ottawa, since it is the municipality which is most affected by the presence of the federal government. Accordingly, I feel I should not let this opportunity pass—and if I see a smile on your face, Mr. Speaker, it perhaps indicates that you know what is coming—without asking the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) to come to the defence of the Peace Tower. I regard it as a disgrace the way this commanding tower which has meant so much to the City of Ottawa has been blocked out in so many directions by the construction of high rise buildings.

I realize I am referring again to the length of time which has elapsed since I came here but certainly, when I did come to this city, the Peace Tower was in every respect a commanding part of the skyline. As a matter of fact, long before I came here as a member of Parliament I came as a high school boy to visit the city and, back in 1924 before the Peace Tower had been completed, I took snapshots of it which I am sometimes pleased to show to people to help them realize that this building was built within the memory of some of us who are still here. In other words, the Peace Tower is something in which I have been interested for a long time.

A good deal of the battle has been lost by the way in which the city has permitted the construction of high rise buildings, but one still gets a very good view of Parliament Hill and the Peace Tower coming in from the western parkway; there are spots around the city, around the Experimental Farm or out by the Union Station from which one can still see the Peace Tower, and I am happy to say I can still see it from my bedroom window out in Parkwood Hills. As I have said before, woe betide the developer who gets in the way of that view! If I get up some morning and find buildings going up between my bedroom window and this tower there will be a question of privilege, a motion under Standing Order 26, and several other procedures on the floor of the House that day.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I believe this craze for high rise buildings, for constructing a jungle for a city, is something which will not always be in vogue, and I would hope that when the Minister of Public Works is holding discussions with the city of Ottawa about its problems, about its need for money, what might be done, and so on, he will express the view often expressed in Parliament that it is a disgrace to block out this tremendous view.

I rose to say just one thing. That is it, and I would ask the Minister of Public Works to remind the city of Ottawa that this city belongs to the whole nation, and that one of the things which is prominent here is the Peace Tower surmounting this building. It should be kept in view for all who live here or come to this city.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the Chair recognizes the Minister of Public Works at this point, he will close the debate.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to close the debate on Bill C-4, I should like to begin by saying to the hon. member who has just spoken that, although I am a new member in this parliamentary precinct, he can rest assured that the prominence of the tower, the history of the tower, and the role which it occupies on the parliamentary scene and in the history of this country, are something very special to me as well. So, in my capacity as the Minister of Public Works, also reporting for the National Capital Commission, another area which though not necessarily germane to the bill under discussion probably gets tagged along because it has to do with local municipality planning and the like, I should like to assure the hon. member that I share his sentiments, and one of the responsibilities I hope to be able to discharge is protection for the concern he has expressed.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: To the hon. member opposite and to the House leader of the official opposition, I quickly express my thanks for the speedy attention they have given to the bill I introduced earlier this afternoon on second reading.

A number of hon. members have invited me to respond to individual points. I decline to do that this evening because I perceive that this bill, first introduced almost two years ago, has been around this place too long and I do not want to give the impression that I am holding it up longer than is necessary. I have, though, noted point by point, with staff also present, the various issues which were raised by all members on both sides of the House, and to show my good faith I shall attempt to respond to those points in writing even before the measure gets to committee so that when they go to the committee they may know the position of the government and of the minister on those points. With regard to some of them, I think I could give explanations, but I do not wish to take the time of the House by doing so this evening. However, as I say, I do not want to take the time of the House to do that this evening.

Mr. Nielsen: You have lots of time tonight.

Mr. Cosgrove: This is a special evening, and the hon. member opposite puts his finger on this being a special evening. A number of hon. members who have spoken about this bill after eight o'clock tonight have talked about the referendum results coming in. I can tell the House that of 79 per cent of the votes cast in the referendum at this time, 58.8 per cent have been No and 41.2 per cent have been Yes. That gives me a great deal of satisfaction, as I am sure it does to many hon. members who have spoken, and to hon. members and people who are in this House who are federalists.

Mr. Knowles: Not just many, all of us.

Mr. Cosgrove: If I may be permitted to make a few comments, as other hon. members have done earlier this evening, the election of a certain provincial government in the province of Quebec threatened a number of Canadians. One of those was the present leader of the opposition in the province of Quebec, Mr. Claude Ryan. I do not believe politics was necessarily his first milieu or avocation. He indicated that he came to the defence of Canada in the political field as a result of that election. I think he has done a fantastic service to Canada, and it shows tonight.

I was impressed as well that a number of people this evening and this afternoon who spoke about this bill were municipal politicians, people with municipal experience who know grassroots communities from school boards, commissions, local councils, city councils, etc., just as I have during the last ten years. I would like to say that although I am pleased to be here as a member of the federal government, I thought as I served my local city, I was serving Canada. I am sure that people in the provinces who serve in local or provincial offices, whether elected or appointed, feel in some ways that they serve Canada.

Canada is many things. It is a federalist system which involves, we know formally, the provincial and federal jurisdictions, but it also involves all people who serve in public life and all citizens who are good citizens in this country. They serve and have served Canada, and so even though I am here this evening and privileged to speak as a federalist in the federal House, I feel that my training and my first involvement in municipal politics were also a contribution to my country in the widest sense.

However, there are people who have responded to the federal cause, and they have responded in a special way. They are people who have stood out in this referendum debate and referendum choice which we have seen related back to us in the results this evening. I ran three times in three campaigns to be here this evening because I believed that there were some fantastic federalists in this House who should be supported, and I refer to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: These two federalists should feel vindicated this evening, as I feel vindicated, and as I am sure the constituents who are responsible for my participating this evening feel vindicated by the results of the federalist vote tonight.

I speak of the past, and I want to conclude my comments by addressing the future. Some say Bill C-4 deals with local government. What does that mean in the scheme of things? To me this bill is a good omen. The distinguished House leader of the New Democratic Party defended the Peace Tower this evening. That is fantastic. I think any person who comes to this parliamentary precinct as a young person will feel he has a champion in the hon. member opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: However, it is interesting that Bill C-4 tonight, as was indicated by an hon. member opposite this afternoon, is here because we have an antiquated constitution. We have an antiquated system of government devised 113 years ago which requires this House this evening to meet and talk about a bill because, for some reason, the law does not permit the federal government to be treated as any other constituent or person in the community. I predict this bill is a good omen for the future, for federalism and for renewed federalism in this country, and its quick passage this afternoon and this evening shows that hon. members are conscious of this.

It has been suggested that a new deal has to be concluded quickly. I offer one caution. It has been said that the 40 per cent of those people who voted Yes in the Quebec referendum have said that they want a new deal. One player in the renewal which has not been talked of today is the province or provinces. This phenomenon, probably second to the growth of local government, should also be taken into account. The strength, the muscle, the will, and the exercise of regional activity through the provinces are one thing which has to be taken into account, and if we are to be successful in a new deal there is a heavy, heavy responsibility on the provinces to match the will demonstrated this evening by this House and at this level of government to address the future through a renewed federalism, and a search for a federalism which will bring people not only in the province of Quebec but in all other provinces into a better Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES RELOCATION BILL

MEASURE TO RELOCATE GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself much more briefly than my last comments to Bill C-13. In my opinion this matter is one of housekeeping. It is a matter which ought not to engage a long debate in this House, and I would like to give my reasons why I offer that opinion and view.

A number of departments and agencies which are subject to statutory requirement to have offices or perform functions in Ottawa have relocated or are in the process of relocating outside the city of Ottawa. The situation must be rectified by new legislation which introduces changes in existing legislation covering each of the affected bodies to permit a legal recognition of the location of that agency or service outside the city of Ottawa. That is what the bill is about. It is a simple housekeeping matter. Bill C-13 deals with the necessary changes.

In five cases the words "City of Ottawa" are replaced by the words "National Capital Region". In the case dealing with the Department of Veterans Affairs moving to the city of Charlottetown, the words "City of Ottawa" are replaced by the words "such place in Canada designated by the governor in council". The location within the city of Charlottetown is a point of some concern to some members in the House, and I understand that the matter will be brought up in the late show tonight, Mr. Speaker.

Bills were introduced by the former ministers of public works in the previous two Parliaments to correct this situation, as was the case with Bill C-4 with which we dealt previously today. Bill C-13 is identical to Bill C-22 which was introduced on November 6, 1979, in the first session of the last Parliament, and which was the successor to Bill C-32 and Bill C-23 in the third and fourth sessions of the previous Parliament under the former Liberal government. To a municipal politician that means that people have gone through two elections and the bill is still sitting here.

A majority of these bodies which have been relocated during the past year or two are located in the national capital region, in Hull or Vanier. The affected bodies are the Economic Council of Canada, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Land Titles Office, the Canadian Transport Commission, Public Archives and DREE. In addition, provision is made for the relocation of the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, and the Department of Veterans Affairs to which I have referred.

The present bill, which is identical to Bill C-22, differs from Bill C-23 in that all references to the Farm Credit Corporation have been deleted. This change was introduced following the last government's decision in July of 1979 not to relocate to Camrose, Alberta, and it was deemed appropriate not to include it in the present legislation because of the uncertainty of a review of the over-all decentralization program.

In brief, that is the introduction of the bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister accept a question before he sits down?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) wishes to ask a question. Does he have the minister's permission?

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister, in order to enable members in the House to participate intelligently in the debate on this bill, table the costs of the move from Peterborough to Cornwall, and from the waterfront site to the uptown site in the other case, so that we might intelligently debate those aspects of this bill on decentralization?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question put by the hon. member opposite, let me say that, in my opinion, that question is not pertinent to the main thrust of the bill before us this evening, which is housekeeping. If members wish to review the substance, the cost, the efficiency or otherwise of the actual physical moves, which, in my opinion, have nothing to do with this, there will be other occasions and other forums available for that type of discussion. I urge members to seek those other forums. In my opinion this bill does not provide the occasion for such a discussion. If my friend wants those figures, I would be happy to produce them in another forum.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I tabled, in answer to a request of hon. members opposite, the cost, for example, of the move to Charlottetown. I would be happy to provide those figures, but I say to hon. members that I do not think this is the time or the place.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned to the minister this afternoon that it was rather interesting that he was cutting his eye teeth on Bill C-4 which dispenses largesse to thousands of municipalities across the country. As he mentioned tonight in his concluding remarks, the principle of the bill has the basic consent and approval of parties on all sides of the House, so perhaps it was a very interesting and fortuitous bill for the minister on which to cut his parliamentary eye teeth.

Having heard those gratuitous remarks, naturally I was a little disappointed in the minister's concluding remarks. While he thanked my House leader for expediting the passage of Bill C-4, obviously he did not really congratulate the speakers on all sides of the House, or any of the speakers on this side of the House who, frankly, had the conduct of the bill and who, through their co-operation, enabled the minister to get Bill C-4 through the second reading stage into committee, regardless of all the deference which he paid to the venerable hon. member who, some people think, lives in the Peace Tower, for his pet project on the parliamentary Peace Tower.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that I started lightly on Bill C-13 because the minister, having made a few gratuitous remarks to the wrong side of the House, in my view, and not having answered any questions from this side of the House, should not expect as easy a passage through the House of Bill C-13 as he had on Bill C-4.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, surely the time at which I spoke, about ten minutes ago, was not so long ago that my friend can say I did not thank both leaders of the parties opposite for the support they gave to Bill C-4, because I did do that. Surely he would not make that statement.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I was here in the House and I heard the minister's remarks. But I will not amplify this because, frankly, it does not address the substance of the bill before us. I must say to my friend, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), or whoever he may be, that I would appreciate hearing him on this bill which involves the relocation of government agencies.

So far as the ambit and the principle of the bill are concerned, when you relocate government agencies, it seems to me that the question of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was most relevant, because one of the things the taxpayers want to know, when you relocate an agency or a government department for whatever cause, be it good, bad, or political, is what is the cost to the taxpayer.

There are several matters which give us concern, and I must say that the minister, in the schizophrenic world in which we live in the political arena, perhaps chose well to put before us Bill C-4 first, and chose well when he decided to cut his parliamentary eye teeth on that bill, because Bill C-13 is a decayed and diseased wisdom tooth which should be extracted, because it has none of the parliamentary attributes of a positive nature that Bill C-4 had.

Here I want to digress for a minute because I know the minister ad libbed very well in his concluding remarks on Bill C-4 about the results of the vote tonight. I will not digress too far on the implications of that vote because others in other places tonight are perhaps trying to assess and divine the situation and the full implications of that vote. All I can say, having been a member here for a few years, is that I do not think the vote tonight has settled anything. I quite agree with those members of the House, as well as those who have spoken outside, that unless this House gets off the dead centre on many issues, some of the divining going on tonight may not be quite as prophetic and may perhaps be a little more pathetic than some people who believe in the federal system would like to believe.

I do not feel any great excitement about the result tonight, although I am glad that the forces in favour of No have so obviously won. But when you get such a massive support for the Yes side, there are implications for any federal member who looks at the federal scene, let alone the disquiet and alienation in other parts of the country.

For a long time this House has been preoccupied with a justification for the problems in Quebec which is very close to us, especially when we talk about the national capital district. In fact there are those of us who could suggest, in terms of the history of Bill C-13, that now that the buildings are across the river in Quebec, in Hull, the government brings in what the minister euphemistically calls housekeeping legislation to legitimize retroactively the move of many departments across the river to the national capital region in Hull. Without getting too philosophical, I think Bill C-13 respecting the relocation of government agencies, in its strictest sense is involved in an indirect manner with the vote tonight.

As the minister mentioned, this matter is not new. We in this House saw changes in the Ottawa region, the capital region and/or construction on both sides of the river, without any great parliamentary debate. With the shift of locations of government agencies, now we are coming in to ensure, in the subject matters which the minister mentioned, be it the Economic Council of Canada, the Land Titles Act, the National Transportation Act, the Public Archives Act or the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act, that where "Ottawa" appears it comes to mean "the national capital region."

There are two matters raised by Bill C-13, as far as I am concerned. One is the historic reason why we even have a Bill C-13, that is, expansion. I am not necessarily saying that I am against that, because it is a fact of life. A man called John Diefenbaker, a former leader of my party, in 1958 expanded the whole definition of the national capital region to include parts that were never included after many years. As your Honour knows, he expanded it far across the river. I do not want anyone to misinterpret my remarks tonight, but he expanded the definition of the national capital region to include other parts of the Ottawa area, the Ottawa-Hull area, the parkway system and the Gatineau. As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, it is a pleasure for many of us who live here temporarily, or for those residents who live here permanently. It has enhanced the area. There is no resident of Ottawa or member of Parliament who has been here for a few years who has not seen the improvement in the national capital region.

Having said that on the positive side, through enhancement, enrichment and development in a positive sense of a national capital region, I cannot stand idly by, meekly bow, and say that we should now just acquiesce in retroactive approval of things which should have been debated in the House before they ever occurred. I am referring to the move of many agencies across the river into buildings there, leaving vacant space in the heart of Ottawa, let alone other moves across the country that have caused concern.

The minister may be a little surprised by my comment because I am from one of the so-called areas of economic disparity. It is not that so-called in economic terms. It is an area that is somewhat economically deprived. Having been in theory and in principle in favour of decentralization, I am sure the minister may wonder why this member for Atlantic Canada is questioning the principle in this bill of decentralization.

An hon. Member: Yes, why?

Mr. Nowlan: The answer to the rhetorical question and/or the question of the hon. member opposite, is that there is a real fundamental difference between decentralization in principle based on proper criteria and decentralization which occurs strictly for political patronage. As far as I am concerned, Bill C-13 is founded not only on weak history. It should have been debated, and perhaps it would not have caused the negative reaction in my mind. It should have come into the House open-ended. We talk about freedom of information and all the other things that members of Parliament and the public should be exposed to and know about, yet a case could be made for almost a surreptitious movement which in effect is legitimized, after the move, by bills such as Bill C-13.

I hope, when I speak this way, that future governments will not take this back-door approach to expand the operations of the federal government for whatever purpose, be it laudable or otherwise. This afternoon the minister did not answer any questions on Bill C-4 which were put objectively by members on this side. Frankly, the questions were not that pointed because the members were all in favour of the principle of the bill which they kicked around. Ironically we have here a bill legitimizing "national capital region" for the word "Ottawa" for five government agencies in areas where the public servants have already moved in large measure, yet the bill has not moved off dead centre of the House of Commons. If the barn door has ever been closed after the cattle have gone out to pasture and were likely to break down the fence, Bill C-13 does it.

I suggest that this bill must be looked at critically. One of the main reasons why it must be looked at especially critically now, notwithstanding the fact that tonight there was a very profound and historic vote in Quebec which has been good for the nation from sea to sea, is that tomorrow the work really begins. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all party leaders in all parts of Canada must get down to discussing the merits and demerits of a renewed federalism and/or a renewed constitution. As some political scientists have said, there can be a real difference between a renewed constitution fundamentally or a brand new constitution fundamentally and a renewed federalism where parts of the whole, for example the provinces, have a much more meaningful say than perhaps they have had heretofore. I must say that I am somewhere in the middle, which perhaps is the safe place to be on a question like this.

I do not think the provinces are given a real meaningful say in a substantive way by just building buildings in different plots of land, no matter how great the building, no matter how great the plot. That type of cement mentality somehow often builds walls around the way we think about our federalism. We think it is there because of dollar signs.

From a personal point of view and that of a federal politician, albeit outside of the province of Quebec, I suggested this was a question for Quebec, although it affected all of Canada, because until very recently there was no emotional content in the debate in Quebec for those in favour of a No vote. I will not go much farther down that road, paying compliments where perhaps compliments can be paid. I might surprise some members in terms of where I think compliments should be paid. But I think the vote justifies the work of all who worked actively in the debate in Quebec. I hope we do not just stay on a Bill C-13 mentality, without substantive criteria for relocating agencies of government departments.

I am a politician and I make no apology for using the phrase "crass politics", but I must say that in terms not only of alienation of the regions of this country but also of the people of this land against politics, not only can they look at Bill C-13 and its strictness in terms of the national capital region in Ottawa, but they can look at what happened to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) versus the former mayor of Cornwall.

Some people in the House do not yet know that the change of the Parks Commission from Cornwall to Peterborough followed the change from Cornwall to Quebec in order to divide the whole thing up. At one time the parks department was solely in Cornwall and it looked after the interests of both Quebec and Ontario. When the parks department changed its location to Quebec in order to be closer to the people, naturally there was pressure to make sure that the remaining parks office in Cornwall was moved to where it could better serve the people of Ontario, where the park was, closer to Peterborough than Cornwall. It was not the Conservative government of a few months ago that suggested this. This is where the question of the hon. member for Yukon is most relevant. What is this topsyturvy flip-flop on parks in Cornwall or Peterborough, or the Charlottetown move, or the move of Eldorado from Port Hope to the northern Ontario region?

If there are legitimate reasons for this, when are we as politicians, or when is the government as the leader of politicians, i.e. the leader of this Parliament, going to start taking people into its confidence by saying, "Okay, there are five good reasons for the move and three bad ones, but these are best"? The people of Canada should make their choice, and those are the reasons. Sometime they will be able to make their choice.

There are many times as a member of Parliament, whether dealing with Bill C-13 which is trying to legitimize something which has occurred after the event, for example relocation, or another bill, I really cannot see the justification. This bill is trying to legitimize the move to a wider national capital from the narrow strict definition of Ottawa, that is, a relocation of government activities to other parts of the country under the umbrella of decentralization. I really wonder how you justify the move, for instance, to Peterborough from Cornwall.

I thought the whole concept of decentralization began with a move out of Ottawa to the periphery, the east and the west, or even to Winnipeg. I thought it was a move of activity out of Ontario, perhaps. I am talking as an Atlantic politician, and I feel there might be a little more benefit in a federal presence in areas more distant from Ottawa. However, we all know that decentralization has been manipulated and used for political purposes. As a politician I recognize the reality of that.

If politicians are to earn the respect of the alienated public out there from coast to coast, in contrast to alienated parts of the country, then the politicians in this chamber, especially the leaders here, i.e. the cabinet ministers, must have the intestinal fortitude to come clean.

This new Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) has some experience in municipal politics in the Toronto area. I do not know the mechanics of the bylaws in the Scarborough region, but I know he was involved in municipal politics before becoming a federal member, and I am sure that he knows in most cases the workings of school boards and municipal councils at the grassroots level are more open and more public that here at the top of the totem pole.

I am really serious that in areas where the public dollar is involved it is time we, as politicians, remember that we are not just playing the Parliament game under the rules of John A. Macdonald, and we all have to vote with the party whip—that is a subject I would like to make a speech on at some time—but we are dealing with an alienated public not restricted just to Quebec. As a body corporate, as a House of Commons, if we make these moves we should make them for legitimate reasons.

Quite frankly I was not overly excited about confirming the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown. I received briefs from legions of this land and talked to many good veterans who, quite frankly, were not excited about this move. I am speaking as an Atlantic member, talking about a move to Atlantic Canada which might help Atlantic Canada in terms of jobs, but there should be a good reason for such a move. I suggest in some areas the reasons should have been openly questioned with the merits and demerits placed on the table.

As far as I am concerned, as the lead-off speaker for my party in respect of Bill C-13, obviously the national capital is an area that has the approval and approbation of this side of the House. However, we do have to be critical about legitimizing things after the fact.

There is another question that has not been covered by this bill. Perhaps it is not overly relevant. Under the British North America Act, section 16, the capital of Canada shall be Ottawa until otherwise directed by order of the Queen's Council. As a result of these decentralization moves there may be people at the grassroots level who could successfully challenge the federal government. Some of these people may successfully challenge the federal government in respect of some of its regulations or laws having regard to some of these departments that have been carrying on business in certain areas for a couple of years. Perhaps an aggrieved citizen could challenge the federal government by suggesting that a head office must be here in Ottawa.

The suggestion could be made that the federal government must issue its edicts, its summonses, its expropriations and whatever here in Ottawa, the designated capital of the country. Such an individual might suggest that the federal government is out of circuit and out of tune because its head office has to be here in Ottawa. Such a challenge could be made on the basis of the change from Ottawa to the national capital region. From the little I used to know about constitutional law I think there very well might be a good class action on the part of the taxpayers regarding some of the federal processes. Tonight, or whenever we pass this bill, we will legitimize this change.

Let me conclude, since others want to speak, by saying that this is a pretty poor way to run a railway, and it is an even poorer way, quite seriously, to run a government. If there is anything that the vote in Quebec should tell us, and quite frankly, that the vote during the last two elections in 18 months, does tell us, it is that there is an alienated public out there, not enamoured with politicians in general and with some politicians in particular. I hope this new minister does not become confined with just the bureaucratic knee-jerk reaction. I respect those bureaucrats around us as fundamental and necessary, but the problems of government, and this includes many political shades of government, occur when there is a knee-jerk reaction as a result of the advice of the bureaucracy.

I am informed that in regard to Bill C-4 there was a gentleman in the Department of Finance who has been involved in writing this proposed legislation with each change of Parliament, for about nine years. He has been involved in this legislation on grants in lieu of taxation to municipalities. He is obviously an expert. No doubt the answers the minister is provided for the questions that might be raised in the House by the opposition are good answers, but I hope this minister does not rely solely on the advice of these bureaucrats but, rather, takes advantage of the experience he has had in the municipal field.

I hope he uses his newness in this government, which is an old government, when looking at some of these problems with a fresh approach. Perhaps in this way he can avoid any further deterioration of the public's respect for the political process, and that deterioration has occurred from coast to coast, regardless of region. Hopefully in this way we can avoid a repetition of some of the dramatic events which have occurred in this country. I am sure we will be faced with even greater problems in the future as we go on with the nation's business in a substantive way. I would hope, therefore, when the minister concludes his remarks in this debate, or when providing information in the committee, he will make sure there are answers to the questions, including those asked by the hon. member for Yukon earlier regarding two precise points.

The minister could bring in those figures tomorrow. With the answers to these questions and those figures, this debate might be expedited. In this way he could perhaps cast bread on the waters and ease the passage of the bill. Whether this information comes tomorrow or at the committee, members of Parliament on all sides, and especially ministers, have an extra duty to be more open than the government certainly has been. Until that takes place we will just be whistling Dixie if we think the public is going to have a different perception of politicians who are supposed to be running this country.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to Bill C-13 this evening. It is a privilege to speak on this day, particularly in light of the results which have been realized tonight in la belle province. I would like to congratulate the minister, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Cosgrove), on his dynamic approach to his responsibilities. With the introduction of both Bill C-4 and Bill C-13 in the same day, he is obviously a very busy minister. I would like to identify and associate myself with this dynamic minister in the sense that I was able to relate to his remarks earlier this evening, having served personally on a municipal government for eight years in New Brunswick.

I speak in support of the relocation of the government agencies, but before I get into my remarks I would like to take this opportunity to participate in what I feel is true debate in this House between two members on such a bill. The previous speaker, the member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) contradicated himself so many times that he laid the groundwork on which I can say something about the importance of the relocation of government agencies to the Atlantic area.

The hon. member started off by saying that he would be brief, but then he went on for a long period of time holding up this bill. He mentioned the two elections and the fact that there has been a long delay in the passage of legislation in this House. From that comment, I understood the hon. member to mean that he was as anxious as all of us are to clean up these housekeeping bills and get on with the nation's business, as he called it. Yet, the hon. member went on to say a number of negative things about what the minister is attempting to do.

The very fact that the hon. member does come from the Atlantic area, and after saying what he said this evening, very clearly established the case that he was contradicting himself. I do not know why the hon. member would do that, or from what base he made those remarks when he criticized the move to Prince Edward Island. This is a move which I have supported 100 per cent, not only in the days when we were in government but during the days, that very brief period of time, when we were in opposition. I defended the decision taken by our colleague, the former minister of veterans affairs, even when he was not here in the House. Now that he is back and is the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) again, he has the privilege of seeing the work he commenced in an earlier Parliament come into reality.

As one who had the privilege to serve as the parliamentary secretary to the then minister of urban affairs who was also responsible for CMHC and other matters, I had an opportunity to realize fully the workings of the National Capital Commission. I join with other members in stating my belief and understanding of the importance of the national capital. Of course I will not be able to muster the enthusiasm nor find the words to express how proud I am of the nation's capital and of Ottawa, but I have nothing but admiration and understanding for the work and the role of the members who represent this region.

I state that because as a member of Parliament I understand the difficulties of those members of Parliament, and I sympathize with them as representatives of the people of this region. On the other hand, it being a two-way street, I would hope that they would understand our position, coming from a have-not, underdeveloped region of the country.

There is very little which I can add this evening in this debate. It has been so well stated by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on previous occasions and, more recently now that we have commenced with a new administration, that both he and the government have indicated how strongly they hold the position that the have provinces must continue to seek and to find ways and means to assist in every way the have-not and underdeveloped areas.

That is why I find it strange for a member from the Atlantic provinces, the member from Annapolis Valley, to stand in his place and qualify himself eminently as a member speaking out of both sides of his mouth. On the one hand he said that we may need this type of relocation and support for the Atlantic area and, on the other hand, he chastised the government, by bringing in the usual type of sly innuendo, that decisions were taken for other than appropriate reasons.

The program which was announced in October, 1977, addressed the relocation of several thousands of full and part-time jobs from the capital area to 24 communities in all ten provinces between the period of 1977 to 1982. I will make no reservations about it since I represent an important constituency in New Brunswick. I am very much interested in supporting Bill C-13 this evening because I want to do what I can in my work to attract some relocation of government agencies to my area, which is one of the most beautiful areas in Canada. I refer to the beautiful Restigouche River, the salmon and all that we have going into the Gaspé area.

However, we also need jobs in order to survive, and we must develop the economy. We have some industry there with mines, with the Noranda group and Bathurst Mining and Smelting. We have the pulp and paper industry which employs thousands of Canadians who are hard-working people. There is also tourism and various other aspects which will help the economy. However, we also need due and fair consideration when it comes to relocation and decentralization.

Mr. Forrestall: Speak to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Harquail: To the hon. member who is trying to enter the debate by way of interruption, I am satisfied that you have received, I think, fair consideration, in time, through reallocation and the very substantial location of federal jobs in your riding.

Mr. Forrestall: I lost it all. You took it all away from us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member please address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I enjoy your support in restraining these interruptions, especially with regard to a member who enjoys to a large extent great benefits from the federal government, from such departments as the Department of National Defence—

Mr. Forrestall: You got to be kidding.

Mr. Harquail: —the Department of Fisheries—

Mr. Forrestall: You got to be kidding.

Mr. Harquail: —the Department of the Environment, and all the other federal agencies which have very substantial installations in his immediate area. I believe that the hon. member represents the Dartmouth area. Certainly I would think that the hon. member has very little to quibble about in terms of reallocation and location of federal departments and agencies in his own area.

In my short experience in this House, and being from the Atlantic area, I have found that it is not uncommon to suffer interruptions from colleagues who share the same concerns as I have with regard to attempting to develop ways and means to develop the Atlantic area. Notwithstanding the negative comments made this evening by the hon. member from Annapolis Valley, and seconded and supported by the hon. member from Dartmouth in his interruptions, we will go on because we have received the mandate of the people to do this. When the member from Annapolis Valley—

Mr. Nielsen: Annapolis Valley-Hants.

Mr. Harquail: It's of no great "Hants". It does not enhance, nor has he convinced me of any enhancement tonight or on any previous occasion. Having experienced interruptions by that hon. member, at least I had the benefit of that experience to prepare myself well for my intervention this evening. When the hon. member mentioned his leader and his party's position, he would have to conclude that that was part of the message delivered to him by the Canadian people, when we were returned to government, that people want relocation of the government agencies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock the House will now proceed to Proceedings on Adjournment Motion.

ENERGY—ALLEGED INADEQUATE RESPONSES OF MINISTER

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, given the events of earlier this evening, I must join with all of those who tonight will not necessarily breathe a sigh of relief because well in excess of one million of our fellow Canadians have expressed a desire that may not be in sympathy with our own, while slightly less than two million have expressed the opposite desire. I do not think we should take any comfort from that. It is clear that we have an extraordinary task ahead of us to reunite this country.

In terms of the question that I raised on April 17 having to do with energy, how we are going to pay for it and how we are going to bring it into this country, might I raise two points for the distinguished parliamentary secretary whom I do not see here at the moment but who, I hope, is here. These two questions have to do with the rejection this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) of any possibility of participation by Canadians and Canadian ships crewed by Canadians and subject to Canadian law in the movement of energy from Mexico into Canada.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us that the question, to the best of his knowledge, has not even been raised. In such a vital area to Canada, I am amazed that the question has not even been raised.

Last year leaving ourselves open to external interests, as Canadians we paid very close to $3.7 billion on the movement of goods in and out of this country by water-borne means. That includes exports overland of Canadian manufactured goods, through the United States, exporting through United States ports. These goods went out in foreign-registered bottoms, not Canadian ships, but foreign registered ones. The agencies here in Canada took their usual fees for these purposes, but the ships were foreign registered.

In discussions with Mexico with respect to the agreement to import eventually upwards of 100,000 barrels of oil a day into Canada—and I speak as an eastern Canadian who is totally reliant on imported oil—I am told this afternoon by the government of this country that the question of who would move that oil was not even considered. I find that reprehensible. I find it equally reprehensible with respect to energy and the question of whether or not this government has bothered to consider how we are going to export northeastern British Columbia coal to Japan.

It is my suspicion, not confirmed and not too late to be corrected, that this government has not even introduced into its discussions the possibility of the utilization of Canadian ships built in Canada, crewed by Canadians and subject to Canadian law, in the export of Canadian natural resources to Japan. It is my suspicion that that has not even happened.

A second problem that I raised on April 17 had to do with where the money is to come from to pay for eastern oil in terms of compensation. It is not in anything mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). In fact it is some $2.5 billion to $2.8 billion short of the premises on which the Minister of Finance introduced his mini-budget. I am sorry to see only one member of the Treasury Bench here, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove). I am pleased he is here this evening. Where is the money going to come from? How is the money going to be raised to meet that compensation fund? I want an answer to that question.

The third question I posed on April 17 had to do with whether the government was prepared to honour the commitment given by the previous government to assist refineries in eastern Canada with regard to the upgrading of their facilities in order to accommodate the heavier crudes now coming out of Venezuela and which will come out of Mexico. Where will the money come from to help them? Are they going to have to do it on their own? If so, when will they be told so that they may start on their own? If there is any federal financial assistance forthcoming, when will they know about it? When will they know what the level of assistance will be?

Those are my three points. When in God's name are we going to start to move our own resources—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in raising this matter this evening the hon. member has provided the opportunity to demonstrate again the international involvement of this government in ensuring a stable and secure energy supply for Atlantic Canada.

Last week I indicated to the House what we have done to foster energy conservation and diversification in the maritime provinces. While those efforts have already brought rewards and shown considerable further promise, we cannot eliminate the need to import oil into Atlantic Canada in the immediate future.

An energy agreement with one foreign supplier, Mexico, was initialed in May, 1979, one year ago. It provides for the delivery of Mexican crude oil to Canada. The intent is to initiate delivery this year, increasing to 50,000 barrels per day one year after delivery commences. Later, if Mexican production allows, this may rise to a volume of 100,000 barrels per day. The precise mix of heavy and light crude oil remains to be negotiated.

As is the case elsewhere in the world, eastern Canadian refineries have a limited capacity to process heavy oil. Certainly we have a responsibility to consider these limitations while negotiating with Mexico. Once this oil supply agreement is finalized, Petro-Canada is expected to arrange for the efficient transport of this oil to eastern Canadian destinations. We expect that this will minimize the costs involved, and allow Petro-Canada to exercise its mandate to assist in protecting our national interests. If available and suitable, we shall, of course, give first priority to Canadian ships.

While the price of Mexican crude is in the upper range of current international prices, it would be accepted by companies which look forward to receiving crude oil from a secure source. This acceptance can be explained by the fact that crude oil contracts from other sources would likely entail prices which would equal, or exceed, the price of Mexican crude available to Canada.

To respond to the subject the hon. member raised regarding financial assistance to the refining system, I can repeat that it was studied extensively in 1979 in consultation with officials from provincial governments, including those of Atlantic Canada. At that time it was concluded that no assistance would be required. Accordingly, the previous Conservative government took no steps to provide financial aid to those who would be refining imported Mexican crude oil.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—RELOCATION OF DVA SITE IN CHARLOTTETOWN

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on this historic and happy occasion I hesitate to raise a mundane matter although the issue I wish to discuss is of great interest to my riding of Hillsborough, to my province of Prince Edward Island and, indeed, to all Canadians concerned about good government. It has to do with a question in the House of Commons on Tuesday, May 13, 1980, which, in the first instance, I put to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). It concerned the attempt by the federal government to locate the Department of Veterans Affairs in the centre of Charlottetown, the capital city of Prince Edward Island, despite a binding legal agreement between the federal government on the one hand and the province of Prince Edward Island and the city of Charlottetown on the other, through the Charlottetown Area Development Corporation. The agreement required the Department of Veterans Affairs to be located on the waterfront.

I asked the President of the Treasury Board on that occasion whether it was his intention and that of the government to ignore the obligations they had incurred under the binding agreement, and whether it was also the intention of the government to force its choice of site on the people of Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman was unable to answer my question, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), in an effort to rescue his colleague, entered the discussion and answered as best he could. In essence, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works presented more or less the same statement that he tabled the next day, an analysis on the basis of which the government proceeded with the change of site. Mr. Speaker, the answer to my question by the Minister of Public Works and the statement he tabled in the House the next day were both riddled with inaccuracies and unfounded assumptions. In the short time I have at my disposal in the House tonight, I would like to deal briefly with each of his points.

The first had to do with cost. He maintained that the waterfront site was between $1 million and $1.5 million more expensive than the uptown, alternative site. The truth is that the waterfront site is valued at $1.5 million. By contrast, the uptown site is valued at $2.1 million, leaving an advantage in favour of the waterfront site of $600,000. It is true, as the statement provided to this House by the Minister of Public Works pointed out, that piles and a seawall are required to be installed to make the waterfront site suitable for a massive federal government building. But the cost, according to the best estimates, would not exceed about $400,000, still leaving an advantage of something like $200,000 in favour of the waterfront site. But one has to calculate also the additional cost to the federal treasury of getting out of the binding agreement with the Charlottetown Area Development Corporation, which may exceed a million dollars. So it may well be that it will cost in excess of a million dollars for the federal government to change the site from the waterfront to the central core for political reasons.

The second point the minister made in his answer and, in his statement the next day, was the desirability of the uptown site compared with the waterfront location, in terms of parking, of traffic and of other things such as bringing business to the neighbouring retail stores. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal for the uptown site does not even conform with the city's bylaws, guidelines, and restrictions with respect to the required ratio of parking spaces to the number of employees in a building.

What is more, the proposal to which the minister is a party would contemplate the placement of a massive federal government building right in the heart of a small community—a capital city but, nevertheless, a small community. This measure will worsen parking problems, especially in the summer, when we have something like 600,000 visitors. During that time of year, 600,000 tourists are added to the population of Prince Edward Island, which is only 123,000. The uptown site will cause congestion of traffic in the centre area of the city, and it will devour valuable commercial space better suited to commercial purposes rather than government or institutional purposes.

Almost as important, I think, is that the decision will place a huge federal government building across the street from the provincial legislature, which is a national historic site. The building is a shrine because it was where the Fathers of Confederation met in 1864 to draft the British North America Act. The placement of the building on the waterfront, on the other hand, would give a much needed boost to the waterfront development that is going on with the help of the federal government, the province and the city, and into which the federal government itself has already poured something like $5 million.

By changing the site and by wrenching out of that project the Department of Veterans Affairs, which was to be the centre-piece or flaghip of the waterfront development, the federal government has in effect undermined a project in which it itself is substantially involved.

I want to make one additional point in conclusion. The waterfront site is not, as was implied by the minister, a million miles away from the centre area. It is only three blocks from the downtown centre. It is close enough to the centre of the city to complement local businesses and retail outlets, while being far enough away not to disrupt city planning in the way the downtown core option would.

May I conclude by saying that the placement of the building in the centre core of the downtown area will not accelerate the relocation, as the minister implied. The fact is that with the haggling that will take place between the federal government and CADC over the binding agreement, and with so little done in the uptown core area by way of preparation, this change in site from the waterfront to the centre area will delay rather than accelerate the relocation of DVA to Charlottetown—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on April 25, 1980, it was announced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that the new building would now be built on the Kent-Grafton Street site presently owned by the federal government.

I am very disappointed that my hon. colleague opposite should think, because this building is intended to be next to a shrine, a place which marks the beginning of this country, that that very important building in that part of this country is not an appropriate location for the headquarters of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I would think that if he had the opportunity of asking the men who put together the basis for this country some time ago whether they thought it appropriate, whether the shrine which marked people who died for this country was good enough for them, or the shrine which marks the continued administration for people who were maimed and still suffer as a result of their sacrifice to their country—whether they think that this shrine and this place is good enough to be next to them, contrary to what my friend says, I think the answer would be, "We would welcome a shrine to these people."

I think that my friend does a disservice to himself, to his province, and certainly to those who served in world wars, and who are served by the Government of Canada through the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, to carry on the way he is about the location of this site.

I will rest.

TRANSPORT—CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, with regard to my question of May 15, which was followed by my question of privilege on May 16, I expressed my sympathy to the minister for having been misled by the Canadian Pacific Railway over the matter of CP rail's freezing of the $322 million Rogers Pass project until the government adjusted the Crowsnest Pass freight rate.

I offered sympathy because CP has sent the minister into the House stark naked except for the pathetic excuse that CP executive vice-president Bill Stinson had been misquoted when he had talked to five reporters on the special Calgary to Vancouver train which was showing off all the improvement CP was making to increase the capacity of its main line, but not all the improvements, however, because Mr. Stinson said that if the Crowsnest rate was not replaced by a compensatory rate of about five or six times as high, CP Rail would freeze Rogers Pass improvement as a sign of bad faith with the Government of Canada over the transport policy. That was Mr. Stinson's statement to the Canadian Press reporter, Steve Merdl. Then, one of CP Rail's highly paid public relations men no doubt told one of the assistants of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) that Mr. Stinson had been misquoted.

However, that was not the end of the story. Then the other reporters on the train started filing their stories. I have mentioned that one of them, Bobbi Lambright of the Edmonton Journal, filed an almost identical story to the Canadian Press account. Miss Lambright wrote, and I quote from her story in the Edmonton Journal of Thursday, May 15:

If the money—

That is, money from higher compensatory rates for hauling grain.

—is not available, some major projects will have to be shelved resulting in serious ramifications for rail transportation in the 1980s. A $300 million double tracking project through the Rogers Pass could be the main casualty if finances are not available.

The link between the Crowsnest Pass rate, which the CPR would dearly love to do away with, and the CPR main line improvements, was established by those reporters. This is what I was referring to when I said the CPR was practising corporate blackmail on the Government of Canada.

There was further evidence. The CBC has a reporter on this train to nowhere, and his report made the same link. Canadian Press, which is always sensitive to charges of misquotation, declined to change its story.

This was the background to our question on Thursday, May 15, and the subsequent question of privilege on Friday, May 16. On the question, I am sorry but the minister and this House have been shamed by the statement by CP Rail which has proved incorrect.

I am somewhat more disturbed about the matter of privilege. Madam Speaker ruled stating that it appeared to her to be a matter of whether the MP was satisfied with the answer given by the minister. The question before the House was whether the House had been misled. If so, why whould CP rail not be called before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to determine why they had decided to tell the minister something other than what three trained newspaper reporters had concluded after an extensive interview with executive vice-president Stinson?

There is a legitimate press issue here, Mr. Speaker. We are often confronted with a public figure who, when he has said something indiscreet, hides behind the protective veil of claiming he was misquoted. This does the press of this country, which already has serious credibility problems with its public, little good in establishing its own legitimacy as the reporter of public events which serves the vital function of shaping public opinion in this nation.

If this matter could have been cleared up by the committee, I think the press, the public and the Parliament of this nation would have been better served for it. That is my regret, Mr. Speaker.

Also, we could have returned in the House to the substance of my first inquiry, namely, whether it is the Government of Canada or CPR which determines the transportation policy in this country. Would the government invoke section 262 of the Railway Act if Mr. Stinson makes good on his threat to move grain at a lower priority than other freight if the Crow rate remains in place, thereby ensuring that western farmers get the priority they deserve in shipping the export wheat which does much to earn the foreign exchange which this country needs so desperately? Would the government consider the recommendations for Crow related freight rates as recommended in the Hall Commission report on grain handling and transportation, and remove the disparities for producers of semi-finished goods such as rapeseed meal and oil?

These are the real questions that matter in the west, not whether some functionary for the CPR claims he was misquoted. We should have an end to these kinds of diversionary tactics which impede the work of the House and its members. What we need are answers to the questions which are on the minds of many westerners, as they see what is supposed to be the fate of this country played out as in Quebec tonight.

I do not doubt that this is so, but I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) to come prepared with answers to this House when questions are asked. It is not an edifying experience to have to sit here and listen while the minister ducks a simple question as to whether the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board was consulted when the initial price of wheat was set this year. Surely one of the minister's dedicated assistants could find that out with a simple telephone call to Winnipeg. If that kind of candor and dedication were more readily displayed, then there would be fewer questions of privilege coming before this House.

Now that the authenticity of the blackmail has been established, would the Minister of Transport answer my question: what does he intend to do in the face of this blackmail?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael).

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Dominion Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway entered into the Crowsnest Pass agreement in 1897. In return for certain concessions, the railway agreed to lower rail rates on grain and to maintain them at that level. The Crowsnest Pass rates were incorporated into the Railway Act in 1925. They now apply to western grain moving for export as well as domestic grain moving eastwards to Thunder Bay.

The low rates on grain began to make themselves felt in the 1950s, and the effect upon the railways was recognized by the MacPherson commission from 1959 to 1961. In 1975 the Snavely commission was appointed to identify the costs to the railways of moving grain at statutory rates. The Snavely commission found that the 1974 cost of moving grain was $231 million. Three years later, by 1977, the cost had risen to $354 million. In that same period the railways' share of the costs almost doubled from $89 million to $175.5 million. It is evident that the continued existence of the Crowsnest rate will exert a significant impact upon the finances of our two major railways. The impact of the statutory rate on other parties must not, however, be forgotten.

With respect to the position of Canadian Pacific's proposed $322 million Beavermouth, British Columbia, tunnel project, economic growth forecasts for western Canada in the 1980s will require a marked expansion of railway capacity to move traffic between Calgary, Edmonton and the west coast. While there is an ever-increasing demand for railway capacity, we are all experiencing a very high inflation rate, which means for railways a very high capital cost for capacity additions. Until now the railways have been able to add capacity in relatively small increments such as dieselization, large capacity cars, and long trains. These methods have been exhausted, and now both CN and CP rail are faced with large, one-time plant capacity expansion programs through the mountains.

The railways have not been able to increase their revenues in relation to the increased requirement for funds. About 22 per cent of the total traffic handled through the Rockies by CP rail is grain which moves on a fixed rate. The minister has requested up-to-date forecasts for grain traffic and a report on capacity expansion from the president of CN by this September. Also, CP Rail is expecting to provide the minister with information on its capacity expansion. With this information we will be able to deal with the important issue of the availability of railway capacity for western Canada.

The minister outlined his views on the Crow rate in the House during the debate on this subject on May 15, 1980, and I need not reiterate them here for the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

DESIGNATION OF "O CANADA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, as yesterday was an historic day for all Canadians, I hope that my colleagues opposite will co-operate so that today may also be an historic day. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the importance and necessity of officially recognizing our national anthem, and the continued efforts to that effect made without avail by several members from both sides of this House, I move today, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House unanimously call on the government to introduce legislation as soon as possible with a view to designating "O Canada" as the national anthem of our country.

Madam Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—LEADER OF OPPOSITION DENIED TIME FOR FULL REPLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): "Merci, madame le Président." Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter or urgent importance to many millions of Canadians, namely, the shameful and apparently deliberate exclusion by the CBC's English language television network of a statement by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in last evening's Quebec referendum program.

I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House condemns the officials responsible in the CBC, as the people's national network, for denying the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition time for his full reply in all parts of Canada to the historic decision taken in Quebec and affecting all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that last night's Quebec referendum resulted in strong support for Canadian unity and constitutional reform, and was a triumph for participatory democracy, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House go on record on behalf of the Canadian people to congratulate the people of Quebec for endorsing the process of constitutional change with an expression of unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I am sorry; I did hear a "No". I will put the question again, if it is proper. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

S.O. 43

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY TO REDUCE NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is apparently preparing a "pain-free" policy to reduce the size of the public service—he has been quoted as saying we are in a period of restraint, and that it has to continue—and since, despite a further statement that he is concerned about morale in the public service, he has indicated he will use lay-offs as part of his policy, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House instruct the President of the Treasury Board to table in this House his program of "pain-free" cutbacks before he takes any action on this matter, and that any plans he formulates should include a list of program and service reductions which would occur and a list of any contracting-out of government services which would result from the illusion of a government restraint program.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE PROTECTION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION OF DISABLED CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I am raising a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Arising from the fact that active support from the new government for the Rehabilitation International Congress, which opens in Winnipeg in June, has been lagging, and realizing that our attitude toward the handicapped is often their biggest handicap, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That the government move immediately to amend the Human Rights Act to provide full protection against discrimination for Canada's disabled citizens, particularly in the areas of unemployment, education, transportation and access, and also take steps to broaden the definition of disability in the Income Tax Act in order to make independent living financially possible for the disabled, rather than having them dependent on expensive institutional care.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREST FIRES

ALBERTA—REQUEST ARMED FORCES ASSIST IN FIREFIGHTING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing emergency which I am sure will gain the support of all members on both sides of this House.

In light of the number of forest fires now burning in northern Alberta and the serious threat this poses to wildlife, forests and people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House instruct the government, at the request of the provinces, to call in the armed forces of Canada to assist the present fire-fighting forces and that the federal government assist in any manner possible.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DISTRIBUTION OF FLAGS FLOWN ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that there are occasions when members of Parliament present Canadian flags to organizations, municipalities and, on special occasions, honouring outstanding Canadian citizens, and given the fact that the United States has adopted a method whereby outstanding citizens may receive a flag which is suitably packaged and which at one time had flown over their capital, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent):

That at least one flag be removed daily from the Parliament Buildings, suitably packaged, the date affixed as to the day it had flown over Parliament, and then made available to members of Parliament for special occasions.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Collenette said "No".

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Doctor No again.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—NEGOTIATIONS ON AMENDING CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the result of the Quebec referendum which last night gave the "Non" supporters a majority, and given the undertaking of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the event of a "Non" victory, to put into place the mechanism required to modify the constitution and renew Canadian federalism, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House express its pleasure at the vote's result, which indicated that a majority of Quebeckers favoured the federalist option and, further, encourage the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures to commence immediately constitutional negotiations aimed at renewed federalism.

Mr. Nielsen: You left out the territories.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: You left out the north.

AIRPORTS

FORT McMURRAY, ALBERTA—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW TERMINAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the airport terminal building in Fort McMurray, Alberta, was built in 1962 to service a population then of 3,000, which is now close to 30,000 and anticipated to be 60,000 by 1990 due to tar sands development, and that the totally inadequate terminal building requires passengers today to wait up to 45 minutes for baggage clearance, while the plane trip from Edmonton to Fort McMurray, Alberta, requires 35 minutes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright):

● (1415)

That this House requests the Minister of Transport to give urgent priority to the construction of a new airport terminal building in Fort McMurray, Alberta, and that if the hon. minister does not know where Fort McMurray is, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, supply him with a map.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

INTRODUCTION OF DEVELOPMENT BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and request the unanimous support of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of this government's commitment to introduce the small business development bond as a temporary interest and tax relief measure to assist Canadian small business, particularly during these times of high borrowing costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the Minister of Finance take immediate steps to implement this very important program.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

DATE AND AGENDA OF NEXT CONFERENCE

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question, in the absence of the Prime Minister, to either the Acting Prime Minister or the President of the Privy Council. I hope, in light of the events of yesterday, that you will allow me, Madam Speaker, a few words to put the question into context.

I want to begin by congratulating all federalists in the province of Quebec who overwhelmingly demonstrated their faith in Canada and their desire to live and work within the Canadian family. I should also like to take the opportunity to congratulate Mr. Claude Ryan for his leadership and courage in leading the federalist cause in that province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: As a member of this House, I think I can say that all of us would recognize that we are proud of the role played by the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, as well as members of the House who have stood together in the cause of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: There are times when we in this House put aside our partisan interests and when we demonstrate we are proud to be Canadians. Today is such an occasion.

Finally, before I put my question, may I say that many prayers were also said by Canadians of all faiths that Almighty God might bring healing and reconciliation to our land. Our prayers have been answered and it is now our opportunity to be peacemakers and nation builders.

I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Prime Minister has set a specific date for a federal-provincial conference, and if he has communicated that message to the premiers as to the date as well as to the agenda of a federal-provincial conference and, if so, would he table copies of that correspondence?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, at the beginning, I would like to endorse the sentiments which have been expressed so well by the hon. member with respect to the results yesterday and with respect to those who participated so successfully in the referendum outcome.

Obviously, every member of the House is pleased that Quebeckers have decided in a very clearcut way to remain within Canada and to seek their future within the federalist system. We also recognize that in voting No yesterday, Quebeckers accepted the notion that it was a vote for a future change in our constitutional arrangements. That, of course, is the point of the hon. member's question.

The Prime Minister, as my hon. friend may know, will be making a statement at three o'clock, followed by the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the NDP. At that time I believe he will outline as clearly as he can the steps that will be taken in order to accelerate the process that we have been discussing, and in order to take advantage of the momentum that has obviously been created by yesterday's historic event.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Many of us look at yesterday and the events surrounding May 20 as an opportunity for a new beginning that does not exclusively pertain to any one region, but encompasses the entire country.

In view of that recognition, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has given consideration, that after the federal-provincial conference is held, a larger forum for a broader constitutional meeting be established with a regular schedule, a meeting which would include not only the premiers and the members of the federal government, but also would include the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of other political parties, as well as elected officials and Canadians from other parts of the country.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has already made it clear that it is the intention of the government, obviously, to consult with Parliament and to consult with the provinces at an early date to begin the process of constitutional renewal.

The hon. member has added another suggestion that to my knowledge has not been discussed by the government in recent days. But it is one, obviously, that one would want to consider, particularly if it would accelerate the process that we would want to accelerate.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR DEBATE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council. Now that the referendum debate has ended and the constitutional reform is about to start, will the minister get an in-depth debate on that important subject under way here in Parliament, so that the federal proposals can reflect the opinions of all hon. members and all parts of the country?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member, with the deep respect in which we hold that noble institution, that we shall endeavour to do all that is necessary to make it possible for hon. members of all the parties to be involved in the process of renewing our constitution and renewing Canadian federalism. Her suggestion is interesting and I am convinced that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada will surely take it into account when the process of renewing our federation gets under way.

Whether the provinces should first be consulted or whether the matter should first be put before Parliament is a question of procedure which must be decided very shortly. In any event, the spirit of the suggestion made by the hon. member will surely be respected and I am convinced that Parliament will have a very useful role to play in the process of renewing the Canadian constitution.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS WILL BE SUFFICIENTLY FLEXIBLE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, on a supplementary, can the minister assure us that the proposals of the government for changing the constitution will have the flexibility required, or will it merely be a repetition of Bill C-60?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I can assure the hon. member that, in light of the referendum results we witnessed last night, it is very obvious that change is wanted; so, the changes that will be suggested and discussed will be those that are needed in the context of the 1980s to make Canada even more viable, more vigorous and more united than ever.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POSITION IN CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I should like to ask him what will be the federal government position in the constitutional debate. Can he tell us whether or not it is the intention of the government to reintroduce Bill C-60, which was before a previous Parliament, in the form it was in then; or do they suggest reintroducing that bill in some other form, or perhaps tabling a white paper? In what way will they introduce the constitutional debate?

● (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the Prime Minister will be outlining in some detail later today the steps he has in mind. But I would say it is not the intention of the government, nor has any decision been reached, to reintroduce Bill C-60.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he can make a commitment that the government will be making some proposals to the House of Commons before it goes to the provinces. Can he make a commitment that we will have a chance to debate some proposals in this House, so that members of all parties have the opportunity of some input into the federal position?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has already indicated in reply to an earlier question that it is the intention and the desire of the government to involve Parliament in this process, and it seems to me it is an absolute requirement that members of the House have the opportunity to make a contribution and express their ideas.

The hon. member is saying today that before making any proposals to the provinces, we ought to have a debate in the House so that members can express their views. While that is a possibility, and I am not rejecting it out of hand at all, I think we have to take a little time to decide which comes first. It may be that the Prime Minister will have some points to make on that matter later today.

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT PRIORITIES CONCERNING REFORM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is again to the Deputy Prime Minister. Can the Deputy Prime Minister indicate to the House the government's priorities regarding constitutional affairs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, as the minister responsible for this issue, I can say that we intend to proceed without delay. As other ministers have said, we believe that a No victory yesterday gave a clear indication to all Canadians that Quebeckers want change, those who voted No as well as a good number of those who voted Yes and who, in this manner, wanted to tell Canadians that they were not satisfied with the status quo. We intend to proceed without delay. But Canada is a federation and we must consult the provinces; we intend to consult both the provinces and Parliament and to act very soon.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—LEADER OF OPPOSITION'S STATEMENT EXCLUDED FROM ENGLISH TELECAST

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): "Merci, madame le Président." My question is for the minister who reports to Parliament for the CBC. In view of the commendable and prominent role taken by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on behalf of the "Non" side in the Quebec referendum campaign—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): —I wonder whether the minister could explain to this House why the former Prime Minister's statement was excluded from the CBC's live television coverage last night on the English-language network; at least, in many parts of this country. I understand it was carried on the French network, but I would like to know why it was excluded from the English telecast.

An hon. Member: It wasn't newsworthy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would just like to add that on this side of the House we also felt that the contribution by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to the campaign was, indeed, a most worth while one and a most welcome one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Fox: As far as the precise question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I would be pleased to bring the matter to the immediate attention of the president of the CBC for his consideration and further reply.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I wonder if, when the minister is checking with Mr. Johnson for an explanation, he would also convey to him and to the corporation the unanimous displeasure of this House for this unfortunate and gross omission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I will surely bring the matter to the attention of the president of the CBC, and I shall make known the point of view expressed by the hon. member in his very strong terms.

FINANCE

OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION SUBSIDY—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister of Finance.

Mr. Crosbie: He has no capacity for that.

Mr. Andre: In his mini-budget on April 21, the Minister of Finance indicated that he expected to reduce the $3.1 billion import compensation subsidy by $1 billion this fiscal year. Given the general price increases in imports by all the major oil exporting countries, including a $4 a barrel increase by Canada's major supplier, Venezuela, can the minister tell the House whether it is still his intention to reduce the oil import compensation subsidy by $1 billion to $2.1 billion for this fiscal year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I said in my economic statement on April 21, a blended price system could achieve savings of up to $1 billion.

Mr. Crosbie: How?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I see it now. That is very interesting.

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, if I recall the words exactly, they were "as much as $1 billion".

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are a great laugh, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: That is what was said. Obviously, the changes that have taken place in the price of international supplies affect that estimate, as the estimates were greatly increased as a result of increases in oil prices that occurred from December to April. That is one of the unfortunate facts with which a minister of finance must wrestle.

I can only tell the hon. member that the blended price system can achieve results, but the greater the increase in international prices, the greater the difficulty.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance, when faced with this horrendous $14.7 billion deficit figure, indicated "Don't worry; we will take off $1 billion from the import compensation to reduce that." Now the minister seems to be wavering.

Could the minister confirm to the House, in order to meet the campaign commitment of less than a $4 a barrel increase in domestic crude oil this year, that he will in fact violate the commitment which he made a month ago today, on April 21, to the House about reducing the import compensation program?

While the minister is on his feet, perhaps he would indicate what he expects the import compensation program to be for this year, since we now know what the price of imported crude oil will cost and, therefore, the demand upon that fund.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that it is not my intention to violate any of the commitments that were made in the April 21 economic statement. With respect to the question as to what is now the precise burden of the oil import compensation program, I would be pleased to get those updated figures and make them available to the House and to the hon. member.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TO HELP FARMERS IF DROUGHT OCCURS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the very serious situation in western Canada with regard to the lack of rainfall. As the minister is aware, there has been a considerable lack of rain, not only over this past spring but over the past winter and the previous fall. This lack of rain has resulted, in many areas, in poor germination, a lack of water and a lack of pasture for grazing animals.

I know that the minister convened a federal task force in Regina which was set up to assess this situation. Would the minister now be prepared to go ahead and assume some responsibility in terms of co-ordinating the various efforts of the provincial governments and some of the local governments to not only transport feed and animals around the pasture, but to pump water to some areas which do not have a water supply?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that several federal departments are involved besides the Department of Agriculture, including the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. They are working very closely with the provincial departments which are also involved.

We have received a preliminary report from these groups. I believe that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board attended one of the meetings informally. However, we hope to be meeting shortly in a more formal way with the provincial ministers to put some of the things mentioned by the hon. member into force.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, any of the programs which can be put into place will be welcome. Another potential problem which is showing up is the lack of pasture. As a result, many producers will be forced into liquidating some of their breeding stock. Would the minister give this House the commitment that he will think about feed supplies as they relate to not only the summer but the fall?

In view of the fact that we are now in some cases looking for feed grain from the Canadian Wheat Board, would the minister take steps, now, to see that there will be adequate feed for the summer, into the fall and possibly into the winter? Doing this would go a long way to assuring producers they will not have to sell some of their breeding herds.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I have already had a meeting with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board from Saskatchewan, from the other place. That was about one hour ago. We discussed this very matter to make sure that an ample amount of feed grain is kept in position in western Canada.

The hon. member mentioned the supply of fodder, forage, etc. We will be using the contingency plans which were put in place in 1977 and which are still there to be used if the weather continues to be dry.

We know that the pastures are very bad and that there are no huge stocks of any of the normal forages that will be necessary. We will be taking surveys, if they have not already started, in central and eastern Canada to determine what stocks there are there. The emergency programs will be used to harvest products here if the dry weather continues.

However, we are still praying. I heard an hon. member say that our prayers were answered last night. Who knows; they may be answered before the end of May. I am told that if we get rain before the end of May, many of our problems will be partly solved.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DENIAL OF COST OF LIVING INCREASE TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is to the government House leader as a member of the Commission of Internal Economy. It concerns an announcement made yesterday to the effect that some 300 House of Commons employees, mainly in the committees and publications branches, have been denied cost of living increases which are to be awarded soon to other groups of Commons employees. There will be a delay of some eight months, until next December, pending a study to be undertaken dealing with, among other matters, reclassification, pay scales, and so forth.

Since there is no question that this decision of the Commissioners of Internal Economy will cause hardship to at least some of the frozen employees, has the government considered granting a "without prejudice" COLA increase for the period between now and December when, presumably, new classifications and pay scales will apply?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is a matter which is clearly under my jurisdiction. The hon. member is referring to discussions which have been taking place between officials of the House of Commons and some employees of the House of Commons. If the hon. member wishes to have supplementary information about these questions, he can come to my office or send me a letter. I would be only too glad to answer his queries.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I accept your kind invitation. My supplementary does not deal with matters which are before your jurisdiction at the moment. May I be allowed to proceed with my supplementary to the same minister?

The existing administrative problems, plus the need for extensive revision of classification, pay scales, grievance and appeal procedures are due in large measure to the traditional denial of collective bargaining rights by House of Commons staff. Since a 1967 parliamentary committee unanimously recommended the granting of equivalent rights to House of Commons employees as are accorded to other public servants, can the enlightened minister tell the House when the government intends to extend long overdue, basic collective bargaining rights to employees of this institution?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): In no way would I appeal directly or indirectly the decision which Madam Speaker has just rendered. The working conditions of House of Commons employees are indeed being reviewed by our Internal Economy Committee which is chaired by the Speaker of the House. A number of meetings have already been held concerning this, others will be held, and I certainly do not intend to report today to the House on the progress of these discussions within the Internal Economy Committee. I might add, however, that the welfare and good working conditions of House of Commons employees are in good hands.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST DOMESTIC PRICE OF WHEAT BE INCREASED TO ASSIST WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture regarding the very serious problem of drought and the high cost of farm operations in western Canada.

In regard to the domestic wheat price paid to farmers in this very serious area, I wonder if the minister would reconsider increasing the domestic price of wheat to $6 per bushel in order to give immediate relief to farmers in that area.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I will discuss this with my colleagues who are also concerned with the problem.

Oral Questions

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE PROTECTION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION OF DISABLED CITIZENS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister announced outside the House last Thursday, at long last, that she was activating the Canadian Organizing Committee for the 1981 International Year of Disabled Persons.

In order to make certain that 1980 and 1981 will really be banner years for Canada's disabled citizens, will she assure the House that the government will proceed to amend the Human Rights Act in order to provide full protection to the disabled against discrimination, a commitment that was made by the Conservative government and reinforced in the Speech from the Throne? Will this be done before the Rehabilitation International Congress which opens in Winnipeg on June 22?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, since the House has set up a committee made up of representatives from the various parties in the House, including the hon. member, to look into the problems of all handicapped persons in Canada, I feel it would be more appropriate to wait for the representations which both handicapped persons and hon. members will make to the committee; I am aware, as I said, that the hon. member is particularly eager to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect all handicapped from discrimination. That is a matter which we have looked into ourselves in all the departments concerned and which, in turn, the committee will surely want to look into.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Madam Speaker, I am interested in the reference by the minister to the Committee on the Handicapped. As she knows, this committee was delayed because of the election. It was appointed on November 29.

Is the minister informing the House that this select committee is going to be reactivated so that it may complete its study and report in time for the International Year of Disabled Persons in 1981? It had been my understanding that the committee had been transformed into a task force. Are we now proceeding with a select committee which will report directly to Parliament on all matters pertaining to services to the handicapped?

Miss Bégin: Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, I am no specialist in power struggles between some hon. members. I do not know of the different suggestions of problems made by the hon. member. To my knowledge, there was a proposal for a task force which was to start work as soon as possible. It was delayed by the party of the hon. member in interparty negotiations.

I am very anxious that the matter find a solution and that hon. members of all parties start working on that committee. Perhaps the hon. member could convey his sense of urgency to his leader in the discussions between House leaders.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Inasmuch as this committee started work last November 29 and was interrupted by the election, I am asking the minister if it is going to be reactivated in its original form.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, we had supported the first committee. Democracy interrupted the course of events for a few months. I thought the hon. member had already had a few meetings himself with the chairman of the committee. I do not quite understand the game in which he tries to catch me.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS OF WIDOWS OF VETERANS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the urgent need for the long promised legislation to provide pensions to widows of veterans where the veteran's disability pension was rated below 48 per cent, and in view of the assurance given to me last Thursday by the President of the Privy Council that I would not have to ask this question many more times, can the minister say how soon he will be bringing in that bill?

Mr. Nielsen: Or how many more times you have to ask the question?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, I cannot give a definite date but most of the work has been done. The legislation that was brought in previously, as I have said before in this House, was good legislation. I have reviewed it and I am making some adjustments. I hope to be able to bring it forward, at least before my cabinet colleagues, before too long.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister. When that legislation is brought in, will it also deal with the matter of tying the basic rate of the disability pension to the formula established in 1973, instead of having to relegislate it every few years? Will it also bring forward the promised revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Mr. MacDonald: The last question first, Madam Speaker. The revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act will be completed before very long and we will be dealing with that. We have a portion of it now. As far as adjustments to the disability pension are concerned, we reviewed that recently, but I do not contemplate bringing that legislation before the House at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM—ONE-PRICE POLICY FOR CANADA

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and is supplementary to the questions asked by the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Will the minister give assurance to this House and to the residents of eastern Canada that the petroleum import subsidy will continue, in order to maintain a one-price policy for Canada and to protect eastern Canadian consumers from the unconscionable, unjust and unreasonable prices imposed by the OPEC Shylocks?

Mr. Crosbie: Be careful.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to terminate this particular program until a successful negotiation and the application of a blended price.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are finished.

STEPS TO OVERCOME EFFECTS IN CANADA OF U.S. RECESSION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, the acting deputy minister. It was announced in Newfoundland yesterday that Wabush Mine, which operates an iron ore mine in Labrador, has suffered a 15 per cent loss of sales of its product to the United States this year because of depression or recession in the United States, and as a result for one month—the month of July—all of its workers are going to be laid off or have to go on their holidays.

What steps is the minister taking to try to overcome such effects of the recession in the United States as are now becoming evident in Canada? What steps is he taking to overcome these effects? Can he take any steps at all? What is his position on this?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): With respect to the workers affected by the lay-off, as the hon. member knows, they will be able to take advantage of programs especially in place at the present time to get them over what the hon. member describes as a short period.

In connection with the recession that may be taking place and is undoubtedly beginning in the United States, the hon. member raises a question that is very broad indeed. As he knows, there are only, in a sense, two ways that one can act in circumstances of this kind; that is, through increased spending or through reduced taxes in order to stimulate the Canadian economy. I have not yet reached the conclusion that that is an appropriate stance to take at the present time.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has now been in office since the end of February. He has taken a very sanguine and somewhat lackadaisical attitude toward these economic problems. I ask the minister this: the forecast in the United States now is that the U.S. recession—and this is the consensus of the economists—is going to run from at least this current quarter to the end of the year with a drop in real output of 2.6 per cent. This, obviously, will have very severe effects on Canada, since 75 per cent of our exports go to the U.S.

We have just seen the effects of this in Labrador and the iron mining industry. Will the minister give us an up-to-date forecast by his department—or can he supply that now—of what they expect economic growth will be in Canada this year? Has the forecast changed since his mini-budget that he bootlegged into the House in April? Has it now changed? Is the forecast worse? If it is, what steps is he contemplating taking, or is he worrying about the situation at all?

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. member knows, in the statement made in the House on April 21, I attempted to set forth what the prospects were for the Canadian economy. I did reduce somewhat the projections for growth which the hon. member had presented previously, in December. I have not yet changed those economic forecasts.

However, I would tell the hon. member that in these circumstances it may be very difficult for Canada to insulate itself completely from the effects of a recession in the United States. I would also add that if he is suggesting in these circumstances the Minister of Finance take steps to increase the deficit further, probably in the long run we would be doing more damage to the future of the Canadian economy than we would be in taking a short-run step of that kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DETRIMENTAL EFFECTS FROM VOLCANIC ASH ERUPTION OF MOUNT ST. HELENS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the massive fall-out patterns displayed by the volcanic ash created by the eruption of Mount St. Helens, and considering the presence of this ash at a time when climatic conditions in western Canada are already approaching that of a drought, does the minister intend to immediately commission a study to examine the effects of the ash fall-out on wildlife, forests, agriculture and climate?

Has the government yet initiated any investigation, in particular this minister in his role as a member of the planning and policy committee for civil defence, as a precaution against the eruption of Mount Baker, which is located just across the border from Vancouver and is, in fact, listed as an active volcano by the United States Geological Survey and has shown increased signs of activity recently?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. As to the first part of his question, the atmospheric environment service has already under investigation the long-term effects of the eruption, so it may not be necessary at this time to establish the commission the hon. member requested. I will look into the situation as far as Mount Baker is concerned and report back to him.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the continent-wide fall-out patterns displayed by the volcanic debris from the Mount St. Helens eruption—I might add that that particular cloud is so far-reaching that it in fact passed over Ottawa las night—and considering that these patterns are very similar to that of a radioactive cloud that would be created by a nuclear explosion, and in view of the Prime Minister's tentative response to my question that he would look into this matter last week, can the Acting Prime Minister, who shares responsibility for civil defence planning policies, now offer his assurances to the House that Canadians would be adequately protected against a similar radioactive fall-out pattern resulting from a nuclear war of much greater magnitude than the eruption of St. Helens?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving an indication this morning to the Prime Minister's office that he would be raising this matter. All I can tell him at the present time is that there are plans in place to protect Canadians against radioactive fall-out. The responsibility for the detailed implementation of these plans is in the hands of the provinces, but the Department of Public Works and the Department of National Defence are the federal departments that have the most direct responsibility in this field.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

RESIGNATION OF MICHAEL McCABE—AMOUNT OF SEVERANCE PAY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. As he knows, the head of the CFDC, Mr. Michael McCabe, resigned. Can he confirm that Mr. McCabe was given one year's full salary for severance pay and, if so, is that not a little too much solicitude for somebody who has resigned?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, Mr. McCabe did, indeed, tender his resignation from the Canadian Film Development Corporation two weeks ago, I believe. The resignation is effective at the end of June. I am not aware of what administrative arrangements he has come to to negotiate with the corporation upon termination of his assignment with them.

Mr. Friesen: Two years ago, when Mr. McCabe came into that position, he was given the highest recommendation by the former secretary of state, the present Minister of the Environment—indeed, very great accolades. I would ask the Secretary of State the reasons for the resignation, if he had all the competence that the former secretary of state said he had.

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I would like to say, on behalf of Mr. McCabe, that the Canadian Film Development Corporation has known a great deal of activity and has been very successful in the two years that he has been the executive director of the corporation.

He indicated in his letter of resignation that he felt he had made his contribution to the corporation, that he wished to return to the private sector, and he thought this was the best time to leave the corporation so that he could pursue his own private interests in the future.

MEASURES TO AVOID FURTHER SLOWDOWN

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given that it takes at least six months for any change in taxation arrangements, or any other stimulus in the economy, to have some effect in combating recession, and given that any substantial increase in the price of oil and, indeed, of natural gas is the equivalent of a very serious tax increase at a time when Canada is heading into a recession, I wonder if the minister is aware and if he would care to comment on the fact that if he waits on any budgetary measures until the fall, this in effect means that the slowdown of the Canadian economy which is already taking place will have taken hold by the fall and will have a firm grip on the country later on.

Is he serious in saying that he does not contemplate taking any measures other than the energy price increases until the fall of this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not believe very much in bringing in a budget that is based upon assumptions rather than facts. That is the difficulty that exists at the present time.

I would also add, in reply to my hon. friend, that I am not satisfied in my own mind that if I were bringing in a budget tomorrow it would be in Canada's interest to run up a further deficit in an effort to insulate the Canadian economy from a possible recession in the U.S. economy. I am ready to receive views on that subject, but certainly I have not reached that conclusion in my own mind yet.

Mr. Rae: We have all heard of the invisible hand, but this is the first time we have been offered a virtually invisible policy and a virtually invisible Minister of Finance at a time when the country is looking for leadership. The minister has had some time in which to make up his mind, and I think it is about time he did so.

He stated in this interview in the Star that he was particularly concerned about the current account deficit. Given his concern about the level of the current account deficit, how can he justify an interest rate policy applied by the governor of the Bank of Canada which would only have the effect of discouraging investment, exports and export-related industries and drive us into debt as we attract even more foreign investment?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the financial critic for the New Democratic Party would have the gall to discuss interest rate policy. His party put forward a motion just after the House opened asking us to reduce interest rates by two points. Presumably his party regarded that as the norm. Well, rates are less than that norm today.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROMBIE—STATEMENTS MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

[Editor's Note: The Leader of the Official Opposition entered the chamber.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, when I gave notice of my question of privilege I did, indeed, think it was of importance. But I had no idea it would command the kind of attention it has received.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for attending and I make this offer through you, Madam Speaker; should either of these gentlemen wish to make a statement I would be only too glad to yield the floor and raise my question of privilege later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUEBEC REFERENDUM RESULT

STEPS TO IMPLEMENT CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

Madam Speaker: I understand that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other party leaders wish to make statements, but these should be made when statements are called. I do not think there is agreement to change the order of business but, if there is unanimous consent, I am willing to accept now the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister as well as those of the other party leaders.

Is there unanimous consent from the House to hear the right hon. Prime Minister now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, yesterday, in a provincial referendum, the people of Quebec opted overwhelmingly for the continuation of the Canadian experiment.

It was under trying circumstances that the people of Quebec had to make this fundamental choice. The question forced them to affirm their allegiance to Canada by a negative vote whereas, being people of action and people looking toward the future, they would much rather have done so in a more explicit and more affirmative way. They were forced to say no to an impasse, to a negotiation which was doomed right from the outset whereas, as people of progress and change, they would have preferred to open even wider the doors to renewal and reform. That fundamental choice has often been very painful since in the passionate atmosphere in which the referendum was held, they were urged to dissociate and even to oppose on the one hand their loyalty toward their French heritage, which is fundamental, and their affection for Quebec, which is extremely deep, and, on the other hand, their sense of belonging in Canada which is indestructible.

I must therefore commend, first of all, the men and women who had the strength to say no in spite of all the attractive features with which that political rupture, which would also have become an internal conflict, had been embellished. But I also hasten to express my respect to those who, having supported with such devotion the other option, must now find the strength to yield to the will of the majority. This referendum has compelled us to state where we stand but it must not divide us. I would like to remind both winners and losers that democratic life does not proceed only from the opinion of the majority but also from the expression and inclusion of the opinions of minorities. That is why changes and progress in societies that claim to be democracies are achieved through compromise rather than coercion. The fact that we have lived 113 years in a democratic system in Canada allows me to assure the supporters of the other option that their deep aspirations will be met by political changes, different, of course, from those they contemplated, and that they will continue to stamp the evolution of our society and to stress what makes its originality.

I would like to express the deep gratitude of the House and of all Canadians to the leader of the No camp, Mr. Claude Ryan. As the leader of the Quebec Liberal party and thus as the leader of the official opposition in the National Assembly, he has become the one who rallied all Quebeckers who refused to give up their national heritage, the land of our ancestors. A tireless Claude Ryan travelled for months to every corner of the province to expound to his fellow citizens the exalting option he had proposed to them as early as February, 1979—choosing both Quebec and Canada. All along the referendum campaign, with a great sense of understanding and despite many conflicting points of view, he was able to mobilize men and women from all walks of life and of every political persuasion who wanted to stand behind Canada's banner. And I emphasize that beside him were constantly standing two former premiers of Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage and Mr. Robert Bourassa. Their presence was the symbol of a continuity which, from Lafontaine to Cartier, from Mercier to Laurier, from Taschereau to Lapointe and, later, from St. Laurent to Lesage, has always mirrored that of a majority of Quebeckers. Claude Ryan follows in their illustrious steps and his contribution to a renewed Canadian federation will no doubt be irreplaceable provided Quebeckers give him the opportunity and the means.

You are not without knowing, Madam Speaker, for the very reason that you are one of them, that all Quebeckers sitting in this House actively participated in the referendum campaign. You are aware as well that all members from all parties and regions of Canada made things easier for us, either by relieving us of some of our duties or by gracefully agreeing to changes in the conventions which regulate relations between our political formations. To all of them I, therefore, extend my congratulations and the appreciation of a grateful Canadian people.

Madam Speaker, I want to stress at this point the essential part played during the referendum campaign by my old friend and colleague, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien). I need not insist on the generosity, perception and political talents of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, whose outstanding qualities have been at work daily in this House for nearly 17 years. By its very nature the referendum gave us the obligation, as members from Quebec, to take part in the campaign, as we were invited to by Mr. Ryan, but our participation had to be consistent and efficient. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice was in control over that and dicharged his reponsibility with exceptional aggressiveness. He could mobilize and stimulate us when we were in danger of getting either discouraged or overly confident. With the same energy and love of country he will succeed in animating over the coming months the renewal of our Canadian federation.

[English]

On behalf of all Canadians I would like to thank also the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) for supporting the position it was incumbent upon me to take on behalf of the Government of Canada on the fundamental issues raised by the Quebec referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The presence of the Leader of the Opposition beside Mr. Ryan and leaders of other federalist parties on the hustings of Rimouski and Shawinigan during the referendum campaign was the living symbol of the unity and solidarity which bind all Canadians. With all his eloquence, the right hon. member for Yellowhead reminded the people of Quebec in their own language that the Canada which our opponents were attacking had ceased to exist, that the so-called status quo was a figment of the separatists' imagination, and that all Canadians from all parts of Canada were pressing for change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The premiers of other provinces also played an important role in the referendum campaign. On behalf of their constituents they too assured Quebeckers that they were not only open to change but also impatient to renew the Constitution of Canada. With remarkable restraint at the meeting of Atlantic premiers in Halifax and at the meeting of western premiers in Lethbridge, and in individual speeches made by Premiers Davis, Blakeney and Bennett, all provincial leaders explained why a vote for sovereignty-association would lead to deadlock, why an economic association not founded on political unity could not be negotiated, and why the government of Quebec, no matter what the result of the referendum might have been, could not possibly have forced them to negotiate on that basis. In so doing the provincial premiers have done a signal service to the cause of Canadian unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: I would also like to pay tribute to the brotherly understanding and sympathy extended by Canadians in other provinces to their fellow countrymen in Quebec throughout the debate that led to yesterday's referendum. Starting from the early 1960s, faced with the turmoil of ideas, contestation and social changes that excited Quebeckers, English-speaking Canadians across the land did not remain indifferent. They came up with a question rather than a refusal: What does Quebec want? That now famous question, of course, reflected a somewhat disquieted incomprehension of the social currents at work in Quebec, but for the main part it spoke for the open-mindedness and understanding of our English-speaking fellow Canadians.

[English]

The past few years have indeed been trying times for the people of all parts of Canada. The issues raised by Quebec separatists were of critical importance to people in other provinces, since the very existence of our country was at stake; yet the nature of the referendum process launched by the Parti Québécois tended to exclude them from the agonizing debate and to inhibit their participation in the campaign. There were times when many of them may have felt that Quebec had become a national obsession, to the detriment of their own needs and aspirations. There were times when the frustration and sense of helplessness of many may have become almost unbearable, but throughout this period of crisis people in other provinces followed the critical struggle in Quebec with forbearance, tolerance, patience and hope.

Ironically, one of the greatest tributes to the political maturity and democratic spirit of Canadians may have come from one of the leaders of the Parti Québécois, the chief architect of the strategy of étatisme, Monsieur Claude Morin. "In virtually all other countries of the world", Monsieur Morin said recently, "what we of the Parti Québécois have been able to do would have been illegal".

Indeed, where else in the world could a political party have openly advocated the break-up of a country? Where else could a separatist movement have had free access to the media, complete freedom to run candidates in any election, the right to form a government of a province, and the prerogative to use all the resources which our constitution makes available to a provincial administration to advance its cause?

Thus, Madam Speaker, all Canadians can take pride in yesterday's victory. It is not only the victory of Claude Ryan and of Quebec federalists; it is a triumph for Canadian democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We strongly hope and believe it signals the end of a long period of uncertainty, of doubt and strained relations between Quebec and the other provinces of Canada and between French and English-speaking Canadians. It marks a new beginning. It heralds a period of healing and rebuilding. By voting for Canada the people of Quebec have recognized that their fellow Canadians are prepared to listen to them, to understand them, and to meet their legitimate aspirations.

But Quebeckers have also shown that they themselves are prepared to hear what other Canadians have to say, to find out what their aspirations are and to help them to realize their dreams. We Canadians are now agreed on a common destination, and that was the fundamental issue. What we must now do is chart a new course and agree on a common itinerary toward that common destination.

Such is the profound meaning, the only possible interpretation of yesterday's referendum. The majority of Quebec voters have refused to give their provincial government the mandate to negotiate the withdrawal of Quebec from the Canadian federation even though they had been assured over and over again that that could be done while maintaining some form of economic association with the rest of the country. Those voters said no because they put their confidence in Canada. They said no because they accepted the assurances from Mr. Ryan of the Liberal party of Quebec, and from the other federalist groups in that province. They accepted the assurances from the premiers of the other regions of the country, from the Leader of the Official Opposition, from the Leader of the New Democratic Party, from all my colleagues in the Liberal Party of Canada and from myself that changes were not only possible within confederation but that the rejection of the option advocated by the Parti Québécois would take us out of the dead end and allow us at last to renew our political system.

On the other hand, we know that a large proportion of those who voted yes did so not because they were in favour of independence for Quebec but because they had doubts about our assurances and felt that they would better promote changes by giving tactical support to the Parti Québécois.

I base this interpretation not only on the polls taken before the referendum, but also on the many statements reported in the press these last few months and on the referendum rhetoric of the Parti Québécois. Altogether, what Quebeckers expressed yesterday was a massive support for change within the federal framework. We cannot venture to ignore this will to change which reflects that of all other areas in the country and to fall short of the expectations of Canadians. This is why, on May 14, I solemnly undertook to launch the constitutional renewal and never stop working at it until Canada finally has a new constitution.

However, we would be deceiving ourselves if we were to believe that it will be easy to keep this commitment. We shall need the constant support of the Canadian people and their representatives within this Parliament. We are also counting on the support of all provincial governments, including that of Quebec. We shall all have to agree on the basic principles underlying our efforts. We have to be receptive to the needs and aspirations of all Canadians, to seek together for methods and mechanisms more effective than those used until now and to be willing to make every effort required to achieve success. For that purpose, I have asked the Minister of Justice to begin immediately a tour of the provincial capitals in order to obtain the views of the premiers on the best way to follow up on their will to change. As for us, our only prerequisites for change are the two which I outlined in Quebec as early as January, 1977.

First, that Canada continue to be a real federation, a state whose constitution establishes a federal Parliament with real powers applying to the country as a whole and provincial legislatures with powers just as real applying to the territory of each province. Second, that a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms be entrenched in the new constitution and that it extend to the collective aspect of these rights, such as language rights.

I had said at the time and I say again today that we consider everything else to be negotiable. What we want is to give Canada a new, modern and functional federal constitution which will enable our governments to better meet the needs and aspirations of all Canadians. This new constitution could include, if the people so wish, several provisions in our present organic laws, but, it will also have to contain new elements reflecting the most innovative proposals emerging from our consultations or from the numerous analyses and considered opinions that have flowed in the last few years from the will to change of Canadians. I am referring, of course, to the many proposals made by the Canadian government since 1968, but also to the Pepin-Robarts report, to the policy papers issued by the governments of British Columbia, Ontario, Alberta and by almost every province but Quebec, to the constitutional proposals of the Liberal party of Quebec, many elements of which could orient the renewal of our constitution if they were ever put forward by the political authorities of that province.

Having said that, we must look into the possibility of making progress in this direction without the co-operation of the Quebec government. This is why I asked Premier Lévesque during the referendum campaign what he would do if the No should win and until now his response has been that he would accept crumbs of autonomy but with some grumbling. But Quebeckers do not want crumbs of autonomy or anything else. They have rejected independence, rejected sovereignty-association while massively calling for changes in Canadian federalism. In other words, Quebeckers will not be satisfied with crumbs because they want a brand new constitution and all other Canadians, through their political leaders, federal as well as provincial, have indicated that they also want a new constitution.

Is Mr. Lévesque ready to accept this will to change? Are his party and government ready to put independence or sovereignty-association aside? Is he and are his ministers willing to participate sincerely, loyally, actively in the renewal of Canadian federalism or will they try to maintain the status quo in Canada in an effort to exploit the feeling of frustration which would be the upshot? Madam Speaker, only time will tell.

But that is the general context in which Mr. Chrétien is undertaking as early as tonight a tour of the provinces. Once he has reported to me, I will be able to consult with the leaders of other parties in Parliament, to communicate with all premiers and advise as to the best means of achieving the renewal of the constitution. As for now, all I can say with certainty is that my government is deeply convinced that the constitutional renewal process must be undertaken promptly. As for us, we are committing ourselves to see that everything will be in progress before the summer recess.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I wish to begin my remarks in the House today by congratulating Mr. Claude Ryan and all the members of his team who won yesterday an important victory for Canada after an honest and strong campaign which showed a deep faith in Canada's future. I also want to commend the role played by my friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by all other members who were directly involved in Quebec by their actions or by their remarks in this House during the referendum period.

[English]

I think that it would be well too to underline that many of the Quebeckers, many of the 40 per cent who voted for the "Oui" yesterday in the referendum, were people who were not at all lost to the federalist cause. Many of those who allied themselves proudly and enthusiastically with the "Oui" option did so because, for one reason or another, they had come to lose faith in the force of federalism. I believe we can prove that that faith should not be abandoned among those Quebeckers and among others. I believe it is important for Canadians across the country to know that a large number of the 40 per cent who voted for the "Oui" option yesterday are people who can be won back to federalism.

● (1530)

I think that we, particularly in this House, and those who serve in governments across the country, should recognize that the obligation is very heavy upon all of us to take a role of leadership in reaching out to those who, for a moment, lost faith in the viability of the federal system and to prove to them by our actions that there is a great deal of room for growth, a great deal of room for their aspirations as Quebeckers and as Canadians, to be realized within the context of a broad, large land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Also if I may, I want to commend the Prime Minister for acting so quickly after the referendum to set in train activities which will move us quickly toward real progress on the development of a new constitution for the country. I am pleased that the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) will be visiting provincial governments. I would hope that he will not forget to visit the governments of the territories.

Mr. Nielsen: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In any consultations that carry forward, and in any machinery that is established, I hope there will be an opportunity for the elected members of the Yukon and Northwest Territories Council to play a full and an active role in those discussions.

We are dealing with circumstances now which have never before existed in Canada.

[Translation]

First of all, as the right hon. Prime Minister said during the referendum campaign, the main federal political parties, my party, the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, as well as the Liberal Party of Canada, have both solemnly committed themselves to a renewed Canadian federalism. The same commitment was made by the provincial premiers who were unanimous in denouncing the status quo. We were sincere in making that commitment and I am confident that the Prime Minister and his provincial colleagues were every bit as sincere as I was when they called for a renewal of the Canadian federation. Madam Speaker, we must make the best possible use of the climate of sincerity and good will that now exists throughout Canada, and see to it that our common objective, a renewed Canadian federalism, is achieved.

[English]

The second circumstance that is new is that, for the first time in a long time, it is my view the public of Canada are now interested in constitutional reform. There is a genuine feeling on the part of Canadians, in whatever province, territory or region of this country, that it is time to bring our constitution up to date with the realities of a modern country. That is true and that is important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Finally, a third circumstance that has changed and is significant is that this country, Canada, has changed in the last 20 years. It has changed dramatically. It has changed to the point where old constitutional arrangements no longer fit. In my view it is this last point which perhaps is most important—the old constitution no longer fits the modern country. That is true not just in Quebec but in other parts of Canada where real and profound changes have occurred in the last 20 years. We are not dealing now with an academic matter or a question of interest only to governments. We must bring our way of governing Canada into line with the modern realities of the country.

Constitutional forms are an important part of that process. We need a new constitution. I welcome the commitment made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice which was reaffirmed here today. It is a commitment, which I share, to a new constitution for Canada. We need a constitution that is located here in our country, a constitution that can be amended here in our country, a constitution that guarantees certain fundamental rights, and a constitution that articulates a sharing of powers that is appropriate to a diverse federal country. We now have a climate where that can be achieved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But I make the point that more than the law and more than the constitution is at issue here. There must also be a positive attitude among citizens and among governments, an attitude which is consistent with the changes in law and the changes in form. Among the citizens of Canada there is developing an attitude of respect for fellow Canadians of different backgrounds and a growing pride in the diversity and in the strength of the Canadian family.

[Translation]

Perhaps I can speak more specifically of the changes that now exist in Quebec, that exist in the so-called Anglophone community in the rest of Canada, because I am very much impressed by the deep changes achieved outside Quebec especially with regard to the aspirations of the Quebec people and the respect for the French language throughout Canada. There has been a change, a new respect upon which we can build a great country in the future.

[English]

I must say, however, that while those attitudes have changed among the citizens of the country, it is not so clear that attitudes among governments have changed. I think it is important that we address that question frankly here today.

I want to take the opportunity, in the climate of good will and of near celebration that exists in this House today after the referendum results, to point out to the Prime Minister that it would be futile for the Government of Canada to be seeking to draw provinces together to discuss constitutional change if, at the same time, the actions of Ottawa on other fronts were driving provinces and people apart.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I think we all know that the sense of being a nation is influenced as much by conduct as it is by constitutions. The success of renewal will be based upon genuine respect for the other partners in confederation. It would be both unwise and irresponsible for the Government of Canada, or for the governments of the provinces, to perpetuate an attitude of confrontation, or to seek to resolve legitimate differences by methods which erode trust or make co-operation impossible.

Hopefully yesterday's referendum in Quebec will provide very real impetus to the process of change and renewal. But the desire—indeed it is more than a desire—the demand for change is not simply a matter of that referendum and indeed not simply a matter of that province. It is a desire shared by all of the provinces and virtually all of the people of Canada. That fact must be reflected in the agenda for change which this government now has a responsibility to place before the country. It must be truly a Canadian agenda not simply an Ottawa agenda, a Quebec agenda, an Alberta agenda or a Newfoundland agenda. Other provinces and other regions have specific proposals for change to which they are equally committed as Quebeckers are, and which they have a right to expect will be debated openly and honestly by all involved in the process.

Certainly patriation, an amending formula, and entrenchment of rights are legitimate subjects for our Canadian agenda, but so is resource jurisdiction, including offshore resources, so is communications policy, and so are proposals to make some national institutions more effective and more representative of regional realities and regional needs. It is not simply that we now have before us a rare opportunity, a rare atmosphere of openness and good will, within which to address the whole Canadian agenda. It is equally that we simply will not achieve a genuine or lasting consensus if some parts of this country or some regions of Canada feel their needs are excluded from the Canadian agenda or are given secondary status in national debate and negotiation.

[Translation]

I was encouraged by the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister when he said earlier today that except for the basic principles he mentioned, all the other matters are negotiable because, to my mind, that commitment is essential to the future of the constitutional renewal process, since hon. members of the House of Commons and the Canadian people throughout the land view differently some of the constitutional proposals.

[English]

For example, I believe the Prime Minister and I have different views about the contribution to Canadian unity of the consciousness of being a people like the Quebeckers, or of being a region like the west, or of being a province. I have a sense that he is concerned that these more local loyalties will drain strength from the larger community. I believe they are a source of strength. Some members of his party agree with me; probably some members of mine agree with him. But, that question must be addressed openly by all sides. We cannot let our work be limited by the prejudices of a Prime Minister or a Leader of the Opposition, or anyone else. We are agreed on the framework of the federal system. The people of Quebec yesterday in a massive and dramatic way indicated their agreement with a federal framework, and now we must build and go where the facts of modern Canada lead us in giving flesh and form to that federal system.

● (1540)

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has indicated his intention to consult leaders of other parties here, and I welcome that. I want to anticipate that consultation and make publicly one suggestion that I think should be very much on the agenda of change.

As the Prime Minister and as the House know, one of our weaknesses as a country so far has been our failure, at least to this date, to develop national institutions which genuinely command the respect of the whole country. Some progress has been made. I believe progress was made by the late Right Hon. Lester Pearson and his government with the introduction of the Canadian flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am delighted to learn that today a Standing Order 43 motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), regarding a national anthem for this country, was accepted.

But, Madam Speaker, we sit here today in one Canadian institution, the only one that has live and genuine roots in every corner of this land. Parliament itself can become the strongest genuine national institution, but it will not have strength until it has real power, and the tendency of the last several years has been to take power from Parliament and to concentrate it in parties, or concentrate it in government.

When we were the government, as the House knows, we introduced proposals for parliamentary reform which were designed specifically to increase the influence of individual members of Parliament, and consequently to expand both the range of advice available to government, and the respect available to this institution. I would hope that the Prime Minister will recognize that one of the ways to connect the parts of this country to the whole of this country—one of the ways to ensure a genuine sense of the Canadian nation—will be to strengthen the most representative and national of our institutions, the House of Commons itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I said frequently during the referendum campaign that the referendum itself was a question for Quebeckers to decide, but that the work of constitutional renewal was the work of all Canadians. Yesterday's vote in Quebec ended the referendum campaign, but it did not end the demand in Quebec for change; in fact, it reinforced it vividly and reinforced it dramatically. That referendum cannot and should not be used to silence the aspirations of Quebeckers, for in fact it was an expression of faith and an expression of those aspirations.

For the rest of Canada the vote yesterday was an expression of pride and belief in this country in which we can all joyfully share. It represents a demand for change in which Canadians have every reason to join and, indeed, which other Canadians have articulated in other ways for reasons of their own, or reasons relating to their own situations. That result in Quebec should be used, if I might employ that term, not to frighten or divide Canadians, and I am happy that there is no hint of that today, but to unite Canadians in a common determination to build a renewed federation which can make this a stronger country, a richer country, and a better country in years ahead.

That common determination, Madam Speaker, exists among Canadians; of that I am totally confident. Indeed, as is so often the case, in a very real sense constitutional renewal is catching up to the attitude of Canadians. Canada already has changed and the people of Canada know it. It has changed for the better in our new strengths and our new maturity. What is demanded now; what is fairly and justly demanded of all of us, particularly in this House, is a political system, a federal system, that recognizes the change that is about us, and shapes that change to the betterment of all of Canada.

The vote which took place yesterday, May 20, was but a date in a continuing process. It was by no means an end but a beginning, and now it is up to us in this Parliament and in the Parliaments of the territories and the provinces of Canada to implement the changes which are being sought by Canadians all across this country.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as leader of the Liberal party, and myself, as Leader of the New Democratic Party, have frequently differed in the past, sometimes over frivolous matters, sometimes over very serious matters, but I want to begin my comments today by complimenting the Prime Minister on the very fine statement he made in the House this afternoon and, in particular, for his magnanimous address to the people of the province of Quebec and to every Canadian last night on television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the historical debate that took place in Quebec proves that we have already reached a level of political maturity of which all civilized nations of the world are envious. In spite of some deep divisions within the Quebec society and also elsewhere in Canada, we managed to express our differences democratically. I can tell you without exaggerating that last night we showed that we can get along together despite deep differences. The Quebec people deserve our admiration and respect. Personally, Madam Speaker, I would like to say to those who voted yes in the referendum that their message was understood. Quebec society must come out and do so by setting its own priorities, and that can and must be done within our federation.

Madam Speaker, I am, of course, very pleased with the result of the referendum. The Quebec people indicated clearly yesterday that they want to remain within the Canadian federation. But, as I said earlier, we must recognize, however, that this is not a vote for the status quo. Our federal system of course is not without fault. During that debate, all parties recognized that there was an urgent need for constitutional changes. All party leaders in the House pointed that out this afternoon. The polls indicated, as I have noticed myself during my visits in Quebec during the campaign, that the great majority of Quebeckers want changes to take place as early as possible. Canadians in other provinces must take up the challenge. All Canadians, wherever they are, must respond positively to that major historical event and the federal government must act and be perceived, not only by the Quebec people, but also by all the other Canadians, as a government out to promote the fulfilment of the people in all areas of Canada.

While it would be a mistake of considerable proportion to suggest that the grievances felt elsewhere in Canada, such as in the Atlantic provinces and in the west, are of the same magnitude as those in Quebec, it is nonetheless a reality that must also be addressed at this time of constitutional change. In approaching this constitutional change, the spirit must be one of reconciliation and imagination. A reconciling of the frequently conflicting regional and national claims with imagination could make that possible.

The goal must be to make whatever constitutional changes are relevant as a means of having Canadians, wherever they may be, feel more at home in their own land so that one can be, as the Prime Minister said last night, "at the same time a Québécois and a Canadian".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: Fishermen in Newfoundland, farmers in Saskatchewan, miners in Sept-Îles and people in every region of Canada must see the federal government as an ally, as their government. This is our objective.

[English]

It should go without saying that on this day, while it is appropriate to stress the relevance of constitutional change, to achieve this goal it is also important to note that policies, programs and attitudes are of comparable importance both in the short run and the long run. It is not simply the case that the need for constitutional change is now urgent. I would also like to stress that the means are at hand for achieving this change soon.

Members of Parliament and other Canadians have before them the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate of just a few years ago, the considerations offered by the present government when it was a government just a few years ago, and the counterproposals made by the official opposition and ourselves at that time. There is also the Pepin-Robarts report, and the results of the first ministers' meeting in early 1979 which reached substantial agreement on many matters. Then there is the beige paper prepared by the Liberal party of the province of Quebec. It would be a mistake or simply naive to suggest that all of these reports reach the same conclusions. Of course they do not. In fact they conflict on many important matters.

However, it is important to stress at this time that these reports do provide us with just about all the information we need and an analysis of the implications of different choices which might be reached, depending on the decisions we make in opting for one suggestion as opposed to another. Furthermore, there are areas in which agreement between the federal government and the provinces has been virtually reached or, at least, on which differences are not great. These areas include family law, communications and cultural policy, language rights, and changes in the Supreme Court. These areas, I repeat, are among those on which there has already been achieved substantial agreement. Therefore, they are among those areas with which we could proceed in the immediate future.

During the referendum debate, as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have already indicated, virtually every one of the provincial premiers indicated that they favour early constitutional change. Therefore early action is not only required and desired, but it is also possible at this time. Matters on which agreement can be quickly reached should therefore be quickly settled. Once they are settled we can proceed to more difficult areas, resolve them as best we can in the national interest and regional interests, and give Canada, at long last, a constitution that is located in our own land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, our approach and attitude toward constitutional change will be of very great importance in and of themselves if we are to get the kind of changes that we think are desirable. Now is the time, above all, to rise above partisan considerations.

Over 100 years ago the various elements which were not yet Canada were in a state of crisis in this part of North America. Leaders at that time responded appropriately. The arch political enemies, George Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald, came together in an act of great historical reconciliation. Speaking in the legislature in June, 1864, George Brown explained—and it was difficult for him to do so—the reconciliation with a point which is so relevant to us in Canada today. He said that only the most extreme circumstances could justify reconciliation between himself and his old opponent and that the circumstances which required that were the crises that existed in many parts of the land.

The result of that reconciliation was the birth of a non-partisan approach to nation building. The nation which emerged, of course, was Canada. I would like to suggest that today we are facing similar circumstances and that these circumstances require the same generosity of mind and openness of spirit from members of all parties in the House of Commons.

There are significant matters which divide Liberals, Conservatives, and New Democrats. They will continue to divide us in the future. However, many of the basic constitutional questions—indeed, probably most of them—have absolutely nothing to do with party differences. If we do not recognize this fact now, we will fail both the best traditions of our respective parties and, more important, we will fail the nation. I suggest that we learn from the attitudes of Macdonald and Brown and make a most serious attempt to achieve constitutional reform and consensus as much as possible on a non-partisan basis.

Specifically, I would urge the Prime Minister heading a federal delegation, at the first ministers' meeting or when the time comes, to head a delegation which represents, not only the government party, but Parliament, while maintaining a majority of government members. I would urge, in the spirit of Macdonald and Brown, that the Prime Minister give very serious consideration to the inclusion of the leaders and perhaps other members of the opposition parties.

In this context I would point out that the other parties in the House of Commons have representation from parts of Canada which are not represented in the government party at this time. Also, in this spirit, I urge the Prime Minister to make the same suggestions to the provincial premiers. I have raised this very matter with Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan. He has agreed to take such an open approach with his delegation to any future first ministers' conferences.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I hope that a constitutional conference will take place this summer and that, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) travels around this country—and I appreciate the urgency with which he is now approaching that task—he will discover in the offices of the premiers a willingness to meet this summer to get this needed constitutional change under way. Of course, it is early to predict precisely what should be done at that meeting, but it is unlikely that an agreement on a wide range of difficult matters could be achieved. At least if the meeting could take place early in the summer, say in July, a very specific timetable could be established and it could be expected that two or three months ahead and periodically for the next 12 months or, at most, two years, final and definitive decisions could be reached on the constitution.

• (1600)

I put forward as a suggestion that at least for the discussion of such an agenda, for agreement on such an agenda, a first ministers' meeting be called this summer.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I want to emphasize the spirit of the determination and co-operation that is now needed in our land, and co-operation is the essence. The road ahead will not be easy—we are all aware of that—but I am more confident than ever before that Canada will not only prevail but will survive.

[Translation]

Canada and Quebec will continue together on a common course toward a just and exciting future.

[English]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Crombie: Thank you very much Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I did not know that the hon. member wanted to ask a question. I suppose that is why the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) is rising. I shall recognize the hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It was my understanding of the House agreement that, following the opening statement by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and myself, the Leader of the Opposition and I would be allowed to raise questions.

Madam Speaker: Yes, that is quite in order, but the Leader of the Opposition did not rise. I waited for a while and the hon. member for Oshawa did not rise either. I therefore recognized the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), but I am delighted to recognize the hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, notwithstanding what he said about the intention of the Minister of Justice to travel throughout Canada to obtain suggestions from provincial premiers about the best method of proceeding with constitutional reform, what his own attitude is in response to the suggestion I made in my speech about having an early conference in the middle of summer involving the first ministers with all-party delegations, at least to set out an agenda and fix a timetable. I suggested a two-year time limit so that Canadians, Quebeckers, and people in other parts of our land would know that the process is going to get under way, and soon.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I heard the suggestion made by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. It is a suggestion which I believe had been made by a few of the premiers also, to hold a conference in July. I could not, nor would I want to, announce the holding of such a conference now until I have heard from the Minister of Justice. It is possible that other premiers who have not spoken will hold other views. I would undertake in answer to a question in the House, or possibly by a short statement, to express the view of the government on this after I have heard from the Minister of Justice when he returns. Presumably he will return within the next three or four days from his visits to the provincial capitals.

In so far as the other part of the question is concerned, I think it is a good idea to have an agenda and timetable. Personally, and on behalf of the government, I would tend to be a bit more ambitious than that. I would hope that we would do more, if we have such a meeting, than establish an agenda and timetable. That would seem to be the disposition of all parties in this House, to move on an agenda rather than just establish it.

Concerning delegations which the hon. member also inquired about, it is obvious that at any federal-provincial conference there would be attendance by members of the House and other parties. Whether they could be part of a delegation at a hypothetical conference or not I suppose would depend on the hypothetical question of whether or not we could come together on a common program for action. I would hope that to be the case.

Listening to the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it does seem that perhaps there is a common basis for action on several fronts, in which case I think it would strenghten the position of Parliament if indeed a delegation were composed of the leaders of all parties in this chamber. I would seek to establish this, hopefully successfully, in the course of the next week, after I have had a report from the Minister of Justice and have had occasion to discuss with both hon. leaders opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROMBIE—STATEMENTS MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), last Wednesday, May 14. I might add at the outset that there were some who felt that my question of privilege related to a comment she made earlier in her statement, in relation to her use of French and my use of English and the hearing aid that I was using in that regard. I want to indicate at the outset that that was not my concern. I wear the hearing aid, of course, so that I can bring more comprehension to the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Mr. Whelan: That is not a point of privilege.

Mr. Crombie: I just wanted to get his attention.

Mr. Whelan: I am listening.

Mr. Crombie: I should like to take a brief moment, since this is the first opportunity I have had publicly to congratulate the minister on her return to office. Since I held that office for a brief period I know the kind of staff that she has available to her and that they have a reputation for good effort and dedication. It is in that spirit that I raise the following question of privilege.

This is a serious matter, because the remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on May 14 in response to questions relate to the integrity of one of the most significant, if not the most significant, social programs in this country, that is, the maintenance and delivery of our system of medicare. I feel there is a consensus in this House, and indeed in the country, that all problems related to medicare must be dealt with openly, directly, and honestly. The previous government's solution in this regard was to proceed with an independent review. We chose Chief Justice Emmett Hall to undertake that review in order that the solutions undertaken by this House would be reached only following extensive representations and consultation, not only with provincial governments but by all interested and all concerned parties.

As a consequence of the remarks made by the hon. minister, my question of privilege falls into three areas: first, misrepresentation by the minister of the facts surrounding the appointment of Justice Hall and the condition and resources within which he was and is conducting his review; second, the misrepresentation by the minister last week in the House on May 14, and indeed in the last Parliament generally, of her authority with regard to the Established Program Financing Arrangement of 1977, the legislation which governs medicare financing; and third, the statements by the minister on the same day in response to the same questions which seriously call into question the credibility of Justice Hall's review and her government's intentions with regard to its impending recommendations. Those are the three areas of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Let me deal with the first, the appointment of Mr. Justice Hall. In answering a question in the House on the Hall review, a question posed by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the minister pleaded ignorance of the details of the Hall review until her party took office again in the spring. That is the beginning of the questions reported at page 1061 of Hansard. Madam Speaker, the Hall review was not announced, appointed or undertaken in any shroud of secrecy. The terms of reference for the review were tabled at a federal-provincial conference of health ministers on September 17, and that was a public meeting. They were tabled publicly. Indeed, those terms of reference were later published in a number of both daily and weekly publications, not the least of which was the November 20 edition of the Medical Post which carried the terms of reference verbatim. I am sure it did not miss the minister's attention because it has a very attractive picture of herself and a fairly attractive picture of myself. It talks about the terms of reference in detail, verbatim. They were produced November 20. We were not in power a very long time, but if my memory serves me right we were still in power November 20.

Further on the terms of reference, the hon. member said, and I quote from page 1061 of Hansard:

—we asked many questions of the government to know what was really the mandate of the commission. We finally found out that the terms of reference were ten pages long, which does not mean anything, and covered everything under the sun.

It is not easy to discern exactly what the minister means, but I will repeat it because I think there is only one meaning you can finally take from it.

—we asked many questions of the government to know what was really the mandate of the commission. We finally found out that the terms of reference were ten pages long, which does not mean anything, and covered everything under the sun.

Allow me to be charitable and say that the minister has confused the terms of reference, which are two pages long and are very exact and very precise, with a ten-page communique which carried my remarks about the two pages of the terms of reference. The terms of reference, those two precise pages, were subsequently circulated to the provincial ministers for their comments. Following that process, those terms were finalized to everyone's satisfaction, including Mr. Justice Hall.

The terms of reference were two pages long, a very specific review. The most central, and that is why I have cause for concern, of those terms of reference which the minister claims not to have had knowledge of until she took office was a set of guidelines, requesting consideration of a set of guidelines for the principles of medicare—portability, accessibility, universal coverage, comprehensive coverage, public administration, reasonable compensation, and uniform terms and conditions. Those were the principles for the requested guidelines.

I might say that toward the end of November a letter was sent to all ministers of provincial governments, with a letter attached by me which again was made public. It indicated to those ministers that we were going to proceed with the terms of reference which I attached to them. I will not read the whole letter. I indicated:

—I have made some alterations in style, without substantive changes. I have asked Mr. Justice Hall to proceed with the attached revised version—

Also contained in the minister's answer on May 14 in which I suggest she again misled the House, she said:

When we were in opposition, the party in power did not send us a telegram with the information pertaining to the commission, how much money it had, what its mandate was, and so on . . . Nobody knew the amount of money made available; nobody knew the status of Mr. Justice Hall or the tools at his disposal to conduct a proper inquiry.

That is simply not true. On December 4 in this House the hon. member as she then was, the minister as she is now, asked me a question on the matter. She asked me if I would outline both budget and staff components. I have the quote in Hansard if she wants it.

Mr. McGrath: Give her the page number.

Mr. Crombie: It is suggested I give her the page number. The minister will find it at page 1987 of Hansard. I did not answer that day. I indicated in the House an undertaking to the hon. member, as she then was, that I would provide her with the information that I had already provided previously to the ministers in the provinces and indeed that we had tabled in a public meeting. I sent that letter, and that letter contained the information which she requested with respect to the staffing and the funds available. I know she received that letter.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I would like to conclude that the record shows that, on the first question of privilege, the hon. member did know the mandate of the Hall review prior to her resumption of office, and that the financial and human resources available to it were also known to her prior to her resumption of responsibilities as Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The second part of my question of privilege relates to the question of the minister's authority. Here I will try to confine my remarks the best I can to the statements made by the minister on the fourteenth. I am also sure that the record will concur that the hon. member recorded again what she said when she was in opposition when she demanded that the government of the day stop cash payments to the provinces in order to force the provinces to stop what she called the diversion of federal health funds to other areas.

The point of all that, and it is one we discussed in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, is that according to the established programs financing legislation of 1977—the agreement was negotiated and agreed to by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) and the right hon. Prime Minister of the day—it was not within and is not within the minister's power to stop or diminish the cash portion of federal assistance without the consent of the provinces. That is as clear as a bell.

It is wrong of the hon. member for Oshawa to ask a question implying that the minister has that power and for the minister to continue the charade that she does, because it is of no help to anyone. According to section 28, subsections (1), (2) and

(3) of the legislation that took away the power from the federal government, it is not within the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to alter the cash portion until after April 1, 1982, at which point the legislation allows for changes without provincial consent.

That is why the hon. minister could not take the action which she publicly stated in this House that she should because she does not have the power. That is the whole point of appointing the Hall commission, to make sure that power is not there, and it does no good for the House to be misled, even with the best will in the world, that that power does exist on the cash portion.

The third area of the question of privilege relates to what I think to be perhaps the most damaging aspect. I am hoping the minister will correct me because I think we share a community of interest in the final conclusion of the Hall commission report. There seems to have been a continuation of attacking the credibility of the Hall commission. I read the minister's comments on page 1061 where she says:

I must be cautious because we are talking about a royal commission of inquiry—

She concludes by saying that we are not talking about a royal commission of inquiry, and seems to imply because it was not and is not a royal commission of inquiry somehow it is less of an authority and will bear less heavily on the decision-making process of the government and indeed of this House. I simply want to give her an opportunity to correct that impression because, never at any time, was anybody ever suggesting that there ought to be a royal commission, and the record will show that.

● (1620)

The move I took as minister of the day was to appoint an expert to conduct a review of existing medical services legislation, with a view to improving it, clarifying it, and protecting and enhancing the principles of medicare. The minister today has an opportunity to state again her interest in doing these things instead of diminishing the credibility of the whole report even before Mr. Justice Hall has the opportunity to deliver it. Therefore, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare acknowledge to this House that she did, indeed, know the information of which she professed no knowledge last week and that in these circumstances she should correct the record of this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am somewhat embarrassed to speak before the former Minister of National Health and Welfare about an alleged question of privilege, because I feel it is non-existent. I am embarrassed because he took several minutes to tell us that he cares about medicare, that he made every effort through a review of the system to restore it to its full status, on which I fully agree with him and find it wonderful. On the other hand, I am embarrassed, because the three parts of the so-called question of privilege which he says concerns me seem to be non-existent.

[English]

I shall try rapidly to give my predecessor another image of the same situation—I will not go into the past the way he did, and I will not use quotations from speeches and discussions of medicare outside the House. He was rising on a question of privilege related to last week's question period, exactly a week ago. I should like him to understand from an opposition member's viewpoint the image perceived or available to us, which is this one, and which is what I was referring to last week when I answered the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) on medicare and the recent Alberta development, in all good faith, by the way. I said, in response to the third question, because the question led me to say that, from an opposition member's viewpoint and from the viewpoint of the general public, if my colleague, my predecessor remembers well, when, in September, 1979, he had an extremely short federal-provincial meeting of health ministers, he issued the press release or a communique, or whatever the name of it was, of about ten pages long. I do not know the exact name given to it but it was a ten-page document which he just referred to once more—

An hon. Member: A communique.

Miss Bégin: —A communique of September 17 in which he announced extremely briefly—I mean, it is less than a paragraph—a review of health insurance programs in Canada, a review, and only that, and then that the report should be prepared and made public within six months; and the appointment of Mr. Justice Hall. The hon. gentleman will recall that the House was not sitting that month and took some more time to start its work. This meant we were completely disconnected from information, especially since there was a new government and we were learning our roles as opposition members without all the research tools to which we were accustomed.

A review can be many things. I am not a lawyer but I have conducted a royal commission, I was involved in one myself, and as a minister I know very well the different categories into which a review can fall and, depending upon which administrative or legislative tool is used, the work of the so-called commissioner can be very different. The hon. member has himself stated that medicare is of great concern to all of us. I think it is fair to say that I, in my capacity—we had lost a government—and the hon. member in his capacity as a member of the new government, did our best to find a solution to medicare.

The hon. member announced the idea of a review which, by the way, we supported, but which we did not institute and might not have instituted, which is a thing I have often said and explained why. There are avenues to try to find a solution to the medicare erosion. What was the review which the hon. member announced and about which we often asked questions? How much money was at the disposal of Mr. Justice Hall? Were there other members or commissioners? Were there public hearings? We did not know whether the hon. member had this in mind.

Neither we nor the general public knew for a long time whether there would be public hearings. I remember asking questions at the time. A review could be a royal commission of inquiry with varying powers according to what part of the Inquiries Act it is under—a task force, an order in council, or a simple contract between the minister and the commission or commissioners. Each of these definitions is different in its consequences and different in the status it reflects on the subject matter, etc. That is exactly the meaning of the line of questioning taken not only by myself but by several members of the House when we were in opposition.

I do not know why the hon. gentleman, when he was minister of national health and welfare, chose not to state openly the nature of the review. He may not have realized that he never told us immediately. It took quite some time to understand and I am not even sure, from memory, that it was clearly said somewhere that it was a contract between Mr. Justice Hall and the minister. As to the other questions about the budget given to the commission and the number of staff given to the commission etc., the fact is, as the minister said, that I received a letter from him on December 19, 1979, dated December 14. But didn't the government fall around that time? There is such a sequence of events that I do not quite remember.

Mr. Crombie: I fell myself.

Miss Bégin: Yes, the hon. member fell too, but what I am trying to say now is that I do not think there is any question of privilege and I think my colleague, the hon. member opposite, is reading things which do not exist. If I speak English I will be in trouble again because I will use the wrong word, but he thinks there are suggestions against the Hall commission or against himself as the previous minister of national health and welfare in his actions to "save medicare". He thinks this is being criticized or questioned. This obviously is not the case. I think the hon. member knows very well that we supported officially, and have always supported, both in opposition and now as the Government of Canada, the work of Mr. Justice Hall's so-called review. Past that point I could continue and answer for a long period of time each point made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), but I think it is irrelevant.

I think the hon. member should know—and I am reassuring him right now—that once instituted and established, the Hall commission became the official tool to save medicare. Anyone with common sense, it seems to me, had to support the commission, which we did do, and will do. So I hope I am clear. It is all in Hansard. The hon. member said that last week I, at one point, said that I would speak French because the question is delicate since it deals with a royal commission and that a few minutes later I said it was not a royal commission. Let us not play with words. It was question period. I had difficulty expressing myself in English because we were discussing matters which could almost be legal. The hon. member was suggesting that there could be a question of privilege, and I did not want to create any suspicion as to the way he handled the erosion of medicare by instituting a royal commission. We differ on ideas about what avenue is best. The hon. member knows that. We have said it often. There is nothing wrong with that. We differ.

We thought the route which could be taken should be different from that of a commission or review of the situation. This being said, I and my colleagues have the greatest respect for an institution once it is created, and the Hall commission is an institution to which added credibility comes because of the past work of Mr. Justice Hall regarding the creation of medicare in the first place and all his contributions to the development of Canadian policies in many different fields.

I will finish on the expression "terms of reference". I happen to believe, and I am not the only one, that the so-called terms of reference are very general. I cannot withdraw that or swallow it back. I feel they are very general. They could not be broader, and I happen to be pragmatic enough that if I had been the minister and if I had decided to have a "review" of medicare, I would have preferred more precise terms of reference. That is a matter which could be discussed ad infinitum, but it has nothing to do with the question of privilege. My past experience with royal commissions or inquiries of any sort is that it may be better in a case like this to have strictly defined terms of reference.

My predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale, chose a wide avenue; let us put it that way. I quote from his so-called terms of reference as follows:

> The review is requested to consider the extent to which the goals set forth in the "Charter of Health for Canadians" proposed by the Royal Commission on Health Services in 1964 are being achieved.

This is one sentence out of three pages I have in front of me. My copy happens to have three pages, and it was attached to the communique of ten pages.

Mr. Crombie: Two pages.

Miss Bégin: I will finish simply by repeating to my predecessor that I think, as we say in French, he is in the potatoes. There is no question of privilege here. He knows he did a great job as minister of national health and welfare. That was the first thing I told him when I telephoned him after I returned to the department. He did things of which I was jealous, except for medicare which we might have done differently, but on other points I thought he had done a remarkable job, which I was discovering literally day by day and week by week at the beginning of my new mandate.

This being said, I hope that I have given enough explanation to the House to clarify the whole situation.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have listened to both sides, and I think I have listened to sufficient arguments on both sides in order to rule on this question.

There is obviously a very great difference not only of interpretation but also regarding what time this interpretation was understood by another party. I have listened very carefully to see whether there was a matter of privilege involved.

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) is obviously not satisfied with the answers he has received from the minister. What was clear to him might not be just as clear to the hon. minister, but that is something over which I have absolutely no power.

The exchange which has taken place, because the hon. member has raised a question of privilege, has served to bring out more information, and that in itself in any parliament, I suppose, is a good point, but it certainly is not a question of privilege. Moreover, the hon. member has moved a substantive motion which does not flow really from a question of privilege and, therefore, if the hon. member still wants to raise that motion, that can be done at another time.

So, having heard a speaker on one side and the hon. minister, it is with regret that I must rule that this is not a question of privilege.

MR. KILGOUR—USE OF EXPRESSION "SHYLOCK" BY MEMBER FOR NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, during oral question period the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) used an expression in his question, the word "Shylock", referring, I believe, to the members of OPEC. In the last Parliament, Madam Speaker, your predecessor ruled that the word "Shylock", albeit in a slightly different context, was not parliamentary language. The hon. member was kind enough to come back into the House after I raised this with him in the lobby, and I wonder if Your Honour would consider ruling or, alternatively, if the hon. member would consider withdrawing that expression and using an acceptable synonym. I do, however, raise this as a question of privilege.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) for advising me that he was going to raise this matter as a question of privilege. I do not believe it is a question of privilege. However, I will not argue that point.

I believe the ruling of your predecessor, Madam Speaker, was on quite a different matter when that word was used in reference to another member of this House. I used the word because it is my belief that the OPEC nations are using their availability of petroleum to extort money from the industrialized nations of the western world particularly, and Japan as well. I think that their action is unconscionable. In fact some of the OPEC nations even use their availability of oil as a threat to other nations, particularly our great friend and neighbour, the United States of America, which has done more to assist developing nations than any other nation in the world.

However, I certainly would not want to offend with my language any member of this House, or any Canadian. So, if it will please the hon. member, I would be glad to withdraw the word "Shylock" and substitute therefor the word "extortionists".

Madam Speaker: I think I can accept that the hon. member simply withdraws the word without substitution. However, I suppose what is said is said. I understand that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) is satisfied with this correction which has been made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

MR. McKNIGHT—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Is it a new one?

Mr. McKnight: Yes, a new one, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I will hear it.

Mr. McKnight: The question of privilege which I would like you to hear arises out of a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on May 14, found in Hansard at page 1061. I should like to quote it. It starts in the middle of the paragraph and reads:

—to ask the local population and community to react to financial barriers being imposed when they should not be imposed in the light of the huge payments being made by taxpayers in all of Canada for medicare in Alberta, as everywhere else—though not in Saskatchewan by the way.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to raise a new question of privilege, which I would be delighted to hear, it would be in order that he give me a written notice of it since he is referring to something that has been said in a previous sitting of the House, as did the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) before him. So, if I receive a notice, I will entertain the question of privilege when it is presented to me.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-596, requiring the Canadian flag and the flag of the province to be flown on federal buildings.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Given the spirit that prevails today in this House, I ask for unanimous consent in order to proceed forthwith and without debate with all stages of this bill.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member be allowed to introduce this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree that this bill be dealt with at all stages this day?

1. What was the total, by province, of moneys loaned from the Canada Pension Plan?

2. What interest is paid on such funds?

3. In each of the past five years, what amount was (a) received (b) paid out of the CPP?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): 1 and 3. The information sought by the hon. member is equally accessible to him, being reported annually in the Public Accounts of Canada. Quarterly statements of the interest rate earned on moneys loaned and the distribution by province are also issued from the information division of this department, on request.

2. Section 113(2) of the Canada Pension Plan prescribes the interest to be paid on funds loaned from the Canada Pension Plan. The amount of interest received and the weighted average rate are reported in the Public Accounts of Canada.

POLYSAR CORPORATION LTD.

Question No. 181—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Polysar Corporation Ltd.?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the Corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the Corporation (c) investment by the government in the Corporation both before and after any write-off?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance):

1. Polysar Limited is a private sector corporation wholly owned by the Canada Development Corporation in which the Government of Canada along with some 18,000 other shareholders holds an equity interest. Polysar is neither a Crown corporation nor an agent of Her Majesty nor does the government directly hold any equity in it. The government does not have any official knowledge of Polysar not available to the public. To assist the hon. member, the 1978 Annual Report of Polysar Limited, which is obtainable from the secretary of the company, 201 Front Street N., Sarnia, Ontario, N7T 7V1, shows:

Revenues	$576,965,000	$747,762,000
Net Income	$ 14,431,000	$ 18,518,000

2. (a) Grants and contributions for fiscal 1977 and 1978 that exceeded $10,000 are published in volume II of the Public Accounts of Canada for those years. While this information is equally accessible to the honourable member, we have, however, had a cursory review made of the 1976-77 and 1977-78 Public Accounts volume II and note that in the former fiscal year, Polysar Limited received a grant, contribution or other transfer payment from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce of $244,713, "to advance the technological capability of Canadian manufacturing industry by supporting selected civil (non-defence) development projects on terms and conditions approved by Treasury Board". In fiscal 1978-79, Polysar Limited received a contribution from the same department, under the Enterprise Development Program, for $37,987. The company would appear to have received no direct or indirect subsidies or benefits other than those available to other Canadian corporations or individuals.

(b) and (c)

No loans, advances or guarantees were extended by the government to the corporation in either fiscal year and the government had no investment in the corporation before or after any write-off.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. (a) 1977-78

Total Revenue	$8,128,810
Net earnings (deficits)	(1,156,759)

(b) 1978-79

DC-10 AIRCRAFT

Question No. 727—Mr. Benjamin:

1. Since the 1977 flight test, in which an Air New Zealand DC-10 encountered structural damage, has the Department of Transport test flown the DC-10 aircraft to determine if it should qualify for a certificate of airworthiness and, if so (a) on what dates (b) with what results?

2. Since May 25, 1979, did the department conduct test flights, inspections or investigations of the engine, pylon, wing mounts on DC-10 aircraft operating in Canada and, if so, of what type?

3. What, if any, standards additional to the U.S. certificate of airworthiness, has the department included in its type approval of the DC-10 aircraft?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

(a) On August 4 and 5, 1978.

(b) Flight test results were satisfactory. It was demonstrated that, at the revised minimum speed limitations proposed by the company, there was a strong and effective deterrent to further speed reduction. Prior analysis and flight tests by the company had established that damage would not occur to the elevators if these limitations were observed.

2. Yes. Engineers and technical inspectors of the department witnessed inspections of the engine, pylon, wing mounts conducted by the Canadian company which operated DC-10 aircraft. In addition, an engineer and a technical inspector of the department participated in the United States Federal Aviation Administration's review of the DC-10 design, manufacture and maintenance.

3. The Canadian type approval of the DC-10 includes the following in addition to the U.S. federal aviation administration requirements:

(a) Incorporation of Spoiler System SCN C27602-02 dated, August 1, 1974;

(b) Incorporation of second stick shaker, SCN C34161-4 dated, April 6, 1972;

(c) Incorporation in the Aircraft Flight Manual of the revised minimum speed limitations referred to in the answer to question 1 (b).

McDONNELL DOUGLAS—DC-9

Question No. 728—Mr. Benjamin:

1. Did McDonnell Douglas inform Air Canada three years ago to either modify the tail end of its DC-9 aircraft or to inspect regularly for cracks in tail areas and, if so, did the department change the standards required to meet its type approval of the DC-9?

2. Have any cracks or defects been found in the fuselages of DC -9 aircraft operating in Canada during the past five years and, if so (a) how many (b) how many were similar to the one that caused the tail cone of a DC-9 to fall off an Air Canada flight near Boston in September 1979?

[English]

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. McDonnell Douglas informed Air Canada through a McDonnell Douglas service bulletin, dated May 25, 1976, to inspect regularly for cracks or modify the tail areas of DC-9s. The department did not change the standards required to meet the type approval as the above inspections and modifications were not due to any deficiency in the standards.

2. Some cracks and defects have been found in DC-9 fuselages in the last five years.

(a) During the service life of a fleet of aircraft scheduled inspections of the aircraft are carried out in accordance with the maintenance instructions.

It is not unusual to find some cracks and defects. These are monitored and repaired as required, and records are kept.

From design knowledge and experience with a fleet of aircraft, the operator and manufacturer have knowledge of the areas where cracks and defects are prevalent, and as well as inspecting the total aircraft, concentrate on these areas. Counting the cracks and defects found in a fleet of aircraft over the years would be very time consuming and serve no useful purpose. A typical inspection of one aircraft could generate up to 500 inspection tickets.

In summary, numerous cracks will have been found over the years, but the exact number is not available without undertaking the monumental task of reviewing the documentation for the DC-9 fleet of 43 aircraft.

(b) No cracks similar to the one that caused the tail cone to come off were found prior to the accident. Post accident inspections revealed three similar cracks in the remaining Air Canada fleet of DC-9s.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT CONDITIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, it is my intention at this time to introduce a motion under Standing Order 26, followed by a very brief statement in support of this serious motion. I ask leave of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the agricultural drought, which might properly be described as a continental drought, which includes the major portions of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the interior of British Columbia.

It is imperative that the implications of this developing disaster, now reaching critical proportions, and the appropriate remedial actions which could be taken, be considered on an urgent basis by the government and the House.

I should like to make a few brief comments about this very serious motion which I have just moved. To begin with, I would say that an agricultural drought in western Canada is not unusual in itself, but after many, many years and many droughts I believe I know that this one is somewhat different, and I want to explain why.

It is most unusual because it is so widespread, spreading from the interior of British Columbia across the three prairie provinces to the east side of Manitoba. It is only a part of the north American continental drought which includes all the northern American states and the portion known as the northwest corn belt in the United States. It extends much farther north in Canada than any previous drought, including the ten-year drought in the 1930s in which I was very much involved.

I would remind you, Madam Speaker, and the House, that the last emergency debate dealing with an agricultural matter under Standing Order 26 took place on October 31, 1974, when the subject matter was the beef cattle market price situation. I am sure there are members in the House who will recall that that debate was precipitated by a dramatic slaughter of Holstein bull calves shown in living colour on television cameras and taking place somewhere in the province of Quebec.

It was over three years ago that the last debate on drought took place in this House during a Conservative opposition day on May 3, 1977. On both these occasions the prevailing agricultural crisis was not nearly as serious and as widespread as the present highly critical situation, and I mean that most sincerely. That situation involves the entire western grain industry where, in many cases, the seeding of spring grains has ceased because of lack of moisture in the soil. It includes the grass and feed sector so necessary for our cattle industry covering 45 million acres in western Canada, and it even includes the northern forest fire situation which is so critical. That is another extension of this serious drought.

Finally, there has been no appreciable soil moisture since early last fall, and it is definitely true that in the winter we have just been through there was indeed a drought. What I am so concerned about is that we came through a winter with no moisture in our soil to show for it, and I see definite parallels to the situation that prevailed in the 1930s. I see a situation building up which could last even a few years, and that would be sheer disaster at this time. I know the situation is in Madam Speaker's hands and your hands only, but I feel there is some urgency here which warrants the special debate I am asking for at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) for notice of his intention to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 26. He has given proper notice to the Chair of his intention to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of this Standing Order.

As the hon. member knows, the Standing Order provides that the Speaker shall decide whether or not the matter which he raised is proper to be discussed at this time. I have looked carefully at the conditions set out in Standing Order 26 and in the precedents. While the matter, of course, is very important and of public interest, in my view it is not a sudden emergency.

Like my predecessors, I must consider that a proper matter to be raised under the provisions of Standing Order 26 must relate to a genuine emergency. The situation described by the hon. member is of a developing nature. In fact those are the very words used by the hon. member himself.

In support of what I have just said, may I refer members to a similar situation which occurred on June 27, 1961, when the then leader of the opposition, the Hon. Lester B. Pearson, moved a similar motion concerning the drought conditions prevailing at that time in western Canada and where Mr. Speaker Michener ruled that the matter could be brought up through some other procedures. The situation referred to by the hon. member in the precedent that he invoked was, in my view, somewhat different from the one that we are experiencing now.

In this instance I am sure the hon. member knows that the matter can be raised in committee where the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are currently under study, and of course, also there are other ways for the hon. member to bring this important matter before the House. Therefore I must rule with regret—because I know a lot of members in this House share his concern over the situation which is prevailing in western Canada—that the matter is not a proper one for debate under Standing Order 26.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, regarding the interpretation of Standing Order 26, I wish to draw your attention to section (3) which states, I quote:

> When requesting leave to propose such a motion, the member shall rise in his place and present without argument the statement referred to in section (2) of this order.

So if one considers the statement which was made today, Madam Speaker, first it seems to me that it was not presented without argument, on the contrary, and that it was much too long. I would not want the House to get used to tolerating such lengthy and argumentative statements when motions of this kind are proposed. I simply want my objection to the way in which this matter has been approached today, to be officially recorded. In my opinion the statement was much too lengthy and contained arguments contrary to the provisions of section (3) of Standing Order 26 and I would not like this situation to happen again.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I thought you had made your ruling, but I cannot sit still with respect to the intervention by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). It has always been the practice in this House for a member raising a motion under Standing Order 26 to speak—indeed the Chair has invited the mover to speak briefly to the urgency—

Mr. Knowles: Not since 1968.

Mr. Nielsen: —to the urgency of the subject matter he raises in the motion itself, to assist the Chair in coming to a decision as to that very urgency.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) for his remarks. I am not all that clear as to how lengthy the intervention of a member can be when he raises a matter under Standing Order 26. Today, however, I insisted on listening to the hon. member because I wanted to understand fully his reasons for attributing to this matter a sense of urgency.

Now I recognize with the hon. minister that perhaps the hon. member extended a little his arguments to the situation existing in western Canada rather than limiting them in fact in a very narrow way to the reasons which justify the urgency. However, I listened to him to be more enlightened, but I take the minister's remarks in good part.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM MONTHLY AMOUNT OF SUPPLEMENT

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

She said: Madam Speaker, on January 15, 1980, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who was then the leader of the opposition, announced a major part of our electoral program, namely, an increase of $35 per household in the monthly guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens.

Today we are giving second reading to Bill C-16, which I think is very appropriate after yesterday's referendum vote of Quebeckers in favour of Canada. This bill illustrates one of the roles of the federal government for Canadians, namely, the redistribution of wealth which, because it varies according to economic times, plays in favour of every Canadian wherever he or she lives in Canada at one point or another in our history.

As many members sitting here today will recall, this is not the first time that we have brought before the House a bill very similar in nature to Bill C-16. Just over a year and a half ago, we discussed and passed unanimously, if I remember well, Bill C-20 which gave senior citizens receiving the GIS supplement and living alone an increase of $20 a month, which was divided for couples, each receiving $10 a month. Today's bill presents the same characteristics except that the amount of money is different. It is far more generous than the earlier one, but it serves the same purpose. It narrows the poverty gap in Canada, of course, for senior citizens in this particular case. In other words, it improves the economic situation of those elderly Canadians who are in the greatest need.

We decided that of all those in need of assistance in Canada right now, priority should be given to those most in need, that is, the beneficiaries of the guaranteed income supplement program and the spouse's allowance program.

I think that all hon. members know that the old age pension supplement is paid to pensioners who receive the basic universal pension but who do not have any other income or who only have a small income in addition to their basic pension. The supplement is also paid to the spouse of a pensioner, aged 60 to 65, when the couple is in need. In other words, those who get the old age security pension supplement need some help and experience difficulty in making both ends meet. Of course, for several years now, more specifically since 1973, the old age security pension and its supplement are indexed every three months. But the fact remains that this is not an increase. Indexing is merely a means of keeping the pension up to date and protecting the purchasing power of the dollar or the income supplement.

At the present time in Canada single pensioners, that is persons who are seperated, divorced, single, widowers or widows, are guaranteed a monthly income of $340.15. By guaranteed, I mean that if a pensioner, man or woman, in Canada depends exclusively on public funds to live and has not other personal income, he or she will get, under the law, $340.15 a month from the federal government. If that person has other income, for instance, interest from a savings account or a pension under the Quebec Pension Plan of the corresponding Canadian plan, then he or she can have a total income exceeding the guaranteed minimum. And that, due to the fact that instead of suddenly cutting off the pensioners from the guaranteed income, we have through the years adopted a scale to which people conform and through which we check the amount of their additional income. I believe everyone knows the rules of the game, that is, for every dollar of additional income from sources other than the old age pension, the pensioner loses 50 cents of the guaranteed income while naturally keeping the other 50 cents.

The amounts guaranteed the aged who are in need are clearly inadequate. On an annual basis, the amount guaranteed by our old age security programs, that is, the basic pension plus the old age supplement combined, represents roughly 80 per cent of the amount Statistics Canada defines as the poverty line. There is no doubt that an income which is slightly lower than 80 per cent of the poverty line is not acceptable in a country as rich as ours and is certainly not enough to live on decently.

[English]

The officials of my department estimate that there are approximately 700,000 single, widowed and divorced GIS recipients of the supplement to the pension who are living in poverty. Fully 60 per cent of them are women. Let me refer to a recent report by the National Council of Welfare describing what life is like for these women.

An hon. Member: That's my line.

Miss Bégin: You had the same in your speech, and that is very good. I am speaking of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), my predecessor, because it is really important in today's Canada, it seems to me, to impress upon people again and again the effect of poverty, which is unfortunately often forgotten.

In this report we have one part of the testimony of a 67-year old "Mary S.", who said:

> "I'll tell you what it's like being an old woman alone who's only got the government pension to live on . . . It's wearing out your second-hand shoes going from one store to another trying to find the cheapest cuts of meat. It's hating having to buy toilet tissue or soap or tooth paste, because you can't eat it. It's picking the marked-down fruits and vegetables from the half-rotting stuff in the back of the stores that used to be given away to farmers to feed their animals.
> "We live in fear. Fear of the future, or more illness, less money, less pride. Fear that the cheque won't arrive and we won't be able to work our way through the red tape in time to pay our rent. Fear that we will run out of food before the next cheque comes in."

There is no need to say that this is not acceptable to me, and it is not acceptable to the Government of Canada that persons who have given all their lives to working hard, to raising families and to building this country, should have to live this way. It is not acceptable, and that is why this bill is among the very first items to be brought before this session of Parliament.

I know there will be some persons who will say that the situation is not as bad as I have portrayed it. They will say that not all single, widowed and divorced GIS recipients have incomes below the poverty level. Of course, it is true that those who have some outside income and who receive what we call a partial GIS, or a partial supplement, may have in total an income that takes them just above the poverty line. But, it is also true that many single pensioners do not have such outside income. The fact that there are 700,000 GIS recipients in poverty is proof of this. We must help these 700,000 elderly Canadians as well as those who are just at or above the poverty line, under which I am sure none of us would like to live.

[Translation]

So the increase of $35 a month proposed in Bill C-16 will allow us to help them. Of course, the amount of money—and I anticipate, of course, the unanimous agreement of all parties—voted by the House of Commons, the amount of $35, will be added to the cheque for the month of July of unattached pensioners, that is single, separated, divorced, and widowed pensioners. So the cheque for the month of July will include the basic old age pension payment, the present supplement, the quarterly indexing—because July 1 is a date of quarterly indexing—and a full $35. I do want to make that clear for all those who are listening. I would add that couples receiving a supplement, whether part or all of the supplement, will have $17.50 each added to their cheque, which makes a total of $35 for a couple.

So, in making that adjustment, what are we doing in terms of fighting poverty since that is the concept underlying this bill? In paying that supplement, we are bringing single pensioners receiving a supplement to their old age pension to about 83 per cent of what is called the poverty line. That is not ideal; there will remain a gap to be filled that we will indeed fill as soon as the economy gets going again. But it is still important to know that this year the July increase will bring single pensioners to about 83 per cent of the poverty line while next year will bring them to 85 per cent of the same poverty line since people will be getting it during the whole year, not only part of the year as in 1980, and it will be indexed every three months.

Now, with respect to couples, here is how the bill will affect their lives. Couples receive a guaranteed income, that is guaranteed for all those who do not have other sources of income, of $628.62 a month. So one can say that their income is equal to the poverty line; it is not below the poverty line like in the case of single pensioners, it is right at the poverty line—one could say that they are 100 per cent at the poverty line. The increase of $35 a couple or $17.50 for each pensioner will bring them slightly above the poverty line, or about 3 per cent above what is considered the poverty line. Couples will therefore receive an annual guaranteed income of $8,162 beginning in July. It is easy to see from the tables of Statistics Canada that this amount is slightly above the poverty line. I believe that we can conclude on this point that bringing these people just above the poverty line is a very modest recognition of the role they have played in Canadian society. We are not talking about a luxury, but about a standard of living that none of us would ever accept and that we are constantly trying to improve.

I therefore think that I have explained how the life of single people and of couples will be improved beginning in July. I could add for clarification purposes that those who now receive the spouse's allowance will also receive the supplementary amount provided by this bill. Hon. members will immediately note that couples are treated differently from single people. Why is this? Does this constitute discrimination? I do not think so. During consideration of the previous bill a year and a half ago, we introduced for the first time the concept that couples would receive the equivalent of half of the amount proposed for single people. In other words, couples receive for both spouses the same as single persons. Why is this? The history of old age security pensions in Canada shows that, throughout the years, as our policy has developed, we have treated pensioners as individuals. It is now recognized that families have special budget problems and that a single person needs about two-thirds of the budget of a couple and not half as it was long believed. We must therefore increase proportionately the pensions of single persons, which explains the differentiation made in this bill.

Now that I have defined the basic amounts granted to pensioners and what this will mean in the fight against poverty in Canada, I believe that it is important to note that since we are increasing the cheques of all recipients of the old age supplement, whether this supplement be total or partial, we are automatically changing the income scale against which private income must be compared to determine whether a recipient is eligible for the supplement or not. By raising the income scale for all Canadian pensioners we automatically allow, as happened in 1979 with the previous hike, some 45,000 pensioners who do not now get the supplement because their meagre revenues are slightly above mark, to become eligible for part of the supplement. I would therefore invite Canadians who will be made aware of that by a special stuffer sent with the July cheque, if they have very low incomes, to see whether they will become eligible for a monthly supplement which, of course, in their cases will be less than $35 a month because it will be a matter of making up for their very slight income deficiency.

[English]

I shall now describe the cost of the bill which we are debating. Bill C-16 increases the supplement to pensioners by $35 per month. The cost in the first year of operation will be $345 million in addition to the regular program costs of the old age security program in the fiscal year 1980-81. In the first full fiscal year, 1981-82, the additional cost will be approximately $525 million.

The federal government is not the only source of financial assistance to elderly Canadians. It is fair to say that more and more provinces are introducing supplementary programs to assist elderly Canadians. Does this bill affect such programs and what is the relationship between the provincial programs and the federal program? When this House debated Bill C-20 a year and a half ago, hon. members of all parties learned for the first time that, in order to make sure that elderly Canadians living in provincial institutions around the country receive the full benefit of this increase which we are discussing today, a positive decision must be made in that direction by each provincial government.

Consequently, I have written to my provincial counterparts asking that they ensure that pensioners who receive what is called "provincial top-up payments" receive the full benefit of our federal increase. At the same time I have also urged that this principle apply, as far as is possible, in relation to the so called "comforts allowances" availalble to pensioners residing in institutions. I am pleased to inform the House that the government of British Columbia and the government of Nova Scotia—a province on the Atlantic coast and a province on the Pacific coast—have advised me that they will be passing on the full increase to all GIS recipients.

We are pleased and hopeful that the other provinces will respond to my appeal in a similar manner. There is no need to say that I will do everything in my power to guarantee that all Canadians eligible for the GIS or the spouse's allowance will benefit from this increase.

This matter is very serious indeed and I feel I have a duty to impress upon the House the need for a common approach throughout Canada and in every political party, because it is a fact of our democratic life that no single party represents each and every Canadian province, in order to settle the unfortunate situation of income pensioners living in institutions in various provinces.

Let us take for instance my own province of Quebec. Should the Quebec government—which, unfortunately, like seven other provinces, has yet to answer—decide in cabinet not to give the full $35 by increasing the comfort allowance, that province will pocket some $7 million of pensioners' money.

I think that that is quite serious and that members from all provinces should question the slowness which seems to exist everywhere, in order to encourage the provinces to take the proper decision so that pensioners residing in institutions can benefit directly from the increase provided by this bill concerning the guaranteed income supplement.

[English]

I guess it is fair to say that passage of Bill C-16 will present an important step toward assuring all Canada's elderly of the adequate income to which they should be entitled. It is not the only step we intend to take and, as I said, it is not the final step we have to take. Some money will still be missing to bring people living alone above the poverty line. An annual injection of more than half a billion dollars into the incomes of senior citizens in Canada who are in need is an important additional step toward narrowing the gap and relieving poverty in our country.

• -1

We should like, as we announced in the Speech from the Throne, to convene a national pensions conference, hopefully in the fall, and we would like this conference to bring together representatives of all the economic partners involved in the pension field. I am thinking of the private pension field in particular. There are the federal and provincial governments as employers and legislators, the private pension industry, Canadian workers and their employers, pension groups and other interested parties in this country. We want to know their views on the urgent pension problems facing the country and we want to discuss the issues of concern to them.

We have about one dozen very good reports and we are waiting for the Ontario royal commission report which was due some time ago. It is coming, and I understand it will be so thorough that it may comprise ten volumes. We will have from different sources, from the Ontario government, the Quebec government with the Cofirentes, from the Economic Council of Canada, the National Welfare Council and many other sources, such as the Lazar report, a reservoir of ideas that we must air together and discuss, delineating the avenues through which the whole pension system in Canada can be upgraded to ensure that senior citizens not only have the minimum—which we do not think is enough—but that when they reach the age of 65 they have the good life that they have slowly built through the latter part of their lives.

In concluding my speech, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the co-operation of members of all parties for rapid passage of what I am sure is an uncontroversial bill, Bill C-16. It is only a beginning in this new session of Parliament, a concrete start toward the fulfilment of a promise for a better quality of life for the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today follows a very historic day in which the people of Quebec decided that their future was with Canada and decided to nurture their roots dating back more than a century. I want to say to the senior citizens who made this country that they can be assured and proud that we decided yesterday in my home province, Quebec, and all of Canada knows and is discussing this vote today, to keep the heritage intact and to leave it in full to our children.

Old Age Security Act

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank you for the opportunity to intevene with respect to this piece of legislation. Like the minister and, indeed, all members of the House, I am interested in its speedy passage. I do not think there is anyone who would oppose the bill. I should like also to associate myself with the remarks of the minister with respect to this being an example of the role of the federal government.

I was careful to note that throughout the referendum debate when questions of social policy came up, whether or not they should be shared responsibilities or the sole responsibility of a province or the federal government, very often people were quick to say that social policies ought to be with the provinces. I noticed during the referendum debate that the minister, and indeed the leader of the federalist forces in the province of Quebec, indicated on a number of occasions that it was concern for family allowances, old age security and social policies that come from the federal government, that weighed heavily on the minds of a number of people in the province. I think it would be worth while keeping an eye on what happens to social policy over the next couple of years with respect to constitutional talks.

I am one of those who believe there is a proper and appropriate role for the federal government in the field of social policy, both for the amelioration of the range of incomes but more particularly in funding of specific social programs. I am not sure how many in this House agree with that view, but it was something I had hoped to hear the minister mention.

Toward the end of her comments the minister indicated the necessity of provincial co-operation so that there is not what is known in the social welfare legislation business as any "leakage" to the provinces. The minister is quite correct; that can be a problem. I wish her well in discussions with the provinces and if she needs assistance we will be happy to offer it. Everyone here wants to make sure that funds go to those who need them.

I was careful to note what the bill means to numbers of people. This is a very impressive list of statistics. The $35 increase in the proposal would affect an estimated 721,000 single beneficiaries, 225,000 married couples where both are pensioners, 44,000 one-pensioner couples and 81,000 couples receiving the spouse's allowance—in total, approximately 1.1 million households would receive the $35 increase.

The proposed increase of $35 per household per month, effective July 1, 1980, will ultimately amount to $475 million. I think anyone reading those statistics would be impressed that $35 seemingly goes so far, and I have some comments to make in that regard. I think it is well to put the bill in some kind of perspective, and a historical perspective is always wise.

In 1967 when the GIS was introduced, a single individual received payments equal to 72.2 per cent of the poverty line. That is to say, when the GIS was first introduced we gave enough so that people were brought up to 72 per cent of the poverty line, or 28 per cent below it. That was 13 years ago.

In 1971 the GIS was increased by $20 per month. Without that increase an individual would have been at 68 per cent of the poverty line, but the increase brought him to 77 per cent of it. By 1978 individuals had fallen to 73.5 per cent of the poverty line with the low income they received from government pension plans. By April, 1979, with an increase of another $20 to the GIS, individuals were at 78.5 per cent of the poverty line. Had the boost not occurred, they would have been back down to 73 per cent. I am sure you could keep those figures in your head, Mr. Speaker, but others did not.

The point is clear. The indexing of the GIS does not work. That is why there needs to be a constant pumping in of fixed amounts of money. The $35 now and the $20 previously were not add-ons. In fact the total effect of the legislation since 1967 has been to maintain them below the poverty line and have their heads just above water. I know the minister is interested in bringing them up to the poverty line, and even beyond in the case of marrieds in the plan.

The fact is that the way in which we have gone about the implementation of the GIS over 13 years, every time we increased it, it has been purely to keep them where they were at and marginally more. The minister chose her words when she said "narrowing the poverty line". Narrowing is exactly what it is. That is not the fault of the minister, but until we find another way in which to index the GIS, we are not going to see those add-ons as doing little more than simply maintaining what we have got. What we have got, as the minister indicated, are thousands of people below the poverty line, and in this particular instance most of them women.

It is time that the ministry, the department and any incumbent minister gave thought to changing the index that is used for the GIS. The consumer price index, which is the index that is used, does not any longer, if it ever did, have any relevance to the particular group of people we are talking about.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Thank you. Let me emphasize that if I can. If you look at the CPI March-April of this year, here is the breakdown for incomes. Think of all the people over the age of 65 that you know and have some sense of how they split up their budget. Food, 21.5 per cent; housing, 34.1 per cent—not in my city—clothing, 10.1 per cent; transportation, 15.8 per cent; health and dental care, 4 per cent; recreation and reading, 8.3 per cent; tobacco and alcohol, 6.2 per cent.

Whatever deficiencies the CPI may have or whatever value it may have as an index for other things, for people over the age of 65, indeed I would argue for people over the age of 55, those getting the GIS, whether we move it below 65 or maintain it at and above, we need a new index. The CPI does not fit our need any longer. The simple reason is that clothing, housing and food increase faster in our society than the other items in the CPI. It is those items on which older Canadians are more dependent.

Despite the welcoming of this bill, and I know hon. members will pass it in a hurry, it is wise to remember that it is simply not an add-on but is in fact required in order to keep up where we have been below the poverty line. Indeed, the index we use is no longer applicable. We should have a new index. I do not know what you would call it, but it should be one that takes into consideration the actual living realities of older Canadians and where they live.

There is another area I want to comment on with respect to the bill and with respect to some of the remarks made by the minister. I was not impressed with that part of the Speech from the Throne which called for a national pensions conference. Generally speaking, I am in favour of conferences. At best, they bring people together who share a common concern. They can exchange views. That is always worth while.

The reason I have difficulty applauding this particular conference is that it is going to take the place of something that is very important, that is, a comprehensive review of pensions and the issues that surround pensions. One of the things in the world of might-have-been's which I thought was useful, and hoped the new government would have carried on, was that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs had been empowered by all-party agreement to investigate and make recommendations to the House with respect to issues dealing with pensions generally, in short a comprehensive approach.

At that time, as I recall, there were a number of people, both privately and in the House I might add, who said, "More reports! More meetings! Where is the legislation? Why more reports?" I explained at that time, and I think it is still fair to say, that the purpose of the committee was not to create any new ones but to be able to synthesize those being done by a variety of other sources and bodies.

When the minister talks about the national pensions conference, I gather she sees that as the substitute for legislation. The first step to legislation was to put it in that standing committee. It seems that was the appropriate thing to do, because indeed the issues that surround pensions ought to be known to everyone now. An increase of $35 a month does not amount to a pensions policy, nor does the holding of a conference. The issues have to be dealt with. Those issues are as follows.

First, the actual on-street economic and financial situation for many older Canadians, both below and above 65 years of age, which they find themselves facing. The minister quoted, although she did not identify the page, from the report "Women and Poverty", a report by the National Council of Welfare. On page 12 of that report you will find a description of a 67-year-old woman known as Mary S. It really is a good insight into the kind of reality these people face. It points out that the biggest enemy for these people is not fear but loneliness. Other than that, there is a very good description of what it is like for many, many thousands of Canadians. I quote from the report:

—most poor women who live alone are over the age of 55. While a few are low-income women who never married and others are divorced or separated women getting inadequate support payments, the majority are widows who were left with very little on which to live after their husbands' death.

Here is the key, Mr. speaker. "In Canada, two out of every three elderly widows have incomes which are below the poverty line." I do not think it needs to be embellished as the first issue, as the description of the reality of where older Canadians exist. That says it, and no amount of statistics or reports will change that fact.

Second, somewhat implied by the first, is the level of protection provided to women by the pension system. The level of protection by both public and private pensions in this country is abysmal. Indeed, the Lazar report which was started some three years ago is a very lengthy report containing a number of recommendations as to what ought to be done with respect to pension systems, both public and private, for women in our society. Let me put it another way. If you want to be poor in this country, be old and be female, because your chances will increase dramatically and no amount of statistics will change that, either.

Third, the performance of the private sector. That is a strong issue, I think, because we have to do two things; we have to assess that performance as the Lazar report and some others too, and we also have to take that performance and measure it against the public systems which are available. While I am on that subject I might add that when we are talking about the performance of those private pensions we need, now as never before, a review of the Canada Pension Plan itself not only in relation to how we "access women" to it but, indeed, what we ought to do in the future in terms of its funding. This is a matter which is fast coming upon us—by the mid-eighties if we do not deal with it soon. Or, like too many things in this country, we will find we are playing catch-up ball with our own ball and bat.

The fourth issue is the introduction of greater flexibility in the age of retirement. That is one of the minister's reports coming in, I gather, from the Senate. Its progress is painfully slow but it is still coming from the Senate. I think it is part of the Croll report. Any policy which envisages flexibility with regard to mandatory retirement at the age of 65 will be welcomed by many people for a variety of reasons, and I do not think the minister need worry about the kind of support she might get in bringing forward a policy of that type.

Fifth, and something which is not talked about very often in conjunction with pensions because it is so often dealt with as a separate category, is the position of the disabled and handicapped in relation to pensions, not only the amount of money but even more particularly, to the disincentive which occurs as year after year both provinces and country and, I might add, municipalities, have done their best to handicap the disabled because the way we go about the funding of those pensions in relation to handicapped people does just that.

Sixth, the protection offered families of deceased persons and, seventh, maintaining the purchasing power of the benefits which are paid out. I did not invent any of that, Mr. Speaker.

All one has to do is to become somewhat acquainted with the literature and some easy reading will do it. Get acquainted with the literature and you will change your perspective of what you ought to be doing both in this House and as a politician. If you knock on any door, and I can think of them in my own riding as I am sure you can, Mr. Speaker, and look inside and see how older Canadians are spending their days, you will know that not only should this bill be passed quickly but that the issues which I have listed ought not to be only the topics of another conference but that they should be brought forward to the House very quickly to be passed into law, pieces of legislation which would make us more proud than we ought to be today.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to follow the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) in the debate on Bill C-16.

I should like at the outset to congratulate the minister on her reappointment to this important portfolio, as indeed I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Rosedale on the good job he tried to do during the short time in which he was head of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We in our party sometimes like to give the impression that we are the only ones who have progressives or persons who are interested in the well-being of our fellow citizens, but there are a few in the other parties who have a proper perspective, and I am prepared to say today that I know of at least one in each of the other parties.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has shown that she is a small "l" liberal and that she is interested in social policies. Likewise, when he was in the cabinet during the Thirty-first Parliament, the hon. member for Rosedale got the label of being one of the Red Tories, and that is said affectionately. We are all pleased that the hon. member's health has been restored and we wish him well as he continues to be a member of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I associate myself also with the tone of certain remarks which both previous speakers made. Knowing, as they did, that this is the day after May 20, each of them pointed out that there are certain things we would not have in this country, certainly things that Canadians would not have from coast to coast, were it not for a strong federal government. Old age pensions, family allowances, medicare—just imagine what would be the plight of our people in relation to these programs if they had all been left to individual provinces. It took a national consensus brought to bear on national government to bring these things into being and they are examples of the fact that it is really worth while to have a national government, that it is really worth while to be Canadians.

I am also interested in the extent to which both the hon. members who have spoken ahead of me discussed the level of pensions as it relates to the poverty line. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the whole aim of this bill, which she treats as interim legislation, is to narrow the gap between the income of pensioners and the poverty line. The hon. member for Rosedale recognized that as its goal but expressed dissatisfaction with the fact that it does not go very far toward closing that gap. As a matter of fact, I think it is high time—and I go along with the hon. member for Rosedale in this—that we found some other way of deciding the level of pensions than by relating them to the consumer price index.

I say in all fairness to the hon. member for Rosedale that when he was minister of national health and welfare and I complained to him about the consumer price index not being a proper basis for the indexing of pensions, he agreed with me and said he would have the matter studied. In fact some studies did come out of that exchange, but I think we in this House ought to be hanging our heads in shame when it is being said here today that our pensioners for the most part are living below the poverty line.

The hon. member for Rosedale referred to times when it got down to 72 per cent or 68 per cent of the poverty line. The Minister of National Health and Welfare boasts that this legislation will bring certain of our pensioners up to 80 per cent of the poverty level and that, perhaps down the line a bit, they might even reach 85 per cent. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in a mood of expansiveness, got to one point where she said that down the line somewhere married couples might even have 103 per cent of the poverty level. I would like to know how she arrived at that figure. It seemed to me that she was escalating the pension by the July 1 change which will take place, but she has overlooked the fact that the poverty line will probably have gone up in the meantime, so the likelihood of our getting the mass of our pensioners—50 per cent or 60 per cent of them—above the poverty line by this bill, or by anything that is before this session of Parliament, is very slim.

I should like to suggest very strongly that we should turn our backs on this idea of pensioners being below the poverty line and that we should build into our legislation a requirement that no pensioner shall have anything less than 125 per cent of the poverty level.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: What is wrong with that? It is not good enough just to keep people at the poverty level, just to keep our old people alive. It is not good enough to say we are bringing them up to 80 per cent, 85 per cent or even to 103 per cent. Surely that implies just keeping them alive as animals, as it were. These are human beings we are talking about. These are Canadians who have given their life's service to this country and who have built the country, and surely they are entitled not just to enough to keep them alive. Surely they are entitled to some measure of the enjoyment of life as they have made it possible.

I remind the House that we do use other indices in some cases. I put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) today about the rate of the disability pension. Actually, I was complaining that a formula which was arrived at in 1973 has not been made permanent and automatic. Nevertheless, the concept in the war disability pension is that the level of that pension for a 100 per cent disabled pensioner must be related to the average take-home pay of five designated categories in the public service. That formula does not talk about the consumer price index. That formula talks about a level of pay. Our problem is that in two or three years after it gets set it has slipped behind, but at least we have been able to persuade the government to introduce legislation to bring it up to date.

If I may mention another subject concerning which my remarks are not always popular, the subject of the pay of members of Parliament, we get an increase every January. Is it based on the consumer price index? No, it is based on the composite wage index, and we get up to 7 per cent if the composite wage index goes up to that point. So there are other arrangements and other payments which are based on something other than the consumer price index, and I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale that the use of that index for increasing pensions has been a failure. I have contended at times that part of the reason is that it is always behind. When you go back to get a three months' period two months ago and compare it with three months before that, and then get that increase a couple of months from now, you are getting an increase that the pensioners should have had six or eight months ago.

Another factor, of course, is that the consumer price index covers all the things which are in that package and is not directly related to the things pensioners have to buy. But even apart from those things I think the principle of indexing by the consumer price index—as though that solves the problem—is wrong. Of course, fundamentally the reason it is wrong is because the base was too low in the first place. But when I propose that the level of pensions should bear a relationship to the poverty line as established by Statistics Canada, we are at least talking about something which has some realism about it.

My colleague sitting next to me asked me a moment ago where this poverty line comes from, and I said to him, "Well, the poverty line that the other two speakers are using is the one published by Statistics Canada". It is, of course, the lowest of most of the poverty lines which are published. Ask any body of social workers or any group of social agencies in any of our cities for a poverty line. It will be a lot higher than the line put out by Statistics Canada. Senator Croll's committee over in the other place has established a poverty line a number of times and has updated it. All those poverty lines, as I say, are higher than the poverty line established by Statistics Canada.

That is one of the reasons I would not dare stand here and say that pensioners should be given a level of pension equal to the poverty line. That is just bare existence. It should be at least 125 per cent of the poverty line as set by Statistics Canada.

May I also point out that when Statistics Canada produces the poverty line, it does it for different kinds of areas. It does it for those who live in the rural parts of the country. It does it for those who live in small communities, small cities and small towns, and it moves up into the 100,000 to 500,000 cities and to the cities 500,000 and over. And, of course, the poverty line varies a great deal depending upon whether a pensioner is living in a rural area, in a small town, a medium-sized city, or in one of the larger cities of this country. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare will confirm, even with the increase she is now bringing in, this $35 increase per household, and even after the indexing takes place in July, it will still be a fact that for our single pensioners they will all be below Statistics Canada's poverty line for people in any of our urban areas.

Single persons who live out on farms or in rural areas may get pretty close to the poverty line by July 1, but the single people in our cities will still be below it. As for married couples, even though the improvement will be there so that some of them will reach the poverty line in smaller cities, if they live in Ottawa, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Toronto or Montreal, they will still be below it.

Perhaps I can continue this next time, Mr. Speaker. I see that it is six o'clock.

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT ON APPLICATIONS APPROVED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has been extremely slow in announcing which projects will be approved under the Summer Youth Employment program, and in view of the fact that summer is rapidly approaching and those who have made application under the program are urgently awaiting word on the status of their applications, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the House immediately instruct the minister to make public today which Summer Youth Employment program applications will be approved by the minister, so that those who have not received approval will be able to make alternate plans for securing summer employment.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEMBERS' SERVICES

GEOGRAPHICAL INACCURACIES IN HOUSEHOLDER BULLETINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that all 74 Liberal MPs from the province of Quebec have recently sent householder bulletins to households in their ridings, all with uniform contents covering arguments in favour of a No vote in the May 20 referendum, and financed by the public treasury for both printing and distribution, and in view of the fact that the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Loiselle), in his householder bulletin on the fourth page, carries a representation of a map of Canada showing Quebec separated from Canada and as part of the separated Quebec 110,000 square miles of Newfoundland being that part of the province of Newfoundland described as Labrador, with a similar map appearing in the bulletins of the other Liberal MPs who represent ridings in Quebec, and since such a map is completely false factually, and an affront to all residents of Newfoundland and Labrador, I move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). This is it here; Newfoundland is shoved 200 miles out into the Atlantic.

That the MP for Verchères and all other Liberal MPs for Quebec apologize to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador for the error committed by them in showing the Labrador part of the province of Newfoundland as a part of the province of Quebec, and that this House affirm the territorial integrity and boundaries of the province of Newfoundland as set down in the Opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council expressed on March 1, 1927, and as set out in the Terms of Union between Newfoundland and Canada of 1949.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That members of the Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion and other Canadians who fought heroically with Spanish Republican forces in the Spanish Civil War between 1936 and 1939 to preserve the legitimate government of that country be given the status of veterans under federal legislation and be made eligible for veterans' pensions and other benefits.

ENERGY

CANADIAN CONTENT OF INDUSTRY—HIRING OF FOREIGN COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to move a motion.

In view of the fact that Petro-Canada, a Crown corporation created primarily to increase Canadian content in the oil and gas industry, has in recent months hired a Bermuda-based company to design a new corporate logo, hired a New York-based real estate company to seek out new offices, and now has entered into a joint venture with a Liechtenstein-headquartered German company to construct a new building which will be designed by American architects, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make a statement on motions explaining just how directing all this business to German, Bermudian and American firms is helping Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VOLCANIC ASH FALL-OUT FROM ERUPTION OF MOUNT ST. HELENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

The recent eruption of Mount St. Helens in the state of Washington has caused severe human tragedy as well as extensive property damage. The volcanic ash fall-out from the eruption is extensive, affecting large areas of the United States of America and Canada, with as yet undetermined short and long-term effects. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House direct the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment to undertake immediately an environmental assessment of the volcanic ash fall-out on human health, as well as the possible effects on wildlife, turbidity and acidity effects on lakes, stream and soils in affected areas of western Canada; and, furthermore, that the government report to this House on this matter without delay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GRANTS FOR WATER AND SEWER SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the government bureaucracy, after an application from an Indian band council has been received, extends the granting of the said moneys for several months; and whereas in the case of water and sewer installation the money thus becomes available in late fall, making it very costly and wasteful to instal them during the winter months; and whereas the Indian band councils desire to make the best use of every dollar and want the money to be made available in the spring or early summer for public works such as installation of water and sewer systems, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the government review and amend the processing of applications with a view to making the money for public works affected by cold weather available in the spring or early summer of the year.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST STANDING COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES AND FORESTRY BE CONVENED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Thirty-second Parliament has been sitting for almost six weeks, and that most standing committees have by now been meeting for several weeks, and whereas the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry has not yet even been organized, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That the government be directed to convene the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry immediately so that matters pertaining to the main estimates and other pertinent questions relating to fisheries, forestry and the environment might be pursued in detail with the appropriate government ministers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FOREST FIRES

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES IN COMBATING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the extensive forest fires in western Canada—there are over 1,000 forest fires in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan, burning over 1,200,000 acres this year—I move:

HUMAN RIGHTS

CALL FOR CORRECTION OF DISCRIMINATION IN CERTAIN AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I rise, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Given the fact that the Liberal government in March, 1978, brought in the Canadian Human Rights Act and established the Human Rights Commission, given that we all should fully endorse the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, and in view of the fact that recently the Human Rights Commission investigators have found that about 3,000 low-paid public servants—most of whom are women—employed as food service workers, laundry workers and miscellaneous services such as gatekeepers, are not receiving equal pay for work of equal value, even though their work is classified as equal in value by the government, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith):

That this government move immediately to correct the discrimination in wages found by the Human Rights Commission with respect to these 3,000 low-paid service workers, and to uphold the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FUNDING OF ARCTIC BIOLOGICAL STATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Arctic biological station at St. Anne de Bellevue is the major federal government agency for environmental research and resource development in Canada's north, and in view of the fact that the government has slashed the station's 1980 funding for the current year to less than 10 per cent of the 1975-76 level, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House condemn the government for its neglect of environmental research in the Arctic, and that the government immediately provide the Arctic biological station with the funds it requires for its urgent work.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

SELF-SUFFICIENCY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, while in opposition, during the election campaign and several times since has repeatedly stated that the previous government was deluding itself and/or was foolish in setting a policy goal of energy self-sufficiency by 1990. However, yesterday, while in Paris attending International Energy Agency meetings, the Minister of Energy was quoted as saying the following:

—we expect to become self-sufficient during this decade.

Does this mean the government has now formally adopted this "foolish" policy of the previous Progressive Conservative government, or was the minister deluding other members of the IEA?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member fails to distinguish between energy self-sufficiency and self-sufficiency in petroleum.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see that hon. members in the back benches do not even seem to understand that distinction.

Mr. Collenette: That is why they are in the back benches.

An hon. Member: We understand.

Mr. Trudeau: But listening to the quotation from the hon. member who asked the question, he is talking about energy self-sufficiency.

Mr. Crosbie: We have that now.

Mr. Trudeau: Those are the words he read to me. So certainly that is not revolutionary, as even the member from Newfoundland understands.

Mr. Crosbie: I understand.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Perhaps I should read out more of this quotation in which UPC Paris indicates:

Canada, Lalonde said, is now dependent on oil imports for only 25 per cent of its needs.

"But we expect to become self-sufficient during this decade—"

Mr. Crosbie: Answer that one.

Mr. Andre: My question is: Is it now government policy to become self-sufficient in oil before 1990, as was the policy of the previous government which was ridiculed by this present minister when he was in opposition?

Mr. Crosbie: Answer that one if you can.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member shows the difficulty of quoting parts of speeches from press releases. His two questions differ as to whether he is talking about energy self-sufficiency or self-sufficiency in petroleum.

I point out to the hon. member that in the last election we were telling the Canadian people that, under our government, in the last few years Canadian dependency on imported oil had been reduced from 50 per cent to 30 per cent and that our policy was to—

Mr. Crosbie: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson: When?

Mr. Trudeau: When? During the last election we pointed that out.

Mr. Crosbie: That is right, you were saying nothing then.

Mr. Trudeau: We pointed out that at the beginning of the decade we had imported 50 per cent of our oil, and that at the time of the last election—

An hon. Member: Those were exports.

Mr. Trudeau: —we were only importing 30 per cent of our required petroleum.

Mr. Crosbie: How many barrels a day?

Mr. Trudeau: What we were saying during the election was that obviously our policy had reduced dependency on imported oil. We were continuing in that direction and that is why we were seeking re-election. The point being made was that with the kind of policy being promoted by the opposite side, we would never reach that stage by 1990 or by the year 2000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I take that to mean the government has indeed flip-flopped on its policy.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Andre: As a member of the International Energy Agency, Canada has agreed to certain goals in terms of reduction of imports of crude oil and also growth in domestic consumption. While in opposition, the current Prime Minister ridiculed the right hon. member for Yellowhead in terms of his agreeing to these conditions at the June Summit which were confirmed at the December IEA meetings.

● (1420)

Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, while in Paris, seeking to relieve Canada of these obligations under the IEA, or is he explaining to our fellow members of this agency just how this new self-sufficiency policy will enable us to fulfil these obligations which were ridiculed a few months ago?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, once again, the minister is in Paris saying things reported by the press that I have not checked. He is constantly available in the House. He has answered every question put to him. I am sure he will be happy to deal with this one.

I point out to the hon. member that what we were ridiculing in the last election campaign, essentially, was a policy that said Canadians had to pay international prices for petroleum produced in Canada.

An hon. Member: We never said that.

Mr. Trudeau: That was not our position.

An hon. Member: That was not ours, either.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I accept the correction: it was that Canadians would be tied to an international price to the degree of having to pay 85 per cent of that international price by 1983, or January, 1984.

An hon. Member: Wrong again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You still don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I hear the hon. member from Edmonton saying I do not know what I am talking about, and I heard an hon. member from Newfoundland say that he agreed with what I said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: So at least I am on the side of one of the hon. members opposite, and that makes it two against one. That is about the end of what I want to say on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OIL IMPORTS FROM MEXICO

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the statement he made in the House on Tuesday when he said that the interim energy agreement with Mexico did not contain any specific references to oil imports planned under the interim agreement. I trust that since that time he has had a chance to look at the interim agreement and to find out that it indeed did contain the specific reference of a commitment of up to 100,000 barrels a day from Mexico to Canada.

Given that agreement on energy co-operation, and given also that the agreement now on industrial co-operation with Mexico will not be signed during President Lopez Portillo's visit to Canada next week, I should like to ask the minister what assurance we have, other than the minister's optimism, that the 100,000 barrels of oil a day commitment will be honoured.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have not checked the record of Tuesday, but I believe what I said was that there is no exact schedule for deliveries by Mexico to Canada contained in the agreement. I believe that to be the exact statement.

In respect of the general problem that the hon. member raised, all I can say is that Canada and Mexico are negotiating today and I hope to be in a position to have further information on that subject in the near future.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, since this seems to be a day for hon. members to correct what they have said previously, I would ask the minister to go back and take a very clear look at what he said, because not only did he say that the interim agreement did not contain any specific references to oil imports, he also said that such explicit references to levels of oil imports would not be written into any renegotiated agreement. Those are his words.

I should like to ask him, given that indication that this government has abandoned the efforts of the two previous governments to obtain specific imports of oil from Mexico, why have such commitments been abandoned? As the minister knows, France has recently attained a specific agreement with Mexico for the importation of oil, and Japan has recently attained a specific agreement with Mexico for the importation of oil. What is wrong with the Canadian government that it cannot attain a specific agreement with Mexico? Has it abandoned all efforts to get oil from Mexico into this country?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there has been no change whatsoever in the policy of the Canadian government in this respect. The change that has occurred has been in the policy of the Mexican government. If the hon. member will read the news reports accurately, she will read that Japan and France have been having exactly the same problems as Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, is the minister now saying that the government has failed in trying to achieve the rate of 100,000 barrels of oil which the government of Mexico had previously committed to supplying to Canada? The agreement had been initialed and it had been agreed to as late as February; but now the deal is off.

Is the minister now indicating that his government cannot carry out a commitment which was previously honoured, and that it cannot get the Mexican government to agree to that commitment now?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to speak for the government of Mexico, but I can say that there is no change in the position of the Government of Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Speak for your own government.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

CANADA-U.S. TAX TREATY—EFFECT ON CANADIAN REVENUES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Finance). The proposed tax treaty, some of the terms of which were released to the press today, between Canada and the United States reduces the Canadian withholding tax on dividends and interest payments going to the United States from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

Can the Minister of State for Finance tell the House what effect this will have on Canada's deficit in terms of lost revenues? Would he not agree that reducing the withholding tax can only have the effect of encouraging further American investment in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, the agreement to which the hon. member referred was negotiated at length. It will indeed be quite beneficial not only to all Canadians but also to the other party to the agreement, namely the American people. As for specific figures, they are rather difficult to establish. However, I will check with the officials of the department and if I can provide the hon. member with specific figures I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. Rae: I thank the minister for his reply and I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

[English]

I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us whether or not he is in agreement with the statements made by the Minister of Finance in one of his rare public appearances, who said as reported in the Toronto Star of Friday, May 16, that he was not in favour of any large-scale repatriation of the Canadian economy and—

> I have never been as uptight as others have been about foreign investment.

Is that the policy of the Liberal government at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the last part of the quotation, if it is a quotation, about being uptight is the expression of a personal opinion and a disposition of mind and body of the hon. minister.

As far as the first part of the statement, about wholesale repatriation of Canadian assets—the hon. member is shaking his head. What was the phrase, again, in the first part of the statement?

Mr. Rae: I will be glad to send over to the Prime Minister the Toronto Star. It reads:

> Nor does he favour any plan for the federal government to buy large parts of the economy held by foreigners, he said.
> That would be a major decision to take.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I distinctly heard the hon. member quote something about repatriation of assets in his first question. Now he is shaking his head as if he did not say that.

Mr. Nielsen: I heard him, too.

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members opposite heard the hon. member as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: He is shaking his head to get the neurons moving.

Mr. Trudeau: I would ask the hon. member if it is the policy of his party to change its questions in mid-stream.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the frankness of the Prime Minister in answering the question. He shows the same forthcoming as his colleague, the Minister of Finance. How does the Prime Minister square the lowering of the withholding tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent with the fact that the Bank of Canada has been maintaining a higher differential in interest rates, and the recent statement by the Minister of Finance that he is not uptight concerning foreign investment?

● (1430)

How does he square that with the speech which he gave when he was leader of the opposition—in Toronto, five days before the election—saying that the repatriation of the Canadian economy was a major preoccupation of his and would be a major preoccupation of his government, and with the statement that foreign investment was now going to be controlled in a future Liberal government? How does he square those two things?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, now the word "repatriation" reappears in the hon. member's question.

An hon. Member: Let's not play with words.

Mr. Trudeau: I want to point out to the hon. members of the New Democratic Party that that is a matter of a very important distinction. I believe that neither the minister nor I have ever talked of, and certainly it is not government policy, repatriating foreign assets into Canada in a wholesale business.

Our policy has been, when possible, to repatriate some assets, but as much as possible to try to buy into the future rather than trying to buy back the past. That has been the policy of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

OIL IMPORT—IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. In response to my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, the Prime Minister indicated that he had no idea what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was saying in Paris.

I wonder if the Prime Minister can confirm that there was discussion in cabinet and instructions were given to the minister with respect to the targets to be set by Canada for IEA purposes in Paris. I would refer the Prime Minister to a press release put out by the minister, dated May 20, in which it is indicated that for IEA members who participated in the Tokyo Summit in June, 1979, those goals were the ones originally set at Tokyo, and that the goals in Tokyo were confirmed in December, 1979.

Is it the position of the government, and their direction to the minister, to confirm the objectives with respect to reduction of imports as set forth in Tokyo and confirmed by the IEA in December? Is that the position of this government, or are there new targets that the minister has been directed to take to Paris?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I honestly cannot answer that question. I will take notice of it. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would know. I cannot recall the exact terms of the cabinet decision authorizing the minister to take a position in Paris.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I am astounded that the Prime Minister would not have this information. He made such a big issue of it during the last election campaign that I would have thought those figures would be in his mind constantly.

Here is a simple question with respect to statements made in the House yesterday by the Minister of Finance, in which he indicated that whether the oil import compensation program was going to be terminated depends upon the negotiations on pricing and the blended price formula. I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the policy of this government to terminate the oil import compensation program, and I would ask him to clarify the situation because conflicting statements are being made by ministers of the Crown.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, it is part of our policy to phase out the oil import compensation over a period of time.

SELF-SUFFICIENCY—ENERGY PRICING

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Since income that would have been available through Conservative party energy pricing policies in Canada is not now available to the federal government, and because increased federal income through energy pricing contemplated now might be completely lost to subsidization payments for expensive imported oil, can the Prime Minister please tell the House how, or if, the government will provide, for the sake of self-sufficiency, the $100 billion funding necessary to develop non-conventional and alternate energy resources in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be happy to take notice of the question, Madam Speaker.

REPLACEMENT FUEL FOR GASOLINE

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): A supplementary question, Madam Speaker, to the Minister of State (Mines), in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

An hon. Member: She is not here.

Mr. Gurbin: I shall then put the question to the Minister of Transport, who is acting for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

With import prices rising, and dependence on imports probably not decreasing significantly, and since the government seems to have given up on oil self-sufficiency by not providing adequate funding, are there any specific plans to develop gasoline replacement fuel that could assist particularly Ontario and the other non-oil producing provinces in their energy needs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I am sure, Madam Speaker, that there are a number of research projects looking into alternative sources of energy. I will make sure that my hon. friend is given a full list of the research projects presently in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PEACEKEEPING IN CYPRUS—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell the House whether Canada intends to renew its peacekeeping contributions in Cyprus—a renewal that I think will have to be made in a few weeks' time—or if we are perhaps looking at the policy of the previous minister, of re-examining our peacekeeping role in Cyprus?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, no final decision has been made yet, but I may say that I do not anticipate any substantial change in our present commitment.

Miss Jewett: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to give me a little more information. Will it be the same commitment? Will it cover the same contribution of troops, and will it last for the same length of time?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I must reply to the hon. member of the NDP that we do not intend to alter the force sent to Cyprus nor the procedure followed as long as we continue to play our peacekeeping role. We intend to keep our commitment as long as Greece and Turkey ask us to remain there to avoid a possible conflict.

CHARITABLE DONATIONS—CANADA-U.S. RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think he is aware that the reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States regarding donations given to charitable institutions is being challenged by some of the IRS offices in the United States.

Is he aware that there is a problem and, if so, could I ask what he is doing in negotiating with his American counterpart to make sure that charitable institutions in both countries do not suffer because of misapplication of the terms of the treaty?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question at the present time, but I undertake to inform the hon. member.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REQUESTED INVESTIGATION OF FOREIGN TAKEOVERS IN DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary.

For the past few years, processors of dairy products in Canada have been systematically taken over by a small group of multinational corporations, concentrating control of wholesaling and retailing of dairy products in Canada in the hands of a group of mostly foreign-owned corporations.

Since this practice has already placed the interests of Canadian consumers and processors of dairy products in jeopardy, would the minister assure this House that his department will undertake an investigation of takeovers of processors of dairy products in Canada, and ensure that the interests of Canadian consumers are being well served?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to draw this to the attention of the director. As the House knows, it is not customary to say when an investigation is proceeding, and I cannot say whether one is proceeding at the present time. I will certainly make sure, however, that the hon. member's concern is conveyed to the director.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERNATIONAL WHALING CONVENTION—REPORTED CONTRAVENTION BY U.S.S.R.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell us what action his department is taking with respect to the reported taking of killer whales and other endangered species, in contravention of the International Whaling Convention, by the Soviet Union?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are certainly very disturbed by this situation and we are making representations with respect to it. If the hon. member desires further information, I will be glad to attempt to provide it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like some additional information, Madam Speaker. I should like to know the nature of the objections, and what plans the government may have to prevent a recurrence in the next season of the taking by one of the signatories of the International Whaling Convention of endangered species.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, this matter is under review. We are certainly making representations in the appropriate places and we will continue to do so.

ASSISTANCE OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FORCES IN COMBATING

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. At present, there are over 230 forest fires still burning in the three prairie provinces, as well as many more in northwestern Ontario and British Columbia, as a result of prolonged hot, dry weather. Thousands of lives are endangered by these fires; indeed, at least two communities have already been evacuated.

Will the minister put at the disposal of civilian fire-fighting authorities all available armed forces equipment and personnel in order to help ease this very serious situation?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): I can assure the hon. member, through you, Madam Speaker, that the armed forces are at the service of the civilian population wherever they are. At the request of the Saskatchewan government, we have provided a squadron of aircraft to check on these fires and to help transport people who are fighting them. We already have two helicopters in northern Ontario, two in Saskatchewan, and two Hercules aircraft helping people wherever help is needed. The hon. member can be assured that the armed forces are at the service of the Canadian people all the time, wherever they are needed.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. I did not realize I was setting him up for such a good answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sargeant: My supplementary is also directed to the Minister of National Defence. At least one of these fires, affecting over 12,000 acres, was caused by artillery exercises at Canadian forces base, Shilo, Manitoba. Will the minister order the suspension of all such military exercises at all Canadian forces bases in areas of extreme forest fire danger?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, in some areas which are kindling dry, we have ordered a stop to certain military operations. In others, we have taken additional precautions to make sure there is no danger of forest fires.

LABOUR DISPUTES

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD POLICE, SAINT JOHN—REQUEST MINISTER INTERVENE TO SETTLE STRIKE

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the National Harbours Board Police Association in Saint John, New Brunswick, has been on strike for a period of six weeks, and in view of the fact that the only outstanding issue is a small wage percentage increase, would the minister intervene in this matter to ensure an expeditious settlement?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, in relation to the National Harbours Board Police Association strike at Saint John, prior to the strike commencing on April 25 our department provided full conciliation and mediation services. Since the strike has been under way, the department has been monitoring the situation and watching for an opportunity when the parties would be prepared to consider a possible settlement. I will undertake to get further details for the hon. member as to any developments in the past day or so, and I will report back to him.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLOCATION OF DREE GRANTS

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the minister confirm that Sterlake Enterprises, of Hamilton, Ontario, has been awarded a $1.2 million DREE grant for locating a plant in the Winnipeg area, and whether the government gave the Niagara region the same financial consideration for the establishment of a plant as that received by Winnipeg?

Expansion): Madam Speaker, may I take that question as notice? Within a day I will give a full answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, would the minister further confirm that the taxpayers, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, gave an additional $3 million in loan guarantees to Sterlake; and what alternate plan does the federal government have to address the serious unemployment situation in the Niagara region?

Mr. De Bané: I will certainly make a full report to the hon. gentleman.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROJECT RELATED TO SALT MINE IN ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE ELIGIBLE FOR GRANTS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I waited some time before putting it, as I knew the minister was quite busy. I should like to ask the minister, with regard to the Îles-de-la-Madeleine salt mines project, whether that project is eligible for grants from his department and, if so, whether he intends to announce those grants soon.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, some two or three weeks ago when that topic became an argument in the referendum campaign of the PQ government in Quebec, I stated that I would not allow myself to be influenced by demagogic arguments and the indecent fashion in which the Quebec government tried to use the project during its campaign. But at that time I did say to the people of the islands that right after the campaign I would go to the islands myself and explain to them the reasons that will underlie and justify the decision the government will take in the matter. But even at that time I wanted to assure them that the decision I will announce will be to their advantage. In passing, I point out that the Quebec government has already announced to the people that the project will go ahead regardless of the decision we make. The people of the islands therefore take the project for granted, and I shall advise them of the reasons within ten days at the most.

Mr. La Salle: The minister did not quite answer my question. I asked him if he could tell the House whether this project is eligible for grants under the criteria established by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and, if not, what reason could he put forward to refuse.

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, in effect, the hon. member is asking me to announce the decision today. I want to give him the strongest assurance that my decision will be based on indisputable ground. However, I do not wish to announce the decision today because I would like to reserve the news for the people of the islands. The hon. member knows full well that if I say this project is eligible then the conclusion would be easy to draw; if, on the other hand, I were to say it is not eligible, I would have to explain why. So I reserve this for the people of the islands, and you can rest assured that my decision will be supported in such a way that all people of good faith will concur in it and approve it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—COMMITMENTS MADE BY INCO

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Given the fact that an announcement was made in both the Ontario legislature and in the House of Commons which would have required Inco to take particular action with respect to its contribution to acid rain, and with regard to the rumblings we are now hearing from Inco that it may not be in a position to meet those commitments, is the minister in a position to tell us whether the government of Ontario will insist that those conditions be met?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I have no reason to believe that any change will take place in the control order which has been issued. Indeed, I would publicly urge against any such change if it were to be suggested.

RAILWAYS

DISPOSAL OF ABANDONED RIGHTS-OF-WAY LAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The minister is meeting with his western counterparts on June 3 in Victoria, I believe. Can the minister tell the House whether the question of the disposal of the abandoned rights-of-way will be on the agenda? If not, could the minister indicate whether, in fact, he has reached a conclusive decision as to the policy with respect to the disposal of these lands?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I could not say whether this is a specific item on the agenda. I suspect it will be however. On the substance of the question, I would expect to follow the policy outlined by my immediate predecessor.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, could the minister undertake to assure the House that he will implement that policy? I am glad that he will follow the policy of the previous administration, but would the minister undertake to ensure that that policy will be implemented as quickly as possible, inasmuch as this matter has been outstanding for quite some time?

Mr. Pepin: I will do my very best to do that, Madam Speaker. For those who are not familiar with the policy, it consists of leaving the responsibility to the provinces for disposing of the rights-of-way left by the abandonment of rail lines.

GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT IN COMBATING

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of forestry. In light of the several motions moved under the provisions of Standing Order 43, one by my colleague from Peace River, and several others in respect of the very serious situation of forest fires throughout the country—one which complicates even further the difficulty the industry is facing right now—has the minister considered the advisability of meeting with several of his colleagues—for instance, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of National Defence—to see whether it would be possible to work out some kind of strategy on the part of the federal government whereby the provinces, the industry and the environment could be protected?

Furthermore, has he considered the advisability of calling into action the interdepartmental committee which was set up as a result of the meeting in January with the minister responsible for forestry to seek its advice as to how the federal government could become involved in this serious situation?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I welcome what I take to be very constructive suggestions on the part of the hon. member. There has been continuing consultation between my department, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the hon. member knows, the Department of National Defence does, in certain circumstances, provide assistance. In view of the very serious situation which has developed, I will take into consideration the other suggestions the hon. member has made, and get in touch with him.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I had intended to direct my supplementary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but perhaps the minister for forestry might be able to answer it.

A report has been tabled—the Forest Fire Review report—which is a study of the serious effects of last year's fire season in the territories. Has the minister met with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to see whether the recommendations in the report could be implemented with dispatch, in light of the fact that the extent of the fires this year seems to exceed the rather dramatic events which occurred in the territories last year?

Mr. Roberts: There have been some discussions among myself and representatives of the minister and, I believe, between our two departments; but there has not yet been on my part any specific discussion of the recommendations of last year's committee. There may have been on the part of the officials concerned. I will investigate that aspect as well.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

OIL EXPLORATION IN BEAUFORT SEA—DANGER OF SPILLS

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In response to questioning on Tuesday, the minister stated that the report of the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee on drilling in the Beaufort Sea was thoroughly reviewed by himself and his department. This report stated that the government "is not and will not be prepared to make important decisions which will be required in the future if drilling activities continue."

Rather than give what I would call blind assurances that there are no risks involved in this drilling activity, will the minister explain what plans he has to improve the government's capability to respond to the environmental risks associated with increased drilling activity in these Arctic waters?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that his leader asked questions on this subject earlier in the week or in the latter part of last week. There is a contingency plan with respect to drilling activities. If there should be any mishap at all—and, as I say, the possibility is very minimal indeed, according to all the expert advice I have received—we have a contingency plan. I am prepared to talk about that contingency plan in the standing committee this evening. We shall no doubt go into that matter.

Mr. Ittinuar: Also on Tuesday last, the minister referred to advances in technology in connection with drilling in the north. May I say that these have to do only with drilling in the north, not with environmental preservation and protection. He further referred to safeguards with respect to relief well-drilling this season, no doubt in regard to the September 25 deadline for the termination of all drilling activities.

Will he assure the House that in no circumstances will any drilling or production testing be allowed after this date, as happened last year, regardless of pressure from Dome or any other company active in the Beaufort Sea?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I can assure the hon. member that neither I nor the government will, under any circumstances, make a decision based on pressure from Dome or anybody else. The fact is that there is a 20-day grace period after September 20 which could be used for continued drilling, if all the advice we have with respect to weather conditions and all other risks which might be involved is positive in the sense that there is very little, if any, risk at all in continued drilling during that grace period. It will be judged solely on the basis of that expert advice. If the advice indicates drilling is not warranted, we shall adhere to the deadline.

OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question, Madam Speaker, is addressed to the Prime Minister, who earlier in the question period agreed with the Minister of Finance that the policy of the government is to phase out or do away with the oil import compensation program.

Will the Prime Minister explain what the time-frame is for that operation, because the last figure we have is $3.1 billion, a cost which is going to increase now because of recent increases in the price of oil? Is it to be phased out this year? Where will the amount in excess of the $3.1 billion come from? Where does he propose to get it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in answer to a previous question, I indicated that it would be done over a period of time. Therefore, the answer to the part of the question related to this year is "No". But the hon. member must understand the policy put forward by the government. It is a policy of blended prices and, naturally, we would have to continue to pay the international price for imported oil. But we will pay less for the oil.

Miss MacDonald: When?

Mr. Trudeau: Even the hon. member from Kingston will understand that they are not going to accept lower prices for our imported oil.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Also, if she had been more attentive to the policy which was stated by the minister and various members of this government, she would understand that the blended price means we are going to pay the international price for the imported oil and that we will pay less than the international price for Canadian oil. The result will be a blended price.

Mr. Crosbie: We all realize that this is a blended government, or a blanded government, but even a blended government cannot perform miracles. The Prime Minister said, on CBC radio on February 10:

> We obviously would have to subsidize the price of imported oil. We would continue to do this as we did in the seventies.

This was a pledge to the Canadian people, before the election of February 18, that he would continue to subsidize the price of imported oil. Today he tells us he is not going to continue to subsidize the price of imported oil. You are not Mandrake the Magician. You cannot fool the Canadian people indefinitely with blended prices on blended prices and blanded prices. How long will this commitment last? The Prime Minister implied that all during the eighties he would subsidize the price of imported oil as he did in the seventies. Is he now doing away with that commitment, as he has done away with so many others?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the element of cross-subsidization which we began in 1974 will, indeed, disappear as soon as the blended price is in. We will pay to foreigners the international price, and the price in Canada will be a lesser price.

Mr. Crosbie: Where will the money come from?

Mr. Trudeau: What Canadians will pay will be a composite of those two prices.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, a supplementary on behalf of simple, uncomplicated Canadians like myself who cannot understand this new algebra or new mathematics. There are $3.1 billion which the government admits it is going to cost for oil import subsidies this year. How is the Prime Minister going to replace all, or part, of that? Who is going to pay to make that up? The taxpayers will subsidize it, the $3.1 billion, under the present program, but that is going to change with the blended program.

Who, then, is going to pick up the money that is saved under $3.1 billion? It is the Canadian people, is it not, and therefore the government will not have to subsidize because they are going to collect it from the Canadian people—from taxes on heating oil and taxes on all oil products, another sleight-of-hand, gerrymandering that is planned?

Mr. Trudeau: I understand the hon. member is making a suggestion. I will have the minister look into it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BUDGET FOR 1980-81

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. When the minister was in Brussels recently, he was quoted as saying that the National Defence budget for next year, 1980-81, has not been set and that the NATO 3 per cent goal will only be reached if the 1979 appropriations are carried over.

Will the minister tell the House whether the National Defence main estimates tabled by his government on April 22, in the amount of slightly over $5 billion, are in fact his budget, or not?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I must inform the hon. member for Victoria that over the last five years the average increase in the defence budget has been about 3 per cent and that we plan on having the same figure for 1980-81. The present budget or, if you prefer, the current estimates indicate a similar rate, namely, an increase of 3 per cent in real value.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I must say that the minister's parliamentary secretary is much more forthcoming and straightforward in her answers to questions.

Could the minister tell the House if he was briefed, either before he went to Brussels or while at that meeting, on the cost overrun of the Airborne Early Warning system, whose costs seem now to have got out of hand?

Can the minister tell the House what action he took, as the minister representing the Canadian government, to enforce appropriate cost controls for that program so that Canada is not liable to pay a fixed percentage of unlimited costs for the new AEW system?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any program or measure taken by the Department of National Defence which is not controlled at budget level. At times it can happen that these costs will increase due to inflation or certain circumstances beyond our control, but the budget as a whole is very well controlled. When certain expenses increase in an uncontrollable manner it is because we do not have any control over inflation or it is due to some other factors.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader if he could inform the House of his plans for tomorrow and into next week. I understand he is prepared to designate next Friday as an allotted day for the opposition. Could he confirm that for me, please?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I want to confirm that next Friday will be an allotted day. The business for tomorrow will be the Federal Business Development Bank Act and the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, on both of which we hope to be able to complete second reading stage.

[Translation]

As for the events of next Monday, Madam Speaker, there is a change which is important to note, namely that the president of Mexico is going to speak in the House, not at 11 a.m. but at 2.15 p.m., contrary to what may have been announced by some media. The oral question period will be at 4.30 on the same day, and after that we shall pursue consideration of the old age security bill, to grant senior citizens an increase of $35 in their guaranteed income supplement.

After this bill is passed we intend to begin consideration of another piece of legislation to provide government with supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, namely Bill C-30. If before next Friday, which is an allotted day, an opposition day, as I have just mentioned, if we have enough time we hope to be able to complete the study of Bills C-19, C-28, C-3 or of motion No. 1 in the name of the government.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on a number of occasions I have asked the minister whether he would be prepared to make the appropriate reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that there could be reports by parliamentary delegations to that committee, which is something which has been done before. I have indicated that we would be prepared to do that without debate. Is the government House leader prepared to make an announcement today as to whether that is appropriate, and could he put the appropriate order on the order paper so that we could proceed?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: The appropriate notice will be given no later than today, so that we hope to be in a position to adopt the motion tomorrow or at the latest at the beginning of next week.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there is one other matter which concerns the House of Commons. There was some discussion during the period of time that the committee on televising the proceedings of the House of Commons was in existence, that committee being under Mr. Speaker Jerome. That committee does not exist at the moment, but that discussion ranged around the possibility of engaging in a pilot program to televise the work of standing committees of the House of Commons. There had been some discussions about that. The discussions did not lead to any final conclusion.

I am not assessing blame when I raise that matter—not by any means—but would the government House leader give consideration to arranging for the television of a standing committee of the House of Commons or at least equipping one room on a temporary basis, or whichever would be the least expensive, for televising the work of committees so that we can have a pilot project on that? I think that if that does not happen, there is a great part of the work of the House of Commons which would not be seen. I understand there is space available now through satellite transmission to carry the televising of the committees of the House of Commons. There is a considerable amount of space and time available. If the government House leader would consider that, I would be grateful. When he is considering it, could he tell the House whether he has any feeling about reconstituting that committee on televising the House of Commons under the chairmanship of the Speaker of the House of Commons, as was the case in other parliaments?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague will recall that a few months, or rather a few years ago, it was our government which decided to bring Parliament closer to the people by televising the debates of the House. A committee was established at the time to launch this experiment which has now proven successful, and it was in this spirit that a committee of the House was appointed by the Speaker to ensure that the systems then being tested would bring about the results that we have today, that is that the debates would be televised according to the concept of the electronic Hansard.

Now, Madam Speaker, the suggestion concerning the committees deserves consideration. However, I must say to my hon. colleague that televising the debates of the House has made us realize that certain procedures are outmoded, and it is important to consider the fact that there is room for improving many elements of the procedures of the House.

While respecting the spirit of Parliament, we should modernize it. We can also make it more effective and more human. I would not want to be so narrow-minded as to limit the experiment of television to a single committee. I believe that in the next few months, in consultation with all hon. members, we must try to bring about a reform through which we shall be able once again to show to the public now watching us in the House of Commons through television that we can be effective while respecting the rights of the opposition and that we are also able to adjust ourselves to the requirements of the eighties.

All these changes, all these modifications, all these reforms should be discussed by representatives of all parties, and I do not think that it would be wise at this stage to launch a very limited experiment, at least not before the summer recess in order to televise the proceedings of a single committee.

If my learned colleague wants to think about reform proposals, I know that he has already submitted a project containing some good ideas, such as shortening the length of speeches at second reading, which I would gladly support. Certain other changes seemed less acceptable to my mind. In any case, we are open to discussion, and I invite all members who have constructive suggestions to make to do so as soon as possible so that we may, to the great satisfaction of the Canadian public, and of course of parliamentarians, make Parliament even more interesting than it is now.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I share with the government House leader the feeling of complete acceptability of the process of televising the House of Commons. As he will recall, the motion brought forward by the then president of the Privy Council, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), after suitable amendment and discussion was approved unanimously by the House of Commons.

● (1510)

I appreciate his interest in parliamentary reform—it is an interest that we have as well—and I wonder, therefore, whether it is the intention of the government House leader—I gather it is his intention and I wish he would confirm it—to give a reference so that Parliament can get to the business of looking at the procedures of the House of Commons. Would he be prepared to indicate to the House when he would be giving a reference so that the committee can get to work with regard to reforming the processes of the House, and can he tell us whether he plans on doing that before the summer adjournment, because I think the interest in reform is shared by both sides of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the hon. member suggests that the matter be referred to committee. It is a suggestion which merits consideration. But there are other ways of achieving reform without necessarily going through a committee. I know the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization gave the matter lengthy consideration in 1975. It produced three reports which are quite interesting and which could be applied in parts.

I will take his suggestion into consideration, but I want to assure him that reform can be accomplished in several steps but nonetheless in a global perspective rather than through isolated actions which would be inconsequential as regards the changes we want to bring about. Such reform could be accomplished not necessarily through a House committee but directly through consultation with my colleagues and then by a government motion.

In any event, we will most certainly consult members from both sides of the House before suggesting any change whatsoever.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, now that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has indicated that his legislation regarding veterans and their widows is just about ready, will the government House leader keep in mind the provision of legislative time for that legislation as soon as it reaches the order paper?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I will certainly keep in mind what the hon. member mentions, and I trust that we will be able to give him satisfaction before the end of the year.

[English]

Mr. Hargrave: Madam Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the President of the Privy Council. I should like to ask the government House leader if he would use his good offices to give a referral to the Standing Committee on Agriculture on the subject of the very critical western agricultural drought, so that it can be properly discussed for immediate consideration and action in that standing committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will, with pleasure, consult the ministers concerned, in particular the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and probably the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), and, after consultation, take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration.

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. I should like to ask him, while the Minister of Transport is here—I see him behind the curtain lecturing the Prime Minister who appears to be terribly intimidated—whether it is true that there is an intention not to bring forward the ports act legislation which was scheduled to be brought in by the previous Liberal administration and was then brought forward by our administration. First of all, is the rumour accurate that the government does not intend to bring forward that legislation? If it is not true that the government intends to bring it forward, can he say when it will be brought forward and what kind of priority the government places on that legislation, because it has very serious implications for the commission port in my constituency?

Mr. Pinard: I will check that, Madam Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKNIGHT—MEDICARE PROGRAM—CONTRIBUTIONS BY SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arose out of statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin) in this House on May 14. After my quick lesson yesterday, Madam Speaker, I should like to start again and quote from the middle of the paragraph on page 1061 of Hansard for that day, where the minister said:

> —to ask the local population and community to react to financial barriers being imposed when they should not be imposed in the light of the huge payments being made by taxpayers in all of Canada for medicare in Alberta, as everywhere else—though not in Saskatchewan, by the way.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister that over the last number of years the taxpayers of Canada have contributed to medicare in Saskatchewan in 1977-78 to the tune of $193.5 million, in 1978-79 to the tune of $225.9 million. I am pointing that out because perhaps the minister has not paid attention to the province of Saskatchewan and does not feel that the rest of the taxpayers of Canada are contributing to health care in that province.

I should like to point out to the minister that up to 30 per cent of the doctors in the province of Saskatchewan are billing their patients directly. This has continued for the last two to three years. I should like to point out the actions taken by the government in Saskatchewan to rectify this practice which members of the NDP and some other members in the House find reprehensible. What the province of Saskatchewan has done is to introduce a bill in 1979 to amend the Saskatchewan medicare insurance act to require physicians to provide patients with information on how to receive reimbursement from the provincial insurance commission. This is not a great deal of help to people who will suffer a financial loss of probably 80 per cent.

In closing, let me state briefly that at present Saskatchewan is suffering along with other provinces from direct billing by physicians. I hope it is the minister's responsibility to rectify this problem.

If you find this to be a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), that the Minister of National Health and Welfare recognize that the people of Canada contribute to medicare in the province of Saskatchewan.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Through you, I congratulate the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) for this second Tory speech in favour of medicare we have heard in two days. That pleases me and reminds us of the erosion problem suffered by that institution, the best Canadians have to serve them and which of course we want to see remaining whole to serve Canadians.

[English]

I regret that the hon. member has misinterpreted so seriously the answer I gave on medicare more than a week ago. If he would forget about making a speech on medicare, he would see that I have said very clearly and repeatedly that Saskatchewan does not impose financial barriers in the way some other provinces have. I do not even know why he rose on the subject. I am sorry to be that blunt—perhaps the heat in this room makes me call things by their name—but I should like to know what is behind the matter he raised, because on the face of it there is nothing in it that constitutes a question of privilege.

It is pretty clear from my answer that Saskatchewan has not raised financial barriers as have many other provinces. It has an indirect barrier to which I did not refer, and that is the barrier of extra billing. However, the fact is that in the last two years the extra billing has been reduced to some 3.5 per cent of the claims, which is not bad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I am sure that members of the NDP would agree with me that it should be reduced to zero, but unfortunately it is still 3.5 per cent.

For the second day in a row we are faced with a Conservative member trying to espouse the cause of medicare, with the NDP applauding. I had decided not to raise this subject during the course of the inquiry by Justice Hall so as to give his report full justice. I thank hon. members of the opposition for bringing up the matter through alleged questions of privilege which do not exist.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have to rule on this question of privilege. I think the hon. member is expecting me to tell him that he has no question of privilege. Obviously this is a dispute arising between two members where interpretation of what was said is not agreed upon.

● (1520)

I think the time has come for me to read to members instances where, a question of privilege does apply, because it seems to me that members are bringing up questions of privilege quite often. Of course, the Chair encourages members to bring up questions of privilege when they are quite sure that there is a privilege involved, but I think I have had to rule sufficiently often on questions of privilege which were simply disputes between two members. Members should try to be a little bit more mindful of the reasons for which one can invoke a question of privilege, and I will read the reasons to members.

I should like to refer to Beauchesne's fifth edition, which reads as follows:

> A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.
> The failure of a minister of the Crown to answer a question may not be raised as a question of privilege.
> Statements made outside the House by a member may not be used as the base for a question of privilege.
> Many matters, such as the absence of a minister of the Crown from a committee studying his estimates, may constitute a grievance but not a question of privilege.

Even that is quite a serious matter. In this particular case the member is raising a question of privilege based on remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on May 14. He is raising that point today, on May 22. Beauchesne's fifth edition also indicates the following:

> A question of privilege must be brought to the attention of the House at the first possible opportunity.

There was ample opportunity for the member to bring up this question of privilege. The member was in the House. I do not know if he was in the House the day after the minister made this statement, but he was in the House several times since that time. It seems to me that several days have passed during which time the hon. member did not feel that his privileges had been breached. Beauchesne continues as follows:

> Even a gap of a few days may invalidate the claim for precedence in the House.

Therefore, on these grounds, which I am sure are quite obvious, I must rule that there is no question of privilege.

QUEBEC'S OFFICE IN PARIS

Question No. 3—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that the Paris, France, telephone directory in effect listed Quebec, prior to May 22, 1979, as an independent nation by referring to it as Ambassade du Quebec and, if so (a) what is the government doing to correct this falsehood with those concerned (b) is the government taking steps to determine whether or not Quebec's office in Paris has been granted certain diplomatic privileges such as duty-free liquor and cars, ordinarily granted only to recognized diplomatic personnel?

2. Is the government aware that a press official of the French foreign ministry stated in a press interview in February of 1979 with reference to Quebec's house in Paris: "In effect, it's an embassy. Mr. Deschamps, the delegate general, is the equivalent of an ambassador" and, if so, what representations has or is the government making to the French government in this regard?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. The government is aware that the Quebec office in Paris was so listed in the 1979 edition of Paris telephone directory. (a) The Canadian Embassy in Paris contacted the appropriate authorities on the subject. The Embassy learned that while this directory is published under the aegis of the French ministry of "Les Postes et Télécommunications", its content and marketing are in the hands of a private concern. The error was corrected in the 1980 edition of the Paris telephone directory, and the Quebec office in Paris no longer appears under the heading of "Ambassade". (b) The officers of the delegation enjoy privileges similar to those of international organizations. They were negotiated between the Canadian and French governments in the early sixties.

2. Yes. The statement which was attributed to a press officer of the French foreign ministry was in fact made by the secretary of Quebec's Delegate-General in Paris. It expressed her own view of the situation rather than that of the Quebec government. No action is therefore required.

BANK OF CANADA BUILDING

Question No. 242—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the (a) total cost (b) design fees (c) furniture and special facilities costs for the new Bank of Canada building?

2. How many persons are permanently employed in the building?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): 1. The final cost of the construction component was $1.7 million below the budget. It is expected that the cost for other components, which are nearing completion, will fall within the budget.

2. Final consolidation of all of the head office operations of the Bank of Canada in Ottawa will have occurred before mid-year 1980. At that time it is estimated that some 1,500 persons will be permanently employed in the new head office complex.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Question No. 583—Mr. Mitges:

1. In the fiscal year (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76 (e) 1976-77 (f) 1977-78 (g) 1978-79, what amount of revenue did the government receive from the capital gains tax?

2. For the same years, what was the monetary cost to the government to collect the tax?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. (a), (b), (c) and (d). See question 1699, Thirtieth Parliament, third session, answered October 10, 1978.

	Tax Year	Amount (millions of dollars)
(e)	1976	310
(f)	1977	415

(g) The year 1977 is the last year for which data is presently available.

It is not possible to provide an answer on a fiscal year basis. The above are estimates by taxation year of amounts of revenue received by the government attributable to the taxable portion of capital gains, based on calculations by the Department of Finance.

2. Since capital gains are not taxed separately, information is not available as to the monetary cost to the government of collecting the tax.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—PERSONNEL INFORMATION SYSTEM

Question No. 589—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1979, at page 507 which states in part, that the personnel information system of the Department of Supply and Services was found by users "to be inaccurate, untimely and incomplete" and that absence of an "adequate information system has led to the creation of duplicate systems and has hindered personnel management", is the government taking steps to correct this situation and, if so, what are they?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The personnel information system referred to in the Auditor General's report was developed and introduced within DSS about ten years ago. Since that time, the technology for such systems has made great progress and, as a result of a full review made in 1978, it was decided to replace this system rather than try to upgrade it. In 1979-80, the personnel information system in the services administration of DSS was replaced by the Personnel Administrative Reporting System (PARS). PARS is a terminal oriented system using current EDP technology and is capable of providing accurate, timely and complete information in support of the personnel management function. Introduction of PARS in the supply administration of DSS is planned for fiscal year 1980-81.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—NUMBER OF LAWYERS ON STAFF

Question No. 606—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): There are no lawyers employed on staff in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Department of Justice has however, assigned a total of five lawyers to provide the day to day legal counsel required by the department.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION—VETERANS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 658—Mr. Howie:

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) The Canadian Pension Commission does not maintain statistics regarding applications for eligibility for pension by province.

(b) The Canadian Pension Commission does not maintain statistics regarding applications for increase in disability pension by province.

Question No. 659—Mr. Howie:

How many war veterans from New Brunswick have been waiting for more than six months for a board decision to determine their entitlement to a disability pension?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The Canadian Pension Commission does not maintain statistics regarding applications for entitlement to a disability pension by province.

Question No. 660—Mr. Howie:

How many war veterans from New Brunswick have been waiting for more than six months for a board decision to determine their right to an increase in their disability pension?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The Canadian Pension Commission does not maintain statistics regarding applications for increases in disability pension by province.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions listed by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to draw to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council question No. 785 which stands in my name. I do not do this by way of criticizing the government for delay at all in view of the date of the question. The question reads as follows:

Has the Department of Public Works, the NCC or any other department or agency made any agreement with the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton or any other local government in the national capital, to grant land or the right to use land for the extension of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club Arterial Road or any part thereof through lands owned or controlled or used by any government department or agency?

That is the purport of the question. I must tell the parliamentary secretary that the question is of great importance to a large number of ratepayers and residents in the areas of Manordale, Woodvale, Arlington Woods, Tanglewood and Merivale Gardens in the city of Nepean. I bring this matter to his attention specifically so that he could ask the Minister of Public Works if he can expedite an answer to that question. I realize there are problems with respect to that, but if the parliamentary secretary would do that, certainly I would be very grateful.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has drawn the urgency of answering this question to my attention. I will do my best to get a quick answer and to talk to the Minister of Public Works about it.

In general I should like to say that to date we have answered 126 questions in the short period of time since the House has been sitting, which I think is not a bad record.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They have done very well.

Constitutional Change

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—QUEBEC REFERENDUM RESULT—CALL FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved:

That this House welcomes the result of the referendum in Quebec and pledges itself to interpret that vote as a clear call for constitutional change.

He said: "Madame le Président," we decided to put on the order paper today a general motion which calls upon the House to recognize the vote in Quebec as a vote that called very clearly for constitutional change. We thought it was important to do that so that members of Parliament of all political parties had a chance to speak out in united voice about the kind of Canada they want to see in the future.

[Translation]

On Tuesday May 20, it is clear, Madam Speaker, that the people of Quebec voted against the status quo. Like many other Canadians, they made known their wish to build a new country. It is important to realize that this is a second chance for the renewal of the Canadian federation.

[English]

I must compliment the Québecois for their intelligent, peaceful and democratic debate. In many countries around the world, in many different societies, the problems we are dealing with here could result in war, killings, violence and unrest. In Canada our differences are a clash of ideas, not of guns; our differences are a clash of words, not of fists.

● (1530)

In this debate I do not want to speak of winners; I do not want to speak of losers. I want to speak about the future of my country, which I think is very promising.

I also want to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of our country who spoke in a very positive and magnanimous way the night of the referendum and here in the House yesterday. I want to compliment the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the leader of my party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), for their openness and conciliatory attitude in the House of Commons and on referendum night in Quebec on May 20.

This is not a time for self-righteousness. It is not a time for English against the French. It is not a time for east against the west. It is not a time for the federal government against the provincial governments. It is not a time for farmer against worker. And it is not a time for one Canadian against another. But it is a time for all of us to work together, to seek a common consensus and a common compromise for the Canada of tomorrow. It is a time to build a country with a new federation that has a central government strong enough so that we can have economic equality among all the regions, yet a country that is flexible enough that all the regions have freedom to express their uniqueness and their differences.

In addition to constitutional change, we need an economic development plan that is fair to all provinces, and we need to patriate the Canadian economy so that we own and control the house we live in and we have a Canada owned by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Finally, we need a change in attitude in Canada, one of understanding and co-operation among all the people of this country. We are a wealthy country, we have resources, we have the educated people, and with imagination, with constitutional and structural changes, we can build a country where we can feed, and provide adequate health care for, all our people; a country where we can help the poor and the underprivileged, where we can find a place for Indian, Inuit and our Métis people, where we can have a special place for Quebec and French Canadians, and where we can have a special place for and thrive on our multicultural background and make it all a part of a new Canada.

[Translation]

It is important to understand that the result of the referendum is a clear indication of a will to change. As a majority of Yes votes would not have meant the end of the country, a majority of No votes is by no means a guarantee of survival. It is obvious that the 40 per cent of Quebeckers who voted Yes demand substantial change. We must keep in mind that the majority of those who voted No, that is nearly 60 per cent, also demand substantial constitutional change. Also, we must note that some of those who voted Yes are in favour of federalism, but said Yes for tactical and strategic reasons.

[English]

It is also very important, I believe, when one looks at the vote in Quebec, to recognize that the "Oui" vote was strongest among the young; the "Oui" vote was strongest among the educated, the leaders of tomorrow. This reinforces the urgency of change in our country, and the urgency of making changes as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I believe that we do not have very long to find a solution, otherwise dissension across Canada may be impossible to stop.

Just think about what has happened in this country since 1967, Mr. Speaker. Let us take our minds back to the year 1967, our centennial year, a year of great promise and great hope, a year of celebration in our country.

[Translation]

Since 1967, a year of festivities in the province of Quebec, it is clear that many citizens are not too happy with the status quo. Here are some examples from recent years. In 1968, the Parti Québécois was formed. In 1976, it had become the government of Quebec, and four years later, the Parti Québécois had managed to rally 40 per cent of the votes for a mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association. It is clear that many Quebeckers are not happy with the status quo in Canada.

[English]

Since our celebration in 1967 we have seen in the west increasing unhappiness and the founding of several small separatist groups, political parties, including the Unionist party that hopes to make me and all of us in western Canada Americans, something that as a westerner I will fight against by arguing for legitimate change within a federation. I have nothing against my friends in the United States, but I want to remain a Canadian; I want to remain a Canadian now and a Canadian in the future.

A recent poll by the Canada West Foundation showed that 13 per cent of western Canadians wanted the west to separate from Canada and form a separate country, and I think that is very serious. Some 4 per cent wanted us to join the United States. A CBC poll conducted in Swift Current, in my province, showed that 19 per cent of the people there wanted a separate country and 6 per cent wanted to join the United States. I think that is evidence that western alienation and unhappiness is growing in our country.

Since our celebration in 1967 we have seen increasing unrest in Newfoundland to the point where a distinguished journalist named Charles Lynch recently described a speech by Premier Brian Peckford as sounding more separatist than René Lévesque.

Since our celebration in 1967 the Indian, Inuit and native people of our country have been increasingly frustrated with their status in Canada. Last month the Indians asked to participate in constitutional talks and to have some of their rights enshrined in a new Canadian constitution. These and other frustrations in our country are very real, and they must be met. We do not meet them by constantly putting people down, by clubbing people on the head and by isolating them. That only fosters a feeling of anger, a feeling of discontent and a feeling of alienation in our country.

[Translation]

With respect to Quebec, neither my party nor I are in favour of sovereignty-association, and the leader of my party has said so many times in Parliament and across the country. But I must congratulate the present government of Quebec, as my leader did in Parliament last year, I believe, on other political decisions, such as the project to nationalize the asbestos company, the automobile insurance scheme, the labour legislation, the farming legislation and its position on the status of women and the highest minimum wage in North America as well as other progressive measures. All these things have been accomplished within the federal system. I also agree with the general principle of Bill 101.

• (1540)

Bill 101 guarantees as many, if not more, rights to the English in Quebec than many of the other provinces guarantee to the Francophones who live outside Quebec. The English minority in Quebec has schools and school boards, while in provinces such as Ontario there are many French schools. But in spite of the fact that there are half a million Francophones in Ontario, they are not allowed to have their own school boards. Here in the national capital the parents of tens of thousands of young people who attend French schools are not allowed to have French language school boards.

Instead of condemning everything that is done by the Quebec government, as some have done by comparing that government to the governments of Cuba and Haiti, we should praise what is right, progressive and good and condemn and dissociate ourselves from that with which we disagree. As I say, we disagree very strongly with sovereignty-association.

I was very happy to notice, in La Presse newspaper of May 17, just last Saturday, an article which quoted a former Liberal MNA who had been a cabinet minister in the province of Quebec. The gentleman was Victor Goldbloom who is an Anglophone from the Jewish minority group in Quebec.

[Translation]

And I quote the headline:

The PQ nationalism does not exclude minorities

The Quebec society is one which is very democratic.

[English]

When someone like Mr. Goldbloom makes a statement like that, we should take cognizance of the fact that, just because we disagree strongly with one of the concepts of a people, we do not have to condemn the whole direction of the people.

[Translation]

Quebec is different. It is a distinct society by reason of its history, its language and its culture. Moreover, its school and judicial systems are different from those to be found elsewhere in Canada. In my view, a new constitution must recognize this difference.

[English]

There are many differences and many problems in western Canada as well. I have already referred to the growth of the separatist movement, the Unionist party and the like, all of which we oppose. However, our differences in the west are primarily of an economic nature. For a long time there has been an increasing economic alienation of western Canada from Ottawa and the government.

But western Canada is not monolithic in a cultural sense. One need only look to Alberta and Saskatchewan to see the many historical, cultural and institutional differences which exist in the prairies. In Saskatchewan there is a long history of co-operation, of public ownership and of public participation in the economy. In Alberta the orientation has gone in the other direction.

However, there are many problems which are similar. We have problems in agriculture. We fought to build a Canadian Wheat Board, and we want to keep a Crow rate as a statutory rate to help our farmers. We also want to process our food resources in the west, to build up an industrial base and process some of the raw materials of western Canada in western Canada to provide our people with jobs and the resulting economic benefits. We would also like to have a freight rate system that is more fair and does not discriminate against western Canadians in the development of our goods.

In terms of the constitution, there are many things that the western Canadian premiers are now asking of Ottawa. Recently at a meeting in Lethbridge, Alberta, the four premiers issued a communique saying that resources should be under the control of the provinces, that the provinces should have more input and more control over communications in our land, and that the federal institutions should be reformed so that they reflect a more accurate make-up of our country which would allow for more provincial input into the institutions of Canada.

What the western premiers are saying is something that we will have to consider in the months and years ahead—that they want a certain devolution of power toward the provinces on the one hand and, on the other hand, a strengthening in the centre of provincial voices and provincial views so that the provinces could have some input into institutions such as the Supreme Court and the Bank of Canada. Perhaps the Senate could be changed to a council of the provinces, or something of that nature.

These are some of the feelings one finds in western Canada. I stress very strongly that most of those feelings are directed toward forming a new country within a federation, a country which we all wish to keep together.

● (1550)

To all those, whether in Quebec, in western Canada, in the maritimes, who have lost faith in a federal arrangement for Canada and to all those who no longer believe that the Canadian federation can meet their needs, we of the New Democratic Party reply that a federal structure is the solution to the various problems that exist in this country. Having said that, Madam Speaker, we cannot accept either the constitutional status quo or a renewed status quo. On the contrary, we consider the new federation must reflect the values of democracy and social justice.

I would like to recall rapidly some of the advantages of a federal arrangement and point out at the same time why the NDP, our party and myself are convinced that this political formula is best for the future of Canada. It is particularly interesting to see that the first individuals who were politically inspired by the old principle "In union there is strength" were not the Fathers of Confederation but the Iroquois who created the first kind of federation in this country. They understood that a federal arrangement was a guarantee of greater stability. Today we can confirm that idea, a very, very important idea. A federation is a more solid alliance than a treaty of association between two or several sovereign states. Another advantage is the absence of monopoly over the political power. In a federation, the political power is divided among different levels of governent and within a democratic framework; that constitutes the best defence against an authoritarian regime by nature and against an intensification of social conflicts. It was de Tocqueville who wrote, I think, and I quote:

> I believe provincial institutions to be useful to all peoples, but none seem to me to have a more real need of those institutions than those whose social system is democratic.

It seems obvious, Mr. Speaker, to the largest part of the people that a federal arrangement assures a certain economic viability that would not be present in other situations. I will give you only two proofs of that. The process of greater economic unity in Europe—and I am referring here to the European Economic Community—and second, the recognition by the leader of the Parti Québécois himself, René Lévesque, in his platform, of the necessity of an economic association between Quebec and Canada.

Finally, as another advantage, one must be aware that a federation is not necessarily incompatible with the development of the peoples that make it up. It is rather the structures of the federation and the ways in which governments use those structures that can create a form of oppression of minority groups. So, in theory, it is possible to conceive the existence of a development for political groups and peoples.

And, Mr. Speaker, even Mr. René Lévesque, Premier of Quebec and leader of the Parti Québécois, acknowledges that because a month ago he wrote in the April, '80 edition of the magazine l'Action nationale, and I quote:

> Instead of the present regime, it may be possible, in theory, to imagine a form of renewed federalism. But this renewed federalism should aim at changing Quebec's place in a way that will not weaken it but strengthen it.

René Lévesque said that a month ago.

In principle, we of the New Democratic Party are not against this proposition since we believe that the development of the people who make the Canadian federation should be promoted. And as far as the Quebec society is concerned, we believe that during the next negotiation round, the idea of a special place for Quebec in the renewed federation should not be ruled out.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I want for a few more moments to digress from the sort of problem we often deal with in this House—the concrete world of taxes, inflation, unemployment, expenditures and so forth—and to address briefly a problem that is much less tangible but in my opinion all too real. This is the problem of attitude. It is very difficult to talk in concrete terms of attitude, but it is the problems of attitude and of perception that underlie the way in which the central government goes about using its power.

It seems to me that power concentrated in the centre has all too often taken on the shape and the image of the centre, rather than reflecting the reality of the regions. This is a multicultural country; our people have come from many lands. The people who settled and built my province, for example, have names like Konkin, Fedorak, or Tchorzewski. Even when adopting the English language they have left their cultural mark. The differences between my province and Newfoundland and Ontario are not as marked as those that exist between Saskatchewan and Quebec, but they are there and they are important. Thus it is important that the central body, the institutions, reflect those differences. We have different cultural values in Canada and those differences should not be treated as an impediment to progress; they should be seen as an attribute in this country.

To return to the question of perception, we must at all times remember that what one culture defines as having great importance is not necessarily so defined by another culture; those things which one culture defines as having equal value are not necessarily so defined by other cultures. By not recognizing the existence of these differences, by not seeing them as attributes and by not incorporating them into policies and programs—those which we describe as universal as well as those we describe as regional—we run the risk of increasing the alienation and regional conflicts with which we are all too familiar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I shall cite but two examples, Mr. Speaker. I hope they will not seem petty or frivolous as they are examples that are important to many people. I remember Robert Cliche.

[Translation]

And I think that hon. members remember clearly Mr. Robert Cliche, who was once the leader of our party in the province of Quebec and a very well known judge—

[English]

He was very popular and an important figure in the province of Quebec. I remember when Robert Cliche talked about the housing program of CMHC. He mentioned that this agency of the central government was building houses in Quebec to architectural plans, which I suppose were adopted by officials in Ottawa, and which had incredibly small kitchens. Robert Cliche pointed out that in the homes of Quebeckers the kitchen has always been a very special place. It was and still is a focal point, a place of socializing, a place of conversation. All this was ignored by CMHC planners who designed houses with small kitchens. In the scheme of things, this is a small problem but I think it is indicative and symbolic of the much larger problem of attitude at the centre of the regions of this country.

Another example is the matter that was raised in the House three or four weeks ago by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky). This example is very important to the part of the country that I come from. I refer to the recent policy of the government of ending the Saturday morning postal service in rural communities. In a constituency like mine people really do not understand how the central government can be so ignorant of the importance of this service to the continued viability of their communities, and therefore to the continuation of a way of life that they value. In a small community of 200 or 300 people or even 3,000 people, Saturday is the day when people come to town to shop, to visit, to socialize, to meet friends, neighbours and relatives, to go to the coffee shops and cafes, to go to the co-ops. They also go to the post office. All you have to do in a small community is stand in front of the post office on a Saturday morning and you will meet over half the residents. That is important to us, Mr. Speaker. A lot of people feel alienated when such a service is removed.

Whether we talk about housing programs, the postal service, rail policy or a multitude of other policies and programs, the widespread feeling that the central government is literally and figuratively too far removed from the lives and aspirations of the diverse people of this country is, it seems to me, justified. Too much has been undertaken by planners and mandated by governments which indicates that there is no awareness or appreciation of the differing values in this country.

As we set out on this ground project of constitutional reform, we must begin, as the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, by putting our own house in order and by putting our own institutions in order. We can begin that process by making sure that our perception of what this country is all about is correct. I think that all of us in this House realize how easy it is to lose sight of what is wanted in the constituencies when we are burdened with the administrative and other responsibilities of office. We must take steps to ensure that the voices of all the peoples and all the regions are heard and that their aspirations are realized as much as possible.

I see that my time is about up, Mr. Speaker. If you will allow me another minute or two, I should like to conclude by saying that the task before us is no easy one. I think we have started off with the right tone, however. We started off by being open, by wanting to build bridges, wanting to reach out to people, wanting to build a federation with a centre strong enough to make sure we have genuine equality of opportunity, yet flexible enough that each region and each province can demonstrate its uniqueness. That uniqueness can grow and flower, Mr. Speaker, and make all of us better and more wealthy because of it.

We are a string of communities, a string of regions and a string of cultures around this country. The combination of all those cultures and communities is more than just the literal addition of them. We are more than a community of communities. The combination of all of that is Canada. It is the combination of all of that that I think is going to make this country one of the really great countries in the years that lie ahead.

● (1600)

I plead with the Prime Minister, with members of this House, with all of the provincial premiers and leaders, that in the next few weeks and in the next couple of years—because I believe that we do not have too many more years to go—we maintain this policy of openness, this policy of trying to draft a new constitution, a new framework with new economic policies, with new attitudes that will make us, once again, one big, united family that recognizes our differences, that is proud of those differences and that grows because of those differences. Those are differences that make us a country called Canada that is unique and prosperous in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member who moved the motion now before the House as the topic to be discussed on this allotted day. It is very simple and, if I may, I should like to read it again:

That this House welcomes the result of the referendum in Quebec—

Obviously, as far as the first part of the motion is concerned, as we saw yesterday, the reaction was spontaneous and unanimous on both sides of the House: all hon. members from all parts of Canada, are truly happy with that result. I resume the quotation:

—and pledges itself to interpret that vote as a clear call for constitutional change.

The second statement is also obvious in that the reaction of the hon. members of all parties proved clearly yesterday in this House that the results of the vote in the province of Quebec must be interpreted as proof that the province of Quebec has decided to choose Canada while at the same time calling for a renewed federalism.

As far as I am concerned, the way I interpret the results which gave the federalist forces about 60 per cent of the votes in Quebec as opposed to 40 per cent to the Yes forces, is this, Mr. Speaker: they are clearly indicative of two conclusions. The first, that a large majority of Quebeckers have expressed their wish to remain within Canada; and second, that a large majority of Quebeckers have also heard, accepted and understood our message to the effect that by voting No, they would be voting for major constitutional change. If, in addition, we take into account the fact that amongst those who voted Yes, quite a number did so, by their own admission, to exert pressure with a view to getting a renewed federalism and those people wanted change while remaining within Canada, in the final analysis, we see that, in that May 20 referendum, far more than 60 per cent of the Quebeckers indicated clearly that they choose to belong to Canada. Therefore, my interpretation is that the vast majority of Quebeckers chose Canada Tuesday night, but that they did so in the hope that institutions can now be changed in the near future. And what leads me to come to that conclusion is the style that permeated the referendum campaign in Quebec these last few weeks. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the campaign unofficially began by the tabling of the notorious question in the Legislature, to be followed subsequently by a debate. All the observers that I have met, at least a large number of them, agree that during the debate in the Quebec legislature the PQ members did not deal at length in their speeches with the question itself but mostly discussed matters other than sovereignty-association. Conversely, the opposition members, a much smaller group, denounced the question as being ambiguous, long, confusing and designed to garner votes under misrepresentations. But since the PQ members were in a majority situation in the legislature, it so happened that their comments had an impact on the public and indeed at that stage of the referendum campaign, the PQ had taken the lead and was winning over the federalist forces.

After that, the referendum campaign was officially launched and then a strange phenomenon happened. Many would have thought that it would have been hard for federalist forces to rally, but quite the opposite. In fact, federalist forces came together and united in the most perfect harmony and in the strongest unity to take a united stand against the sovereignty approach. Under Mr. Ryan's remarkable leadership, we saw the Liberal members of the Quebec National Assembly, the members of the National Union and of other opposition parties join forces with members of this Parliament and in the most complete harmony express to all Quebeckers their will to build a modern Canada, a country that meets the requirements of its regions and where the constitution will be renewed as soon as possible.

This was a turning point because, from the very beginning of the referendum campaign, we saw the exemplary union of federalist forces of all parties both in Quebec and in Canada and this, to my mind, largely contributed to the great victory of the No vote during the referendum campaign.

Also, the style adopted by both forces was a determining factor in the decision made by the voters in the province of Quebec. If we analyse briefly the campaign style of the Parti Québécois and the Yes side, we realize, and this may seem paradoxical, that their approach was very negative. I suggest that this seems paradoxical because they were trying to get a Yes answer, while their approach was essentially negative.

The Yes supporters attacked federalism, federalists, and they even tried in some instances to attack individuals rather than to stick to the substance of the debate. They even failed—and it was perhaps a strategy, and if so, it failed—to deal in depth with sovereignty-association and to define it to a population which was obviously concerned and wanted to know exactly where the Parti Québécois and the Yes supporters wanted to lead them with a question which was denounced from the very beginning of the campaign as deceptive and ambiguous.

And we saw on May 20 how the general public's common sense had the better end. The question itself aroused suspicion, being much too long and not really understandable by the average Quebec men and women, the average citizens. And the people told themselves: If the question is so long and complex, probably those who put it have something in the back of their minds. I think this was a natural reaction by Quebeckers, at least in my constituency.

It would have been much simpler to ask plainly: Do you support sovereignty-association or not? and explain the implications during the campaign. The skepticism caused by the lengthy and ambiguous question was strengthened by the fact that the question was being put by a political party proposing Quebec's independence. Federalist forces made this very clear in my view during the referendum campaign when bringing it to the attention of Quebeckers. Finally the people from the Parti Québécois used their majority position to force their question upon the National Assembly and in the referendum.

And Quebeckers realized that the lengthy and difficult question, ambiguous for most people, was put by a political party with a clear platform to seek independence for Quebec. Once again the common sense of the people prevented them from going the Parti Québécois' way, not only because the question was confusing and too lengthy, but also because it was put by a party with an avowed objective of independence that appeared to be hiding their choice behind a 125-word question.

But something more decisive than the ambiguity and length of the question and the fact it was put by a political party seeking independence is that Yes forces, the PQ majority failed to show Quebeckers—as theirs was the burden of proof that the change to sovereignty-association would bring about advantages not provided by the current system, federalism, and I think that the No forces exploited that well in all regions, and the question was legitimate. I think that with a question as important as this one where people were asked to give the government the mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association, a question which was 125 words long, and that was what the Parti Québécois wanted, I think it would have been normal and wise for the Yes side, during the referendum campaign, to try and prove to the ordinary people, to the general public that a change was desirable because it would benefit Quebeckers.

Not only was proof not given by but the Yes forces, those who argued for the Yes cause, seem to have deliberately avoided talking about sovereignty-association and therefore about its advantages, if any. This, in my opinion, showed disrespect for the electorate and the people of Quebec. But once again, as I have said, common sense prevailed. Quebeckers were distrustful as soon as the question was made public because it was long, because it was ambiguous, because it was asked by a political party whose political option was to achieve independence, and it seems to me that the fact that the Péquistes skirted the definition of sovereignty-association and its consequences only added to this mistrust and encouraged the great majority of Quebeckers to reject the option, to refuse to give the mandate asked for and to say no to the referendum question. So, this is my modest and very summary analysis of the results of the referendum, results that should be interpreted as an outright rejection of sovereignty-association by Quebeckers, an option unknown to them and about which they have been systematically denied any explanation and, consequently, of which they do not know the benefits, if any. On the other hand the results of the vote show very clearly and very positively that the huge majority of Quebeckers are in favour of Canada, their feeling of belonging was very obvious but, at the same time, most Quebeckers, if you add up to those who voted No all those who voted Yes and who wanted constitutional changes but within the federation, we realize that the large majority of Quebec citizens want major constitutional changes and very soon.

[English]

I am delighted with the result because it makes two things clear; first, that a majority of Quebeckers have expressed their preference for staying in Canada; and second, that they have heard and accepted our message that voting No is a vote for change. In interpreting this victory we should remember that many people who voted Yes really want change which would keep Quebec in Canada. So, all in all, the victory for Canada is clear. The job now is to get on with the work of reform as rapidly as we can, and this is exactly what we intend to do. It is our hope that the government of Quebec will accept the will of the people and express its willingness to participate creatively in the work of constitutional reform.

[Translation]

It made me conclude that the large majority of Quebeckers want to stay in Canada and promote a renewed federalism. I mentioned the type of campaign made by the Yes supporters, but the type of campaign of the No supporters had also an influence and a significant one.

On our side, I think we tried to make people proud of belonging to Canada and we have been very successful. I think people in Quebec accepted our proposal that they should choose the road that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, (Mr. Trudeau) had often described as the road to excellence, where you try to be heard at the federal level so that this country will be governed in harmony between the two great founding peoples and so that individual freedoms and minority rights will be protected.

I think that our commitment to Canada and our approach commanded great respect, because people understood what we were asking from them, in spite of injustices that occurred in the past which no one denies, but that nonetheless happened within a relatively very short period of time. After all, in my humble point of view, a nation is still very young when it is only 113 years old. There are various ways of correcting injustices. Contrary to the Parti Québécois, which was advocating a kind of territorial withdrawal which would be an act of frustration and would result in the loss for the Quebec people of huge resources, both cultural and material, and which would also be unfair to our French-speaking minorities outside of Quebec, what we were proposing was—instead of collective sulking and a sort of confinement in a limited territory—a noble effort to show that in this country which is still very young, French and English people can live in complete harmony, in mutual respect, and of course in the greatest equality, Mr. Speaker. I for one believe in it, and think that our message was well accepted by the Quebec people as a whole. In 1980, in a country which is about 113 years old, we can still meet the challenge of diversity or, in other words, as I have just said, allow two great founding people to benefit from the cultural wealth of each other and let several other cultures be respected and develop in the Canadian mosaic. I believe that what I said in my region, and what many others said in their own region, helped to strengthen the will of Quebeckers to meet this challenge, to have confidence in the future and to go on building a great country which can remain united and be really strong. I have the impression that the vote on the question asked by the Parti Québécois resulted in a refusal of the concept of sovereignty-association, but also, and this can now be stated as an obvious fact, gave massive support to a healthy, fair and equitable development of the beautiful and vast country which is Canada. This this is why I am in complete agreement with my colleague of the New Democratic Party who moved today's motion when he concluded, as I am convinced we must all conclude, that it is now obvious that Canadian attitudes have begun to change clearly and significantly, and I believe that this will lead to constitutional changes which will come about effectively and quickly. I am happy that the Prime Minister unequivocally reaffirmed yesterday in this House his desire to bring about a renewed constitution and the flexibility of his approach.

Before closing, I would not want to miss the opportunity to quote some of his comments which are essential at this stage of the evolution of our Canadian history. Two days ago, we saw the victory of the No option of which we have just commented on the meaning for Quebec, but the fight is not over. It has just begun, Mr. Speaker. It is important to emphasize this short passage of the statement made yesterday afternoon in the House by the Prime Minister of Canada, and I quote:

> —I have asked the Minister of Justice to begin immediately a tour of the provincial capitals in order to obtain the views of the premiers on the best way to follow up on their will to change. As for us, our only prerequisites for change are the two which I outlined in Quebec as early as January, 1977.
> First, that Canada continue to be a real federation, a state whose constitution establishes a federal Parliament with real powers applying to the country as a whole and provincial legislatures with powers just as real applying to the territory of each province. Second, that a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms be entrenched in the new constitution and that it extend to the collective aspect of these rights, such as language rights.
> I had said at the time and I say again today that we consider everything else to be negotiable. What we want is to give Canada a new, modern and functional federal constitution which will enable our governments to better meet the needs and aspirations of all Canadians.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is hardly anything left to add to the comments made by the Prime Minister of Canada; except for the federal link as well as individual and minority rights, everything else is negotiable. This is where we stand and I have every reason to believe that with some good will, a change of attitude has been shown and continues to be shown, but now it is time to alter our institutions in a harmonious climate without undue delay.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—QUEBEC REFERENDUM RESULT—CALL FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nystrom:

That this House welcomes the result of the referendum in Quebec and pledges itself to interpret that vote as a clear call for constitutional change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There have been some discussions or consultations with respect to how the order of speakers might best be handled today because there is a considerable number of members who wish to enter the debate. Some proposals have been put which, it is the understanding of the Chair, may be convenient and suitable to members of all parties, and if that is the case I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to proceed in that fashion.

The elements of the understanding appear to be that, while ordinarily the next speaker would not enjoy the 30 minutes given to the first two speakers, in fact the House might agree to give the Conservative spokesman, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), 30 minutes in which to speak.

The second element of the understanding is that speeches after eight o'clock this evening would be limited to 15 minutes for each hon. member.

The third element, if I might call it that, of the understanding is that it is hoped that this order of business would produce a capacity to have speeches from four members of the New Democratic Party, five of the Conservative party and possibly—perhaps likely—five of the Liberal party.

If there are hon. members who want to expand on that, that is fine, at the cost of some problem with the amount of time which may be available generally. However, as soon as it appears appropriate the Chair will seek the unanimous consent of the House to proceed in that fashion.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the elements you have outlined are accurate and agreeable to this side, and by my calculations, if we adhere to those time limitations, the Liberal party will have five speakers, we will have five speakers and the NDP will have four speakers. We are proceeding on that firm understanding.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that our understanding is what you have said from the chair, that if need be the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) could have 30 minutes. After eight o'clock the time will be reduced to 15 minutes per speaker; we will get four, the Conservatives will get five and the Liberals will get five.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make a suggestion. I know that this has not been cleared with the House Leaders on either side, but in view of the number of people who might want to speak on this very important issue, perhaps it might be appropriate to reduce the time limit after eight o'clock to ten minutes rather than 15 to allow more members to speak.

Mr. Nielsen: No.

Mr. Malone: You may do that voluntarily, though.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The impression I have, with respect to the last suggestion made by the hon. parliamentary secretary, is that he might find the agreement of the House if it were proposed that the speeches were in fact kept to 15 minutes rather than ten, because I did hear some objection to the reduction to ten.

I will now seek the consent of the House. Is it agreed that after eight o'clock this evening speeches shall be limited to 15 minutes, without exception?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is so ordered.

• (1630)

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. I want to say at the outset that the official opposition fully endorses the two elements of the motion before the House this afternoon.

The citizens of Quebec have spoken clearly and expressed their desire to remain in Canada. For many the referendum was an experience in which they shared very deeply. But the outpouring of emotion was not restricted to the citizens of Quebec. Across Canada Canadians have expressed relief and gratitude at the results, which were a clear demonstration that the break-up of Canada was not to proceed, that sovereignty-association was not an option that we would consider.

Now that the referendum is over, it is imperative that Canadians from all parts of the country have an opportunity to participate in the changes that must take place. As Canadians, first, we must recognize that we are among the most fortunate countries of the world. Yes, we have problems; yes, changes must be made in our institutions; but let us never forget that as a nation we have advantages. We have been blessed beyond the dreams of those who in the 1860s gave form to our country.

Second, we must remember that confederation has not failed. During the past 113 years our country has developed into a modern society, a society which is conscious of its minorities, a society which gives everyone opportunities unequalled anywhere else in the world today.

There have been those who have argued that confederation does not and has not worked, those who have advocated that a province or a region would have a better future if it were on its own. Canadian history is replete with examples of politicians who have advocated the dismemberment of our country. Those politicians of division are still with us today, but they have never been able to convince the majority of Canadians, who have followed their own common sense, to follow their siren call for ending the Canadian experience. Often they were motivated by frustration or perceived injustice which they felt was perpetrated on their region or on their province. But never were Canadians willing to follow their proposition that our future would be better apart and that we should end the grand experiment called Canada.

The Fathers of Confederation grappled with attitudes and problems similar to those that face us today. Tension then, as today, existed between English and French-speaking Canadians, and even then between east and west. But I am reminded of the words of one of the Fathers of Confederation, George Étienne Cartier, when he said in 1865:

> Shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence, when by combining together we could become a great nation?

Surely that is the sentiment of every member of the House and also virtually every Canadian, that we are a great nation only because we have combined together in a common cause.

Just as in 1867 Canadian leaders saw the need and the advantage of joining together and forming a new nation, so also today that advantage has not changed. It is important, therefore, that we renew our dedication to the building of our country. Having said that, let me say that it is important that we grasp this moment of opportunity. The important question must be answered not by words but by action.

Many supporters of the No option were convinced to vote No because of the promise of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other federal leaders that constitutional change would become a priority. Additionally, a significant number of those who voted Yes were convinced that the only way in which constitutional change could take place was by voting Yes and delivering a shock to Ottawa to get on with the job.

Constitutional change should not be viewed by either the federal government or the provinces as an exercise where one has to give up or give in, but rather as an exercise in nation building. It does not have to be a win-lose confrontation. What is fundamental is the attitude that will be brought to the exercise.

In the past many of us have said that the Prime Minister has been inflexible in his approach to constitutional change. The attitude to adopt must be one which embraces openness and the willingness to see the other person's point of view. It is an attitude which cannot be dominated by a win-at-any-cost approach. Unfortunately, our history is littered with the debris of constitutional proposals and conferences which attempted to bring about constitutional renewal but were not successful because of the attitude of the participants. In the end, if people are not willing to change their attitudes, no matter which structures we anticipate, no matter what conferences we call, they will end in failure.

Speaking in the House yesterday, my leader said, in terms of attitude:

> More than the law and more than the constitution is at issue here. There must also be a positive attitude among citizens and among governments, an attitude which is consistent with the changes in law and the changes in form.

First of all, then, we must accept that the status quo as now understood is not acceptable. A genuine feeling exists that a new constitution is needed for Canada, a constitution in Canada which can be amended by Canadians.

It is for these reasons that it is important to reach out to those Quebeckers who voted and who wanted to see constitutional renewal. It is important that we do not reject those who, because of their frustration, voted Yes but who did not want to end the federalist experience.

Despite the euphoria and good will that have poured out throughout Canada and in this House since May 20, I believe that a word of caution must be expressed. Of course we want constitutional renewal, and the referendum vote should be interpreted exactly that way. But there is an inherent danger that we can create false expectations that constitutional renewal will be easy to achieve and that, once achieved, the structural problems will not give rise to new frustrations. We must also be cautious that we do not give the impression that constitutional change will end the differences and the divisions which have occurred in the past.

Second, it is important to stress that this desire for change is not only a Quebec phenomenon. My leader said in the House recently:

> May 20 was but a date in a continuing process. It is by no means an end but a beginning, and now it is up to us in this Parliament and in the parliament of the territories and the provinces of Canada to implement changes which are being sought by Canadians all across this country.

We cannot make the mistake that only Quebec wants change. Nor can we fall into the trap that one region has more legitimate grievances than another. Just because certain regions have not chosen to have similar referendums does not indicate less determination to address and alleviate long-standing grievances.

So at this time of good will we also face a serious peril—a real threat that disappointment and anger can replace this good will if we fritter away our opportunities. All of us recognize how quickly good will can be replaced by anger and accusations. We must avoid giving any comfort to the separatists, wherever they may be, to conduct our activities in such a way that the talks would not lead to new satisfactory arrangements. There are obviously people in this country who are hoping that these talks will end in failure. This cannot happen. The talks must be real and they must bear results.

Additionally, we must caution members of the House that results will not be achieved overnight. We can pass as many unanimous resolutions in the House as we want; these will not result in overnight change. It will also take more than a few months. While there may be advantages to setting target dates, I for one would caution members of the House that the setting of strict time limits by which renewals should occur has inherent dangers in it. There have been premiers, as well as members of this House, who have said that within two years a new constitutional renewal could take place. While targets are acceptable, I do not think we should be locked into those kinds of time frames.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, when speaking in this House, stated that a federal-provincial conference would be called in the near future for the purpose of discussing the future of Canada. While we welcomed this announcement, it is important that we note the manner in which these conferences have functioned in the past. They have provided a forum for leaders from all regions of Canada to meet and discuss the problems the country faces. This exchange of views has been beneficial.

But there is also an inherent weakness in this approach. For one, these conferences provide a forum in which to express grievances as well as to put forward points of view, but unfortunately too often they have not brought about resolution of conflicts. Some might say that this is a harsh judgment of the federal-provincial history of this country, but a study of that history will show many of these conferences failed. While the participants were well-meaning, the legacy of the conferences did not result in the changes sought by the people. By their very nature the membership is composed of political leaders who must defend provincial or federal interests. Too often those interests have thwarted any compromise that could have broken the impasse.

Additionally, these conferences are composed of personalities, and often the personalities have been in conflict with other participants around the table. A reality of a democratic society is also that these participants from time to time face elections. They have to meet the people. That as well can result in positions taken which, through other circumstances, might not have been pressed as hard.

Yesterday in this House questions were asked of the government as to whether consideration was being given to expanding the format of constitutional conferences after the initial federal-provincial conference to be held later this year. My view is that consideration should be given to expanding the membership in these meetings into a broader-based constitutional meeting which would include political leaders other than the Prime Minister and the premiers. The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and for that matter elected leaders in the provinces, represent a large number of Canadians as well as regions which this government does not represent in this House.

I welcome the assurances of the Prime Minister to consult with the Leader of the Opposition with a view to exploring the possibility of expanding the format. As well, consideration should be given to including representation of groups in Canada that have a special interest in constitutional change. I think all of us know there are many of them and they seem to be increasing every day.

The suggestion of Premier Hatfield on the night of the referendum that a regular schedule of meetings be considered is a worth-while proposal. I think it would be advantageous to have regularly scheduled meetings rather than a target date by which constitutional renewal must take place.

One must ask the question: What do Canadians want in a new constitution? I believe many of the grievances we have heard in the past are not constitutional in nature but rather are due to frustration from governmental agencies, regulatory bodies and government in general not serving the interests of Canadians. For example, membership on many of these agencies does not reflect the regions and does not reflect the participation that the various members of those regions would like to give. If the federal government is interested in retaining the status quo, the bureaucracy with all its resources will reflect that attitude and will further frustrate Canadians.

There has been a difference of opinion between my leader and the present Prime Minister on the role the regions should play. Let it be clearly understood that my leader and this party have never stood for the dismantling of the federal government. Rather, we want to see it strengthened. We want a strong federal government that can address and resolve national issues; let there be no doubt about that. The reference of the Prime Minister of "Who speaks for Canada?" in my mind was a divisive attempt meant to reflect on my leader—that he was not interested in preserving national institutions. Nothing could be further from the truth. Rather it was a recognition by my leader and our party that strong regions contribute to a stronger country. Strong regions are not a threat to Canada. A strong Atlantic Canada with strong economic bases is of advantage to all of us. A strong western Canada, building on its resources and its agricultural base, is of benefit to all and should be recognized as such.

During this debate other members of my party will address the issue of constitutional renewal from the perspective of their constituents and their regions. I want to spend some time dealing with the views we hear expressed in western Canada.

Much has been said of the deep-seated resentment in western Canada. Let there be no doubt that the resentment toward the manner in which the federal government has ignored western Canada runs very deeply. It is not an accident that the government does not enjoy representation west of Winnipeg. How many members of Parliament from western Canada have stood in this House, from one Parliament to the next, and read the history or litany of grievances which we experience in western Canada? I do not have to repeat them; everybody knows them. But it is important that we recognize that those grievances are legitimate. They are as legitimate as the aspirations of the people of any other region of Canada.

For example, only recently there were promises made during the election campaign, promises that were changed, promises that were called into doubt or promises that were cancelled. It is that attitude which has resulted in the alienation we now feel.

But underlying specifics such as provincial control over resources, lack of secondary industry, or the loss of comparative or competitive advantage in the western freight rates, there is a deeper feeling of grievance. It is, that expressions of our aspirations, the grievances we have had in the past, have been interpreted in this House and in federal institutions as not being as valid as the grievances of other areas. I stand in this House not simply as a representative of western Canada. I stand here as a representative in the federal House of Canada. Let there be no mistake about it: we cannot nor will we accept that the points we want to make and the building to which we want to contribute should in any way be lessened because we come from western Canada, or that our grievances are not valid today because they have been repeated so often. It is important to remember that the west wants to grow, but it does not want to grow at the expense of Ontario or any other part of Canada. Rather we see our growth as benefiting the entire country. Western Canadians share the view that federalism is based upon the concept of sharing. We want to do our part and we will do our part. I ask this government to change its ways, not to hold us back or be less interested in us than other regions.

I want to spend some time in consideration of Canadians whose background is neither French nor English. It must be clearly understood that Canadians who are recent immigrants, or who have been here for a few generations first and foremost want to be Canadians. The referendum period for them, even though they did not live in Quebec, was traumatic because many of them had come to Canada to escape deep-seated and long-standing animosities in their homelands. They came here because they wanted stability. Too often they had been forced to leave because basic human rights in their homelands had been violated, or radical changes either in government or in their boundaries had taken place. These people look upon constitutional renewal as a strengthening of our federal system to create stability and the preservation of human rights.

The Prime Minister has stated his determination to enshrine a bill of rights in the constitution. He mentioned that in the House yesterday as well. It is my view that no greater contribution could be made by the Prime Minister to those Canadians of whom I have just spoken than incorporating the bill of rights of the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker into the new constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: During the time when I had responsibilities as minister of Indian affairs and northern development I became acutely aware of another region of Canada that is too often left out of the mainstream of Canadian life, and I speak of the two Canadian territories. The north also wants to be part of this renewal in Canada. The north is an awakening giant, an area which gives us an opportunity to be nation builders. When one takes a look at the various countries of the world one sees that Canada is one of the few that has a frontier where we can still build as a nation.

Residents of the north, be they native or white, want to be Canadians first. They do not want to be colonists of the federal government. The time has long passed when commissioners can be appointed to make decisions without regard to the residents or their representatives. The north will develop institutions that are similar to ours, but they will be modified to reflect the native population and the special conditions that exist north of 60.

Another contribution this House could make, and we as members of it, is that we not stand in the way of native people and residents of the north by deciding for them what is best from the view of those of us in the south.

I face the future of Canada with great optimism. A country is more than a constitution and it is more than its institutions; it is a feeling, it is one of belonging and it is personal.

Speaking personally, if I could for just a minute, I had been in Quebec City a number of times prior to when the right hon. former prime minister asked me to serve in his cabinet. We had a cabinet meeting in Quebec City. That was the first time it was impressed upon me that I, as the son of an immigrant, was able to be in that part of Canada and look at the shores of the St. Lawrence River where my father had landed 50 years before without any future other than the hope this country gave him, and to realize 50 years later that this country had given me an opportunity to serve.

There are opportunities that this country gives each of us in a unique way. I am filled with hope that we will grasp the opportunity that awaits us. This is a growing country, a young country and a country that is facing change; but our future must be one of a united nation, from sea to sea and from our border to the Arctic.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I too welcomed the decision of the people of Quebec to vote No in the referendum on Tuesday. This was a result which indicated a love for Canada and a faith in this nation on the part of the residents of that region. The good will felt by the rest of Canada toward Quebec as a consequence of this decision provides an opportunity to make real progress in the next round of constitutional talks.

This opportunity is also a challenge, because if we do not make significant headway now the negative feelings the previous speaker mentioned, which are real, and the feeling of hopelessness on constitutional talks, will be felt not only by the Québécois but by all Canadians. There is presently a hope in our ability to overcome the obstacles which have created roadblocks in the past and that we now must meet in order to face the challenge we have as a nation.

We face more than one challenge, and we must be clear about that. Constitutional talks do not deal with just the Quebec issue, although naturally recent events have tended to focus on that particular problem which we face as a country. There are other issues: Native people were not involved in the formulation of the original BNA Act or amendments that have since come into place. They now wish to have full participation in discussions which will affect their future as well. We cannot straitjacket ourselves or our country by believing that we will solve all the problems of all the people of Canada by discussions among 11 men. Constitutional change in Canada must include participation by native Canadians. They are too often left out of any constitutional discussions and considerations by government.

Fortunately, recent federal governments, both Liberal and Conservative, have realized that the aspirations of native people within Canada must be taken seriously. Unfortunately, recent governments have not come to any conclusion about the exact nature of the role of native people at the discussion tables.

It was just a little over ten years ago that the then Liberal federal government concluded that the best way to deal with native problems and native aspirations was by a mainstreaming approach, by an assimilating approach. If I may refer to a Liberal policy paper at that time, the so-called "Chrétien white paper" of 1969, it said that all these conditions of the Indians are the product of history and have nothing to do with their abilities and capabilities. Indian relations with other Canadians began with special treatment by government and society, and special treatment has been the rule since Europeans first settled in Canada. Special treatment has made the Indians a community disadvantaged and apart. Obviously the course of history must be changed. Just ten years ago that was the policy of the Canadian government.

In the short run what they were saying was that the Indian Act, enacted under the authority of section 91 of the British North America Act, should be repealed, and in the long run that the policy of the federal government implied that ultimately any specific references to Indians must be removed. That approach would have meant that the native people would have no role in constitutional talks had they taken place ten years ago. Today, ten years later, the federal government does realize that exclusion will not mean positive change for native people. What it has not figured out is just how native people will be consulted in the constitutional talks.

In his speech last month to the national conference of Indian chiefs and elders, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that his government would be working closely with Indian representatives in any reform of the Canadian constitution. The fact is that the Prime Minister's remarks could have as easily referred to any single Canadian or any other group within our society. It is not our business to rank the various social and ethnic groups in order of their capacity or their status at the negotiating table, but at the very least we will have to recognize that Canada's native people are Canada's original residents and are, therefore, entitled to full participation in any constitutional talks.

The Prime Minister's remarks last month have, quite frankly, proven unacceptable to the native people of this country. The New Democratic Party recognizes that this country's obligations to some of its native people are written in the treaties, but that those treaty rights are not there for the Inuit or the Metis people of this country. Aboriginal rights, such as those pertaining to hunting, fishing and land use, are well documented but they are not accepted by many Canadians. The current land claims negotiations have a grounding in historic precedent and in law but are not showing any progress.

Therefore, it is certain that the fairest and most just way of recognizing Indian input is not by excluding them from participating or by hoping that the problems will melt away, as suggested in the white paper. Instead, native participation must be full and ongoing in future negotiations.

We are all partners in confederation, and if our obligations to Canada's original people are not made clear in constitutional talks, then confederation will be a misnomer for native people. I would hope that in his trip across the nation to meet with the provincial leaders, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) will also meet with representatives of the native people of Canada.

Northern residents are also concerned about the future of this country. Northern residents in this vast country have expectations about their role in constitutional change. Residents of the territories, both white and native, cannot be excluded from determinations that affect their future. To do that would be a denial of the principle of self-determination, that somehow others will express the concerns of northerners without being elected representatives of the people living in those regions. Northern residents in the territories, as in the northern regions of most provinces, have concerns that must be addressed in any constitutional changes. Decisions regarding how economic development will take place should not be left to those living elsewhere in Canada or, worse, to those living outside our borders.

In addition, just as the railway to the Pacific was a condition before British Columbia would enter confederation, we must provide certain initiatives, such as equalized freight rates and guaranteed medical services, to enable northerners to be part of the economic growth of our country and to benefit from those social services which we believe all Canadians are entitled to as a basic minimum standard. Such social services are sadly lacking in many northern communities and are a disgrace in light of our relative affluence as a nation. This is a serious problem. There are other serious problems which can be resolved or at least partly resolved as a result of constitutional talks.

Another problem which we face is in the area of regional disparity. Regional disparity is a serious challenge to the unity of this country. If we are able to continue living together in a confederation and if we are to consider ourselves a united composite of different regions, we will have to recognize that serious regional disparities are there and that we must do something about them. These disparities are nothing less than a product of a century of patchwork economic development in this country. They are representative of a lack of a national policy and planning that is based on our resources.

The examples of regional disparity are many. The northern part of this country has been the site of resource extraction with little planning and with little benefit to the residents of those regions. If we are to live together in this community of Canada, we must begin to place development in the north in its proper perspective. It must be development not just for the sake of development. It must be development not just for the sake of the south and central parts of Canada, but development which is also for the sake of the north. Inevitably this will mean that some development will not take place because it would be detrimental to the north and its inhabitants. Sometimes we will find that certain developments should take place that will be of social and economic benefit to the northern regions, but that they will need the assistance of the provinces, the territories and the federal government in order to bring about that development.

In other parts of the country there are also regional disparities. The Atlantic provinces have traditionally been an area where regional disparity has hurt the unity of this nation. A specific example there can be found in the industrial Cape Breton area where the Sydney Steel Corporation plant is not operating at the capacity of which it is capable. The province of Nova Scotia alone cannot provide the input to ensure that jobs are protected and that the Sysco plant is modernized. This requires federal government assistance. So far the federal government has been reluctant to keep its part of the bargain. In order to prevent an economic downturn in Cape Breton which would isolate it from the well-being of Canada, the provincial and federal governments must work together.

Any changes in the framework of our constitution must allow for provincial and federal projects to overcome present regional disparity. Changes in our constitution cannot be allowed if they result in the federal government being too weak or too impoverished to assist in the development of the entire nation. After all, the federal-provincial conferences of the past have not really produced the results for which we have asked. It has been a long process which has been very difficult and frustrating for many Canadians.

I would question whether or not we really knew what we wanted in our constitution over this past decade. Are we simply to move some items from section 91 to section 92 and back again? Are we simply to make cosmetic changes that will create an illusion of progress? Or are we to have a constitution that will soothe the various wounds that open from time to time in this country, or is the constitution to be a foundation for creating the type of Canada that we want for ourselves and for future generations?

Of course, we hope that we will accept the latter choice, for if we do we will not only avoid the pitfalls of continuous tinkering with a delicate instrument like the constitution, but we will also be able to use our energies to build a nation in which we will all be able to exercise our cultural and economic goals. In this respect I would like to remind hon. members that historically what has been called English Canada has always been a generation behind French Canadians in determining its own aspirations.

At the beginning of this century Henri Bourassa, as an MP in this House, rose to call for a Canadian identity. He was rebuked by those who wished to remain part of the British Empire. Twenty years later we accepted the wisdom of Bourassa's remarks. When Quebec premiers called out for the strengthening of the role of the provinces within confederation, the rest of the country ignored them and was appalled at the thought. A generation later we heard the same call coming from each and every region of this country. In the sixties when Quebec was asking to be maître chez nous or master of their own destiny, the rest of Canada was accepting increased foreign control of our resources, our industry and our future. It has ofter been said that Quebec wants too much independence and that English Canada wants none. We are now in the 1980s and another generation has passed by. It is time for all Canadians to be asking to be masters of their own destiny.

How we resolve the Quebec issue and the other problems that we face, not only the answers that we arrive at but the process which we go through, can be an example to others in this world. The referendum held on Tuesday with its unique approach and its peaceful progress was historic in a world where such decisions are usually made through use of the bayonet. Where we go from here will be of importance in history.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my party leader for suggesting that we use our opposition day—which is normally an opportunity to score political points—in a non-partisan manner to give members of the House an opportunity to discuss this important issue.

In a similar way I hope that the Prime Minister and the premiers will realize that 11 people cannot answer all the questions that the nation must ask of itself. With that in mind I would encourage the first ministers to take the approach suggested by the leader of my party yesterday and form delegations that are non-partisan in approach and membership to discuss future constitutional action. The need for this was made very obvious in the House this afternoon. The first three speakers from the opposition all represented western ridings while the government speakers represented eastern ridings. That is a result of the composition of this House.

The mood of the country is open to changes in the constitution, especially after the decision of Tuesday night. This openness to change, however, might well dissipate if all points of view are not aired in an open and non-partisan manner. The only way to decide our future, Mr. Speaker, is to work at it together.

Constitutional Change

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin this speech, which is the first opportunity I have had to address this House at length, by extending my warmest congratulations to Madam Speaker on her election to the very important office she now holds.

As a new member of Parliament I am honoured to be a participant in a debate on constitutional reform.

I believe it is customary, Mr. Speaker, for a newly elected member to share with the House a few observations about the nature of the riding he or she represents. In describing Kitchener, I cannot help but feel a very deep sense of pride in the history and accomplishments of the city I grew up in. I also feel a strong sense of responsibility, as the voters of Kitchener have placed a trust in me to voice their concerns and make a contribution on their behalf to this Parliament.

Kitchener in many ways is a microcosm of Canada—a cultural kaleidoscope of the Canadian experience. Many people associate my riding with Canadians of German descent. They comprise 32 per cent of our city's population. Oktoberfest, for which our city is now famous, rivals its predecessor in Munich. People of Irish, English and Scottish extraction comprise 45 per cent of my constituents. Twenty three per cent of Kitchener's residents are largely those whose ancestry is French, Polish, Dutch, Italian, Portuguese, Ukrainian, Chinese, Japanese, East and West Indian, Ugandan, Pakistani and Lebanese. Most recently, Mr. Speaker, Kitchener was fortunate enough to be able to welcome 1500 Indo-Chinese refugees who were brought over through the efforts of privately sponsored groups in the Kitchener area. These refugees have much in common with the German Mennonite settlers who arrived in the Kitchener area from Pennsylvania in 1800. As pioneers, they brought with them the technical skills and traditions of their homeland. They set in motion an intermingling of cultures and ideas that is still evolving 180 years later.

Mr. Speaker, the community spirit and sense of social concern, expressed in sponsoring the Indo-Chinese refugees is a recent example of the numerous and varied voluntary efforts and organizations that exist in Kitchener. Some of these are: the regional branches of the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Heart Foundation, the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Rotary Club, the Kinsmen, the Knights of Columbus, and numerous other church and social organizations.

The multicultural centre provides a focal point through which the many ethnic groups of the area can enjoy each other's heritage. The Kitchener-Waterloo folk arts festival, which is an example of this, is being held this June and I am looking forward to attending.

The people of Kitchener, Mr. Speaker, are an open-minded citizenry. They are also very industrious and resourceful. From its austere beginnings with a few hundred settlers, Kitchener is now a thriving and prosperous industrial centre with a population of 135,000. There are 314 manufacturing plants and a total work force of 75,000. The female labour force is 45 per cent of the total, well above the national average. So as you can see, Mr. Speaker, both men and women pull their weight in the economic enterprises of Kitchener.

Just as a footnote to that, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to be aware that the chances are better than average that on a daily basis the members of this House and the people of Canada own, use, or consume products manufactured in my riding. Some of the national industries located in Kitchener include Electrohome, BF Goodrich, Uniroyal, Schneiders, Greb Shoes, Krug Furniture and Budd Automotive.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to focus more directly on the issues of national unity, the referendum and constitutional reform leading to a renewed federalism. As the member of Parliament for Kitchener, I feel very strongly about the mosaic that is Canada, and the different groups which over the years have made our country unique. The cultural mix of my riding spans virtually every corner of the globe. Interaction between French, English and other cultures makes us that much more complete as a people. However, Mr. Speaker, Canada is at a critical point in its history. Throughout the nation there are forces driving us apart, rather than bringing us together. In Atlantic Canada the promise of large oil reserves has led to controversy between the provinces and the federal government. In Ontario there are many who are fearful and resentful that the hold Ontario has exercised as the economic leader is slipping away.

In the west alienation in British Columbia has increased. In the prairie provinces, and particularly Alberta, there is talk in some quarters of separation. My unshakeable conviction is that the status quo, symbolized by the British North America Act, is no longer an option in Quebec and no longer an option in Ontario or in any of the provinces. The decision in favour of fundamental change has already been made, brought about by the dynamics of Quebec society since the "Quiet Revolution" of the 1960s, and crystallized in the results of the referendum vote on Tuesday.

The people of Quebec have stated that they wish to remain in Canada, but they do so based on certain assumptions about the rest of Canada. One of these assumptions is that the government and people in the rest of Canada recognize and understand the consensus in Quebec and that there must be fundamental alterations in the constitution.

A second assumption, Mr. Speaker, is that those of us who live outside Quebec will be willing to work with Quebeckers to build the structure of a new Canada, and more broadly, Mr. Speaker, that all Canadians, no matter in what region or province, will co-operate to build the structure of a new Canada.

A third assumption, Mr. Speaker, is that this constitutional reform will not be postponed indefinitely in a fog of words, procedural delays and competing priorities.

These assumptions indicate that the people in Quebec are reaching out in confidence and trust to the people in the rest of Canada. Thus, Mr. Speaker, you can understand why the response of English-speaking Canada to the federalist option of the beige paper is extremely important. Quebeckers have taken a leap of faith by voting No, and voting Yes to Canada. They must be given the assurance that their own eagerness for change will not be met with sullen dedication to the status quo.

Constitution-making is never easy. It is usually impossible except as a result of pressures caused by war or revolution. Because of this, for the rest of us to give the necessary assurances to the people of Quebec also requires us to make a leap of faith—faith that Canadian moderation, good sense and willingness to compromise can lead to success. By giving these assurances, we commit ourselves to the difficult task of hammering out a new constitution. That constitution must reflect more completely the diversity and complexity of modern Canadian society. It must also be capable of handling the external challenges of a world in turmoil, as well as the internal social and economic pressures which Canada and Canadians will face in the years ahead.

Whatever the risks of acting boldly and decisively, the dangers to Canada of doing nothing are far greater. We must not succumb, Mr. Speaker, to lassitude and apathy merely because of the magnitude of the task and the failure to achieve consensus on important issues at past federal-provincial conferences.

I say this for three reasons. First, I believe that we are nearing a pivotal period in Canadian history when the demands for change from Quebec will be met with a wave of dissatisfaction with the existing arrangements in other parts of the country. The impending clashes between Ottawa and Alberta this year, and probably later with Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, will certainly highlight serious constitutional and economic issues.

Second, the years ahead are years when unprecedented external geopolitical and economic pressures will make abundantly clear to all participants the indispensable role which the federal government must continue to play.

Third, the approach to constitutional reform in the 1980s will be to consider a package, rather than a piecemeal series of patches to the old arrangements. We will not be attempting to put new wine in old bottles. This should make possible hard negotiations as well as the accommodations and compromises which will be essential if success is to be achieved. We will not be starting cold. In fact, a great deal of work has already been done by various governments and interprovincial committees. Most provincial governments have published statements in favour of change.

In that the people of Quebec have taken the initial risks and committed themselves to Canada first, I believe it is appropriate, as a start to constitutional reform, to examine the issue from Quebec's perspective first as presented in Mr. Ryan's beige paper. This is a start, and obviously all provincial governments will be involved as will all the people of Canada. Constitutional reform will affect the daily lives of all Canadians and, as such, all Canadians must have a meaningful voice in its construction.

For years many Canadians have been asking, what does Quebec want? There could be no clearer statement than the one contained in the beige paper. This document is generous in spirit, civilized in tone, and is addressed to all Canadians. It recognizes the need for a strong central government. It invites comment from all Canadians.

The beige paper identifies 13 fundamental objectives, and then outlines a structure consistent with these goals. These objectives or principles form a key element in any future constitutional discussion. They should become familiar to all Canadians.

The first is to provide Canada with a constitution which is both modern and Canadian. The authors of the paper attach great importance to the symbolism of Canadians themselves—not the parliament of Great Britain—collectively and solemnly affirming the commitments and structures on which Canadian political life will be based in the years ahead.

Five principles are concerned with human rights. One involves a declaration of the equality of the two distinctive societies which give this country its unique place in the family of nations. This goal involves both linguistic rights and guarantees to Quebec which will enable it to maintain its unique personality despite the pressures arising from its position in North America.

This group of principles would also require the entrenchment in the constitution of the rights and liberties of individual Canadians. The fundamental rights of the first inhabitants of this country, the Indians and the Inuit, are specifically recognized, as are the preservation and development of the rich cultural heritages of the many multicultural groups of Canada. Equality of opportunity for all Canadians is emphasized, with a strong federal role in the redistribution of wealth to ensure the reality of this promise.

Two principles outline the commitment to the federal system. Two orders of government will continue, each sovereign in its area of jurisdiction. A specific pledge is made to guarantee the free circulation of individuals, goods and capital to all parts of the country, and a system of laws protecting the fundamental equality of all citizens. While an intergovernmental body is proposed to permit participation by the provinces in the government of federation, the beige paper explicitly states that the central government must be, and I quote:

—strong enough to serve the whole country in the face of whatever new challenges the modern world presents, whether internally or externally.

Five principles are concerned with the need for strong provinces, to ensure the development of their distinctive human and physical resources. The beige paper calls for clear definitions of the responsibilities of the two levels of government. Because Canada is so large and diverse, the beige paper opposes ad hoc extensions of federal powers and advocates a formal system for arbitrating constitutional disputes which clearly recognizes the duality and plurality of our population.

There is also need for explicit recognition of the provinces' role in international relations in areas under their jurisdiction within the framework of foreign policy.

Canada can never be a unitary state. Indeed, the forces at work in the last two decades have underlined its diversity and the need for a new approach which will underpin and build upon that diversity.

The beige paper provides all Canadians with an outline of a new federal system which accepts the fact that Canadians must find their unity in their diversity. It also defines the institutions and division of powers such a new federal system requires. Few will accept this outline in every detail. I do not. I think it should be questioned. Much sharp discussion and hard negotiation can be anticipated. In particular, finding a balance between decentralization and maintenance of an effective federal government will not be easy, but carried on in the spirit in which the beige paper was written, such negotiations give promise not of failure but of success.

Indeed, at a recent symposium held at York, Mr. Thomas Wells, the Conservative minister of intergovernmental affairs, accepted the 13 principles underlying the beige paper, declared that the Ontario government favours comprehensive constitutional changes, and stated:

> We regard the Quebec Liberal party proposals as a reasonable and constructive basis on which to negotiate new constitutional arrangements for Canada.

The authors of the beige paper, as reasonable people, have addressed their thoughts and concerns to other Canadians. They ask us to recognize the problems which they see in our current constitutional arrangements and to undertake with them the great task of achieving change which will be acceptable to all, to achieve, in Mr. Wells' words, "a genuine national reconciliation."

In conclusion, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that achieving this without violence or bloodshed will further enhance Canada's reputation as a great country, a nation to be modelled after.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to intervene today with respect to the motion involving constitutional reform. I might say that undertaking constitutional reform involves something which takes a much longer time than not only a modest afternoon but indeed the next few years that have been allotted for it.

I hope I do not sound a note of pessimism—that is not my intention—if I suggest to you that I think the next few years are going to find constitutional reform important but probably of secondary nature. It seems to me that as we look at constitutional reform we will have to go through a much more fundamental process, and it is that fundamental process to which I would like to direct my remarks today.

I think part of the difficulty we have had over many years is the inability to understand who we are and where we would like to go. I have some considerable mistrust in constitutions. I have noted, and I am sure other members have, in the history of this century at any rate, that some of the most democratic constitutions, constitutions which had the most intensive language with respect to human, civil, cultural and linguistic rights, are those that exist in countries which have the most oppressive governments. I meant what I said and I hope it is not a note of pessimism.

The principles which the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) and others have mentioned must be based on something and I think they are based on certain realities, or ought to be based on certain realities about this country. I think there are probably some considerable difficulties for us, Mr. Speaker, as we attempt to determine what the fundamental realities of Canada are, because we have spent so long in making sure we don't know very much about the country. We have spent a long time and worked very hard in denying our own history, in, to put it another way, not paying enough attention, and in taking the country for granted.

I think the three fundamental realities of this country are going to dominate the next ten years and that is why I suggest that, over the next ten years, the idea of Canada, not the Constitution of Canada, is going to be the most important thing to address ourselves to.

Let me deal with the first of those realities as I see them, Mr. Speaker. I think that any stranger happening upon this land would come up with the first reality fairly easily. We are known best, and we know ourselves best, by our parts—by the parts of the country. Many speakers today have talked about regionalism. They have talked about their particular provinces. I think I could go from coast to coast and, like other members of this House who have had the opportunity to travel, I could take you to towns, cities, villages and neighbourhoods in Newfoundland right through to British Columbia, and in every one of those towns, cities, villages and neighbourhoods you will find the same instinct. People in St. John's, Newfoundland, think that that is the best place to live.

Mr. McGrath: It is the centre of the universe!

Mr. Crombie: My hon. friend from St. John's East says it is the centre of the universe. It may be surprising to a number of hon. members present to know that there are people in Toronto who think that that is the best place to live.

An hon. Member: Shame!

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Crombie: The hon. member says "Shame" but I do not accept that. I was in Timmins a year ago, on Boxing Day. It was 40 below, but the people there think the only place to live is in Timmins. And everybody in Victoria knows that the rest of the country is lining up to get in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: So, I could go from coast to coast, Mr. Speaker, and in each province, each city, town and village, and in each neighbourhood, the people know that that is the place to live. Regionalism in this country is a state of mind, one which is founded on geographical location, and it is rooted in an historical experience. That is why regionalism is so strong in this country. It is an historical experience and it is a geographical reality. That is why it is not an aggravation, why it is not a fly in another person's ointment. It is not an imperfection because the regionalism from which we come, the towns, the cities, the villages and neighbourhoods—I mention neighbourhoods only because in large cities one tends to identify with neighbourhoods—is real, authentic and necessary. It is from those areas that we get a sense of identity about who we are. It is in those areas where we have more control, in fact, over who we are and the ability to better ourselves and raise our children in value systems in which we can have a strong involvement.

The values which affect people most are those which come from small places. Countries other than ours which have large populations and small territory know the only way in which you can organize human nature is by having a strong value system and, as I say, that usually comes from small places. That is the first reality I see, Mr. Speaker, about this country. We are known by its parts and we have a regionalism which is enduring because it is authentic.

The second reality that I see is the opposite of the first. If regionalism is the first reality, then the second reality is the opposite of that. It takes the whole string of communities that the hon. member from Saskatchewan mentioned earlier, and binds them together. It is the opposite. Because the reality which organizes us best and determines that we are Canadians exists, I think, in the physical land itself. Most countries have something which defines them and tells them who they have been and who they are going to be. In some countries it is their art, in some countries it is the legislature, in some countries it is the military power, in some countries it may be the history, as in the United States, but in this country I think it is the physical aspect of the land itself.

I could take any member of this House on a boat, on a train, plane or bike, or we could walk it, to any part of this country. After they got off they would feel enormous pride about it. But they would feel something deeper. What they would feel, I think, is that the sense of Canada that they know is given to them from the land. Indeed, most of our historians have tried to explain to us—whether it is Lower or Creighton, Morton, Shortt, Harold Innis—that the fundamental reality of the country which takes us beyond our particular is the land itself.

This country in the past 20 years or so seems to have accepted the view that we are here in spite of geography and in spite of history. It is, indeed, the opposite. This country is here because of its geography and because of its history. I am reminded of the thesis, Mr. Speaker, of Harold Innis that this country takes on the configuration of the fur trade. All those towns and the building of each staple product as it came, exist because of geography and not in spite of it. It is interesting too, if you look at the lives of most of our historians. They had an intimate relationship with the land in personal terms. If you read Lower in his "Colony to Nation"—he was the most lyrical of our historians—his sense of the bush and his need to go canoeing, like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is part of it. It is a sense of having to renew with the land. I don't think we should misunderstand what that means to us. It has animated every aspect of our life, not only our historians.

Take also the art which has endured. The Group of Seven and Tom Thomson in this country have endured because they reflected the land, and this is the message which comes from the paintings of the Group of Seven and from Tom Thomson. Interestingly enough there are no people in the art of the Group of Seven or of Tom Thomson, and there are no people in Donald Creighton's artistry with history in this country because they were reflecting the land. If you look at that art it is rugged, it has colour to it, and it is eternal. And that is where the strength comes from. I think that is also true of the music of this country. I do not know whether I should mention Gilles Vignault, but I think it is all right.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Crombie: If you listen to his music you find that music tells you about the land. In 1962 when Monique Leyrac, as reported in the French press but not the English press, won an international award in Hungary singing Vignault songs, those three songs were about the land.

• (1740)

When Gordon Lightfoot sings, he sings about the Canadian railway trilogy. We know that is the land. For the maritimers present let me mention Stompin' Tom Connors. The best song Stompin' Tom Connors ever wrote was not about the maritimes but, indeed, about another town in Ontario. If you have ever picked tobacco, you know something about hard work, and he wrote a song called "Tillsonburg". "My back still aches when I hear that word".

An hon. Member: Don't forget the "Squid-jiggin' Ground".

Mr. Crombie: I will leave that to the hon. member who follows me. I could use the squid-jiggin' ground. I have only 20 minutes; the hon. member can sing his own songs.

It is also true in sport. There are some people who think that hockey was invented, if not by Harold Ballard, then by Allan Eagleson. Hockey was not invented by either one of those people. It was invented by the frozen ponds in the land of this country. Maybe they should put some of the money back into it.

If you go down to New York to visit the United Nations building and look at all the flags of all the countries represented in that body, those flags represent either the history or the ideology, or both, of the countries they represent; all except one—ours. It is a leaf, and it reflects the land.

So the second reality in our constitution building is recognizing that the geography and the land and our response to that land will always be there. No matter what politicians and other people say, that is what unites us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The third reality which I would like to mention and one which I wish I could spend some time on, because we have spent so little time on it, is our traditions. I have been impressed with the desire on the part of all hon.

members of the House, and, indeed, all commentators, people interviewed on sidewalks, on television on radio and so forth, for a new constitution. Constitutions do not happen every two weeks. Every time we have a new thought, we do not build a new constitution. Constitutions are not merely a reflection of a particular generation. Constitutions reflect past generations and the values they engender, as well as current values, and as well as our hopes for future values, and I think it is that aspect that is worth mentioning. This third reality is the traditions of this country. They are good traditions; they are not bad traditions. Traditions are collective memories.

The licence plates of the province of Quebec used to say "La belle province". Now they say "je me souviens", "I remember". That is right; we should remember. The collective memories of this country are worth remembering as we build a new constitution.

This country has been a monarchy since Louis XIV. It is not fashionable to mention the monarchy, I think, but I do so because I was impressed some years ago when I read a book called "Freedom wears a Crown" by John Farthin. Farthin pointed out that the reality is not the royal family or whatever affection we have for the lady who is the Queen or the man who is the King at a particular time. The reality of the monarchy is the Crown, and from 1864 to 1867 in all of the discussions in the confederation debates the reason we did not have fundamental discussions about fundamental human rights and civil liberties of any significance or account was because they were assumed. They were built by generations, and the Crown reflects the civil liberties you have, Mr. Speaker, and that I have, and that my children will have. Whatever one wants to do in the future in this country with the monarchy, let us not confuse it with the significance of the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: I was going to mention female athletes as another tradition—1928 was a good year for female athletes—but I will not get into that.

I think the most fundamental tradition in this country is one for which we are involved in no small enterprise because of the first reality of our particularisms. There are over 3,000 miles from one sea to another, and because of the second reality of the strength of the land itself, we are involved in what Parmenides wrote about. I hope I have that right. The Greek scholars here can correct me if I am wrong, but I read something by him which struck me. Parmenides said that the riddle mankind has—and it struck me that that is our riddle—is the riddle of the multiple and the One. He said:

> Is the One alone real and the multiple merely illusion? Is the multiple alone real so that the world is irremediably and irreducibly pluralistic at its core? Is the world a gigantic process consisting in the unification of a multiplicity destined to be brought into a higher unity with the One?

That is pretty heavy stuff. Hon. members might want to read that tomorrow. Some may want to take it home to Hamilton, but in a sense most of us have been talking about that today because our contribution to the ancient Greek riddle of the many and the One is the concept of federalism, and we do it better than anybody else in the world.

Canadians know more about it and have dealt with it longer than any other people. It has allowed us to have not just unity; it has allowed us to have more than unity. It has allowed us—not only the Europeans who came here but before the white man came here—to create. There were Indian confederacies. The federal principle has allowed us to take the first two realities and make them one, because what it has done is to allow that diversity and that unity to exist. That federal principle has guided us for centuries. We have had five constitutions under it, not one. There were constitutions in 1774, 1791, 1841, responsible government in 1849, and in 1867. We have amended the constitution on a number of occasions. That constitution and that federal principle have served us for a very long time. It has served us in good times and bad times and in war time and peace time.

That BNA Act is not a piece of paper that you chuck away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: It has allowed us to do what we want to do. We can make things smaller or larger. It is a house of many mansions. We need only to decide what we would like to do with it, and it will serve us again. The federal principle requires only two things. First, it requires tolerance, and not tolerance which is based on assuming that we are all brothers. The American understanding of tolerance is to make sure that they can deal with their similarities. The Canadian way has been the opposite, out of necessity. We have to understand toleration by celebrating the differences, and it is the celebration of those differences which is the glory of the country.

The second thing it requires other than toleration is the constant need—and I got into trouble once before, so I will make it clear—to talk, discuss, and negotiate, because negotiation and discussion are the mother's milk of the federal system. Those who would argue that we should draw lines are also the people who end up shooting.

The federal principle will continue to serve us, and we will be able to continue to solve the riddle of the many and the One, as long as we not only exercise toleration by making sure those differences are appreciated and celebrated but also make sure that we understand the necessity of discussion and negotiation.

Mr. Speaker, it has been a pleasure for me to have the opportunity to speak on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1750)

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, we are presently living in a crucial period of the history of our country. The problems we will have to solve are difficult and complex. As members of this Parliament, we must uphold and promote together the values which unite us. Naturally we will not always be in agreement but, as Brown, Macdonald and Cartier, we will have to find a new formula for today's Canada. This formula will have to take into account the fundamental needs of our society, including understanding, in order to meet the challenge of tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, that lets you know the extent of my use of both languages. I am going to keep trying, let me tell you.

I wanted to enter this debate today because I have given, like most hon. members, a lot of thought to the future of Canada. I have watched as the battle raged, rejoiced as the results became known, and felt both a sense of happiness and a sense of foreboding as I watched on television the final vote and the response to the recent referendum in the province of Quebec.

I think we must all be careful because something in excess of 40 per cent of the people of the province of Quebec said they did not like the way the country was going and they did not like the relationship between their province, the federal government, and the rest of Canada. As I watched that evening, it became clear to me that the one thing we must not think is that they were defeated, because there were no victories and there were no people who lost.

What happened in Quebec that day was that a number of people who wanted to see some fundamental change went to the polls and expressed two somewhat different views of how that change ought to take place. It is now our responsibility here in this Parliament, in all the legislative assemblies in the country, and yes, even in the municipal councils and across the electorate, to look seriously at what kind of change can be brought about that can satisfy the majority, that will lay the ground work, and that will establish the base from which Canada will grow into the future.

As I said in my few brief words in French, whatever French it may have been, we in this Parliament probably have the most difficult task because we must set aside our parochialisms, we must put aside the divisiveness which frequently creeps into many of our debates and which will, in one way or another, determine what shape the country will have in two, three or four years' time. We cannot all win on every point, and there will be necessity for give and take; there will be the necessity to recognize that not everything that everyone wants can be accomplished at one time. We have to take the lead in that regard. We in this Parliament have a job which will probably—I say this without overblowing our importance—parallel the very first Parliament of this country. It is an exciting time at which to be in the House of Commons, because the decisions that we make here over the course of the next few years will be the decisions that the people of Canada will live with through the next 50 years.

Whether or not we recognize the aspirations of the many parts of Canada, whether we put it into writing, whether we establish a constitution—no matter how we write it, no matter how carefully we try to incorporate everyone's desires and everyone's feelings—in the end what will matter most will be whether or not we will approach this task with good will, whether we approach this task without the burden of having to take positions simply for the sake of being re-elected.

I worry when I look around the country because you can almost tell from experience over the last few years—and I have had the benefit, which others had, of having sat in a provincial parliament and of watching provincial politics as somewhat of a student—when we are about to have a provincial election, because slowly the words creep into the debate that it is the federal government's fault. It is called, as my colleague says, Ottawa bashing. It happens all across the country in every provincial Parliament. The unfortunate part is that it takes place a couple of months immediately prior to the election and it takes two or three years to resolve it, if ever at all. It sets the mood that has people in British Columbia believe that someone in Quebec put the French on the cereal boxes, and it sets individual against individual. It makes people in other parts of the country believe that perhaps the problems that they encounter in their day to day lives are the will of someone else in Canada.

I think that politicians will have to stop and take stock of what their role is to be. We will have to be much more serious about it. We cannot be frivolous about the future of this country. We cannot simply engage in debate for the sake of scoring some political points which may well undermine the confidence of the electorate. When I pick up the paper and read of the premiers of the provinces, I find that, without going into detail, one by one they stake out their position for the negotiations that must take place. If it is not resource rights, it is more autonomy; if it is not more autonomy, it is that Ottawa has not treated them well in the existing confederation. The problem with that is that, like everyone else, they are able, for one reason or another, to convince people who live in this country that these illusionary, imaginary things are real.

If you travel across the country and speak to the individuals in many communities, you find that they are not arguing, not blaming each other, that they are not blaming the people in Hamilton, in spite of the conflict between themselves and Vancouver over the football games that are played. Do not think that the people in British Columbia are undermining or in any way destroying their place in the Canadian society. Yet one might get the impression from time to time that the politicians who presume to speak on their behalf are trying to leave the impression that this is in fact what is happening. You find farmers in Alberta who are being blamed for oil price rises, strangely enough, by people in British Columbia. You find that the politicians in general are not responding in a less partisan way.

I want to suggest some things about this. First of all, I think it would be useful in this Parliament if we could clearly set out some time, over a period of years, when Parliament would be able to sit as we are doing today—maybe even with some people present—and talk about what our role as Parliament ought to be in the new confederation. There is no question that there will have to be a dramatic change in the formula which now exists. What I will do is to deal with two or three of those changes right after eight o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. May I remind all hon. members that an order was issued this afternoon by the House, the effect of which will be that speakers who take the floor as of eight o'clock this evening will be limited to 15 minutes. That raises the problem for the hon. member who currently has the floor. Rather than go into some convoluted logic on it, the Chair will arbitrarily assign the remaining time of six minutes to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, the process of constitutional reform has begun. For just a few hours this week Canada's newly elected Parliament understood and shared a common purpose. It is almost sad to realize that René Lévesque's pledge to dismantle confederation was needed to prompt a little patriotism throughout Canada. Even so, like many others I savoured the results of the referendum in the hope that Canada will survive at least this century and beyond, if possible, intact.

Although the No vote must not lull English Canada into inaction, constitutional reform must not be seen as the cure-all. When was the last time the average Canadian read our constitution or, for that matter, the British North America Act? The cold fact is that a constitution can only provide a framework and not a sense of national purpose. A constitution guarantees a certain minimum standard of behaviour. It is important for all minorities—the French, the Italian, and many others—in that it provides guarantees. But this is only a base to build upon. I think a great many Canadians from every province would agree that the country's problems stem not from our constitution but, as I said, from our politicians. Every four years some provincial premier spends two months blaming every conceivable problem in the land on the federal government, and then they have an election. This is one problem that constitutional reform cannot resolve. It will require instead greater honesty among our politicians, and a more critical electorate.

A catch phrase that is making the rounds these days is the one about control of our resources. Western provinces, and now the eastern provinces, argue that given control of their oil and gas reserves harmony will follow. The real question is: who has control now? With a couple of exceptions like Petro-Canada and Saskatchewan Potash, most of our resources are controlled by foreign companies and not the Canadian government. If there is to be a transfer of control over oil and gas, it should be from Exxon to Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Constitutional reform may be a start. National unity will come when it is understood that no matter where in Canada one is born, there is an equal chance to build a good life.

Canada's resources must be used to promote the stable growth of all parts of Canada. The oil and gas will eventually run out even in Alberta, and together we must prepare Alberta's economy for that day. At the same time we must allocate some of the oil and gas revenues to assist the underdeveloped regions in this country. The point is that federal guidance is necessary in order to smooth out the highs and lows in the economy. Whoever is given jurisdiction over Canada's resources must be able to see beyond provincial boundaries.

For the people of Ontario I want to say, on behalf of those I know, that they are eager to share with all others in the distribution of economic opportunity. If, over the years, as my smirking Conservative colleagues might think, others feel Ontario was less than understanding, I want to suggest very strongly that it was not the citizens of Ontario who were to blame. It may have been the government, but it probably was the very people who operated on Wall Street and Bay Street and who now operate on Jarvis Avenue in Edmonton—Jasper Avenue in Edmonton.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: We can enshrine language and cultural rights. We can develop an amending formula. We can bring home our constitution. In fact, we can rise to any challenge, and we can achieve most any dream.

I should like to comment on the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) that Canada is land and frozen ponds. Canada is 23 million people. They are industrious, sensitive, generous and diverse. They are people who can and will rise to any challenge, who can and will realize a national dream. The only thing that stands in their way is the desire of politicians to use them for their own ends. I want to suggest that, if we gave the people of Canada a chance, they could make this the very finest land in the world, and I think we should give them that chance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the opportunity I am given tonight of participating in this debate on the constitutional question. I am happy to see that the New Democratic Party decided to devote one of its allotted days to the constitution and that we should be invited to speak to a resolution inviting the House to interpret the referendum vote of Tuesday last as an unmistakable call for constitutional reform.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the request that the House of Commons launch a constitutional reform. I have believed in the need for it for a long time and still believe in it. It is unfortunate—as the former speaker pointed out that, and if I recall his words correctly, he said, "It is ironic"—that the PQ party should have been the one to provoke us into proceeding with a reform of our constitution. That really does not bother me very much but, what is important, is that we should, as parliamentarians, as government, commit ourselves to changing the terms of our constitution.

Mr. Speaker, we undoubtedly need a new constitution in which will be enshrined basic and linguistic rights. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that, as far as the basic issue is concerned, it would be wise to say that we should set any deadline. We should expect that writing a new constitutional document, deciding on a new basic constitution is something that is going to take a lot of time, a lot of patience, a lot of energy. But there are certain things we should be able to do.

There is one thing that the referendum that took place in Quebec last Tuesday should enable us to do. There is now in Canada, as we saw in this House yesterday afternoon, a feeling of wanting to do something. Several of us said, particularly in the last three, four or five years, that we wanted a new constitution and in fact this government in June, 1978, brought forward a document entitled A Time for Action and a legislative measure that was referred to a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on the constitution. We of the Liberal party have been committed to constitutional reform for a long time. We are happy today to see that because of what happened in Quebec, because the campaign of the No side also advocated change, Canadian parliamentarians, provincial premiers and, I imagine, provincial parliamentarians interpret that vote as a desire for change, and they are committing themselves to undertaking a constitutional reform.

Mr. Speaker, we must clearly understand that we must use the feeling that exists now but it can only do certain things because it is impossible to elaborate, to build—I am using words like "build"—a new constitution because it is more than a simple matter of writing a document. A constitution is more than just a legal and political document. A constitution must express a desire by all Canadians to live together, to build a better society, a society in which each and everyone will be respected.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one thing we should be able to do is patriate the constitution. This we could do, thanks to the feeling we now share. Not because of some threat. We should never accept that anyone, either French or English-speaking, proceed with constitutional reforms under the threat of some deadline. We should do so because we want to. And patriating the constitution is one of the important elements of constitutional reform with which we want to proceed.

The second element is the amendment process and amending formula. In my view, this is the second important part in that debate. And I would say further that we should make sure that the feeling that is prevailing this week does not vanish before we reach that goal. But the third important part, after patriation and the amendment process the amendment formula and the constitutional reform process is the content itself. And there difficulties will arise. Let us not fool ourselves, let us have no illusion.

It will be difficult because trying to reconcile all the different interests in Canada will be hard and long work, but what is important, Mr. Speaker, is that we should repatriate our constitution, that we should make it into a Canadian document, and that both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, either by themselves or with the provinces, can work on constitutional reform. We should be able to agree before too long on an amendment formula and a process to bring it about.

As concerns the federal Parliament, one thing should be done urgently, and that is that, at least as concerns federal rights, we should pass legislation to entrench in the Canadian constitution basic individual rights and linguistic rights, and I did say legislation respecting federal rights, and this according to the principle of Bill C-60, so that when the provinces want to do the same for provincial rights, they will be able to do so.

However, what I am saying applies only to basic individual and linguistic rights and federal rights, because I respect the fact that some rights come under provincial jurisdiction. However, there should be a mechanism to allow the legislative assembly of a province anxious to entrench in its constitution certain fundamental and linguistic rights of provincial jurisdiction to do so. In the case of New Brunswick and Acadians, this would allow us to entrench in a new constitution or in the existing one certain fundamental and linguistic rights which are of federal jurisdiction, but also certain provincial rights, because since about 13 years, the former Robichaud government and the present Hatfield government have undertaken to entrench in the constitution certain linguistic and basic rights. Even if we did so only to help the Acadians, I believe it would be worth while because there are not very many Acadians as New Brunswick is not a very large province.

Mr. Speaker, if in a small province like New Brunswick with a relatively large group of Acadians, people are not able to agree on their political future, how can we expect to agree throughout Canada? It is not a matter of figures, a matter of quantity, but a matter of will. And if we in New Brunswick do not succeed in giving assurances to Acadians who want to protect their language and their culture, and in making Anglophones understand that it is good for New Brunswick, if we are not successful in that endeavour in a small province like ours, if we cannot express that will, how can we expect to express it throughout the country? Then, it is not a matter of figures, it is what might be called a moral issue, a matter of will.

Mr. Speaker, I say that we should commit ourselves to changing the constitution, to repatriate the constitution within a process of constitutional reform. As federal parliamentarians we should propose a legislation on basic rights and linguistic rights. I emphasize that we should not limit provincial rights. That mechanism would allow any province anxious to do so to enshrine in its statutes linguistic and basic rights whenever it decides to do so. And that would be important for the Acadian minority in New Brunswick.

With respect to the reform process, Mr. Speaker, I must say that in our previous approach—and I want to make here a positive criticism of my party's approach on that issue—in the past we always had intergovernmental negotiations. The constitutional negotiations that we have had since 1966 have for the most part involved governments only.

Mr. Speaker, we must see to it that something is added to that. Obviously, there is a need for negotiation between governments but in my view the importance that parliamentary assemblies, the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures may have in solving that problem should not be minimized. Provincial and federal assemblies should have a mechanism which could be semi-permanent. We should probably consider having a Canadian parliamentary assembly on the constitution, not a parliamentary assembly which would be empowered to decide on a new constitution, but between governments, there are sometimes close links with respect to civil servants or policies and it is possible that these might thwart the process.

But one should not minimize what elected parliamentarians might accomplish in a forum composed of a delegation from the Canadian Parliament, a delegation from the legislatures and the Canadian Senate. It could be interesting to see what the upshot of such discussions could be; these discussions could be held on a regular basis for one month, six weeks or two months a year somewhere in the country to decide not only on the need for a new constitution but also on the way in which this result could be achieved. And I must stress the fact that a parliamentary assembly should not make decisions but simply constitute a forum for discussions between elected representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I think such a process could do much in the way of helping to define various regional interests, cultural and economic interest within the country for parliamentarians can sometimes more readily understand one another's aspirations and this is what we must do in Canada. I myself, as an Acadian from New Brunswick, should be able to understand the aspirations of Canadians from British Columbia, Newfoundland, Quebec and Alberta. They in turn must also be in a position to understand those of the others. One thing that intergovernmental negotiations do not allow for is a true discussion of those aspirations. They are negotiations between governments which have close links with respect to their civil servants and their policies. One might say that when we have all those people in front of television cameras, it is a good place to make what is known as set speeches, to put up an act, and that is important, it must be done. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like those questions to be debated outside that format, not exluding that format, but we could have another debating forum to discuss Canada's constitutional future.

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this has been one of the truly uplifting days of Parliament. This has been a tremendous debate. We have heard marvellous speeches. It is something from which we can all draw encouragement, the fact that we as members of a diverse House of Commons, coming from diverse parts of the country, can meet together in debate on the future of our country. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has done a great service to the House by introducing the motion which he has set down on the order paper. Indeed, I would like to congratulate the hon. member, not only for his motion, but for the speech which he made today.

We have heard outstanding contributions in this debate from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) who made an outstanding contribution and set out the position on behalf of our party.

I suppose that I am in a unique position in terms of this debate or this resolution, a resolution with respect to the outcome of the momentous and historic Quebec referendum. I am one of the few members of this House who lived through a referendum, a privilege which I share with my colleagues from Newfoundland. Indeed, we lived through two referendums. In 1948, after some 15 years of direct colonial rule, Newfoundlanders, by referendum, were asked to vote on whether they wanted to continue that colonial type of administration which was administrated directly by civil servants from Westminster, or whether they wanted to revert to dominion status, which Newfoundland enjoyed prior to 1933 under the Statute of Westminster—which is the same statute that gave Canada its sovereignty—or whether we wanted to confederate with Canada.

I recall very well the trauma of that time. I can feel for what happened in Quebec. I can empathize with the people of Quebec in what they are going through right now in this post-referendum period. Indeed, we were encouraged, and I was certainly very pleased to see the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), following the decisive results of the referendum in Quebec, reach out a conciliatory hand to the minority in Quebec which felt strongly enough about sovereignty-association. They felt strongly enough about the independence of Quebec to go and cast their ballot for that question, in many cases alienating the affection of their relatives and friends by so doing.

That is important because I recall the post referendum period in Newfoundland. I recall very well the night of the second referendum. At the time I was working as an active member of the Young Responsible Government League. I lived in a part of Newfoundland which was staunchly anti-confederate. My job as a member of the Young Responsible Government League was to be an agent in the polling booth. I did that during both referendums.

Of course there had to be a run-off because, on the first referendum, the outcome was indecisive. There was not a clear majority for either of the three questions. It is interesting that in the first referendum, independence, if you like, or sovereignty-association, if you like, responsible government as we knew it, won the day. But in the second referendum the confederate option won, because there was only two questions remaining. The two questions were whether to confederate with Canada or whether to continue to revert to dominion status.

I recall walking home that night to my house, Mr. Speaker, and looking at my father who was crying. That is how strong our feelings were running at the time. I remember the feeling on the street as I talked to my neighbours, and how strongly I felt as I passed our old parliament building. For some reason there were flood lights on it. I remember a lump coming in my throat because I felt the sudden realization that we would no longer exist as a separate entity. We had lost. We were the sovereign-associationists of our day and we had lost!

It took years for that feeling of bitterness to subside, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, you will still find it in Newfoundland today, and there are those who would take advantage of that feeling. They do so at their peril. That feeling still exist to a certain extent. I know it existed when I came here as a young member of Parliament in 1957 because the constituency that elected me then did so largely because of the anti-confederate sentiment that still existed. One of the ironies of the time was that we had no political parties, so the confederates joined with the government of the day and became the Liberal party, while the anti-confederates joined with the opposition of the day—hence I am a Progressive Conservative. There were no political parties, you see. Our constitution was in suspension. We had no legislature as it had been in suspension. Indeed, political parties were not permitted to exist save for those that were permitted to organize, as they were in Quebec, for the referendum.

I remember coming here in 1957 with a certain feeling of bitterness still there—bitter because of the way it was brought about. We felt we had been short-changed. We felt that somehow the British government and the Canadian government had got together and decided that this would, in the long run, be best for us and that in insidious ways they were able to influence the outcome.

I did not realize until I came here, Mr. Speaker, the diversity and majesty of Canada. When I went to school I learned British history. We did not learn Canadian history. We learned very little about Canada, and the little we knew about Canada in the Newfoundland I grew up in we learned from the Canadian Armed Forces who were stationed overseas in Newfoundland during the war. Hence, I can speak with some feeling of this country because I became a Canadian by way of referendum—I suppose I am a statutory Canadian—a referendum that took place on July 22, 1948.

The constitution that we are now talking about patriating was amended on March 23, 1949, and royal assent was given at Westminster in order to make provision for Newfoundland's entry to confederation.

When I came here in 1957 what did I find? We were divided in this House on the question of whether we should have bilingual cheques. Can you imagine that—whether the French-speaking citizens of this country were to receive cheques from the federal government in their own language! Up to that time all government cheques went out in English only. This was a new dimension of Canada for me.

I recall that at that time a French Canadian could not stand in his place in this House and speak in the French language because, if he did, no one would understand him. Not only did the late right hon. member for Prince Albert bring in bilingual cheques, but one of the first things he did when he became prime minister was to provide the simultaneous interpretation that is in this House today.

This is not the Canada of 1949, Mr. Speaker. We have come a long way. This is not the Canada of 1957. An expression was articulated by my leader, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, when he said that Mr. Lévesque and those associated with him wanted to separate from a Canada that no longer existed.

It is not for me to articulate the grievances of the French-speaking people of this country, our brothers and sisters in the province of Quebec. I can speak of the grievances of my own province and I will.

Sir, what I want to say in the few minutes left at my disposal tonight is this: I believe in Canada. I am happy that the people of Quebec, by a democratic expression of their vote, demonstrated belief in Canada. I believe in strong provinces. I believe in strong provincial governments—provincial governments that have the constitutional authority to discharge their mandate, to carry out the obligations they have to their constituents, but I also believe in the absolute necessity of a strong federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: If there is one thing that worries me it is the suggestion that somehow, in this quest for constitutional renewal, the conventional wisdom may become a self-fulfilling prophecy and we will divest the Government of Canada of the powers necessary to serve the common good of Canada. That is what worries me more than anything else. I look at the power grab taking place in this country today by some of our provincial premiers, and it shames me. I can stand in this House and articulate the views of my constituency; I have the responsibility of serving my constituency, and I have the concomitant responsibility of serving my province, but I have an equal responsibility in this House to serve my country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is why I reject those who would put forward the proposition that the Government of Canada can only enjoy those powers that the provinces delegate to them, that somehow the Government of Canada is perceived as merely the agent of the provincial governments. I reject that notion, Mr. Speaker. I reject it for many reasons, not the least of which is that it would create a Swiss type confederation in Canada, with a Government of Canada that had no power to serve its people to speak for Canada.

I hope, sir, as was so eloquently expressed today by my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale, that in our pursuit of constitutional renewal we do not look on the British North America Act as a piece of paper and throw it out. It has served us well. It is one of the oldest constitutions in the world. We have been able to grow and prosper under that constitution. It is a constitution that could permit Bill 101 in Quebec. It could permit French Canadians to come to this House and find expression in their official language.

Let us not sit down with the attitude of carving up the pie. If we do that we will destroy Canada. Let us sit down and share in the dream that is Canada, a dream of the Fathers of Confederation. If we do that we will succeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is almost superfluous for me to say, after all those who spoke earlier in this debate, that I join in the motion introduced by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). I congratulate him for his altruism and for that of his party, through him, because less than 48 hours after the results of the referendum became known in the House of Commons, he has enabled us to reaffirm solemnly the commitment made by the federalist forces to the people of Quebec that a negative vote on the question asked by the government of Quebec meant in fact a step on the road to change. It is for me symbolic that the dust having hardly settled on ballot boxes the House has already had the opportunity to hear the three national parties represented in this House state that it is very important for the survival of the country to devote the respite given to us to nation building, and I agree.

● (2040)

I was deeply interested by the speeches made by the hon. members for Provencher (Mr. Epp), Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the one made by the previous speaker, the member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I would like to say that I was deeply moved when, 30 years later, he referred to the heartbreaks induced by both referendums in that province and the fact that even after all those years, the people of that province still remember. I express the wish, Mr. Speaker, first that in 30 years from now we will still be in this House of Commons to say as Quebeckers: I remember the referendum in 1980 but also I would like to say then: You know, I was on the No side at the time and I do not regret it since Quebec has taken its place in the Canadian federation, its rightful place, and that happened only a few months or a year or two after the people of Quebec stretched its hand out to the rest of Canada as it did the night before last.

I am happy that the hon. member for Provencher took the opportunity tonight to draw attention to the regionalistic dimension of this desire for change. Let me explain. Everyone knows as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that the Pepin-Robarts report gave a diagnosis of the situation, with which I agree, and said that there were two currents of change in Canada. One current, from Quebec, could be termed the nationalistic current, and the other, of which Alberta is perhaps at the moment the torchbearer, the regionalistic current.

I was glad that the hon. member spoke of this dimension because I think one of the biggest mistakes of the Quebec government was to presume and state that the other partners in confederation had no desire for change and that a No vote would simply allow all Canadian federalists to sit back and watch the world go by. But we realize now, and the hon. member has proved it, that this desire for change exists not only in Quebec but that it is echoed, and forcefully so, for perhaps differing reasons, in the regionalism of western Canada which is demanding adjustments to our constitution and institutions.

Finally, it is perhaps the hon. member for Rosedale who fascinated me most, because he indirectly opened a door which I myself wanted to open, and that is to warn all those who will be responsible for constitutional change, those who will bring it about, not to be lured by change for the sake of change.

Let me explain this. The hon. member said "You know, in the final analysis, the constitution of 1867 served us well." You will be surprised to hear that from a Quebecker; it is probably true. It would be sad to cross out our whole past for the sake of change and to feel obliged to build anew without putting to some use the experience that we have acquired and must preserve. I like very much the saying which has become very popular now, that instead of pulling the old house to the ground and building a new one, it is better to keep the nice architecture, the high walls and the large and aired rooms of the old one and to renovate them, to upgrade the insulation, to improve the heating system and to keep our link with the past which survives through the house and is beautiful.

You know, I have the feeling that if there ever was a myth that has been excessively used during the debate, it is the idea of status quo. Obviously, nobody wants the status quo. It has become the villain in Canadian politics. But is there only anything like status quo in Canadian constitutional law? I wonder and I am asking every hon. member. Not sure. Strictly speaking, the constitution of today is not that of 1867. It has changed and developed along with the times and needs, in line with other legislation, the British North America Acts—there are a whole series of them—the Statute of Westminster, through constitutional amendments, both provincial and federal. The constitution of today, whether in the tax, monetary or power-sharing areas, is not that of 1867. One can rightfully say that we live today in a system which was conceived in 1867, but one could not say that the rules of the constitution under which we live today are those of the 1867 constitution. We are living under rules which have evolved. If these rules, therefore, have evolved, it is because the formula itself is not so bad after all, and this is one of the reasons—there are indeed others—why I believe in federalism. I believe in it and, until proven wrong, I shall continue to do so.

Alas!—and here I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale—the problem we must face today is not, strictly speaking, a problem of constitutional reform. Of course the federal government, in March 1978, and before that, in October 1977, presented during federal-provincial conferences a whole series of proposals for constitutional reforms, on such esoteric matters as the declaratory power, the power to spend, natural resources or offshore rights on the continental shelf, which are all very important, of course, but which are all matters with which I am not sure that all Canadians can easily identify.

Reforms had therefore been suggested and the process was underway to make certain necessary adjustments, which leads me to say that we should beware of using the term status quo in Canadian constitutional law because it does not reflect reality. I do not believe that this is the real crisis; the real crisis is one of identity. And, as I said earlier, I would like to warn those who will bring about this reform against making simply a legalistic reform, a reform of the legal texts, against playing a political give and take game during these federal-provincial conferences mentioned earlier by my colleague from Gloucester (Mr. Breau) which could be compared to a circus where everyone is trying to gain some advantage so that when they go home, whether it be to Edmonton, to Quebec City or to St. John's, they will be able to mark political points. Unfortunately, this is just about what has happened in past constitutional conferences and even during federal-provincial conferences on energy or the economy, and we have to avoid falling in this trap.

Indeed, you can believe me, Mr. Speaker, even if I said earlier that the major issue may not be constitutional reform, but rather a change of attitude—and I shall unfortunately not have the time this evening to explain in detail what this change of attitude should entail—this change can have various manifestations, for instance, the creation of bilateral consultation mechanisms, a decentralization of decision-making, the creation of a House of Federation, a mechanism of shared membership among the provinces and the federal government, and so on. That could be discussed at length. But that has nothing to do with the constitution as such; it is rather the institutions themselves that will have to adjust.

As I was saying, let us not kid ourselves, this is indeed the last chance that Canadians will have to reidentify with their country. The hon. member for Rosedale talked about the land, and I did like his image. For some it might be the land, for others, the sea, but the fact still remains that our crisis is one of identification. Mr. Speaker, if we cannot find a way to solve that crisis of identification, and very rapidly, I am afraid there will not be any need for a second referendum, and perhaps involving not only Quebec but other partners as well, for Canada as we know it now may no longer exist five years hence. It is the danger as I see it, the danger I apprehend and the reason once again why I would dare hope that that reform, that desire for change on the part of all Canadians will be expressed in two different ways. First, of course, to clean up that hotchpotch of necessary proposals for change, but that can sometimes blind us, make us think that here is the solution, the miracle solution is the spending power, the declaratory power, the offshore rights under the continental shelf, ownership, oil wealth. Some think solving that will solve the problem. No. But let us clean that up as rapidly as possible. Perhaps that can be done at the conference that will take place in July.

But that is not all. It would also be necessary, in a second step, that the conference in July be the starting point for that reflection and over-all reform that would finally enable us to better identify ourselves with our institutions. As I said, several proposals have been made, by the Pepin-Robarts commission, or in the beige paper of Mr. Ryan, by the Canada West Foundation or by the government of Ontario, in Bill C-60, or again by the Canadian Bar Association. Many groups have offered proposals, huge documents, reform proposals. There are many good ideas in there, proposals which may indeed help Canadians to better identify themselves with their institutions, which would allow a really dynamic federalism.

One solution could be to ask officials, and I would like this to be done on an intergovernmental basis, to collect and organize all this by the month of July—I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker, I need only 30 seconds more—so that we could, at the July conference, after having organized this hotchpotch, we could establish intergovernmental bodies to study these proposals and reach a consensus as soon as possible and, once again, on an intergovernmental basis. At a second stage, in maybe two years, we will reach proposals agreed on by consensus which could be submitted—one can dream about it—to a national referendum. Then all Canadians could vote on these proposals prepared by politicians.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am quite moved and feel very privileged to particpate in the debate on the motion. I was very moved by the speeches made by hon. members earlier in the debate and I find my interests and concerns overlapping those of members in all parties.

I think we all have deep feeling and emotion and a love for this country. Some of us have been deeply troubled as we have moved out of the decade of the seventies. My hon. friend from Rosedale spoke with soul and feeling. He is obviously a man who understands his community, his region and his country, as do the speakers who followed him. I was touched to hear my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), give his experience, stating the fact that he is a statutory Canadian in that he joined this chamber and this country as a result of a referendum. We heard that Canada today is an idea, not a constitution, that historians and artists reflect the strength, the beauty, and the magnificence of the land.

My background, my education, my reading, my work, my life, my region of the land, are quite different from those of members who preceded me, and I would like to place perhaps another broad dimension into the debate here today. Canada has come through a decade in which I have been troubled, as have others, in seeing the spirit of Canadian nationalism diminished. I have often related this denationalization to the social engineers working under the direction and perhaps with the assent of the government which was in power through the seventies.

I, like many Canadians from my region of Canada, carry a deep concern, yes, a resentment at the deterioration in the nationalism I was brought up in. I have seen this deterioration take place in the schools of my land when they stand to sing the national anthem. I have seen it deteriorate at the hockey and football games of my land as we sing the national anthem. Many of us are concerned that the spirit and the values which built this great country are diminishing. That spirit and those values carried our forefathers, my father and myself, through two world wars in my family, defending freedom and dignity for men, freedom of speech, freedom of ideas, freedom of movement, freedom of enterprise in a free marketplace, freedom to set individual goals and work to achieve them, all within a sense of order necessary to serve and protect the common weal and the common good.

We know that the racial crisis that we are in the midst of in this land has roots deep in the history of the nations of our French and British forefathers. But in spite of this historical antagonism, Canada came together as a nation with a constitution surely for some very fundamental reasons in addition to the land that we have heard of today, the love, the idea, and the referendum.

In May of 1979, a year ago, I received from a constituent an article in the Washington Post. It was written by John Conway, a Vancouver person, a scholar who moved to the United States as a lecturer in law and history. His article was written as an interested Canadian observer looking at Canada and what was happening to it from outside the land, not involved in the day to day work of it. The article was entitled "Canada is Coming Apart". In the files of clippings and literature which I have gathered, and which most of us have gathered on this issue, that article stood out in that it expressed something I fully did not know from my knowledge of history and my schooling. He pointed out that Canada came into existence for three reasons resting upon a genuine distrust of the American democracy, founded on life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, as opposed to British constitutionalism.

He pointed out that Canada in its beginnings was afraid of American annexation. Indeed, he reminded us that in 1896 Theodore Roosevelt even talked of declaring war on Britain to conquer Canada, its resources and its land. The Quebec French Catholics did not like the idea of being forcibly etched to the bosom of the Protestant American Union. This was one of the feelings that was in the origins of Canada. English Canada, on the other hand, was founded by some 35,000 loyalists who had backed the defeated side in the revolutionary wars of the United States and had settled along the shores of Lake Ontario. They feared the Americans and disliked their political and social institutions. Concern about American annexation lasted in this country into the twentieth century.

The second reason Conway gave for confederation was economic. If British North America was to be united and strong against American attack, it must have a strong, stable, expanding and mixed economy. This led to tariffs to support founding industries in Canada, in Ontario and Quebec against American competition.

From the very beginning of Canada this policy was a source of irritation to the farmers on the Canadian prairies and to the harvesters of the natural resources on the west coast of Canada in British Columbia.

In British Columbia we have always had to compete in world markets with products from our resources. Our export dependence far outweighs that of Ontario and Quebec. In addition, we have had a slender hold on secondary manufacturing and processing of resources which are important to stable payrolls and long-term growth in those regions. This means that national policies have a very different impact on my part of Canada from that on other regions like Ontario and Quebec.

Canadian tariffs and quota restrictions are seen as a negative drain on our payrolls and on consumers and higher prices for consumers in all of Canada, while the benefits go largely into central Canada. I do not put this out antagonistically; I just seek understanding of that attitude which prevails. Anti-dumping Tribunal decisions which disturb western payrolls and industries and which transfer the market advantage to Ontario are indeed dangerous policies within the delicate nationhood we have.

The third reason he pointed out for confederation was the growing might of the British Empire. Canadians could not compete with the might of the industrialized forces of the United States, so British preferential trade agreements were in our history a great boon to us and were a great offset against a very powerful neighbour to the south. British preferential tariffs are now being phased out, as three quarters of our trade is with the United States.

These three founding reasons have faded. We are intimately related to the United States economy in that 74 per cent or 75 per cent of our trade is now with the United States. The United States has no intention of taking us over through the force of arms. We know that, although its influence and economic power over us are a challenge which we must recognize and face. The British Empire has faded like all previous empires. It appears, therefore, that of the founding reasons for our nation only one in part remains, and that as a nation we are searching and looking for the base upon which to reconstitute ourselves.

Although anti-Americanism is raised from time to time in Canada, so far it is only the product of the intellectuals. I do not see the rank and file average Canadian perceiving it as an issue. Even in British Columbia we are concerned about the extent of Japanese economic domination over our resources and over the secondary industries adding to the value of those resources. Could it be that in addition to the land the only other rationale for reconstituting our nationhood lies in more self-determination and control over our resources?

We in British Columbia want to see initiatives on two fronts, the economic front and the constitutional front, where amendment is necessary. We are impatient with a struggle and a structuring to concentrate power to the centre. We want to see a federalism based on co-operation and with guarantees for inputs from the regions of this great country. Most of us in the west believe that the problem is economic, and would like to see a healthy economic environment exist in order to resolve the cultural and language problems which are within our bosom.

At the moment we have an impatience with the posturing for duality of language, law, and culture. It will take a great deal of talk, such as we have had in the meeting of minds, hearts and feelings in this House today, to create the understanding needed for duality of language and an at home feeling from sea to sea to come about in this country. I believe there are federal powers, as my predecessors have said, which must be strengthened, and that a strong central government is absolutely necessary for this country in order for it to take its rightful place in the community of nations. But to do so by the central government's grabbing the resources of the regions is indeed a strain on the threads which tie and bind us together.

Quebec has been the first to speak out. The west feels that its frustrations, although of different origins, are equally valid. Conway writes that without the empire, without the unifying ideology, and without the charter myth such as the Declaration of Independence, we are retreating into regionalism and indifference. I think May 20 snapped us out of indifference. Now we in this chamber have to talk our way out of regionalism.

He also challenged that all three political parties in Canada have failed to address these fundamental issues upon which the survival of our country depends.

In closing, let me echo the words of my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). The present constitution really needs two things. It needs tolerance—"Let us celebrate our differences"—and talk. This chamber needs heart-to-heart talk. We have lost ourselves in closed caucuses which do not allow us to express in this House the sense of regionalism that we were elected to bring to the federal government. That debate started back in Britain in the late 1700s, and I think we in all parties have to address it today.

I should be able to stand up and talk to hon. gentlemen across the way and to my left and my colleagues here openly, in front of the media and the Hansard of Canada, and express the feelings and the emotions of my home in my part of Canada. I should not have to be locked into a caucus of silence when I do so. Without talk how are we ever going to understand each other and defeat the regionalism which has descended upon us? I believe the challenge before us lies in this chamber today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to do something a little bit odd this evening by finishing off the address I started on the seventh day of the throne speech debate. You may remember that you were in the chair and that I had the last ten minutes, and tonight I have a bit more time. I think it is timely, since I was talking about the protection of minority language rights and minority rights in general, that I finish off that part of my speech and talk a little bit more about what I think has to happen in terms of constitutional change from the perspective or vantage point of an Ontario member of Parliament.

[Translation]

But first, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat part of a speech I made before this House some four years ago. I said at that time that many English-speaking Canadians born in Canada forget all too easily the fate that a minority group must suffer. Just ask a newly arrived immigrant in Toronto if it is easy to be accepted by the majority. The answer, I reckon, will be a loud no.

New Canadians must face difficulties because of their linguistic and cultural differences. They must face discrimination because of the colour of their skin or their religion. Immigrants generally accept these difficulties. They consider them as the price tag of their acceptance in this country, Canada. The same is not true of French-speaking Canadians. They represent more than a minority, Mr. Speaker, they are part of a minority with has a status of equal partner in the Canadian nation-state.

In my opinion the Official Languages Act is a wonderful thing and contributes to the unity of this country. It spells out the legal right of Canadians of both official languages to be served in their respective language by the national government throughout the country.

Where it is feasible, I think that the people want the government to establish this service. But now, Mr. Speaker, we must go further, especially after the results of Tuesday's referendum in the province of Quebec. We must entrench linguistic rights in a new Canadian constitution.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that one of the main reasons that I wanted to come back to this House, as I mentioned the other night, was to see a new constitution, and to see minority language rights enshrined in that constitution. I applaud the speeches of some of the premiers of this country, such as Mr. Davis, Mr. Hatfield, and even Mr. Lougheed, who are prepared to enshrine minority language rights in the constitution. That may help to win the hearts of those in Quebec who really delivered for us the other evening when they voted overwhelmingly No to sovereignty-association for the province of Quebec.

But there are other aspects of the constitutional debate that have to be analysed. As a member of the House from Ontario I think that Ontario has to make many sacrifices if the other regions in this country are to feel at ease with being part of the continued Canadian confederation. I want to talk for a moment about resources because resources are to western Canada what language and cultural rights are to Quebec.

I am glad that the premier of my province has made a public commitment to enshrine minority language rights in the constitution of this country. But I also think that the premier of my province and his government, the members of the provincial legislature and the members of parliament from Ontario, have to recognize the legitimate aspirations of those people from western Canada with respect to resource management and ownership.

I would agree with some of the comments made by Premier Blakeney when he said in Toronto recently that one cannot talk about federal taxation on revenues flowing from oil and natural gas if one is not prepared to apply the principle across the country no matter what the resource. I think the people of Ontario will have to realize that they cannot expect the western provinces, in particular Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, which have most of the oil and natural gas in this country, to accept a lower price, to accept federal taxation of that resource, unless resources in the province of Ontario are equally taxed.

I have a couple of things in mind here, Mr. Speaker. Uranium is a great export from the province of Ontario and, to my knowledge—and I stand to be corrected—there is not on it the same kind of export tax, if indeed any, that applies to the export of oil and natural gas. With regard to hydroelectricity or electric power, I saw some figures this afternoon when I was signing a question which will be produced in the House in a few days from the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) about the sale of hydroelectric resource to the United States. It is my understanding that electric power in general, when exported to the United States, is not subject to the same kind of tax that we have levied on exports of oil and gas to the United States. So, to use that old adage—and I hate to use it—what is good for the goose is good for the gander, I think for too long people in Ontario have lived comfortably and have perhaps behaved a little like ostriches, not willing to recognize the legitimate aspirations of other parts of the country.

It is my hope to see in this debate what was so eloquently expressed this evening by my colleagues on all sides and I took particular delight in the comments made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) who, in my view, united themselves with most, if not all, members of the House in the desire to hatch up regional differences, to maintain a strong, united country but also to maintain a federal power and the national Parliament which has the ability to protect all people across this country, whether it is to protect minority language rights, English in Quebec, French outside of Quebec, or whether it is to protect the federal power in setting national standards in certain programs which we have accepted in the last 20 or 30 years as the right of every Canadian. One that comes to my mind is medicare. I would say quite frankly that one of the worst things I did when I was a member in the Thirtieth Parliament was to vote for a piece of legislation which, en bloc, had the effect of transferring the powers over medicare to the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I would hope that we may correct that in this Parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: We need a strong national government to maintain a good medicare system and equal access to medicare. We need a strong national government to ensure that all the resources of the country, whether it is oil in the west, or uranium and hydroelectricity in Ontario, are shared equally across the country. All the resources, such as off-shore fishing on the east and west coasts, belong to all Canadians, and it is only with a strong federal power and a strong national government that these resources will be shared equally among Canadians.

We need a strong national government to ensure the freedom of movement of goods, labour, and capital across provincial boundaries. I think that what the hon. member for St. John's East said a few moments ago struck the core of the problem. In the last few years this basic principle has been seriously eroded. I think that some of the talk about decentralization, about the devolution of power and the need to weaken the central authority, is really a figment in the imagination of certain bureaucratic and political elites in this country. That is not to say that we in this chamber and our public service here in Ottawa are also not an elite that wants to protect its own sphere of interest, but I think that if we are really going to solve all of our problems we have to look beyond our petty interests, whether those interests are the ones I have described, the political and bureaucratic elites federally or provincially, or whether they are the petty concerns of people in their respective provinces. We have to agree to put these aside, and we have to agree to unite and all make sacrifices.

The vote the other night was great for us from English Canada. We appreciate no end the decision taken by the majority of people in the province of Quebec; but the heat is now on the rest of us from outside of Quebec not to break the faith of those people who voted in Quebec. So we must push for constitutional change, and I hope that the good wishes expressed in the House in the last couple of days will not dissipate as the referendum results move farther away from us. I think we realize—and I believe this sincerely—that we have very few years left to make sure that this country stays together. The problems in this country, whether they be language rights, the legitimate recognition of the economic aspirations of the provinces or the sharing of wealth in this country, must be attended to. We must in this Parliament, as I said the other night, pledge ourselves to come forward with a new constitutional document.

I was quite glad to hear the response of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the question from the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) in terms of participation of the member for Oshawa and of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in any federal negotiating team.

We have had two elections in the past year. They have left a bitter taste with some members, not just those of the former government. I might remind hon. members that I was one who paid the supreme sacrifice last May, and then came back. It has been a tough year, but politics and our political fighting in election campaigns are what make this country democratic. As indeed the Prime Minister said about the referendum, where else but in Canada could one part of the country legitimately debate openly the future of that part of the country and put it to a democratic vote? We are a very mature country.

Since two elections are past us, and since the referendum is past us, we in this House can bicker back and forth about specific programs. Perhaps I should not say "bicker", as we all have legitimate differences. But on constitutional matters I really hope in a most sincere way that we will put our differences aside. Whether it is an all-party federal negotiating team with the provinces, or whether it is some other kind of mechanism, I hope we can all submerge our differences and agree that we must make some sacrifice. It will not be easy.

It will not be easy for someone like me to go back to metropolitan Toronto and tell people that higher oil and gas prices must be levied or must be gained by the western provinces, and that growth must shift further west. It will not be easy for me. It will not be easy for the hon. member for St. John's East if he has to go back to Newfoundland and say to the people of Newfoundland, "You cannot claim all of the jurisdiction over offshore mineral rights". Those are some of the sacrifices we as members will be called upon to make in the next few years. I hope all of us are equal to the task.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Constitutional Change

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too am very grateful to be here in the Parliament of Canada on this occasion, on the occasion of talking about the referendum in Quebec, on the occasion of talking about constitutional renewal for Canada. It has been, barring the Newfoundland referendum, one of the most important events in Canada since the Second World War. It is all very well to say that other provinces, regions and cultures have problems, grievances and some feelings of being wronged, but no other part of the country had come to the point where it felt it had to have a referendum asking whether or not its people wished to have a quite different role to play in Canada, a sovereignty-association role. No other part of the country has felt it necessary to do that. It seems to me that in itself makes this an occasion for us all to realize, if we have not yet done so, that French Canada, particularly Quebec, is different. It is not a province like the others, nor has it ever been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Since none of us can be experts in this, I can do no more than say I think that many of us in Canada, many, many Canadians in all parts of this country, have over the past three or four years, particularly since the election of the PQ in the province of Quebec, really come to feel in our souls that there is a duality, that there is a dual society in Canada. The duality is the vast numbers of us who are predominantly English-speaking, of a great variety of cultures, but the mosaic is within the English-speaking group, on the one hand, and a large, significant and historically important French-speaking group on the other. By the way that group itself may become more and more a mosaic of cultures as new people come into Quebec.

I think it is the politicians who have not yet recognized that Quebec is different. I think it is some politicians, anyway, who have not yet accepted this marvellous duality that is Canada. Many, many people have accepted it. I have been reading in the Vancouver, Ontario and maritime newspapers in the last day the man-on-the-street interviews. Of course we cannot say that they are scientific samples, but time after time people are saying that what Quebec has been feeling, needing and wanting, and what French Canadians generally right across this country have been feeling, needing and wanting, is different.

As one woman said in Vancouver, which is in my province, "British Columbia and all the western provinces must realize that the intensity of Quebec's cultural issues is far greater than the west's economic questions." There are many more, more than I think we have ever seen before, along that line. In a sense it took a referendum to do it, but I think it has been a culmination of many years for many Canadians getting a fundamental grasp and feel for the duality of this country.

I would hope that there would be no difficulty getting agreement very soon on one measure. I hope to speak to the premier of my own province to see if I can persuade him to come along. I am referring to the entrenchment of language rights. I think this is the time at last when we could get and should get agreement right across this country on the entrenchment of language rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Of course one of the really difficult things will be deciding on the division of powers. We all know that. There will be lots of discussion on what we will do when we abolish the Senate.

Mr. Epp: What will Stanley do if he cannot go there?

An hon. Member: Good luck, Stanley.

Miss Jewett: There will be lots of important discussions—one just needs to read the beige paper, for example—on the courts and their composition, as well as the fascinating subcommittee of the council, that is proposed to deal with dualistic matters. But the big one will be the division of powers, and we all know that.

We have heard a lot of talk in this very fascinating debate today about whether or not we can have a reasonably strong federal government particularly in the area of economic development, or whether we will have a society where all economic development matters are left in the hands of the provinces. It is interesting to observe that over the last decade or so it has been the provinces that have been taking the initiative in economic matters.

It was never true in the past that the provinces took very many initiatives, certainly not in social and economic matters. But in the last decade or so—in fact some people would say since the Second World War—the federal government has been on a continental drift. There has been no Canadian economic development policy. Some people would say that there has not been any since Sir John A. Macdonald. But even looking at the last dozen years, there has not been a national economic development policy. The only major development at all was the establishment of Petro-Canada.

How do we know whether we as a people, we as members of provinces, we as citizens of different parts of the county, want to have a strong federal government, particularly in economic matters, when we have allowed the role of the federal government to drift totally over at least a decade? In other words, we not only have to address constitutional reallocation but, indeed, even before we make decisions on that, we have to decide as a people whether we want to see the federal Government of Canada in co-operation with the provinces have a Canadian economic development policy. It is crucial, to me, that we make that decision.

I was very moved, as I think we all were, by the speech of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). As he was speaking I was wondering whether he and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) had ever engaged in a friendly debate because, as I understood the hon. member for St. John's East, he was saying that one of the marvellous things about being a Canadian is that you can feel a part of every part of this country no matter where you live and no matter where you come from—you can feel it.

I have heard lots of people in British Columbia say, when they were afraid that Quebec might separate, "Quebec belongs to me too". We do have this feeling, or many of us, about every part. I have it for New Brunswick because of my father's background, about Ontario because of my education, and about B.C. because that is where I live. I have it about other parts of Canada too. I think everyone has it even though they may never have left home.

The hon. member for Rosedale was saying that he thought a fundamental reality of this country was regionalism, a state of mind rooted in historical experience. With all due respect, I think that day is over. One of the fundamental facts of this generation in this country is mobility—we move around.

I am practically a senior—I won't use that phrase; I am practically an old timer in British Columbia. I have been there six years but most of the people I meet there now have only been there two. The big feature of Canada is its mobility. I agree with the hon. member that there was a period when all of our paintings, particularly the Group of Seven, were only of landscapes. That is not true any more; we are a society of people. There was a period when we stayed home and never moved; that is not true any more. We move right across this country. We move and we must encourage, through government action, more young people to move backward and forward across the country.

I have only one more theme I particularly want to address. Two or three hon. members have referred to the suggestion that more than governments be involved in the constitutional negotiations. Or course, not being in a government, I think that is a splendid idea. We have to look at the way it might be done. It was suggested by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) that it might take place after the first ministers' conference; that there might be a sort of constituent assembly after that first ministers' conference. I think my leader's suggestion was that the actual delegations at the first ministers' conference should have a multipartisan make-up both from provincial and federal spheres, and that there should be at least leaders of other parties in the delegation. At this time of, I hope, a joyful renewal in Canada I think that would be an act of magnanimity, but more than that, an act that has a chance of real success. The delegations would have to do a lot of talking among themselves first, but it would have a chance of real success to have the federal delegation multipartisan, and the provincial delegations the same. I would hope, therefore, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would take that into consideration very seriously.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) had an interesting suggestion as well. His was more a way to involve more members of Parliament in a forum of discussion; it would not be more than a forum of discussion, but to mix them up with members from the provincial legislatures. I think that is an additional means of furthering our understanding of one another and, therefore, deserves to be thought about seriously, in this case by us as members of Parliament with our counterparts in the provincial legislatures.

I for one look forward to the real opportunities that the referendum and its results have given us all as Canadians. I think they have taught us a great deal, as I said earlier, and when both the Yes and the No votes can be construed and are being construed as strong requests for constitutional renewal, we can approach the task not in a spirit, at least I hope not, of narrow regionalism. I do not think Canadians feel that way any more. I think we can approach it in a spirit of wanting to create through the kinds of policies, particularly in the economic sphere, that this country has been crying for for years—a new Canada. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I believe in Canada; I believe in Canada with the passion of a convert, like so many other new Canadians who have come to this country and who have chosen to become Canadians because of their faith, their hope, and their observations of the greatness of this land. I hardly need to dilate upon the greatness of this nation after the eloquent tributes that have been paid verbally today and the last day or so, and certainly I hardly need to expand upon it after the tributes that have been proferred, not only in this House, but, above all, by the votes that have been cast by the people of Canada in the province of Quebec, expressing their faith in the most excellent way, far greater than words could ever state, when they voted in the referendum, choosing for Canada.

Given this background I want to say that I will not trespass upon the tributes given to Canada, either by those who have spoken so eloquently in the House, or by those who have voted so eloquently in Quebec. However, I want to state that I believe in Canada as one who has become a Canadian, like so many others who become Canadians and who have come to this country, as I did in 1951, and in years before and after, people who have come with a faith and a belief, and have come to appreciate what Canada can do for them, and what a great and free land it is. I believe in this nation as those new Canadians do.

Perhaps I have that kind of concern that comes not just out of reason, that comes from those who have perhaps always lived here and look at their country with great satisfaction, but with something that comes from experience.

I was born in Switzerland and I lived in France just before the Second World War began. My father was the Protestant chaplain general of the French army. He saw that that nation, as I saw it, was, if you will, complacent; complacent with what it had, complacent with the way things were and, in fact, unwilling to make any changes that would adjust and permit it to face up to the world that was changing about it. My father paid with his life for his efforts to try to awaken France to the dangers of the complacency in that country. And so, perhaps, out of that experience as a child, seeing what could happen to what is called a great democracy, I saw also how great was the price that was paid. As Georges Santayana said, and as the words are immortalized on the gates of the prison at Dachau, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it."

• (2140)

It seems to me, therefore, that one has to say as a Canadian who was not born here, one has a love for this country that is the love of a convert. From having experiences and seeing what happened in other nations, one knows what a great country this is and one wants to be sure it does not happen here. Perhaps it was for this reason that I attended conferences in 1971 in an attempt to convince people of the need for dialogue among Canadians, to talk about what was separating us, what was making us different, and what would bring us back together again in a sense of sharing, understanding and cooperation. Perhaps it was for this reason, I would suggest, that I entered the political arena, to participate in this great dialogue which now, once again, is beginning in great earnest in this country.

Why? Not because of rational reasons, but because of experiential ones. And those who have not learned from the past are bound to repeat the mistakes of the past. Those of us who do not learn from the past of Canada are bound and doomed to repeat the mistakes that have been made in the past in Canada.

I believe that we are faced with two choices. On the one hand, we can enter once again into the trivial argumentation of constitutional haggling of small points and of fine points the unsuccessful route that we have followed until now, or perhaps we might take a bolder approach, and I suggest we do that.

A bolder approach would be to enter into a faith in a new country, to undertake a rebirth in this nation that would bring about a new Canada on this continent. In other words, we must look to transcend and overcome the past rather than to bicker about whether or not this belongs to me and that belongs to you. As we focus on what belongs to me and to you, we lose the vision of what belongs to all of us. This rebirth of a nation can come about in three ways. They are essential if this nation is really to come into a new life.

The first thing, I think, is to fight the threat from within. The only way a new nation comes into being is the same way, in fact, that some people in Quebec wanted their new nation to come into being, by fighting what people regard and perceive as injustices. If we intend to fight the enemy from within, we must correct the injustices of the past and present with a completely new approach, an open heart, and an openness toward one another. We must have the enthusiasm, the idealism of a population that wants to right wrong, obtain justice for all, and that perhaps has the same kind of inspiration which fired the separatist cause. We need a new spirit within, a moral appeal and a moral renewal.

The second way, I suggest, is by combating the external threats, by protecting our air space from pollution, by protecting our land from pollution, our offshore resources in the 200-mile limit, our fishing rights and our internal channels of communication in the north which some may wish to say are our international channels. We must waken and realize that we are being threatened from without, not by armies but by a new form of danger, a new form of threat that can destroy us—pollution and destruction of our resources and the wasting of our country.

The third thing which we could do is to take pride in our country. This subject has already been mentioned, but it bears repeating. One does not create a new nation by trying to argue over what belongs to me and what belongs to you, but by grasping the vision and pride in this country of what we have achieved in the past and what we may be called upon to achieve in the future. We might be called upon to fight disasters, to increase our peace-keeping forces, to continue our work with refugees. We must continue to be concerned about the human rights of people in other nations.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we are shortsighted because we have gotten used to it. We are shortsighted when we look at only our own concerns in this nation, instead of looking beyond and realizing that the world is being torn apart by tyranny, nationalism and regionalism. One need only look at countries such as Cypress and Lebanon, at countries like France with its problems in Corsica, and Britain which is being torn apart through Ireland and Wales with their nationalism, and even the Scottish nationalism—all of which was once the United Kingdom. We can look throughout the world and see one nation after another being torn apart by civil war. There are countries like Bangladesh and Ethiopia. The tragic list goes on and on.

Do we really think in this nation that we are immune from these forces which are tearing other nations apart, from the terrorism and violence which exists? If Canadians were to take the view of persons coming to this country from another country, if they could each step apart and aside and have the view of new Canadians, they would see this country for its totality. They have not become identified with its parts, and Canadians, too, would realize how important it is that we be united in a common cause.

We must look at the dangers that are without and come to appreciate the values which we have. It is only then that we can do, for example, what France was unable to do, to realize that the external threats and the threats of injustices from within will tear us apart like other nations, unless there is a renewal from within. We must renew our moral faith and develop a concept of a rebirth of goals, of our inner selves, each as an individual. It must begin with me, Mr. Speaker, and with you.

The problem will not be solved in this House. But the spirit that now prevades this House, of talking to one another, of really listening and not trying to find fault in the other, to see if we can hear something wrong in order to attack, and instead really trying to understand what the other person is trying to say, and helping that individual put it in the best possible light, that, Mr. Speaker, is dialogue. That is what will hold this country together.

I appreciate the rare privilege this evening of standing in the House of Commons. Though I was born in another land, I was permitted to adopt this land and I have had the good fortune of being able to stand in this House to speak on behalf of my riding and the many people in it who were either born Canadians or who came to Canada. I can say for them that we are grateful for what has happened in the last few days. I am grateful for the privilege of being able to add my few words of hope for a new country with a new start.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps fitting that I should be speaking at the tail end of this debate, because we in the north have been for so many years the tail end of the country. We are about to embark upon discussions with respect to the amending of the constitution of our country. I now make an appeal to be heard on behalf of Canadians who live above the sixtieth parallel.

The common southern conception stops at the sixtieth parallel, and the realization is not there that there are thousands of Canadians who live in Canada's two northern territories which comprise 60 per cent of our land mass. We have been treated by the government of the day as colonists. We have been defined judicially as colonists. I cannot help but compare that status with the progress that is being made throughout the world in the new nations which are emerging and which have a good deal less to offer to the development of a country than Canada's north.

The voice of northern Canada must be heard. It is represented in this House by three members, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), and myself. With the advent of party politics in the Yukon, we now have a government leader who is very able to speak on behalf of our concerns. In the Northwest Territories that development is taking place quite rapidly and their elected representatives should also be heard.

It was notable yesterday when we listened to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) that no reference was made to the participation in any forthcoming talks with respect to the reform of our constitution of the elected representatives of the north. The former prime minister, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) did make that reference—a reference which he seldom neglects to make when he speaks of the country as a whole.

The system which exists vis-à-vis the administration of northern Canada is archaic, to say the least, and repressive, to say the most. When we have elected representatives who must be present at the kind of federal-provincial conferences at whatever level through a minister who happens to come from Hamilton at the moment, this is simply not acceptable. It is no more acceptable than if I were to have the presumption to suggest that I could speak better for the residents of Hamilton and the riding which he represents.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Particularly that minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Particularly that one. As suggested by the former prime minister, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in his remarks yesterday, it is time to recognize that those Canadians living above the 60th parallel should participate fully in any conferences that are going to affect their lives as Canadians.

It seems to me the time is long past that we should be operating under a system which was discarded from 1879 onward. Since that date when Manitoba became a province at the insistence of the territorial movement of that time, there has been no further movement toward recognition, with full participation, of Canadians who are classified as territorials. Indeed, that classification puts us within the definition of what I believe to be second-class Canadians.

We have made some progress in the 1970s and a good deal of progress in the last year toward achieving some measure of determination which at least equates that of a municipal council in most parts of the country. We have a long way to go.

My pitch—so that it is not misunderstood—is not for immediate provincial status, but for a relinquishment of the Liberal philosophy of maintaining a stranglehold on the legitimate aspirations of northern Canadians to make decisions for themselves which their own municipal administrations, like provincial administrations, have the ability to make now. It is a simple question of fairness.

There are many thousands of Canadians in northern Canada, including many thousands of native Canadians, who want that kind of representation in any constitutional talks with respect to the reformation that is about to be conducted. That desire has been made known to the government opposite, I know, as it was to ours. Under the responsibility of the immediate former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, a good deal of progress was made toward achieving that equality which northerners have a right to expect in any democratic society.

The government leader in the Yukon has already communicated his desire to participate on behalf of the people of my territory—his willingness to participate in any constitutional reform talks that come up. While the Council of the Northwest Territories has not progressed to that stage in their development that we have in the Yukon, they too have elected representatives.

The time is long past, and I hope this course is not adopted by the government when it comes to the talks—I will not call them federal-provincial talks because they should not be that; they should involve a much broader representation than that—the time is long past when participants in those talks must be confronted with a fait accompli designed in the bowels of the Langevin Building. The time is long past when the talks must commence on the basis of a structured plan presented to those participating. The time has come when there must be a realization that the elected representatives of the people in the broadest possible sense, must be the designers of any reform that is to come about in our constitution—a constitution which, incidentally, has served us well, as has been pointed out by many previous speakers, particularly from this side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: It has served us well. The fathers of the BNA Act had remarkable foresight in designing a constitution which at the time was applicable to four provinces—Upper and Lower Canada and the two maritime provinces that participated. In 113 years we have progressed to the point where it needs updating but, as the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) said, it certainly does not deserve to be chucked out on the crest of the impetus we achieved on May 20.

My appeal tonight is that for the first time northern Canadians should be represented by their elected representatives, not by the bureaucrats in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and not by any other bureaucrats at the table. I do not suggest they be full participants on an equal level with provincial premiers but I suggest that the elected representatives of the northern territories, those Canadians who live above the 60th parallel, should be heard in person. They should not be made sit behind the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) or behind any other minister, but should be heard in person and directly. We are Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: As long as I have lived in the north, which is 28 years, we have been fighting to get into confederation when other parts of the country were actively trying to get out or thinking about getting out. We want to be heard, and we want to participate in the kind of constructive building of this nation which we know is possible and which we know is our future heritage. We have so much to offer in resources and in talent in this 40 per cent of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—HEALTH AND SAFETY MEASURES TO PROTECT URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, on April 30, I put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) and asked him how soon the government would be moving to implement regulations relating to uranium miners concerning their health and safety. The minister indicated at that time that he hoped by May 30 there would be new regulations put in place to ensure the safety and health of the uranium mine workers in this country, especially in the province of Ontario so that they would be on an equal basis with those workers under provincial jurisdiction in other mining camps.

During the last several months there has been increasing concern that those uranium mine workers are working under a much less safe arrangement regarding health and safety regulations than those working under provincial jurisdictions. In fact, last August regulations were passed under part IX of the Ontario mining act, which has since become out of date because Ontario has moved on to Bill 70, the occupational health and safety act, which provides more up-to-date arrangements.

A few weeks ago we had a meeting attended by representatives of the United Steelworkers, and the Minister of Labour, the minister of mines and other representatives from the two operating mines in Elliot Lake to urge upon the minister that action be taken on this matter. At that time the minister gave an understanding or a commitment that he would look into a number of items, including a request that the whole question of the health and safety of uranium miners be put under provincial jurisdiction. It is very appropriate that this matter should be raised tonight when we have been talking today about the constitution and new arrangements between the federal and provincial governments, because the United Steelworkers of America believe that conventional occupational health and safety should be under provincial jurisdiction.

Also at that meeting the minister indicated that he would move to see if Bill 70, the provincial regulations bill, could be, by reference, appended to section 4 of the federal labour standards code. At the same time he indicated that he would review the decision of the former minister of labour authorizing the health and safety committees in those two mining operations in Elliot Lake. He has already moved to do that and I am pleased to see that that is under way.

I am concerned about the labour unrest that has resulted and the uncertainty there has been during the past few months, that he moves to reference these occupational health and safety regulations under Ontario's bill 70 and put them in place as federal regulations under the federal labour standards code so that we do not have two classes of miners in Ontario, but instead that we have them all operating with equivalent health and safety provisions. If the minister does this by the end of this month I am sure there will be great appreciation for that decision, certainly by myself and by the thousands of uranium mine workers employed in the Elliot Lake mining camp.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for having brought up this important question regarding the uranium miners in his riding, one which also affects all the uranium miners in Canada.

If I may, I will give a little of the background to put the subject into perspective before referring, in closing, to a decision which has been forthcoming from my minister.

Labour Canada's involvement in the uranium industry began with a legal opinion by the Department of Justice in October, 1978, that part IV of the Canada Labour Code applied to conventional occupational safety and health in uranium mines. Prior to that time, all aspects of occupational safety and health in the uranium industry were regulated by the Atomic Energy Control Board. This was accomplished by a clause in the AECB licence which required the companies to comply with all local, municipal and provincial laws. By this means, the provincial legislation in relation to mine safety applied to the Ontario uranium mines and was enforced by inspectors of the Ontario Ministry of Labour.

Subsequent to the legal opinion in 1978, the uranium mining situation was given top priority and immediate action was taken by the department to ensure the provision of services in the field of conventional safety and health. The hon. member drew attention to this in his own words.

At a January, 1979, meeting attended by representatives of the mining companies, the labour unions, Atomic Energy Control Board, Labour Canada and the Ontario Ministry of Labour, it was agreed that the existing provincial laws would continue to apply and be enforced by the provincial inspectors. This interim arrangement pertaining to the legislative requirements was formalized when federal regulations, which referenced the Ontario legislation, were proclaimed in August, 1979. At that time, however, it was recognized that new Ontario legislation would be in effect shortly and departmental officials planned to amend the federal legislation to reference these revised Ontario mining regulations. This approach was unacceptable to the union, which requested that the federal regulation be revised in a format that included the safety and health requirements in a detailed, clause-by-clause manner. Although departmental officials recognized that this would be very time consuming, it was agreed to proceed on this basis with a target timing for completion of late spring, 1980.

To resolve the conflicts that have arisen in the tripartite application of safety and health standards in the uranium mining industry of Ontario, it is proposed to place a submission before cabinet in the near future which would offer several alternative courses of action in the federal jurisdiction.

I hope this will be done at an early date so that the hon. member might soon convey to his constituents the decision taken at that time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—WINNERS OF COMPETITION FOR DESIGN OF PATROL FRIGATE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my participation in the adjournment debate tonight will possibly not last even the seven minutes allotted for it. I am seeking some information. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that on May 1, as reported at page 601 of Hansard, I asked a question and a supplementary question. Yesterday I telephoned the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) to inform her that my request for an adjournment debate related only to the supplementary question, not to the first question, so that the department could zero in on that aspect without wasting time answering the other portion.

As Hansard reflects, I asked the minister a question. He answered. I made some comment on the shortcoming of his answer, and then I went on as follows:

> Last November, as minister of national defence I sent a memo to the chief of the defence staff and the deputy minister ordering a study to be started on a new ship replacement program to follow on after the six frigate program was finished. An interim report was to be given to the chief of the defence staff by March 15 and to the minister by the end of June. Can the minister tell the House what progress, if any, has been made on this study, and if he has been briefed on it by the chief of the defence staff?

The minister replied:

> Madam Speaker, following my previous answer, the development of the frigate program follows a normal course and once the problem of the new fighters was settled I asked that the department to do its utmost to suggest all possible solutions about the frigates.

I am forced to the conclusion that the minister did not understand my question, and in the hurly-burly of the question period this is quite possible. That is why I have risen tonight to ask for a more detailed and a more explicit answer, and I presume by now they will have had time to apprise the minister of anything he might not have been apprised about before. I mentioned that I had sent the memo in November. I would like to correct that. It was October 29 that I sent the memo. As a result of that memo of October 29, only some three months later the chief of the defence staff instructed his subordinates to go ahead with the future ship study.

I do not wish to take up any more time of the House. I simply want to know, as I wanted to know on May 1, what progress, if any, had been made on this study and if the minister had been briefed on it by the chief of the defence staff.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer as best I can the two or three questions asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I want to assure the hon. member again, just as I did the other day, that there is nothing delaying the normal progress of the Canadian patrol frigate program and, as I stated in this House only a short while ago, once a decision has been reached on finalists to enter a competitive contract definition, shipyards on both coasts and in Quebec will, no doubt, be negotiating production proposals with the prime contractors representing the industrial group finalists.

However, the decision in regard to the winners of the competition and the factors involved are still under consideration.

In respect of the study to which the hon. member referred in his question, I would like to inform him that I am acquainted with the nature of this study and its progress to date. A preliminary report of this study was submitted to the chief of the defence staff in mid-March, and I was assured that the completed study would be ready for my consideration by late June, as the ex-minister mentioned in his question on May 1. I would like to point out, however, that this is still the month of May, not the month of June, and I cannot see any reason why we should have a delay on this report.

I would like to point out further that far from delaying the progress of new equipment programs for the Canadian forces, since this government took office only three months ago it has selected a new fighter aircraft and made the decision to replace our fleet of two and a half-ton trucks.

Also, the former Liberal government approved the purchase of the Aurora long-range patrol aircraft, of which the first one will be delivered next week. The Leopard tanks and the armoured vehicles also represent something we have done.

During the seven-month period in which the hon. member was minister of national defence his government was unable to initiate any major equipment programs.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity tonight to reassure hon. members of this House that, in view of the critical situation regarding forest fires in the central and western provinces, directives were given to our armed forces to be at the disposal of Canadian citizens in need of help, even if it means cancelling normal operations. When Canadian citizens are in need, it is a priority for the armed forces to help them.

To resume the answer to the hon. member for Victoria, the study he mentioned at the beginning of his question will, I think, be on time at the end of June, and then I think we could discuss the content of this study.

STATUS OF WOMEN—STUDIES ON EMPLOYMENT STRATEGIES FOR WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am raising the question of a women's employment strategy this evening because the situation facing women in terms of high unemployment, cutbacks in support services, and growing poverty, is reaching crisis proportions.

What are the facts? First, unemployment among women remains persistently higher than that for men, close to 9 per cent.

Second, women still earn only 58 per cent of men's wages, and according to Dr. Ratna Ray of the women's bureau of the Department of Labour, the gap is widening steadily.

● (2215)

Third, women's employment counselling and training programs funded under Outreach have dwindled away under Liberal and Conservative governments to the point where there are fewer than 12 left.

Fourth, job ghettoization is worse than ever with 71 per cent of women workers still concentrated in the sales, service, clerical and nursing occupations.

Fifth, technological change is placing jobs for women in even greater jeopardy and closing the doors to better paying and more interesting job opportunities.

Sixth, private sector corporations are succeeding in keeping women out of skilled trades and in hampering women's efforts to organize into labour unions.

While the situation facing women has deteriorated rapidly in the last decade, particularly in the last three years, both Liberal and Conservative governments have produced nothing more than vague promises, regressive cutbacks, and more rounds of studies. The decision by the current minister responsible for the status of women to carry out yet another study on a women's employment strategy with the assistance of Liberal vice-president Lorna Marsden, is of deep concern to me, for several reasons.

First, women have been promised an employment strategy many times during the last three Parliaments; by the former Liberal minister in March, 1979, by the former Conservative minister in November, 1979, and now by the current minister responsible for the status of women. The urgency of the situation requires the immediate implementation of job-creation and job-training programs for women.

Second, can the women of Canada look forward to action from a government that refuses to implement standards of equality among its own employees? The recent investigation of equal pay in the federal public service, and the growing number of complaints before the Human Rights Commission from women public servants suffering discriminatory wages, demonstrate that this government's commitment to equal pay for work of equal value and to job promotion for women is dubious. New programs and new standards in the public service are not necessarily needed. Rather, what is missing is the will to enforce existing programs and to demand departmental accountability. If enforcement is lacking in the public service, is it possible to expect this government to enforce affirmative action, job training and equal pay in the private sector?

Another concern is that this government and the minister responsible for the status of women have neither talked in terms of, nor made proposals for, a full employment policy such that everyone willing and able to work is able to find useful, rewarding, and decent jobs. In fact the opposite is characteristic of the Liberal government. Instead of publicly advocating that employment opportunities should be available for all women who want to or need to work, this government has helped to perpetuate the myths that women are secondary wage-earners, are the cause of high unemployment, are temporary aberrations in the labour force, and tend to abuse unemployment insurance benefits.

If the Liberal government has not yet adopted a full employment policy and has failed to develop a job-creation strategy, can we really expect a meaningful and serious employment strategy for women?

Finally, I question the need for yet another study on employment for women in view of the tremendous number of studies and recommendations that have already taken place. They include, one, a study of women returning to the work force by the Advisory Council in April, 1979; two, six major studies costing thousands of dollars prepared by the minister's own department outlining the elements of affirmative action and methods for implementing such a program; three, a report by the National Council of Welfare on Women and Poverty in October, 1979; four, an employment strategy for women by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women presented to cabinet in March, 1978; five, another employment strategy by the National Action Committee presented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on February 22, 1979; six, specific employment related proposals presented to the former Liberal minister in a letter dated March 23, 1979, from Yvette Rousseau, then head of the Advisory Council; seven, a brief by the Canadian Committee on Learning Opportunities for Women presented to the government on May 14, 1979; eight, "An Employment Service for Women", a paper done on contract for Status of Women Canada in July, 1979; nine, Towards Equality for Women, the Liberal government's own national plan of action presented in March, 1979; ten, a complete strategy for women's employment prepared by officials in the minister's own department, approved by the previous minister in the Conservative government and destined for cabinet consideration in December, 1979.

The last thing the new minister should need is more studies.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

[English]

The hon. member over-simplifies the situation of women in the work force when she suggests that implementation of all the government's previous studies should be undertaken immediately.

Implementation of such studies is impossible without some co-ordination and the assistance the department requires from those who act as consultants, co-ordinating past studies with present realities and policies. The employment situation of women is well known.

[Translation]

Working women are playing an increasing role in the economic life of this country. The rate of activity among women, that is the proportion of women of working age who are part of the labour force, rose from 23 per cent in 1953 to more than 43 per cent in 1978, and that is largely due to the fact that more married women entered the labour market. Working women total nearly 4.4 million and represent 39 per cent of all the labour force.

The fact remains that Canadian women still do not have equal opportunities on the labour market. Although the proportion of women on the labour market is expanding rapidly and approaching the proportion of men, big differences still exist between the two groups, particularly with respect to employment opportunities, the kinds of jobs, salaries, working hours and promotion opportunities.

[English]

None of this work can be done overnight, nor can it be done without a co-ordinated and comprehensive strategy, one that is well planned and well thought out. This is the work the government is undertaking at the moment. We are in the process of implementing many of the recommendations of the past studies to which the hon. member has made reference. We are in the process of developing new co-ordinated strategies to improve the employment situation of women.

With regard to the plan of action to which the hon. member referred in her question, I would point out that, pursuant to the provisions of the plan of action, departments will be reporting their progress on the various initiatives to the minister by June 1, and then he will be making his report to cabinet. This will be the first of a series of annual reports to be made between now and 1985, the period covered by "Towards Equality".

Also I would add that the fact this present government would give the same minister responsibility for the status of women and the job-creation and employment strategy is a sign that we are trying to make a better relationship between the employment strategy and the status of women.

REQUEST FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BE PROVIDED TO ROCKWELL INTERNATIONAL PLANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of extreme urgency particularly in so far as the employees of Rockwell International, one of the plants in my riding, are concerned.

This plant is involved in the production of wheel discs and other auto parts for many of the large automobile companies. Since 1978, the number of employees at this plant in Parry Sound has been significantly reduced, from 220 employees in 1978 to 75 at present. On June 6 of this year, the plant will officially close. The Rockwell International plant at Bracebridge has also experienced severe financial setbacks in recent years, although I understand they will continue to operate. The plant at Parry Sound has on more than one occasion been outbid by a Rockwell International plant in Mississippi, a sister plant.

In view of the fact that this government has seen fit to give Chrysler Canada a $200 million aid package in an attempt to salvage the company, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government undertake a firm commitment forthwith to provide similar financial assistance to the Rockwell International plants in Parry Sound and Bracebridge, in an attempt to assist these plants to survive the profound financial difficulties that they are presently facing as a result of their having to compete with plants in the southern United States where the cost of labour is considerably less expensive.

GREEN FEES FOR GOLF COURSES—GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that green fees, on a seasonal basis, at the Green Gables golf course in Prince Edward Island—a course managed by Parks Canada—have risen by 50 per cent, from $110 to $165, while the provincially-run courses have risen by only 10 per cent and, added to that, the age for junior golfers has been lowered from 19 to 17, which means that an 18-year old golfer who paid $30 last year must now pay $165—a whopping 530 per cent increase which will undoubtedly keep young golfers off the course—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House instruct the minister responsible for Parks Canada to immediately review and adjust the green fees policy for golf courses that come under the jurisdiction of his department, so that especially the young golfers will not be faced with such outrageously high fee increases.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

LOANS AT INTEREST RATE CHARGED CPR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway owes $31 million to the CNR, and are only paying an 11.75 per cent interest rate through a partnership agreement covering CN-CP Telecommunications, and in view of the fact that this interest rate is of great benefit to the CPR because it is substantially below the rate ordinary Canadians have to pay, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House require the government to lend money to Canadian farmers, home owners and small businesses at the same preferred rate that CNR is lending money to CPR.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CRIMINAL CODE

CALL FOR COMMITTEE REVIEW OF GUN LAWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provision of Standing Order 43, to present an urgent and pressing matter.

Whereas the Magna Carta ensures that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; and whereas, under Canada's gun laws, an officer does not have to secure a search warrant for a search of a person's home but only has to believe there is just cause for the search; and whereas an officer may search a person's home and, under the provisions of the gun laws, may seize all firearms held by him without even laying a charge; and whereas there are a number of other inequities and inequalities contrary to British justice in our gun control laws, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the gun laws be referred for review and amendment to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee at the earliest possible time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PETRO-CANADA

REQUEST OPERATIONS BE EXPANDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since Petro-Canada announced the good news yesterday that it will do the following soon: one, rename its Pacific 66 stations as Petro-Canada; two, adopt the maple leaf as its logo; and three, issue credit cards to Canadians—an action we have advocated for more than a year—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

● (1110)

That the Goverment of Canada at last implement its campaign promise to expand the operations of Petro-Canada, particularly throughout Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

STEPS TO ENSURE SUFFICIENT SUPPLY OF FEED GRAINS AND FORAGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the serious threat of a severe drought in the prairie region this year and the possibility of a shortage of feed grains and forage, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the government take immediate steps to place a ban on the shipment of screenings from the prairies and build a stockpile of feedgrain to ensure a sufficient supply of feed for livestock producers in the west for this coming year.

PURCHASE OF INDIGENOUS NATIVE CANADIAN ART—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that many major art galleries of the world display indigenous native Canadian art, and that the Peter Jackson Golf Tournament and the Canadian Open also award Inuit sculptures as prizes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the acquisitions policy of the National Gallery of Canada be changed to purchase indigenous native Canadian art, Inuit and Indian prints and sculpture, to be used as part of the permanent and travelling collection of the gallery.

STANDING ORDERS

ADDRESSING THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my motion is one I believe will receive the support of the whole House. I believe it deals with the objectives of all members of this chamber in seeing a more fulfilling role for women in our society, and particularly that this Parliament should lead in that way. It is in respect of our rule book of the House of Commons Chamber which makes reference to members of Parliament and to Madam Speaker as "Mr. Speaker", which leads to so many of the, "Mr.—I mean, Madam Speaker" that we hear. I note on page 7 of the Standing Orders, as one example, the following:

When a member is speaking, no member shall pass between him and the Chair, nor interrupt him—

That is as if members of Parliament are male. Also on page 23, Standing Order 28 reads as follows:

Every member desiring to speak is to rise in his place . . . and address himself to Mr. Speaker.

Virtually every page makes reference to members or the Speaker as being male. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That in the next printing of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, which we encourage to be soon, the male gender in reference to members of Parliament and the Speaker be removed and replaced by articles of neutral gender so that reference may be made to either or both sexes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I think we can correct those anomalies when the Standing Orders are reprinted. Of course, we do not have the same problem in French since the masculine gender encompasses the feminine gender, thus making the drafting that much easier. At any rate, I suppose we have the unanimous consent of the House to see to it that the Standing Orders reflect contemporary conditions a little more faithfully.

CANADA DAY

PROPOSAL THAT LEGAL STATUS BE GIVEN TO JULY 1—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the attention and the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since May 20, 1980, was a symbolic and historic day for the destiny of our nation, and considering that Canadians have reasserted their preference for a united Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That this House urge the government to introduce as soon as possible a bill which would give legal status to Canada Day on July 1.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH DENMARK ON NAVIGATION IN MUTUALLY ADJOINING WATERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that if Canada is to pursue the goal of energy self-sufficiency by way of the development of its Arctic resources, it may well in the near future become necessary to transport hydrocarbons through the Davis Strait separating Canada from Greenland, and because the government of Denmark has an interest in respect of tanker traffic in these waters not dissimilar from the interest of Canada off its west coast, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be required by this House to speedily expedite negotiations with the government of Denmark with a view to reconciling the outstanding differences between the two nations regarding navigation in mutually adjoining waters.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL IMPORT POLICY OF GOVERNMENT—IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister yesterday confirmed in this House that his government will phase out the oil compensation subsidy, and that the Canadian price for crude oil will be a blend of imported and domestic crude prices. This means the federal government will no longer contribute the estimated $3.1 billion or more for this year to cushion the impact on the consumer of higher imported costs.

My question is: where will that money come from? Will it be picked up directly by the consumers through high crude oil prices? Will there be some special tax or levy operating outside the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or will the producing provinces be requested to pick up this $3.1 billion?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member must know, it is the intention, following the current oil pricing negotiations with the provinces, to phase out the oil subsidy policy over a period of time.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I compliment the parliamentary secretary for hearing what his Prime Minister said yesterday in the House. However, that does not answer the fundamental question on which the Prime Minister was forthcoming yesterday but today, for some reason, refuses to be.

Perhaps the Prime Minister can answer this question. I trust the Prime Minister realizes that phasing out this subsidy—as he indicated to the House yesterday was the intention of his government—means that there will be a price increase, in respect of crude oil, of at least $5 a barrel before any federal government, provincial government or industry needs are met, and it means that his campaign promise of keeping crude oil price increases at less than $4 this year and $4.50 for each of the next three years cannot be met.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to indicate or admit to the House that he will, in fact, be breaking that campaign promise, along with the promise made on February 10 in a CBC radio interview that he would maintain subsidies during the 1980s as was done during the 1970s?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, I do not know whether I can add very much to the answer I have already given.

An hon. Member: You weren't asked.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLaren: The fact is that the oil compensation program will be phased out over a period of time as part of the oil pricing negotiations that are now being conducted, and when conclusions are reached, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be reporting to the House.

Mr. Andre: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The parliamentary secretary keeps repeating what the Prime Minister said in the House. I am sure the Prime Minister recognizes that what we are looking for is additional information, because the consequences of what he said are quite profound on the people of Canada. Does he not believe he owes it to the people to explain what are the consequences?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask a question.

● (1120)

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, my question relates to an article by Jeff Carruthers, in this morning's Globe and Mail, that the government is planning a refinery gate tax to replace the excise tax, which will ensure that all users of petroleum, not just automobile users, will pick up the additional revenue requirements of the government.

Can the Prime Minister confirm that, in fact, his ministers are making these representations to the producing provinces for a refinery tax, which will ensure that not only drivers of cars with V-8 engines will pay an excise tax, but users of heating oil and those without automobiles will also pick up part of the cost of this needed government revenue?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated to the House on a number of occasions that a number of options are being explored. Neither the energy package nor the process for implementing it have been finalized.

The refinery gate tax proposal is, of course, one possible option; but until conclusions have been reached on the current negotiations there will be no decision on that particular option or, indeed, on a number of other options which have been raised during the course of discussions in the House.

PHASING OUT OF OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PAYMENTS—CONSULTATION WITH ATLANTIC PREMIERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I, too, wish to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the statement made by Premier John Buchanan of Nova Scotia that the gradual phasing out of oil import compensation payments, as announced by the Prime Minister yesterday, would be the death-knell for Nova Scotia's industrial base and, indeed, that of the whole Atlantic region, I would like to ask the Prime Minister: Was there any consultation with Premier Buchanan or any of the Atlantic premiers before this decision was taken, and is the government's stand irrevocable?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in response to a somewhat similar question by the hon. member the other evening, I indicated that the oil compensation scheme as it affects the Atlantic provinces was a subject of discussion during the minister's recent visit to the Atlantic provinces, and that the views of the provincial governments were being fully taken into account.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I hope the Prime Minister will answer my supplementary question, since it deals specifically with a statement made by him. Since the Prime Minister promised in Halifax on January 25, 1980, to establish a program designed to achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians, I would ask him this question. With what program will he replace the compensation payments, in order to relieve the financial shock on our people? Specifically, will he reintroduce the energy tax credit and the program to subsidize electricity generated from oil in the Atlantic region?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, again, as the minister has indicated on a number of occasions, the details of the current oil pricing discussions—which affect all the provinces, the producing and the consuming—are under current review. It would be inappropriate at this time to give details of possible options that are being considered.

PETRO-CANADA

EXPANSION OF OPERATIONS—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which bears directly on one of his campaign promises.

Mr. Nielsen: He's not answering any today, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: Having advocated that Petro-Canada have a maple leaf as its logo, distribute credit cards and change the name of its Pacific Petroleum stations to Petro-Canada, we in this party were delighted to learn that that company will be following through on these matters soon.

Considering that the Prime Minister promised, during the election campaign, that if elected his party and his government would take steps to expand the role of Petro-Canada, could he now tell the House more precisely what his government has in mind in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1125)

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I join with the hon. member opposite in welcoming the further evolution of Petro-Canada and the fulfilment of its commitment to develop its own identification in terms of the purchase agreement with Pacific Petroleum.

Any further evolution in the direction of additional retailing would be part of the normal corporate expansion of Petro-Canada, an expansion which we on this side of the House see as contributing toward the commitment we made to further Canadian ownership in the petroleum industry.

Mr. Broadbent: I had not realized, Madam Speaker, that we have a new Prime Minister in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Any change is for the better.

Mr. Broadbent: I hope the real Prime Minister will respond this time, because the answer we just received from the parliamentary secretary was completely at variance with the campaign commitment made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So what is new?

Mr. Broadbent: The answer we got from the parliamentary secretary was that the decision to expand, if that is to happen, is to be made by Petro-Canada alone. That is different from the Prime Minister's commitment, which was that it would be government policy to make sure there was an expansion.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government holds to its policy commitment to expand Petro-Canada; and, specifically, since all Canadians east of Thunder Bay in Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada, are denied the possibility of buying oil and gas from the company they own and control, will the Liberals expand Petro-Canada into those parts of our country?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member opposite will look at Hansard he will see that I, in fact, said that the possibilities of moving toward a greater degree of Canadian ownership in the oil industry in Canada will find expression partly through the expansion of Petro-Canada and partly through various incentives which will promote Canadian ownership in the industry.

As far as retailing in eastern Canada is concerned, we would look toward the possible involvement of Petro-Canada in that area as part of the normal corporate expansion of the company.

Mr. Broadbent: It is obviously Friday, Madam Speaker. Either the Prime Minister is suffering from some sedentary disease, or his miasma is bothering him—one or the other. I should like to put the question to the parliamentary secretary, because we are obviously going to get nothing from the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Since the only way Petro-Canada has got to the position it holds in our country is by buying out one of the pre-existing large firms, and since the Liberals were content to state that they wanted it to become No. 3 in the industry, while we wanted it to be No. 1—but since to choose either group requires buying out one of the multinationals—I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if the government will direct Petro-Canada to take immediate steps to buy out one of the multinationals as soon as possible. It could possibly begin with Petrofina, which has a modern refinery in the province of Quebec and has outlets in eastern Canada that could provide a real service to Canadians.

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the expansion of Petro-Canada has come about as a result of a number of initiatives, not merely the acquisition of a major, foreign-controlled corporation. The possibilities of further expansion have been underlined by the additional financing which this government has provided to Petro-Canada, and the possibilities of acquisition are, of course, always available.

Those possibilities, however, are of a commercially confidential nature, and any discussions that might be going on now or later would only be announced when they have been completed.

Oral Questions

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—CABINET MEMBERS WHO MAY HAVE BROKEN LAW

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister, or whichever parliamentary secretary he designates to answer.

In view of the statement of Mr. Justice David McDonald, which indicated his commission was going to make public the names of any cabinet ministers, Mounties or officials it considered had broken the law, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he or any parliamentary secretary has received any information from the commission with respect to any present cabinet minister who, in its opinion, has broken the law?

● (1130)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the McDonald commission has not yet issued its report; and that would be one of the matters that would be included in the report if, indeed, it is dealt with at all.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Kaplan: It would be by way of report. No findings have been made by the McDonald commission that have been brought privately to the attention of the government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, Mr. Justice McDonald has indicated that almost all the evidence involving possible offences has been made public, even the information heard in-camera—in private. I want to know whether the Prime Minister or the government—whoever the spokesman is this morning—is, in fact, conducting its own investigation with respect to the implication of charges being laid against any cabinet minister now sitting on the treasury benches.

Second, what is the position with respect to any cabinet minister whom the commission indicates has, in its opinion, broken the law? Is it the intention of this government to ask for the resignation of any such cabinet minister still sitting in the cabinet ranks?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, that is a very speculative question. As I indicated in my earlier answer, the commission has not yet made its report and no private report has been made by the commission.

My colleague, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General, indicated in the House recently that any action taken by the federal government would await the report of the McDonald commission, and that is the general position of the government.

NATIONAL SECURITY

STATUS OF CASE CONCERNING PROFESSOR HAMBLETON

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of the Officials Secrets Act charges that were pursued against Peter Treu, pursued against Peter Worthington, editor of The Toronto Sun, and almost pursued against myself as a member of this House, will the minister give the House all the reasons why the government has closed the case against Professor Hambleton, of Montreal, who confessed to a representative of The Ottawa Journal that he had been a KGB agent for 30 years and that he did it for kicks?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am very familiar with this matter. It is an operation known to the RCMP as Operation Red Pepper. The Department of Justice officials and law officers looked at all the matters that were uncovered by the RCMP that were made known to me, and there was nothing there that would form an adequate basis, in the opinion of justice officials, for a successful prosecution under the Officials Secrets Act. For that reason, no charges were laid under that act.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, in effect, the minister is saying that the work done by the RCMP, the many raids and seizures, was to no avail. May I say, in prefacing my supplementary, that it is inconsequential whether things were classified or unclassified, as the minister may want to put it.

Will the minister tell the House whether it is government policy to permit certain persons to cavort around with Soviet agents, give them material—and certainly the minister will admit that happened—and yet be completely free of any consequences, when they are actually working against the interests of this country? I ask, why does the government do that?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, first, there is a question as to whether any official secrets at all were obtained to be given to foreign governments. Second, there is a question of whether any of the information that was given, secret or not, was damaging to our country. Third, there is a general recognition in this House and elsewhere of some of the problems that we have had with the Official Secrets Act. The last three prosecutions under that act have been unsuccessful. The McDonald commission has recommended some changes to the act in the report that it put forward recently. Those recommendations are under consideration by the government.

It has already been indicated in this House that we propose to bring forward amendments to that act which will make it more effective. For all of those reasons, no action was taken in this matter. Canada is a free country, and anyone can talk to whomsoever they want and cavort with whomsoever they want without necessarily breaking any Canadian laws.

FISHERIES

CANADA-U.S. EAST COAST FISHERIES TREATY—EFFECT OF NON-RATIFICATION

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as it concerns the vitally important Canada-U.S. east coast fisheries treaty.

Can the minister inform this House whether or not the minister's American counterpart has been informed that the Canadian Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, without brandishing threats, has revealed that he may be forced to "turn loose" Canadian fishermen in the Georges Bank area next year if the U.S. Senate fails to ratify the treaty soon?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I think I should answer this question, because the quotes used in The Globe and Mail this morning were rather serious distortions of the answers I gave yesterday to the press in Halifax.

I indicated that if the treaty was not ratified, and therefore did not bind either side, then obviously we could not hold our fishermen to a percentage of the scallop fishery when the Americans were not holding back their own fishermen. Those were not threats; that is a reality.

Mr. Gass: I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Realizing that the minister has been quoted, or misquoted, in today's Globe and Mail as saying "fishermen are hard to control", I ask: is that a direct quote? Is it correct, or incorrect?

Can the minister explain to this House how, and under what conditions, Canadian fishermen will—quote or misquote— "be turned loose" in the Georges Bank area; and will this turning loose of Canadian fishermen lead to an abandonment of good conservation practices so that the Canadian effort will drastically outweigh the American fishing effort in the area?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, certainly, if I said that fishermen were sometimes difficult to control, I do not back away from a statement like that. I think all countries find that their own fishermen are pretty energetic when they are out there on the fishing ground, particularly the ones from the area in dispute. They are very good fishermen.

I do not remember saying, and I do not think it is a phrase I use in my vocabulary, "turning fishermen loose". I always very cautiously approach this area and this subject by using the expression that we cannot allow the increase of effort on the part of U.S. fishermen to put us in a position of having a sort of historical right if a new treaty or new arrangements have to be negotiated in case of non-ratification by the U.S. Senate. It is for that reason that we may have to redress the balance. But nobody wants to turn anybody loose and destroy the fishery: that is why we have kept our fishermen very much under strict conservation measures in the past few years.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES OF DEPARTMENT STORES AND OIL COMPANIES—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: He is not talking today.

Mr. Orlikow: Yesterday, the chartered banks prime lending rate was reduced to 13.75 per cent, with accompanying drops in consumer loan rates—a trend welcomed by most people. Yet organizations such as Visa, Master Charge, the department stores and the major oil companies—Shell, Gulf and Esso—are still planning to increase their annual interest rate charges to 24 per cent a year.

Will the government discuss with these companies this completely unwarranted policy, which will adversely affect tens of thousands of Canadians with whom they deal, and will the government urge these companies to stop what can only be described as a legalized form of loan-sharking?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, we have witnessed recently a number of very substantial reductions in interest rates. The particular problem which the hon. member has mentioned is one which I feel is likely to ease in the marketplace as soon as pressures on interest rates diminish, and it is clear that the service charges that banks and corporations levy on credit cards will also gradually diminish. Indeed, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is zealously watching over this matter, he is very much concerned about it, and he will certainly not fail to take steps to stop any possible abuse.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, a Visa spokesman is quoted today as saying that the decision to increase rates is made in terms of a six-month period, and they have no intention of reducing their rates. The cost of living is increasing at a rate of almost 10 per cent a year. Canadians who make a living through earnings wages and salaries are being urged to exercise restraint in their wage negotiations. Therefore, should not Canadians be able to expect that these powerful corporations whose profits are running at an all-time high should also show some restraint? Can we expect the government to make very strong representations to these companies to moderate the demands they are making on their customers?

• (1140)

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, naturally the intention of the government to continue fighting against inflationary pressures does not apply only to workers who want higher wages.

The example the government sets in restricting its expenditures and in its administration should be followed by everyone, especially by the big companies which are in a position, in some instances, to increase their profits. Of course all companies, whether in the banking, petroleum or other industrial sectors, are being asked to join in the efforts of the government as well as those of the workers in moderating their expectations and, in so doing, to help the fight against inflation so that in the not too distant future our economy might be healthier.

INDUSTRY

ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, if he could find his way to his seat. I notice the Prime Minister is able to talk to him, but not to answer to the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: In view of the fact that over 30,000 Canadians within the auto industry are now out of a job, or will be in the near future, and more lay-offs are still being contemplated even as of this weekend, can the minister tell us what specific action, other than the questionable financial aid package to Chrysler—who, by the way, as the minister knows, laid off another 1,400 people less than 48 hours after receiving the guarantees—or what direct action for the whole auto industry he and his government are taking at this moment in order to ease the over-all impact of these massive lay-offs in Ontario and across the country?

Is the minister, for example, considering the implementation of quotas on offshore imports of automobiles?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think that our efforts to help the auto industry and its workers have to be carried out in the context of the severe difficulties the industry is having in North America generally.

My hon. friend seems to ignore the reality that there are over 200,000 workers laid off in the United States. We are not talking about something that is simply a Canadian problem. We are working very actively to deal with the needs of the Canadian industry and the Canadian workers. We are going to begin, shortly, our consultations with the United States in order to try to achieve an operation of the auto pact which will be more satisfactory from the Canadian point of view. We are working to set up a special investment panel under the enterprise development fund to help the independent Canadian parts manufacturers.

With respect to the hon. member's specific question, we are examining the whole range of options. However, we want to be very careful we do not take a narrow, protectionist point of view that will hurt our export-based industries and threaten the jobs of a lot more workers.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, the government imposed quotas on textiles and shoes, yet there is only talk as far as the auto industry is concerned, and no action. In the absence of the Minister of Finance, I would like to put my supplementary question to the Minister of State responsible for finance.

Could the minister tell this House whether or not his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has requested the Minister of Finance or the department to consider implementing some much needed stimulative measures for the auto industry in Canada, such as temporarily removing the 9 per cent federal excise tax on North American-built vehicles, eliminating the extra $100 tax on auto air-conditioners, or any other measures which would give the auto industry a much needed stimulative boost? If the minister of trade has not shown an interest, would the minister, on behalf of the Minister of Finance, now be prepared to take such action?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is working strenuously on an industrial strategy. He has already proved, in the case of the Chrysler Corporation, just how willing he is to devote his energy and efforts to solving the problem in the automobile industry. Still, I should like to remind the hon. member that with regard to the very specific question he has put, the present government does not want to work in a field like that one, specially under the inspiration of the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in a piecemeal fashion, putting bits and pieces together in the hope of bringing temporary relief in the face of such a serious problem. Of course, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has held very serious discussions with the Minister of Finance on some of the steps that could be taken to help or support his industrial strategy, particularly in the automobile sector. Those measures are now being discussed and the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget, will announce what specific measures have been accepted.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

MEASURES TO PREVENT ABUSES OF PROGRAM

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I would like to address this question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am sure he will not be leery about answering it.

The minister was in the House on April 30, 1980, when the hon. member for Athabasca drew to his attention flagrant violations of the employment tax credit program. In view of the large number of false claims and errors made under the employment tax credit program during the past fiscal year, I would like to ask the minister what measures are being considered to prevent such abuses in the future.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the extension of the employment tax credit bill is presently before Parliament for decision. Until we are able to gain the co-operation of the hon. member and his colleagues in terms of passing that bill, we cannot implement any additional measures because, in fact, we do not have a decision in effect right now. When we gain that co-operation and get the bill into effect, we will be introducing measures to make sure there are none of the violations the hon. member talks about.

Mr. Stewart: In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, I will direct my supplementary question to the same minister. I would like to know if he is aware of a study being done now pertaining to the number of false claims and errors under the employment tax credit program; and when the study is completed, does he plan to table the report on it in the House?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, we have an evaluation of the program. There was an interim report several months ago when hon. members opposite were in government. We hope to have a final evaluation report in a matter of two or three months. I would certainly be prepared to make it available to members of this House.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

RENT INCREASES FOR APARTMENTS IN TORONTO

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works, who is also the minister responsible for housing. On two different occasions I have written to the minister on behalf of the 1,200 apartment dwellers who live in Main Square, metro Toronto—many of them senior citizens and handicapped persons—who were recently notified that they face a 12 per cent increase in their rent.

How can CMHC, the official landlord of this building, reconcile gouging these people by more than double the rent increase permitted most landlords under Ontario law?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I will take the question as notice. I have not been able to respond to the hon. member opposite with particulars thus far. CMHC, together with the provincial government through its housing corporation, is jointly involved in the project. I hope to have an answer which will be satisfactory within a short period of time.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister will also take notice of this supplementary. I am also sure the minister is aware that this scandalous increase will raise rents to unaffordable limits for most of these tenants. In addition, they are now being required to pay the first and last month's rent as soon as the leases come up for renewal.

● (1150)

Will the minister assure the House that he will intervene in this matter and rescind both of those actions by CMHC?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, of course, I cannot give that undertaking unequivocally. I will, however, take notice of the hon. member's request.

I would like to say that the obvious intention of the corporation is to try to bring some equity to its portfolio and to take rent to where it feels people can pay and to where it is justified. It would assist the corporation, for example, to respond to some of the hon. member's colleagues who have asked for assistance in other areas, for example, in non-profit housing.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST RETIREMENT AGE OF PILOTS BE EXTENDED

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that airline pilots employed by Air Canada must retire at age 60, yet the same pilots can be hired by the subsidiary company, Nordair, and continue employment until age 65, would the minister tell this House why the discrepancy in ages, and would he agree to take appropriate action by possibly extending the retirement age of Air Canada pilots to 65 provided they meet all the mental and physical health standards?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is fortunately, or unfortunately—I do not know which—no regulation on that subject on the books now: decisions are left to the initiative of the various companies. Some retire their pilots at 55, others at 66, others at 65. I really have no strong view this morning on that particular subject.

EMPLOYMENT

SHORTAGE OF CHICK SEXERS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO HATCHERIES

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the minister may know, it is very difficult to determine the sex of a chick; that is to say, a young chicken. This has created a major difficulty in the hatchery business in Canada and there have been attempts for over one year to resolve this situation through the department.

As there is an acute shortage of competent chick sexers, and as chick sex training is not done in Canada, is the minister prepared to give some relief to the hatcheries—and to the chickens?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, while I would have to say that this is not the most pressing crisis facing Canada, I am prepared to admit that there may be a shortage of chicken sexers in this country. As the hon. member knows, it is the policy of our government to make sure that Canadians have the first opportunity to obtain any jobs that are available.

If it is true that Canadians have not yet shown an aptitude or inclination to become chicken sexers, then I am quite prepared to investigate and to assist the hon. member in determining how we can attract chicken sexers from offshore. I hope the investigation will prove that in fact Canadians can open up a brand new line of work for themselves.

TRANSPORT

STUDY OF "AT AND EAST" FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Transport. It is the same question I would have asked him in Committee of the Whole when he had his officials with him. Could the minister inform the House whether he is planning to refer the "at and east" freight rates to a commission or a committee of inquiry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I did not catch the words before "freight rates".

Mr. Nielsen: It wouldn't make any difference anyway.

Mr. Jelinek: You wouldn't answer it in any case.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, by way of clarification for the minister, "at and east" freight rates are like the Crow freight rates in western Canada. Due to his commitment in this House to hon. members that he will study the Crow rate, would he make his intentions known as to the subsidy on the Atlantic and eastern grain and flour subsidy?

Mr. Pepin: That might be a good idea, Madam Speaker.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSALS TO EXPAND CANADIAN LUMBER MARKET IN MEXICO

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the current high levels of unemployment in the forest industry, particularly in the lumber and plywood sectors, which serve to re-emphasize the importance of diversifying our markets for these products, and considering that Mexico is, and will be, the recipient of massive inflows of capital due to large increases in the sale of oil—thus allowing for increased spending and catch-up in areas of social need such as housing—will the minister undertake to see that a Canadian trade delegation is sent to Mexico in the near future in order to seek open and expanded markets for Canadian lumber and plywood, in combination with a program to build demonstration homes in Mexico using Canadian lumber and construction crews to encourage interest and develop experience in frame construction and in Canadian lumber and plywood, similar to past experiences with regard to Japan which were certainly successful?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will certainly be encouraging the sending of delegations to Mexico to pursue these types of initiatives, and I will be working on this with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, who is responsible for forestry.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I think the minister will understand that it is important in these matters to get there the "firstest with the mostest". Will the minister now undertake to have this subject and the trade of Canadian lumber and plywood raised in negotiations with the Mexican delegation in Canada during this upcoming week?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I and the Minister of State for Trade will be having several working sessions with the Mexican delegation, and this is one of the subjects I will seek to have actively pursued.

COMMUNICATIONS

PROGRAMMING AVAILABLE FOR CANADIANS WITH HEARING HANDICAP

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. May I ask the minister what he is doing to increase the stock of programming available for the 1.5 million Canadians who are hearing handicapped?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I would like to tell him, in response, that the research sector of my department is aware of the problem. We are most interested in coming up with a captioning system for the hearing handicapped as soon as possible.

It is our feeling that the Telidon terminal system could be adapted and developed in such a manner as not only to use the spectrum for caption purposes, but also it could be used at the same time to provide additional services to the hearing handicapped which would go beyond the type of services provided by the American-developed Decoder which was done through the PBS in the United States.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that some 70 per cent of Canadians who are deaf are within range of American television signals, either off air or over the cable, where they would be able to have access to programming which is closed-captioned at the present time, and in view of the fact that some 25 hours per week of closed-captioned programming will be available from American sources before the end of this year, may I ask the minister what sort of time-frame he is looking at for getting the Telidon system onto the market?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, we hope to have the Telidon system developed as soon as possible. In the meantime, if there are American Decoders available to people who have impaired hearing problems in this country, we would not wish to stand in the way of their using the American system.

UNITED NATIONS

SPECIAL SESSION ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The United Nations shortly will hold a special session on international development.

I would like to ask the minister what steps the government is taking to prepare a government policy for this session, particularly with respect to the report of the Brandt commission. The Brandt commission was composed of a distinguished international assemblage including, among others, Edward Heath, the former British prime minister, Joe Morris, the former president of the Canadian Labour Congress, and Shridath Ramphal, the Commonwealth Secretary-General. It reported that the reshaping of worldwide north-south relations is crucial to the future of mankind. What role will that report play in the formulation of government policy?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the government's view of the Brandt report is that it is a very important document indeed, and we are devoting a great deal of attention to it.

As the hon. member will know, we have agreed to the setting up of a special committee of this House—I believe it has already been set up—which will look into the question of the north-south dialogue. We hope to have some advice from that special committee before the special session takes place. In the meantime, we are continuing work on it within the government.

Mr. Roche: Is it government policy to support the chief recommendation of the Brandt commission, that there be a summit conference of about 25 north and south world leaders on this critical question? Also, is it government policy to support the four emergency priority items cited by the Brandt commission, namely, an increase in resource transfers, an international energy strategy, an expanded food production program, and the reform of international financial institutions? Is it government policy to proceed on those two particular recommendations?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I do not at this time want to state what government policy will be with respect to the Brandt report, except to say that we are working with some other countries on the idea of a world conference.

GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I would rather have Motion No. 5 considered as the first item on the orders of the day.

Madam Speaker, yesterday I gave notice of two motions and after consultation I think there would be unanimous consent to accept at this stage those two motions without debate and without having to read them in full. The first one is very short however, and that notice was given following a request by my hon. colleague for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He also asked that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to receive and examine reports from official delegations. That notice of motion appears at page VIII of today's order paper and there is unanimous consent for that motion to go through without debate.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for granting that request. That is the understanding.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I join with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in thanking the government House leader for putting down this motion. It represents something that we have tried for many years to establish. It was started in the last Parliament, we are glad to have it now and we support the motion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF REPORTS FROM OFFICIAL CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to receive and examine reports from official Canadian Parliamentary delegations which have met with delegations from foreign Parliaments or attended inter-parliamentary meetings, and to report from time to time thereon.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That special committees of the House of Commons, each to be composed of seven members to be named at a later date, be appointed as follows:

(1) To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on Regulatory Reform to examine and report upon government regulation in order to minimize the burden on the private sector, including:

—the objectives, effectiveness and economic impact and expanding scope of such regulations;

—alternative techniques for achieving regulatory objectives;

—ways by which overlap of federal and provincial jurisdictions may be eliminated;

(2) To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on Alternative Energy and Oil Substitution to explore and report upon utilization of alternative energy sources such as "gasahol", liquefied coal, solar energy, methanol, wind and tidal power, biomass, and propane for heating oil and vehicles, with special attention paid to the feasibility, the impact on balance of payments and over-all economic desirability;

(3) To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on North-South Relations to examine and report upon the relationships between developed and developing countries in the areas of:

—Food, including production and distribution, food security and food aid; —Energy, including international co-operation to increase energy production, diversification of energy sources, energy assistance to the non-petroleum producing countries;

—Trade, including export earnings of developing countries, protectionism, market access, adjustment and employment;

—Payment balances, including recycling and deficit financing;

—Development issues, including official development assistance and assistance to the most poor and other such matters that are being negotiated in several international fora and to recommend practical and concrete steps that Canada can take to contribute to the success of these negotiations;

(4) To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on Critical Skills for the eighties to examine and report upon shortages in skilled trades and higher-skill occupations in Canada in view of economic development requirements in the 1980s and to recommend initiatives that the committee sees fit, to review existing federal policies and programs intended to deal with skill shortages and to seek the views of industrial, labour, voluntary, human resource and educational specialists in this matter;

(5) To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on the Disabled and the Handicapped to evaluate the scope and effectiveness of existing government programs for the disabled and handicapped, as well as the degree to which they interlock with voluntary programs and services, with the objective of suggesting measures to improve the quality of services provided to such persons, provided that the examination shall include the following subjects:

—fundamental and civil rights

—employment opportunities

—vocational training

—business incentives

—income supplement programs

—health services and medical rehabilitation

—quality of life of institutionalized persons

—community support services

—access to public buildings and services

—co-ordination within and between jurisdictions

—transportation

—housing;

That the committees shall have all of the powers given to standing committees by section (8) of standing order 65;

That the committees have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff as may be deemed necessary;

That the committees, their sub-committees and members of the committees have the power, when the committees deem it necessary, to adjourn or travel from place to place inside and outside Canada and that, when deemed necessary, the required staff accompany the committees, sub-committees or members of the committees, as the case may be;

That the provisions of sections (4) and (9) of Standing Order 65 be suspended, unless otherwise agreed to by a said committee, in application to the said committees; and

That, notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if the House is not sitting when an interim or final report of the committees is completed, the committees may make the said report public before it is laid before the House, but that, in any case each committee shall report to the House finally no later than December 19, 1980.

He said: The second motion, Madam Speaker, is the result of rather extensive consultations with my colleagues, the parliamentary leaders of both opposition parties. I just want to take this opportunity first to say that there is unanimous consent for that motion to be passed today and to thank them for the parliamentary spirit they showed during those discussions as well as their co-operation which enabled us to reach that agreement. Briefly, the purpose of this motion is to set up five small task forces which are intended to be action groups and are going to report in very short order, that is, on or before December 19, 1980. That is going to allow us to use the talents of hon. members in this House and is going to provide for the participation in particular of members from western Canada in the elaboration of policies relating to major questions. So, Madam Speaker, the purpose of this very long motion is to set up those five task forces that are going to be reporting to Parliament, and once again, I appreciate the co-operation of my colleagues which enabled us to reach that result.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, this is an important matter, notwithstanding the subject matter of the parliamentary task forces as they are described in the motion. What is important is that the government have agreed—I am glad they moved away from the position which was initially taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House—that these special committees, as they are called in the preamble, of the House of Commons will now, in fact, be under the rules of the House of Commons modified to fit the particular requirements of the task forces.

I think it is important that everyone in the House understand that they are to be parliamentary, and thus Parliament will not be bypassed. I am satisfied that the government House leader has exercised persuasion on his colleagues with respect to that, and on behalf of the House I want to thank him for that because I think it is quite important that the original concept of these committees be changed and that they now report to Parliament rather than to a minister. Ministers may, if they want, take the advice of the committees or they may reject it, but it is an indication that the House has made a breakthrough on something which started most unfortunately but has now ended fortunately.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the order of the day at the moment seems to be one of patting each other on the back. The government House leader thanks us on this side for having looked at this matter in a parliamentary way, but we must thank him for having seen the wisdom of the point that we were making and for having been able to persuade his colleagues of the validity of that position.

As has been pointed out, the original idea of the government was to have parliamentary task forces which would be responsible to a minister. We liked the idea of the task forces but we objected to their being handmaidens of the minister. We wanted them to be parliamentary committees and the government has come to that position. The motion is in a form of language which protects everyone's position and we are happy to see these task forces being set up.

We approve of their being given a time limit within which to report, and we also approve of the right of each committee, if it wishes to do so, to make public its report when its work is finished, even if Parliament is not sitting at that time. I believe it was also understood that, although there are just five parliamentary task forces set out in this motion, a sixth one is in prospect having to do with trade. It is awaiting the return of the minister concerned so that the terms of reference can be outlined. When a similar motion is made under that subject we shall agree to it as well.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: If I understand correctly, there is unanimous consent of the House to pass the motion introduced by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INCREASE OF ADVANCES TO CORPORATION

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses) moved:

That Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am happy to introduce in the House today Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Act, at the second reading stage.

This bill provides two ways to increase the loans of the bank to small businesses. First, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), with the approval of the governor in council, can authorize capital payments to the Federal Business Development Bank not exceeding $475 million, which represents an increase of $275 million over the usual capital ceiling of the bank.

● (1210)

Second, the ratio of the direct liabilities of the bank to its capital will rise from 10 to 12, with the provision that the governor in council can increase it up to 15. Mr. Speaker, this bill also contains a provision limiting the combined aggregate liabilities and capital of the bank to $3.2 billion, or $1 billion over the present statutory maximum authorized by the act.

This additional $1 billion in the lending power of the bank will be a sufficient temporary measure to allow the bank to fulfil its present mandate for about two more years. As I said in the House during the discussions on the bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, this legislation is temporary because the government is undertaking a complete review of all its financial support programs for small businesses. This review should be completed in about 12 to 16 months, and the government will then introduce more comprehensive policy proposals for the future role of the Federal Business Development Bank and other government assistance programs for small businesses.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the last Parliament the previous government had introduced legislation, Bill C-4, aiming at temporarily raising the bank's capitalization. This bill would have allowed the bank to raise from 10 to 12 the ratio of its total direct and contingent liabilities to its capital, with a clause allowing this ratio to be raised up to 15 times the capital. However, for obvious reasons, this bill died on the order paper. The bill I introduce today again proposes to raise the ratio, but more important still, it contains an additional clause to allow for injection of new capital in the bank. This provision aimed at increasing the capital of the bank reflects our government's concern to prevent the capital of the bank from becoming overly onerous, because of its composition, for their preferential customers, that is small enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Development Bank and its predecessor, the Industrial Development Bank, have played a major role in the government's financial programs to aid small businesses, and that goes back to 1944. The bill before us will enable the bank to continue filling its mandate of term lender to small businesses who cannot find elsewhere a loan at reasonable conditions.

[English]

At this time I should like to highlight some aspects of the bank's activities. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1980, the bank authorized over 16,000 new loans for a total of over $880 million, which is an increase of 36 per cent in the number of customers and 30 per cent in the dollar amount of gross authorizations over the previous fiscal year. At the end of fiscal year 1980, the bank had over 40,000 customers on its books and over $2 billion worth of loans outstanding.

As an indication of the bank's small business orientation, I should like to say that the average size of loan authorized in the latest fiscal year was in the order of $55,000. Furthermore, 90 per cent of the loans made by the bank are for amounts of $100,000 or less.

Also the bank provides financial support by making equity investments in small businesses when it is appropriate. At the end of the fiscal year 1980, the bank had investment commitments of approximately $40 million. Although the bank has been active in venture capital financing for only a few years, it is now the largest source of venture capital for small businesses in Canada.

The operations of the bank are national in scope with a network of over 100 offices across Canada and a staff of over 2,200 people. As well, officials of the bank regularly makes visits to many smaller centres, including those centres in remote regions of the country, to ensure that the programs and facilities of the bank are available to entrepreneurs located outside urban centres.

The bank is active in every province and territory. In 1979-1980, 9 per cent of the bank's loan authorizations were made in the Atlantic provinces, 23 per cent in the province of Quebec, 30 per cent in Ontario, 15 per cent in the prairie provinces, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and 23 per cent in British Columbia.

The bank provides financial assistance to small firms in a broad range of industrial sectors including manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade, tourism, agriculture, construction, rental properties, transportation and storage, and service industries. However, the major part of the bank's lending is concentrated in three main industrial sectors. For example, in the fiscal year 1979, loans to the wholesale and retail trade accounted for 34 per cent of the number of loans and 25 per cent of the amount lent. The tourism industry accounted for 20 per cent of loans in terms of number of loans and 24 per cent of the amount lent. For manufacturing, the comparable figures were 19 per cent and 24 per cent respectively.

FBDB loans are usually used to acquire land, buildings and/or equipment to strengthen a firm's working capital position, for the establishment of new businesses and for the acquisition of existing businesses.

[Translation]

Another proof of the bank's commitment to small business is that its financing terms are based on the particular needs of each client. In effect, this means the time frame and schedule of repayment are determined by the firm's circumstances. Also taken into account are profit potential, working capital requirements and useful life of the assets offered as security. The repayment schedule and instalments are determined according to the seasonal nature of some businesses. In addition, loans can be renegotiated where the borrower cannot meet the terms of the original loan agreement due to unforeseen financial problems. The repayment period can extend from one to 25 years, the average being in the vicinity of 8 years.

In addition to loan programs, the FBDB also has a whole gamut of managing services that are a significant part of its support to small businesses. The best known of the management services offered by the bank is CASE, the counselling assistance to small enterprises. The bank retains some 2,000 retired business men and women with impressive knowledge and experience of a wide spectrum of business activities. These counsellors use their experience and knowledge to help small entrepreneurs solve their management problems. Counselling assistance is usually given on the client's premises and extends over an average two days. The program's popularity can best be judged by the fact that the number of firms having received assistance over the three-year period ended with fiscal year 1979 trebled over. There were more than 10,000 consultations during fiscal 1979.

The bank also has available a series of training sessions that were used by some 25,000 business people last year. Finally, the bank offers information to entrepreneurs on every assistance program available at various levels of government.

• (1220)

[English]

For many years, Mr. Speaker, the Federal Business Development Bank has been a major part of the government's financial programs in support of small business. It is more than that. Through financial services in the form of direct loans, investments and management counselling, training and information services, the Federal Business Development Bank provides a wide variety of services for small businesses.

The bill before the House today provides for a recapitalization of the bank to allow it to continue with its financial activities in support of small businesses.

In concluding my remarks, I would again like to remind hon. members of the need to deal with this legislation as expeditiously as possible. The bank has committed the last of its funds it is empowered to raise under its existing authority. Unless legislative relief is forthcoming, the bank will have to curtail its lending activities somewhat. As I indicated earlier, this is only an interim measure sufficient to keep the bank operating for approximately two years, pending the outcome of the government's extensive review of small business financing. There will be ample opportunity for hon. members to review the role of the bank in depth when the government comes forward with its comprehensive proposals for small business financing.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is naturally with some regret that I find myself on this side of the House speaking to a bill which I found to be a very important and necessary bill when I enjoyed the office that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) currently holds. There will not be an excessive delay on the second reading debate on Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act, by my party. We would like to see second reading completed before we begin private members' hour today.

The minister closed his remarks by saying that Bill C-20 was an interim measure. He referred in his opening remarks to the former Bill C-4, which was tabled in the House during the previous Parliament. I remind hon. members that Bill C-20 is substantially different from Bill C-4 which was tabled in the previous Parliament. It is very obvious now that I was dealing with a very dedicated and deliberate president of the treasury board in that we placed great emphasis on the cash flow problems of the federal government. We were making truly, I think a magnificent effort to reduce the borrowing needs of the government.

We treated the increase in ratio of from one to ten to one to 12 as an expedient measure to cover the Federal Business Development Bank's needs for the next two years, rather than increasing the capital. I realized at the time that increasing the ratio from one to ten to one to 12 increased the cost of borrowing for the bank and that this meant its margin between cost of money and revenue received from lending money was greater. If my memory serves me correctly, their margin of burden on top of cost was something like 4.25 per cent.

To me the Federal Business Development Bank, as I am sure the minister will agree, is the federal government's front line of service to the small and medium enterprise community in Canada. When I had the opportunity to speak previously as the minister responsible for this area of activity in Canada, I pointed out that this area creates new jobs and delivers risk into the business sector. It is an organization that cannot stand on its own in the private sector. It needs government support because it is a lender of last resort.

The difficult thing with the Federal Business Development Bank is that it is asked to maintain a bottom line or a positive cash flow in its operations. At the same time we want it to fulfil that marginal area of risk out in the business sector.

The federal government delivers millions of dollars into the business community through DREE and other departmental programs, but in terms of serving the borrowers and businesses which are in this marginal area where there is a high degree of risk, and where normal and traditional lenders in the market place say no because of that risk, then the services of this bank come into play.

I mentioned that Bill C-20 is quite different from the Bill C-4 which was tabled in the last Parliament. The government is not only amending the ratios which the previous bill asked for—that is moving from one to ten to one to 12, with governor in council approval for moving from one to 15—it is also amending or asking for a substantial increase in the capital of the bank. I could not get that request through the last president of the treasury board. It is obvious that the present minister is a real soft touch and that the incumbent President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is a real pussycat.

If I were the president of the Federal Business Development Bank I, too, would be seeking exactly what the bill before us today proposes. The government seems to have abandoned totally, I guess as a result of February 18, any concern for Conservative principles in management of cash flow, management of debt and the ability to say no to anything. That is the situation with which we are dealing and that is perhaps why I find myself in a difficult position in this debate today.

However, being a believer in the democratic process, I must accept the wisdom and the will of the Canadian electorate and I will try to do the best I can as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to test the wisdom of this bill, while at the same time saying that I have great admiration and respect for the officers of the bank, the president of the bank, for the job which this bank performs in our community and for the problem which the Minister of State for Small Businesses has on his desk.

Bill C-20 moves the capital limit from $200 million to $475 million. I seriously question if that move of $275 million is responsible and whether it might even be necessary. Certainly as this bill moves into committee we will be asking for justification of that move of some $275 million in capital.

The key political issue, Mr. Speaker, that we have to deal with in this bill is that Parliament has to decide the degree of subsidy it is prepared to deliver to the Federal Business Development Bank whose mandate requires that it be the lender of last resort. That, again, is what we are dealing with in this bill, as we were in the previous Bill C-4.

The challenge of the bank lies in ensuring that it carries out its expected function at a profit, while taking risks that prudent lenders refuse. The bank also provides extensive educational services, as the minister mentioned in his speech, through its case studies and case counsellors, and delivery of services into regions not normally considered to have economic viability for the private and traditional marketplace lenders. Under its mandate it must therefore provide more services, while maintaining reasonable and stable lending rates.

It is incumbent upon each and every one of us to understand the difficulties that the president and managers of the bank have in working under its mandate, dealing at the perimeters of the marketplace and the market of risk.

The bank also, because of its market and the mandate we place on it, has to deal with and focus on small loans which have a higher percentage of carrying cost and administration cost than large loans. I think it is on record that its main competitor in term lending delivery is Roynat, whose average loan, I believe, is something like $320,000 to $330,000. A year ago the Federal Business Development Bank's average loan was in the order of $54,000, and today I believe it has slipped to $47,000. This is a high burden of cost that we have to acknowledge is within the management problem of the bank. We want that situation to exist, however, because that is a service to the marginal activities of the business community that we need.

The bank also has to operate in an environment of voyeurs or "peeping Toms", because the traditional market lenders are always concerned that the bank is stealing customers from them and is playing games with the matter of lender of last resort. The bank has, therefore, also built safeguards into its administration cost and burden, so that it is always in a position to explain or defend itself against that constant criticism that most members of Parliament receive when dealing with disgruntled applicants or borrowers from the Federal Business Development Bank. That is another burden it has to maintain in its management or explanation of its affairs when it deals politically with members of Parliament or ministers who have disgruntled constituents.

I have received a pile of letters and criticism from colleagues on this side and the other side of the House and from constituents at large in Canada regarding the bank's activities. There could have been a time in the bank's affairs when some of that criticism was justified. At large, however, it was my experience in the short time I was in office that the bank handles itself with a great deal of pride, respect and concern for the positions and conditions under which it has to operate in its mandate.

In most cases I know of where there is a criticism of attitude on the part of a regional manager, the senior officers of the bank will move with dispatch to obtain an explanation. I would say to all members of the House dealing in this political aspect of the bank's service that they have to remember there is another side to the story. There are always two sides to this type of argument and I would plead with them to get the other side of the story before making serious allegations, keeping in mind, of course, that it is our job to make sure the bank and its personnel operate as a government institution to serve that aspect of the marketplace.

Another burden that does not reflect in the earnings of the bank is the fact that the bank officers and counsellors will often go into applications that have been refused by traditional lenders and will put together a combination of factors to bring that application for a loan into a category of safety with the result that the traditional lenders then want it. The bank has to yield that burden of work to the traditional lender because it is a lender of last resort. That is a cost that we must keep in mind as we discuss this federal government service to the small and medium enterprise sector.

One of the problems that I do not think has been brought to light in the House is the high turnover of credit managers and staff at the bank. I think the bank has become a training ground, at high cost to its cash flow and overhead, for credit managers and managers for the traditional lending institutions in Canada. Maybe this is a good thing, but I sympathize with the problems it poses for senior management and the president of the bank.

As the minister is asking for such a large sum of capital in addition to the increased ratio, I think we should be moving in and considering—if we can do so at committee stage—lifting the president's salary to a point commensurate with the quality of the job he is doing for the bank. We should increase the salary ratio in order to keep senior officers of the bank so that the quality of delivery of service, considering the difficult management factors they have to deal with, which I believe I have explained fairly, is in place. I would urge the minister to take an initiative on this. Perhaps when we go into committee or even in the House, if he winds up this debate, he will confirm that the president's salary will be lifted and that the salary of senior people in the administration of the bank will be lifted to the point that we can offer the bank some stability in terms of staff.

I would not want to interfere too much with the bank being a training ground to upgrade the financial community at large. I think, however, that the market sector is very capable of doing most of its own training. I do not think we should be losing key personnel to it by default or by lagging behind the compensatory levels of the marketplace.

The front line of service that the bank offers the business community is its seminars. These are of good quality and are well received. They should be advertised so that more and more people from the small business sector attend. They have a nucleus of experience that can often avert tragedy and heartbreak brought about by risky enterprises. High quality educational material is published by the bank. The case counselling service is supplemented through the estimates, and this has been expanded. Some day soon we must examine the subsidy made to the case counselling service to satisfy ourselves that it is good value for the money. Personally I think it is.

The bank is moving into the hinterland in outer regions which the traditional lenders do not consider economically viable. It carries the small loans that have a high burden of administrative or initiative costs that other lenders do not want.

I am sure the bank is at a point of crisis today. It needs an expansion of its ceiling of last December. It has gone through a period of nine increases in interest rates over the last year, and has had to face an accelerated rate of bankruptcies. Again, if my memory serves me correctly, we were budgeting for something like 5,800 bankruptcies in Canada, and there was a reserve built in based on that projection. If the figure given to me orally is correct, the actual number has turned out to be around 8,000 bankruptcies.

So, the bank has had to move in with something like $29 million in write-offs—I hope that figure is correct—to cover bankruptcies that the bank had been carrying on its books in categories three and four, which are the categories of loans that have had to face postponement or have been put aside in the reserve with the hope that somehow or other the combination of factors could be put together to move them back to category two, then to category one and eventually be retired.

As we examine the changes and the reasons for the changes in the bank's conditions, which we will be doing in committee, Parliament will have to decide whether the bank is to work on a cost recovery basis or whether it is prepared to subsidize, on an annual average basis, a degree of marginal ventures. The review that the minister speaks of, and it is a very important exercise indeed, has to deal with this. We could perhaps start at committee stage to express concern and perhaps give some input to that aspect of this bill at that time.

I am told by its president that the bank since Bill C-4 has had additional factors to consider and deal with beyond those given to the previous minister of state responsible for the bank. A matching problem has shown up between borrowings and loans. The average term of loan outstanding with the Federal

Business Development Bank is eight years, while the roll-over in terms of the bank's debt to the Bank of Canada is on a five-year basis. The portfolios that it has inherited from the Industrial Development Bank it now claims were not properly matched, and this has been an additional burden of cost the bank has had to carry and that has come to light within the last half year. This has cost the bank considerably in light of the nine increases in interest rates over the last year.

I can remember—going back to the Thirtieth Parliament and to the then Bill C-16, the borrowers depositors act, the one where we started to monkey around with the terms of medium and long-range loans—cautioning the House at that time about this aspect, and my caution subsequently turned out to be right, because the bill was withdrawn. Any time we are dealing with legislation interfering with the term of loans, this is something that we have to be cognizant of, and I think the problem that the bank has is proof of the accuracy of that claim made during the debate on the former Bill C-16.

As a member coming from the private sector I often look at FBDB as my window on the banking community and its problems, in the same way that some of us in the House see Petro-Canada as a window on energy industry.

I am also told that the $100 million increase in capital requested of the last government by the bank did not take into account the venture capital program, and that the venture capital program requires equity because equity should be invested in equity situations. The bank should not be borrowing and creating debt to invest in equity situations. I agree totally with that fundamental principle.

There is justification for some increase over the $100 million that it was seeking in terms of increased capital so that it could remain within an 8 to 1 debt-loan ratio, and there is some $75 million of legitimate request in this increase in capital that the minister is asking for. I will remind members again that the minister is asking for an increase in capital of $275 million in addition to a widening of the ratio of from one to ten to one to 12. In this bill the minister is asking for everything one could imagine in terms of expansion. The only thing that saves me from blowing my eyebrows is that there still remains a cap in the bill of $3.2 million in terms of outstanding loans.

I am told the venture capital equity demands on the bank to March 31, 1981, is $50 million and that its budget requires an additional $25 million to build up its venture or equity lending for the next two and a half years. Therefore, I can substantiate $75 million of the minister's request in this bill in that area.

The former president of the treasury board had imposed an attitude of total restraint on his colleagues in cabinet and on presidents of Crown corporations, such as the Federal Business Development Bank. Although it was an option at that time that we increase the capital by $100 million, the general policy of restraint that we were under moved us over from increasing the capital into increasing the ratio from one to ten to one to 12. I do not know what the situation is, but I think the bank faced very serious problems as we went through nine increases in interest rates, and because its matchings were not in balance added to its cash flow problem and burden. Now that we have a rapidly decelerating interest rate in the marketplace, I would think that loan authorizations to loan lendings would accelerate. Cancellations of approvals through March and April of this year have allowed the bank to still service loans. The high cancellation rate again has added to the bank's administrative burden per loan outstanding. I would think that it is now facing the situation whereby the approvals of applications and the actual delivery of loans would start to accelerate with the new interest rates that are coming into place on the market.

I appreciate that the minister and the president of the bank have time-frames whereby we should be delivering this bill and this authority to them. However, I am wondering if those matching problems they faced as interest rates went up are now offset as interest rates come down. I think we would want to examine that aspect in committee.

One other aspect of the bank's problem, and particularly in a period of rising rates, could be resolved if we had a look in committee at the floating rate principle, and I would put on notice now that I think members should be questioning the minister not only on a floating rate as it would apply to the administration of the bank, but a floating rate as a possible benefit to the bank's borrowers, keeping in mind some of the other problems that the bank faced which I believe I have outlined today.

The cost of money to the bank is an important issue we should be examining in the committee and that members should consider. I understand that since 1975 the average ratio has been eight to one and that the cost of money for the bank fits into that framework. I am not sure that I remember the exact figure of its major competitor in the term lending field, but I think it was operating at a seven to one ratio.

If we accept what the minister has given to us in Bill C-20 with capitalization moving from $200 million to $475 million against a cap on loans of $3.2 million, we find that the bank is trying to move down to a ratio of seven to one so that it can match its cost of money to its major competitor in the marketplace. That cap would be good for about two years of operation, I understand.

I have examined the figures. I see the $75 million of equity required for the next two and a half years for venture capital programs. I see $30 million needed to cover the bankruptcies that it will have to write off in categories three and four. I expect that is a normal degree of risk for a lender of last resort. If we put in $100 million of capital for loans, my arithmetic tells me that would yield an eight to one ratio for the bank which has been their average since 1975. With that rule-of-thumb arithmetic, I would just ask the minister why we have to amend section 31 and increase the ratio from one to ten to one to 12. Why do we not go for a $200 million or $205 million increase on the 200? Would he explain why we need that extra $70 million of capital?

It is important that members understand that he is not asking for cash out of treasury in moving from 200 to 475. What he is asking for and what the bank is asking for is a cancellation of debt to the Government of Canada. This brings us into the whole debate of cancelling debt of Crown corporations and playing games with the balance sheet of Canada. I want hon. members to be fully cognizant of what we are doing here. There is an effect to the balance sheet of Canada.

Perhaps I am too old-fashioned in my education and conservative way of managing things that have to do with dollars and cash flow, but I get a little disturbed when we start playing games here that the tax collector does not allow in the marketplace. I would like to see that addressed in the minister's reply or at least when we go to committee.

I must say it is not easy for a person schooled and brought up during the depression, working hard and saving every dollar of earnings you can to have a dollar of capital in order to invest and risk in the marketplace, to stand as a responsible member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition on this bill. I think the minister has gone too far. He has asked for more than he needs. I think we should bring the bill back to an increase of $200 million in capital and leave the ratio where it is, at one to ten. I put it on record that I would like answers to that in the wind-up speech or in committee.

We have a review coming up that I believe the minister said would be available in something like 16 months. I would think that review could probably be brought ahead, but if 16 months is what is needed, that is fine. We should also be acquainted with some of the interim reports of that review, so that we do not get it in one overpowering bundle in terms of any sincere reaction to or criticism of it. As I was starting to say, trying to be a constructive critic schooled in conservative management principles in terms of cash flow, I am trying to be as gentle as I can in saying to the minister that I think the bill is excessive.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat something I have been saying over and over again on the political platform. I guess it is one of the reasons why I stood as a person from the small business community carrying a sense of anger and frustration at what was happening to my tax dollar. Most Canadians do not object to paying taxes in a land like this. I do not object personally. I will even work to encourage a fair share distribution of the wealth of this country.

Where I differ with the progress being made by this government or the approach to that of this government is that they, through the process and bureaucracy of government, are setting taxation levels that are too high for an incentive to remain for the risk-takers in the market place. When that happened all down through history, we have seen the entrepreneurs of countries leave or fall back and rest. We cannot address the problems of this country if we smother the initiative and energy of the entrepreneurs and risk-takers in the business community. The cash flow problems of the treasury are going to mount and accelerate in relation to the degree with which we pull incentives out of the business sector. I am not saying anything new. Every civilization has gone through this cycle, but part and parcel of the dilemma that we are facing in this Parliament is in that destruction of incentives.

As we came through the last election, one of the things I found repeated often by very responsible, intelligent people was that they did not object to the tax or the proposed 18 cent increase on a gallon of gasoline, which was a big election issue. They did not object to that per se as much as they objected to the way the tax revenue is spent, the reckless arrogance and waste of the energy and sweat that goes into producing and delivering a dollar of tax into this treasury.

If we are to create excitement and the creation of wealth in this country, and if we are to keep that level of excitement high, for goodness sake stop the extravagance. Bill C-20 asks for the moon. It asks for more than the bank needs at this point in time, particularly as a very important review is in place. I suggest we start right here in this Parliament, bring this bill back and give the bank what it needs to function properly, but let us not overdo it.

I hope that this second reading debate can be completed before private members' hour today and I look forward to the challenge and the discussion in committee on this bill. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock the motion for second reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act, was under consideration. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) had the floor, but I understand that he has completed his speech.

Mr. Huntington: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I therefore recognize the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise this afternoon in the debate on Bill C-20, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act. I listened very carefully and enjoyed the comments made by the minister detailing the perceived benefits of the act and how it has been very, very helpful to small businessmen in Canada from one end to the other. I am pleased to know that its benefits were distributed relatively equally across this country.

I also listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). His comments covered many of the specifics of the bill and focused on the amending ratios, the increase in capitalization being provided for the bank and the concept of debt cancellation which has been involved. Since he went through those specifics, I will restrict my comments to items other than those in an effort to ensure that his bill receives speedy passage and that we get it into committee and deal with it at the earliest opportunity.

I recognize that the Federal Business Development Bank is really a lender of last resort. What it does, in my mind, is indicate a very important and crucial trend which has developed in Canadian economics in the last number of years. I want to focus some of my comments this afternoon on that trend. I suspect that many members of the House are not aware of what the importance of this bill indicates to us here and to Canadians generally.

I was both surprised and, I suppose, somewhat alarmed at the comments made by the hon. member for Capilano. I was surprised at his recognition of the role that the federal government is playing in the private enterprise sector and that he should extol the benefits of this development bank. I was somewhat alarmed not at the comments he was making but at the fact that his comments were so accurate in that the reason we are discussing this bill this afternoon is partly because of the failure of our financial institutions in this country.

I want to take a moment to put this discussion into context by suggesting that during the 1950s, 1960s and perhaps even the early 1970s there was a sense of economic optimism about the land. People saw an endless range of opportunities for those with entrepreneurial interests and instincts. Canada was a very worth-while place in which to be investing. Education at our colleges and universities across the country virtually guaranteed employment in the career or profession of one's choosing. Training of one kind or another in the occupational sector virtually guaranteed a job, increasing employment opportunities were found across Canada, and, of course, this very positive climate manifested itself in an increasing willingness of people to get involved in the business sector, and particularly for the small entrepreneur, the small businessman, to become involved in an enterprise where he or she was eventually his or her own boss.

I would be surprised if there were many members in the House representing all parts of Canada who have not at one time or other been involved or have wanted to be involved in business, who had a dream, an aspiration to take that initiative and assist in the development of our fine country. During the period of the 1950s, 1960s and early 1970s, funding for ventures was available, new ideas were encouraged and nurtured, risks were relatively minimal and so were failures.

However, unfortunately the experiences of the 1970s have essentially systematically destroyed this optimism. There is an increasing air of uncertainty in our country today, a feeling that our future will not necessarily be a better one, that the world of the 1980s and 1990s will not necessarily be better than the world we have in Canada today. Obviously confidence has been reduced.

This has led to increasing risks to many small businessmen and small entrepreneurs. Here are individuals who are experiencing at this time shortages in capital, expertise and information data, recognizing daily the growing imperfections in the marketplace. Indeed it is a time of transition, a time when our economy is experiencing a transformation. Small has now become rather precarious, small has become rather uncertain and small has certainly become risky. To survive in Canada today as an entrepreneur it is certainly in your favour to be very big to survive, let alone to grow. In order to have access to more capital, to have access to resources, to manpower and to information, you must be big.

I suggest that large companies have achieved today a significant advantage in our system. Probably this advantage is most clearly demonstrated in our taxation system. Not so much in our rates of taxation, but when you examine the taxes paid by the large corporations and those paid by our small business companies you see a substantial difference, which indicates clearly that the large companies have a significant advantage.

I suggest that this points to an inherent contradiction today in our economic system. Today we possess essentially a certain image of tens of thousands of small businesses across the country—and indeed they are there—accounting for something in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent of Canada's employment. Yet when you examine the situation carefully it becomes obvious that power lies with the large corporation, that power lies with the large multinational corporation. We have today a situation where Canadians possess an illusion, an impression, of an economy dominated by small entrepreneurs and small businessmen.

Of course, we extol the virtues of the small businessman, the small community and the small town. We say that small is best, that small is easy to comprehend, yet this is inconsistent with the realities of the 1980s. Today small business is being excluded from the marketplace. One of the most obvious examples of this is where small business is being excluded from the traditional sources of funding. Banks are becoming increasingly hesitant to lend to the small, higher risk entrepreneur. Banks, the traditional lending institutions, desiring more and more security, find that security in the large company incorporation.

Just yesterday in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, representatives of Canada's banks indicated that banks were not prepared to finance small livestock processors unless those processors could use someone else's property for collateral. To me it indicates the extent to which the traditional funding institutions are going in this country. How many of us in this chamber are able to go into a bank and use someone else's property as collateral, as the banks demand? That is what the banks were demanding in committee yesterday in an effort to finance the livestock processor, packing plants and so on. It is too risky for the chartered banks so therefore they are prepared to cut off their funding.

Due to this elimination of funds, a financial crisis has emerged and is continuing to emerge in Canada. During these years when, goodness knows, we need Canadian investors, when we need to encourage new ideas in the economic sector, when we need to nurture new approaches and ask for new methods and techniques, the traditional funding sources are being reduced or eliminated.

So it begs the question: Who comes to the rescue during these times? Indeed, who comes to the rescue are the provincial and federal governments of Canada. I ask members to reflect on that, particularly those who have been here for some years, and to ask how many programs the federal government had in the 1950s to assist the small businessman and small entrepreneur. Probably one could count those programs on one hand. Yet today as we begin the 1980s, if one were to examine carefully the variety of programs available to the small investor and small businessman, one would find in excess of 400 federal programs, let alone programs in the provincial sector providing encouragement and support to small businessmen. On my desk the other day was a notice from British Columbia listing support of the small business sector through assistance to the small enterprise program. There were pages and pages of small businesses, some manufacturing utility trailers, others manufacturing mobile homes, others manufacturing hydraulic components, people prepared to try new ideas and to take a leadership role in developing Canada's economy.

As the hon. member for Capilano indicated, the private sector interested in venture capital, interested in risk capital, must now look to government, not to the chartered banks of Canada, the traditional lending institutions. The $3.5 billion of capital in our Federal Business Development Bank to be made available to small business demonstrates a failure in our financial capital markets. It demonstrates a failure in our chartered banks, in our trust companies and in our sales finance companies, to provide much needed risk venture capital to the small entrepreneur.

A few days ago we heard discussed in this chamber credit unions and caisses populaires in the province of Quebec which have received a considerable impetus in the last decade and have experienced considerable growth. I would suggest that one of the reasons for their success and their tremendous growth in the last decade has been the fact that since they do not lend to corporations, they are essentially providing funding to the single proprietorships, the single businessmen, to the partnerships, to enable this much needed risk capital to enter our economy.

In the end, the private financial sector is failing. It is letting Canadians down at a time when creativity and innovation is necessary, at a time when the frontiersmen of our business community must be opening up new territories to meet the challenges of the 1980s and 1990s. Because traditional funding is too risky, it is not available and the private sector must now depend upon institutions such as the Federal Business Development Bank.

We support Bill C-20, and at the same time we recognize the glaring failure of our chartered banks. We recognize that Bill C-20 provides an opportunity for the federal government now to step in and provide that leadership, for the federal government to step in and rekindle that spirit, to provide those new options, and to put Canadians back to work.

I want to end my short discussion this afternoon by suggesting as a new member of Parliament that I feel, in considering legislation such as Bill C-20, we are called upon to make decisions without having adequate information. A number of questions ought to be posed. I should like to pose just a few of them for the hon. minister to reflect upon perhaps in his response later this afternoon or to examine when we get into committee.

Why has the FBDB lost money over the past year? What are the real reasons behind that loss? Is there a clear concept of the purpose and the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank? Why was the staff turnover in this past year so vast? When the bank is losing money as it is, why is it going ahead with spending an additional $35 million or considering a new head office? Has there been a comprehensive review of the bank's operations, focusing on such things as the bank's borrowing policies in terms of its sources of capital? Have the bank's lending practices been examined adequately? What is the expertise of the bank's personnel?

Just so that I am not misunderstood, I concur with the comment of the hon. member for Capilano when he recognized the commitment and ambition of those responsible for the bank and the efforts they have made. I might add that these efforts were very positive. I want to emphasize the fact that they have a staff in excess of 2,000 across the country, and perhaps most important of all, they provide that much-needed management advice, introducing management skills to so many of those people who are interested in beginning business ventures. The expertise and the quality of the people they have providing that service must be commended. Looking at perhaps some of the crucial personnel within the bank itself, are we confident that the necessary expertise and background is always in the right place at the right time? I recognize that these are very difficult questions, but nevertheless they are questions that must be addressed.

In closing, I must say that our party certainly supports this bill. In a sense we feel that it is a shame the traditional financial institutions have essentially let us down in terms of providing much-needed venture capital. I am pleased to see that in fact the federal government is leading the way through this expanded bill.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make some remarks during this debate on Bill C-20, an act to amend the Federal Development Bank Act. This morning, my colleague the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) already expounded to hon. members the details and the main objective of this bill. He also released some details regarding the activities of the bank.

During the period of time allotted to me I intend to stress the role of the bank in the development of the short-term loan market for small and medium-size businesses in Canada and to add some observations to the remarks made by the minister regarding other activities of the bank in the field of management.

Mr. Speaker, as we all know the Federal Business Development Bank was created in October, 1974, to succeed the Industrial Development Bank which was founded in 1944. I think that when we created the FBDB we brought it closer to its customers. It acted like the Industrial Development Bank which had been a pioneer in the field of term loans in Canada. The success of both institutions was to a very large extent an important factor in building and expanding a term loan market for small businesses, as I said earlier, not by a governmental or public institution, but by a number of financial institutions of the private sector.

Actually, a great many customers of many of these private loan companies are former employees and customers of the bank whose businesses achieved viability thanks, in many cases, to the support of the FBDB or its predecessor. Although it is rather easy to determine the activities of the bank which will directly assist small businesses, and I will speak briefly about it in a few minutes, it is almost impossible to measure the real contribution of the bank as far as the development of private loan services for small businesses is concerned. I would like to point out that often disregarded substantial contribution of the bank to private financial institutions which, as you know, represent the most important source of loans to small businesses. It is an indication of the government commitment to co-operate with financial circles and other groups and individuals so as to initiate steps to help small businesses. This should reassure the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) who this morning was concerned about the growing presence of the government or governmental banking institutions in the economic system.

[English]

While there have been positive and constructive developments in private financial markets, the Federal Business Development Bank continues to play an active and innovative role in the provision of financing to small businesses. For example, in recent years the bank has made private lenders aware that it is prepared to consider joint or co-financing arrangements on loan proposals which the private lender, for one reason or another, is not prepared to finance entirely on its own. Thus, I commend the banks for this initiative to develop and expand the small business term-lending market in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the past five years ending March 31, 1980, the Federal Business Development Bank has lent almost $3 billion to more than 55,000 small businesses in Canada. In addition, since its establishment, over 75 per cent of the loans granted by the bank are for amounts up to $50,000 and this indicates its attitude towards small businesses. To show how much it is aware of the needs of small businesses, the bank has decentralized its loan activities to an appreciable extent.

• (1430)

Most loans are now approved by regional branches or offices, which also considerably shortens the time necessary to process the applications and advise the applicants of the decisions. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, my own constituency benefited from this decentralization a few years ago, which has made the Federal Business Development Bank more accessible.

The branch of the FBDB in Valleyfield, where I live, serves the counties of Beauharnois, Châteauguay, Huntingdon, Vaudreuil and Soulanges. This branch, as far as I know, has been in existence since November, 1976. Whoever considers the evolution of its operations realizes the interests of its customers. As of March 31, 1979, the Valleyfield branch had 152 stores, individuals and firms as customers with a total commitment of $8.2 million. One year later, it had 201 customers with a total commitment of $12.9 million. For the information of hon. members, I should add that during the 12-month period ended March 31, 1980, there were 109 loans authorized amounting to $7.3 million. The average loan for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1980, is $67,000, which means that, fundamentally and in practice, the branch of the Federal Business Development Bank which serves our area really helps small business.

Once again, in an effort to allay the fears of the hon. member for Capilano the rate of penetration of that branch in our region is 6 per cent, which means that only 6 per cent of the businesses probably cannot find the financing needed from ordinary or conventional banks, that only 6 per cent of the 2,549 businesses in our area are served by the bank, but at least those people are helping the economy in our part of the country. I feel it is desirable, not only that the Federal Business Development Bank should continue its slow but sure assistance, but that it should be helped to do even more, and offer more and better services, and even perhaps continue to offer risk capital.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back to more general considerations, during the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1979, I would say that over 40 per cent of all loans granted by the Federal Business Development Bank were used for capital expenditures including land, buildings and equipment. Small businesses are also trying to get assistance from the bank to increase their working capital. Proper financing of the working capital can be a particularly important element of business especially these days when high interest rates are for the small business that is growing rapidly. The bank also grants loans to facilitate changes of ownership, which period is often a difficult one in the evolution, progress or development of a business. Changing owners can also mean adding a new one at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with another important activity of the bank, namely, management services for small business. To that end, I shall start with the conclusions of the study on the financial problems of small businesses, which was made before the Federal Business Development Bank was set up, and which revealed that one of the big problems of small businessmen is that of management aptitudes or talents. To meet that need the responsibilities of the Federal Business Development Bank were expanded in order to offer small business management services in addition to financial services.

So those management services include consultation, training and information services. Some of them were started by the Industrial Development Bank itself within the framework of its normal activities in the small business area which expanded following actions taken on an ad hoc rather than a planned basis. However, with the establishment of the Federal Business Development Bank, those activities became a statutory responsibility of the bank, and they were considerably expanded later. Consultation services are offered through CASE the Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises program. Under this program the bank hires retired managers as advisers to help small businessmen solve their management problems for a minimal fee.

The advisers are selected for their competence, their experience in the area in which the customer company operates. The bank can presently call upon about 2,000 advisers for a wide choice of assignments. In the fiscal year 1980, the bank completed more than 14,000 assignments. The program was well received and it is highly regarded. It is interesting to note that the majority of CASE customers do not borrow money from the bank. In other words, the service is also extended to those whose financial position is already fairly secure.

The second part of the bank's management services deals with the promotion of sound management practices for owners or managers of small businesses through management training. It is one thing to help someone set up the management of his business by way of a temporary program, but without the possibility of sharpening the business acumen of his staff the program falls short of the stated objective. Therefore, the bank offers training by way of courses, seminars and other meetings. During the 1980 fiscal year, more than 25,000 businessmen have attended approximately 1,700 seminars held by the bank on matters relating to commercialization, taxation, bookkeeping and cost control. In the framework of its management training, the bank has also developed a number of 30-hour courses which it offers to provincial and territorial authorities in charge of education. This material is used to train adults in community colleges and elsewhere and is also meant for people in charge of small businesses or those who intend to go into business for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, the third part of the bank's management services consists of giving information with respect to business support programs at all levels of government. This objective has been met through the setting up of new branches in rural areas across the country. Last year, bank offices were responsible for more than 90,000 client contacts. The bank also publishes a series of brochures on business management entitled "Minding Your Own Business" as well as a quarterly bulletin "Small Business News", and also makes available a lot of information on specialized services from various other departments and in particular the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. These publications deal with matters of interest to small business and have an extensive distribution. Moreover, each of the bank's offices houses a reference library allowing small business to have easy access to works of interest.

[English]

The Federal Business Development Bank is a major part of the government's financial support program for small business. Its leadership and innovation has contributed significantly to the development of the private term lending market in Canada for small businesses. But the bank is much more than that. In addition to its financial services, the bank provides, as I said previously, a wide range of management services in support of small businesses.

The breadth of the bank mandate is a reflection of the government's commitment of support to a viable and growing small business sector. The bill in front of us is a clear indication of the government's direction in this area, the right direction. I take great pleasure in supporting this piece of legislation.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to speak in favour of Bill C-20, to increase the lending ability of the Federal Business Development Bank. This is my first speech in this House, and I would ask for your indulgence and that of hon. members opposite while I place on the record some of the traditional remarks which a member makes on the occasion of his first speech. I can assure this House that they will be brief and that I will then go on to discuss the bill before us.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to carry my congratulations to Madam Speaker on her appointment. I feel that it is an honour that she richly deserves and I am sure that she will acquit herself in the chair with dignity and fairness, the same dignity and fairness which we have come to expect from the Speakers of this House.

It is an honour and a privilege for me to represent the riding of Simcoe North. For several years my riding was represented by Dr. Philip Bernard Rynard, and his service on behalf of his constituents is a legend in my riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: His service to this House is also well known because of his lifelong interest in health and welfare. He has left his mark in Parliament, as he has on the riding of Simcoe North.

Following in his footsteps is quite a challenge, and I welcome that challenge. I know that this House will be saddened to hear that Dr. Rynard suffered a stroke the day before he was to campaign for me in the last election, but he continues to progress and has recently left hospital. I am sure that this House joins with me in wishing him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The riding of Simcoe North is as diverse as this nation. The townships of Mara, Rama, Orillia, Oro, Medonte, Matchedash, Tay and Tiny are rich in farmland, forest and water, but richest of all in people. The city of Orillia and towns of Midland and Penetanguishene are strong and vibrant parts of the riding. The riding contains people from English and French background strengthened by immigrants from many lands. The economy of Simcoe North is mixed and that is its strength.

Simcoe North riding is comprised of farmers, skilled tradesmen, entrepreneurs, tourist operators, store owners, professionals, civil servants and retired people, all of whom rub shoulders throughout the riding. I have lived in Simcoe North since 1969. We have known triumphs there and some tragedies, but we have come to know that Simcoe North is a riding rich in people who are Canadian every day of their lives.

Now I would like to turn to Bill C-20. The role of the Federal Business Development Bank in financing Canadian small businesses is well known to this House. Its role in counselling small business through its branches and seminars, which it carries on throughout the country, is important to the concept of helping small business to develop in Canada and entrepreneurs to develop management skills. The provision of management consulting services to small business is also important because small business often cannot afford to hire this expertise on its own and which the Federal Business Development Bank makes available at a reasonable rate.

I am pleased to learn that the bank is continuing to take an active part in financing businesses engaged in manufacturing and tourism in Canada, particularly in Ontario. I note that in the nine months ending December 31, 1979, the number of loans in Ontario increased 58 per cent and that their value increased 61 per cent compared to the same period last year. We need such loans. We need the bank activity to foster continued growth in the province of Ontario. We intend to go on maintaining our position as the cornerstone of confederation by manufacturing, employing people, and by good, old-fashioned hard work in the province of Ontario.

It is not my intention to fill the record with a litany of facts and figures designed to prove that my research is equal to that of the minister's or other hon. members. The minister brought forward the facts and figures quite adequately. My colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), reviewed them and I think we have enough statistics on the record.

We are sent to Parliament to represent the views of our constituents. I wish to place on the record some concerns which I feel adequately reflect the viewpoint of the people of Simcoe North, particularly small business, with respect to the Federal Business Development Bank and this particular amendment. I want to talk about what happens to the money after the bank receives it. I want to touch upon the bank's role as a lender of last resort, the image that the bank has with small business, the cost of completing a loan, branch discretion limit, what I call the approval-disapproval time lag, and the availability of branches.

It could be suggested that these are matters for committee, but I feel that they are important to the public and small business and that they should be brought forward in this House. I feel comfortable discussing the bill from the standpoint of the borrower, perhaps more so than I do from the standpoint of the bank, because I was often, if not in the borrower's shoes, in the shoes beside the borrower as either a chartered accountant or a lawyer. So the loans, guarantees, financial statements, collateral security and related problems are not unknown to me.

I would also point out that my comments are not the result of dissatisfaction with any particular branch; I think they reflect somewhat the feelings of the public. The small businessman feels that the Federal Business Development Bank should be a lender of last resort. The bank makes that claim. The chartered banks, trust companies and other financial institutions make a profit and report to their shareholders. The FBDB is viewed as a branch of government which has as its principle the provision of assistance to small businessmen who do not qualify for loans with chartered banks or other such institutions because he may have a lack of business experience on equity, or he has an unstable market, a new product or any of the other reasons which would make the ordinary bank on the corner nervous. That is how the general public views the FBDB.

The general public expects the FBDB to take a higher risk than the chartered bank. I believe the public feels that the bank should have a higher bad debt ratio than a chartered bank. It is expected to lose money. Perhaps that is a strange thing to say, but we must understand that the FBDB must take those risks and lose money in some cases.

It must also have a normal percentage of interest to cover its operating profits. The social and economic profit of this institution to Canada does not show on a profit and loss statement, but it is there in the form of thousands and thousands of successful small businesses in Canada.

I disagree with the comments of my colleague on my left. I think small business enjoys the challenge of doing business in Canada. As a record of that I point to the many thousands of people who leave the comfort of large business to go into small business.

I suggest to my colleague to my left that the banks have not failed small business as he suggested. The banks do lose money on some loans. If the chartered banks had no bad debts at all, he would be correct; but since they do have losses—and they have moaned and groaned on my law desk about them—I think the chartered banks are taking a risk and that the Federal Business Development Bank backs them up very well.

The problem is that the general public does not always have the feeling that the Federal Business Development Bank wants to take a risk or play the role of lender of last resort. The businessman often comments, "If I was not in this fix I would have borrowed the money from a chartered bank; they turned me down and now I need your help". The FBDB must decide whether it is just another bank. If it is, I suggest that it get out of business and stop competing with free enterprise. If it is going to be a true lender of risk capital, however, a lender of last resort, then it has to actively pursue that role. It has to be prepared to prove to Canadian business that it will take a risk, not an unconscionable risk with no chance of success, but a reasonable risk designed to help a struggling business with potential.

I should like to comment now on the image of the FBDB in the small business community. The management counselling seminars conducted by the bank are well received and generally enhance its reputation in the small business community. Where the bank runs into problems is with the process of borrowing money. The small businessman sees this as costly, time consuming, frustrating and full of unhappiness. If the bank wants to play an important role in this country, it must improve the loan process.

I think it has to put more emphasis on the initial interview with the potential customer. It should be made clear to the customer what the bank's paperwork requirements are before a loan is considered. All the banks requirements should be established at that time. Businessmen complain, "We submitted the documents; they sat on them; they got back to us; they wanted more; we gave them more; they reviewed them; they came back again and then we were turned down." That is the businessman's complaint. It frustrates him to go through that submission process. He has to wait for an answer and then, instead of an answer, he gets a further request for paperwork.

I should like to suggest that the branch managers should make a better effort to distinguish between the paperwork which tells a businessman a story about his business, for his sake, and the paperwork which is required for a loan. It is an education process; it is ongoing and very important. The FDBD can play that role with small business by pointing out what the financial statements, the inventory control, the accounts receivable aging, mean to the small businessman who, until he goes into the branch office, has no idea what the bank should be doing for him. I think the bank can play a role there and I want to see it played with all this money the bank is getting.

I am going to raise a defence for lawyers at this point, Mr. Speaker. We must have a defence for lawyers somewhere!

An hon. Member: Throw him out of the party!

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Lewis: We often hear it suggested that lawyers' and accountants' fees are connected with the application. I should like to point out the difference. The FBDB requires financial statements which are prepared by accountants who charge for the time they put in and, of course, they should be paid for it. Lawyers' fees do not come about until after approval of the loan. That is when they bill for their time and effort. Of course, they are not adequately paid for what they do!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: Hansard should show that the hon. member is smiling.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to suggest that when an application is doomed from the start, the bank should say so, in order that people do not incur these costs. Risky applications should be viewed with the idea that easy and inexpensive information be made available first of all, and then if it is felt the submission has potential, then you start paying money.

When this bill was considered in committee last fall there was discussion about discretion levels. I do not want to ask the minister to bring forward the discretion levels of every branch of the bank in Canada, but I would ask him to delineate the bank's policy in this regard. I think some branches get away with stalling, through not delineating that approval or discretion level which every bank manager has. Head office is blamed for things which the branch office should really take care of.

Earlier I spoke of what I called an approval disapproval time lag. Last fall Mr. Lavigneau made the comment before the finance committee that it took one week for head office to consider a loan. I made the comment then, and I repeat it now, that we are not interested in how long it takes head office to handle things. The small businessman is more interested in the lag between the time they walk in the front door and the time approval or disapproval is given. That is where we could really do a job for Canadian small business.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to touch on something which pertains to my own riding and perhaps others in this country. The previous speaker referred to the branch in his riding. One place where the FBDB could really improve its operation is by making branch banking through the FBDB available to every constituency in the country. All of the major chartered banks have branches in the riding of Simcoe North. They are on street corners or in the middle of the block and are part of the business community. The FBDB has no branch in the riding of Simcoe North. I cannot point to 6 per cent of the loans being made in Simcoe North, although I would like to, but there is no branch in my riding. There are other ridings which do not have a branch either.

Mr. Darling: Like mine.

Mr. Lewis: Including Parry Sound-Muskoka. I am not asking for the corner site and I am not asking for a lot of windows and that kind of thing, but I do suggest, however, that if this government believes in decentralization and bringing government to the people, then it ought to bring the Federal Business Development Bank to the people. A loan manager and a secretary could handle applications on a daily basis. We should really try to make the Federal Business Development Bank part of small business in this country and part of every riding in this country. When the bill goes to committee perhaps the minister could look into this question and tell us what is envisaged for putting branches into the ridings.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I support this bill. I should like to see it go through as quickly as possible so that the bank can get on with the job of helping small business.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, rather than repeat the arguments advanced by speakers on this side of the House, I should like to take the opportunity to react to some statements made this afternoon by hon. members opposite. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) at the end of his speech listed a number of questions, and the previous speaker made a number of observations. I should like to take the opportunity to address them directly rather than speak in a very general way about this bill.

We are all anxious to see the bill passed but I think a number of points have been made that are worthy of further discussion this afternoon. The question was asked whether the bank has a clear concept of its mandate. I would argue that it does and has successfully carried out that mandate. Over the past five years in excess of $3 billion has been disbursed to small businesses. How do we know that it has been disbursed to small businesses? Ninety per cent of the loans made have been under $100,000, 50 per cent of those have been under $25,000. There is no question whatsoever that this considerable sum of money has gone exactly where it was intended to go, and that is to the small businessman. Two-thirds of that money was used to start new businesses or to expand young businesses. In total, approximately 30,000 businesses are here that were not here before, or are larger than they were before, and healthier than they were before. Because of that we have in excess of 350,000 extra jobs in this country, many of them in the critical field of high technology.

● (1500)

Part of its mandate has been to dispense advice and information to small businessmen. If one looks at the thousands of seminars that have been conducted throughout Canada, and the millions of pamphlets that have been distributed, and the hundreds of thousands of phone calls that have been answered and referrals that have been made, I think hon. members would agree with me that this part of its mandate has been carried out successfully as well.

There were in this past year 177 loans amounting to approximately $9 million in my municipality, which is Scarborough. Last year there were 971 referrals; 12 clinics, 580 inquiries, and 11 seminars.

Since the program began in 1975, very close to $14 million has been invested or loaned to the small businessmen of my municipality.

From a general perspective or from a very particular perspective, one would have to argue, and I think members opposite would have to agree, that this bank has carried out the mandate with which it was entrusted by this Parliament five years ago. I would suggest to hon. members opposite that this bank has displayed a sensitivity and a responsiveness to the demands of the small businessmen throughout Canada. If one looks at the amount of loans and investments that have been made, and divide that amount by the population of the various areas, one would see that no region dominates the services of this bank, and that no urban centre dominates the services of this bank. The hon. gentleman opposite, who raised the question of the clear concept of the mandate of the bank, comes from a riding in British Columbia. I might advise him that Vancouver has a penetration rate, that is the percentage rate of loans to small businesses made by the Federal Business Development Bank, of 11.3 per cent. In Toronto it is only 3.8 per cent. In Mackenzie, Fort St. John, Salmon Arm and Williams Lake, the penetration ratio is very close to 30 per cent.

The preceding speaker made the point that a part of its mandate is its willingness to lose money. I would argue that that is not a part of its mandate. The mandate states quite clearly that this bank is to break even in its operations. Thankfully in four of the five years it has met its mandate. It is regrettable that economic circumstances in the past year have made it more difficult for it to meet that mandate, but that is an exception. That is not the rule, and I think the bank can be proud of its record of financial success.

An hon. gentleman opposite remarked that there was a need for more branches in the smaller urban and rural areas of Canada. He has more experience than I have, and he is probably right, but I would argue that the bank has taken serious steps to meet this demand. Sixty per cent of its branches are already in the rural areas and the smaller towns, and it is a service that is continually growing. I do not think that he should be critical of what has been delivered so far. I think he should applaud the rate of progress that has been made in such a short time.

He talked about the head office and its relationship with loans and borrowings. I would suggest to him that the bank has an enviable record in its responsiveness and sensitivity to the demands of the local borrower. Ninety-eight per cent of the loans of the bank are negotiated and authorized by the local bank. I am sure this is something which cannot increase much more, just 2 per cent. It is already doing an excellent job of responding to the pressures and demands of the small local businessman.

In short, is the bank meeting its mandate? I say undeniably so. All one has to do is take a look at the demand on the bank for loans, for equity investment, for advice and information. It is growing at a remarkable rate every year, and will continue to grow at a similarly fast rate in the future. It has grown so much that it has used up in five years all the money that was allotted to it by the last Parliament. That is why it is back here again to get more money so it can continue in the future to do as remarkable a job as it has done in the past.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap mentioned that the bank lost $30 million last year, and I made reference to that as well earlier in my speech. The explanation for that is a multiple one. There are a number of reasons why the bank lost money last year. The creation of the SLBA has introduced a serious competitor for loans, and that corporation has, regrettably for the perspective of this bank, absorbed the better risks that are out in the marketplace. There are new and vigorous lending companies in the market today which are now competing for this business. In short, the bank has been pushed to the riskier end of the spectrum and that is why, in part, it is having difficulty in making financial ends meet. As well, the erosion of its equity base has made the loans it makes more expensive because it does not have the equity base any longer to command the lower rates on the open market. That problem will be solved by the reinvigoration of new funds, so that when it borrows in the future, it will be borrowing at a better rate than it has over the past year.

Another reason why the bank had difficulty last year and lost money is because hon. gentlemen opposite, who are smiling indulgently at this point, forced it out in the private market. When the bank was first created, the bank had access to the CRF funds and the lower rates that were available with those funds. But it was the administration of the previous government, the party that now sits opposite, which forced the bank completely and totally out into the private market for its funds. Therefore it had to pay the higher rates of the private marketplace.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have to draw to the House's attention that that statement by the speaker is incorrect. The previous government allowed $245 million through the estimates for borrowing. All it did was increase the ratio of loans to borrowing as a substitute—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Kelly), has the floor. I do not believe the hon. member for Capilano had a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, if I am in error, I apologize, but those are the facts as I understand them today.

Finally, part of the loss is explained because of the general difficulty of business in the last year and the higher level of defaults that mark the economy today.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap also made reference to the staff turnover. Apparently there has been 30 to 35 per cent turnover in staff in the last few years. It is not so much that the staff is fleeing the bank as it is that staff members are attracted by the higher salaries offered by the newer institutions now competing in this field.

It is ironical that Petro-Canada raided the private market a few years ago for its staff, and today the private market is raiding the Crown corporations for its staff. I have been informed that the staff turnover for this past year has subsided substantially, that increases in salaries are keeping the young, attractive staff members with the bank. The bank can look forward to the staff stability in the future that it has enjoyed in years past.

Mention was made of the new head office. The suggestion was that this Crown corporation, like other Crown corporations, is following in the grand tradition of Crown corporations and building a huge physical empire for itself. If you look at the balance sheet of the bank, you will see that the revenue it raises goes almost exclusively to the loan and equity investments that it generates. Far from being an example of empire building, this particular Crown corporation is a model for other Crown corporations to follow.

The last two points the hon. member mentioned had to do with the borrowing policies and the lending policies of the bank. When he was questioning the borrowing policies of the bank, he was suggesting that it borrows at too high a cost and passes on that cost to the consumer. As I previously explained, there are a number of legitimate reasons for these higher costs. When this bill is passed, the small businessmen of Canada will be able to look forward to a return to the lower rates that they enjoyed in the past.

As far as its lending policy is concerned, the hon. member was suggesting that the bank was being too loose with its money, that because of the rapid turnover of its staff the younger and newer people it was employing did not possess the expertise to assess and distribute money with prudence and wisdom.

I suggest that with criticisms like this the bank finds itself in an awkward position. Some members on one side of the House criticize it for being too loose with its money. Members in other parties on the other side of the House criticize it for being too tight with its money. All I can say is that it has exhausted the money supply that was given to it. It has done the job properly and will continue to do the job through its lending operations in the future.

If I had any comment to make on the lending policies of the bank, I would suggest that conscious preferences be introduced in the lending deliberations of the bank. Canadian businessmen should have priority over foreign businessmen. Businesses in fields of high technology should have priority over businesses in other areas. Finally, I would hope that businesses that are frontier oriented would have priority over businesses in other older established areas that are serviced by a remarkable field of banking and lending institutions. These are things to be studied more properly in committee. I look forward to continuing the dialogue at that time.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome this opportunity to join in the debate on the amendment to the Federal Business Development Bank, Bill C-20, now before us. I would like to make it known from the beginning that I support the amendment and encourage its speedy passage. Also, I would like to say that my general impression of FBDB is a good one. On the whole, it is my opinion that the calibre of service they offer Canadian small business is good and that they fulfil a very important role in the small business sector of the economy. I do have some reservations about certain specific functions of the bank and I should like to address those things. The comments and suggestions that I make are not born of any detailed knowledge of FBDB, but are impressions and opinions that I have picked up in trying to assist constituents in their efforts to secure financing from the bank.

First of all, as I have stated, I welcome the amendment before us today. It represents a welcome recognition of the very important role that small business plays in the total economy of Canada. When I say small business, I mean "small' in a relative sense. I know FBDB can and does loan very significant amounts of money to larger businesses. However, in reviewing the bank's annual report for 1979, I could not help but notice that two-thirds of the approved loan applications were made for amounts of $50,000 or less. I think it is safe to assume that when you talk about loans of this amount, you are generally talking about assisting small business. While I concede that the scope of the FBDB goes beyond merely assisting small business, it is this sector of the economy which I am most concerned about and wish to address. I would like to turn my attention to some of these issues.

When you look at the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank, you quickly see that its intent was to create an organization which would provide financial assistance to businesses which could not get financing elsewhere on reasonable terms and conditions. In other words, it was set up to be a bank specializing in last resort financing.

However, I am concerned that the bank may be too conservative—if you will pardon the expression—in its lending practices. If this indeed is the case, then it could be argued, with justification, that it is not fulfilling the terms of its mandate.

I am the first person to concede that attempting to determine if this is the case, is a very arbitrary matter. It depends on the criteria you use and what your own opinion is of "too conservative". However, I suggest that this is not a new complaint and may never really be settled to everyone's satisfaction.

In a speech delivered on April 9 of this year by Mr. Peter E. Quinn of industry, trade and commerce to the Canadian Advanced Technology Association, he addressed this kind of concern as it relates to the enterprise development program. He compared the relative timidness of EDP with other agencies and institutions involved in the same pursuit. He mentioned the FBDB's loss rate on loans was in the neighbourhood of 1 per cent of all their issued loans.

It is my contention that determining what percentage of issued loans turn bad is an appropriate yardstick to use in passing judgment on how timid the bank is. If this figure is indicative of the bank's failure rate, then I am of the opinion that FBDB is too timid and may not be following its mandate as closely as it should.

Again, I wish to restate that trying to determine if this claim is justified is a very arbitrary, subjective judgment. Nonetheless, it is a consideration which is fundamental to the operation of the bank if it is to carry out its mandate accurately.

It may be useful to compare this 1 per cent loss rate to other programs of a similar nature. Although it is not by any means a mirror image of FBDB, the enterprise development program could be used as a comparison. In the speech just referred to, Mr. Quinn notes that EDP's loss percentage in its field of jurisdiction approximates some 17 per cent. Again, the comparison of FBDB and EDP may be called into question because of the widely different industries they support; however, it is a comparison worth noting.

Along the same lines, DREE has a failure rate of close to 10 per cent and its mandate does not specifically refer to the department as being a clearing-house for business looking for last resort financial assistance.

• (1520)

If the FBDB is too timid and thus is not completely fulfilling its mandate as I have suggested, then we must question the causes of this tendency. Part of the problem may be found in the fact that many of the people employed by the bank have come from private sector lending institutions. Their training in the private sector has made them understandably leery of risk loan ventures, and for obvious reasons. Once this philosophy is instilled, it is understandably difficult to reject. To come from a chartered bank, which is not favourably disposed to extending loans to businesses turned down everywhere else, it must be trying on credit officers at FBDB to remember that risky ventures are the rule, and certainly not the exception, of their clients.

Another possible reason for this limited risk mentality that has often been levelled at the FBDB may be further compounded by the fact that since 1979 the bank has begun to raise money on the private money markets. Obviously the bank has to recognize the fact that it raises money on the private market and has to temper any excesses in lending money with the responsibility it has to take into account the raising and repaying of these obligations. Therefore, one can easily sympathize with the FBDB for being caught in a difficult position.

These problems could be addressed without compromising the intent and purpose of the bank. The following ideas are submitted as possible alternatives. First, it is important that those involved in processing applications be made aware that the FBDB's mandate includes high risk. Officers must realize that this fact is their primary mandate and must not reject out of hand applications which chartered banks would not touch. It is an approach designed to recondition their thinking, and must be a goal of management.

The second possibility would involve changing the financial operations of the company so that the federal government would allot the bank a certain amount of money each year earmarked as special high-risk capital. That money would then be distributed to the various branches of the bank and would be directed specifically at projects that would not normally be accepted.

Before I go any further, I must state the obvious. In levelling this limited risk mentality criticism at the bank I do not want to appear to be an advocate of free spending money thrown into projects which have no hope of success. I would like to temper everything I have said so far with an acknowledgment that due and deliberate consideration must be given every application which is presented to the bank. The point I am trying to make is that an element of risk in any loan should not be the sole reason for rejecting an application. The bank is in a high risk business. It is my fear that it may shy away from some applications on the basis of this fact alone. To do that, in my opinion, is to thwart the intended purpose of the bank.

Another area of concern for me in the dealings I have had with the FBDB is the fact that its counselling services may not receive the human and financial resources necessary for them to carry out their important functions. It should surprise no one that many businesses, especially small ones, often get into financial difficulty because they do not have the expertise to make sound investments based on adequate appraisal of market conditions, general economic trends, and so forth. Therefore, it becomes imperative that an agency or institution like the FBDB fill the void by providing such a service. I have every reason to believe that the FBDB carries out its role in providing this service with well trained and highly qualified specialists. However, it is my impression that the resources committed to this aspect of the bank's operations are lacking.

I contend that an ounce of prevention is certainly worth a pound of cure, and if small business has quick and easy access to this kind of service, the number of businesses seeking financial assistance to get out of difficulties will decrease.

I would like to conclude my remarks by stating that although I may be advocating more government assistance in a very risky field of enterprise, I am not turning my back on the need to control government spending which, as hon. members of this House know, is a central plank in our party's platform. What I am advocating is the strengthening of the business sector of our economy through the vehicle of the Federal Business Development Bank. This too is a central plank in our party's philosophy. That is why I support the amendment now before us. That is also why I have offered suggestions to strengthen the FBDB. It is my contention that if these matters are considered and addressed in their entirety, business, especially small business, will be well served by the federal government and its various programs of assistance.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-20, which proposes to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

When the Federal Business Development Bank was established in 1974, its mandate was clearly stated. The new bank was to give particular consideration to the needs of small businesses and to lend money in a responsible manner to those for whom financing was not available—and I underline this—under reasonable terms and conditions from private lenders.

Now, after five years of operation, we are told that increased activity within the business community, and particularly the small business community, has placed unprecedented demands on the Federal Business Development Bank's financial resources. The bank faces the prospect of reaching the statutory limits of its capital and borrowing power within a very few short months.

Like so many of us in these hard times, the Federal Business Development Bank is running out of money. Bill C-20 would increase the Federal Business Development Bank's borrowing power from a factor of ten to 12 times the capital of the corporation.

Without this increase, as has been said earlier, the Federal Business Development Bank would only be able to lend an amount of money equal to the repayment of existing loans. This would cause the bank's loan approvals to drop to one-third of their current level. On the average the bank assists 1,500 small and medium-sized businesses every month. If its loan approvals drop to one-third, well over 1,000 Canadian business operations will be left without funding.

From the outset I want to go on the record as being in support of the proposed increase. I support this increase in spite of some of the criticisms which I will speak about later. I am willing to encourage speedy passage of this legislation through the House so that many Canadian businesses will not be denied access to a vital credit source.

The use of credit is a valuable and essential tool within the small business community. This is particularly true in my constituency of Okanagan North. We are a constituency of small businesses. By way of example, the owner of an independent farm equipment dealership told me the other day that his company's sales volume has doubled every year for the last four consecutive years. He also said that it would have been entirely impossible for him to do this had he not taken advantage of various credit sources, including the Federal Business Development Bank, to buy the inventory and build the facilities he needed to service his customers properly.

Credit, as we all know, is essential to the survival of the small business person, and yet obtaining adequate financing from private lenders is one of the most serious difficulties facing small business firms and, as has been said before in this debate, especially those firms starting new operations.

The Federal Business Development Bank, according to the statistics we have heard, is estimated to assist in the start-up of over 2,000 enterprises per year in Canada. When we add to this the fact that those 2,000 businesses are responsible for the creation or preservation of some 36,000 jobs, it is hard to argue against allowing the corporation to continue lending on a business-as-usual basis.

The Federal Business Development Bank performs a very important function in fostering the development of private enterprise in this country. Private enterprise makes up the heart of the Canadian economy. One of the primary objectives of at least the people on this side of the House is to ensure that private enterprise in Canada, comprising our small business people, is given every opportunity to take advantage of their individual initiative to grow and prosper.

● (1530)

I believe it is the responsibility of this House to create an environment which will facilitate growth and development—not to hinder or overwhelm it. It has been said many times, Mr. Speaker, but I believe the figures deserve repetition and reinforcement, that the 1.2 million small businesses in Canada employ over two-thirds of our work force. One point two million business owners and two-thirds of our work force deserve more than just the cursory attention of this House. Small business preserves competition and efficiency in the market place. It also provides more opportunities for less skilled workers.

This vital sector of the Canadian economy wants and needs a small business policy which will create an environment in which individual creativity can flourish.

I will confess, Mr. Speaker, that it was with some disappointment, but certainly not surprise, that I watched the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appoint his cabinet. I had hoped this administration would follow the Conservative lead and appoint one minister whose sole responsibility would be to help small business cope with government and compete with big business. This, however, was not to be. It is obvious the concerns of large corporations seem to be more important to this government than the needs of individual Canadians.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Dantzer: As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation as a housekeeping measure pending a further review of the bank's activities. For example, it appears to me there is at least one aspect of the Federal Business Development Bank which deserves discussion and possible investigation. I speak now not of the contents of the act itself but rather of the manner in which the act is administered, whether by the various individual bank branch managers or by bank policy as directed from above—I am not sure which.

I speak only from my experience and from observations respecting clients who had occasion to use the credit facilities of the bank, and of the actions of the bank in the community in which I live. Like the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), I have stood next to the borrower on many occasions when he was dealing with the federal bank.

It is my understanding that the purpose of the Federal Business Development Bank is, and was, to provide facilities to small business throughout this country. This includes providing direct loans at competitive rates to those who found it difficult, if not impossible, to receive and obtain credit from the usual and ordinary financial sources under reasonable terms. The purpose of the bank was not to compete for customers with the ordinary existing credit sources available in the marketplace.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the bank has other goals and purposes that have been referred to in the House. For instance it is my understanding that they attempt to provide local seminars for small businessmen covering such things as accounting, business management, and other areas of expertise in which the small business person may need advice—and indeed in so far as the bank is successful in these endeavours I commend them for their efforts.

The policy to which I refer, however, is the apparent effort of some local branches to compete—and compete fiercely—for existing business, which the usual financial resources could handle. It appears they compete by advertising and also by establishing local branches in prime office locations—in the so-called high rent districts, in new and modern first floor walk-in offices, for which undoubtedly they pay the highest rent in the area.

By way of example, the Federal Business Development Bank opened a branch office in the town in which I reside, Vernon, B.C., some time ago on the second floor of a fully adequate building, about a block off the main thoroughfare—not prime office space certainly, but adequate for a government corporation which, presumably, was not competing in the open marketplace, but was, in reality, a second-line source of credit.

There should be no need for a great, successful corporate image on the main street on behalf of a federal bank. One would think their needs would be restricted to adequate floor space, a telephone number, an address in the phone book, and sufficient identification on the outside of the building. One would have thought this adequate, and I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North when he says there should be a branch in every constituency, but not on the main street, not competing with the major banks.

However, in a very short time, the Federal Development Bank in my community was advertising and calling for bids for new office space in a prime location. That particular branch succeeded in its endeavours and now has new office space in a prime location, with presumably higher rent, at more expense to the taxpayer. It is all very nice and it looks very well in Vernon, but I do not think it was necessary.

I hasten to say, Mr. Speaker, it is no answer to say that the cost of this high-class building or the rent of that building is covered in the bank's profits, since any excessive and unnecessary costs will certainly result in higher interest rates and less profit, and a higher rent would eventually cost more to the people who use the service and more to the individual taxpayer.

I can only presume this kind of empire building is carried on throughout the country, and I know there has been some criticism of it. I say that if it is an active policy of the bank, it should be discouraged by the head officers of the corporation as soon as possible. I believe there can be no justification whatsoever for this kind of ego trip on the part of the bank.

I would now like to discuss another practice which, if it exists as a bank policy, should be discontinued immediately.

I presume the bank follows normal banking practices in the granting of loans to its customers. But, of necessity, if it is to fulfil its role of providing a supplementary or secondary line of credit for small business it must, of course, relax some of the usual rules of credit which are enforced by banks or other first line credit granting institutions. So far so good. However, in granting credit the Federal Development Bank almost always takes as security a debenture on the assets of the business which is obtaining the loan.

The debenture is a form used by the bank, as most members of this House will be aware—if they are not they should be—which grants the bank the right in the case of default, to appoint a receiver of the assets of that business, and to take over and sell off all the assets of the business at the discretion of the local bank manager. This, of course, is not an unusual practice, Mr. Speaker; it is also followed by those in private industry when they feel that the type of loan they are giving requires exceptional security. I find no fault with this procedure. However, it is my understanding that this security is taken by the Federal Business Development Bank far more often than by charter banks, at least this is true in my experience.

I might also add, as the hon. member for Simcoe North said, that the Federal Business Development Bank requires documentation that this is far more detailed and extensive and, correspondingly, more expensive than the chartered banks. Thus, while the interest rates may seem to be competitive with those of the chartered banks, all too often the cost of the loan is very much higher as compared to the cost of loans from chartered banks and other private financial institutions. In my opinion, in many cases this documentation is excessive and unnecessary. But this is not the main thrust of my criticism, this is not the real reason I bring the matter up—although these are important matters of practice which the officers of the bank should look to and look to immediately.

The matter which most concerns me is the charge which has been made to me, and which I believe should be answered by the bank, that many of the officers of the Federal Business Development Bank, in their various branches throughout Canada, are too quick to call in their loan when the creditor defaults. By their policy the Federal Business Development Bank—it has been charged—too often entices the business person to borrow too much money and to overextend himself. In doing so, the bank does not provide that business person with sufficient working capital over a sufficient period of time.

In other words, the Federal Business Development Bank does not provide a reasonable repayment plan to enable the borrower to start to overcome his difficulties, to turn his business into a paying proposition, to turn it around to enable him to commence paying off his loan. Instead, at the first sign of default, the bank comes pouncing in, as it were, seizing all assets and the business. In short, the charge is that all too often the Federal Business Development Bank entices the business person to borrow more money than that person should, and then the business owner finds he cannot meet the terms of the loan. Then the bank moves quickly, decisively, and, it appears, without any regard for the welfare of the small business owner. It calls in his loan and proceeds to take over the business by means of an administrator, selling the assets and discontinuing the business.

The small business owner went to the bank in good faith. He took this loan, he mortgaged his assets, and now he finds himself without a business, without a livelihood, without assets, probably with substantial personal debts and facing bankruptcy, if not already in it. Again my charge is that too often the Federal Business Development Bank entices the businessman into bankruptcy. I do not know whether they do this because of the overeagerness of small bank managers attempting to compete in the market and attempting to build up their records. I do not know whether it is done because the manager himself does not have sufficient business experience to know what size of loan is required in the particular business he is financing, or whether he does not know the period of time or the amount of capital the small businessman requires in order to turn his business around. Whatever it is, I think the record is clear.

I have witnessed the scenario which I have painted here. I do not believe, and I know, that it is not an isolated incident. It is a policy which should be condemned by this Parliament. I would ask the minister to assure the House that my complaint will be brought to the attention of those in the bank whose responsibility it is to ensure that this policy is discontinued forthwith. As I said, I support the early passage of this piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to say a few words in support of Bill C-20. Along with my colleagues, I certainly realize the importance of this bill. In fact I believe on April 15, just after the House started sitting, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when this bill would be brought in because it was brought to my attention by several people interested in borrowing from the Federal Business Development Bank that the funds had dried up and that there would be no money there until new, additional funds were voted by Parliament. I am delighted to know that Parliament now has a bill before it and that this bill will receive second reading today.

I listened with interest to the comments of many of my colleagues on both sides of the House. They have quoted all the necessary statistics and figures, so I would just be repeating them. I come from the small rural riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka where we do not have a branch of the bank. With all due respect, I appreciate the comment that it would be nice to have a branch in every riding in Canada, but I am realistic enough to know that money does not grow on trees. Of much more importance than a branch in every riding is to have the money available in every riding and to have officers of the branch there. I have found the officers with whom I deal most co-operative and helpful. One officer with whom I deal is located to the north of my riding in North Bay, and the other is located in the branch to the south, in Barrie.

Along with a great many other members of Parliament, I have been approached by applicants for federal business development loans. We are told by the applicants that we are all-powerful, that all we have to do is tell the bank to lend them the money and the bank will. Of course, I am well aware that it is far from that. I have told every one of these applicants that, first and foremost, I have been informed in a roundabout way that the bank takes a very dim view of a member of Parliament trying to wield a very big stick on the knowledgeable people. I told them that it was up to them to sell their business or prospective business to the branch. I said that I would try to open the doors for them, but they must have a financial statement ready, they must have the know-how. Also I told them that when they have done this, it is up to them, and if I could assist in any other way, I will do so. I want to commend the many branch managers, or the ones with whom I deal, for their courtesy and their endeavouring to help get the loans through.

Some of us think that they do not move too fast, but I spoke to one bank manager this morning who stated that his average was 45 to 60 days. That is a pretty good batting average, if it takes 45 to 60 days from the time the application comes in until the loan is finally processed. In some cases it could even be quicker. In a good many cases I am aware that the fault lies with the applicant himself. He goes into the branch without a financial statement or does not give the full story to the branch manager. Therefore he cannot expect to get the "okay" right away.

As has been mentioned time and again, the Federal Business Development Bank is the lender of last resort. I am well aware of that because I also wear the shoes of a borrower. Some years ago I had to enlarge the premises I had in Burk's Falls and build a small building. Therefore I went with my hat in hand to the Royal Bank of Canada. While they did not throw me out on my posterior into the street, they would not give me the money. Then I went to the Federal Business Development Bank, and after some time the loan was approved at the peak interest rate, which did not please me too well. That was approximately ten years ago and the rate was 10 per cent. Right after that I think the interest rate started sliding down to 9 per cent. I will admit that I am not too unhappy with the 10 per cent rate today. It will be paid off in due course.

I ask the minister to give consideration to the fact that the Federal Business Development Bank lends money at certain interest rates. I brought this matter up a few weeks ago. Up until three weeks ago, the bank lent money at the very high rate of 19 per cent. Even with the sliding interest rates of today, as the minister knows, the interest rate in the Federal Business Development Bank is 17¾ per cent. Needless to say, we hope that will be amended within the next week or so. That is pretty tough, but the hardest part of it all is that the borrower is locked in for five years. With the high interest rates, the mortgages on homes and so on, banks are providing one-year mortgages in the hope that the interest rates would go down. They have gone down, but it would seem that some of the FBDB new applications and renewals were renewed at 19 per cent a month or two ago. I can imagine what those business people are saying today. They are wringing their hands and are probably saying things not only under their breath. The loans are at 19 per cent and they cannot change this for four or five years, or whatever the case may be.

It would seem to me that the Federal Business Development Bank could operate like the chartered banks and say, "All right, we know it is a very bad time; we will give you a one-year mortgage which will be adjusted when we think things will work out a little better". Again I want to bring that to the attention of the minister.

I am also well aware that the rates of the Federal Business Development Bank are not competitive. From time to time I have told, and I still think of it as the IDB as it is easier to say, the Federal Business Development Bank that their rates are higher than one can get from a trust company, if one wanted the money for a building, or to put up a building, or from a chartered bank. I have advised people that they had better look into every avenue to get the best rate.

Again this comes down to the matter of the lender of last resort. Often many of the applicants do not qualify for loans from chartered banks or other institutions. As a last resort they go to the Federal Business Development Bank. Mention has been made about the higher loss ratio in respect of that government agency. I still suggest, as some others have done, the government should be there to try to help these small businesses get on their feet and remain on their feet. I am also delighted, Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Minister, that this can even be enlarged, so that rather than for bricks, mortar and machinery the bank will lend for working capital.

There are a great many small businesses today which, because of the serious financial situation and general outlook, are finding it pretty difficult to keep afloat. If they have an existing loan and they are able to get some extra money to be used for working capital, and they approach the bank on that basis with some assets, I would hope the bank would consider them in a most sympathetic manner. This is most important.

One of the other things I want to comment on is the facilities which the bank provides; counselling to businessmen and offering them various types of services. This is very excellent. Seminars are held, as mentioned by the previous speaker, to which businessmen can go and lay their troubles on the table, and the bank can send someone down, very knowledgeable, in a particular type of business, to assist them in making more profits, and assist them if they are in financial difficulty so they can remain solvent. I would hope that if these businesses have viable objectives and plans, the bank would then step in and lend them this money.

I know that Bill C-20 is to be put through, so I will sit down and let the minister speak, as I am sure he would like to make a few comments to wrap it up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should warn members of the House that if the minister speaks at this point he will close the debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the few minutes that are left to express my sincere gratitude to my colleagues on both sides of the House for having commented so favourably on the Federal Business Development Bank and especially to thank them for allowing the second reading of this bill to be completed today.

There is not enough time left for me to reply in detail to the various questions raised. But I do want to echo the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and say how much I agree with his views as regards the expertise of the Federal Business Development Bank staff and their efforts over the past two years in particular to extend their regional offices and expedite their customer service and especially to shorten the time between a loan application and the decision on the granting of the loan. I think we can all notice in each of our regions that service has improved and that the bank makes commendable efforts to serve all regions of the country. I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say that the Federal Business Development Bank can be an example to all federal institutions and departments as well as all Crown corporations. Indeed, I believe that with the possible exception of Air Canada, it is the national institution which is the most decentralized in the country and I think that we should congratulate it and several of our departments in this regard. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other departments should imitate the efforts made by the bank these last few years to bring its services to its customers on the customers' own grounds. I would like to join with my colleagues in this House in addressing my sincere congratulations to the president of the bank for having made the most of this policy.

I know that some of my colleagues, including the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), have said that they would like to have an office of the bank in their constituency, and I myself, as minister responsible for the bank, would very much like to have one in my constituency, but as our friend for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has said, we must not dream of castles in the air and money does not grow on trees. Representatives of the bank try to go to these areas by announcing well in advance in local newspapers when the credit officers will be there so that businessmen can meet them, and I believe that is a good tactic.

I was somewhat surprised by the speech of our colleague the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) who said that he did not find it normal for the bank to have offices on the first floor of downtown buildings, for instance. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I am personally so proud of the operations of the bank and the services it offers to small businessmen in our country that I find it very important that this federal symbol be quite visible for everyone and that the necessary services can be provided to small and medium-size businesses in pleasant surroundings.

I therefore look forward to seeing everyone at the standing committee, where I shall be able to provide more specific answers to the concerns of the hon. member for Capilano, who wonders why section 31 must be amended and how the additional $75 million will be used. I believe that we shall have every opportunity to discuss this in committee, and once again, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues for their extremely positive comments about the bank.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

Order No. 3, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble). Shall the order stand?

An hon. Member: Reserved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Stand, by unanimous consent.

Order No. 4, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By unanimous consent.

Order No. 5, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By unanimous agreement. I wonder if there is an agreement in the House to proceed to order No. 20, and stand everything by unanimous consent prior to that?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ANTHEM ACT

DESIGNATION OF "O CANADA" AS NATIONAL ANTHEM

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South) moved:

That Bill C-220, respecting the national anthem of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to use all of my allotted time this afternoon. The intent of my private member's bill is well known to the hon. members of this House, and it is not my intention to elucidate the obvious. Mine is a measure which has no partisan overtones. Bill C-220 clearly is a measure which seeks to formalize in legislation a generally accepted and important element of our heritage and our nationhood.

A national anthem, like a national flag, is an important external symbol of nationhood. Yet here we are after 113 years of confederation without an official national anthem. I do not seek personal identification with this measure. I do not introduce it for personal or selfish gain. Instead, I see myself as a lowly backbencher, as a catalyst representing the aspirations and ambitions of my colleagues in this chamber and my millions of fellow-Canadians across this great land.

I began my research in the Thirty-first Parliament fully intending to introduce my private member's bill at that time. It was not until this Thirty-second Parliament that I had an opportunity to raise the matter in this House. I want to thank the government for allowing me the opportunity to place Bill C-220 before this House. I understand from Beauchesne's that when bills sponsored by members are called, that they are allowed to stand only at the request of the government and not at the request of the sponsor. I am indeed grateful to the government for causing this private bill to see the light of day.

The chronology of events which culminates here this hour has occurred with sudden swiftness. The sudden swiftness and the apparent unanimity reinforce my belief that a backbencher is not redundant in Parliament and even the lowliest private member has a special niche in the universe which unfolds. In my maiden speech of May 12, I announced my intentions regarding an official national anthem by way of Bill C-220.

On May 15 the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), seconded by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard), attempted to have passed under Standing Order 43 a motion which officially recognizes "O Canada" as the national anthem and "God Save the Queen" as the royal anthem. The motion did not receive the required unanimous consent.

The following day another motion under Standing Order 43 introduced by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), on my behalf, failed to receive the necessary consent. In Hansard of May 16 at page 1145, after this Standing Order was introduced, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is reported as saying:

No. What are the words?

I would just like to say that the words are those which have been accepted in both English and French by every school child and every citizen of Canada. They are the words which everybody knows. On May 21 a motion under Standing Order 43 by the member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) calling on the government to introduce legislation as soon as possible with a view to designating "O Canada" as the national anthem did receive the unanimous consent of the House.

This brings us to 4 p.m., Friday, May 23, 1980, and Bill C-220, a private member's bill, which could readily be adopted as a government measure, should the government concur. I am approaching the end of my remarks. I hope to be the only speaker from my party. It is obvious from the motion under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Joliette that my party supports the intent of my bill. For that reason I believe members of my party have agreed to stand down in this debate and allow me to be the sole spokesman.

"O Canada" has its roots in the formation and development of this great nation. Its genesis goes back to the year 1880 when it was suggested that a competition be held for the composition of a national anthem. Some of the principals involved in the evolution of "O Canada" were Mr. Justice Routhier; the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, Dr. Theodore Robitaille; the famous French Canadian composer, Calixa Lavallée; and music editor Arthur Lavigne. It has its prime roots in French Canada.

It was not until the turn of the century in 1908 that an English version composed by Robert Stanley Weir gradually came into use. In 1924 the Association of Canadian Clubs endorsed Weir's version as a suitable anthem to be sung at all Canadian Club meetings. At the same time the Weir version was printed in many school readers in several provinces and was given official recognition by the federal and provincial governments on many important occasions.

The Weir version was used to mark the fiftieth anniversary of confederation on July 1, 1917. As stated previously, the words proposed are those which are in common usage in both English and French. In 1948, by order in council, it became the anthem of Canada's Armed Forces and they were required to salute it. Similarly, the Department of External Affairs provided that "O Canada" be accorded the recognition of the national anthem of Canada. In 1967 the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons recommended that the government be authorized to adopt the music of "O Canada", as composed by Calixa Lavallée, as the music for the national anthem.

The government of the day has, on four separate occasions in two Parliaments, introduced bills to adopt "O Canada" as the national anthem. None of these bills went beyond first reading stage. In 1978 the member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) introduced Bill C-438 respecting the national anthem. We have an opportunity this afternoon to pass into law a measure which has, through 100 years of usage, become a fact of life.

It is not my intention nor my desire to throttle or stifle free speech or debate. But the fact remains that my measure may easily be talked out and disappear completely. I urge hon. members to consider it in the national interest, not as partisans but as patriots. Give it your support. In Beauchesne, section 217, at page 74 we find the following:

If it is evident that no member claims the right of speaking, the Speaker proceeds to put the question by reading the main motion . . . He then takes the sense of the members of the last of these by saying: "Those who are in favour of the motion . . . will say 'yea'.

Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, say yea for "O Canada". say yea for Canada.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate this afternoon. I should advise the hon. member that the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) will be here later in the debate to comment on this bill. I think from the outset that we should say that there probably will not be a disposition to talk this bill out, as is often the practice. But I cannot guarantee that, because I have not talked with the minister this afternoon. The minister is very glad to have an opportunity to participate in the debate and is very happy that the hon. member has come forward today.

Since we do have a few minutes before the minister comes—and I understand that other members wish to speak—I would like to say a few words. This past week has been a very traumatic one for Canada. It has been one where one particular region, the province of Quebec, voted by a significant margin to stay within Canada. I am sure that all members of the House applaud that vote. The feeling around this House this week is a feeling which I have never experienced in my years in this House of Commons.

There seems to be good will on all sides and a disposition on matters of national unity and the constitution to work together. That is not to say that all parties will agree on every particular item that will be discussed in the forthcoming constitutional debates, but as I said last night in a debate which was very graciously provided for us by the New Democratic Party on their opposition day, this has been a difficult time for us, and we now must come together as politicians from all sides of this House to deal with the future of our country and the future structures in our country on an almost non-partisan basis. I hope that in the speeches which ensue this afternoon members will follow in that vein.

I would like to talk about symbols. "O Canada" has been a symbol in this country for many years. It has been a symbol, as the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) suggested, of the history of Canada. It was written by a Canadian of French-speaking origin many years ago, and has had wide usage within the country. It is unofficially Canada's national anthem. It is a symbol. I can remember as a young boy of ten years old being in the immigration office in London when our family applied to come to this country—at the time Canada was trying to entice immigrants—seeing a film by the Canadian government which depicted the different regions of the country. I remember at the end of that film, Mr. Speaker, the closing credits came on with the then flag of Canada, the Red Ensign, and the music of "O Canada" sung by an armed forces chorus. I had never heard the song before and, even as a ten-year-old, I was quite moved. It had an appeal for me. Little did I know that some 23 years later, or less, I would be a member of this House of Commons and speaking on the very future of that symbolic song.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would welcome, as I am sure every member of the House would, the adoption of "O Canada" as the official anthem of this country.

There are some other symbols I wish to talk about, however, as they have equal meaning. One is a symbol for many people of British origin, and that is the anthem "God Save the Queen". I think it is fair to say that not all members of the chamber have the same attachment to that anthem. As one who grew up in Great Britain I have a particular attachment to the royal anthem. I do not think that if we pass this bill, or if the government brings in a bill—as I understand is likely—to make "O Canada" the official anthem and if it does become the official anthem, that that would in any way diminish the royal anthem which is played on all suitable occasions. I would hope that in accepting the symbol of "O Canada" we would not forget that part of our heritage which is reflected in the British fact and the royal anthem.

We also have the flag as a symbol. Some 16 years ago this House was torn apart in the debate over the flag. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was here then, perhaps also the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and, of course, yourself Mr. Speaker. You will remember that in 1964 there was an emotional tearing apart of the House on the adoption of the flag, and I think for good reason. The Red Ensign had great historical significance for Canada. It was a flag under which Canadians fought in the Boer War, the First World War, and the Second World War. It had great significance for most Canadians—so much so that the province of Ontario has seen fit to retain it as the provincial flag.

In those 16 years the flag we now have, the single red maple leaf, has become the living symbol of Canadian unity. I remember thumbing my way through Europe in 1967, as I am sure many other hon. members have done. I remember the kind of rapport that was struck up between my friend and I and the people in various countries we visited, and how the Canadian maple leaf was recognized as the symbol of Canada. That was only three years after it had been adopted by this House and the wounds still had not healed.

There was great pride—I would not say jingoistic pride, although I suppose there is competition between Canadians and our friends to the south—in having the Canadian maple leaf on our packs and saying to the Americans we met that we were a separate country from them although we might speak the same language with a similar accent. We have a different country and a sort of different heritage, some of it common to that of the United States, but there is a distinctive difference in this country which is enhanced by the fact of two official languages and the many cultures that have decided to call

Canada home. I wanted to mention a couple of those symbols, Mr. Speaker. In the previous opportunities I have had to speak I have dealt with the constitutional question and not participated in some of the emotional aspects of the unity debate that we saw this week.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am very grateful that the hon. member has seen fit to persevere with his bill and bring it forward again. I think it was fitting that it be called today. Hon. members wanted him to proceed with it and that is why the other bills were stood.

I wish to reiterate my personal support and, I am sure, that of every member in the House. The Secretary of State will be here shortly to make some significant comment on the question of national unity and the symbolism implied and inherent in Bill C-220 which will make "O Canada" our official anthem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful and proud as a Canadian to be allowed to speak on this particular issue. Legislation to make "O Canada" our official national anthem is long overdue—I should even like to suggest it is exactly 100 years overdue. It was back in 1880 that Mr. Justice Routhier penned the original French words in 1880, and later that same year Mr. Calixa Lavallée put this poem to music. This anthem was found to be very popular among French Canadians, so much so that it supplanted other French Canadian patriotic songs in existence at that time.

We are aware, of course, that there are many English versions of "O Canada" which have been put to Lavallée's original musical score. The most generally accepted English version, however, was that composed in 1908 by Robert Stanley Weir. The English version has undoubtedly met with the same popularity as the French version.

I feel we must press to officially declare "O Canada" as our national anthem. There is no doubt in my mind that the euphoria created in this House due to the rather welcome outcome of the Quebec referendum was one of the major catalysts behind the unanimous acceptance of a motion on Wednesday, May 21, requesting that "O Canada" be adopted as our national anthem. I think it is appropriate that positive action be taken, and I hope that members of the House will consider doing so this afternoon.

National symbols such as flags, anthems, and emblems play a very important role in our life. They represent and project an image of our land, they provide us with a link to our heritage, and in this manner give us a feeling of continuity and serve to evoke in each of us a more clear conceptualization of our identity as Canadians.

I also feel that national symbols draw us closer to our fellow Canadians in the realization that we all share many things in common. This was part of Robert Stanley Weir's reason for writing English words to Lavallée's tune. He said:

In 1908 it occurred to me that there was an opportunity, by the medium of music, to supply English-speaking Canada with English words which could be sung to the same melody that our French Canadian fellow countrymen were making use of. With one national song as to music, what mattered if the words differed as regards language.

Let us all, in unison, join with one heart and mind in support of this motion.

● (1620)

In examining the bill before us, I invite all hon. members of the House to take a look in four directions with me.

First of all, this bill causes me to look back. I look back to the time of the birth of our nation. I speak of the crisis of confederation. More precisely, I look at the spirit of confederation. One morning, in designating and identifying what Canada would be, Sir Leonard Tilley turned to psalm 72, verse 8. He shared with his colleagues the following words from the psalmist David "And his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, from the river even to the ends of the earth." "From sea to sea" is the origin of the legend on the Canadian coat of arms.

In the last two decades our self-identity has been enhanced by two other symbols of our confederation. Under Prime Minister Diefenbaker we adopted a Canadian Bill of Rights. While Lester B. Pearson was our prime minister we adopted a new Canadian flag. More recently on May 20, Quebeckers forced us to examine ourselves again and realize afresh that we are a nation. A most fitting national memorial to the occasion of the referendum would be to adopt "O Canada" as our national anthem recognizing that originally a French Canadian had written the anthem for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewycky: Third—actually second.

Mr. Cullen: I thought you meant second.

Mr. Lewycky: Yes, second; I have to be a little slower this time. Second, this bill should cause all of us to look ahead. I think that the spirit, intent and purpose of the bill are praiseworthy. We are doing what we should have done long ago. However, I must say that I see this bill as only a first step. I feel we should see this anthem as an opportunity for creativity. I do not think we can look at this bill as a law of the Medes and Persians which does not change.

Personally I have a little bit of a problem with the music designated in the bill. I would be distressed if Canadians looked at this bill so legalistically that they could not transpose the music to accommodate a lower key and a more normal human range. Recognizing that the cultural occasion and situation of the original composition provided for some one hundred trumpets and brass instruments, even a tenor like myself prefers something somewhat lower for public audience consumption.

As the multiculturalism critic for the NDP, I must also look at the contents of the song. Some amendments in the English version should probably also be made in the future. The words "native land" definitely apply to those of us who were born in Canada and to the aboriginal inhabitants. However, Canada is a land of many ethnic groups. I merely think of the dozen and a half new citizens who received their citizenship papers in Dauphin this last week.

Furthermore, I see no reason why we cannot introduce words in Ukrainian, German, Italian, Chinese and any other language some time in the future.

Mr. Nystrom: And Swedish.

Mr. Lewycky: Swedish, for the benefit of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Surely we can encourage and enhance multicultural creativity in our land of Canada. I think back to a time when our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was headlined in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 11, 1968, under the caption, "Trudeau sees four official tongues if French given recognition." The Canadian anthem should provide in the future a challenge to our pluralistic cultural heritage.

And now, third, I invite the hon. members of this House to take a look within. A philosopher said that an unexamined life is a worthless life. The Quebec referendum has left many positive possibilities and opportunities for action. Families and friends have been split up. Relationships have been broken. Now is the hour of reconciliation. Now is the time for healing past hurts. The Canadian anthem should remind us to look within and to ask ourselves, "What am I doing to promote a spirit of harmony, music, concord and unity in my country?"

Finally, I challenge hon. members to look up. Symbols of nationhood and unity are meaningless if the spirit of cohesiveness and unity are absent. Like Sir Leonard Tilley we need to look up to the source of life and strength. The prayers that Madam Speaker leads us in each day before the doors of the chamber are open to the public must be the innermost longings of our innermost beings rather than a meaningless routine exercise.

In conclusion, I thank hon. members for allowing me to address them by sharing some of my thoughts on why I support the spirit, the intent, and purpose of Bill C-220 respecting the national anthem of Canada.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) for his sentiments in bringing before this House the bill proposing that "O Canada" be declared Canada's national anthem.

I do not wish to be labelled as an opportunist who is trying to talk out this bill, but I think it is too good an opportunity for a person like myself who considers himself to be a patriot to say something about this great and wonderful country of ours.

When I came into this House I questioned the fact that I might not have had enough experience nor had particular expertise as a lawyer, or whatever else is required, to be a good parliamentarian, but I do feel that I have one thing that all of us have, and that is I have experience of living in the greatest country of the world, and that makes me an expert as far as I am concerned on this subject of how one can love this country.

My friend on these benches mentioned something about the fact that so many of our patriots leave this great country and go south of the border. There is an old saying in this country, "If you can't lick 'em, join 'em." So what I did was to join with an American and now she is living in this country with me and enjoying the great fruits of our country. I am not so sure what happens to my children. My father was of German extraction. My mother's family are Scottish; I married an American of Norwegian extraction, so what that makes my children, I am not so sure. But I know one thing, it does make them citizens of the greatest country in the world.

I do not know whether many of you have been in that area of Ontario which has Fort St. Marie Among the Hurons, which is in the Midland area. If you have never been there and you want to experience something worth while, you should visit the fort. It has been completely reconstructed. At first you are shown a movie of the trials and tribulations of the French and the Hurons and all of the things they went through to try to establish themselves in Canada. As hon. members probably know, in order that the enemy not take over the fort, as the enemy approached the Hurons and the missionaries burned the fort to the ground so that it could not fall into enemy hands. At the back of the theatre there are some doors which rise and, just as the film concludes, the last picture depicts the whole fort burning. As the doors rise, the audience, on departure, walk through the flames, which are filmed on the doors. It is a most exciting and moving experience.

Recently I took some visitors from Britain to see the movie and the fort. They told me, and it may sound rather provincial on my part, that for the first time they really understood the French attitude in Canada because this whole story was mainly about the French and the Indians. It was a very moving experience.

I talked about my American experience, and the thing that really impressed me there was the fact that in the city of Minneapolis they have such names as Minnie-ha-ha, Minnetonka, and Scottish names like MacPhail. When you drive down the street you may see a sign which points to a place called Douglas. Then you have French names like LeSoeur, LaSalle, indicating that the roots that were established by the early explorers of this country, the fur traders and other people, have extended right across the continent. I am sure that is why we have this tremendous common bond with our neighbours to the south. We are more alike than we are different, and much of this is due to the kind of heritage that we all have.

I remember when I was reasonably young at the beginning of the Second World War. Some of my relatives said, "Son, just make sure you keep your patriotism in the sole of your shoe." They had been through a war and had seen what happened. They were telling me, "Look, don't get involved in this war," but my patriotism came to the fore. I had no difficulty in volunteering to serve my country, this great country of Canada. After having been in North Africa, Sicily, Italy and northwest Europe, England and Scotland, how proud I was all the time I was in these countries to be a Canadian.

I am going to talk a little bit on how this national anthem came about. It gives me an opportunity to mention my riding in this respect. This national anthem "O Canada" came about because of a contest to try to have a national anthem for a particular purpose some 100 years ago. It is interesting that we have in my constituency the Guelph Spring Festival which each year sponsors a contest to try to encourage young Canadian musicians to go on with their work and become successful musicians.

There has been no doubt for many years that when a national anthem is declared in this country, it will be "O Canada". Both tradition and custom vest it with this distinction, although it never has been acknowledged as such by an act of Parliament or by proclamation. Over the years a solidarity of sentiment has developed in the hearts of the preponderance of Canadians that "O Canada" is our national anthem. As a matter of fact we are not dealing with a consensus that we ought to have a national anthem, rather, we are dealing with a solidarity of sentiment that we already have a national anthem, "O Canada." This sentiment is one that should have a very special meaning for us at this very specific and happy time, when our compatriots in Quebec have affirmed their faith in a united Canada.

"O Canada" is the artistic creation of three men; of Adolphe Basile Routhier, who wrote the French words, of Calixa Lavallée who wrote the music for Routhier's words, and of Robert Stanley Weir whose English lyrics, written for Lavallée's music, is the one among many such attempts around which a solid public sentiment has grown.

I would like to present a brief history of "O Canada". Its origins, I submit, are quite pertinent to our deliberations and I feel that an account of them should be on the public record. The subject is of direct, even personal, interest to Canadians all across the country. Yet the details of the story of "O Canada," while in no way obscure or complex, are not widely known.

Shortly after confederation in 1880, Quebec City was preparing for a great gathering, the first national French Canadian convention. This was to be a great public occasion. The program included a patriotic banquet attended by the Governor General of the day, the Marquis of Lorne, and his wife, Princess Louise. There was also to be a high mass celebrated in the open air by the Archbishop of Quebec.

The committee arranging the congress had plans for commissioning a patriotic song and there was a scheme for holding an open competition. The winning entry would have its first public performance June 24, 1880, the feast of Saint-Jean-Baptiste, for the dates of the convention had been set to include this most important French holiday.

We can all imagine the mountain of details that must have preoccupied the organizational committee. Not only was the occasion to involve the highest leaders of state and church, but many French-speaking visitors were expected from both near and far. We can understand, also, how time slipped by until the group responsible for finding a patriotic song realized that it was too late to launch such a competition. Indeed, that is what appears to have happened.

The next turn of events may inspire gratitude for the foresight of the Fathers of Confederation in providing for the post of Lieutenant Governor. Or perhaps our thanks should be for the good fortune that placed a man on the scene who must have combined a good deal of perception with inventive initiative.

This man was Théodore Robitaille, Quebec's Lieutenant Governor at the time. He was a person well acquainted with events and developments in the Quebec capital. When he learned of the committee's decision to drop plans for developing a national song, he simply took matters into his own hands.

His first move was to approach a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec, Adolphe Basile Routhier, who was well known as an orator and man of letters. Would the judge produce a suitable poem? The judge would; and the judge did. Next the Lieutenant Governor called on Calixa Lavallée.

Now, almost a hundred years later, it is almost impossible to get a satisfactory assessment of Judge Routhier's status in the literary world of his day. This kind of assessment is somewhat easier in the case of Lavallée. He was then the leading musical figure in Canada. He had studied in Europe as well as in Canada and the United States. He had a reputation that was both solid and international.

In retrospect, Lieutenant-Governor Robitaille's commission to Lavallée—a commission to compose the air for a patriotic song—came at a most inauspicious time in the maestro's career. Only shortly before, Lavallée had composed, produced and conducted a musical tour de force in honour of the Governor General and Princess Louise. Although the event seems to have been a success in every other way, it turned out to be a financial disaster for Lavallée.

Calixa Lavallée had read the writing on the wall. To remain in Canada would mean a future of routine teaching and playing. Indeed, at the time of Robitaille's commission, he was on the point of making a decision that too many talented Canadians have had to make since; that decision was to leave Canada for broader horizons and, in Lavallée's case as in so many others, that meant moving to the United States.

But to return to the events of 1880, Lavallée seems to have accepted the assignment with real enthusiasm; to compose a setting for Judge Routhier's poem. And quickly.

Nor did Calixa Lavallée waste any time. Apparently only a week or so went by before he had the music sketched out on paper. He tried the melody out on some of his friends. They agreed. It was the real thing. So Lavallée ran off to have the music copied and placed in the hands of Théodore Robitaille.

● (1640)

As things turned out, the work of Routhier and Lavallée was not performed exactly as had been planned originally, that is, during the outdoor mass on Saint-Jean-Baptiste day. Its debut came the next day at the patriotic banquet attended by the Governor General and by Theodore Robitaille, no doubt in his role as Lieutenant Governor. The immediate response was enthusiastic. Those in attendance applauded. "The new national air is striking and was well received", reported the Quebec Morning Chronicle. Arthur Lavigne, a figure on the Quebec musical scene, rushed sheet music of "O Canada" into print.

And then, nothing. For almost 20 years "O Canada" was seldom heard. Calixa Lavallée died in Boston in 1891 with no inkling of the place his work was to take in his native land. Indeed, the piece was not even listed in the summary of his accomplishments set out in his obituary. And the writer of a biography of Sir Adolphe Routhier which came out in 1898 did not consider "O Canada" significant enough even to be mentioned.

But the words of Judge Routhier and the music of Calixa Lavallée were not forgotten. Their emergence from obscurity was described in a column in Le Devoir on November 6, 1915, by Arthur Letondal, as follows:

> It had yet to capture the public imagination, and this was to take some time. One cannot dictate to a people what its patriotic songs should be any more than one can impose a new work on the language. It takes time and a special combination of circumstances to awaken national sentiment and win its support. And 20 years were to pass before the song again attracted attention. What finally prompted this we cannot say but we do know that around the year 1900, by some sort of mysterious understanding, certain groups . . . began to campaign in favour of what we then called "Lavallée's Anthem". Our concerts and festivals all concluded with the song and enthusiasm for it grew daily. This was the beginning. Editions soon appeared with English lyrics spreading it across the country. It has now been definitely adopted throughout the nation and its popularity is uncontested.

What we might call the first formal or official exposure of "O Canada" in a purely English-speaking event seems to have occurred when it was played during a tattoo at the military camp at Niagara in 1900. The next year, in 1901, "O Canada" was one of the airs played by massed bands as the Duke of Cornwall, who was to become King George V, reviewed troops who had assembled in Toronto from all over Ontario.

Then, five years later, the firm of Whaley, Royce and Company in Toronto published the music with Sir Adolphe Routhier's original French words and an English version by a Toronto physician, Dr. Thomas Bedford Richardson.

During those early years of this century almost a whole catalogue of English lyrics was proposed to be sung with Lavallée's music. The height of this flurry of poetic activity was related to the 1908 celebration of the three-hundredth anniversary of the founding of Quebec.

Mr. Knowles: That is the year I was born.

Mr. Schroder: It is from this period that we date the English version that has come to be so widely accepted across Canada.

The writer of this English version was also a member of the legal profession. He was the Hon. Stanley Weir, who served during his career as both minister and speaker in the Quebec legislature, and also as a judge of Quebec's Exchequer Court. It is his words that English-speaking Canadians associate almost instinctively with Calixa Lavallée's music as the anthem that identifies this country.

There is much more to be said about this anthem's progress in the hearts and ceremony of the Canadian people.

Suffice it to say that there was ample reason for this House to give unanimous approval to the motion of May 21 by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) that the government be asked to prepare immediate government legislation to make "O Canada" the official national anthem of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to take part in this debate on Bill C-220, the purpose of which is to make "O Canada" the national anthem of our country, and I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) on his initiative. I must say that the simple act of introducing this bill in the House is certainly heart-warming to all of us who, in Quebec, have felt great pride in singing "O Canada" for many, many years.

We have just come out of a referendum campaign with great emphasis on Canada, during which our national anthem and institutions were at the heart of the debate; I must say that whenever we met, "O Canada" was very much in evidence, and we are very happy, following the victory of the side favouring a renewed federalism, to have to deal with a bill such as this one in the House.

Mr. Speaker, we must rejoice in the fact that during this referendum campaign, we have witnessed in Quebec an ever growing devotion for the anthem "O Canada", just when the future of our country was not looking overly promising. I would like to add that during this campaign, "O Canada" became a true rallying point, much like our flag, the single red maple leaf, for everyone who expressed their faith in the Canadian federation.

The present circumstances invite all Canadians, particularly the federal and provincial governments, to renew our constitution and incorporate into it forever our attachment to federalism and to our ideal of freedom, as Canadians, and to our ideal of generosity toward human rights. Given this context, we must take action immediately on all fronts, although the definition or redefinition of our constitution would a priori seem most complex.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the proclamation of our national anthem will contribute to create a positive and dynamic impetus which is not necessary for the strenuous task awaiting us in the coming months, but which must be maintained and nourished constantly if we want to convince all Canadians in the west, the maritimes, central Canada and Quebec that in-depth changes must be made in the near future.

At this time, I should like to quote to the House the motion just mentioned by the hon. member, the motion passed on May 21, and explain why it is imperative that we proceed as indicated in the motion, instead of by way of the bill which comes to us, without warning, this afternoon. I quote the motion passed on May 21:

That this House unanimously call on the government to introduce legislation as soon as possible with a view to designating "O Canada" as the national anthem of the country.

By supporting that motion, all parties in the House expressed the wish that the government introduce legislation as soon as possible to make "O Canada" the official anthem of the country. Since the government is getting ready to act to that effect, and implement the motion the House passed unanimously, well, Mr. Speaker, I would much rather vote for a government bill instead of making a decision in this House, this afternoon, with a handful of well-intentioned hon. members, and give that decision which I consider important all the decorum it deserves.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to remind this House that it was as a result of a motion under Standing Order 43 that the Canadian flag was introduced into this House and given the place it occupies on your right; and also that last year, in this House, an hon. member moved, during private members' hour, that Dominion Day be changed to Canada Day.

• (1650)

Well, that hon. members in a spirit of magnanimity and with good intentions should have let such a bill be referred to a committee, returned to the House and then that such a bill should be talked out by some members on third reading, then, Mr. Speaker, if we want to adopt the national anthem I have been waiting for for a very long time, I would like that national anthem to enter by the front door, not the back door. After the decision we took to keep Quebec in confederation, at a time when the people of Quebec decided to go with Canada in terms of their future, I think they deserve to have that decision followed up by an official decision that will give us once and for all the national anthem we have been wanting for several years.

There is no doubt that passing this bill would be just as valuable and as important a decision as if we waited for the government's, but I think the national anthem of my country should be adopted in a bill that could perhaps include an amendment so the name "Dominion Day" would become "Canada Day". That is one thing I hope and I recommend greatly to the government and the responsible minister.

My insistence this afternoon is not to refuse the adoption of the national anthem, my insistence and my participation in this debate is to recognize the merit of that anthem that has been sung for years by generations of Canadians officially or unofficially, that is being sung to the glory of Canada by a Canadian, Roger Doucet, who made it known across the world and to whom I want to pay tribute today, a national anthem that is already recognized internationally and which deserves to come in this Parliament through the front door. Not only do we owe it legally that official status but we must also ensure that "O Canada" is used more from coast to coast in this country. We will be able to do that only if we can build a country of which all Canadians can be proud, a country whose constitution reflects the geographic reality and the democratic ideal that is ours. Our national anthem must become a symbol of the modern Canada we all aspire to, the brotherly Canada we should build together to meet the fundamental aspirations of its citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I am in total agreement with the reasons that prompted the hon. member for Simcoe South to introduce his motion. I support the principle and the aim of his proposal, to give us a national anthem, but I would much rather have that important gesture that is basic to our country's future, a gesture of Canadian unity, proceed within the standards and norms of the great honours that can often be confessed at the right time by this House, and I would invite the government to indicate the time-frame, hopefully short, within which they propose to act on the resolution that called unanimously for the official designation of the national anthem, and hopefully change the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise in the House of Commons this afternoon in the debate on Bill C-220, an act respecting the National Anthem of Canada.

[English]

You might allow me, Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning of my remarks to wear my hat as the Secretary of State, and in reference to "O Canada", to mention that a National Film Board film has won the Jury prize at the Cannes Film Festival. The film that won the prize is called "The Performer", "L'Artiste." It is directed by Norma Bailey. I am especially pleased that the National Film Board won this important prize as we will soon be celebrating, next month, the one-hundredth anniversary of "O Canada".

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, "The Performer" depicts Roger Doucet as he prepares to sing the national anthem prior to a hockey game at the Montreal Forum. My congratulations, and I am sure those of all the members present in the House this afternoon, go out to the National Film Board and to Norma Bailey.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: This is indeed a very important bill and a very important subject matter which has been brought to the attention of the House this afternoon. I would like to say at the outset that the government, indeed, intends to bring in a bill on the national anthem within the next two weeks. While we are in agreement with the general objective that has been presented to the House this afternoon by the hon. member, we do believe the bill should be brought in by the government.

I would just like to refer the hon. member to a motion under Standing Order 43 which was passed in the House and accepted unanimously by all members on Wednesday, May 21. This motion under Standing Order 43 was introduced by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and I would like to read it. I have the French version in front of me.

[Translation]

That this House unanimously call on the government to introduce legislation as soon as possible with a view to designating "O Canada" as the national anthem of our country.

It is indeed our intention, Mr. Speaker, to introduce in this House within two weeks or so, and subject to an understanding between the leaders of the various parties in this House, on the rules of debate, a national anthem bill.

It is my view that at the historic juncture we just went through, it is time that this country had a national anthem.

[English]

I think that it is indeed fitting, a few days after the referendum, and as the country gets into the process of constitutional renewal, and embarks down the road to a renewed form of federalism, that this House take some time to consider some of the national symbols we have, and that we have enjoyed in this country. I believe the hon. member's bill goes some way toward establishing or meeting some of these objectives. I am pleased to see that the bill has received a great deal of support in this House.

While I reiterate to him the government's intention to proceed to introduce a bill to declare "O Canada" to be the national anthem, including the appropriate wording for the national anthem, I would wonder if I could ask the hon. member, in the circumstances, whether he would be willing to withdraw his bill and have the subject matter referred to the appropriate committee of the House of Commons for appropriate study. If this measure met with the general approval of the members of the House the government would be willing to see a motion moved to that effect and the subject matter, as opposed to the bill, sent to the committee for discussion, under the understanding that the government indeed would be moving with its own bill within the next two to three weeks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent for the hon. member to withdraw his bill and that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that this commitment from the government is not only a commitment to present a bill for first reading, but to put the bill quickly through the House.

Mr. Fox: If I might reply to that very briefly, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed, the intention of the government to move a bill and we would hope to see it move through the House as speedily and as quickly as possible. Of course, on this matter, as on others, we are in the hands of parliamentarians on both sides of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement that the mover of the bill may withdraw his bill and that the subject matter be referred to the standing committee of this House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

It being five o'clock p.m., the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 4.30 p.m., pursuant to order made Thursday, May 22.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO LOAN TO CUBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency stemming from an answer last week to my order paper question concerning the $10 million loan at 3 per cent interest to Cuba approved on February 6, 1975, and the answer stating that to this date no payments have been received on time and that Cuba is currently two semi-annual payments in arrears. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House request a full investigation of this unpaid ridiculous-interest loan presumably inspired by a "viva Castro" spirit, that a demand be made upon the Cuban government to immediately bring its payments up to date, that no further loans at such low interest rates be ever issued when the average Canadian struggles with high interest and mortgage rates and, finally, that the government and Crown corporations cease and desist from making any further loans to extremist governments of the left or right without approval being first given by the Parliament of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST TRENT UNIVERSITY STUDY ACID RAIN PROBLEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Trent University, in Peterborough, is now a leading centre for environmental studies in Canada, and because a large amount of office space leased by this government in downtown Peterborough is now vacant because of the cancellation of the Parks Canada regional office in Peterborough, and considering that Peterborough is ideally located among the Kawartha Lakes, and that it is the government's intention to deal with the acid rain issue with the help of regional offices of the Department of the Environment, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That this government give immediate consideration to designating Peterborough and Trent University as the centre for environmental research into the acid rain problem, thus taking advantage of an already leased government building in Peterborough, while at the same time recognizing Trent University as a major regional research centre for environmental studies in Canada.

Madam Speaker: A motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RELEASE OF ARGENTINE PRISONERS HOLDING CANADIAN VISAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I am glad I have the Secretary of State for External Affairs beside me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: In view of the fact that over 40 torture victims being held in Argentine's prisons have been granted visas to come to Canada and have not yet been released to come, despite the efforts made on their behalf by Canada's ambassador to Argentina and by refugee-help groups in Canada, and in view of the increasing number of people being imprisoned and tortured in Argentina, many of whom could be granted Canadian visas, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the Canadian government more actively seek the release of the 40 or more people who have been given Canadian visas but who are still being held in Argentine prisons, and that the Canadian government empower immigration officials to grant visas based on information received by such authoritative bodies as Amnesty International, rather than require individuals to be interviewed personally.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WATERBORNE MOVEMENT OF ENERGY AND OTHER CANADIAN PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of some urgency.

Given the present state of negotiations between Canada and Mexico, and in view of the ongoing discussions between our countries and the state of the deliberations with respect to oil and other general trade imports, and in keeping with the UNCTAD suggested formula of 40-40-20, the percentage for the movement of such goods, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to include in the deliberations the Canadian desire to reserve at least 20 per cent of cargo for transportation by Canadian vessels built in Canada and crewed by Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INCENTIVES FOR GASOHOL PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a motion of urgency under Standing Order 43. Because of the urgency of gasoline supply, and the fact that shortages may occur at any time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the government immediately set yearly goals for ethanol or gasohol production and provide incentives for such production, such as the removal of the excise tax for gasohol gallons and the lowering of the production bond requirements.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROGRAMS FOR JOB CREATION—TABLING OF STUDIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has not produced a full-scale, long-range and cost-effective job-creation program, even though there will soon be close to 1.5 million Canadians who want to work but cannot find employment—almost twice the number of the unemployed during the worst years of the great depression—and given the determination on this side of the House to declare war on the unemployment problem and to have government policies which would create cost-effective real jobs and training opportunities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook):

That this House condemn the Minister of Finance for creating the problem, and that it instruct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to table all of the research studies on job creation and manpower training programs that have been paid for by the taxpayers of this country.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CALL FOR LEGISLATION REQUIRING DEATH PENALTY FOR FIRST DEGREE MURDER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter that is pressing and urgent under Standing Order 43.

Whereas a government in a democratic country has the responsibility to reflect the thinking of the greatest possible number of people, whereas a majority of the people of Canada want the death penalty restored, and whereas the death penalty is a deterrent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House request the government to bring legislation to the House that will require the death penalty for first degree murder.

EXPORT OPPORTUNITIES FOR SOLAR ENERGY AND HYDROELECTRIC PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the developing countries have a need for energy technologies to offset pressure on their balance of payments because of the increases in oil import costs, and whereas Canada has the technology to meet that need, for example, turbines and generators for small-scale hydroelectric projects and photovoltaic, that is, solar-powered irrigation pumps—to name only two projects—and whereas Canada has the lowest trade levels of all OECD countries with developing countries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs examine these two specific export opportunities and devise a clearly defined government program where there is none now to support initiatives in this field.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RAILWAYS

CRITICISM OF PROPOSAL TO INCREASE MOVEMENT THROUGH METROPOLITAN TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that residents of Etobicoke are extremely concerned about the proposal to build a third rail line through their neighbourhood, because of the adverse impact this will have on their safety, the quality of the environment and on property values as a result of increased movement of freight through metropolitan Toronto, and in view of the recent formation of the metropolitan Toronto Rail Action Committee, representing a number of citizens' groups in Toronto with similar concerns, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House request the Minister of Transport to meet forthwith with the metropolitan Toronto Rail Action Committee, so that he may hear their concerns first-hand and the various alternatives which his department might consider in meeting these concerns.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

RECOGNITION OF INTERESTS OF COASTAL PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The provinces of Canada are virtually united in their position that each provincial government administration should exercise control over the exploitation and development of offshore resources. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House direct the Prime Minister, in the interests of renewed federalism, to review the stand taken by the government on ownership and management of offshore resources and recognize the legitimate interests of the coastal provinces.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

POSSIBILITY OF REFERENDUM ON QUESTION OF AMENDING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. I wonder if the minister can advise the House whether he said, during his remarks in Edmonton on the weekend, words to the effect that if unanimous approval by the provinces cannot be found for a new constitution, then eventually some other way such as an appeal to the people will be necessary?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I thank the right hon. member for the question, Madam Speaker. I think the words the hon. gentleman read were roughly what I said. I said that if we were unable over the course of the passage of some years to achieve unanimity among the provinces, that in my view at some point in time there would have to be some other course of action taken.

I was questioned afterwards as to what those possible courses of action were, and I said that it might be that the constitution could be amended with three-quarters of the provinces approving. I was asked specifically, "Is a referendum to the people", if the provinces did not approve, "a possibility?" and I said yes, that would be a possibility.

I would make it clear to the right hon. gentleman that I spoke as a citizen in answer to questions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: —and that I carry no ministerial responsibilities in relation to the amendments of the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON POSSIBLE REFERENDUM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister, who knows a little bit more about ministerial responsibility than his Nova Scotia colleague, whether the citizen from Halifax was expressing the position of the government when he uttered those remarks both during his speech and in the press questioning afterwards?

Does the position just outlined by the Minister of Labour here in the House of Commons, in answer to a question directed to him as Minister of Labour, represent the position of the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would hesitate to add—

Mr. Nielsen: Is this citizen MacEachen speaking?

Mr. MacEachen: —to the very detailed and satisfactory explanation which the Minister of Labour has made to the right hon. gentleman's question. Obviously, the Minister of Labour has said what I confirm, that this matter has not been a matter of government decision up to the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, may I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether, as is suggested in recent news reports—at least in Le Droit—the Government of Canada is now considering or now has under preparation a new federal referendum bill?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have absolutely no knowledge of that preparation and I have not heard about it.

Miss MacDonald: Ask Regan.

An hon. Member: Regan knows everything.

Mr. MacEachen: Therefore, I think the hon. member can conclude that it is not a matter which has come before the Government of Canada within the last few days or since the referendum; indeed, not since the bill was in the House the last time when I heard that subject discussed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF NEXT CONFERENCE

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Now that the Minister of Justice has returned from his cross-Canada tour discussing the possibility of a federal-provincial conference with the premiers, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether a date has been agreed to among the premiers and the federal government as to the holding of a federal-provincial conference.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the Minister of Justice has not yet had a meeting with representatives of the province of Quebec in the round which just concluded. Therefore, it would be my view that until that meeting has been held, or the views of the province of Quebec ascertained, it would not be possible to give a report of that kind to the House.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether the federal government intends to move forward with a federal-provincial conference even if a meeting with the premier or officials of the Quebec government cannot take place.

Further, when the Minister of Justice met with the premiers as a federal representative, did he also discuss with them an agenda? Was the agenda only that of the federal government, or was the federal government also willing to put on the agenda items that the provinces have advocated in the past such as an examination of the division of powers?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, on the first point, I think it is a matter of time in so far as a meeting to be held between the province of Quebec and the federal representative is concerned.

On the second matter, I cannot carry the information any further than I have up to the present time.

ENERGY

EXPANSION OF ROLE OF PETRO-CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker since it is pertinent to my question, I am sure I express the views of hon. members on all sides of the House when I say that we were all pleased to hear the highly imaginative and statesmanlike address earlier today by the President of Mexico.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Now that I see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources clapping, and since the people of Mexico have long since demonstrated the advantage of complete national ownership of the petroleum industry in their country, which is anticipated to bring to the people of that country some $11 billion in revenue this year alone, I would like to ask the minister what early plans the Government of Canada has to implement its pledge to the people of Canada in the election campaign to expand significantly the role of Petro-Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government is indeed committed, not only to expanding the role of Petro-Canada but also to expanding significantly Canadian ownership generally in the oil and gas industry.

An hon. Member: State ownership?

Mr. Lalonde: Various proposals have been considered and are being examined at the present time by my officials and myself. I hope to be in a position to go to my colleagues in the near future, and then announcements will be made in the proper way once the government has decided what steps are appropriate in the circumstances.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, just to be very clear, in replying to questions I put in the House on Friday, the minister's parliamentary secretary said that with reference to a suggestion that Petro-Canada expand its role in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic, it would be up to Petro-Canada to set its own priorities. That was the gist of what he had to say.

If that is government policy, it will simply be up to Petro-Canada to decide whether it is going to expand into all these provinces which do not yet benefit directly from its retail services; or is the minister prepared to tell the House that the government will be, if not instructing, issuing a strong request to Petro-Canada to expand in these areas soon?

• (1655)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have always taken the position that it is not the role of the minister to interfere in the daily management decisions of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Clark: What about Eldorado?

Mr. Lalonde: There are executives and a board of directors of that corporation, and they should be left to run it. However, there are regular contacts with the officials of Petro-Canada. I have had discussions with the president of Petro-Canada in the last couple of days, the opportunity of touring certain parts of Ontario with him, and the opportunity of visiting France with him where we attended certain discussions together.

I would remind the Leader of the New Democratic Party that it is pursuant to a request made by this government that, for instance, Petro-Canda is now studying the construction of a large upgrading refinery in Montreal at a cost of approximately $1.5 billion. This construction is for the purpose of upgrading the oil which comes out of six refineries found in Montreal.

I hope to receive a report from Petro-Canada in the next few months. I hope that after this study, Petro-Canada will conclude that indeed this is a very valid and positive development. This is only one example of the numerous steps which are taken through regular consultation with the authorities of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister has said in his answer that even in this limited area, which I do not by any means totally dismiss, it would take perhaps some three months before any action could be anticipated. In the minister's speeches during the campaign, he said that he would be content if Petro-Canada were to become No. 3 in the industry, which from our point of view is rather paltry because we think that it should be No. 1.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shorten up those questions.

Mr. Broadbent: Given the need to move quickly because, as we all know, oil will go up in value at a constant rate—therefore, the longer we wait to expand, the more we lose in potential revenue—will the government take early steps to request that Petro-Canada buy out one of the other major firms, such as Petrofina which already has a modern refinery in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, even if I had taken part in such discussions with the chairman of Petro-Canada, I am sure the leader of the New Democratic Party would be the first to recognize that it would be extremely inappropriate for me to reveal their contents. I indicated earlier to the hon. member that we have asked Petro-Canada to get involved in the building of a major upgrading refinery in the east end of Montreal. Of course, there are other projects; for instance Petro-Canada is going to participate as a shareholder in the building of the pipeline extension to Quebec City and hopefully to the maritimes eventually. Petro-Canada is deeply involved in exploration work off the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador and it is considering the possibility of reopening the Come-by-Chance plant in Newfoundland. So Petro-Canada is presently involved in all kinds of projects and our objective is in fact to make it the major Canadian oil company as quickly as possible.

SPORTS

ACTION TAKEN BY CAHA ENDANGERING EXISTENCE OF NOTRE DAME COLLEGE, WILCOX, SASK.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister of fitness and amateur sport. Is the minister aware of the problem which exists for the college of Notre Dame, in Wilcox, Saskatchewan, because of the action taken by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association last week?

A motion was passed last week in Edmonton by the CAHA that will endanger the very existence of this world famous Notre Dame College which was founded in 1927 by the late Pere Athol Murray, who was awarded honorary membership to the Hockey Hall of Fame for his outstanding contribution to Canada's national game of hockey.

Will the minister take the action that is necessary to stop this flagrant abuse of freedom of individual choice which could, in fact, close down this great Canadian institution? This matter should be of great concern, not only to the minister and members of this House but to every Canadian.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the problem which the hon. member has brought to the attention of the House. It is certainly true that Notre Dame College, in Wilcox, has made a great contribution in education, as well as in sports, over the years. Apparently, the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association has passed a rule providing that young players in certain age groups cannot transfer from one province to another and then play in CAHA games.

● (1700)

This college attracts a great number of people from outside the province who end up with excellence in hockey and also in education. It is a matter over which the government has no direct jurisdiction; indeed, no jurisdiction that I know of. I will be happy to discuss the matter, however, with the president of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Gustafson: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Is the minister aware of the urgency of this problem? These boys make their home in Wilcox when attending school there. Will he look into it and attend to the situation immediately?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, as I say, I am aware of the contribution since the days when Don Metz and Nick Metz came forth from there to play for the Toronto Maple Leafs, and I am aware of the great work of Frank Germaine who is presently their coach. I certainly recognize that it is an urgent matter. I point out that Cy MacDonald, an excellent Liberal cabinet minister, was a graduate of that university.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: And hockey player.

Mr. Regan: So I assure the hon. member that I am aware of the urgency and I will attempt to see if there is some middle ground that can be found.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FROM LOTTERIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is to the honourable private citizen from Halifax, the sports minister who made a statement in Edmonton. It has to do with lotteries.

How can the minister break an agreement with the provinces which was duly signed by the previous government under the PCO and Department of Justice? I want him to know that his provincial counterparts are calling him a liar. I would not call him a liar—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: —but he cannot play that kind of game with his provincial counterparts.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the excellent hon. member for not calling me a liar, since he says he is not going to do that. It is certainly not the intention of the government to break any agreement at all.

There was an agreement that existed between the provinces and the federal government, negotiated by Iona Campagnola, and the former short-lived Conservative government tried to give away the whole shop by changing that agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I happen to believe that we have a responsibility to the arts and to amateur sport at the national level as well as the provincial level; therefore, if the terms of any agreement that was entered into by the interim government allows us to re-enter the lottery field, we certainly will be exploring that with the provinces in the immediate future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Ten o'clock, Madam Speaker.

FOREST FIRES

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO ASSIST VICTIMS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the suffering and dislocation being experienced by many Canadians because of the disastrous forest fires raging in many parts of Canada, and in view of the expense that these Canadians will face when they try to return home and re-establish themselves, is the government in a position to tell the House what specific plans it has to help these people and, in particular, will the government consider that it has a special responsibility to native peoples, many of whom are involved in this disastrous experience?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I certainly thank the hon. member for drawing the attention of the House to the very real hardship and suffering that is now going on in various parts of Canada as a result of forest fires.

The hon. member knows that the federal government stands ready to assist in situations which are presented by the provinces as being beyond their capacity, and in these circumstances we will also be ready to consider any such appeals.

ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS IN REGAINING REMUNERATIVE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I address my supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that one of the most serious results of the forest fires now raging in Canada could, because of the destruction of so much timber—for example, in the Kenora area—be the loss of employment to many hundreds, if not thousands, of Canadians, what specific plans does the minister and his department have to assist these people in regaining remunerative employment?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I can tell him that during the past two or three days I and several of my colleagues from the cabinet from western Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: It was a very small plane, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: Are you talking about the twins?

An hon. Member: It must have been a two-seater airplane.

Mr. Axworthy: As I was trying to say before the eruption, we spent the last two or three days visiting the fire sites and talking to provincial authorities and people in western Canada to examine the possibility of plans that we could develop for future government action. We had a meeting in Regina, on Sunday afternoon, with federal officials from the joint task force that was established in 1977. That meeting was for developing proposals that will be going forward to cabinet within the next week. It includes an examination and assessment of the problems caused by the very serious fire situation.

I can tell the hon. member that I have never seen anything quite as dramatic or as tragic as the fire situation in my own province, and in Saskatchewan when I flew over. I can communicate to the hon. member that action is being taken. The discussions are going on and officials are preparing a document that will be presented to cabinet at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget Kenora.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FISHERIES—RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the U.S. Senate plans to recess, according to all reports, by the end of June, what steps is the government taking to impress upon that body the necessity of ratifying the Canadian-U.S. agreement which is vital to the management of fisheries on Georges Bank?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, this is one of the most serious bilateral problems facing Canada at the present time, and we are very concerned about it. I am hoping to have the report this week from our parliamentarians who are attending the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Association meeting.

I welcome suggestions from the opposition. We are trying to formulate the best plan possible to bring our views very strongly to the United States Senate. I might say that we have, of course, brought our views very strongly to the U.S. Administration, but that is not necessarily the same thing as creating an impact on the Senate. We would wish to do that as well.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. After the Conservative government brought back the Americans from Iran, Senator Frank Church, head of the Senate foreign relations committee, agreed to put this agreement at the top of the list for ratification.

I ask the minister if he was aware of that fact and, if so, what has happened since that statement was made? Will we have to face the same problem that is presently being faced by Norway, for example, where overfishing has required that country to cut their quotas in half this year? Will we have to face that problem before concrete action is taken to impress upon the Americans the necessity of getting agreement on this treaty?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, one of the most troubling aspects of this problem is the overfishing which is occurring. That was a point which I made very strongly to Mr. Muskie when I discussed the matter with him recently in Brussels, namely, the overfishing by American fishermen that was occurring.

It is not Senator Church who is directly involved with this, but Senator Pell, of Rhode Island, who is the chairman of the subcommittee involved. I suppose he does not regard himself as bound by any undertaking which Senator Church may have given. I can assure the hon. member that we will do our best to have an impact upon the American Senate in this matter.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

PROPOSED MOVE OF WATER TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE DIRECTORATE TO ST. JOHN'S; TORBAY AIRPORT—PROPOSED REMOVAL OF PRECISION APPROACH RADAR SYSTEM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is for the minister of Transport, Madam Speaker. On February 16, 1979, the then minister of transport, Mr. Lang, announced that the water transportation assistance directorate in the minister's department was being moved to St. John's, Newfoundland as part of the decentralization program. There were 29 positions involved. It later turned out that some of the civil servants did not want to move there, but the move was reconfirmed by the minister's predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville, on August 2, a move that was supposed to take place by August, 1980.

• (1710)

Will the minister advise the House whether that move is still going forward or whether he has put a halt to the move, or could he advise just what the situation is.

Will he advise the House also, while answering that question, whether he is planning at the same time to take away from Torbay airport the precision approach radar system, which is now in effect there, that his department plans to remove in June.

One of my questions is a question of removal and the other is a question of moving.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, with respect to the removal, that question is still being discussed in the sense that I am trying to accommodate, in this particular instance, the very well respected interests of Newfoundland and those of my department. If my hon. friend would like to wait a few more days, I will gove him a very definitive answer on that at that time.

On the subject of the instrument landing system, this system is going to be installed during the summer. At the same time the present system which is there but which is obviously inadequate will not be used. However, I understand that this will not create major difficulties.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I gather from the minister's answer that he is reconsidering whether this move of the Water Transportation Assistance directorate will take place, because up to now it has been affirmed by two governments that it would go ahead as part of the decentralization program. What reason could the minister possibly have for the move not taking place, other than the fact that St. John's East and St John's West are seats held by PC members? Is there any other reason apart from that involved here?

Would the minister also tell the House whether there are any other airports in Canada that so badly need every type of navigational aid, as does the airport at Torbay which has a constant problem of fog. I do not want a foggy answer, but I want an answer to these questions. Why is the minister reconsidering this stated government policy through two election campaigns?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am quite sure that my hon. friend would like me to try to combine the interests of Newfoundland with the interests of the Department of Transport. This is what I am doing now.

There has been a change in the functions of the directorate itself, and a reduction in the number of people employed by it. I am looking at all these factors and hopefully will come to a conclusion that will accommodate all interests.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

HIRING OF DEFEATED LIBERAL CANDIDATE AS SPECIAL ADVISER

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I want to ask him about the most expensive "twin" in Canada. Recently the minister appointed a friend, Mr. Doug Lauchlan, who was the defeated Liberal candidate from my riding in Calgary West, as special adviser in the minister's Winnipeg office. He has been appointed with a reported salary of—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is coming to it.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I would like to know how the minister can justify paying an inexperienced special personal assistant $50,000 a year, when the top administrators in his department make $38,300 or thereabouts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is a good question.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, first I would like to correct the hon. member in terms of the sum of money mentioned; it is not that amount of money.

An hon. Member: What is it, then?

Mr. Axworthy: Second, I believe that the hon. member for Calgary West would be the first to accept that it is very important for this government to be able to maintain its contact and its information sources in western Canada.

We announced at the beginning, because of the outcome of the election, that special measures would have to be taken to ensure that we would be able to provide services in western Canada, to maintain contact with a wide variety of interest groups and individuals who want to be served both by the government and by a specific department. That is the primary role the minister's staff has played. It has played that role under every government and it will continue to play the same role under this one. I think we should be thankful that we are able to obtain the services of someone like Mr. Lauchlan, who was the former president of Mount Royal College as well as being a Liberal candidate in the last election.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY WHETHER ADVISORY COMMITTEE CONSULTED ON QUOTA

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the present disastrous growing conditions in western Canada, which could leave the prairie feeder industry without feed, could the minister inform the House whether the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board was consulted before the 45,930 bushel quota per permit book holder was issued?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Obviously, Madam Speaker, I cannot answer this question which is very detailed and presumes information on what went on at the Canadian Wheat Board on that particular occasion. I will consult with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and report to my hon. friend.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, the minister then would not be aware that this quota opened 12 days after the ability of producers to reassign their quota acres had expired.

Was this quota, which denies access of equal opportunity of delivery, issued so that the Canadian Wheat Board could repay the country elevators the stocks of barley that they borrowed last June and July from the country elevator system, which now will cost Canadian farmers and cattlemen millions of dollars?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, in my inquiry I will add the second question to the first.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSED ACTION TO DISCOURAGE INVESTMENT IN FISHERIES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

The newspaper Le Soleil reports that some of his officials in Montreal advised two Toronto companies against investing in the fishery industry in Quebec, suggesting Nova Scotia instead as a site to develop their project valued at some $8 million.

Did the minister read the letter which Mr. A. E. Beauchamp sent to Quebec maritime fisheries director Pierre Vagneux concerning the disappointing and disconcerting attitude of his officers in Montreal or was that merely another dirty trick played against the Canadian government a few days before the referendum?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to report to the hon. member that I spoke about the matter with the assistant deputy minister of our department in Montreal and he assured me that contrary to the allegations to which he referred, my officials encouraged, rightly in my opinion, that company which wanted to set up a processing plant to make fish products to put it up in the Gaspé peninsula or on the north shore rather than in Montreal so that fishermen may also get jobs in the manufacturing sector. They wanted to send them in the maritime area of Quebec. I suppose the company did not like that. It would rather be near the market in Montreal. Personally, I think that manufacturing jobs related to fisheries should be where the resource itself is found.

POST OFFICE

SASKATOON POSTAL DISTRICT OFFICE—ENQUIRY AS TO STATUS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. The minister is aware that the delay in announcing the final decision about the future of the Saskatoon postal district office and the Saskatchewan postal region is causing great concern and discontent among the people of Saskatoon and Saskatchewan. Whereas Senator Argue, who is not responsible to this House, has been quoted as saying that the post office will not move, and whereas the minister has not answered my letters requesting a definite answer to the situation, is the minister willing to tell this House today what the decision is? If not, will he tell us when the final decision will be made?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am glad to say that Senator Argue was right in announcing that no change will take place. I regret to say that it was only in the mind of an opposition member that the possibilities of a change in the number of people to be moved from Saskatchewan to another province was contemplated. In fact, I indicated in this House that no decision would be made before I had a chance personally to assess the situation. I did assess it, and I indicated to my officials that that change should not be made.

Mr. Ogle: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for this clear information that the postal region will not be moved, and I know that is something the people will be extremely happy about. But is the minister aware that such indecision and such insensitivity in not giving clear replies to pertinent questions is causing greater alienation to the people in the west than the fictitious twinning of seats in which defeated Liberal candidates give the impression that they have direct input and control into what Ottawa is doing? Is the minister willing to announce the government's intentions in this House for that part of Canada rather than having the information backdoored through defeated candidates?

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, it is true that some officials of my department, in order to save some person-years, have done studies in order to merge some of the activities of the post office in western Canada. I am very pleased to be able to report that, thanks to what the hon. member described as twinning and thanks to some Liberal senators, such bad mistakes were avoided.

ENERGY

IMPLEMENTATION OF OIL CONVERSION PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister aware, as is reported in Canadian Renewable Energy News this morning, of the high degree of concern within his department that a too quickly implemented off-oil conversion program will undermine gains about to be made in Canada's conversion program?

● (1720)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I understand the question refers to certain concerns within my department about the quick implementation of a certain program. I have received no indication leading me to believe that the quick implementation of the conversion program I announced should threaten anything. On the contrary, that decision was made in agreement with my department, and I am quite determined to put in place as rapidly as possible all measures likely to encourage Canadians to reduce their consumption of gasoline in favour of other forms of energy.

[English]

Mr. Schellenberger: Is the minister concerned about this, because his department has stated it is not ready to put in this program as he intended? Also, is he concerned about the confusing reports given to Canadian people about conversion or conservation?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member must surely be mixing things up. If there are concerns within my department, then the minister reports on them. As far as I know, there are no such concerns. On the contrary, I have received no indication from my officials that there would be any difficulty or danger. I am pleased to inform the hon. member of that.

[English]

REPORTED STATEMENT OF ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, maybe I can clarify the matter for the minister. One of his assistant deputy ministers is quoted at some length in the article to which my colleague refers as indicating that it was the view of the department that you cannot give the public too many confusing signals and that the department had decided it was too confusing to be told to get off oil and to conserve at the same time, although it is hard to understand why that would be too confusing for the Canadian public. Was that assistant deputy minister enunciating government policy when he made that statement, if in fact that statement was reported accurately?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has drawn the particular article to my attention. I will certainly read it. I can at least say that one should not assume it necessarily reports correctly what the assistant deputy minister may have said. Second, if he did say it, I agree with my colleague that I fail to see how it would be confusing to tell the people to conserve and get off oil. I do not see any contradiction between the two.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED SUPPLY OF WEAPONS AND EXPLOSIVES TO NATIVE COMMUNITY IN B.C.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Recently leaders of the B.C. native community made certain allegations that they were offered weapons, including supplies of high powered AK-47 rifles, dynamite and plastic explosives, training in the use of these weapons and money by undercover RCMP agents, including one Warren Hart. Can the Solicitor General inform this House under what mandate these agents, including Hart, were acting, apparently in 1975, whether this was the March, 1975, cabinet mandate and, second, at what level these particular activities were authorized?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do now know if there is any truth at all to those allegations, but if they are to be considered, perhaps they should be considered by the McDonald commission that is looking into other matters involving Warren Hart.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, once again we see the McDonald commission being used to stonewall the political responsibility of the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Will the Solicitor General explain to this House when we can expect the report of the McDonald commission? Will he assure this House, particularly in view of some of the possible political ramifications of the report, including involvement of former Liberal solicitors general, that the full report will be reviewed by either the justice committee, sitting in camera where necessary, or a special committee of this House? In other words, will the full, unexpurgated report of this commission be given to us, not a version which is being doctored by the Privy Council office?

Mr. Kaplan: I have already informed the House, and I believe hon. members are aware, that the McDonald commission will be making its principal report this summer and the final report cleaning up smaller matters will be made public before the end of the year. I expect that all of the aspects of that report that deal with responsibilities of individuals will be made public, but hon. members will understand that, if that report is to be of any value to the government in security work, it will contain recommendations which should not be made public. I understand that the McDonald commission may well recommend which aspects of this report should not be made public, but certainly all those aspects that can be made public will be, and in particular references to individuals in connection with various allegations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED DECISION OF PROVINCE TO RESERVE OIL RIG JOBS FOR NEWFOUNDLANDERS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. According to the press he is quoted as having told a meeting in Alberta that, and I quote:

—provincial moves such as Newfoundland's decision to reserve jobs on oil rigs for Newfoundlanders do more to damage Canada in the long run than any nationalism that has surfaced inside Quebec.

Will the minister acknowledge that, in following the procedures it has, the government of Newfoundland has simply followed the practice in the province of Quebec under legislation which precluded Ontario construction workers from gaining employment in that province?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see such interest in my speech to the annual meeting of the Alberta Liberal Association.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Was the meeting held in a telephone booth?

Mr. Regan: I urge the hon. member to attend the next time and perhaps he will be able to get the answer directly. I do not believe the hon. member's question could be properly answered in the time that could be allotted by the Chair. Let me just say to the hon. member that as a Canadian I happen to believe that the essence of this country is having a common market in which Canadians can move to any part of the country and be employed without restrictions on the basis of what province they come from.

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, I am delighted with the response of the minister. Let me ask him, if I may, what specific steps he proposes to take to ensure that his hopes and expectations for the future of Canadian workers everywhere in this country will be realized, recognizing that the federal government has authority to disallow provincial legislation of this kind.

Mr. Regan: I thank the hon. member, but I am sure he is aware of the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour and its limitations. I assure him that the minister of manpower is very capable of handling the responsibilities of his department, and I am sure the minister would be happy to brief him some time on the responsibilities of his department.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RE-UNIFICATION OF FAMILIES—REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On May 20 the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence put a motion before this House, which was passed, asking the government to bring to the attention of the government of the U.S.S.R. certain aspects about the Helsinki Accord and the reunification of families, specifically the case of Colonel Len Ovsisher, a colonel in the Russian army and a hero who has been refused the right to leave for Israel. I ask the minister whether representations as set out in that motion have been extended to the government of the U.S.S.R. and, if not, when will they be? Is the minister prepared to report to this House at an appropriate time as to the result of these representations?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am certainly prepared to look into that and report to the hon. member.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

RENT INCREASES FOR APARTMENTS IN TORONTO

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. On Friday last I might have given the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) an incorrect impression as a result of an answer I gave him concerning the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Although the leases about which he asked are not with the corporation, the corporation does, in fact, control them through a master lease and is moving to increase rents. However, the hon. member will be happy to learn that a 25 per cent formula gearing rent to income has been introduced and this should assist those who are in need.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask the minister a question in response to what he has just said?

Madam Speaker: I would suggest that the hon. member direct his question to the minister tomorrow. I would be glad to recognize him on that occasion. Otherwise I would have to ask unanimous consent to revert to oral questions in order to enable him to proceed today, and considering the lateness of the hour I think we had better continue with the agenda.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 99, 135, 239, 290, 689, 695.

[Text]

OFFICIAL PASSPORTS

Question No. 99—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 437 of the first session of the Thirty-first Parliament which states, in part, that travelling to certain countries is stamped as restricted only in diplomatic and special passports and not in passports issued to other Canadians, is it government policy that members of Parliament, in particular, should have less privileges than other Canadians?

2. Is such stamping because of no Canadian diplomatic representation in the countries concerned and, if so, in what way could the government be of assistance to persons with ordinary passports in such countries but could not be of any service to members of Parliament with special passports in the same countries?

3. Will the government re-examine the policy introduced by the former government in this regard with a view to changing it?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. It is not Canadian government policy that members of Parliament should have fewer privileges than other Canadians. Members of Parliament, like any Canadians, may travel on ordinary passports to locations for which diplomatic and special passports are invalid.

2. The use of diplomatic and special passports for travel to such places is restricted because travel on official passports is not appropriate to entities whose governments Canada does not recognize and with which it has no diplomatic relations. Travel on official passports, even if ostensibly private, would acquire an official character inconsistent with a policy of non-recognition. This limitation on the use of official passports does not relate specifically to the lack of Canadian diplomatic representation in the places in question, although it is indeed a consequence of non-recognition and lack of diplomatic relations that there will be no such representation.

3. The government has no plans to change this policy.

INCOME TAX—CHARITABLE RECEIPTS

Question No. 135—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past three years, has the government discovered the issuance of false charitable receipts for income tax purposes where the sums of money shown were not given to the charity concerned and, if so (a) on how many occasions (b) what was the total amount and what is the breakdown by province (c) what are the names and addresses of the organizations concerned including the name of the person responsible for issuing the receipt?

2. For the same years, how many persons were charged in each province and, if any penalties were issued, what were they?

3. How many prosecutions are before the courts and how many charges are pending?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes.

(a) Seven charitable organizations have been identified as apparently having issued false charitable receipts.

(b) About $4,000,000 in amounts shown on the receipts; province of Quebec.

(c) Secrecy provisions in the Income Tax Act prevent disclosing the names and addresses of the institutions concerned and persons involved.

2 and 3. One person charged on 247 charges; charges are still pending.

PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE—COST OF MAINTENANCE

Question No. 239—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the estimated cost, by province, of the maintenance of unprofitable passenger rail service?

2. What amount did the government contribute in each of the past five years towards such losses?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Canadian Transport Commission estimates the passenger service losses incurred by federally-chartered railways in 1978 to be $250.7 million. The table shows losses for passenger services aggregated by province. Losses for interprovincial services have been allocated on a mileage basis. The provincial breakdown cannot be interpreted as representing where passenger service losses actually occur. For example CN, CP and Via headquarters expenses all occur in Montreal, but are distributed in the table over-all passenger services. Losses from commuter rail operations are not included. The losses shown are for Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Limited, Algoma Central Railway, Toronto-Hamilton-Buffalo Railway Company, and part of the Ontario Northland Railway. Via's losses for the Western Transcontinental passenger service as paid by Transport Canada are also included from the take-over date of October 29, 1978.

	($ Million)	Per Cent of Total
Nova Scotia	14.8	6
New Brunswick	12.2	5
Quebec	47.6	19
Ontario	108.1	43
Manitoba	17.9	7
Saskatchewan	15.3	6
Alberta	13.9	6
British Columbia	20.9	8

2. Subsidy is paid at 80 per cent of the railways' losses, as approved by the commission. Transport Canada pays 100 per cent of Via's losses. Payments to Via for the Western Transcontinental from the take-over date of October 29 are included in the 1978 figure. Payment to the Northern Alberta Railways Company is included in the 1974 figure. The table shows amounts that are not yet finalized and may well increase by a few percentage points when final payments are made. The amounts paid to date by the government in each of the past five years towards such losses are as follows:

1974	$135,090,600	1977	$198,689,670
1975	$169,244,489	1978	$204,160,267
1976	$193,374,466

The Canadian Transport Commission is currently preparing a breakdown by province of the estimated passenger service losses incurred in the year 1979.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED

Question No. 290—Mr. Herbert:

1. (a) What was the amount paid by the government for the purchase of Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. (b) in what form was the payment made and to whom?

2. Was there any outstanding indebtedness at the time of purchase and, if so, what was it?

3. What was the authorized (a) share (b) issued capital of the company at the time of purchase?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources):

1. (a) $5,271,812.10

(b) Payment was made to shareholders at the rate of $1.35 per share surrendered.

2. Information no longer available.

3. (a) $4,000,000 authorized, divided in shares of $1.00 par value.

(b) 3,887,344 shares

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): 1. Two.

2. (a) Two; (b) None; (c) None.

3. None.

4. $18,000.

Old Age Security Act

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

3. 3.

4. $154,357.00.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM MONTHLY AMOUNT OF SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, when this bill was under debate on Wednesday, May 21, three of us had spoken to it—the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and myself. There is one aspect of this matter which all three of us touched on, namely, the relationship between the amount pensioners have to live on and the level of poverty as established by Statistics Canada.

Those who followed the debate last Wednesday will recall that both of the first two speakers apologized for the fact that pensioners who have to live on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement are being forced to exist on amounts below the recognized poverty level. Incidentally, the poverty level which was talked about last Wednesday is the level established by Statistics Canada, which is the lowest of all the poverty levels which are computed. Indeed, if one looks at the computations of any of the social agencies in any of our larger cities, one finds that the poverty level is much higher.

I appreciated and understood the apology which the other two speakers made for asking senior citizens to live below the poverty line, but I suggested it was not good enough just to try to narrow that gap. The only suggestion made about anyone ever reaching the poverty line was by the minister who thought that possibly by July married couples living in the smaller cities or rural areas would reach the poverty level. I suggested then, and I repeat now, that we should not let this subject of pensions rest until we have established for all our senior citizens a guaranteed level which is above the poverty line. I suggested the other day the figure of 125 per cent. One might go higher but one certainly should not go any lower. No longer do we think of pensions as simply a means of keeping older people alive. Surely we have reached the point at which we assert the fact that older people have helped to build the economy and that they have the right in retirement to continue to enjoy the standard of living they have built up for themselves during their working years. I hope it will not be long before we cease making these apologies for pension levels which are below the poverty line and establish the fact that pension levels should in all cases be above the poverty line.

There was also a fair amount of discussion last Wednesday about the methods of indexing which have been used, and it seemed to be agreed by the three of us that indexing has not worked to give our people the level of pension income they require. I want to make the point again that the fault is not so much with the system of indexing as it is with the basis upon which we started, or in other words the amount of pension income made available at the beginning. One can take the beginning to be at any time—back in 1926, or in 1952 when we moved from the means test to the principle of universality. Take the beginning at any point and it was never enough; if you establish a basis which is below the requirement for decent living, then no amount of indexing by the rise in the consumer price index will place pensions at a decent level.

I say the time has come to establish a level of pensions below which no one should fall, and that the level should be at least 125 per cent of the figure accepted by Statistics Canada as the poverty or existence level.

During the election campaign we advocated not just an increase in the guaranteed income supplement, as does the bill now before us, but an increase in the basic amount of the old age pension. Whereas the present figure is $35 added to the guaranteed income supplement, we proposed it should have been $40 added to the basic amount.

Some will say right away: that is giving it to a certain number who do not need it. Madam Speaker, that problem is with us all the time. The way to correct it is through adjustments in the Income Tax Act which will take money away in large measure from those who do not need it. In my view, there is a world of difference between making people prove their poverty in order to get supplements to their pensions and letting people receive the amount and then dealing with it when they file their tax returns. It is also a fact that no matter where you draw the line—I am thinking now of the guaranteed income supplement—there are always many people above that line who are really in a state of poverty.

I did some calculating some years ago—and my recent calculation leads me to believe that the figures stand—that our senior citizens can be grouped into four categories, and for the purpose of simplicity these categories are in round figures. There are three categories of 30 per cent each, and then there is a 10 per cent category at the top. The 30 per cent at the bottom have nothing else, and that is attested to by the fact that they draw the full amount of the guaranteed income supplement. Then there is the 30 per cent group that has something else but not enough, so they draw a portion of the supplement. At the top there is the 10 per cent group whose income is such that they do not need any increase in the old age security, but the way to deal with those people is to increase the amount of income tax a person pays if he or she draws the full old age security benefit.

But in between the 60 per cent level and the 90 per cent level there are 30 per cent of our senior citizens who are really in trouble. They do not get some of the benefits and prerequisites that go with being a recipient of the guaranteed income supplement. They are just over the line. They find it very difficult to see that some of their neighbours who have a little bit less get something additional and are able to carry on while they are stuck in that category. The answer to that whole problem, in our view, is a position we have taken for a long time, namely, that the best thing we ever did was to put old age pensions on a universal basis, and we should get back to that as soon as we can.

I am going to come back to that before I conclude my remarks, but before I do so I want to speak about some of the groups that are still left without the consideration and the attention they deserve. That group consists mainly of women who are alone or unattached. A good deal has been said about this $35 supplement that we are going to give now, and are giving in many cases to single women. They get $35, whereas a married couple would only get $17.50 each on a monthly basis. But we are still labouring under what I think is one of the most unfair pieces of social legislation we have ever produced in this country, and that is the spouse's allowance. No amount of trying to fix it up, as the former Liberal government did just before it was defeated or as the Conservative government did while it was in power, got us away from the fact that the spouse's allowance continues to be an unfair arrangement. I know this works both ways; it applies to men if they are the younger ones, but there are not that many of them.

According to this arrangement, women in the age bracket 60 to 65 who might be in need get no consideration at all unless they are married to, and living with, an older spouse. The woman in that age bracket who is a widow, divorced or single receives no consideration at all. I know there are a few cases of women in that age bracket who were spouses and were receiving the spouse's allowance but then lost their husbands and now receive the spouse's allowance until they are 65 years of age. That touches only a small part of the problem. That fact that it is done for some widows underlines the fact that any woman who was a widow at the age of 60 or who became a widow before her husband was over 65 does not qualify.

I remember the night when this program was first announced in the election campaign of 1974. I could hardly believe that we were going to bring in a program which would be so discriminatory. It is still there, and I suggest that the time has come to correct that. The only way that it can be corrected is by providing whatever you are going to provide to the spouse between the ages of 60 and 65 without regard to marital status. This business of saying to a woman, "You will get consideration, you will get the pension, you will get the allowance, only if you have a man," does not fit with our thinking today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I urge very strongly that the whole business of the spouse's allowance be reviewed. My view is that what we should have instead is a pension available at age 60 to all persons who are out of the labour market. That would catch the single people and the widowed people, whether male or female.

It would do some other things as well. It would encourage many people in that age bracket to retire and thus would open up employment for younger people. I think that is the direction in which we should move. I understand all the talk that goes on against a mandatory retirement age. We do not have a mandatory retirement age in this country by law, but by custom we seem to have it at age 65. I hope to work a lot longer myself—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I have already gone seven years beyond that age. I press the point as strongly as I can that the right to retire when you want to, freedom to make that choice, has far more meaning if you let people retire early than it does if you talk about the right to go on.

For the number of people who want to work beyond 65, there are many times that number, particularly those in the kinds of industries that are in my constituency, people who have a really difficult time keeping up with the rat race, who would like to be able to retire at the age of 60, but they cannot do so if there is not sufficient income. The answer to that, in my view, is to establish a pension at the age of 60, and I would do it both for old age security and the Canada Pension Plan for all those who are out of the labour market.

If the government is not prepared to take that step all at once, if it wants to move part way, then it should impose some kind of an income test between the ages of 60 and 65—

Mr. Blenkarn: A means test?

Mr. Knowles: I said income test. The hon. member should not get off the point. I say, do not apply a marital test. If I have to explain it again for the benefit of my hon. friend, there is no question where I stand. I do not want an income test at all. There is no point in suggesting it to the Tories because they would not do it, but I suggest to the government that is over on the other side today that if they want to take one step in that direction, it should be to expand what they are doing, which is a pension provided a woman has a spouse, to a pension provided you are in need of it. Let us get rid of the marital test.

Every time I speak on this subject I speak on behalf of the woman. I know the law works the other way as well, that a man between the ages of 60 and 65 gets the spouse's allowance if his wife is over 65 and gets a pension. There are men who are short changed too because of this legislation, but their number is very few. Custom is such that in most cases the spouse's allowance is being paid to a woman because in most cases she is the one married to the older spouse.

While I am talking about the unfairness of our pension system to women, I want to mention again the fact that the Canada Pension Plan does not have any kind of coverage for homemakers. I want to say right away that I think I understand the Canada Pension Plan very well and I am not suggesting that a pension for homemakers should be made part of the Canada Pension Plan itself. But I do think there should be a parallel plan whereby those women who work in the home and make their contribution to our society and our economy in that way should qualify for benefits equivalent to those that are available to women who are working under the Canada Pension Plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I should say that really the trouble assumes large proportions at about the age of 55. It is women from 55 to 65, especially those who are unattached or alone, who have the greatest difficulty, and one of the reasons for that is that in working years they get lower pay and therefore they build up lower pension rights or, in what might be regarded as their working years, they do the job of a homemaker without any pay, without any pension entitlement, and so this all compounds by the time they reach the age of 55 or 60 and they suffer grieviously, as we all know. There are plenty of statistics about this. Plenty of reports have been written by social agencies of all kinds, by government departments, and of course more reports are being produced all the time. But my contention is that it is time something should be done about it.

• (1750)

As I have said, there are other ways in which women are the victims of ideas that we had in the past, but surely we have got over them. A man and wife live together, raise their family and work. The result of it is that the man goes on a pension and the two of them try to live on that pension, and then the day comes that one of them dies. If the wife dies first, the husband's pension is 100 per cent. But if the husband dies first, the widow's pension in most cases is only 50 per cent of the pension that the two of them had earned by their joint effort both in the home and out in industry. This notion is really for the birds. It has got to go.

One of the places for it to go first should be in the public service. We have done a little better for ourselves as members of Parliament. If a member of Parliament on pension dies, his widow receives 60 per cent. That is a little better than in the public service and in most other employment. But even that, I suggest, is not good enough. Maybe some of the members of Parliament could take a lot less so that the widows could have a better pension.

But apart from that, this is an element of discrimination which just seems to be part of our fabric. It was 50 or more years ago that pension plans were produced in some places where there was no provision for the widow at all. It was a man's world. It has taken decades to get women considered as being entitled to something more than they get just because they happen to be attached to a man. As I say, this means we must do something about a plan that is the equivalent of the Canada Pension Plan for housewives or homemakers. We must do something about this business of the survivor's pension. We must take other steps that I have in mind. This has to apply outside of government. It has to apply to railway pensions, both the CNR and CPR. It has to apply to private pensions. Indeed one thing we need to do in the whole pension field is to take a much closer look at what is going on out there in the private pension world. It is just not good enough, they way things are at the present time.

I said earlier in my remarks that one of the reasons I wanted a guarantee of a pension level to be at least 125 per cent of the poverty level is that our concept has changed about pensions. When pensions were first started in this country as a result of the efforts of my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth, in the middle 1920s and a pension of $20 a month at age 70 was produced, there was great rejoicing. One wonders how there could be rejoicing over that amount. But it was a beginning, and it was brought about in a day when it was felt that if we at least kept the old folks going, we were doing something that was half decent. Surely we have gone beyond that now.

I can remember when we were discussing the Canada Pension Plan in committee a few years ago. One member found certain statistics and he said, "If people get two or three pension plans together, they are going to end up having just as much income in retirement as they had when they were working". This particular member was shocked at the idea. What is wrong with it? If people have helped to build our economy to the point that it produces a certain standard of living, why should our elderly people not have the right to continue to enjoy that standard of living? Therefore, I contend that all of our pension thinking, whether it is the old age security plan itself, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, the public service plan, the armed forces plans, the railway plans or private plans, should be geared to the idea of a level of pension that will enable people when they retire from their productive years to continue to enjoy the standard of living they have had during those years.

It is not often that I go to anything that is connected with the Senate. Hon. members are looking surprised—what have I done? A couple of weeks ago an evening testimonial dinner was held over in Room 200 in the West Block for Senator Croll on the occasion of a report in his name that had been tabled. Actually the party was supposed to have been held earlier this year, but we got into an election and the senators put it off. I went to that party, I admit it. I went to the party for the senator.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speeches that were made about Senator Croll. I listened to the very good humour that a number of those speakers had, but then I listened with particular delight to David Croll's speech. He is a little older than I, but not much. At least he was talking about a portion of history in this country from the 1920s on with which I am very familiar. I could go along with everything he said in that speech, but as he got toward the end of his speech he said, if I quote him with reasonable correctness, that there are two diamonds in the crown of social legislation that we have built in this country and do not let anyone take away those two diamonds. Now, what were they? One was old age pensions on a universal basis and the other was medicare on a universal basis. Of course, one can imagine that I was ready to stand up and cheer when I heard Senator Croll say that. He elaborated on what it means to our older people to have the guarantee of pensions. I think it is the finest thing we have ever produced in this country, the concept of universality with respect to old age security. I dislike anything that detracts from that universality. I hope we will take heed of the kind of message that Senator Croll gave that night to those who were in Room 200.

There is a lot of talk and a lot of writing these days, a great deal of it misinformed, about pension plans. One reads headlines in the paper which indicate that a great pension robbery is taking place, that the funds will dry up, that we will go into the red, and all that sort of thing. It is a lot of nonsense, really. Let me make my point by saying this: the old age security scheme in this country is the fairest, clearest and most honest pension scheme we have. Why? Those who are working pay in and those who are retired draw their pensions. There is no question about a fund running dry. The pensions are guaranteed by the government and they are paid out of current production. If one is producing, one pays in; if one retires, one draws the pension. It is clear in the case of old age security. The same principle really applied to the Canada Pension Plan.

There is a talk about a fund, but what really counts is the production in any period of time that will make pensions possible. The same is true of all kinds of plans. Let us not get wrapped up in or too concerned about these stories about pension plans being in trouble. We have a basic concept here that is good with old age security on a universal basis. We have the Canada Pension Plan to provide an addition to that so that part of one's retirement income is on an earnings related basis. We have the other things that they can do to improve the picture by taking care of women in the work force, by taking care of spouses and by taking care of widows. If we just give our attention to this, we can have a plan of which we can be really proud.

● (1800)

I believe as the time goes, mine is just about up, so I will not try to go beyond six o'clock. I simply say again that in my view, as one who has followed this subject for half a century, like David Croll, I believe the best thing we have done in Canada is to recognize that our old people on a universal basis deserve the result of the work they have done. Let us put that principle into practice by making our pension of an amount that will enable our older people to live in security and in dignity for the rest of their years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this House for the first time. I take this opportunity to extend to Madam Speaker, the assistant Speakers and to you, sir, my best wishes and my determination to show a spirit of co-operation throughout Parliament. I am proud to represent the people of Willowdale in our national Parliament, and under different circumstances it would give me a great deal of pleasure to be able to speak about my constituents.

But within the context of this debate on Bill C-16, to increase the Guaranteed Income Supplement for our senior citizens, let me just say this about the people of Willowdale. In my riding there are many senior citizens, many of whom live in homes they built themselves. The people of Willowdale have worked hard to make a contribution to Canada, and they are among the thousands of senior citizens who are watching the passage of this bill with great interest because on July 21 it will mean a few more dollars to help them cope.

For some senior citizens this bill will make it easier to keep their homes, for others it may mean better food and for still others it may mean extra visits to their families. This bill, though, is more important to senior citizens everywhere in Canada. I was pleased to hear in earlier debate that it will receive the support of all parties.

I would like for a moment to examine the broader principles underlying this bill. Canadians are aware of the severe economic challenges confronting all industrialized countries and they realize that Canada is intimately linked to the rest of the world through trade and capital markets. Yet, in the face of fiscal deficits in Canada, and even the possibility of little or no growth this year in our economy, we are increasing this program of assistance to Canadians in need, a program to which this Liberal government attaches the highest priority.

The philosophy behind this bill was expressed in the throne speech which said:

[Translation]

Canadians recognize the need to live within their national means and they understand that in doing so the state cannot meet every demand or satisfy every group. Therefore, in employing the limited resources available, my ministers will help first those who need help most.

[English]

This is a philosophy which I support, because we must strike a balance between fiscal responsibility and assisting those groups in society which are unable to provide for themselves. What does this balance mean to me? It means that, despite the reforms I see as necessary to bring a greater sense of fiscal responsibility to government, it is intolerable that senior citizens are forced to live on incomes which do not provide an acceptable standard of living.

In writing about the plight of the aged, Simone de Beauvoir said:

We are told that retirement is the time of freedom and leisure: Poets have sung 'the delights of reaching port'. These are shameless lies. Society inflicts so wretched a standard of living upon the vast majority of old people that it is almost tautological to say 'old' and 'poor': Again, most exceedingly poor people are old.

● (2010)

Throughout this debate, Mr. Speaker, it is almost as if aging were a new problem. We have heard the shocking statistics, and we have been told of the terrible plight of one group in particular, elderly women, especially widows and other single women. From all the numbers we have heard it is clear that our senior citizens need help. There is an urgent need for this bill and indeed, for much more than this bill.

I was glad to hear the minister say in her remarks in this House that this bill was only an interim measure to alleviate the situation of pensioners until greater assistance can be given. Let us therefore look at the context in which pensioners and senior citizens in Canada today are required to provided for their retirement. In particular I should like to discuss pensions and the broader aspects of reform that I perceive to be necessary.

As hon. members are aware, Canada has three basic ways in which it provides retirement income. One is through the Old Age Security Act, of which this GIS is a part. Another is the Canada and Quebec pension plans, and then there are the private pension plans, both those which are employer sponsored and individual plans such as RRSPs.

As hon. members also know, the Canada Pension Plan has problems, the most urgent coming from projections contained in the Lazar and other reports. They show that the Canada Pension Plan funds will be depleted by the end of the century. To make the plan fully funded it is estimated that contributions must be increased from their present rate of 3.6 per cent to 6 per cent first of all, and perhaps to as much as 9 per cent or 11 per cent in the near future.

There are, as well, very serious problems with our private pension plans. Less than 40 per cent of the entire working force is covered by private plans and there is little or no protection for part-time labourers, including many women. Figures for 1975 show that 81 per cent of unmarried women, 74 per cent of elderly men and 60 per cent senior couples receive no private pension income based on the work they have done throughout their working lives. In fact Canada has one of the lowest rates of coverage by private plans in the western world. Many of these plans have no portability, and three-quarters of the employer sponsored plans in the private sector require at least ten years of service and/or 45 years of age before pension benefits become those of the people who contributed to them.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Peterson: Right. I cite just one case illustrating the urgent need for portability in our pensions, Mr. Speaker. A woman I know worked for 26 years for a company in Manitoba. That company moved from Manitoba to Saskatchewan, but the woman could not move because of her husband's job in Manitoba. In spite of the money she had invested in her pension plan over 26 years of work, she got only a paltry pension. This is only one example of the many problems of vesting created by our pension plans today and the lack of portability.

As a result of these problems, only 12 per cent of the income of our senior citizens—12 per cent, Mr. Speaker—comes from private pension plans. Nearly half of all income for seniors comes from the public sector, the old age security benefits. I think it is unfortunate that private pension plans have not responded better to modern working conditions. It is estimated that Canadians now change jobs an average of seven times during their working careers. At the same time inflation shows no signs of abating to zero. Pension plans must be designed to react to these realities which working Canadians face every day, if we are to have valuable supplements to the public pension system.

These problems which I have outlined mean that Canadians have less confidence in the private system, less encouragement to save and invest for their future than if a decent return on their investment were assured.

I strongly believe that the pension system will work best when there is a healthy mix of private and public plans. Where possible, people have a responsibility to look after themselves and I endorse the notion that people should save and invest throughout their working years in order to provide for their retirement. But saving and investing will mean nothing if inflation eats into their income and if they lose their contributions because they have changed jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: Our current system of providing retirement security for Canadians cries for change and reform. We have 2.3 million seniors today; in 20 years the number will reach 3.4 million, and six to eight million within 50 years. Within 50 years there will be 2.5 times more senior citizens in relation to our working age population than there is at present. We have only a few years now to deal with the dramatic problems that this change in our society, the composition of our work force, is going to create.

Without drastic changes, employer sponsored plans, particularly in the private sector will provide only minimal benefits, locking people into unwanted plans because of onerous vesting provisions, ignoring large parts of the work force, especially women and part time or seasonal workers, and offering little protection against inflation.

The Canada pension plan will become grossly underfunded. The clear message is that Canada will not be able to provide the necessary dollars to meet even the most parsimonious needs of our senior citizens.

[Translation]

I would like to quote from the report of Senator Croll, because I believe it gives an accurate summary of the problem. He said:

> It is a tragedy for senior citizens, as well as a blot on the national conscience that so many old people are being denied a reasonable share of the good things produced in a wealthy and dynamic society.

The senator went on to say:

> It should also be borne in mind that the magnitude of the problem will certainly increase unless some remedial action is taken.

Mr. Speaker, where are we going now?

[English]

I welcomed the announcement in the throne speech of a national pension conference this fall. I was further encouraged when the minister said last Wednesday in this House that a broad cross-section of interested parties, including pensioners, would participate. The national pension conference is one of the ways we can make the phrase "renewed federalism" mean something tangible for senior citizens right across Canada.

I should like to make some comments about the remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), a man who, I am glad, and I am sure all of us are, to see back in good health and back in opposition because of his very great contributions. I do take issue, however, with what he said last Wednesday, and I quote:

> When the minister talks about the national pension conference, I gather she sees that as the substitute for legislation.

And then he continued:

> An increase of $35 a month does not amount to a pensions policy, nor does the holding of a conference. The issues have to be dealt with.

I agree that an increase in the GIS is not a policy in itself, and we have not claimed that it is, but I do not think we should dismiss the conference as a substitute for action. It is, rather, as I see it, the spark for action, the start of legislation. I think that conference will be very important because it will bring together all those responsible for the pension system—government, private companies and pensioners—"to sit down to work out new directions." This is the best forum to deal with the issues. I expect very positive legislation is going to result from this conference.

We have, as others have pointed out, done much of the field work. Now that we have a good idea of the problems, we have to get to work and hammer out the solutions. Without prejudging the results of that conference I should like to make six suggestions.

● (2020)

First, employer sponsored plans must be revised to allow national portability.

Second, private plans must be changed to improve coverage, indexing and adequacy, and private pension plans will have to come up to scratch.

Third, I hope the conference will look favourably upon the Croll report recommendation calling for larger contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, otherwise it will be under-funded.

Fourth, the national pension conference will undoubtedly raise important questions about the revenue raising powers of Canada's three levels of government. In this light it is essential to remember that, except for Switzerland, Canada is the most fiscally decentralized of all the countries in the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development.

On the average, tax revenues of local or regional governments among OECD countries are only 44 per cent of that of the federal government. In Canada this figure is 88 per cent.

I believe that the federal deficit cannot be balanced by fiscal management and restraint alone. The question of fiscal powers must be raised early at a national conference on revenue sharing. It is critical to the building of a new Canadian federalism.

Fifth, Senator Croll recommended against compulsory retirement at age 65. Age does not mean that one is unfit to serve or that one is unfit to work. We must adopt a flexible plan with respect to retirement age.

My final point is one raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is admired and respected for his work on behalf of retired citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: He recommended legislating a pension level of 125 per cent of the poverty line, and made suggestions about the type of indexing that should be used in calculating pensions.

Let me say that I trust that all of us recognize the very real economic needs of our senior citizens. We want to do something for them. The points mentioned are ones that should be at the forefront in our pension conference this fall, and we must find a way to pay for them. This, of course, relates to my point about revenue sharing. Under the current system the federal government would have to bear the full load of any increase. This would be the same with the Canada Pension Plan. The rights of our senior citizens and the funding of the programs to support them should not be left to the federal government alone.

[Translation]

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I support enthusiastically the increase in the guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens not only as a necessary measure, but as one which will give rise to a new era of reform.

Our aim must first of all be to enable senior citizens to live in dignity and security without fear of being pursued by poverty every time they go to the supermarket or to the doctor's office.

[English]

But, Mr. Speaker, when we have achieved these measures, when we have achieved all these reforms, we will have taken only the first step, that of helping provide financial security for our senior citizens.

The second step, a step even more important than the first, involves a complete change in our attitude toward our senior citizens. They must not be "out of sight, out of mind". They must not be relegated to the ash heap of uselessness. Until we have learned to tap fully the resources of our elderly, their wisdom, their experience, their love and their concern, until we allow seniors a more useful role in our society and until we have taken the second step we, as a nation, will have fallen far short of our great potential.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, one way that history rates civilizations is to determine how the old, the physically and mentally disabled have been treated or are treated. When we look at some of the civilizations of the past, we deplore things such as the killing—even though they call it mercy killing—of people who are disabled, sub-normal, crippled or old. Our civilization will be rated by future historians on how we treat our senior citizens and how we treat our crippled and our disabled, whether they are disabled physically or mentally.

I will not be too long tonight because I know there are many other members who want to make a contribution to this debate, but I do want to deal with about five or six items that come under the principle of this bill.

The first one was dealt with by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) under the topic of universality. There was a time when I was very vocal in regard to universality, and I felt that the pension was the right of citizenship and that everyone should receive it. I have changed my mind, for two reasons. In the first place, the government is short of funds. The government has to establish priorities. When priorities are established, it is not always that senior citizens or the disabled who get high enough on the list.

When I enter a home of a senior citizen who has worked his entire life in a coal mine, I find that in the last three days of the month that person has to eat bread and soup occasionally because his pension has run out. Then I look at those who are in that upper group, the 10 per cent or 15 per cent of people who do not need money at all. Even though they pay some back in income taxes, they do not put it all back. Because of these two things I have come to a conclusion that a better policy than universality would be to keep the same amount of money for this particular vote but to distribute it on a different basis so that those who needed it would get it, and those who do not require it at all would not get it.

I know there are many people who are over the age of 65 who have not applied for the old age pension, and properly so in my view. They do not need it, they are still working. I can see no reason to pay a pension to people who are still working. We talk about leaving the choice of retirement at age 65 or at whatever age a person wants to retire. That fits right into my philosophy of life, freedom of choice, which is part of the philosophy of the party I represent in this House. But if we are going to say that people who are able and who want to will continue to earn wages well past the age of 65, then I can see no reason at the same time to be paying them a pension out of public funds because they are senior citizens. I would much rather that that money be distributed to those who need it so that our senior citizens will not have to live during the last four or five days of the month on dry bread or watered-down soup.

We have to be realistic about dealing with this matter of universality. I can see no reason to pay the pension to those who are well off and who are well able to live without it and, at the same time, not pay enough to those who really need it so that those people can at least live reasonably well through the period in which that pension is paid.

I have changed my mind about the pension being a right of citizenship. I do not want to go back into any rigid poverty means test. I simply say that those who are working and continuing to earn good wages after 65 should not, in my view, be drawing the old age pension. That money, whatever amount, would bring into the pockets of those who really need it a little bit of extra cheer, without costing the government any more if the priority prevents the government from increasing the amount of money for this particular vote.

The second item that I want to deal with is directly in connection with the guaranteed income supplement as set out in this bill. During the election there was a good deal of misunderstanding. Many people said, "we will be getting $35 each after the election if Mr. Trudeau is elected." According to my understanding of the bill, that was right. I said, "yes, I believe that is what is planned." It has been rather sad for many married couples to find that it is $35 per household, or $17.50 each. It will certainly be helpful and help those who are having a difficult time, but it is another aspect that I do not like.

One married couple said to me, and I was horrified when they said it, "We could very easily separate and get $35 each." I hope the department will keep very close tab on that particular item. The laws of this country should be encouraging marriage, not separation, or common law which is becoming more acceptable and more common in many areas.

In my view we should be sticking to the family which is the foundation of this nation, encouraging the family to stick together, work together, and, as I often said, pray together. When we pay so much per household, it has an adverse effect. When we pay $17.50 each to a married man and a married woman, both of whom are pensioners, and pay $35 to a bachelor, it does make our senior people think.

I would like the government to think that problem through and see if there is something that can be done to do away with this aspect that many people feel is discriminatory. They are all old age pensioners, yet they are being paid different amounts. Many of them have the same expenses, the same rent and everything else, but they get a different amount of money. I hope that our legislation will not drive married people apart but will be aimed at keeping them together to the greatest degree possible.

The third item I want to deal with in connection with this bill has already been mentioned by other speakers, that is, those who do not qualify at all. They feel that this is discrimination. Take the spinster who is 58 years of age. When she reaches 61 or 62, she still gets nothing. She has to wait until she is 65 before she can get any assistance.

What about the widow whose husband died when she was 58 and he was 59? She has raised her family and now she is alone. She will get nothing until she is 65. This is a sad group, an unfortunate group to be in. Such a person would look at her sister or brother who happens to be married, and would see that they get enough at least to keep them alive. Some of these people feel bitter. Some have said, "Why didn't the spinster who worked all her life provide for her old age?" There are many reasons. Many of these people are spinsters because they were providing for a widowed mother or a disabled father, or for a brother or sister who was unable to look after themselves. They sacrificed their life earning and providing and keeping a home through all those years, until they suddenly found that they were old. But for them there is no help until they are 65.

Rather than universality, giving something to everybody, I hope that we will try to give something, even though it is not the greatest possible amount, to those who need it. There are those who have planned for the future who today are having a nightmare of frustration. They worked hard all their lives, built up a farm or a business, and now they are ready to retire. They think they have enough put aside. They paid taxes throughout the years. Now they feel they are able to retire and live on what they have provided for themselves.

When they go to sell their farm or their business, the government steps in and says, "Just a minute, we want half of that to be taxed as capital gains." They have already paid their taxes throughout the years, paid it on every cent they have made. They have been scrupulously honest. Now their government is taking another handful.

It has reached the point where one farmer in my riding said to me, "Now I am on the poverty line, all my plans have been cast aside because this capital gains stuff came in." It not only kills initiative, but it ruins the hopes and the plans of people who have built and worked long hours and long days, in many cases without holidays. They did this in order to build up something for their old age, but now they find there is not enough there.

One of the last speakers mentioned inflation. If we need to have capital gains, and I do not think we do—I would like to see it done away with entirely—why do we include the inflationary aspect when we start to value capital gains? A businessman said to me he would not have minded paying on the true capital gains, but he had to pay on the inflated value. We index pensions but we do not index capital gains. There has to be some fairness in this. If capital gains were eliminated, many businesses would expand. Many senior citizens would be able to retire. If this were to happen on the farm, a young man could farm more land, raise more cattle and more food. It would be a boon to the economy. As long as we keep capital gains over the heads of people, they are not going to use that initiative.

● (2040)

As I think I told this House before, one businessman said to me, "I'll work 14 hours a day to build up something for my wife and my children, but I am not going to work 14 hours a day to build up something for some blankety-blank government." He was not referring to any particular stripe of government, just government which would take part of the earnings he built up for his old age. Well, they did plan, but it hasn't worked out. Small businessmen face the same thing.

Small business—the last member spoke feelingly about encouraging business to provide a pension plan of some type—is faced with the problem of just staying alive without including anything else. If we are to have pension plans in our small businesses there has to be some government encouragement, not government help but government encouragement. Just look at the figures presented by the government the other day. There were 5,000 bankruptcies in the month of April alone. Five thousand businesses went under; those were businesses without any retirement plan. It is said that the best of plans sometimes go astray, and I can feel the bitterness from some of our people who have planned and worked only to find that through no fault of their own they are left in a precarious position in the senior years of their lives.

The next point I would deal with is the matter of social legislation. In this country we are getting to the point at which we are including everything under social legislation, including veterans pensions and pensions for prisoners of war. Veterans pensions should not be under social legislation, neither should pensions for prisoners of war, veterans and their dependants. That is not social legislation. That is a national obligation. These people left part of their lives on the battlefields so that we could live a life in freedom with our own government. Then we put them under social legislation. It is not social legislation at all. It is a national obligation. We say we will pay so much to widows of pensioners who were getting less than 47 per cent, down to 37 per cent, so that in five years they will be able to get their proper pension. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it is realized how old these people are. Some of them served in World War I, and others in World War II. They haven't long to live. We say to the widows, "Wait for another four years and then you will get the pension your husband would have received had he lived." I do not think we should include veterans and prisoners of war under social legislation at all. It is a number one national obligation which we owe to these people.

The last point I want to mention concerns the way in which we work out pensions. It is a type of universality, I suppose. To get back to the point with which I started tonight, I think history will decide whether we are in the high category, the medium category or the low category when we are being rated according to the way we treat our senior citizens. I am not referring to the rich; they can look after themselves. I am concerned with those who are not able to look after themselves, those who made plans which went astray, or those who did not make plans but who are human beings, and the group of women who are in that category but who get nothing until they are 65. They are too old to work so we tell them to go on welfare after they have spent their lives saving money for the government because they continued to work to look after a disabled brother, mother or father.

I will support the second reading of this bill although I do not like the division of the $35 a month between a married couple. I think it is going to drive some families apart. But every bit helps. I went into a home in my riding. A man who spent 50 years working in the coal mines was eating dry bread. I felt a lump come into my throat: after all those years, this fine man who raised a family, could only afford to eat dry bread. He did not have any money left from his pension. We can do better than we are doing. If the government cannot find extra dollars to help these people, let us forget about the extra 10 per cent or 15 per cent at the top, those who don't need the money. Let us distribute that amount, at least, to those who are in dire need. We will be helping to raise the poverty line. Let us make sure that when history rates us we won't be at the bottom of the ladder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on the second reading of Bill C-16. I must also say, that I feel very close to this issue. As many hon. members may know, I was a family physician before the last election. But what they may not know is that my practice was largely dealing with the elderly. So you see, Mr. Speaker, I feel I have a good first-hand knowledge of the problems faced by the elderly as they relate to health and also social security measures.

I think every hon. member realizes the gravity of the problem of maintaining a decent standard of living for our senior citizens. The situation is especially acute in times like the present when governments must walk a fine line in terms of aiding those hurt by inflation and of fuelling the fires of inflation through increased government spending. In the Speech from the Throne it was recognized that, "Inflation strikes hardest at the aged and those least able to take care of themselves." It is precisely in view of this that the government is proceeding early with the proposal to raise the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month.

There is no doubt that there is a real need for increased assistance to our elderly population. I would like to illustrate this fact with a few startling statistics. As many in this House may know, we have in our country approximately two million persons currently receiving the basic old age security pension. But what many may not be aware of, however, is the extent to which these old age pensioners rely on the government to provide additional income assistance through the GIS program. For example, over a half of all old age pensioners have little or no income apart from the basic pension. In December, 1979, 807,000 elderly persons were receiving a partial income supplement. Even more indicative of the vulnerability of our older population is the fact that an additional 381,000 were receiving the maximum benefit payable under the guaranteed income supplement. In other words, about 17 per cent of all pensioners rely solely on the federal government to provide them with the income they require.

The minister has indicated that we are falling short of the mark in guaranteeing our elderly population an income which is at least equal to the poverty level. I say that this is only the first step in bringing our elderly just up to the poverty level. This is only a first step and I support the legislation before us for that reason. The poverty level particularly affects single pensioners, and they are predominantly women. It is in an effort to bring these people closer to that mark—the mark of the poverty level, that they may live their later years in some semblance of dignity and independence—that we are seeking approval of Bill C-16 today.

Bill C-16 is not a complex piece of legislation. In general, the bill directs additional financial assistance to the low income, elderly population and, in particular, to single elderly people, who do not benefit from the combined effects of two OAS pensions and two GIS benefits.

The GIS rates, established under the Old Age Security Act, are adjusted quarterly, in accordance with the consumer price index. The maximum rate, for the quarter commencing April 1, 1980, is $153.35 a month for a single pensioner, and $127.51 a month each for a couple where both are pensioners. Up to these rates, the amount of GIS payable depends on the pensioners' monthly income from other sources. Bill C-16 provides that, in addition to the normal indexation made for the quarter commencing July 1, 1980, the maximum monthly GIS rates will be further increased by $35 for a single pensioner, and $17.50 each for a pensioner couple, or $35 per pensioner household. This increased benefit will be subject, to the normal quarterly cost of living increases, Mr. Speaker.

The proposed amendment to increase GIS and SPA benefits will provide an additional $35 per month for each household receiving GIS, or GIS and spouse's allowance payments. For a two pensioner couple receiving GIS, or an OAS-GIS pensioner with a spouse receiving SPA, the increase will be $17.50 on each monthly cheque. Single recipients will receive $35 more each month. The larger proportional increase for unattached pensioners recognizes the fact that basic costs for one person, living alone, are proportionately greater than the expenses for two persons living together.

The Department of National Health and Welfare estimates that, as a result of this bill, an additional 45,000 pensioners and spouses will become entitled to partial GIS and SPA benefits. With the rise in the maximum GIS and SPA levels, these persons, whose other income was too high previously to qualify for GIS or SPA benefits, will now become eligible for a monthly benefit of up to $35. As well, Mr. Speaker, OAS pensioners and spouses whose income level is too high to qualify for GIS or SPA, will not be affected by the increase.

It is important to note that this proposed increase will be in addition to the regular quarterly indexation made in accordance with changes in the consumer price index. In essence, the proposal represents an increase in the real value of the GIS and SPA benefits of all eligible recipients.

In total, there will be an increase of approximately $345 million in the hands of low income, elderly Canadians for the balance of the 1980-81 fiscal year, and approximately $525 million in 1981-82, the first full fiscal year for which the increase is in effect. In terms of the estimated number of elderly recipients benefiting from the increase, the figure for 1980-81 is 1,379,000, and for 1981-82, 1,443,000. The bottom line, of course, is the amount of expenditure in total that the government is allocating toward meeting the needs of senior citizens. The figures for total spending in the old age security, guaranteed income supplement and spouse's allowance programs for 1980-81 are $7.5 billion, and for 1981-82 $8.5 billion.

So, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, the government is directing a very considerable portion of its budget as part of a continuing commitment to the elderly. The $35 increase in the GIS is a much needed and significant step on the road to providing more economic security for senior citizens. In view of this I am sure members opposite will be delighted to support a measure which helps assuage the vulnerability of older people living on fixed incomes.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my comments to future problems relating to income security for the aged. The government has already taken steps in this direction by calling for a national pension conference in the fall, but I firmly believe that we must act with the greatest dispatch in addressing this problem. At present, Canadians over 65 constitute approximately 8.7 per cent of our population. In 20 years this figure will rise to 13 per cent, and by 2031 it is estimated it will hit 20 per cent, almost three times the figure at present. As well, the ratio of Canadians aged 65 and over to those aged 20 to 65 is 15.60 per cent—that is more than six workers per pensioner. By the year 2031 this ratio will be 33.37 per cent, or less than three workers for every pensioner. So it would appear that the tax burden of the Canada Pension Plan will more than double in the next 50 years. The time to act on this problem is now, Mr. Speaker.

I think a good starting point from which to initiate discussion is the Report of the Task Force on Retirement Income Systems. While the report does not make specific recommendations, it does outline a broad range of policy alternatives that might be considered to upgrade the system. The main findings of the report are outlined in relation to the two main objectives that underlie the current pension system. These are: first, to alleviate poverty among the elderly; and second, to assist and/or require people to defer consumption during their working years through taxes, pension contributions and savings in order to ensure that the living standards they experience during their work years are maintained adequately after retirement.

Among the findings of the study were that only 48 per cent of workers were members of employer sponsored pensions plans in 1976. Many of these will never collect an adequate pension because most plans are not portable. Rules regarding an employee's right to ownership of pension credits, known as vesting, are too stringent. Moreover, the after tax income of the elderly is only about 40 per cent of younger persons. For example, in 1975 average elderly income was $4,620 after tax; compared with $11,870 for the non-elderly.

The report also notes that more than half of Canada's retired persons collecting pensions also receive guaranteed income supplements, additional benefits paid to needy pensioners. It is stated in the report:

> This makes clear that many people who were not in financially tight circumstances during their working lives find themselves in that situation after retirement.

As well, it states that the Canadian employer sponsored pension system is behind most other western industrialized countries in terms of coverage and vesting provisions.

Another of the findings was that fewer than half of workers with employer sponsored plans have survivor benefits, leaving widows without any extra support in their later years.

Also, up to one half of middle-income earners making between $12,000 and $24,000 will see a significant drop in living standards after retirement unless the public and private pension system is reformed. In addition, it says government could provide more subsidized housing for the elderly, and raise old age pension and supplementary benefits payments based on wage increases.

The report also proposes compulsory establishment of an earnings related plan on an indexed scale, possibly through expansion of the Canada Pension Plan. The CPP, which pays a monthly pension of about $244 to contributors and their survivors, is based on earnings.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to dwell for a moment on the issue of health care delivery for the elderly. I believe it is an integral part of a comprehensive package of security for our senior citizens. When we are talking about financial security for senior citizens, we have to consider the total social security for senior citizens. As I have mentioned, this has been an area of vital interest to me. As the percentage of people over 65 increases, we will be faced with a vast array of problems relating to health, aging, poverty, institutionalization, isolation and depression. In my view the health care system must be sensitive to the special needs of our senior citizens and adapt to these needs rather than having the elderly adapt to the needs of the health care system.

None of what I have just said is new, since health care officials and the public have been aware of the problem for years. But time is catching up with us, and this awareness must be translated very soon into action.

To sum up, the same applies to the need to reform the system of retirement income. While Bill C-16 helps to redress some of the immediate financial difficulties now being experienced by segments of our elderly population, we must direct our efforts, in consultation and co-operation with the provinces, toward finding a long-term solution to this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about what has been said on that very important legislation. My colleagues will no doubt support the policy of income supplement for a group of individuals for whom we have the highest respect and consideration. I think that we are dealing with people who deserve the attention of all hon. members not out of charity but respect for the contribution they have made to our history and life as many others have. I am not speaking on behalf of the thousands of unemployed but of those who are enjoying a well-earned retirement. Most of them are very concerned and are experiencing some problems because benefits have not kept pace with the cost of living increases, as measured by the consumer price index.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to repeat how pleased I am to say a few words about that proposal, but I am not convinced that if there had not been elections last February such amendment would have been made so early. One thing I would like to say is that, as a government, we had made a commitment. The former minister had already shown his interest in discussing all these social issues at a conference with the provinces. Also, in reply to questions asked, he undertook to initiate a full review of the hardships of our senior citizens. And since the costing method did not seem as fair as it could be, it was clear that we were preparing a full scale study with a view to improving the situation.

I think it is desirable to increase the benefits by a reasonable percentage in view of the poverty line. It is clear, and the minister recognizes this, that even with this increase, thousands of people will still be below the poverty line. I do not think we can be proud of the fact that we cannot act fast enough to help these people out of this situation, because there are indeed thousands of senior citizens who are having problems. I remember, and I think that we must recall the period in which those $35 were promised. As I said, we will heartily support the bill because we ourselves had already thought it was absolutely necessary to readjust these rates. But I remember that it was quite an electoral gadget during the campaign, Mr. Speaker, in my own riding as well as in others, and I remember my colleagues on the other side coming to my riding. I found it unfortunate that senior citizens were led to believe those $35 were reason enough to support the party which got elected. To me, this looked regrettable, as I said then and I repeat it tonight, that they go and tempt the people with their concerns, that they use that $35 promise: If you elect a Liberal government, you will get $35 more. Of course, we could not say that the previous government was seriously considering this, that there was an in-depth study of difficulties faced by those people, difficulties that are still and will be faced despite the increase.

We will not oppose the $35 increase, of course, but nonetheless we know that it was an electioneering gadget! I for one was shy of discussing this, as on a number of occasions I was called upon to say if we were going to give these $35. We could have said for purely political and partisan reasons that we would be offering $50. It would have been easy, but we knew the conditions, the economic situation left by the former government. The minister of finance was aware of this problem, and so was the minister of national health and welfare. We thought that savings in other areas would enable us to adjust the pensions, that are needed, without increasing the deficit. Anyway, we now have a proposal for the $35, and as I say I am very happy to state in this debate that of course, as a matter of principle I will support the measure.

I would also like to take this opportunity to ask this government to consider very seriously the case of single pensioners. Saturday evening last, I had an opportunity to meet a group of senior citizens. I was very happy to tell them that last week we discussed the $35 promised by the government and that opposition parties would not oppose it. But they stressed the difficulties faced by single pensioners, because a couple can still manage at 83 per cent or 85 per cent and somewhat more below the poverty line, they still approach that level. But the single person is definitely in difficulty with the benefits he or she is getting. And I feel that all members here, as hon. members who spoke before me recognized, there will have to be a very special effort to see what is financially possible for the single person who is faced with the responsibilities almost equal in certain cases, as far as shelter, telephone and other essential services are concerned, and indeed the single person must find shelter as well. If he or she owns a house, it does not cost any less. I think it would be interesting to study the situation of people who are alone without neglecting to re-examine the current system as well, the consumer price index. Others have already demonstrated that this system is not equitable given the cost of living increases which we have unfortunately been forced to accept in the past few years. I therefore think that the government should seriously look into the matter to better justify these increases and change this method so that the rates are a lot more realistic than those we have known so far.

The minister has also expressed her hope that the provinces will give the entire increase to the aged, especially those living in provincial institutions. I am therefore totally in agreement with the minister and I hasten to wish that the provinces will act accordingly, because I do not think they have to, but they will let these old people receive the total amount of $35 because we are always aware of their responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate and I know that others will want the floor but I repeat that there are a few considerations to take into account. I was going to forget, Mr. Speaker, that we did mention giving more flexibility to the retirement age. I am one of those who, for the past 12 years at any rate, have tended to support lowering the age of retirement and this might be a good time to let the government know this. As we know, some people at age 60 or 65 express the wish that they be able to draw their old age security. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we know that some people 65 years of age would like to continue working without being rushed into retirement. Well, there has been some talk about relaxing the age of retirement and I do hope that the studies the government will commission and those that are under way will look seriously at those two aspects. And it is clear that there are people 65 years of age who would like to get their old age pension in view of the many years they spent working and in view also of their health. It can always be argued that at 60 they can always get help from the provincial system called the Department of Social Affairs.

On the other hand, I think that we can seriously consider that relaxation of the old age security. But here again, I know that more than ever before the economic conditions as well as the needs and the demands have to be taken into consideration and I think the government must ponder upon the matter because we know the cost of these increases are rather substantial.

So, in view of the circumstances, it is with great pleasure that I support this legislation and I would hope that the remarks I have made, which are not new, because other members have said the same thing will be heard. I also wanted to take part in this debate in order to impress upon the government the importance of continuing to improve the lot of the people in that age group who are definitely behind in view of the increases in the cost of living.

I do not think that we have the right to let them suffer any longer. We must endeavour to find the necessary funds so they may receive pension benefits as an expression of the respect and the consideration we must have for them who worked hard for many years and who certainly deserve their retirement pension and should not live in misery and hardship. People talk about a decent level for so many other things; I think that group of people deserves a decent level of income and we should be able, in this Parliament with all the objectivity that is called for, to give them that decent level of income to enable them not only to live well their years of retirement but also to enjoy several more. They should also feel that the generation behind them has not forgotten them and wants in this way to thank them for everything they have done.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, of course. I know there is a hope or a tendency to proceed with this bill in Committee of the Whole and possibly even third reading later this evening. I do not know if that is possible, but it is certainly desirable. I think all of us realize the importance of passing this bill since its benefits would be made available to senior citizens come July 1.

When I first arrived in this House many years ago, it seemed to me that the whole concept of pensions was much simpler. It was based on the concept of universality. I look with a certain amount of misgiving, perhaps, at the trend away from universality. It concerns me. I read the minister's speech last Wednesday, and it was an excellent speech. There were two things in that speech which impressed me. One, of course, is the minister's intention to bring together all the people in this country who are interested in the total concept of pensions—not simply old age pensions but also industrial pensions—with particular emphasis on the private sector, at a conference this fall or perhaps next spring.

It will be interesting if, coming out of that conference, can be some new concepts or, perhaps better still, a return to the basic concept of universality. It seems to me that it should not be too difficult to combine universality with the Income Tax Act to make certain that the number of people who benefit or obtain pensions, GIS or what have you and who do not really need this kind of income, would find it simply retrieved by the government through the income tax system.

One very persuasive member talked tonight about the need of a means test to make certain that the money goes only to the people who need it. This is a laudable concept, but I have yet to see anybody in the public service, the opposition or in my own party in caucus come up with a system or method of determining need or means properly. I have heard the argument that the need of a senior citizen living in Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal may be greater, theoretically, than that of a person living in a smaller community in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. This is why I retreat a little from discussing the poverty line. What is the poverty line? It is certainly not uniform in this country.

I think statistics would indicate that the poverty line in one part of the country is different from that in another part of the country, so the whole matter becomes more and more complicated, more and more formulae are devised, and more and more bureaucracy is introduced, with more and more regulations. Why? Because we do not have the courage in this House of Commons to say that we are going back to universality and that really the whole pension plan needs improvement, and not just the GIS.

People have argued eloquently for the need for de-regulation, and I agree. We are an over-regulated society, but regulations usually come in because of a lack of restraint and willingness to make regulations unnecessary. When we depart in the slightest from the concept of universality, we are automatically increasing the bureaucracy and automatically increasing the number of regulations. Once someone says the money should go only to those who need it most, we are automatically setting up regulations, if only to determine who are the people who need it most. This has always eluded the better brains in the public service, so I am rather anxious to see the outcome of this particular badly needed conference to see if somehow we might want to get back to the concept of universality.

This, of course, does not ignore the fact that thousands of Canadians, because of hard work, because of a rich father or because of a relatively illness-free lifetime—for a lot of reasons—reach the age of 60, 65 or 70 when they desire to retire from the work force without any need of an old age pension. However, it seems to me that the logical way of retrieving or getting that money back is through the income tax system and not through having bureaucrats crawling over our bank books, peering under our beds and all the rest of it, to see whether we are actually in need. I am not exaggerating because this really was one of the characteristics of the depression days when we were very, very meticulous about making certain that nobody got something unless he or she could demonstrate it was deserved as a result of the sweat on his or her brow, as they used to say. It bothers me slightly that we seem to be getting away from the concept of universality.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said at the beginning of her speech:

> The federal government is not the only source of financial assistance to elderly Canadians. It is fair to say that more and more provinces are introducing supplementary programs to assist elderly Canadians. Does this bill affect such programs and what is the relationship between the provincial programs and the federal program?

It seems that there is a parallel or relationship between what the minister asked in that question and the experiences which we are now running into in the medicare plan. Medicare has been one of the greatest contributing factors to the well-being and quality of life of people in this country. If we look at the medicare plan in the United States, we will see that it does not come anywhere near the Canadian plan. There is no universality and, indeed, no plan.

We pride ourselves on the universality of medicare. But just a couple of years ago we introduced the concept of block funding, which is leading away from universality and from a common standard across this country. What has happened as a result of block funding? We need only look at the medicare plan in Ontario but, more important, as people study the results of block funding in medicare, we are finding that it perpetuates regional disparity. It is obvious that certain provinces are unable to match the quality or standard of medicare found in other provinces, particularly the have-provinces. I can think of, for example, Nova Scotia's plan, with which I am familiar because I recently studied it.

Once again, unintentionally of course, we have a policy which perpetuates regional disparity. My party, the Liberal party, has been able to forge a marriage of convenience between private enterprise and government. We believe that the private enterprise system of this country is the greatest generator of capital in the history of this country or of the world. Private industry is by far the most successful generator of capital. We need capital in this country, not only to provide jobs, but to provide a quality of life. We are talking tonight about senior citizens, but tomorrow we could be talking about equality of opportunity in the educational system for young people.

The marriage of convenience between private enterprise and the government is that the government insists on having some input into the distribution of some of that capital in order to provide a standard of living for all Canadians. It is only when the two partners, as in any marriage, fight over the income that the marriage has tremendous strains put upon it. Over the last ten years we have run into that situation. Private industry is, quite properly, demanding more of the available funds, and those who believe in social reform are unwilling to give a little.

Consequently, concepts are evolved by harrassed public servants in an attempt to break the conflict. So we end up with, in the case of old age pensions, a retention of the concept of universality, supplemented by guaranteed income supplement and by provincial contributions. The end result is that the changes are made in the GIS and not in the basic income. Again, it could be retrieved through income tax, particularly in these days of computerization.

What concerns me is the trend toward a continuation of regional disparity. Sooner or later senior citizens living in a have-not province, and we never know which province that may be in five years or ten years' time, cannot expect to have the same income as senior citizens in Quebec or Ontario. And it is wrong to presume that it costs any less to live in the Atlantic provinces than it costs to live in the city of Montreal. If rent is less, then food is more expensive, transportation is more expensive, and medicare is more expensive. Really, there is no big difference. If anything, the cost of living is probably greater in the Atlantic provinces than in the central provinces.

Yet, senior citizens over time, if not already in some provinces, will obtain from the various levels of government considerably more income than somebody in the less favoured regions of the country. I suspect that this is why the minister said that she hopes that the provinces would not attempt to retrieve some of the money from the $35 under one pretext or another.

The minister also said that she was pleased to be advised that Nova Scotia and British Columbia will be passing on the full increase to all GIS recipients. However, some of the other provinces may not pass on this increase. If they do not, then the senior citizens in those provinces will have less income than those in Nova Scotia or British Columbia. Thus we begin again the whole cycle of accentuating the differences in our country rather than, at this very important time in our history, going the other way.

What must come out of our constitutional talks, whether they be next month or three years or four years from now, is a dedication to certain basic principles. Those principles could be perhaps summed up by simply saying "equal opportunity for all Canadians". Equal opportunity for all Canadians means access to the same facilities right across the country, such as education, medicare, income for senior citizens, and family allowances. When we in this House allow ourselves to depart from this basic principle, perhaps to accommodate some of the provinces or to appease other provinces, or perhaps even because of some conflict over what confederation is all about, what we have done, unintentionally I am sure, is to put in place programs which help some people and not others.

Somebody said earlier today that a certain amount of jealousy is built into the programs, that if it is not $35 for most people, then it is $17.50. It is $35 for a household, but it is only a matter of time before there will be regional differences and regional jealousy. Such a disparity will have the effect of encouraging people, once more, to leave the have-not provinces for the more favoured provinces. It is happening now in Quebec, to some degree. People there who are in their sixties are leaving because inheritance taxes and duty taxes are different. These people are planning their estates and saying, "As much as I would like to remain in this province, maybe I would like to move into Ontario. It is still part of Canada, but I want to go there because of the taxes."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The two new rookies could learn something if they would keep quiet.

An hon. Member: Where were you in 1978?

Mr. Mackasey: They both look like they are ready for their old age pensions.

An hon. Member: When it comes to pensions, you are doing okay.

Mr. Mackasey: It is not inconceivable, and it can be demonstrated that people who reach the age of 65, or in some cases 60, can receive considerably more in one province than in another. In this very mobile society, people then begin moving out of areas like the Atlantic provinces to Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, the current have provinces.

In conclusion, I am certainly pleased that we are increasing the GIS. I would be much happier, however, if I saw a trend back toward universality entirely and, even more desirable, a fairly decent increase in the old age pension itself.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to congratulate you on your appointment to the position which you now hold, and I do so. I should also like to congratulate the minister on her appointment. In her opening remarks she demonstrated more than a real feeling for poor people in Canada, as she has done on other occasions. I commend her on her appointment.

● (2130)

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), on his most excellent remarks, as well as all those who have participated in this debate, particularly the hon. member who made his maiden speech tonight.

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, Robert Browning wrote some very famous words:

Grow old along with me
The best is yet to be
The last of life, for which the first was made.

I think the concept that Robert Browning had in mind for senior citizens is a really wonderful idea, but it is an idea that has not been realized in our lifetime. Canada's senior citizens, in more difficult times than we enjoy, created for us a much better way of life than they had. They did it with a lot of self sacrifice and a lot of hard work. Today, hundreds of thousands of our fellow Canadians, our senior citizens, live below the poverty line and do not share in any measure in the prosperity that their hard work helped create.

In her opening remarks the minister indicated that 700,000 Canadians who are single, including widows, widowers and separated people, live in poverty. I have to say that their reality does not reflect Robert Browning's ideals.

I feel that the bill before us is a step in the right direction, however, and I feel that the minister's dedication to seeing that the $35 per household—$35 per couple, or $35 for a widow or widower who lives alone in a household—is passed on to that person and does not become absorbed by another program, no matter how worthy, is just about as important as the amendment she has proposed. I support her in that regard and will do everything I can to see that hope fulfilled. I believe it is a step in the right direction.

There are some features of the bill that cause us to reflect on the programs represented by the guaranteed income supplement. I think of two things: one is indexing, and other is the means test. I should like to see the formula for indexing changed to reflect the actual purchases made by senior citizens on slender incomes. At the present time indexation is tied to the consumer price index, which represents the average of increases in price of a wide variety or basket of goods, whereas senior citizens on slender incomes spend their money basically on food, heat and—if they have any left—on accommodation and a very small amount of clothing. These items rise much faster than the average. I should like to see these staples used as the basis for the guaranteed income supplement and the old age pension.

As for the means test, I should like to see the House address the question of the reality of the means test in view of the decreasing purchasing power of our dollar. These two things are somewhat related but not entirely so, because the guaranteed income supplement depends very much on the formula that is used for the means test.

In terms of indexing pensions in the private sector of our economy, we have had very little experience of this because they are not indexed to any great extent. In the public sector we have had some experience, and it is under study. I should like us to match the private and public experiences and look for a high interest vehicle so that all Canadians in the low and middle income groups could have their pensions indexed. The alternative to this is to see Canada's senior citizens get by with one less egg, one less piece of bread, one less vegetable every week—week after week. In an inflationary economy such as we have experienced throughout the seventies, this is the alternative to indexing. It is an alternative that cannot be acceptable to any thinking Canadian. We should use the best brains available to devise some kind of higher interest vehicle.

Today, trust companies borrow money at 12 per cent on guaranteed investment certificates and lend it out on mortgages at 14 per cent. With the 2 per cent difference they provide a profit to shareholders and defray the cost of administration. Maybe we should consider investing in mortgages because the interest rate paid on mortgages and the interest rate on guaranteed investment certificates is higher than the consumer price index and higher than the inflation index. I believe we should examine this possibility. I have a private member's bill before the House that deals with some of these things and I look forward to an opportunity in the near future of discussing them at greater length.

Since I first came to Parliament I have spoken on one or two occasions in favour of a $200 basic old age pension. I have not been able to convince all of my colleagues in opposition of the merit of this proposition, and I certainly have not been able to convince my colleagues in government.

Mr. Knowles: Try $300.

Mr. Howie: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is an ally in my cause. I think the time will come when we must focus on the resources of our nation with this proposition, and I hope that time will come quickly.

Another thing that is very important is to enable senior citizens to live in their own homes as long as they possibly can. When the time comes that they cannot live there any longer, they should be treated with understanding and compassion. Before the last government fell, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was examining a proposition for a shelter allowance and attempting to identify areas where funds could be reallocated to support it. The concept was based upon the need of a senior citizen who spends more than 30 per cent of income on housing. In view of the rapidly rising cost of energy, particularly home heating, this is a very valid and real consideration. I would personally like to see the figure of 25 per cent used. That study should be continued and the issue addressed by this House.

When senior citizens are no longer able to continue living in their own homes, perhaps because of disability or illness, other arrangements must be made. I am very impressed with a concept used in New Brunswick which I should like to share with the House. The federal government and the New Brunswick government in a joint agreement, using the vehicle of the New Brunswick Housing Corporation, provides excellent housing to senior citizens where they can and do live with dignity at a rent geared to income. This is an excellent concept. In my riding there is York Manor and Dixon Lodge which look after those senior citizens capable of caring for themselves and senior citizens who require nursing care. I think this program could be a model for others in Canada. I hope all hon. members will avail themselves of an opportunity to find out something about it.

There is also in my riding a 20-unit senior citizen housing development with low rent which was built by the Kinsman club. Eighteen young men met the community's greatest need. I am very proud of these institutions, and that is the reason I mention them in my brief remarks.

Another thing we should look at soon is the concept of enabling Canadian housewives to participate in the Canada Pension Plan. The concept that is so prevalent in pension plans, including the government's, of requiring a surviving spouse to live on half the pension of a deceased pensioner is a very cruel thing. In my view the basic expenses of an individual household continue after the death of a pensioner, and it is very difficult for the survivor to exist on half of the income. In fact it is very difficult for them to exist on the income when the pensioner is alive.

I should like to say a word in closing, Mr. Speaker, about our veterans. I do not think any Canadian wants our veterans treated other than with the greatest generosity, particularly our disabled veterans. Today there are hundreds of veterans waiting for the pension board to indicate the level of disability pension. This is in part because the grounds of appeal of a decision with respect to a disability pension have been broadened and the opportunity for appeal has been increased. But the structure has not been created to deal with these extra appeals, and I think it is a national disgrace to require men and women who sacrificed themselves for this country to have to wait in line to be treated with justice.

I would like to see us review the basics of the veterans pensions, the disability pensions and the war veterans allowance. I would like to see us implement also some of the suggestions that have been made by our colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with respect to the indexation of those pensions.

I will close my remarks by indicating that it really does not matter whether my suggestions or better ones are acted upon, but I think that this House should follow some of the suggestions made by some of my colleagues from all parties and so address ourselves with greater dignity to the problems of our senior citizens.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking today on Bill C-16, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, because of the concerns I have for the inadequacies contained in the structure of pensions and retirement income programs in Canada today.

It is proposed in this bill to raise the guaranteed income supplement benefit by $35.00 per month for single recipients and $17.50 per month to each married recipient. Even though we in the NDP have long advocated and encouraged any pension increase that will improve the lot of seniors, over half of whom are living under the poverty level, the measures proposed by the government in this bill fall far short of what could be done. In fact the bill falls so far short of what could and should be done that most if not all pensioners see the government's proposal as a continuation of its attitude of perceiving pensions as some sort of charity rather than a social program that should allow our seniors to live a decent and dignified life.

A social right to decency and dignity in retirement should be the thrust of any income security legislation for our seniors, and that has always been the aim of those who sit on this side of the House. Even though there are those on the government's side who attempt to persuade Canadians otherwise, history shows that it was only under pressure from the CCF that the government finally introduced a pension system in Canada. In fact our pension system has always had a CCF-NDP stamp on it. The CCF was responsible for its introduction. People like J. S. Woodsworth and my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), led the fight for the replacement of means tested pensions with old age security legislation. The NDP did the same thing in the early 1960s in relation to the Canada Pension Plan.

It was an NDP government in British Columbia which led the way and which was the first province to supplement the incomes of the elderly poor by way of legislation. The only time the OAS was increased in real terms in the last 15 years was in 1973 as a result of NDP pressure during the 1972-1974 minority parliament.

This government proposal, while being of some assistance to our elderly, does nothing toward bringing much needed fundamental reform to the pension system. Many people used to think that after a lifetime of productive contribution to society they would be rewarded by a worry free retirement. Not any more, Mr. Speaker. Now to be old and to be poor are synonymous in the minds of many people, and for very good reason. More than six out of every ten Canadians over the age of 65 have annual incomes under $5,000. For women, the realities are even worse. Three out of every four women over the age of 65 are poor.

This government has failed to recognize that for many of our senior citizens it is difficult for them to do the things that we do not even have to think about doing. For many it is a choice between buying a coffee or taking a bus downtown. For many it is a choice between buying a daily newspaper or being able to buy a pork chop dinner once a week. If you were one of the 1.2 million women over the age of 65, these would be the kinds of decisions you would be making every day. Three out of four of these women live alone, single, widowed or divorced, and these women are trying to make ends meet on $389.00 per month.

A single 65-year-old person in Ontario with no other source of income receives three monthly benefits: old age security of $186.80, a guaranteed income supplement of $153.35, and GAINS under the Ontario guaranteed income supplement of $49.00. These figures add up to the grand total of $389.15 per month. If one compares this figure to the poverty line cut-off for a single person living in a city the size of Toronto, that person needs a minimum of $470.00 a month.

I want to refer to something that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said in her remarks the other day, which I found to be quite astounding. At page 1281 of Hansard for May 21, 1980, the minister was reported as saying:

> The officials of my department estimate that there are approximately 700,000 single, widowed and divorced GIS recipients of the supplement to the pension who are living in poverty. Fully 60 per cent of them are women.

In another part of her remarks, the minister said this:

> On an annual basis, the amount guaranteed by our old age security programs, that is the basic pension plus the old age supplement combined, represents roughly 80 per cent of the amount Statistics Canada defines as the poverty line. There is no doubt that an income which is slightly lower than 80 per cent of the poverty line is not acceptable in a country as rich as ours and is certainly not enough to live on decently.

Yet the same minister, and I have heard members of the Liberal party speaking here tonight express many of the same sentiments, can stand up and support a $35.00 increase in the supplement and still stand there with a straight face. It is laughable to the people of Canada, and it is certainly laughable to the people on this side of the House.

I want to tell members of the government where the money would go if they were one of the 32,000 single women over the age of 65, living in metro Toronto today. For argument's sake, let us take a month in the life of a Toronto pensioner who is a widow.

First of all, you would need a roof over your head. It is quite likely you would still be living in your own home. The old neighbourhood means a lot to you and many of your friends still live there. Even though your mortgage has been paid off, you find that it still costs you about $250.00 a month for shelter. This money goes toward property and education taxes, housing insurance, repairs and maintenance, heat, water, hydro and telephone. In talking to some of your other widowed friends, you find that they are not much better off living in a one-bedroom apartment. Unsubsidized one-bedroom apartments cost about $280.00 in metro Toronto, but the vacancy rate is less than 1 per cent, so those apartments are very hard to find.

The subsidized housing is cheaper, but you have been told there are about 3,300 people on the waiting list. And those who live in rooming houses can expect to find their fridge is down the hall, can expect to share a bathroom with four other people and wash the dishes in the bathroom sink. The stove in your room will probably offer two options: on or off. So, whether you rent or own your own home, your housing costs are likely to absorb a good 60 per cent of your pension income.

In addition, you find that there is a cumulative shortfall. As things wear out, they are difficult to replace and they can rarely be replaced with new items. Clothes and sheets, dishes and glasses have to come from bazaars and rummage sales and second-hand stores.

Food for even a moderate eater will run close to $80 a month. This includes an occasional meal at a restaurant; it is good for your mental health, encourages you to be sociable, and you need the occasional change of scenery. Every time you go to the grocery store you are reminded of how packaging is done with families in mind. Economies of scale are great for large families who can afford and use up five and ten-pound bags of flour, sugar and cereal. But single people pay dearly for things in small packages. Anyhow, how could you possibly carry anything so heavy over a distance of several blocks?

This raises another problem. Once the food has been paid for, how do you get it home? Bundle buggies are great in the summer, but are useless in the winter. If you shop in corner convenience stores, you pay about 10 per cent more for every item of food you buy. So you shop in chain stores, taking the bus there and back, especially in the winter when sidewalks are icy.

Your special senior citizens bus tickets, plus an occasional cab to take you places off regular bus routes, cost an average of $26 a month. This figure does not, of course, include transportation costs for occasional bus or train trips to visit out of town grandchildren or other relatives who live far away. If you are one of those privileged seniors who own their own cars, you would pay about twice the $26 transportation cost for pedestrian seniors. That $50 a month would cover gas on 4,000 kilometres per year, servicing and repairs, maintenance and insurance. Not included in this estimate are parking costs. Most senior citizens do not own cars, so for the purposes of this scenario we will use the $26 figure.

So far we have spent $250 on housing, $80 on food, and $26 on transportation. That comes to $356 for basic requirements of subsistence. I hear my Conservative friend on the far right making interjections. I am not surprised. I would not expect him to understand the problems of senior citizens.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He did not say a word.

Mr. Young: He has been yelling all night.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He has not.

Mr. Young: Out of our $389 pension income, there is only $33 left for the rest of the month to spend on such luxuries as clothes, dental care, glasses, hearing aids, gifts, a movie, entertaining friends, long distance phone calls, cable TV, or an occasional bingo game.

To solve this problem, the Liberals, those big spenders, are throwing an extra $35 a month into the pot. Who are they kidding? For the elderly woman on old age pension, it is not a question of enjoying old age, it is simply a matter of gritting your teeth and enduring it.

I am fully aware that in the Speech from the Throne the government promised another study on the needs of senior citizens. If there is anything Canada that our seniors do not need, it is another study on pensions. We all know how people in retirement have to live. What is needed is action from the government to alleviate poverty among our elderly and it surely will not be accomplished by yet another report or by the measures proposed in this bill.

We need a new deal for pensioners rather than the inadequate measures contained in this bill. The government should have brought in amendments to increase the old age security payments and the guaranteed income supplement so that older people with no other source of income would always be able to live at a standard above the poverty level.

During the election campaign, Ed Broadbent introduced a new deal for pensioners.

Some hon. Members: Ed who?

Mr. Young: If hon. members would listen, they would learn a few things.

During the last 15 years, he pointed out, OAS has failed to keep pace with growth in the incomes of other Canadians. Liberals and Tory governments have allowed the relative value of the OAS to fall. From the time of its introduction in 1952 to 1964, the OAS was equivalent to approximately 17 per cent of the earnings of the average worker. Since 1964 its value has been allowed to fall so that the OAS is now equivalent to only 13.5 per cent of average earnings. The only time the OAS was increased in real terms in the last 15 years was in 1973, the result of NDP pressure during a minority Parliament.

Our proposal recommended an immediate $40 per month increase to the OAS. This would make a pension again equivalent to 17 per cent of the average earnings. In addition, the NDP favours increasing the OAS annually in accordance with the growth in average earnings as measured by Statistics Canada. Legislated into the Old Age Security Act, this would eliminate the possibility of pensions being raised at the whim of the government.

In addition to the increase in the OAS, we also endorsed a shelter grant for pensioners. This grant was designed to concentrate funds in the hands of those senior citizens who need protection against the rising costs of shelter. Under the program, pensioners who pay rent would be eligible for grants equal to one third of rent paid. The maximum grant would be $600, or $50 a month. Those who own their own homes, and who on average are better off than those who rent, would be eligible for grants equal to 20 per cent of their property taxes. Here, the maximum grant would be $120 per year, or $10 per month. The shelter grant program would have its biggest impact on pensioners with under $200 per month of private income who rent and live alone. Women make up three quarters of this group.

These are the minimum actions that could and should have been undertaken by this government on behalf of the senior citizens in our country, and it is shameful that this government has not done so.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your position in the House. I would like to express my appreciation to the minister tonight for coming here in time to hear me declare that it is ten o'clock. I will start off at the next session with your permission, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary to the Leader of the Government could tell us the business of the House for tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We shall continue with this bill until its completion tomorrow. I understand there is a disposition to go into Committee of the Whole tomorrow and perhaps to third reading. If we do get through the bill, we will move to the borrowing authority bill. I should say before I sit down, since the hon. member mentioned it, that the minister's car broke down on the way to the House this evening. That is why she was not able to be here until just a few minutes ago.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—VETERANS SUFFERING FROM CANCER BECAUSE OF EXPOSURE TO ATOMIC BOMB TESTING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I rise in respect to my question of May 15, 1980, which I put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). It had to do with Canadian servicemen who had been assigned to duty at atomic bomb test sites in the United States during the 1950s and subsequently had been reported as now suffering from cancer, or at least as many as had been detected.

I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs what actions he was taking to determine the state of health of all the servicemen so assigned, whether a program to monitor their health had been approved, and was the government willing to recognize its responsibility to these Canadian servicemen. In reply, the minister said:

• (2200)

There has been some detection and detection of other people supposedly involved should be made in the near future.

In answer to my supplementary question with respect to the government's liability in the matter, the minister responded as vaguely as he did to my first question. The minister said:

When the analyses and diagnoses are completed by the people within our department who are qualified, such as doctors, that determination will be made.

In the first place, I suggest the government has known for some time that this serious situation existed. The minister has been in a position to make a much clearer and much more definitive reply than he did to my question. He was certainly more knowledgeable later the same day—he was reported by the Toronto Star of the following day, May 16, 1980, as stating that at least three Canadian servicemen had contracted cancer as a consequence of that particular duty assignment. What concerns me is that the vagueness of the minister's response appears to be associated with the lack of concern shown by government officials since the matter was brought to light.

The first knowledge I had of the problem was a report dated May 30, 1977, by Jack Anderson in the San Luis Telegram-Tribune when he reported:

Forty unsuspecting Canadian soldiers may be in mortal danger from a 20-year-old nuclear test in the Nevada Desert.

The report went on to say:

We are told that the Canadian volunteers were members of the Seventh Platoon, 2nd Battalion, Queen's Own Rifles.

Mr. Anderson also reported that in response to a telephone call to military authorities in Ottawa he was told that the Canadians had no official comment. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time the government began to give some forthright answers to these servicemen. Since there is no known antidote for nuclear radiation, the least the government owes to the soldiers concerned is detection and treatment of the diseases which the tests caused. Moreover, there should be no question of the government accepting liability or giving assurances to these men and their families that they will not be forgotten.

I am extremely anxious that this not be allowed to happen. However, I did not draw much comfort from the minister's replies or from the experiences of the Toronto Star reporter Helen Bullock the results of whose excellent research into this matter were printed on May 3, 1980. I want to quote a few passages from that report. This reporter said:

I asked the Canadian government who they (the soldiers) were because I needed to know the age of the people in this group. It's an important factor in estimating the expected incidence of cancer.

They wouldn't release the names but they did give the birth dates so I couldn't argue.

Again, from the same article:

For example, a spokesman for the Canadian Armed Forces said 40 men of the Queen's Own Rifles took part in shot Smokey in 1957; they were, he said, the only Canadians actively engaged in the tests.

However, a U.S. researcher reports that 85 Canadians were at that shot although many of these were probably official observers not in the troop trenches.

And at the Directorate of History in the Department of National Defence there is a list of 157 Canadian army personnel "and there could have been others at other tests but we don't have the file."

Although it appeared at first glance that only the Queen's Own Rifles were involved, the directorate lists observers from, among other units, the Black Watch and the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery.

Having established that some Canadians were in the nuclear testing site, the next question is how close were they to the bomb?

If the minister had been properly responsive not only to me, as a member of this House, but to the concern of the Canadian Armed Forces, I would have expected a much more informative reply. If he did not feel he could make it at that time, I hope he will be prepared to do so now.

• (2205)

Mr. John Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the Canadian Pension Commission is the agency designated under the Pension Act to deal with all matters pertaining to the adjudication of disability pension claims. It has the responsibility of collecting material relevant to a particular claim where such material is in government records. It is in this context that the commission recently addressed itself to the Department of National Defence with regard to reports which were received that members of the forces had been exposed to radiation some years ago. Arrangements have been made for the National Defence Department to provide information concerning amounts of exposure received by any member of the forces, or former members, asking for it. The information will, of course, also be available to the Canadian Pension Commission to assist it in its adjudication of pension claims which have been or may be received.

Some former members of the forces have called the Pension Commission indicating that they may have received radiation exposure but have no disability which seems to be related, and they asked for information on what to do. They have been told to confirm the degree of exposure with the Department of National Defence and check with their own doctors as to whether any related disability exists. If a disability exists and an application is made for pension, the commission will consider the claim. If no disability exists, the personal physician will have a record of the exposure in the event of some future problem turning up.

The Canadian Pension Commission will examine any claim received for pension based on disability caused by radiation exposure and will obtain the best advice available with respect to the type and amount of exposure in relation to the specific claim for pension. Each decision will be made on an individual basis.

The Canadian Pension Commission deals with individual applications for pension for disability or death arising out of military service. It is anxious to ensure that any former member of the forces receives any disability pension to which he is entitled. If any former member of the forces who has participated in activities involving nuclear radiation believes that his health has been affected by such exposure, he should get in touch with the nearest district office of the Canadian Pension Commission, or with his nearest district pensions advocate. The department has always treated its veterans fairly and adequately, and will continue to do so in the future.

FINANCE—CAPITAL GAINS TAX—EFFECT ON INVESTMENT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, on May 13 last I addressed a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) with regard to any input he might have had in a study which I understood was being conducted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) concerning taxes on capital gains. The minister gave a rather strange response. He said that if there was a study he would look forward to receiving the results. In view of the big "if" in his response, I addressed a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance to find out whether in fact he was conducting a study regarding capital gains taxes, particularly because of the views expressed by the President of the Treasury Board before he became minister in this government. In his book "Fiscalamity" the minister clearly castigated the value of capital gains taxes.

The Toronto Star of October 18, 1979, reported the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston) as having said:

I am convinced that the introduction of the tax on capital gains has stifled investment in many sectors and frozen assets in others.

The capital gains tax was introduced and came into effect on January 1, 1971. It has proven to be a tax, as set out in the minister's own book, which stifles investment in that it prevents or delays the transfer of property from those who can make good use of property because of the impact of the tax. Indeed, with respect to small business, the tax can almost be expropriatory. In fact a small business may have no value as a base on which capital gains is taxed, so that the entire sale of the business can be taxable. Of course the tax is levied on 50 per cent of the return, a tax rate that can be 30 per cent or 35 per cent of the total value of the business.

The tax creates enormous problems with pressure groups coming to this government and saying, "You are taking my farm away from me, you are taking my property away from me". Consequently, we have had representations from all sources asking that this tax be removed or indexed or that something be done with respect to it.

Second, a great deal of the tax collected by capital gains is really not a tax on a capital gain but a tax on inflation. Indeed inflation is caused, as is set out in the book entitled "Fiscalamity" by the President of the Treasury Board, by governments printing money and in fact creating a value for money that is less and less, so that one needs more money to purchase the same goods. It is not really a capital gain. Indeed it is a depreciation of the value of the currency. So, we have a tax that to a great number of people is treated and deemed to be a very unfair tax, an expropriatory tax. Consequently it is sometimes a tax which is difficult to collect. It is a bureaucratic tax requiring all sorts of appraisal studies. Indeed in estates we wind up with situations that are most peculiar.

For example, under the present act if a person dies with a private home valued at $200,000, they pay no tax. If they happen to have invested their capital in growth stocks or equities in the country, they may wind up with a great deal of that $200,000 estate being taxed away. On the other hand, if they happen to be farmers and have $200,000 farms and have passed them on to their children, then that tax is deferred. So, deferral and deferral and deferral in effect is no taxation at all. It really depends on how one holds one's assets in this country whether one pays tax or not. Therefore a very unfair situation is developing.

It has been my suggestion to the ministry in the past that perhaps the ministry might look at a form of new estate tax based on a flat rate of tax, say, 10 per cent or 15 per cent of the amount in the gross of an estate over $25,000. A tax of this nature would be a flat rate tax. It would apply to all people, all estates. Presumably it would apply only to estates passing to survivors. As a solicitor I know that people are not unhappy about paying a tax on something they receive as a result of an estate settlement.

It would strike me that this tax is not producing a revenue for Canada. The returns for 1977 indicate that this tax produced about $250 million. Of course that was the tax divided among the provinces and the federal government. Of course I have no figures on the tax produced last year nor in 1978, but there is no question about it, that this tax is not producing, as it is presently written, any enormous revenue to Canada. In my view it is a tax that should be abolished. It could be replaced by another form of taxation that would be far more equitable. I ask the minister to bear that in mind when he brings this matter to the committee, as he has promised to do, so that we can have a look at this tax to make sure that Canadians are more equitably taxed.

● (2215)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite has referred to the impact of the taxation of capital gains on investment decisions and on the desirability of referring a study which is being conducted—and the minister has admitted it is being conducted—on this topic to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

In the past few years there has been considerable discussion regarding the taxation of capital gains, and many proposals for change have been put forward. The individuals and organizations making these proposals are well aware of the effects of the taxation of capital gains on their own affairs and on investment decisions generally, but they are also concerned and aware about the impact that this tax has on the economy generally. The current study that is being conducted in the Department of Finance is designed to clarify exactly what this impact is.

However, I should note that the taxation of capital gains is now a fundamental part of the Canadian tax system. The remainder of our present tax system depends on the continued taxation of capital gains. We would need a quite different system if the taxation of gains significantly was reduced or if it was altered. The issues involved can be traced to the changes which occurred in taxation in general around and subsequent to the introduction of the taxation of capital gains, and these changes included the way in which corporations and shareholders are taxed in general.

The federal government vacated the estate and gift tax field, and most of the provinces have also stopped taxing estates and successions. The deemed realization of capital gains upon death is thus the only tax collected upon inheritance. As a result Canadian taxation of transfers of wealth among generations is among the lowest in all industrialized countries.

Capital gains are distributed very unevenly among income classes. In 1978, while the top seven tenths of 1 per cent of all tax filers—in other words, those people with incomes of greater than $50,000—accounted for 5.1 per cent of the total income reported on tax returns, these same people received 38.8 per cent of all net taxable capital gains. The treatment of capital gains thus has great significance for the distribution of taxes and also for the distribution of income. It should also be noted that the introduction of the capital gains tax was accompanied by a reduction in the top marginal tax rates of the income tax.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has indicated that such a change to remove capital gains taxes would reduce federal revenues by some $700 million this year, and the provinces would suffer an associated revenue loss of some $300 million, substantially more than referred to by the hon. member opposite.

All of the factors I have just mentioned, plus others, are being assessed in the current study, and the minister has indicated clearly that it is his intention to release this study. This will provide an opportunity for full and informed discussion. A further option would be to refer the study to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the minister has indicated that he will take a decision on this particular question at the time the study is released.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

EXCELENTISÍMO SEÑOR PRESIDENTE DE MÉXICO

JOSÉ LÓPEZ PORTILLO

ante ambas Cámaras del Parlamento

en la sala de la

CÁMARA DE LOS COMUNES, en OTTAWA

el lunes 26 de mayo de 1980

El Excelentísimo Sr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Primer Ministro de Canadá, dio la bienvenida al Excelentísimo Señor Presidente de México; le mostraron su agradecimiento S.E. el Sr. Jean Marchand, Presidente del Senado, y S.E. la Sra. Jeanne Sauvé, Presidenta de la Cámara de los Comunes.

[Español]

S.E. Jeanne Sauvé (Presidenta de la Cámara de los Comunes): Los honorables miembros del Senado y de la Cámara de los Comunes se complacen en dar la bienvenida al Excelentísimo Señor Presidente de México José López Portillo.

[Traducción]

Excelentísimo Señor Presidente: su alocución ante esta reunión conjunta de miembros del Senado y de la Cámara de los Comunes constituye para nosotros un gran honor.

[Español]

Y ahora ruego al Excelentísimo Señor Primer Ministro de Canadá que tenga a bien presentarnos a nuestro distinguido huésped.

S.E. P. E. Trudeau (Primer Ministro de Canadá): Excelentísimo Señor Presidente de México, Señor Presidente de la Cámara de Diputados de México, Señor Presidente del Senado de México:

Señora Presidenta de la Cámara de los Comunes, distinguidos miembros del Parlamento de Canadá:

En nombre del pueblo canadiense y de sus representantes en el Parlamento, tengo el honor de darle la más cordial bienvenida, señor Presidente, así como a los Presidentes de la Cámara de Diputados y del Senado de México, a los Ministros y otros altos funcionarios de su Comitiva.

Desde nuestro encuentro en la ciudad de México en enero de 1976, señor Presidente, me ha impresionado profundamente el growing stature in the global community, of nations, a growth which Mexico's many Canadian friends had both desired and predicted.

Canada welcomes your country's determination to use its stature to contribute effectively to the enhancement of global stability, which has been seriously disturbed in recent months.

In response to such dangerous threats to world order as the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, and the violation of the immunity of diplomatic persons and premises by Iran, Canada believes it is essential for other countries to give firm, practical and united expression to their opposition to such serious transgressions of international law.

[English]

Mexico and Canada agree that the goal of global peace with justice must be approached by other paths as well and especially by responding more effectively to the needs of the world's developing countries. I therefore look forward, Mr. President, to discussing with you the critical issue of greater co-operation between the groups of nations which have come to be known as the north and the south.

We acknowledge Mexico's earned status as one of the leaders of the Third World and as a country which has helped to focus attention on the urgency of international development. The wide-ranging proposals which you yourself, Mr. President, put forward at the United Nations General Assembly last autumn were a particularly valuable contribution.

The problems of the least developed countries are especially compelling. There can be no real solution until the world community finds the will and the way to replace sterile rhetorical confrontation with a united and practical response to the poverty, hunger and stunted economies which oppress so many of the world's peoples. We look forward to working with the government of Mexico to help find the will and the way.

Mr. President, we discussed this morning with our ministers ways in which our two countries might enrich our bilateral relations. It is true, of course, that our relations do go back hundreds of years. You may know that one of Canada's most illustrious explorers, Samuel de Champlain, visited Mexico City in 1599 when your capital was a thriving community of some 100,000 Spanish and aboriginal souls. He was so taken with the beauty of your country, sir, that he did not come to our country until a few years later as a sort of second choice.

Happily, in recent years there has been more frequent travel between our countries. It has resulted from a growing awareness of how we can meet many of each other's needs and a growing consciousness of how many things we have in common, not the least of which is a friendly neighbour with whom we share a border.

prestigio cada vez mayor de su país en el seno de la comunidad mundial; un aumento de prestigio que los numerosos amigos canadienses de México habían ya previsto y deseado.

Canadá aplaude la determinación de vuestro país de utilizar toda su influencia para contribuir eficazmente a la mejora de la estabilidad mundial que ha sufrido graves trastornos en el curso de los últimos meses.

Ante amenazas tan graves de orden mundial como la invasion de Afganistán por la Unión Soviética, así como la violación de la inmunidad del personal y de las sedes diplomáticas por el Irán, Canadá opina que es esencial que todos los países expresen en conjunto, de manera concreta e inequívoca, su oposición a violaciones tan graves del derecho internacional.

[Traducción]

México y Canadá están de acuerdo en que otros medios pueden también conducir al logro de una paz justa en el mundo, especialmente una mayor sensibilidad respecto a las necesidades de los paises en desarrollo. A este respecto, señor Presidente, me alegra aprovechar esta ocasión para discutir con usted la cuestión fundamental de una mayor cooperación entre los grupos de naciones que se conocen actualmente con el nombre de Norte y Sur.

Reconocemos el merecido prestigio de México entre las naciones dirigentes del Tercer Mundo, por el papel que ha desempeñado para llamar la atención mundial sobre la urgencia de una política de desarrollo internacional. Las propuestas de largo alcance que usted mismo, señor Presidente, ha presentado a la Asamblea General de las Naciones Unidas en otoño pasado, han constituido una contribución particularmente valiosa.

Los problemas de los países menos desarrollados se imponen todavía más vivamente a nuestro espíritu. No se podra alcanzar una verdadera solución sino cuando la comunidad mundial haya encontrado la voluntad y el modo de reemplazar los estériles enfrentamientos retóricos con una respuesta concertada y concreta a la pobreza, al hambre y al marasmo económico que agobian a tantas personas en el mundo. Nos complace aunar nuestros esfuerzos a los del Gobierno de México para ayudar al mundo a encontrar esa voluntad y ese camino.

Señor Presidente, hemos discutido esta mañana con nuestros ministros sobre las formas de enriquecer las relaciones bilaterales entre nuestros dos países. Por supuesto, es verdad que nuestras relaciones datan de centenares de años atrás. Sabrá usted que uno de los exploradores más célebres de Canadá, Samuel de Champlain, había visitado la ciudad de México en 1599 cuando su capital era una comunidad próspera de unos 100.000 habitantes españoles e indígenas. Le impresionó tanto la belleza de su país que no se decidió a venir al nuestro sino años más tarde, como una suerte de segunda elección.

Felizmente los viajes entre nuestros dos países se han intensificado en el curso de los últimos años, a medida que hemos cobrado conciencia de nuestra capacidad de satisfacer recíprocamente lo que cada uno de nosotros necesitaba y una conciencia cada vez más clara de que teníamos muchas cosas en

We also share similar aspirations for industrial and economic development. We have long enjoyed a mutually beneficial trading relationship, and Canada has been an important source of financing for Mexican development. I note that while Canadian imports from Mexico are still dominated by agricultural products, the pattern of trade has broadened to the point where Canada now purchases a more diverse range of products from Mexico than from any other Latin American country.

World conditions have now brought us to a moment of full potential for closer economic relations in the future. Canada looks to Mexico as a secure supply of oil for our eastern provinces. Mexico looks to Canada as a supplier of the industrial equipment and technology which you need in order to fulfil your goal of economic diversification.

There can be no doubt that your visit has produced considerable progress toward agreement which will help satisfy the needs of both countries.

[Translation]

Mexico and Canada share a rich and varied cultural heritage which took root far back in our history, at the time when the original people of North America were its only inhabitants. The later contributions of European civilization have resulted in a lively cultural sharing, of which both countries are justly proud.

Twelve years ago, Mexico and Canada began their formal cultural relations with an exchange of notes. There followed in 1973 an agreement on annual exchange visits by young specialists and technicians. More recently, in 1976, I had the great pleasure and honour of signing in Mexico City, with your predecessor, a cultural agreement covering a wide range of activities in the fields of information, fine arts, theatre and telecommunications.

Mr. President, your visit is the occasion of a new meeting between two countries, both of whom are eager to contribute to peace and international justice. I am confident that, together, Mexico and Canada can make a greater contribution to our hemisphere and to the world. For all these reasons, Sir, we welcome you.

común, especialmente el amistoso vecino con el que compartimos la frontera.

Compartimos, asimismo, aspiraciones similares relativas a la expansión económica e industrial. Mantenemos desde hace tiempo relaciones comerciales mutuamente benéficas, y Canadá ha sido una fuente importante de financiacion para el desarrollo mexicano. Deseo subrayar el hecho de que, si bien los productos agrícolas son todavía preponderantes en las importaciones canadienses de México, los intercambios comerciales se han ampliado al punto de que Canadá compra actualmente una gama más variada de productos de México que de cualquier otro país latinoamericano.

Las condiciones internacionales nos han llevado en la actualidad a un momento decisivo que podría implicar un robustecimiento de nuestras relaciones económicas en el futuro. Canadá ve en México una fuente fiable de abastecimiento petrolífero para sus provincias del este. A su vez, México ve en Canadá un abastecedor de equipo industrial y de tecnología indispensables para el logro de su objectivo de diversificación económica.

No existe la menor duda de que vuestra visita nos ha permitido realizar grandes progresos hacia acuerdos que ayudarán a satisfacer las necesidades de nuestros dos países.

[Español]

México y Canadá comparten una herencia cultural rica y variada cuyas fuentes se remontan a una época muy lejana, al período de los primeros habitantes del continente norteamericano. Los aportes posteriores de la civilización europea han producido esta vigorosa convivencia de culturas de la que cada uno de nuestros dos países está legítimamente orgulloso.

México y Canadá comenzaron sus relaciones culturales hace 12 años, mediante un intercambio de notas. A este primer paso siguió, en 1973, un acuerdo sobre un programa de intercambio anual de jóvenes especialistas y técnicos. Y más recientemente, en 1976, tuve la gran satisfacción y el honor de presenciar en México con vuestro predecesor la firma de un acuerdo cultural que cubría una amplia gama de actividades en los campos de la información, artes plásticas, teatro y telecomunicaciones.

Señor Presidente: vuestra visita brinda una nueva ocasión de reunirse a dos países deseosos de contribuir a la paz y justicia internacionales. Estoy persuadido de que, juntos, México y Canadá podrán realizar una mayor contribución a nuestro hemisferio y al mundo entero. Por todas estas razones, señor Presidente, le damos la bienvenida!

ADDRESS BY MR. JOSE LOPEZ PORTILLO, PRESIDENT OF MEXICO, TO THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

26th of May, 1980

Your Excellency the Prime Minister of Canada
Honourable Members of Parliament
Ladies and Gentlemen:

I consider it an honour and an opportunity to be welcomed in this stately chamber that serves as a meeting place for the representatives of the noble Canadian people. The expressions of cordiality that you have shown me have augmented and reaffirmed both the official and private tokens of esteem I have received during my sojourn in this generous country. I wish, consequently, to express to you my own gratitude together with that of the Mexican people.

I am returning from a trip that has taken me away from this continent, and, as occurs in such cases, I am returning filled with reflections on geography and time. My first impression is that Canada, the same as Mexico, belongs to the New World not only geographically, but also spiritually. Despite the great distances existing on the American Continent, Canada is close to us and is inevitably linked to our own destiny.

Return to this continent leads us to the immediate and irrefutable reality that we are members of the great family that shares this continent, despite the fact that the most notable characteristic of this family and this territory is its diversity.

From this perspective, the problem of our relations should be posed as a necessity and not as something merely desirable; that is, as a geopolitical destiny more than an enumeration of affinities and specific coincidences.

Canada has gained new prestige, but it has not lost its former prestige. Despite its formidable industrial and urban growth, it continues to bring to mind an image of a nation of pioneers, an image it deserves in view of the concerted efforts expanded by this tenacious and hardworking people in every sphere.

The Mexican people are also persistent. They have been able to surmount rigorous historical tribulations and thereby strengthen their national identity. Their great historical battles are the culmination of a process of sovereignty and the initiation of new processes of sovereignty. The struggle for our independence was not won on a single occasion. It is a daily struggle that cannot be abandoned.

Canada and Mexico know the value and the price of independence, and they are open to any kind of exchange that does not imply dependence and subordination. We respect the rights of other nations and affirm here that the recognition of these rights is the basis of international order.

Consequently, although we, the three nations that constitute North America, should set down systematically revisable rules that will ensure improved co-existence and co-operation, we

DISCURSO PRONUNCIADO POR EL C. JOSE LOPEZ PORTILLO, ESTADOS UNIDOS MEXICANOS, ANTE EL PARLAMENTO DE CANADA

26 de mayo de 1980

Excelentísimo señor Primer Ministro
de Canadá,
Honorables Miembros del Parlamento,
Señores y Señoras:

Considero un honor y una oportunidad ser recibido en este augusto recinto que congrega a la representación del noble pueblo canadiense. Las propias muestras de cordialidad que ustedes me han dispensado prolongan y consagran las otras, oficiales y privadas, que he recibido durante mi estancia en este generoso país. Deseo, por ello, expresarles mi gratitud y la del pueblo mexicano.

Regreso de un viaje que me ha llevado fuera de este continente y regreso, como ocurre en estos casos, lleno de reflexiones sobre la geografía y el tiempo. Mi primera impresión es la de que Canadá, al igual que México, pertenece no sólo geográficamente al Nuevo Mundo sino también espiritualmente. A pesar de las dilatadas distancias de nuestra América, Canadá nos resulta próximo e inevitablemente vinculado a nuestro propio destino.

El retorno a este continente nos abre paso hacia la realidad—inmediata e irrefutable—de que pertenecemos a la gran familia que comparte el espacio americano, por más que el signo de esta familia y de este espacio sea el de la diversidad.

En esta perspectiva, el problema de nuestras relaciones debe plantearse como un hecho necesario y no, simplemente, como un hecho deseable. Destino geopolítico más que recuento de afinidades y coincidencias particulares.

Canadá ha ganado nuevos prestigios pero no ha perdido los antiguos. Sigue suscitando, a pesar de su formidable crecimiento industrial y urbano, la imágen de una nación de pioneros. Fama que merece por el concertado esfuerzo que, en todos los ámbitos, desarrolla este pueblo tenaz y laborioso.

También el pueblo mexicano es persistente. Ha sabido sobreponerse a duras pruebas históricas y, en todas ellas, ha fortalecido su identidad nacional. Sus grandes batallas históricas son culminación de un proceso de soberanía. La lucha por nuestra independencia no se ganó en una ocasión. Es una batalla cotidiana que no ha de cesar.

Canadá y México conocen el valor y el precio de la independencia y se mantienen abiertos a cualquier tipo de intercambios que no impliquen dependencia y subordinación. Respetamos los derechos de las otras naciones y afirmamos que el reconocimiento de estos derechos es el fundamento del orden internacional.

Por ello, si bien las tres naciones que formamos América del Norte debemos fijar reglas, sistemáticamente revisables, que permitan nuestra mejor convivencia y cooperación, no debemos must not forget that the differences in the kind and extent of our development make it impossible under present-day circumstances to form a regional economic association of either a general nature or with specific reference to energy. Let us promote our bilateral relations, but let us not seek to establish artificial entities based on a single factor—the geographical factor, as important as it may be—but rather let us promote relations in which other equally important elements for the economic integration of several countries are presently lacking.

The focal point of the European Economic Community is support for the relatively homogeneous development of the nations composing it. This is not the case in North America. As far as Mexico is concerned, we believe that the establishment of such an entity would inevitably impede our industrial development and perhaps oblige us to extract and export raw materials indefinitely for the use of the most developed societies. Even in the specific field of energy the exploitation of hydrocarbons has very different connotations in accordance with varying degrees of development. For us it will serve above all to create new sources of employment and to stimulate industry and agriculture. For an affluent society the high levels of consumption of hydrocarbons, which some deem to be excessive, serve to sustain a very high standard of living to which we cannot aspire at the present time. In such circumstances, I consider it difficult for us to arrive at a common strategy for the exploitation, future and use of energy unless they are included within a system of total responsibility on the part of mankind. This is what we have proposed to the United Nations.

The recent crisis convulsing the world is precisely the result of a lack of respect for the independence of weak nations. Local conflicts and the permanent threat of global war are the result of a power mechanism bestirred by the craving for territories and markets.

For this reason, Mexico's efforts in favour of general and complete disarmament may be considered among mankind's noblest causes. The Treaty of Tlatelolco, for which Mexico is depositary, is a decisive step toward preserving a vast geographical area from nuclear destruction. This, however, is but barely a beginning, and it will only have full validity when it transcends the regional sphere and becomes a model for other similar treaties.

Universal acceptance of the rule of law—both domestically and in relations among nations—is the irreplaceable foundation of the social order. All societies, whether simple, complex, conservative or revolutionary, need law to preserve their unity and their coherence.

In any circumstances, but particularly in a time of crisis, it is absolutely essential for the international community to reaffirm the validity of its legal institutions. Defending the United Nations means defending the standards that govern peaceful coexistence among States and the supremacy of law over force.

We recognize, of course, that the United Nations' political and administrative machinery is not always effective in solving the world's problems. The scope and pace of its procedures are olvidar que las diferencias en el tipo y grado de nuestro desarrollo hacen imposible —en las actuales circunstancias— integrar una asociación económica regional, sea general, sea en el ramo de los energéticos. Impulsemos nuestras relaciones bilaterales, más no pretendamos crear entidades artificiales basadas en un solo factor —el geográfico, por importante que sea— pero en las que estén ausentes otros elementos igualmente esenciales para la integración económica de varios países.

La Comunidad Económica Europea tiene como punto central de apoyo el desarrollo relativamente homogéneo de las naciones que la integran. Eso no ocurre en Norte América. En lo que a México toca, estimamos que la creación de una entidad semejante frenaría inevitablemente nuestro desarrollo industrial y nos condenaría, acaso, a extraer y exportar a perpetuidad materias primas para su aprovechamiento por sociedades más avazadas. Aún en el terreno puramente energético, la explotación de los hidrocarburos tiene un sentido muy distinto según el grado de desarrollo. Para nosotros, servirá ante todo para crear nuevas fuentes de empleo y estimular la industria y la agricultura. Para una sociedad afluente, el elevado consumo de hidrocarburos, que algunos califican de excesivo, sirve para sustentar un muy alto nivel de vida as que nosotros no podemos aspirar actualmente. En esas circunstancias, creo difícil que pudiéramos llegar a una estrategia comun sobre la explotación, destino y uso de los energéticos, salvo que se inscribiera en un sistema de responsabilidad total de la humanidad. Así lo hemos propuesto a las Naciones Unidas.

La reciente crisis que sacude al mundo es producto, precisamente, de la falta de respeto a la independencia de las naciones débiles. Los conflictos locales y el amago permanente de una guerra global son resultado de un mecanismo de poder que agita la ambición de territorios y de mercados.

Por eso, los esfuerzos de México en favor del desarme general y completo se inscriben entre las mejores causas de la humanidad. El Tratado de Tlatelolco, del que somos depositarios, es un paso decisivo para preservar a un vasto espacio geográfico de la destrucción nuclear. Pero se trata, apenas, de un principio. Cobrará sentido pleno cuando pueda trascender su ambito regional y se convierta en modelo de otros tratados semejantes.

La aceptación universal del derecho —en el plano interno y externo— es el fundamento insustituible del orden social. Todas las sociedades —sean simples, complejas, consevadoras o revolucionarias— requieren del derecho para preservar su unidad y su coherencia.

En cualquier circunstancia pero particularmente en época de crisis, es indispensable que la comunidad internacional reafirme el valor de sus instituciones jurídicas. La defensa de las Naciones Unidas significa la defensa de las normas que rigen la convivencia entre Estados y la supervivencia del derecho frente a la fuerza.

Reconocemos, por supuesto, que los mecanismos políticos y administrativos de Naciones Unidas no siempre resultan eficaces para resolver los problemas del mundo. La dimensión y el frequently not commensurate with the scope and pace required to solve such problems.

The political problems that have arisen in recent months call for the good offices of countries not directly involved in the conflicts. The concerted action of countries that have demonstrated their devotion to independence and for that reason enjoy international prestige may have, in certain cases, a profound impact on the solution of international conflicts.

Peace, however, is not merely the result of anti-war activities. The pacifism of the between-war period is a thing of the past. Now we know beyond the shadow of a doubt that peace is not possible without equitable development.

In order to achieve such development, we are committed to the establishment of a new international order, which is the only viable alternative to our decaying economic institutions. Inflation, unemployment, monetary chaos or the progressive indebtedness of the underdeveloped countries presage even worse evils, such as recession and famine.

The new international order in its political and economic aspects concerns—or should concern—all the nations of the world. To present it as a plan that derives exclusively from the developing countries is a grave and deliberate departure from the truth, unless, of course, we were to invent a happy world in which only consumers existed and in which neither raw materials, work nor the financing of trade were necessary. The critical elements that endanger peace are the developing countries that have to contend with social confrontations, economic crises and cravings for hegemony or spheres of influence. Everything here is related to everything else.

As part of this new international order, we have proposed the establishment of a world energy plan to the United Nations General Assembly in order to rationalize the production, distribution and consumption of energy. This plan anticipates using the resources derived from present energy sources to develop alternative energy sources.

This plan must include all the members of the international community. Therefore, each country—rich or poor, producer or consumer—must assume proportional responsibility to guarantee its implementation. At the present time the energy problem can only be resolved by the concerted action of the international community—not by the silent manipulation of dominant transnational interests.

The relations of mutual respect and friendship that exist between Canada and Mexico guarantee a proper framework for broadening our political, economic and cultural relations, and we have the will and the resources to bring this about.

In the economic sphere, we are especially interested in the possibility of making joint investments in certain specific projects.

We attach particular significance to political collaboration between our nations, since we are convinced that a common approach to certain international matters can help to strengthen the cause of peace and security both on this and other continents.

ritmo de sus procedimientos no corresponden, con frecuencia, a la dimension y al ritmo que exigen los problemas.

El conjunto de problemas politicos que han surgido en los últimos meses requiere de la intermediacion de países no comprometidos directamente en los conflictos. La acción concertada de países que han demostrado su vocación de independencia y que por ello gozan de prestigio internacional puede tener, en ciertos casos, un impacto serio en la solución de conflictos internacionales.

La paz, sin embargo, no es el mero resultado de la actividad antibélica. Pasó la etapa del pacifismo del periodo de entreguerras. Ahora sabemos—con certidumbre irrefutable—que no es posible la paz sin un desarrollo equitativo.

Para lograrlo, estamos comprometidos en la creación de un nuevo orden internacional que se presenta como la unica opción viable ante la decadencia de nuestras instituciones económicas. La inflación, el desempleo, el caos monetario o el endeudamiento progresivo de los países subdesarrollados anuncian males aún más graves como la recesión y la hambruna.

El nuevo orden internacional—en sus aspectos políticos y económicos—interesa o debiera interesar a todas las naciones del mundo. Es una aberración malintencionada presentarío como un proyecto exclusivo de los países en desarrollo. A menos, por supuesto, que inventáramos un mundo feliz en que no hubiera sino consumidores y no fueran necesarias las materias primas, el trabajo o el financiamiento del comercio. Precisamente los puntos criticos que ponen en peligro la paz son países en vias de desarrollo, con enfrentamientos sociales, angustias económicas y ambiciones de hegemonia o de zona de influencia. Todo está en todo.

Como parte de este nuevo orden internacional, hemos propuesto a la Asamblea General de las Naciones Unidas establecer un plan mundial de energia para racionalizar la producción, la distribución y el consumo de los energéticos. Este plan preve la captacion de recursos para desarrollar fuentes alternativas de energía.

Este proyecto debe incluir a todos los miembros de la comunidad internacional y, por lo tanto, se requiere que cada país pobre o rico, productor o consumidor, asuma una responsabilidad proporcional en su realización. En la actualidad el problema energético sólo puede ser resuelto por la acción concertada de la comunidad internacional y no por las manipulaciones silenciosas de los grandes intereses transnacionales.

Las relaciones de mutuo respeto y simpatía que existen entre Canadá y México garantizan un marco adecuado para el incremento de nuestras relaciones políticas, económicas y óculturales. Tenemos voluntad y recursos para hacerlo.

En el plano económico, nos interesa especialmente la posibilidad de realizar inversiones conjuntas en algunos proyectos específicos.

Acordamos particular relevancia a la colaboración política entre nuestras naciones pues estamos seguros que el común enfoque de algunos asuntos internacionales puede contribuir a reforzar la causa de la paz y de la seguridad dento y fuera de este continente.

Your Excellency,
Honourable Members of Parliament:

We are embarking upon the next-to-last decade of the twentieth century under the shadow of grave international threats of war. The economic disorder of recent years is compounded by a generalized and acute crisis of confidence in all realms. This difficult state of affairs has even undermined the basic principles of peaceful coexistence among men and nations.

We have no desire to dissemble the wounds and scars of the world we live in. Rather, our aim is to transform it. We have little time left in which to do this, but we cannot renounce our commitment to forge the roads along which the new forces of life will march.

I pledge my faith in the future and in the fraternal relations between Canada and Mexico.

Hon. Jean Marchand (President of the Senate): Mr. President Portillo, Mr. Prime Minister of Canada, Madam Speaker, honourable colleagues of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen, in 1973, we had the great honour to welcome in this House your predecessor, Mr. President, who came to convey to us the solemn testimony of the friendship uniting Mexico and Canada. Your presence among us today vouches for the constancy of this faithful friendship. Before acceding to your high functions at the head of the State, you had foreshadowed in your writings and teachings what has been your government's program for three years now. You summarized it in two short and strong phrases which call for the reinforcement of the structures of freedom and justice and the enrichment of the values which are fundamental to national coexistence. We are also of the opinion that in the life of every nation, there must exist a dynamic relationship between the institutions with which a country endows itself and the values and aspirations they represent.

Mr. President, your visit takes place at a milestone of our history where that balance must be achieved anew. Please rest assured that Canadians will be up to that perpetual challenge as they have always been.

[English]

Mr. President, you called our attention to the urgency of searching also for the right equation in the international economic arena. We will ponder your views and the remarks by the Prime Minister about the growing and necessary interdependence between the economies of the world. Canadians have always been concerned about basic human needs. They are becoming more aware that the problem is complex, that there is no easy solution and that a wide range of interlocking issues will have to be tackled with patience and determination by all parties concerned.

Excelentísimo Señor Primer Ministro,
Honorables Miembros del Parlamento:

Iniciamos el penúltimo decenio del siglo XX bajo graves amenazas de guerra internacionales. Al desorden económico de los últimos años se agrega una generalizada y aguda crisis de confianza en todos los órdenes. Esta difícil coyuntura ha vulnerado, incluso, principios esenciales de la convivencia entre hombres y naciones.

No deseamos disimular las heridas y cicatrices del mundo en que vivimos sino transformarlo. Disponemos de poco tiempo para hacerlo, pero no podemos renunciar al compromiso de abrir los caminos por donde transitarán las nuevas fuerzas de la vida.

Hago votos por el futuro y por la fraternidad de Canadá y de México.

S.E. Jean Marchand (Presidente del Senado): Señor Presidente López Portillo, señor Primer Ministro de Canadá, Señora Presidenta de la Cámara de los Comunes, honorables colegas del Senado y de la Cámara de los Comunes, Señoras y Señores: En 1973 tuvimos el gran honor de acoger en este recinto al predecesor del Señor Presidente que nos aportaba el testimonio solemne de la amistad méxico-canadiense. Vuestra presencia entre nosotros hoy es una prueba de la constancia de esta fiel amistad. Antes de alcanzar las funciones más altas del Estado ha anunciado usted en sus escritos y en su enseñanza lo que ha sido desde hace tres años su programa de gobierno. Este programa lo ha resumido usted políticamente en dos fórmulas resueltas y concisas: robustecer las estructuras de la libertad y de la justicia y enriquecer los valores esenciales de la coexistencia nacional. Nosotros también pensamos que en la vida de cada pueblo debe existir una relación dinámica entre las instituciones con que un país se ha dotado y los valores y aspiraciones que encarnan.

Su visita, señor Presidente, tiene lugar en un momento decisivo de nuestra historia donde se debe alcanzar nuevamente dicho equilibrio. Tenga usted la seguridad que los canadienses sabrán mostrarse, como siempre, a la altura de ese reto constante.

[Tradución]

Señor Presidente: usted nos señaló asimismo que urgía tratar de establecer cierto equilibrio en el panorama económico internacional. Vamos a reflexionar sobre sus observaciones y las que hiciera el Primer Ministro (Sr. Trudeau) relativas a la creciente y necesaria interdependencia entre las diversas economías del mundo. Los canadienses siempre se han preocupado de las necesidades fundamentales de la humanidad. Cada día se dan más cuenta de la complejidad del problema, que la solución no es fácil y que todas las partes interesadas deben analizar paciente y resueltamente toda una gama de cuestiones estrechamente entrelazadas.

We thank you, Sir, for your visit and we hope that your talks with Canadian ministers will lead to a further strengthening of ties between our two countries to their mutual benefit.

[Translation]

Your Excellency, please accept our most heart-felt gratitude and offer our best wishes to your magnificient country.

Madam Speaker: Mr. President, I have the honour of expressing, on behalf of each and everyone of my colleagues, the joy that we feel at hosting you here in the House of Commons of Canada.

[English]

We have listened to your speech with great interest because it reflects your feelings and those of your countrymen toward our people and our country.

You emphasized that Mexico had to bring about unity in order to establish a homogeneous community whose mission is to create the type of climate most likely to favour the prosperity and welfare of your citizens while respecting their differences.

[Translation]

That reminds us that we too, like yourself and your people, must abolish the gaps that would prevent Canadians from feeling united within this family which bears a great deal of resemblance to yours and within the larger family which occupies the entire North American continent.

Your words bring to light the need for this constant cooperation between peoples who defend the same values and who are trying to promote a heritage with common roots in civilization.

Mexico is a fascinating country which has a special appeal to people the world over. Its spectacular geography, composed of bodies of water, forests, plains and mountains, projects an image which encompasses the multiple facets of a country whose vibrations echo the life of the old and the new world. Your culture, your civilization, your architecture, your monuments, your folklore, your music and your literature form a blend of new wealth and old treasures. Your country still retains the secret of the language and thought of its first inhabitants, a language that has not yet been decyphered but which, through its multitude of signs and its variety of images, expresses the thought, the psychology, the joy, the pains and the hopes of a people who preceeded us by far in America. It is never without deep emotion that we walk your land in the hopes of discovering old paths which will bring us back to the dawn of human life and wisdom. The meeting of the civilizations of old and of the new one which followed it have produced the jewel that is Mexico. It is with pleasure that I say to you how much we admire your political, cultural and social edifice which is greatly envied by all those who give priority to the fundamental values of society.

Le agradecemos su visita, señor Presidente, y esperamos que las conversaciones que sostenga con los ministros canadienses contribuyan a estrechar los vínculos que nos unen, para beneficio mutuo de nuestros países.

[Español]

Excelentísimo señor Presidente: acepte nuestro más profundo agradecimiento y nuestros mejores votos por su magnífico país.

Señora Presidenta de la Cámara de los Comunes: Señor Presidente, tengo el honor de expresarle, en nombre de todos y cada uno de mis colegas, todo nuestro júbilo al tenerle entre nosotros en esta Cámara de los Comunes de Canadá.

[Traduccion]

Hemos escuchado su discurso con gran interés, ya que traduce tanto sus sentimientos como los de sus compatriotas respecto a nuestro país y a nuestro pueblo.

Ha subrayado usted que México debía promover la unidad con miras a crear una sociedad homogénea que establezca un clima más favorable a la prosperidad y bienestar de sus compatriotas respetando al mismo tiempo sus diferencias.

[Español]

Esas palabras nos recuerdan que nosotros también, al igual que usted y su pueblo, debemos abolir las distancias que impiden a los canadienses sentirse unidos en esta familia tan parecida a la suya y en la todavía más numerosa de la América del Norte.

Sus palabras sacan a luz la necesidad de esta constante colaboración entre pueblos que defienden los mismos valores y que tratan de promover el bien común cuyos principios básicos pertenecen a las mismas fuentes de civilización.

México es un país tascinante que ejerce sobre todos los ciudadanos del mundo un atractivo especial. Su asombrosa configuración geográfica, sus masas de agua, bosques, mesetas y montañas proyectan una imagen que reúne las múltiples facetas de un país de vibraciones profundas cuyo eco repercute en la vida del Viejo y Nuevo Mundo. Su cultura, su civilización, su arquitectura, sus monumentos, su folklore, su música y su literatura son una síntesis de nuevas riquezas y de antiguos tesoros. Vuestro país conserva todavia el secreto de la lengua y del pensamiento de sus primeros habitantes, lengua misteriosa que no se ha podido todavía descifrar pero que, a través de sus múltiples signos y diversas imágenes, expresan el pensamiento, la psicología, alegría, sufrimientos y esperanzas de un pueblo mucho más antiguo que el nuestro en América y nunca hemos pisado vuestro suelo sin que nos embargara una profunda emoción, con la esperanza de descubrir viejos senderos que nos hagan remontar hasta la aurora de la vida y sabiduría humanas. El encuentro de las civilizaciones del pasado y de la moderna que las ha seguido creó la joya que es México. Me complace expresarle cuánto admiramos este edificio político, cultural y social que es la envidia de todos los que dan prioridad a los valores fundamentales de la sociedad.

[English]

Mr. President, you have done us the honour of bringing with you a large delegation of most distinguished politicians and citizens. I would like to extend my most sincere greetings to these distinguished visitors and I wish to assure them not only of our interest, but also of our affection.

In closing, please allow me to express once again, on behalf of all members of the House of Commons, on my behalf, our heartfelt thanks. There are links between Canada and Mexico that we would like to reinforce and extend through more frequent meetings between the representatives of our respective Parliaments. I would ask you, Your Excellency, to bring this message to your countrymen as well as our warmest wishes for their welfare and progress.

[Translation]

Let me now say that this House stands adjourned.

[Traduccion]

Señor Presidente: nos ha honrado usted al venir acompañado de una importante Comitiva de personalidades políticas y ciudadanos destacados. Quisiera extender mis más sinceros saludos a estos distinguidos visitantes y asegurarles que les testimoniamos no solo nuestro interés sino también nuestro afecto.

Para terminar, permítame expresarle una vez más, en nombre de todos los miembros de la Cámara de los Comunes y en el mío proprio, nuestro más profundo reconocimiento. Desearíamos desarrollar y robustecer los vínculos que existen entre Canadá y México organizando reuniones más frecuentes entre los representantes de nuestros respectivos parlamentos. Excelentísimo señor Presidente: le ruego tenda a bien transmitir este mensage a sus compatriotas, junto con nuestros votos más sinceros de progreso y prosperidad.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

PUBLIC SERVICE—DISCRIMINATION AGAINST LOW-PAID EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the decision of the Canadian Human Rights Commission that the federal government is discriminating against 3,000 low-paid, mainly female, public servants; the commission has decided that employees in the female-dominated food services, laundry services and related services are paid substantially less than the male-dominated stores and warehouse occupations; in view of the commission's ruling that the jobs are considered equal in value; and since the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) ignores this shocking disparity, despite repeated representations for equal pay, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That as a matter of good faith, the President of the Treasury Board move immediately to rectify this gross inequity in the public service, the result of which is to further discriminate against women, and that his action include compensation for one year's back wages.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO MARITIMES—GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Liberal leader of the opposition in New Brunswick has raised a motion in the provincial legislature that the federal government proceed with the extension of the pipeline immediately through the maritimes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources explain to his Liberal colleague in New Brunswick why the federal government does not feel it is appropriate to extend the pipeline at this time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLYMPIC GAMES

GOVERNMENT URGED TO RECONSIDER DECISION ON 1980 MOSCOW GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that about all of the European countries, plus other members of the western alliance, intend to participate in the 1980 Olympics, and since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated repeatedly that Canada should boycott the Olympics only if such a boycott would be effective, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House urge the government to reconsider its earlier decision of forbidding our athletes from attending the games; that instead, Canada assume leadership among the 103 United Nations' members who condemned the invasion of Afghanistan in the implementation of international economic and other sanctions to emphasize to the U.S.S.R. our abhorrence of such aggressive acts.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST NATIVE PEOPLE IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES PARTICIPATE IN UPCOMING DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that constitutional matters are the focus of government attention at this time, and that constitutional revisions are crucial to the political evolution of the two northern territories, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

S.O. 43

That this House recognize that representatives of the native people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories be invited to participate soon in discussions on revisions to the Canadian constitution.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT ON ATLANTIC PROVINCES OF CHANGE IN OIL PRICE COMPENSATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of some urgency.

Whereas the Atlantic provinces, following years of neglect by successive Liberal governments, are totally dependent on imported oil to the tune of 300,000 barrels a day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister of Finance be directed to study and report to the House the impact on the economies of the Atlantic provinces that would result from a reduction or an increase in oil price compensation payments, and disclose his preference to the House.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

COST OF SYNTHETIC CRUDE OIL PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recent developments clearly indicate that Canada will be facing petroleum shortages in the very near future. Whereas development of the Alsands project in Fort McMurray, Alberta, and the Imperial Oil in situ plant in Cold Lake, Alberta, are being delayed for lack of an oil pricing agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to table the studies done to determine the economic cost to Canada of a one-year delay in bringing to the Canadian market in excess of 200,000 barrels of synthetic crude oil per day.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

CARRIAGE OF CANADIAN EXPORTS BY CANADIAN VESSELS AND CREWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise, as well, under Standing Order 43, with regard to the urgency to Canadians of moving our own resources in our own ships.

In view of the arrangements to export western Canadian coal to Japan, and recognizing the need for a stimulus, soon, to the Canadian shipbuilding industry, and as an expression of support of the UNCTAD arrangements, I move:

That in any further deliberations on the transportation of coal to Japan, the Prime Minister recognize the Canadian desire to transport at least 20 per cent of cargo in vessels built in Canada and crewed by Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—PROGRAM TO ASSIST HOME OWNERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has in this House and elsewhere promised a program of assistance to Canadian home owners who are required to renegotiate commercial mortgage interest rates in 1980 and who cannot afford the substantially higher levels of interest. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to prepare and present forthwith the promised plan or program of assistance for home owners who require relief from high commercial mortgage interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MEASURES TO ASSIST FARMERS SUFFERING EFFECTS OF DROUGHT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a draft report prepared for the federal cabinet suggests there is little the federal government can do about the serious effects of the drought situation on the prairies, but that the government must look as if it is doing something by publicity stunts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House asserts that the federal government must not just look to be, but must truly be working on behalf of livestock and grain producers to alleviate the effects of the drought situation in western Canada, such as massive programs to obtain supplies of livestock feed, feed freight assistance, water well-drilling, water pipelines, extending farm credit, a minimum six-month moratorium on interest charges on FCC and FIL loans, and delay, without penalty, payments on such loans. And, further, that the minister personally take charge of all programs and replace the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Employment and Immigration in dealing with prairie governments and farmers on this serious matter.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LOTTERIES

CONDEMNATION OF GAMBLING PRACTICES THROUGH LOTTERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, whereas the previous government extricated the federal government from the lottery business, and whereas national government lotteries are a direct form of taxation mainly on poor Canadians and are, therefore, better left to non-profit organizations and local governments, and whereas the lottery business is a prime example of federal government interference and infiltration of provincial areas of jurisdiction, which has caused increasing federal-provincial constitutional stress and strain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House condemn any effort by the federal government to re-establish national gambling practices through lotteries.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

CANADA-MEXICO OIL AGREEMENT—NUMBER OF BARRELS TO BE IMPORTED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question would be for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Crosbie: He is looking for help. Answer it yourself, Pierre.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister will recall that on May 4, 1979, an agreement was initialled between Canada and Mexico, one sentence of which reads as follows:

The government of Mexico undertakes to supply and the Government of Canada assures the purchase of up to 100,000 barrels per day of crude oil during the validity of the present agreement and in conformity with the program referred to in this article.

In 1979 it was 100,000 barrels per day, but today an agreement was signed by which Mexico will be sending Canada only 50,000 barrels per day. Will the Prime Minister tell the House what happened to that lost 50,000 barrels of oil per day?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the right hon. Leader of the Opposition compares the two agreements, he is right: he will see that the figure 100,000 no longer appears. In that respect, we feel the agreement reached today is not as satisfactory as the one that had been initialled last year.

An hon. Member: Just how?

Mr. Trudeau: On the other hand, there is an improvement in the terms of the other half of the agreement, that concerning 50,000 barrels per day. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition will recall that last year the undertaking of the Mexicans was to go up to 50,000 barrels of oil per day. Now the agreement is specific as not being "up to" but, in fact, 50,000 barrels per day.

He will also see that the agreement last year was to reach that figure of up to 50,000 some time in the 12 months following 1980, whereas the terms of this agreement make that delivery of 50,000 barrels effective this December; therefore, a year in advance.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to the language of the agreement initialled last year. It does not suggest, "up to 50,000 barrels per day"; it says, "shall reach 50,000 barrels per day". That clearly indicates that the 50,000 barrels would be achieved by the agreement that was initialled and apparently abandoned.

The Prime Minister has said that somehow or other Canada benefits from having lost 50,000 barrels per day of imported oil from Mexico. Will he tell the House how we benefit from having lost, in the course of a year, 50,000 barrels per day from Mexico?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the Leader of the Opposition does not understand correctly the agreement initialled last year. It was a "best efforts" by the Mexicans toward 100,000; it was not a certain undertaking of reaching 100,000. That part of the agreement, I admit to the Leader of the Opposition, does not appear this year. There is still a "best efforts" clause, but not linked with specific figures. I can only repeat to the House what I have just said: we have not that 100,000 figure, but we have gained 12 months in the deliverance of the 50,000 figure.

Mr. Crosbie: You have lost 50,000 barrels.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the "best efforts" in the agreement that was initialled last year referred to the 100,000 barrels per day. It was in relation to that that the phrase "best efforts" occurred. There was a clear commitment of up to 50,000 barrels a day: "shall reach". There was a clear commitment that the exports "shall reach" 50,000 barrels a day in the agreement that was initialled in May of last year. What has happened is that this government, in the course of twelve months, has lost 50,000 barrels of oil a day for Canada from Mexico.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: Fumbling and bumbling.

Mr. Clark: The figures last year in the initialled agreement were spelled out in the agreement. There are no figures spelled out in the agreement that was signed today.

Miss MacDonald: Right on.

Mr. Nielsen: You blew it.

Mr. Clark: The figures are included in a joint statement by the President and the Prime Minister, but they are not part of a formal agreement signed on behalf of the two governments.

Can the Prime Minister give us a clear assurance that the 50,000 barrels a day—down 50,000 from what Canadians had a right to expect—is a firm figure and will not change, as the 100,000 barrels a day of last May changed in a year?

Mr. Nielsen: You blew it.

Mr. Trudeau: The reason it does not appear in the agreement, Madam Speaker, is that it appears in a specific contract of understanding between Pemex, the Mexican petroleum company, and Petro-Canada. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition cares to refer to that, there is a specific agreement between the exporter and the importer that the figure of 50,000 will be reached, I repeat, this December rather than December, 1981.

All I can say, Madam Speaker, is that indeed it would have been preferable if the additional figure of 100,000 "best efforts" had appeared. It does not. The Mexicans did change their minds on that.

I would hope that the agreement that our government negotiated last May, and which was initialled by the two parties, had been followed up rapidly by the then Government of Canada and that the visit of the President of Mexico had indeed taken place within months of that signature, which was our intention had we remained the government. The party opposite then formed the government and postponed that visit for a full year, which gave the Mexicans time to change their minds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows full well that that is not the case. But the fact remains that he has admitted that there is now a loss of 50,000 barrels a day—between May of last year and May of this year. He admits that.

Will he tell us what went wrong? Will he tell us what actions by the Government of Canada caused the Mexicans to back away from their "best efforts" commitment toward 100,000 barrels a day and to settle for only 50,000 barrels a day? What accounts for the lost 50,000 barrels a day?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I just said, Madam Speaker, that the opposition party formed the government of that period and failed to follow up on the advantage we had negotiated last May.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The Prime Minister will note that as of February 8, 1980—just a few days before the election—the Mexican ambassador to Canada stated that oil deliveries of 100,000 barrels of oil would be part of an energy and trade agreement to be signed when the President visited Canada in May of this year. That was February 8 of this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Explain that one.

Miss MacDonald: My question to the Prime Minister is this: The government has lost 50,000 barrels of oil from Mexico. Imports from Venezuela will be down from 240,000 barrels in the first quarter to 150,000 barrels in the last quarter of this year. As well as the loss from overseas, from offshore sources, the Minister of Energy is delaying negotiations with the provinces which would have the result of bringing on domestic supplies of oil.

● (1425)

Having had a few days to think about it, can the Prime Minister now state why the Minister of Energy went to Paris and stated that we would be oil self-sufficient by the end of this decade? Can he tell us on what projections the Minister of Energy based those comments?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would first say that I disagree with several elements of the premise to the question; but in so far as the minister justifying his statement in Paris, I would tell the hon. lady that the minister is expected in the House and he will deal with that question himself.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question. Perhaps if the Prime Minister cannot answer this and give me an assurance, I will be permitted to put it later to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What I would like to have, and what the House would be very interested in having, is that the minister table the projections on which he made that statement.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister will be pleased to consider the interests of the hon. lady.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

PURPOSE OF FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING—DATE THEREOF

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Is he now in a position to confirm that there will be a meeting of first ministers of the provinces with himself on June 9; and if that is the case, can he tell us a bit more about that meeting? Can he tell us whether this is a meeting merely to set an agenda, or a meeting to get involved in the constitutional talks themselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, I am not in the position to add to what was stated clearly in the House yesterday by the Deputy Prime Minister, because we have not yet as of this moment had a response from the tenth province. It has not indicated up to now an understanding that it will be present on that date.

Mr. Nystrom: Has the federal government committed itself to a timetable for constitutional change, so that we can have a series of meetings until the constitution is changed and fully realized, and will those meetings take place in public? Perhaps the Prime Minister can also tell us whether he has had a chance to make a decision on a suggestion made in this House last week, that the leaders of the opposition parties, and perhaps some members of the opposition, be part of the federal delegation on the constitutional talks.

Mr. Trudeau: On the latter part of the question, Madam Speaker, why does the hon. member ask me to say more than I said last week, that indeed I would hope the federal parliament would reach a consensus on the position it would want to present for a new constitution. That is still my hope. However, if that hope is not fulfilled, I am not certain that it would be easy to have members of other parties or leaders of other parties form part of the delegation assisting the Government of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I am interested in having the Prime Minister tell us whether he has made a decision on whether there will be involvement of opposition members and leaders of opposition parties in the delegation. I would also like to ask him a question about resources, which are so important to western premiers.

The committee of ministers studying the constitution was making a lot of progress on this matter before the 1979 election. Has the Prime Minister made a decision that resources will be placed on a short list, along with items such as language rights and culture to be discussed at the constitutional conferences?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must again answer that we have not yet heard from Quebec whether that provincial government will attend the conference and, if so, what will be the standards or the framework of the discussion it wants to lead. We have that information from other provinces but still not from Quebec. As long as we do not have complete information or we have not learned whether the Quebec government intends to co-operate, I would rather not state what will be the position of the federal government.

ENERGY

RELIANCE ON FOREIGN SOURCES OF OIL—NEGOTIATIONS TO INCREASE SUPPLY

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Prime Minister. It relates to Canada's reliance on foreign sources of oil. According to the best information currently available to the government, the dependency upon foreign oil will increase from the present 450,000 barrels a day to approximately 800,000 by 1985—an increase of about 78 per cent.

● (1430)

Will the Prime Minister confirm that it is upon this projection of a 78 per cent increase that his government is basing its negotiations not only with provinces but with foreign oil suppliers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, I cannot confirm that. I answered the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands a moment ago that I would take notice of her question regarding projections and I will give the hon. gentleman the same answer, namely, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be available to answer questions on projections on the estimates.

Mr. Jarvis: Given indications that our historical suppliers, such as Venezuela, will be decreasing rather than increasing shipments to us, and given the difficulty, as evidenced this week, in negotiating new contracts with such countries as Mexico, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House which countries he is looking to over the next five years to satisfy our increasing dependence on foreign oil sources?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure we would look for supplies wherever they could be had. The closer, the better.

OIL—CONTINGENCY PLANS TO MEET NEEDS OF ONTARIO, QUEBEC AND EASTERN CANADA

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since domestic oil supply is meeting a decreasing proportion of our needs, and since the government has failed to secure the 100,000-barrel objective it had in mind in the Mexican deal, since this means a potential significant shortfall in both offshore and domestic supply, since it appears that the Liberal policy as stated by its candidates both now and during the last election is rationing, will the Prime Minister tell us, what is the government's contingency plan to meet the needs of Ontario, Quebec and eastern Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as in the case of the previous question, I do not agree with the premises of this one so I do not feel an answer is called for.

Mr. Gurbin: In his lack of plan, the Prime Minister has failed to identify how he will divide limited fuel resources between agriculture, industry and consumers. Will he tell the House if he has decided who will suffer most?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SALARIES RECEIVED BY SENIOR EXECUTIVES OF CERTAIN CANADIAN CORPORATIONS—NEED FOR RESTRAINT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In the last few days, the Department of Labour reported that wages of Canadian workers increased last year by 9 per cent. Statistics Canada indicated that the cost of living increased by more than 9 per cent in the same period, so real wages have suffered a reduction.

Today, we learn from figures released by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission that senior executives of Canadian corporations such as Seagrams, Imperial Oil, the CPR and Gemstar, to mention just a few, are now receiving more than $500,000 a year in salaries and other forms of income, an increase in the last year of more than 50 per cent.

Would the minister call in the officers of these major corporations and tell them that, given the state of our economy and the desire of so many government officials that ordinary people should restrain their demands on the economy, increases of the sort I have described are unacceptable?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have noted the representations of the hon. member and will consider whether, in the circumstances, it would be useful to take the steps he suggests. I agree with him that in the present situation restraint is required in all sectors of the economy, including the group to which the hon. member has referred.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CALL FOR MANDATORY PUBLIC DISCLOSURE OF EXECUTIVE SALARIES AND BONUSES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Madam Speaker. I should like to ask the minister why Canadians have to get information of the kind I have just put on record, about executive compensation from the United States, through information required to be filed publicly as a result of regulations enacted by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Will the minister give active consideration to amending our corporations act to make mandatory public disclosure of executive salaries and bonuses, as is now provided in the United States?

ENERGY CONSERVATION

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATIVE ACTION PROPOSED

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. Because of conflicting statements forthcoming from the Minister of Energy and his senior assistant deputy minister, will the hon. gentleman show that the government is serious about energy conservation by bringing forward bills which indicate as much, or will he continue to appear to take advice from the assistant deputy minister, one of whose statements I will quote: "We ought to concentrate our communications efforts on getting them off oil rather than conserving energy"?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am unaware of such contradiction, I cannot accept the premise of my colleague. I can assure him that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is endeavouring to see that the best policies are carried out in the interests of every Canadian.

[English]

Mr. Schellenberger: Part of my question was: would the government House leader show that the government is serious about energy conservation by bringing forward bills which indicate that seriousness?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: The hon. minister will do every thing that is necessary in the best interest of the Canadian people as a whole, and that includes policies on energy conservation.

THE CONSTITUTION

REGIONALISM WITHIN THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday, in a speech he delivered in Montreal, the minister said that we were experiencing an excess of regionalism in Canada. In light of the recommendation in the Pepin-Robarts report that one of the two greatest challenges in Canada is to allow for a new and deep expression of the forces of regionalism within the constitutional system, I should like first of all to ask the minister whether he was speaking on behalf of the government.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I was expressing my own views but, in any case, when I suggested that there was a problem in that area, I was referring to the report—

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that since that question does not deal with the minister's parliamentary responsibility, it should be directed to another minister whose responsibility it is.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, perhaps you will recognize the validity of my question. I was simply asking the President of the Treasury Board, who is a member of the cabinet, whether he was speaking on behalf of the government when he made this vitally important statement, in view of the Prime Minister's statements on renewed federalism.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has been sitting in this House long enough to know that he has another recourse, and that is to direct the question to the member of the government empowered to answer such questions as to whether the minister was speaking on behalf of the government or was expressing a personal view.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, with your permission, I would like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. I think he understood the question I asked one of his ministers, the President of the Treasury Board, on the excessive regionalism we are presently experiencing in Canada, contrary to the recommendation contained in the Pepin-Robarts report for which I have the utmost respect. Was the minister speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not see in the minister's text where he spoke of excessive regionalism. I saw the expression "knee-jerk reaction" used in the context of decentralization and in that sense I fully agree with the minister. There is a pronounced tendency to think that we can solve all problems by greater decentralization and, in my view, that is not the only solution.

TRAIN DERAILMENT AT MIRAMICHI RIVER, N.B.— CONTAMINATION OF FISH

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As the minister knows, last Saturday a train derailed and plunged into the Miramichi River near Juniper, New Brunswick. I would like to ask the minister what he is doing to mitigate the effects on fish of the chemicals spilled into the Miramichi River.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, there is very little that we can do—

An hon. Member: Double-track.

Mr. LeBlanc: An hon. member has derailed over there. There is very little we can do once a spill has occurred, especially since we were notified only two days after the incident. I will, of course, be looking into that aspect of it, because I consider it to be quite serious that the railway authorities did not notify the proper departments. I am told that the damage is not as serious as had been feared at the beginning. But we are monitoring the situation to see the extent of damage. I only wish we had been told when the products were still in the water, and we could have conducted testing.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for CMHC, who is also responsible for the failure of Canada's home repair program.

Given the fact that families rarely qualify for RRAP home repair grants because the government refuses to adjust the unrealistically low 1974 income guidelines, or they cannot afford RRAP loans because CMHC has raised the interest rate from 8 per cent to 14½ per cent, or they do not live in an area designated for RRAP—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mrs. Mitchell: —will the minister tell us whether this government is deliberately phasing out RRAP, which is so essential to upgrading older housing stock in Canada, as these increasing restrictions would indicate?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to phase out the program. Indeed, the government is studying and is attempting to infuse new activity into this program, as indeed we are into others.

It is a question of which program receives attention today, tomorrow and the next day. We have many requests from members of the party of the hon. lady who asked the question; but I can assure her that it is not our intention to let that program go. It is a valuable program, it has been encouraged and supported, and I intend to encourage it in the future.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, if new activity means disregard of recommendations in reports which have been in the minister's department for two years, I wonder about new activity.

In view of the fact that 200,000 low income families across Canada urgently need home repairs, and in Vancouver 1,000 hardship cases are waiting while close to $1 million of RRAP funds were unspent last year, will the minister assure this House that income guidelines will be adjusted, area restrictions removed completely, and interest on home repair loans rolled back so that these blatant disincentives are eliminated?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, through the last few years, in the short history of this program, we have gradually raised the number of homes which qualify. If we need to take the next move, which is to update the group which falls into it, that takes into account thousands of homes from coast to coast. To respond in equity from coast to coast would take a large infusion of funds. So we cannot do that. However, we are looking at modest ways by which we can approach strengthening the program in other ways.

FOREST FIRES

PLANS TO ALLEVIATE HARDSHIP SUFFERED BY VICTIMS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in his role as half of the western Liberal party.

On a tour in Saskatchewan last Sunday, the minister told us in the House that the devastation of the forest fires and, I think, the drought situation in the western provinces was surveyed. Could the minister tell us whether at the meeting last Sunday in Regina he and his colleagues came forward with any meaningful plan to alleviate the hardships imposed on the people of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and parts of British Columbia?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, the discussions we held in Regina were with the officials who comprised the drought task force, which was established in 1977 when the prairie region went through a similar difficult period of dry conditions.

Those officials are from several departments. They have been meeting, advising and assessing the situation on a constant basis. They also have been negotiating with provincial governments. We have met with them. We discussed different proposals which could be made. Those proposals are being drafted and will be presented to cabinet, we hope, within the next week.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear the minister say that meaningful steps are being taken. A Canadian Press story from Regina, leaked from cabinet documents prepared for the cabinet as to what the role of the cabinet should be in the drought on the prairies and Saskatchewan, indicates in part that there is little the government can do about the drought in the west—"but it is of critical importance that we be perceived to be doing something; that we should arrange and stage a public relations effort so that the actions—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask his question.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, in light of this cynicism, can the minister explain what meaningful program regarding drought cost-sharing with the prairie provinces his government will enter into? Saskatchewan has committed $20 million. Is the federal government going to pay 50 per cent of the $20 million in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should know that when it comes to meaningful action, the federal government is already heavily involved in a number of initiatives to relieve the problems in western Canada. We cannot relieve the drought: that is beyond our control and, I suggest, the control of all mortals. However, through agencies like the PFRA we are providing the opening of the community pasture system in the prairie region, and a number of water services.

Major initiatives are being taken at this point in time by the Department of Agriculture, and DREE, in their programs to aid and assist farmers. We have indicated in our discussions with provincial authorities that when they are prepared to put forward specific proposals about cost-sharing, those would be considered by the government, as they have been in the past.

Mr. Malone: We want rain, not a snow job.

ENERGY

OIL—SOURCES OF SUPPLY FOR EASTERN CANADA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The very serious blow with respect to the security of oil energy for Atlantic Canada which has come with the agreement signed between Canada and Mexico today is one to be regretted. It causes some real alarm, which I am sure the minister appreciates.

Given the fact that the need to import oil to meet unsecured domestic sources of oil in eastern Canada over the next seven or eight years will go up some 75 per cent or 80 per cent, can the minister tell the people of the maritimes, Newfoundland and Labrador what sources he is looking at to replace not only the valuable 50,000 barrels lost today, but also the increased requirements to meet basic needs in that part of Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like, first of all, to alleviate some of the fears of the hon. gentleman by saying that Canada has not lost today 50,000 barrels a day; it has won 50,000 barrels a day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That has happened.

Mr. Crosbie: Less is more!

Mr. Lalonde: I understand the nervousness on the other side: they did not do anything about it for a year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I say that this gain of 50,000 barrels a day has been made in spite of the fact that during the time they were in office, hon. members opposite did not do anything about increasing supply either from Mexico or from Venezuela. We had to work at double time to catch up with what they failed to do when they were in government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I only want to add that the hon. member should not, again, spread useless fears about shortages in eastern Canada, for the very good reason that while it is true that Canada is importing oil, we have a policy in this government of making sure—through the Emergency Supplies Allocation Board, that if there were ever a shortage in this country, no one area would suffer at the expense of another area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, it would be interesting if the minister, or the Prime Minister, could indicate to people in Atlantic Canada just how they would transport oil or natural gas beyond Montreal and Quebec City to lend effect to the wild statements the minister just made. They were totally irresponsible.

● (1450)

My supplementary question arises from a very clear awareness, from comments made earlier today by the Prime Minister and, just now, by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that they neither understand nor care about Atlantic Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Nor the people in the west.

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to ask the minister this: with respect to the 50,000 barrels of oil for which we have now signed an agreement, and I remind the minister that as late as February 8—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Especially on a supplementary question, I feel the hon. member should put his question quite shortly.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. minister that as late as February 8 there were assurances from Mexico—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Forrestall: —that it would be—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Make it short and snappy, as Madam Speaker said.

Oral Questions

TRANSMISSION OF SUPPLIES TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question either to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Take the Prime Minister, he's easier.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the government's decision not to proceed with the maritime portion of the natural gas pipeline, an action which would go a long way toward relieving the concern of Nova Scotia over a possible shortage of energy, I should like to ask the minister: would the government consider the establishment of a tanker service, either an intermediate or a small tanker service, between Montreal and Halifax in order to supply our area with Canadian oil?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am glad that at least this other hon. member from the maritimes knows that there is such a thing as maritime service in this country to help areas where there may be shortages at times.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: In answer to the non-question of the previous member, I might point out that that hon. member does not seem to realize—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. minister pursue his answer, please?

Mr. Lalonde: I should like to point out to hon. members, in case they do not know on the other side, that the Panama Canal was constructed many years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: For years we have been able to ship oil from Vancouver, via the Panama Canal, to the east coast and to St. Romuald, near Quebec City. So that possibility always exists.

Miss MacDonald: That is why there is so much now.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the specific question raised by the hon. member is concerned, he also knows that the government indicated that, while it agreed with the Energy Board decision to proceed with building the pipeline only to Quebec City at the present time, our preferred option remains to have the full building of the line as soon as the environmental concerns have been answered and as soon as we have sufficient information concerning the reserves off Sable Island. This is still the policy of this government and this is what we intend to abide by.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Where is Allan MacEachen when we need him? Surely he can stand up for the maritimes.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since we are now paying over $20 a barrel to compensate imports of foreign crude oil, costing this nation more than $3.1 billion in 1980 alone, is the government giving any consideration or planning to liquefy the natural gas which is available in huge quantities in the Baffin Island area, for delivery to the maritimes; and if so, when can we expect an announcement of this possible development?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, indeed the government is considering the possibility of liquefaction of Arctic gas for transportation. This will be a very major project indeed. Petro-Canada is working on this particular question right at the present time. As the hon. member may know, it is called the Arctic Gas pilot project. Petro-Canada intends to apply to the National Energy Board some time this fall for authorization to proceed with the exploitation of those reserves.

As far as bringing that gas to the maritimes in order to increase supply to the maritimes is concerned, it would appear that the more economical way of doing it would be by shipping gas to the maritimes via a pipeline from the west, rather than through liquefaction from the Arctic. But the Arctic gas, the liquefied gas, might be gas that would be available for export if the Energy Board finds these are surplus reserves.

FISHERIES

POLLUTION OF WEST COAST MARINE RESOURCES—STUDY BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the fact that a marine veterinarian has warned that the increasing incidence of marine mammals washing up on the west coast of British Columbia is an indication of deteriorating ocean ability to harbour man's pollutants, I should like to ask the minister if he could inform us whether his department is aware of this dangerous precedent and if any research is being carried out on marine mammals to indicate the cause of death, so that we can prevent threats to marine mammals and further threats to more marine resources in the future?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, of course I will inquire about recent incidents, if some are reported. When an unusual situation arises, there is great scientific interest in trying to determine the cause of unexplained death of species washed up on the shore. I do not have in my briefing notes any comments on recent incidents, but I will inquire from the hon. member. Then, of course, if there is a substantive answer I will provide it.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Several of the most important and dangerous accumulative poisons are lead, arsenic and radium, which are heavy metals that accumulate in the body fat and interfere with normal functioning.

These heavy poisons have been permitted to be dumped in Alice Arm by Amax Mines, and permits for the dumping of mine waste and mine tailings in Alice Arm, beginning next year, have been approved by the British Columbia Pollution Control Board and by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Could the minister inform us, in his capacity as Minister of Fisheries, if he has directed his department to investigate the decision, in view of its seriousness? In effect, would the minister consider reversing the decision made during the last election?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I was informed of this problem, or this situation when I was last in British Columbia and I asked for a full report on it. I would not reverse the decision unless there was evidence to show that the decision should be reversed. In this case, scientists made the judgment—and I understand the province was involved in these discussions—that it was better to use an underwater site for dumping than to use a land fill site, where rain causes leaching and in fact accentuates the problem. But I will look into this matter and report.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTION CENTRAL BANK FOLLOW LOWER INTEREST RATE POLICY TO AVOID RECESSION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. I was wondering whether, in his weekly evaluation of the interest situation, he is taking into account the serious drought situation in western Canada as it affects not only the grain industry, but the cattle and the tourist industries as well.

I wonder if it has entered the mind of the minister, or the governor of the Bank of Canada, that continued high interest rates, even at the present rates, will cause a serious recession not only in western Canada but in the total Canadian economy? Will he ascertain from the governor of the Bank of Canada whether or not it might be advisable at this time to continue a lower interest rate policy in order that we might avoid an unnecessary recession which would affect the unemployed and the total economy of the country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will be aware that there has been a very significant drop in interest rates—in fact, a very substantial drop in interest rates—in the past number of weeks. When I became Minister of Finance when this government took office, the bank rate was 14 per cent; today it is 11.83 per cent.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is quite a result. If the hon. member could live with a 14 per cent bank rate, I think he can reconcile himself to an 11.83 per cent bank rate.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CUPW—COST TO TREASURY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In that he has been strangely silent during the post office negotiations with CUPW, I felt he should be given an opportunity to tell the House how well he has guarded the treasury.

Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether he can assure the House that the settlement with CUPW will not result in additional costs in excess of $26.1 million?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it is not our practice to carry on negotiations in public. I would expect my predecessor to be aware of that. The matter has not yet been ratified by Treasury Board. When it is, full details will be made available.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In that the "A" budget, which is now in our estimates, contemplated a 6 per cent settlement for wages, plus any known scheduled increases for the CUPW, and there are no unexpended funds available for the Post Office budget and there are no reserves, will the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether he contemplates that special supplementary estimates will have to be brought into the House to satisfy the increase with regard to the settlement with CUPW?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I would very much like to satiate the hon. member's curiosity; but, as I said, full details will be made available after the proposed contract has been ratified by the Treasury Board.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NOWLAN—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I hesitate to bring forward the perennial point of privilege about a situation that members on all sides sometimes experience but, quite frankly, Your Honour, my patience has almost come to the end. Any sensitivity for the issues before this country would have perhaps given some direction to the Chair as to why I have been rising right from the beginning of the question period for two days, having asked three to four questions in English and one question in French during the total time of this session. I do not rise frivolously in most cases, and I have not asked a frivolous question this session.

I have a matter that could potentially grievously affect my province in Atlantic Canada, and particularly my riding. There have been three members on this side of the House recognized today, fellow colleagues, admittedly, who were also recognized by Your Honour yesterday. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), for whom I have great fondness and affection, was not on any list on Monday and was not on any list today, but you recognized him twice and still have been able to have a blind eye for this seat.

I would like to know what system the Chair uses. Admittedly you recognize front benchers, and you have help to guide the Chair, with which I fully agree; but I felt that once the question period was open the priority related to when members commenced to rise. I do not mind getting my exercise, Madam Speaker. I certainly enjoy getting exercise. But at some time I would like to know why my rising does not take precedence over other hon. members.

That is my question of privilege, Your Honour. I do not think either of the two ministers involved in the questions I wish to ask are going to be here tomorrow and I have given notice to both of them.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have already explained to the House what is my policy in conducting the question period. I did say that, of course, when front benchers want to get into the question period and I know they might have a supplementary to a question asked by another member, I allow them to ask those supplementary questions because I want the question period to be as lively as possible and to bring out as much information as possible.

As for the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), his name was on the list of those who have risen in the House for several days. I do acknowledge that. I recognize hon. members in the order in which they have risen and the hon. member's name was the fifth to come up on my list, but we did not get to him before three o'clock.

Many members rise and I try to recognize them in the order in which they do so. I am assisted in that regard, to be as fair as possible, by the Clerk who tries to give me that order. I do my best in trying to recognize members as soon and as often as possible, but it is not possible to recognize everyone every day. On subsequent days I bring back the names on my list, but if hon. members are not in the House it is quite obvious I cannot recognize them. I cannot keep them on the list for five or six days in a row. That is my policy and the system that I have tried to establish in order to satisfy all members, but we all know that is impossible.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I accept and appreciate the explanation. I do not like to say things in this House that reflect upon the Chair because the Speaker occupies a very onerous position, but when I see my colleagues, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), the hon. member for South Shore and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), all of whom were recognized yesterday, recognized again today on legitimate questions, I feel your system has to be revised to become a little more perceptive, with respect.

MR. CLARKE—LACK OF PUBLICATION OF COMPOSITE PHOTOGRAPH OF MEMBERS OF THIRTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I hope to be able to convince Your Honour that I have a question of privilege in relation to a matter which affects most hon. members of this Parliament and, indeed, many of the members of the Thirty-first Parliament. It is a matter that has just come to my attention through an inquiry made to the office of the Clerk of this House. The problem is that a custom, nay a tradition, of Parliament may be destroyed by a simple administrative decision.

The Thirty-first Parliament was unique to many people for many reasons. For example, for some it was their only stint as a member of Parliament. It may or may not have been the shortest Parliament on record; the record will show whether it was or was not. It was unquestionably the first Progressive Conservative administration for 16 years. I am confident that it will prove to have been the first, but not the last, of which the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was prime minister. It may be the only one during which the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) was leader of the official opposition, as they tell me he is going to retire again.

Members of the House and, indeed, visitors to the Parliament buildings stroll through the corridors here and view various contributions to the history of this country. I am informed reliably now that composite photographs of the members of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada will not be produced.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has not given me notice of this question of privilege. I listened to him in order to determine whether it flows from the deliberations of today's session, but I find that it does not do so. Therefore, if the hon. member wants to give me notice I will hear him at another time.

Mr. Clarke: With respect, Madam Speaker, this is the earliest opportunity I have had to raise the matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

> That the matter of the lack of publication of a composite photograph of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member that if those photographs have not been put out, as they usually are, it is simply because a lot of the members were absent and we could not take their photographs. This is done as a matter of course. I hope this explanation satisfies the member; if not, I would ask him to give me notice and I will hear him another time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF HON. LINCOLN M. ALEXANDER

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I hope that you will forgive me if I take a few moments of the time of this House. I know that there are matters of significant importance which must be debated, but I feel that it is necessary, after having spent 12 years in this House, to give some credibility to what is already a fact, that I will be leaving my "family", as I would like to have it known, this House of Commons, because I have accepted a position with the Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario.

I wish you well, Madam Speaker. I saw that you were being tested today. I think that you have the fortitude and excellence of mind to handle yourself in your new position. I am sorry that I did not have an opportunity to become more involved and to challenge you as well, but I thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak to the House.

I have been touched by the excitement of this place. I have been moved by the challenges and touched by the joys and disappointments. But what is more important to me is that I have been touched by the friendships which I know I have made, because I have received so many letters wishing me well. When my friend from Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) triggered that spontaneous standing ovation, it was a good thing that I did not have to speak at that time because there were tears in my eyes. I am not ashamed to say that I was not able to control myself. That was a great tribute and one I will never forget.

That is why I feel so sad at this particular time. This is a great family and a tremendous institution. When I think of the criticism which comes from all quarters, I say to my colleagues, "Forget it, because you are serving". Let those who criticize try to get into this place. There are so many who try to get in, but who cannot make it.

However, I have been blessed. I am grateful to three of four people, who I would like to single out, with your patience, Madam Speaker. The late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker is the one who asked me to run, who believed that I should be here in this House and who believed that I had a role to play. No matter where he may be, I hope that I have not disappointed him.

I remember Bob Stanfield. He plucked me from what is called the back benches and honoured me by making me a critic in the shadow cabinet.

Of course, there is the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who made me a cabinet minister. Madam Speaker and my dear colleagues, I stand here naked because in my wildest dreams I never believed that I would represent my country as a member of Parliament or that it was possible I would represent my country as a cabinet minister.

Yes, I will have some very fond memories of this place, but I think it must be recognized that there are many around us who make our lives more successful. It is not only the "me's" and the "I's" who are fortunate to be sitting here temporarily, but I think of those who are involved in Hansard, the maintenance department, the office of the Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, security, the post office, public servants and even the media—although, there are a couple I would like to mention specifically, but I will let them know that I have love and forgiveness in my heart! Frankly, I could not care less what they think about me anyway.

I care about what the hon. members of this House think of me, and I care about what the people of Hamilton West think of me. I am pleased to have concrete evidence that they thought enough of me to send me back to this House on five occasions. But to those people to whom I made reference, I would like to say thank you, because without their assistance and help the Alexanders and anyone else you would like to mention, Madam Speaker, would not be effective in this House of Commons. They are the people who protect us and who look after us. I would like publicly to thank them now for looking after me for the past 12 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: These people have made my task very easy and very pleasant. I would like to extend a special thanks to Labour Canada. Although I was not there long, they did keep me out of trouble, and I thank them from the bottom of my heart. I wish them well because they are a fine group of people. When a new government takes charge and new ministers are appointed, there are some who believe that perhaps the public servants are not on their side. I can stand here and say that I had the confidence of my department, for which I am very grateful and I thank them.

Last but not least, I want to thank the constituents of Hamilton West who gave me their confidence, loyalty, and faith over the years. It is in this area that I feel a little confused and a little sad because they were counting on me. However, I will not disappoint them in the future because I am going into another area of service. I can advise them, as I can advise my colleagues here, that you expect much of me, that you want me to do a good job and I will not disappoint you, as I have tried not to disappoint you in all the years I have been here.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would like to tell you in all sincerity and from the bottom of my heart that I will miss this place. But I think having served in this place I am a much better person, and for that I am grateful. Thank you very much.

[Editor's note: Mr. Alexander received a standing ovation.]

Mr. Alexander: Madam Speaker, I would now indicate to you that I resign my seat in the House of Commons for the constituency of Hamilton West effective midnight, May 28, 1980.

TRIBUTES TO HON. LINCOLN M. ALEXANDER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I think this is one occasion on which I can truly claim to speak on behalf of all members of the House of Commons when I say to the member of Parliament for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) just how very much he will be missed in this assembly, in the work of Parliament and of government. I think it is true to say that no member of Parliament is better liked in this House and that no member of Parliament will be more sorely missed by his colleagues.

The hon. member for Hamilton West served here with distinction for 12 productive years. He became a symbol of Canadian democracy and a spokesman for Canadians in need across this land. He served his constituency with care and sensitivity. He served in cabinet as an outstanding minister of labour. But more importantly to him and to us, he won the respect and affection of all who were associated with the House of Commons.

We all wish him well in the new responsibilities which he has accepted, but this House of Commons will miss Lincoln Alexander and will long remember him as one of the outstanding individuals ever to have served in this Parliament.

● (1520)

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was perfectly correct when he said that on this occasion he was speaking for everyone in this House of Commons. I should just like to make that very clear and very certain by associating the New Democratic Party with the sentiments that have been expressed.

I rise to speak on behalf of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), who, like the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), first came here in 1968. I also speak on behalf of all my colleagues.

We enjoyed the remarks the hon. member made today in his final speech in this chamber. I think what appealed to us most—at least, it appealed to me—was his emphasis on the friendships he has developed in this assembly, friendships that he will carry with him through the rest of his life. We have not always agreed with the hon. member. He and I have had some interesting discussions, but more often than not we have agreed and we have common interests. He has served this place with distinction. He has put forth his best effort and he fully deserves the tributes we have been paying to him in these few moments today.

We say goodbye to Lincoln Alexander from the House of Commons and we wish him the very best through all the years that lie ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to have the opportunity of saying a few words in tribute to my colleague and friend, and my colleague from law school as well. We both went to Osgoode Hall law school and got to know each other very well over the years. Of course, he has been much more successful than I, and I guess he was more successful in law school as well. He has certainly been more successful politically. Although we were both elected in 1968, I sort of took a sabbatical from 1972 to 1974 while he continued to serve here. We have both been around since that time, Madam Speaker.

On behalf of this party I want to echo the sentiments of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who spoke for the New Democratic Party.

I have enjoyed working with the hon. member these many years. He is going on to his reward with a new career—a career with the Workmen's Compensation Board in the province of Ontario. As a member from Ontario, I know that I shall be working with him and seeing him from time to time. I can only say au revoir, good luck, and God be with you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for permitting me this opportunity of adding my voice to those of the leader of the Conservative party and others in paying tribute to one who is best described as a very personal friend.

When the hon. gentleman arrived in this House in 1968, I was then the minister of labour. In a comparatively short period of time I was very much aware of a rather brash, talented new member of the opposition party. In no time at all, as I recall, the hon. member became the Official Opposition critic of the labour portfolio. One day I called him over after a rather tough question or two and expressed the opinion that he had perhaps been a little unfair. He reminded me that he had patterned his particular style after mine, which made it very difficult for me. He is a very charming individual.

I repeat what has often been said, that this is a very unique institution. I recall the hon. member and his wife coming with us to the ILO convention in Geneva in the early seventies. I had an opportunity to break bread with him and get to know him well. I must admit that I have always had a particularly soft spot for the hon. gentleman, particularly since he is the member of Parliament for the riding in which my mother lives. I am not just sure how she voted in the last election, since very early in the campaign she received a personal visit from the hon. member.

In conclusion, I want to say as one who left this House in 1976 that it is not at best a very easy decision. If we are selfish we tend to remain here because we enjoy the company of members, the challenge and the unpredictability of the House of Commons if you are a House of Commons man.

I recall on a similar occasion that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) expressed the wish that perhaps one day fortune would be such that I would be back in the House of Commons. I hope that what happened to me does not happen to the hon. gentleman.

I know, from the hon. member's record in this House of Commons and particularly from his compassion when he was minister of labour for those wonderful Canadians who do manual work for a living, that he is more than adequate to fulfil the role of head of Ontario's workmen's compensation board. I bridled and went to the defence of the hon. member when, shortly after his appointment, it was suggested by certain members of the press that he lacked the qualifications for the job. I think, Madam Speaker, that the qualities which the hon. gentleman has exemplified so many times here—compassion, concern, curiosity, willingness and devotion to work—are all the qualifications he needs to fill this very sensitive position, and I wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I know that all of us in this House would like to pay special tribute to the departing member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). We are extremely fond of him. As a matter of fact, I do not think it would be too much to say that we love him.

He is one of the four surviving members of the Conservative party of the class of '68; I am one of the four survivors of the class of '68 in my own party.

Mr. Nystrom: Retreaded.

Mr. Rose: Recycled and retreaded. I should like to tell him that I express no flim-flam at all when I suggest that the kind of friendship he has developed with all members of the House on both sides is unique. He is unique in a lot of ways. He is a person with drive, intelligence, forcefulness and a tremendously big heart.

We plan to have a meeting of the survivors of the class of '68 on June 25, which is a very important anniversary. Although he intends to resign from this House today or tomorrow, I should like him to know that we intend to award him special status and hope that he will be able to come to Ottawa and join the survivors of '68. There are some 25 members left out of approximately 100 who were elected, which tells something about job security around this place.

We offer the hon. member congratulations on his new career and want to let him know that we will certainly miss him. I know that he will miss us, and I hope he comes back some day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I also want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). His contribution to the Parliament of Canada has been exceptional. He dedicated 12 years of his life to representing his constituents and Canadians as a whole in the best way he could, and I believe the circumstances justify that, on behalf of the government, I should offer him our best wishes, good health and a successful career outside this House.

I do not want to add further to what was said by those who knew him more intimately, but I would like to say that I personally had the opportunity to come in contact with him on several occasions. He proved himself to be a seasoned parliamentarian but always polite and always aware of that spirit that must stir us of being adversaries, of course, but at the same time people working for a common cause—the improvement of the well-being of Canadians as a whole.

[English]

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I have recognized a good sense of humour in the hon. member for Hamilton West. I am sure he will agree with me when I say that the House of Commons will have a "missing Linc."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

JANIS JOHN GRIMBA

Question No. 14—Mr. Cossitt:

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM MONTHLY AMOUNT OF SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed from Monday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Bégin that Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am not so certain that the continuation of this debate at this time is appropriate following on the heels of the announcement by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that he is retiring from the House of Commons. As we are all aware, it is not his intention to retire from active life and he will continue to serve his country in another function for many more years to come.

I have been listening with great interest to the debate on Bill C-16 as it has continued, and I must say that the speech presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is of great interest to all members of this House, particularly on a subject which is so near and dear to him. I think members would do well to take heed of the remarks of the member from Winnipeg North Centre on a subject about which he is so knowledgeable.

I listened also with great interest to the speeches made by my colleagues in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). Both of these gentlemen made excellent representations, and I am certain their impact will be felt in the presentation of this bill and their support of it.

I must add that I was interested to hear what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) had to say. Probably he should know more about pensions than anybody else in the nation. Unfortunately, like most of the others in the country I was disappointed with his remarks. I suppose if anybody in this House of Commons should not have been dealing with that particular subject, it might be said that the member for Lincoln, who has been somewhat chatted about in recent months, should not have entered into the particular question of pensions.

However, I am glad to say that I can support Bill C-16, which will give a $35 increase to recipients of the GIS. But I am somewhat concerned about the method in which it was presented to the country. As hon. members are aware, this bill came about as a result of a Liberal promise made during the past election campaign, and although the fine print dealt explicitly with its being made available only to those who could pass a test, which presumably is the means test, it was in the minds of most individuals, certainly most recipients of old age security, that all people who were 65 years of age and over would be receiving the $35 increase.

For that reason I think it unfortunate that it had to come in the fashion it did, because the plight of senior citizens in Canada surely must be of more concern to the consciences of government than an election campaign. It was in that same vein that I was disappointed in the approach of the other opposition party in this House, that it too utilized senior citizens somewhat as a tool in its effort to have members elected. That is on the record, if anyone should choose to inspect it.

There were pressures on the government of the day to include that type of promise. However, we determined that we should not use senior citizens to that extent, and our decision was that the entire plight of senior citizens should be examined thoroughly and the decision would be based on a realistic evaluation of the difficulties that these people face.

By the year 2001 the number of senior citizens in Canada will have increased to about 3.4 million souls. Presently there are about 2.1 million senior citizens here. They represent approximately 12 per cent of the population. By the year 2030, we will have over 7 million senior citizens in Canada. Senior citizens are defined as those people over the age of 65. There will be about two to three times as many senior citizens in Canada by the year 2030 as there are now. By the year 2031, it is estimated that in Canada there will be only two people working to support one senior citizen. At the present time there are seven working people who support one pensioner.

The question that we must deal with as members of the House of Commons is to determine how these people are living and to examine their plight. I think that most of us recognize and appreciate that senior citizens are living poorly. Old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Pension Plan account for more than one-half of the total income of people over the age of 65. Private sources—that is, private pensions—amount to something less than 12 per cent of the total income of senior citizens. In 1978, 54 per cent of recipients of the OAS were eligible for the guaranteed income supplement. That indicates that over 54 per cent of our senior citizens in 1978 were below the poverty line and were less well off than they were prior to 1978, prior to becoming senior citizens.

The average income of the elderly is about one-third that of the non-elderly. After tax considerations are taken into account, it increases to about 40 per cent. Even after the allowance for wealth, which includes such things as houses and other properties and the number in the family that they are responsible for, the gap gets narrower, but there is no question that the gap is still considerable.

Financing to support senior citizens is becoming an increasing burden on society. Today the expenditure of keeping senior citizens amounts to about 3 per cent of the total value of goods and services. By the year 2031 it is expected that the total expenditure will amount to about 7-plus per cent of the value of goods and services. It costs about three times as much in Canada to keep an elderly person as it does to maintain a child. That shoots down the argument that when the year 2031 rolls around there will be fewer children so there will be more money available to support senior citizens.

We recognize that as compassionate Canadians the objective of government has got to be the alleviation of poverty among our elderly citizens. In those terms Canada does not do such a bad job as far as other nations of the world are concerned. The only nations in the free world that exceed Canada's contribution to its elderly are Sweden, Italy and France, but in real terms, the terms that we must deal with, are they being treated fairly? The fact is that senior citizens in this country, the elderly who are recipients of old age security and guaranteed income supplement, are substantially below the minimum income standards that most of us know.

It is also interesting to note that elderly couples are better off than singles in this country. Because women live longer than men, they are worse off when living alone in unsubsidized housing. They are at the bottom of the heap, so to speak. Twenty per cent of the elderly couples in this country and 60 per cent of individuals who are senior citizens are living below the poverty line. Their plight increases every day because of inflation. The fact is that their pensions are based on the consumer price index. However, the CPI does not reflect that increase in the commodity which so much affects them as individuals. That of course, is primarily the price of food. It is way out of line in comparison to the CPI. For that reason, it is unfair that these pensions are indexed on the CPI scale.

We then come to the question: Can we continue to afford to support them? Can we look into the future and can we see ourselves as a nation being able to pay the bills? In this country, as I mentioned, the pension schemes include the old age security, guaranteed income supplement and Canada Pension Plan. The old age security and guaranteed income supplement are programs that are financed by taxes that are collected during the year, and the Canada Pension Plan is partially funded.

As I stated, we must not forget that it is our responsibility as legislators, as members of Parliament, as the voice for senior citizens in this House of Commons, to ensure that their poverty is not only alleviated and helped, but indeed that they are brought to a level whereby then can live as properly as they should. That is our responsibility, and I want to reinforce my support for any type of legislation that will bring these senior citizens, who in so many cases are below the poverty line, above the poverty line.

In that regard, I will support Bill C-16 although the help of $35, or $17.50 each in the case of couples, is not very much. It is a mere pittance, but it is a step in the right direction. However, this House should not regard that as being a permanent solution. Surely the government will take it upon itself to do something about the difficulties of these people before another general election is held. These are hard decisions, the financing of the plan, which must be taken now. We cannot wait until the time is upon us when we no longer have the funds to assist our senior citizens.

Some people say that all funding should come out of general revenue, that the younger generation, the people who are now in the work force, should be paying to support the older generation. With respect to the old age security and guaranteed income supplement, I can support that kind of thesis. This is the type of system we have had in this country for a good number of years. I believe there is room in our system to support this type of approach.

However, I reject it with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. It is in that regard that I believe we must take responsibility now to ensure that the Canada Pension Plan remains at a level that will alleviate the drain on the treasury which it is bound to make and will as a result affect the guaranteed income supplement when the time rolls around that there are no longer any funds left in the Canada Pension Plan.

At the present rate, by 1985 pay-outs will apparently exceed contributions. By the turn of the century, the year 2000, the fund will be depleted entirely. It is obvious to me, and I trust obvious to the government and to other members of the House, that the time is now here to adjust the formula. We must prepare for the future of our senior citizens now.

There has been some suggestion that lower retirement should be brought into play, that it should be made available to those individuals who want to opt out of the work force. The entitlement to old age security and the guaranteed income supplement has been age 65 for close to a decade. I reject the suggestion put forward by some members that the retirement age should be reduced to 60. The fact is that people are living longer in this day and age and are expected to continue to live longer as the years go by. They are living longer because they are healthier. I do not reject out of hand all cases. I think there are special instances.

I was pleased to see the previous Conservative government take steps to protect widows between the ages of 60 and 65 who lost their spouses who were over 65 and were no longer entitled to spouse's allowances. I was pleased to see that government take steps to ensure that spouses continue to receive the spouse's allowance. That is a healthy attitude. That is an attitude I feel we should see continue in this House.

I would like to plead the case for those widows who had husbands or widowers who had wives in the work force who predeceased them and who are below 60 years of age, for example age 56, 57, 58 or 59. These people have a difficult time trying to cope with life. At that age it is difficult for someone who has never had any experience in the work force to try and go out and make a living and a contribution not only to themselves, but perhaps a family as well. I would like to think this government would have compassion enough for those people that they would take into consideration the situation in which this very special group of people find themselves.

I would also like to plead the case on behalf of the families of veterans whose breadwinner, or the veteran himself, has died. Those people should be allowed a special place, an entitlement to pension benefits and to consideration from us as legislators. I feel the mandatory retirement age of 65 is no longer realistic. I would like to see that phased out. In too many instances at age 65 we have people who are prepared and able to cope with many more years of service in the work force. People need that income as a means to support their families and themselves at the level to which they are accustomed. When we force them into retirement at age 65, in too many instances we are forcing them into a state of poverty.

These people should be able to maintain their eligibility to work and their eligibility to their pensions as well. At age 65 they should continue to receive their old age security benefits. They should be allowed to continue to work if that is their decision. In a good many instances, they are competent, capable individuals. We have seen many examples in the House of Commons of individuals who have much to contribute and who have contributed much past the age of 65. Of course, the fact of the matter is that as they become more of a force, they become a more significant group in the country and, with fewer people entering the work force we are going to need their contribution.

The special Senate committee on retirement has recommended the abolition of mandatory retirement one year at a time over the next five years. I believe that report was published last November. I support that approach. I believe it is a realistic attitude for the nation to adopt. I would like to see this country head in that direction.

In closing, may I say that the economy needs our senior citizens. It will rely on the competence and capability of these people more and more as the years progress and I believe we should not be forcing them out. I believe we should be providing greater amounts of money to our pension scheme, the one which is partially funded at this time, the Canada Pension Plan, to ensure that there are dollars there in the years to come to continue paying out the full benefits of the plan without relying on the taxpayers of the day to do that job, and that there will be ample funds in the old age security fund and the guaranteed income supplement fund to ensure that those who do require assistance have access to funds.

The overriding consideration must surely be to bring the elderly above poverty limits. I do not believe we should use the lowest poverty limits in this country as the example; I believe we should strike a happy medium. As I have mentioned, the CPI is not a realistic index with regard to those commodities which so closely affect our senior citizens. I believe that these people should no longer under any circumstances have to suffer, and I primarily believe that the elderly, the senior citizens in this country, should no longer have to fear for their future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the next speaker, who will be the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer), may I point out that according to the motion before us the bill is to be sent to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs following second reading. The Chair understands that there may be a disposition among members to carry the bill into Committee of the Whole. I would simply say that, when I have finished recognizing hon. members who wish to catch the eye of the Chair, I shall seek the will of the House as to whether or not the bill should proceed to the standing committee or to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since you have raised this matter, may I say there have been discussions among the parties and it has been agreed that this bill should not be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, but, rather, that we shall go into Committee of the Whole after the list of speakers on second reading has been exhausted. I might add that there is also a disposition to give third reading to this bill today, before ten o'clock. That is my understanding after discussion with the leaders of the other parties.

Mr. Nielsen: As far as we are concerned, that can be made a House order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then as I understand what has just been said, it may be desirable to amend the motion now. The Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) suggests that the words "and be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs" be amended in the motion to read "and be referred to the Committee of the Whole". Also, that the bill be further considered on third reading. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion amended.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act, because it directly affects many of the people who live in my constituency. Okanagan North is a constituency which boasts very beautiful scenery and very beautiful weather. This attracts very many senior citizens. In fact, in the community in which I live, the community of Vernon, some 40 per cent of the population are senior citizens.

When passed, Bill C-16 will fulfil the government's election promise to increase the monthly guaranteed income supplement for pensioners and those receiving spouse's allowance by $35 per person. In the case of married couples, however, their pensions will increase by only $17.50 each. This was not the understanding of many among the electorate during the course of the most recent federal campaign. People are dismayed, upset and astonished, particularly married senior citizens. Surely, only the Liberal party believes the myth of the 1930s that two can live as cheaply as one.

I would like to speak for a few moments, though, on behalf of those elderly Canadians who will not receive this increase and those Canadians who need more, much more, than this increase will provide. I should like to call attention to the inequities inherent in this legislation and, indeed, in all legislation dealing with pensions in this country.

Mr. Speaker, 36.4 per cent of all Canadians age 65 and over have an annual income of less than $5,000. In 1975, 60 per cent of households in Canada headed by pensioners aged 65 and older had incomes of less than $4,000. The elderly people of this country are poor. Many of them are shockingly poor. The increase which is now proposed reflects the government's band-aid approach to vital reform, an approach which cannot continue. Increases of $35 here or $40 there over the next 20 years will not solve Canada's pension problems. We cannot expect senior citizens to be content if federal legislators continue to treat their concerns on an ad hoc basis. It is our responsibility as elected representatives to review conscientiously the situation as it exists today, recognize the inequities and, more important, act to correct the problems.

The very nature of pension financing requires that decisions be made earlier. If we are to have an effective pension program in the year 2000 we must make decisions now, decades before our reforms will directly affect the individual pensioner.

The changing structure of Canada's population is well documented. We are witnessing lower birth rates and lower immigration levels. If this pattern continues, and there is no reason to believe it will not, the older generation will eventually be larger than the younger. We must take this into consideration when dealing with the complicated issue of pension financing. Under current conditions, the ratio of old to young in this country will more than double between the years 1975 and 2050. If we continue the present pattern, as I suggest we shall, it can only mean it is going to cost the individual worker more and more money to support the retired population. We must now question the advisability of this situation.

I should like to take a few moments in which to outline what I believe to be one of the most urgent problems facing us today, one which the government must be prepared to deal with, and deal with now. Even a cursory examination of our public pension schemes demonstrates that we are fast approaching a crisis. The government cannot be allowed to ignore the issue of financing. History will record its attitude toward social responsibility in this area. It is a fact that the contributions scheduled under the Canada and Quebec pension plans will not be sufficient to finance pensions to which current workers are entitled. Without an increase in contributions, according to the department of insurance, the fund will be exhausted in 2003. The total contribution rate of employees and employers now equals 3.6 per cent of earnings. This must rise to 9.1 per cent by the year 2030. It is almost unnecessary to say that if future workers are unwilling or unable to pay the necessary increases in taxes and contributions, today's workers will lose all of their benefits.

● (1600)

By way of example of what can be done, the provincial government of British Columbia has recently moved to determine future increases in pension payments by the amount of money paid into the plan, by the amount of money contributed. The provincial government has acted to limit cost of living increases in civil servants' pensions on the understanding that open-ended indexing that is tied to the consumer price index will only result in an increased deficit. The province was worried, and justifiably so, about the unfunded liability which has been created by its own and the federal government's pension plans. These liabilities amount to $1 billion provincially and $7 billion federally.

I should point out that I am not necessarily lending my full support to the B.C. government proposal in this area. I am only saying that at least it is statistically correct, and that at least it is a fiscally responsible decision. I am not saying yes or no to the social aspect of that proposal.

This government has made a political decision to use scarce government funds—or, rather, tax moneys of Canadians—to subsidize the Canadian automobile driver. This government currently subsidizes the gas and oil consumer to the tune of some $3 billion per year. That amounts to about two hundred tax dollars per year for every man, woman and child in this country. I realize that this government has limited funds at its disposal, although this is hardly noticeable when one considers the gay abandon with which the liberal administration spends taxpayers' dollars. As I said earlier, I realize that choices have to be made, but I am not one who would have used scarce dollars and scarce tax revenue to subsidize the driver of the automobile. Gas guzzlers are used for pleasure as well as business. If I had had to make a decision in that area, I think I would have decided to spend taxpayers' dollars on some more worthy social purpose than to provide cheap automobile transportation and encourage the over-consumption of an already scarce resource.

By way of example, I suggest that the almost $3 billion subsidy spent every year would provide a pension increase of over $1,500 a year for each pensioner in Canada. By way of another example, $3 billion would go a long way toward properly funding our present pension plans. I might add that if the $3 billion was spent in Canada rather than handed over to the oil-rich countries as it is now, that would provide an enormous boost to our economy, with resulting beneficial effects on business, productivity and employment.

I urge this government to reconsider its choices and priorities and place the needs of pensioners at a much higher level on the list.

In the throne speech this government listed its second principle of action as follows: "My ministers will help first those who need help most". It seems to me that this government has chosen to subsidize the car driver and to allow the elderly to continue to live in poverty.

What of the elderly woman in our society? Two out of three elderly women in this country have income levels which are below the poverty line; 66 per cent of all widows over 65 live at sub-poverty levels. It seems that the position of women in the pension system has been largely ignored, for perhaps a number of reasons. Perhaps it is partly because the issue of women and pensions is tied to the relationship between women and the working world. In this regard the government should act toward strengthening survivor benefits, since many private plans have little or no death benefits, and most widows' pensions amount to 50 per cent or less of pensioners' benefits. This government has to recognize the fact that $35 a month is only a small step toward providing any real relief for individuals who are forced to live at sub-poverty levels.

I would like now to express my concern to this government regarding an issue which was brought to my attention by several constituents and many other people in and around this country. I understand that this is not a peculiar problem to British Columbia but is evident across Canada. I am told that the current formula for receiving old age security and guaranteed income supplement forces those over the age of 65 who wish to get married to live together without, as we used to say, the benefit of clergy. This is most distressing to a large number of elderly people.

At the present time a married couple receives funds totalling 100 per cent of the poverty line, whereas a single pensioner receives moneys totalling 78 per cent of the poverty line. This means that it is not, then, economically sound for two single pensioners to get married and give up up to 56 per cent of their combined income, particularly when they are living below the poverty level. This is a very real concern to many Canadians, and I speak on their behalf and on behalf of these senior citizens to encourage the government to re-evaluate this situation.

In conclusion, I reiterate that I support this bill and encourage its speedy passage. I am concerned, however, that the present government recognize the fact that this increase is only the first step.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I will try not to delay the House too long. We want to get this bill into the Committee of the Whole House as quickly as possible and possibly get it out later this afternoon.

First, I feel I should mention that this bill comes about because of the promises made during the election campaign. The Liberals said they would increase the pension by $35 a month, and the NDP immediately bid $40. I must say that among the 22,500 old age pensioners who live in my constituency it does not go over well for them to have this insulting auction go on every election as to how much it will cost to buy an old age pensioner's vote. In fact, I do not think many of them were bought. The attitude I perceived from pensioners was that they would just as soon take the Conservative promise that they would be treated fairly, although this seemed to be an unfortunate election in which to run on high principles.

The NDP promise turned out to be considerably more, really, than the Liberal promise, which started to deteriorate right after it was made. First, it was not a promise to pay $35 as an increase to old age pensioners, despite what we might even read in tomorrow's press.

Every time I have read about this in the media, it has been a $35 increase to old age pensions. This is far from being a $35 increase to the old age pension. It is an increase of $35 per household, and only to the guaranteed income supplement. My records indicate that there are 486,047 people getting the guaranteed income supplement at the married rate. That is according to Statistics Canada. I will probably have more to ask about this during the committee stage.

There are two other points I would like to raise. I was rather concerned about the comments made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), as recorded at page 252 of Hansard, when he was questioned about why he did not bring in the Liberal equivalent of our Bill C-28, brought in by the Conservative government. One of his excuses was, and I quote:

> Further, a continuing joint study has been undertaken with the Department of National Health and Welfare in order to achieve a greater level of harmony in the administration of income security policy and to identify opportunities for streamlining the administration of the MVA Program—

Further on he said:

> While I am very anxious to introduce changes to the War Veterans Allowance Act as quickly as possible, it is necessary that they be examined in relation to other social policy initiatives.

However, here today we have one of those other social policy initiatives coming about, and I expect that the comments of the Minister of Veterans Affairs really will not be borne out because we have clear evidence now that it is not being done in co-ordination.

The other point I would like to ask about is reciprocal pensions. Not everyone might be aware that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in December of 1978, and I quote:

> I am investigating the possibility of reciprocity of pension but the Brits really are not helping at all. I hope this will be put on the agenda of our two Prime Ministers if they meet very soon—

Parenthetically, they met a week or so later.

—which is what we heard in the press yesterday.

• (1610)

I will continue with the quote of the minister. It reads:

> As soon as I know whether it is to be on the agenda or not I will inform the House and that will, of course, change completely and speed up, I hope, my course of action. That is my priority. Italy was a priority, Great Britain was one. Italy is done and I am very proud of it, but I want to unblock the Great Britain dossier. It is very important.

When the minister speaks, I hope she will clarify what happened to her priorities. It is quite obvious that nothing came about because of the meeting of the Prime Ministers of Canada and Britain.

I do not want to delay the speedy passage of this bill any longer. I will have a few comments to make and a few questions to ask during committee stage, but as far as my party is concerned at this time, we are ready for it to go on.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to add my voice to those members who have congratulated the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on her reappointment to her portfolio. Most certainly it is one of the most important portfolios, especially as many of its activities touch millions of our citizens in a very direct way. As time goes on, and considering some of the constitutional proposals currently in vogue, it may very well be that it will be even more important that we maintain whatever meaningful, direct contact we can between the federal government and citizens across Canada.

It is precisely because the old age security program is one of the few federal programs that touch many, many Canadians directly, along with a few other programs such as the unemployment insurance program and family allowance program, that I wish to spend most of my few minutes discussing the issue and principle of universality. Yesterday two of my colleagues, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), dealt at some length with many of the other issues involved with and related to this bill, such as the continuing discrimination against women in our current old age security system and the steps required in an attempt to end that discrimination. Second, they touched upon the fact that our pension levels are still inadequate in relation to realistic estimates of the poverty line, the history and development of pensions in Canada and the reduction of the retirement age. Also they put forward detailed proposals enunciated by our party in the recent election campaign, including our suggestion that the basic old age security pension should be increased immediately by an amount of $40 per month.

Of course, it goes without saying that I am in full agreement with their remarks and the proposals which they outlined, especially, their reference, and also the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) when he spoke yesterday, urging a return to omit the principle of universality and a move away from the needs or means test.

I am very much afraid that if we allow the principle of universality to be eroded further in programs such as the old age security system, family allowances and UIC benefits, then we will sooner or later precipitate a backlash from those middle income wage earners who work hard and pay most of the tax bill in this country only to find themselves, especially in the last few years in one program after another, cut off from the very benefits for which they have been paying.

Sometimes people have a very difficult time even reaching retirement age, not to mention—depending on the type of industry they have worked in—whether they are able to enjoy that retirement for other than perhaps a very few months. I am thinking particularly of the mining industry and the logging industry with some of their environment hazards. If we continue to adopt a system that cuts off those people who pay the majority of the bill from the benefits of one program after another, then sooner or later a backlash will take place in spite of the leadership which they or their organizations have given.

The cut-off levels for some of these programs are being set almost exactly, as we watch them year by year, in tune with or just a little above the average industrial wage. In the union which I was proud to represent prior to being elected to the House of Commons, a number of us noticed for many years that every time we negotiated our wage agreement, we were within a very few dollars of where the cut-off levels were being set to deny unemployment insurance benefits, to phase out family allowances, or in some provinces to eliminate them. Because of the erosion of the basic old age security pension, that which is paid out without a needs or a means test, we do not see many of them gaining any increasing benefit from the increasing share of the tax load which they have been paying.

No matter how idealistic some of us may want to be on occasion, sooner or later these people will be driven into a more socially conservative approach in spite of their usual willingness not only to support but to lead the fight for these kinds of programs and many other social programs which very often have tended to benefit others more than themselves. I am referring to people who in some cases have not had the benefit of being able to negotiate pension programs of their own and many other benefits.

One almost begins to wonder, noticing this tendency in the last few years, whether the continuing move away from the principle of universality is consciously or unconsciously designed to set a social backlash in motion. I cannot believe that that would be the intent of the minister today. Certainly the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln, if he reflects any body of opinion at all across the floor, would at least lead me to hope that that is not the conscious or unconscious intent. But many of us have begun to wonder. I suggest that it could not be better calculated to provoke that kind of social backlash than if it were intended.

That to me would be regrettable. It flies in the face of everything that I and my colleagues have stood for over the years. It flies in the face of the kinds of social leadership which I believe not only my colleagues but many people in other parties have advocated over a long, long period of time. It would be a move backwards in spite of some very enlightened social leadership under rather pressing conditions which Canada has been very lucky to find in the labour movement in this country over past decades. Very often they have sacrificed many of their own abilities to gain benefits for themselves in order to set into place mechanisms which would aid those citizens who have had less power to further their own ends and interests.

I do not want to say very much more, but there is a rather common phrase in my father's country of origin, Denmark, which I think is apt to many social security programs. Their hope was to build a society where "few have too much and none have too little." Unless we can move toward the principle of universality, I believe we will fly in the face of that kind of social objective. I think that would be wrong. I think it would be dangerous for the entire fabric of our society. Of course I have to support the motion before us. It will be of some help to many people. But unfortunately, perhaps it leads us even further away from the principle of universality which I and many others believe is so important to the entire social fabric and future of our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I should like to inform hon. members that recognizing the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will close the debate at this stage. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say how pleased I am with the general support of this bill from speakers of all parties. Of course, I am quite pleased, as well, that members in every corner of this House have expressed the desire to do more to alleviate the financial problems of senior citizens in Canada.

● (1620)

The $35 a month will be a substantial increase and, according to the pleasure of the House, will start with the cheque in July. This is a total injection of about $500 million to this group of Canadians. We all know it is not enough.

Could the House please let me say, before we start discussing the details of the bill in Committee of the Whole, that I am the first one to recognize what I identify as the next step for us to take in Canada, namely, to liberate and free another sum of money. I wish the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) were here. We will liberate another sum of money as soon as the economy is in better shape and is more alive, amounting to about $730 million. That is what is missing to bring all senior citizens above the poverty line. I use that expression "poverty line", a cold, statistical phrase, as a measure which we can all understand and use to show our progress year after year, decade after decade, in providing a better quality of life for Canadians.

Perhaps I could answer just a few points that were made during the debate after my opening speech, and I will be very brief. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) stated that he did not agree with the approach of a conference on pensions which I announced or reiterated at the end of my speech. He said that when he was the minister he had plans for a comprehensive review and the reference of the whole subject area to a standing committee of this House. In this regard I would like to say that I am sure we both share the same objective, which is to improve pensions in Canada, particularly private pension plans. However, I am in total disagreement as to the way by which this can be achieved.

As I said, all major studies have been done on private, public, semi-public or parapublic pensions, like the CPP, except one which is being finished and is due at the beginning of next fall, and I refer to the Ontario royal commission on pensions.

What is needed? Do we need one more committee and, by the way, could a committee of the House study and put together 15 or so reports, and how would it do so? Our assessment in light of all that we know of House of Commons proceedings, with the tools of work at our disposal, with the workload of members of all parties, is that a committee of the House of Commons may not be the best tool for doing this. We think that a committee, if given such a reference, would have to take at least two, if not three, years to do the work.

What is the work to be done? It seems to me the work to be done involves a technical step; namely, putting together these studies and listing in a comparative form the various recommendations. That is what I call a technical piece of work that the committees of the House are not equipped to do. In any event, that is what our departments are for. They have the expertise and the researchers to digest these various reports and present recommendations in a summarized way.

[Translation]

How should I put it? I will finish in French: having themselves put some order into all the recommendations and compared them one with another. Thus I have asked the department to prepare that table to summarize the recommendations contained in the more than twelve or fifteen reports already drafted on pensions.

Now what is the second step we consider the most important? Action is the answer. We think it is high time that the parties concerned, the economic partners, meaning employers, governments as employers, unions and pensioners themselves publicly discuss those recommendations. We think we are ready to have Canadians, and particularly the economic partners directly involved, to start talking about the different ways they favour and those they dislike, and telling us why, and second, for the negotiation and decision-taking process to be well under way within the next two or, at the most, three years. Indeed, we thought that a committee would have lost precious time with a tool which is far from being the most appropriate for making studies and recommendations based on various reports. In conclusion, I wish to emphasize the importance of making the first steps. We believe that a national conference in the fall would be the best way to do so.

[English]

Could I now make a short comment concerning a member who made the national news today. I just know him by his family name and I did not have time to check what riding he represents. I know he is a Conservative.

Mr. Knowles: Bow River.

Miss Bégin: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) made national news with something I would not like to use to make national news. It is true that it is his choice, but I would like to know why he did so. He said he believes honestly that by giving to people living alone, single, divorced, widows and widowers, a sum of money twice as great as what each partner of a couple will get will create the incentive to divorce. That seems to me to be pure fantasy, to say the least. I could also say that it seems to be pure Tory policy, or pure Tory belief about human nature. There is no need to say that. You do not divorce for $17 more a month. I cannot accept that. I asked the department how many divorces we created in Canada the last time we gave an increase to single people. They are very polite and they did not burst out laughing in my face, but they did not know what to tell me. To our knowledge this never happened.

I am saying, in other words, that no government has provided a sum of money which would change the behaviour of people to the point that they would choose divorce at age 65 just to get $17 more a month. I will not speak more of that, but I find that concern bizarre. I do not understand it and I do not think it is accurate. This does not happen and that is why I seem to be considering it very lightly.

Let me conclude by saying a few words about the statements of my friends in the New Democratic Party. I listened very carefully and have reviewed rapidly, though not in depth yet, all the possible indicators of inflation which can be used in indexing pensions. The results would indicate there would only be a few pennies, at most $1 or $2 more or less every three months. I will continue to explore the question to make sure there are not significant benefits lost to the seniors because of our way of indexing their pensions. The question I will pose to my department I am already aware of, because it is the question that will give me the answer. The question is: If we were to choose a different way of indexing instead of the way we do it in Canada now, how many more millions of dollars will it cost initially? When I get the answer I will know immediately if we are talking business, if we are talking of something very serious, or if we are talking of a nuance with so little relevance it could not really affect the lives of our seniors.

During this debate I listened carefully to the members of the New Democratic Party who spoke and particularly, of course, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I remember very clearly the promises of that party during the last election campaign. Only today did I come to the conclusion that they speak the way they do because it is a strategy to maintain universality. I came to that understanding only today, and I am not even sure of my observations.

Quite honestly, I had great difficulty understanding the sudden promise of the NDP party during the election campaign, that they wanted to raise the basic OAS pension for every Canadian by $40 a month. Such an increase would amount to $2.5 billion a year. That is a huge figure. I was very surprised at this promise because there was no consensus in Canadian society that such an urgent step was required. There is this urgency in certain quarters, among specialists and experts, but not among the general public.

The idea that the general basic OAS pension should be slightly higher in order to correspond to, for example, 15 per cent of industrial wages or to some other measure is a theoretical concept developed among specialists. To my knowledge, this opinion has never reached the Canadian public and surely there is no consensus of urgency. For me the consensus of urgency is giving those pensioners on the GIS—in other words, those who need it—a better deal. The measure being used to make sure that there is a unique message, one which we keep repeating in order to achieve success, is: "Bring them above the poverty line". That is what we are trying to do with this bill.

As I said, one more step is required before these people will be brought completely above the poverty line. This time we are coming closer to that realization with the sum of $.5 billion. Another large sum of money will be required to make sure that they are brought over that poverty line once and for all. So if it was not an election campaign promise, I would say to the NDP members what I have already told them in public, that they have the academics but they still need an accountant in their party. One cannot find $2.5 billion just like that.

If I stress this point, it is because the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) spoke often of the need for returning to the principle of universality. The hon. member does not know it, but he has raised the scarecrow of the loss of universality in old age pensions and, by way of consequence, family allowances. I think that this is the strategy of that party. That party wants to raise the OAS pension issue to put back into the minds of the Canadian public the need for saving pensions for all.

I can tell the hon. member that that is a battle which was won just a few months ago. I honestly think that members of this House from the government, the New Democratic Party and others who were interested in the fight in favour of maintaining universality against the trend of neo-conservatism which Canada, as well as other countries in the western world, has already gone through was won last fall and during Christmas and that it is now a battle of the past. I am very pleased about that.

I have no reason to believe that universality of social programs is under question, under fire or in threat of being lost. I must insist on that point because it takes so much energy to win such a battle, and I prefer to save my energy for the next battle. The hon. member for Kootenay West was talking about a battle of the past, and that does not interest me much. I prefer to identify the next step and tell Canadians that the next time we will have to do more for those people who have reached the age of 65 and who are living in conditions of poverty.

I do not want to leave Canadians today with the slightest hope that the basic old age pension will increase. Well into the future, the next step will probably be to help those people who are between the ages of 62 and 65. That will be the next step, to help those in need within that age group.

At this point I would like to thank all those who participated in the debate. Many hon. members were kind enough to agree to a speedy passage of this bill and to reserve their remarks for other occasions. I ask all hon. members of this House, whatever their political party or political beliefs, because they have all said nice things about the need to combat poverty among senior citizens, that they give their help by any means at their disposal and, particularly, help obtain from the provinces a commitment that this $35 will be passed on to all senior citizens living in institutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I had hoped that this bill would get through before five o'clock, but the minister's remarks were a little too pointed to leave much hope for that. I do not think that getting after individual members on this side of the House is the way to encourage the speedy passage of any bill.

I should leave to the New Democratic Party the minister's funny calculation on what $40 a month raise in the old age pension would cost nationally. My figures are around $1 billion, not $2.5 billion. We will see who needs an accountant.

The number of people who are receiving the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement and allowances from the provinces total 2,206,000. If one multiplies to million by $500 a year, it adds up to roughly $1 billion.

I would like to go over a few questions which I had in mind before the minister summed up. I am not certain whether the minister would prefer me to ask individual questions to which she could give individual answers, or whether she would like three or four questions at a time. I believe that the minister is awaiting her advisers.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I do not know the type of question which the hon. member intends to ask. It is no problem for me to take his questions either one at a time or all together.

Mr. McKinnon: Then I will run through my questions and the minister can suit herself as to whether she wishes to answer them one at a time or not.

In a press release which was put out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare it was estimated that an additional 45,000 OAS pensioners and spouses would become entitled to partial GIS and SPA benefits as a result of this amendment, and I was referring to the entire amendment as outlined in Bill C-16. I am curious as to just what aspect of the amendment will allow an additional 45,000 people to become entitled to partial allowances for the first time. I can see where a great number of them will get an increase in the GIS, but I would be curious about the estimated 45,000. Just what particular section of the bill does the minister anticipate will bring in 45,000 new pensioners?

● (1640)

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will excuse me, but this is my first bill in this session and we have forgotten the ritual which accompanies the passage of legislation.

The figure of 45,000 recipients of old age security not now entitled to the guaranteed income supplement who will receive part of the $35 following passage of this bill comes from the fact that we are automatically increasing the eligible income scale for all recipients. Let me explain. All recipients of an old age security pension receive by mail once a year a booklet, which I am now looking for and which I shall have in a few moments, which gives a table of incomes eligible for an old age pension supplement to the nearest dollar. This table shows a basic amount over which the recipient is not eligible. We are increasing this basic amount by $35 a month or $420 a year.

[English]

We increased the base of the table that people of little income can make and still get some GIS by $420 per year. Automatically, a certain number of seniors in the gray area who have just too much income, although very little, to start qualifying for the GIS will be able to qualify. I suspect that the calculation of the 45,000 was done by computer.

Old Age Security Act

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, my next question concerns the minister's speech as reported at page 1282 of Hansard. She was quite definite when she said:

> I do want to make that clear for all those who are listening. I would add that couples receiving a supplement, whether part or all of the supplement, will have $17.50 each added to their cheque, which makes a total of $35 for a couple.

The bill makes mention of the increase being added to the maximum guaranteed income supplement. If that is where it gets added on, then what the minister said at page 1282 of Hansard for May 21 would not hold. The explanatory note on page 2(a) of the bill reads as follows:

> These amendments would increase the maximum monthly amount of the Guaranteed Income Supplement by $35 in respect of a single pensioner and a married pensioner whose spouse is not a pensioner and by $17.50 in respect of a married pensioner whose spouse is also a pensioner.

Taking the example of someone who just barely qualifies for some of the guaranteed income supplement—

Mr. Knowles: By $1, for example.

Mr. McKinnon: Or $10. If a person is receiving a supplement of $10 per month, is that person now going to get $45?

Miss Bégin: Yes.

Mr. McKinnon: So it will be added on at the bottom and not at the top. The bill is not too clear on that and it gives an indication that it was written by people who thought you could now get a guaranteed income supplement $35 higher provided you currently received 100 per cent of it. The part about $17.50 each being added to their cheques, this will be done in the household by two separate cheques. Each cheque will have $17.50 added to it, no matter whether both pensioners are at a very low level of guaranteed income supplement at the present time. If they are both getting $5, they would both get $17.50 extra and a single person would get $35.

Something that has been mentioned several times and which appears in the press release always bothers me about pension cheques and indexation. When the minister speaks of this supplement being on the July cheque, unfortunately a lot of senior citizens think they will get their July cheque on July 1. I would rather the minister explained when they will get their July cheque than do it myself.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, first of all, to close on the matter of the scale of incomes eligible for a supplement, this scale, of which I now have a copy, ends at the present time with these two figures.

[English]

Please let me give the current points right now for the scales of low income for people who can still receive some GIS. The existing cut-off point for single people receiving GIS is $3,696. With passage of Bill C-16, this will become $4,632. Everybody receiving some GIS who is in the single category—widowed, divorced, separated, single—has his or her cheque increased by the full amount of $35.

Mr. McKinnon: Unless they are married.

Miss Bégin: I am speaking of single people. Common law marriages are recognized as legal marriages by the old age security administration.

For married people the cut-off point today of $6,144 will become $7,152 per year. People who do not yet qualify for any GIS and who may be in the grey area will receive less than $35 per month, or less than $17.50 each if they are a couple, depending on their income.

A pamphlet explaining this will be inserted with the July cheque which will come late in the month. The third last banking day of the month is the date on which the latest cheque will be received, so it will be late July.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first may I say that I welcome the questioning that has taken place so that one or two points can be made clear. I think it is important for recipients of the pension to know that their increase will be in the cheque they receive at the end of July and not in the cheque they receive toward the end of June which they spend in the month of July.

I think it is also important and useful that it has been made clear that anyone who is getting any portion of the supplement at the present time, even if it is only $1 per month, will get the $35 in the case of a single person or $17.50 each in the case of two members of a married relationship.

Before I get into the one or two questions that I should like to put to the minister, I should like to say a word or two. I am not going to indulge in a long speech about our relative philosophies in this area but I was pleased that the minister, when she made her speech and tried to get straight in her own mind what our strategy is, said categorically that the battle for universality has been won—that no one is going to go back on that.

I hope the hon. member for Bow River heard that. When he made his speech yesterday, he said that he used to believe in universality but that he does not any more. He wants to take it away from some of those at the top of the scale, supposedly to enrich the pension to others. I trust the battle is won but there are still a few stragglers around who think they would like to change that principle. I agree with the minister as to its importance, and my colleagues and I feel very strongly about universality.

I was glad to hear the statements made last night by the hon. member for Lincoln, and I suspect that there are other Liberals on that side who have the same view. Likewise, I remind the minister again of my approval yesterday of the statements in this connection made by Senator David Croll on the occasion when a testimonial dinner was held for him over in the West Block.

It is still my view, Mr. Chairman, that it is wrong to make persons prove their poverty to get additional money. I think it is better for the amount to be paid universally and for the income tax to be used much more steeply than it is now to take it back from those at the top. However, that is an ongoing issue and we can discuss it time and time again, on and off the record. As I say, I am satisfied to let that part of the discussion end for today with the minister's ringing declaration that universality is here to stay. Let it be that way for sure.

Taking the bill as it is, namely a bill that does not increase the basic rate of the old age security pension but increases only the amount of the guaranteed income supplement, there are two or three questions I should like to put to the minister.

In the first place, I should like to ask her whether she and her department are giving study to some other basis for establishing the guaranteed income supplement level than that which we now have. I am inclined to agree with her that we put too much blame on the method of indexing. We say that it is wrong and that it does not produce the right results, but is not the real trouble that the base was too low at the start? It is no use for government members to say we have got indexing so we keep the pension value up where it was, when to begin with it was too far down.

What about my suggestion the other day that, instead of starting with a figure just drawn out of a hat and then indexing it, we start with a figure that bears some relationship to the cost of living at the level sometimes defined as the poverty line?

As I say, for the veterans on the disability pension, we have established a formula. We get away from it at times, but it is there and we keep coming back to it, namely that the 100 per cent disability pension shall be the average take-home pay of five designated categories in the public service. Why not establish, I said the other day, 125 per cent of the poverty level as the line below which no pensioner should be allowed to fall, and then either index that to the consumer price index or index it to the changes in the poverty level as established by Statistics Canada?

As the minister knows, when we take that computation we are taking the lowest one around. Any social agency will produce a level that is higher and, of course, there are problems about different costs in city and in country. But surely something better than just a figure drawn out of a hat, that no indexing ever makes adequate, would be better. I would like to ask the minister, when I give her a chance to reply, if she will tell me whether some study is being given to that in her department.

Second, I ask the minister, and I press this upon her as strongly as I can, whether in this term of office she is enjoying she is going to do something about the disgrace of the spouse's allowance legislation. The original motive may have been good—to give something to people who needed it. But the result is for women between 60 and 65 for the most part—I know it works both ways but there are not very many men involved—there is applied a marital test. If a woman has a man or has one that dies while she is in that age bracket, she gets the pension. But if she does not have a man because she is a spinster or divorced or became a widow before age 60, or she became a widow before her husband was over 65, there is no pension there.

The other day when I was talking about this, one of the Tory members here tried to chide me a bit. He thought I was actually standing up and advocating a means or an income test. I am not, and the minister knows that. But surely in that 60 to 65 age bracket something in the nature of a supplement or a pension because people need it is far more civilized, far more modern, than this pension based on the test that is applied to every woman, namely, has she got a man? It just does not wash any more. There is not a doubt in my mind that the minister does not like it. She was not connected with this department when this test was brought in; she was in a more esoteric area, the area of external affairs. I often wonder what she thought about the test when it was being put through. My urgent plea to her is that something be done about this.

We heard comments made today when the minister was turning down our request for an increase in the basic amount of the pension, at least turning us down for now. There is always the future in this business and there are the increases that come about because of the rise in the cost of living. Anyway, when she was doing that she said that the area where something was needed to be done was that respecting unattached women—I think the age bracket she gave was 62 to 65. I would rather see the bracket of 60 to 65, and there is the problem of those from 55 up. That is where the problem assumes rather large proportions.

I was glad to hear the minister say that, just as I was glad to hear her say that the battle for universality has been won. But I relate this to the unfairness in the spouse's allowance. What is she going to do to meet this problem which all of us know is so real? We can give our statistics about pensioners, we can tell about the problems that people have, single or married, in large cities, and all the rest of it, and I can make my speeches about the desirability of universality. But I agree with her that the most pressing problem for senior citizens is the problem faced by unattached women from 60 to 65, as well as those between 55 and 60. I hope that the minister will tell us that the department is going to do something more about that area than is done in this bill.

I had another question down. I was going to leave it to my friend from Victoria, but he mentioned it in his second reading speech although he did not raise it again in Committee of the Whole. But with my respect for him, since he comes from a place where so many of them are involved—I know from the correspondence I get from the member's constituency—I will raise the matter, and that is this question of reciprocity.

Mr. Nielsen: That is why he gets elected all the time.

Mr. Knowles: It is because the people write to me and I answer their letters? This is an interesting place, isn't it?

A long time ago we were told that pensioners from the United Kingdom living in this country could not get their United Kingdom increases because there was no reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom. After a while we passed one piece of legislation and then we passed another to make reciprocal agreements possible. But the people who write to the department tell us when they write to us that the blame is put on the British, and when the British write these people, they put the blame on the Canadians.

We have a reciprocal agreement with one or two other countries. We have moved a lot slower in this field than I had thought we would and that I had hoped we would, but surely we can talk to the people in the United Kingdom and come to some understanding about this matter. Perhaps the minister can answer me at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT PROHIBITING PUBLICATION OF IDENTITY OF ACCUSED PERSONS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved that Bill C-213, to amend the Criminal Code (reporting names of accused), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to address myself to this topic and to this bill in particular. I naturally hope that this bill might go to the committee for consideration and will not be talked out. I happen to think that the subject matter at least is very important; it is one that we have shied away from addressing straight on. I hope there will be some exposure of it today. Maybe it could be dealt with at length in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I first introduced this bill back on July 12, 1977. I introduced it again on October 29, 1979. Interestingly enough, I find that in the provincial legislature of Ontario, Albert Roy, the provincial member for Ottawa East, copied the principle of this bill and introduced one of his own back in November, 1977, and had it debated in that assembly. It is more appropriate to debate this bill in this House and to amend the Criminal Code.

First, I would like to refer to section 2, subsection (f) of the Bill of Rights, which states that a person charged with a criminal offence has the right, and I quote:

—to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal—

I agree with that 100 per cent. I might also point out in advance of going into the details of my comments today that I have received opinions in support of this bill from such diverse groups as the South Okanagan civil liberties society and the report of the committee of the social planning council of Ottawa-Carleton concerning the publication of the names of persons accused of crimes.

A lot of the detail I will go into comes from a magistrate in England, Magistrate Margaret Jones, who in 1974 did quite a lengthy paper, which was her thesis for her Ph.D., dealing with this topic of whether or not there should be broadcasting or printing in the printed news media of people's names prior to their having been convicted.

I am pleased that today we will have an opportunity of considering this bill. The bill is designed to recognize one of the fundamental concepts on which our system of justice is based, and that is that an accused is presumed innocent until proved guilty. Toward that end, this bill would prevent the naming of an accused in the media until he or she is convicted of an offence. Since I first introduced this bill I have received many letters, some from journalists, some from civil liberties groups, and some from individuals who felt that they suffered unjustly because they had their names appear in the local media only to be subsequently acquitted of the charge.

I believe this bill is quite straightforward. It would prevent the publication or broadcasting of the name, address or occupation of an accused in any manner in connection with the commission of an offence or the judicial proceedings arising out of the commission of such an offence. For the purposes of the bill, I have defined an accused as anyone who has been charged with an offence and who is awaiting trial, undergoing trial, has been acquitted, or has received an absolute discharge or pardon.

I realize that this bill is not perfect, that the argument surrounding the question of a free press versus a free trial is not about to be resolved this afternoon. The files I have compiled and the letters I have received on this bill have shown just how divided public opinion is on this issue, even among sectors such as the civil liberties groups which usually have no problem finding a consensus.

Basically I have introduced this bill almost as a devil's advocate. I am willing to be persuaded now as to whether we should continue with the system which we presently have where people's names can appear in the press prior to conviction, or whether this bill should be passed, or at least go to committee for detailed consideration of whether persons' names should be commented upon before there is a conviction.

I hope the bill will not be talked out because it is a non-partisan issue. I believe it is a topic which does merit further study in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I hope that at least the subject matter will later today be referred to that standing committee.

In Canada, there is no encompassing standard for court reporting. Coverage is randomly selective, based on a vague notion of newsworthiness, a notion which could never be defined unanimously by any group of ten editors that one could assemble. There are only two common qualities to cases which are deemed to be newsworthy: first, it is a selective process, and secondly, it is the product at the discretion of the news editor's judgment. Unfortunately in journalism, as in all other fields, selectivity leaves the door open first for injustice, and secondly for exploitation. Perhaps the greatest irony in this debate is that while judges have strived over the years to achieve a greater consistency in sentencing, the press has achieved anything but consistency in their coverage and in their decision of what is of importance and interest to the general public.

Magistrate Margaret Jones of Britain, who has written a doctoral thesis on the subject of naming of accused, has characterized the practice of the British press as "the arbitrary infliction of publicity on a random cross-section of the accused". It is a characterization that easily adapts itself on this side of the Atlantic. Canadian practice is a hodge-podge of guidelines and traditions and editorial edicts from each and every news organ in this country. In some cases, it is the practice not to cover shoplifting, petty theft, wilful damage under $50 and so on, but the ban gets lifted should there be a significant "human interest angle". Most editors will agree that "little crime by little people" does not deserve coverage, that is unless there is a possibility of a person's misery becoming a human interest anecdote for the lighter side.

I would like to say that this is a moral issue, and in its defence the press uses moral arguments. I intend to look at these, but I would like to say that first and foremost the press is an industry. Criminal proceedings are but one more source of grist for the information mills. It is the task of the media to use every available pool of information to make a selection of stories, which are then displayed in a particular order to make as good a newspaper story or broadcast as possible.

● (1710)

A court case is no different from any other type of story. The decisions made about coverage remain journalistic, non-judicial. In general, the sexiness or saleability of a story is paramount. A morals charge, in practice, receives automatic attention. Leaving the scene of an accident will not, unless it is in connection with an accident of major proportions or involves a socially or politically prominent individual. An accused may see published not only his or her name, but address, occupation and even, perhaps, parentage if such happens to be newsworthy.

In this city a few years ago a case involving an alleged male prostitution ring made every front page and newscast. Many of the alleged clients were charged and their names and addresses were published. There was a preliminary hearing. It was lengthy. Then they went to trial, but prior to that one of the accused committed suicide after receiving death threats and harassment at work. So here in this city at least one death has resulted from this journalistic practice. Eventually, Mr. Speaker, all the accused were acquitted, the Crown withdrawing the charges because they did not depend upon the reliability of their young witnesses. But many of the accused had already lost their jobs or been obliged to leave the city to re-establish elsewhere because of the penalty of publicity.

Recently there has been another case in this city involving a trial for rape. The accused, who was later convicted, had not only his name, address and occupation published, but his racial origin as well. Somewhere along the line his race was deemed as integral to his trial and as newsworthy. For years the Ontario human rights commission has bluntly said that the needless accentuation of racial or ethnic origin in court reporting can only lead to the polarization of communities and suspicion. It cannot help but reinforce negative stereotypes.

As Morris Schumiatcher, chairman of the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association has said, the presence at any trial of the general public, of which the press is a part, is intended to ensure a fair trial. Let us not forget that it is the accused who is supposed to be the prime beneficiary. It is not for the purpose of informing, entertaining or titillating the general public. I do not accept for one moment that the actions and the proceedings of the police or of law enforcement agencies and the courts cannot be fully and effectively reported or even commented upon in the media, but this should be done without the use of names or any other identifying description.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, the press uses moral arguments in its own defence. There is a notion that the adverse publicity is a deterrent to crime, although the reporting itself is random and there is no way of knowing with certainty what will be reported. There is a notion that the press is the instrument of the public's right to know, although there is hedging as to when knowledge crosses the boundary into curiosity or entertainment. There are even some who use the argument that publicity, should, in effect, be part of the penalty for crime, although it is not determined why an accused who is later acquitted should have to pay that penalty.

Then there is the justification which is offered that every newspaper tries to follow up on its court stories, and that where there is an acquittal that, too, will be published. But of course, Mr. Speaker, there is no guarantee that the follow-up will receive the same prominence as the initial story; nor is there any admission that with today's large urban centres and the proliferation of courts, remands and appeals, it is virtually impossible even for the most well-meaning editor to ensure that there will be an efficient follow-up on every story, particularly in connection with minor cases.

There is also the argument, taken up by several civil liberties groups, that failure to name an accused puts in the hands of the police the potential to arrest an individual, charge him, hold him in jail and neglect to notify anybody that an arrest has been made. To that I say "balderdash," because the same procedure could be used as is used today, only you could not disseminate the names and other identifying information. You would have the same police dockets and the remands would be the same—no more than eight days.

Some see a bill such as this one as an attempt to legislate secrecy in the courts. I do not buy that. That is not the reason for this bill. Others quite bluntly say that there is no place for sentiment in selecting court or crime stories for publication, that it is the media's obligation to report any story it feels will be important or interesting, or both, to the general public. It is funny how the names of Jean Marchand or Louis Robichaud were both on the front pages of Ottawa newspapers when they were facing charges for impaired driving. Yet any day you can go down to No. 1 court at 60 Waller Street, where the remanding is done, and find 30 or 40 people picked up every night and charged with impaired driving. But their names are not to be found even on page 60 of the same newspapers.

These arguments are the ones most often used in defence of the practice of naming the accused. I would like briefly to outline what the practice is in two European countries, countries which are frequently held up to us as models of social justice and progressive thinking.

In The Netherlands the names of accused are not broadcast or published at any stage during criminal proceedings—arrest, during trial, even on sentencing or acquittal. This is a matter of tradition in the Dutch press. Where a trial story is used by the media, an accused is identified by initials. The Netherlands government is obliged to list the names of accused and the disposition of each and every case in an official government periodical.

In Sweden a code of conduct has been established by the code of honour of the press which is observed by all its members. The code states that the name of a person involved in judicial proceedings cannot be published or broadcast until conviction and sentencing, and only then if the sentence is one of imprisonment for two years or more.

Here in Canada we have seen action taken already in terms of press reporting of court cases. Reporting of preliminary inquiries as covered by section 467 of the Criminal Code states:

> Prior to commencement of taking of evidence at a preliminary inquiry, the justice holding the inquiry shall, if application therefor is made by the accused, or where there is more than one accused, by any one of these, make an order directing that the evidence taken at the inquiry shall not be published in any newspaper before such time as
> A) the accused who made the application discharged, or
> B) if the accused who made the application is committed for trial or ordered to stand trial, the trial is ended.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, under sections 441 and 442 of the Criminal Code, justices have a limited jurisdiction to hold certain proceedings in camera and to exclude the public where a juvenile is charged, or where the judge is of the opinion that it is in the interests of public morals, the maintenance of order or the proper administration of justice to exclude the general public.

I should also point out that in September, 1978, the Canadian Bar Association passed the following resolution at its Halifax annual meeting:

● (1720)

> Be it resolved that the Criminal Code be amended to provide that the name or identity of a person (including a corporation) charged with an offence shall not be published in a newspaper, magazine or periodical or broadcast in any manner unless
> (a) an indictment has been preferred pursuant to section 507 of the Criminal Code;
> (b) the accused has been committed to stand trial following a preliminary inquiry;
>
> (c) the trial has commenced;
> (d) the accused consents in writing to the name or identity being published or broadcast.

The purpose of that resolution was to protect those who are charged but who never come to trial for lack of evidence.

In 1974, the Ontario Press Council solicited views on the naming of an accused from the Elizabeth Fry Society and the John Howard Society.

Mrs. Elizabeth Haslam, the director of the Elizabeth Fry Society in Toronto, responded, and I quote:

> We are interested in the debate about the publishing of a name as a protection against arbitrary arrest and court procedures. Personally I would see the fact of courts being open to the public, including the press, as being the safeguard. If an individual wished to have his or her name published in connection with the case, then this, of course, should be his or her right.

Mrs. Haslam also said that in her understanding of the problem, the consequences of naming an accused were worst in small communities, that the family of an accused does suffer unfairly from the practice and that the general public, contrary to our concept of presumed innocence, operates on the assumption of guilt once an accused's name is published. She also noted that in the case of the young, rather than having a deterrent effect, being named in the media is far more likely to create a sense of importance or celebrity.

At the same time, the Ontario executive director of the John Howard Society replied that the society is just as concerned about the nature and extent of crime in a community as it is with the judicial process. Here again, one wonders how a community can be served, given the selective nature of court reporting, with an accurate concept of crime within a community. There is perhaps far more constructive work to be done on the part of the media in terms of analytical crime reporting or judicial reporting than in the selective display of random cases.

In contrast, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association has taken the view that media coverage and the naming of an accused is a safeguard against abuse and remains the essential public means of evaluating government and law enforcement agencies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he could carry on if he has unanimous consent. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and other members of the House. I will try to wind up my remarks as quickly as possible.

As I was saying, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association has taken the view that media coverage and the naming of an accused is a safeguard against abuse and remains the essential public means of evaluating government and law enforcement agencies. The view is one of "better to run the risk of having an individual's reputation injured from time to time than have the channels of mass communication cut off".

I would like to return to the thesis of Magistrate Margaret Jones. Mrs. Jones came from a family with a journalistic background and is married to an editor. In her book "Justice and Journalism" she states:

> I have ended, after several years of study, with the conclusion that the current action of the British press in reporting the proceedings of magistrate's court is socially undesirable and detracts from the administration of justice. I have found that it contributes to injustice in its arbitrary infliction of the punishment of publicity, often the cruelest and most harmful of all penalties, upon a random selection of offenders . . . whom the newspapers choose to identify.

In her analysis Mrs. Jones said that the foundation for change would be based on modifying the nature of reporting to accord with the concept that an accused is presumed innocent as well as providing for the names of the accused and court decisions to be publicly available in a government document.

She also outlined the following three steps:

(1) In reporting summary proceedings, there should be no publication of names or identifying particulars until a criminal charge has been determined;

(2) In the reporting of summary proceedings, there should be no publication of names or identities when a trial ends in an acquittal unless the defendant opts for the advertisement of his or her innocence;

(3) In the reporting of summary proceedings, there should be no publication of names or identifying particulars of civil offenders whom a court has found it expedient to punish and in respect of whom it has made an order of absolute or conditional discharge or probation unless those persons opt for identification.

As I have said before, the media is an industry, and court reporting is but one of the many materials it uses. In this country it is a tradition of reporting the names of the accused. In the past we have legislated against industries where we have found their traditions to be harmful, whether through environmental regulations or child labour laws. We have legislated such practices out of existence. I think it is time that we began to look at this segment, for if there is one point of unanimous agreement among the media, it is their distaste for guidelines laid down by any press council. And it is all too apparent that the various press councils in existence are handicapped in their efforts to police their members.

In closing, I would like to leave the last words to Margaret Jones. After publishing her thesis, she was asked to speak before the British Guild of Editors. She said:

This then is the challenge for the watchdogs of justice—do not degenerate into the jackals or hyenas of justice. In your reports of judicial proceedings can you not cease to be the hounders of humanity, at least for its minor crimes, yet still continue to watch over and record the process of justice? If you could do so you would make good the proud boast of the press that, through it, justice in our courts is seen to be done. Then you might better be called not the watchdogs but the guardians of justice; for you would show yourselves to be not dogs, but men.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence by congratulating the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) for raising this important subject not only on this occasion but in a number of other Parliaments as well. May I say at the outset, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, that we would support the reference, at the very least, of the subject matter of this bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I certainly hope hon. members opposite will agree at least to support the reference of the subject matter to that committee.

I say that we would support the subject matter being referred because, quite frankly, we have a number of concerns with regard to the bill as it is presently worded. There are some segments and areas of the bill with which we must take issue. There is certainly a fundamental safeguard which we believe should be inserted in the bill, which I will be coming to in short order.

It is clear that the matter with which we are dealing today is one of central importance to all Canadians because it essentially touches on two fundamental freedoms which in some senses tend to clash in this particular instance. These freedoms were both won through long and hard struggles. I refer, of course, to freedom of the press, on the one hand, and the right of the accused to a fair trial, on the other.

We have to attempt essentially to pick between these two principles and, in doing so, to come to a compromise between them, because we are really talking here about a matter of compromise. If we were to forgo the one and accept totally the other, we would be permitting, I suggest, a very serious miscarriage of justice to take place.

What the bill proposed by the hon. member attempts to do is arrive at a compromise between these two important principles. Unfortunately, I do not believe he has succeeded in doing that in the wording which is before the House at the present time. As I have said, I certainly sympathize with the objective of the bill, which is to ensure that an accused person has the right to a fair and unprejudiced trial which is decided strictly on the basis of the evidence presented before the court.

Of course, as my hon. friend has stated, the fundamental principle which must govern in criminal trials is the overriding presumption of the innocence of all accused. We have seen too many cases in which there have been reports of accused persons who have subsequently been acquitted, having had their reputations tarnished and in some cases their whole livelihoods destroyed as a result of the kind of reporting which has taken place regarding the crimes which they were alleged to have committed. I need only point to the most recent instance of this in the case of Alan Spraggett, a gentleman who was charged with very serious offences in the province of Manitoba. He lost his job, his reputation was severely tarnished, and he was subsequently acquitted by a provincial court judge. He was said to have been an honourable man, as I recall the words of Magistrate Dubienski in Manitoba.

● (1730)

In Canada we are fortunate to have won these fundamental principles of freedom of the press and the right to be presumed innocent to which my friend referred, in the Canadian Bill of Rights. We have to guard these principles. We have to safeguard them against both the state and the police. We have to safeguard against the effects of malicious, irresponsible or sensational reporting and comment. I appreciate that is the intent of my hon. friend's bill. Certainly I welcome his concern and share his concern for this vital right of Canadian citizens.

My hon. friend alluded to some of the conflicts within the various civil liberties groups on this question. It is not an easy question. Certainly for that reason I believe it would be inappropriate to refer the bill in its present form to committee. However, I think the fact that there is such a controversy and such a widespread interest in the subject matter of this bill warrants the referral of the subject matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

However, I have stated that we have some concerns. I should like to just deal briefly with those concerns. I have no intention of speaking for the full time allotted to me because I hope members opposite will see fit to have this bill moved on to committee. The concerns I have with respect to the bill are fundamentally this: first, that there is no option on the part of the accused to insist in some cases on publication of the name of the accused. If this bill is aimed at protecting the rights of the accused, then surely it should be up to the accused to waive the provisions of non-publication. For example, if the accused believes that he or she is being harassed or intimidated, that certain aspects of the judicial process are unsatisfactory, and wants his or her name to be published together with the circumstances, it is my view that that should be at the option of the accused, because it is a bill which is essentially aiming at protecting the rights of the accused. If this bill came to committee I suspect my hon. friend would not be adverse to such a provision being inserted in the bill, but he will appreciate that as it stands now there is no such protection afforded to accused persons.

The concern expressed not only by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association but by others is precisely that this would tend to blanket the proceedings of the court and make the court proceedings more secretive. I would suggest that by amendment along the lines I have proposed, permitting accused persons themselves to have the final word as to whether or not there should be publicity of their trials, would adequately deal with the concerns these various civil liberties groups have expressed. I should say I have taken the opportunity to canvass a number of people who have indicated a concern with the bill in its present form. Without exception they have stated that with the amendment I am proposing the bill would be satisfactory. We certainly feel the persons who are accused of an offence must be assured the right to full public scrutiny of the process of law. They must be able to appear publicly to show that they have not been harmed, for example, while they were being held in custody. They must be able to have the evidence and the circumstances of their case heard publicly if they so desire, to ensure that the evidence and the process conform to the due process of law.

What we have to avoid at all costs is any suggestion that there will be any increase in the arbitrary powers which already exist in the prosecutional arm of the state. For example, we have seen the abuses of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. Certainly we on this side welcome the intention of the government to repeal that particular section of the Federal Court Act which has been abused far too frequently by previous governments and, I might add, by the present government, unfortunately by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) only two months ago.

Those are the kinds of provisions which we believe should be removed from the present statutes of the country. On the other hand, as I have said, we recognize the concern on the part of those persons who are accused of criminal offences that too often their trial is conducted in the newspaper, or on television, or over the radio, and even if they are found to have been not guilty of the offence with which they are charged, that in the mind and in the eye of the public in fact they are guilty, with all the consequences that holds in terms of their jobs, their reputations, and the reputations of their families, friends and associates in the community. We recognize that that is a concern with which this particular bill is attempting to deal.

I will just pass over some of the comments I was planning on making with respect to the Official Secrets Act and trials that are being held in secret, because I think it is important the subject matter of this bill be referred. As I say, we are concerned about the question of the right of the accused to waive provisions of the bill. Also I would like to express at this point a concern with the wording of the bill. It would also ban the publication under all circumstances of the names, addresses or occupations of accused persons even after their trials have taken place, if they were acquitted or if they received an absolute discharge or pardon. Again I think my hon. friend would recognize some of the difficulties in these aspects of the bill. For example, in the case of pardons, they are not granted in some cases until a number of years after the accused has been convicted of an offence. According to the wording of the bill as it stands now, if the press reported the name of the accused in the interim between the time of conviction and the time of granting of pardon, they would be guilty of an offence. I am sure that is not the intent of the bill, but once again there are problems in the drafting of the bill as it now stands.

At this point I am not persuaded that it is a wise step to take to deny the press the opportunity to publish the names, occupations, and other relevant details of an accused person after the trial has taken place. I recognize that some of the unfortunate aspects of publication which are dealt with before the acquittal still arise here, but I believe at least at this point that the interests of the freedom of the press in that particular instance outweigh the other concerns that have been expressed. Following a trial, whether that trial results in an acquittal or a conviction, the press should be free to report on the outcome of the trial in its fullest detail.

Also I believe it is important that this be done and that there be an opportunity to report in the case of absolute discharges. I note there is no reference to conditional discharges here, but it is important that this be done in the case of discharges or acquittals, because frequently it is the case that trial judges, while acquitting an accused, or giving an accused an absolute or conditional discharge, will make certain comments with respect to the conduct of the accused. They will say that they are acquitting the accused but only on the narrowest of technical grounds. There may be important statements in the judgment of that particular accused which the public should know. While they may have been acquitted, in some instances the judge will state quite clearly his or her disapproval of the conduct of the particular accused. Surely it is the right of the public to be made aware of those kinds of concerns on the part of our judiciary.

I should like to conclude by saying that I would hope, because of the importance of the subject matter which is before the House today, which has been raised in a number of instances, and has been widely discussed by a variety of important institutions and organizations in our society, that the subject matter of this bill would be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am confident, if it is referred to that committee, that some of the problems I have raised in connection with its drafting will be cleared up, and those problems, having been cleared up, that we on this side of the House would be prepared to support the amended bill.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) for bringing this bill forward. The matter is one which might be considered non-partisan, an act to amend the Criminal Code reporting names of accused. At the outset I would merely suggest that there are many points of view on it and that there are many different ways of looking at it. I hope to bring forth some of those views this afternoon.

Also I should like to say that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) talked about the civil liberties involved and the balancing of various freedoms. This, of course, is something that is of the utmost importance. We have to consider freedom of the press as well as the freedom to which the individual is entitled. When the hon. member talks about the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) using section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, I would merely say to him that as long as the law is there it can be used, although it is my understanding that there will in fact be a change, and that particular section 41(2) will probably be repealed in the not too distant future.

● (1740)

With regard to the bill before us today, it seems to me at the outset it is necessary to consider the validity of the premise on which the bill is based. The explanatory note in Bill C-213 states:

> The purpose of this bill is to recognize more fully the time-honoured right of an accused in Canada to be presumed innocent until proved guilty by prohibiting the media from identifying an accused unless and until he is convicted.

The validity of this premise is in doubt, for a number of reasons. First, I would say it assumes that trial by the media is a general occurrence. You may or may not agree with this, but I think that is a fair assumption that can be made. Second, it assumes that the present laws and processes in the criminal justice system are inadequate to prevent those rare cases of excessive or improper pre-trial publicity, which is obviously not the case. Third, it ignores the need to balance the competing social and legal interests which are involved, namely, the potential harm to the individual accused's reputation or economic interests versus society's overwhelmingly great interest in ensuring that the operation of the criminal justice system is carried out with the greatest publicity and scrutiny, with some few well recognized exceptions such as juvenile proceedings, national security, and matters of that nature.

Professor Allan Mewett lists six reasons justifying the overwhelmingly greater social and legal interests in ensuring public trial, including media publication. I will just mention them to you. They are, first, an open trial provides some safeguards against unjust or unfair proceedings against an accused; second, it militates against the use by the executive of the courts to achieve its own ends; third, it reduces the possibility of any abuse of judicial power; fourth, it maximizes the chance of equal and impartial administration of justice to all accused persons; fifth, many aspects of the enforcement of criminal law, such as general abhorrence of certain acts or general deterrence, demand that the public be informed; and, sixth, witnesses who have to give their testimony in public will be more reluctant to give false evidence for fear of exposure.

Coming back to the other details, the validity of this premise is in doubt because it gives undue weight to, or alternatively confuses the effects of publication of the identity of persons charged in relation to the consequences such persons must or are likely to suffer, although their innocence is subsequently established, because it is not possible to prevent total dissemination of the knowledge of charges and the identities of persons charged; it is not possible to prevent persons who know of the charge and identity of persons charged from drawing wrong conclusions; it is not possible to prevent some damage to the reputation or economic interests of persons who are charged with criminal offences, whether or not media publicity takes place, even if they are subsequently proven innocent; and, it ignores the educative, moral and deterrent effects of openness of the criminal justice system to the public.

It would seem that the real objective of the bill is concerned with the protection of the reputation and economic interests of a few persons who, having been charged and having received some publicity in the media, are subsequently found to be innocent or, at worst, who although convicted either receive an absolute discharge or a pardon, as the case may be. The assumption that the presumption of innocence is not being honoured sufficiently is incorrect. The presumption of innocence is too well entrenched in the Canadian criminal justice system to be assailed for the reasons stated in the explanatory note of this bill and, as will be seen later, the consequences of implementing these proposals.

What about the content and effectiveness of Bill C-213 itself? There is a blanket prohibition in the terms proposed which is not unusual in the Criminal Code or other federal statutes, such as section 142(2) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. However, one must consider whether the interests which prevailed, in the case of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, for example, over the wider social and legal interests, should now be extended to provide no publicity in all criminal cases.

A total prohibition against media publication for all criminal offences might not be regarded as objectionable as, for example, a total prohibition excluding the public from all criminal proceedings. However, a number of factors have to be considered in the context of the effectiveness of this version of prohibition, the effect of this prohibition on the wider social and legal interests presently served by media publication, and the difficulties of application or implementation.

The true meaning of public trial is inextricably linked to full media publication of all the particulars sought to be prohibited by this very bill. This is not to say that the law does not recognize specific exemptions to the principle of publicity which are founded on specific public interest issues which are deemed of a higher order than the interest of publicity. Unfortunately, Bill C-213 creates a blanket prohibition without addressing the issues and concerns enumerated above. Such a blanket prohibition would derogate from the principle that justice must not only be done but must manifestly be seen to be done.

The total prohibition will not preclude some dissemination, because word of mouth and court room spectators will still be able to connect the accused and the charge; the facts of the charge or proceedings will continue to be the subject of publication; and the publication of the facts without particulars enabling identification may increase interest and greater speculation and rumour-mongering.

The consequences of these developments may continue to introduce a degree, albeit less than media publication, of the harms which Bill C-213 is intended to remedy, namely, protection of reputation and prevention of prejudice. In fact Bill C-213 may result in new prejudices; for example, completely innocent people may be mistakenly regarded as being involved or even as the unnamed accused as a result of speculation unchecked by fair and accurate media publication. This tendency may progress to such an extent that it brings the system of justice into disrepute.

The beneficial effects of openness, made manifest by media publication, accrue to the public, the accused and the prosecution, and would be greatly diminished by virtue of the prohibition in Bill C-213. The accused and the Crown are assisted by openness to the extent that witnesses are constrained to be more truthful, are induced to come forward, and reputations may also be vindicated. Concealing the name of a person whose innocence has been established can work to his great disadvantage as well. In this respect Bill C-213 could be regarded as inconsistent with its stated objective, namely, the furthering of the presumption of innocence.

Furthermore, Bill C-213 would preclude media disclosure of tactics which verge on harassment or vexatious proceedings such as multiple charges, multiple prosecutions, and unmeritorious appeals against acquittal.

Disclosure of misconduct by law enforcement personnel which is collateral to the commission of the offence charged could also be affected. In cases involving criminal misconduct of law enforcement personnel, and there are recent examples of that with regard to the detectives in the Lorenz case, for one, who forged affidavits, and also certain revelations by the McDonald commission, who are charged, plead guilty and obtain absolute discharges, the media would be precluded from identifying the culprits. This would have a deleterious effect on general and specific deterrence with a concomitant devastating impact on public confidence in the criminal justice system.

The difficulties of application or implementation are considerable. In the first place there is no reason why a convicted person should be protected from public view merely because he has received an absolute discharge. In addition, inequality in the treatment of persons must necessarily arise. Consider the case of persons convicted of the same offence. Those who receive an absolute discharge get the benefit of prohibition, while persons sentenced to other nominal dispositions do not receive the same protection.

In relation to the application of the prohibition in cases where a person who is convicted receives a sentence—that is, other than an absolute discharge—publication would be permissible notwithstanding that that person consequently receives a pardon. Publication, having taken place before the pardon was granted, the intended purpose of Bill C-213 will be frustrated in at least this respect. On the other hand, why should the fact that a full pardon has been granted not be published, since publication may inure to the individual's benefit by vindicating him? Publication also ensures society's interests by guarding against unwarranted use of the power to pardon. For example, there is the newspaper coverage of a Newfoundland case and the Mississippi case where an outgoing governor sold pardons.

The prohibition, as drafted, would also extend to civil proceedings which arise out of the commission of an offence. In particular, proceedings for false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, assault and battery, etc. could be affected. How would law reports, law journals, bar association publications and so forth be affected by the blanket prohibition contained in Bill C-213? Would the minutes of convocation of law societies be prohibited from naming solicitors disbarred and charged after disciplinary proceedings? All of these questions are affected by the definition of newspaper in section 261 of the Criminal Code. In view of the outcomes enumerated above, it appears that Bill C-213 is inimical to its stated objectives, that is, the enhancement of the principle "innocent until proven guilty". Further, its destructive effect extends to harm other primary values of the criminal law.

Consider the question of the administrative feasibility of the proposal contained in the bill. It is not possible to give a precise answer to this question. However, it seems reasonable to assume that it will involve increased screening by the news media, with the result that enquiries to the courts should increase. There is likely to be an additional case load in view of the nature of the activity and scope of the prohibition.

Another matter to be considered is the compatibility of the bill with existing legislation and regulations, as well as its impact on present programs and mechanisms. The right to public trial is well established historically in both the common law and legislation. The Canadian Bill of Rights, section 1(f) provides for freedom of the press in Canada. It is likely that the media will regard this as an attempt to restrict this fundamental right. In addition section 2(f) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which gives every person charged the right to a fair and public hearing, could be construed as enabling publication of the particulars sought to be prohibited.

On the other hand, a trial in public is not the same as a trial that may be reported in the newspaper. There already exists in the Criminal Code provisions which either restrict absolutely any publication, such as section 441, and 141(2), or provide the court with the power in appropriate cases or circumstances to limit or preclude publication of all or part of the proceedings including the identity of witnesses and accused persons. I have mentioned sections 442, 457.2, 467, and 470. These provisions are directed toward the problem of newspaper or radio coverage of certain matters. Bill C-213 will, by implication, have the effect of limiting those sections of the Criminal Code which now give the court a discretion to prohibit newspaper publication or radio broadcast in so far as the name of an accused person is concerned.

It should also be noted in this context that the International Covenant on Human Rights, to which Canada is a signatory, Article 14(i), provides that:

> 1) All persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. The press and the public may be excluded from all or part of a trial for reasons of morals, public order (ordre public) or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice; but any judgment rendered in a criminal case or in a suit at law shall be made public except where the interest of juvenile persons otherwise requires or the proceedings concern matrimonial disputes or the guardianship of children.

Article 14(1), which embodies the principle that the press shall be admitted and be entitled to publish, recognizes specific exceptions to the principle of publicity which are founded on specific public interest and which are deemed to be of a higher order than the interests of publicity. Bill C-213 creates a blanket prohibition which could be regarded as restricting the application of this article. The mischief which Bill C-213 now seeks to redress is precluded by the present law of contempt of court.

Bill C-213 creates an offence of strict liability. The desirability of creating such an offence should be carefully considered in the light of the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission in their report "Our Criminal Law", which was to the contrary. Finally, in this context, it should also be noted that the Supreme Court of Canada will soon be considering an appeal involving the right of the public to all information relating to search warrants.

We must also consider the relationship that the proposal may have to any planned legislative programs of the Department of Justice. In the ongoing review of criminal law the Department of Justice has identified all aspects of the issue of pre-trial procedures, including publicity and the law of contempt of court, for review in conjunction with the Law Reform Commission as part of its criminal law reform program.

In the circumstances and for the reasons outlined, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) considers the passage of this proposed legislation inappropriate at this time.

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, as this is my first opportunity to speak in the House, I would like to congratulate Madam Speaker, through you, sir, on her election to the chair. I have no doubt that she will have a long and distinguished tenure in that great office. I do not intend to speak about my riding, but Don Valley East is a cross-section of people from a typical suburban riding in Canada. I consider it quite an honour to be the second member to represent that riding. The first representative of that riding was in this House for a very brief period of time.

Bill C-213 is an interesting bill and one which attempts to deal with real and genuine problems. However, I think that the issue is one which certainly warrants a more thorough and comprehensive bill to anticipate ways in which some of the very many problems could arise on this issue and to deal with those problems.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the present speaker feels that this bill should be given more of an airing and a better chance, rather than talk it out in the remaining few minutes, would the hon. member move that the subject matter of the bill go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I think that the bill has a great deal of deficiencies. What is really needed is a bill that deals with the matter in a much more comprehensive way. I do not think that it would serve much purpose to have this bill in its present form go to committee.

Mr. Dick: I said the subject matter.

Mr. Smith: I understand what my friend is saying. One very fundamental principle which has been held by the courts for many years was stated in the famous case Scott v. Scott. The case was held in the House of Lords in 1913, and Lord Shaw stated:

> Civil liberty in this kingdom has two direct guarantees; the open administration of justice according to known laws truly interpreted and fair constructions of evidence; and the right of Parliament, without let or interruption, to enquire into, and obtain redress of, public grievances. Of these, the first is by far the most indispensible; nor can the subjects of any state be reckoned to enjoy a real freedom, where this condition—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 54 I do now leave the chair for the House to revert to Committee of the Whole House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM MONTHLY AMOUNT OF SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act—Miss Bégin—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

AFTER RECESS

The Committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: At six o'clock this evening before the House rose we were in Committee of the Whole and on clause 1 of Bill C-16, with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre having the floor. Was I correct that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wanted the floor?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to take the floor for just 60 or 75 seconds to remind the minister of the three points on which I should like her to comment. The first has to do with the base for income for our pensioners, bearing in mind my suggestion that it be related to something like 125 per cent of the poverty line.

The second point I raised had to do with the spouse's allowance and the earnest hope that something better than that would be produced, particularly for women in that age bracket.

My third point was to go along with the hon. member for Victoria in expressing the hope that we can do something soon about reciprocity between this country and the United Kingdom in the matter of pensions. Perhaps the minister could answer those three points now.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for refreshing our memories after suppertime. In answer to the first question which has to do with a possible review of the base for establishing OAS rates, I would point out that in most, and I think all, the numerous studies on pensions recently made public in Canada in the last two or three years, which will be used at the national conference on pensions, it is never recommended to increase the OAS, except in the presentation by the Canadian Labour Congress. The emphasis is always on increasing the GIS, the supplement to those in need.

I think it is fair to answer that at the conference in the fall the theoretical concept of an ideal OAS in Canada could be part of the discussion and would surely be touched upon by some participants, although if I answer the hon. member in the cautious way I am doing, it is to make sure we are not raising expectations right now.

I should now like to make a correction to the figure I used earlier this afternoon which was questioned by the hon. member for Victoria. When referring to the NDP election promise regarding pensions I used the figure of $2.5 billion as the annual cost of raising the basic pension by $40. That annual cost in fact applies to the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the basic OAS could be 125 per cent of the poverty line for all Canadians. That would cost $2.5 billion. I am answering that this matter will surely be part of the discussions, but it will not be the objective of the conference. I hope I am being honest and open in that matter.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before the minister leaves that first question I wonder if she would say another word. She is perfectly justified in assuming that I was asking for all pensions to be 125 per cent of the poverty line, but I said that I was speaking in the context of this legislation which carries with it the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. I was asking whether consideration would be given to bringing the level arrived at by adding GIS to OAS up to 125 per cent of the poverty level. I was asking whether consideration would be given to that as a basic concept.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the estimate of $2.5 billion corresponds to an increase in both the OAS and the GIS to make sure that everybody is 25 per cent over the poverty line. Am I answering clearly?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, that would be lovely—that would suit the way I would like it, but I have been prepared to live with what we have now done. I am asking that the amount of the GIS be such as to bring those people who are on it to that level. Many people who are not on the GIS are at that level already. I am asking that those who are on a combination of OAS and GIS have 125 per cent of the poverty line. I am not particularly concerned about the figure. I am asking whether consideration is being given to that as a basic concept.

● (2010)

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I am going to express my views in French, perhaps for the sake of clarity.

There must be some misunderstanding about the words because I thought I had answered the question put by my colleague. If we increase the basic pension and the supplement by 125 per cent, we increase the incomes of all those who are living in poverty today. So we increase in fact only the supplement, which will cost $2.5 billion a year. Even if we talked about—

[English]

OAS-GIS—with a dash in between—does not change a thing to the OAS. The upgrading of the GIS to put everybody above the poverty line, say by 25 per cent, would cost $2.5 billion. I hope I am clear on that point. The proposed increase to the OAS for all Canadians over the age of 65 by some $40, which was the electoral promise of the NDP, would cost a little over $1.1 billion or $1.2 billion. I do not remember the exact figure. I am citing that figure because I think it is important to describe the order of magnitude.

The next question was: do we intend to do something for those people between 60 and 65 years of age who are not eligible for the so-called spouse's allowance? This means for the majority of seniors 60 to 65 who are in need because of lay-offs, loss of jobs, sickness, handicapped and so on or for whatever reason I think the thrust of your question was what is our priority. That is very important.

As a possible first step for the future I mentioned those between the ages of 62 and 65. In our previous work in this party it became very clear that at age 62 there is a net decrease of seniors actively involved in the labour market for all of the reasons that were previously mentioned, that is, either because of bad health conditions, technological lay-offs, etc. At age 62 there is a statistical sharp decline in labour attachment. Therefore we think that whenever Canada is able to do something about this situation it could be at that age first. But the problem remains the same, that is to say, those aged 60 to 65 who are in need.

We had estimated at the rate of pensions and the supplement, because that means pension plus supplement, this monthly $35 that we will add in July will cost $890 million. I do not hide behind figures. These are the barriers we have to overcome. That is the money we have to find. I see that the Minister of Finance has left the chamber. The minister of state was here. However, we all understand. In terms of objectives, the answer is yes, we would like to do something. When, we cannot say. However, before doing that it appears to me as Minister of National Health and Welfare that there is no way Canada can move to do something for those who are not yet 65 years of age but in need of help and a pension, until those who are over 65 are all above the poverty line.

Tonight we will pass a bill which will cost either $520 million or $525 million a year. We still need $730 million just to bring all of those who are more than 65 years of age above the so-called poverty line. For me, that is our next step as soon as the economy permits it; literally as soon as possible. After all of those who are over 65 years of age are no longer below the poverty line, we will look at those who have not yet reached the age of 65. However, I do not want to raise false expectations. It seems to me that we are not in a position to do so in the present economic circumstances.

As to the third point, which concerns the reciprocal agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada, we have developed a draft agreement. New members may not be aware of that. We had a draft agreement but, to put it in blunt words, and I hope that the officials will not have a fit about this, Great Britain does not want to pay for any form of indexation of their own pensions to former U.K. citizens now resident in Canada. We think they should pay a form of indexation.

When I was a minister early in 1979, the hon. David Ennals was involved in a meeting with officials. I understand their position, that when they were in power they did not succeed any more than we did and that is why I am putting it very openly to the House of Commons. After all, we all meet the High Commissioner at times and we may bring this request to him of about 23,000 people who are affected under this draft agreement.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak briefly on this bill and I will start by asking the minister a question. In doing so, I would like to salute her. I think she is sincerely doing the best she can. The $35 envisaged in this bill is the best that she thinks she can get by her colleagues. I mean that most sincerely. I do not think anyone on that side of the House would more like to help pensioners than the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I would like to put a number of premises, all of which I believe to be correct, and hope that the minister will answer my one question. I have here an article from the Ottawa Journal dated January 24, part of which reads:

> But if you are female, single and elderly, life has become a cruel joke. Three out of four unattached individuals over the age of 65 living in poverty are women, a brief on retirement policies prepared by the Canadian Council of Social Development points out.

As a second premise, if I can put it that way, I would like to cite an article from The Toronto Star written by Dian Cohen, dated April 24, 1978. She says:

> Irwin Gillespie, an economist professor at Carleton University in Ottawa has long been in awe of the Liberal claims for their income redistribution programs.

Further on she concludes by saying:

> In fact, Gillespie concludes that budgetary policy has provided larger benefits for the highest-income families than for the poor. On average, a poor family was $2.25 better off after all the budgets were implemented during 1970-77, while an average rich family was $3,710 better off.

That is a second premise leading up to a question.

Third, I will quote an article from the Winnipeg Free Press, dated November 17, 1979, written by Fred Wood. It reads:

• (2020)

> Forty per cent of those who are over 65 years of age depend solely on their old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplements.
> Besides the fear of runaway inflation, another spectre haunts their minds. They remember the devaluation of paper money in several countries during the inflationary period following the First World War. Some once-sound nations were forced to cancel their currencies entirely and start all over again, or to trade large numbers of their monetary units for lesser numbers of units.

Fourth, I wish to quote from a brief from a volunteer organization called Canadian Pensioners Concerned, Alberta Division:

> In Canada there are more than 2,000,000 men and women 65 years of age and over. Several hundred thousand more are approaching pensionable age. Early in 1975, 23 per cent of pensioners were completely dependent on old age security (OAS) pension and guaranteed income supplement (GIS).
>
> Another 34 per cent were receiving OAS and partial GIS. So 57 per cent, more than half of all old age pensioners, are being forced to live on incomes far below the amounts that governments themselves call a minimum wage—
> The 1949 dollar had shrunk to 86 cents in 1954; to 79 cents in 1959; to 72 cents in 1965, and in 1977, that 1949 dollar had shrunk to 36 cents! With these reductions in our savings and our income, our ability to buy the things we need becomes more and more limited.

I understand that if inflation in Canada continues to rise at the rate it has in the past decade, by the year 2015 one will require a minimum income of $1 million merely to exist in Canada. People have asked me, and this is not aimed so much at the minister as at her colleagues, how the government can have so many policies which foster inflation on the one hand, fostered in part by the deficit of $14 billion, and from time to time give an increase of $35 to old age pensioners which, in my part of the country, will not buy more than 35 hot dogs. How can they expect pensioners to get by with the same decency the rest of us expect?

I again quote from their brief:

The reasons for our senior citizens' plight should not be overlooked: two world wars, the great depression, unemployment, low wages and wage freezes, the drought, little or nothing in the way of pension plans or hospital-medical insurance plans as we know them today; no family allowances or unemployment insurance; no student loans, grants, and scholarships; no local improvement plans or opportunities for youth, etc., etc.

Now, inflation and high taxes have wiped out or drastically reduced the purchasing power of whatever savings had been accumulated.

Yet these citizens paid taxes for half a century and more, worked or fought for their country, raised and educated families, helped to build Canada into a great and rich country.

The Canadian Pensioners Concerned sent out a question naire to pensioners in Alberta. The first question was:

Do federal pensions meet basic needs?

Fifty-four per cent replied no and made comments such as:

The quarterly increases are far too small to keep up with the rising costs of rents, utilities and food. Without other income the pensions would be completely inadequate.

Question No. 2 read:

Are federal income tax exemptions and deductions for those over 65 adequate?

Approximately half said no. I should point out that this questionnaire is two and a half years old.

Fifth, I wish to quote from a document by Statistics Canada entitled "Canada's Elderly." I quote from page 16, I believe:

In 1975, the average income of families with a head 65 plus was $10,171. That is slightly less than two-thirds of the average income of all families. The average income of unattached individuals 65 and over was $4,138, while that for all unattached individuals was $6,595.

Finally, the people in the part of Edmonton I represent are overwhelmingly in favour of a proper pension system for pensioners. I spoke to approximately 700 of them. Almost without exception they said such things as "pay them a decent income", or "they built our country and deserve to live well in retirement." Virtually everyone in Edmonton-Strathcona I spoke to personally had nothing but good will toward older people. My question to the minister is:

[Translation]

I can say it in French: after all that, after all the problems faced by people who are 65 and over, do you think what we are doing through this project is enough?

[English]

Miss Bégin: I thank the hon. member for the question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Before recognizing the minister further, hon. members will recognize that the usual tradition is to express themselves through the Chair, if that is acceptable, rather than directly to the minister or individual members.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to the question finally put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is very clear and simple. He probably thinks that by the very sarcastic tone of his speech and question that it is going to embarrass me, but it will not. The answer is no, it is not enough. We have done more and we are going to continue to do more.

Following all the quotes which the hon. member gave to the committee, quotes which in fact established the poverty which still exists among some senior citizens in Canada, I ask him where was he when his party formed the government? To my memory, only one bill was passed by the Conservative government, and correct me if I am wrong, with regard to senior citizens. That bill had to do with people continuing to receive the spouse's allowance until they reached age 65. The way the bill was proposed by the Conservative government, it would cost $6 million, je répète, six millions. Our proposal is $525 million.

Out of their big heart and out of the public purse, they were able to obtain from the hon. member for York-Peel the huge sum of $6 million. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and members of the opposition forced them to raise it to $10 million. The hon. member may have forgotten that. We on this side do not forget. We accepted it. Every extra penny for our senior citizens is one more step in the fight against poverty. However, where was the hon. member's caucus? How come he is suddenly so pure when he could not impress that on his caucus?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: The hon. member can make his speeches about how good we should be. The answer is yes, there are still things to do. I am very pleased that he is a member of the committee and in the group that will fight for these people.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the chance to say a few words on Bill C-16, to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month per household. I want to congratulate the minister on getting this bill into the House so soon since the election. Hopefully, if none of us talk too long tonight we shall see this bill pass through the committee and get on to third reading. The bill is in the best tradition of the social security programs which Liberal governments have put in place through the years, such as the family allowances legislation, the indexing of old age security pensions, rent geared to income housing, medicare, and a host of other things.

The most impressive aspect, to my mind, was that the minister wanted not only to see this bill passed but she also said she was not satisfied that we are doing enough for our seniors. I believe that is the way most of us feel. Although this increase represents some $525 million in cost to the treasury, it is probably a small enough amount when the individual senior citizen receives the increase of $35 per month per household in July.

It is characteristic of most of our senior citizens that they do not demand much; they have gone through the difficult years of the depression, often having raised large families, and many of them have learned to live very frugally. But large numbers of them are hurting and to see this increase put in place would be a welcome sight.

In her final speech on second reading, the minister set out her other priorities, that is, to see implemented when the economy expands sufficiently to afford it—for example to see all levels of social security are moved up to at least the poverty line. I was glad to hear her talk about the possibility of a national convention on pensions. I think that is extremely important.

Last year when I was campaigning in the general election there was a strike in progress at Inco in Sudbury. Of the people who were on strike there, some of them, at least, were working at the paper mill in Espanola. I had occasion to talk to a few of them and they were saying, "Gee, we really like this town; we would like to stay on and work here permanently, but we would have a problem with our pensions which are tied to the Inco mines in Sudbury some 40 miles away, and we cannot change now". Well, it seems to me it should not be beyond the ingenuity of man or of the elected representatives in the various legislatures of Canada to make these pensions more portable so that people would not be stuck in one industry or in one spot just because they had been there for 15 years or 20 years. I would hope that in future people will not be caught with unsatisfactory pensions or pensions which place them in a difficult position.

The minister also mentioned the situation of people in the age group between 62 to 65. I am pleased, as a member on this side of the House, to see that our minister is not only putting forward a very constructive program but that she is also looking to the future, and keeping in mind the progress which needs to be made. The hon. member for Victoria talked about the "auction" that takes place in elections. I should like to comment on that because it seems to me that in our political system parties sit down, as we did during that election campaign, and draft their platforms and policies. In our party we drafted a platform of proposals relating to social and economic fields, energy, and many other matters. These were placed before the people in due course. One of these proposals to which the greatest priority attached was the measure which is before the House tonight to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month.

Mr. Nielsen: You are holding up the bill.

Mr. Foster: We not only put that forward as a proposal but we identified the source of the necessary funds. So we were not just talking about pie in the sky. I think it is typical that two or three weeks after that proposal was announced—of course, it was worked out by our policy committee in December and it was announced some time in January—lo and behold, the New Democratic Party came along with their proposal for a $40 a month increase. That proposal was incredibly more expensive than ours because it would have applied across the board, whereas we were considering the needs of those in the lowest income brackets and looking at it in a positive way, because we believed we were going to form a government and were going to put forward a practical program. We needed to know that it would be possible to raise the funds to make it work.

Mr. Nielsen: You are holding up the bill.

Mr. Foster: So it is significant that the hon. member for Victoria should have been talking about a bidding, or an auction proposal. Surely that is what politics is about. You put forward your proposals to the people. If they elect you, and you implement them, you are fulfilling your obligation as a party or as an elected representative. It is obvious that members opposite did not put forward the right proposals or did not offer the proper priorities to attract the support of the people.

Mr. Nielsen: Again, you are holding up the bill.

Mr. Foster: I am glad to see this bill before us tonight. I am glad to see it put in place for our senior citizens in time for them to see the benefits in July. I was glad the minister ticked off the hon. member for Bow River for his comment about this bill forcing senior citizens to become divorced because the benefit was applied on a household basis.

Mr. Nielsen: Why are you holding up the bill?

Mr. Foster: It seems to me that this is one of the most ridiculous suggestions I have ever heard.

There is one question I should like to put to the minister and it is this: I have received many complaints because the GIS is indexed whereas programs such as the Ontario GAINS program are not indexed. When the guaranteed income supplement is increased quarterly following the inflation rate, the extra amount does not benefit the senior citizen receiving the pension because the GAINS benefit is reduced. I should like to see put in place some provision whereby the indexing is passed through, or, if that is not possible, in a bill such as this I should like to see an arrangement made with the government of Ontario or any other government where that kind of practice is followed to ensure that if there is an increase of $10 or $15 in the GIS due to indexation it goes to the individual pensioner and that the provincial pension is not reduced by a similar amount. Very often those programs are not indexed on a regular basis so the pensioner ends up coming to the elected representative saying, "We got an increase from the federal government but our provincial GAINS pension was reduced by a similar amount, so we do not get any benefit." It seems to me this is a cruel, unfair and insensitive way for the provincial government to operate. If there is an increase in the rate of inflation, this benefit should be passed to the pensioner and I hope the minister will take some action to stop the present unfair arrangement by the provincial government.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, may I take my colleague's question as notice for a few minutes in order to obtain some details and to be in a position to give him a more accurate answer.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I have a small series of questions I would like to put to the minister. Am I entitled to put a small series of questions—stand up and sit down—and I will be recognized?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has 20 minutes, and he can use the 20 minutes in any way he sees fit, subject to the normal rules in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Knowles: He can't dance a jig.

Mr. Hawkes: I am sure the minister would not want to leave the house with the wrong impression, but I think she did, perhaps inadvertently, because she was not familiar with the defeated Conservative budget or the bills introduced by the Conservatives into the House in the last Parliament. However, if we simply look at three of the measures which hon. members opposite voted against, including the energy tax credit, the tax credit for property taxes and the tax credit for mortgage deductibility, it is clear that something in the order of $145 a month was available to many senior citizens in this country, and that is considerably more than $35.

Perhaps of even more importance was the direction of that budget toward a balanced budget. I think economists will tell us clearly that that is the direction in which a government should go if it is serious in terms of its fight against inflation. A reduction of the inflation rate of something in the order of 1 per cent, 2 per cent or 3 per cent which accumulates over time, benefits senior citizens who are at the lower end of the income scale a great deal more than the bill we are considering here today, and I would like the record to show that.

I would now like to begin my series of question to the minister. Could the minister begin by telling me what her departmental estimates are so to the number of people who will benefit from this bill in this fiscal year, and what are the costs for this fiscal year alone for this bill?

Miss Bégin: No, Mr. Chairman, I will not correct my previous remarks. I happen to believe very strongly in direct transfers of moneys to those in need in cases of higher inflation, and I happen not to believe that the tax credit for mortgage deductibility and other Conservative budget measures would have been a direct help to seniors.

We may not be talking about the same seniors. I am talking about hundreds of thousands of seniors in need who do not even have houses which belong to them in most cases.

I believe very sincerely that the clientele touched by the Conservative budget, which was defeated by a majority of the Canadian population, and those touched by a measure like this one, are totally different. That is just to clarify in what context this bill is presented.

The number of seniors who will receive this increase is 1.3 million senior citizens of Canada at a cost for this fiscal year, which means the balance and not the full fiscal year, of $345 million.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister might resolve the disagreement between us if she were to table in the House of Commons the research reports which characterize the characteristics of the seniors we are discussing. I suspect there are many more of the senior citizens who would fall into the classification of poor who own their own homes, and perhaps the minister recognizes that. I hope she has research data of that kind and that she might see fit to table it in the House so that we might have the issue resolved.

The minister has said, in various parts of this discussion on the bill, that she would like to provide senior citizens with a great deal more money than she is able to through the provisions of this bill. I assume she is referring to the fact that on many occasions different ministers of the Crown have indicated they want to restrict the increase in spending. They have adopted a practice which we instituted in the last government of envelope spending, so there is a limit to what can be spent. If you want to spend more on the right hand side, then you have to take it away from the left hand side. If that is correct, I wonder if the minister would indicate to the House whether she has argued in cabinet and whether she is in favour of spending something between $3 billion and $4 billion on subsidizing the importation of oil rather than spending the money on the guaranteed income supplement. Perhaps the minister could tell us how much the amount would be to senior citizens if in fact the cabinet to which she belongs had not chosen to spend that amount of money subsidizing American aeroplanes, truckers who come across the border, and people of that kind.

An hon. Member: Don't be ridiculous.

An hon. Member: Go back to the farm.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, the bill would provide more money to help seniors in need. We are talking about 1.3 million seniors who will get that additional money. By the way, as I said earlier—the hon. member may not have heard me—this is not enough money. I hope as soon as the economy expands we can add to that to make sure that all seniors of 65 and over live above the poverty line.

The question of inflation which the hon. member attached relating to the lives of seniors is relevant. If he asks me if I have any difficulty believing in full solidarity with regard to the policies of the government, my answer is that I have no problem. I am not a split personality. I am in complete agreement with the kind of compensation payments which—whatever their cost figures; I do not have them here in detail—ensure a price which is lower than that in other countries and the same price to all Canadians. That is very obvious to me. It is a very good policy, to my way of thinking, and it benefits, among other groups in the population, seniors.

Without quite asking the question—the hon. member merely made a suggestion—he seemed to ask where the money will come from. He referred to the envelope system. The money, as we said during the election, and as announced in this House by the Minister of Finance, is money added to the so-called social envelope. It is new money, in other words, coming from increased taxes on corporations to be announced later in the year.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the minister might consider the following commitment. She sat on this side of the House in that last Parliament and voted against the Conservative budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: She complained about the 18 cents tax on gasoline. Does the minister realize that a three cents per gallon tax on gasoline would enable her, without borrowing more money—if the Minister of Finance was to give her that revenue—to double this allowance from $35 to $70?

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do it?

Mr. Hawkes: Would the minister consider petitioning the Minister of Finance to come forward with a three cents per gallon tax on gasoline, thus enabling her to double her guaranteed income supplement? I think public policy is a matter of choice, and I am trying to clarify the minister's original statement about choice. She said that she would choose to help this group out. Would she be prepared to go to the Minister of Finance and suggest a three cents tax on gasoline to enable her to double this subsidy?

Miss Bégin: No, Mr. Chairman. I think we explained in previous exchanges of views that at the beginning of the election campaign when we finalized our social policy, the Liberal Party decided that as a party—and that became government policy since—we would finance this particular program with $525 million. This year it is less because of part of a fiscal year, and it is only $345 million, to be financed by an increase in corporate taxes. The exact form of it is to be announced by the proper authority.

● (2050)

The hon. member raises fundamental questions, but he keeps finishing his questions by asking me if I would agree with him. The answer is no. I am a Liberal, and he is a Tory.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the minister that as a consequence of a decade of Liberal policy, in particular the seven years preceding our formation of a government, a situation was produced which has long-term consequences for the senior citizens of this country.

Miss Bégin: Yes, they are better off.

Mr. Hawkes: They face an undue burden in terms of their ability to meet increased costs through inflation. Those increased inflationary costs are a consequence, in large measure, of government overspending. The Minister of Finance smuggled a budget into this House in April. We have a situation where he asked the House to approve the borrowing of close to $11 billion to pay the interest on the public debt. Most of that debt was accumulated in the last seven years. If the minister were to have access to that $10 billion or $11 billion, does she have any idea of the difference in the standard of living that could make for senior citizens? Is the minister not willing, as a member of that government, to accept responsibility for creating the situation on which she is putting a band-aid when, in fact, major surgery is indicated?

Miss Bégin: Of course this is a very simplistic view of the economy, particularly in terms of the international situation. The hon. member does not even refer to Canada being part of a larger entity, first North American, and then of all industrialized countries. He is giving us an electoral speech. He knows full well that we did not create inflation.

Mr. Malone: You did.

Miss Bégin: We have fought inflation for years as well as we could. To my knowledge I have never read or heard anybody in the country who now knows what is the remedy against inflation.

Mr. Malone: It is our own energy.

Miss Bégin: I think this is very clear. After all, we have a much better record than our friends to the south. The member keeps talking about restraints, less spending, etc. Was it not Mr. Shultze who said very recently that the American government might have made a mistake and should have been expansionist? I am not here to give a course to the member as he is doing to the rest of the House.

We are talking about a bill in the field of social policy. It seems to me the objective of social policy is to ensure, first, that the general economic background is the best we can provide for everybody. This is my job as a member of the government together with other members of the government. However, it is not my direct responsibility. On the other hand, my direct responsibility is to ensure that the social policies meet the needs of Canadians in what I will call the quality of life. That means health and their financial security. It seems to me that this bill is very appropriate.

Unless my colleague opposite is more specific, I must admit that I fail to understand his line of reasoning. I can see the politics of linking poverty in Canada to inflation, but it is not a direct link. Poverty was with us in the good years. Many governments, one after the other, tried to fight poverty. We succeeded modestly. I think it is fair to say that. Progress was observed, and we can conclude that absolute poverty has decreased in Canada in the last 15 years.

Mr. Malone: That is not true.

Miss Bégin: Of course it is true, otherwise I would not say it. Relative poverty is still the same. Relative poverty, as its name indicates, relates to the general wealth of the country. So, we still have a very serious challenge with us. The fight against poverty is valid, inflation or no inflation. We had poverty with us before inflationary times.

If we go back to strictly discussing the indexing of pensions, I am not quite sure if quarterly indexation is the best form of indexation, but I have the figures with me which indicate that it maintained the value of the dollar for the last eight years. Those are the figures that are available to me. I just wanted to state that very clearly to the House.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, as other hon. members have done this evening and today, I should like to say a few words on this great subject of pensions. Sometimes in listening to the debates in the House I wish that our friends in the Conservative party would stop defending their last budget. I think it is past history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: I think everyone in the Conservative party agrees that in fact it was a great, honest, outspoken and forthright budget, but it did not wash. It did not wash, and that is why we are—

An hon. Member: That is why we are in the mess we are in today.

Mr. Rose: In case anyone thinks that I am being unfair to one side of the House, I should like to indicate that we have something like $1.15 billion to $1.20 billion in deferred taxation. If we are worried about from where the money is going to come for pensions, we can look at the fact that on deferred taxation we are getting about 8 per cent. If we raise that to the prime rate, probably we will have about $1 billion more for pensions. However, I do not think either my friends in the Conservative party or the Liberal party would suggest that we call that money right in or charge the up front interest rate on it because it would offend some of their friends and, my God, we cannot do that!

Pensions are really political questions rather than economic ones. How we decide to spend our money is really what we are talking about. It has to do with how we decide on our particular priorities. We think we have a reasonable pension scheme in this country. I think it is reasonable. It is not unreasonable, but any time we think we are being unduly generous, all we have to do is look at some of the western European countries and find that our people are not lavished with all kinds of extra benefits.

If we believe what the minister told us, and I see no reason why we should not, 1.3 million out of two million are getting the supplement, and that means they are broke. So, very few of them are squandering their money driving Cadillacs or doing all these things like taking trips to Hawaii. I do not think we have lavished money on pensions.

From the time pensions were introduced by my predecessor or the precursor of my party, we have heard the question asked: where is the money coming from? We heard that last year when the Conservatives responded to the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to increase the pension to $350 a month. We heard them say that they were spending $4.5 billion on pensions at that time, how could they double that, it was impossible, it would break the country. We heard the same thing in what year; in the early twenties? You would not care to specify the year?

An hon. Member: 1926.

Mr. Rose: All of us in the House are probably going to love this bill to death. I do not think anybody is against it, but I think all of us would like the opportunity to say a few words about it, ask questions of the minister, and probably to tilt a few of our own favourite windmills.

Pensions are of vital interest to everyone in this country beyond the age of 30. Young people like my friend, the hon. member for Crowfoot, who thinks he is going to live forever, are not much interested in pensions, as with many other young people of his ilk. He looks disgustingly healthy and probably will live forever. I think we have to be realistic about this. In spite of the fact that we seem to be spending a lot of money on pensions, according to some people, only 54 per cent of all Canadians are covered by pensions of any kind, and certainly most of those people not covered are women.

It is the women of our society who tend to outlive us by about ten years, and they are the ones who are left with inadequate subsistence in terms of rent and income for other necessities. They live in poverty for probably that most difficult and lonely period of their lives. This is the kind of thing that all of us probably just think about because we do not experience it. Sometimes people with a literary bent will write and bring home to us this kind of loneliness and scrimping on food and that sort of thing, but that really is something we look upon as literature and do not experience. I have no particular desire to experience it. We are pretty well looked after as members of the House of Commons.

We are not talking about that, we are talking about the 55 per cent of all pensioners, all those Canadians who are over 65 and are eligible for the supplement, whether they are married or unmarried. We are told this is going to cost the nation some $345 million. I do not think that is particularly massive when you consider the fact that when I first entered this chamber the total budget for all Government of Canada spending was something like $12 billion and now it is closer to $60 billion. It is really not a huge item.

I do not think people need to express overt gratitude for this increase, but I would suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, like a lot of other members, that it is certainly a welcome step. We in this party welcome it and we would like to push it through.

We know the minister's problems with the President of the Treasury Board who is sitting over there in deep thought. He has his own problems with his climate of restraint, but I want the minister to use all her blandishments to convince that minister that she needs more for the good and welfare of the pensioners in this country. She should certainly encourage the minister to loosen the purse strings and change the kind of priorities we have in this country so that those people who have provided our generation with the kinds of things we enjoy can, in their time, have an opportunity of being without fear, insecurity, poverty and the rotten, old, crummy places where they live, with crappy dinners and all that sort of thing, while the rest of us, including the minister and the President of the Treasury Board, eat in the parliamentary restaurant.

We have to take another look at our priorities, and I do not think we are being unfair in suggesting that. Something needs to be done, and there is no question about that, to bring pensioners at least up to the poverty line. If you are not below the poverty line you do not get the supplement, and if you do not get the supplement you are not even eligible for the $35, and that is pretty clear.

Miss Bégin: That's not true.

Mr. Rose: You have to get the supplement in order to get the $35.

Miss Bégin: About 45,000 more will get it.

Mr. Rose: I am pleased to hear that, but that has to do with indexing. If the minister would care to correct me I will sit down and she can get up and tell me about that. Do you want to do that?

Miss Bégin: Yes. Rapidly, Mr. Chairman, the supplement, not the indexing is involved. This increase, in other words, of $35 will permit some 45,000 pensioners who now do not qualify to start qualifying for the GIS.

Mr. Rose: I appreciate what the minister has to say, but I think the point has been made that there are still a million pensioners in this country who do not qualify. They are the ones who are not in a particularly affluent state either. I would encourage the minister to consider these people.

We are talking about all these things that have happened in Canada; we have medicare, redistribution of income, and all those lavish social schemes that have come about over the past 25 years. The fact is that distribution of income in terms of percentage has not changed a great deal in the last generation. The minister nods her head. The bottom 25 per cent still get less than 4 per cent of the total GNP, or total income, and the top 20 per cent still get over 40 per cent. I do not think my figures are that far off. That shows you, I think, the kind of society in which we live and the need for some kind of change or updating of our attitudes and priorities. I do not think anybody can argue against that.

The point is that whichever of the two old-line parties forms the government it still has other pressures. I am not discounting the pressures that confront the government. They are real and they are there, but the old age pensioners, the senior citizens of this society, are not organized. They do not speak with a unified voice and they do not speak with unified electoral clout, so they are ignored. Unless they begin to organize and put pressures on the politicians, they are going to be exactly where they always have been. I do not think there is any question about that.

We are told that over the next 50 years pensions will be in for increased buffeting. Six people today working support one pensioner, and within 50 years there will be three people working to support that same pensioner. That is a very serious matter. That means we will have to make some changes in the way we fund and the way we react to the pension problem. Those operating private plans suggest we cannot afford indexing. We have something like 10 per cent inflation in this country. What is a person going to do today who is retired at 65 if inflation continues at the rate of 10 per cent? That person who retires at 65 will have a pension in ten years worth a great deal less. The dollar he gets today will be worth 32 cents. Ten years after that, if he is lucky to live to 85, or unlucky, the dollar will be worth only ten cents.

We have all those people in the trust companies with private pension plans saying we have to get rid of indexing as they cannot afford it. How on earth could anybody expect to pay in forever in expensive dollars and be paid out in cheap dollars with the suggestion that that is a fair deal? That is absolute nonsense.

An hon. Member: He won't be on earth.

Mr. Rose: My hon. friend says he will not be on earth. What happens is that the dollar in 1980, if inflation continues, will in ten years be worth 32 cents, and ten years later worth a dime. What does that mean? It means no early retirement. Nobody wants to retire because they are too vulnerable. They do not know what will happen to their income so they cannot afford to retire. The carry on but, of course, they cannot collect from their pension plans. The longer they work in terms of their lifespan the fewer years they will be able to collect.

• (2110)

What we have in our society are the idle rich, who do not need a pension plan, and the idle poor, who retire and get a job to supplement their income. Private plans have been fighting indexing because they are set up to accept expensive dollars and pay out cheap dollars. They do not want to change that, nor do they want to change the fact that they occupy about 50 per cent of the pension business. The last figure I heard was that the private plans have in their treasury something like $20 billion.

There are a great number of people who would like to get their hands on that money because it is a very substantial investment. The unions are rather anxious to get at it, and companies are rather anxious to keep it. I do not think that we can afford any longer the kind of mix of private and public plans which we have had up until this time. For one thing, they do not serve the people. If it were not for the positive payout in the private plans, I am quite certain we would not need the kind of public assistance that we receive from the treasury.

If we had contributory, portable, across the board, decently funded plans in our society, run by the government, instead of hundreds of private plans in which the vesting remains with the firm, then we could probably afford, either through CPP or some other means, a plan that would pay out and look after the interests of the senior citizens about whom the minister, other members and myself are so concerned this evening. We cannot go on with the old litany of trying to bump the public pension plans up without taking a look at the private plans and the mix which we have of private and public plans to see if there is not a more rational or better organizational method by which we can proceed into the twenty-first century.

Unless we set up those plans decades in advance of when they are needed, they will simply not work. They will simply not be actuarially sound. Many private plans have vesting for the first ten years which remains with the company. I am not saying that it is true of a particular company when I mention that company, but I know, for example, that Safeway and Seagram have private plans. Again, I am not using facts in terms of relating to these particular companies, and I want to make that point clear. The fact is that vesting has remained in many private plans with the company for up to ten years. It is considered a gift.

An hon. Member: Mention the Liberal programs.

Mr. Rose: I have heard of the Liberal program. I think that they had a tremendous program in medicare which was brought in in 1917. That was the same year that "I'm forever blowing bubbles" was composed. I do not think that we can wait that long, and I am trying to convince the Liberals to hurry. We would like to see a few more Liberals in a hurry around here.

In any event, vesting can no longer be thought of simply as a gift. Vesting is deferred wages which belong to the wage earner, not to the company which happens to hold the vesting interest in the plan. We must look at this sort of thing. If one looks at the Canada Pension Plan one will find that there is a limit in that plan in terms of the yearly average insurable earnings of something like $13,000. I know of certain members of Parliament who make a little more than twice that, not to mention a number of other people in society, and who pay 1.8 per cent of $13,000. Actually I am told that it is a little less than $13,000 because of some sort of formula that is applied.

But if the 1.8 per cent were applied to the full earnings, instead of a limit of $13,000 on the yearly average earnings, it would change things quite a bit. It would provide more money for CPP funding which would provide the pensioner with a portable contributory plan, a higher income, and the Canada Pension Plan would no longer be considered a supplementary plan worth approximately 25 per cent. If people do not have a contributory plan to support them when they retire, then they call upon the non-contributory, except through taxation, plans of the kind we are speaking of tonight.

What this country needs is a plan that will be portable, adequate, contributory, and available to all, including housewives, because they are among the most vulnerable. If such a plan were available we would have a vastly superior social security system and one in respect to which the present minister, or ministers of the future, would not have to come back to the House and beg the Treasury Board chairman for a bit more chicken feed to give to the pensioners.

Generally, people do not like to feel as though they are recipients of charity. We hear a great deal about welfare bums, those people who want to rip off the welfare system. We do not hear about those people who are entitled to welfare, but whose dignity does not allow them to accept it. These people carry on year after year going without, because they are too proud to accept welfare or what some people would call "pogey". This is very important to some people. I do not belittle them. We also know that they probably balance off the people who want to go on the UIC ski team up to Banff or some other resort.

What I am saying is that people want to contribute through their work. We must change the taxation system so that it does not favour the affluent, and we should be taking a look at the pension plan. The Conservatives had an excellent idea when they suggested that sometime in 1980, were they still around, they would hold a pension conference. At this conference they intended to look at the whole matter of pensions in the future, generations from now, and at the kind of plans we need.

I am quite sure that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, would say that we have had enough talk, now we need action.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: On that note I shall close because I think that hon. members have heard enough talk from me and would like some action from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Of course I welcome the better organization of seniors into regroupings of all sorts. Power to seniors is something which we are increasingly witnessing every day. The second thing I would like to say, which probably will be of some surprise to the hon. member, is that the President of the Treasury Board was one of the strongest alliances which I had in cabinet discussions on this bill.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Chairman, I have a very short comment to make, and two very brief representations to put to the minister. I am happy to see this bill before the House, although I would have liked to have seen the $35 added to the basic pension rather than the supplement. This program has received very little criticism, even in Quebec, although it is of a provincial nature and under provincial jurisdiction. Federal intervention with provincial approval was intended to establish national standards and national payment levels, portability and other national goals.

Where these reasons for federal intervention no longer exist, and where the total spending and the manner of spending are entirely in the hands of the provincial governments, then the entire financing by an appropriate tax increase should be by the provincial governments. The minister now realizes that her former trust in provincial legislative bodies did not stop, for example, the Ontario government from making changes to the medicare program.

My first short representation could best be led into by quoting a couple of sentences from an article in yesterday's Ottawa Journal by Bruce Yemen. He is speaking of a couple who are receiving the guaranteed income supplement and he mentions that the GIS is paid on the basis of an income test.

Incidentally, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre talked about universality, but we should realize we can only go part way in this program toward universality as long as we retain the guaranteed income supplement.

The article mentioned that for every dollar of guaranteed income, a couple would lose 50 cents of the GIS, thus $2,500 in income would wipe out the entire $1,250 GIS. The article goes on to mention the provincially administered supplements. That was referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma, just recently. The article continues as follows:

—many elderly home owners on low incomes are reluctant to move to smaller or rented accommodation—it doesn't make sense to turn a tax-free home into income which is either taxed or makes them ineligible for government aid.

My representation, which I have made before and which I repeat now, is that the government should think soon of changing the two for one formula to, as a start, a three for one formula, so as to encourage persons to put a little more money away for their old age and to make it less punitive for those who have relatively small incomes.

In my opinion one of the problems facing us today is the level just above the minimum—those who have saved just a little, but not very much, and have seen their earnings disappear with inflation and so on. That is my first suggestion, Mr. Chairman.

My second suggestion also refers to something mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he talked about spouse's allowance legislation. He said, "Have you got a man?" is the standard. I want to go a little deeper than that. At least there was some logic in the argument of the minister concerning the difference between a person who has always been single and a person who loses a spouse. Unfortunately, with the legislation as it exists, we still see an example where old age persons between 60 and 65 who have lost a spouse are not treated equally.

I find it personally unacceptable that three widows, for example, of exactly the same age, with exactly the same income, should be treated differently—one being eligible for spouse's allowance, and the other two not, for reasons that have nothing to do with their age or their income but which are related entirely to the age of their husband when he died, or vice versa in the case of a woman dying.

My two representations to the minister are that she consider at some future date, some changes to encourage more, those with small savings, and also that we get rid of what I consider a terrible situation where two widows can live side by side, be the same age with the same income, yet one is eligible for the spouse's allowance while the other is not.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to answer the member for Vaudreuil that the first suggestion he made will probably be studied not as such, because it is new to me and I am not aware of its financial implications, but in the context of ways to encourage retirement savings during the national conference on pensions. As for his second suggestion, I think we are all aware of the problem since we identified it as the next step.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I will try to be as—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, there was an exchange earlier in the day with respect to progress of this bill. I have had the benefit of reading the blues with respect to that exchange. I think it began by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council indicating that there had been some discussions and it was the intention of the House that this bill complete the committee stage tonight, and complete third reading as well, so that we can proceed with it as expeditiously as possible.

I gather there may be some confusion with the two stages tonight. The hon. member for the Yukon, who was speaking for our party, indicated our agreement to the proposal put by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council. I wonder if that could be cleared up because we are anxious to get this bill through tonight and not have it talked beyond ten o'clock. It is an important bill to senior citizens. I think that should be done and we should have that matter clarified.

There may be some explanation that the Chair could assist us on this matter. We would certainly be grateful. It may be that the parliamentary secretary or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could make a contribution.

As I understand the reasoning earlier in the day, it was that this bill would be completed and would not be talked out. We are anxious that this be clarified and that that be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton are quite in order. That was our agreement, although I understand from reading the blues that it is not quite as firm an order as the parties wanted it to be. I think there might have been some misunderstanding, perhaps by yourself, with all due respect, and I think we can agree now that we will go to third reading this evening.

With respect to talking out the bill in Committee of the Whole, as hon. members know, every hon. member has the right to speak. I would ask, however, that hon. members keep in mind the disposition of the parties to get this very important piece of legislation through. The Minister of Finance has been waiting patiently to introduce Bill C-30, and there are only 33 minutes left before ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think it is correct to say that there was some misunderstanding but I do not propose to make anything out of that now. As hon. members know, I do spend most of the day in my place in this House but I did have to go out for a few minutes this afternoon and this was all done while I was out.

We can live with it, Mr. Chairman. We want to see this bill through as soon as possible. The hon. member for Vancouver East will be our last speaker in Committee of the Whole.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair will take only a moment of the time of hon. members. What happened was that earlier this afternoon a suggestion was made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council that all stages of this bill be passed by ten o'clock this evening. At that time the chair, which was occupied by myself, mustered up both digits of its IQ and managed to suggest a rephrasing of what had been proposed by the hon. parliamentary secretary. I rephrased it rather badly, but it was clear at that time that the hon. member for the Yukon had accepted the proposition put forward and, as the Chair understands it now, and as seemingly has been agreed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, an order of the House has issued for the disposal of this matter by not later than ten o'clock this evening.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): All stages.

The Deputy Chairman: All stages. I understand we will proceed with the hon. member for Vancouver East. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Agreed and so ordered.

Mrs. Mitchell: My colleagues have stated that we in the NDP will support Bill C-16. A $35 increase for senior citizens is an important start, but it is not enough. In particular, Bill C-16 does not cover the increasing costs of shelter, fuel, utilities, and home repairs—essential costs that I am sure you realize are escalating almost every day. Pensioners with no other income will still be far below the poverty line. We in the NDP advocated a $40 increase per month for all elderly people on basic pensions, not just those on the guaranteed income supplement. This, along with a shelter grant, could bring income of pensioners closer to the poverty line.

Ideally, of course, we should have an adequate guaranteed income, not guaranteed poverty, with cost of living increases on a regular basis. This should be available to eliminate poverty for Canadians of all ages, not only for senior citizens.

Tonight I want to focus briefly on the high cost of shelter which is a major expense for senior citizens, particularly for those who are having to rent accommodations at market prices. I hope the minister will take particular note of this and will include this in future planning if not in this bill. Shelter costs are a major concern of senior citizens, depending, of course, on where a person lives. Almost every senior citizen, regardless of income, has a major problem with accommodation and housing costs today.

First are those persons lucky enough to have had a home during their lifetime, a home that is paid for. Second, we have many senior citizens who are also very lucky to live in senior citizens housing developments, non-profit housing, where they pay 25 per cent of their income for shelter. Then we have the hidden pensioners who have great problems. I suspect many of them are the parents of members sitting in this House tonight who live in nice middle-class apartments, have had comfortable professional backgrounds perhaps, and yet are also paying exorbitant rents probably out of very limited pensions. It is known through research that of the many people in Canada who pay 50 per cent to 60 per cent of their incomes on rent—and this is many thousands of people—most of these are senior citizens and women. And 50 per cent to 60 per cent of senior citizens pensions is certainly something which is a very drastic cost.

Finally are the group of people, many of whom I am familiar with in my own riding who live in downtown flophouses or unsafe fire trap rooming houses, or in damp, cold basements and who are living on welfare, in some cases living on less.

First of all, dealing with the home owners, we know there are many pensioners who own their own homes and who may seem to have many advantages. However, with the increasingly high cost of fuel, home repairs, taxes and utilities, this is not necessarily so. Home owners with no extra income find it difficult to meet increasing costs. Often they are overhoused with homes too large for them, as families have grown up and moved away and they have little choice to move elsewhere.

These are the people who ideally, if more RRAP funds were available, could afford perhaps to subdivide and house other people. They are also finding that their houses and the repairs that go with them are an increasing burden. Too often these seniors in their own homes are more isolated than those in housing developments, without families around and who are somewhat isolated from their neighbours. The New Democratic Party during the recent election proposed a grant for elderly home owners that would help them pay their increased taxes. It was not much. It was $120 a year, but we would urge that this is justified for many of our seniors who are trapped in the high cost of owning their own homes.

Mr. Nielsen: Question.

Mrs. Mitchell: Second, pensioners living in non-profit housing developments have many advantages: decent housing, but perhaps they are not close to amenities. Although they pay 25 per cent of their income on housing, they perhaps do not have the privacy and some of the services that they need. Unfortunately, we do not have nearly enough of such developments to meet today's demand and future needs. There are long waiting lists for housing, and our elderly population is increasing considerably. Funds are not available for social housing which is needed. This is a very serious concern for senior citizens.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Question.

Mrs. Mitchell: One might think also that elderly couples living in apartments are well off, but, as I mentioned before, these people are also having difficulties.

Most urgent are the fourth group of seniors who are in a desperate situation and faced with a very high proportion of welfare costs going toward shelter with no amenities, no services and few alternatives. This is a really desperate situation. For this group in some provinces there are shelter allowances such as the SAFER program in British Columbia, but these programs are not adequate. I would ask the minister what she intends to do to cover some of these costs and alleviate some of the problems—the shelter problems in particular—for these groups of people.

When we discuss adequate pensions for elderly citizens we must recognize the desperate housing problem facing not just a few poor people but most of our elderly citizens today. Imagine paying over 60 per cent of one's pension on rent, with rents going up every day. This is why the NDP advocated a shelter grant for pensioners. This would assist persons who are the hardest hit by shelter costs. We recommend that there should be a rent subsidy that will cover up to one-third of the cost of rents where rents are over 25 per cent of the incomes of pensioners. Surely this is not very much, and surely members of this House could take this aspect a little more seriously. This would mean an extra rent subsidy of $50 per month, or $600 per year, for those not in subsidized housing. For home owners we recommended a grant toward taxes of $120 per year.

I ask the minister to comment on what plans she has, if any, to introduce shelter allowances in addition to pension increases. Will the minister also press CMHC and the Treasury Board to put more dollars into low-interest mortgages for non-profit senior citizens housing that is subsidized so people need to pay only 25 per cent of their income?

Finally, I would like to mention briefly that I know the minister has been an advocate of an adequate guaranteed income system to replace our outdated welfare system in Canada for some time. I commend her for this. In the meantime, if this bill goes through, and we hope it will, there are many unmet needs of our elderly where we must have shared federal funding. I would appreciate it if the minister could comment on what plans there may be for funding for programs such as transportation for seniors, which has experienced a drastic cutback in our communities, since there is very little shared funding now from the federal government; housing that is adapted to handicapped people and other services for the disabled, services such as Meals on Wheels, homemaking services, and also increased funds for opportunities for seniors to be active in their communities.

I think New Horizons is doing a fine job, but there are other programs such as foster grandparents, tutors, and other self-help projects that need support.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Question.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: With all due courtesy, Mr. Chairman, I think I should tell my colleague from Vancouver East that I am of course aware of the problems she has mentioned. I am familiar with the promises made by the New Democratic Party during the election. This is a first step of more than half a billion dollars. We will start by implementing it in the best possible way. We will have to raise additional taxes on corporations and this is but a first step. I think the best thing to do is to thank her for her speech and to say that this is only one step toward achieving everything that has to be done. That is why we all sit here.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, might I just say a brief word which I am sure all members will support. When we are dealing with pensions, some of us think of former members and former ministers who made a great contribution in this field. One of them is the Hon. Judy LaMarsh. In view of the fact that she is suffering an illness, although her spirit is strong, I think at this point we should send the greetings of this House to Judy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not put his expression in the form of a motion, but I think that given the support that was expressed throughout the House, that the feelings of the members in this House would be carried. Is that understood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am advised by the Table officers I might then put the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Borrowing Authority Act

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1980-81

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are not only the big spenders, they are also the big borrowers.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will follow the advice given by members of the opposition and make my remarks very brief, not because the subject matter is not important, but because the members opposite and on this side of the House will understand very easily the purpose and significance of this bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Just tell us why you want our money.

Mr. MacEachen: The borrowing authority bill now before the House seeks borrowing authority of $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81. This bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars.

As hon. members will recall, on April 21 last I tabled in the House of Commons a projection of the government's budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements for fiscal year 1980-81. I indicated at that time that that statement was a necessary foundation for a request which I would be making later for a borrowing authority. The requirements forecast in that projection amount to $11,730 million. This amount excludes requirements for foreign exchange transactions.

In addition to these forecast cash requirements, there is always the need for a substantial margin of borrowing authority to provide for contingencies. For example, there are major uncertainties arising from foreign exchange transactions since either a major weakening or a major strengthening of the exchange rate would have an impact upon the borrowing requirements of the government. If the Canadian dollar were to be strong, then the government would have to raise more Canadian dollars to borrow foreign exchange. On the other hand, the Canadian dollar could be or might be weak. Under those circumstances the government would then be faced with the need to borrow foreign currencies.

This margin of borrowing authority is being provided by unused borrowing authority obtained prior to November, 1979, and which is not subject to automatic cancellation at the end of the fiscal year. I believe that when the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made a similar request last November in the House, he referred to this unused borrowing authority which had not expired and which indeed has not expired up to the present time.

This borrowing authority was obtained prior to November, 1979, and was not subject to automatic cancellation at the end of the fiscal year. This unused borrowing authority which is available for use at any time and which has been carried forward, amounted to approximately $2.9 billion at the beginning of fiscal year 1980-81. All unused borrowing authority obtained under the Borrowing Authority Act 1979-80 was cancelled or lapsed on March 31, 1980. As I recollect, that refers to the borrowing authority which was granted by the House at the request of the former minister of finance. Consequently to date in fiscal 1980-81 new moneys raised have been charged to the $2.9 billion of unused borrowing authority obtained earlier and carried forward. However, these unused borrowing powers are rapidly being used up and the government requires new borrowing authority to enable it to continue with the 1980-81 debt program.

The borrowing authority of $12 billion now being requested, along with the remaining portion of the unused borrowing powers obtained in prior years and still available, should be sufficient to complete the borrowing program this fiscal year as well as to provide a margin for contingencies.

All outstanding and unused borrowing authority provided by this new act for fiscal 1980-81 in respect of which no action has been taken by the governor in council, pursuant to section 37 of the Financial Administration Act, will be cancelled on March 31, 1981.

Hon. members will recognize that, referring to clause (2) of the bill, we seek certain clarification with respect to borrowing in foreign currencies. Over the years the government has borrowed in many currencies including U.S. dollars, British pounds, Deutschmarks and lira, and has always honoured its debts in the currency of contract. This clause, the one to which I referred, will serve to confirm the authority of the government to borrow and repay loans in currencies other than Canadian dollars.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is a very signal occasion in the history of this session of Parliament because we have actually had the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) speak. This is his second speech. The House opened on April 14 and this is the second time the minister has spoken. The last time he spoke was on the occasion of his bootlegged mini-budget that he introduced toward the end of April.

This is a very short statement. We are expecting a bit more from the minister. We hope that when he speaks to close the debate he will actually tell us something. It is his history in this House to speak but never to say anything. Before I am through with the few remarks I am going to be making on this bill, which are always succinct and to the point, I will analyse and dissect some of the answers the minister has given to questions in this House on various serious issues of economic and financial approaches by the government.

The minister has said, and he can hardly deny it since it is in the bill, that the bill is to authorize the government to borrow some $12 billion during this financial year. It is to give the government borrowing authority for $12 billion. I recall that in the bill I brought into the House last fall on October 23, we were asking the House to authorize us to borrow $7 billion.

Some Liberal members, probably risking being kicked out of the caucus then said, "That's terrible. You have lost control." That is what they said when we brought in the bill to authorize the borrowing of $7 billion.

The hon. gentleman who is practically a deskmate of the Minister of Finance, that tattle-tale "Gray" Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), said we should only have $3.5 billion. He said we did not need $7 billion. He made a rough calculation and he came up with $3.5 billion. I am going to make a rough calculation tonight and say that $6 billion is more than enough for the hon. gentleman until he produces some facts and figures to show why he needs the $12 billion. In other words, when is he going to bring in his budget? Why is he such a reluctant virgin in a financial sense? He doesn't want to bring a budget into this House. He doesn't want to show the Canadian people and the business community what his financial plans are, what his economic policies are going to be. Why is he so reluctant to do this when he and his minions back last October and November were urging that a budget be brought in very rapidly? I will refer later to the remarks which were made by them last fall.

● (2150)

The minister says he has a margin. He says there was unused borrowing authority of $2.9 billion at the beginning of the 1980-81 fiscal year. That's at the beginning of that year, April 1, 1980. So the minister had unused borrowing authority of $2.9 billion at that time, he said. But he did not tell us how much of that is unused tonight. Are we not, as members of Parliament, entitled to know, when the minister comes by looking for a mere $12 billion in borrowing authority, just what is left of the $2.9 billion he had on April 1? Why is he so reluctant to give members of the House and the people of Canada that information? Why does he make this short little spavined excuse of a speech when he introduced this bill, neglecting even to tell us how much is left of the old $2.9 billion that he had a few short weeks ago?

This spendthrift minister, this spender—he and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) are helpless in the hands of his colleagues. But before this bill passes the House we want to know how much of the unused borrowing authority is left of the $2.9 billion the minister says he had on April 1. This is being rapidly used up, he says. You are darned right it's being rapidly used up because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is a man who says he does not worry about the deficit. So it is certainly being used up rapidly. But we would like to know how rapidly. We ask the minister to let us in on the secret. After all, he is asking for $12 billion.

In addition, the minister neglects to tell the House that he has borrowing authority for every billion dollars he repays in debt coming due. For every $100 million in Canada Savings Bonds people want to redeem, the minister has the right to borrow another $100 million. Or another billion dollars. So how much unused authority does he have in those directions—or is that included in the $2.9 billion? The minister is a silent minister. He reminds me of something people used to have in their homes at one time—the silent butler. This is the silent minister, the Sysco Kid. He is in a constant soft-shoe dance. He is a soft-shoe dancer without parallel in the world. Never have we seen such an example of soft-shoe dancing as this minister tiptoeing through the question period. And now he wants authority to borrow $12 billion to help the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) who has a $3.1 billion oil import compensation bill to meet—

An hon. Member: At a minimum.

Mr. Crosbie: —at a minimum. Or is it $4 billion, or is it $5 billion? And the House is being asked to authorize $12 billion for this profligate minister, this silent minister, this demure minister, this shy minister, this reluctant minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Tell us how much of that is for the oil import compensation program. Perhaps the people of Canada are interested. Perhaps they are not. I don't know. This is the minister who refuses to have the House of Commons finance committee look into the question of the interest rates. The same group of people who last fall were so anxious to examine interest rates no longer want Parliament to look into the interest rate question at all. Has the minister had a quick change in his thinking?

An hon. Member: You just don't show up, John!

Mr. Crosbie: I am getting ready for the business of the House here. Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard the carrion crow? We are certainly hearing a lot of crowing and cawing tonight. Just listen. The House of Commons opened on April 14, 43 days ago. This government took office on March 3, 85 days ago—it seems like 85 years—and there has not been a single initiative in the financial area or the economic area to help the people of Canada in all that time, not one, except for the bill which went through the House tonight, the one the Liberals and the NDP filibustered to stop it going through, the $35 additional assistance to old age pensioners. It was filibustered by the Liberal and NDP members.

Mr. Speaker, there have been only two issues in which this government has been interested—Quebec and patronage. This is all they have had on their minds in those 85 days. Only two issues have they faced—the Quebec separatist issue and patronage, and we don't know which comes first. Both are very much on their minds. This is a guano government which believes in fouling its own nest. That is what it is doing. I asked a question in the House yesterday. I asked how much of this money is going to be used in connection with the refusal of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to put the water transport assistance directorate down in St. John's, Newfoundland, where it was promised it would go on February 16, 1979. How much is being spent on that, and the counteraction of that move, if it is to be counteracted?

How much of the money borrowed will be spent on the Port Hope finagle, the movement of the uranium refinery from Port Hope to Northern Ontario? How much will be spent on stopping the move of the regional forestry office from Cornwall to Peterborough? How much is to go to Charlottetown in additional expenses caused by the interference of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in the location of the site of the DVA building down in Charlottetown? A shameful record of patronage.

Mr. Speaker, one out of every four of the tax dollars paid by the Canadian people this year will go toward payment of interest as a result of the honourable spendthrifts opposite, with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Sysco Kid, leading the ranks. How much of this borrowed money will go to the Sysco plant? When will the minister follow up on his commitment to the Sysco plant down in Cape Breton?

Our position is this: five months ago, practically six months ago, our government was defeated because of the budget which I presented to the House.

An hon. Member: The people didn't want you any more!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Honourable howling monkeys opposite. They are either monkeys or donkeys. Even with the majority they have, they are afraid to listen in case I might induce some of them to cross the floor. Almost six months ago, hon. gentlemen opposite defeated the budget we put forward outlining our plans for dealing with the economic problems facing the country. Why are they now so reluctant, having defeated our proposals, to come forward with their own? They were so ready to defeat us on December 13 that they called members in from the hospitals with their ruptures, their hernias, and everything else. They risked the lives of those people to defeat the government. They are afraid, now, to bring in a budget of their own. When do they propose to tell the people how they intend to deal with the problems facing the economy?

What about the 6,000 miners up in Labrador city and Wabush who have just been advised they will be laid off in the month of July because of the reduction in iron ore sales to the United States, the immediate effects upon Canada of the U.S. recession? Why doesn't the minister bring in a budget telling us what he intends to do, or not do, about this recession?

May I call it ten o'clock, Monsieur Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SPORTS—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FROM LOTTERIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, my question on the late show this evening has to do with two questions, really. One was posed on May 1, as reported at page 600 of Hansard, by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) to the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, and the other was my question on May 26 of this year as reported at page 1392 of Hansard. I believe the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), or whatever his title is, is just not quite sure of what is going on in the lottery field. In view of the new face on federalism the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is now trying to portray to Canada, I am sure the Prime Minister would like his ministers to recognize that such jurisdictional questions as resource taxation, offshore mineral rights, federal spending power, federal trade and commerce power, communications and lotteries are as important and valid as patriation of the constitution.

How can the Prime Minister allow a minister—a former premier—to break an agreement with the provinces which was duly signed by the federal and provincial ministers, his conterparts, and scrutinized under the guidance of the Privy Council Office and by the Department of Justice? How can he expect any provincial government to believe him in the future?

An hon. Member: That is what you did.

Mr. Paproski: The provincial governments have now accumulated $170,000 in interest, and I doubt whether the federal government will ever receive that money. I realize that the former premier does not think the amount is much. After all, his salary and perhaps a few additional trust funds make that look like peanuts.

An hon. Member: Come on, that is not like you, Steve.

Mr. Paproski: However, Your Honour, athletes, ballets, symphonies, the Stratford Theatre and small theatres can use that money, and they can use it right now. The agreement was made by the ten provinces. The cheque was paid one day ahead of time. It was due on March 31. It was accepted by the executive assistant of the Minister of Labour, sent back on April 14, and the cheque was approximately $6,150,000. The next cheque will be due on June 30. I wonder whether that will be sent back.

I want just to bring this House up to date on the agreement because I think this minister is really not aware of what has happened. I do not like to talk about former ministers who are not in the House any more. My predecessor was a good minister; nevertheless, she did not have an agreement, and I would just like to express this to the House.

On January 14, 1980, as minister of state for fitness and amateur sport I announced that the cabinet had approved the equal splitting of lottery revenues for arts and culture and fitness and amateur sport by endorsing the terms of the recent federal-provincial agreement on the transfer of Loto Canada to the provinces.

The cabinet had agreed that the $24 million guaranteed annually from the provinces, and indexed from 1979 to the cost of living, would be shared equally, with $12 million being directed to amateur sport, fitness and physical recreation programs, and $12 million to arts and culture programs.

The $24 million annual Loto revenues would have been over and above the funds voted by Parliament, that is, incremental to the budget.

I was most pleased to provide Canadians with an example of the practical benefits which do result from a co-operative approach to federal-provincial relations. The provinces had gained new funding. The public would have seen less of its lottery dollar eaten away by duplicate advertising and administrative costs, and the federal government had a source of revenue totally secure against both inflation and government spending cuts to devote to the cultural and physical well being of our citizens.

By dedicating the funds to these two areas the federal government was demonstrating its commitment and increased support to two very important areas. During the previous four years Loto Canada had only provided an average of $2.5 million per year to fitness and amateur sport.

I would like to read the agreement. This was sent to all ministers, but perhaps the minister does not have a copy of it, so I should put it into Hansard.

● (2205)

My Dear Minister:

On behalf of the Government of Canada, we are pleased to confirm the agreement reached at the August 21 meeting in Ottawa, the principal terms of which are as follows:

(1) The Government of Canada, through its agent Loto Canada Inc., will withdraw from the sale of lottery tickets, effective December 31, 1979.

(2) The Government of Canada will cause Loto Canada Inc. to be wound up after December 31, 1979, under the Canada Business Corporations Act, as quickly as legal, financial and administrative requirements permit.

(3) On and after January 1, 1980, the provinces will jointly remit annually to the Government of Canada the sum of $24 million payable in quarterly instalments of $6 million and adjustments, commencing April 1, 1980. The provinces shall agree—

I should like to emphasize that this was in 1979 dollars connected with the CPI. It continues:

—among themselves as to the proportion to be paid by each province.

Each quarterly instalment shall be adjusted as to reflect the effects of inflation, utilizing the consumer price index as the standard of measurement and 1979 as the base year.

This was signed by the then minister of state for fitness and amateur sport, the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski); the Hon. David MacDonald who was then secretary of state; the then minister of state for federal-provincial relations, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis). Also it was signed by ministers for the provinces of Alberta, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, Quebec, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland. It was completely signed, sealed and delivered.

It continues:

In view of the fact that this agreement is expected to result in increased earnings for provincial lotteries:

(a) the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec will assume responsibility for any Government of Canada share (estimated to be $13.5 million) of the costs relating to the expansion, upgrading and renovation of the NHL arenas—

That is what the previous minister did for professional sports arenas. Fine, we looked after that.

It continues:

(b) The province of Ontario agrees not to request financial assistance from the Government of Canada in respect of the Royal Ontario Museum.

We looked after that. Also Alberta looked after the Olds disaster fund for the fire in Olds.

It continues:

On or before October 1, 1979, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will each remit the sum of—

It was close to $2.6 million.

It continues:

—owed to Loto Canada Inc. under the Loto Select memorandum—

That was another problem the minister had.

It continues:

This agreement may only be terminated with the unanimous consent of the provinces and the Government of Canada.

It was signed, sealed, and delivered. I am sorry I do not have enough time to read the entire agreement, but that will give the minister a little bit of information about what was going on. It is unfortunate the minister is not here because I am sure he could have learned something this evening.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague opposite that the minister responsible for physical fitness and amateur sport indeed will hear what he had to say in the House tonight. I might mention that I am slightly disappointed in that the hon. member mentioned things which of course were extraneous to the matter before us. There are a few things I should like to point out.

First of all, there is some question as to the legal validity of the August, 1979, letter agreement between the provinces and the former Progressive Conservative government that led to the federal withdrawal from the lottery business. Parts of the letter agreement are vague and incomplete. It cannot be considered the necessary formal federal-provincial agreement in that an order in council concerning the matter was never even issued.

Furthermore, the decision to terminate the operations of Loto Canada was shortsighted in that it would significantly limit the federal government's ability to contribute financially toward fitness, amateur sports, arts and culture. Also, it would seriously curtail federal funding of major national events and programs in the culture and sports areas. The hon. member was so proud when he said that we were going to get $24 million a year. Let it be known that the net annual profits of Loto Canada were in the area of $76 million. This member opposite was the minister for sport at the time. He should know that the former Progressive Conservative government agreed to withdraw from the business in return for annual payments from the provinces of only $24 million.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Parent: Big deal. We are so willing to give away our money at the federal level where we can carry on national programs, and all for what? Is it so that we can bow again before the provinces?

• (2210)

At a meeting held in Calgary last Friday the organizing committee for the 1988 Winter Olympics formally requested that the federal government re-enter the lottery business to provide a source of revenue for financial assistance. I am surprised that the hon. member would not support such a request from his own home province. I think in fairness it must be said that the hon. member, the former minister, took his responsibilities very seriously as minister for physical fitness and amateur sport. I commend him for that and I would also ask him in fairness to consider all of the aspects of this particular agreement. I know that in some ways the decision reached by him and his government was detrimental to sports here in Canada.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES OF DEPARTMENT STORES AND OIL COMPANIES—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on May 22 the chartered banks announced they were reducing their prime lending rate to 13.75 per cent with accompanying drops in consumer lending rates, a trend which was welcomed by most people. The next day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the absence of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), whether the government would call in the executives of organizations such as Visa, Master Charge, the department stores and the major oil companies, Shell, Gulf and Esso, which had announced that in spite of the decrease in the interest rates they were increasing the annual interest rate they charged to their customers to 24 per cent a year. I characterized that kind of increase as a form of legalized loan sharking.

The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) replied to my question and gave assurance that the government expected that these rates would be reduced. He said:—

—the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is zealously watching over this matter, he is very much concerned about it, and he would certainly not fail to take steps to stop any possible abuse.

I asked a supplementary question in which I pointed out that spokesmen for Visa had indicated they made their decision to increase rates on the basis of a six-month period and had no intention of reducing those rates. I called on the government to take some pretty strong action. Again the Minister of State (Finance), made a very vague promise to do something which really amounted to nothing. He said:

Of course all companies, whether in the banking, petroleum or other industrial sectors, are being asked to join in the efforts of the government . . . to help the fight against inflation—

That does not give us much help when we are talking about a very serious matter. These are not local nickel and dime stores.

Let us look at the role these organizations play in our economy. Visa and Master Charge account for approximately $5 billion a year in merchandise and cash advances. Visa has 6.7 million card holders in Canada; Master Charge has 2.2 million credit card holders; Eaton's has 2.4 million credit card holders; Sears has two million credit card holders, and Imperial Oil has 1.5 million credit card holders. We are talking about a very substantial portion of the Canadian people.

It has been estimated that 40 per cent of Chargex customers pay their entire bill each month. That means 60 per cent do not. Those 60 per cent will be charged 24 per cent annual interest on the money which they owe Visa. Approximately 50 per cent of the customers of Master Charge pay their accounts every month. That means that 50 per cent of the 2.2 million Master Charge customers will be paying interest at the rate of 24 per cent per year.

I am not talking about small companies. I have not been able to get the financial statements of Master Charge and Visa because they are part of the bank operation and their profits are folded into the bank profits. I tried to get this information, but it is not available to Canadians because, like the statements of other Canadian businesses, it is kept secret from Canadian citizens.

However, I have had an opportunity to look at bank assets and profits. The assets of the Bank of Commerce increased in the six years beginning in 1973 from $16.1 billion to $45.9 billion in 1979. That is an increase in assets of 300 per cent over that period. If we look at the profits of other banks, we see the same picture. In 1973 the Toronto Dominion Bank had profits of $52.7 million, and by 1979 their profits had increased to $160.4 million. The Bank of Nova Scotia had profits in 1973 of $56.8 million and by 1979 they had gone up to $180.9 million. The profits of these banks in those six years increased by over 250 per cent.

The same can be said with regard to oil companies. For the first three months of 1980 as compared to the first three months of 1979 there was an increase in the profits, for example, of Shell by 93 per cent, of Imperial Oil by 70 per cent, of Texaco by 93 per cent, and of Gulf by 72 per cent. Given those figures and the tremendous profits of these companies, it can be said that they are involved in a form of legalized robbery.

I call upon the government to take action to stop this unconscionably large increase which Master Charge and Visa are proposing.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the last six weeks there has been a 4.5 percentage point decline in the general level of interest rates. This is a relevant point to make with regard to credit cards because what we see now is a situation where the individual consumer has a great many options in the market place apart from credit card borrowing. Consumers can now borrow from banks, trust companies and credit unions at rates which are now declining at a very substantial rate and in a very significant way.

With regard to credit cards, I think that it behooves this House to say that no individual in this society has been forced to take out a credit card or to borrow on that credit card, and that there are alternatives to borrowing on that credit card which are now, with the declining interest rates, becoming very reasonable, as opposed to what they were a few months ago, particularly with regard to the cost of credit card borrowing.

Indeed, 24 per cent is a very high rate, and I agree with the hon. member that any individual who has the option should not borrow at that rate. And individuals do have that option. If one is granted a credit card, one typically has a good credit rating. We would encourage, if one is looking for funds, that one not borrow from the credit card companies, but rather through the form of a consumer loan which can be obtained at a much lower rate and which is available to anyone who qualifies for a credit card.

It is also interesting to note that individuals who have credit cards can buy goods and services with them and take up to 50 or 60 days after they have made the transaction to pay. If they pay during that period they incur no credit charge whatsoever. They have had, effectively, 50 to 60 days free use of money.

An hon. Member: If they bought it in Mexico.

Mr. Evans: As a result, there is no interest paid whatsoever. Certainly if they go beyond that period, this government wants to ensure that the consumer knows clearly what the terms and conditions of that credit card are, and what the rates of interest going to be charged by that company are. If the consumer, knowing all the facts, decides to use the credit that is available through credit cards, then in those cases he or she knows what she or he is doing and can make that decision. The fact is that if you pay for your credit card within a period of 50 or 60 days, depending upon when you purchased and when your billing date is, no interest whatsoever is incurred.

Clearly, as the hon. member has pointed out, a great many individuals—40 per cent for Chargex and 50 per cent for Master Charge—are taking advantage of the cards and are using, effectively, the banks' money for a period of 45 to 60 days, paying no interest whatsoever.

I agree that beyond that period 24 per cent is a high rate that should not be paid by consumers if they have any alternatives whatsoever. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in the market place today there are consumer loans available from a great many institutions at much lower rates. We would encourage consumers to seek out those loans rather than using the credit card as a vehicle for financing their expenditures.

Adjournment Debate

TRANSPORT—STUDY OF "AT AND EAST" FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, my reason for asking for this late night debate arises from a question I asked of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on May 23, which will be found at page 1354 of Hansard. I asked the minister if he had any intention of referring the "At and east", or Atlantic and eastern, flour and feed subsidies to a committee or a committee of inquiry. The minister apparently was not aware of what my question meant. The point I should like to make is that it is a question that I would have asked the minister but I have been given unanimous consent when we were in Committee of the Whole and when he had his officials with him so that he would have then had the ability to answer this question.

The other reason I found it necessary to ask this question is that the minister answered the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in Committee of the Whole when the hon. member asked if he was going to refer the statutory rate for the movement of grain in western Canada, known commonly as the Crow rate, to a committee or a commission of inquiry. The minister said yes.

Unlike some other hon. members, I am pleased to see the parliamentary secretary to the minister present tonight because he is the only person who has given me an answer when I have sought information in this House, and I compliment him for that.

The Atlantic and eastern flour subsidies were set in November, 1960. The grain was to move at November, 1960, rates, and flour was to move at September, 1966, rates. This is western grain moving from eastern ports. It could move in relation to any of the railway points along Georgian Bay, along Lake Huron, along any waterways directly or indirectly connecting with Lake Huron, not being further east than Prescott, but including Prescott; in relation to flour it was any point in Canada east of the 90th degree of west longitude.

The ports are defined as the ports of Halifax, Saint John, West Saint John, any other points on the St. Lawrence River east of Montreal, including Montreal. This is for the movement of western grain to eastern ports. This is probably as important to the people of Ontario and east as it is to the people of western Canada.

If the minister says he is going to look at and study—and I am always concerned when people "look at and study" that they do it with something in mind—they are planning to study the Crow rate and I would think that is with something in mind. If the minister is going to look at one form of subsidy, I strongly recommend that he look at the other forms of subsidy.

• (2225)

Along with looking at the subsidy there is a question of the legality of Ontario grain moving at subsidized rates on the "At and east". This is done by shipping Ontario grain west and then bringing it back into the system and letting it continue on east at a subsidized rate. This rate on use of Ontario grain to be shipped east on a supposed program to complement western grain is increasing now to a point where it is almost one fifth, or 18 per cent, which I think is the exact amount last year, of the total grain moved at the "At and east" freight rate that actually came from Ontario. This is fine, but if we are going to have a subsidy, we should have a subsidy that covers Ontario grain. We should have it out in the open, up front, so that we all know whose grain is moving at what subsidy.

The concern that I have is that the minister is aware of some of the problems we will have. If he is going to consider the change, as he did on the Crow rate, we would suggest that he also consider looking at, although I am not recommending change, the "At and east" freight rates. I know that I will receive an answer from the parliamentary secretary that will probably set my mind at ease.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has already described most of the information that is pertinent to the "At and east" rates.

The "At and east" rates and the subsidy mechanism are defined in section 272 of the Railway Act. The subsidy applies to grain moving for export by rail from points along Georgian Bay and other points east to Prescott, and to flour moving for export from any point in Canada east of Thunder Bay.

The federal government pays the railways a subsidy to cover the difference between the frozen rate and a compensatory rate. The so-called "At and east" grain rates were initially introduced for the export of western grain by rail in carload lots from ports located along Georgian Bay, the lower lakes and the upper St. Lawrence to Montreal and maritime ports. Traditionally, these rates had been closely related to American rail rates for movement from Buffalo to ports on the Atlantic seaboard in order to offset the economic advantages of the U.S. route. The term "At and east" therefore initially referred to Canadian rates which would be comparable to Canadian rates on the movement at and east of Buffalo.

Since 1966, subsidies have been paid to the railways on the basis of the difference between the frozen rate level and a compensatory rate level determined periodically by the Canadian Transport Commission.

The "At and east" subsidy represents a considerable cost to the treasury. The repeal of section 272 of the Railway Act was incorporated in the anti-inflation omnibus bill but was removed because of the possible impact upon the Georgian Bay and maritime ports and elevators. The "At and east" subsidy payments in 1977 for grain and flour amounted to $27.4 million. In 1978 the subsidy on the same commodity amounted to $25.5 million. I personally respect the logic of the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) when he points out that if we are going to look at one, we should be looking at the other. But to date no decision has yet been reached either on a commission of inquiry for the Crow rate or a similar commission for the "At and east" rate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

It concerns the government party's announced plan to twin eastern MPs with Alberta ridings. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That east is east and west is west and never the twain shall mate, and that Senator Olson be applauded for his courage in proceeding with the formation of the Alberta chapter of the Gemini Lonely Grits Club.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

ASSISTANCE IN FIGHTING FOREST FIRES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Since the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has been quoted in the press as having confused Manitoba officials by stating that the provinces are liable for 100 per cent of the costs of military aid in firefighting, and considering that provinces are not charged for salaries of regular armed forces members employed in firefighting—nor are they charged for use and maintenance of equipment—and considering that charges made to the provinces for incremental costs are, in fact, a small percentage of the costs of the Department of National Defence to provide these services, and that this represents a much smaller cost to the provinces than such services provided by other sources, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins):

That the Leader of the New Democratic Party correct his statement regarding services supplied by the armed forces in order to eliminate the confusion he has caused and in order to give credit to the very excellent work of the Canadian Armed Forces in assisting the provinces and Canadian citizens threatened by forest fires.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CONVENING OF JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Thirty-second Parliament has now been in session for some 44 days, and as yet there has been absolutely no move to organize the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In view of the fact that there are important questions of immediate national urgency facing our country, involving the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, among others, and there has been no action by the government to constitute this important committee, I have made arrangements, in connection with the appropriate House officials, for a committee room and time to assemble interested members of Parliament to constitute and organize this committee. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

● (1410)

That this House directs that the organizational meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be held at 8 p.m. on Thursday, the 29th day of May, 1980, at room 306, West Block.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

DAMAGE CAUSED BY FOREST FIRES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that forest fires are raging throughout parts of several provinces, especially Ontario, Quebec and the prairies, and that some of these are still out of control, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the Minister of the Environment conduct immediately an assessment of the damages inflicted by those fires on Canada's over-all environment, including Canada's inventory of accessible forest stocks, and that he table the results of such an assessment without any delay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ABORTIONS

REQUEST CRIMINAL CODE BE AMENDED TO CONFORM WITH BILL OF RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, to present an urgent and pressing matter.

Whereas the Canadian Bill of Rights guarantees the rights of individuals to life, and whereas an unborn child is an individual, and whereas thousands of unborn individuals are denied the right to life because of our abortion laws, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House urge the government to bring in legislation to amend the Criminal Code in regard to abortions, to conform with the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEMONSTRATION ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) did not appear in front of the Parliament buildings today to receive the presentation of the public employees of this country in their protest of the meagre 5 per cent raise they have been offered, as opposed to the first-class air travel offered to members of Parliament, which they do not want, the 7 per cent raise that is given in the first year to members of Parliament, and the fact that we had a 9.1 per cent increase in the cost of living last year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House suspend its regular duties momentarily to have the House accept the presentation in the form of a wooden nickel that we would like to present at this time to the President of the Treasury Board.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RENEWED FEDERALISM

STUDENT PARTICIPATION IN CAUSE OF NATIONAL UNITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact Quebec's referendum resulted in strong support for Canadian unity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House acknowledge the message received from the students of the history club of Notre Dame College, in Wilcox, Saskatchewan, who are deeply conscious of the strong attachment of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec to their culture and their determination to work for a renewed federal-

ism. I would like to pledge their good will to work toward understanding the Quebec viewpoint and thus facilitate a frank dialogue toward a more prosperous, equitable and serene federalism which will result in a stronger Canada.

POST OFFICE

FUTURE OF POST OFFICE IN FREETOWN, P.E.I.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there is widespread fear among the residents of Freetown, P.E.I., that the Freetown post office may be closed, and in view of the fact that almost 100 per cent of the boxholders using that post office have signed a petition against the closing, which has been sent to the Postmaster General, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

● (1415)

That this House instruct the Postmaster General to immediately make known to this House, as well as the residents of Freetown, his plans for the Freetown post office, so that he can honour his commitment made in this House on April 17, 1980, that being that he would consult with the elected representatives of the Parliament before any reductions in postal service would be made.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ALBERTA—COMMENT OF MINISTER OF ENERGY ON SOVEREIGNTY-ASSOCIATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who I am sure shares my satisfaction at the positive attitude taken by governments across the country to the prospect of co-operating to reform the constitution. The Prime Minister knows the importance of nurturing that good will if we are, in fact, to achieve that kind of reform.

My question concerns the action of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who yesterday, in a prepared speech, suggested that the motives of the government of Alberta were " to get economic sovereignty with political association".

I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell the House whether the Minister of Energy was speaking for the federal government when he attributed a motive of sovereignty-association to the government of Alberta?

Mr. Nielsen: What did you say, Marc?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we must maintain the spirit of Canadianism which has emerged in the past weeks. I have to admit that I have not read the speech that he refers to, although it is my custom to attempt to do so in advance. I have not had the occasion to do so at this time. However, I am informed by the minister that he mentioned no province in his speech.

Mr. Crosbie: Watch your nose, Pinocchio.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, let me direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He will recall, having read the speech last night—a deliberately prepared speech—that the great bulk of the references prior to that particular paragraph were to the province of Alberta. If the minister was not referring to the province of Alberta, will he stand in his place and assure the House that he does not accuse that government of those motives; and will he tell the House of Commons to whom he was referring?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must point out that the Leader of the Opposition, in his question, misquoted what I said by saying it applied to the government of Alberta. The paragraph in question reads as follows:

We just came out of a referendum in which we fought hard for a united Canada. We defeated those who wanted political sovereignty with economic association. We did not carry out this difficult battle to get economic sovereignty with political association.

That is the end of the paragraph.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That is the sum total of the paragraph, Madam Speaker, and if the Leader of the Opposition thinks that the hat fits the government of Alberta, that is his judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, whose reputation and capacity for reconciliation is unparalleled in the land, will know that the immediately preceding seven, eight or nine paragraphs in that speech referred specifically to the province of Alberta. The conclusion was there to be drawn, and has been drawn by commentators and no doubt by the government of Alberta.

But the minister can clear it up. He can stand in his place now and make a categorical statement that he does not accuse the government of Alberta of those motives, and he can tell us to whom he did direct those comments, to whom he was referring when he made that statement from a prepared text yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition referred to the immediately preceding paragraph.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Try honesty.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth.

Mr. Lalonde: Calm down:

Economically, looking ahead, Canadians have every reason for optimism.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde:

We have barely begun to tap oil and gas in our Arctic and offshore territories. If we can survive politically, we can, in not too many years, be the strongest democracy in the world. And we can survive if we realize that our fortune and our freedoms hinge on our interdependence.

That is the preceding paragraph.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The following paragraph, which I quoted in this House just now, applies to any and all provincial governments to whom it may fit. It applies also to the whole of our country.

● (1420)

As I said, we fought hard in the province of Quebec in particular to ensure that the solutions to the problems in this country would be within the federal system. I think we should fight just as hard against all those who are going around and saying that the federal government—

Some hon. Members: Who?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will now allow the minister to complete his answer.

Mr. Lalonde: I will finish by saying that the hat fits so many people on the other side, I will let them pass judgment.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will spare the House the tedium of reading earlier paragraphs, except perhaps initial sentences in them, those immediately preceding the ones cited by the minister.

The first one, "The Alberta government"; the next one, "The Alberta government"; next "But in fact, Alberta's conventional oil revenues"; and, "Alberta's industrial base." They are clear references to one province. Now the Minister of Energy has broadened his accusations not simply to deal with the province of Alberta to which he was referring in the prelude of this statement but to include members on this side of the House of Commons.

Will he tell the House of Commons who, specifically, he had in mind? Who is this enemy that he wants to have the Government of Canada take on? Who is the straw man? With whom is he seeking a conflict and a war as we enter a period that is designed to achieve agreement on constitutional reform? Who are the enemies here, in the minds of the Government of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The answer is very simple, Madam Speaker. Indeed, it applies to all those in this country, whoever they are, who think that this country can still go on as a federal country while turning the federal government into a mere agency of the provinces. We do not believe that this is the way of the future of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the interests of calm, I want to point out to him that that paragraph—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Jarvis: Really, Madam Speaker, I think this is a terribly crucial thing leading up to the June 9 conference. The minister will realize that if it is not Alberta, then Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Newfoundland could all interpret that speech, with every justification, as referring to them. If the minister does not intend that, surely in the interests of this forthcoming conference he will wish to take this opportunity to correct what one might suggest is a wrong assumption. I give him that opportunity at this moment. If he was not directing his remarks to Alberta, will he clarify that neither is he directing them to those other three provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am not going to add anything to what I said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: It is quite clear in my speech. I specifically said in my speech earlier that as far as the producing provinces are concerned, their viewpoint is understandable. The government of Alberta has argued it well and forcefully. What is not so well understood is the federal viewpoint. What I have stated is the perception of Canada as I see it and as I believe this side of the House sees it. That is what we are going to defend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, who not many days ago led this House in one of the most moving afternoons that we have ever spent, in my view. I give him full marks for it. But I am terribly distressed when I see the reaction of various provinces, particularly Alberta, because for some reason they thought those remarks were directed right at them, though I am equally concerned with the other provinces I have mentioned.

So would the Prime Minister please take this opportunity to indicate that the minister was maybe negotiating, by long distance, a new energy contract or something like that, and that it had nothing to do with constitutional discussion? In the interest of all of us, not in a partisan interest, would he please take this opportunity to correct what is obviously a very bad proposition advanced by his colleague?

● (1425)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I accept the plea put forward by the hon. member, and I want to tell him that as far as the government is concerned we will approach the meeting which has now been arranged for June 9 in the conciliatory spirit which was present in this House last week. But I would add, because of the previous questions and the debate which has taken place, that the minister was not speaking in a vacuum. We have heard premiers take some pretty strong positions.

Some hon. Members: Who?

Mr. Clark: Name them.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think members opposite are ignorant of what several premiers have defined in the past few weeks.

Mr. Clark: Which ones?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the one hand I have a member who is asking me to be conciliatory, and on the other I have the Leader of the Opposition who is asking me to name names. I will name one name for starters, and I apologize in advance to the premier for bringing him into the debate.

Premier Peckford was here on the evening the referendum votes were counted, and he defined federalism, the federal government, as an agency of the provinces. Now, this is not our view. I hope it is not the view of the opposition. I am not sure if it is the view of Mr. Peckford himself; perhaps it is a bargaining position. I am prepared to receive him with open arms in spite of his statement but I think he should realize that there are people on this side who do not accept his image of the federal government as being a mere agent of the provinces. That is what the minister is staking out as our position, and in that I support him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary. I can agree with the concern about Premier Peckford's speech with respect to the federal government being an agency, though I respect his right to say it. What concerns me is that the Prime Minister now seems to be associating himself with the sovereignty-association implications in the address given by the Minister of Energy last night. I hope I have misinterpreted him, but that was the nature of the Prime Minister's answer to me. The talk about the federal government being an agency is not sovereignty-association.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It must be a question, not argumentation about what has just been heard. Please ask a very brief question, because the hon. member is on his third question.

Mr. Jarvis: Without wishing to embarrass his colleague, will the Prime Minister make it clear that he dissociates himself from any idea of accusing any premier, of whatever province, of advocating sovereignty-association?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously not, because there was a referendum battle fought in Quebec precisely on that issue. But if the hon. member is talking about accusing any province of seeking economic sovereignty in political union, I think there have been signs in Canada of a tendency to downgrade the federal government and to give the provinces a type of overwhelming economic "say", which would be corrosive to the type of Canada we seek. I believe there are a lot of people in Canada who share this worry and who would only applaud—

An hon. Member: Do you?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I applaud the dichotomy made by the minister, in the sense that there can be dangerous tendencies not only toward political sovereignty of provinces but toward economic sovereignty of provinces, and I support him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEMONSTRATION ON PARLIAMENT HILL BY MEMBERS OF PSAC—NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Visitors to the Hill today from the Public Service Alliance of Canada were disappointed that the minister did not come out to receive a rather large token of their small esteem. By the way, that token is in my office and the minister can pick it up after the question period.

In view of the fact that the clerical and regulatory group of the PSAC have been without a contract since last November, and in view of the rather successful intervention of the Postmaster General in the postal workers' dispute, would the President of the Treasury Board please intervene personally in the negotiations which are going on with the clerical component, and make sure that the offer is more than the paltry 5 per cent being offered at the present time?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, some time before the demonstration to which the hon. member has made reference, I instructed my department to attempt to bring the parties back to the bargaining table in a meaningful way in order to arrive at a just and fair settlement.

I should point out to the House that the 5 per cent offer to which the hon. member refers was made in January of this year, so one might regard it as a rather "conservative" offer.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, since the offer was "conservative", I presume the Liberals are offering nothing. Can the minister assure this House and the workers involved in the clerical component that the government will not try to institute a clause—which it has in quite a few public service agreements—which will discriminate against people who will quit the public service prior to the date of the signing of the contract? Will the government assure the people that it will not try to insert this type of clause and, therefore, deny a large number of people the pay raise they should have received if negotiations had gone on at a reasonable pace?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I take notice of the hon. member's representation. I would like to point out that the reason for the pace has not been the fault of my department or the government. As I say, we hope to bring this matter to a rapid, fair and equitable conclusion.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I am glad the minister is taking notice. Since he has already agreed that the last offer was made by the previous government, he must have some responsibility for the lack of progress.

In light of the Canadian Human Rights Commission ruling yesterday that the government is discriminating against at least 3,000 public servants, most of whom are women, since the discrimination exists in violation of the equal pay for work of equal value clause, and in view of the fact that a large number of the members of the clerical and regulatory component are women, is the minister now willing to accept the ruling of the Human Rights Commission and reimburse workers who are denied equal pay for work of equal value?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to be confusing a number of issues. I have already spoken with regard to the general services group and the particular case in point, and I have indicated in this House that the Treasury Board will be discussing with the Human Rights Commission a means of making a proper and fair settlement of that particular complaint.

TREASURY BOARD

LIST OF PROJECTS WITH COST OVERRUNS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the President of the Treasury Board who, the House will recall, two weeks ago yesterday, filed with the Committee of the Whole House a list of 497 current projects which the minister had found with potential cost overruns of $1.062 billion which, linked to the $1 billion in overruns revealed by the Treasury Board last January, means that bureaucratic bungling and mismanagement may cost the average worker in this country over $200.

Would the President of the Treasury Board now indicate to the House why, in making his filing over two weeks ago, he failed to disclose $200 million of further overruns and yet represented that the entire $1.062 billion in overruns was included in his filing?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I take notice of the hon. member's representation. He put the question to me at the time. He recently occupied the post of president of the Treasury Board, so I presume he had this information at his fingertips, and I am surprised he did not make it available to me when I was answering his question in the House.

I used the information which I had available. I and my officials filed the information which was requested. I will look into the matter the hon. member has raised and report back to him.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, on the specific day to which I am referring, the President of the Treasury Board said he was reading a cost overrun memo which showed that there were 497 projects having a possible cost overrun of $1.062 billion. He offered to table that list in the House. He did subsequently table a list, but forgot $200 million of the overruns. I am now asking when we may expect that added filing to be made, and why did the minister mislead the House?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I take great exception to any suggestion that I misled the House. I produced at the time a computer print-out which I believe was as of December 31, 1979. That is by memory, so I stand to be corrected on that point. The information was made available, I think the hon. member would agree, in a most expedient manner within literally minutes, if not an hour, after he requested the information.

The hon. member has raised a question with respect to other cost overruns, which I have undertaken to look into. But I reject any suggestion that there was the slightest attempt to mislead this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PARKS CANADA

DECISION TO CANCEL CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH MOVE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. It stems from a recent decision to cancel the Parks Canada move from Cornwall to Peterborough and from a statement made by the President of the Treasury Board in this House on May 13, at which time he reported, and I quote:

—one of the reasons Treasury Board supported leaving Parks Canada in Cornwall is that it is cheaper. It will cost the taxpayers less money to leave Parks Canada in Cornwall than to continue with the move to Peterborough—

I would like to advise the minister that he was in receipt, two weeks prior to that, of a Treasury Board statement. With that knowledge of its costing $1,130,000 to move the employees back to Cornwall from Peterborough, and only $900,000 to move them there in the first place, can the minister answer as to why he figures that that extra cost of $230,000 is cheaper to move them back to Cornwall than to leave them in Peterborough?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I apologize that I do not have that information with me at this time, but I recall very well the exchange of questions and answers and my response to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who formerly had responsibility for Parks Canada, and I made the point very clearly that I was comparing the direct cost of the move from Cornwall to Peterborough with the costs associated with the cancellation of that move.

I made that very clear in my response to the hon. member for Vancouver South, because I had thought that the answer this hon. gentleman read from Hansard might very well have suggested that I was taking into account all the costs. So I made that point clear at the time. I still stand by that statement because I verified, upon returning to my office, that that was correct. There are other costs which may be involved over the long term which have nothing to do with the cost of cancelling that move, but I would be very happy to furnish the hon. member with that information.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, the difference I pointed out to the President of the Treasury Board was the difference in the cost of moving the employees either up or back. However, my supplementary question is to the Minister of the Environment, because it appears obvious that the Treasury Board has very little regard for the dollars as it allocates them at the request of ministers.

In light of a mass grievance by the employees of Parks Canada to the National Joint Council, a copy of which was sent to the minister, and in view of the submission to the Treasury Board by the Ministry of the Environment on April 30 confirming that 115 of the 145 employees had signed agreeing to go to Peterborough—which is 79 per cent in favour—would the minister now, in the interest of controlling government waste and excessive cost overruns, agree to reconsider this cancellation, or is the minister supporting this cancellation against the will of the majority of the civil servants in Cornwall?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): No, Madam Speaker, I have no intention of reconsidering a decision which is taken.

I think the hon. member is confusing two things. One is the willingness of civil servants. An hon. member opposite says the hon. member may have confused much more than one or two things, but I think he is confusing, in this instance, two things. One is the willingness of the employees of Parks Canada, as loyal employees, to move. Many of them are ready to accommodate the decisions which are taken within the administration.

● (1440)

There is a great difference between willingness to move and desire to move. While it is quite true that many of the employees of Parks Canada were willing to make that change to Peterborough, it was quite clear to me that by far the majority of them very strongly preferred to stay in Cornwall.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS—REBATES TO AMERICAN BUT NOT CANADIAN CUSTOMERS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I should like to ask if he is aware that Chrysler Corporation, General Motors, Ford Motor Company and American Motors have all provided purchase rebates to their American customers, and have failed to provide those same rebates within Canada.

Furthermore, the Chrysler Corporation has provided recall and repair services for American automobiles, and has failed to do this in Canada; instead, relying on a secret warranty program. Finally, the Chrysler Corporation has failed to acknowledge responsibility and rectify major defects in its automobiles in Canada.

Can the minister indicate if he is aware of these problems, and what moves or plans does he have available to obtain for Canadians the same benefits that those corporations provide to their American customers?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to tell the hon. member that I am very much aware of this issue. I discussed the problem with representatives from the Automobile Protection Association of Canada, and following that meeting, I wrote the presidents of Canadian companies to inform them of this situation and ask them for corrective measures. I am pleased to tell the House that I have already received replies from two companies, Chrysler and Ford. Chrysler Canada and Ford Canada answered in the affirmative, and from now on Canadian car owners will be offered the same benefits granted American car owners.

PARKS CANADA

DECISION TO CANCEL CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH MOVE—COSTS INVOLVED

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister said that the reason for the cancellation of the move was that it would cost less to keep Parks Canada in Cornwall than to proceed with the move to Peterborough.

Can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House why the submission to Treasury Board of the Ministry of the Environment, dated April 30, 1980, which set out the cancellation costs, makes no mention of the cost of completing the move versus the cancelling of the move? Would the President of the Treasury Board explain how he comes to the conclusion that it would cost less, when the document submitted by the Minister of the Environment makes no mention of the cost of continuing the move to Peterborough?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, first of all, I did not say that the only basis for supporting the submission was cost.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: One of the reasons that Treasury Board supported the move was that it costs less. That answer was read by the hon. member who was quoting from Hansard. I presume the hon. member would know that we at Treasury Board have the capacity to make our analysis, which is also done when such submissions are presented. That is one of the principal roles of Treasury Board.

Mr. Fraser: I take it from that, Madam Speaker, that the President of the Treasury Board had no submission at all from Parks Canada as to what it would cost to continue the move, as opposed to cancelling it.

May I ask the President of the Treasury Board—who does not seem to want to tell us exactly what cost figures he had—whether it is now Liberal government policy to allow the preference of a minority of personnel in a work group—and it is a minority, because 115 signed their willingness to go—to override the decision that would increase efficiency and save the taxpayer money?

Why did the President of the Treasury Board ignore the legitimate interests of the taxpayers of Canada by refusing to take into account the fact that the move would result in increased efficiency and a saving, on an annual basis, of well in excess of $200,000 from now on?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Tell them, Don.

An hon. Member: He looks lost.

Mr. Johnston: In response to the first part of the hon. member's question, Madam Speaker, I was not under the impression that he had asked me to furnish him with the respective costs.

Mr. Fraser: You said you would do it, but you have not done it.

An hon. Member: Will you do it?

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member says that I would give them to him. If I had said that, I will make sure they will be made available to him at an early date.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE TO AFFECTED PROVINCES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of Agriculture arising from a Canadian Press report out of Regina last weekend which quotes material provided for several cabinet ministers who made a political jaunt out there last weekend, including gimmicks such as MPs touring drought areas. I want to assure the House that that is not necessary. I can tell them now it is so dry out there that every time the wind blows, the dust is so thick that gophers are ten feet up in the air, digging.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question in two parts. First, can he confirm that the government has accepted the agreement in principle between respective deputy ministers of a 50-50 shared cost on drought assistance based on the 1977 program? Second, would he advise the House if the Government of Canada is prepared to accept requests from Saskatchewan to share the cost of, at least, transportation for screenings from Thunder Bay to the prairies, hay from Ontario to the prairies, and alfalfa pellets from Alberta and Saskatchewan being distributed to livestock producers in the three prairie provinces?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member is that wherever I was in western Canada from last Friday until late Monday evening, it rained.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I did not go to Manitoba. But even in the hon. member's area, in the city of Regina, it rained while I was there. I am sorry if it quit when I left.

I want to say that we are well aware of some of the things that have been written in the press, and we are well aware of some of the things that the provincial ministers have said. Our officials have made suggestions. They met in Ottawa yesterday and they are putting together a paper, or they have been putting it together late yesterday and today. It has not arrived on my desk as yet.

I have acted as I believe a good federal government should, and we will act in the same way in the future. But one thing I resent is provincial ministers making decisions for us to abide by. The idea is mutual co-operation and understanding on the terrible situation with which they are being faced at this time. They are incorrect on some of the actions to which they said we had committed ourselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, obviously the Minister of Agriculture must have travelled, in the west, on his knees, praying, but he missed Kenora 23 and a few other places where forests are burning.

I asked the minister to confirm whether or not the government accepts the agreement in principle by deputy ministers on cost-sharing, and he did not answer that. Nor did he say what the government's feelings were on the three additional items which the government of Saskatchewan is asking for.

May I proceed to ask him a question regarding a further request of the government of Saskatchewan to the Minister of Agriculture, namely, whether he will request the Canadian Wheat Board to stop moving non-board grains, that means feed grains, from the prairie provinces to eastern Canada until the drought threat is over?

• (1450)

Will he also advise what the stand of the federal government is on the other request of the government of Saskatchewan that the Canadian Wheat Board take control of all feed grain supplies so they can be managed and guaranteed for use, where necessary, at Wheat Board prices?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I am sorry if the hon. member misinterpreted my answer. We made even broader suggestions at those meetings in the way of instructions that I and other ministers concerned in western Canada gave regarding the drought, including possibilities of mass irrigation in those areas where there is water.

All of these have strong possibilities, as long as they are put into action before June 15 in order to produce forage, etc., in those areas where water is available. We know water is limited, but we know that we can increase the production of forage in eastern Canada for transportation to the west. We have acted in a responsible fashion in the past along the lines of all these suggestions, as we will again.

Having regard to what the hon. member has said about the Wheat Board, I had discussions with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board about this very matter more than two weeks ago. I understand he has in his hands now all the information concerning feed grains on the prairies at the source and where there is need. I am told that instructions have been issued that a proper banking of this information is to be made available, and that proper stocks be kept in Canada to meet the needs of domestic producers before any further exports take place.

Oral Questions

PARKS CANADA

LOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE—COSTS INVOLVED

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment and it is supplementary to those posed by my colleagues, the hon. member for Peterborough and the hon. member for Vancouver South.

On May 13, 1980, the minister stated in this House that the government had cancelled the relocation of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough because—he said—of the morale of the staff involved. How does the minister reconcile the statement he made on that occasion in this House, as the rationale for that extravagant cancellation decision, with his own statement in a confidential Treasury Board document that I happen to have, addressed to the Treasury Board from the minister which says the department is prepared to contemplate very costly legal suits from the staff involved "for personal suffering, career prejudice, and mental anguish, stemming from the cancellation of the relocation decision."

How does he reconcile the two statements, the rationale he gave in this House and his own statement in a confidential Treasury Board document?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief in attempting to explain what I think is a relatively simple process. I am not going to discuss, nor would the House expect me to, the contents of cabinet documents. I will, however, reiterate for the hon. member the basis, clearly, on which decisions were taken.

As I said earlier in the House, it is my conviction, after conversations with the people involved and after communication in a confidential manner from virtually all the people affected, that by far the vast majority of the people working for Parks Canada at that regional office had a strong desire to stay in the Cornwall area. Just as clearly—as I have said to the House, I think, on several occasions—there are those who would have preferred to move to Peterborough. There was no way, in taking that decision, that we could satisfy all the aspirations of all of the individuals who were concerned in it.

Therefore, while I believe we have met the interests, the desires and the needs of by far the majority of Parks Canada employees, there were those who had made previous commitments to move to Peterborough and who will be financially and otherwise damaged by the decision we took. Those people—not the majority, I believe, but a minority—who had interests at stake could, quite clearly, have taken legal action as a recourse for the damage which had been done to them. I believe it was, therefore, incumbent upon us, as a government, to ensure that those who were damaged—and, I repeat, a minority—by the decision to have their interests fully compensated.

I think that is as clear as I can make the explanation for any possible divergence members on the opposite side might see in whatever document they may, or may not, have at their disposal and the decision I announced.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, since the Minister for the Environment is unable to satisfy this House, may I pose a question to the President of the Treasury Board?

The proposal to the Treasury Board from the Department of the Environment which would compensate the Parks Canada employees involved covers every conceivable cost associated with the cancellation of the move. It covers everything from mortgages, to home furnishings, to lost income of spouses, and all the rest. In some cases it involves lump sum settlements of $10,000 to $30,000 per employee.

Will the same type of generous compensation from taxpayers across the country be paid to the province of Prince Edward Island, for example, for the substantial damages to it surrounding the cancellation or at least the change of site in Charlottetown of the Department of Veterans Affairs from the waterfront to uptown, against the interests of the province of Prince Edward Island, in spite of a binding legal agreement and without any consultation with the province involved?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, surely it is apparent that this government has always been, and will always be, fair in its treatment of people who are in any way prejudiced by government action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TREASURY BOARD

COST OVERRUNS OF PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. I guess the people who watched the "late show" on television realize how difficult it is for the opposition to get satisfactory answers because of claims of not having the statistics in front of them.

Last fall, the Conservative government set about establishing a special committee which would have allowed a much better examination of cost overruns. This is an extremely serious matter, costing taxpayers millions of dollars.

Will the minister set up such a special committee, now, to examine these cost overruns? This is a vital matter to the proper administration of government, and I suggest such action would tend to make the bureaucrats more accurate in future calculations of costs. Will the minister establish such a committee; and why does the minister want to hide these overruns in the public accounts committee?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am sorry, but I missed the last part of the question. Could I just have the last part of it?

Mr. Gilchrist: Yes, Madam Speaker. I asked why the minister would want to hide these overruns in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Johnston: I find that question quite extraordinary, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who is a member of the party opposite, is chairman of the public accounts committee and I can think of no reason why he would be interested in hiding cost overruns. It is the duty of the public accounts committee to look into cost overruns. I have previously answered that question fully in the House in response to questions by the hon. member for York-Peel.

If it is the unanimous decision of this House that the public accounts committee is so overworked that it is incapable of looking at these areas of cost overruns, then indeed I would consider the establishment of a committee to do so. They are being actively considered within my own department and all the information in respect thereto, if it has not been made available, will be made available to this House. I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that I have confidence in the chairman of the public accounts committee even if the hon. member opposite does not.

Mr. Gilchrist: Madam Speaker, as a former chairman of the public accounts committee I am sure the minister would know how overworked that committee is in discussing these specifics. I wonder whether he will appear before that committee and go very carefully into these cost overruns which are so expensive? Will he allow a full review of the cost overruns in that committee, and will he attend and explain them?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, not only will I allow a full review, but I would be delighted to conduct such a full review either before the public accounts committee or in any other forum.

EXCESSIVE COST OVERRUNS—REASON THEREFOR

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday, in appearing before the public accounts committee, the Comptroller General, Mr. Rogers, indicated that direct action against key management personnel would be contemplated to cope with the problem of cost overruns in government departments. But the Comptroller General also felt that overruns to date are not yet serious enough to warrant direct action such as firing, censure or demotion, against key personnel.

How does this square with the fact that substantial cost overruns are projected for programs currently in progress, overruns sometimes in excess of 100 per cent which are obviously the result of incompetence, mismanagement and bungling at senior levels of the bureaucracy? My question to the President of the Treasury Board is simply this: At what level of overrun, and under what circumstances, will such direct action be warranted? When will the managers be held accountable for these inexcusable overruns?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member probably knows, if he has been attending meetings of the public accounts committee, that we do have policies which cover major Crown corporation projects and which make specific individuals accountable. I do not think it is fair to say that all the cost overruns to which he refers arise from bungling, mismanagement or incompetence.

We know very well that a substantial number of cost overruns arise by virtue of the fact that the contracts were originally quoted upon in constant dollars. Also, there are sometimes foreign exchange fluctuations, as in the case of the Aurora contract and the long-range patrol aircraft contract. These matters, obviously, result in additional costs due to inflation and cost overruns, but I really do not think it is fair to blame the overruns on bungling or incompetence in terms of administering those particular contracts.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, in the breakdown tabled a week or two ago in this House, the President of the Treasury Board presented data which, I assumed, normalized out all those factors to which he has referred—the question of constant dollars, and the like.

I would like to follow up on a question raised by the hon. member for York-Peel with regard to the $200 million discrepancy, and ask why it is that certain projects in certain departments are not even reported in the sheets which are presented to members of this House.

In particular, why does the prepared list presented not include small craft harbours' projects in the amount of some $25 million each year within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? Are these projects running in arrears; otherwise, why were they deleted? What is the government trying to hide, if anything? Is it bureaucratic interference, or political interference?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, as I recall, the list which I tabled—and I stand subject to correction—was prepared during the tenure in office of my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel. If something was deleted or hidden, I suggest that the hon. member direct his question to his colleague.

Mr. Stevens: You didn't give us all of it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BOSLEY—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, earlier this afternoon a motion under Standing Order 43 was put by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni). As I understand it, the hon. member is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. There are some traditions in this House with regard to the rights and duties of parliamentary secretaries. I suggest that my question of privilege is a complicated matter, and I would like the right to pursue the matter through the blues and to check the record. I reserve my right to raise this matter at another appropriate time in this House, and I would appreciate your consent to that, Madam Speaker.

MR. BENJAMIN—LEASING OF EQUIPMENT TO FIGHT FIRES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to a statement made in the motion moved by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) under Standing Order 43 this day, in which she said "nor are they charged for use and maintenance of equipment". I was in telephone conversation within the past hour with the department of northern Saskatchewan which assured me that the Department of National Defence is being very co-operative and that they were grateful for that.

The Department of National Defence is leasing equipment to the government of Saskatchewan to fight fires and are, by the way, charging lease fees which are less than the commercial rates. But they are, in fact, charging lease fees for the use of DND equipment in fighting fires on other than Indian reserves, in which case the Government of Canada pays 100 per cent of the cost.

I would like to suggest that the hon. member was in error in her motion. I am sure that either the hon. member or the minister would like to correct the record in that regard.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I shall not take too much time to tell the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) that the matter he raised is not a question of privilege. The statement by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) was the subject of a motion under Standing Order 43. I think that what he said: "Ottawa's help needed" was certainly confusing. Madam Speaker, we must appreciate the effort that is being made by the Canadian armed forces in the four provinces that are stricken by forest fires, the equipment that is being loaned and the services that are given. It is customary to send a bill later for what is called incremental charges that are, I would say, only a very small part of the real costs to the armed forces.

So, Madam Speaker, I do not think there is a question of privilege. I can understand that the hon. member for Oshawa was misinformed, perhaps because of information he was given, but I can assure the House that what is called incremental charges are very small compared to the real costs and are less than half the amount suggested by the hon. member for Oshawa.

I think that the motion was simply to correct the newspaper reports and also the impression that may have been created that the armed forces are not doing all they can at the present time to help the people affected, as I said two days ago in the House. The forces are at the service of the population and I think that in urgent cases such as forest fires they are even more so.

Point of Order—Mr. Stevens

Madam Speaker: I hope the explanations given by the minister satisfy the hon. member. Should he not be satisfied, he can ask other questions at some other time in the House, but I think this is clearly not a question of privilege.

I can understand that the hon. member was not satisfied with the answer he received or else that he did not interpret it in the same way as the parliamentary secretary, but in any event this does not constitute a question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD ON COST OVERRUNS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my point of order relates to the apparent exception which the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) took to my statement that he misled the House with respect to the filing of certain documentation touching on overruns of approximately $1.062 billion on 497 projects.

The reason I feel it is fair to say that the House was misled can best be illustrated by reading from Hansard of May 15 at page 1103, where it is reported that the President of the Treasury Board stated:

—I am not in a position, nor would I take the time of the House, to furnish that list at this moment.

That is the list to which I just referred.

But I will provide such a list to the hon. member. I would like to point out that the $1.062 billion overrun figure which I cited was the total overrun for the 497 projects calculated back to the original budget.

Subsequently, during the Committee of the Whole proceedings, the President of the Treasury Board, as reported in Hansard at page 1129, rose to state:

—I have the report on the breakdown, as it were, of the projects on which the cost overruns that I referred to were incurred.

The President of the Treasury Board subsequently filed that report. Upon adding up the projects we found that they totalled only $820 million, not the $1.062 billion which the President of the Treasury Board had indicated. That, to me, is misleading the House. I would like the President of the Treasury Board to correct the error.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I do not have that information in front of me. My recollection is, though, and I thought that I had told the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) at the time, that in one instance we are looking at an overrun figure on specific projects. At the other end we are looking at a net overrun figure which takes into account savings which are incurred on other projects, which does happen.

● (1510)

In any event, I shall check the point and if there is any misunderstanding I will ensure that it is cleared up. My recollection is that that amount with respect to the projects is correct but that there were savings in respect of other projects which probably account for the difference.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I cannot hear the hon. member a second time on a point of order.

I must say that I have the distinct feeling that the two hon. members are engaged in a debate which started earlier on. Perhaps they could pursue it tomorrow at question period.

Is the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) rising on a new point of order?

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, it is a point of order relating to the question of privilege I raised.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I cannot hear that as I have already ruled on the question of privilege.

"ORGANIZATION AND METHODS OF THE RUSSIAN INTELLIGENCE SERVICE"

Question No. 6—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Prior to May 22, 1979, did any branch of the government distribute a pamphlet entitled "Organization and Methods of the Russian Intelligence Service" and, if so (a) how many copies were printed (b) what are the names of all persons who received it (c) who published it (d) on what date or dates was it distributed?

2. What are all reasons that the government, at the time of distribution, did not see fit to allow the Canadian people to have knowledge of the information contained in the document in the interest of (a) freedom of information (b) an informed public?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. It is not in the interests of Canada as a sovereign state or as a member of several defence alliances to reveal publicly any detailed information which might undermine its intelligence capabilities or the trust it enjoys within the alliances.

SECURITY SERVICES

Question No. 16—Mr. Cossitt:

What is a full list of all security services, committees, groups, etc., operated by the government, directly or indirectly, during the past five years including the dates involved, the number of personnel and the purpose in each case?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): It is not considered to be in the public interest to provide detailed information about security arrangements. To disclose such information concerning the ongoing work and structure of government security mechanisms which have existed in various forms for many years, and through the tenure of office of numerous governments, would serve those who seek to undermine our national security and political system.

FINGERPRINTING

Question No. 68—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Between January 1, 1972 and May 22, 1979, how many public servants were fingerprinted or were under instructions to be, or were designated to be, fingerprinted by the government?

2. How many were processed, or are being processed, or will be processed by (a) the Public Service Commission (b) the RCMP (c) any other government agency or anyone acting on behalf of the government and what are the names of such entities?

3. What are the names of the departments employing public servants who were fingerprinted and what was the total number for each department?

4. What are the reasons that justified this procedure, other than for those engaged in national security matters?

5. How many Public Service Commission offices were engaged in any way whatsoever with the fingerprinting of public servants and, in each case, what is the (a) address and location (b) Christian and surname of those in charge?

6. Is the government continuing any form of fingerprinting of public servants and, if so, what are all the details?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Several attempts, all unsuccessful, have already been made to find the necessary basic figures to answer this question. No policy instruction has ever been issued to government departments to register and account for every individual fingerprinting.

2. Figures on the number of employees or applicants having been processed, being processed or to be processed are not available for the reason stated in 1. Fingerprints may be taken for security clearance purposes by any department or agency of government which has a suitably trained technician. These fingerprints are submitted to the RCMP by the security officer of the department-agency concerned for a check against RCMP criminal records. A criminal record can only be identified correctly on the basis of comparison of fingerprints.

3. All departments-agencies have a number of officers and support staffs who have been fingerprinted for security clearance. For the reason stated in 1, it is not possible to compile a total figure with an acceptable degree of accuracy.

4. The only government-wide policy which requires the taking of fingerprints of employees-applicants is in connection with the security clearance investigation process as defined in CD 35 and authorized for application by regulation 26 of the Public Service Employment Act. Government departments and agencies which used the umbrella of CD 35 to take fingerprints in an administrative reliability screening context were informed by PCO on July 19, 1978, that this practice was inconsistent with the intent of CD 35 and that the RCMP would discontinue checking fingerprint records unless such records indicated clearly that the subject was an applicant for a classified position. The only department which has a fingerprinting policy is the Department of National Defence. The primary purpose of this policy is to ensure the correct identification of casualties. These same fingerprints, however, may be used for security clearance purposes, as required.

5. There are six Public Service Commission of Canada offices engaged in fingerprinting of public servants and prospective public servants:

(1) Mr. Samuel E. Mombourquette
Director, Halifax Regional Office
4th Floor, Royal Bank Building
4161 George Street
Halifax, Nova Scotia

(2) Mr. Hugh Hiscox
Director, Manitoba and Saskatchewan Regional Office
Room 500, Credit Foncier Building

Winnipeg, Manitoba

(3) Mr. Douglas P. Learoyd
Director, Alberta and the North Regional Office Room 300, Tower Mortgage
10355 Jasper Avenue
Edmonton, Alberta

(4) Mr. Claude Lacombe
Director, Quebec Regional Office
Suite 300, 685 Cathcart Street
Montreal, Quebec

(5) Mr. A. R. Slater
Director, Pacific Regional Office
Box 11120, Royal Centre
Room 313, Norwich House
1575 Georgia Street West
Vancouver, British Columbia

(6) Miss Patricia Kouri
Chief, General Services Section
Room 1581, West Tower
L'Esplanade Laurier
300 Laurier Avenue West
Ottawa, Ontario

6. Yes. See part 4.

MEDICARE PROGRAM

For the years 1970-75, what amounts were in dispute in the settlement of the transfer payments to the provinces under the medicare program?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

For the years 1970-75 no province disputed the federal calculation of the cost of insured services—within the meaning of the Medical Care Act—furnished under its medical care plan. However, in the settlement of the amounts transferred under the medical care program, three provinces disputed the estimated populations used to calculate the federal contribution to them for some of the years mentioned. These matters were resolved along with parallel issues under the hospital insurance program.

2. How much currency is estimated to be held by the chartered banks and other financial institutions?

3. What has been the percentage change in the amount of currency in circulation in the past year?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): 1. As at February 29, 1980, currency circulation outside banks comprised $8,225 million of Bank of Canada notes and $952 million of coin.

2. Chartered banks' holdings of notes and coins totalled $1,173 million as of February 29, 1980. Currency holdings of other financial institutions is not available but is included in (1) above.

3. The year-over-year growth rate in currency outside banks as of February 29, 1980, was 8.5 per cent.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. One hundred and forty-six beds—all priority use for veterans.

2. Six.

3. $40 per diem.

4. Yes—137—except for a co-insurance charge by the department of $10.50 per day per patient, the provincial government pays the cost of hospitalization.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—OPENING DURING THE WINTER MONTHS

Question No. 591—Mr. Cossitt:

2. Is the St. Lawrence Seaway losing money financially and, if so, what was the deficit in each of the past five years for which figures are available?

3. In what way can the capital expense be undertaken that would be involved in winterization?

4. Is the government giving any consideration to such a project as suggested by certain United States interests?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport)): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. Yes.

2.	1978/79	1977/78	1976/77	1975/76	1974/75

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1980-81

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-

81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, last night I started to speak on this bill and I have a few preliminary comments. I wanted to assure hon. gentlemen opposite that we have no intention of rushing this bill to authorize a $12 billion borrowing authority by the government through this House. We are going to be just as quick in rushing this bill through as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) becomes quick in answering questions about the economic and financial shape of this country.

An hon. Member: He is not even here.

Mr. Crosbie: If we go by his example since April 14, he is in slow motion. He is stuck in the bog. He is stuck in the tar sands somewhere because he has not answered a question yet.

Why are we not going to rush this bill through? It is because in his speech last night the minister gave us no information. He said that on April 1, 1980 he had $2.9 billion in borrowing authority left, but he did not deign to tell this House how much of the $2.9 billion is left today.

The minister is forgetting that I have a little black book—the book that was prepared for me when I brought in the borrowing authority bill last October 23. It contained all the information current to that date. I know that the minister has a little black book but he is not sharing the content of it with us. He wants to keep it secret. We have some questions which I am going to put on the record in a few minutes.

The Minister of Finance claims to be the genius who arranged for the defeat of our government on the non-confidence motion on December 13 on the budget that we brought down.

Mr. Breau: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The party that brought down our government on our budget which outlined the way we saw the economy needed to be handled for the next several years. Surely having done that, they accepted the responsibility to bring in their own budget outlining their own approach to the economic and financial problems of Canada as soon as they had the chance. They have been in power now 86 long days. It is like a sentence of 86 years. They have been in office since March 3 and not one new initiative in the economic or financial area have they taken.

The minister does not want to tell us about the budget or that he is going to bring down a budget. I will illustrate how he answers questions in just a moment.

The kind of thing that we and the people of Canada want to know was asked the other day in an article in The Globe and Mail written by Wayne Cheveldayoff, a very astute financial reporter. I have liked him very much since last January 1—in particular since then. I will quote from this article of May 26 as follows:

> The big policy question in Ottawa these days is what, if anything, the federal government will do about the recession.
> Ottawa could do three things:
> Leave things alone and let the Canadian economy dip downward with the U.S. economy—

One gets the impression from reading the financial statement of the Minister of Finance of April 21, I think it was, the bootlegged statement he made—his first speech in this House; his second was last night, a five-minute speech that as usual told us nothing—that that was the course he was going to take. He said in the course of those remarks that we could not do much in Canada, that we are in the hands of the United States and had to follow them no matter where they go. That is one course. He continued with his second course as follows:

> Try to prevent the recession from getting worse—
> As the Liberal government did in 1974-75.
> —by using the Keynesian techniques of tax cuts and government make-work projects—

That is another course the government could take except, of course, the government is already planning for a $14 billion deficit this year. The government has got itself in a straitjacket with the deficits it plans for this year and the deficits it has racked up for the last eight years. It is going to be difficult for them to do that. They used the Keynesian techniques during all the good years. Now that they have used them through the good years they do not have them available to use during the bad years.

We are already in a morass of deficits and this year's is the largest yet. So can they do that? Are they going to attempt that? Is it not about time the government told this country and the financial community, the workers, the employers, which one of these alternatives they are going to try to take?

The third point was as follows:

> Make the recession worse by following Britain's lead in tightening the money supply and cutting social programs to reduce the fiscal deficit.

That is another alternative. There are three alternatives. Later the author pointed out:

> In fact, Mr. Trudeau's public statements so far indicate that he will attempt to duplicate the 1974-75 experience.

I say he probably would. He has no understanding of economics. Some of his statements would make your hair curl if you were not so busy laughing. Here is one of his statements. Back on April 24 at a press conference the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the reason he wants to reduce the deficit is not to improve the health of the Canadian economy. He said it is healthy. The Prime Minister thinks the economy is healthy. Rather, he said, it is necessary to reduce the deficit because the interest charges on the deficit are so high due to high interest rates. The Prime Minister does not even see the connection between a higher deficit and more money that you have to pay in interest. That is the kind of rudimentary knowledge of economics that he demonstrates in this House.

In a February 14 campaign speech in Winnipeg the Prime Minister argued that the federal government should be doing the contrary to what the Conservatives planned in the December budget. When are they going to start doing the contrary, or to start doing anything in relation to economics and finances in this country?

The Minister of Finance said in response to a question that his policy and mine were the same. When is he going to clarify that statement? When is he going to give some leadership to this country as to where we are going? Is this the government that is going to do what the Prime Minister indicated during the campaign? I would say the odds are against it. He has not done a thing yet that he indicated during the campaign he would do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: These are some of the reasons why, before we approve a $12 billion and more borrowing by this government, we want to know what direction the government are going in and to what use they are going to put that money. Just what are they going to do? The Minister of Finance was reported as saying this on April 18. I have quoted this before in the House but it is so remarkable that I want to put it on the record again. In The Toronto Star for Friday, April 18—the Toronto black hole I call it—the Minister of Finance said:

● (1520)

—the lower rate was "welcome news", but it's worth pointing out that the high interest rates we have had and the very rapid increases in these rates recently have been a direct result of action taken in the United States.

This was the same minister who got up here yesterday, patted himself on the back and pretended that there was some virtue of his that has resulted in interest rates dropping precipitously in the last several weeks, when on April 18 he admitted that the high interest rates that we have had have been a direct result of action taken in the United States. And, of course, the lower interest rates now are the same direct result. They have nothing to do with this Minister of Finance who answered a question yesterday with smart alec answers. We do not want smart alec answers. The 4,000 or 5,000 people who are going to be unemployed in the iron ore mines of Labrador in July do not want smart alec answers from this minister. They do want answers, but this is a minister who will not even answer. As I said last night, he is the silent butler of the government. He is the soft-shoe dancer. He is the soft-shoe specialist extraordinaire pit-patting down through the halls of power without giving us any answers. That has got to change. We are not satisfied with his soft-shoe techniques any more, Mr. Speaker.

Here is an article written by Ronald Anderson in The Globe and Mail who points out the sharp drop in interest rates. He writes:

Interest rates are moving down only because of a pronounced falling off in the demand for loans, especially for business loans in the United States. This, in itself, is a clear sign that the recession has arrived, and confirms the evidence of such other indicators.

Mr. Anderson goes on to examine the situation in the United States. Then he gives opinions from various financial houses and says that the weight of evidence indicates unmistakably that the North American recession will be severe rather than merely average, and so on. This will have its direct effects in Canada.

What position is the Minister of Finance and the government going to take on that? Are they going to reverse themselves again and adopt the same policy as was laid out in our budget—that you have to start getting the deficits down and under control over the next four or five years? You have to give more room to the private sector. They have not encouraged the private sector to build and grow, expand and employ more people; but you do have to stop borrowing so gigantically in the financial markets and give the private sector room to grow so it can borrow, grow and create jobs.

Is he going to take that route even though he voted against it? That is quite possible because since the government has assumed power he has gone all kinds of routes that he voted against on December 13. Is he going to do that, or is he going to take the 1974-75 lessons, ignore them, and go the other way as the Prime Minister indicates? He cannot have it both ways. What is he going to do? He should not just come to this House and ask for $12 billion and refuse to tell us or give us any indication of what he is going to do.

Just to give you the flavour, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rae: That is exactly what you did in November.

Mr. Crosbie: I know that little voice from the NDP. He is so far away from power; he is right down the rat hole and he is not even going to be near power. We are dealing with the men here, not the boys. I do not want to be interrupted any more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: This caterwauling indicates why they are never going anywhere. They are going down the gopher holes out west in the next election.

Here is an indication of how the Minister of Finance treats this House. In Hansard on April 18, at page 160, the Minister of Finance was asked by me a question about the budget and oil pricing. This is what he said:

I will certainly bring in a budget as soon as possible, but I do not see that possibility within the near future, or even beyond the near future.

This is as clear an answer as we ever get from that minister. He is going to bring in a budget as soon as possible, but he does not see the possibility within the near future, or even beyond the near future. We do not know if he even sees. I doubt that he sees. He certainly does not speak.

Then we move on to May 5 and we can see how informative he is on that day. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) asked about financial assistance on wheat prices. Wheat prices are lower because of a decision made on embargoing grain shipments to the Soviet Union. This is the fulsome answer of the Minister of Finance at page 703 of Hansard:

Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to announce any immediate steps today but I shall take the hon. member's representation under consideration.

He is an expert at taking member's representations under consideration, and that is the last we ever hear from him. Has the hon. member for Prince Albert heard from him since?

An hon. Member: Not a word.

Mr. Crosbie: Not likely. Would the member for Prince Albert nod his head if he has heard from him? The hon. member is not nodding his head, so he has not heard from him since. The no nod NDP.

Now I will turn to Hansard for May 6, 1980, at page 742. This is why we are not rushing through $12 billion for somebody who cannot even speak or will not speak. The Minister of Finance was asked a question by the hon. member for St. John's West, who does not often get a chance in this House to ask. At page 741 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance was asked this:

—will the minister advise the House what steps the government is taking to increase real domestic output, manufacturing output, and employment in Canada this year, particularly in view of the forecasts—

That is for Ontario. Ontario is having a bad time economically. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are amazed to hear that, coming from Ottawa, but it is true.

The Deputy Prime Minister was then asked a supplementary question about the Canadian dollar. In answer to that question he said this at page 742:

My hon. friend knows that the Canadian dollar is reacting to market forces at the present time.

That the Canadian dollar is reacting was a real nugget. The final supplementary question reads as follows:

Is the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance satisfied with the present level of the value of the Canadian dollar, and is his policy to keep it at the present level of value or is he prepared to allow it to rise?

The answer to that question is as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Canadian dollar has fluctuated rather widely in the last two months.

Then I interjected with the following:

So have you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Then the Minister of Finance goes on to say:

The governor of the Bank has permitted that fluctuation to take place, and I believe that is a comment in itself to the hon. member.

That is a great answer, that the governor of the Bank of Canada has enabled it to take place, and that that is a comment itself. The Minister of State for Finance is here today listening with rapt attention, and I congratulate him for that because he is not going to get a chance to listen to his minister who does not say very much. But when we ask a serious question about the economic and financial future of this country, these are the kinds of answers we get from the Minister of Finance.

Again, on May 21, 1980—I am only giving a rapid selection because I do not have much time to speak today—in Hansard at page 1256, another question was put to the Minister of Finance. This time the question was raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) about a $1 billion saving the minister is going to get from the blended price system. The Minister of Finance replied in this way:

I can only tell the hon. member that the blended price system can achieve results, but the greater the increase in international prices, the greater the difficulty.

That is a fulsome answer when he is asked to explain how he can save $1 billion. In answer to a supplementary question about commitments made in his April 21 economic statement, the Minister of Finance said this:

With respect to the question as to what is now the precise burden of the oil import compensation program, I would be pleased to get those updated figures and make them available to the House and to the hon. member.

Has the Minister of Finance got those updated figures and made them available to the House and the hon. member? He has not. He answered the question here in the House that day and then he softshoes out of the House, down the halls, going down to get those prices which he forgot about and which we have never seen since. We turn the page to page 1259 and the Minister of Finance is asked by the member for St. John's West the following:

It was announced in Newfoundland yesterday that Wabush mine, which operates an iron ore mine in Labrador, has suffered a 15 per cent loss of sales of its product to the United States this year because of depression or recession in the United States, and as a result for one month—the month of July—all of its workers are going to be laid off or have to go on their holidays. What steps is the Minister taking to try to overcome such effects of the recession in the United States as are now becoming evident in Canada? What steps is he taking to overcome these effects?

I consider that to be a serious question, not just a light question, not just a little question to get up on your feet and exercise yourself getting up and down. There is going to be 1,500 people out of work. Since then we have the news of another 4,000 in Labrador city. Here is the answer given by the Minister of Finance to that question:

With respect to the workers affected by the lay-off, as the hon. member knows, they will be able to take advantage of programs especially in place at the present time.

And so on. He went on to say:

In connection with the recession that may be taking place and is undoubtedly beginning in the United States—

A great admission by this minister.

—the hon. member raises a question that is very broad indeed.

That is very informative. It tells the House that I have raised a question that is very broad. The minister continues:

As he knows, there are only, in a sense, two ways that one can act in circumstances of this kind; that is, through increased spending or through reduced taxes in order to stimulate the Canadian economy. I have not yet reached the conclusion that that is an appropriate stance to take at the present time.

● (1530)

Do you get that, Mr. Speaker? Pure and utter bafflegab; pure and utter vacuity; pure and utter lack of information. This is a government that has been in place 86 days, that ejected us from power and that used every pragmatic means—I will call it that because I am going to be statesmanlike this afternoon—to get back in power themselves. They disagreed with our budget. They thought it was shocking and frightening.

When the minister is asked 80 days after he got into government what he is going to do to meet the U.S. recession, he does not know. He tells us there are several options: we can increase spending or reduce taxes. We already knew that. Every simpleton in Canada knows you can increase taxes or reduce taxes or increase spending or reduce spending. We do not need a Minister of Finance to bafflegab and flap that past us in the House when we ask a question. He says he has not reached a conclusion which is appropriate at the present time. Well, we have not reached a conclusion as to whether $12 billion is appropriate for borrowing authority for this minister at the present time, not until he comes into this House and starts to tell the people of Canada and the members of this House what his economic and financial approach is going to be.

We want a budget and we want a firm date set for a budget. We know there is going to be an oil price war. We have seen the attitude of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) outside this House and repeated here today. He is looking for nothing but war and confrontation with the oil producing provinces and many of the people of this country. He gets up and says he has just won a successful battle against separatism in Quebec and now he has to fight another battle. He implies it is another battle against separatism, only this time in Alberta and with the oil producing provinces.

He is the man who is supposed to go out and negotiate for this government a successful conclusion to this whole oil price and energy price difficulty that we have had for the last year. We can see now what he plans to do. He plans to have war and confrontation with Alberta, hoping that he can rally the rest of the country around him on the ground that we need a strong central government to deal with the separatist threat in the west.

This man will put this country in peril just to try to achieve the carrying out of cheap political promises made last fall and winter to this country, and he knows he cannot carry them out any other way. He knows he can only carry them out if he unilaterally imposes new taxes on the oil and gas industry and takes the money from the producing provinces and the industry. This is the stage he is sitting. His tactic is beneath belief. It is unconscionable.

Mr. Paproski: Dishonest.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, it is a dishonest approach. How can anyone going out to really try and negotiate with a group of people a very contentious question like this and make statements so insulting, so calculated to make the blood boil? The Prime Minister of this country endorses this attitude. He should be ashamed of himself.

To come back a bit more to the topic, let me look at the debate of October 23, 1979, when I asked this House for borrowing authority of $7 billion for the rest of 1980, to expire on March 31, 1980. What did gentlemen opposite do? They spoke on that bill. I had to borrow the money to meet their obligations to carry out their budget. It was not mine. I was asking the House for $7 billion to carry out their programs, their financial system and their budget of the previous November, and what did they do? They talked for four days. We had nine Liberal speakers and seven NDP speakers. They will speak on anything, that crowd in the NDP. They will speak on anything, any time they get a chance, God bless them. They are great speakers. There were two PC speakers. We had four days of debate, the 23rd, 25th, 26th and 29th, on second reading.

There was a long interruption caused by the hon. member for somewhere or other down in New Brunswick. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) moved the adjournment of the House. A couple of hours were lost because nobody was here; nobody anticipated this resolute action by that fighter for civil liberties, the honourable Breau. That is the kind of thing that went on when we asked this House for $7 billion last fall.

We heard also from the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). We do not see him around too much these days. I guess he has gone up the spout somewhere with Chrysler. He seems to have them and only them on his mind. The then finance critic is up the tailpipe.

The then finance critic said we only needed $3.5 billion. We did not need $7 billion; we only needed $3.5 billion. Therefore we have ample precedent just a few months ago as to what to do with this bill. We have serious purpose behind this objection we are taking to this bill because we are going to carry out the advice that they gave us last October 23. Let me just briefly refer to some of it. I am referring to Hansard, for those of you who have not looked recently. The hon. member for Windsor West complained about interest rates and so on. He has forgotten it all now. He is thrilled with the interest rates since. He said that we bore the responsibility for the damage the interest rate increases were doing to small business, the farmer and the consumer. When this government got in, interest rates went up 2.2 per cent. That is how much he cared. He said this at page 509:

> But there is another serious flaw in the way the Conservatives are proceeding with this first financial measure they have called for debate in this new Parliament. They are seeking this $7 billion in borrowing authority in Bill C-10 without first presenting their own budget to Parliament.

He was seriously upset. The "honourable Herbie" was seriously upset that we had not presented a budget and we deigned to ask for $7 billion in borrowing authority to carry out their spending plans. There is our serious flaw. I give this advice to the Minister of Finance. He has got a serious flaw in asking us for $12 billion because he is seeking it without first presenting a budget to Parliament. What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

We want to see a budget before the end of June. We will then give the government the $12 billion if we think it is a worth-while budget. If we do not think it is a worth-while budget, they will have to claw us, fight for it, impose closure and rack it up and down the House and out in the corridors to get it. But don't be afraid to bring in a budget. All that can happen is they might be defeated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Let me give them another piece of advice that we got in that debate from the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chretien). He said this. He understood my problem. He urged me to talk to the then prime minister and make sure that the oil and gas pricing problem was resolved very quickly. Good advice, Mr. Minister. I am glad to see that M. le Ministre of Energy, Mines and Resources is buckling right down to settling this question very quickly. We saw that last night. He will need tanks to settle the question. He will need artillery to settle it if he is going to proceed as he did last night. That is the only way he is going to settle it. There is no agreement between two consenting parties. There is not going to be any agreement between two consenting adults in private or in public if he continues as he was acting last night and this afternoon.

What else was the good advice from the former minister of finance? He said this. He was all caught up about a budget and he said this at page 516:

—so that the people could make plans for the year to come on the basis of a budget that would be known to everybody.

He asked this question:

How can they prepare against inflation next year without knowing the government's budgetary intentions?

I ask the same question of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, who I know is not listening and will not pay any attention anyway. How can the people of Canada prepare against inflation? How can they prepare against anything when they do not know what this government's budgetary intentions are? They have been frightened to death and frightened out of their wits by the $14 billion deficit already indicated by the Minister of Finance, but they have had no indication yet as to how the government is going to tackle our economic problems.

At page 517 the former minister of finance was talking about the difference in their approach compared to ours, and he said this:

We do not think it is necessary to let the Canadian economy go into a recession as the Americans have. We managed to prove that point in 1974 and 1975, and I hope that the Minister of Finance will keep that in mind.

That is the belief of the former minister of finance. We do not know the belief of the present Minister of Finance. When is he going to let Canada know? When are the manufacturers going to know what the prospects are with this government? These are some of the questions we have.

● (1540)

Here is Mr. Carl Beigie outlining an economic plan. Canada needs a co-ordinated strategy to reduce consumer spending and raise investments as much as it needs national unity, according to Mr. Beigie, who is the president of the C. D. Howe Research Institute. This is what we read in a clipping from The Globe and Mail of May 22, 1980. He was speaking to a group of economists in Montreal. He proposed action on five key points—more cuts in government spending, a willingness to allow prices to rise faster so as to discourage consumer spending and encourage investment, more taxes on consumer spending, a set of measures to reward productive investment and measures to punish the use of capital for dividend increases, mergers and acquisitions. The final recommendation is maintenance of the dollar at a level favouring sectors other than non-renewable resources.

Those are the suggestions of one economist as to what should be done at the moment. There are dozens more. People engaged in the industries of this country along with the farmers and fishermen need to know in which direction the government is going. But all we hear from the Minister of Finance is that he cannot make a move until there is an oil pricing agreement. He can make assumptions. There will be no oil pricing agreement. I make that forecast now, Mr. Speaker. Certainly there will be no agreement by July unless the government has a plot, as I now suspect it has, to start a war with the province of Alberta and the other provinces which possess resources, and then impose a unilateral solution. But there is going to be no agreement.

Here are some of the questions to which we need answers from the minister. This is some of the information we should be getting. There are two ways for the government to secure borrowing authority. One is from Parliament, and the government is now asking for authority under this bill. That is new money. But the government has continuing authority to borrow funds to repay maturing debt. What we want to know is: How much authority do they now have in view of the fact that they have been repaying maturing debt over recent months? We know they had to redeem more than $1 billion in Canada savings bonds. That gives them authority to borrow another billion without coming to the House at all. So let the minister tell us what he has under that heading.

We know that all their authority under the bill passed last fall expired on April 1. But the usage of borrowing powers is calculated on a net basis, so that as the government reduces the level of outstanding debt it increases its borrowing power. On November 1, 1979, there was $2.9 billion of unused borrowing authority still outstanding, available to be carried forward. The minister has stated that this was still the case on April 1. So let us have the facts on that. Imagine coming to this House for authority to raise $12 billion and the minister doesn't even tell us how he plans to get it—how much by way of Canada Savings Bonds, how much by way of marketable bonds, how much by way of treasury bills. How does he plan to borrow this $12 billion? What is his borrowing plan? He makes a five-minute speech during which he tells the House nothing. He doesn't tell us how much will come from government pension funds, how much is expected to come from the public market—

An hon. Member: Or at what rate.

Mr. Crosbie: —or what rate he expects to pay. We want some information on that. What does the government intend to do about Canada Savings Bonds? A huge proportion of our debt is represented by Canada Savings Bonds. The people who hold those bonds could come in tomorrow and ask for payment. What would the government do about that? The government says it will reduce its reliance on Canada Savings Bonds and if members over there are not going to do it, they are making a bad mistake.

Just look at the proportion here. It is something like 18 per cent to 20 per cent of our indebtedness, if not more. In the first several months of this year, $1.1 billion were redeemed, an amount equal to the whole of last year. In a moment, looking through these notes, I will come across the proportion of government debt which is in Canada Savings Bonds. It is a very high percentage. The government must get out of that. The people are getting worried about their interest rates, worried about inflation and we may yet see the whole kit and caboodle, widows and all, coming in next week with $18 billion worth of Canada Savings Bonds to be cashed.

What is the government going to do if that occurs? It might not be $18 billion, it might be only half that amount, $9 billion. It might be a quarter, $3 billion or $4 billion. We cannot continue with so high a proportion of our debt in Canada Savings Bonds. Does the Minister of Finance intend to explain what he is going to do to avoid trouble and difficulty in that direction? Is that not his responsibility when he comes to the House for authority to borrow $12 billion? Does he think the members on his own side are dum-dums, dodos or greenbacks who would not be interested in this information? Does he think they are uncaring? I see a number of members over there who are caring. Others are passed caring—the ones who have been there any length of time. But the rest of them are still caring. Shouldn't they have this information? Shouldn't the members of the cabinet have it?

This is the kind of information we want. We want to know how much of our indebtedness is in treasury bills, how much in one year bills, how much in Canada Savings Bonds, how much in bonds altogether. What is our present debt as of today, or as of May 15 or some reasonable date? How is it held? How much is on short term, how much is on long term and the rest?

According to my little black book, back in October when this estimate was done, interest charges for 1980-81 were expected to be $10.5 billion. That has since gone up to $10,750 million. The gross public debt charges as a percentage of total government outlays were 18.2 per cent. The figure is higher, now.

I remember when I was minister of finance in Newfoundland. The minister of finance of the mighty Liberal government, which was almost solvent in those days, back in 1972, was advising me that Newfoundland was headed for bankruptcy if we continued to borrow in the way we were borrowing. That is when the borrowing started here. It went up from $1.253 billion in 1972 to total $46.5 billion over the next seven years. It quadrupled from the time the Prime Minister took office in 1968. Now, 18.2 per cent of all government outlay is going to pay public debt charges and the minister comes to this House with the thought that we are going to give him $12 billion borrowing authority. And he gives us no information. What is the interest cost to Canada going to be, Mr. "Assistant Minister of Finance"? What is the latest estimate for 1980-81 of what the interest on gross public debt is going to be? What percentage will that be of total government outlays and what percentage will it be of the gross national product? The Prime Minister of Canada might not care about the deficit, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is very, very important. The people of Canada, or their children, will rue the day that this kind of thing went on. It is our duty to ask questions and look to the future. So we want some information about these matters.

It was originally thought that in 1980 the interest cost, the cost of the public debt program, would be $8,350 million. That is what was in the Main Estimates prepared by the same government which sits opposite now. That was an 18.3 per cent increase over the previous year's level, 1978-79. Well, then the estimate went up from $8,350 million to $8,450 million, an increase of 19.7 per cent over the previous year. That happened during the year and the estimate had to be revised. The latest note I have here is that last October we expected the interest costs for last year to go to $8,600 million, or 21.8 per cent above the previous year. What was the figure? What did it finally turn out to be? The last estimate I had was that it was going to cost us 21.8 per cent more for interest in 1979-80 than it had cost us in 1978-79.

We want that information, Mr. Speaker, before we pass this bill. The minister will just have to be more forthcoming. The people of Canada want to know what is happening with these tremendous increases in interest costs.

● (1550)

There is a note here also that the balance outstanding in employee pension accounts continues to increase, accounting for a major source of government financing. A lot of the government's financing now is coming from compulsory acquisitions of funds from government pension accounts, moneys paid in by public servants and other people paid from the public treasury. They are compulsorily having to lend that money from their pension funds to the Government of Canada to reduce the amount the government has to go to the markets for. How much is that going to be for the present year? What is the latest forecast on that? What are they going to be able to take from non-government sources, from government pension funds and the like? We would like to know. We would like to know how much of the Canadian debt now is payable in Canadian dollars and how much of it is payable in foreign currency. That would be of interest. The last figures I have here are that at October 31, 1979, we had a total government debt of $68.067 billion. Of that, $63.144 billion was in Canadian dollar debt, and the remainder was in foreign currency debt, the Deutschmark, the Japanese yen, the Swiss franc.

There is nowhere that this government will not borrow. They will go anywhere in this world to borrow. Their next loan will probably be in the old Zambian Kwacha or whatever. We would like to know what these figures are now for the latest period we have them for before we go authorizing another $12 billion. How much of their domestic debt program last year is held by the Bank of Canada? How much are they planning to have the Bank of Canada hold for this year? Last year, at least up until October 31, the Bank of Canada had financed Government of Canada cash requirements to the extent of $1.2 billion. What did this turn out to be for the whole year? What are their plans for using Bank of Canada financing this year? That has an important effect on inflation, the money supply and the like.

These are some of the questions we expect to have answered, and they are not unreasonable, surely, when this House is asked to approve $12 billion in borrowing authority. What are the interest costs on the foreign debt? The gross annual interest cost on foreign loans for March, 1978, outstanding as of October 31, amounted to U.S. $326 million. What is it now? What are the net interest costs? What are they earning on those proceeds? These are some of the questions the Minister of Finance or his Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) might find that if they answered we would be co-operative in trying to get this bill through the House before we adjourn in July, August or September.

What is the government's fiscal plan? What is the government going to do? How much is the oil import compensation plan now going to cost? What is the latest figure on that? It was $3.1 billion, but now we have had increases in the price charged by foreign countries in connection with our oil imports, so what is it going to be now? These are some of the things we want information on.

I do not believe I have forgotten any questions. I know some of our speakers will have further questions, and that is all to the good.

Now, what are some of the things that the people of Canada are concerned about and want to get information about? They want to know what the government is going to do, and this government will not tell them.

According to a report I have here, in two decades of surveying consumer attitudes the Conference Board in Canada has never found Canadians to be as pessimistic as they are now. That is what the board said on May 22. They have been doing these surveys. They did a quarterly survey of consumer confidence, and they find that Canadians are showing increasing concern about their families' financial prospects, about employment possibilities, about making major purchases at this time.

Well, if consumers are the gloomiest they have been in two decades, surely it is up to the government to try to reinstil some confidence in the consumer by telling the consumer what the government's plans are and how they foresee the year. If the government cannot do anything and if the government's hands are tied because of its present huge deficit and its present huge deficit in the balance of international payments, the government cannot go into expansionary spending or increase the deficit beyond the $14 billion. I myself cannot see how they could do that. It would be very dangerous and damaging. If they cannot do it, they should tell the people of Canada that they cannot, and about what we have to prepare for and how they see us coming out of it.

According to the board, for the first quarter of 1980 the index was 82.7, one of the lowest levels measured since the surveys began in 1960. Well, is to ask this House for borrowing authority of $12 billion without any information or indication of the government's financial and economic plans going to induce confidence in the consumer? You bet it is not, Mr. Speaker.

Here is another clipping. One does not have to be a genius to read the papers and see the result of these surveys. Canada has the worst productivity in the seven major free world nations. We had a decline of productivity last year from 1978 levels. The U.S. had the lowest gain, but they had a gain. But Canada had a loss. Canada had a decline in productivity, 0.8 per cent. Italy had an increase of 8.7 per cent; Japan, 8.3 per cent; France, 5.4 per cent; Germany, 5.2 per cent; Great Britain, so often sneered at and looked down on, had increased productivity of 2.2 per cent. Canada had a "decline" of 0.8 per cent. What is the government's plan to help deal with that situation? The government has been in office for 16 years with a brief interruption of eight or nine months. They are back in office again. What is their plan to deal with that?

When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was finance critic for the then opposition, he was full of plans as to how he was going to overcome all these things.

According to another report, the decline in our buying power is the worst since the depression. This comes from Statistics Canada. Canadians' purchasing power has declined steadily in the last three years. It is the worst drop since the depression of the early 1930s, according to Statistics Canada. How long does the Minister of Finance think this decline in our buying power is going to go on? Does he see this stopping this year or next year? Is there anything he can do about it?

The whole history of collective bargaining in this country will be affected by the expectation of the labour unions as to whether their buying power is going to continue to decline or not. Can the minister not bring in a budget and give them some indication of where he expects this situation to go? What is the long-term outlook if we are restraining ourselves now and our buying power is declining now? Are we going to be better off in the future? If we tighten our belt now, are we going to be better off a year, two years or three years down the road?

These are questions the people of Canada want answered. They do not want the minister to be mute on these questions. They do not want him to be sliding and skating all through the question period refusing to answer any questions, just talking. He is a very skilled parliamentarian. We all know that this Minister of Finance can avoid answering questions. We know that if he is not the most skilful, he is one of the most skilful parliamentarians in this chamber. That does not mean that he is to be admired for refusing to answer questions when he is the Minister of Finance.

The President of the CMA, Mr. Newall, spoke recently. He said, and I am quoting from a report in The Globe and Mail of May 27:

—if government will provide the right climate, manufacturing industry can invest between $150 billion and $200 billion in larger and more productive plants this decade.

The pertinent words here are "if government will provide the right climate". Most people do not expect that this government will provide the right climate. The budget of December 11 did provide the right climate, a climate for people to invest with confidence that they were going to get a return on their money, that they were going to be able to employ more people and that we were freeing up the private sector to some degree so that they could get on with the job of doing what they know best—removing the dead hand of the government.

That is not the attitude this government has been known for in the past, and it does not sound as if it is going to be in the future, so is the government going to provide the right climate? What climate are they going to provide for our manufacturing industry? We can only know that when we have a budget. That is the only time we are going to know that. We are not going to know by giving the government the right to borrow another $12 billion.

Here is the C.D. Howe Research Institute again making a report. This is May 2 in The Globe and Mail again.

Canada will not begin to solve its inflation problem until the federal government's deficit is reduced, according to Carl Beigie—

Mr. Beigie, again, is the president of the C.D. Howe Research Institute.

In Canada surplus demand originates primarily in the government sector through budgetary deficits.

And so on. I will not read it all into the record, but it is true. It is correct. Mr. Beigie and I believe that the federal deficit is the key to inflation. Is this government going to do anything about inflation? Are we going to feel safe to save money or not? Is it going to become too dangerous for people in this country to save money because the government does not care about inflation or it will not fight inflation or will not take the painful steps that are necessary to fight inflation? This government has now got a safe majority for the next four or five years. It does not take any courage to fight inflation when you have a safe majority.

● (1600)

We made the decision that we were going to fight it when we did not have a majority. I suppose that in political terms that was a mistake, but the government now has a majority. When is it going to indicate to the people of this country, to the people who have some money to save, to the people whose money is needed to be invested in this country, whether or not it is safe for them to save it, or should they all shoot outdoors today and spend it before it loses even more of its value? That is the main question.

The bill which we passed in the House yesterday giving $35 per household to help those who receive a guaranteed income supplement to the old age pension is a picayune measure. That $35 might help them temporarily, but what helps the old age pensioner, the older person and those on fixed incomes is not that kind of small token, a handout from the government, or whatever it is, an attempt to give them security. The only security they will have is if we overcome inflation so that their cost of living will not go up by 10 per cent, 12 per cent or 15 per cent every year. We must ensure that this country does not go bust, that we do not wreck the economy. The only security anyone has in this country is if we operate the economy properly and we produce more so there is more to divide among us all and we give more to the senior citizens and the rest.

A party that is not interested in the fight against inflation, that will not battle inflation, is not interested in the older people, the senior citizens, is not interested in the dispossessed, is not interested in those who do not have strong organizations to protect them. The people of Canada want to know: is this government going to fight inflation? Because we have no indication whether or not they are. The minister's statement of April 21 indicates they are not. He is satisfied with a deficit of $14 billion.

The United States, whose interest rates and everything else the minister is following, are going the other way; they will have a small surplus next year in their budget. If they adopted the same policies we have and followed us—our deficit is $14 billion—they would have a deficit ten times that size amounting to $140 billion, yet they are going to balance their budget next year to try to fight inflation.

What is this government going to do? It is not telling us. All we have had is this pitiful excuse, this document which was presented to us on April 21 which we were not allowed to debate.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, we have a Prime Minister who thinks we have a healthy economy. Well, we should have the world's healthiest economy. We have the possibilities for a healthy economy, but we have an economy which has been badly mismanaged for the last ten years at least. For nine months we made a beginning in trying to get it back again to a healthy state. Now we do not know whether this government will follow that direction or go on to complete the dismantling of our economy which they proceeded to do from 1972 to 1979.

I believe that the Prime Minister is the Count Dracula of the Canadian economic system. The Prime Minister has to start giving it a transfusion, giving it more power, not just taking the blood out of it. His government has been like Dracula, like a vampire bat feeding on the economic system of Canada for the last seven or eight years. Are they going to stop that and start giving the economy a transfusion, or will they continue taking all the life blood out of it? That is the question which the Minister of Finance will not even answer.

An hon. Member: He is not even here.

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister has had to go somewhere outside the country, I believe. But the Minister of State for Finance is here and I think that he is the man concerned with these questions and he might put them to the Minister of Finance.

The Prime Minister remarked on our healthy economy. At the same time, on April 21, here is how the Minister of Finance spoke about the health of our economy. He said inflation appears worse now than in the previous peak inflation years of 1974 and 1975. That is one point he made. He said also that the underlying rates of inflation in the United States and Canada are not very different. He said the consumer price index will rise by 10 per cent this year. He said there will be little or no growth in Canada in 1980. He said that residential construction is likely to decline. He said that Canada cannot insulate itself from the slowdown in the United States because of the substantial deficit which already exists on the current account of our balance of payments and because of the size of the already existing deficit of the federal government. That statement is the exact opposite of the statement made by the present Minister of Justice on October 23 when he was in opposition, and which I quoted earlier.

The Minister of Finance said that the unemployment rate would rise this year to an average of 8 per cent. Does the Prime Minister think that is healthy? Does he think that all these things are healthy?

As I just mentioned, the Conference Board has found Canadians never to have been so pessimistic before. The productivity situation is not good, our purchasing power has declined. But the Prime Minister says our economy is healthy. He does not worry about deficits, except that they cost more in interest. He is worried because interest costs are higher. All this is not calculated to reassure the people of this country that their serious economic problems will receive much attention, if any.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, as the first speaker I have unlimited time. As the opposition spokesman on the government bill I was hoping to address myself to this bill for three or four days to review in depth what the government needs to do and what the problems are. But I have to take a plane to Toronto this afternoon to fulfil a commitment to speak there tonight, and therefore I cannot take the time I want on this bill. But eventually this bill will go to committee.

I suggest to the Minister of State for Finance that when he speaks—and I am sure he will be speaking—he give us some of the basic information we want. If we can get some sense from the government on what their economic and financial plans are, we are willing to give the government borrowing authority. It might be $12 billion or less than that, depending on what the government shows it needs. It depends on the government telling us what its plans are and telling the Canadian people. If the government can show at any time that there is some emergency, that they cannot meet a cheque, that they cannot meet the social security payments, or something like that, because they cannot borrow the money, they do not have that authority, if they can show that then we will be agreeable to rush through $1 billion or $2 billion of borrowing authority, some reasonable amount. But the government is not so down in the mouth, so financially strapped, that it cannot carry on its operations because we will not give it borrowing authority. We will give it some borrowing authority, but the official opposition will not agree to give $12 billion borrowing authority blind. We are not like the three blind mice. We want to see some evidence of the government's serious intentions and actions.

We want to have information. We will not be shoved around here by the government. Perhaps the electorate does not worry at present. They do not appear to be following public affairs with any great attention. This might be the case now, but they will not always be like this. I have been here only since 1976 and I thought I had seen some arrogance exhibited by the government up to May of 1979, but what I have seen in this House since April 14 shows that in the few brief months that they were out of office no new attitudes at all have been adopted.

The government thinks it has a majority and does not need to worry about anything. It thinks that the memory of the public is so short that the public will not remember in three months' time what the government is doing or not doing today. It made solemn commitments to mortgage holders, to the renters of Canada, to home owners. It told them that we were not doing enough. They were in this chamber and they opposed our mortgage tax credit legislation. They fought it bitterly in this chamber. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) when he was in the opposition wept crocodile tears and said that we were not helping renters, we were not helping the lower income people.

During the campaign, they went on with the same line. They stopped our attempt to help the home owner, the poor person burdened with mortgage costs, and they pretended that the high interest costs were our fault. When they came into office they allowed those costs to go even higher to 16.2 per cent for the bank rate and 17 per cent or 18 per cent on mortgages. Now, luckily for them and for everyone, the rates are coming down because of the recession, for no other reason. They promised the people of Canada they would help the home owner, the renter and the mortgage holder. They have not done a thing in their 86 days in power.

This House has been sitting since April 14 and the government has done nothing but give excuses for not helping the renters of Canada, not helping the mortgage holders of Canada. Ministers are still saying they are going to help 4,000, 5,000 or 6,000 people who got involved in AHOP and have been put in a terrible position over that program. They now have to renew their mortgages after five years at double and triple what the costs were originally and they cannot afford it. The government says it may still help them, but those are the only people it is going to help in Canada. These are the people who made the welkin ring in this House last fall about how their hearts bled for the Canadian home owner and the Canadian renter, yet they have done nothing since they got into power. They have offered no legislation to this House and they do not explain now why they opposed what we did offer. They could have supported that and improved it, if they thought there should be improvements, when they got into power. They think the people of Canada have very short memories. Perhaps they are right, but they are taking an awful chance. If the people of Canada have got short memories, we are going to be here to remind them about some of the things the government promised and committed but which it is now not doing.

They are trying to fool the people on oil pricing. They have blended prices; they have "blanded" prices. They have the best kinds of prices. They have a new electric blender over in the Prime Minister's office and he is getting all the stuff and he is blending it all up, and they are going to try to convince the Canadian people that prices will not have gone up more than they were going up under our policy—$4 a barrel this year and $4.50 next year. We will be revealing how that is not so as they try to unfold that program.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if he was Pinocchio, would have a nose that would reach from here to Vancouver with the stories he has told on energy pricing since he became the minister on March 3. If the Canadian people are not listening too intently now we intend to see that the record is clear so that when they do take an interest they will see what we were trying to accomplish and how, and what this government promised and what it has done, which are two distinctly different things.

By the way, I have a final note here. This is a final piece of arrogance and I have not received an apology for this yet. Here is a document sent out by 74 of the Liberal MPs from Quebec to householders in Quebec just before the referendum vote. This one here is from the MP for Verchères (Mr. Loiselle). It shows a separated Quebec gone from Canada, and gone with Quebec is 110,000 square miles of Newfoundland and Labrador. Not only that, Newfoundland is pushed out 200 miles into the Atlantic Ocean. It is no wonder Premier Peckford said you should only be the agents for the provinces. In this brochure you have pushed the island out 200 miles into the Atlantic and you took Labrador away from it, showing it going off with a separated Quebec.

Every one of the 74 members from Quebec, as far as I know, sent that brochure out. We have not heard a word yet to say it was a mistake, that they did not mean to include the 110,000 square miles of Newfoundland with Quebec. Perhaps they did not want to show the true boundary because there was a sensitive election going on. Maybe that was the reason. We call that arrogance down in Newfoundland.

My God, there is so much to talk about, Mr. Speaker, why do I have to leave? We have a Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who said in a brave speech in Toronto when he was again threatening Alberta on May 6, and this appears at page 3 of his speech:

> There will be free flow of goods and services in this country. No province has the right to dictate development outside its borders, and the federal government will fully defend this basic constitutional principle.

That is what he said in Toronto. When he is asked in this House whether he will apply that principle to Newfoundland and Labrador so there can be a free flow of hydroelectricity from Labrador to other provinces in Canada across Quebec, which is now stopped by Quebec which will not permit it unless the power is sold to it at the price it sets so it can resell it at a far greater price and make fast profits, while we hewers of wood and drawers of water in Newfoundland make nothing, they do not assure us that they will apply that principle in the province of Quebec.

This is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has so flexed his muscles now with Alberta he is "super Marc"; he is going to crush Alberta; he is going to crush Lougheed. He says the principle is:

> No province has the right to dictate development outside its borders, and the federal government will fully defend this basic constitutional principle.
