When Newfoundland and Labrador asked him to defend that principle against Quebec, Newfoundland with seven seats and the province of Quebec with 75, that is the last we hear of it. They turn and they twist every way you can think of in the House here to avoid answering that question. That question will be coming up when the Lower Churchill studies are finished in the next couple of weeks. That question will then be right in the lap of the federal government, because those developments cannot go ahead; the Lower Churchill cannot be developed with a potential 2,500 megawatts of power badly needed in the maritimes to displace oil. That cannot go ahead unless Newfoundland can transmit that power across Quebec to these other provinces. That problem will be right in their laps, and that great principle will have to be followed or revealed to be a completely hollow principle.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me just say that the requests we are making are reasonable. When you look at the way the debt and the borrowing have increased in Canada, it just makes your head spin, particularly the way it has happened in the last ten years. We now have a situation where the House is being asked to authorize $12 billion in borrowing authority. There was one period of two years when the amount was $28 billion. This is given in my briefing book which says "net debt borrowed", and there was borrowed $28 billion in 1977-78 and 1978-79. Now the government is asking for $12 billion. These are huge amounts of money.

The man who asks the House for this authority spoke last night for five minutes, filling just one page of Hansard. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance can treat this bill so lightly that all he thinks he has to do is ask the House to give him the right to borrow $12 billion without a word of explanation as to why he wants it, how he is going to raise it, what his present authorities are and the like. This just boggles the imagination. He treats the matter very lightly, just as the minister has treated us in respect of the questions we asked in the House. It is not a question of whether we like the Minister of Finance or whether we do not like him. I personally like him. I have a high regard for his ability to do the old soft-shoe dance. I call him "old slippery heels". But he is going to get caught. He cannot be Minister of Finance and avoid answering all the questions. He cannot be Minister of Finance and avoid telling the people of Canada what his approach is going to be to the economy and the financial system of Canada for the next two or three years. He cannot do that without ruinous effects to our economy.

It may be that the Minister of State for Finance will repair all the damage of the Minister of Finance when he speaks. I think he is the back-up man for the Minister of Finance. I think the Prime Minister knows that the Minister of Finance is not too forthcoming so he has got the Minister of State for Finance to back the minister up and do the things he is not going to do. We hope that is the case. In the meantime we are prepared to explore these issues and discuss every aspect of government operation in the coming weeks until the government does become more forthcoming and, particularly, until we find out when there is going to be a budget, or, in the alternative, what this government's approach is to our economic and financial problems about which they were so anxious to defeat us. Perhaps they defeated us just because they were anxious to get into power again. I think that is the true reason; I think that is the only reason. If that is not the reason they should be eager to come into this House and show us how they are going to go right when we were going so wrong. That is what we want the minister to do before we give him this authority to borrow another $12 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are being asked through the provisions of this bill to permit the Government of Canada to borrow $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81. As I listened to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) outline the reasons he was bringing forth this bill in his very brief speech yesterday, I did not know whether to laugh or to cry. I remember that this is the finance minister who engineered the defeat of the Conservative government last December. This is the finance minister who persuaded the Liberal members of Parliament last December to vote for the NDP motion which led to the defeat of the Conservative government. This is the finance minister who, according to the most knowledgeable media people, persuaded or forced all Liberal MPs to be here in this House to vote on that fateful day last December. This is the finance minister who, we are told, persuaded the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to stay on in politics. This is the finance minister who, having moved from the opposition benches to take his portfolio, seems to have forgotten all the pledges made by his leader and his party before the last election and during the last election campaign.

This is the finance minister who has implemented all of the measures proposed by the former Conservative finance minister last December, except for the 18-cent a gallon excise tax. This is the finance minister who obviously believes that the government should not interfere actively in directing the economy, either to get it moving at a faster rate or to slow it down. This is the most silent finance minister I have ever seen in my 18 years of Parliament.

Under the regime of this finance minister we will see a situation in the coming year in which growth will be restricted to just a 1 per cent increase in the gross national product, according to the Conference Board in Canada. The cost of living will increase by 10 per cent or more if the price of oil moves up as the province of Alberta wishes, and unemployment will undoubtedly increase by at least a half to 1 per cent in the next year over what it was in the last year.

I would like to remind members on the government side that on December 13, 1979, their party voted for an amendment moved by the New Democratic Party to their amendment on the budget of the Conservative party. That vote led to the end of the Conservative government. Our amendment was supported by the Liberal party, so we assumed that they endorsed its principles. Our amendment was:

—and this House unreservedly condemns the government for its outright betrayal of its election promises to lower interest rates, to cut taxes, and to stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy, without a mandate from the Canadian people for such a reversal.

When the Conservatives were in power, the interest rate was approximately 11.5 per cent. In the few months in which the Liberal government has been in power, it went up to approximately 17 per cent. Of course, the minister is now taking credit for the fact that it has gone down, but the interest rate is still at 13.75 per cent, more than two percentage points higher than what it was when the Conservatives were in power.

The government has done nothing to lower interest rates or cut taxes. There have been no tax cuts at all. The only consolation is that it has not levied the 18-cent excise tax per gallon of gasoline proposed by the Conservative government. There have been no measures to stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy. It is obvious, particularly since the United States is moving rapidly into a major recession, that we are going to have much more unemployment in this country in 1980 than we had in 1979.

I would like to spend a few moments putting on the record some of the comments which were made by members of the Liberal party while in opposition and who are now members of the cabinet in the present government. The present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) said on December 12, 1979, the day before the Conservative government was defeated, as reported at page 2299 in Hansard:

What we should have had from the Conservatives last night was a budget that would reduce inflation, strengthen the economy and create more jobs for Canadians—

Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce now when we need him? Why is he not saying the same things and giving the same message to his colleague the Minister of Finance? Now the Liberal government is refusing to bring in a budget, just as the Conservatives did for so many months, and we are to give the government authority to borrow $12 billion.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was not the only Liberal member who took that line. The following day, December 13, 1979, the present Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) concluded his attack on the Conservative government with the following paragraph which is reported in Hansard of that date at page 2349:

So there, Mr. Speaker, after six months in power, this is the only record of the Progressive Conservative government: the highest interest rates that members in this House have ever seen and an unemployment rate—as the result of measures put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) who does not seem pleased that we already have such an unemployment rate—that will make it impossible for 850,000 Canadians to find a job. In addition to that figure, the policies of the minister unavoidably lead to the unemployment of 986,000 Canadians in 1980. I will end on those comments, Mr. Speaker. Such is the record of the government. It is time that we put an end to it and that we close the books.

Now, in 1980, we have higher interest rates than what the present Secretary of State was talking about last December. We have more unemployment and we have higher inflation. So much for Liberal promises.

One of the things about which the Liberal party spoke so fervently while in opposition and during the election campaign was the failure of the Conservative government to adopt an industrial strategy, a failure which led to an increasing decline in our manufacturing industry which is the backbone of every industrialized country. It seems to me that government members have forgotten the criticism which they levelled at the Conservatives and what they voted for then, now that they are in government. The Prime Minister in a number of his speeches during the election campaign mentioned this kind of need. I would like to quote from a speech which he made on February 12, 1980, in Toronto. He said, among other things, that a Liberal government:

—will convert the Canada Development Corporation into a bigger player in industrial development along the lines of Petro-Canada's role in energy.

Have we heard a word about that promise? Silence. He further said that the Liberal government:

—will capitalize on Canada's energy base in order to build a world-competitive industrial sector.

Have we heard a word about that? Silence. And further he said the Liberal government:

—will strengthen Canadian industry's research and technological capacity by encouraging development of Canadian-controlled high technology firms and ensuring that foreign multinationals expand R and D efforts in Canada.

Those are just a few illustrations of what the Prime Minister was talking about at that time. Have we heard anything about any of those promises? Of course we have not, because the Liberals are now in office and they have a few years before they must think up a few more promises. What we see is that the Liberal government is retreating from its pre-election promises of more intervention into the economy, in the same way that the Conservatives broke their promises.

The problems are becoming more serious as time progresses. In a recent issue of The Globe and Mail, Geoffrey Stevens dealt with the whole question of the need for the Government of Canada to change its ways and become involved, as other governments have in the industrialized world, in the whole process of research and development. He quoted the following paragraph from the Speech from the Throne:

My government reaffirms its commitment to increase Canada's over-all expenditures on research and development to 1.5 per cent of the value of the gross national product.

That paragraph was in the Speech from the Throne on April 14 this year. The government has been making that promise for more than a year, Mr. Speaker, and every few months putting back the date when it expects to achieve that 1.5 per cent of gross national product expenditure on scientific research and development.

• (1630)

Mr. Stevens went on to give some of the figures that show the real record of how we have failed. He wrote:

We haven't even tried to keep up with our industrial competitors. In 1968, Canada's 'gross expenditure on research and development' (known to its intimates as GERD) was 1.26 per cent of gross national product. In 1969, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) recommended that Canada's GERD should be raised to between 2.1 and 2.4 per cent of GNP. In 1972, the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy (the Lamontagne committee) recommended a GERD of 2.5 per cent by 1980. But by 1978, our investment in R and D, had, yes, fallen—a GERD of 0.94 per cent of GNP.

We invest less than half as much of our national wealth in R and D as other developed countries do.

This is the record of this government which has talked so much about the need to get our economy moving and the need to get our country moving in the direction in which other countries have long since moved.

I had the opportunity last fall to spend a day and a half in Japan. Those of us who were there were briefed by the Canadian ambassador in Tokyo on how the government of Japan, a free enterprise government, goes about promoting private industrial research and development. We were given a document prepared for the Canadian ambassador in July, 1979. Any resemblance between the way in which the Japanese government encourages research and development in their country and the way it is done in our free enterprise system is purely coincidental.

I should like to put on record a summary of the system followed in Japan. The report to which I refer is restricted to research and development activities in the physical sciences and reads in part as follows:

The most important ministry in industrial R and D is the Ministry of International Trade and Industry, which has two R and D related external agencies. One is the Agency of Industrial Science and Technology. (AIST). The other is the Small and Medium Enterprise Agency (SMEA).

The responsibilities of the AIST include research and development of industrial technology of national importance which is conducted in 17 research laboratories, the promotion of research and development by the private sector, and the standardization of the industrial technology.

For small and medium-size companies, special care is needed. The restrictions on government subsidies and loans for large companies may be too severe for small businesses. Hence, SMEA is used for this sector.

The Science and Technology Agency (STA) in the Prime Minister's office co-ordinates and promotes science and technology R and D in five major fields; (1) nuclear technology (2 space development (3) marine technology (4) disaster prevention technology (5) others, jet engine development and remote sensing R and D. Most of these areas, except nuclear technology is not yet profitable; however it is necessary for the future and hence the government assumes responsibility here.

Compare that with our government disinterest in and rejection of any responsibility to give any real leadership in the field of research and development. The report continues:

Approximately 50 per cent of the Science and Technology R and D in 1977 went to universities. It should be also noted that in university research expenditure, 56.4 per cent went to basic research, 38.2 per cent went to applied research, 5.3 per cent went to development research in 1976.

The government R and D involvement is roughly divided into two categories. One is for R and D in which the government is directly involved and the other one is where there is no direct government involvement. The result of the R and D belongs to the government in the case of direct government involvement and to the company in the case of indirect government involvement.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. The Japanese are spending more than twice as much of their gross national product on research and development as Canada. Is it any wonder that their economy is booming, that their manufacturing industries are alive and growing while ours are declining and, in many cases, dying?

Just one last point on the Japanese situation. In their system, tax deductions are far less attractive than the other loans and tax-free subsidies which can be obtained by doing what the government wants done. Thus many corporations are attracted to the activities the government wants done.

These conditions affecting the success of corporations in getting subsidies are detailed. They include technical competence, sound planning and management, financial stability, and they cannot be a foreign-owned or controlled corporation. The cost of purchasing or manufacturing tools, machinery and buildings is also taken into account. Compare that with what we do and do not do in Canada and you will see why they are moving ahead while we are in a declining situation.

The government may want to encourage manufacturers to invest more money to improve their productivity and to employ more people. There is very little indication that this is the case.

Under the headline "Canadians Must Triple Manufacturing Spending", there appears the following article in the Montreal Gazette of May 26:

Manufacturers have to make up for lost time and invest three times more in this decade than in the 1970s, says J. Edward (Ted) Newall, who takes over today as president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association (CMA) at its Ottawa convention.

"In the 1980s we will have to invest a lot more than the $50 billion of new money that went into manufacturing in the 1970s."

Later in the article Mr. Newall is quoted as saying:

"We're looking at investing $150 billion to $200 billion in Canadian manufacturing in the 1980s. We will have to have confidence to invest that kind of money and take those kinds of risks—"

I do not know how they can have that kind of confidence given the failure of this government over the years. This government has been in office, except for those few short months when we had a Conservative abberation, for more than 20 years.

We have had a great deal of talk about the need for an industrial strategy and the need to do something about our lagging productivity, yet we have done very little about it. In an article in the Financial Times of May 26, 1980, Don McGillivray wrote:

During the past seven or eight years, Canada has steadily lost ground in some of its areas of previous economic strength, becoming more dependent than ever on imported capital and on the markets for its primary products.

Since the last recession began in 1974, for example, Canada has created about 1.8 million jobs. But only 130,000 of the jobs have been in manufacturing, which has thus declined in the proportion of the nation's work force employed.

B. W. Wilkinson, an Alberta economist, said in a study published last week that this is not so much because the performance of the manufacturing sector has declined as because it has failed to keep up with performance elsewhere. What was good enough in earlier years is no longer good enough.

● (1640)

His argument was echoed by the president of the C. D. Howe Institute, Carl Beigie, who said in a speech in Montreal a few days ago that incentive programs by government should favour reinvestment of profits and discourage increased dividends or the use of capital for mergers and the acquisition of other companies. Today is not the time to go into it in detail, but what we have seen in the last couple of years is a host of mergers, of purchases of one corporation by another which may have brought benefits to the corporations and their shareholders when they purchased another company, but really did nothing for Canadians in terms of improving our productivity or bringing more modern methods of production to this country.

During the campaign before the February 18 election, the Liberal party advocated a strategy which would involve more government action. Where is that government action? We have not seen it. What we need very badly is an industrial strategy which will put the people of this country to work, the more than one million people who want to work and who simply have been unable to find jobs.

If we are going to accomplish that objective and put the people of Canada back to work and find jobs for the very large number of well-educated, highly-trained, skilled young people who are looking for work now in the hundreds of thousands, work which is not there, we must have a plan. We must have an industrial strategy. We must plan by studying our economy, sector by sector, as advisory groups representing both labour and management have already recommended to this government. There should be a permanent secretariat serving those advisory committees so that solutions to our industrial weaknesses can be worked out through long-term discussions rather than enforced by arbitrary and by seat-of-the-pants decisions made because we are facing a crisis in a particular sector of our economy.

Second, we must set up an investment fund system such as they have in Sweden whereby companies are not given tax concessions automatically, as they are in our system. They are given assistance only if they place a portion of their profits in a special government organized fund from which they can receive tax benefits. This could be done here if and when they propose to expand their facilities and if and when they propose to increase their labour force in Canada.

What we do not need is the kind of thing which International Nickel did. It used the profits that it made in Canada elsewhere. It used the money, the deferred taxes, which it did not have to pay to the Government of Canada, and loans which it got from the Government of Canada, to open facilities in countries such as Indonesia and Nicaragua to mine nickel which will be sold in competition with nickel mined in Canada. This will probably increase the profits of International Nickel, but it means three or four thousand less workers are employed in Canada. That is the kind of tax system that we have had up until now. This is something which we in the New Democratic Party want to see disappear.

We need to have an industrial strategy. We need to aim to strengthen certain of the basic industries which are found in every well-managed, successfully functioning industrial society, many of which industries are now located outside of Canada. These are industries which supply input to other industries producing final products. These basic industries include those that produce industrial machinery, industrial equipment, chemicals, plastic materials, telecommunications and basic metal fabricating products. These are the foundations of a modern industrial economy.

To meet our needs in these categories we depend very heavily on imports. When our economy is moving ahead, when it is stimulated, which is not happening now, it is in precisely these fields that we have to expand our imports. What we do is produce jobs in other countries instead of in Canada. If we are to find jobs for our people, we must substitute Canadian production to replace the present policy of importing these products. In some of these industries we should encourage such specialization and efficiency so that we will be able not only to meet Canadian requirements but to compete for a share of business on a worldwide scale.

I have used this illustration before, but we are frequently told by representatives of Liberal governments and by some of our manufacturers that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to compete with large countries such as the United States and Japan.

I have pointed out before and I will do so again that the sound system in this chamber was produced in Austria, which I suppose has one quarter the population of Canada. Austria produced the sound system, these speakers and microphones, and sold it, I presume in competition with Canadian manufacturers, and installed it here in Canada. I say that if Austria can have an industrial strategy and if Sweden can, both countries being much smaller than Canada, then Canada can have one too.

Let me give some examples of specific industrial opportunities that we ought to be exploring. First, I think of the transportation industry. Because of the shortage of oil and the shocking increase in the cost of oil, we must move, as other countries must move, to the modernization of our mass transit system. If we do that and increase the number of people who use public transit, we must concentrate on a new and improved technology for those systems. We can do that in Canada if we set our minds to it, rather than importing that kind of a system from other countries, something which we have done so frequently in the past.

Our passenger and freight movement by the railway must be made more efficient. Rail lines, railways, railway engines and rolling stock must be upgraded. We should be looking at the electrification of our railways. We have some companies in Canada, I think in Quebec and Ontario—for example, the Bombardier company—which have gone into these fields. What these companies are doing mainly are producing for sales in other countries, not for sales in Canada. That seems to me to be part of the continued shortsightedness and lack of vision governments have had in recent years.

Now I come to the automobile industry and the automobile parts industry. It has been estimated that somewhere between one in ten and one in six people in Ontario, our largest province, work in the automobile industry or a related industry. We have a deficit of about $2 billion a year in our automobile and parts trade with the United States. We must renegotiate the automobile pact with the United States with the objective of eliminating that $2 billion a year deficit. We need a greater share of the parts manufacturing industry in Canada and a substantial increase in the design and development facilities of the automobile industry. We have been restricted and relegated mainly to assembly type jobs in this country. That simply is not good enough.

Then we have the whole field of agricultural machinery. This country which produces such tremendous amounts of the world's foodstuffs is at the same time one of the largest importers in the world of agricultural machinery. The tariffs on farm machinery between Canada and the United States have been removed. We produce between 7 and 8 per cent of the North American market for agricultural machinery, but Canadian farmers purchase 12 per cent of the farm machinery produced in North America. If we produced a fair share of the North American market, employment would be increased by 50 per cent. That would automatically stimulate other industries, such as the steel, rubber and electrical equipment industries.

One last illustration is the machine industry and the equipment industry. These are high technology industries characterized by favourable working terms, high wages, high skills, clean working conditions and so on. It has been estimated that the industry now employs about 120,000 people and production is about $5 billion a year. However, we import $5.5 billion a year of this kind of equipment. We see that a high degree of dependence on imports of machinery is evident in almost every category—forestry equipment, construction equipment, machine tools and even oil and gas drilling machinery.

Even though there is a tremendous spurt in the search for oil and gas in Canada, we import most of that equipment from the United States. We need an industrial strategy. The government should begin putting into place some of the promises with respect to an industrial strategy made before and during the last election campaign.

I want to deal with another aspect where the government has failed completely, and that is in the field of manpower training. On April 1, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced that a high level group of civil servants was working out a new multimillion dollar job-creation package to be ready in time for the April 14 opening of Parliament. We are some six weeks past that date—

Mr. Blenkarn: And we have not seen a thing.

Mr. Orlikow: No, we have not seen a thing. I do not often agree with the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), but this is one occasion when I have to agree with him. All we have seen so far is an employment tax credit bill which is so weak that it will have virtually no effect.

It is now being said that the minister is planning to issue a position paper on unemployment insurance, manpower training and job creation. When? In January of next year. It will be based on previous studies which have been done. We have had study upon study, task force upon task force, report upon report. What we need is not more reports but action, but action we have not seen.

Let me indicate what are some of the studies which have already been completed. In 1977 we had a comprehensive review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. In the fall of 1979 there was the review of unemployment insurance made by Mr. McCrossan. Then there was the interdepartmental evaluation of the Canada manpower retraining program. Who knows how many other departmental studies of manpower programs have taken place or are taking place at the present time.

In the meantime, the government is ignoring the critical employment problems in Canada. For example, there is a critical skilled labour shortage in Canada. In the Financial Post of May 10, several weeks ago, it was reported that:

—85 per cent of companies in the machinery industry still report at least some difficulty obtaining journeyman workers, but there is now hope that training programs now being implemented will start to meet that need.

What those training programs give us is a couple of hundred people being trained when the need runs in the thousands. I quote from another article in the Financial Post.

The skilled labour shortages that have bedevilled Canada for years could be with us until 1985. That's the opinion of 1,354 Canadian companies surveyed by the Economic Council of Canada for a report to be released in June.

In my own city of Winnipeg, the Free Press of May 20 pointed out:

Like the rest of the Canadian mining industry, the north is faced with a continuing and critical lack of skilled personnel and has had to resort to importing tradesmen from other parts of Canada and overseas.

That is a quote from a speech made by the divisional personnel manager of Sherritt Gordon Mines in northern Manitoba. In The Globe and Mail of May 26 there was the following report:

Firms involved in training are mostly located in the highly populated and industrialized central region of southern Ontario, and tend to be large. These firms believe that all businesses within their respective industries should support employee training in some way.

They believe it, but they have not been willing to put their dollars where their beliefs are. They have done very little. In doing very little they have been aided and abetted by Liberal governments and many of the provincial governments, because none of our governments have really addressed themselves to the problems of manpower training to meet the need for skilled workers which we face.

We in the New Democratic Party support the principle that all firms should be involved in manpower training. This should be based on a British type training tax whereby all companies would contribute to an industrial training fund, and whenever they trained workers they could obtain rebates to meet some of the costs which they have incurred.

Not only have we failed to meet our manpower needs to give our industries the skilled workers which they need, and not only have we continued to depend on immigration, bringing people from other countries to meet our need for skilled workers at a time when we have almost a million unemployed, but we have failed and are continuing to fail to meet the needs of the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I would have asked if there was unanimous consent, but the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) was seeking the floor. I might ask if there is unanimous consent for the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I join in the debate on Bill C-30 introduced by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) for borrowing authority of $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81, and seeking explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as Canadian dollars.

I was moved to rise to speak on this bill after taking a look at the actual bill. One of the amazing things about the bill is the size of it. It is about one-third the size of a regular page of Hansard. In that one-third page we are asked to give authorization for borrowing authority of $12 billion.

This $12 billion is to be borrowed at a time when the Liberals say they have no budget. Borrowing is taking place to fulfil the commitments made in a "non-budget" which was actually the budget the Liberals felt was so bad for Canada that they had to defeat a Conservative government. Judging by what was left out, the provisions the Liberals thought were bad for Canada included mortgage and property tax credit, energy tax credit and capital gains tax relief. It is obvious Liberals believe that putting money back in the taxpayers' hands is bad for Canada.

Then again, the non-budget ignored the question of paying for imported oil. This year, $3.1 billion will be paid as import subsidies. The Liberals say they will pay for this in a phased-out manner with a blended formula. This blended formula is a little bit to my mind like robbing Peter to pay Omar. What it is doing is taking money from Canada and sending it to the OPEC nations in order to satisfy the Liberal's claim that they can provide a cheaper price than the Conservatives could.

There is no telling where that import subsidy will stop, no telling how long it will take for that outflow of dollars from the Canadian economy to be halted because we have improved our own production. It's a dirty trick. It's a modern-day, dirty trick on the Canadian people. It is a "robin hoodwink", an effort by the Liberal government to absolve itself from the responsibility it has to provide for the energy future of Canada.

Recent OPEC price increases also indicate that more borrowing bills are on the way. If this is an example of how we are going to pay for that in import subsidies, government members are such profligate spenders that even at one-third of a page per $12 billion it won't be long before we have a whole book full of these bills. And that is at $36 billion a page!

Government spending under the Liberals has grown rapidly and to frightening proportions, from $12 billion in 1968 to over $50 billion in 1979. In 1978-79, the government under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had a deficit of $12.1 billion more than the total budget of 1968. There were deficits in ten of the 11 years of his administration. I am not sure what happened in the other year.

Over the same period the consumer price index went from 4.0 to 9.1. Unemployment went from 4.5 per cent to 7.5 per cent. It is obvious that the government's policy of buying our way out of trouble does not work. Spending increased at an average annual rate of 14 per cent. As a percentage of the gross national product, federal government spending grew from 16.8 per cent in 1968 to 20.5 per cent in 1978. Spending simply grew out of control. For example, the net debt tripled between 1974 and 1979 and in 1978 alone UIC overpayments amounted to $290 million.

During the last election, the Liberals committed themselves to making no tax increases while promising to reduce the deficit in a phased and orderly manner. This is an exercise in "double-think". Those commitments are never to be kept. We are seeing now, with the proposals and the extrapolations, where that deficit will go. It will increase; it will clearly increase. Canada's gross debt amounts to $97,991 million and net debt amounts to more than $57 billion. Out of every tax dollar, 22 cents is used to pay for interest on debt which is costing us $1 million an hour. This leads to an annual cost per capita of $356 or an annual cost per taxpayer of $964. Every time this government in its past incarnations has introduced a budget within recent memory, it has spent more than it has received in taxes. These continued deficits merely add to the debt.

Mr. Speaker, there are only four ways in which the government can pull itself out of this cycle. In order to prevent deficits and begin to pay off the debt the government must do one or a combination of the following: It can liquidate assets—some people say they have already sold the farm; they can collect more taxes—and this appears likely; they can enlarge the tax base by increasing the gross national product; or they can cut back on services. The most unlikely scenario is that the government will be able to stimulate growth in the economy in such a way as to pay off our debts. It is far more likely they will follow their old pattern and actually increase government expenditures while the nation's economy sours. Given such a history of mismanagement it is no wonder the country is heading toward a recession.

The Liberals tend toward big government and bribe taxpayers with their own money. New programs are instituted and are paid for with borrowed dollars. Two years down the road, taxes are raised and then the taxpayer has to pay for the cost of the program as well as the interest on the borrowed money. Then the cycle repeats itself. The country is constantly playing catch-up to pay for yesterday's promises.

The voters who rejected the Conservative proposal that Canada should start paying her bills will be rudely awakened by the final cost of this form of government. There can be no doubt that our energy bill under this government will come as a harsh surprise. The surprise will be greatest among the members of the middle class who thought they would get off lightly by voting Liberal. Experience has shown that the wealthy have an extraordinary capacity for avoiding measures designed to redistribute income. At the same time, the poor have not benefited substantially from the government's social policies. What has really happened is that the middle class has become more heavily burdened and less able to foot the bill.

The party opposite defeated the Clark administration because it felt our tax credits did not do enough to help those who needed help the most. The fact is that our tax measures would have aided the people who would have done the most to ensure that economic growth would continue.

Let us examine some of the items which escaped Liberal notice when they decided to introduce our budget. First, a mortgage and property tax credit. This would have provided for saving in taxes of up to $1,250 on a mortgage. It would have resulted in a flat $250 saving on property tax per year.

Next, the energy tax credit. To shelter low and middle income Canadians from higher energy prices the budget offered a refundable tax credit of $80 per adult and $30 per child. Under our capital gains tax relief proposal farmers would have been able to defer from taxable income $200,000 of capital gains by transferring some of those gains to an RRSP. The common stock investment plan and changes to the rules covering RRSPs would have encouraged Canadians to invest in Canadian companies.

The differences between the Liberal and the Conservative approach include a slowdown in the housing industry, a mortgage crunch, no resolution to the real cost of energy, no assistance to farmers in fighting inflation, no growth in Canadian investment in Canada and a continued commitment to a growth in the deficit. This is the result of the Liberal plan. The Liberals have the misguided and dangerous notion that governments are more efficient than private citizens.

One of the most frightening things in the Speech from the Throne is the notion on the part of the government that the Canadian people want more government rather than less government. This is foolish. The private citizen knows when he does not have the money to pay his bills and thus stops spending. The government does not notice. The government does not understand this. Private industry, monitored by government, is, as a result of both economic and legal checks and balances, less likely to be corrupt or poorly managed than government working alone can be. However, these are facts the Grits are unwilling to accept, because if they did they would also have to admit they are responsible for the disaster that Canada's economy has become. The Liberal government is like the person who, faced with a choice between putting his money in a sound investment which would give him a return on his money or buying a luxury good which rapidly devalues, buys the luxury good. There is a heavy cost for failing to consider the future. In practical terms, this translates into the sort of government which would prefer to increase welfare payments instead of creating new jobs—unemployment insurance rather than employment insurance.

Let us look at what this sort of thinking does to Canada's most efficient industry, agriculture. Let us look at agriculture from the perspective of agribusiness. The term refers to all industries and agencies which own, manage or profit from activities directly related to agriculture. The two biggest sectors are farm supply and the food and beverage industries. The food and beverage industries are the largest source of manufacturing employment in Canada, 200,000 workers.

Farmers have annual expenditures of about $500 million in connection with their operations. They buy such things as energy, fertilizer, manufactured goods, transportation and chemical sprays. As well as the few agribusiness companies there are many companies which earn a portion of their profits from some involvement in agriculture. This includes companies like Ford Motor Company, which has a farm machinery division which is the fourth largest in the world and it specializes in farm trucks. It includes Imperial Oil, which manufactures and sells fertilizers as well as its usual items. It includes Canadian Pacific, which benefits from grain marketing through railways, owns a fertilizer plant, speculates on farm land through Marathon Realty and profits on farm fuel sales through Husky Oil.

The point of this discussion is to show that Canada cannot afford to ignore the needs of the agricultural sector. However, this government has chosen to do exactly that.

An hon. Member: Good point.

Mr. Gurbin: Let us consider some of the figures on farming as they were outlined in The Toronto Sun on Sunday, May 25, 1980.

> The average dairy farmer in Ontario is $80,000 in debt, on an investment of about $330,000.
> The province's farmers, together, are $3.2 billion in debt. For every one per cent rise in interest rates, an extra $32,000 in interest must be paid. And although rates are falling, the crush of the past six months has already taken its toll.

Over all, Canadian farmers owe about $12 billion in debt, an amount almost equal to the national deficit, and as farm incomes decrease, that debt grows. Young farmers are being squeezed out and, as they go, so does our food supply, our lending institutions, the 200,000 people in the food and beverage industry and everyone else who depends in full or in part upon agriculture for his income. What does the government do? Nothing. It allows young farmers to go bankrupt, and by way of rewarding those who manage to hang on, when it is time for the farmer to retire, he is taxed so heavily upon the sale of his farm that he cannot enjoy the fruits of his labour.

The government says that capital gains tax relief is unfair and that there is no need to protect farmers from high interest rates and low prices. It is a matter of principle for this government—what else can it be?—because one-third of a page and $12 billion later this government has shown that it is willing to spend money. But it is unwilling to spend that money to help farmers. Capital gains tax relief is fair. It is the government that is unfair. Farmers need protection from high interest rates and low prices, but they also need protection from a spendthrift government. The national farm debt is $12 billion, and that is what is Bill C-30 amounts to. It amounts to one-third of a page and $12 billion.

How will we get those $12 billion? I can picture the solution of the Minister of Finance now. He will raise farmers' taxes. I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) can justify his colleague's actions, as Canada's truly last productive industry goes under. What we do not have is a national food policy; we do not have a commitment to the farmers of the nation and we do not have an agreement between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture. We do not have that understanding, and that is unfortunate for the farmer.

Other areas of our economy are similar. They have the same problems. We wonder now what kind of government we are getting. What kind of commitment does this government have? It originally had a commitment to a decreased deficit, and we see the results of that now. Three years of inflation will totally wipe out the commitment this government made to the social welfare of people to whom it has just given $35 by way of old age pension increases. We see an arrogance. I think arrogance can be defined as 142 seats.

Hon. members opposite are secretive. The amount of $12 billion is before us, and we have no idea of how it is to be raised or how it is to be spent. We have a government which is choking free enterprise by increasing taxes—corporate taxes are to be increased—by increasing red tape and by allowing high interest rates.

One of the worst problems is that many of the social measures which have been instituted—measures which should help people—are doomed to failure because of the lack of ability to continue to pay for them or because inflation will rob real increases.

People in the country are becoming cynical. They are becoming cynical for a reason: this Parliament is becoming irrelevant. Hon. members opposite occupy 142 seats, and now we are getting this type of bill. We are getting one-third of a page, with no understanding at all, in order to borrow $12 billion, and there is no ability to control. We are financing by reaction and by patronage, and we are crippling our country. I think this has to change by way of responsible planning.

The first speaker to speak against this bill asked that the Minister of Finance bring before this House certain measures which would allow the House to understand not only the purpose of this bill but also some of the more important aspects in terms of how the money is to be raised, how that relates to the entire financial picture of the country and what effect it would have on our economy.

It is my purpose at this time to join in asking and imploring the Minister of Finance to bring before the House all the things that the previous minister asked for. These things are important if hon. members on this side of the House are to understand what this bill is all about and what this $12 billion is going to do. I ask that the Minister of Finance do that.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is a bill to authorize the borrowing of $12 billion, $12,000 million. The way the estimates are presented to us, we have a tendency in this House to leave out zeros. Once upon a time this government said, "What's a million?" Now it says, "What's a billion?" The minister came here last night and said, "Well, I just want $12 billion". He sat down after five minutes, and that was the end of it. However, we must impress upon the government that it is asking this House to give it the right to go to the country and borrow $12,000 million.

There are 282 members of Parliament in this House. Members of Parliament are generally pretty well connected around their ridings, but I doubt if all the members of Parliament in this House collectively know 12,000 millionaires. This government is asking us in one bill to give it the right to expropriate, take, grab or borrow the money of 12,000 millionaires. I think the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) said that this one bill uses three-quarters of a page of paper. We are asked to go along without any facts or any plan for repayment. We are asked to go along without being given any direction, any budget, any demonstration of need or any evidence other than what this overspending government proposed in what was not even a budget—hon. members opposite say the speech was not a budget on April 21. They now say they have a $14 billion deficit this year. I suppose that deficit is to be stimulative in order to get us out of the hole tomorrow. There is no plan before us. There is no budget before us. There is no policy before us which in any way indicates why we need the money, for what purpose, where the money is to come from, what plan there is for the repayment of that money or how it is going to help the economy of Canada.

We heard last night a five minute statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). It was his second statement in this session of Parliament. In that five-minute statement he said, "Give me another $12 billion, boys". That is not good enough for us. It is not good enough for this party, and this party will not go along with that position.

We took over this government last May for a short period of time. They call it the interregnum. At that time we took over the problems which have been set out by the Auditor General. He said that they lost control of spending. We took over the problems set out by the Lambert commission and the d'Avignon report which show the government lost their ability to manage, and they made their recommendations on how this country should be managed. We took over the disaster that was created.

They did not like us taking over, so they conspired with their friends to my left, they conned them into it and tossed us out. But the big problem is that in the interval, in those few months when we had the opportunity to look into the affairs of Canada with ministers of the Crown now sitting in opposition on this side—particularly the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—we had the opportunity to go over what was happening, to find out what those borrowings were all about, and how we could get out of this mess. So they can no longer come to us as they had in the past and give us the con job, because we know where the money has gone, we know where it has been wasted, and we know what to ask them when they come before committee or this House.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) cannot get out of it with a quick little answer, as his Liberal predecessor used to be able to do; nor will the Minister of Finance be able to get out of it. It is time they came forward and gave us their plan. After all, they were all fired up to defeat the government which was elected last May. They said they had a system organized to reorganize the affairs of Canada. Presumably they had it all organized when the Conservative government was defeated last December 13. They have not produced it and it is time they did. I say to you, sir, and to the government opposite, that until they produce it, until they produce some evidence in a proper budget of how money is to be spent, a proper economic statement such as the one which was produced last fall by the former government, they can wait, wait and wait for the borrowing authority to be given them. Or they may have to use other methods.

In July of last year when the hon. member for York-Peel first took over as president of the Treasury Board, he made certain projections as to where the spending plans of the Liberal government were taking us. Those spending plans for the period from July until January, 1980, were changed and new projections made. The projections resulting from the December 11 budget represented a change in the spending program and the deficit program, and indicated control over the growth of government. May I refresh your memory, sir, by telling you that the December 11 budget presented a spending plan over four years which committed the government to no more than a growth in expenditure of 10 per cent, which was calculated to be the approximate inflation rate.

In other words, the government of which we were a part was prepared to limit the growth of federal government expense to exactly the rate of inflation and no more. Thus the 10 per cent growth in constant dollars would represent a decline in the percentage of the gross national product to cover the costs of running the federal government. The result was a definite program to reduce the required borrowings and required deficit very dramatically so that the borrowing anticipated would be reduced from a requirement of $9,940 million to $4,790 million in the four-year period. That was a dramatic reduction in the amount of money required to be borrowed.

We now have a government which says: "We do not care for those projections. We will go back to the same kind of thing we had before. We will continue to operate in the same way, no matter what the d'Avignon report said and no matter what the Lambert report said or what our Auditor General, Mr. Macdonell, said. We will go on operating in exactly the same way."

Strangely enough, the former president of the Treasury Board had a projection in his January statement of gross government expense in that period if we went back to the old plan as opposed to where we would be if we had followed the plan presented by the hon. member for St. John's West in his budget of December 11. The then president of the Treasury Board in that projection said that the gross government expense for 1981 would be $58,994 million. Actually, he was a bit low in his estimate. The Minister of Finance said it would be $60 billion, so he was out by about $1 billion. He did not think they would spend quite as much as the Minister of Finance had said they would spend. But he projected that the deficit in 1981, if the government proceeded on the same basis as the previous government, would be $14,949 million.

Let me tell the House what he thinks the expense will be next year if they carry on in the nonsensical way in which they approach things. He said that in the year 1982 the budgetary expense will be $66,354 million and the deficit will be $16 billion; in 1983 the budgetary expense will be $74 billion and the deficit will be $16.5 billion; and in 1984 the budgetary expense will be $82 billion and the deficit will be $18.25 billion. That is what they have for us, that is what we are afraid of, that is what we are upset about, and we will not support that type of program any longer.

We are demanding of this government—and we say the people of Canada will probably demand it vigorously soon—that there be some proper accounting, that there be a plan to reduce the debt, the deficit, and the amount of government expense. They have a duty to the House and the people of Canada, having taken over the government, to produce the kind of accounting that is demanded by our Auditor General and the kind of government that Lambert and d'Avignon said was absolutely necessary.

The minister says he proposes to take in taxes $45 billion and he proposes to spend $60 billion. In other words, he proposes to spend this year 25 per cent more than he takes in. For every $4 he spends, he takes in $3 in taxes. We will go in the hole by 25 per cent this year.

What has been the practice over past years? In 1978-79 we took in $35 billion and we spent $47 billion. Again we took in three-quarters of what we needed. In 1979-80 we took in $40 billion and we spent $52 billion, so the same ratio applies. You take in 75 per cent in the form of taxes to cover what you need and you borrow, beg, steal or whatever the rest. It cannot go on. I say to the parliamentary secretary, so that he will give this message to the minister, that it cannot go on. He had better come up with a plan and program to show the people of Canada where we are going.

Where are we going? You cannot come to this House and say "Give me another $12 billion", without a plan or a program. The former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, came clean with the people of Canada back in December. He produced a budget which set out what would likely be the revenue receipts and expenditures for not only the fiscal year 1980-81, but for 1982, 1983 and 1984. He set out in pretty fair detail what would likely be the unemployment problems, what would likely be the inflation problem, what would likely be the size of the national debt and where we were going. Members on all sides, particularly members from this government, stood up and said: "This is terrible, we are going to have unemployment". We sure got it. They said, "We are going to have inflation", and we have it. Let me tell you, sir, we are going to have a lot more inflation and unemployment if we carry on in the way we have been. We must have and we demand some sense of responsibility.

One of the things that bothered me, and certainly bothered the hon. member from Winnipeg who spoke earlier, was that the statement—and apparently that is what it was—on April 21 was presented to this House with a whole series of tax measures, small changes, alterations and proposals almost identical to the proposals made by the hon. member for St. John's West in his December 11 budget.

The other day I was looking for an extra copy of the statement of April 21 and I sent my secretary down to the minister's office for a copy of the mini-budget. The staff down there were very upset at the term "mini-budget". They said that it is only an economic statement. Whether it was an economic statement, a mini-budget or a Minnie Mouse budget, it certainly was no kind of accounting that could properly be described as a program on which a responsible government would come to this House looking for $12 billion.

That budget, or whatever you want to call it, of April 21 did the nickel on the booze and cigarettes, it did the nickel on corporation tax and it raised sales tax on cosmetics. Certainly the government across there does need some cosmetics. That government is trying to make pretty pictures and it raised the charge on pretty pictures, but it did nothing to come to grips with the real tax requirements in terms of oil and oil pricing. It did nothing to come to grips with how it was going to reduce expenditures and the rest of it. That is what we require from this government now.

I was fortunate enough to have the opportunity to obtain some briefing details in respect of how the financing of this government is carried on. I should like to point out to this House what has happened with regard to debt in this country, the amount of money we Canadians owe, and what has happened over the past years.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first became Prime Minister, or by the end of his first year, the amount of unmatured net debt of the country was $21.725 billion. By 1977-78 it had increased to $51.57 billion. At the end of October, 1979, which is the last accurate figure I have, it was $68.067 billion. I am told through my inquiries of the Bank of Canada and elsewhere that it is likely to be $81.5 billion to $82.5 billion by the end of this fiscal year.

This increase in debt, which I might point out was being carried when the present Prime Minister took office for somewhere around 4.5 per cent per annum and right now is costing us very close to 12 per cent to 12.5 per cent per annum, is a burden not only on us but on our children and our grandchildren. I suppose that would not bother me too much if that debt was doing something for us; in other words, if we had gone out and borrowed money like a person might borrow money to buy a home for a family, or if we had borrowed money to put in another pipeline, some more rail service or some harbours. If there were some hard things being purchased with that money being borrowed to create prosperity in the future or to create assets that would pay off the debt, much the same as a business would borrow in order to buy production machinery, that would be fine. But we have not done that. What we have done is borrow money to pay the interest.

In that alleged statement of April 21 last by the minister, he suggests to us that the interest requirement for the public debt of Canada for this current year is $10.75 billion. He wants to borrow $11.7 billion and he asks for borrowing authority to borrow $12 billion. Why he needs the extra I do not know. He says he is just borrowing to pay the bills. The truth of the matter, sir, is that he is borrowing most of the money to pay the interest. When do we get to the point where we cannot borrow enough money to even pay the interest? This is very much like a family that borrows from the bank to pay their Chargex bill and uses the Chargex or Visa card to go to the grocery store. You have to pay certain things as you go along. Surely the ordinary expenses of a country should be paid from taxes collected.

When the government comes to Parliament and says, "Look, give me $12 billion", surely to goodness they should say, "Here is why we need it, here is where it is going and here is how it will be paid back". It almost has a free lunch mentality. What bothers me particularly is the kudos which it attempted to get when it made the recent wage settlement with the members of the Post Office Department.

That particular matter was the subject of a Globe and Mail editorial this morning. I am certainly not one to read The Globe and Mail editorials into Hansard, but this editorial does say that it is a costly, free lunch. The editorial goes on to say that it is a precedent that undoubtedly will be pursued throughout the civil service and which will add hundreds of millions of dollars to taxpayers' costs.

Many hon. members will remember a settlement made by a former prime minister, Lester Pearson, when he settled with the Seaway workers in 1966. That settlement increased the wages for that one group of public servants by 30 per cent. That one settlement became the benchmark settlement right throughout the late sixties and into the seventies. What we have here, and I am not saying for one moment that the postal workers were not entitled to more money—maybe they were—is an unbudgeted-for increase in wages far beyond what the projection in the blue book indicates. This increase will require an enormous increase in either taxes or borrowing.

Yet in the budget or the material which we have before us, nowhere does it contemplate what will be required to pay that settlement and various other settlements, which will undoubtedly be required to give certain public servants who, like anyone else, need wage increases to cover inflation, the wages they need. That matter has not been budgeted for nor accounted for in the blue book or in the estimates we have before us.

When asked about this matter today, the President of the Treasury Board more or less shrugged his shoulders and suggested, "Well, that's the way it is". Apparently he was offered a wooden nickel today. The problem is that he seems to want to get $12 billion from this House. Maybe we could use some wooden nickels to pay some of the bills run up by this government. Perhaps this government had better figure out a way to make wooden nickels and to pay its bills with those wooden nickels, because until it gives us an accounting of its spending plans, it should not be coming here for a request to borrow real money.

Prior to the budget of December, this House was presented with a Government of Canada tax expenditure account book that set out all the various tax expenditures that had occurred as a result of legislation up until that time. This tax expenditure conceptual analysis was available to members of Parliament. This is the first report of its kind presented by a government which was concerned about what tax preferences were given to various people in society, how the income and commodity tax system works and what it costs to give certain benefits to certain groups in society.

That report was presented in December, 1979. The government of the day was defeated in that same month, and since that time we have heard absolutely nothing from the Minister of Finance with respect to how he proposes to treat tax expenditures. One of the greatest problems in our country is a tax system which has all sorts of little benefits, and in some cases very major benefits, for certain individuals. We have not had from this government, despite the material available to it, an analysis of whether certain tax expenditures allowed by the various taxing statutes are really doing what they were intended to do.

Once again, having had no accounting, no direction, no proposal with respect to tax expenditures, and considering that even the material analysis and work was done for it, we are entitled to something better than what this government is offering and something better than just an outright demand for $12 billion.

I would like to come for a moment to the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board when he was presenting the Main Estimates. The President of the Treasury Board said, when he tabled the Main Estimates for 1980-81 which provided for expenditures of $58.4 billion, that those estimates were prepared on the basis of economic policy and assessments of the previous government and that they were not modified to reflect the policies under development by his government. Given the time required for the technical revision of estimates, that is literally an amazing statement. We have the President of the Treasury Board, on behalf of the government, presenting estimates that he says do not reflect the spending plans of the government.

This economic statement was made in the House on April 21. On April 22 the estimates were introduced, but the estimates do not reflect the spending plans of the government. The estimates do not balance with the cash demands suggested as being required by the Minister of Finance of approximately $60.4 billion. We have a situation where this Parliament has no real indication of where this government intends to spend the money, or how it intends to change the tax structure of the country in order to collect that money. All we have today is a bill asking this House to approve further borrowing by the Government of Canada in the amount of $12 billion.

That request would not be that bad if we had figures, but we do not, so we begin to wonder why it needs all that money. In the spending estimates and proposals made by the former government, it indicated for the year 1980-81 that it would have a financial requirement, excluding foreign exchange transactions, of $8.2 billion. This government says that it may require $11.7 billion. But when one analyses the statement further, one cannot figure out what the non-budgetary transactions are because the government does not give a budget, merely an addendum.

On the addendum, it says that the non-budgetary transactions will save the government $600 million. However, the statement in December produced by the former minister of finance, and on which the present estimates are based, indicated non-budgetary savings of $1.1 billion. Again we have no idea, either in the budgetary amounts or in the borrowing requirement amounts, of where we are going.

The former government, on the basis of the Crosbie budget and on the basis of its financial requirements as indicated in the estimates, said that it could operate this country for the full fiscal year on a borrowing requirement of $8.2 billion. This minister says that he will need $11.730 billion, but he does not tell us how, where or what his spending plans are. He simply says, "Give me more money". That is not being responsible. This House would not be very responsible if it were to vote for that kind of proposition.

The budget statement—or whatever you want to call it—that was produced on April 21 by the Minister of Finance refers to an oil policy. Buried in his speech is the following statement:

> The blended approach to oil pricing, which it is the government's intention to introduce, will allow a reduction in federal oil import compensation payments from the level assumed in deriving the $60.4 billion estimate of total outlays.

That is most interesting. Later in his speech he said:

> Implementing blended oil pricing could alone reduce both expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion.

That is interesting as well. Day after day in this House we have asked, "Where is the blender? How do you blend the price?" But we get no answers. We ask, "What is your oil pricing policy?" We get no answers. We ask, "Are you going to put a tax on oil at the wellhead, at the refinery, at the refinery gate or wherever?" We get no answer. We ask, "How do you blend the price? Do you go to Mexico and pay them $5 or $6 American more than any other country in the world and blend it that way? Do you blend the price by telling Canadians who want to drill for oil in Alberta that they will get less than the Mexicans? Do you tell the Syncrude-type operators that you will give them less than the Mexicans? Do you tell the people drilling off the coast of Labrador that they will get less than the Mexicans? Is that how you blend it?" We do not know the answers but we are told, "You can get a blender and it will give you a billion dollars."

This is all the more reason why we must have a budget before this bill is passed. We want to know where we are going. Why does this country really need to give this government authority to borrow without any facts or figures on why the government need the money? The estimates do not balance; the financial statement of April does not balance; we have the blender here and it does not balance. We do not even know how it is put together. Is that supposed to be reponsible government? Is that how parliament is asked to be responsible in dealing with this irresponsible government?

It would not be so bad if we were borrowing money for capital projects, if we were borrowing money to make Canada self-sufficient in petroleum or if we were borrowing money to build new harbours, seaways and that type of thing. But we have no indication what this borrowing is for. There is no indication of the reason for the borrowing. This is no way to run a government.

An hon. member brought up the question of unemployment and I want to dwell on that for a moment. The bill before us is the same old bill that we had before—the employment tax credit bill. It does nothing to improve employment; it is more of a handout, in some senses, to some employers. There is no evidence before the minister, even, that he has created new jobs with the bill. It does not help companies unless they make a profit. Indeed, our analysis shows that a company has to make in excess of $35,000 profit before it is worth employing anybody under the employment tax credit bill. That is the government's total strategy for employment. It is one of these tax allowance bills, tax expenditure bills, yet we have no analysis from the government on how this type of bill works. We have no statement in a budget to show where we are going.

This is the only employment bill before the House so we want to know where we are going before we let the government put the country, our children and our children's children further into debt.

Dealing for a moment with the way borrowing in this country operates, in his opening statement the Minister of Finance said that he had on April 1 $2.9 billion borrowing authority left. That borrowing authority is increased every time the existing debt is paid off. In other words, once you have a debt of the country you can continue to borrow up to that debt all the time. You can always borrow money to pay off existing indebtedness.

We know from reading the newspapers that there have been enormous redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds. All of the money required to pay back those Canada Savings Bonds can be borrowed again without any increase in borrowing authority. I am sure the hon. member for St. John's West expected to hear from the minister, as I did, the exact amount of borrowing authority left as of last evening —perhaps as of May 1 or May 15—but that figure apparently is not available to us.

What shocks me is the Minister of Finance coming to this House and saying that he needs the authority to borrow $12 billion when he does not know how much authority to borrow he still has. He dashed in here last night and he dashed right out again. He cannot tell us what he has still available in the way of borrowing authority. There has not been a Liberal speaker come forward to give us any indication. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) was here this afternoon, as was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans). I have put this question now and the member for St. John's West has already asked for it. I would have thought that in the course of the debate the government would have been able to give us some figures on the borrowing authority they still have, but we still have not heard from them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Blenkarn: I will be very, very brief.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sorry; is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: I will be very brief. There is a feeling on this side of the House that the government has to do something. It has to produce a financial and economic statement before it gets approval to borrow money that is presumably required to handle all its needs until the end of the fiscal year. If it is really impossible for the government at this point to operate, we suggest that it has an obligation to advise exactly what borrowing authority it needs. We will then undertake with them, so that they will not run into the problem of being unable to pay pensions and so on, to pass temporary borrowing measures piece by piece to enable them to keep the country operating. However, we cannot see the point of allowing them the right to borrow what purports to be the amount of money—it might not be the right amount of money—they are going to need for the entire fiscal year to the end of March without some accurate accounting from them. If the government wants to get this bill through, if they want to undertake with us exactly when they can give us the financial accounting, then perhaps we can come to some agreement with respect to the amount required in the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think the Chair recognized that it was six o'clock. I do not think there was one minute to go. It was six o'clock. I will entertain a point of order but not concerning the time.

• (1800)

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I thought there was sufficient time for a member of this House to adjourn the debate on this bill so that the order of speaking would therefore be established. However, because you have indicated that it is six o'clock, I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATIVES OF GOVERNMENTS OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice, on his recent tour to arrange for a constitutional meeting of first ministers, failed to visit either Yukon or the Northwest Territories, and whereas the Canadians living north of the sixtieth parallel demand to participate, as witnessed by the telegram of May 28, 1980, sent to the Prime Minister over the signatures of the hon. Chris Pearson and hon. James Wah-Shee of their respective territories, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the duly elected representatives of the governments of Yukon and the Northwest Territories be included, with full status, in any first ministers' conference called to discuss the Canadian constitution.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATIVES OF INDIAN AND INUIT PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, in view of the constitutional conference to be held on June 9, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Prime Minister declare his intentions as to whether he is going to invite the Indian and Inuit people of Canada to participate in the process of reform in areas directly affecting them.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF EXECUTIVES' SALARIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the CPR increased the annual salary of its chairman by 70 per cent to over half a million dollars per year, while in the same year chiselling on retired CPR employee pensions and cancelling pass privileges of retired CP hotel employees, including one gentleman with 50 years' service with CP who had his gold pass revoked, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House require CP chairman Ian Sinclair, head of Canada's largest welfare recipient, CP Ltd., to appear before the House of Commons transport committee to justify these kinds of increases for CP executives, in the face of their inequitable treatment of retired employees.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GRAIN

WHEAT—CALL FOR INCREASE IN PRICE OF DOMESTIC WHEAT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In spite of the rhetoric and the endless pledges and promises of the Liberal government to heed and to act swiftly upon the needs and aspirations of western farmers and producers who have lost more than $25 million since this Liberal government was elected, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government immediately carry out the policy of the previous administration to make retroactive to February 1, 1980, the increase in the upper limit for the price of domestic wheat for human consumption.

Madam Speaker: Such a presentation can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

COAST GUARD

UPGRADING OF EQUIPMENT AND FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of life-saving importance.

In view of the ever-increasing number of deaths resulting from marine accidents on Canada's Pacific coast, and in the light of testimony given yesterday in Vancouver before the Dubin royal commission, to the effect that there are no float-equipped rescue aircraft operating on the west coast, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House direct the government to implement immediately the $300 million program to upgrade Canada's Coast Guard, a program to which the former Progressive Conservative government was committed; and I move, further, that as part of this program sufficient float-equipped rescue aircraft be provided in British Columbia to prevent further loss of life.

REQUEST THAT LACK OF REPRESENTATION OF FRANCOPHONES AND WOMEN BE REMEDIED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Each year the report of the Public Service Commission points out the under-representation of women and French-speaking people in the higher echelons of the federal administration, and since more than 30 per cent of administration graduates in Canada come from French language universities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Public Service Commission take immediate steps to put an end to the under-representation of French-speaking people and women.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DISCUSSIONS WITH LABOUR LEADERS TO IMPROVE PRODUCTIVITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As Canada was the only country among the seven major free world nations to have a decline in productivity last year from 1978 levels, according to a recent U.S. government report, and all of the others—including Italy, Japan, France, Germany, Great Britain and the United States—had an increase in productivity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the government commence discussions with this country's labour leaders in an effort to resolve this disgraceful situation.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATIVES OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the total number of Indians, Inuit and Metis in Canada is more than 1 million persons—more than the population of several of the provinces—and whereas these aboriginal peoples of Canada were never consulted with respect to the present Constitution, or agreed to its terms, nor with respect to the many federal and provincial laws which have critically affected their lives, lands and communities, and whereas the aboriginal peoples of Canada never voluntarily relinquished their political sovereignty over many areas of Canadian territory, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille):

That in the interest of moral justice, the Indian, Inuit and Metis people, through their national associations, be invited to attend as full participants the constitutional conference scheduled for June 9, 1980.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO CRTC THREAT TO CITE PERSON FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Canadians were shocked last week when the CRTC, a federal regulatory agency, threatened to cite an individual for contempt of court because it did not approve of comments made in an intervention before the commission. In view of the serious threat to freedom of speech, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House, being disturbed by recent actions of the CRTC which threaten the freedom of speech of individuals before the commission, calls upon the Minister of Justice to make a full investigation of this incident and report to the House on what measures he feels are necessary to ensure that federal regulatory agencies do not place themselves beyond public criticism.

COMMUNICATIONS

ROLE OF CABLE TV—PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada's major cable TV operator, Mr. Ted Rogers, in a submission before the CRTC in Vancouver, proposed to "redefine the role of cable TV as a communications medium and to offer a broad range of non-broadcast interactive services"—in short, to become another common carrier—and since both the Telecommunications Carriers Association and the Telecommunications Workers Union have expressed concern that cable's intention to duplicate existing and future natural carrier functions will, among other considerations, require a vast outlay of funds for hardware to be shouldered by the consuming public, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House accept the recommendation of both the Telecommunications Carriers Association and the Telecommunications Workers Union to establish immediately a parliamentary task force to study the economic impact of these new services contemplated by the cable industry's apparent interest in becoming a common carrier.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

SUBSIDIZATION OF INSULATION FOR PRE-1976 HOMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In the Speech from the Throne, the government promised to bring in an extended home insulation program. The heating season is now over, and now is an ideal time for people to work on insulating their homes so that they will be ready for next winter. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House does hereby direct the government to forthwith introduce rules and regulations for a new Canadian Home Insulation Program to subsidize home insulation for all homes built prior to 1976, particularly homes where it is impossible for the home owner who is forced to use home heating oil and where it is impossible or next to impossible for that home owner to convert to an alternate source of energy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

MEETING SCHEDULED FOR JUNE 9—INVITATIONS TO ATTEND—AGENDA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister relating to the constitutional meeting scheduled for June 9.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons whether a formal invitation will be issued to the Executive Council of the Yukon and the Executive Committee of the Northwest Territories to attend the June 9 constitutional meeting and to participate in those talks which might follow that meeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the meeting of June 9 as discussed between the premiers and myself is for the premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada only. However, the Leader of the Opposition will recall that at the last constitutional conference that was convened in February, 1979, we put that item on the agenda and consulted the provinces on the possibility and the desirability, from our point of view, of involving native peoples on the one hand and making sure that their representations were made.

In so far as the Yukon and the Territories are concerned, we have always followed the practice of ensuring their presence either as observers or, in some cases, as members of the federal delegation.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that there is widespread dissatisfaction in the north at the prospect of being either excluded from a conference of heads of government or being represented there by, in effect, federal bureaucrats. The Prime Minister indicated that it is the intention of his government to urge the participation of the territories' representatives in the process, if I correctly understood him.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to request of the provinces that an invitation to subsequent meetings be extended to elected representatives of the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, elected members of their respective councils?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker. I do not want there to be any misunderstanding on this. In the past, I have encouraged the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to be present either as special observers or as members of the federal delegation. I do not intend to urge the provinces to change the practice.

● (1420)

At the meetings which have been held thus far under my government and all previous governments, the practice has been that federal-provincial conferences are attended by first ministers of the provinces and of the federal government, not by representatives of the Territories.

Mr. Clark: The other day, in the House, the Prime Minister declined to indicate the agenda the federal government would be setting forth for the June 9 meeting because he had not received a reply from the government of Quebec.

Now that he has received a reply, would the Prime Minister tell us what agenda the government proposes for the meeting on June 9, and whether it will include a discussion of the means by which citizens of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories will be represented by people they elected, at subsequent constitutional meetings?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, no formal agenda has been agreed to by the provinces and the federal government; nor, I believe, was it the intention to have a specific and formal agenda. The meeting is an informal one on constitutional matters generally. We, for our part, have indicated, in correspondence which I will be pleased to table later today, that we hope at these meetings to agree on at least two things: the basic principles which must underlie our federation and, second, the method by which progress could be made in updating and modernizing the Constitution.

As to the second part of the question, that subject is not specifically on the agenda. Of course, if the matter arises on provincial initiative, or if I see fit to discuss it, I will, but I want to tell the prime minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: See how easy it is?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, lest the opposition should think I am forecasting the shape of things to come, I want to say that sometimes I speak to myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): A supplementary to the Prime Minister regarding the June 9 meeting. In view of the great interest in the constitutional discussion across the country, has he made a firm decision as to whether those meetings shall be held in public or in camera?

Mr. Trudeau: It was the generally expressed desire that the meeting of first ministers be private, but I believe it has already been indicated by one first minister that he intends to report everything that takes place. I, for my part, think I will wait until we have the meeting to see what rules of the game the first ministers wish to establish at that point.

Mr. Epp: Is it the right hon. gentleman's intention, at the meetings on June 9, to explore with the premiers the possibility of establishing a regular schedule of constitutional meetings with participation not only by the federal government and the provincial governments, but also exploring the possibility of future meetings on a regular basis to include Canadians in a broader pattern than is represented at a federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Trudeau: I feel that is a very constructive suggestion and I am quite certain the discussions will take that suggestion into account. When I say we shall be looking at the process for improving our basic constitution, that should be one of the methods we would look at. But I cannot at this time say what conclusions will be reached at the meeting of first ministers.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in the letters the Prime Minister is tabling at three o'clock, one common letter to the premiers of the predominantly English-speaking provinces and the other to the premier of the province of Quebec, there is a language difference: I do not want to suggest there is any difference in ideas; I just want clarification in light of what the Prime Minister has just said to the House.

In the letter to the premier of the province of Quebec, the Prime Minister indicates that the subject would be to reach agreement "both on the principles and on the process of constitutional change", whereas in the letter to the other premiers, the Prime Minister simply says that the purpose of the meeting is "to lay our future plans".

Does the Prime Minister really make any distinction between those two letters and, more specifically, is it clearly his intention not to attempt to reach an agreement on any matters of substance at the June 9 meeting?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to assure the leader of the New Democratic Party that both letters convey the same meaning and there was no intention, in the translation, of changing the emphasis of one aspect or another of the letter.

As for the second part of the question, I would ask the hon. member to repeat it.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I will include that second part in my second question. I asked the Prime Minister to indicate clearly, or reaffirm that it was not his intention to reach an agreement at the June 9 meeting, since it is private and since it is restricted to the first ministers, on any matter of substance in terms of constitutional change.

My second question, if the Prime Minister will deal with it at the same time, is this: last week he indicated an agreement in principle to the idea of including, as part of the federal delegation, leaders of opposition parties as well as, perhaps, other members of opposition parties in an attempt to get a broad, consensus approach to this serious question of constitutional change. Does he still stand by that, and is he urging his colleagues at the provincial level to establish the same principle?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if hon. leaders of the opposition parties are willing and available, it would be my intention to meet with them next week, at their convenience, to have a discussion among ourselves to see in what direction they would hope the federal government or myself would be leading the conversations at the meeting on the ninth.

I would not expect to extract any form of binding agreement but I would be interested in knowing if, among ourselves, the parties represented in this House of Commons, there is some basic agreement on the general principles underlying our federalism and, indeed, the ways in which they think progress could be made in a rapid way in renewing our federalism. I am convinced that I will be enlightened by such meetings and I hope I would be able to guide my own participation on the ninth on those discussions.

In so far as the end of the previous question regarding substance is concerned, Madam Speaker, we hope that basic principles of federalism will be discussed and to that degree there will, of course, be discussions of substance. I would not expect, even in my wildest dreams, that there would be agreement on some form of words to be put in which ultimately would be an amendment to our present Constitution. If that should happen, and if 11 of us should reach agreement at that meeting on part or the whole of a new Constitution, I would grab it and run.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have a final, two-part question on this important subject matter. I think the Prime Minister misunderstood the second part of my last question. I asked, does the Prime Minister agree in principle that as part of the delegation which he would lead to such a first ministers' conference on June 9, and it would not therefore be a first ministers' conference exclusively, the Canadian government delegation would include the Leader of the Opposition, myself and possibly other members of opposition parties? I would like him to answer that question.

The second part to the question, to go back to the question of representation by the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and native peoples' groups, would he agree that at subsequent meetings which take place concerning constitutional change there should be an expanded delegation coming from the federal government and the provinces, native peoples, representatives of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon who ought to have an opportunity publicly to make submissions to such meetings.

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to the first part of the question, Madam Speaker, I believe I already gave the answer a couple of weeks ago, but I will certainly repeat it: that if a measure of agreement can emerge among ourselves as to how best we can renew federalism, and do that with considerable speed, I would be most happy.

I can say in advance that, if such is the case, of course I would be happy to include members of the opposition and, certainly, leaders of the opposition parties in the federal delegation. But, of course, I cannot prejudge that until we have had some discussions.

With regard to the second part of the question, my answer is that just a few weeks ago I met the native chiefs and elders and their political leaders in Ottawa. I gave them an assurance that any constitutional discussions which would involve subjects close to their concerns—such as aboriginal rights, local government, and so on—would be subjects on which they would be consulted, without any decision being made before we had such consultations.

I fail to see at this moment that until we in the House, and perhaps we in the House with the Indians, natives and Inuit and we in the House with the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, have reached some measure of agreement, it would be productive to have federal-provincial conferences at which everyone airs their point of view but no progress is made. I think the House is seized of the importance of making progress quickly on this matter, otherwise we would be justifiably accused of not keeping our promise to renew federalism with as much haste as possible, and I want to create conditions where we can make progress.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR SAFETY

INSTALLATION OF MANDATORY FREQUENCIES AT AIRPORTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and it has to do with the important matter of air safety which continues to dominate a considerable amount of public attention.

Can the minister advise the House whether he has reviewed the policy of installation of mandatory frequencies at airports, since the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers' Association has voiced very strong objections to this installation inasmuch as it would constitute, in their view, a degradation of safety?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have not yet done so.

Mr. Mazankowski: Would the minister undertake to consult with CATCA before further installation, and would he not consider referring this matter to the Dubin inquiry?

With regard to a related question which arises out of the mid-air collision which took place in the Windsor area in July, 1979, and the subsequent investigation which was carried out which revealed there was inadequate co-ordination between the control towers of Windsor and Detroit, can the minister tell the House what action has been taken to rectify that dangerous situation?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I remember reading a memo explaining what went on, but I do not know what action has been taken since. But I will inquire as soon as I can.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you give notice of your questions?

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN—INVESTIGATION INTO UPGRADING—VALUE RECEIVED BY WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Could he inform the House and the farmers of western Canada whether he has investigated the problem of grade promotion, uppages or upgrading—they all mean the same thing—and if he has done so, could he tell us whether he has assured himself that the farmers in western Canada are receiving full value for their grain?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously this is a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and, as everybody knows, I am not in daily contact with the industry. I will inquire from the responsible member of the cabinet and I will report accordingly.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, would the minister, then, table a report to the House as he investigates this problem on the rationale behind grade promotion, uppages or upgrading, which right now is costing the Canadian farmer and the Canadian Wheat Board millions of dollars every crop year?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I will have a conversation with the minister responsible and report accordingly.

SHIPPING

SUBSIDY FOR DIRECT WATER SHIPMENT TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my question, as well, is for the Minister of Transport. With regard to the government's contractual obligations to NSL, has the minister as yet determined a policy or formula for establishing an equitable subsidy for direct water shipment to Newfoundland?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): This is obviously my day for very specific questions, Madam Speaker. I will inquire on that one: I am not aware of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I am tempted to ask the minister when he is going to provide some bridge pier-fendering for the protection of lives and to save money, but I will ask a supplementary question.

When can we expect a resolution of this question, which is of crucial concern not only to the Clark interests and other direct water carriers but, more important, to shippers and users of those goods and services in that island province?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I know that I am supposed to know everything. Unfortunately, I can not live up to these expectations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: I would like to say that if my hon. friends would like to give me notice of their questions, I could provide better answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES INACTION TO RATIFY EAST COAST FISHERIES' TREATY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the U.S. Senate is unlikely to ratify the Canada-U.S. east coast fishery treaty, and since U.S. fishermen are expanding their scallop fleet and increasing the scallop catch in the disputed territory—in direct defiance of the Canada-U.S. treaty signed over a year ago by Canada—will the Secretary of State for External Affairs, rather than simply expressing displeasure with the U.S. position, tell the House what plans he has now, or what attempts have been made either to place real pressure on the U.S. government to finalize this treaty or to protect Canadian fishermen from current U.S. inaction?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are in the process of formulating a policy for dealing with this serious problem. I am having a discussion with an opposition spokesman immediately after the question period today, and of course the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I are most preoccupied with this issue.

Mr. Miller: Either the government is really not aware of the seriousness of the situation, or they are unable to indicate their displeasure strongly enough to the U.S. government to ensure some action in that direction.

I should like to ask the minister why he does not have, at this time, a plan of action and a timetable which he can place before the U.S. government at which time he would expect some action; or can he recommend what kind of action the Canadian fishermen can take right now to protect their fishery and their income?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I do not know whether or not I need to give the hon. member an elementary lecture on the U.S. government. Our problem is not with the U.S. government: we have made our point very strongly to them. Their problem is that they cannot control the U.S. Senate on this issue. We have to formulate a strategy which would take account of the U.S. Senate as well as of the U.S. government.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ACTION TO ENSURE SUFFICIENT QUANTITIES OF GRAIN IN ELEVATOR SYSTEM

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and I trust that he will be able to answer it because it is important to the western producer.

Due to the action taken by the hon. member for Vegreville in getting grain moving when he was minister of transport, we now find that the elevator system within the Canadian Wheat Board area is operating at 47 per cent below capacity, and with one million tonnes less grain in the system than at this time last year. This is affecting terminal operating efficiency.

My question to the minister is: what action is the minister going to take to ensure that sufficient quantities of grain are in the country elevator system to ensure adequate supplies at the terminals? As of last week, it has been reported that CN could have moved 3,500 cars and only 2,400 were loaded.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was in Winnipeg yesterday, meeting with the grain transportation authority. I was provided with a factual report on what was happening, and I found that the situation is not at all what it was described as this morning. The increase this year is at the 15 per cent to 16 per cent level in exports, which is slightly less than anticipated by my predecessor, but which is considered in western Canada to be a very good performance indeed.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, the minister misinterpreted the question entirely and he did not answer it.

Mr. Clark: He read the only answer he had.

Mr. Towers: With a differential of up to 70 cents per bushel between the off-board and board feed barley, and with producers not being able to realize a higher price because of lack of quota, could the minister state what action he intends to take before the end of the crop year? Will he increase the initial price paid to producers, as well as raise the quotas? The minister must be held responsible for this—

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the initial prices this year were established at a level which was substantially higher than the initial prices last year. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board reported, at the time he made the announcement on the initial prices, that he would review them at the beginning of the coming crop year. That is the situation as it stands now.

An hon. Member: Unbelievable.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ABORTIONS—INQUIRY WHETHER LEGAL ACTION WILL BE TAKEN AGAINST DR. MORGENTALER

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, I should like to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that Dr. Henry Morgentaler performed 12 to 15 illegal abortions a week in his Champlain clinic in east end Montreal—

An hon. Member: Is that all?

Mr. Flis: Someone from the NDP says, "Is that all?" It seems to me that 12 to 15 a week is too many. He, and he alone, decided who will and, occasionally, will not have an abortion. What appropriate steps is the hon. minister prepared to take to bring Dr. Morgentaler within the full reach of the law?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the law provides for abortion committees. These committees should be in effect in hospitals and clinics.

An hon. Member: Tell us what you believe.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): If Dr. Morgentaler is not following the law, then this is a matter for the Quebec police or the local police to take action on. I would only say, from the federal point of view, that at the present time we are implementing the recommendations made in the Bagley report which was tabled in 1977.

AIRPORTS

IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES IN METROPOLITAN TORONTO AREA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. There are a number of outstanding and long overdue matters to be dealt with in the metropolitan Toronto area, such as additional runway capacity at Toronto international airport, the construction of a third terminal, the disposal of lands at Pickering, the decision on STOL at Island airport, the Buttonville satellite airport, the moratorium of additional landing rights, the broken promises on urban transit, the SOMPS report, and the Toronto Harbours Commission debt, just to name a few.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is just a beginning.

Mr. Jelinek: Could the minister tell this House what action he intends to take on these matters, especially considering the fact that in the previous government we had a plan of action which would have dealt with all these matters expeditiously? What action will he take?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend was speaking too fast for me to make notes on every question he raised. But if I were to act now on a number of them, what I would do would be illegal. The STOL question obviously is before the CTC. That is one I cannot rule on, obviously, because it would be illegal if I did that. On the Toronto Harbours, this question is coming before cabinet committee next week.

Mr. Stevens: What about Pickering?

Mr. Pepin: I am attending to all of them as time permits and also as time permits my colleagues to become acquainted with them.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I knew that federal transport problems were in limbo since the minister's takeover, but now I see the minister himself is also in limbo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: In order to simplify matters for the minister—he did not answer it quite correctly—my supplementary question is, could he now assure this House that he will put into action forthwith the programs which were initiated by his predecessor; and, if not, why is he wasting time? He has been in office and has had an opportunity to grasp the situation in transport. Why has he not taken action which is long overdue to deal with these problems?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am really doing a number of things. I could recite them here.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Pepin: In some cases there is no funding available. There were promises made during the electoral campaign. My hon. friend, who is a very distinguished gentleman, is also a very generous one, so he went around and made promises during the months of December and January the like of which has hardly ever been seen in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

VENUE OF HEARINGS ON PROPOSAL TO INCREASE OIL TANKER TRAFFIC ON B.C. COAST

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the presence of our distinguished visitor, Mr. Jacques Cousteau—who has been so concerned with the health of world oceans—I believe that my question is especially relevant today.

The National Energy Board has received notice from Trans Mountain Pipe Line Co. Ltd. that they intend to proceed with a rehearing this fall on their proposal to build an oil port in Washington state and to increase oil tanker traffic on the British Columbia coast. As the hearings are presently set for the fall of 1980, and as the last NEB hearings were held in Vancouver, will the minister undertake to hold these future hearings in Victoria, which is the area most directly affected by the proposal for increased tanker traffic?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that the government shares his concern over any increase in tanker traffic on the British Columbia coast. As my hon. colleague knows, the National Energy Board decides on its own where it will hold its hearings—it is an independent agency—but I want to assure him that I will convey his suggestion to the board. If it is possible, I think the NEB will consider his suggestion favourably. But again, I do not have the authority to force the board to hold its hearings in any location whatsoever.

[English]

INQUIRY WHETHER ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDIES WILL BE PRESENTED TO HEARINGS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. My supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment.

In view of the fact that the rehearing is being scheduled to hear environmental impact concerns, and that in the final report of the west coast oil ports inquiry the commissioner, Mr. Andrew Thompson, called on the federal government, in the event of future proposals involving Port Angeles, to set up a public inquiry to study navigational safety and the impact of oil spills as they affect Canada, will the minister undertake environmental impact studies to be presented on behalf of the Canadian people at the hearings this fall?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I will give careful consideration to the representations of the hon. member.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—REQUEST PRICE BE INCREASED FOR GRAIN CONSUMED DOMESTICALLY

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in this House. Members on this side of the House feel that the minister should keep himself informed.

Given the fact that farmers are subsidizing the cost of domestic grain consumed in Canada by $1 million a week, will the minister take the same steps taken by the former Progressive Conservative government and increase the price as of February 1, 1980, to bring some immediate relief to farmers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is a wrong basis for asking these questions. I am not the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Yes, you are.

Mr. Pepin: I answer in this House for the minister who is responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: No.

Mr. Clark: Read the order in council.

Mr. Pepin: Anyway, be that as it may, I will consult with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and bring an answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. Gustafson: Would the minister also find out for us how the farmers are to recover the $25 million they have lost?

Mr. Pepin: I will look into it, Madam Speaker.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—INCENTIVE PRICING ARRANGEMENT FOR GAS DESTINED FOR NEW EASTERN CANADIAN MARKETS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the continuing negotiations, which have been going on for the past year, into an incentive pricing arrangement for natural gas going into new markets in eastern Canada.

In view of the concern of many communities and industries that this gas price incentive be put in place, could the minister say when this agreement will be reached with the producing and consuming provinces; or is it awaiting the agreement which is yet to be reached on oil prices?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the question of incentive pricing for gas is part of the general discussions on energy prices which I am having at the present time with the producing provinces. I hope those discussions will be concluded favourably very shortly, and that the question of incentive pricing for gas will be concluded at the same time.

TRANSPORT

MECHANICAL DEFECTS IN AUTOMOBILES—ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIANS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for transport. It is a very important question because it deals with a matter of possible life or death for many Canadians.

In view of the fact that there have been thousands of sudden brake failures reported in the United States and Canada during the past 12 months, involving Volkswagen Rabbits, Sciroccos, Audi Foxes and Dashers, and since the mechanical defect of both the master cylinder and the back-up braking system appears to be the cause of this dangerous situation, will the minister inform this House what action his department has taken to protect Canadians from possible serious injury due to sudden brake failures in Volkswagen cars?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, first I will check to determine if there have been such complaints lodged. My department does not have the authority to recall. We investigate these situations and it is up to the companies to make the recalls. I will look into this very specific case and determine whether or not the company itself is in the process of recalling.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, in spite of the disclaimer by the Minister of Transport, it is a fact that officials of his own department have been investigating the safety-related defect since May, 1979, as has the U.S. national transportation safety administration.

In view of the fact that Volkswagen Canada, Inc., has failed to accept responsibility for repairing or replacing the defective braking systems, despite great risk to human life, will the Minister of Transport, in concert with his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, take action through this Parliament if necessary to force an immediate recall of all Volkswagen cars sold in Canada since 1975, so that this very dangerous mechanical defect can be repaired at no cost to Volkswagen owners?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I just said that we could not force the companies to make recalls. I will consult with the company and try to exercise the normal diplomatic pressures so that this measure will be contemplated.

RAILWAYS

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES TO IMPROVE GRADE LINES—CALLING OF PUBLIC TENDERS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise this House whether he is prepared to accept the Progressive Conservative government's initiative that in cases where government money is being spent to upgrade rail lines or rehabilitate grade lines, public tenders will be called for such work as bank widening, ballast and any work that can reasonably be carried out by independent contractors?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will look into present practices and act on the matter.

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, can the minister advise the House whether he is prepared to follow through on the previous PC government's initiative to set up an advisory committee made up of representatives of various grain companies, railways and the office of the grain co-ordinator, which would be charged with the responsibility of recommending the priority of upgrading or rehabilitating branch lines comprising the prairie line network?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my answer is the same as my previous answer.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CHILD CARE SERVICES—REQUEST LEGISLATION BE INTRODUCED

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child is meeting in Ottawa today. Since one of the commission's major recommendations is for greater participation of the federal government in expanding child care services across Canada, will the minister, in co-operation with the provinces, present a national child care act to this House to ensure a network of good quality child care services, and to help subsidize costs to low income parents?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I see that the hon. member reads the newspapers like everyone else. We have noted that the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child will deliver its report to the Prime Minister and to some ministers in a few minutes. I would like the hon. member to be kind enough to let us receive the report and consider the recommendations. I intend—and I can announce it immediately to the House—to table the report in Parliament tomorrow morning.

[English]

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, since most communities do not have sufficient capital to develop child care centres, and many elementary and pre-school children are left at home without adequate care, will the minister approve shared federal funding up to 75 per cent for start-up funds to renovate and equip new centres such as vacant school rooms, so that affordable day care and out-of-school care can be made available in most neighbourhoods?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question is based on statistics already out of date for 1977 and 1978 but in 1979, probably as the result of the excellent work to promote awareness made by the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child, the capacity of nurseries and day-care centres available for children who need them in Canada increased by 9 per cent as compared with the best previous year in 1976, that is, 17 per cent. This increased capacity is essentially due to a unique provision of the Canada Assistance Plan which encourages the expansion of nurseries with capital funds and payment of operating costs. The hon. member knows that the Canada Assistance Plan has that special provision only for nurseries, as far as I am aware, but we cannot do anything if a province does not take any action. In his case, I am sure that he will speak to the Ontario government.

AGTL AND PETRO-CANADA JOINT VENTURE AGREEMENT ON ALBERTA OIL SANDS PROJECT

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister confirm that the Alberta Gas Trunk Line company and Petro-Canada Exploration entered into a joint venture agreement to review the feasibility of developing a fourth oil sands mining complex in northern Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I can indeed confirm that agreement between Alberta Gas Trunk Line and Petro-Canada and the decision, I understand, was announced a few minutes ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Corbett: What a coincidence.

Mr. Lalonde: This decision represents a significant development in the pursuit of the general objectives of the Canadian government, both in terms of ensuring supply of petroleum for Canada in the 1990s and also ensuring expansion of Canadian ownership in that most important sector.

AIR TRANSPORT

SCHEDULED JET AIR SERVICE TO BRANDON, MAN.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I discussed the subject matter with him previously, so he will know what I am about to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: He still will not answer.

Mr. Mayer: It concerns the lack of scheduled first-class jet air service to the Brandon area. Would the minister tell the House and the people of that area what the government's position is in terms of this service, which is very much in need in that important area of Manitoba?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I had the great pleasure of meeting with the mayor of Brandon last night in Winnipeg. He informed me of the eagerness of the municipality and the authorities to express their views. As my old friend knows, the case is still before the CTC. The difficulty we have is that the CTC has so much work at this time that it cannot deal with this matter as fast as it would like. However, I am trying to help matters move faster.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question deals with the same topic, to the same minister. He spoke earlier to the effect that the previous minister of transport had been very generous. In this case he was not generous; he was very responsible in making a decision to allow a regional carrier to apply for that route. It is one thing to be sort of passive in agreement, but what we need is active support for that air service.

Would the minister give the same kind of support to that service, in terms of speeding up hearings at the ATC, so that the service can be put into place as quickly as possible? It is something we have done without in that area for far too long: there are 180,000 people without service, not only in southwestern Manitoba but in southeastern Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, in some ways my predecessor could be accused of having forced the hand of the CTC in this matter. I would prefer, as I have every right under the law—

Mr. Clark: He could be accused of knowing his portfolio.

Mr. Pepin: —to revise the decision of the CTC. I would prefer the CTC to make an objective appraisal of the situation, knowing full well that I and the government as a whole can change that decision if judged necessary.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it being Thursday, I wonder if I might put the usual House business question to the government House leader about the balance of the week, on the understanding that tomorrow is an allotted day.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Indeed, Madam Speaker, we will resume today consideration of the motion for second reading of the legislation to provide the government with supplementary borrowing authority for fiscal year 1980-81. Tomorrow is an allotted day. On Monday, in case we have not completed the debate on second reading, we will continue consideration of Bill C-30, to provide the government with supplementary borrowing authority for fiscal year 1980-81. Then, we will deal with the bill to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and motion No. 1, in the name of the government, calling for the establishment of a Ministry of State for Social Development. Later, we will go on to Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. If, in the middle of next week, we have completed consideration of these pieces of legislation, I will then be pleased to inform my hon. colleague of the other measures ready to be dealt with.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, as the government House leader knows, we on this side try to ask these Thursday questions in a low key without any element of confrontation. But I have to say to the minister that my annoyance quotient is getting very high with respect to his delay in telling the House anything definite about the bill that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is to bring in, having to do with the widows of disabled veterans. Two weeks ago the minister said I would not have to ask the question many more times, but a week ago he said it would be in before the end of the year.

Madam Speaker, this was the subject of a bill in the last session, so the work has been done. The Minister of Veterans Affairs said he hoped to make improvements to it. Before the House met, he indicated it would be brought in soon. This is a matter of great urgency, and I call on my good friend, the government House leader, not to play around with it any more but by next Thursday to tell us when that bill is going to be brought in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I hope I can provide a satisfactory answer to my hon. colleague. However I am in a position to give him confirmation that as a result of his numerous representations and immediately following his first intervention I have asked the responsible minister to deal with this matter so that the bill may be drafted as soon as possible. The minister gave me that assurance personally and also gave it to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

We are now working on that bill and as soon as it is ready we will introduce it before the House and try to expedite it as swiftly as possible. However, I cannot give any personal commitment to my distinguished colleague that this bill will be introduced before Thursday next. If we can do so later on today I will, but if it is delayed to mid-July, we will do it then. We will do it when everything is ready and I can assure the hon. member that we will not unduly delay the introduction of that bill.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Do it in June.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MACKAY—QUESTION PERIOD ANSWER OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief point of order with respect to the answer the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) gave the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer). If I may have the attention of the Minister of Transport, I should like to direct his attention to the answer that he gave the hon. member for Portage-Marquette.

I may have misinterpreted it, but I understood from his answer that he, in effect, accused the former minister of transport, his predecessor, with forcing the hand of the CTC which is supposed to be an independent body. I see the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has just come into the chamber: he might like to elaborate on that answer. I thought it might not be a good thing to leave it on the record in the form in which I understood it, if I understood it correctly.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, if I can say just a few words on that, I did not mean to insult anybody. I just said there are two ways of looking at this particular situation, one in which the minister defines a situation beforehand on which he expresses views, and then the case goes before the CTC and is implemented by the board. That is one way of going at it.

I said that in some ways this might be considered—I think I am very precise—or could be considered as forcing the hand of the CTC. I said that I prefer the other way around, that is, the CTC makes a decision and because of sections 25 and 64 of the act I can, and the cabinet can, review that situation and change it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): On the same point of order raised by my colleague, Madam Speaker, I would simply reserve the right to check to see precisely what exchange did take place. If, as my hon. colleague indicated, the minister suggested that I had interfered wrongly or unduly with the operations of the CTC, I would certainly want to examine that exchange and reserve the right to raise a point of order or a question of privilege at a later date.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKNIGHT—LACK OF ANSWERS ON CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise on this question of privilege with great reluctance, but I also do it because of the importance, the concern and the necessity of the people of western Canada, the grain producers, the farmers and the cattlemen who apparently are totally ignored by this government. I have asked five questions in this House; as a matter of fact, with four supplementaries. The only question that was answered was answered by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael).

Madam Speaker, I should like to read from The Canada Gazette, part II, volume 114, No. 6, page 622, assigning the Hon. Hazen Argue to assist the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) respecting the Canadian Wheat Board, the Two-Price Wheat Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act. The farmers of western Canada have a need and a desire for knowledge from this House. This is the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. He has an assistant in the other place—an assistant, not a minister.

I would ask, with all due respect, Madam Speaker, if anyone on the other side—the Prime Minister or anyone—could provide us with a minister so that we could obtain information here, and in turn present it to our constituents who demand it and desire it of us. If you find in my favour, Madam Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Prime Minister instruct a minister in this House to be responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. minister wish to reply?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can only observe that my hon. friends on the other side were organized today to bring the point that my friend is now making. This is a situation that I cannot, obviously, change; it is not in my power to do so. I was given the job, and I am trying to do it as well as I can.

If my hon. friends wanted to accommodate me to any extent, that is, when they ask me questions that in some cases even the Canadian Wheat Board cannot answer without days of research, if they wanted to give me notice of these questions beforehand, I think they could be accommodated very well. I could provide the information. Inasmuch as they do not want to, we have the situation that we have now.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): On this question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I regret that the minister not only does not understand his responsibilities, but does not understand the question of privilege that has been raised here.

He said in this House minutes ago, during the question period, that he is not the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. That was his statement. That was his claim. That was his excuse for knowing nothing about matters of basic and fundamental interest to the grain producers of this country.

● (1510)

Mr. Clark: The point raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), when he cited an order in council was that an order in council vesting ministerial responsibility does not vest the responsibility for reporting to Parliament for the Wheat Board in someone in the other place: it vests that responsibility, clearly and categorically, in the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

I will read again the order in council, PC 1980-605 dated March 4, 1980, in which His Excellency the Governor General in Council appoints the Hon. Hazen Robert Argue a Minister of State. I will quote the very relevant part, Madam Speaker:

—to assist the Minister of Transport in the carrying out of the latter's responsibilities—

That is, in the carrying out of the Minister of Transport's responsibilities. It continues:

(a) in respect of the Canadian Wheat Board; and (b) as minister for the purposes of the Two-Price Wheat Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

The order in council makes it abundantly clear that there is not another minister in another place upon whom this Minister of Transport can shuck off responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is his job to know what the Wheat Board is doing. It is his job to report to this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is his job to take responsibility. It may well be simply a matter of opinion whether or not the minister is carrying out that job well. We think he is carrying it out abominably, Madam Speaker. I cannot remember a minister in my time in the House of Commons who has come into this House day after day less prepared than the Minister of Transport has in relation to very important questions relating to the Canadian Wheat Board. But that is a matter of opinion.

The question of privilege at stake here has to do with the attempt by this minister to deny, here, on the floor of the House of Commons, responsibilities which are clearly assigned to him by an order in council. It is bad enough that he does not know the details of matters relating to the Canadian Wheat Board: what is even worse is that he should come before this House of Commons and try to tell us and the people of Canada that he is not, in fact, responsible for matters for which an order in council of his own government makes him responsible. It is time for this government and for this minister to accept responsibility here in this House of Commons, not to relegate the problems of Canadian grain growers to a secondary status or to a matter of being so unimportant that the minister denies his responsibilities for them.

I believe that we are seized here of a very real question that touches the rights of members on this side of the House of Commons and, indeed, members anywhere in the House of Commons who represent grain growers whose interests are affected by the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. They have a right to expect that there will be a minister here who will answer questions.

The order in council and the law of the land imposes upon that minister, the Minister of Transport, the responsibility to come here. He has tried today to deny that he has the responsibility given him by the order in council. That is simply unacceptable, Madam Speaker, not simply to this House but to any concept of responsible government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) longs for his few years of law and is trying to give interpretation to an order in council even though what is more important is that members of the House obtain information that is as complete and as accurate as possible. What the minister did today in the House in replying to a few questions was done in the most honest and the fairest way possible. He replied that he was planning on consulting the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, who sits in the Senate, and that he would obtain all necessary information and report later to the House so as to provide hon. members with the fullest and most accurate reply possible.

Madam Speaker, I find it difficult to understand why some members try to interpret a document simply for interpretation purposes without truly considering what they are looking for. When hon. members ask questions in the House, what they want is not so much to know how to interpret an order in council as to obtain an accurate, full and honest answer.

If the Progressive Conservatives really want full answers to their questions, I wonder why the Leader of the Opposition objects to the fact that the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) wishes to consult his colleague, who is in fact the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, so as to be able to give specific details and provide the information requested by opposition members.

If this persists, Madam Speaker, we shall have no other alternative but to conclude that, in fact, what the members of the Progressive Conservative party want is not so much serious and full replies to their questions as the simple opportunity to play political games in a Parliament which has no time for such things.

Madam Speaker, I find it totally unacceptable for the Leader of the Opposition to take up the time of the House at this time, when Parliament has been in session only a very short time this last year because of two general elections in quick succession, to amuse himself by interpreting orders in council and attempting to show that the Minister of Transport is acting irresponsibly when he wants to obtain some facts to provide a full and accurate answer to one of his colleagues. I find this totally unacceptable. Instead of taking up our time by attempting to interpret certain documents, I would ask him rather to try to obtain full answers like the one the Minister of Transport wants to give his colleagues.

Madam Speaker: I have heard two speakers from each side on that point of privilege. If I may, I would like to state that with the remarks made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), this House somewhat strayed in my view from the original point of privilege. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition spoke on who was responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, while the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) was rather in the nature of representations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), representations stemming from the fact that the hon. member is not satisfied either with the answers he received or the situation arising in this House from the fact that a minister who is a member of the upper chamber is responsible—on which point I will not interpret the nature of his responsibilities because it is not for me to do so—or in any case on who should answer questions pertaining to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The remarks made by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster were rather in the nature of representations, and certainly he will understand that points of privilege may not be raised to make representations. In conclusion, on its face, the point raised by the hon. member is certainly very important, it probably deserves to be debated at length in this House, but this may not be done under a question of privilege.

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), has raised a substantive question of privilege. I am not challenging your ruling, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member is referring to the ruling that I have just made, I feel that I cannot hear him. If it is a point of order pertaining to some other matter, I will hear him with pleasure; but he must be very careful not to allude to the ruling I have just made.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, first I want to know what was the disposition of the substantive motion made by the hon. member in support of what he and many of us consider to be a prima facie case of privilege. The fact that there is a minister in this House who, under the order in council, is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is the question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Precisely. It was a substantive motion, and there was no notice given of that substantive motion. Furthermore, quite obviously, by the argumentation set forth by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), he was making representations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about a situation which he does not find satisfactory. He can debate that at any time he wishes, but my ruling must stand.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect to the question of notice, I think if it had been the kind of matter that occurred in other than the question period, it would be one upon which notice could be given at the appropriate time prior to the next sitting of the House. But I would not want your response with respect to the question of notice to imply that if written notice is not given, members are precluded then from raising at three o'clock matters that occurred during the course of the question period, otherwise we would be denied some very substantial rights. I am sure Your Honour did not intend that, but I want that to be clear. I hope that Your Honour would express that that is not her intention.

Madam Speaker: I said two things: that a substantive motion does require notice. I also said that the nature of the argumentation brought forth by the hon. member seemed to me to be that of representations and did not appear to be a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When you recognized members to participation in the privilege motion by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), you did not recognize anyone from this party. I know you have the right to recognize whom you choose. What I want to say is that we support very strongly the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster. I do not know whether you will allow me to continue, because you have already made your ruling.

It is very important that I put on the record that we were not recognized to comment and that we support very strongly what the hon. member said. We are very unhappy with the way the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has handled questions regarding the Wheat Board. When he said today that he is not responsible for it, we think that is a real infringement of our privileges as members of Parliament who come from western ridings where wheat is very important.

We have an obligation in this House to pose questions on this topic. The government has an obligation to make sure there is someone on the government benches who can respond with intelligence to our questions. I see, Madam Speaker, that you are trying to cut me off. I want to make the point that I think we should have had some say in this debate.

Madam Speaker: First, it is true that I did not recognize someone from the New Democratic Party. I said that I had listened to two members on one side, two on the other side, and that I felt sufficiently informed in order to make a ruling. However, I must point out to the hon. member that he, too, is arguing the question. This is a grievance that members have vis-à-vis the government. They are quite free to bring any kind of grievance before this House, but not under the guise of a question of privilege.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. JELINEK—QUESTION PERIOD ANSWERS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my point of order is on a related matter but not on the same question of privilege. It is a point of order which I believe the minister could clear up.

Today, Madam Speaker, as you saw and heard during the question period, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) put on one of the most disappointing, if not disgraceful, performances on record in this House. Not only did he not even attempt to answer questions pertaining to the Wheat Board, but he could not answer any questions relating to the Department of Transport today, as in the past. It is obvious that the minister is not taking the necessary time and effort to brief himself on one of the most important portfolios affecting every Canadian across this country—not only every member of the House of Commons but every Canadian.

I said at the outset that the minister could clarify the situation today, right here and now. I ask him to take the only honourable step open to him in respect of his performance so far in this House of Commons, that is, to resign from his position as Minister of Transport and allow somebody who will take the necessary steps to brief himself and to be responsible as a minister in this very important portfolio.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows that the Chair is in no way capable of ensuring that a member will be satisfied with the quality, length or breadth of an answer to any question posed by a member of the opposition or, in fact, a member of any party. If a member is not satisfied, he can ask more questions day after day after day. That is the whole object of the question period. However, I do not believe it is a point of order.

MR. TAYLOR—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise, on a point of order, on the matter of false information being given to the House. When he talked about the Wheat Board, the minister said, "I am not the minister responsible". The order in council shows that he is the minister responsible. Therefore, I suggest that this matter be held in abeyance until after Madam Speaker has had a chance to read the record, because false information was given to the House.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is entering into a debate. This is not a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MALONE—FAILURE TO CONVENE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise on a different and very important question of privilege dealing with the rights of all members of this House, and one that we can underscore as restricting members from their full opportunity to participate in Parliament. It deals with the fact that, for whatever the reasons, the government of the day has failed to put this Parliament into action, as demonstrated by the fact that as of this moment 13 out of 20 committees are not functioning. If we take a look at those committees, six of them have never met, and seven have met only to have their organizational meeting but have not met since.

In light of the discussion we just had on a question of privilege dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board, if we look at that particular institution it will be noted that the Canadian Wheat Board has a budget as large as the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan combined. It reports to no one except members of Parliament, and yet members of Parliament are denied the opportunity to call that agency to account. Members of Parliament are the only people who can call that agency to account.

If we look at the committees on agriculture, fisheries and forestry, health and welfare, justice and legal affairs, miscellaneous private bills, procedure and organization, and a great number of other committees, we find in fact that they have never met or they have in no way—

Mr. Knowles: Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Malone: The member of the New Democratic Party says that veterans affairs has not met. As hon. members know, if there is a motion in the committee and that motion is passed by the committee, it must be brought to this Parliament and debated here if there is a wish by any one member to call for it. However, we cannot call for that motion if the committee does not sit. We cannot speak in this chamber if those committees will not allow us to raise the motion with the possibility of passing it and therefore bringing it to this chamber.

Those members who have been here for some time are clearly aware of the narrow restriction of what is and what is not privilege: it is whether or not we are restricted to function in Parliament in this chamber. However, when we look at the issues that we could potentially face, the committee function, surely we have to come to the conclusion that you can bar a member in a committee by somehow not allowing him to speak, putting him out of the committee or physically or psychologically cutting him off. Surely you can do the same thing by never having the committees function, and thereby denying a member that right.

If you take the committee function which would bring to this Parliament a variation of activities, amendments, motions or whatever, and make it so it cannot be proceeded with here, then surely it has to be a concern when we say our right to speak or to influence this Parliament has been denied.

I wish to refer to citation 578 of Beauchesne which deals with the need to call committees early. It is citation 579(2), which puts a responsibility for that clearly on the government whip, and citation 570 which stresses that committees must give preference to due and sufficient consideration.

I am not sure what the members on the government side would consider due consideration, but today is the forty-fifth day after this Parliament resumed on April 14. Surely we do not need to wait beyond some 45-day period with more than 50 per cent of the committees either not formed or never having met for the first meeting. There are, before us, all the estimates. We should have a right to call those estimates, as members of parliament, in order to review them, analyse them, criticize them or make amendments. We should have the right to make a motion which would bring a debate to the floor of this chamber. However, we are denied that opportunity because the government of the day simply will not strike the committees or have the committees called to meet.

One of the questions that members of Parliament are starting to ask is, "Why are we here?" There are systems set up whereby we can function, work and represent our constituencies on the issues of the country. However, if they will not put the systems in place, then by default what the government is doing is making it so that Parliament will not, and cannot, work.

We see situations like the explosion of Mount St. Helens, in Washington, which is having an effect on the spawning of salmon on the west coast; but there is no fisheries and forestry committee. Very early in the spring and summer of 1980 we have had by far the largest number of acres of forest destroyed by fire that we have had in our history; but find there is no forestry committee meeting. When we find there is no forestry committee meeting, then surely the rights of members are, in fact, being denied.

I would like to quote just one other instance of this, Madam Speaker. I refer to the occasion just a few weeks ago when the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) rose under the provisions of Standing Order 26. You will recall he was endeavouring to bring to Your Honour's attention, and to the attention of the House, his concern about the very severe drought in the three prairie provinces. At that time, Madam Speaker, you denied the emergency debate on the following grounds—and I quote your words:

In this instance I am sure the hon. member knows that the matter can be raised in the committee where the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are currently being studied.

Madam Speaker, that was some weeks ago, yet the Standing Committee on Agriculture is only today meeting for the first time. So up to this moment, 45 days after April 14, when there was an urgent request made by one member followed by the suggestion that he could take the matter up before a committee, there has been no committee. So I would again say I think we are being denied.

If we take a look at the miscellaneous estimates committee we find that the committee met, mapped out two weeks of work, and has not met since. I think that speaks for itself about the kind and quality of work the government is directing us to do and about our inability to function. I argue that the right of members of Parliament to scrutinize estimates, to examine government policy, to analyse and make suggestions about alternative policy, belongs to every member of this House. A member is denied the privilege of being able to participate if the system denies him the opportunity to do so.

I believe I do have a question of privilege under the provisions of Standing Order 75(2), and I glean some information from that Standing Order although there are many others which are relevant. It says:

All amendments made in committee shall be reported to the House.

How can I, as a member of Parliament, affect in this House something that would come out of an extension of the House if that extension does not exist? The committees have always been viewed by members of Parliament as an extension of Parliament. When we sit in committee we are sitting in an extension of Parliament. I am sure members of all parties, when their constituents come to sit in the galleries in the afternoons and ask "Where are you?", tell them: "I am in committee, which is an extension of the House." That is a part of the House activities. Standing Order 75(2) states that all amendments adopted in committees must be brought to the House. But we cannot do this when more than half of the committees, 45 days after this Parliament met, are not sitting.

Madam Speaker, if in your judgment I have a bona fide question of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the unacceptable failure of the leader of the government in the House of Commons to give instructions or references so as to cause the committees of this House to function, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

As a footnote, I would like to add that this is one of the committees which, by chance, happens to be meeting.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Madam Speaker. I would like to emphasize the remarks made by my colleague from Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), because it is absolutely unacceptable in my view that at this point in time, in the sixth week of this Parliament, a number of our committees are defective. I remember very well that when we were in committee to discuss the current rules of procedure, we ensured that it would not be necessary to wait for motions of reference from the government before estimates could be sent to a committee. In fact, once the estimates are introduced, they are automatically referred, and committees are in place because the first motions are for the nominations committee, and committees are appointed in a matter of days. But this is ended for the major part, and the government whip is directly responsible for this.

The only way we can act is to submit our grievance to the Chair. We can voice our grievances, and how! This is a tactic worthy of Marie-Antoinette, to say in the House that you can discuss a certain matter in committee when that committee does not even exist. This is not a satisfactory way to deal with matters when there is a crisis in one region of the country. When there was a dry spell in eastern Ontario, your predecessor, Mr. Lamoureux, had agreed to an emergency debate. And now, we also have rules in this respect; there is no interference with the work of the House since these emergency debates are held after the ordinary time for adjournment, such as Wednesday night. Therefore, why say that when it does not exist? However, tomorrow will be an opposition day. Such days are provided so that the opposition will use information to judge the administration of one department after having studied certain votes. But how is it possible to do that if half the committees do not meet? We cannot study the votes if we do not have them before us.

The opposition is completely frustrated in its efforts. It may be that government members do not know that we can be frustrated with respect to matters we want to raise during opposition days. And to state merely that those days exist and you may air your complaints, if it is not possible to seek out these complaints or to expound on them, this is another method worthy of Marie-Antoinette. I simply say that I agree very strongly with my colleague from Crowfoot and it is now imperative that the government whip be asked to appear before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to explain why he has neglected his duties, and on this point I support the motion.

[English]

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in speaking to the question of privilege raised by my friend the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), I, too, would like to reflect on the frustration I feel as a member of this House, duly elected and fully equal to all other members, to engage in the full parliamentary process in accordance with parliamentary traditions, and long-established and respected routines.

Without meaning any disrespect to the Chair, I think it is Your Honour's responsibility to recognize that there is an arrogance on the part of the government, a lack of co-operation which ought to be unacceptable to the Canadian people and which is certainly unacceptable to members on this side of the House. In light of my interest in fisheries in particular, I find absolute frustration in the fact that some $300 million worth of spending under the jurisdiction of the minister responsible for fisheries is contained within the estimates for the current year, yet we in this House through the process of committee work are not able to examine those estimates. We have long, unresolved questions relating to federal fisheries licensing policy, questions related to reports which the committee should have been dealing with a year ago, and we are not even able to secure enough of the time of the House to get detailed answers from the minister responsible. It is, therefore, a travesty that the committee has not been organized, let alone called to this date after almost seven weeks of sitting of this House.

There have been two motions under Standing Order 43, one last Thursday and another again yesterday, moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) censuring the government and directing it to get on with the calling of committees so that this important work might commence.

We recently had a volcanic eruption that has decimated the salmon stocks of the western Washington coastal region, and we have Washington fishermen now suggesting that they should have a greater share of the salmon yield from the Fraser River. That is a matter of some urgency in which all of our west coast fishermen have considerable interest. We should be able to question the minister on what approaches he is making to his American counterpart, and what initiatives he is taking on behalf of west coast fishermen to see that their interests are protected.

Of course, as my colleague the hon. member for Crowfoot mentioned, and other colleagues might wish to go into greater detail, we have forest fires raging across this country, a matter which ought to be before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

The fishing season is under way, yet the minister has yet to make any announcement on fishing licensing regulations and fee structures in the commercial fishery and the sport fishery. There are fishermen who are expecting to go out fishing or, indeed, are out already who do not know what size salmon they should be throwing back into the water. There is a whole host of related questions that we know the minister has under deliberation.

In the Speech from the Throne we heard reference to a special landing tax or levy against the catch of west coast fishermen, and we want to question the minister about that concept because we think the fishermen of Canada are very, very concerned about what that will mean to their incomes this year, particularly given a very tight situation in terms of the prices that world markets are yielding.

There are important conservation considerations, the east and west coast joint Canada-U.S. negotiations affecting our fisheries, and there was a review of the Fresh Water Fish Marketing Corporation in process, all questions that have gone without answers because the government opposite is frustrating the process of this Parliament and its opportunity to get detailed answers to these questions.

In supporting this question of privilege I would urge that you, Madam Speaker, consider very seriously that the work of Parliament is being frustrated. Ministers are abdicating their obligations to members of Parliament and this is a mark of their arrogance and their lack of respect for Parliament. I think this is absolutely inexcusable.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I will be rising, I hope, later today on another matter of privilege, or a point of order, I suppose, technically, but that matter pales by comparison with the import of the motion that my colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), has put forward this afternoon having to do with the failure of some of our standing committees of Parliament to meet. While I had not intended to speak on the motion, I was so moved by his eloquence and the eloquence of other members I felt obliged to respond. The motion relates fundamentally to the rights of every member of this House, regardless of party and regardless of where any particular member might sit.

The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) has referred to the failure of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to meet, a failure even to have an organizational meeting. He has discussed some important and urgent matters relating to fisheries. For just a moment or two I would like to elaborate on that point by illustrating the importance of some other issues coming under the rubric of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

I refer in particular to the urgent issues having to do with the environment, in respect of which I am the official spokesman of the Progressive Conservative Party. All of the urgent problems to which I might refer could not be itemized in the short time I have at my disposal. But I should mention, and it is only an illustration, the problem of acid rain, a form of pollution that is devastating our forests, our waters, our air, our land and our wildlife; indeed, it is threatening human life itself. That is a matter which could be dealt with effectively, not just in Parliament on the floor of the House of Commons itself, but as well in the forum that standing committees provide.

Another example is resource development. Huge initiatives being taken—for instance, in the Arctic—threaten our environment, our precious and delicate ecosystems there. That is an issue, too, that should be dealt with in the relevant standing committees of the House which are failing to meet.

What about the proposals for tanker routes down our coasts and the threat they pose to our environment? And what about oil exploration everywhere, including that in my own region of Atlantic Canada and the threat it presents to our fish stocks? Another illustration is agricultural spraying. All such matters cry out for urgent attention by every member of this House regardless of party and regardless of where a member might sit. Because these standing committees are not meeting, the government is, in effect, failing to provide members of the House of Commons with one of the most important forums in which to address national problems. Members of Parliament are, consequently, being denied a fundamental right.

All those issues I mentioned, and many others that could be referred to, need to be discussed in standing committees. Since they are not, we are being denied the right, for example, to hold relevant ministers accountable for their portfolios. It is a basic principle of parliamentary democracy and of responsible government that ministers must account to members of the House of Commons in every parliamentary forum, whether in the House of Commons or in standing committees, which are, as one member pointed out, an extension of this House. We do not have that opportunity, for some of the standing committees have yet to meet. We are, therefore, being denied our full privileges, and in the process the principle of responsible government itself is being undermined.

It is for those reasons, and for many others, that I take great pride in supporting the motion put forward by the hon. member for Crowfoot, and I urge all other members to support it likewise.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in my view there is no more fundamental question of privilege raised in this House than this; that has been my experience after serving eight years in this House. It is further testimony, to my way of thinking, to the arrogance of this particular government in denying the right of members on all sides of the House to exercise their functions; hence privilege. This is the definition of privilege. Members are being denied the possibility of even exercising their full functions to legislate, to inquire and to hold ministers to account for the performance of their duties.

There was a package of parliamentary reform available for presentation by the government in the Thirty-first Parliament. It was to have been placed before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and it would have obviated this particular problem we are now facing. That package would have permitted, had it been accepted, the members of the committees to call the committees together without having to wait on an inefficient, ineffective and arrogant government to agree, to condescend to allow committees to be brought together in order to fulfil their functions, or one of the functions of Parliament, and to permit members of this Parliament to perform their functions.

That package would have been brought before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in this Parliament had the committee been allowed to be brought together by an order of the House. There should be an automatic reference of every ministerial report, any departmental report, to committee so that the committee would have, by virtue of the tabling of that particular report, access to the minister in charge of the department.

My colleagues have spoken of the various problems this country is facing owing to the drought, forest fires, the fall-out from Mount St. Helens and its effects on the forestry industry, the fishing industry and agriculture. But there is no possibility of discussing these subjects in committee because under the standing rules it is the government alone that makes the reference to the House. The House concurs in the reference once the government has drawn it up, but there has to be, if this Parliament is to have any meaning whatever and if your role, Madam Speaker, is to have any meaning whatever, with all due respect, a means for this Parliament to function and for members to exercise the duties and responsibilities for which they were sent to this Parliament by their constituents.

Therefore, I support every single word, comma, apostrophe and parenthesis, the whole statement, of my colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone). I encourage you, Madam Speaker, to rule that we should have the means now of calling the committees together so that we may fulfil our duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with all due respect since several hon. members have spoken, I would not like to offend them by allowing a ruling to be brought down which seems obvious to me. The case before the House has nothing to do with the question of privilege. Intelligent reading of Standing Order 65(1)— I hear the hon. member from Vancouver howling. Let him have his say, after which I can resume my remarks. The Progressive Conservative member from Vancouver just yelled something. I did not catch what he said.

Madam Speaker: The hon. President of the Privy Council has the floor.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I was just saying that intelligent reading of our Standing Orders shows that Standing Order 65(1) stipulates as follows:

> At the commencement of the first session of each Parliament, a striking committee, consisting of seven members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, within the first ten sitting days after its appointment, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the House:

Then, a list is given of 20 standing committees of the House. We have fulfilled our obligation, Madam Speaker. The striking committee was appointed and the list drawn up of hon. members chosen to sit on those committees. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) brought up two points which deserve consideration. The first concerns the organization of those committees, and the second the fact that some committees, though constituted, are not sitting.

On the first point, I want to advise the hon. member that I am surprised by his statement because, according to my information, the overwhelming majority of the standing committees of the House have been organized. In fact, it seems that only two committees, three at the most, are not yet fully organized, and that is not through any fault on the part of the government. Furthermore, as to the committees which are organized and which, according to the hon. member, have not met to date, I want to tell the House that it is the responsibility of the committees themselves to set their own procedure and make their own decisions. I hear an hon. member say that he has been sitting in the House for a few years and that he thinks this is the most important question of privilege he has ever heard in his life. I refer to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). I think he is sincere when he says that it is a very important matter, but I am not under any obligation to share his views.

This, to my mind, is the least important question of privilege I have ever heard being raised in the House. Madam Speaker, when the committees are formed, it is up to them to determine their procedures, their time of sitting and their activities, and the House has no authority to intervene unless it has received a report for any one of these committees. To my knowledge, there has been no report from those committees that would justify the intervention of hon. members who are criticizing. I want to make it quite clear that the committees are masters of their procedures and we cannot consider what goes on or does not go on in committee unless a report is brought before the House; we can only discuss the report.

Now there is another basic principle that applies. Standing Order 65(8) enumerates the powers of the committees and states that those committees are empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House, and not by government. I heard earlier my colleagues say the government decides what a committee is going to study. In fact, the rules indicate quite clearly that the House does. I, for one, have a lot more respect for Parliament than those who say government members alone determine what a committee is going to study. There is a forum here where we can discuss, where the opposition can be heard, can make its point, and the reference can be the result of a debate in this House. In fact, the House makes the reference, not the government. So those who argued the government had failed to have matters referred to committees are mistaken and run counter to Standing Order 65(8).

In any event, Madam Speaker, on the whole I do not believe the hon. member for Crowfoot has reason to complain. He says the estimates are now before all appropriate committees. That is true. But he should know that under the agreement we reached the standing committees are going to have a lot more time to consider the estimates than they would have had had the normal rules applied. But, as we know, because of the two successive elections in the previous year, it was impossible to apply the normal rules so the standing committees of the House, following an agreement we reached, instead of having three months to consider the main estimates, are going to have nearly nine months to do it. So if there is a delay of a few days in getting the committees organized, well, I want to reassure my hon. colleague there is no great loss there. He will still have a lot more time to consider the estimates than he would have had had the normal rules applied.

So, Madam Speaker, all things considered, when you take the two arguments raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot, you realize there is no question of privilege because, on the first point, we acted diligently to get the committees organized. Out of 20-odd committees mentioned in Standing Orders, at least 17 have been set up and the other two or three are in the process of being organized, and if they have not been set up yet, there is no evidence here to suggest the government was at fault. Nothing shows that it is not due to the action or inaction of some members opposite. I am not saying that; there is no evidence. On this matter, to establish if there is a question of privilege you must have before you some elements of evidence. There is a total lack of any proof that the government would be responsible for the fact that two or three committees have not yet been organized with a chairman and a vice-chairman elected.

As concerns the second point, the fact that some of those committees have not yet met, it might be because first, there have not been enough references coming from this House except for the estimates which we shall be able to study at length. We have not been able to study enough bills and not enough bills have been passed in second reading to justify a committee meeting. Then, there is no indication, no evidence before this House that one or several committees have been instructed to meet. Here again those who have complained are also responsible for that. No allegation was made nor proof given that a request had been made to have an organized committee meet and that such a request had been refused. Nothing along that line has been proven or set forth in this House. Moreover, I can confirm in the presence of my colleagues the parliamentary leaders that this matter was never raised during our many meetings since the beginning of this session.

In light of the facts I have just mentioned, Madam Speaker, it seems obvious that the question raised has some interest. As for me I will do everything in my power to expedite the organization of the two or three remaining committees. I will do everything I can to ensure that these committees are willing to meet as soon as possible, but until now there has been absolutely no cause to justify the motion presented by the hon. member for Crowfoot. There was certainly no breach of the rules which would justify a decision by the House that there is in this respect a prima facie question of privilege. For all these reasons then, Madam Speaker, I ask you to reject this motion and conclude that there is not a prima facie question of privilege.

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, would the hon. minister permit a question? I am not quarrelling with what the minister had to say, with one notable exception. My question is simply this: Does he take the position that only the government has the right to call an organizational meeting of a committee, just as only the government has the right to set the day when Parliament will meet? Parliament cannot meet itself because it does not have a Speaker; only the government can set that date. By the same token, only the government can decide when a committee will meet after it has been struck. Is the minister taking the position in this House that the government does not have the responsibility to convene a meeting of a committee after it has been struck for the purposes of that committee organizing itself and electing a chairman and a vice-chairman?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I indicated clearly a few minutes ago, at least I thought it was clear, that some hon. members have maintained that committees which were organized had not met and I said they had not given any proof to their arguments demonstrating that the government was to blame if some committees had not yet met. I stated this clearly.

In answer to my colleague who asked whether it is up to the government to see that these committees organize themselves, in my view the government must surely have an important role to play in this respect. For my part, when there is a problem I have always been ready to discuss it with the parliamentary leaders of the other parties in order that all House services work as smoothly as possible. I have great respect for the rights and privileges of the opposition as well as ours and I like to see the opposition participate. And if there had been serious reasons, serious complaints or consequences for the opposition stemming from the fact that some committees, albeit a small number of them, had not yet been organized it seems to me that I would have heard about it from my eminent colleagues who are parliamentary leaders of the official opposition and of the NDP, but I have never heard a complaint of this nature.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister. The advice I have been given is that the committees which have not met are the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, and the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That is my understanding of the committees which have not met. Some of them are quite important with respect to issues, as members have indicated.

Now that the issue is here in the House, I have a question for the minister. Would the government House leader undertake to speak to the members of the committee—and I will for my part undertake to speak to members of the committee on my side of the House—so that they can be urged to ensure, in the event that it is found there is no question of privilege, that those committees get going? Although there may be no legal responsibility on the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard)—he may take that view—I think he has had the sense of the House. I now speak to him in his capacity as House leader. Having had the sense of the House, will he take some initiatives to get those committees going?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, this is what I referred to earlier in my remarks. Considering on the one hand that almost three-quarters of an hour were lost arguing about a question of privilege, which it is not, and on the other hand that this is the first time I have heard any complaints about this, I offered my services to speed up the organizing process of those committees that are not yet organized and to check whether there are serious or valid reasons why the organized committees have not yet met. Therefore I would repeat the offer I was pleased to extend to my colleague, the Leader of the Official Opposition, and I extend the same offer to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who seems to be in agreement.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I am wondering whether the government House leader would be prepared to accept the question in the form of a motion under Standing Order 43, that the matter would be referred to a committee thereby giving it a reference from this House. For example, I would be prepared tomorrow to formulate a motion under Standing Order 43 on fisheries and forestry procedure, requesting that that committee meet to discuss the matters that ought to be before it and to elaborate on the matters that ought to be before it. Would the House leader accept that form of a reference? He said that it is not the government's responsibility to produce references. If we can produce references in that way, I would be delighted to learn of it, because it will happen tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, to answer the question, first there is nothing to hinder the hon. member from introducing a motion under Standing Order 43. Of course, we decide whether it is truly urgent, as we did on all those that came up until now. I cannot guarantee that the 281 members in this House will agree to a motion by the hon. member to refer any subject to a committee. Second, we jealously maintain nonetheless the government's prerogative under Standing Order 18(2), and we are responsible for establishing the order of things here. What I said earlier, and I would have expected my learned colleague to grasp it immediately, is that we sometimes refrain from referring subjects without consulting with opposition members.

When I said that Parliament was involved, opposition members were involved in the references, I made it very clear later that this usually follows a lack of agreement in a debate that the subject or legislation or motion be referred to committee, whence the contribution by members from both sides of the House, including the hon. member who just put the question.

[English]

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I have a related question for the House leader. Should such a motion be put tomorrow, as indeed it was yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), would the House leader give us his assurance that he would urge all members of the government caucus to support such a motion? Would he make that commitment today and show leadership to this House, in view of the recognition he has given of the fact that he believes along with us that it is time we got on with meeting in committee?

Mr. Malone: We want to work.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am afraid my hon. colleague misunderstood my remarks. I encourage him—I do not wish to disappoint him—to read my answers. I think they completely cover the subject. I recognized no responsibility, all I offered was my co-operation. I therefore submit this is no valid question of privilege. We are ready to co-operate and we never had any complaints before today. For the rest, I would encourage him to read my remarks and he will see and understand my position.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that in the question of privilege which has been raised, there are two main issues which I must deal with. First, that the committees have not met. The arguments and suggestions which have been presented have led me to believe that committees have been set up, but the main grievance seems to stem from the fact that some of them have not met. The other question on which it would seem I am expected to rule has to do with an urgent issue which hon. members feel they could not debate. They suggest that this is an important issue and that the House should deal with it forthwith. As to the setting up of committees, this clearly comes under the organization of the business of the House and as a rule, as indicated by an hon. member, it normally depends on the initiative of the whip, as expressed in Beauchesne's citation No. 579. But it is not up to me to weigh the reasons why committees are meeting or not meeting. This is completely beyond the responsibility of the Chair. I am not certain, but I think that there were assurances that some committees would meet so that the question which some members consider urgent could be debated.

As I was given notice of this question of privilege, I noted that the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which is mentioned in the question of privilege, was meeting this afternoon at 3.30 and that the minister would be present at the meeting. Of course, the committee is now considering the estimates. Some will say that this urgent question is not on the order of the committee, but members could try to raise it anyway and they might obtain satisfaction.

In any case, it seems to me that I must also consider the urgency of the question raised, because some time ago, concerning a motion moved under the provisions of Standing Order 26, I gave a decision which said in essence that other procedures could be used to debate the matter, including the fact that certain committees were to meet at a later date which I was unable to specify. These other procedures would, of course, be questions during question period, motions moved by hon. members and opposition days. In fact, what I want to emphasize, in accordance with my earlier decision on the above mentioned motion, is that there are procedures which can be used to debate these urgent matters.

However, in view of the importance of the question raised, in view of the dissatisfaction of some members concerning committee meetings which are not held, and in view of the fact that the question, as presented by some members, exceeds the limits of what could be discussed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture—I believe that certain members raised the issues of the environment and fisheries, and I do not know now whether these committees have been able to meet yet or not—in view of this situation and the importance of this issue, I would like, if I may, to review all the documents and see whether there will be other opportunities to discuss this question in the House, and I shall therefore defer my decision on this motion.

MR. ROCHE—CONSTITUENTS REFUSED ACCESS BY SECURITY STAFF TO MEMBER'S OFFICE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege at this, my first opportunity to do so, on a matter that affects the rights of all members and certainly affects my rights as a member.

At 1.40 p.m. today five constituents of mine, whose visit was anticipated by me and who were introduced at the front desk of this building where I maintain my own office, were not allowed past the front desk and were, in effect, barred from going to my office, despite the fact that they were, as I say, properly introduced. Moreover, one of my secretaries was sent to the front desk to personally escort these people to my office.

I feel that this is an interference with my right to receive constituents in my office. I am conscious of the security problems, particularly in this building. I have always notified the security officials when I am expecting a large number of constituents. Today, the arrival of the five constituents was, as I say, anticipated. They were rudely treated. My secretary who went personally to escort them was harassed. My staff is owed an apology by the security staff at the very least.

But in any event, I think there is a larger point at issue here, that irrespective of the security provisions of this building, I do not think it is particularly helpful to members of Parliament when their own constituents who come to visit them in a properly programmed manner are treated in a way in which they are made to feel unwelcome and in which they are shaken, as indeed these people were today. I believe that it is the right of a member of Parliament to bring constituents to his office and, moreover, to bring them to the gallery which is provided for opposition members.

These people were denied access to that gallery. The ordinary procedure is for members of Parliament to issue passes. The constituents line up in turn and if there is room in that gallery then they get in. It is not the function of the security staff at the front door of this building to bar people entrance to my office where they can obtain a pass and then take their chances of getting into the gallery.

I feel that it is an important provision, Madam Speaker. I will not take up the time of the House on the matter, but I would ask, respectfully, Madam Speaker, that you investigate this incident and make sure that the security staff operates in such a way that they are protecting the building, but not turning away people who have a legitimate right of access to the members' offices.

Madam Speaker: Indeed, the hon. member has not raised a question of privilege but rather a matter of security which is under my responsibility. I am most surprised at the facts which the hon. member has related. I am sure that he is relating these facts correctly, but usually the staff at the front door or any of the doors of the House of Commons is most courteous.

Of course, we have given instructions with regard to security, that people should give their names and tell the security officers where they intend to go. We have juggled in our minds whether we would oblige any member of Parliament to send someone down to greet the people he is expecting, because that is the only way that we can ensure that these people do not go walking around and entering offices which they clearly did not want to visit at the time they presented themselves at the door. That is not a very difficult matter, but it could make the atmosphere a bit unfriendly if we had to resort to that kind of provision.

I am very surprised at the facts which the hon. member has presented and I will certainly inquire as to what exactly took place. Nobody should harass anybody in this House, but perhaps they had some reason for acting in the way they did. At any rate I will, of course, apologize to the hon. member's constituents, because I am sure like all of our constituents they want to be welcomed in Parliament.

DREE—GRANTS TO INDUSTRIES—CONSTITUENCY OF LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Question No. 119—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Will the government consider extending the designated DREE areas to include grants to medium and major industries in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville?

2. For what reasons are Renfrew and Cornwall designated for grants to medium and major industries when Leeds-Grenville is not?

3. On what date were designated DREE areas last changed or in any way modified with respect to grants to medium and large industries?

4. Was Leeds-Grenville ever considered and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The response for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

1. The constituency of Leeds-Grenville is currently eligible for assistance under the Small Business Incentives program of the Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement. In view of this assistance, the need for fiscal restraint and, consequently the limited development funds available, an extension of the area designated for RDIA assistance is not anticipated at this time.

2. Cornwall is not within the area currently designated for RDIA assistance. However, from April 1, 1971 to June 30, 1973, Stormont—including Cornwall, Glengarry and Prescott counties were designated under the RDIA as part of Region "C", comprising Montreal and surrounding regions. Part of Renfrew county (including the town of Renfrew) was designated for RDIA assistance on the basis of such factors as low population and employment growth, high unemployment and remoteness from metropolitan Toronto and other large market areas. In Leeds-Grenville and other parts of southern Ontario, more favourable economic conditions have generally prevailed.

3. From April 8, 1970, until December 31, 1975, Renfrew-Pembroke was designated under the DREE Act as a special area, allowing industry in the area to receive similar assistance to that provided under the RDIA program. As of January 1, 1976, the RDIA designated area was expanded to include part of Renfrew county.

4. Yes. As part of its ongoing efforts, DREE continuously monitors the economic circumstances of all regions of the province, including Leeds-Grenville. RDIA boundaries are thus reviewed, as conditions warrant, in order to ensure their continuing appropriateness.

CANADIAN NATIONAL—WEST INDIES—STEAMSHIPS LTD.

TREASURY BOARD—NUMBER OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 404—Mr. Herbert:

How many public servants were under the general direction of the Treasury Board on March 31 (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): The Treasury Board is the employer for departments and agencies listed under schedule I, part I of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It also has control over a portion of the organizations listed under part II of the act. The number of public servants under the general direction of Treasury Board, on strength as of March of each year was thus:

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, it always gives me great pleasure to rise in my place in this House and debate the business of the House. Today I have particular pleasure in debating Bill C-30, the borrowing bill—a bill in which the government of Canada is asking for the authority to borrow $12 billion for the current year.

We have heard some eloquent debates in this House. One was a two-hour debate by the former minister of finance, "Honest John Crosbie," who put forth a most magnificant case in regard to the need to debate this bill in depth. Then we heard a dissertation from "Slippery Allan," as I call him, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who spoke for a bare few minutes on a bill of great import. In watching him I was quite certain he would be a fine curler. He is an excellent sweeper, he can sure curl around a stone or an issue, and he can talk forever without saying anything.

The minister is offering this House an economic statement pointing to more of the same that has been handed out by the Liberal government during the decade of the seventies. What were the over-all economic directions of the Liberal government during the seventies? First, uncontrolled government growth, literally a form of de facto socialism. Second, a major preoccupation with the redistribution of wealth through a federal bureaucratic empire of enormous proportions. Third, the creation of debt to unload upon future generations—the creation of debt at enormous rates. Until this year, the debt creation, as far as I understand it, is in the order of $60 billion. Fourth, the promotion of consumption rather than production through every process known to governments. A vicious cycle of credit and the printing of paper money, therefore laying down the foundations of recurring inflation. Fifth, a massive subjugation economically of municipal and provincial governments to the bureaucratic direction of a centralized, political will.

It is this package of policies pushed to unreasonable levels that is tearing this nation apart. It is the federal government's unlimited and uncontrolled spending policies in provincial jurisdictions that is the primary cause of the constitutional difficulties that now exist in this country.

I want to touch very briefly on one or two of these five policy points. Just a little over a year ago all governments in Canada spent approximately 42 per cent of the gross national product of the nation. What that means is that government at the three levels took from the people 42 cents of every dollar they earned, and they spent those dollars in accordance with their priorities.

Interestingly enough, in 1968 the provincial and municipal governments spent 46 per cent of the total spending of governments in Canada and the federal government spent 54 per cent. A decade later this was reversed and the provincial and municipal governments in Canada spent 53 per cent of total government expenditures and the federal government spent 47 per cent.

What this shows is a terrible desire by municipalities and provincial governments to control their own economic destiny. What it shows is that the federal government has been the catalyst to push growth at the provincial level and the municipal level to counteract the growth of the federal government which was running away during the seventies.

Rather interestingly, in this new Parliament what has now been given to us in the economic statement is an indication that the federal level of spending in relation to the gross national product will grow by 2 per cent in one year, from approximately 20 per cent of the gross national product to 22 per cent of the gross national product. As hon. members know, federal government expenditures are to be in the order of $60 billion in 1980. This is literally about 22 per cent of the gross national product of this nation. This is a startling 2 per cent increase in just one year.

If anyone could put any type of term to it, it is galloping socialism. This is being done through borrowings, not through the collection of taxes, because the taxes will only supply $45 billion, and somewhere between $14 billion and $15 billion will be borrowings. This is catastrophic for the long term. Who is going to pay this debt? Who is asked to pay this debt on behalf of the nation? What is tearing this country apart is the absolute concentration by the federal government on the redistribution of the wealth, potential and opportunity of this nation.

Western Canada is now looking desperately for manpower. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) went out to the west and indicated on his return here the vital need for technicians and people to go to western Canada to fuel the western Canadian economy.

Why are people not going to western Canada? Because they are being kept immobile through handouts in the rest of the nation. These handouts are primarily given by the federal government. This is an exciting nation because of size, because of potential and resources. The young people in this nation have all this potential before them, but they are not seeking opportunity in this nation where there is opportunity. I ask the question again, why are they not doing that? Has this government had the determination, the honesty and the courage to look at that very question and answer it in this House? The federal government has used its spending power to keep the young entrenched, doing nothing, being unproductive and on welfare in part of the nation where there is no opportunity.

Let me speak very briefly about the accumulation of federal debt. The federal debt has risen to dangerous proportions. It is in excess of $60 billion and is rising this year by some $14 billion. That is about $3,500 of debt per capita. It is rising at some $700 per capita per year. Indeed, approximately 15 per cent of the federal budget now services debt.

A family of four existing in this nation effectively has a debt associated with it of $15,000. A family of four has to pay the interest on the debt of this nation. It has to pay interest on a debt of $15,000 incurred by the federal government, apart from having to pay its mortgage and the interest on the mortgage. This is catastrophic.

I have not had the opportunity to review conditions in every other nation, but I can say categorically that no nation in this world, with the potential, the wealth and the resources it has, is in any type of situation that this nation is in today. There has been absolute and abject mismanagement over a decade of irresponsibility by a Liberal government that should have been dethroned long ago.

An hon. Member: Look who is talking.

Mr. Yurko: Some of these people on the other side who ruined this country should have been brought before the justice of the law.

Mr. Evans: Order.

Mr. Yurko: To account for their mismanagement of this country, they should have been brought before the law of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They didn't keep you there.

Mr. Yurko: I have got them excited now, Mr. Speaker. I thought they were going to be silent, but it is obvious that they are alive over there.

Mr. Chénier: Because we are hearing untruths.

Mr. Yurko: One has to be appalled, and I for one am, by the irresponsibility of government during the decade of the seventies.

We managed to get into government by the people rejecting the Liberal government in 1979, and we tried to deal with the economic problems of this nation honestly, forthrightly, with pragmatism, knowing that it was going to be difficult but that hard decisions had to be made. So we specifically set out to control the mounting debt of Canada as we are moving toward national bankruptcy. Second, we set out to contain the growth of the federal government and make it more effective and responsible. Third, we established a comprehensive energy policy needed to make Canada self-sufficient in oil by 1990, and establishing a sound strategy for Canadian energy self-sufficiency for the next century. Fourth, we established a small business incentive growth policy, coupled with major employment stimulation processes, particularly for young Canadians, to tide this nation through a most difficult period which we knew was coming. Some people termed it short-term pain for long-term gain. It did not help us during the election of February 18, but it was an honest approach taken with the greatest degree of courage.

I say that the type of attitude being exemplified in this House now—a week ago, a month ago—by a minister who gave an economic statement without the courage to come out with a budget at the earliest opportunity, means that there is no one who is going to bankrupt this nation faster than that government over there. I wish it would come to its senses.

I want to be more specific on energy. Most of my life has been spent dealing with energy of one form or another—at least most of my professional life. Therefore, I feel I have an appreciation of some aspects of energy.

I want to talk briefly about the flow of capital from rising energy prices and the direction it would take in this nation, and I would like to indicate why it should or should not take that direction. Second, what I want to talk about rather specifically is the constitutional prerogatives of provincial resource price-setting. In 1974 I was president of the Canadian Council of Resources and Environment Ministers of Canada. At the first conference I sponsored as president, I asked for a detailed examination of the constitutional prerogatives of a province in connection with its resources; in other words, what it can do and what it cannot do, when it can do it and so forth. We produced a magnificent report which I would like to refer to periodically through my speech this afternoon.

First of all, I would like to speak a little bit about the supply of conventional oil in the world and the supply of conventional oil in Canada. Much of the conventional oil that exists in the world now was discovered in a different economic time-frame. It was discovered under a low-cost regime, and so we have established throughout the world a series of conventional oil reservoirs.

I have said in the past that no one knows the value of the oil in the ground in a conventional reservoir. It is one of the most valuable commodities on this earth. No one can put a price on it, a market price if you wish, or a value because it developed over billions of years. It is a hydrocarbon of enormous value, enormous ability and flexibility in terms of its use by humanity.

We have now gone in the world from a position of supply and pricing to a position of conventional oil conservation. We have moved massively in that direction. They have shown wisdom in the Middle East. The prevalent wisdom of Mexico was well displayed in this House recently. They have cut exports to Canada and have not committed themselves on a long-term basis to supplying us with 100,000 barrels a day, but only 50,000. That indicates without equivocation that the conventional oil reservoirs of their nation have to be extended and the rate of production of those reservoirs has to be reduced. The value of that commodity is so great for the future that it is sheer hypocrisy, in fact almost a crime, to drain the reservoirs at the earlierst possible opportunity and at the fastest rate possible.

The same applies in Canada, particularly in Alberta. Alberta has moved from a position of price being the most important matter in connection with its conventional oil reserves, to recognizing that maintaining the capacity of its reservoirs over the longest possible period is the single most important criterion. That government has to do that because it is the will of the people of Alberta, and Alberta owns those resources.

What did Saskatchewan say? There was a most remarkable dissertation along this same line. Indeed, from here on there will be a delay in the tertiary recovery of their reservoirs and every mechanism will be used to limit production. On April 22, 1980, in the legislation of Saskatchewan, Mr. R. A. Larter asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, a question to the minister for Kelsey-Tisdale. In light of huge natural gas discoveries in British Columbia, and in light of what Premier Lougheed stated last night on television that the quickest way to strengthen the Canadian dollar was to export massive amounts of natural gas, is the minister now prepared to accept the fact that there is a little more natural gas than what he anticipates? Are you ready now to do more exploring in Saskatchewan and prop up this concept that there is a lot of natural gas available?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I've indicated to the member on previous occasions that we are reviewing the policy in respect of natural gas exploration and development in the province of Saskatchewan. We do believe that we have the probability of discovering larger quantities of gas than we thought was the case 10 years ago. A lot of that assumption is based on the success that Alberta has enjoyed, and to a lesser degree, that British Columbia has enjoyed, in the last decade in proving up pools of gas. We are not so ambitious to open the gates, as I believe the member is alluding to, because of the problems which go along with that. We have Alberta in particular indicating that they have a surplus of gas for a shorter medium-term period of time, and are seeking very ambitiously, large export permits into the United States.
> I would suggest to the member that if we were to expand gas exploration and development in Saskatchewan, we would not want to attain that level of shorter medium-term extra capacity. Because we would like to guarantee that the pools of gas we have in the province of Saskatchewan will guarantee and give assurance to Saskatchewan consumers in years to come, that we will not be the victims of imported gas from outside this province, and pay what may well be a very heavy penalty in order to have that source of energy available to us.

I recommend this policy to the members of this House. It is a very deliberate policy in Saskatchewan to delay exploration and development so that the reserves in Saskatchewan can be maintained for that province in future years. I could go on with this topic for some time, but I want to cover a few other areas of the energy scenario, and I know time goes by quickly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have listened quite attentively to the hon. member for quite a while. I wonder if he is on the same bill. I draw to the attention of the hon. member that we are considering Bill C-30, known as the borrowing authority bill. I invite the hon. member to address his remarks to that bill.

Mr. Yurko: I have been advised by some members of this House that when the government brings in a bill for authority to borrow $12 billion to cover its debts in all areas, we have before this House for debate all areas of government activity where these borrowings are to be used. It is in that light that I am discussing this bill today. I can think of no more important matter than the question of energy. With regard to oil compensation, I understand this government may need in the area of $5 billion, and they will need it soon. There is no more fundamental matter than the energy question when discussing this bill.

I want to speak very briefly on distribution of the money. I had an opportunity to look at the gross dollar generation of the whole mining industry, which includes oil and gas. The generation of dollars in this nation from mining each year is in the order of $22 billion. Of that, about $12 billion is for oil and gas and $10 billion for minerals, building materials and other products in the mining area.

Where does this $12 billion go? With the price of energy now, this $12 billion floats primarily westward, but a substantial proportion comes back eastward through the federal government taxation system in the form of individual taxes, corporation taxes and so forth. The $12 billion that flows westward represents approximately 4.5 per cent of the gross national product of this nation. Of that, approximately 2 per cent comes back east to the rest of the nation. Therefore the net flow of capital westward from oil and gas, a resource owned by western Canada, is in the order of 2.5 per cent of the gross national product per year.

What Liberal government can say that is too great a flow of dollars westward, or to any other region of this nation in order to upgrade it? I would like any member of this House to tell me that is too much per year when in fact this nation has such dynamic potential.

Let me go further and refer to the speech made the other night by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). There is a great deal of foolishness in that speech. I am surprised that a minister of his calibre would make such foolish statements as he did in that speech.

Mr. Darling: Not foolish, sinister.

Mr. Yurko: He obviously had an objective. It was not putting the case for a united Canada. I quote from his speech:

> If we were to go to 85 per cent of the international price tomorrow, and assuming no further international oil price increases, we would increase the revenues flowing to industry, provinces and the federal government, assuming gas prices rose in tandem with oil prices, by about $14 billion.

The $14 billion represents 4.5 per cent of the gross national product of this nation. Is that too much? Is that too high in terms of boosting the capacity of the regions? Why do the young people of the rest of the nation not go to where there is all this opportunity? I did in 1950 when I graduated in Alberta. There was no opportunity there at all. There were 64 of us who graduated as chemical engineers. Sixty-two came to Ontario to find opportunity. We were mobile in this nation. It was the greatest thing I ever did in my life.

I spent six years in Ontario, traversed the United States and then went back west again. I made the circuit three times. It is an exhilarating experience for young people. It is a tremendously unifying force for this nation. It brings all regions together. Young people get to know this nation from one end to the other. The idea of taking 42 per cent of the wealth of this nation, and trying to distribute it from the centre to fix people where they are without opportunity is ludicrous. I have never any difficulty with equalization on a health basis and for providing assistance to senior citizens wherever they may be across the nation, but I have a great deal of difficulty with this administration from the centre trying to collect funds from all over the country to maintain the immobility of young, dramatic people who should be developing the west, the north and the eastern part of this land. That is the fundamental reason this nation is creaking and almost falling apart. That is the fundamental reason this nation is tearing itself apart—because the federal government has used its unlimited spending power to create a situation which cannot sustain itself; all it does is go into debt more every year to sustain this unnatural and insupportable economic situation.

Mr. Harquail: Sad.

Mr. Yurko: It is a crime. It is a crime against the well-being of this nation. It is a crime against Canadians. I wish they would get some good advice on the other side and recognize that while the federal government should, indeed, have umbrella powers to bind confederation, it should not get itself involved in every corner and nook of this country with its bureaucratic regime feeding dollars, and with DREE trying to prop up this situation, when people could be used in some other part of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I shall speak briefly on the oil price scenario, but before I do so I should like to quote a couple of statements by the minister of energy, that eloquent man who feels he is an expert in the energy area. This is what he said:

> Let me turn for a moment to natural gas. It too must rise, we are told, because Alberta has depleting resources and will soon run out of revenue. At the same time we are told that we should export more gas because we have growing supplies and will continue to have growing supplies for as far into the future as one would care to look.
> Again, I am baffled by the logic. Should Canadians pay another $4 billion a year for natural gas even though we have a huge surplus of it and growing exports? Remember, of the $4 billion about $500 million would go to the federal government, about $1.5 billion to the Alberta government and $2 billion to the industry.

Does the federal government not realize that it collects income taxes from all the wealth which goes to pay wages in the west and brings it back here at the rate of 33 per cent or 40 per cent or 25 per cent of all those wages that are paid? Do they not realize that it comes right back in this direction through equipment purchases, income tax, corporate taxes and so forth?

Then the minister says:

> I think we should be honest with each other. The position of the Alberta government has nothing to do with security of supply. It wants a higher price for natural gas because it believes that it has a right to higher revenues.

Mr. Speaker, I was part of a government which set drilling incentives in Alberta. The industry was drying up. There were no federal incentives and the Alberta government ended up paying 95 per cent of the cost of every dry hole drilled in the province and beyond. It is beyond my understanding that a minister in this government could suggest in a speech that the Alberta government has had nothing to do with gas reserves in the province of Alberta. That is absolutely false.

I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. I still have much to say, but I will try to get through somehow. Here is a further quotation from the minister of energy:

> We have two opposing political thrusts in this country: regionalism and interdependence. We understand and support the desire of people in outlying regions to gain more control over their lives. I think it is due; many would say overdue. But provinces can't afford to pursue autonomy by undermining interdependence.
> Interdependence—pooling of strengths—is what makes this nation great, why the whole adds up to more than the sum of its parts—

I think I was one of the first to use that statement at a Man and Resources conference some few years ago. How can a minister make statements of the kind he did, Mr. Speaker? Regionalism and interdependence are not incompatible. They are mutually supportive in every way. Strong regions provide interdependence in this country through the equalization process, through the taxation process. How could a minister of the Crown, supposedly an intelligent minister, suggest that these two processes are incompatible? I can only think that the minister is massively confused and fails to recognize the nature of this country; he has been so blinded by the Quebec referendum. It is sad. What else does he say? I quote:

> We just came out of a referendum in which we fought hard for a united Canada. We defeated those who wanted political sovereignty with economic association. We did not carry out this difficult battle to get economic sovereignty with political association.

The minister is using terms foolishly, like a fool, like an arrogant school debater trying to create discord and division. What is economic sovereignty? It is inseparable from political sovereignty. The two are literally the same thing. Economic sovereignty means the collection and levying of all taxes by the sovereign state, as Quebec indicated in its program for sovereignty-association. What else does it mean? It means the state shall set all its commodity prices, import taxes, export taxes, excise taxes and so on. It means the conduct of all national and international negotiations in connection with the pricing of commodities. It means the printing of its own money, the establishment of its own banks and its own credit. That is what economic sovereignty means. Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to get up in an honest way and tell the members of this House and the people of Canada which province is asking for economic sovereignty in this nation.

The only thing the provinces are asking for in this nation is respect for the constitutional prerogatives they have in connection with developing, using and marketing their resources.

That is what the provinces are asking for economically—respect for the constitution which is now in place, not a new one but respect for constitutional provisions which already exist. The provinces want the responsibilities they have under the constitution of working toward the goal of as much autonomy and as much self-sufficiency within their regions as possible though still under the umbrella of the magnificent federation we have created in Canada. Crazy statements such as the minister of energy made on the eve of constitutional negotiation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson)—Administration of Justice—Safety of persons living in proximity to penitentiaries· the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis)—Air Canada—Request retirement age of pilots be extended; the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis)—Small Business—Plans to assist businessmen.

● (1700)

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

In view of the fact that there are no private bills, we will move to notices of motions for the production of papers, No. 3.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTION FOR PAPERS

[English]

CLASSIFICATION AUDIT REPORT

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the data base upon which the Report on the Classification Audit in the national capital area and the non-national capital area was based.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the motion is to try as best we can to obtain a little more information on what is happening in the public service in the area of classification. I have been trying for some time to get progress reports over the years either by seeking papers or by asking questions, and this motion is one of several that I have put on the order paper dealing with this subject.

Back in 1979 Mr. Lincoln Alexander—and I can use his name today—the hon. member who left us yesterday, put a question on the order paper, No. 329, dealing with job classification in the public service. Some time later in that same session question No. 600, also dealing with job classification appeared. When this gentleman became a member of the cabinet in the government of last year, I thought that since he was so interested in the subject he might be willing to produce some documents. I produced some motions for the production of papers which essentially were worded along the same lines as his questions on the order paper. However, even from this new government last year which had indicated its intention to be very generous in producing information, nothing was forthcoming.

Of course, what we want, not so much the documents themselves, is some idea of what progress we may or may not be making as a result of the studies, papers and books that are produced on various subjects with the intention of improving efficiency in the public service.

The Treasury Board secretariat has carried out cyclical audits since delegation of the authority to classify positions up to SX-2 was given to departments and agencies some six or seven years ago. Although this activity provided information about the administration of various aspects of the system, the subjective selection of positions used did not allow quantitative statements about classification for a particular department or the whole public service.

Therefore, in 1976 a project known as "Classification Evaluation" was established with three stages, and the report referred to in the motion deals with stage one, which was to develop and apply a scientific sampling scheme that would enable statements to be made with confidence about the quality of the output of the classification system.

For the survey design a sampling method was selected. The public service is divided into departments and agencies, and within each department positions are divided into occupational groups, and each group is divided into levels. The disadvantage is that proportional sampling applies the same sample ratio, in this case one out of every 69 positions, to all strata in the population. As a result, for small departments the method generated such a small sample that it did not provide a meaningful estimate.

The sample taken outside the national capital area represented 1.5 per cent of the public service. The postal operations groups were excluded because the sample would have been dominated by those large groups. Thus the figures I mention are from some 135,000 public servants outside the national capital area.

The evaluation process consisted of a comparison of performed duties with the classification standard, a comparison of the written position description with the classification standard, and a comparison of the performed duties with the written position description.

The results of this study were the first data available and provide a base for future comparative studies. Over one position in six of those examined was judged to be misclassified, and five of the six were overclassified, and that, of course, means overpaid. Let me quote from the report:

> The sample data indicate that throughout the public service there is a distinct tendency to overclassify. This suggests that misclassification does not occur by a simple erroneous application of the classification standard which would likely result in about the same number of positions overclassified as underclassified. It appears that there are motivational and environmental factors within the classification program which encourage overclassification.

The incumbent is not performing the duties described in the job description and a significant cause for misclassification is the misapplication of the classification standard. In this study the possible net salary cost of misclassification was estimated at $43,600,000 per annum.

On February 26, 1976, a report was tabled by me in this House resulting from some 18 months work in what was popularly known as the Finkelman committee, or more properly the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. Under the heading "Classification", eight recommendations are listed. Has any action been taken in the intervening four years?

The report on the classification audit is a cross section of the public service excepting, as it does, the postal groups. Thus we can get no impression of the effectiveness of manuals issued for selective groups. I have in my hands one of these that runs to some 200 pages, or so, which is entitled "Classification and Selection Standard, Scientific Regulation, Scientific and Professional Category". It cost, when it was issued in October 1974, $9.75, obtainable from the Department of Supply and Services. I will read two short paragraphs, if I may:

> This standard describes the plan to be used in classifying and evaluating positions in the Scientific Regulation Group, and in selecting personnel for appointment to them.

The second paragraph reads:

> The Scientific and Professional Category is composed of occupational groups engaged in the application of the comprehensive body of knowledge acquired through university graduation in fields specified in the group definitions, and of professional groups in which membership in Canada is generally controlled by legally established licensing bodies.

Of course, the point here is that this is quite a sizeable document for what is quite a small segment of the public service. I have no idea whether similar documents are produced for every sector, but that in itself is a pretty good base on which to be working. That was issued in 1974. This first report to which I am referring, the one that appears in the motion, is now some two years old.

In February of 1979, just over a year ago, the then president of the treasury board produced an impressive document entitled "Program Performance Measurements". I wonder, and I think I have a right to wonder, just how you measure the performance of a person who is both overclassified and overpaid.

In March of 1979, the final report of the royal commission on financial management and accountability was issued. This report, commonly known as the Lambert commission report, is a most interesting document into which not only was a tremendous amount of work put but in regard to which there has been a considerable number of seminars and studies conducted since its issuance. Of course, it deals in part with the subject of classification which we are debating this afternoon.

The question—and it is the same question I am putting all the time—is: What action has been taken since the issuance of the report? I should refer also to the fact that that report runs to some 586 pages and costs $8.50 per book, whether it is the French or English edition. In September of last year we received a 259 page report entitled "The Report of the Special Committee on the Review of Personnel Management and the Merit Principle." This report, popularly known as the D'Avignon report, runs to some 291 pages in French and was issued at a cost of $10.

When I put motions such as this on the order paper, I am trying to underline a point which I have been trying to underline since I came here some eight years ago. I would like the government to tell us just what progress has been made, at what stage we are at, what has happened since the issuance of the report which is the subject of the motion, what has been done with all the recommendations in the Finkelman report to which I referred earlier and which was tabled several years ago, and on which personally I have heard nothing regarding the progress and implementation of the many recommendations in it, recommendations, incidentally, which I can say were almost unanimous.

I think that hon. members present in the House would not dispute my saying that that report was almost unanimous. But we have heard nothing and there has been no subsequent report and no subsequent reference, and therefore no subsequent study on implementation. I can say that the same thing applies to the Lambert commission report and the D'Avignon report.

My motion is therefore a plea to the government to look at some means by which we can be better informed. May I suggest that one of the best ways in which we could be informed is by making it possible for us to study the subject in committee? Of course, we need a reference. There are many other matters being referred to committee at the present time, but surely efficiency in the public service should be a priority.

The motion was turned down by the government because the wording might not have been precisely correct. After all, we do not always know enough to know precisely what to ask for, and as a result the motion was turned down. I am not taking particular issue with that; I am only saying that it did give me the opportunity to say a few words on the subject of classification in the public service. I should like to include in that general plea a request that an opportunity be given for discussion of whatever progress might or might not have been made as a result of the production of these numerous reports to which I have referred in my remarks.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this matter forward for debate, notwithstanding the fact that I am sure he shares with me some disappointment in not being able to have the specifics for which he originally made his request. He has indicated his understanding that the base which he sought does not exist. I share with him the interest he has in the entire question of classification, as I am sure many hon. members in this House do, particularly those who have sat on the committees to which he referred, in particular the Finkelman committee upon which both he and I and other members whom I see present in the House have sat and have laboured so diligently.

Notwithstanding the fact that that information does not exist—and the hon. member was so advised—it is good that we at least discuss the subject matter today, in order perhaps that we get on the record and clarify for the sake of hon. members here today how far we have been able to progress, and indeed what is the current state of conditions with respect to the concept of classifications.

I should like to refer as well to the three reports which the hon. member has mentioned—the Lambert commission report, the D'Avignon report and the Finkelman report—and I would like to advise him that all of these reports are currently under intensive study at the level of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). He is requesting on a bi-weekly basis to be updated with respect to those studies so that implementation can be achieved at a fairly early date of at least some of the recommendations that have been made in those reports so that there can be some results obtained from the work that went into them.

The present classification system in the Public Service of Canada was developed in accordance with recommendations made in 1965 by the preparatory committee on collective bargaining. At that time, the committee concluded that a new classification system should have the following objectives.

The first objective is to bring together civil servants and prevailing rate employees under one system; second, to be flexible enough to meet both the demands of the labour market and those of internal relativity; third, to provide a logical framework for the determination of bargaining units and the negotiation of pay rates; fourth, to permit different approaches to wage and salary administration and to personnel administration generally, for different types of employees; fifth, to be conducive to effective career planning and development and to provide strong incentives to superior performance; and sixth, to permit extensive delegation to departments of the authority to classify positions.

The preparatory committee concluded that these objectives could be achieved by developing a system based on the principle of occupational grouping. The resulting system, which is in use now, was designed to have the following features.

The first is to provide a logical framework for comparing and ranking positions within an occupational group; the second, to provide a means by which a series of positions within a particular group can be compared to each other and to similar occupations in the non-federal public service and the private sector for the purposes of establishing salary relativity for collective bargaining; the third, to permit the establishment of a basis on which the employer is able to attract and retain employees, that is, against which appropriate rates of remuneration can be established for the specific job responsibilities, and periodically revised; the fourth, to permit the identification of the skills, aptitudes and abilities required of the incumbent in a position; the fifth, to permit the establishment of a career structure for clusters of employees; the sixth, to provide the means by which the employer, the employee and the bargaining agent can achieve a common understanding of what management wants done and what is therefore expected of the employee; and the seventh, to provide the means by which the over-all organizational role or objective can be divided into individual position responsibilities.

While the classification system was designed to have the foregoing features, in itself it is intended to do nothing more than establish the basic level of responsibility for the duties of a position and the relativity, within an occupational group, of one position to another.

At present, occupations are divided into six broad categories, with 183 groups and subgroups within these categories. The occupational category is a family of occupations related in broad terms by the nature of the functions fulfilled and by the extent of academic preparation needed by people engaged in these occupations.

The six occupational categories to which I referred earlier are as follows. The first is the occupational category which includes the groups in which manual and related work of an unskilled, semi-skilled or a skilled nature is performed and supervised.

The second is the administrative support category, including the groups in which the preparation, transferring, systematizing and maintenance of records, reports and communications, or the direct application of rules and regulations, or the supervision of these functions are performed.

The third is the technical category, including groups in which specialized techniques are performed that require highly developed skills and a defined minimum of secondary school education.

The fourth is the administrative and foreign service category, including the groups engaged in planning, execution, conduct and control of programs, including those directed toward the public and programs of internal management.

The fifth is the scientific and professional category composed of groups in which specialized qualifications attained in university or professional institutions and specific to each occupational group are required.

Finally, the executive category is composed of groups engaged in senior managerial and policy-making responsibilities, or in tasks calling for exceptionally high standards of performance in the development and execution of policy, or in the introduction of new or improved administrative processes.

Classification is basically a judgment process by which a rank order—for example a relative worth—of a series of positions is established. In a small, simple organization, this ranking may be based on nothing more than the perception of the manager. At the other extreme, such as in the case of the public service, where classification authority is extensively delegated and the classification systems cover an extremely large and diverse work force, a highly sophisticated system is obviously required.

Therefore, public service classification standards exist to ensure that judgments are based on common and consistent criteria, and that the relative worth of a position can be established not only in relation to other positions in a group within the organization or department, but also in relation to positions in the same group in other departments and agencies.

There are four basic types of evaluation plans currently in use in the federal public service. It would probably do us some service to explore, at least briefly, those four groups. The first is the ranking system. These types of evaluation plans are used where there is a high degree of homogeneity in an occupational group and a limited number of different types of work situations. Usually there is already an established and understood job hierarchy in such occupations. An example of this type might be the law group. The second is the level description which is a refinement of the ranking system. It is used when most of the same conditions as in the ranking system apply but a greater variety of work situations exist. By way of example one could look at the engineering subgroup.

The third is the so-called predominant factor system. This type of evaluation plan is used when an occupational group has common characteristics, but a variety of work situations exist which cannot be easily related to each other on the basis of a direct job to job comparison. An example of this type might be the commerce group.

Finally, the point rating plan. This type of evaluation plan is used when a high degree of heterogeneity exists among jobs in the same occupations to the extent that neither qualifications nor work situations can be compared easily one with the other. An example of this would be program administration.

Classification Audit

The classification system I have been describing has now been in use for 13 years, and from time to time in recent years the question has been raised as to whether it is still appropriate for the 1980s or whether it should be changed from one based on occupational groups to one based on departments, or to other approaches such as a classification index or centralized classification system.

Under a departmental system, one or more departmental groups would be established which could recognize departmental relativities but would ignore interdepartmental relativities. A similar system existed prior to 1965. However, the present public service classification system is based on the premise that most jobs are similar across the service and there are very few occupational groups which are unique to individual departments. The current approach encourages and facilitates interdepartmental mobility.

A departmental system would solve the problem of intradepartmental relativities, but would not lead to over-all improvement. The extensive administrative exercise required to make such a transition would be traumatic, while the cost of such a change-over is prohibitive. The system would introduce equity problems and would require changes in the Public Service Staff Relations Act and a restructuring of the bargaining units.

The provinces have a variety of systems and practices depending on the size and complexity of their public service work force. Where collective bargaining is permitted, there are fewer bargaining units than are found in the federal public service. As well, classification delegation is far more restricted. Generally, according to provincial authorities, control problems exist wherever classification delegation is permitted.

In the Canadian private sector, classification systems range from ones which are far simpler than those of the federal public service to ones which are equally complex. The degree of complexity generally increases with the size of the enterprise and its geographical dispersion. For example, in the grain industry there is a high degree of consistency between companies and the classification system is very simple.

In a number of companies, for jobs which would be allocated to groups in our operational and technical categories, no formal classification plan exists and job descriptions are very basic. Again I offer as an example the electrician whose job classification is to supervise all electrical work, to assign staff their duties and to perform electrical-related work as required.

At the other extreme, the steel industry uses a system, the co-operative wage study evaluation system or CWS, covering thousands of plants and office workers in the United States and Canada. Two classification plans, a 12-factor plan for blue collar workers and a seven-factor plan for office workers, are used. Despite access to a grievance procedure, including provision for final and binding arbitration in the event that union-management agreement is not reached and revisions that have been periodically incorporated in the 35-year history of this old plan, steel unions have recently gone on record as considering that significant modifications are required to the CWS classification plan.

In the private sector there is usually a distinct split between managers and others, whereas in the public service classification plans a complete spectrum of work from most junior to intermediate or senior management level is covered. As well, our plans, except for senior executives or the SXs as they are called and personnel administration, the PE positions, normally cover both unionized and excluded employees. Private sector ones do not and the demarcation is much more distinct. Management levels in significant private sector organizations are usually covered by direct or partial reference to compensation systems developed by consultant organizations.

Generally in the private sector both personnel administration and classification are highly centralized. Where there is a measure of delegation, this is usually exercised under tight guidelines which leave very little room for discretion on the part of the manager. In effect, the manager establishes a position by selecting one of a series of job descriptions that has been developed at the corporate level. Because the diversity of work and programs in the public service rarely exists within one company in the private sector, more centralized and straightforward approaches to classification are possible in the private sector.

In the United States, at the federal level the classification system, commonly known as the GS system, closely approximates our class and grade system which existed prior to the introduction of collective bargaining. There are a large number of series and grades in existence for the clerical through officer classes of work. These grades in turn are assigned to one of some 18 GS pay levels. Thus, a biologist, a chemist and an administrative officer, although classified in their own distinct classification series, could all be paid in the same GS pay level. The introduction of a similar system in the Canadian federal public service would require a revamping of the entire existing bargaining unit structure to allow the negotiation of a unified rate structure for all occupational groups.

Another difference in the American system is that while delegation is permitted, collective bargaining is restricted or prohibited. While the pay system is simpler, there are a number of problems in the classification area and studies have been under way to reform the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Daudlin: I am glad that hon. members are happy to see that the studies are under way. I commenced my speech by indicating that the studies are under way. As any good teacher would do, having started with the point, I am reinforcing the point through the middle of the speech and I will conclude with the same point.

As is evident from the foregoing, the current American classification system and classification in the private sector operate in a significantly different and highly varied arena. The systems used range from those which would be totally incompatible with our organizational structure to ones which are comparable and, except for the cosmetic differences, essentially the same.

In conclusion, I have endeavoured to describe the particulars of the current classification system in the public service. As I have indicated, it is a complex system, but I assure hon. members that the classification policies and procedures are under constant review to maintain a system that is fair to both employees and taxpayers.

The President of the Treasury Board, I believe, has indicated in this House and, therefore, publicly, and privately to many hon. members who have an interest in this topic, as has the hon. member for Vaudreuil, that he has a personal commitment to see that these three reports to which I referred earlier do not languish in the dust on the shelf, that they in fact receive a complete examination and that that examination results in some action in terms of the implementation of at least parts of those reports.

It is a commitment on the part of the President of the Treasury Board that this be done quickly and effectively, and that in fact it should be done in the context of changes in the PSSRA legislation which obviously will have to come forward. I would ask the assistance and co-operation of all members of this House to see that this matter is dealt with quickly.

I agree with the hon. member for Vaudreuil when he says that this has been a matter of long standing and that it requires that something effective be done soon in consultation not only with members of this House but with members of the public service who, obviously, are vitally interested and concerned and who will be affected by what happens.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for giving us this evening the opportunity of discussing a topic that although not of the easiest to understand, still concerns a subject of interest to at least some hon. members and also to the House generally because, in the final analysis, Parliament is responsible for the management of human resources. This question of job classification and its standards is inevitably linked with the whole question of human resource management and civil servants.

I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Daudlin) indicate some of the steps that have been taken to ensure that in a few months, if not sooner, solutions will be brought to the problems pointed out by my colleague from Vaudreuil. I would remind the parliamentary secretary and his minister that we have been impatiently waiting for four years already for the results of the study made in 1976 by a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on employer-employee relations in the civil service of Canada. That study which, I believe, was presided over by the hon. member for Vaudreuil some time ago recommended that classification be made negotiable and that, of course, certain conditions attach to the application of the new formula.

Job classification is, put simply, the first step toward filling a position. The manager must, in fact, determine the parameters of the job, evaluate the work to be performed and, after analysis, locate that position at the appropriate level in the general classification scale. The level of classification having been determinated, the Civil Service Commission is then asked to set the selection standards. So, on one hand the employer has the exclusive right to determine the classification standards, the work to be done. The employer decides what will happen. On the other hand, the Public Service Commission must by law choose the candidate who seems best qualified to fill the position. Therefore, on one hand we have the employer who must identify the work to be done and on the other hand we have an agency which must find the person best suited for the work.

As we can see, classification represents one important part of the management of our human resources in the civil service. According to the law now in force, the employer unilaterally decides on the classification standards, though ordinarily a consultation process takes place between negotiating agents. Normally, before applying or changing any standard, the Treasury Board consults with the negotiating agents.

In the public sector, as my colleague the parliamentary secretary to the minister has mentioned, it is different, even in the United States. Four years ago I thought we were slowly on the way to adopting a much more modern system, that the employer, although he may be completely in charge of setting the classification standards, would have understood that his task was an integral part of personnel management and that if classification meant money—if I hold a senior position, I am well paid and if the salary is negotiable—it necessarily follows that classification should also be negotiable. I negotiate with respect to salary so I should therefore negotiate with respect to classification.

This is what the employer-employee relations committee which met in 1974, 1975 and 1976 recommended; and I will simply read an excerpt for hon. members because this document has gathered a lot of dust in the last four years. Its recommendations were never followed up and I would simply like to remind hon. members of what the House and Senate committee recommended. I quote from page 4721:

> Your committee is of the opinion that the law should provide for some extension of the scope of bargaining so as to include classification standards, and recommends as follows:
> 34. That, having regard to the established jurisdiction of bargaining agents in the public service, bargaining classification standards be interpreted to mean the determination of the relative worth of jobs within an occupational group.
> 35. That provision be made in the law for the bargaining of classification standards following the three-year period after promulgation.
> 36. That collective agreements incorporating classification standards be treated as "special agreements having their own duration".

Classification Audit

> 37. That in accordance with regulations made by the Public Service Staff Relations Board, disputes arising in negotiations and involving the development or redevelopment of a classification standard be subject to reference to and arbitration by the Board.
> 38. That the provisions of the act relating to the appointment of conciliation boards or conciliators not apply in cases of disputes arising out of the negotiations of classification standards, but that the board be empowered to appoint a mediator.
> 39. That resort to strike or lockout to resolve classification disputes be prohibited.
> 40. That arbitration of the pay plan attached to a classification standard be dealt with by the Public Service Staff Relations Board only with the consent of both parties.

● (1740)

As we can see, Mr. Speaker, four years ago members of this House made seven recommendations on how, in a clear and precise manner and step by step, standards of classification could become negotiable just as salaries and other working conditions are negotiable. This brings us back to the problem raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil. Four years ago it was realized, according to the report under study today and which is the basis for this motion for the production of papers, that the issue of classification audit in the public service posed certain problems. That report indicated certain positions were overclassified or underclassified, overpaid or underpaid. And I remember at that time, four years ago, that document was alluded to and it was said once again that civil servants receive more money than they deserve and do work that bring them working conditions and salaries that far exceed what they are worth. Mr. Macdonell, the Auditor General, recently told us that federal civil servants were for a large part unable to do their work with the same efficiency and effectiveness as the private sector. We were told that 50,000 federal civil servants could do the job as effectively as 36,000 comparable workers in the private sector. And that was used to hit again civil servants over the head and tell them: Listen, you are overpaid, there is not enough strictness to prevent those abuses. And the press jumped on that.

I must say that classification is determined by the employer, who is also responsible for personnel management. And when one talks about the efficiency of federal civil servants, one should not forget that it is management, and in the final analysis the agencies themselves, and perhaps this Parliament, that is responsible for that. Because we did not make sure we had the controls we needed, we did not make sure for many years we had in place a necessary approach to management so the managers could administer their departments effectively.

And then the civil servant gets blamed—that happened four years ago when the report on classification was released, and again recently when the Auditor General acted on a very doubtful basis. Mr. Speaker, 160 civil servants were extrapolated on 50,000, and that is what the Auditor General based himself on to conclude there was a lack of effectiveness and efficiency in the public service. What the hon. member for Vaudreuil sought is to get—

[English]

We are told that the data behind this study is unavailable. I accept that. Possibly it did not exist. I do not know, but somebody made a statement that 17.8 per cent of public servants in the national capital area were overclassified, and somebody made a statement also that outside the national capital area it was a lower percentage than the national capital area but, nevertheless, an important percentage were overclassified. In both instances I claim this is not the fault of the public servants; it is the fault of the system. On the one hand, we do not have a general policy, a philosophy of management, and on the other hand classification is the employer's exclusive responsibility. Perhaps some day we can set up a system which will give the employees and the unions a chance to negotiate classification standards.

The problem, of course, arises when we divide normal negotiations on standard things such as salary and fringe benefits like health, pensions and such things. Some of them are accepted as part of normal negotiations today. In our report, in the D'Avignon report and the Lambert report for that matter, it is suggested that the staffing process be part of another type of negotiation, separate from the normal negotiations going on regarding salaries and other conditions.

I see some difficulties with that. If the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Treasury Board is serious, I want to warn him that there may be some difficulties inherent in double negotiations—on the one hand negotiating salaries and conditions of work and, on the other hand, negotiating staffing and classification standards. A contract signed for a period of time covering salaries and working conditions may be arrived at in the next month or so, but a contract in regard to classification standards and staffing functions may be effective only next year. The process of negotiation would then start over again and the public service and the government would find themselves negotiating pretty well all the time on two different contracts, one dealing with money and other conditions, and one dealing with classification and staffing. I would caution the parliamentary secretary about that. Two negotiations going on at parallel times could complicate the whole process and add to the complexities of the problem.

I should like to talk now about the classification question. For the past several years Treasury Board has carried out ad hoc audits of departmental classification decisions, and has taken the necessary corrective action. I accept that they cannot audit everybody all the time. They audit some medium and large departments every 18 months, and I understand that they audit small departments, boards and agencies, every 24 months. Although this provides information about the administration of various aspects of the system, the subjective selection of position used does not allow quantitative statements about classification for particular departments in the whole public service.

When these audits revealed possible problems with the classification system as a whole, it was decided to carry out a full scale audit. A full scale audit is required if we are ever to come to grips with the management philosophy—the over-all responsibility of this Parliament, this government—to make sure that we reach effective goals in administering public funds and that we obtain efficient services and value for money from our taxes.

I understand that the evaluation and analysis made in 1976 was done in consultation with Statistics Canada. The method automatically ensured that departments and occupational groups were represented in this sample. In the national capital area, one of every 33 positions was selected. That is what we call the subjective approach system. In the non-national capital area, one out of every 69 positions was selected. Here again we are taking advice from professional statisticians and trying to cope with a very challenging problem but doing it with well recognized scientific methods.

The application of the staffing method resulted in approximately 2,000 positions being selected in the national capital region, which represented approximately 4 per cent of the full-time employees who had been in the same job for over 12 months. After completion of the national capital area phase of the program, the audit was repeated for another 2,000 positions in the rest of Canada outside the national capital area, to substantiate further and expand the results of the study in the national capital area. This sample represented approximately 1.5 per cent of full-time employees outside the national capital area. The combined results of these two phases provided the assessment of the entire public service.

I am not much of a statistician, Mr. Speaker. I know nothing about statistics and have never taken such a course. I suspect, however, that we are in a situation similar to the one the Auditor General was in when he apparently used 160 public servants out of 50,000 and, from that, extrapolated the finding that they were not efficient. I do not know how acceptable that is to the ordinary person. I find it difficult to accept that we can extrapolate 160 to 50,000 and that we can extrapolate from 1.5 per cent of full-time employees outside the national capital area and say there is great difficulty here in classification standards.

The systematic audit of 4,000 positions in the public service showed that a significant percentage of positions were misclassified, I quote from the document, both inside and outside the national capital area. The NCA was 20 per cent, while in the non-NCA—that is the non-capital area—it was 16.7 per cent. For the public service as a whole, the percentage of misclassified positions was 17.8 per cent.

I would like to point out that there will always be some subjectivity in the administration of any classification system. There will always be some cases where the duties and responsibilities of the particular position could be at the lower end of one particular classification level, or at the upper end of a lower level. Because of this, and because of the size and nature of the classification system in the federal public service—the system covers, I understand, about 300,000 positions—there will always be some degree of misclassification. That is acceptable in as big a shop as that employing 300,000 people and it is expected that there would be movements up and down and some misclassification. But in the order of 20 per cent—the extrapolation that has been done—if it is right, it is in dire need of change, and it is wrong, it is in great need of being readjusted. That is possibly why the hon. member for Vaudreuil wanted to see the data that produced these figures so that we could understand where the problems were.

As a result of the initial findings of the audits in the national capital area, departments were advised of the general results of the audit while the Treasury Board continued with the audit outside the national capital area. In addition, the Treasury Board undertook a thorough study of the classification system in the personnel policy branch of Treasury Board and one other operating department, as well as a detailed review of all the policies and procedures relating to classification in the public service. They reviewed the policies and procedures.

I do not want to speak too long on this subject because I know we could possibly get into the Lambert report, the D'Avignon report, and explore the recommendations in the report of the committee on the employer-employee relations in the Public Service of Canada, but I fail to understand how Treasury Board, who admit that their classification system is 17.8 per cent inefficient at this time are charged now—according to the answer given by the President of the Treasury Board to my question a few weeks ago—with reviewing the whole system. In view of the Lambert commission's report and recommendations, the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability, how can the department charged exclusively with classification standards tell me that it will now review, with the hope of listening to members of Parliament on both sides of the House, when four years ago it was recommended that this thing be made negotiable?

I could relate pages of testimony of Treasury Board statements on classification where to a series of questions that we put to them with regard to classification, the answers were "no" or "not supported". And yet the same minister and the same department are being charged with a review of the classification standards based on a report which my colleague, the member for Vaudreuil, brought up which said that 20 per cent in Ottawa, or the national capital area—17 per cent nationally—are overclassified. Likewise they will not let us know on what data they are basing their statements; neither will they allow the unions to get into the data or negotiations, nor will they follow our recommendations that we made some four years ago—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman to advise him that his allotted time has expired. He could continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I also congratulate my colleague from Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who asked once again for the necessary information to carry out his duties in the House. We know that for several years the hon. member for Vaudreuil has often tried to obtain the information he needed to take some decisions for his constituents.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must add that on several points I agree with my colleague the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and also with the member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) who spoke about declassification. However, there is an aspect of the matter with which they did not deal and it is the point that I would like to discuss.

[English]

Classification audits such as the national capital and the non-national capital audits which were referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, have found that some positions are either overclassified or underclassified, that is, the pay for the actual duties being performed is not consistent with that for similar positions elsewhere in the public service.

It is evident that corrective action is necessary in such situations. Where a position is underclassified, the employee immediately receives the benefit of the higher salary, which is just. If, and looking at the position in the first instance, we find that a man or woman because of the job they are doing is underpaid, then it is incumbent upon the employer to see to it that they are justly remunerated for the work they are doing.

In cases of overclassification, the process known as red circling is somewhat different. It is to this point that I wish to address myself. In the mid-1960s, with the introduction of the present category and group classification system, mentioned by my colleague, the hon. member for Essex-Kent, who referred to a study which was carried out in the United States, we found that the employer provided for corrective action, generally resulting in a freeze of the employee's salary for 60 or 90 days after notification of the overclassification situation. That was done unless—and this is very important—the position could be restructured to sustain the overclassified level. This freeze was to continue until the salary for the correct classification level coincided with the employee's frozen rate of pay. The employee suffered no monetary loss. My colleague from Timmins knows that from his studies and from the people working in his riding—we discussed this a little bit earlier—this was a very important aspect for them as it bore directly on the well-being of their families as well as on colleagues working in the same offices.

As I said before, the employees suffered no monetary loss. But later, to protect the red circled employees from adverse effects of increases in the cost of living, lump sum payments were instituted. In their time, these red circling provisions were at least equal to corrective classification provisions of other employees.

It should be noted that in 1975 through a memorandum of understanding jointly reached between the employer and the Public Service Alliance of Canada, an improved red circling process was instituted. However, shortly thereafter, a legal challenge was made to the employer's authority to bring employees salaries into line with the correct level of their positions, and this question was finally resolved through a Supreme Court decision. I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at six o'clock, Bill C-30, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81 was under consideration. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) had the floor. Since the hon. member for Edmonton East is not present, I will see what other hon. member catches the eye of the Chair. The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish).

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of honour this evening to rise and address this House on Bill C-30, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will bear with me when I say a few words about my constituency, since this is my maiden speech in the House of Commons. Because of the very nature of the bill and the wide scope which it encompasses, I am sure my remarks will be appropriate to that. I would like to start by thanking the people of The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency for seeing fit to elect me as their federal representative in the House of Commons and to present their views here to the best of my ability.

The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency is located in northwestern Saskatchewan and geographically covers about a quarter of the entire size of the province of Saskatchewan. It stretches from the Borden Bridge in the southeastern corner of the constituency, along the North Saskatchewan River to the Alberta border, and north to the Northwest Territories, taking in communities such as Meadow Lake, The Battlefords, as I already mentioned Buffalo Narrows, and Uranium City in the extreme northern corner of the constituency.

The constituency has a fairly diverse economy. Its economic base originally has been mainly agriculture, and fishing and trapping as we move further north out of the agricultural areas. Agriculture has been and likely in the long term will always be the number one industry within The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency, although it is a bit overshadowed at the present time because of heavy oil development, some manufacturing and mining, and an equitable distribution of income from a sound resource policy of the government that we have in Saskatchewan, as well as extensive forestry operations which take place within the constituency. However, they have been devastated somewhat recently because of the numerous forest fires of such a large extent that have been experienced in northern Saskatchewan and throughout all of northern Canada.

The constituency has a rich cultural background of Ukrainian people, people of Scandinavian ancestry, German, French, British, and in the largest part of the constituency we actually represent people from all countries in the world. As well, about 45 per cent of the constituency is made up of native people. Here I speak of treaty Indians, the registered Indians, non-status Indians and the Metis people who live within the constituency.

As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, we have an NDP government which has been in power since 1971. It has done a very good job of providing the people of Saskatchewan with a good diverse economy. It provides the people of Saskatchewan with the kind ot representation that they have enjoyed very much. That shows in the electoral results of the federal election as well as in the provincial elections since 1971.

The NDP government, as you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, came into power in Saskatchewan after seven long lean years of Liberal administration under the Hon. Ross Thatcher.

An hon. Member: The famine in Egypt.

Mr. Anguish: Prior to that time the province had been represented with the CCF administration of Tommy Douglas, Woodrow Lloyd and other such notables. They brought to us programs of electrification and the resource ownership that we enjoy so much in Saskatchewan today and, again, an equitable distribution of the income and economy within that province.

I would like to say a few words now that tie in a bit more closely with Bill C-30, the act to provide supplementary borrowing power for the federal government to the tune of $12 billion. I would like to express at this time that that is an amount that would run the provincial government of Saskatchewan for eight years. This government, in less than one page of Hansard, is asking us to provide borrowing power of $12 billion. That is disgraceful.

When I looked at the throne speech of April 14, as a new member of Parliament I had great hopes for the Liberal government. I thought they were finally going to work with the other members of this federal House in establishing a good sound country to provide equitable distribution of resources and income among all classes of the population and throughout all geographic areas of the country. They told us in the throne speech that we would have to follow two main principles in this Parliament. First, we would have to live within our means—and I can certainly agree with that as most Canadians would, so long as you have the bare means of existence. Some Canadians who live below the poverty line—and that includes many of our senior citizens and those on fixed incomes—do not even have the bare means of existence. I think that this government addressed some of those problems in the throne speech, and I was very happy to hear that.

The second thing they told us in the throne speech is that in the 1980s we will have to make sacrifices. It seems to me that this is a ridiculous statement. We live in a country which has an abundance of resources, in many areas we lead in technology, and we are an industrialized country which should be able to provide many jobs and a high standard of living. We should not have to make personal sacrifices in a country such as ours.

I think that some parts of the throne speech were good where they said that members of Parliament from all parties would be consulted in a non-partisan way on how the country should proceed through the 1980s. I mentioned in many reports to my constituents and to the media in Saskatchewan my high hopes for the Liberal government. I also mentioned some of the problems which were not addressed in the throne speech in terms of agriculture. No meaningful legislation was proposed to deal with the problems of agricultural communities in Canada, and unless the government takes some initiative to help the farmers and cattlemen in their plight, we will be facing not only an economic and an energy crisis in a few years' time but a food crisis because we are driving farmers off the land.

Nothing was said in the throne speech about transportation except for one brief statement that transportation was an important part of the Canadian industrial strategy. No mention was made of double tracking which was proposed during the last election campaign, nor was there any mention of an industrial strategy, which the Liberal party does not have anyway. I do not know why transportation was not made an important part of that strategy, a strategy which does not exist within an incompetent transportation policy under the auspices of a minister who cannot even handle his own portfolio, let alone carry out responsibilities for the Canadian Wheat Board.

At that time the Liberal government did not accept any responsibility for the high interest rates. They blamed them on the poor Conservatives and their short-term government. But actually the reason for the high interest rates can be traced back some years ago when the Liberal government was in office, and that brought us to the bad state in which we are now. Now that the interest rates are coming down, the Liberals want to take credit for it. It is not due to the Liberal government that those interest rates are coming down because the Liberal government had no policy with which to achieve it, just as the Conservatives have no such policy. I submit that the NDP put forward a policy during the election campaign for an industrial strategy and some type of long-term planning so that the people of this country would not have to make the sacrifices which they are expected to make today.

Many parts of the throne speech were taken directly from the NDP policy in the last election campaign. The petroleum price auditing agency proposed in the throne speech is exactly what the NDP was calling for during the election campaign when it proposed a commission on oil profits and prices. In fact, the Liberals found that in order to win the last election they had to swing to the left, thus almost treading on socialist ground in order to get some of the strength away from the NDP and also from the Conservatives.

The throne speech made mention also of some other matters similar to some contained in our policies put forward during the election campaign. It referred to the retaining and expanding of Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation. I think that this is a very good idea. We were great advocates of that agency when it was first formed and we supported it throughout the election campaign, as we support it now. We believe that not only should Petro-Canada be involved in 50 per cent of the petroleum industry in this country but that within the next five years it should own 100 per cent of the petroleum industry in Canada.

Still in the area of energy let me point out that it was stated in the throne speech that the government would explore the possibilities of building a pipeline from western Canada to supply the energy requirements of eastern Canada. This was taken almost directly from the NDP policy stated during the election campaign.

The government stated in the throne speech that a meaningful role would be given to members of Parliament from western Canada. As members know, and as all Canadians know, this Liberal government desperately needs representation in western Canada outside of the city of Winnipeg, and we doubt whether even that representation is adequate.

We hear now about the Liberals twinning constituencies across this country, sending their political lackeys across Canada in an effort to gain support in the west. I submit to you, sir, that they will not achieve that. I think they had better pay attention to those members of Parliament from the west who were elected by due process. I do not want to hear about proportionate representation. The people in western Canada worked for over two decades to get rid of the Liberals—we will not work now to help them back in. Another thing the Liberals have been talking about is a coalition between the NDP and the Liberals. That is a bunch of hogwash.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anguish: Again, we do not want the Liberals fooling around in western Canada because they will drive us to the same bankrupt situation we had in Saskatchewan in 1944 when the CCF government had to bail Saskatchewan out because of the shameful Liberal administration.

An hon. Member: Horsefeathers!

Mr. Anguish: Horsefeathers for sure! Mr. Speaker, the $12 billion that this government is asking for in its request for blanket borrowing powers is nothing more than money to help their corporate friends, just as the Conservatives would have done had they been in office. We spoke about the problems of government and the big deficits that we have had, but when people who work for this government ask for proper compensation, we cannot even afford to offer them 5 per cent in a two-year contract.

I should like to quote some of the salaries of the top executives in this country. Let me take Seagrams as an example. Their top executive received $788,974 in 1979 as his salary. The second top man—they do not have any women in their administration—received $585,501 in 1979, and the third top person in line for the presidency received $553,413. In 1979 the chairman of Imperial Oil received $649,172. The chief executive officer of Canadian Pacific received over $500,000. The list goes on and on and on.

I agree with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) when he says we should nationalize them. We in fact should, because they do this country no good whatsoever. At the same time we scrounge around depriving people of a decent standard of living, some of whom actually work in the House of Commons around here as clerks. They actually live almost below the poverty level. I think that is shameful. They do nothing for women's rights in order to give them equal status. As a result of the futile attempts governments made and the hundreds of reports we have received, there have been no significant gains.

The real problem with this government is that the $12 billion we are being asked to approve is being spent to help their corporate friends. That money is not needed in fact because there are about $14 billion in accumulated unpaid corporate taxes which the government chooses not to collect. The Liberals will not collect it, and the Conservatives did nothing about collecting it. If we collected that money we would not have to go out and borrow $12 billion.

I have talked about something before in this House during the question period and at committee meetings, as I happen to sit as the NDP representative on the Public Accounts Steering Committee, namely, the deficit of this government which last year was $16.185 billion. That is shameful. I would like that to go on the record. This is to be found in the 1978-79 public accounts and the audited financial statement of the Government of Canada, section 2 on page 2.5. It is there for all Canadians to read, and it is shameful. The reason for this is that the Liberal government has squandered our resources, given them away to multinationals without any thought for the Canadian people. In fact in 1969 this government had a surplus of $605 million. In one decade the situation has changed so that we now have a deficit of $16.185 billion. At this rate it will not be long, and mark my words, before this country is in the same situation that Saskatchewan was in in 1944 when the CCF government had to come and bail it out.

Mr. Elzinga: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Anguish: No, Mr. Speaker. I will permit a question after I am finished.

As I said, in 1944 the CCF party had to come in and bail out the people of Saskatchewan because of shabby Liberal administration. Up until that time the Liberal government, and before that the Conservative government for a brief period of time, and I will mention that later, gave away the resources and collected no revenue, bankrupting the province. In 1944 when the CCF government came into power members had to put up personal guarantees. People like Tommy Douglas, Bob Wooff, who represented the Turtleford constituency, and Clarence Fines, had to sign personal guarantees so that the government could in fact borrow money to put Saskatchewan back on a sound base. Today that province is on a sound base with an abundance of resources, not second to anywhere in Canada. That Liberal government came to power through the help of their corporate friends and ripped off the people of Saskatchewan.

The only time it was different was in 1929 when the Ku Klux Klan backed the Conservative party that came to power in Saskatchewan. That is the only time they ever formed a government there, and it is the only time they ever will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anguish: I am very happy that I have the attention of the House so that I can express some of the concerns I have about the people who administer this government.

Through my experience on the public accounts committee I have been exposed to reports of the Auditor General and the setting up of the office of the Comptroller General to introduce a sound base for the introduction of an efficient and accountable government which is effective and honours the wishes of the Canadian people.

I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) left, because he could use some of this experience.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anguish: Let me refer to some of our other problems to emphasize the need for this government to get control of our own economy. In 1978 we had $75 billion in foreign ownership in this country which stimulated about $4 billion a year in profits that just left the country. Those profits go to Imperial and Exxon, and to countries all over the world. Those profits are not kept here. They give money to Inco and Inco does not expand here in this country, it lays people off. That company goes to Indonesia and other places in the world to build its fortunes there. These companies in no way help the Canadian people.

We do not need to borrow because of inefficient government, but rather because of inefficient politicians who have done a poor job of running this country. I would like to use stronger words but I guess that would be unparliamentary.

We think that we should have a program in this country for effective control of our energy. We should have effective control of our financial institutions and of our transportation agencies. We should clean up our environment. The Liberals do not pay much attention to that, and the Conservatives with their many provincial governments pay no heed to it either. We should be able to provide full employment to the people of Canada rather than driving them out of their homes with high interest rates. Although the interest rates are getting lower now, many people had to renew their mortgages at 17 per cent and higher. This is the fault of Conservatives like you, and the Liberals like you.

In the area of energy, we still feel that Petro-Canada should be involved as the sole agency, with public ownership, to go into competition with other companies involved in the petroleum and the energy sector. We feel that Petro-Canada should be involved in exploration and research. It should be involved in refining, wholesale sales and retail sales. I suggest that we should get Petro-Canada involved in exploration because we in fact do not know how much conventional gas and oil we have left in this country.

In the 1973 annual report of Imperial Oil the president of that country told us, "Do not worry Canadians, we have enough gas to last us for hundreds of years." Some two years later he was telling us that we had an energy crisis. The president of Imperial Oil miscalculated by a couple of hundred years. What is even worse, the Liberals and Conservatives believed him. That is disgraceful.

We need Petro-Canada as a public agency to tell us how much gas and oil there is. Petro-Canada should also be involved in research regarding alternative forms of energy because some day the gas and oil we have will run out and we will have to look at alternate forms to satisfy the great needs we have in this country. We should consider keeping some of our energy at home to provide for our needs first, and then exporting the surpluses to other countries which are in as much need as ourselves.

We should not sell it to the United States, as Alberta does, without putting one single cent into confederation. That province does not pay one penny in export tax on the gas that they export. Saskatchewan pays about $500 million a year in respect of the export of heavy crude. The only reason Saskatchewan has to export this crude is that it does not have an upgrading plant in proximity to upgrade that crude so that we can utilize it. This is something we will be working for in this Parliament, to be situated in northwestern Saskatchewan.

We say also that Petro Canada should be involved in the wholesaling of petroleum products. This will likely be one of the most important areas when the real energy crunch comes and our gas and oil supplies are running out because the multinationals will not sell to the little service station up in Uranium City or to the little service station in Buffalo Narrows, or to the independent service station operator in the Battlefords, Meadow Lake or St. Wallburg. They will sell to their own service stations, the privately-owned ones in the larger centres, or they will sell where they can maximize their profits by obtaining the highest possible dollar without consideration for the regional distribution of supplies. Petro-Canada should be involved in the wholesale trade and sale of petroleum products just to ensure that we have an adequate supply of petroleum in all areas of this country, not just in those areas which can afford to pay the most.

We also think Petro-Canada should be involved in retail sales, not so that it can dominate the market as the multinationals do now, but so that the people of Canada may have a choice, when they pull up at a pump, to fill up their vehicles, or when a truck comes up to the farm to fill up your tank, you may have a choice between paying a multinational company to do it and exporting the money out of the country, exporting employment. You should have the choice to buy either Co-op or Petro-Canada and ensure that all your money stays in Canada.

We also believe there should be some effective control over financial institutions. The Liberal government has said it does not care to become involved in controlling interest rates. The monetary policy of this country is not set by the government. But monetary policy should be set by the government. We should not bleed the credit unions and the caisses populaires trying to make them go broke, declining to raise the ceilings for them from the $1,500 in the Small Loans Act and forcing them to charge only 12 per cent when they should at least be able to compete. This government does not let competition flourish. The field is dominated by multinationals.

When considering the subject of transportation in this Parliament we need to give serious consideration to a transportation policy designed to move people and goods across this country in a manner which is fitting to all areas of Canada, not just central Canada where the majority of the population is centred, but to the east coast and to the west coast, to move people and products throughout this country and to help in overcoming the disparities which exist now.

The fourth thing I want to talk about is the environment. We have a real problem right now with the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) failing to move to negotiations with the United States to stop sulphur from going into the air, causing acid rain to fall in this country, killing hundreds of lakes, especially in Ontario. That acid rain which is now moving throughout this country will be our biggest problem in the decades ahead unless some action is taken now to clean up the environment. What we need to do is not to find remedies after the fact. We have to look at the environment itself. Nature has always been acknowledged as the best cure for damage by pollutants that enter our environment. So if we regulate the amount of pollutants which go into our environment, nature itself will take care of that for us and we will not have to try to open up negotiations with the multinationals through inept Liberal and Conservative administrations.

The other thing we would like to see go through is a policy of full employment within Canada, and it is a policy I intend to work toward. It is ridiculous that in our country today people should be laid off in the automobile industry, in the forestry industry and elsewhere, or that people should have a hard time finding jobs in any area of this country. It is not pleasant to be faced with unemployment. Everyone is aware of the grave social problems which occur in families and communities when the unemployment rate runs so high.

In Northern Saskatchewan alone, three mills had to close down in the last few months just because of the bad administration of the federal government and its unwillingness to act to bring down high interest rates which have caused a sort of snowball effect on our economy. Things will get worse yet before they get better, because it takes times to catch up. It is definitely ruining the economy.

I should like to close by saying we have to do something about gaining control of our spending. Either revenues have to be increased or else programs will have to be cut to reduce expenditures.

An hon. Member: A total paradox.

Mr. Anguish: Someone within the Liberal administration has to make a decision about what should be done to overcome the disastrous effect on our economy. We have moved from a surplus in 1969 to a deficit of $16.185 billion a decade later. This is the difference between the amount of money we take in and the amount of money we spend. Then what happens? The politicians of this country turn around and blame it on the civil servants and on the people of Canada for not living within their means, though the fault rests entirely with the politicians who are here in Ottawa, especially those who have held the government purse strings but who have failed to act and have done nothing to solve the problems of this country.

An hon. Member: Take a look at the Crosbie budget.

Mr. Anguish: I would like to close by putting on record a short quotation which was referred to earlier by other members of this caucus, originally by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen). The quotation is from John Foster Dulles—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Anguish: —who said:

The measure of success is not whether you have a tough problem to deal with but whether it is the same problem you had last year.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it has been several decades since we have had the same problem with us and it is because of this government. We have proved it in Saskatchewan. Through equitable taxation of corporations, not just the little people of this country, we have a thriving province; we have moved from being a have-not province to being one of the most prosperous provinces in Canada, and that will not happen in this country as a whole until the people wake up and realize that the NDP can provide the only sound administration for this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: The hon. member indicated he would be good enough to answer a question after he had concluded his remarks. He showed a deep regard for the deficit and for spending. Perhaps he could explain why, when we introduced a budget to reduce the deficit and cut government spending, his party voted against it.

Mr. Anguish: I do not think that was the reason the people necessarily alone voted against the Conservative government. The reason the people of Canada voted against the Conservative government was—

An hon. Member: Joe Clark.

Mr. Anguish: Joe Clark. Second, because of the 18-cent a gallon excise tax they were going to impose—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. With the greatest of respect, the hon. member indicated at the beginning of his speech that it was his maiden speech. The Chair has therefore allowed the greatest latitude, though there were moments of difficulty when we reached the Ku Klux Klan and other subjects. But I think I have even more difficulty at this point understanding the relationship between the exchange of the two members and the subject of Bill C-30, an act to implement a borrowing authority. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the next hon. member who hopefully will show hon. members the joys of relevance which perhaps would assist the House.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate your Your Honour's degree of latitude in allowing me to go on in my maiden speech in the House of Commons. As Mr. Speaker can appreciate, I had difficulty in sticking with Bill C-30 to give the government borrowing powers. But in response to the question the hon. member opposite was asking me—

● (2040)

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: —I was only trying to go on with the long list of problems, as to why the people of Canada in fact defeated the Conservative government.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the hon. member illustrated his intelligence in answering my question, because I did not ask him why the people of Canada voted as such. I asked him why his party voted against a budget that would reduce government spending and bring down the deficit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair is having a problem recognizing the relevance of even the points of order. I recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling).

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly endeavour to heed your very, very excellent advice and stick to the subject for most of the time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: I know we are allowed a little bit of latitude.

An hon. Member: Do you want to bet?

Mr. Darling: I bet occasionally. The strayers from the subject time and again are the hallowed group to the left of me—

An hon. Member: Hallowed!

Mr. Darling: —who think they are saints personified.

On Tuesday, May 27, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, introduced a profoundly significant bill, Bill C-30. It is a bill to grant the government the authority to squander more of the hard-earned money of taxpayers, and then the minister spoke in defence of the bill for less than five minutes. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, asking members of this House to allow it to borrow an additional $12 billion, and then speaking in defence of such a request for such a very few minutes. I presume he is going on the basis that the government has a majority and that it will be able to ram it through despite the objections of the combined opposition.

At the time the minister introduced the bill, he said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, I will follow the advice given by members of the opposition and make my remarks very brief—

Certainly the minister held to his words. His remarks in defence of this terribly significant bill occupied about three quarters of a page in the May 27 edition of Hansard. Can you, Mr. Speaker, fathom such arrogance, such dishonesty and such insolence? It is bad enough that the minister spoke in defence of the bill for such a few minutes. What is even worse is that he said absolutely nothing of consequence. He told us nothing. He told Canadians absolutely nothing. Does the minister think he can hoodwink Canadians a second time? Does the minister think Canadians are uninterested? Does he think Canadians are all stupid? It is high time the government realizes that it is dealing with taxpayers' money. It is deplorable that the minister would ask for permission to borrow such an enormous sum and not provide members of the House with any indication whatsoever of how it intends to dispose of and spend that money.

Actually the government had the audacity, the unmitigated gall and the temerity to ask members of the House to provide it with the authority to borrow an additional $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81. I would remind the government that just a few months ago it was declared by certain Liberal members that the Clark administration had lost control when it requested the authority of the House to borrow $7 billion. At that time it was suggested that we only required $3.5 billion. I believe that suggestion was made by the finance critic at that time, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), who was in his seat a few moments ago. I wonder what he is saying now about this $12 billion. My apologies, I see the hon. minister is talking very confidentially with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). I am wondering what the minister who now sits on the Treasury benches, the finance critic of the Liberal opposition party during the very short tenure of office of the Clark government, is now saying about this $12 billion request.

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Darling: Nothing; that is quite right.

The government is asking members of the House to trust it. Let me repeat that. The government is asking the members of the House to trust it. It is requesting authority to borrow a lump sum of money without indicating why it needs the money. It is saying to Canadians, "Let us borrow the money and let us spend it just as we see fit". What will the government do with the $12 billion? This is information which the House deserves to be provided with before it grants any such authority. Certainly we do not intend to give them a blank cheque, or a cheque for $12 billion and say, "Away you go, boys, spend it as you like."

There is no doubt about it. The government has lost control over government spending, if indeed it ever had control. One only needs to refer to the long list of cost overruns which was supplied recently by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). In committee of the whole the minister referred to a list of 497 projects with cost overruns of $1,064 million. The list with which we were supplied contained only 471 projects. Why were we not supplied with a complete list? Not only was the list incomplete, it was seven months old. One cannot help but wonder if the government is deliberately endeavouring not to reveal the actual seriousness of the problem. Is it possible that the amount of the cost overruns of these 497 projects is probably a good deal greater than the $1,064 million stated by the minister in the House?

It is bad enough the government has permitted the magnitude of the problem to skyrocket. Members on this side of the House want to know what the government is doing to make certain the problem is being brought under control. Mr. Speaker, 153 projects out of 223 projects under the Department of the Environment have experienced serious cost overruns. Certainly that is scandalous. Does this department have no control at all over its spending? Permit me to mention just a few of the more serious examples.

The Lachine Canal project had a cost overrun of $45.9 million, or 90 per cent over the original cost. The Art Park restoration project had a cost overrun of $6,550,000, or 54.4 per cent over the initial estimate. The Halifax Development project has had a cost overrun of $14,063,000, or 97.1 per cent. I cannot imagine a cost overrun that is in excess of 95 per cent. That is unforgivable and deplorable. The Newfoundland Highway 430 project had a cost overrun of $12,537,000, or 298.5 per cent. That is absolutely unbelievable. The Fort Anne Nova Scotia Development project had a cost overrun of $4,174,000, or 302.7 per cent. It is getting worse and worse as I go along. What kind of estimates did the government come down with?

A good many of us on both sides of this House are probably considering that these departments, when they originally ask for this money, know that even the Treasury Board chairman of the present government would have turned them down if they knew the true facts. Therefore, they hide them by estimating at rock bottom prices because they know when the time comes the figure will go up, but by then the government has committed itself. Once the project is under way, it is much easier to say, "You cannot shut the project off now because it is half done". In that way, they are able to extricate the extra money out of the government.

Part of the money which the government is asking to borrow this time will probably go to this very same thing. The Department of the Environment is not the only department which is experiencing serious cost overrun problems. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is experiencing similar difficulties. In fact 42 of the 76 projects under the jurisdiction of Indian and Northern Affairs are experiencing cost overrun problems as well. National Defence, Public Works, the National Research Council, and the National Capital Commission are all experiencing serious cost overrun problems.

The Quebec sewage program and the road network projects under the National Capital Commission have experienced phenomenal cost overruns. The Quebec sewage project has a cost overrun of $14 million, or 35 per cent. The road network project has a cost overrun of $10 million, or 6.7 per cent. I am sure that a good many of us are aware of the hundreds of millions of dollars which have already been poured by the National Capital Commission into projects across the river in our sister city, Hull.

The Lethbridge laboratory project which falls within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture is experiencing a cost overrun of $16,136,000, or 503.6 per cent. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, 503 per cent over the original suggested cost. One would think that the government is not overly concerned about the problem. If the government is willing to allow one of its projects to realize such a fantastic overrun, then what other conclusion can we reach? If, by chance, this government would like to give the impression that it is indeed concerned, then why has it not established a special committee to investigate cost overruns, a move, by the way, which was initiated by the previous Conservative administration?

It is abundantly clear that the government has lost all control over government spending. What is even worse, it appears that it is not prepared to do anything about the problem. In light of this appalling evidence of bad fiscal management on the part of the current Liberal administration, I would strongly suggest that the government not be given the authority to borrow $12 billion until, first, it has produced to this House solid proof that it is endeavouring to adopt a more responsible attitude with regard to the expenditure of the people's money. Secondly, this government should provide this House with a definite indication of how it intends to spend the money which it expects to borrow.

We are all well aware, and the subject has been mentioned by previous speakers, that a good deal of this money will probably be used to offset the high cost of energy and the greatly increased cost of offshore oil. There is no argument that the price of oil prior to 1973 was dirt cheap. However, that is certainly no longer the case. Hon. members are aware that about one-quarter of the oil that we use is imported, and the difference between the cost of that oil and the price of Canadian oil is subsidized from general tax revenue.

At the start of last year the subsidy for oil was $4.60 a barrel. This month the subsidy is a staggering $21 a barrel. From 1968 to 1978 the budgetary deficit increased by 11 times. In 1968 the deficit of the federal Liberal government was $800 million. In 1978, ten years later, it was a staggering $9.2 billion. The size of the Prime Minister's office staff between 1968 and 1978 rose from eight people to 90 people. In 1968 the Privy Council staff consisted of 194 persons, and it now contains 368 persons. That is a total increase of 127 per cent.

Let us look at some other figures. Unemployment in 1968 was 4.5 per cent, and in February of 1978 it was 8.3 per cent. The important thing is to cut down on the borrowing and other costs and attempt to get more people back to work. Unemployment insurance benefits in 1968 cost the government $438 million. In 1979 the amount paid out for unemployment benefits was a staggering $3.9 billion.

I have with me tonight a very interesting article. It is the verbatim transcript of a dialogue between two very prominent Canadian citizens, which was broadcast to us on April 23. I do not think that either of these illustrious gentlemen could be classed as strong supporters of the Progressive Conservative Party. One of the individuals was the very notable and redoubtable Pierre Berton.

Mr. McDermid: A millionaire socialist.

Mr. Darling: Yes, a millionaire socialist. There is no doubt about that. The other individual almost took the leadership of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, Charles Templeton.

Mr. McDermid: Charles who?

Mr. Darling: The brief conversation between these two gentlemen went as follows:

TEMPLETON: Pierre, I gave up, temporarily, on Canada when the results of the last election came in. I now say the chickens are coming home to roost—we are going to rue the day.

BERTON: Well, after looking at last night's mini-budget, Chuck, there is only one question to ask: what ever happened to that word 'restraint'?

TEMPLETON: Pierre, Mr. Trudeau said, during the campaign, among the few things he said, that he would cut back on government spending. The budget they sneaked in—calling it a non-budget—Mr. MacEachen said two things which beyond all the inspecifics ought to be noticed. He said the higher interest charges on the public debt and further escalation of the oil import subsidy is going to mean that there will be two billion dollars more federal spending than was anticipated last December 11. Secondly, the budgetary deficit is going to go up in this one year, 2.7 billion dollars to 14.2 billion dollars, and still there is nothing in this mini-budget designed to cut spending or to fight inflation or to combat unemployment.

BERTON: Well, this is the government that knocked out the Conservatives because of their budget. This is the government that invented the word 'restraint', and said that they were going to cut back on government spending before the last election. This is the government whose auditor general on retirement two weeks ago announced that there was one-third too many civil servants in the country. This is the government that last night through Mr. MacEachen said that federal spending would not increase 10 per cent this year as predicted by the Conservatives, which is horrendous enough; it will increase 13.5 per cent. In other words, there is no real effort being made to cut the cost of government, which the Auditor General himself tells us is necessary. They tell us now that unemployment is going to go up from 7.4 to 8 per cent, that inflation is going to go up from 9 to 10 per cent. The economy is going to slow down to .5 per cent growth.

TEMPLETON: Oh, that's what they estimate.

BERTON: Yeah.

TEMPLETON: There's going to be no growth, no growth at all.

BERTON: Well, either, as you say, no imaginative or sensible projection—

TEMPLETON: Never mind imaginative or sensible, no projections.

BERTON: That's correct, nothing at all.

TEMPLETON: What they're going to do is get more money to spend.

That is certainly proven in this bill.

BERTON: They're going to rent more money, they're going to borrow more money at 20 per cent interest rates.

Thank goodness, Mr. Speaker, the rates have started to come down so they are not exactly correct in that.

TEMPLETON: They're going to borrow it. They're going to steal a little bit off tobacco smokers, steal a little bit off alcohol, but they are not going to charge anything more for gasoline. They are not going to do anything about conservation. They're gonna put a surtax of 5 per cent on federal income tax from corporations, but that is temporary. You see, what I, what really burns my—

I will say posterior, and not use the exact word that Mr. Templeton used.

—is the absolute corruption of the Liberal government who pay no attention to what they promised the people, who make no attempt to keep the promises they make, who lie in their platforms and who lie when they get in office. They don't even call this a budget.

I guess, Mr. Speaker, some of them find it difficult even to lie straight in bed at night.

What it is, it's a way to get more money so they can spend it because that's the Liberal way of governing.

BERTON: One thing they've got Charles, you have to admit—

TEMPLETON: Power—

BERTON: —they've got power that the people gave to them, you know. What the heck, you say, I gave up on Canada, people get the kind of government they deserve and I think they're gonna rue the day they got this one, that's just unbelievable what went on last night in the House of Commons.

TEMPLETON: Pierre, if you look at the proposals here, if you look at the suggestions, they are absolutely . . . first of all, how in heaven's name can you bring down a government, as they did, in company with the NDP on the NDP's amendment . . . how can you bring down a government and then bring back virtually all of the things that government was going to bring, except the things that matter. Namely, a cutting down on spending; namely, an increase in the taxes on driving. The very things campaigned against are the things that are done. We have an immorality in this Liberal government and in its leader, that I find just incomprehensible.

I find it impossible to believe for whatever the charisma may be, or whatever the myth may continue to be, the people continue to support, but they do. And they have a majority they can run on—

BERTON: There's four years, they're there for at least four years and I think Mr. Trudeau's gonna stay in for four years—

So do I, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: So do I.

Mr. Darling: He continues:

—and he's going to prevent any attempt to challenge his leadership until four years are up.

An hon. Member: Tell Gerry Regan that.

Mr. Darling: Templeton finishes up with "A pox on him". I say the same—a pox on this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate, on Bill C-30 tonight, which I remind hon. members of the House and the public is a bill in which the government is requesting authority to borrow a further $12 billion, I feel it might be helpful, first of all, to try to put that sum into perspective. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I believe we in this House often lose total sight of the figures with which we are dealing.

As a result of the government's borrowing needs, they are now required to pay something like 12 per cent interest per year when they borrow money. To put that into perspective, as we debate tonight this small bill, large in its impact, remember that with interest rates running at 12 per cent, money on a cumulative basis doubles in six years and goes up four times in 12 years. This means that we are not in fact talking about $12 billion, we are talking about the creation of debt in the name of Canada that will require, over the next six years, a further $12 billion simply to service it. Then 12 years ahead, the total amount of debt and servicing charges that will be required is $48 billion and within 18 years it is then, of course, $96 billion.

The reason I emphasize this, Mr. Speaker, is that I am so totally and unbelievably shocked by the indifference of this government to the magnitude of what they have asked this House to do by introducing this bill.

To put it again into perspective, once I was told by a bureaucrat, when there was a little uncertainty as to whether he meant in the case of this deal, $10 million or $10 billion, that we never use the last three digits in Ottawa. That is part of this nation's problem, Mr. Speaker. We have had a government for the last decade especially, with the brief interregnum, that frankly does not relate to the figures they are forcing the Canadian public to accept.

It is easy to do the arithmetic. What we are considering tonight, in effect, is whether the government should be empowered to go out and, on behalf of every man, woman and child in Canada, borrow $500. That is what we are talking about. For a family of three we are being asked to allow the government to go out and borrow $1,500. It is as simple as that. With interest at 12 per cent and applying the cumulative factor, that means that for every man, woman and child we are, in effect, going to incur a debt of $500 on their behalf, that becomes $1,000 in six years, $2,000 in 12 years and $4,000 in 18 years. This does not have to continue, Mr. Speaker. With a responsible government, a government that is willing to attempt to balance its budgetary position, this ongoing increase first, of budgetary deficits and second, of debt requirements, could be halted.

I was rather encouraged as I came into the House tonight to hear the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) at least showing some alarm with respect to what we are being asked to consider and approve tonight. I think it is good that any member of the House, whether he be socialist, Liberal or Conservative, has the courage to stand up and say, "We have had enough of this and we are not going to rubberstamp it any further."

I know it is commonplace for this government that believes only in political power, is totally indifferent to the economic consequence of its actions, to say, "Maybe things are not as good as we would like in Canada but, after all, we are not doing badly compared with other countries." In that connection, let me refer to a couple of things. In the Spring 1980 Review, the Friedberg Mercantile Group have an interesting chart in which they set out the comparative CPI figures, the wholesale increase figures, and the current account positions with respect to ten of the most industrialized nations in the world. If hon. members think that Canada is not doing too badly, I ask them to please take a look at these charts.

The first chart deals with the consumer price index. It ranks Canada sixth among the ten. The next chart deals with wholesale prices and it ranks Canada ninth out of ten; only one country is worse, and that is Italy. With regard to our current account deficit, we have the distinction of being the last. We are the ninth worst in the industrialized world. There were no figures for the tenth country to show how it performed.

Somehow this is all knitted together. I know that members on the government side might be quick to say that is just one economist's or company's views, but let me quote their own figures to them. Earlier this week the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—who I am quite disappointed is not in the House tonight while this bill is being considered—tabled his Economic Review. Again, I invite all members to leaf through that review because it they do not want to accept the figures that may be put on the record from this side of the House, surely they will accept the figures from their own Minister of Finance.

For example, what that review highlights is the tremendous imbalance of taxation in this country compared to that of the United States. I refer to page 136 of the review, table 11.22. That shows a Canada-United States comparison of government expenditures by function as a percentage of their gross national product. I emphasize that this is not dealing with simple dollar terms, it is dealing in the percentages being spent in those two countries in relation to their respective gross national products.

In the case of the United States, it shows that the total expenditure in that country is 34.6 per cent of its gross national product. That is the expenditure on account of government. In Canada, the expenditure is 41.8 per cent. As one can see, it is over 7 per cent higher, and it is over 20 per cent higher, if you want to take one percentage over another, than that in the United States. That is only part of the story, Mr. Speaker.

You will find the reason that the American figures are as high as they are is that they are spending 5.4 per cent of their gross national product on defence, while Canada is spending only 1.7 per cent. If those figures are equalized, and if the Americans, for example, only spent on defence—and I am not suggesting that they should—what we are spending relatively, it would mean that their total governmental expenditures are 30.9 per cent compared to Canada's 41.8 per cent.

I refer to that because sometimes we lose sight of the fact that in Canada we have not only become one of the most over-governed countries in the world, we have become one of the most inefficient, expensive countries in the world as far as government is concerned. This is so significant because the figures that I have given are comparative figures to those of the United States.

The Americans are our main trading partners. It is the United States that holds out the greatest hope for further exports as far as Canada is concerned. I can only tell hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to the degree that we are loading our Canadian public with approximately 20 per cent more in government expenditures, that we are handicapping our people in their productivity and in other means of exploiting that American market.

That brings me to the discounted dollar, because the two are related. As hon. members are undoubtedly aware, we had to let our dollar fall because we could no longer compete on the world markets with a dollar roughly at part with the United States. One reason why we could not compete was because we had loaded our workers with this excess government spending which meant extra taxation on their backs compared to their counterparts in the United States. The phony equalization mechanism is simply to allow the dollar to fall, roughly 15 per cent, which then makes the Canadian worker a person working for 15 per cent less than he used to work for in terms of American dollars. That is what happened with a discounted Canadian dollar. We require every worker in Canada in terms of American dollars to simply take a pay cut of over 15 per cent in order to allow the Liberal government to continue with its high-flying spending approaches.

I could read into the record certain other rather startling revelations that are in the Minister of Finance's economic review. I stress these are not Conservative or socialist figures; these are figures tabled by the government of the day.

For example, there is an international comparison of central government expenditures on page 135 of the review at Table 11.21. It is interesting to note that there is only one country that has a higher central government expenditure than Canada. Guess who? It is Italy. That is the only country. Australia has a total expenditure of 29.7 per cent. I could read the whole list into the record. Again, it is interesting to note that as far as international comparisons of central budget balances are concerned, again, in 1977, those are the last available figures, there is only one country worse than Canada, and that is Italy.

Again, most importantly, when we compare the budgetary deficit in Canada for 1979 with that of the United States—and these figures are available on page 133, Table 11.19 of that Economic Review—I am pleased that you are seated, Mr. Speaker, because how many people in Canada realize that while these Grits have led us to the position of where we have a deficit in relation to our gross national product of 3.5 per cent, the Americans are virtually in balance with minus 0.4 per cent in relation to their GNP? These are the facts.

I believe it is particularly relevant tonight to be putting those facts on the record as we consider a bill in which the government is asking us to approve it borrowing, on behalf of every man, woman and child in this country, an extra $500.

Think what this government has done to interest rates in the country. There seems to be great confusion about this. I have heard our socialist friends to the left stand up and say, "Reduce interest rates" and the next speaker will stand up and say that certain expenditures should be increased as far as the government is concerned, without realizing that if you increase expenditures with a government that is already spending one-third more than its revenue, you have no place to cover your expenditure other than going into debt further which drives up interest rates.

Let me again refer to the Economic Review of the Minister of Finance. What they have loaded Canada with is all spelled out. For example, on page 141 of that review there is a chart which indicates that in 1970-73, interest rates in Canada at one time were actually below 6 per cent. That is as recently as the 1970-73 time-frame.

In 1974-77 they got up as high as 9 per cent. In 1978 they were almost continually above 9 per cent. In 1979 they got up to almost 11 per cent, certainly over 10 per cent. As we know, recently interest rates on Canadian government bonds got as high as 13¾ per cent. This is the bottom line, if you like, of the inept bungling on the part of the present government.

I would like to refer, and perhaps read into the record because it is so interesting, what the Economic Review says concerning comparative interest rate levels at the federal government level and the provincial level in Canada. Referring to page 141 of the Minister of Finance's own Economic Review, it states:

> While there may not be a close relationship between nominal interest rates and total borrowing requirements, relative yields within the Canadian financial markets have been influenced over the past decade by the relative volumes of securities available. For example, the yield on federal securities has increased relative to the yields on comparable private sector securities over the course of the decade as the federal government increased its marketable issues at a rapid pace. Thus, while federal government marketable bonds represented 20 per cent of the Canadian dollar bond holdings of the general public in 1970 and almost 25 per cent in 1979, the yield differential between federal and provincial bonds dropped from 1.13 percentage points in 1970 to 0.53 points in 1979, and the spread between federal bonds and comparable private securities narrowed over the same period from 1.27 to 0.69 percentage points. A similar situation occurred in the short-term money market where the federal government's securities constituted less than 4 per cent of the market in 1970 and more than 10 per cent in 1979.

Expressed simply, what that review, or the economist who wrote that paragraph, is saying is that the federal government, which used to be able to borrow money at over one percentage point less than the provinces in Canada, has now borrowed money to such excess that that differential has been cut by more than half. That is significant.

I know some may say, "What do you do about it?" We are faced with a bill requesting the $12 billion to which I have referred. Here is where I feel the official opposition is on sound ground. On December 11 last year we tried to do something about it. In the budget that was brought down that night, we attempted for the first time in Canadian history to show an economic program that would in fact lessen the deficit and the necessary borrowing in this country, that would not only just raise revenues, but would also lower expenditures as far as the federal government level was concerned.

Within two days we were voted out of office. We must never forget this: The old alliance between the NDP and the Liberal party deemed it in their own political interests to trigger an election in this country. With that background, Mr. Speaker, you can understand, as I said before, my pleasure in hearing the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake talk about deficits and the fact that he was alarmed at the size of our deficit. On the other hand, surely we must all agree how totally inconsistent members of Parliament can be within their own caucuses. Here you have that member being coached by the person who brought in the motion that was supported by their friends, the Liberals, that defeated the government which would have lessened deficits in this country. We are told tonight by another member of that caucus that that is exactly what should have happened.

Here is the consequence of what we are looking at. If the present Minister of Finance does not arrest the present trend as far as spending and revenue forces are concerned, it will mean that the cumulative extra deficit. which means net debt, between now and 1984 will be $27 billion. Unless the present government arrests the trend, that is the net position as far as expenditures and revenues are concerned. The net cumulative deficit will be increased by $27 billion if the Minister of Finance does not come up with something comparable to what we proposed on December 11 to narrow the deficit in this country.

Let me give the figures. At the present time the total net debt in this country is approximately $67 billion. Under the budget that we proposed, by 1984, with the restraint that we proposed, and with the revenue increases that we suggested, the total net debt position would be $105 billion. Without that budget, and as the trend is now in place, the net debt will be $133 billion.

Let me put that into per capita terms. It will mean there will be approximately $1,200 of added debt over and above what we would have suggested for every man, woman and child in this country. If there is any compassion in these ruthless, hungry political people who somehow or other covet power over everything else, surely they are going to bring a halt to this type of extravagant expenditure performance that has been their tradition in Canada.

It is so typical of the government now ruling this country for me to be able to look across the aisle and see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) giggling and laughing as if this is one of the funniest things that has ever happened in the nation.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am only wearing my nice, usual smile.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Nice Guy.

Mr. Lalonde: That's right.

Mr. Stevens: Anybody who finds much to smile about when we are talking about adding $500 to the debt of every man, woman and child in this country as a result of the sheer incompetence of his government is a strange person indeed.

Mr. Lalonde: Don't you smile now.

Mr. Stevens: That strange, strange Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Lalonde: You are smiling too.

• (2130)

Mr. Stevens: That strange Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to whom I have been referring is the same person whom I heard say in the House—and at that time I think he had a straight face, but perhaps he was laughing to himself—that he saved the Canadian public 18 cents a gallon in lieu of the excise tax which was not imposed in the mini-budget brought in by the Minister of Finance.

Let us put that into perspective. They did not save one nickel, let alone 18 cents. What they have done simply is to add it to the deficit, which means it is added to the debt and is going to be in the general pot, accruing an interest of 12 per cent a year.

An hon. Member: Do not mislead the House.

Mr. Stevens: Let there be absolutely no doubt about that. This government, in saying that it has saved the Canadian public 18 cents a gallon—

An hon. Member: Is telling the truth.

Mr. Stevens: —is not telling the truth because all that has happened essentially is that the government has proposed, if we grant them the authority tonight, to write IOUs to cover 18 cents a gallon, which means that all they have done for those who fill their tanks, is to give them approximately $3 on a tank of gas. This money ends up in the debt column in Ottawa to be paid by future generations.

Mr. Kaplan: It ends up as profit for your friends in the oil business.

Mr. Kempling: The bionic mouth over there is speaking.

Mr. Stevens: Let us put something in perspective because I have heard certain comments coming from the Liberal backbenchers. They are well back, I might say. I did not talk about certain expenditures so far as our budget was concerned that would have offset the 18 cents tax to which I referred. Here are the hard figures. so far as the budgetary transactions were concerned, under the conservative budget of December last our revenues were to amount to $46,835 million. The revenues under the mini-budget brought in by the Minister of Finance were $45,635 million, that is $1,200 million less than our revenues. So far as expenditures are concerned, we proposed under our Conservative budget to spend $57.3 billion. The Grits brought in a mini-budget calling for expenditures of $59,800 million, or $2,500 million more than we proposed. Those are the figures. It means that in total our deficit, which was higher than we would have liked, amounting to $10,465 million, expanded in those few brief months by the time the Minister of Finance came up with his mini-budget to $14,165 million, or a jump of $3.7 billion.

Any time a Liberal backbencher wants to ask me a few questions like that, I will be only too willing to read into the record the disastrous incompetence on the Liberal side.

In summary, let me put it in other words. An NDP spokesman tonight referred to John Foster Dulles.

Mr. Epp: The new guru of the NDP.

Mr. Stevens: Being a truly progressive Conservative I should like to refer to the words of Thomas Jefferson who had this to say:

> I place economy among the first and most important virtues, and public debt as the greatest of dangers . . . we must make our choice between economy and liberty, or profusion and servitude. If we can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people under the pretence of caring for them, they will be happy.

I rest my case. No MP in conscience could vote to pass Bill C-30 until the government has produced a proper fiscal plan, namely, a budget for this country to examine. It would be irresponsible for members to start voting in support of this bill in light, first of all, of the government's hesitation to bring in a budget, and second, to give us a five-year overview such as the United States has produced, the United Kingdom produces, the Lambert report has suggested be done in Canada, and we did in our December budget. In short, it is time that members of the House stood up and were counted for the Canadian public instead of simply playing it political.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-30, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81. I do so because the wording of the bill and the minister's introduction to it on May 27 raise more questions than they answer. In fact the minister's speech is surely a model of brevity. When he wrote it he must have been looking at the three monkeys. By that I mean the three monkeys that hear no evil, speak no evil, and see no evil. He definitely made certain not to tell the House any more than the barest essentials. In fact, his speech is so naked in content that had it been presented anywhere but in this chamber, I feel that the minister may well have been charged with indecently exposing his borrowing act.

I listened to the minister's speech, I read and reread it, and I did the same thing with Bill C-30. But because it tells me nothing about the government's plans I cannot in all honesty, as the representative of the people of South Shore, vote for this measure. As close as I can determine, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stood in his place and simply stated that the government needs borrowing authority for $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81, in foreign currency as well as in Canadian money. Obviously he has already had a little twinge of concern that he and his colleagues may have gone once too often to the cookie jar and that perhaps the cookie jar may be becoming empty. So now he wants to make certain that he has the right to go to some other country's cookie jar in order to get the funds he may require, if it is necessary. All this may be due to the minister's Scottish background and his ingrained sense of thrift which causes him to make certain that sufficient funds are available from any source for his needs. If this is the case, our only regret is that his sense of thrift is obviously not shared by his colleagues.

The minister also referred to his statement of April 21 when he tabled a projection of the government's budgetary requirements for 1980-81 in the amount of $11,730 million. Since then, however, he has decided he needs a little extra margin of borrowing authority to provide for contingencies. So he is rounding out the figures and he is asking for a blank cheque of $12 billion. Well, the difference between the minister's April forecast and his request in May is $270 million, which is not an insignificant amount seeing that little more than a month separates his two statements. It reminds me—and I go back a few years—of the C. D. Howe statement when that gentleman was prone to ask the question, "What's a million?" Obviously this type of thinking still prevails among the present day Liberals. One would hope that they had learned a lesson because the "what's a million" statement cost them the government at that time.

An hon. Member: Now it is "What's a billion?"

Mr. Crouse: Yes, now it is "What's a billion?" The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) must have been reading my notes because that is exactly what I was going to say.

An hon. Member: He wrote them.

Mr. Crouse: I am sorry but I have to correct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). The notes that lie in front of me, sir, for your information, were entirely composed and compiled by me; good, bad, or indifferent, they are my effort.

The $12 billion that is in the bill is not the total story. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance in his brief remarks told us that the unused borrowing authority which is available for use at any time, and which is being carried forward, amounted to approximately $2.9 billion at the beginning of the fiscal year 1980-81, which is really April 1, April Fool's day. The minister may take us all for April fools, but quite frankly I believe that the Canadian electorate is at least entitled to know what this government planned to do not with $12 billion, but $15 billion. That, as was so adequately described by a previous speaker, is $500 for every man, woman and child in Canada. That is in effect what the government is asking the right to borrow at the present time.

I say this because it is now obvious to everyone that the Canadian financial ship of state, sir, is out of control. You need only look over the years in which the Liberal party has been in power to realize the truth of that statement. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was first elected on June 25, 1968, Canada then had a population somewhat in excess of 20 million people, and according to the record, "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent", which was put out, I think in 1978 by the then president of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Bud Drury, we read that in 1968 it required less than $10 billion to look after the needs of our people. What has happened in the intervening years? Our population has grown to a little more than 23 million and today we require $58.4 billion, perhaps $60 billion, to look after our needs.

With the exception of a brief period during which my party was in office, unfortunately too brief a period, when we proposed to reduce Canada's deficits, the Liberals had been in power under their present leader for some 12 years. The problems which had been brought about by their mismanagement and deficit financing must be laid squarely at the feet of this present government. The $15 billion borrowing pill might be a little easier to swallow if it was coated with the sugar of explanation, and obviously this can only be done if the government provided this House with a budget.

The minister in his shy, retiring manner has given no indication of when we can anticipate a budget, or what his final spending plans are for this fiscal year. Obviously we can only anticipate his reticence as being indicative of something more sinister. I refer to his reticence to come clean. He could be "Mr. Clean" with Canadian taxpayers, but we can only judge his reticence as an indication that worse is yet to come. "Come grow old along with me," says the Minister of Finance, "the worst is yet to be." That is about what we are facing tonight.

This bill is asking for $12 billion borrowing authority on top of, as I said, almost $3 billion already approved. This means that the total sum of $15 billion will have to be borrowed by the government, or will be available to be borrowed by it to finance its operations and to meet its cash requirements during the current fiscal year. This amount, as I said previously, is more than the minister predicted in May that he and his government required. The increased amount is substantial. When one calculates the interest at current borrowing rates, something like 12 per cent, all of which will have to come from the pockets of individual taxpayers, one will see that the load that must be carried by Canadians to support this spendthrift government is staggering. The $15 billion at 12 per cent means a carrying charge for one year only of $1.8 billion.

Why do you need borrowing authority for $14.9 billion? I ask the Minister of Finance that through you, Mr. Speaker. Why do you need that when you stated on April 21 last that your total requirement would be only $11.730 billion? That is $3.170 billion more than his own estimate. When you ask for this much money in excess of requirements you certainly cannot any longer hypocritically keep telling the Canadian people that you are a government of restraint or a party practising restraint. This is the course you have been following, but it is way past the time when you should match your words with concrete action.

On January 11 of this year, for example, Mr. Trudeau campaigned for votes, outlining five general commitments to Canadians which were the echoes of some of the same old, reprinted promises we have heard for the past 12 years.

I ask the government, through you, Mr. Speaker, how does it relate this request for almost $15 billion in borrowing authority with Mr. Trudeau's statement that, if elected, the Liberal government "will manage more vigorously the nation's finances in order to make more effective use of the taxpayer's money?" That is his statement. Is it any wonder that the Canadian electorate today are cynical about promises made by their leaders? That is unfortunate, sir.

On May 31, 1968, in his first campaign, Mr. Trudeau told a Moncton office that his government would spend no more than it earned. On August 3, 1969, he said in Ottawa that a new Liberal government restraint program would bring government spending under control. On February 19, 1973, his finance minister promised government determination to impose restraint on its own spending in order to avoid aggravating inflation.

In the throne speech of September 30, 1974, and in the budget speech of June 23, 1975, the Trudeau government promised spending restraints. When announcing wage and price controls in October of 1975 Mr. Trudeau promised spending restraints. On October 18, 1976, the Liberal president of the Treasury Board promised spending restraints. On August 1, 1978, Mr. Trudeau went on television to tell the nation his government would cut $2 billion in government spending. This is one of the benefits of being around this esteemed chamber for a few years, you can look back and draw on your own experiences. I recall, having gone through ten campaigns, the many promises that had been made by these people on the other side.

With all this restraint we must ask ourselves why are the Canadian people today groaning under an onerous tax burden which siphons the money away from the private or productive sector of the economy and places it in the public or non-productive sector of the economy, thereby contributing to horrendous inflation, while at the same time building up bureaucracy? The answer is that this government has not kept its promises to restrain spending, for the figures tell an entirely different story.

In the fiscal year before its defeat last May the Liberal government spent six times as much as it did in 1968 when Mr. Trudeau first took office and it ended that year with a deficit of more than $12 billion. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance, stating in less than a whole page of Hansard that he wants borrowing authority for another $12 billion—that is a billion dollars a month, or a thousand million dollars a month—is showing his contempt for Parliament. That is a lot of money. That makes the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources smile. I am sure his computerized mind was working that one over, but it is a thousand million dollars a month and we have no explanation whatsoever about the manner in which this vast sum of money is to be spent. When they do this, the government and the Minister of Finance are showing contempt for Parliament.

An hon. Member: Careful, now.

Mr. Crouse: Somebody over there says "Careful, now." Analyse what I have said and I think members will agree with me that, as far as the minister is concerned, we are not supposed to ask any questions about where this money is going and for what purpose it is to be used. We are simply supposed to sit here quietly while the hon. gentleman plays his bagpipes, or when he decides to tinkle those little bells that ring in the corridors. Then we are supposed to come into this chamber and rubber-stamp the measure before us. One of the hon. members over there—I think it is the hon. member for Burin-St. Georges (Mr. Simmons) keeps interrupting me. He says "Right on!" He doesn't get up and make a speech. It shows what little understanding he has of what is actually happening in Canada today.

Mr. Simmons: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) indicates that I was interrupting him. Actually, I was trying to help the gentleman on. He suggests I might want to make a speech. Mr. Speaker, if he would yield I would certainly like to make a few pertinent comments on the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has the floor.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, but my time is somewhat limited. I was saying we are expected to sit here and rubber stamp this measure. This is something I cannot do, for the government, by following its present course, is not showing any respect for Parliament or its representatives. I ask supporters of the government whether any of them could tell us why the executive should require these vast borrowing powers. Why is the government following a course of action which gives them more than $3 billion in excess padding over and above the minister's stated requirements, requirements which have not been explained in any detail to the House? Is this cushion required to maintain the dollar at current levels if there is new pressure against it on the foreign exchange markets because of the obvious mismanagement of the country's affairs? Or is the cushion needed to blunt and contain the adverse effects on the economy of the slow-down, the recession which unfortunately is already under way? All these questions could be answered if the government had the courage to present the House with a budget.

Why are they seeking this enormous, this tremendous, this scandalous borrowing authority without first presenting a budget to Parliament? It is unfair and unjust to ask anyone in this chamber to vote for this measure in the absence of a budget, since we have no way of knowing what to expect by way of revenues and expenditures or what will be the resulting deficit and cash requirements to be financed by borrowing for the balance of the fiscal year.

It is possible some of us might think differently about this request for authority to borrow $12 billion if the minister would open the door just a bit—just wide enough to give us a little peek at his plans. For example, his party has not been adverse in the past to adopting Conservative proposals. Sometimes the stone which the Liberals rejected becomes the headstone of their party's platform. For example, is he giving any thought to adopting our income-tested refundable energy tax credit of $80 per adult and $30 per child a year phased in over two years for the benefit of lower and middle-income Canadians, the group which is hardest hit by present-day high energy costs? Is the minister giving any thought to introducing our mortgage interest and property tax proposals, or a somewhat similar proposal, which in these periods of high interest rates and high property taxes would go a long way toward easing the burdens on our young and not-so-young home owners?

Is the minister perhaps thinking of assisting our small businesses by recognizing the contribution many wives make toward running the business and allowing them to receive salaries as a deductible business expense? Perhaps the hon. gentleman plans to encourage greater regional development by promoting investment in Atlantic fishing vessels built in Canada. This would be helpful in our area. Possibly the Minister of Finance is even thinking about our farmers and is planning some substantial relief for them from the problems caused by the taxation of capital gains when farmland is sold. These are all measures which might use up some of the billions the minister wants to borrow.

However, if I haven't scored bingo on any of my questions, surely the minister must have a shopping list of his own and surely he must realize, now, that he ought to take the House into his confidence and outline his plans to the Canadian people who, in the final analysis, must foot the bill. It is just possible we may see some action on the Prime Minister's promise in Halifax on June 25 that his party seeks to achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians. Among other things he promised there would be "a natural gas pipeline to ensure that all Canadians had access to their resources." Liberals, he said, would take "immediate action to begin negotiations for the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes." Initially, the line was to carry natural gas east, but when maritime supplies were ready the pipeline would be like a natural gas railroad with a return delivery facility as well. That was the promise. Well, it seems that the National Energy Board ruling has put a stop to that prospect, and the ones being railroaded are the people of the maritimes. We cannot have energy security at a fair price in Atlantic Canada as long as this Liberal promise remains a Liberal promise. Energy security can only become a reality for us when our own Canadian natural gas is flowing by pipeline to Nova Scotia. We need action, not promises, though it seems, looking back over the years, that we have had more promises than action.

For example, in 1974, 1975 and 1976 the government under the present Prime Minister promised to develop Canadian resources and tar sands and to promote conservation. The minister of energy at that time, Mr. Alastair Gillespie, who had been in favour of self-sufficiency in oil, was compelled to back off by the cabinet of the day in favour of a meaningless policy of "self-reliance". Obviously he was not happy, for in May, 1977, he said it was "—in Canada's interest that we should move our oil price up because any other policy would have disastrous consequences for Canadians in the future." However, despite this far-sighted prediction, the government failed to back Mr. Gillespie.

The thought occurred to me that the Minister of Finance may need these extensive borrowing powers in order to bring about some improvement in regional disparity. This has been a very promising area for the Liberals, for the Prime Minister and his followers. Campaigning in 1980, he promised to build greater economic strength in Canada's regions. In 1968, according to the record, the Prime Minister promised to end regional disparity, and I think, without reading every one of his promises, he promised to do this in the course of every election which followed.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the hour approaches ten o'clock. In closing, I should like to say it ought not to be necessary to remind the government that promises are the paper money of principle and, like our currency, Liberal promises have been greatly devalued over 12 years of reissue. I say it is time to end this charade. It is time to get down to the serious business of governing Canada. We need a new budget and we need one soon. In the absence of a new budget we do not know the facts about the state of our economy, we do not know the facts about the oil price agreement which the government is seeking or the effect rapid increases in oil prices will have on new cash requirements which have to be met.

The Canadian people do not realize the debt burden the government is placing not only on this generation but on generations yet unborn. This is indeed strange conduct for a government under a leader who has promised greater participation by Parliament in solving the nation's problems, a man who promised to bring about the "just society" and who, in 1980, promised to enhance individual security. How can anyone claim to be enhancing the security of individual Canadians while blatantly denying members of this House and, thereby, the Canadian people the facts about the state of the economy?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—SAFETY OF PERSONS LIVING IN PROXIMITY OF PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my remarks tonight is to bring to the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) the continuing inadequacy of security measures in our penal institutions with the consequent danger to the residents in the areas where these institutions are located.

Perhaps the residents of my constituency are more sensitive to the dangers than those in other areas because of the fact that we have five federal institutions in the riding, plus two more on the border, and several provincial institutions as well. There are continuing reports of escapes from several of these prisons and the rather lengthy list of incidents has had and is having a very disturbing effect upon the local population.

One of the most recent incidents, the one providing the basis of the present problem, was the escape of an inmate from Mountain prison at Agassiz, British Columbia, and the murder of a local postmaster, and this individual has now been charged with the crime. A protest rally attended by approximately 400 people was held in Agassiz where the local residents, including mayors, community leaders, school representatives and others, expressed their views and called for action to halt this kind of activity.

Numerous communications have been forwarded to the Solicitor General and others, including myself as the member of Parliament for Fraser Valley East, protesting the lack of adequate protection for residents of the community. A school has been closed because of the absence of protective measures to ensure the safety of the staff and pupils.

I should like to read a communication which I received from M. D. Dunn, the mayor of the district of Kent. It refers to communications which he had with the Solicitor General on various occasions. It reads as follows:

> Security at Mountain institution has been a major concern of council and the community for many years. By the repeated lack of action to upgrade the security your office must assume the responsibility of the event of April 28, 1980.

This is when the murder took place. It continues:

> I feel that past events show that the facilities at this institution are totally inadequate for a medium security institution and would urge that these prisoners be relocated to other more suitable institutions immediately.

Also I have a telegram from Mayor John Allen of the village of Harrison Hot Springs, and communications from residents, the school board and school principal, all calling for action to deal with this serious danger to private citizens.

The Solicitor General visited the area shortly after this tragic event and I understand he made some commitments. Unfortunately I did not receive an invitation to attend, so I am just taking my information from the reports of it that I received. Certain commitments were made. One was to tighten up security. The second was the construction of a second fence. The third was double gatehouses. The fourth was more adequate perimeter lighting. The fifth was an impact study with local input before any increase in prison population is considered.

May I say that there is a deeping conviction that the two institutions in Kent district, the Kent maximum security institution and Mountain prison, which is a medium security institution, are too great a burden and danger for this area to bear. In discussions with some of the elected officials, I was made aware that Mountain prison should be closed and necessary facilities to house the prison population should be located in some alternate community.

There are a number of problems that have arisen which have caused great concern. One is that apparently there has been a reclassification of prisoners and certain individuals who were previously in the New Westminster penitentiary, which is now closed, were reclassified in order to put them in a lesser security prison because maximum security facilities were not available. When there are one or two individuals who are unruly and are not observant of the rules and regulations of the prison, then trouble can be expected. That is exactly what has happened, and it is causing a great deal of concern among the general prison population.

There have also been escapes from custody when inmates were appearing before provincial court in other parts of the constituency. I have an article here which details the escape of two inmates from the maximum security institution at Kent while appearing in court in Chilliwack. Of course, they were later charged and their sentences extended. Employees of the hospital in my constituency are refusing to provide medical care to prisoners because on a number of occasions they have been faced with incidents in which inmates have drawn knives or guns in an attempt to escape.

I am not blaming the local directors of these institutions. I am saying that the department of the Solicitor General and the minister who propounds the philosophy and implements policies which fail to protect society from those who break the law and endanger the lives of law-abiding citizens, are the guilty ones. I believe that they must be called upon to give reasons why these incidents are happening and why there is such a failure on the part of the authorities to maintain the security of the population in these areas.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) as I went to the Mountain prison a few days after the incident, and the minister also went through that area on May 10 to assess the situation and discuss with local authorities. So I am pleased to tell him the steps that have been taken during those meetings the minister had and after my report to the minister on my visit before that.

First of all, security measures including a high security double fence, a new perimeter lighting system, new security towers, a new gatehouse, all those additions amounting expenditures of some $1.2 million were immediately agreed to by the minister. The officers of the municipalities will be consulted on the plans before they are finalized. There was previous consultation and there will be consultation during the implementation of these new security measures.

In addition, the Solicitor General being aware of the conditions of the roads in the surroundings of the prisons in that area said he is also prepared to consider federal financial contributions toward the improvement of the roads. A study on the community impact will be undertaken by independent consultants before expansion work is undertaken. So, the whole situation, Mr. Speaker, will be reviewed.

Also, a system of notification including a system of audible alarm that could be heard by the residents in the area will be installed so the community will be immediately alerted if other escapes were to take place. Indeed, I would point out to my colleague, who said so previously, that there have been escapes from maximum security penitentiaries, so escapes from a medium security institution are a more likely thing.

In any case, I think those measures will contribute to tighten up security at the institution and will hopefully remedy the problems in my colleague's community.

AIR CANADA—REQUEST RETIREMENT AGE OF PILOTS BE EXTENDED

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise to share with you on this occasion a matter of deep and troubling concern that Canadians are and will be experiencing at least once in their lifetime. This concern grows out of a question I posed in this House to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on May 23 regarding the forced retirement of Air Canada pilots at age 60.

During the last two decades we have witnessed the development and establishment of various rights for cultural minorities, rights for men and women, rights for the handicapped, and even rights for gays, to name but a few. It is on this note of human rights that I ask you to focus your attention on the rights of men and women who are forced into retirement by mandatory, bureaucratic policies. As the member for Parkdale-High Park, some of my constituents are turning to me for assistance on this issue, stating that these mandatory retirement policies are not only discriminatory and unjust but are robbing them of meaningful employment and activity.

I bring to your attention, for example, the case of one of my constituents who is a 59-year old Air Canada pilot. He will be forced out of a job soon, simply because he will turn 60 years of age. This constituent, a healthy and alert individual says, simply, "I have worked almost all my life. It has been a real joy and pleasure." In his case this is grossly unjust, especially when one considers that other airlines are permitting their pilots to fly until age 65.

Another constituent of mine who works with the RCMP at Toronto International Airport is being forced to retire this year at age 55. He started working for the RCMP late in life and so, after eight years of work for the RCMP cannot retire with a very large pension. He will have difficulty finding new employment.

These are just two cases from thousands of our Canadian workers who, whether they like it or not, are being put on the shelf. Some have argued and some will argue, that persons should retire because individuals are more prone to heart attacks, strokes and other illnesses after age 60. However, as is pointed out in the report of the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policy entitled "Retirement without Tears", under the chairmanship of Senator David Croll, a gentleman for whom I hold a very high regard:

> Compulsory retirement at age 65 could not be justified on medical grounds as a general rule, and for those who did not have enough income, such a compulsory system could sentence them to a life of poverty in their old age—

This has become a real danger, especially during these unstable economic times where inflation threatens pensioners.

One of the government's biggest worries for the future is that a smaller and smaller working population will have to support a larger and larger retired group. As the postwar baby boom generation reaches old age, the figures will zoom, reaching between six and eight million by the year 2031. This problem situation will only be compounded if we continue to permit these mandatory retirement policies to be enforced. To alleviate this most undesirable situation, Mr. Speaker, I propose that this government dedicate itself to implementing the following provisions, outlined by Senator David Croll and his committee.

First, there should be amendments to the rules governing public servants and employees of companies under federal jurisdiction, as well as provincial and municipal public servants.

Second, there should be an increase in the mandatory age of retirement of one year at a time for five years, by amending pension plans or retirement rules and conventions. At the end of five years, the concept of compulsory retirement at a particular age would be dropped.

Third, there should be a review of all human rights legislation to eliminate loopholes which permit age discrimination because of employee benefits and similar plans.

Fourth, there should be created a policy of flexible retirement as the standard for both public and private enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, it is only through the elimination of these and similar discriminatory policies that Canadians will be able to make claim to their "just society". After all, if an individual wants to and is able to work, giving himself a worth-while place in society, then this government should do all in its power to preserve the healthy self-image that many receive from being actively involved in the work force of this great and mighty nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to replace the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael), and attempt to answer the question of the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis).

[English]

Transport Canada, contrary to the hon. member's pretension, has no retirement age for pilots. The only age requirements is that the applicant must be not less than 21 years of age at the time the licence is issued. This licence must be an airline transport pilot licence, which is a licence required to captain the type of aircraft presently in use by all major airlines' aircraft over 44,000 pounds gross allowable weight for takeoff.

Once the pilot has been issued the licence he can continue to hold it and exercise the privilege of the licence provided that he can continue to meet the medical standards based on those set by ICAO, and pass periodic flight testing to demonstrate his competency. Such testing is done by both the airline company and Transport Canada at least once a year.

At one time the International Civil Aviation Organization on which the Canadian standards are based specified that pilots who had reached the age of 60 should not be permitted to engage in scheduled or unscheduled international flights. Canada filed a difference with the ICAO and did not adopt this standard since it was considered impracticable and unreasonable.

The latest proposed revision to the international standards, circulated for comment to different organizations, no longer includes such a requirement. Medical and licensing standards are continually under review by Transport Canada and ICAO. The matter of age is always the subject of consideration.

Air Canada, like any other airline or employer, for that matter, sets its own conditions of employment which, of course, include the retirement age for its pilots. Transport Canada has no jurisdiction in such matters. It was impossible therefore for the minister to answer to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

Our responsibility is to ensure that crews are properly licensed and meet the required Transport Canada standards based on those set down by the International Civil Aviation Organization.

The hon. member referred to the special report of the Standing Committee of the Senate entitled "Retirement without Tears."

[Translation]

Retirement without tears. Well, it may be that he will find the answer to his question in that report and that, eventually, provincial laws and service acts can meet his request but, for the time being, nothing can be done in the Department of Transport.

SMALL BUSINESS—PLANS TO ASSIST BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise this late evening hour on a question that I posed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) on April 21, that same fateful evening when a mini-budget or financial statement was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). At that time I asked the Minister of State for Small Businesses whether or not he cared about small businesses in Canada, whether or not he had specific plans for the small business community, whether he was planning to take action, and if so, what specific action he was planning to launch.

To date we have heard a number of reports in committees about the small business community and some of its concerns, and the programs being proposed have been examined. I can say with a great deal of regret and some hesitation that what I recognize so far are simply extensions of the past. These programs that are being brought forward are nothing more than programs which have been in existence for many, many years. There have been some minor alterations of what can only be considered as totally and completely inadequate. The minister is not addressing the problems of the future, the problems that face Canadian small businesses today and what they will be facing in the years to come. At best one can say that the minister is addressing the problems of small businesses that have existed for the last few decades.

The minister will be the first to say there is legislation now that is of assistance to small businessmen such as the Small Businesses Loans Act. I would like to propose that that legislation is completely inadequate. I want to use an example of some persons here in our capital city of Ottawa who put their heads together. They had a fine proposal, a proposal with sound projections and sound cash flows. Four local entrepreneurs were prepared to invest their savings. They were prepared to work toward seeing their dream of a small business established in our capital city. However, to do that they needed $30,000 above their own savings. They were able to pull together $12,000 on their own. They required yet another $30,000, for most enterprises certainly a very small amount of money. They were prepared to put up for collateral, in order to go to the bank, two homes, each worth in excess of $45,000. One individual had silver bars worth at that time $15,000. Together the collateral they were prepared to put forward in order to achieve a $30,000 loan amounted to $105,000, plus a considerable amount of their own money.

First they approached two small branches of the chartered banks. They were rejected outright. They reminded the bankers that there was this Small Businesses Loans Act under which they should be able to purchase the $30,000 loan at prime plus 1 per cent. However, the banker felt they did not have enough collateral.

They then went to two of the downtown main bank branches in this capital city, again interested in applying for a small business loan under the act that should guarantee them a loan at prime plus 1 per cent. The banks said they were not particularly interested in small business at these main branches. They were not particularly interested in encouraging and supporting the small business sector of the community. Furthermore, they said they had some concern that the government was not necessarily a good guarantor and that their experience in the past indicated that the government could not necessarily be relied upon to back up these guarantees.

They had no success with our Canadian chartered banks to arrive at a $30,000 loan with a considerable amount of collateral. Then off they went to the Federal Business Development Bank. I am pleased to say that after a considerable amount of time, energy, certainly a great deal of concern, that at this place of last resort for lenders in Canada they were able to achieve a loan. The loan was at an interest rate of 18 per cent and fixed for at least a five-year period.

This is not a typical situation, but in fact the kind of story that small entrepreneurs across our country are continually bringing to Parliament. They remind us of the difficulties they have going into a bank expecting to have access to the small business loans guaranteed by the federal government. There is no risk to the bank, but the one problem, of course, is that it is only the prime rate plus 1 per cent and the bankers do not know about this act—which has been in existence now, I believe, for 19 years—and are hesitant to bring forward that money.

I suggest then, as a result of this experience, that the small business entrepreneur in Canada has an unbelievable challenge, and I think it was a fair question which I asked, whether the Government of Canada really cares about the small businessman in Canada.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his remarks related to his question asked on April 21. I will try to answer it to the best of my knowledge. It might not be to his satisfaction, but at least he will have had the opportunity to make his point to the House and to other colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, in the last few months some sectors of society, including small businesses, have shown a lot of concern over rising interest rates. I think that the hon. member's question reflected this difficulty. The government recognizes that these high interest rates are a heavy burden for the citizens and businesses of Canada, but the country is also faced with serious inflation problems and controlling them is one of the government's main objective. The current level of interest rates could seriously jeopardize small businesses, but so can inflation.

I am not an economist but I know that interest rates help control inflation and maintain the value of the dollar. This may be a simplification but it is widely recognized. In the Speech from the Throne, on April 14 last, the government committed itself to help those Canadians most affected by rising interest rates including small businessmen. Two bills have already passed second reading and have been referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, raises the maximum loan from $75,000 to $100,000 and provides for loans totalling $850 million which will be granted over the next two years. Also, Bill C-20 makes it possible for the Federal Development Bank to offer more financial aid to small businesses. Or again, in the more general sector, through the Income Tax Act, the government provides new fiscal measures concerning bonds for the development of small businesses and the transfer of deductions between spouses. Finally, for a longer term, the Economic Council of Canada is currently studying matters concerning small business and another study has been undertaken jointly by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Canadian Banks Association.

Since his appointment, the Minister of State for Small Businesses has consulted with all the important associations of small businesses in Canada and he has met with a large number of independent businessmen. It has not taken him a very long time to understand that the small business would in fact encounter difficulties in the period we are currently going through.

[English]

In short, Mr. Speaker, this government is addressing economic issues faced by this country, head on. It is committed to fighting inflation and it is committed to the Canadian small business community. It is committed to the short-term and the long-term solution.

I can assure the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) that not all small businesses are going bankrupt. Very few, less than 1 per cent, are going bankrupt, which is a standard and recognized historical figure.

We remain very positive with respect to the opportunities which small businesses will be faced with in the months to come. We are also positive toward the government's commitment to the Canadian small business community.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

SMALL LOANS ACT

INTEREST RATE—AMENDMENT TO ASSIST SMALL BORROWERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of the fact that the Small Loans Act requires any lending institution which charges in excess of 12 per cent per year to be licensed by the federal government, and in light of the fact that such a regulation no longer makes it financially profitable for credit unions to lend small amounts of money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the minister in charge of consumer and corporate affairs be required to introduce a bill before the end of the current session to amend the Small Loans Act so that the mandatory 12 per cent ceiling is no longer effective, thus making it possible for credit unions and other similar lending establishments to serve the people that they were primarily intended to serve—the small borrowers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFFS IN P.E.I.—REQUEST CNR REVERSE DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This week Canadian National Railways has laid off one-half of its rail car repairmen on Prince Edward Island, with only 14 days' notice to the men involved, despite the fact that most of these men have given over 30 years of dedicated service to their employer. Four of them have given 140 years combined service. Given that those lay-offs constitute a most serious further downgrading of the railway on Prince Edward Island, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House condemn Canadian National Railways for its heartless treatment of rail car repairmen on Prince Edward Island; and, further, that this House urge CN to reverse its lay-off decision so that P.E.I. rail cars can continue to be maintained and repaired on Prince Edward Island rather than in another jurisdiction.

DEPLORABLE HOUSING SITUATION ON RESERVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the deplorable housing situation on Indian reserves all across Canada and the dissension this causes within Indian bands, and in view of the fact that Indian women on the Tobique reserve in New Brunswick are occupying the band council office in yet another attempt to receive adequate housing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development look into this explosive situation and take action immediately to help the band council resolve this long-standing injustice against Indian women in New Brunswick.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH

CANCER-CAUSING DRUGS IN CURED MEATS—CALL FOR BAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that a recent study done by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology confirmed that nitrates and nitrites when consumed can cause cancer, and in view of the fact that these drugs are still being used extensively in Canada in processing cured meats such as bacon, ham, weiners, etc., which when consumed form nitrosomines, a well-known cancer-causing agent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Department of National Health and Welfare take immediate steps to completely ban the use of nitrites and nitrates in food curing and processing, which will speed up the development of alternative methods of curing meat not harmful to the human body.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUEST PENSIONS BE ADJUSTED FOUR TIMES A YEAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This is especially appropriate in view of the receipt yesterday of the report on the International Year of the Child.

Whereas the government presently adjusts old age pensions four times a year to allow for increases in the cost of living, but payments to widows and dependent children under Canada Pension Plan legislation are only adjusted once a year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the federal government end discrimination against Canadian widows and dependent children receiving payments under Canada Pension Plan legislation and immediately begin to adjust these payments four times a year rather than once a year.

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION FOR REPORT AND WORK OF CANADIAN COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child has just presented to Parliament its excellent report, "For Canada's Children: National Agenda for Action", and in view of the fact that the 50 members of the commission, from all parts of Canada, contributed much time and hard work on a voluntary basis on behalf of Canada's children, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and, I hope, supported by all members of the House:

That this House express its appreciation to the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child for the outstanding work done by the commission in particular in establishing the report "The National Agenda for Action for Canada's Children."

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

REQUEST INTEREST RATE REVIEWED PERIODICALLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I hope my motion under Standing Order 43 will secure the required unanimous consent of this House, because it deals with a matter of immediate, pressing and national concern and importance.

Because Canadian government annuities have been bearing interest at only 7 per cent since 1975, when a promise was made to review that interest rate, and with the interest rate now standing at over 11 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That this House require the government to live up to the undertaking given in February, 1976, by the then minister responsible for the annuity program, Mr. Robert Andras, to the effect that "both the increase in the rate of interest and the percentage increase in the annuity (at maturity) will be subject to periodic review" and, in addition, that the government be required to take appropriate steps so that adjustments may be made from time to time to keep the interest rate on government annuities more closely aligned to interest rates in the marketplace.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

REFINERIES TO UPGRADE HEAVY OILS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He will recall that on May 15, in a speech, he indicated government involvement to fulfil the very obvious need for refineries in Ontario and in Quebec to instal facilities to assist in heavy oil upgrading to maximize, of course, the productivity of the crude oil they process. One of the refineries he mentioned specifically in that speech was the Ultramar Golden Eagle refinery at Quebec City. I wonder if the minister could advise the House today if this upgrading at this particular refinery includes government assistance such as grants, loans and tax benefits.

Specifically, because he indicated in the speech greater access by that refinery to Canadian crude, can the minister confirm that he proposes to allocate Ultramar an additional 50,000 barrels a day, or some such approximate amount, of Canadian crude which would be diverted from the Montreal area refineries, which refineries receive this crude through the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there is no intention to provide for grants or subsidies for this particular conversion at the Ultramar refinery. However, in order to achieve the purpose we are trying to achieve, of upgrading the treatment of oil at that particular refinery, we are working on an arrangement whereby greater access to Canadian domestic oil will be provided to the Ultramar refinery. Obviously, this will imply reallocation between the various other refineries at the present time. That is in the works and I expect that it will be worked out very shortly.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, when the minister refers to "other refineries", my information was that it was the Montreal area. The minister may wish to confirm that. What concerns me—and the minister will recall, because many of his colleagues raised it last year—is that it was Ultramar which cut off so many Quebec and Ontario independents. There was one in my own riding as well, so it was not a problem unique to Quebec.

However, would such diversion not be against the advice of department officials, who were informed of numerous accusations made against Ultramar to the effect that Ultramar shorted its Quebec City refinery by selling about 50,000 barrels a day on the spot market in order to secure higher profits? There are those accusations on the one hand, and on the other hand there is the vulnerability of the small Canadian independents in both Quebec and Ontario who rely very heavily on that refinery and were cut off arbitrarily.

That company does not enjoy the best reputation in the industry, and I am wondering what we are doing to ensure that the situation will be improved by that particular refinery

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I am indeed quite pleased to see that my colleague is raising that very important question and I can assure him that it is one to which we attach much importance. I already had the opportunity to meet with the independent dealers of Ontario and Quebec and we discussed the matter. I also had the opportunity to meet with some representatives of Ultramar and to point out our dissatisfaction about the situation in recent years. The developments to which we are now referring should boost the production of that refinery and make it available to independent dealers. We intend to follow the matter closely and see that independent dealers are truly protected so that there will be no discrimination against them compared with the dealers related to the multinationals. The Ultramar project should increase the heating oil and gas available while the Petro-Canada project to build a large upgrading refinery in eastern Montreal should also encourage in the years to come an increase in gas and other petroleum products available to the independents. We keep this question constantly in mind while we are working out the developments that have been announced.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: I have a final supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I hope the minister will go beyond expressing dissatisfaction, because he is in a very excellent bargaining position. In that regard, my final supplementary deals with the government's pledge to Canadianize the industry.

As the minister knows, Ultramar is 100 per cent foreign owned. He indicated in a speech that he had secured certain undertakings from Ultramar, although not respecting Canadian ownership. Given the minister's excellent bargaining position, given the pledge with respect to the Canadianization program, what undertakings, if any, is he seeking from Ultramar with respect to the Canadianization of its Canadian subsidiary?

Mr. Lalonde: I am very pleased that the hon. member recognizes the excellent work done by the government.

Mr. Jarvis: I did not say that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't read too much into that, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad he recognizes the excellent work already done by the government in this field. On the question of Canadianization, I want to say that I think we should approach this as a broad issue, rather than on a single refinery basis.

An hon. Member: You have to start somewhere.

Mr. Lalonde: The government is at present working on such a broad approach. Some steps have already been taken such as, for instance, the announcement yesterday by Alberta Gas and Petro-Canada that they will build, together, the first totally Canadian-owned major tar sands plant. This is a major development in the field of mega projects owned and operated by Canadians.

So far as ownership in the area of refineries, or in the industry generally, is concerned, this is a matter upon which we are working at present. I think it should be presented as a whole package, rather than being approached on the one-by-one basis as at present.

ULTRAMAR REFINERY—TRANSFER OF CANADIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): I have a supplementary question to the same minister, Madam Speaker. In a speech on May 15 in Montreal, the minister indicated he had an understanding from Ultramar to complete this upgrading facility on condition that the federal government would direct to it Canadian crews from other Montreal refiners.

However, as the minister should be aware, under the 1979 agreement with FIRA, related to Ultramar's purchase of Canadian Fuel Marketers, Ultramar is required to build an upgrading facility. My question to the minister is very simple: why is he now bribing Ultramar to do what it is already required to do under the FIRA agreement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is certainly not a question of bribing anybody, and Ultramar in particular. It is a question of reducing our dependence on imported oil, increasing the higher processing, the upgrading of oil through our refineries in Canada. This is going to be achieved, and the net result will mean, I hope, reducing our dependence on foreign oil.

• 1125

I think this is a very welcome development in terms of the refineries in Sarnia, in terms of the refineries in eastern Montreal and what Ultramar will do at the present time.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the minister has not answered the question as to why he is penalizing the Montreal refiners to benefit this Quebec City refiner; why he is allocating profit among companies.

As the minister is aware, refineries in Atlantic Canada are suffering just as serious a problem with excessive residuals. Indeed, the Gulf refinery in Point Tupper will be shut down for three months, laying off workers in Cape Breton, as a result of the same problem.

Why has the minister chosen through direct government largesse to assist this company, which apparently is no more worthy than any other company, and in some people's eyes is considerably less worthy than other companies? Why is he not giving Atlantic Canada refiners the same kind of assistance, since their problem is, if anything, more serious?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, at the present time the question is to try to do upgrading at refineries which have the volume and can do that upgrading on an economic basis. This seems to be the case. If the Gulf refinery thinks they can still do it on an economic basis without having to call upon the government for subsidies of various kinds, then we will be very happy to look at it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ECONOMIC STIMULUS—STATEMENT OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The motion which brought down the previous Conservative government and was supported by those who make up the present government called specifically for economic stimulus.

Considering that the governor of the Bank of Canada once again yesterday, but this time publicly and totally, repudiated precisely this policy, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he will now call for the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not read the remarks of the governor of the Bank of Canada in detail, whom I understand appeared before the Senate banking committee yesterday. I would doubt whether anything in his speech would induce me to take the reckless and irresponsible course of action suggested by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I doubt that anything would cause the present Minister of Finance to do anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to ask the Prime Minister how his government can keep in office a man so insensitive and so biased as the governor of the Bank of Canada who says that we, as a country, should "hold firm" in fiscal policy at a time when the economy is operating at only 85 per cent capacity, when more than one million Canadians are out of work and the depression both in this country and in the United States is getting worse every day.

In short, how can he keep in office a man who publicly repudiates his own government's policy and harms seriously the economy of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I take strong exception to the statements made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Compared to the policies advocated by the hon. member and those advocated by the governor of the Bank of Canada, the governor of the Bank of Canada is a public benefactor in comparison with the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who not so long ago asked the House of Commons through a motion to direct the governor of the bank to decrease interest rates by at least 2 per cent. Since that time, interest rates have decreased by more than 2 per cent. If we had followed the hon. member's course of action, the economy would be subjected to greater rates than we have at the present time.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I point out to the minister that calling for a drop in the interest rates in fact precedes what was actually done. I do not know how the minister can object to that. Considering that he and his party supported the motion that brought down the Conservative government in December—

An hon. Member: So did you.

Mr. Broadbent: —on the grounds of policies that we still maintain, is he now repudiating his own government's policy when they were in opposition?

An hon. Member: They didn't have a policy.

Mr. Broadbent: Or is he now taking on that great 1920s disease known as "Boueyitis", which means that we can expect continuous unemployment throughout the rest of this decade in this country?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Madam Speaker, I have not repudiated any policies that the Liberal party advocated while in opposition. I would say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that he is not contributing to public debate or economic understanding in this country by personalizing the debate in the way he has done today.

Mr. Broadbent: It is policy.

Mr. MacEachen: I certainly believe that the governor of the Bank of Canada has followed a responsible monetary policy that has resulted in a very significant drop in interest rates without bringing about the inflationary consequences that the hon. member—

Mr. Broadbent: You are following the American rate, and you know it.

Mr. MacEachen: —was advocating just a few weeks ago. I say, Madam Speaker, thank God there is a force in the country that is preventing the hon. gentleman's ideas from being implemented.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You just destroyed the coalition.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

EXPORT TAX ON NATURAL GAS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On May 13, the B.C. energy minister said that the federal minister of energy would not give an assurance that an export tax on natural gas would not be imposed on British Columbia gas exports.

During the election campaign, on February 13 Mr. Gordon Gibson, a three-time federal Liberal candidate, former Liberal MLA, past member of the Prime Minister's staff and past leader of the Liberal party in B.C., said:

> An export tax on natural gas was considered by the government in 1974 and abandoned after representations from the producing provinces. It has not been considered since, and does not form a part of the energy policy of the Liberal party. That is the stand of B.C. Liberals. It is also the stand of party energy spokesman Marc Lalonde and he confirmed that Monday.

Would the minister clarify the misunderstanding he left in British Columbia, and confirm that this Liberal government will not put an export tax on British Columbia gas?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have had meetings with the minister of energy for British Columbia. We have considered many alternatives. The question of an export tax on gas is obviously one of the various alternatives being considered. The hon. member will have to wait for the conclusion of our negotiations and discussions before he can reach any conclusion as to what will, or will not, come into effect.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The Minister of Finance just said that he was not going to repudiate any Liberal promises made while in opposition. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources seems quite prepared to do so. I find the minister's answer is a waffle and his answer is disgusting because it borders on dishonesty.

Would the minister come clean and confirm the election undertaking of the Liberal party, because he is making a liar out of Mr. Gibson, if not himself.

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member wants to look at the energy policy, or stand, of the Liberal party during the election, I suggest he should look at the official policy statements of the party. They are there for everybody to read and see. They were announced by the Prime Minister, by the leader of the Liberal party, during the election and I suggest the hon. member refer to them. We will stand by the policy statements that we enunciated during the campaign.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You just destroyed Gibson.

Mr. Nielsen: So Gibson is the liar?

Oral Questions

DENIAL OF COUNSEL TO DEFEND MEMBER OF RCMP

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As the minister knows, Sergeant Al Godin, a 20-year veteran of the RCMP and a member of the security service, has been charged under the code of offences in the RCMP Act with respect to certain allegations of smoking marijuana, based on the allegations of another member of the force. He requested the right to counsel at his trial, and has been denied that by the force.

Will the minister assure the House that minimum standards of justice, such as the right to retain counsel, will be accorded to Sergeant Godin in circumstances where his reputation, his livelihood and his future are in peril?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as I understand the situation, we are not dealing with a trial but with an internal discipline proceeding of the RCMP. I agree with the hon. member that the present procedure is unfair. I want to point out that its unfairness was noted by the Marin commission in 1976, when it made recommendations for change.

These recommendations are the subject of legislation which is under consideration by the government and which was referred to in the throne speech. It is a high priority of the government that it should be brought forward. When it is brought forward, I hope it will receive rapid consideration and approval by this House, so that the RCMP will have at least as fair a system, if not more fair, than that which applies to other police forces in Canada.

Mr. Speyer: A supplementary question. Will the hon. minister agree with me that under the code of offences in the RCMP Act there is nothing to prohibit him from having the right to counsel now? Will he recommend to the commissioner of the RCMP that this man, whose livelihood and future are in jeopardy, be able to retain counsel to dispute the allegations made against him? Will the minister make that recommendation?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I am looking into the matter. I undertake to speak to the commissioner about it and to take whatever action is appropriate.

CONSULTATION WITH INDIAN AND INUIT PEOPLE DURING CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, in reply to a question from this side of the House, the Prime Minister indicated that Indian and Inuit people would be fully consulted during the constitutional conferences or prior to any change in the constitution that may affect them.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if his definition of "consultation" is the one that his government used when employing the force majeure clause under the Syncrude agreement, which was a telephone call to the minister of energy in Alberta an hour before the announcement, or to the partners of the Syncrude agreement who read it in the newspaper, or is it duly defined consultation in the context of telling members from the west, in the throne speech, that he would be consulting them on things pertinent to the west?

I receive once in a while, and I have been twinned but I have not had the privilege of meeting my twin. Is that the kind of consultation? Would the Prime Minister please define it? I would really like to know.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not sure if we heard an argument or a representation; but if it was the latter, I would indicate to the hon. member that I will be meeting with his leader, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, on Wednesday to discuss constitutional subjects. Perhaps the hon. member could make his precise claims known to me through his leader.

INDUSTRY

WORKERS LAID OFF AT MASSEY-FERGUSON PLANTS—REASON THEREFOR

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the announced lay-off yesterday of some 5,000 Canadian Massey-Ferguson workers in the city of Brantford, and also in Toronto. The plant is shutting down for three months—August, September and October.

Could the minister tell this House if he has had any indication whether this is a short-term problem due to high interest rates and prairie drought, or is the beginning of a recession in the farm implement industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have asked my officials to get me a full report on this very serious situation. I understand that Massey-Ferguson has reported to the press that sales of tractors in the industry as a whole in the United States have been down some 40 per cent, and combines down some 45 per cent. This has been reflected in their decision.

I understand that of the three-month period, the first month, August, is the normal shutdown period. Obviously, the decline in sales has led to this decision which is very seriously affecting large numbers of Massey-Ferguson workers both in Canada and in the United States. I will report as quickly as possible to my hon. friend on the results of the investigation I have asked my officials to undertake.

• (1140)

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, while the minister is going to undertake what he has just promised, I would also like to ask if he would inquire whether the company deliberately chose September and October to reduce inventory, due to the fact that the union and the company are currently in negotiations, with the current contract expiring, mysteriously enough, on September 1?

Mr. Gray: I will ask that the report cover that area as well, Madam Speaker.

BANK ACT

REFERENCE OF SUSPECTED FRAUD TO INSPECTOR GENERAL OF BANKS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, to whom I have given notice. I would like to refer the minister to a letter dated March 21 which he received in his office from an Ottawa constituent. This constituent seems to have been the victim of fraud by the Bank of Montreal located at 1247 Wellington Street, Ottawa.

Since the Inspector General of Banks, according to the Bank Act, is empowered to investigate banks only for solvency, and not for suspicion of fraud, and is required to refer suspicions of fraud to the minister, why did the minister in a case of suspicion of fraud over which the Inspector General has no control or authority refer the matter to the Inspector General of Banks?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I realize that the hon. member is interested in this particular case and I thank him for having brought it to my attention.

I have asked the Inspector General of Banks to provide me with all the possible information. When that comes forward, I will consider it and be in touch with the hon. member.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I guess the buck is going the circular route. I ask the minister whether he will now get in touch with the commercial crime section of the RCMP, asking them to conduct an investigation of this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if that course of action is indicated when I have more facts I will consider it, but I think it may be a bit premature at the present time to launch a criminal investigation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROTECTIVE STAFF—WEARING OF SERVICE RIBBONS ON SUMMER UNIFORMS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is in respect of veterans serving on the security staff of the House of Commons who also served with pride in the armed forces.

These veterans have been directed not to wear their service ribbons on their summer uniforms. I would ask the minister whether he is aware of that. If so, is this a recommendation of his department? Will he look into the matter?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will certainly look into the matter. I am not really conscious of this, but it is not a recommendation of my department.

DEALING WITH GRIEVANCES OF RCMP OFFICERS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I should like to follow up briefly on a question asked by the hon. member for Cambridge of the Solicitor General, whose answer reassured me.

I would like to ask him to be a bit more forthcoming and to tell the House when he proposes to do something more tangible to bring into effect the legislation to which he earlier referred. I want to ask him to repeat his commitment to do something to solve the long-standing grievances of several RCMP officers whose names he is well aware of—McCleery, Brunet, Danch, and people of this type—and also to report briefly whether he has looked into the situation whereby many members feel uneasy about the fact that they appear to be under pressure simply by being associated with a lawfully constituted association of the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Each of the cases, Madam Speaker, to which the hon. member refers is different, and I would deal with any one if the hon. member wanted to ask a specific question about it. Generally, the legislation is not yet completely drafted. The opposition, when it was in government, was working on it. I am working on it much more quickly and I hope I will be able to bring it forward, at least for first reading, before the break for the summer.

PARTICIPATION OF NATIVE PEOPLE AND NORTHERNERS IN CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has consistently refused to make clear his intentions on native people and the constitution, and he has directly refused the participation of elected members of the Yukon and Northwest Territorial governments in constitutional discussions.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister to clarify what his real intentions are regarding natives and the constitution, and to ask him to reverse his decision of yesterday which denies elected representatives of northern peoples' participation in the June 9 talks, so that northern Canadians are accorded the same status and respect as Canadians living in the ten provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, with regard to the role to be played by the native peoples and their leaders, I made a lengthy statement about three weeks ago at a meeting with those leaders and I would be happy to send a copy of it to the hon. member. I summed up the essence of it yesterday when I said they would be involved in discussions on any aspect of the constitution which directly affected them.

In so far as the Yukon and the Territories are concerned, Madam Speaker, I have not invented or created their status. They do not have the status of provinces. Under the constitution and under the constitutional conventions, the participation of the Territories is not needed for constitutional change, much as their advice has been, and will be, sought. That may be different if in days to come they achieve the status of provinces. But for the time being I repeat that the constitution and constitutional conventions do not provide room for the Territories as such to be negotiators on constitutional change, no more than they provide room, for instance, for the elected representatives of municipal governments who are legitimately representing the interests of the municipalities in which they are elected. They have no locus standi, in the legal sense, in constitutional discussions. That is the situation as the constitution states it, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Ittinuar: My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. We make a modern and reasonable request and we get praetorian justice and anachronism. Perhaps in his esoteric plans for artificial insemination of the country, the Prime Minister can reveal just what his plans are for political and constitutional development of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that is an entirely different subject. There have been various reports, and a very recent one by Mr. Drury, on that subject. The government intends to deal with it and bring the House into the discussion on how it should be dealt with. But the hon. member knows that there are some people who feel that the Territories should be given provincial status, and some who feel that they should not. That is a matter for discussion here, not for discussion in the presence of the premiers at a constitutional conference.

PARTICIPATION OF REPRESENTATIVES OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I am sure the people in both territories will resent their equation to municipalities in talks as important as those that are going to be conducted after June 9.

While the Prime Minister is, in a very dry way, absolutely correct in saying there is no need for participation under an act passed in 1867, in this day and age, in the 1980s, will he agree to put the proposal to the provincial premiers on June 9 that some form of input by the elected representatives of the two territories be accepted? I think he will find a good number of the provincial premiers very responsive to the suggestion that the government leader of the Yukon, for instance, and an elected member from the Northwest Territories have some kind of direct input to the discussions after June 9.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I can understand the member of Parliament for Yukon making that representation, but I can assure him that equally valid and strong representations have been made at various times by mayors and reeves for their participation in constitutional discussions.

An hon. Member: They are represented by their provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised at the groaning coming from the Conservative side.

An hon. Member: That is not the same thing.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course it is not the same thing, Madam Speaker, and that is the point I am attempting to make.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we have the roaring Fraser over there making more noise than the river that bears his name.

• (1150)

Mr. Trudeau: I am telling the member from the Yukon that municipalities, in terms of numbers represent many more people than live in the Yukon and the Territories combined, yet they are not sitting down at the constitutional table with us. Perhaps they should, and perhaps the constitution should be written differently. But for the time being I am respecting the letter of the constitution and the spirit of it.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

DUTY REMISSION ON IMPORTED SAIL BOATS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I am tempted to ask the Minister of Transport a question today, but I will let him catch his breath from yesterday. I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

I previously asked the minister's colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, about duty remission on sail boats over 25 feet. As the Minister of Finance, you have the power to grant that duty remission, and I understand representation has been made to you in that regard. Could you give us the status of that decision, when it might be received, and what is happening in that regard on duty remission?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance): Madam Speaker, we have had a close look at the request for the duty remission mentioned by the hon. member which we must take into account in the study of the over-all stituation in the Canadian industry. We will be making recommendations in the near future and our decisions will take into consideration the interests of the Canadian industry and other businesses involved in that sector.

THE CONSTITUTION

PARTICIPATION OF REPRESENTATIVES OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon. The Prime Minister did not answer that part of the question which asked if the Prime Minister would propose to the provincial premiers on June 9 that an arrangement be found so that elected representatives of the Council for the Yukon could participate directly in constitutional discussions. Are we to interpret from the Prime Minister's failure to reply to that part of the question that he refuses to make such a proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am interested in the lengthening list of matters that appear to be closed for constitutional discussion. The Prime Minister, not long ago in this House, indicated that everything was negotiable except one or two basic principles, which he had stated. He is now indicating that he is not prepared to negotiate and not prepared to consider the participation of elected members of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories councils at subsequent constitutional talks. He has, in the course of recent days, indicated other matters which he is reconsidering are negotiable.

Would the Prime Minister, prior to June 9, indicate to the House of Commons exactly what is the list now of non-negotiable matters in his mind as we go into the June 9 meeting?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I suspect the question is somewhat argumentative. I have made my position clear, that apart from the basic form of federalism and the basic rights of Canadians, everything is negotiable. But I have not said that it would be negotiated on June 9.

FORESTRY

UNEMPLOYMENT IN FOREST AND LOGGING INDUSTRIES—PLANS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance regarding the very serious situation in the forest and logging industries in the country.

Statistics Canada recently informed the House that the unemployment rate for men and women presently working in the forest and logging industries is now at 40 per cent, which represents a 300 per cent increase in the last six months. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he and his government take this crisis seriously. Also, would the minister indicate to us what plans he and his government have to get these men and women back to work?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the condition of the particular industry to which my hon. friend refers is obviously the result of a number of other factors that are operating in the economies of both the United States and Canada.

When the government reaches decisions affecting this particular industry, I will make sure that the House is informed.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I find it unacceptable that the Minister of Finance would suggest that 40 per cent unemployment in an industry which stretches from coast to coast—it is not only focused in central Canada—is experiencing such devastating conditions and he is not prepared to indicate clearly to this House what he and his government plans to do about it. Is the minister saying that he is not planning to say anything at this point in time, in terms of alleviating this crisis?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member has misunderstood my response.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We understand very well.

Mr. MacEachen: I told the hon. member that when any decisions are taken relating to this industry, the House would be informed first.

COMMUNICATIONS

LEGAL ACTION AGAINST OWNERS OF UNLICENSED EARTH STATIONS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. Earlier this week, in Vancouver, the chairman of the CRTC indicated in a speech before the Canadian Cable Television Association that the government intends to lay charges against the owners of unlicensed earth stations receiving satellite signals.

Can the minister indicate what the involvement of the Department of Communications has been in this incident, and can he indicate whether it is the policy of the government to lay charges against Canadians living in remote areas of the country who have banded together to put up earth stations because they are unable to receive a variety of Canadian signals off air?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that there are two parts to the policy being pursued by the government in this respect. The first part is to try to reach the root of the problem and to have a variety of television programs available to residents of remote or nonmetropolitan communities in Canada.

However, at the same time we have responsibility to enforce the law. We expect that the solution to the first part of the problem—extension of services to northern communities—will result from the present hearings of the CRTC on this very subject: we expect to have a report from the CRTC around June 15.

In the meantime, there are instances in the country where some unlicensed operations are interfering with licensed cable operations. The CRTC and the Department of Communications are watching and following the situation closely. At the request of the CRTC, we have started an investigation to make evidence available toward the prosecution of some of these cases.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, in a published report by the Canadian Press, the CRTC estimates that there are currently some 700 unlicensed earth stations in Canada. May I ask the minister, in how many instances does he expect prosecutions to be launched? In particular, is the government considering launching prosecutions against the Manitoba Telephone System, the provincially-owned company which is currently distributing American satellite signals without a federal licence?

An hon. Member: A Conservative businessman is doing it.

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, this is the first time I have heard of the figure 700. The figure I have heard up to now within my department is something closer to 70, with a possibility of it being as extensive as 200.

As far as the Manitoba Telephone System is concerned, I sent a telegram last week to the minister responsible, Mr. Enns, requesting him to obey Canadian broadcasting legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister is aware, the top career post in the foreign service is that of ambassador to Washington.

Would the minister assure the House that any new appointment to this position will be drawn from the public service, that is, a career foreign service officer, as has been the case with all governments since World War II.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the government does not have under consideration any new appointment to Washington at this time.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is as aware as I am that there is considerable discussion going on about this particular appointment. He is also well aware, I am sure, of the very low state of morale among the Foreign Service Officers' Association—

Mr. Trudeau: It is getting better now.

Miss MacDonald: —because of his hasty implementation of the Steers report. Would the minister assure us that he will not further aggravate that state of morale by the appointment to the top career post of a person from outside the ranks of the public service?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there is a tradition in this matter in which the opposition has had a part. But I want to say that we have complete confidence in our present ambassador in Washington.

An hon. Member: Jean Wadds will love that one.

• (1200)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there were a number of questions raised in the House yesterday and on previous days to which I would like to give answers. Would that be acceptable?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid the hon. minister will have to wait until some further questions are put to him.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Question No. 126—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Do any provisions of the Official Secrets Act differ with present government policy and, if so, what are they?

2. Does the government intend to amend the act and (a) if so, on what date will such amendments be introduced (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The government does intend to review the Official Secrets Act. Until that review is complete, it would be premature to speculate as to the timing or nature of any amendments that may be proposed. In this regard, the recommendations of the McDonald commission will have to be taken into account.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

Question No. 187—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): In so far as the Canadian Commercial Corporation is concerned:

Total revenue	$281,641,987	$276,118,333
Net earnings	Nil	$ 1,116,757
Deficit	$ 1,681,470	Nil

2. (a) Parliamentary Appropriations:	1977	1978
Administrative costs	$6,259,453	$7,271,889
Contract losses reimbursed	$1,983,201	$3,000,000

(b)	1977	1978
Loans for the Consolidated Revenue Fund as at March 31	$5,800,000	$3,300,000
Advances from the Consolidated Revenue Fund as at March 31	$10,000,000	$10,000,000

(c) There was no investment by the government in the corporation either before or after any write off.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS PURCHASE ACCOUNT

Question No. 277—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was transferred to the National Museums purchase account?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Museums as follows:

Fical Year	Amount
1975-76	$4,220,000
1976-77	2,120,000
1977-78	570,000
1978-79	2,120,000
1979-80	2,045,000

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO. LTD.

Question No. 291—Mr. Herbert:

1. (a) What was the amount paid by the government for the purchase of Northern Transportation Co. Ltd. (b) in what form was the payment made and to whom?

2. Was there any outstanding indebtedness at the time of purchase and, if so, what was it?

3. What was the authorized (a) share (b) issued capital of the company at the time of purchase?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows:

1. (a) Northern Transportation Co. Ltd. was a wholly-owned subsidiary company of Eldorado Gold Mines Ltd. and was shown as an investment on the balance sheet of that company at $152,000 when in 1944 the Eldorado Gold Mines was expropriated by the federal government. See also answer to question 290 answered May 26, 1980.

(b) See (a) above.

2. It is not possible to establish any indebtedness due to the manner in which NTCL was acquired.

3. (a) Authorized share capital of Northern Transportation Company Ltd., as of 1944 was 2,500 shares of $100 each.

(b) Issued share capital at the time of purchase was 1,520 shares of $100 each.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT—EMPLOYEES

Question No. 359—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of the Environment (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979 and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) 77 (b) (i) 9 (ii) 1

2. (a) 64 (b) (i) 9 (ii) 0

3. Impact of structural changes

Date	No. of SX's	No. of Francophones	No. of Females
DOE with Fisheries March 31, 1979	77	9	1
DOE without Fisheries April 2, 1979	54	6	0
DOE with Parks June 8, 1979	64	9	0

LABOUR CANADA—PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 637—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of Labour?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Twenty-two.

MARINE BIOLOGICAL STATION, ST. ANDREWS, N.B.

Question No. 826—Mr. Howie:

1. As of December 1, 1979, how many persons were employed by the Marine Biological Station in St. Andrews, New Brunswick?

2. What is the operating budget of the Station for the current fiscal year?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans):
1. One hundred and seventeen employees.

2. The operating budget for the current fiscal year is $2,800,000.

[English]

Mr. Daudlin: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED LACK OF GOVERNMENT RESPONSE REGARDING AGRICULTURAL DROUGHT AND FOREST FIRE EMERGENCY

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat) moved:

That this House deeply regrets the government's lack of response in the House of Commons to concern about the disastrous western agricultural drought and the related forest fire emergency and calls on the government to abandon its secretive approach and consult with MPs of all parties in an open and forthright manner.

He said: Madam Speaker, may I say at the outset that I think drought is a most appropriate subject for debate on an opposition day on this Friday afternoon in Ottawa.

Before I get into the main content of my comments about drought, I want to make a brief remark and an obvious one about rain. I am referring, of course, to some good rains that began a week ago today in western Canada, mostly in Alberta. I would say very briefly that they were heaven sent and very, very welcome. They began last Friday afternoon and it seems that most of the heaviest rains followed along the foothills, along the western side of Alberta. The city of Lethbridge reported a three inch rain and Raymond, in the southwest corner of Alberta, was reported to have had five to six inches of rain, which is a very heavy rain. Incidentally, that rain lasted over a three to four day period.

In the southeast corner, my corner, Medicine Hat, we received a maximum of about one and a half inches. That was spread over about four days. I would say the heavy rains seemed to extend northward in Alberta and covered a good bit of the forest fire area in northern Alberta. Of course, that was a welcome change in the weather pattern. I would say it is not what we call a general rain, but over the weekend there was a series of showers which was very, very beneficial.

In Saskatchewan and Manitoba the situation is not nearly as good. The rainfall is considerably less, beginning right at the Alberta border and working east. Some areas, such as the Swift Current area, received hardly any rain. In Manitoba it is my understanding that the same situation exists, that is, very skimpy rainfalls over most of the province.

In spite of this very welcome rain—actually it is the first since early last fall—and in spite of the CBC's very glib statement on the first day of the rain that the drought was over, I would say that the western drought definitely is not over. The considerable and substantial implications and aftermath of this drought are still with us. The western agricultural drought is certainly not over and that is what I want to talk about in the remainder of my remarks.

Let us examine this drought, its extent and the implications that flow from it. It begins in the interior of British Columbia and covers all of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. To the south it goes well into the United States, covering all of those border states along our western provinces, including what is known as the American northwest corn belt. Its northern extension in Canada is significantly further north than a drought has ever been known to extend before. I am thinking of the 1930s and the drought in 1977. In the north it extends right across the four western provinces as well. The extreme forest fire situation from British Columbia across Canada and well into northern Ontario is, of course, directly related to, and is an extension of, the southern prairie drought.

The current drought began early last fall across the west and it extended right through the winter. Yes, it is possible to have a winter drought; we had one last winter. The snowfall was exceedingly light, not only on the prairies but even across Ontario and into Quebec. In our short grass country, and that is usually the chinook belt, or all across southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan, our snowfall was almost nil. The little snow moisture that resulted finally in the spring was completely lost by a month of not just warm but hot weather in April, with very strong, hot and dry winds.

Most of these drying winds, and I think this is unique and exceptional, came out of the east and southeast, a direction we usually associate with storms and moisture. It may or may not be significant, but this unusual wind and hot weather pattern did not change until Mount St. Helens blew its top and our traditional southwest Pacific winds returned, complete with the very depressing volcanic ash fallout.

The present drought situation to date has been much more serious than the one-year drought of 1977 because it is so much broader in its coverage. The final assessment of this drought year will have to wait until the key month of June is over when rain in generous amounts must come to prevent a disaster in our agricultural growth year in the west.

Yesterday this subject of drought was raised in our first meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and today in this opposition debate is the first time this subject has come before this Parliament. I say very bluntly now that this drought debate should have taken place at least a month ago. The persistent questions in this House and in the Senate and the number of motions under Standing Order 43 certainly confirm that statement.

I must say that I was very disappointed that my motion under Standing Order 26 for an emergency debate was denied about a week and a half ago.

I repeat that our motion today is very appropriate, and I want to read it for emphasis. It is short and to the point and is as follows:

> That this House deeply regrets the government's lack of response in the House of Commons to concern about the disastrous western agricultural drought and the related forest fire emergency, and calls on the government to abandon its secretive approach and consult with MPs of all parties in an open and forthright manner.

Surely this subject is much too important to be left to the traditional partisan, political type of debate. The subject is of widespread concern throughout western Canada, even after that good rain I said we have already received out there, and even in cities such as Calgary where the implications of a shortage of domestic water supplies are obvious. It is also a serious concern to our prairie governments, and because there has been no federal debate or action there is the perception—and I emphasize "perception"—in the west that this government and even this Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) do not care and do not know about the real drought situation in the west.

The subject of drought is at best distressing and unpleasant, but it should not be treated secretively, and especially we in Parliament should not be reluctant to talk about it. However, that situation does exist, mainly because politicians, of any stripe, cannot legislate or otherwise solve the climatic and geographic combinations which bring about droughts at irregular intervals. Suffice it to say that those of us from the short grass chinook country have learned how to pace ourselves or condition ourselves to live with a drought, and not to exist in spite of a drought, such as during those ten years in the 1930s and, more recently, the single drought years we had in 1961 and 1977.

I would say that it is almost a way of life. No one, however, can fully appreciate the true significance of a drought if he has not witnessed the tragedy of dust clouds hundreds of feet high rolling over the prairie like a black storm cloud—without moisture, of course—making it dark enough to require lights. That is a frightening experience. You cannot have a feel for drought if you have never witnessed, especially in the summer time, a large herd of cattle hungry because of no grass growth, or the spectacle of cattle becoming thirsty with no water immediately available. Hon. members should not hasten to tell me that these are management problems because these situations can develop, especially in the process of trailing large herds of cattle, even today. It is a frightening experience to see a herd of cattle on the trail suddenly and all at once stop walking and to see the cattle lift their heads into the wind when they can smell water upwind. It is almost an instant reaction. Have hon. members ever tried to smell water? Cattle can, but they cannot differentiate between fresh water and alkaline water, which is too concentrated to drink.

Western Canada has 45 million acres of grass suitable for grazing domestic livestock, and there are only 50,000 million acres of grass in that category in all of Canada. Our cattle industry and a relatively few sheep presently use nearly all of this grass. So drought has a special significance for our cattle, which harvest that grass year round. That is all they really do.

They harvest our native grass mainly on a year round basis, and very often it is very short grass. During the 1930s we learned the hard way that during a drought you cut your cattle numbers to fit your supplies of grass and hay. You try to retain a bare minimum breeding herd to produce calves the next year. In a nutshell that is our objective in a drought.

Today, due to the extreme shortage of grass and hay, it is not practical to move cattle to another source of grass or hay or to move hay any distance to cattle. That applies all over western Canada where the drought is so severe. The reason is that there are simply no available supplies of grass or hay in western Canada either to move or to move to. It may be very significant before this drought is over that the only area with a surplus of both hay and grass at this moment is in the province of Ontario.

Southern Alberta's 950,000 acres of intensive irrigation will produce two good cuttings of alfalfa this year. It is a major irrigated crop in our intensive irrigation, but that crop will be competed for mainly by the dairy industries of the four western provinces from British Columbia right through and into Manitoba. Presently the last of the 1979 alfalfa crop in the Brooks area, which is the heart of one of the irrigation districts, is selling at as high as $100 a ton in the stack before being trucked to places like Red Deer, Alberta, and that is an area in central Alberta which has seldom been short of hay. It is a very unique situation.

That is the drought picture today as straightforward by and factually as I can describe it. And, of course, I should remind the House that these are my personal remarks.

What can we do about it here in our Thirty-second federal Parliament? I want to address myself to that for the remainder of my remarks. I have some suggestions for serious consideration by all of us.

I said that in the thirties we had to reduce our cattle numbers to fit our grass and hay supplies. That, of course, was long before the days of income tax. Today that lesson of the thirties is still valid, but it is complicated by our tax laws. Forced sales of feeder cattle and even breeding herds, up to as—much as one-half of some of our cattle herds—creates an impossible income tax situation.

The obvious answer is to recognize the merits of what is known as the deferred income averaging trust account which would allow cattlemen to build up their own tax protected stabilization fund, but on a personal basis. The Department of Finance is familiar with this well thought out proposal because it refused to consider it in the 1977 drought, when it was put to the department in a very serious suggestion at that time. The deferral should last long enough for cattle producers to rebuild their numbers by natural increase which will follow the drought period, or to buy back in, when grass and hay conditions return. That, of course, could take several years.

Another suggestion already widely recommended is to require the Canadian Wheat Board to guarantee sufficient supplies of barley in the west, and especially in Alberta, to feed out the increased number of feeder yearlings now going into feedlots. These supplies must be assured now for use before the new crop is available. We should be aware that significantly increased numbers of drought cattle—and that includes some cow and calf pairs—have been coming to markets in the west over the last month.

We should consider the practical possibility of encouraging the earlier movement of feeder cattle to Ontario—that is, more so than the usual pattern—and even the possibility of a back haul of hay by both the railroads and by trucks. The cattle, of course, would remain in Ontario on grass as long as possible until the beginning of winter and then be moved into the Ontario feedlots to be finished out on corn and corn silage. Eventually they will go to the fat cattle market in Ontario, we hope at prices high enough to pay the $6 per hundredweight freight rate which it costs to move the cattle from the west to Ontario.

I suggest that surely here is a worthy possibility that will require financial assistance which should be forthcoming from two sources, not only from our federal government but from the railways in some form of special reduced rates, especially on the back haul with the hay, if that possibility should develop. I think it is a very practical suggestion. Years ago we used to have what the railways called a feeder rate for moving feeder cattle. That might be reinstated with some modification to help out in this situation.

Canada's beef cattle industry desperately needs some positive indication of confidence over the long-term. That has been apparent since we got into this market situation which we share with the hog industry across North America. What better way to do this than bring in our beef import or, if you like, meat import legislation now? It will get widespread support here in the House and, I am sure, from the total Canadian cattle industry.

I should now like to say something about PFRA, or the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration. It is the agency created out of the tragedy and despair of the dirty thirties. Its new director, Dr. Harry Hill, has initiated the beginning of a drought contingency program quite recently. Only a few of us in the House are aware of it, but it is certainly not a security item! I say most sincerely now: let us give solid support to this approach. After all, PFRA developed the original guidelines for the original drought, at least in modern times, which was in about the mid-thirties. Is it not about time that PFRA was returned home to agriculture here in the federal government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: Finally, Mr. Speaker—and this is perhaps the most important point of all—I should like to make a suggestion which I will leave with you at this time, and that is that we should all become involved in a serious drought dialogue in a non-partisan manner. We do not expect any instant solutions—that would be naive and impossible. I say to the Minister of Agriculture, let him give us much more detail about the drought task force. Who are the members? What are their names and responsibilities? Are there any here in Ottawa, or are they all in the west, or is it a mixture of both? Let us hear about it.

An hon. Member: The minister is not even here in the House.

Mr. Hargrave: In spite of the heaven sent rain this week in the west, there is no reason whatever why a drought of several year's duration, even ten years, cannot come again. That, perhaps, is the most serious thought I could leave with you. With all of our sophistication to date, whether in weather forecasting or in trying to modify the weather itself, there is no reason why there could not be another dirty thirties. Some of us on this side of the House have of necessity become unofficial experts on the subject of drought, whether we like it or not. I think it is about time that we had an opportunity to share it with all hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Baker): Order, please. If no hon. member to my right seeks the eye of the Chair, I will look among the NDP next, with the reservation that an hon. member from the NDP would have 20 minutes to speak and when, on the next turn, a minister or an hon. member to my right seeks the floor, he will have 30 minutes. Thereafter each member will have 20 minutes.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the topic chosen by our friends in the Conservative party. However, I am saddened that the drought situation in the west is such that the topic is considered urgent enough to be the subject of today's debate.

I was forcefully reminded of the seriousness of the situation in the west on the weekend when I heard the lowing of hungry cattle. It reminded me of the permanent drought area in the southern Sahara where I spent several years in the early 1970s as an educational adviser to the Kano state government in northern Nigeria. A million cattle starved in the drought conditions in the most appalling circumstances in a chronically food-short area. Hearing that sound again in my native Saskatchewan last weekend underlined how difficult the present circumstances are for livestock producers.

My colleague, the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), who is our party's agriculture critic, is not here today because of the drought and the necessity for him to be on his farm to find accommodation for his cattle. As of yesterday when he was in contact with his office, only one tenth of one inch of rain had fallen in his area since last fall.

Although some of the areas in the west have had rain recently, there are large parts of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan that have had little or no rain. Each personal difficulty that a farmer is facing is multiplied thousands of times. We must as a country and a government be prepared to meet the challenges presented by this drought and the ones which will inevitably follow. To date we have had many words from the government opposite but precious little action.

Here is the situation regarding cattle and cattle feed, as I see it. Pasture land is critical at this time of year and it is critical throughout most of the west. There is little excess feed for movement among the regions of the west. Farmers are therefore making do with what they have for pasture and in some cases letting their cattle graze on seeded acreage that is not yet at a stage where plants will be damaged; still others let their cattle graze on hay land. The best these farmers can hope for is to keep their cattle going until the middle or the end of June. If there is rain by that time—and how many times did we hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in committee yesterday invoke the name of the Almighty in hoping for rain—some of the hay land may still produce one cut for feed next winter.

I say to the minister and hon. members opposite that the Almighty might not choose to bail us out this time. The minister might remember another phrase from another era when farmers were seeking action from reluctant governments. It was "raise less wheat and more hell". The minister can expect to hear more of that from this side of the House.

The drought crisis is taking place right now. Many farmers, particularly dairy farmers, are already having to feed cattle reserve stocks of feed. Herds are being trimmed right now. Producers will try to carry their core herds through until next fall, but not all will be able to manage on current stocks. Many herds were being cut in the past few months because of low prices and the projection of low prices into the future. Now, with more culling because of feed shortages, the cattle industry may nearly collapse. Can I ask the minister what will happen to the cattle industry now?

I cannot agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) that the sale of breeding stock should be accelerated by the government's giving an income averaging annuity to producers.

An hon. Member: No, he did not say that.

Mr. Hovdebo: Giving the farmer a tax dodge may help the big operator, but certainly it will not help the run-of-the-mill producers who are dependent on their breeding stocks continuing from year to year, and the consumer will also pay considerably for the same beef when the herds have been diminished.

Surely the answer is a national meat authority which the minister has been asked repeatedly to establish. I understand he will be asked again by the ministers of agriculture in Toronto. Although he is not here, I call upon him to give a commitment to supply management in cattle just as he has given to other agricultural crops and animals in the past. Orderly marketing can give the Almighty and the minister a good deal of assistance. We need every bit of it.

The situation could improve if we could be sure of producing a substantial grain crop. However, there has been considerable damage to grain because of low germination rates, field pests such as grasshoppers, and the effects of hot, drying winds on available moisture and the crops. The government must be doing its forward planning with the probabilities in mind. First, there is not likely to be enough rain to rescue the present situation. Second, even if there is rain, hay and grain production will be minimal this year.

On this basis a drought contingency plan can be developed if the federal government would consider the matter seriously and put its money rather than its ministers' speeches and tours first. That has been this government's approach throughout the spring. It has been the political low road for various superannuated senators who have been playing at make-work projects such as Drought Inspector. It is a high paying make-work project. But let me illustrate how the travelling circus on the political low road is upsetting my constituents and many ex-Liberal voters in the west.

Many members are aware that the deputy ministers of agriculture from the four western provinces met with the federal government two weeks ago and agreed to share costs in a drought relief program on a 50-50 basis, or at least that is what the provincial governments thought. They are dealing with drought on a day to day basis, and that is what they thought they had agreed to. But this week and yesterday in agriculture committee hearings the minister repudiated any agreement. He said such an arrangement required Treasury Board and cabinet approval. He scolded Saskatchewan agriculture minister Gordon MacMurchy for having the gall to say that a substantial drought relief program costing $15 million to $20 million had not been cost-shared with the province.

Mr. Pepin: There is no contradiction there.

Mr. Hovdebo: No one is saying that the Saskatchewan program will solve the drought crisis, but it may help those who are only partially able to cope. It is a rational approach to a desperate problem, yet the minister would only pour cold water, if he could find any, on a substantial effort by a provincial government. Unfortunately for the government, this ploy was uncovered. A cabinet document has been leaked which revealed the cynicism of the approach the federal government has been taking.

An interesting slice of this document appeared in a Canadian Press story in the Montreal Gazette on Wednesday. It reads as follows:

> While it is recognized that because of the widespread nature of the drought and impact on the economy, responsive governmental programs will not have a large impact upon drought-related problems, it is of critical importance that the federal government be widely perceived as doing all it can to respond to the situation through as wide a range of action as possible.

The key word in that quotation obviously is "perceived"—"perceived as doing all it can". In a lifetime of watching cynical moves by the Liberal government, even my jaw dropped a little over that one. They seem to be saying, "Do not watch my actions, just look at the press releases" from the cabinet ministers on the low road. We have a saying in the west about people like this: "There is no business like no business".

Of course, the government thinks there will be a political payoff for its "as wide a range of action as possible". First there is the travelling circus of cabinet ministers. I understand that actually a drought agreement was signed with Manitoba today. On the weekend there may be more agreements to be signed in Victoria when the ministers of transport and the agriculture ministers get together.

I would simply like to say that there is a better way, a way that would not alienate the west and play into the hands of such evident opportunists as the Saskatchewan Unionist Party, a party led by a former Conservative leader who would like nothing better than to see the federal government play partisan politics with the drought. Surely no government in Washington would be so cynical as to say that the federal government must be widely perceived as doing all it can to respond to the situation.

On this side of the House we say, "Let us get on with the agreement Saskatchewan signed with the federal government in 1977". That agreement needs revising in view of changed conditions. In 1977 there was a shortage of surface water, but this year the water table has help up well. In 1977 movement of feed from farm to farm was a big component, but this year there is little excess feed to move. The federal government has been advised of these conditions for some time through its drought committee, yet as late as yesterday the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan received a telex from the minister in Ottawa indicating that discussions have been tentative to date and that no commitments to drought relief have been made by cabinet. Who know what miracles tomorrow might bring?

The proposed agreement of two weeks ago does not have all the answers, and I must say that the hon. member for Medicine Hat pointed out other solutions in his speech today. But I think the draft agreement which may, after all, become a reality shortly, has some of the answers, and I would like to commend them.

First is the purchase of alfalfa pellets which were surplus to export commitments and the storing of them for resale as needed.

● (1240)

The second is back-hauling of hay on cattle liners from Ontario.

The third is assuring retention of enough barley stocks to meet regional needs—and I am repeating some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

The fourth is a commitment of no further feed grain sales to export markets until the impact of the drought is known.

The fifth is halting the movement of non-Wheat Board grains for two weeks to allow for assessment of prarie stocks.

The sixth is return of pelletized screenings from Thunder Bay or Vancouver that are excess to export commitments.

The seventh is to use provincial and federal wildlife preserves for grazing where possible.

The eighth is to assist in the transportation of cattle to those areas or to other available pasture.

The ninth is the implementation of a fodder and feed grain listing service.

The tenth is assistance to farmers in developing wells.

The eleventh is assistance in respect of dug-out pumping where necessary; and lastly, the twelfth is assistance in the development of municipal wells.

The wording of this motion is very apt. We do regret the lack of action, just as we have sometimes regretted the lack of action by the Conservatives in proposing alternatives. The minister has admitted that his department has long been alerted to the problem, but there has been no action. There has also been an approach taken to the drought that has been secretive and clothed in cynicism. The government's hesitancy to commit itself either to the Saskatchewan program or to commit funds to implement it makes us a little suspicious that the reason the government is holding off is to make the meeting in Victoria this weekend a big media event. Such an approach is inexcusable and will make all of this government's stalling tactics suspect and opportunistic.

In closing, I would like to point out half a dozen main areas where the government could help farmers to survive this impending or partial disaster if we get as much rain as we have in the last few days.

Let us have some concern for action in respect of livestock right now. Let us have some concern for the livestock industry on a long-term basis, such as the suggestion regarding a national meat authority. Let us put into place a continuous plan which can be called upon on very short notice to keep the whole agricultural industry going in times of drought. Let us put in place a credit system which will allow farmers to survive in stressing times. Let us get all the feed grains back under the Canadian Wheat Board so we can be sure we have the kind of information and control of grain movement we need. Let us not appear to do something about the drought situation; let us do something about it. Let us do something as a Parliament and not as a party attempting to impress the west.

The bible story of the seven lean years is being repeated in southern Sahara regions. We pride ourselves on our planning and on our technology, but that may not be enough if the rains do not come. Let us approach this crisis as a nation should, and be prepared to do as a good government should.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first of all that I am speaking today in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who, as this House knows, has to leave for Africa today, and in the absence also of his parliamentary secretary who is in Montreal to close off the Floralies.

I must tell the House how much I enjoyed the speeches of both speakers who preceded me. I thought both their interventions were in the spirit the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned in his speech on the twelfth when, in full evidence of our very low numbers of MPs in the west, he said, talking to colleagues in the opposition:

> Like all of your colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation. You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constituents. It is a task no one else can fulfil. My government is prepared to co-operate fully in helping you to achieve this.

I might say that when I heard the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), I thought it was exactly in this context that they spoke. Indeed, I found that the description of the drought, this very serious matter that concerns all Canadians, given by the hon. member for Medicine Hat was one that was accurate; it was reasonable and it was sincere, and that from a man who has basically experienced droughts in the past and foresees the dangers that might face his people in Alberta, particularly the cattlemen, if this situation continues.

Some hon. Members: You should go out there.

Mr. Deniger: I would be more than willing to go and meet the people in that area so they can discuss that with me; but I know that no one could better represent those constituencies than those who have been elected.

When I heard the member for Prince Albert, I could not help but remember that I was in Prince Albert on several occasions, as he knows, and I know how very interested he is in the ambitions and the needs of his people there. When he said that there should be something done as a Parliament, he is entirely right.

Before answering the very positive recommendations that both he and the hon. member for Medicine Hat have suggested to this House, let me bring the members of this House and the people of Canada up to date on basically what the situation is in relation to the drought in Canada right now. There is no question about it, the drought in western Canada and in northwestern Ontario also is critical and requires immediate federal action. In that regard I completely associate myself with the remarks of both the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

At this time the Department of Agriculture is preparing an immediate contingency paper. The task force is in action right now. Indeed, later on this afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) will be speaking on this subject. At the noon break he is meeting with members of the Department of Agriculture in order that he can bring members up to date on the latest developments in this particular regard.

As the hon. member for Medicine Hat says, indeed, serious drought conditions exist on the prairies as well as in the United States and in northwestern Ontario. Pasture and hay crop conditions are poor. The supply of cattle feed for this summer is critical and of growing concern. Indeed, the few drops of rain in Alberta may have made it possible for some cattlemen to recover, but, indeed, the short grass situation is critical.

We do not know the consequences if the cattlemen were put in the situation where they had to dump all their beef on the market with a subsequent drop in price and the difficulty they would face in restarting their herds. I assure this House that I will bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance the very serious and very adequate and fair tax proposals the hon. member for Medicine Hat has put forward today. As he knows, I also sit on the finance committee of the House and I intend to assist him and associate myself with his demands, because members of this House, even if they do not have a farm in their ridings, are aware of the concerns of the cattlemen of this country.

Water supplies in major streams, lakes and underground are deteriorating, but the information we have is that they are still expected to be adequate to meet requirements up until perhaps the end of the summer of 1980.

Again I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert when he says that immediate action should be taken to assist in the drilling of wells, and to assist also in the drilling of municipal wells. Later on this afternoon one of our speakers will explain to the House and the people of Canada the very practical and concrete measures taken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to basically assist and put some sort of irrigation system in place in the west.

However, I understand sufficient soil moisture generally exists for the germination of crops. The situation, as I understand it, is more serious for the cattlemen because the grain farmer does at least have crop insurance and a stabilization scheme.

For this reason I should like to address my attention now to the situation of the cattlemen. Recently the cattlemen came before the finance committee and complained about clauses in the Bank Act which they felt were inadequate to meet their needs. Members opposite made serious representations on their behalf and I was there with several members from our side to support their plea.

Basically, the problem we face is the absence of rain, and all the programs we can develop on this side of the House with the assistance and positive co-operation of members opposite will not bring rain. So there are several propositions. The tax proposal will not solve the problem immediately though it will certainly alleviate the concerns of the farmer. Another possibility which was mentioned was the reduction of beef imports to give farmers an assurance that at least they would have a market in which to sell.

Another point which was raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert—I am not sure I agree with it—was that we should begin transporting hay from the east to the west. From the little knowledge I have, I believe the cost would be such as to be almost prohibitive. I will, maybe, ask the people in the departments of transport and agriculture to put together a package to find out basically whether the idea is feasible or not. When the hon. member talks about sufficient stocks of barley, I agree with him. There is no question we shall have sufficient stocks of barley because in the parts of Saskatchewan I know drought is something which could happen any year. Basically, the weather in southern Saskatchewan and in the area around Medicine Hat is dry.

I agree with the hon. member from Prince Albert: now is the time to do something. The hon. member put forward some 12 concrete proposals for immediate action and five long-term proposals. I was not able to make note of all of them but I certainly intend in the near future to have a conversation with him and to make sure that his representations are brought to the attention of the departments of agriculture and finance. I will make sure that this is done.

However, I was disappointed with the hon. member when he said that we on this side wanted to make political gains out of this situation. I would point out that there is not likely to be an election for four years and that there are no political gains for us to make in the short term. The hon. member should understand that we, especially those of us who have just been through a referendum, believe we are here to represent the whole country and we do not want to make short-term political gains. Absence of rain is something we can do nothing about.

The hon. member has put forward strong and concrete proposals. But to suggest we want to make a big show for June 3 and 4 in Victoria is completely wrong. That is unfair and I am disappointed with the hon. member for making that suggestion. I can only think that some member of his staff wrote it and that he accidentally read it to the House. As the hon. member knows very well, we have the situation out west at heart. I hope that this afternnon when the Minister of Transport meets with officials from the Department of Agriculture and others about what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will be doing, we shall be able to provide more satisfactory answers.

I also want to talk to the hon. member about the suggestion that somehow the Department of Agriculture did not agree with, changed its mind, withdrew or deceived the government of Saskatchewan and its minister of agriculture by saying one day that there was a deal and on another day that there was not a deal. From what I understand, according to information provided to me by officials of the Department of Agriculture and as repeated in this House by the Minister of Agriculture, an agreement was being discussed at a meeting of deputy ministers but nothing formal was decided. We have not turned down Mr. MacMurchy's request at this time. All we have done basically is say this: "Mr. MacMurchy has talked to our deputy minister, Mr. Lussier, Mr. Lussier has talked to the Minister of Agriculture, who in turn brought the matter to the attention of the various ministers who are concerned and who will bring it to the attention of cabinet". This is very different from saying we have rejected the request.

In a situation like this there can be no politics. We are here as a nation. That is why, when the provinces get together and talk to our department, I would never accuse them of trying to make politics. Basically, everyone is concerned about this situation. Concrete proposals have been made and we will act on them in the belief that the plight of the western farmer is of interest to all the nation.

I intend to go out west several times next year and in the years to come to meet with more of the prairie farmers. I think a suggestion which could be acted upon quickly would be to have the members of the agriculture committee travel across Canada and listen to the representations of the kind which were made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and by the hon. member for Prince Albert. They could talk to the farmers and to representatives of the Cattlemen's Association to make sure that the crisis situation which has arisen this year, a situation we experienced partially in 1977, in 1960-61 and for ten years in the thirties, will not continue. I cannot but believe that we on this side of the House, especially those who have just finished a very strong battle in Quebec, will be willing and understanding and ready to go to bat with our ministers and our officials who have the plight of the western farmers at heart. The hon. member may rest assured that this afternoon he will get precise and up-to-date information.

The hon. member mentioned an agreement made with the government of Manitoba. I am not aware of that agreement; maybe there is one. The Minister of Transport, at the meeting with officials, will have up-to-the-moment information.

The hon. member mentioned a big show in Victoria. Again, I am not aware of that. I am aware there is a meeting in Victoria but not a big show, a big political rally. That is not what it is about. What we intend to do is to take forceful action immediately. In 1977 we had a cabinet committee, an officials committee and a task force. This year that task force went into effect, met with the different farm organizations and met with the provincial organizations at the official level. It then made a report to the senior officials who then met with the deputy ministers. Now we are at the cabinet stage and with the help of the positive suggestions by the hon. members for Medicine Hat and Prince Albert we have the benefit of an even better and more complete file.

I am very pleased to have the occasion, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary, as one, who represents a very rural riding in southern Montreal despite the fact that its name is Laprairie and that it does not have a single farm on it, to get up once again to talk about my concern for and my devotion to the cause of the prairie farmer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): May I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If the hon. member is agreeable to calling it one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, when he will be recognized to take the floor.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) had the floor. I understand that the hon. member has offered or will offer to give way to the Minister of Transport. Perhaps he might like to advise the House of that, and the minister might like to advise the House of his decision.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, in light of the emergency and the concern that we on this side have, I would like to give way with unanimous consent to the Minister of Tranport (Mr. Pepin) to make a statement, and rely on the good auspices of the Chair for the rest of the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is that acceptable to the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I want to draw to the attention of the House and of the Minister of Transport that Standing Order 58(13) makes it clear that the first member who speaks on a debatable motion in reply to the mover of the motion has a time limit of 30 minutes. My review of the Standing Order would indicate that the reply has been given. The minister would therefore be limited to 20 minutes. Regarding the fact that we now have two members from the same side of the House speaking one after the other, the Chair will have to try to sort that out in the next few minutes.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. I shall try to respect my 20-minute limit. I believe I can manage it. First of all, I should like to reiterate the excuses of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who had to leave yesterday or this morning—I believe he left last night, in fact—to attend the World Food Conference in Tanzania, Africa. I know the minister would have liked to be in the House today.

Secondly, I want to say that the government is really grateful for the debate today and wishes to thank hon. members who are willing to take part in it. This debate obviously gives the opportunity of keeping the people of Canada informed about the present situation with regard to the drought in western Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the first part of my remarks which I obtained from the Department of Agriculture has to do with a description of the present weather situation in the west. Serious drought conditions continue, as we all know, to be experienced across a large area of the prairie provinces and areas also in northwestern Ontario and the interior of British Columbia. The generally dry fall in 1979, below normal winter precipitation, and a hot, dry April and May have contributed to cause below normal moisture conditions. The moisture shortages range from critical to below normal.

The one bright spot in recent weeks, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) underlined this morning, has been rain in southern and some parts of central Alberta, but a lack of moisture is causing great hardship on many other people elsewhere.

The worst forest fire conditions on record are being experienced in the northern areas of western Canada and northwestern Ontario. Substantial damage has already been done and, as we all know, many people have had to be taken by Armed Forces planes and personnel from their homes as fires threaten. I am glad to be able to tell hon. members that many of these residents of our northern areas now have returned to their homes. Cooler, damp weather has helped put out some of the fires and reduced the fire hazard. But it is recognized that the over-all dry conditions across the prairies continue and are threatening to have a serious effect on agricultural production.

I share the concern of some hon. members that the cereal crop in western Canada is in jeopardy because of low moisture reserves in the soil and in some areas a total lack of rainfall. I am told that it is still not too late for the wheat crop to recover and to provide its usual bounty. Timely rains could indeed turn the situation around for grain producers. But there is no question that if the present weather conditions prevail for very much longer, there will be an increasing number of short and long-term problems developing. In a nutshell, the situation is serious but not yet critical. We all pray and hope that it will not become critical.

Livestock producers have been the first to be affected. Increasing demands placed on already short feed supplies and local water supplies are causing great concern. Livestock and feed, when available, must be transported long distances. There is also a concern that some cattlemen may have to sell off their herds if feed becomes scarce.

There is no question that the drought situation is more serious in some respects than the dry conditions of 1977. It is far more widespread, covering a very large area of western Canada.

What, then, is being done? First, the government has been continuing to monitor the situation most carefully. Cabinet members have met their provincial counterparts, and senior officials within various government departments have consulted with provincial officials.

In 1977, the last year drought conditions existed on the prairies, cabinet approved the formation of a federal task force on drought. The task force was charged with the responsibility of assembling information, recommending government action and co-ordinating programs aimed at alleviating the situation for western farmers.

I would like to make it clear to my hon. friends that the task force was not simply a one-shot affair. It has continued in existence in Regina since 1977 and has been meeting regularly. In fact, it has regularly reported moisture conditions to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), and these reports have been made public.

This morning, the hon. member for Medicine Hat suggested that the names of the members of the task force be made public. If I am permitted, Mr. Speaker, I will do so now. The chairman is Mr. V. O. Coffey from Agriculture Canada; the secretary is Mr. D. James, a representative of DREE in Saskatchewan. The members are as follows: Mr. J. C. Lowe, representing Agriculture Canada; Mr. J. R. Lane, DREE, Saskatchewan; Mr. G. S. Brown, PFRA—as hon. members know, that is part of DREE; Mr. D. A. Davis, Environment, Regina; Mr. W. H. Willis, EPC, Winnipeg; and Mr. W. L. Tucker, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Winnipeg.

There is an interdepartmental steering committee working from Ottawa which is chaired by Mr. Mike Heeney of Agriculture Canada. I would like to thank these people for their participation in this task force.

As I was saying, the task force is a permanent institution now and it met last in Regina on May 16 with senior officials from the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It was agreed at this meeting that a drought of major proportions was developing, and that joint federal-provincial action was urgently needed. Action plans were presented as soon as possible to the respective governments of task force members for consideration and implementation.

As a result of this meeting, all hon. members would have received last week a memorandum of information from the Minister of Agriculture providing the most up-to-date information possible on the drought situation. Similar information has been made available regularly to western farmers and to the members of Parliament through media releases from Agriculture Canada.

Today marks the reinstatement of a weekly drought report first initiated in 1977 during dry conditions. The report which hon. members will receive on Monday morning not only provides current information on weather conditions, but also provides some predictions as to what these conditions mean to prairie farmers. That report is widely available in both print form and by radio across the prairies.

At lunch time I managed to get an advance copy of the report. If members want to know what the situation is in their particular region—it is divided into geographical areas—if they would get in touch with me, I will let them see it.

Just last weekend the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board toured the most seriously affected areas of the prairies to gain first hand information on the situation. They met in Regina with task force officials. A draft paper recommending certain federal action to alleviate hardships caused by the dry weather was also studied by ministers at that time.

Task force officials worked out details this week. Just three days ago a meeting of senior federal officials was held in Ottawa to review these details and to make specific recommendations. These recommendations for action will be placed before cabinet for decision next week, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure hon. members that the matter will receive the highest priority. Detailed federal plans aimed at assisting producers on the prairie provinces will be announced as soon as possible after cabinet has made its decision.

The Minister of Agriculture was sort of chastised this morning for saying that he could not act as rapidly as others thought he should. I thought he stood on very good ground. The proper way of doing these things is for the minister—or any one of them—to go to cabinet first to get authorization for whatever he wants to do before proceeding with an announcement. I thought some of my friends were unfair to the very friendly and able Minister of Agriculture. So I stand up today to support him.

This document, the one I referred to as coming before cabinet next week, will address the most urgent part of this situation, that is, pasture and feed for cattle. It will cover possible moves on the feasibility of transportation of cattle feed and transportation of cattle to pasture. It will make decisions about that. It will also address the possibility of accelerating programs for the provision of water facilities, not that these programs are entirely new—we all know that they exist—but there is a possibility they could be accelerated. This is the sort of thing the document will be about and it is on what the cabinet will base its decision. Therefore, my hon. friends will have their curiosity satisfied by this announcement next week.

In the meantime, the task force members and senior federal officials are considering further government action should the drought continue. The drought situation can change very rapidly, we know that, but the government will be in a position to react to a worsening situation very rapidly if it becomes necessary.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) seemed to make a great to do about a meeting to be held on June 3 in Victoria. I think he was implying that this was another one of those Liberal conspiracies to get maximum press coverage. I just want to tell him that I will be at that meeting. The meeting was called to discuss grain transportation. A minister from one of the provinces informed the chairman of that group that he would like to discuss drought conditions should they not improve in the meantime. It was by provincial action that the subject of drought was brought up as a possibility for discussion at the meeting in Victoria. My friend might want to apologize or blush for having imputed motives that were not there certainly in the first place.

So that there is no confusion as to the action the government already has taken to handle the drought situation on a continuing basis, I would like rapidly to review some of its programs and other activities. While the emergency measures to be considered by cabinet will be geared to answer specific needs for this year, there exist other measures that have been in place, in some cases for decades. I will mention just three.

First, ever since the dust bowl days of the 1930s, Agriculture Canada's research stations in the western provinces have laboured to provide farmers with new tools, management techniques and different crop varieties to combat the odds of farming in what is naturally a dry land area. This has been met with great success and international acclaim.

The second measure I want to mention is crop insurance programs, half the premiums for which are paid by the federal government. This is another way in which prairie farmers can protect their investment in the land. About 80,000 western grain farmers have purchased $1.5 billion worth of crop insurance protection for this year. The federal government will contribute about $73 million to premiums in the western provinces. The government also assists provinces through reinsurance programs when indemnities greatly exceed reserves. This is another measure that exists, and I am sure hon. members are aware of it and others. I just mention them as a record of the system that has been built throughout the years to anticipate situations like the one now confronting us.

Third, the Western Grain Stabilization Act provides income protection should poor crop yields result in poor market returns and reduced net cash flows. Some 74 per cent of all rain producers on the prairies are part of this program.

As I have said, our immediate concern is for the livestock producers who are suffering the most from soil moisture conditions at the present time. I can assure hon. members that government emergency action will recognize that fact. The selling off of cattle and subsequent reduction in western breeding herds must be prevented, as was stated by some members this morning.

To sum up, the government stands ready to institute whatever action is needed to help producers as well as residents of western Canada should the drought conditions continue much longer. I repeat that the situation is a very serious one, but it has not reached critical proportions. Hopefully it will not. However, to react to the present serious situation, the government will make announcements next week.

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) for having given the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) the opportunity to speak before him. We on this side have no objection to Your Honour now recognizing two Conservatives to speak on this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair wants to express its thanks to the hon. member for indicating that we might balance out debate in that fashion. Unless there are any objections, that is the manner in which we will proceed. There will be two Conservative speakers. I will then go to my right again. I then have in mind a further member from the NDP. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) for assisting in this debate. I was pleased with the remarks of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in that we have finally had a statement in the House from the government on a very serious problem that faces the three prairie provinces, part of British Columbia and part of Ontario.

If I am critical of the Liberal government, it is because of the lenght of time it has taken them to realize the problems that drought is causing individuals. It may not be of a huge proportion in some minds, but this drought, this disaster, this quirk of Mother Nature, is of huge proportions in their personal lives.

I would like to try and express this in a way a friend of mine from southern Saskatchewan does. When we are talking about drought, some people say drought, some people say "drouth". I don't care what you say, it's damned dry in Saskatchewan right now. We, and I am talking about men, governments and human resources, all believe that rain will come and that the "Man upstairs" looks after us; but we cannot wait for help because we need to have help now.

I would like to draw attention to some of the problems that we have, some of which were mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo). The task force that was organized in 1977 and which is still in existence is made up of those mentioned by the minister, very capable and responsible members of our bureaucracy. I have a great deal of empathy for those members. They come up with programs that are of great assistance. The only problem with the programs is that they cost money. These hard working civil servants go out and try to provide the answers. When they come back and ask for money to carry out the programs that will assist those suffering from this drought, they find that this is where the problem lies. It is not a problem of finding the answers. We have very capable people who have provided the answers. The problem lies with whether this government is committed, believes and is concerned that it will find the money or the resources to give the assistance that is needed in western Canada, not tomorrow and not next week but now.

The Minister of Transport took exception to one of the previous speakers' comment that things should be done quickly and should be done now. However, I would draw his attention to some of the things the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said when we were in government and he in opposition. He said it was a shame that agriculture was not represented properly in the Clark cabinet, that the then minister of agriculture was not a member of the inner cabinet. What he forgot to recognize as important is that that minister was a member of Treasury Board. When you are a member of Treasury Board, you have ample opportunity to get fast decisions on problems concerning agriculture. The present Minister of Agriculture is not a member of Treasury Board. That is why we have to wait so long before competent and precise help is given to those in western Canada.

I wish to bring to the attention of the House the supplies that we have in western Canada to give us assistance with this problem. It has been mentioned that screenings should be used to supplement feed. There are people in my constituency who have turned cattle out on to grass. When they did that, they also had to feed them. They have to grind, chop and supply feed in addition to grass for the cattle. The reason for that is that they were breeding stock.

I would like to correct an impression that may have been left by the hon. member for Prince Albert about a statement made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, who has long been recognized in the cattle industry and other industries in Canada as a very knowledgeable person. He did not say that we should sell off half of our breeding stock. What the hon. member for Medicine Hat said was that in some instances farmers and ranchers are selling up to half their breeding stock. Selling half their breeding stock is giving away their ability to earn a living. It takes away the ability of families, ranchers and farmers to earn a living. They can no longer earn a living unless they have their breeding stock. The only cash they get comes when calves are dropped, grassed and then fed. When you give away or are forced to sell part of your ability to earn a living, it is not a small matter; it is critical, and it is critical right now.

We have very small supplies of screenings in western Canada. As a matter of fact, my information is that at the most we have available now only 450 tonnes of screenings, which would not make a significant difference, considering the numbers of cattle which will have to be fed. A problem arises because of a formula called the corn competitive formula which says that barley sold within Canada should be based on the price, the energy efficiency and the price of equal efficiency of corn which comes in from the United States.

What it is doing now is that the cattlemen who are in need of feed are buying barley from the Canadian Wheat Board stocks because they can buy it cheaper from the Canadian Wheat Board stocks under the corn competitive formula than they can buy it non-board, from elevator companies or from their neighbours, their farmer and rancher friends.

The other thing that is going to develop is a shortage of barley for both areas. There are approximately 200,000 tonnes of barley on-farm in western Canada, and it will not be sold to the Canadian Wheat Board. It will not be sold on quota until the price comes up 40 cents or 50 cents or until a quota opens up which will allow it to be sold. These are some of the problems.

Long before my time the PFRA served the people of western Canada well. It has the interest of the people of western Canada at heart at all times, but right now on PFRA pastures there are aproximately 190,000 head of cattle. Officials of that agency say that the optimum expectation is that grass and water—one or the other and in some cases both—will dry up by the end of June. These cattle are going to have to be taken out of the pastures and put on feed in feedlots on farms. This is an additional burden, but farmers and ranchers will do this to save their breeding stock.

I am aware of the deep program of the PFRA, but I would like to draw the attention of the House and the minister to the fact that in this year of drought there have only been 251 deep wells drilled in western Canada as of May 28. This compares with the year 1977—and I realize we are only at the end of May—when there were 4,059 deep wells dug by the PFRA or with the assistance of the PFRA. I commend this program of the PFRA, but I also ask that the government provide the monetary means—the dollars—so that this agency can function.

There are some other things I would like to mention, but one thing I want particularly to bring to the attention of the House is the suggestion the hon. member for Medicine Hat made regarding an annual income averaging program for cattlemen and farmers who are forced, through no fault of their own but because of the quirk of Mother Nature, to sell their stock. The hon. member for Prince Albert said that this would not help the small operator, but I think it should be drawn to his attention that a small operator with 30 or 40 head of breeding stock has a total investment of anywhere from $35,000 to $45,000.

If he is forced to sell half of that, he will pay anywhere from 30 per cent to 40 per cent of the proceeds in income tax. Five-year averaging does not help. I do not know how the hon. member for Prince Albert would feel were he a farmer or had he experience on the farm, but I would not want to have to sell my cows. I would not want to have to give away 40 per cent even on 20 head of cattle. Larger operators whose cattle are on short grass have no back-up. They rely on grass to produce the calves they sell for income. The smaller farmer is usually a mixed farmer. He has access to straw, feed grains and cereal grains, so that he can get through. It will cost him more, but he will get through. I would like to draw that to the attention of the House.

Mention has been made of programs which are available to producers in western Canada when it comes to crop insurance. The minister stated that there are about 80,000 farmers involved in the crop insurance program. We recognize that that program is funded partially by the federal government and by the provincial governments, but I must add that the people who buy it, the producers, also fund it. There are 80,000 farmers involved in this program, but there are 150,000 permit book holders in western Canada. That means that just s little over half of the farmers are protected under the crop insurance program.

Western grain stabilization was mentioned. This is a program which is of assistance, but again only 70 per cent of the producers participate in that program.

One problem in the cattle industry which is critical now is that if it does not rain within the next ten days, there will be a problem with cereal grain production. For the information of the minister, we are about a month ahead in our growing season in western Canada now compared with the average year. Ordinarily if there has been no rain by the first of June we do not panic, but crops have been in the ground for 30 days or 40 days. The germination is not so good. It really is not great. Gophers have to pack a lunch to travel across 100 acres. There is nothing to eat. We must have some feeling of concern for the grain producer right now. I agree that the situation is not as critical as it is for the cattleman because the cattleman is selling off his ability to earn an income.

Considering the expressions of good faith and good will by the government toward people in western Canada and all parts of Canada who are having a problem, I hope that it will again take a very strong look at income averaging in order to protect people who, again through no fault of their own, have been forced to sell parts of their cattle herds.

I hope the Canadian Wheat Board will be instructed to guarantee a supply of feed grain on the prairies, but again let us keep in mind that the mandate of the Canadian Wheat Board is to export grain out of Canada. I know this is a problem, but I think there must be some way of getting around it.

We certainly hope there will be federal assistance given to the movement of cattle from western Canada to Ontario and Quebec. We had the assurance from our confreres in the Standing Committee on Agriculture yesterday that there is more than enough forage in Ontario and Quebec to assist in a small way in saving our breeding stock. We would like to see if a back haul could be originated to haul grain and hay back.

We hope that the government will look at a meat import law. That would not help in the drought, but it would help cattlemen and farmers have some faith in the industry of raising beef. Unless they have faith, and unless they know they are going to get a fair return for their sweat, they will sell their breeding herds and it is not just the cattlemen and the farmers who will suffer; every consumer in Canada will feel the effect within the next 18 to 24 months. We hope the government will take a strong look at placing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration, or the act, under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Pepin: Why not Transport?

Mr. McKnight: The minister suggests Transport. I will pass over that. The Minister of Transport is a busy man and I do not think he really needs anything else to keep him occupied.

The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger) said he had a feeling for western Canada and understands some of the problems there even if he does not have a farm. I recognize that, and there are other members on his side who have a similar approach. If the government is willing to take the steps which are needed along the lines of suggestions which have been put forward, it will renew faith in western Canada that the federal government does care about the region. But if steps are not taken, and taken soon, this belief will be very hard to maintain in western Canada. In contradiction to the view held by some people, I should like to say that the situation is critical now. It is critical for individuals and it is critical for the industry—for the farmers, the cattle business and everyone in Canada. So I hope the government will take a look at these problems.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate although I regret the situation we are discussing is not a healthy one in terms of the western economy or the Canadian economy as a whole. It is very unpredictable. Today we might be talking about a very serious drought; tomorrow the rains may come and continue to fall and then, all of a sudden, the situation is fine and dandy.

This does not excuse the government from taking action. After all, the government has a responsibility here, as it indicated in the Speech from the Throne. Along with many other western members, I read that speech and heard it from the mouth of none other than the Governor General, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recited to us in western Canada that we had a responsibility to indicate to the people in western Canada what the government was doing. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can we tell the people of western Canada what the government is doing if the government does not tell us what it intends to do?

If anyone doubts the seriousness of the drought, one has only to look back at past history. I can remember what happened in 1961. Not too many people have experienced drought conditions but I suppose that in my lifetime I experienced it also in the thirties as a boy. I did not understand the seriousness of it in those days. I was just a young shaver at the time and it really did not make much difference to me. One could have a lot of fun, even in the depression. You did not need much money to get by. You ate what was available, you did what everybody else did and you did not ask questions.

That was in the days when you did not require capital. Those were the days when you could feed a horse, turn it out to pasture for a couple of hours in the afternoon in the heat of the sun, and about four or five o'clock hook him up, drag him back out to the field and work again until late at night. But you cannot do that any more. So in terms of today's economy there is no comparison with the thirties, and I think we may as well forget about trying to make one because any time reference is made to the thirties it is such a foreign thing for everybody to understand. It is something for the CBC to recall whenever they want to drag out something about the prairies and western Canada.

Western Canada is not the prairies any more. Western Canada is far more than vast prairie dust bowls and so on. It is true there is the possibility of dust bowls and grave economic consequences. But the dust bowls are gone forever in terms of our agricultural approach and our ability to cope with them. Our ability to cope demands several factors. One of those is the ability to raise capital, and ability to raise capital depends very much on the ability of the government to understand the consequences of what is happening today.

We have a far more serious problem than relates to only one province. Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and parts of Ontario are affected by drought. When I say parts of Ontario are affected, I am talking about the forest fire situation as it affects the northern area. If anybody doubts the consequences of forest fires in the northern parts of our country he has only to look at the value of the tourist dollar that produces an income to Canada. If ever Canada needed income from foreign capital, it needs it today. And if ever a government needed a jolt to make it understand the consequences of the folly of the financial policy it is pursuing it needs it now. It is oblivious to the fact that it is heading totally in the wrong direction in terms of deficits. The time to budget for deficits is when we have the one we are facing today, to pull us out of an economic recession.

Just look at what is reported in today's The Globe and Mail. If people in eastern Canada are not aware of the consequences of what is happening in western Canada, let them look at the Massey-Ferguson lay-offs which will reach 6,850. Do I need to say more? Who is it, Mr. Speaker, who buys the tractors? Who buys the combines? It is the people who have been complaining to their representatives in the House of Commons, and they are asking this government to outline a plan for coping with the situation.

The government announced they had a plan. They told us they had some sort of a task force. Where was it? Hidden in a cupboard? What was it doing? Studying itself—studying its navel, I guess. I do not know what it was doing. But the point is this: they did not indicate to the people most affected what they intended to do in the event of a serious situation developing. And it was developing very rapidly. Imagine the situation which existed when we started out this spring. Interest rates stood at 18 per cent. What were the producers to do? Were they to look up into the sky, say it was too dry, that interest was at 18 per cent and that the government didn't care? Were they to fold up?

They asked themselves these questions and said: "We don't care about the government, we don't care about the interest rates and we don't care about the weather. We are going to take our chances despite everything that everybody does to us because that is the nature of the farmer". But does that mean we have to say to them: "Yes, your're tough, but you withstood it before"?

You know, Mr. Speaker, there are such things as bankruptcies. We see the evidence of that. Once in a while the CBC comes out with a spectacular case. But we do not have to look at the spectacular cases. Businesses go under and nobody even notices them. All of a sudden a family farmer pulls out of a suitable home and goes into the city and becomes a statistic. We look down at the records later on and see that another farm has closed down.

What is important is not to come up with some grandiose scheme later on, but to deal with the situation right away. It is important to give them an indication of where you are going. They also have to make plans, whether or not the government knows it. Everybody in business who is affected by the income of the producers, whether they be cattle producers or other agricultural producers, has to make plans. You cannot imagine what it is like when you see grass which in the middle of June would normally be two feet high now only six inches high and very scarce. You can walk through it, you can see through it, you can see a blade of grass ten feet away. That is the kind of situation that you run into.

These people are not stupid, they know that they cannot carry their cattle through the winter, they know they have to unload them, and they know that every buyer in this country knows their situation. They know that the sooner they unload their cattle the better, because if they wait the situation will become worse. The government waits and waits, thinking that perhaps something will happen and it will not have to come through with anything.

With regard to the drought, the situation is not yet critical in my area. We hope that with some rainfall, perhaps even a bountiful crop might be produced. But let me tell the minister who sits over there who, although he is not responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, is pinch-hitting for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) at this time, that he had better take the message back that whatever kind of plan this task force may have for the cattle industry and for the grain industry, it had better be announced very quickly. Even an interim program is better than nothing.

Now let me go on to speak about the other industry affected, and that is the tourist industry. Here I do not fault the federal government, and in fact I do not think it was through any action on the part of the federal government that the tourist industry has suffered. I want to give full marks to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, despite the credit which the province might want to take for itself, because people within the department foresaw the need for water bombers for Saskatchewan, and through DREE funding—perhaps the minister does not even know about this; in fact, I am sure he does not and I would like to fill him in on this—

Mr. Pepin: Flattery got you where you are.

Mr. Korchinski: I want to give the department full marks because with the funds out of the northlands agreement, 60 per cent of the cost of the $1,500,000 program was provided to buy three water bombers for northern Saskatchewan. And what did the province of Saskatchewan do? They were not ready for the forest fires. They had a few tracker bombers which were on wheels but they could not scoop up the water as a water bomber can. The water bombers that were provided were equipped to cope with the situation. But they took their time, and of course the forest fires do not take time—whenever they come, they come.

I want to give DREE full marks because they knew what the consequences would be to the tourist industry. The tourist industry depends a great deal upon Americans coming to northern Saskatchewan to fish. Tourist facilities in that area have had to be shut down, but the federal government had nothing to say to those people who heard nothing other than a bald announcement which came from the province of Saskatchewan. The province reversed a few statements here and there and implied that it was all to their credit, which is a lot of baloney, if I can use that term.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is parliamentary.

Mr. Korchinski: The province was trying to take the credit for everything that was being done. I want to give the federal government credit in that regard, because at least the officials of DREE were aware of the need for water bombers. I do not know whether those three water bombers were sufficient for the amount of work that was being done.

Now I want to go back to the throne speech where the following statement was made:

> It has been said in recent weeks that the three westernmost provinces have no elected voice in the governing of this country. That is not true. Parliament is the supreme law making assembly of Canada, and every Canadian is represented in the House of Commons by his or her duly elected member.
> Like all of our colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation.

That is fair enough. In other words, the government is admonishing us, western representatives, that we have a job to do to inform the people. And yet when an industrial park was being opened up at La Ronge, what did the minister and his department do? It did not matter that I as the elected representative for 22 years—was not invited on the occasion, but they even denied me the opportunity to tell the people about what the federal government was going to do.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Korchinski: They denied me that opportunity, but they invited everyone else. They admonish me, they lecture me, and they tell me what my role as an MP is, and then when the opportunity arises they deny me the chance to play that role. It does not really matter because they have done that to me before and yet I am here. I would have told them the same thing I am telling them now. I give them credit where credit is due, if there is any credit due, but at the same time they deny me the opportunity to make information available to the people. That is what the resolution is all about, and that is what we are asking for. We ask for information about what the government is doing about the drought as it applies to dairy producers, beef producers, grain producers and the tourist industry.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to say much more, but let me tell you that in my area, in Cumberland House, there are marshes—it is marshland area—and despite the droughts in western Canada we can grow great amounts of feed in that area. In 1961 when everywhere else there was no feed, we in Cumberland House grew it and made it available. We had a trucking program to bring the feed to the southern parts of the country. Now it will be available there because the marshlands still exist. The land is flooded and grass will grow there. There are many other areas in the province that have similar programs in existence where feed will be available. They can be co-ordinated to benefit the beef industry so that cattle do not have to be slaughtered and producers will not have to make sacrifices at this time. It is an industry which is badly needed at this time.

I should like to say one other thing with regard to the effects of the forest fires in the province of Saskatchewan. The forest products industry in the province is about to abandon some of its operations. The fires have ravaged many parts of the province through the Hudson Bay area and around La Ronge in the north, a prime producing area where no less than three plants, to say the least, will be closing their operation. They will be using the excuse that it was high interest rates and everything else, but in reality the reason for their closure will be partly because they were not ready to cope with the forest fire situation.

The federal government has now reached a point where it requires $14 billion for its deficit position. That is an increase from the $11.5 billion which we projected. The federal government will never be in a position to help western Canada at this particular time, or maybe another area at another time, because of the monetary policies it is pursuing.

The other day I suggested that the Bank of Canada should take into account the drought in western Canada and its effect upon the economy. I was swept aside by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but a few days later I saw a headline in The Globe and Mail which indicated that Ontario is affected. I am not a strange soothsayer. I do not have any way of knowing or predicting that certain things will happen, but I know if things are happening in one place that it will affect another place. All it takes is a little common sense on the part of the government. I ask the government to give us as much information as possible. The grain producers, the cattle producers, the tourist industry and the lumber industry in western Canada are capable of coping with difficult situations. They are intelligent people, but they must be given information so that they will know what the government is prepared to do and how far the government is prepared to go, and they will carry the rest.

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in this House to talk about the drought conditions in western Canada. Serious drought conditions affect a large part of the prairie provinces, certain areas of northern Ontario and British Columbia. A generally dry fall, below normal winter precipitation and a very hot and dry April and May have contributed to the present situation. Moisture conditions range from low to average and the situation is critical.

The one bright spot in recent weeks has been rain in southern and some parts of central Alberta but a lack of moisture is also causing great hardship elsewhere. The northern prairies and northwestern Ontario are now having the worst forest fires ever recorded. Substantial damage has already been done and, as hon. members undoubtedly know, many people have been evacuated by the armed forces because of the threat those fires represent. Fortunately, most of these residents now have returned home. Cooler damp weather temperatures has helped put out some of the fires that were raging and reduced the fire hazard. However, the over-all dry conditions across the prairies continue and seriously threaten agricultural production.

I share the concern of my colleagues representing certain western areas that the cereal crop is in jeopardy because of low moisture reserves in the soil and a total lack of rainfall. But I am told it is still not too late for the wheat crop and yields could still be excellent if it rains and continues to rain as it has been doing in certain areas recently. But there is no question that if present weather conditions prevail we will face short and long-term problems. Livestock producers were the first to be affected. Because of increasing demands we can expect cattle feed shortages. In certain regions, the drop in water supplies also poses serious problems. Livestock and feed, when available, have to be transported over long distances. Also, cattlemen may have to sell off their herds if feed becomes scarce.

There is no question that the present situation is more serious in some aspects than the problems which existed in 1977. The problem has much greater proportions than three years ago. The government is monitoring the situation most carefully. In 1977, cabinet approved the formation of a special task force on drought whose mandate was to assemble information and make recommendations to government, besides co-ordinating various programs to alleviate the situation out west. The task force is still active and continues to meet. They met recently in Regina, on May 16 to be precise, with Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba senior government officials. According to the task force, we are facing a serious drought and the federal and provincial governments must be prepared to take immediate action.

During the last weekend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), and also both ministers of state responsible for economic development and for the Canadian Wheat Board visited the most affected areas to see for themselves the extent of the problem. At the same time, they considered a working paper proposing that some measures be adopted by the federal government. A special committee has prepared the particulars of those proposals only three days ago. Those recommendations will be submitted to cabinet which should make a decision soon. In the meantime, the task force and the senior officials will continue to co-ordinate the goverment's action if the drought were to continue. The situation could improve quickly, but the government must be prepared to act as quickly as possible if things were to get worse. Not only have action plans been provided but I am convinced as all members in this House that the government will act in time and effectively to give assistance to western farmers.

It is important that decisions taken in those circumstances be the best possible. I believe that negative criticism would be contrary to the best interests of farmers and consumers alike. However, Mr. Speaker, we should refrain from dramatizing so as to avoid useless panic. Rain has fallen in some areas and yesterday we were informed that in some specific areas, four inches of rain had fallen, three inches in others and one inch elsewhere. Let us hope that the rain will greatly improve the grazing areas so that cattle may feed properly. Let us hope that this will continue and let us search for practical short, medium and long-term solutions because this drought could seriously impair western Canada's economy.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise today realizing that in my area we did get the first rains this year over the weekend, much needed rains, because, as the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), said, much of the crop had been in the ground for 30 to 40 days and had been germinating sporadically. In the lower areas germination was taking place, and in the higher areas of fields there was no germination. This would have resulted in a very uneven crop and grain of very poor quality this fall. However, we did get the rain and I now am pleased to say that most of my farmers are saying germination is taking place across all of the fields.

This does not alleviate the problem regarding pasture lands in the west part of the ridings of Wetaskiwin, Red Deer and, I suspect, Vegreville, Bow River and Crowfoot. The pasture lands and hay lands are not growing. The only plants growing are the deep rooted alfalfa plants, which are already coming into bloom and should be cut one month before we generally go out and make the first cut of that hay for the year. This is disturbing.

I am also concerned that many of the ranchers and farmers in the area raising cattle, because the pastures grass did not grow this spring, were forced to turn their cattle out on their hay fields to keep them going long enough until the pasture lands could get a bit of a foothold so that the pasture lands could hold the cattle through the fall when maybe some grain lands and straw would become available.

The very serious problem of drought has really affected most seriously now, and will continue to do so, feed for the cattle on the prairies, and that is something we have to turn our attention to as a Parliament.

As I looked at the act which was brought forward by the government in 1935 to deal with drought I found that it had remained in its same form since that time. It has never been amended. Obviously it was well thought out by those who brought it forward at that time. We have found that because of that it has served as well since 1935 when first brought forward in this House. I refer to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

I looked back at the debates of that time as I felt people then had just been through a most serious drought and surely we might be able to learn a lot from history. We may find ourselves in a recurring situation. Many of the things we should have been doing through the years were brought up at that time in 1935, and they have not changed.

I noted that the then minister in 1935, Mr. Weir, when bringing forward the act stated a number of policies that DREE should consider. One of those policies was to set up small areas, sort of experimental plots. He considered they should be a township in size and there should be three in Saskatchewan, one in Alberta, and one in Manitoba. The purpose was to develop grasses and grains that were hardy in drought conditions. There was also to be a tree-planting program to help farmers in the conservation of water. These were practical educational plots for farmers suggested by the scientists of that time who were capable of producing drought resistant plants, shelter belts, and the types of farming necessary in drought conditions.

I do not know what has happened to that program. I do not believe these experimental township plots are now in existence. Perhaps there is no need for them to exist, but surely with our modern techniques we must still learn the proper methods of farming when water is in short supply. If we look back to those records we might find that some of those techniques can still be applied today. Some of those crops could still be planted today in our pasture lands. We should bring these methods forward and make them available to farmers who may now have to experience similar weather conditions.

Many members of Parliament who spoke at that time talked about less water available than they had known in previous experience. As I look at my farm which has experienced the drought I can see the very same thing happening there today that happened to my ancestors back in the 1930s. Sloughs, as we call them, which contain water—we lament them because we have to go around them with our large equipment—have dried up. Usually they hold water which infiltrates the land around the slough and supplies water through capillary action to plants. As I have said, they are now dry. My brother seeded right through them this spring. I do not have a chance to work the farm any more since I am a member of Parliament, but I do keep watching on weekends to see what is happening. There is no water in them any more, largely as a result of very little snow this winter and no rain for 50 days this spring. The one and a half inches of rain we received are going to assist, but surely will be of no lasting value unless we get more.

Members back at that time talked about the very same thing. In fact one of the opposition members stated:

The present situation presents an opportunity of guarding against a recurrence of these conditions. When times were good people would not bother with rehabilitation, and that is why at the present time it creates a special opportunity with regard to the projects which we are now going forward.

They were talking then about preparing themselves for a situation that could come forward again in the future.

Another matter they talked about, which is essential, was the planting of shelter belts. When our forefathers came to this area they wanted to farm and they cut the trees. The rains came and they did not worry until the thirties when the rains did not come. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) said he was able to remember, and I am not, about the dust clouds and the drifting of the soil. Shelter belts can gather the snow in the winter as the winds drift it across the prairies, preserving that moisture in the areas where it is needed. In this way the snow does not drift onto the highways and into the towns where it is not needed. The shelter belts are absolutely essential. They also prevent the winds from gaining velocity and the soil does not drift as rapidly as it would otherwise.

Many members at that time spoke about the planting of trees. They suggested two things, shelter belts and plots. The advice accepted was in respect of shelter belts. I must commend the PFRA administration for what it has done since that time. I phoned the tree planting nursery at Indian Head, Saskatchewan. It was set up to do exactly this. I looked at some of the statistics and I was astonished. From 1935 to 1978 they have spent $11 million. In 1978 the nursery shipped its 400 millionth tree to prairie farmers in that region. In fact in 1977 when we experienced a bit of a drought, similar but not as severe as the one we are now experiencing, the demand for trees was greater than they could meet. They increased their yearly supply from six million in 1976 to 6.96 million in 1977, and they still had orders they were unable to fill. If there is anything we can learn from this it is that perhaps they need a larger grant so they can plant more trees to meet the demand.

As I looked at the records it seemed that each year, and I have the figures for 1974 to the present, their budget has been increasing, from $800,000 in 1974 to $1.2 million in 1977-78, which means that they are meeting as closely as possible the demands for this absolutely essential service to western farmers.

Another suggestion the hon. members spoke about at that time was in respect of measures for improving soil erosion controls, the provision of water storage, irrigation, and the better utilization of soil resources. They spoke about the withdrawal of submarginal lands from intensive farming to go over to pasture.

I have some interest in renewable energy and it seems to me that the poplar tree that our scientists have developed, and which grows so rapidly, will be a valuable contribution. I know it is a relatively new tree, and some education would be required for farmers to learn the value of it over the traditional crops of alfalfa and other forage. It may sound odd to those of us who have farmed for years that we should switch submarginal lands from growing alfalfa to growing poplar trees. The tree grows so rapidly that, within two years, the farmer can take off 12 or 14 tons of matter for feed. He would not get close to that production with alfalfa. It grows very well on rocky, submarginal land, and it does not have to be harvested in dry weather. It has many advantages. Because it is deep rooted I suspect it would also be an advantage in a drought year such as this one. It is something on which agrologists might work with our farmers for submarginal lands in order that we can prepare ourselves for times like these.

We hope drought will not come very often, but when we go through a period of light rainfall we should utilize the technologies that are being developed which are essential to our agricultural industry. These trees can be developed to produce the energy required for that agriculture, because the product of the tree can be distilled into ethanol and methane gas. Those are two very welcome uses.

We welcome the way the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has served us over the last 35 or 50 years. It set up some excellent programs from which we can still learn and which we should constantly study. It would have been useful in 1977, also this spring, and who knows when in the future? It set up four programs. One was for land use service to rehabilitate lands which were submarginal. The primary activities of the program were to be operational and administrative for a community pasture program. The second was a water development service. The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster told us about the deep well drilling service which is very essential to the dry land ranching area of the prairies. In times of drought it means they can bring water up to fill their dug-outs.

I was out in western Canada last Friday, Mr. Speaker, and spoke to the minister of agriculture for Alberta. I asked him about the drought conditions there. He was very concerned and listed a number of programs that he was ready to put in place for the farmers of Alberta. One that he had already put to work was the filling of dug-outs. As there was no run-off from winter snows, the dug-outs were empty and there was nothing for the cattle to drink. Water had to be trucked in. If more deep water wells were drilled on the ranches under this program, I am sure it would cost less than it does to hire the trucks to haul water to fill the dug-outs. This is a very important program under the PFRA that should be going forward.

Another program for the distribution of seedlings and trees is operating very well. There is an irrigation demonstration facility at Outlook, Saskatchewan. The minister of agriculture in Alberta told me that irrigation is the solution, as the waters from the mountains flow, even under drought conditions.

The Alberta Heritage Trust Fund is often criticized but it is a pool of money that could be used for these programs, and $8.25 million has been set aside this year for irrigation headworks improvements, and $31.26 million for the expansion of the irrigation district. That is very welcome not only to the farmers of Alberta but to the farmers of western Canada because alfalfa production in those irrigation lands can be used for alfalfa pellets and hay.

We are concerned about the province of Saskatchewan. The Diefenbaker Dam which was established for water resource management and hydroelectric development has run dry in the east ditch, and the Saskatchewan government has not brought forward plans for irrigation. That ditch should have been filled and put into use four or five years ago in order that the conditions we face today could be met. It is very important that more irrigation be planned for western Canada.

The third part of the PFRA program was to investigate plans, designs, and to be responsible for construction and maintenance of various works pertaining to water development, irrigation, and community infrastructure programs. This is more of a long-term planning procedure.

The last part of the PFRA program concerned administration, to provide for the internal management and programs related services for PFRA.

I think we can learn a lot from history, Mr. Speaker. That is where we find the best examples that members of Parliament and people in the committee of an earlier time felt had to be worked out. They have provided the exampies for us. Surely we should continue with that excellent program, fostered by modren technology where possible. We could use some of the other scientific inventions such as plant breeding tools for such things as more drought resistant crops and poplar trees.

In summation, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a statement by the director of PFRA, Mr. Hill, contained in the 1977 annual report, as follows:

PFRA was uniquely able to render immediate aid to drought-threatened areas and was successful in administering relief programs in co-operation with provincial governments and other federal agencies. Valuable information obtained during the course of these activities led to the conclusion that the consequences of severe drought, which have occurred at random throughout the region, are not understood in terms of our present-day society, with its increasing water consumption and diversifying economic base.

The director tells us in this annual report that modern society has forgotten what it was like to live through seven, eight or nine years without rain and without snow in winter. We have now developed a society capable of wasting water day after day. Many of our farmers have not listened to their forefathers and are not using the techniques necessary for them to exist under dry land conditions. The government should take a lesson from what the director stated in this annual report given just after 1977 when there were sporadic drought conditions on the prairies.

I should like to turn now to a private member's motion which I introduced regarding the income averaging trust account. This is most important to the ranchers of my region and I am sure to ranchers of other regions which are similar. Sometimes they are compelled to sell their livestock because they cannot feed them. They then have money and no use for it, but find that one-quarter or one-third of it has to be paid in income tax—with which we all agree, of course. Surely we could bring forward a program to assist farmers at such times. In my motion which I put forward in February, 1979, I set out eight ways of doing that. The ideas are there. I would recommend that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) look at these ideas. They are not just mine; most of them come from Peat Marwick Mitchell & Co. in a study prepared for the Department of Agriculture. These ideas could be used to set up a program and there would be no difficulty getting it past this side of the House, Mr. Speaker. I think it is essential that farmers be allowed this tool.

• (1530)

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to speak on the motion before the House.

That this House deeply regrets the government lack of response in this House of Commons to concern about the disastrous western agricultural drought and also the related forest fire emergency, and calls on the government to abandon its secretive approach and consult with members of Parliament of all parties in an open and in a forthright manner.

The farmers of the three prairie provinces are presently facing a very serious situation with possible consequences which could create economic havoc on a scale that has not been witnessed since the dust bowl days of 1930. While the majority of citizens in some of these provinces may be basking in the unseasonably hot weather, the farmer certainly is not. The livelihood of a number of producers is threatened, as well as the various businesses that service and process the farmers' goods.

A few areas in my own riding of Dauphin, such as Dauphin and McCreary, have received some rain within this last week, but other areas such as Roblin and Swan River are in desperate need of precipitation. In fact the majority of the provinces 30,000 farmers are worried that the drought may ruin their 1980 crops. There is widespread fear that the rye crop is already lost, for example. The Winkler weekly report states "—that emerged crop is turning yellow and may need to be reseeded". Certainly the situation is desperate in many places in the west.

We welcome, with appreciation, the department's reactivation of the 1977 drought task force. However, much more needs to be done. It is true, as has been mentioned, that there are certain programs in place that might be able to reduce the impact of whatever kind of weather conditions we have in the west, such as the crop insurance which covers some loss of crops. Also there is some protection under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. However, we would urge that the government act quickly in signing agreements, especially with the affected prairie provinces supporting drought assistance programs. We are reminded that Saskatchewan has submitted at least a ten point proposal for a drought assistance program which would be cost-shared between the province and the federal government. We would want action taken on programs like that, and similarly that action would be taken for Manitoba and other areas.

I want to draw attention to what I consider to be six areas needing examination. There are six objectives that we should have when we look at the drought and related forest fire situation on the prairie provinces.

The first area that I wish to address is the area of feed and water supply assistance. One of our major objectives must be that we maintain the livestock herds in the west. There have been reports of some increase in the slaughtering of animals, and we would not want the slaughtering to affect the foundation herds. We must make sure, therefore, that we have a secure supply of feed even if it means that the feed must be brought from Ontario, or whether such things as feed pellets must be brought in from Thunder Bay. The foundation cow herds, the breeding stock, must be maintained, otherwise shortages of beef will occur along with a major disruption in the livestock industry in the future. Likewise, dairy herds must be protected.

To achieve this objective and to make sure that there is maintenance of livestock herds, we must take a look to see if there are some Crown lands available for emergency hay and pasture use. We would suggest also that perhaps there is some land which is under the auspices, at this stage, of the Wildlife Association of Canada, which should be examined. We should also make sure that there is an adequate feed supply for livestock in the area.

Similarly, when we take a look at some of the needs that we have in the west, I think we would want to see that the western livestock producer is treated in much the same way as the eastern livestock producer. In the east there is a domestic feed grain policy that guarantees supply to meet domestic needs. We would also want to ensure that something like that is true for the west. There should be a halt to export sales commitments of feed grains until we can be positive that there are adequate stocks on hand for the needs in the areas that might be affected by the drought.

There should be some direction given to the grain transportation authority to halt the allocation of cars to the movement of non-board feed grains from the prairies so that the needs of the drought-stricken areas might be met.

Perhaps there could also be a return of certain pelletized screenings from Thunder Bay or Vancouver that are in excess to our export commitments to make sure that the farmers in the west are able to supply their cattle with the necessary feed.

In connection with reaching the objective of maintaining our livestock herds, the other area I wanted to talk about is that of the provision of water. True, there is some assistance through the PFRA programs that already exist, but we may need to look at the need for irrigation of hay crop areas where there is such a feasibility, and also perhaps to take a good look at grants that might be available to farmers to assist them in developing water supplies that would be necessary to reach the objective that I have stated.

The second area I wanted to look at, in addition to the feed and water assistance areas that I have mentioned, is the whole area of transportation and storage assistance. There should be some sort of policy there to make sure that, where necessary, the assistance is provided for the transportation of hay or feed grains to the required areas. In addition, through the hauling of feed there might be a necessity for moving cattle to alternative accommodation, moving cattle to pastures. Likewise, there is a major need for assistance for the farmers so they can be sure their cattle are provided for.

In the area of storage, the hon. member for Humboldt Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse), in his letter to the minister, mentioned that pending the outcome of the crop the federal government should implement a program for storing feed grains and forage in the prairie region in order to reduce the sell off of basic livestock herds. This is certainly critical to make sure that we are able to maintain the livestock herds in the west and to ensure that feedstocks will be available in the coming fall and winter. We want to make sure we protect our feed supplies now so that enough grain will be available to carry us through the upcoming winter.

The third area that we ought to look at with respect to the drought situation in the west is the necessity to alleviate the many problems that are faced by farmers. Basically I am looking at two areas when I look at the financial difficulties with which farmers are faced in the west. First is the area of income, and then comes the area of credit.

On the income side of the problem, we would want to see an initial price for wheat being kept at $4.25. The initial price as proposed for the wheat board grains for the 1980-81 crop year should be increased to the current level rather than dropped to $3.75. We want to make sure that we would discourage any selling off of grain before the end of July when this grain could more properly be held for feed and also for seed.

The federal government should also ensure that there is a final payment which is equal to the pre-embargo levels. Also, in the ara of stabilizing income we have always urged the implementation of national marketing systems for beef and hogs and for an expanded role for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is essential for the federal government to implement a stabilization plan for farm commodities which would reflect the net farm costs, because this whole area of income is definitely one of the problems and financial difficulties that farmers are facing in the west.

I also said that there is the whole area of credit, or the necessity for additional money. Many producers went into this drought faced with a heavy short-term debt load. There was a reduction in their cash flow. A potential crop failure could force many of them into bankruptcy. For this reason, the suggestions on extending credit amounts and guaranteeing the interest rates at minimal levels are a very necessary and integral rates at minimal levels are a very necessary and integal part of any program of drought relief. The federal government should set up some sort of emergency fund, perhaps through the Farm Credit Corporation, to allow for the transfer of short-term operating credit to longer-term loans at guaranteed low interest rates so that the necessary interim financing could be there for those farmers who require it until the drought it over.

In this whole area of credit or money problems, there is also a need for individual moratoriums of farm debts. This likewise should be looked into by the Farm Credit Corporation. I am speaking on a moratorium on interest under such circumstances as might be requested by the federal government.

Another aspect that is of concern to us in the Dauphin constituency is that in the long run farmers do not start losing their land due to the non-payment of property taxes. There might be some need for assistance in this area as well when we look at the financial difficulties that would be facing the farmers.

Another area we want to look at, in addition to the third area of the money problems that I mentioned that farmers are faced with and that must be addressed in any sort of drought relief program, is the matter of providing information to farmers. Whatever types of programs are announced next week, we want to make sure that the farmers are aware of the programs, what exists, and what would be required for them. There definitely has to be some sort of co-ordination of information regarding the supplies and pastures that might be available for farmers experiencing feed shortages as drought conditions continue in the area. There needs to be some sort of monitoring of feed supplies and shortages, and certainly some sort of co-ordination with regard to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration and other feed and pasture supplies.

There would be a need for information packages being provided to the farmers so that they would understand the types of programs that are available. For example, the Saskatchewan government has suggested that there is an immediate need for implementation of a fodder and feed grain listing service whereby farmers would be asked to list seed oats so that any available supplies may be used for seeding in June or July to provide green feed. This type of information service would be essential for any sort of successful program to cope with the very serious drought conditions that exist in the west.

I wish to spend a minute on the fire situation. In my constituency of Dauphin we have been living either in or adjacent to the fire problems on several fronts. On the northern side we have the Porcupine Mountains which have been affected by fire. This created a lot of fear among many of the residents there simply because in some cases they were forced to anticipate evacuation. Fortunately places like National Mills did not have to evacuate, but the situation indicated there was certainly a lack of response, especially in terms of the federal government.

When we think of the situation at Riding Mountain and Porcupine Mountain and the fire hazards created there, there was certainly no initiative on the part of the federal government to ensure that the required facilities and necessary arrangements were in place to deal with these fires, especially considering that there were American firefighting authorities who had been prepared to co-operate in battling and suppressing forest fires in areas such as Manitoba. The problem that these fires created underlines the need for acting more efficiently, and ensuring that in situations like this there is more of an input from members of Parliament who represent the area.

This leads me to the sixth point I want to mention dealing with any kind of drought program to be brought forward. This is the whole matter of consultation with members of Parliament. The government stated that it was prepared to work with members of Parliament. I have not had any contacts by the government with regard to the problems that might be faced in this whole drought and forest fire situation.

An indication of the lack of being able to deal with this problem is indicated in the announcement made this morning in Winnipeg with regard to the drought situation. This morning the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), and the Manitoba government signed an agreement. However, when you look at the impact this will have on the drought situation, there is only one sentence which suggests that some of the agreements as the apply to DREE might be implemented to deal with the drought situation. The whole problem of the drought appears to be merely an afterthought, as indicated by the type of agreement signed this morning.

Considering the pledge of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to work with the members of Parliament in the area, and considering the fact the government does not have representation in the west, I urge the government to ensure that there is a greater degree of consultation with members of Parliament so that, when faced with problems such as the drought situation and related forest fires, we can act expediently, effectively, and in such a way that will indicate to the people of the area that we are interested in their concerns and are prepared to deal with the problems they face.

I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to express on behalf of my constituents our concern for the entire drought problem. I trust that the six points I mentioned in terms of implementing any programs relating to the drought will be taken into consideration so that we can be assured we will not face the prospects faced in years long gone by, but rather that the problems will be dealt with effectively.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate as a farmer. Although I am from a different area of Canada than those which are so badly affected by this drought, I wish to place on record my concern for the people of western Canada, those in northern Ontario and other areas of the north where forest fires are a factor at the present time. In particular, my concern is for the cattlemen in the drylands and ranch areas of western Canada. I understand their problems because I, too, keep a herd of cattle. I am well aware of the reproductive cycle in the beef industry, from the time a heifer calf is born until that calf reaches maturity, conceives, and produces an offspring that grows to market weight. We are speaking here of a time frame of approximately three and a half years. I am well aware of what will happen if our beef herds are depleted, and the ensuing hardships that will be placed not only on our ranchers but on our economy in general. It is imperative that we keep our herd intact, and we must work for that protection in every manner possible.

I am concerned to about the grain farmers who face hardships, and those farmers in eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces who may not have adequate supplies of feed grains next winter and, therefore, may have to cut back their livestock and poultry operations.

I well remember the drought of the early thirties that did extend into parts of Ontario and, more recently, the one in 1977 which existed to a lesser degree, particularly in the United States, in the State of Michigan which is not far from my riding, where a disaster did take place in terms of drought conditions at that time. I believe the type of help available today in Canada in situations like this is far superior to anything they have in the nation to the south of us.

I indicated in committee yesterday that with respect to the area in which my family farm lies, in Lambton-Middlesex, we are in a narrow belt of land which does not receive the rainfall other farmers get just a few miles away. By a quirk of nature the storms and the rains seem to follow the Great Lakes. We happen to be in that area.

I phoned home today at lunch time. We finished planting our soya beans today. We have an excellent stand of corn and prospects to date are excellent. But conditions can change very, very rapidly. The weather patterns in our area appear to follow the lakes as I said, and the fact that we have to rely on moisture for our crops to sustain continued growth in our grain, our corn, soya beans and pastures, means we need to have some form of a contingency reserve of forage on hand. We always do this, but when we are planting our crops, too, we try to preserve the moisture in the subsoil reserve in the event that the normal rain does not materialize. Mr. Speaker, we fully realize the serious situation existing, particularly in B.C., Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and northern Ontario.

We look back in history. Drought is not new. There is a book, of course, which tells us of the wise ruler centuries ago who set aside grain reserves against a seven-year drought. But here in modern society perhaps it is time that we, too, examined the possibility of establishing food reserves of non-perishable products. We seem to have forgotten that history is a good teacher.

I fully agree with the hon. members from Medicine Hat and Prince Albert, who spoke first in this debate, that the situation is critical. The next few weeks will be indicative of the type of help needed. In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, these conditions did not just arrive over night. We all here should have recognized that the lack of snowfall last winter—much below normal—would result in dry land conditions to a greater degree than is normal. Perhaps we waited too long in the expectation of Mother Nature sending us the moisture required for bountiful crops, and it is obvious that in this regard we are all perhaps somewhat guilty. But as farmers, we are all optimists. We have to be, or we would not be involved in our sector of the economy. Yet, as optimists, we have to think back, too, to where it is written some place:

He who watches the clouds neither reaps nor sows

We have to be optimists. When we are engaged in that part of the economy, which is the greatest profession on earth, I trust that we can keep in mind the human suffering involved, the needs which must be met, and move in that direction to deal with the situations of distress as they develop, as the weather patterns unfold. At the present time the livestock industry is in distress and this alone is of real importance and of concern to all of us in Canada, regardless of whether we live in the east or the west. I agree that we must work together with all Canadians in an attempt to resolve these problems, and may I suggest the necessity of examining the feasibility of using some of our existing legislation to ensure that alfafa cubes and pellets are kept here in Canada. The legislation I refer to is the Export and Import Permits Act which was originally intended to be used in times of emergency.

We should make every effort to see that essential grains and screenings are kept in close proximity to the stricken areas, and that all forms of usable roughage feed be kept in western Canada. I fully realize that moving roughage from Ontario to the west is cost-prohibitive, but in emergency situations such as we face at the present time we must consider all possibilities. Every year there are countless numbers of trucks and cattle cars bringing cattle from western ranches to Ontario feed lots—we bring them in by the thousands—and I would like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin): do these trucks and rail cars go empty one way, or do they have a back haul? If there is no back haul, would it be possible to move some roughage on these empty units going west?

I know that every year there are thousands of tons of clover and corn stover ploughed under, put back into the soil of Ontario farmers. There are thousands of tons of corn stover; in my area many farmers winter their cattle on corn stover alone, with no other additives than the protein additives and other nutrients. Could we examine this possibility rather than face the depletion of a vast portion of our national beef herd if conditions don't improve? I fully realize that at first glance, moving roughage seems quite illogical, but we must not leave any stone unturned in our effort to give help to our fellow Canadians.

To turn to another area, could we not examine the availability of irrigation equipment? Could such equipment not be sent out to those areas of western Canada where specialized crops are grown and where water is available? I fully realize that this is no help to the ranch areas or the grain-growing areas, but I refer to those areas where they grow vegetables and other specialized crops.

I remember that several years ago the farmers of western Canada were unable to harvest their grain crops due to wet weather. But during the late autumn the grain combines were able to go on the fields and a large number of grain dryers were sent out to help dry the grain so that it could be stored safely and used as food and as livestock feed. Again I want to assure my western colleagues that we are willing to assist the western farmers in this time of need. We sometimes feel quite helpless in situations such as this when, through no fault of the farmers or the governments at all levels, a national disaster occurs such as a drought, or maybe a flood, or an earthquake, or hurricane, to name but a few. We should remember that a drought situation is one which does not normally result in the loss of human life in North America, and for this we can be thankful. But we must realize the economic loss, the hardship and human suffering which will result from this natural disaster.

I have family relations across western Canada. Many of them are farmers and I well remember when I was young, before I went to school, going to Sunday school, and even though we ourselves were in a depression, bales of clothing were collected and Christmas presents were sent to help those in need. Again, I remember the disastrous drought which occurred here in the Ottawa Valley less than ten years ago. The governments helped those farmers through their times of need, and when I came into the airport here this morning I could not but help notice the contrast between the lush green valley here around the capital city and the parched fields I saw last week around Winnipeg. Certainly, as a farmer and as a member of this House, I am concerned and willing to help. I believe there have been several worthy suggestions made in the debate today. The statement by the Minister of Transport, the announcement of the task force, the discussion indicated for next week, have convinced me that the situation is being monitored closely—perhaps even more closely than some of us realize.

I indicated earlier that farmers the world over are always optimists. Perhaps no other segment of society has to deal more closely with the elements. We hope and trust this spirit continues and that other segments of our society and all levels of government will work together to provide the assistance for Canadians so seriously affected by this quirk of Mother Nature's.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, food is the first essential of human life. The magnitude of the problems can affect each and every Canadian if these conditions continue. I urge the co-operation of all parties and the ministers involved in working toward the successful implementation of the programs outlined by the government today in the interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, first let me state my appreciation to the ten hon. members opposite who have waited so patiently and cut short their weekends so that they might sit under the influence of my spellbinding oratory.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to bring a somewhat different perspective to the matter of water supply in western Canada. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) make reference to crop insurance and, inasmuch as we have somme officials of the Department of Agriculture in our midst, I would like to note that I am a great advocate of the crop insurance program. It has been of tremendous value to Canadian farmers coast to coast. I know it inside and out. I was employed by the B.C. ministry of agriculture in the crop insurance branch for more than ten years prior to coming to play this role. I do not know of another country in the world which has a better program. Few, if any, can match its effectiness. Certainly the insurance program offered south of the border cannot compare. Crop insurance effectively minimizes the effect of partial losses which farmers suffer from causes beyond their control, mainly weather-produced losses such as the drought circumstance which we are discussing today.

However, crop insurance does not always capably cope with those disastrous situations in which total crop losses are experienced, and this is particularly true of the tree fruit industry where expenses continue whether crops materialize or are lost. We must be prepared to strengthen the ability of that worthy program to protect against those most damaging losses which are presently in some circumstances subject to unsatisfactory limitations.

Not only do we have a water drought in the west; we also have a Liberal drought, and we have a Liberal government policy drought which ignores important economic and social factors of western aspirations.

Mr. Chénier: Get serious.

Mr. King: I will, my dear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. King: Incredibly, we have a Liberal government and ministers who bleatingly imply that they do not even know their ministerial responsibilities. This strikes absolutely no western confidence in this government's ability to speak for Canada, let alone western Canadians. Under these circumstances, as a western member I say that there can be little hope of constructive talks on whatever subject is envisaged by this government. I am insulted, constituents are insulted, and western Canadians are insulted.

I would like to quote from the Saint John Telegraph Journal of May 15, 1980.

An hon. Member: Saint John?

Mr. King: Saint John, right. "Nothing too good for one region; nothing bad enough for the other. Hate for one. Love for the other. The basic Liberal strategy—win Ontario, Quebec could safely be taken for granted, and forget the rest".

To assume this same strategy in pre-constitutional meeting posturing is cynical politics indeed and a cynical approach. The Saint John Telegraph-Journal goes on to say that through the national treasury, the dominating politicians of central Canada, with grants, subsidies, handouts, and everything but honest and fair treatment, have encouraged the development of a "psychology of dependency". This concentration of power—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to point out to the hon. member who is speaking now that he is quoting a very poor authority when he quotes the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John. It is the largest daily paper in New Brunswick. It and all four other daily papers in New Brunswick are owned by the same outfit, and they have not deemed Ottawa important enough to send a reporter to Parliament Hill, so they do not know what they are talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: That was a valuable interjection.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this approach to the real problems of this potentially great country is attempting to hide the real drought of constructive policy of this administration. This is not the way to win the west. It is not the way to attack the problem which is under discussion today.

The drought situation now being experienced in the three prairie provinces and throughout northern Ontario has been well depicted through media attention and in this House by hon. members whose constituents are in the centre of that impending disastrous situation. It is not my intention to add further elaboration to that circumstance, particularly inasmuch as my closest proximity to the area most affected has been at 37,000 feet.

I do, however, have more than a passing concern for those farmers and citizens of the provinces affected. I too have a background in agriculture.

Mr. Pepin: It doesn't show.

Mr. King: I have an emotional as well as a practical attachment to the land. I was raised on a fruit farm.

Mr. Chénier: Is that why you called me "my dear"?

Mr. King: If I was not here as a member of Parliament, I would be in Kaleden working my orchard. Although I lived then, as I do now, in the Okanagan, I remember all too well the great drought years of the 1930s. I recall the influx of prairie folk into B.C. seeking relief from the drought, the dust, and the unemployment-induced poverty. Many of my neighbours, friends and in-laws came to the Okanagan under those circumstances. What is it that encouraged the exodus westward? What is it that brought the influx into the Okanagan? Certainly those caught up in the prairie drought, the tumbling tumbleweeds and the moving landscape, did not come to the Okanagan seeking refreshing rains. The Okanagan, in reality, has desert characteristics. There is less than ten inches of average precipitation annually.

Mr. Chénier: It has some effect on you.

Mr. King: I thank my friend. Agriculture is possible in the southern interior of B.C. only because the pioneers of that area—my father included—saw the possibilities and took the opportunities presented to them. As a result, the first efforts of these pioneer developers were to produce facilities such as dams, weirs and diversions to store and to husband that most precious commodity on which our civilization hangs. Thus we find originally a system of earth dams with distribution of water by open ditches, completed at minimal cost with human and horse powered effort, often on a volunteer basis—the human part, I mean. Effective in their day, these simple works have been gradually superseded by increasingly more complex and constly systems adapting to the technology which became available, as science and ingenuity brought us advantage and efficiencies in construction and equipment.

In my remarks to the House on May 16 respecting the farm improvement loans bill I made mention of some of the government initiatives which have been of particular value to agriculture in British Columbia. One of those initiatives which has transformed the face of the southern interior of B.C. has been the joint federal-provincial program commonly called ARDA. Without the assistance available from the ARDA program, my own community of Kaleden would be totally different both in appearance and in optimistic outlook, and so too would most of the southern interior of B.C. I well recall days in my youth when water was in short summer supply because of limited winter snowpack in the surrounding hills which provided a too short period of runoff. I recollect water rationing measures which affected fruit production and farmers' incomes from the orchards of that area. So I speak on this subject with considerable empathy with those agriculturists now suffering in the drought areas of our nation.

We must accept our role as representatives of the people and do everything possible to bring relief to those so affected. We cannot, of course, legislate rain, and therefore I have listened attentively to the speeches presented in this House and in committee by those most familiar with the problems attendant with the drought in the specific areas they represent. Their deep concern is evidenced in the calibre of proposals which they have set before the House.

I trust that hon. members opposite will not be too proud to give adequate attention to the specific suggestions put forward by hon. members on this side whose ridings, constituents, friends and families are in the drought areas and whose concerns reflect a deep awareness of the implications which the drought carries, implications which require an attentive reaction totally free of political strategies.

Let me say something about my own area, something which, at first sight, seems to be a contradiction. The Okanagan-Similkameen area is renowned for the production of tree fruits of incomparable excellence, quality and appearance. This area is now attaining an equal reputation for super grape production, with most of that production destined for the grape crushers of Canada's newest and finest wineries. We have market gardens, ground crops and cattle farms. These verdant agricultural endeavours blossom and flourish in a desert. The natural vegetation on much of the land is bunch grass, sage bush and greasewood.

The agricultural potential of this area depends entirely on the judicious use of water from the limited precipitation in this whole watershed area, for domestic and irrigation purposes. Water shortages threaten communities and individuals in my riding, but there is something that we can do to relieve the situation and perhaps even to eliminate the problem, but the solutions are capital intensive. So we must set our priorities for spending in order.

There should be no more Mirabels, on which over $500 million was spent thus far. It is losing more than $1 million a week. It is so deficient in concept that the airlines are refusing to use it.

Mr. Pepin: Not true.

Mr. King: Mirabel does not even have the merit of fulfilling a need. We read such headlines as "Lonely Mirabel deserted once again." The article goes on to say:

> Another airline is bailing out of sorely underused Mirabel airport, bringing to four the number of defections to date.

The reference is to Scandinavian Air Services. Mirabel is a disaster that was totally unnecessary, a blunder of major proportions perpetrated for reasons about which we can only conjecture.

Mr. Pepin: Keep to the subject.

Mr. King: The point of this reference to Mirabel is to refute emphatically the often stated complaint heard from ministers opposite that members on this side ask the government to cut the size of the national deficit while, at the same time, they ask the same government to spend money on specific programs.

Mr. Pepin: Subject.

Mr. King: This repetious and arrogant argument is, of course, the norm that can be expected from those opposite. We on this side advocate a regime of spending priorities. These federal spending priorities must be set to maximize the benefit to the nation rather than to the Liberal party. I know that this is a radically new concept which would be difficult for hon. members opposite to grasp. But I think that they might even start enjoying the feeling of doing something worthy for their country.

Mr. Pepin: Subject.

Mr. King: They must be warned that the highest priorities should not always be given to moving and establishing departments and agencies of the federal government exclusively to ridings represented by ministers of the Crown. So I am suggesting that a review of priorities would leave room to put tax money to better use without increasing the demands on the taxpayers of Canada.

Having indicated the beneficial transformation made possible in Okanagan-Similkameen through the auspices of the ARDA program of funding assistance, I must point out that the job is not completed.

Individual areas and communities in my riding face their own drought possibilities due to inability to provide independent financing for upgrading. Westbank, a growing, expanding community, is suffering growth pains most evidenced and highlighted by last summer's water shortage which resulted in parched lawns and wilted gardens and even threatened the ability to flush toilets. This local community's drought resulted from design limitation in the water collection facility of the Westbank irrigation district. The water is there, the below-intake delivery system is in place, the engineering is available, the desire and initiative is present to tackle the problem, the action-inhibiting circumstance centres around available funding.

We, as legislators, must priorize the ultimate destiny of the Canadian tax dollar so that the federal government can assume a positive, supportive, financially responsive role in assisting communities such as Westbank and Skaha Estates and Naramata and Midway and Greenwood and Grand Forks and Oliver and Osoyoos, and others, with equal imperatives. We must assist them in the resolution of water-related problems beyond their fiscal abilities—whether these problems be ones of supply or ones of the disposal of domestic waste.

The Skaha Estates improvement district and the Naramata irrigation district are examples of places where rural water systems in the Okanagan Valley are in desperate need of capital funding assistance. The water is available, but the funding for its distribution is not.

One can now sense the real frustration of these once complacent westerners when they consider the vast amounts of taxpayers' funds that are squandered on such projects as the one I mentioned, namely, Mirabel, or the 3 per cent loan to Cuba—that great purveyor of cummunism and communistic effort in our hemisphere and in Africa—some of the undisciplined CIDA projects, and yes, even the $258,000 advertising program after the fact telling Canadians what a great job this government had done in choosing a fighter aircraft. "A good deal for all of us in Ontario" said the ads in Ontario. In Quebec they said "For the Quebeckers in particular." In the west they said "A Good deal for all Canadians." Imagine that this advertisement ran two times in the Pentiction area. What was its purpose? Pentiction has many things going for it, but an aerospace centre it is not.

So again I must press for priorities to be assigned. Surely the over one quarter million dollars could have been better spent on the acquisition of works to provide vital potable water in a community where disaster threatens in the form of limited supply. No wonder Canadians are becoming cynical about their government, this government opposite which continually pleads poverty but acts as an irresponsible spendthrift.

I think hon. members opposite should take on the task of explaining Mirabel, of explaining the recent one quarter million dollar advertising and breast beating about the F-18, explaining to the people of Canada the government's recent movement of facilities to cabinet ministers' ridings, moves which are costing Canadian taxpayers millions of unnecessary dollars. Hon. members opposite should take on the task of explaining their priorities to Canadians.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, explain.

Mr. Evans: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The challenge was thrown to explain priorities, but I should like to challenge the hon. member to explain how the particular set of subject matters he has just been relating for 15 minutes has anything to do with the drought problem in the prairies of western Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has almost expired. He has about 30 seconds in which to comment.

Mr. King: I think I should take the time to say that I understand the topic to be the drought in western Canada, and British Columbia has been mentioned. I come from British Columbia and I have explained my situation.

Mr. Evans: Look at the motion.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He did.

Mr. Pepin: Explain.

An hon. Member: He does not understand it.

Mr. Pepin: It is the coming of the second drought.

Mr. King: I appreciate the interjections. The people at home understand the implications of a lack of water supply. You may not understand it as it applies to the Okanagan Valley. I do, and the people out there understand it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave). If there is one individual in the House of Commons who understands the drought conditions in western Canada, surely it is the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Because of his personal knowledge and the basis of his livelihood, he has firsthand experience in this area. One could not help but be moved when one heard the presentation he gave earlier. He shared with us the situation which existed in the 1930s and the possibilities of it developing again now.

In participating in this debate I should indicate that I am somewhat amazed by the participation of the member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) who supposedly is the twin of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). Rather than rising in his spot for a two-minute interjection, I thought he would be more concerned about the constituencies with which he is concerned and would participate in the debate himself. In the six years that I have been here, I think the hon. member has made more speeches from the seat of his chair than he has from his feet.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am a little bit surprised that the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) either cannot read or cannot understand what be reads. Certainly I am not twinned with the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), God forbid. I am twinned with the Liberal riding association in Calgary Centre, of which I am very proud. I do not pretend nor ever have pretended to be a spokesman for the west.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How I speak in the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, I do not think the hon. member is making a point of order; it is a point of debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You can raise it as a question of privilege on Monday.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) has not established a point of order to this point.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I shall, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why didn't you do it the first time?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pembina reflected on my ability to represent my constituency.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Indeed he has. He has reflected upon my ability as a representative in this House of constituents who elected me, by saying that I had made more speeches from my seat than from my feet. I speak from my feet when I have something of importance to say in the House, I argue across the floor from time to time as do hon. members opposite all the time. The hon. member has no right to reflect upon the representative abilities of other members in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair hopes with this exchange the hon. member will be able to continue his speech.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rather enjoyed this exchange because I had never heard anyone put on record exactly what the obligations are of the various members who are twinned with constituency associations or whatever. I am surprised the hon. member would associate himself with such a group of losers because it is obvious that is exactly what he is, and he is exemplifying his own position by rising to protect it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair invites the hon. member to speak to the motion.

Mr. Elzinga: In speaking to the motion and the release put out by prairie members of Parliament in regard to the drastic drought condition, we have stated a number of options we would like to see the Liberal government follow. One such option is that the Department of Finance should bring in income averaging. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) on a number of occasions brought this proposal before the House of Commons. I should like to refer his speech of on February 26, 1979, in which he referred to a study that was done by Peat Marwick and Partners for the Alberta department of agriculture entitled "Feasibility of an Income Averaging Trust Account". The objective of this plan was that farmers would deposit a portion of their income during high revenue and withdraw funds in lower income years. This would give the farming population faced with such conditions as the current one an opportunity to equalize their incomes.

During the short period of time that my party was in government, we brought forward a number of positive proposals as they pertain to the agricultural sector in Canada. We laid them before the House of Commons, or were in the process of laying them before the House of Commons. Even though they do not affect directly the drought situation as it exits in western Canada, they affect the agricultural sector throughout Canada.

I wish to review some of those positive proposals. The reason I do so is to compare them with the action, or I should say inaction of the present Liberal administration regarding the very serious drought situation as it exists especially in Saskatchewan. In our budget which the other parties saw fit to defeat, we included significant capital gains relief for the farming sector. We promised that during the election campaign, and we delivered on that commitment when we were the government. We promised to make the salaries paid to spouses of farmers deductible for income tax purposes. I was encouraged to see in the so-called mini-budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that he included such a provision in his economic statement.

Also we promised a meat import law. The hon. member for Medicine Hat had been working on that when he was parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture. He had it ready for presentation to the House of Commons. It is my understanding, at least from the commitments we have to date from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), that he is thinking of introducing a meat import law of his own. It remains to be seen whether he will do it or not, because this has been promised in the past.

We came forward with positive proposals. In regard to the drought situation, the hon. member for Medicine Hat who has spoken on this on several occasions in the House of Commons again has come forward with a plan of action which we would like to see the government adopt. When we read some press stories about what the government will do in regard to the drought situation, it is obvious their concern is only with the appearance of it rather than with exactly what they will do. I should like to quote from the Regina Leader-Post of May 27, 1980, the article entitled "Cabinet told to look good even if it can't really help", which reads as follows:

> Draft proposals prepared for the federal cabinet on the drought in western Canada have warned that even if the federal government cannot do much to alleviate the impact of the drought, it must appear to be responding to the situation.

We do believe that is good enough. We would like to see some positive action as was outlined by my colleagues who spoke before me. I am referring to positive action not only in regard to the drought situation, but also in regard to the difficulties western agriculture is facing in totality. If the example we were given yesterday in question period by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is the type of action that the government is taking, obviously once again the western Canadian farmer will be left wanting.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I must say that in our corner of Saskatchewan we are all saddened by the very tragic road accident that happened a couple of days ago in which some 22 young workers were killed. Certainly my condolences go out to the friends and relatives of the victims. Also I should like to pay tribute to the authorities in Swift Current and district, particularly the medical staff involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): We would like to see Swift Current put on the map, but not through such terrible headlines.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) suggested that the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) wanted to reduce the breeding herds. This is not correct. What he was suggesting was absolutely the opposite, that is, to protect the breeding herds through our taxing system with an income averaging trust account so that cattlemen could run their own stabilization plan. This is something we have called for many times over the last few years.

It is the cyclical weather swings, among other things, that give rise to the ups and downs of our agricultural income, that make us look first to our provincial and municipal governments for immediate assistance. As a result of this it makes us in western Canada particularly jealous of our natural resources. We see them as the only possibility of making our provinces financially strong enough to ride out the inevitable downswings and catastrophes that face agriculture, Saskatchewan's basic industry.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated that he got 1.3 per cent of the federal budget, and appealed for help in having it increased. I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words about the importance of agriculture, not only to our nation but to the world, and about why it is so important to keep it viable, giving producers confidence to face the futre, most especially the young people who will be entering agriculture.

Our good friends to the south are way ahead of us in the way they are placing great stress on scientific agriculture. Agricultural colleges in the United States are now filled with the brightest young students. There is some excitement about agriculture down there which we do not have in Canada. I am sure the Americans have made the decision, looking ahead, that as they run down their natural resources, high technology and their ability to produce food will be the two great strengths of that nation.

I would like to look ahead one generation to the year 2000. The trouble with looking ahead is, of course, that it seems to be so distant and so far away; we can hardly imagine it. However, if we look back one generation, 1960 is the same distance back as the year 2000 is ahead, but it only seems like yesterday. What did we have one generation ago? We had gold selling for $37 an ounce and wheat selling to the Russians and Chinese at $2.60 per bushel. Now gold is $500 an ounce and wheat is selling at about $6 a bushel. As one of my colleagues said sometime ago, during the last generation we enjoyed cheap energy, cheap money, and cheap food. Now as we enter the eighties we see that cheap energy has gone, cheap money has gone, and I suspect that the era of cheap food will be the next to go. Two of the three have already gone.

Let us take a look at the importance of agriculture to Canada and the world in the area of security and co-operation. Surely it was agricultural deeds, the ability to produce food and move it commercially around the world, that opened up the links between the eastern and western worlds. I can think of the exchanges that followed, technical, economic and cultural, and I am sure this has been the greatest influence on security and co-operation that our world has seen in the last 20 years.

If we look ahead one generation the experts say world population will be up by 50 per cent. That means there will be six billion souls in the world. Arable land will decrease by 25 million acres, and for the first time agriculture will not be devoting its resources to producing food, but more and more to producing fuel. We will find food production competing with energy, with all the inputs required. This year alone Brazil will be planting more acres to sugar cane for alcohol production than the total world planting of sugar cane five years ago. We also must give some thought to the moral implications of this food versus fuel situation.

At the very local level, much as I admire PFRA, they seem more concerned right now in southwestern Saskatchewan about moving some cottage owners off a small dam, Duncairn Dam, than they are in working toward a solution of our water problems. As a first step I suggest once again that the minister give consideration to putting PFRA back into agriculture where it belongs.

In the southwest corner of Saskatchewan we have a tremendous aquifer. So far there is only one well drilled down to it. This requires drilling about 1,400 feet and is very expensive, $40,000 a well. We have only one. Surely some work could be done on this resource.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) spoke about the farmer taking a chance, going ahead and seeding in spite of high interest, lack of moisture and low prices for his products. I think this attitude of farmers can be summed up in the one word "craft", which to me is a combination of skill and cunning. It is something that no government will ever really understand.

It is my understanding that the flood damage compensation from last year's Manitoba floods has still not been paid out. Surely we must have faster action than that. Compensation should now be in the process of being paid out for the flood of people to Winnipeg and other cities as a result of the move from the forest fire regions. There should be federal contribution to forest fire labour expenditures, and it should be immediate. Once again, immediate steps should be taken to protect our breeding herds for the livestock industry. We must have some long-range planning to protect our most important industry in Canada, agriculture, for its contribution to our nation's well being and to others will be one of our greatest assets in the years to come. I urge the minister to do everything he can to expedite some fast action in this regard.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) wanted to say a few words, but I will be very brief. I will take just a few moments to indicate my concern as well about the drought situation on the prairies, and the concern that has been expressed to me by a number of people in the last few weeks.

I concur in what other western members are saying, and that is that the federal government must act as quickly as possible, and must do all that is possible to alleviate the situation facing our people.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) pointed out the importance of food and agriculture in our economy and in the world. I want to concur with that, and to say that if we have to budget a few extra dollars now to help compensate farmers for the losses they are sustaining, by deferring payments on Farm Credit Corporation loans and the like, then that is a worth-while investment, because these farmers will need that money to maintain their operations, and the production of food is the most important thing that human beings can accomplish. We have a lot of people in this world, and if we do not produce food there will be more and more starvation.

I do not think most members of this House realize that Canada, according to the federal Department of Agriculture, is a net importer of food already, to the tune of $2 billion. If we include oilseeds and grains, according to the Science Council of Canada, by the year 2000 we will still be a net importer of food. This is a fact about a country with a small population, with a skilled work force, and with all the scientific and technical knowledge at our disposal. Still we will not be able to feed ourselves. It is important when we get into a crisis like this that we are willing to invest a few extra bucks to make sure the farmers stay on the land, that they do not sustain losses, that they are helped in the national cause and in the national interest. I believe that to be a very, very important thing, indeed.

Many things can be done in the immediate sense and I have already mentioned a moratorium on loans. I mentioned assistance to get feed out to the prairies for livestock—the federal government could provide money for that—and assistance to farmers to find more water through dug-outs and wells and things of that nature. These are all very important. This is a real crisis, and that must be emphasized as vigorously as possible.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) mentioned how very unfortunate it is that the people who drafted the cabinet memo said that even if the government could not do much, it must appear to be responding to the situation for political reasons. That made a headline on the front page of the Leader-Post—"Cabinet Told to Look Good even if it Cannot really Help". Maybe the advisers got careless when writing to memo. Maybe it should not be leaked, but I do not think memos of that sort should even be written. They just increase the feeling of alienation and cynicism in the country that once again it is "they" in Ottawa who are trying to do a snow job, that they are up to their old trickery and up to no good once again. It just reinforces that kind of feeling. I hope the government will learn from his experience. Even if Ministers feel that way they should not put it in writing. I hope that they do not feel they have to do things for the sake of appearance and just put on all the cosmetics in order to look better. I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) can look well if he puts him mind into gear, without all the cosmetics.

These are the things that I am concerned about, that we do what we can to protect the agricultural industry. Farming is our No. 1 industry. It produces a lot of jobs in itself, and also in food processing and transportation. There is also the problem of feeding the world's people.

We have a lot of problems in the west that make farmers very angry and upset. One is the question of the grain boycott. Just the other day the hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out that despite the fact there is a boycott on grain in the world, the Russians are purchasing as much grain now as they did before the boycott. That makes our people very angry. The Argentinians, for example, have tripled their sales of grain to the Soviet Union. Spain is shipping some of its grain to the Soviet Union and buying cheaper grain from the United States where the market is depressed, thus making a profit on the grain they have in storage.

Some companies are shipping grain mysteriously to the Soviet Union. Once ships get out to the centre of the ocean they mysteriously change direction and their cargoes end up in Poland, Romania, and other countries. The Soviet Union ends up buying as much grain as it did before the Carter boycott, although perhaps at a higher price. The price of grain in Canada and the United States has gone down and the farmer suffers.

Just today the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) asked questions about lay-offs in the farm machinery industry involving 5,000 workers. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) replied that people are buying fewer tractors, combines and farm machinery. This is because their income is not as good. The grain boycott affects them, the drought will affect them, and high interest rates affect them. All these things add up, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pepin: We had a record export this year.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, we have good exports but the price has fallen. When the cost of production goes up and the price falls, even though the exports increase it does not mean the net income of the farmer increases. The farmer is caught in a cost-price squeeze and that is one of the reasons he is buying less farm machinery. The consequence is lay-offs in Brantford and other farm machinery plants in Canada and North America. The only way of putting those workers back to work is to improve the farm economy.

These are several of the problems we face on the prairies. I am not going into them in detail. One way to alleviate them is to try to get extra money from Treasury Board to be spent on helping farmers in need through moratoriums on loans, helping them find more water supplies, feed supplies for cattle to make sure that the basic herds are not sold off and that some marginal farmers are not forced off the land. All this may cost a little more in the short run, Mr. Speaker. I suggest it would be a good investment in the long run, however, to protect the farmers and people of this country, our No. 1 industry and the most important commodity in the world, food.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in participating in this debate which has been an excellent one. There have been good speeches and excellent contributions by members from all sides of the House. I should like to commend the government on its conciliatory approach to this very urgent and pressing problem. It is a very serious problem and one for which the government must take a great deal of responsibility. Clearly the federal and the provincial governments of the day have a heavy responsibility to ensure that the viability of our basic industry, agriculture, is preserved. There were excellent presentations by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski).

It is quite clear that the most pressing problem at the moment is that of the cattle industry. You have been in this House a number of years, Mr. Speaker, and you have heard of the various problems associated with the cattle industry as a result of depressed prices and situations such as the present drought. One wonders just how many blows this important industry can survive. It has undergone a number of setbacks.

The fact that the cattle producers of this country are very resilient and enterprising is a tribute to them and the fact that they have been able to survive.

The government must respond with some action. The comments of spokesmen on the government side lead us to expect some positive and affirmative action. The proof of the pudding will be the programs and steps they initiate to deal with this very important problem.

A number of very good speeches have dealt with the importance of the agricultural industry. What is disturbing, however, is that some of the things that have happened in the few months since this government took office show that there has been a plan for the reduction of the initial price of wheat. Wheat is still one of the major commodities produced in western Canada, and this government has seen fit to reduce the initial price effective August 1.

Mr. Pepin: Compared to the adjusted price.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is saying compared to the initial price set last year. That is true, but the Conservative government that was in power adjusted those prices and paid an interim payment. What in effect has occurred is a reduction in the initial price of some 50 cents per bushel. The minister cannot deny that.

We also have a situation where for a long time—

Mr. Pepin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport had his opportunity to make a speech. I am sorry I missed it, as I do not know whether he covered this point. If he wants to make another speech I am sure the House would concur. I would certainly like him to clarify that point. For the life of me I cannot understand how a government can reduce an initial price and then suggest it has increased it. The initial price, as it now stands, will be reduced effective August 1. There is no question about that.

I want to turn now to the two-price system. For a long time it has been recognized that the impact of the two-price system has placed a heavy burden on the producer. The current price of wheat for domestic human consumption is between $4 and $5, while the international markets are considerably above that. They were as high as $6.

In terms of looking at it from the point of view of the cost of production of grain, since 1973 when the two-price system was put into effect, there has been an increase of 105.5 per cent. If you take that back to the price established at that time, you would come up with the figure of $6 per bushel. As a government, we were prepared to increase the price. As a matter of fact we had cabinet approval to increase the price of wheat for domestic human consumption to a level of $6 per bushel. That price would have been in effect right now had our government not been defeated. Because of our government's defeat and the subsequent taking over of the government by the Liberals, the farmers have lost something in the order of $25 million.

We have to address these matters in a very serious way. What is of deep concern to me, and I am sure to many other members of this House, is the fact that this country, even though it has a tremendous agricultural potential, is relying more and more upon imported foods to feed Canadians. In 1978, Canadians spent some $3.25 billion on imported food. That is almost equal to the $3.8 billion that we paid for imported oil products in that particular year.

We have a tremendous potential in Canada for production of food. However, if we were to take away the exports of our grain and oil seeds, we would be very, very heavily reliant upon imports of food and we would have a very negative imbalance in terms of our agricultural trade picture. Notwithstanding the fact that we are able to penetrate the world markets for wheat and oil seeds, and notwithstanding the fact that we are competing against countries that subsidize their producers very heavily—in this connection I am thinking of the United States and the European Common Market—we do quite well in feed grains, cereal grains and oil seeds, but there are a number of areas where we do not do as well.

By way of illlustration, in little over a decade our self-sufficiency in peaches has fallen from 40 per cent to 19 per cent; apricots have fallen from 48 to 25 per cent, and tomatoes from 74 to 43 per cent. In 1978, Canada imported $331 million in meats, primarily beef and pork, most of which could be grown and processed in this country. Next I come to the potato growers in Canada. Our tariff duty of 37.5 cents per hundredweight is one-half of the U.S. duty on its potato imports.

What we have to do is recognize the potential in terms of the food production in these areas. We hear it said often that Canada does not have an energy shortage. We may have a shortage of oil, but we do not have an energy shortage. We have many alternative forms of energy which we could use for the encouragement and the expansion of market gardening. Great reliance on hot house production, as far as I am concerned, is essential. Surely with the energy potential that we have, we should be co-ordinating that potential with the potential that we have in agriculture so that we can become more self-reliant in the total area of food production.

Clearly, that is one of the challenges of this government and one of the challenges of this House of Commons. More and more of our acreage should be shifted to fruit and vegetable growing. There is much land in this country that is not being used in its most productive way. It means that we have to be a little more enterprising and more innovative. A country that has the potential of feeding itself is on a drift which I believe will be very serious.

Let us go back to the time of the oil crisis. Prior to 1973 it was suggested that we had all kinds of oil. Yes, the reserves were there. The potential was there. But our will and desire to produce and exploit that were not there. We find that condition exists today, particularly in the absence of any definitive policy by this government to develop an energy plan which would provide self-sufficiency for oil in this country.

We have heard some very good suggestions today. We have had suggestions with respect to taxation policy which would help to alleviate the burdens and pressures caused by drought situations, such as this. The annual income averaging program, which has been referred, to is a very excellent example. The matter of capital gains is another one. There are a number of these things which form part and parcel of this party's and our government's agricultural policy. Some of those items were defeated in the budget that we presented to this House in December. Now I find it very strange that some of my hon. friends to the left are harping and chastising the Liberal government for its failure to act in a number of these areas.

This party which formed the government in May, 1979, really identified with a number of the agricultural problems in this country. We addressed those problems. We had a plan of action. We brought forth programs. I find it very strange that the NDP, notwithstanding the fact that these programs were for the benefit, particularly of western Canadians and western agricultural industries, did not support those programs. For reasons of political expediency it defeated the budget which was going to transform many of those thoughts and policies into action. In the short period of time that we were a government we did create an improved climate of confidence with respect to grain production in this country, and particularly our ability to move grain to export markets.

I am pleased that my hon. friend, the Minister of Transport, has continued with a number of those programs. I have the assurance of the minister personally, and he has given that assurance in the House, that that will continue. I commend him for that stand. If we are going to develop and continue to exploit our export market potential, we must demonstrate to those customers that we have the facility and the capacity to move our grains to an export position when needed.

We have lost many markets. As a matter of fact over $1 billion has been lost in the last two years as a result of our failure and inability to move grain to an export position when our customers demanded it. It is important for the producers to know that we will have the ability to move that grain to an export position. It is important for them to plan.

I urge this government to deal with this matter very seriously. This drought situation is one of those areas in which it can now act to ensure a continued climate of confidence and stability so that our producers can plan not only for this crop year but for future crop years.

As hon. members know, the amount of foreign exchange generated out of the export of grain and oil seeds to the export market is a very important component of our total economy.

Today we have heard of the impact that any reduction in agricultural revenue and activity has upon the industries of eastern Canada.

I conclude by saying that this has been an excellent debate. I am pleased by the conciliatory attitude of the government. I simply want to say this that that conciliatory attitude will have to be backed up and demonstrated with positive actions and programs to ensure that this agricultural industry, so important to us, can continue to grow, develop, and survive as a vital industry.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is still the intention to return to the debate on Bill C-30 on Monday?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government House leader, I can inform the House that that is the intention of the government for Monday, namely, continuing debate on Bill C-30, the Supplementary Borrowing Authority Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) the proceedings on this motion have now expired. This House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA—ARREST OF REVEREND TOM ANTHONY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing national necessity. In view of the recent arrest in South Africa of Reverend Tom Anthony, director of the Canadian Anglican Church's national and overseas mission, along with 52 South African clergymen, and given that these arrests have taken place at a time when clergymen from around the world are meeting in South Africa and have stated their opposition to apartheid at some considerable personal risk, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That this House urges the Government of Canada to protest to the government of South Africa the arrest of Reverend Tom Anthony and remind South Africa in the most forceful manner possible of Canada's continued opposition to any form of apartheid.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LIONS INTERNATIONAL

SIXTIETH ANNUAL CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House welcomes the members of Lions International, Multiple District "A" to Canada's capital on the occasion of their sixtieth annual convention, their diamond convention, which is taking place at the present time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

PLANS OF ACTION TO REDUCE SHIP-BRIDGE COLLISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of growing urgency to many parts of Canada. There have been over 20 major collisions between ships in motion and standing structures since 1965, resulting in large loss of life and countless millions in costs. Every day of delay by the federal and other levels of government in providing fendering protection for bridge piers brings us a day closer to a major disaster, one which could be significantly reduced if not eliminated. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this House regrets and condemns the Minister of Transport's failure to bring together the appropriate authorities for the purpose of developing plans of action to reduce the ever-growing danger of a major disaster.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN TO EDUCATE AMERICAN TOURISTS REGARDING AMERICAN INSENSITIVITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that there is universal recognition of the disastrous impact of acid rain upon our environment and economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House unanimously support a program to be undertaken by the Department of the Environment for a full public relations campaign directed at American tourists that would include billboards and leaflets at every border crossing and media advertising to educate our American neighbours regarding the insensitive and intransigent attitude taken by their legislators toward protection of Canada's environment from American pollution.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

SUGGESTED REVOCATION OF SECTION 33 OF REGULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the frank and welcome acknowledgement by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) that present internal discipline procedures are unfair as they pertain to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police charged with offences which might result in the dismissal of such members, and in view of the promise of the minister to introduce promptly legislation to replace the totally inadequate procedures presently in place, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House direct the government to revoke forthwith, by order in council, section 33 of the regulations of the RCMP Act which deny counsel to members of the force charged with offences which could result in their dismissal and that the Solicitor General require the Commissioner of the RCMP to issue a directive which would permit members of the force charged with such offences to retain professional counsel.

HOCKEY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE FOR NEW CALGARY ARENA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the new Calgary team in the National Hockey League will be playing its home games for the next couple of years in the Calgary Corral, which seats fewer than 7,000 people, in view of the fact that all of those seats have already been sold for the entire upcoming hockey season, and in view of the fact that a new arena would greatly enhance Calgary's chances of getting the 1984 Winter Olympics, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright):

That this House direct the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport to proceed immediately to provide any and all possible assistance from the federal government to ensure that Calgary will receive a new arena at the earliest possible date.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CROSS LAKE, MAN.—LOWERING OF WATER LEVEL BY MANITOBA HYDRO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the actions of Manitoba Hydro have resulted in drastic reduction in the level of water in Cross Lake, Manitoba and that the people living there, including about 2,000 members of an Indian reserve, have lost the use of the ferry system to their community—

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Murphy: It is interesting that the Conservatives have not yet heard the motion. They are obviously not very concerned about the Indian people. Since they have lost the use of the ferry system and have been deprived of certain revenues and a vital food source usually available from fish in that lake, in addition to facing a dangerous health hazard to their water supply, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House request the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to look into the situation at Cross Lake, provide assistance to the people living there and assure that Manitoba Hydro take steps to guarantee that an adequate level of water is kept in Cross Lake.

Madam Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43 such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMMUNICATIONS

SUGGESTED LICENSING OF EARTH SATELLITE RECEIVING STATIONS IN REMOTE COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that municipally and privately-owned unlicensed earth satellite receiving stations provide popular television entertainment in many western and northern areas of Canada which otherwise are inadequately serviced, and in view of the threatened prosecution of certain station operators by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That policy and regulations be developed whereby operators of such satellite receiving stations could be permitted to provide these desired community services within the sanction of law and that in the meantime they not be subject to such legal action by the government as would deny accustomed services to residents of remote communities.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

REQUESTED INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government has twice promised in Speeches from the Throne that it would introduce freedom of information legislation, in view of the fact that the Clerk of the Privy Council, one Mr. Pitfield, has indicated that he was not favourable to court appeal procedure when there was dispute between the government and the citizen, which is at the heart of freedom of information, and in view of the fact that there is a German delegation here meeting with us on the subject of freedom of information, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That the government be instructed to bring in the same bill as was presented to Parliament by the former government as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion, under the terms of the Standing Order, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL CHAMPIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to put forward a motion which should gain the full support of the House.

When this country joined the boycott of the Moscow Olympic Games we asked for the support of the athletes and they have given that support, in many instances at great sacrifice to themselves. Now we hear that in some instances national organizations or associations are not competing at a national level to determine national champions at a time when successful athletes should be so recognized and honoured.

● (1415)

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That in the interest of maintaining a high level of morale and co-operation in our Canadian athletes this House urge the national governing body of the individual elite sports within Canada to determine national champions through trials or other suitable competitions and that those national champions be appropriately recognized.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO QUESTION SENATE MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the present system of appointing members of the Senate as ministers responsible for various departments denies elected members of the House of Commons the opportunity to question and pursue matters which are of direct concern to their constituencies, and whereas the present system of twinning a minister from the other place with one in the Commons results in the minister who answers in the Commons being nothing more than a messenger boy, which denies members of the House of Commons an opportunity to pursue a question where answers are vague or incomplete, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That the Prime Minister institute a system whereby ministers who serve from the other place may appear at least once a week before a special sitting of a parliamentary committee constituted specifically to have these ministers appear before that committee, whose sole purpose would be to provide elected members the opportunity to question them on day to day operations of their respective departments.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY—REPORTED CRITICISM BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister and it concerns statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs over the weekend. On the television program "Question Period" the minister said, and I quote:

I have a lot of reservations about American foreign policy, about their lack of consultation, about their lack of adequate leadership.

Since the hon. minister was speaking as Canada's foreign minister, could the Prime Minister tell us whether he was speaking for the government when he voiced his reservations about the lack of adequate leadership in the United States today, and have these sentiments been conveyed to President Carter and to the leaders of the United States Congress?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the other part of the same answer, she will see that the reservations expressed by the minister have to do with tactics but that the minister points out that we have a considerable amount of agreement with them. However, on some questions of tactics—

Mr. Nielsen: Nice try.

Mr. Trudeau: On some questions of tactics there is obviously, naturally, disagreement.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question because the minister very clearly articulated his reservations about the leadership in the United States today. I would like to go on further. In another part of that same interview the minister gave his view that the United States is at least partly to blame for the current crisis in Afghanistan in that it failed to counter the activities of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan some two years ago. I find it passing strange that the minister should condemn the United States for something it did not do two years ago when he, as minister, took two months to summon up courage to introduce a boycott of the Olympic Games following the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops.

Can the Prime Minister explain why the minister is now levelling his criticism at the United States rather than against those who are butchering children in Kabul?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Here again, Madam Speaker, I think it is important that we look at the whole answer rather than just a part. The minister was not singling out any one country for criticism. He made it quite specific that he was talking about all the western powers. He talked about a mistake on the West's part.

Miss MacDonald: "Especially by the United States".

Mr. Trudeau: He was indicating, with the benefit of hindsight, that it might have been better if indeed the West had a couple of years ago, to use his own expression, been more concerned when the satellite government was first set up in Afghanistan about two years ago. So I would not want the hon. lady to think that the minister was directing his criticism at the United States particularly. He was appealing to the West generally to be more vigilant against Soviet aggression.

• (1420)

Miss MacDonald: If the Prime Minister would take the time to read that statement, he would see that it says "and especially by the United States," which the minister did single out.

Then there is another comment which I would like him to explain, if he would. The minister said that the Soviet Union's policies were to look for weak points, that they picked them off, but they do not go against the heart of western civilization, of western Europe. Given that Canada has consistently argued over the years that detente is indivisible, that military adventurism by the Soviet Union in other countries indeed has a bearing on the pursuit of detente in western Europe, am I to assume, then, from the minister's statement that it is now the position of the Government of Canada that Soviet aggression elsewhere in the world against any neutral, non-aligned or Third World country will no longer have a bearing on the pursuit of detente in Europe?

Mr. Trudeau: Not at all, Madam Speaker. If once again the hon. lady looks at the question, she will see that the minister was indicating that this is not happening in Europe because there is some balance of power there. I think he would agree with the hon. lady that the danger is in other parts of the world where such a balance of power does not exist, where, to use his own words, they attempt adventures——and are more likely to attack a country like Pakistan or a country like Iran than they are to attempt an adventure in western Europe.

He was indicating that, because of the balance of force in Europe and because of NATO in particular, western Europe was not as endangered as were other parts of the world on which the Soviet Union was putting pressure.

Miss MacDonald: I have one final supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Just so that everyone will know that we are reading from the same transcript, I should like to quote the next line, which the Prime Minister refused to do, where he said that the Soviets are much more likely to attack a country like Pakistan or a country like Iran than they are to attempt an adventure in western Europe. The minister then said:

I think that's completely out of the question.

Will the Prime Minister tell us on what certainty the Secretary of State for External Affairs is able to base his comment that Soviet aggression against western Europe is entirely, completely out of the question? If that is the case, why do we have NATO forces, a NATO alliance? What have we been doing in this last number of years except making sure that we are indeed ready in the event of an invasion of western Europe?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it would seem to me that the hon. lady gave the answer to her own question. It is because there is a balance of power in Europe—I repeat, mainly achieved because there is NATO against the Warsaw Pact—that the minister is of the opinion that it is out of the question that the Soviets will attack western Europe at this point. The message is that, if we let down our guard, that certainty will be less plain.

SOVIET UNION—REPORTED REINSTATEMENT OF CULTURAL, SCIENTIFIC AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The Toronto Star of yesterday carried an article written by Jean Edward Smith in which the writer praises the Prime Minister for what the writer calls his "deft use of Canadian power" in his decision to reinstate cultural, scientific and educational exchanges with the Soviet Union next spring. Can the Prime Minister verify the accuracy of that statement and, if it is accurate, can he tell the House what led him to this dramatic reversal in policy; and if it is not true, could he indicate whether he is considering such a reversal and what are the circumstances which would lead to that kind of a change?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not read the article in question, and I am not sure whether it is within the rules to ask the ministry to comment on some published article; but I will gladly look it up and give the hon. member an answer.

Mr. Friesen: Whether or not the Prime Minister has read the article, he should know what is going on in his mind, and if it is one of his considerations, could he tell the House whether he is considering that kind of reversal?

● (1425)

My supplementary question follows on the questions by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. It concerns the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday in which he really roundly condemned President Carter for his so-called lack of leadership as well as the apparent runner-up, Ronald Reagan.

An hon. Member: What about the rest of your question?

Mr. Friesen: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is now the policy of this government to meddle with the domestic affairs of another country, something which the Americans happily did not do with Canada during the time of the referendum debate?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is repeating in a more aggravated form the question asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. The minister did not roundly condemn the American leadership. He indicated that on matters of substance there was considerable agreement, but that there was some disagreement as to the tactics. It seems to me that each country is entitled to have differences of view on tactical matters.

NATIONAL REVENUE

POSSIBLE ENDING OF INDEXATION OF PERSONAL INCOME TAX—SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF COST OF LIVING TAX CREDIT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister; it concerns the state of the economy. The reports from both his Minister of Finance and from his deputy minister of finance indicate that the government is giving serious consideration to the possibility of ending the indexation of personal income tax, which means an effective tax increase of $1.4 billion. While we may agree that the index is particularly regressive and we oppose its introduction, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, at the same time as his government is contemplating massive tax increases on the personal income side and on the energy price side, the government also is giving serious consideration to the plight of low and middle income Canadians? In particular, is his government giving consideration to the possibility of introducing a cost of living tax credit which would have the effect of stimulating the economy before the recession takes hold?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, quite obviously the Minister of Finance is particularly concerned with the deficit. Surely the hon. member knows that the indexation of income tax rates and social measures set up by the government is extremely costly for the state. The hon. member raised a special point and I think his suggestion should be examined in the general ambit of all hypotheses now considered by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, in light of the reply of the Minister of State for Finance, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. The recession in the United States is taking hold. Indeed, the official figures show that the leading economic indicators have plunged 4.8 per cent in one month, which is the largest decline ever registered on this particular set of indicators since they were started 32 years ago. Is it still the intention of the Prime Minister to delay the bringing in of a budget, or at least a partial budget, which would have the effect of aiding those Canadians who are most affected by the recession, until well into the fall, which means that we will have a winter without any significant stimulative measures for the economy?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has stated his intentions quite clearly. He has indicated that there are basic factors which are constantly under negotiation and which will be of great importance in the drafting of the budget and unless some truly significant changes happen, the minister still intends to table a budget as soon as possible—and he did speak of this fall.

● (1430)

Mr. Rae: I will try again to the Prime Minister one last time, Madam Speaker. I should like the Prime Minister to answer a riddle which I am sure perplexes many Canadians. When in opposition the finance critic for his party, now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, said on December 12, 1979, as reported at page 2295 of Hansard:

> Surely the health of the Canadian economy cannot be looked at primarily in terms of the government's deficit. What is also important, surely, are measures of performance such as the growth of employment, the growth of the economy, and the level of the cost of living.

He went on to say:

These measures are being given second place to a concept which was discredited or, at least, greatly called into question as a result of the bitter experience of the Conservative government of R. B. Bennett in the 1930s.

My riddle to the Prime Minister is this. Why is it that we hear that kind of language and that kind of policy from the Liberal party when they are in opposition? Why is it that the only economic statements made by his economic ministers have been on the problem of the deficit and not on the problems of unemployment, inflation and those difficulties facing the average Canadian?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must disagree with the statement of the hon. member that those have been the thrusts of the policy of the Minister of Finance; on the contrary, we are now budgeting for a very considerable deficit rather than tending toward a balanced budget, as in the case of the United States. We have a very considerable deficit—

An hon. Member: You better believe it.

Mr. Trudeau: Even the Tories agree with that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We have not dignified it with the description of "stimulative deficit" that used to be the description given to it by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: You have no excuse.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the effect of this deficit. This very House has adopted, as recently as last week, measures which will increase that deficit, precisely to assist people receiving the guaranteed income supplement and the hon. member was supportive of it.

INQUIRY WHETHER INDEXATION OF INCOME TAX BEING RECONSIDERED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question in the absence of the Celtic sphinx—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: —the hon. Celtic sphinx, is to the Prime Minister. My question is this: The Minister of Finance on May 24 in an interview with Le Devoir said that "the end of income indexation looms as a probability". Not as a possibility, not that it was under review, but as a probability. I refer the Prime Minister to the February, 1973, budget speech when his then minister of finance said that he was taking steps to provide a lasting solution to the problem should inflation continue. That is, the problem about the effect of inflation on a tax system which has a progressive rate structure.

Would the Prime Minister tell this House whether there is a probability, not just a possibility, that the reform introduced in February, 1973, by the minister of finance of the day at the suggestion of the hon. Bob Stanfield to index the income tax to deal with this problem of inflation and the progressive tax system is being seriously reconsidered at this time by this government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the associate minister answered a moment ago, the government is considering various possibilities and that is one of them. I believe the point was made equally by the deputy minister of finance. I would advise the hon. member, as a former minister of finance, not to believe that a budgetary statement is firm and final until he finds it in the budget itself. And even then, as the hon. member knows, it is not always necessarily firm and final.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister, who has said that he is not worried; he has made it clear that a large federal deficit itself does not worry him. That does not worry him; it is just the debt charges, just the interest. He does not see the connection between the two.

Mr. Andre: It is not the knife wound, it is the loss of blood!

Mr. Crosbie: The deputy minister of finance appeared before the Senate committee on national finance on Tuesday, May 27, and said that a major study of the revenue system of the government is now being carried out, and I quote, "with the aim of reducing the federal deficit in coming years;" and he said there is need for some kind, and I quote, "of generalized tax increase."

Now that the Prime Minister has the bothersome matter of an election campaign over and he has a working majority, will he tell the House whether it is his aim to reduce the federal deficit and whether he is going to have generalized tax increases this year that he forgot to mention to the Canadian electorate up to last February 18?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the statement made by the minister himself in this House a few weeks ago, he will get the answer to that question. It is to the effect that over a period of time we would like to see the deficit reduced, but we would want to keep in mind that we will not do that if it is necessary to maintain some stimulus to keep the economy growing. That is the effect of the answer I gave to the member from the New Democratic Party a moment ago.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, in my final supplementary I put this to the Prime Minister. In February, 1973, when the indexation of the tax system was put into force, it was stated:

—the progressive tax system can leave him worse off than he was before because he has entered a higher tax bracket. What I want to do,—

This was the minister of finance of the day speaking:

—is eliminate that unfair and unintended result from our tax system.

Is the Prime Minister now telling the House that because he has four or five safe years in office he is going to forget the unfair and unintended results that inflation brings to the progressive tax system, with the inflation that he has allowed to grow over the last eight or ten years, so that this year it is likely to be 10 per cent and even more next year; and is he going to forget the unfairness of that part—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it would seem that the hon. member is making an argument rather than asking a question. I would just keep him informed that there have been indexations of various forms of assistance like family allowance, old age pension, veterans pensions and so on. Therefore, we are assisting those most in need by indexing their pensions to protect them against the effect—

Mr. Crosbie: And gouging the taxpayer.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if one wants to protect those in need—

Mr. Crosbie: Taxpayers need help too.

Mr. Trudeau: —help those who need it most, one has to get help from the taxpayer, yes, Madam Speaker. I would have thought the hon. member would have understood this.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY WHETHER PERMIT TO BUILD OVERPASS WILL BE AUTHORIZED

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. As the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced in Winnipeg on Friday that funding will now be provided for the building of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass over the CP tracks, could the minister inform me whether he will now authorize the permit to build the overpass that was requested by the city in early 1979?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, what is happening is that the government as a whole is offering the province of Manitoba funds otherwise available, from DREE particularly, in order to effect the relocation program. I do not know what the reaction of the government of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg will be. I am awaiting a report on the discussions held on this subject.

Mr. McKenzie: As the mayor informed the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker, they were going to wait until the end of May to see what the government was going to do about rail relocation. We are now into June. The city of Winnipeg wants the permit for the overpass. Is the minister going to issue the permit now for the overpass, and will his department be providing some funding for rail relocation later on or the building of the overpass?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, there is no difficulty with issuing a permit for the overpass. There is no problem at all on that subject. This has been offered. The city is well aware that they can have it, and so is the province of Manitoba. I assume that in the light of new developments the province and the city would like to have a second look at what is possible.

USE OF ASBESTOS AS BALLAST FOR RAIL BEDS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. It arises from a CBC documentary shown on the weekend that showed that CP Rail has used asbestos instead of gravel as ballast for 90 miles of rail line in the province of Quebec.

It is a threat to the health of railwaymen and the public. Is the minister prepared to have Canadian Pacific take out the asbestos at its own expense and launch an immediate inquiry into the matter?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is no legislation in Canada governing that aspect but the Department of Environment and the Canadian Transport Commission are now investigating and I will report as soon as I obtain the results of the inquiry.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, why can the minister not tell us why he has not ordered CPR to clean up the asbestos which they put on railway tracks?

Miss Bégin: That is what he just told you.

Mr. Nystrom: I know that there is an inquiry in progress, but I am wondering why the minister cannot tell us why he has not ordered CPR to clean up the asbestos which has been put on rail lines. Secondly, the government was informed 16 months ago in February, 1979, that asbestos is a carcinogenic substance. Why can the minister not say whether or not he has asked the CPR whether they will compensate any employee or person who might be affected by the activity of the CPR? Can the minister assure the House that the CPR and, indeed, the CNR has not done this type of thing in other parts of the country as well?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that is exactly the reason why I said there was no law on the use of such rock in the building of railways. I specifically said that to indicate why I could not take the kind of action which my hon. friend has in mind. It seems to me that the proper approach is first to inquire prior to exercising the normal diplomatic pressures in these matters.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN CERTAIN MILITARY ALLIANCES

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It deals with national security. Books have been written, one by Gerald Porter, In Retreat, on our armed forces, and another, written by Peter Stursburg on our relationship with NATO. Mention is made, I believe, of the fact that the hon. Léo Cadieux threatened to resign if Canada pulled out of NATO. In view of his remark today to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, can the Prime Minister explain whether or not he has changed his mind about NATO?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was not in the House at that time, but I should like to remind him that in the early seventies, or at the end of the sixties, we undertook to review our external policy and our military policy, with a view to re-examining Canada's membership in all those alliances, of which NATO and NORAD. We then even looked into both possibilities, of being completely neutral or multiplying our alliances. This study was sincere and lasted quite a while; a large number of citizens and parliamentarians took part in it. At that time, we decided to confirm our ties with NORAD and NATO, and we have not changed our mind since then.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AFGHANISTAN—MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In rationalizing the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the policy of Canada in Afghanistan, the Prime Minister stated that the minister's concern was that two years ago the United States should have taken action. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that there was a difference in policy in this regard and that two years ago Canada suggested that action be taken and the United States disagreed? Or, if the minister is criticizing the United States, did Canada take such action or express such concern two years ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to the remarks of the minister, he will see that, as I told the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands, he is not attacking the United States in any particular way. Rather, the minister is saying that the west in general was at fault in not sensing the problem arising two years ago. Also, because the United States exercises leadership in the western alliance, the minister was saying "and especially the United States". The minister was referring to the entire west, and we consider ourselves a western power. The minister, in hindsight, was regretting that we had not reacted then.

INDUSTRY

NOVA SCOTIA—POSSIBLE EXPANSION OF MICHELIN TIRE—OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, unfortunately my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to whom I gave notice last week. Since he is not here, I would like to direct my first question to the Prime Minister. I appreciate that the Prime Minister will not have all the facts as would the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the meeting which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had with the Minister of Labour, some of the perennial corporate competitors of Michelin and certain labour officials a week ago today, which was called because of protests against any further expansion of industry in Nova Scotia through another Michelin plant, particularly with DREE money, can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will talk to his minister and that those in favour of DREE application, assuming there is still a DREE policy, will have an equal opportunity to make representations to the minister?

Would the Prime Minister also point out to the House and the country, especially Ontario, that the contemplated production of any increased plant is primarily for export and that, in view of the success of Michelin tires, such tire plant will be built elsewhere in the world—most likely the southern United States—if it does not come to Canada, albeit Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker. I am not versed in the details of this particular presentation. It would seem to me that the hon. member has summed it quite thoroughly. I am informed that the government has already heard representations that they are now being considered, and an answer will be forthcoming as soon as possible.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Labour. In view of the surprising and, to me, deplorable appearance of the president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour with a group which was lobbying against the expansion of industry and jobs in Nova Scotia, would the minister advise this House if he shares the views of the president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour that another Michelin plant in that province would be against the interests of Nova Scotia and against the job opportunities of the working man of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, obviously I do not share the views of the president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour in that regard. I am not sure, though, that his views go quite that far. He has expressed some concern about the labour laws of Nova Scotia, but I felt that after our meeting along with the minister of DREE during which we exchanged our views, perhaps the president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour was to a greater degree able to realize that there would be great benefits to the Annapolis Valley in western Nova Scotia, and to Canada as a whole, if that project were to go ahead.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

REFERENCING OF ONTARIO LEGISLATION—PROTECTION OF URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Mines. I would briefly like to congratulate the minister on her appointment. My question is with respect to the protection now afforded uranium miners in Ontario. In view of the minister's statement in Elliot Lake last Friday, as it is reported in The Globe and Mail of Saturday, with respect to last week's order in council referencing Ontario's occupational health and safety act and regulations under the Canada Labour Code, that "exactly the same thing" had been done with health and safety legislation in Saskatchewan, "and there have been no problems" and in view of statements by United Steel Workers of America representatives to the contrary, does the minister agree that this recent referencing will provide the uranium miners of Ontario the protection which both the minister and the Minister of Labour have pledged and that the referenced order in council and Ontario regulations will, in law, take precedence over the other weaker provisions of the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The Minister of Labour and I worked long and hard to ensure that bill 70 was referenced into the Canada Labour Code. I can assure the hon. member that it is the advice of several people, including the Solicitor General, that once bill 70 is incorporated into the Canadian Labour Code, it becomes a part of the CLC and, therefore, federal legislation. I foresee no problems.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Labour. Given the Saskatchewan case in which federal labour officials, AECB officials and justice officials have held up for almost a year, on a jurisdictional point, an attempt to prosecute Eldorado Nuclear for conditions which led to the death of a miner, can the minister state clearly and in unequivocal terms whether the order in council making bill 70 part of the Canada Labour Code does take precedence over the provision in section 4 of the Canada Labour Code and, in the minister's words, whether the protective measures now afforded Ontario uranium miners via the order in council route "are as high as they would be under provincial jurisdiction"?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question on a very important subject. I would agree with the remarks made by my colleague to the effect that this protection is indeed provided.

The Saskatchewan case, to which the hon. member refers, had particular circumstances, and it was not a jurisdictional problem that delayed that case. The time restrictions of the question period do not allow me to explain that in detail. However, I would be happy to explain outside the chamber if the hon. member so desires.

Let me assure him that the referencing of bill 70 of the Ontario legislature is a step that was asked for by the unions involved after they became satisfied that there were delays and difficulties in trying to get a parallel set of federal regulations. That is the course of action that we would have originally taken, and it is the course of action that we have now taken. Any other course of action to give long-term, better protection would be a lengthy process. However, I want to say that if any of the companies were to see fit to challenge the validity and the force of these provisions, then I would be prepared to bring in very strong legislation indeed.

INQUIRY WHETHER ADVICE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL IN WRITTEN FORM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of State for Mines. I believe in her answer she indicated that advice had been received from the Solicitor General in this matter. Would the minister confirm whether that was the case. If so, would she tell us why the Solicitor General was involved, and further would she advise the House whether that advice was in written form?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): No, Madam Speaker. It was a short conversation that I had with the Solicitor General because the subject was brought up to me by the hon. member who requested the information earlier. I asked the Solicitor General if indeed the legislation was valid, and he assured me that it was and that there was precedent involved in this area.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have one supplementary that perhaps I should direct to the Prime Minister. Is it now the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada who gives legal advice to ministers on which action is taken?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, the acting minister gives advice on his behalf.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, so we are clear about this, the advice given to the minister of mines by the Solicitor General, presumably after consultation with the law officers of the Crown, was given in his capacity as acting minister of justice and acting attorney general; is that the case?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I do not know exactly what the terms of the advice were. The Solicitor General is the acting minister of justice, and it was natural for the minister to address herself to him as she would to any other colleague who was acting minister.

GRAIN

TWO-PRICE WHEAT—REIMBURSEMENT OF PRODUCERS

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board—

An hon. Member: Who is that?

Mr. Gustafson: —with regard to the domestic price as of February 1, 1980. The answer that came to my desk this morning reads as follows:

There is therefore no plan to reimburse producers for their costs—

On Friday this announcement was made:

Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan today announced that a cheque for $5 million has been sent to Quebec—

Further on in this announcement are the following words:

Under the Quebec program, the federal government is providing $33.5 million over a five-year period—

This is for freight on grain from the prairie provinces.

In view of what the Prime Minister had to say in the Speech from the Throne, and in the interests of fair play, can the minister tell the people of western Canada, and the farmers in particular, how he can justify, on the one hand, turning down $25 million that came out of the farmers' pockets and paying out $33 million that comes directly out of the treasury? Would he reconsider his decision, please.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is not a question, it is a debate, obviously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: I can only confirm what my hon. friend says that for a period of time the international price for wheat was higher than the maximum of the policy. Consequently, for a period of time western farmers lost a fair amount of money. I can confirm that. This is the reason why the new policy on two-price wheat for domestic use has raised the lower price to $5 and the upper price to $7 a bushel.

Mr. Nielsen: At least you are trying to answer now.

Mr. Gustafson: Madam Speaker, is the minister aware that it was only eight months ago that the situation was reversed, and in this time of high costs, would he reconsider?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member simply put a question and not argue, please.

An hon. Member: It is a preamble.

Mr. Gustafson: My question is simply this, Madam Speaker. Does the minister consider it fair, and would he reconsider in this time of drought and high costs?

Mr. Pepin: The decision on that subject has been made, Madam Speaker.

REIMBURSEMENT OF PRODUCERS FOR LOSS OF INCOME FROM DEPRESSED PRICES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since the grain embargo has not been punitive to the Soviet Union but only punitive to Canadian farmers, because of depressed grain prices, and since the drought situation in the west is increasing the economic insecurity for many prairie farmers, will the Prime Minister fulfil his promise to reimburse grain producers for their loss of income so that some extra cash can be injected into the drought-ridden farm economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would want to disagree with the premise of the question stated by the hon. member that the embargo is not being effective. I can assure him that our information is that it is being effective.

As to the rest of the question, the matter is being considered, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport who is sometimes responsible for the Wheat Board. Economic security is an important factor when the farmer is facing the effects of a debilitating drought. Since higher initial grain prices will not be a subsidy but only an evening out of cash flow for farmers, will the minister do what he can to have the initial price of grains maintained at its present level rather than dropped 50 cents per bushel on July 30, as previously annouced?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is difficult to answer because some weeks ago I was asked to intercede to ensure that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board would increase the hike of the initial prices. If I understand the question now, they do not want the prices to be lowered.

Mr. Epp: No, we do not want them lowered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: The minister in charge of the Wheat Board promised at the time he made the announcement on the initial prices that he would review them before the crop year, which is August 1.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SETTLEMENT WITH CUPW—COST TO TREASURY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Now that there has been a very heavy favourable ratification vote for the CUPW settlement that Treasury Board entered into with CUPW on May 23, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate what the extra cost will be to the federal government treasury as a result of this CUPW settlement?

Mr. Crosbie: Come on, "Dapper Don".

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member last week, the contract has not yet been ratified by Treasury Board. When it is, I will feel free to release full details obviously at that time. But I would like to take the opportunity of pointing out what a fine job my colleague, the Postmaster General, did in negotiating this contract.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Good old Ouellet.

Mr. Johnston: I would also add in that context, in setting a number of important precedents, it is the first time, I understand, that the majority decision of a conciliation board has not been accepted by this government through four hard days of negotiations for which I believe he deserves a great deal of credit.

● (1500)

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board could clarify why, if Treasury Board has not ratified the terms of the agreement, Mr. Parrot sent out a brochure to all of his members in which he enclosed a copy of the Treasury Board and Canadian Union of Postal Workers agreement signed on May 23, 1980, for the Treasury Board and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I would have thought that the hon. member, being my predecessor in office, would be aware of the procedures of contract ratification. I think that question should be more appropriately addressed to Mr. Parrot.

WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF OVERPASS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine of the Minister of Transport with regard to announcements made on Friday in Winnipeg regarding rail relocation and the Sherbrook Street overpass. Has the minister now said in the House today that the federal government will be helping in the funding of the Sherbrook Street overpass, that they will also be including in those costs the additional cost due to the two-year delay and, if the overpass will be built, that rail relocation at the CPR yards is a dead issue in Winnipeg?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker. The offer that the Department of Transport made to the province of Manitoba for the use of UTAP money—the urban transport assistance program—still stands. No mention has been made of paying for the delay suffered by the city in having to undertake a study. They would have had to make it anyway. What is new since Friday is that an offer has been made to the province of Manitoba wider than the particular envelope that we have been talking about up until now. Presumably the province and the municipality will want to think about it before committing themselves either to agree, hopefully, or disagree with the new offer that has been made.

Mr. Epp: Which program?

Mr. Pepin: We will find out when the minister who made the offer returns.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE JOB OPPORTUNITIES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I rise today to inform hon. members of the programs the government is putting into place to deal with the immediate employment needs of Canadians, and to discuss briefly employment development in the 1980s.

Canada is, above all, a land of contrasts. In some areas, such as those relating to our ethnic roots and traditions, diversity is a source of national strength. This is not the case with the diversities in our economic well-being. The existence of groups of Canadians who are continually frustrated in their yearning to participate fully in the economic life of Canada is a condition that weakens us as a nation.

In designing our employment program, we looked first at the principles that would provide the basis for specific initiatives. The first of these principles is the principle of targeting, or reaching out directly to those who traditionally receive little or no benefit from the economic growth of the country.

Native people, even in the very wealthy province of Alberta, face unemployment rates of approximately 75 per cent, and this situation is even more critical for native women. Handicapped people everywhere face not only the challenge of overcoming their disability, but also must contend with the invisible barriers of prejudice and ignorance that bar their entry into the labour force. Women, and particularly those who have worked tirelessly in their homes to raise families, are told that they are not wanted in the paid labour force. Whatever else we do to ensure that all Canadians enjoy rising levels of real income, we must give special assistance to such people as I have mentioned.

The second principle upon which today's measures are based is the recognition that employment must have continuing and genuine value. It should offer an unemployed worker hope for the future, and contribute to his or her sense of self-worth. In the programs we are announcing today we are including criteria that will channel funds towards projects that will make a sustaining contribution to the Canadian economy and will be consistent with our national objectives and priorities.

The third principle reflected in these measures is recognition of the need to have the particular mix of employment measures tailored to regional needs. By this I refer not only to employment disparities or the fact that there are shortages of skilled workers in certain industries and regions, but also to the differing capabilities of regions to cope with problems in their respective labour markets. I have already begun consultations with my provincial counterparts to identify each region's needs, and these consultations are being carried out on an ongoing basis by our respective officials.

With these principles in mind, I am announcing the following programs relating to job creation and training:

First, we are introducing four specific job creation programs to meet special employment needs. The first is Canada community development projects. A major new program is being implemented to further national and regional priorities in such areas as fisheries enhancement, energy conservation, tourism development, and community restoration. In addition to providing valuable work, this program will contribute to the development of an expanded employment base. More than $100 million will be committed across Canada to such projects this winter and next year, with special emphasis in areas of high unemployment. This program also gives us the flexibility to respond to emerging employment problems caused by industrial dislocation, or major emergencies such as the fires and drought in western Canada.

Second, we are introducing a new technology employment program. This program is designed to assist men and women trained in technical and scientific areas to make full use of their skills in support of research and development. Funded at $7 million in the year 1980-81, this program will provide subsidies to firms and non-profit institutions that hire unemployed or under-employed post-secondary graduates to work in research and development activities. This will help to promote innovations in manufacturing and the application of conservation and alternative energy techniques and programs across Canada.

Further, we will have a program called local economic development assistance. While the Canada community development projects are short term, it is our intention to increase the capacity of communities to meet long-term employment objectives. We will, as appropriate, use these funds for long-term employment development, through this new experimental program, as well as use existing programs such as LEAP.

The LEDA program is a new initiative aimed at providing selected communities with the means to develop comprehensive employment development strategies through non-profit community corporations established in each of these communities. LEDA will accelerate the process of economic development in these communities, first by us applying front-end money to develop appraisals, marketing and forecasts, and then provide short-term investments for equity investments in new businesses and small businesses. This is particularly appropriate for small towns and communities that want to establish a new economic base.

Funded at $3 million in 1980-81, it is intended as an experimental program and as a complement to other business development programs. Our target is to have a number of these pilot projects across Canada started in the summer and fall of this year.

Fourth, we have a community services program. This is a new program which will enable the federal government to enter into new partnership arrangements with non-profit voluntary agencies. The program will provide jobs for unemployed men and women and will, at the same time, increase, improve, and make innovations in urgently needed social and cultural services.

A major innovation of the community services program is that funding will be provided for up to three years on a diminishing share basis. Ongoing service activities will be funded, as demonstration projects, only if there is a reasonable expectation that the organizations will, over three years, be able to make other provisions for the costs of services. I expect that many service organizations will wish to use the program to help expand their volunteer base, or to develop fee for service operations, or simply to carry out three-year projects of real value to the community.

The labour market contains many striking and frequently unfair imbalances. In some parts of the country today, and particularly in the resource-rich areas of western Canada, industries have problems finding enough skilled workers in a growing number of occupations, while elsewhere the level of unemployment remains at intolerable levels. The economic potential of our physical resources cannot be fully achieved until we realize the human potential of the Canadian work force and, in particular, of native people and women.

Madam Speaker, in order to begin the process of establishing a balance between labour supply and demand, and to ensure that all Canadians get a fair share of the economic and social benefits of our society, we are taking the following measures.

First, we intend to add an additional $10 million to the amount available for the existing critical trades, skills, and training program. The level of funding will be increased immediately from $20 million to $30 million, an amount constrained only by the capacity of industry to utilize effectively the additional funds during the next 12 months. I am prepared to consider increasing funds for this program still further in subsequent years if industry is prepared to offer the necessary training.

We also intend to provide a special training program for native people. A special allocation of $10 million will be provided for additional training of men and women of native ancestry. The program is designed to enable them to take advantage of employment generated by new resource developments and to move into job opportunities in our urban centres.

We intend to embark on an experimental program called women in non-traditional trades. In order to help open the way for women to enter occupations traditionally dominated by men, $2 million will be provided to cover a wage subsidy of 75 per cent under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program to employers who train women in non-traditional occupations. This is a start-up program and, if it proves successful, it will be substantially enhanced in the following year.

Finally, because of the large number of Indo-Chinese refugees who have come to Canada, an additional $7 million will be provided for language training for refugees. This will speed the successful integration of these people into the Canadian labour market.

These initiatives, which provide a good indication of future directions in developing employment opportunities, bring total federal expenditures on training, including income support, to $834 million in 1980-81. A growing share of that training is being provided by industry, on the job site and in the skills that we so badly need.

I should also mention that another program dealing with people who have severe employment disadvantages will be presented at a later date, probably by way of legislation.

I would like to indicate, however, that the proposed program will provide additional help to the same groups of people who will benefit from the measures I announced today as well as to other hard-to-place workers such as former prisoners and individuals with little or no education and those with physical handicaps and learning disabilities. The program will offer incentives so that disadvantaged workers are employed in the private sector. I have reserved $15 million in my budget for that program, one which will be later presented to Parliament.

Madam Speaker, in my capacity as minister responsible for the status of women, I would like to stress that our efforts today are only the first steps of a thorough approach to the problems of women in the labour force. I will soon announce ongoing measures to improve employment opportunities for women, with particular priority to improving the affirmative action program in the public service.

The employment development measures outlined today will themselves have a considerable impact on the employment of women. Community services projects will assist organizations to provide services, such as day care and after-four programs, which are important to many working women and men. The cash incentive for firms to train women in non-traditional jobs is a significant innovation in terms of public policy, in Canada and in the industrial world.

Youth will also significantly benefit from the employment development measures announced today. Both the community services projects and the community development projects will serve to provide young men and women with valuable first-job experience. For young people who are qualified in technical areas, the new technology employment program offers opportunities to use their skills to advance the development and application of new technology. Young men and women under 25 can be expected to make up nearly two-thirds of the participants in our employment programs and training program expansions.

The increases in badly needed training and the new employment programs will cost $137 million in this fiscal year. These programs will be paid for with funds previously intended for tax credits and other funds set aside for programs planned by the previous government.

The measures that I outlined today are in addition to programs already planned for or in operation this fiscal year, such as the extension of the employment tax credit program. I hope members of the opposition will provide us with the co-operation which would facilitate the extension of that program so that both these announcements can go forward at the same time.

An hon. Member: When is it coming?

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member will have it on his agenda sooner than he expects. Furthermore, this program must be seen in the context of additional programs such as the Summer Youth Employment program, the carry-over of Canada Works and the Local Employment Assistance Program.

In summary, these training and employment measures that I have announced are not the entire solution to our labour market problems. But they are an important beginning. We will focus on the training and employment needs of natives, women, young people, and other groups facing special difficulties in finding and retaining jobs. We will provide extra jobs in areas of high unemployment. We will reorient employment programs to serve key national and regional priorities. These measures represent the start of a new long-term approach to employment generation and national development. They point us in the right direction.

In my opening remarks I referred to the need to use our programs to meet Canada's different regional problems. There is no group with a better understanding of such conditions than members of Parliament. In our Summer Youth Employment program, the advice and participation of members of this House have added considerably to the success of the program. It is our intention to draw on the intimate knowledge that members of Parliament have of their local areas, particularly for the locally-based Community Development Projects and through the use of local advisory groups which will assist in each constituency in the determination of priorities.

I look forward as well, Madam Speaker, to the results of the Parliamentary Task Force on Critical Skills for the Eighties, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). This special committee will provide members of Parliament with an additional opportunity to be involved in the formulation of an employment strategy for the decade we are entering.

Within Employment and Immigration Canada, a special high level task force is being formed to examine the entire spectrum of labour market needs, including training, employment programs, employment services, mobility of workers, and industrial dislocation. I am confident that these special bodies will be productive in their work, and enable Canada to move closer to its potential in the 1980s.

Madam Speaker, may I conclude by reminding this House that these programs represent an important investment in our most priceless asset—individual Canadians. Our free market system, for all its strengths, does not always distribute opportunities equally to our people. We are all diminished when any of our fellow citizens, for whatever reason, do not have the opportunity to develop their talents to full potential and contribute their full energy to the common good.

These programs are not public charity or government bounty. They are an investment which will bear returns beyond those we now devote to resource industries, the manufacturing sector or financial enterprises. They are an investment in our fellow Canadians—our true, genuine undiminished capital for the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) for providing me with a copy of his statement, his press release, and a background paper. I received this material at noon and have taken the opportunity to read it over and reflect on it before making my response.

I must begin by expressing on behalf of the Conservative party a sense of disappointment, having waited so long for an employment strategy, to find so little that is new, exciting or helpful to Canadians. It is a small program, and the degree to which it tackles the long-term unemployment problems of this country is practically zero.

I point out to the House, for instance, that a one-cent tax on a gallon of gasoline would produce twice as much money for employment creation as the minister has brought forward today. Public policy is always a matter of choice, and the failure of hon. members opposite to take responsible steps such as those the Conservative government was prepared to take in its budget, has strapped them for funds. Many useful social purposes must be overlooked or a band-aid must be put on them because we have a government which will not raise the money that the people of Canada require it to spend.

Unemployment is caused by bad economic decisions. The kind of unemployment which we in Canada experience today is a consequence of many bad economic decisions taken over a long period of time. Those problems affect regions in a broader sense. They affect provinces, and they affect areas within provinces. Quite frankly, I was looking forward today to a series of measures which would get us to the heart of the problems experienced in those parts of this country more than in other parts of this country, and as I look through the documents presented to me by the minister, I cannot find that mentality. I find many words asserting it to be true, but as I look at the detailed specifics of the program, I cannot find it.

In April the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) raised taxes and virtually ignored the measures in the Crosbie budget of December which would have created more employment in this country. This morning I glanced over that mini budget, and the minister left out eight specific employment creation measures related to the private sector. He chose not to reintroduce them, and we are facing a rather tragic unemployment situation in this country in the future.

How many people will we find in this country who would like to work, who would like to make a contribution to the well-being of this country, but who simply cannot find jobs? I have done a little calculating based on the figures which the government has provided to this House in the last two months, but I think there is general agreement among econometric forecasters that some time in the next two years the measured rate of unemployment in this country will be in the neighbourhood of 9 per cent. We are looking at measured unemployment of something in the neighbourhood of 1,100,000 Canadians. Econometricians will also tell us that as we get an increasing unemployment rate of that kind, then our hidden unemployment rate goes up.

The hidden unemployed are those people who have looked for work for so long that they are discouraged and are no longer looking for work. The best estimate of the number of people in that category at this time is 300,000 people. Then we look at this package of so-called job-creation measures which the minister has laid before the House today. With that package he says he will create something in the neighbourhood of 192,000 jobs in the current fiscal year. That is close to 200,000, and if the minister is correct and those people are working, they will not show up in this 9 per cent. When we add those three numbers, the predicted 9 per cent measured unemployment rate, the hidden unemployed, and those who are sort of tucked away in these subsidized jobs, we come to 1,600,000 Canadians who would like jobs in the real economy but cannot find them because of the economic policies of the government opposite. That is close to 15 per cent of adult Canadians who would like to make a contribution, and I think that is a crime, a scandal, and something we should not continue to overlook.

I think there are other choices available to the government opposite. Perhaps they are not available to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but certainly they are to the government.

I would feel much more confortable as a member of this House trying to do my best to act on behalf of the Canadian people if I could see policies coming from the other side of the House which would contribute to the long-range development of this country, such as energy policies which would produce substitution, reopen coal mines in Nova Scotia, and develop the tar sands rather than retard development of the tar sands. When a tar sands plant is built, it takes $7 billion worth of wages and materials to build that mining operation, but at the same time a community must be created out of the bush which will house and service some 20,000 to 25,000 Canadians. In projects of that kind there are real jobs for those who make door knobs, doors, and steps and for those who build the houses and the plants.

I think if we trace back to the beginning of our confederation we will find that in times of trouble it was the job of the federal government to develop the economy on behalf of the people in the provinces, and it is that job which I think has been overlooked in the last decade. Our money should not be going into band-aids. Our money and our efforts should be going toward projects of real and lasting value to this nation.

Seventy thousand homes were supposed to be built in Canada this year, but they will not be built. Seventy thousand homes would create 100,000 jobs and leave 70,000 more housing units when those jobs are over. Some kind of subsidy program, in the face of high interest rates, would have produced those additional 70,000 homes, and in that way I think the money might have been better spent.

The program which was announced today is really an exercise in public relations which will not bear close scrutiny and examination. It is full of sympathetic words for the unemployed, but when we look at it closely we see that it reveals a tremendous number of basic inconsistencies. I do not know if that is a problem generated by the minister or a problem generated by his officials, but I would like to go into some of those inconsistencies arising out of the information which was presented to me today.

I think we need to look at the mathematics. First, the local economic development assistance program is going to cost $3 million of that $137 million, and in the minister's own background paper the number of jobs created by the expenditure of $3 million in that category is zero, so we are spending $3 million to create no jobs. In the question period the minister might care to bring us up to date on that.

I asked a question of the minister in the House of Commons a couple of weeks ago about which kinds of philosophy he might favour in the development of this program. The need for that kind of information becomes apparent when we look at the figures provided to us by the minister. In the community services area, if we transpose the figures presented by the minister, the cost to the public treasury for each job created on a 12-month basis would be $22,000. In the new technology area, which is really the only innovation, the cost to the public treasury will be $20,000. Those are the two highest priced job-creation measures: $22,000 a year for one job, or $20,000 in the case of new technology. The lowest cost job-creation measure, according to the minister's own figures, is the employment tax credit. The minister estimates a total cost of $900 to the public treasury for one job created. There is a difference of something in the order of 25 to 1 in terms of the cost of creating new jobs on the one hand with employment tax credits and, on the other hand, with direct job-creation measures.

What about the cost of training? There is quite a bit of information in here about the fact that $834 million will be spent on training. Of that amount, $22 million is an increase; that is a 2.5 per cent increase over the money already allocated by Parliament in the main estimates. It is certainly not a significant amount. There are many, many other examples of flimflam.

I understand that you would like me to wind down as quickly as I can, Madam Speaker, but let me say that we do not have a definition of what a job is. The minister talks about 192,000 jobs. Are those one week jobs, one day jobs, or 12-month jobs? He talks about creating employment in non-traditional training for women and says he will provide 75 per cent of the wage costs for that activity. I would point out that existing programs provide 60 per cent, and in fact if you are handicapped severely they provide 85 per cent. So the program he announced here today is either a little bit of an improvement or a decline from what is available.

There is not really much change in what the minister proposes. He identified 11 programs in his background paper. One of those programs is to create employment for 1,000 people. Only one program is new, the others are a rehash of existing expenditure patterns and existing programs.

When the minister spoke about community development projects he mentioned fisheries, energy conservation, tourism, community restoration, and he went on to say that it might help us fight fire and drought in the west. Surely those are activities normal and natural to governments at both the federal and provincial levels. Are these really job-creation projects, or is this the borrowing of money from other departments to flimflam the Canadian public into believing that there is some kind of clear and consistent job-creation effort coming out of the Department of Employment and Immigration?

The minister spoke about community service program jobs which will be paid for on a declining basis: 100 per cent the first, 66 per cent the second year, 33 per cent the third year and no cost in the fourth. I ask the minister if there is any intention on the part of the Minister of Finance to provide through the tax system better tax breaks for those who donate money to the private sector social welfare organizations. How can government start something without providing an opportunity for people in a local community to continue to make it grow and develop?

The minister bragged about the fact that in his estimates, without clearcut policy directives, 40 per cent of the jobs in training will go to women. Madam Speaker, around 45 per cent of unemployed people in Canada today are women. This program provides a disproportionate number of jobs to men. If the minister were really doing something to deal with the imbalance, we would find that 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the jobs were going to women. What he is doing is to perpetuate and intensify the disparity which already exists.

In summary, and in the questions which I hope we will be able to ask the minister subsequently, let me come back to the really basic issue, which is: is employment in Canada more likely to be the consequence of a fiscal policy? Are we, as taxpayers, better served when we provide subsidies to the private sector, or are we best served by direct employment-creation programs? I should like to engage in that debate in the context of Bill C-19 when it comes back on our plate. But I think it is impossible to proceed in a coherent fashion without clear answers on the differential costs and benefits from those three mechanisms.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) for providing me with a copy of his statement earlier today.

To say that the measures being proposed by the minister are disappointing would be to make the understatement of the year. With rare exception, Canada has had the highest number of unemployed workers of the seven major countries in the last ten years. As of April of this year there are officially 937,000 Canadians out of work, or 8.3 per cent of the work force. When the hidden unemployed are taken into account, that figure jumps to an estimated 1,462,000 unemployed Canadians, or 12.4 per cent of the work force.

Unemployment in Canada is a national disgrace, and in the face of that all the government is capable of doing is to bring in programs that are largely cosmetic in their treatment of the most serious problem facing Canada today.

Several weeks ago I had the opportunity to speak in this House on the bill brought forward by the minister to extend the provisions of the Employment Tax Credit Act. At that time I expressed the hope that this government was finally serious about bringing forward measures which would get our country back to work. However, I also said that the record of this government was such that I was not convinced we would see the kind of action required to get the job done. Now that I saw the statement made by the minister today which alleges to deal with "employment development in the 1980s", I am convinced that this government is not serious about our unemployment crisis, or is incapable of coping with it. Rather than bringing in programs to stimulate our economy and providing proposals for long-term job-creation, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is continuing to attack unemployment as if he were Canada's own Don Quixote, and he is doing about as much good.

Of the 14 programs to which the minister has addressed himself in the background papers which accompanied the statement, no less than eight have been in existence for some period of time, and the six new ones merely serve to indicate that the government recognizes there are problem areas within the larger problem of unemployment. These are all short-term and moderate cost programs.

There is not even a mention in this statement of the Liberal party's promise during the election campaign to develop an industrial strategy in Canada. There is no mention of the government's intention to regain control of our economy, either in the short or the long term. In fact there is nothing in this statement which will give Canadians assurances that this government is going to do much of anything to create meaningful long-term employment.

Placing an emphasis on skilled training, as these programs do, without referring to long-term job creation, simply means that somewhere down the road we will end up with an awful lot of unemployed skilled workers. Perhaps from the government's point of view it is preferable to be skilled and unemployed as opposed to being unskilled and unemployed, but this is not a view that our party shares. Rather than these measures providing solutions to unemployment, they tend to raise more questions than they provide answers.

Taking a look at the programs themselves, under the new technology employment program all I can see is that it provides band-aid measures, given that 660 jobs are to be created in 1980-81 and that there are some 2,500 Ph.D.s graduating each year. Under the critical trades skills training program, the government has allocated $30 million which, in my view, is a drop in the bucket when one considers the critical trade skill shortage in Canada. Predetermined labour short trade occupations beg the question: how does the minister define or determine what those are? Under the non-traditional training for women training programs, I should point out to the minister that there are around 393,000 women who are unemployed, and the minister is allocating $2 million to assist these women to enter non-traditional training. At the very least the minister should be embarrassed even to introduce this kind of program to this House for our consideration.

Under the native opportunities training program, again there is not enough money in view of the decision to let the Canada Works program continue as it is now. Canada Works excludes provinces like Manitoba and Saskatchewan where there are pockets of native unemployment ranging from 50 per cent to 90 per cent. Also the focus on major resource areas presents a problem as to what happens when the resource projects are completed, that is, skilled natives versus unskilled natives. Under the community development program, this is intended to work along the same line as Canada Works and LIP, with the exception of projects to be selected further to establish national and regional priorities.

The short-term results are that there will still be unemployment after the project is completed and there is not much money allocated to those programs. As I suggested, these programs raise more questions than they provide answers. If this government were serious about job creation, either in the short term or in the long term, it would have taken concrete action and accepted responsibility for the social and economic inequities being perpetrated on the Canadian population.

We need more than token gestures. We need to grasp firmly and control our abundant resource benefits. We need greater corporate financial responsibility in Canada. We need the creation of jobs and consequent reduction in unemployment, which should be one of the first priorities of this Parliament. A well-planned program of social reform must be initiated so that poverty can be completely eliminated. Low income and elderly people should be given a shelter allowance, bread and milk subsidies, and a tailor-made consumer price index should be brought down so that we can accurately assess their purchasing patterns.

A cost of living tax credit would help to alleviate the crush created by the drop in real purchasing power of family income. Inequities in income distribution should be attacked by the forms in the income tax, substituting refundable tax credits for some items which are tax deductible. We need to recognize and work toward a common goal, a guaranteed minimum income which would ensure that all members of our society receive a basic share of resources, goods and services as a part of their birthright. If this government were serious about doing something finally about the unemployment crisis in this country today, a crisis which was brought on by this administration over the last 11-year period, those are the kinds of things this government would do, instead of bringing in cosmetic items such as are contained in the program presented today which do nothing but help to cement the cynical attitude that the Canadian people have of this government and which certainly I, as a member of this Parliament, share with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). Is it on a question?

Mr. Hawkes: Yes, Madam Speaker. Is it possible to ask more than one?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member can ask one to begin with and we will see how long it lasts.

Mr. Hawkes: I will start with the simple question. In terms of his background paper, could the minister define what a job is?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, considering that the hon. member at one time was reputed to be an academic of some note in the definition of work, it strikes me as seemingly odd he would ask a question which he has already defined for himself. It is someone who is gainfully employed.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister indicate, whether my interpretation is correct—if somebody is employed on a project for one day or a half day, then that person is presumed to have been given a job by the public? Is that the kind of number we are dealing with in the minister's background paper?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is deliberately trying to confuse the issue. What we are talking about is that when we put these programs forward, the different organizations such as voluntary organizations, municipalities and others, make applications for projects which we will measure according to their meaningful value. Obviously a job that will last one day would have very little chance of being considered, certainly when one takes into account that we will be asking for assessment and measurement by members of Parliament who we know are always very discerning in their judgment and attitude.

Mr. Hawkes: Dealing with the 192,000 jobs the minister is asserting he is creating, if we were to use a different definition of 52 weeks of work, then we might be dealing with the public sector creating something like 30,000 or 40,000 jobs. Does the minister have an estimate of the more normal meaning of the word "job" where they last for a fiscal year?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, there is nothing that requires us to define a job as lasting a year. A job is when one is making an income for the work one is doing. We have estimated in the extension of the programs we have announced today, combined with those that will be brought about as a consequence of the employment tax credit, that we will be creating opportunities for well over 80,000 participants, whether they last nine months or a year. In some cases they will last beyond a year because we have said very clearly in these programs that under the community development projects, the community services program and others, they can last a year, 18 months, or three years. So, what we might lose on the nine-month end of it, we will pick up on the other end of it.

I do not want to tell the member something I assume he knows from his own background, but I think in any labour force people are constantly changing jobs and coming in and out of the work force. However, we are defining a series of work opportunities and training opportunities that are well defined by the sponsors of these or by the agencies that put them forward which would provide work particularly in those areas where work is most needed in the high unemployment areas that sometimes may last nine months or 15 months. We will be measuring and assessing those projects on their merits.

Employment Strategy

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I note with interest that the minister is now restricted by the envelope system in the amount of funds he can use. In the opening paragraphs he mentioned that the aim of this program is for fishing enhancement. I should like to ask the minister how much money was taken from the salmon enhancement program and applied to this program for the fishing enhancement part of it?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I should like to make one small correction in the statement of the hon. member. We were not limited so much by the envelope system but by the niggardly estimates that were put in by the previous government for job creation. That is what we were limited by.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: One thing which gave me frustration when I took on this portfolio was to realize the previous government had totally wiped out all the direct job-creation programs, so that applying employment opportunities in those areas where they were most severely needed, or to the groups that most needed it, was not possible because they were going to employ exclusively the tax credit system. According to my figures, for example, some 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the job credit programs do not go into the high unemployment areas. So, what we were basically limited in is the very poor judgment and poor choice of the previous government. We have attempted in our best efforts to try to improve that in the time we have had. If we had not done this now, there would have been a total vacuum in job creation in this country for the next six months and thereby there would have been very major problems created.

But I can assure the hon. member that we did not take any money from his salmon enhancement program. I have discussed with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) that if a department such as his wished to put up capital works or capital money of that kind, then we would add to it the employment money so that major fish enhancement programs could take place. I think that is something which would be determined and blueprinted in each local region. We will be establishing a very strong area of autonomy for each of our regional officers to consult with the provinces and the private sector in each of the provinces to tailormake a job-training program which best suits their area. In those cases other federal departments could come in and add capital moneys to provide for a supplement so that we can undertake larger projects.

Mr. Friesen: I am glad I had such a short question. Since the minister says he is taking nothing from the salmon enhancement program for the fisheries enhancement, I will be looking to the future to see whether the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) will be discussing the amount he is spending on the salmon enhancement program and allowing the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to make up for his shortfall.

I should like to ask the minister about what I believe is called the new critical trades training program, or an appellation such as that. That is a good bureaucratic word; in street language it is called an apprenticeship training program. Could I have a short answer to that?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, in each of the provinces there are a number of ways the provincial governments organize the training of skilled workers. What we attempt to provide through our critical skills program is ways of paying allowances and ways of helping them pay for those programs. In some cases it is applied to apprenticeship programs; in other cases it is applied directly to the employer to provide on-the-job training on the factory site. It has flexibility in its application. That is why we do not try to restrict it to one use or the other.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, in his statement the minister said he wants to aid target groups, and specifically he talked about the critical skill shortage in Canada. I have had some considerable experience in that particular area through the community college structure in Ontario. As a result of that experience I know personally that most employers have extreme difficulty in identifying the groups that the minister is attempting to identify. Could the minister advise the House what procedures or mechanisms he plans to use to do the kind of thing that employers seem incapable of doing?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I do not share the low regard for employers that the hon. member has. For the last two or three months I have been meeting with a variety of employment groups, both in the trade unions and in the products sector, and we have discussed the variety of skill shortages that they encounter. They know very well exactly what kinds of shortages they have. You only have to go onto the shop floor to know who they cannot employ. If it is a problem for those associated with the community colleges to identify that need, maybe that is one reason why we have difficulty, that those in the operation of educational institutions have not been communicating well enough with those actually working on the shop floor to identify what those needs are.

I can assure the hon. member that with the means we have available we put together a major catalogue of those areas where there are shortages, and we are attempting to work with each of the employment occupational groups. I would suggest to the hon. member that if he wants a good overview he should go back to the reports prepared by the previous Liberal government when they established the sector-by-sector approach, under the minister of state for economic development, which established a series of categories of skill needs in this country. I think that has proven to be very accurate forecasting.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. minister that I have a regard for employers about equal to his own. My comments were based on personal experience with them. The minister identified social services such as day care, crisis centres, and home care for the elderly, as essential services several years ago, or his ministry did. Would the minister tell the House whether the federal government has a commitment to see that these programs are not just implemented but are guaranteed to be ongoing? Are there any guarantees that after the programs have been completed they are not going to be left in the lurch and that there will be some federal moneys available, or will they be into short-term programs? What does the minister plan to do to make sure that those programs will be ongoing and will prove to be worth while? Could the minister give us some information in this respect?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I will be very pleased to answer the hon. member's question as I think it is an important one. We were approached by a number of organizations, particularly those representing women, which indicated that one of the real problems in developing proper opportunities for employment of women in this country was a lack of support services such as child care, lunch and after-school programs, and various other forms of support services in the community. What had happened in the last two or three years, because of a kind of neo-Conservative philosophy bandied about or displayed by too many provincial governments and municipal governments, was that those services were the first to be cut and were in short supply. We feel that through this kind of program we will be able to assist such groups to regenerate those kinds of programs. We made it very clear to them that we could not usurp the jurisdictional responsibility of provinces for ongoing services.

This program is designed to provide an extra boost for groups and organizations in the non-profit, volunteer sector to start new programs which would help them to strengthen their organizations. For example, if a group or organization in the child care field wanted to develop a new volunteer base for its program, or fund raising for its program, this program is designed to do that. As we pointed out in our statement, we have extended it over a three-year period. We would measure and judge the program on grounds which would either indicate it would terminate after those three years or provide ongoing support beyond that.

We are doing it on a trial basis to see if it will work. What we think is critical is that we provide employment opportunities in that field and at the same time provide the service that will enable other people to become employed.

Mr. Young: Past experience has shown, Madam Speaker, that once those programs have run their course and have proved to be useful to the community and the groups they were designed to assist, the funding has dried up, even though the need continues. The groups have been spending around 90 per cent of the staff's time and energy on fund-raising activities and the other volunteer services have been getting about 10 per cent.

Has the minister any specific plan to provide that once the funding has terminated this undesirable situation will not occur again, that there will be continued funding where these programs have proven successful to the community and the user groups?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, perhaps I can explain it to the hon. member this way, that the ongoing support for the social services communities must come basically from the provinces. As he well knows, at the present moment the federal government pays 50 per cent of most of the costs of CAP. Those programs will be renegotiated and discussed with the provinces as the agreements are put in place. We are not trying to displace that major, ongoing social service funding arrangement between the provinces and the federal government with this program.

What we are trying to provide are supplementary programs to enable community non-profit groups to engage in extra activities that they would not otherwise be able to afford. For example, some people I spoke to this weekend who are in the child care field said their workers are so busy trying to provide the basic services that they do not have time to extend any additional services in the community, to measure needs, to do fund raising, to strengthen their base, or to develop the parental, volunteer side of their organization. Under this kind of program they would have the means to strengthen their organization under well-defined program objectives.

We are not only attempting to provide employment opportunities, particularly for women who will be working in this field. These are the areas that were cut out by the previous government through Canada Works programs and by municipal and provincial governments. It will enable those existing organizations to provide for extra activities, and demonstration projects or innovative projects that they could test themselves, or to provide supplementary activity. That is the reason we are putting this program into effect—to provide employment and to help those organizations strengthen their activity.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have two questions, but I shall ask both at the same time. If the minister considers the over-all economic conditions in the country he will surely realize that in the auto industry, the farm implement industry, the housing industry, the steel industry, the retailing industry in general, the construction industry in general, and in the mining industry, there are massive employment cutbacks. Many people are being laid off in all those industries. Keeping that in mind, looking at the programs which the minister has brought in, and if we were in a period of full employment with many employment opportunities, and since this matter deals with a peripheral unemployment group, then I would say that this program is not bad.

Keeping in mind that we face massive unemployment and that we are following the economy of the United States into a further downturn, can the minister tell us exactly what programs such as these will do for people who are now becoming unemployed and who face the prospect of long-term unemployment because their jobs are disappearing due to the major downturn of the economies of the North American continent?

Can the minister specifically address himself to the matter of women in non-traditional trades where allowing $2 million to the extent of funding to 75 per cent of the total cost means 280 jobs at $10,000 a year per person. What in heaven's name is this supposed to do for unemployment?

Madam Speaker: I am glad that the hon. member decided to ask his two questions at once. I would ask the hon. member not to make a speech and be brief in his questions. We do not wish to spend too much time on this matter, although I know that there are other hon. members who wish to ask questions of the minister.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member asked four questions and made five statements, not just two questions. However, the hon. member asked a very legitimate question. I am sure that everyone in this House would agree that major changes are taking place in the economic and industrial structure of North America. The problem will not be solved in a matter of two or three months.

As I said in my statement, this is why we have introduced a parliamentary committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), so that all members may join in public consultation over the next two months or three months with all the people in the country who are affected, to make their representations and concerns known. At the same time I have established within my department a major task force staffed by people from throughout the public service to begin working at the long-term public requirements in Canada in the 1980s. This task force will be chaired by the deputy minister.

As a result of those two major initiatives, I hope to be able to come to this House by the end of next year, in either October, November or December, with a major paper which will outline the employment requirements, what the public sector should be doing and what the private sector should be doing. This paper will also give an indication of our future direction based on those two initiatives. I agree with the hon. member that we must take a look at these matters.

In the meantime, the hon. member should not judge these particular programs as the government's only answer. As I said in my statement, the government is spending over $800 million this year in training programs. What I did was that I put more money into that fund. Over 250,000 people are being trained at the moment in this country with the support of the government. It seems that the hon. members ignore this obvious fact, that the government has a number of initiatives already in place.

What the government has tried to do with this program is to add to and supplement the other programs to fill in some of the vacuum areas, mainly in the area of direct job-creation programs. The government is fully aware of and sensitive to the needs, and it is trying to respond. As a responsible government should do, it is consulting first with those who are affected, looking at and reviewing its own programs, and, in the six fiscal months remaining in this year, it is using all the available resources to apply to the hardest core problems, the special target needs in our society.

We must remember that what this program is doing is not with regard to a full year's financing. The cabinet was formed on March 4. There are only six months remaining in this fiscal year, and those are the months in which the $137 million will be applied. We cannot measure, as did the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), on the basis of a full year. What we are trying to do is correct the mistakes of the Conservative government.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have a list of the hon. members who have risen. I will allow only one question each. The list includes the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley), the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner), the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). The hon. members may not be called in that order to ask their questions. I would ask all hon. members to state their questions carefully and briefly. Each questioner will be allowed only one question, otherwise we will be here until five o'clock.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I have a point of order. I have been on my feet from the beginning, and I did not hear my riding called out as one on the list. I hope that you will include me.

Madam Speaker: That is true. The hon. member is on the list. There is another piece of paper here.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a few very specific questions for the minister.

An hon. Member: One question.

Mr. Allmand: It is one question, and I will get on with it. I believe that the minister mentioned in his statement that constituency advisory groups will be reintroduced. I would like to know whether those constituency advisory groups which, by the way, were abolished by the previous government last year, when it did away with the entire Canada Works program for the west end of Montreal, will apply to all the community programs, will the money be allocated on a constituency basis, and will there be a minimum amount of money for each constituency, which was not the case under the Conservative program.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very pertinent question. I would like to answer yes to all three of his questions: Yes, the money will be allocated right across Canada, one region will not be selected over another, and there will be a basic constituency allocation for every constituency. There will be factors built in with regard to those areas of high unemployment, and those areas which have special needs such as native organizations will get a larger amount for distribution. Each constituency will have a basic amount for its community development program. The constituency advisory groups that we established are being designed to enable a full and accurate reading of the real priorities in those areas. This reading will be provided through the person who is perhaps in the best position to judge, the member of Parliament.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the minister in his statement indicated that while governments can move in these areas, there is a limit to what they can do, and that government efforts by themselves are not sufficient. What is required is a sound economic program to involve the private sector in job creation, co-operation between the provinces, and a whole host of other requirements. I am sure that one of the things which the minister would have in mind to assist what he has indicated is only a stop-gap measure to augment a program that is in existence now, would be some basis upon which he and we, as members of Parliament, and the public that we represent could understand the economic plan and economic direction of the government.

The minister must be as confused as everyone else with regard to the statements made by the deputy minister of finance in the Senate the other day and the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in the House about whether we will allow the deficit to grow or to decrease. It is a confusing situation not only to employers but to everyone else.

Would the minister, given the importance of a sound base upon which any employment program can be built, call upon the Minister of Finance to end the uncertainty by bringing forth a plan of action and a budget so that the minister and other ministers will finally have some sense of direction as to where this country will go, and so that there can be real fight against unemployment in this country?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would want to say to the hon. member that it depends on which side of the House one is on as to how one hears things. I am most impressed by the clarity and logic of the Minister of Finance in presenting the economic position of this government. By comparison to the statement made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), when he predicted in his budget speech last December, that an additional 200,000 people in the country would be employed, the statements made by the Minister of Finance are exemplary.

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question will take some leading into, but I will be brief. The minister has indicated to the House that he has done nothing but shuffle old money into new programs. He seems to ignore the fact that the government is borrowing $3 billion more than the Conservative government intended to borrow, which suggests that the minister has lost the fight for more money for more programs. That is the first point, and it is indicative.

My second point before I lead into the question is that the government in its previous incarnation as a government promised the Canadian people support for urban transit. It boot-legged that in later on top of the program which was used to help solve the problem of railways at overcrossings, and called it the urban transit program. Today the minister indicated, after releasing the press release, that the major component of the program, the $100 million—which he indicates is no more money to be redistributed than there was in the beginning—will also be used for industrial relocation relief and for help in drought situations.

Is the minister, in fact, not saying to this House that he has lost the fight for more money for job creation? Second, has he already had to concede that some of those funds should be stripped from job creation for local salvation problems where they exist and are in real need, that those funds are going to be stripped from job creation programs so that in fact under this program we are going to wind up with substantially less money in direct job creation than would have been true?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I find that a very surprising question. When I became the minister of this department there was no money for direct job creation. The Tories had stripped the funds totally from the estimates. There was not a cent left for direct job creation.

What we have tried to do is to restore the concept of direct job creation so that we can target in on very specific areas of unemployment because there was no money left in the budget by the previous administration to do that. It had decided, I guess for philosophical reasons which I accept, that the only means of creating jobs would be through the tax credit system. What was very clear in our measurement, that while the tax credit system has utility in some areas, and has been an effective program in part, it cannot be used to target in on the special problems of women, or of natives or the problems of high unemployment areas. The tax credit system is not employed, for example, in areas where there is unemployment over 11 per cent or 12 per cent, where there is not a small business component to take advantage of it. He says shuffle the money around. It is not so easy to shuffle the money around when the money is not there to begin with. What we had to do is restore direct expenditures of the government in the job-creation field because those direct expenditures had been removed.

I would say to the hon. member that I do not agree that calling a necessity to respond to problems of reforestation, for example, in northern forests or on the prairie regions, is just simply a make-work project. There are major economic problems in those areas. I think nothing could be more useful than for this government to assist, whether it be in Windsor or in northern Manitoba, those Canadians to get back on their feet and start recreating an economic base. That goes back to the original principle of our statement: do we want to create work that serves more useful, meaningful job opportunities and national objectives? That is what we are trying to do. We are trying to twin those two objectives so that we get more "bang for the buck".

Employment Strategy

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister regarding the programs, particularly those directed toward women, at least that is the suggestion in the statement. There has been a good deal of rhetoric expressed in recent months concerning the role of women. Certainly in the Speech from the Throne there were some welcome initiatives that were proposed. However, I would suggest that the amount of $2 million which is allocated in this particular program is really an insult to Canadian women, and what we should be looking at is a far greater amount in direct funding rather than essentially a bribery of the corporate sector to the tune of 75 per cent of the cost of the jobs.

I ask the minister to indicate in this area, partly as the minister responsible for the status of women, now that he has finally had a chance to put his rhetoric into action, whether this is the best that he can come up with. First will he not make a commitment to this House to restore the funding to Outreach programs which was slashed by the previous Liberal government? Second, will he not make a commitment to make direct funding for child care facilities, instead of hoping that some of the other funding which he has proposed will trickle down to the child care area? One of the ways in which women can be encouraged to enter the labour market is by adequate child care being available. Will the minister ensure that there will be substantially increased funding for child care?

Third, will the minister assure us that there will be tough affirmative action taken in the public sector to lead the way in this important area, rather than just making a suggestion that $2 million, which is really a slap in the face to Canadian women, is adequate to deal with the serious problems facing women in this time of difficult unemployment for all Canadians?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, it is sometimes unfortunate that certain members of this House are so eager and active in trying to engage in their own rhetoric that they refuse to see the real value when certain initiatives are being taken.

I feel that it is too bad that the hon. member would be so anxious to condemn what is basically an important issue that has been discussed with a number of womens' organizations across this country. I would say to hon. members that, in discussing the problem with a group called women in trades, for example, the fundamental problem that they faced after they had acquired certain skills in the workplace was providing an opportunity in the private employment sector to gain access into the specific shop.

I am trying to answer the question. If the hon. member does not want to listen, then maybe we should not talk about it. But I want to answer this question as honestly as I can.

When we examined what we could do and discussed it with different groups, they said that it is a starter program. You cannot inject a massive new program with money without seeing if it works. We put the money in. As I said, it is only within the latter six months of this fiscal year. If it proves to be effective, as I said in my statement, we will substantially enhance that program as a way of ensuring that women get that opportunity in the non-traditional fields. But first we have to test it out. That is the intention of the program, namely, to test that particular formula to see if it works. If it works, I will guarantee to the hon. member that there will be substantially more funds for that program, and for other programs. But I am not going to rush into a program and spend all kinds of money without having an idea of whether it works or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: For the hon. member's information, at the present moment we have close to 80,000 women in training programs across Canada. By talking about 600 or 800, the hon. member does a disservice to mention those figures. There are close to over 80,000 women in training programs sponsored by the federal Government of Canada across the nation.

I can also tell the hon. member that the funds to Outreach have already been restored and we intend to increase them and develop new Outreach programs. We are consulting on that aspect at the present moment. As far as affirmative action is concerned, I would certainly tell the hon. member that we are presently working on an affirmative action program both in the private sector where we have signed a number of agreements with private sector employers, and we will be applying the same system to the public sector. We are presently negotiating to make that happen. I think that the hon. member will find that we will be living up exactly to the commitments made in the throne speech.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the minister has not lost his temper yet. My question deals with the native opportunities training program. First, I would like the minister to clarify that the three defeated Liberal candidates whom he appointed in Manitoba and who reported to him yesterday on native employment projects will in no way be held responsible for the programs that are suggested today.

An hon. Member: That is western input.

Mr. Murphy: I am sure that they would not like to be blamed for any of the programs that came forward. Obviously if they made the report yesterday, they have no impact.

I would like the minister to explain how, by September of this year, he expects to find 3,900 training positions in the provincial institutions and in industry. I do not believe that by September this year it is possible to get these positions in line. I do not believe it is possible, especially in light of what the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) said, to find positions in industry at this time. I think we are looking at a bunch of paper figures, that it is not actually possible to do what the minister is saying.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I can only comment on the total lack of faith which the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) constantly displayed in his statement about the ability of people to put things into effect when they want to. It may be that he is slow in moving on things, but we do not intend to be.

In this program we have already had several negotiations with native organizations. We do not intend to restrict our assistance simply to provincial institutions or to the workplace. We are also negotiating with a number of native organizations across Canada to see how we can assist them establish their own native training programs which would come with our basic principle of government, which is to increase the autonomy and self-sufficiency of native organizations across Canada.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question deals with a matter in which I have a special concern. I refer to the employment program and more particularly community development projects, community service projects, economic development assistance and so on. Are municipalities, municipal agencies, municipal libraries or other government levels eligible under those programs and, if so, can we take it that some municipalities might be interested in being actively involved and becoming the driving force behind those new schemes for the creation of employment?

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, with respect to those programs I would tell the hon. member that in most of the cases the programs that we have announced, particularly those dealing with the leader program, we would welcome the participation of the municipalities. There are certain provinces, one in particular that is bordering on this province that we are now residing in, which does not allow the municipalities to participate directly in these programs.

● (1620)

As I said, I met with the provincial ministers to consult with them. What we intend to do is to allow each of our regional officers to sit down with provincial officials, private sector people and community people, to design a blueprint that is suitable for each of those regions.

In the application of the LEDA project, we would hope to have 15 to 18 of these projects in place by the end of next year. In these projects what we basically do is enable a community, a small growth community or even a downtown urban community, to establish a non-profit development corporation that would include representatives of the municipality, the business sector and the local residents. We would assist them to develop that corporation and provide seed money so they could take loans to establish new businesses. It is a way to try to get away from the short-term job creation and into long-term economic development programs.

I think it is one of the most exciting possibilities we have in terms of a new approach to job creation in Canada. If those 18 projects work, then we will expand the program, obviously. We would request and encourage municipalities to be involved in helping us with these programs.

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the minister, it is an embarrassment and an insult to the Canadian people—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Kushner: Just a minute. I am just getting to the question. My question is: how can you blame the Conservative government when you have been in power for 11 years and you are still forming a committee to try to find out what the problem is? It does not make any sense.

Mr. Regan: Is he allowed to criticize the government?

Mr. Kushner: My question to the minister is: in the technical and trade field, will the minister inform this Parliament if the trades in fact will be recognized by the apprenticeship board?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure. Perhaps the hon. member could repeat his question.

Mr. Kushner: Does the minister know what a trade is, that you have to serve an apprenticeship and it has to be recognized by the apprenticeship board, the union, or whatever technical trade you may take? Have the unions agreed?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member obviously knows, because he purports to be knowledgeable in this field, the apprenticeship program is under the provincial jurisdictions. They establish both programs and they establish the apprenticeship board. What we can do through our program is assist in the allowances paid to apprentices going into those programs. We have nothing to do with the licensing or authority dealing with the apprenticeship program.

I have met with all my provincial counterparts as well as having spoken to them on the phone. We have received proposals from them. We have indicated to them that we are prepared to co-operate if they want to extend their apprenticeship programs. The one thing that we do insist upon is that those apprenticeship programs have a much higher involvement of women and other people and not be so restricted. It is up to the provinces to negotiate the actual design of the apprenticeship program; that is a very clear constitutional authority. What we can simply do is aid and assist them in those areas.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I have a concern regarding the community services project set up with the funding of 100 per cent, 66 per cent and 33 per cent, a diminishing funding program for setting up various projects within communities. Has the minister looked into the experience of other government projects with diminishing grants from government to see the disaster that they have been? In fact once the federal funding has disappeared, the projects tend to disappear as well, or they are back at the door of another level of government asking for the funding that has been lost from the federal government.

I am thinking of an AHOP program, for example, which is a prime example of a program that in its original concept looked good on paper, sounded great, but when you put human nature into it, it turned out to be a real problem child. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) likes to say that it is 95 per cent successful. I want to hear what he is going to say a year from now when all those mortgages come due.

In this particular program, has that type of thing been looked into? I am concerned that communities will be encouraged to establish these various projects, and then you will start withdrawing the funding and do not have suitable funding to replace it, and the good of the program will be lost.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I think that is a very legitimate question. It is one that we addressed a fair amount of time to, and one that we did talk to the provinces about. It is fair to say that we would not want to be in the position where we were simply designing programs that would then take flight and then come to a sudden thud. The reason for that in the previous programs was that it was usually just one-year funding and they would come to a dead stop.

What we would indicate, under the directions and instructions surrounding this program, is that those who apply for them would have to understand very clearly the terms of the programs. We have extended it to a two-year basis. Along the way they will have to become either self-sufficient or simply apply for a year or two to complete an actual project. When it is designed, as I tried to answer another hon. member when he raised the question, it is designed as a supplementary auxiliary program to allow those organizations to do things that they otherwise could not do because they would not have the people in place to do it.

We do not intend to replace or displace the base funding of a community served between the social services. That is a matter for a much broader negotiation between our government and the provincial governments in terms of the funding of health, community services, and cultural services.

What this will enable many of the organizations to do is to provide programs which they otherwise would not be able to provide in that time period of one, two or three years.

Just to give another example that comes to mind, there are a number of organizations trying to deal with the problem of immigrant women coming to this country, women who have arrived through the new refugee program. It is a program that is necessary to provide for education, counselling or services within the community. It is that kind of program for which this community services project would be ideally suited. They would have to define very carefully the objectives of the program. They have to understand that after three years it would terminate and they would have to become self-sufficient under those terms. What we would obviously want to have happen is that these programs would be worked out even on regional levels with our directors general of regional commissions, with the provinces and community service sector, so the programs would be well understood according to those criteria.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-597, to amend the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission Act (provincial representation).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, we have arrived at a critical junction in our country's history. The vastness and diversity of Canada have always contributed to conflicting demands upon the federal system. Today these demands have climaxed into separatist movements in both the east and the west.

I do not pretend that this bill, the first of three which I will be introducing dealing with the question of provincial representation, will make more than a modest effort to slow down the divisive tendencies so evident in our society today. But I would like to think that these bills are in keeping with the spirit expressed both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the House following the referendum, when they spoke of the legitimate aspirations of all Canadians and the need for more effective and representative national institutions and mechanisms.

My bills do recognize that provinces have legitimate aspirations and moreover, valid demands for input into decision making when the outcome of those decisions is of fundamental importance to them.

As it presently stands, the act establishing the Canadian Radio-television Commission does not provide for provincial input into the appointing of commissioned membership. Changing the act to require the approval of the majority of provinces for these appointments would go a long way toward overcoming provincial accusations that the federal government is ignoring the concerns of those regions outside of central Canada. These changes would, in effect, provide a mechanism whereby the provinces could ensure that their concerns would be recognized. At the same time these amendments would ensure that the administrative efficiency of the commission would not be impaired.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—TRANSFER AND ACQUISITION OF LAND AND BUILDINGS

Question No. 339—Mr. Herbert:

Since April 1976, what properties, land and/or buildings have been (a) transferred out of (b) acquired by, the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

(a) 1. Westminster Hospital, London, Ontario, real property (lands and buildings) on the north side of Commissioner's Road (79.12 acres) transferred to the province of Ontario under the authority of order in council (PC-1977-3198, dated November, 1977).

2. Westminster Hospital, London, Ontario, real property (lands and buildings) on the south side of Commissioner's Road (246.5 acres), transferred to the province of Ontario under the authority of order in council PC 1979-1460, dated May 9, 1979.

3. Queen Mary Veterans Hospital, Montréal, Québec, real property (lands and buildings) transferred to the province of Québec under the authority of order in council PC 1978-8/2264, dated August 4, 1977. Acreage 20.8.
4. Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax, Nova Scotia, real property (lands and buildings) transferred to the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of order in council PC 1978118/723, March 9, 1978. Acreage 11.8.
5. Colonel Belcher Hospital, Calgary, Alberta, real property (lands and buildings) transferred to the province of Alberta under the authority of order in council PC 1979-5/2919, dated October 25, 1979. Acreage 3.5 approximately.
6. Lots 29 and 30, Block 70, Plan A-1, Calgary declared surplus to departmental needs and now administered by Public Works Canada.

(b) Nil.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—LAWYERS ON STAFF

Question No. 612—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has no lawyers on its staff. Lawyers assigned to the department are employees of the Department of Justice (4).

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 701—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of National Defence for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the national capital region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Ten.

2. (a) 10, (b) and (c) Nil.

3. Four.

4. $55,467.50.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—LIST OF VENDORS—LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Question No. 926—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 670, which states in part, that the Department of Supply and Services does not compile lists by electoral districts for the purposes of calling tenders on an invitation basis, did the department furnish the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on November 9, 1979 with a list of those used for inviting tenders for Leeds-Grenville and, if so (a) was the list headed "Leeds-Grenville Vendor List" (b) how does the government explain the discrepancy in the answer to the question?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The department did provide the hon. member on November 9, 1979, a list of vendors registered with the department and located in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville.

(a) The list was headed "Leeds-Grenville Vendor Listing".

(b) The list is not "used for inviting tenders for Leeds-Grenville". The list was extracted at the request of the hon. member's office and drawn on the basis of postal codes for the constituency.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1980-81

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed from Thursday, May 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise to oppose the bill now before the House. As a matter of interest I note there are now 19 members sitting on the benches opposite. I wonder how many of them will still be in the House at the end of my remarks. That will be a process of deflation; I shall be talking mostly about inflation.

An hon. Member: Count your own side!

Mr. Kilgour: I am sorry, I left out members of the New Democratic Party. There are six of them here.

As hon. members know, the bill authorizes the government to borrow $12 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81. Some of us do not know what $12 billion really amounts to, so I made some calculations last night. The Ottawa Journal tells us that a Silver Shadow Rolls Royce now sells for a mere $138,000. So according to my calculations, $12 billion would provide 140,000 "Silver Shadows"—enough to buy one Rolls Royce for every man, woman and child in the city of Saskatoon.

An hon. Member: Why not do it?

Mr. Kilgour: A lot of Rolls Royces, Mr. Speaker! That example might help in putting this figure of $12 billion into perspective. As members know, the amount deals with projected budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements tabled on April 21. I should like to begin by placing before the House examples of the way in which past Liberal governments have spent the taxpayers money. It goes without saying, I believe, that the policy of the present government, if it follows the pattern of Liberal governments in the past, will be: spend and spend, don't tax and don't tax, in an attempt to elect and elect. The examples I have selected are taken from a book entitled "A Legacy of Spending", published on the west coast; this is the second printing, I understand it has gone through many more since this edition was published. I bring them before the House on the premise that most Canadians will see the link between deficit spending and inflation, which is what most of us are concerned about. My first example, taken from this work, might be called item one:

Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau went on national television in a major press conference to talk to the Canadian people about inflation and the country's financial future. He said this—

There are, now, I think, only 17 members sitting opposite.

"We would be on the way to national disaster if nothing were done to bring spending under control. To spend vast sums on welfare, education and other programs while allowing inflation to continue—

Mr. Manly: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kilgour: By all means, at the end of my talk. The quotation goes on:

—would merely place hundreds of thousands of Canadians on a treadmill they could not escape."

The Prime Minister also committed the government to a substantial cut in the federal civil service.

What has happened since August 13, 1969? According to this work, government spending has increased by $34 billion.

Item number two is a quotation from the Canadian Press in The Province dated Thursday, November 3, 1977.

Finance Minister Jean Chrétien introduced legislation in the Commons which would give the government authority to borrow up to $9 billion . . . the request for new borrowing authority comes on top of a $17 billion authority to borrow which the government received in March of this year.

Now, of course, the government is asking for $12 billion, so presumably at the rate these demands are increasing it will be asking for authority to borrow $18 billion of $19 billion by fiscal 1984, if it is still in office.

My next item, number three, is a quotation from the Nobel Prize Winner in Economics, Milton Friedman, speaking on CBC Radio on February 20, 1977:

There is only one place where inflation is made in Canada, and that is Ottawa. The unions don't make inflation for the simple reason that the unions do not own a printing press on which they can turn out those multi-coloured pieces of paper called money. The reason you have inflation is because the government has been printing too much and spending too much.

An example of this which many of us think of, though it is not in this book, is the loss of $130 million which Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, a Crown corporation, incurred selling its Candu reactor to Argentina, of all places.

The next example has to do with contracts. I believe members opposite know very well what contracts to their friends and consultants have amounted to over the years.

During 1975 and 1976 there were about 5,000 outside people under contract to the federal government to 72 departments, agencies or Crown corporations. The total cost to the Canadian taxpayer in those two years was some $148 million.

The latest example of what I call the government's use of contracts to reward its friends is that of the contract which was awarded to their candidate in Calgary West, Doug Laughlin, whom I know and find to be a pleasant individual. He has been hired by the Minister of Immigration and Transport at a salary, I am informed, of $50,000 a year, which is higher, I understand, than any other member of the same department.

I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) conceded last week that a large part of his job, if not the only part of his job, would be to try to build up the Liberal party in western Canada. I assure hon. members opposite that it will take more than Doug Laughlin or 50 or 100 Doug Laughlins at $50,000 a year to do anything about getting the Liberal party off the ground or out from under the ground in western Canada. However, I cite that as one example of why hon. members opposite are asking for $12 billion in borrowing authority.

Item number five is simply figures respecting the deficits of the Post Office. I will only give the last few because it will get monotonous if I go beyond that. In 1972-73 the deficit was $90 million. In 1973-74 it was $177 million. In 1974-75 it was $320 million. In 1975-76 it was $546 million. In 1976-77 it was $671 million. In 1977-78 it was $567 million. I am told that the current deficit for the Post Office is of the order of approximately $700 million.

I am also told that the agreement the government has entered into with CUPW is worth approximately $20 million. Other unions will understandably want the same thing in terms of lunch breaks, and this will increase the deficit by about $30 million. When all the other government agencies and public employees ask for the same thing, that could amount to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Item number six deals with the question of the burden of debt. Please bear in mind that this is a couple of years old, but I do not think the situation has improved. The total direct government debt at the end 1976 was $96 billion, of which about $60 billion was owed by the federal government. I am quoting here:

Canadian governments are already deeply in debt at a time when they ought to be able to borrow to stimulate recovery. They have gone into debt to provide services and allowances the economy could not afford—to cover deficits, in fact. Governments have taken too much of the capital that was needed by private industry to build new or expanded plants—

I add parenthetically that that seems to have a relevance to what we were discussing a few moments ago.

—to create manufacturing jobs and beyond them service jobs. Servicing the enormous debt burden can only increase taxes (or borrowing, which in the end would be worse), and that can only further impair our already poor competitive position in world trade. Politics there has been. Foresight there has not.

Let me point out that interest charges on the public debt from January 1, 1976, to September 30, 1977, have amounted to $8 billion.

Item seven might be repetitive, but it is interesting. I am not sure of the date of this article, but it is a Canadian Press article and reads in part as follows:

The words of Paul Gérin-Lajoie, former president of the Canadian International Development Agency, did not come cheaply for the Canadian taxpayer.

In fact, it cost more than $20,000 to prepare and publish a speech he gave last May in Montreal, entitled The Arab World and Canada: Prospects for Co-operation.

Mr. Evans: Did you lose your place?

An hon. Member: How long is this going to take?

Mr. Kilgour: Item number nine deals with annual reports from the Canada Council, and there are seven or eight pages or grants by the Canada Council. I think some of them are quite amusing, in a sick way. The first one is for $32,972 "to study the prehistoric cultural ecology of Caspian Escargotieres in North Africa between 8000-5000 B.C.". The next one is a mere $7,395 "to conduct research in England, Louisiana and California on administration values and logic". The next one is a mere $4,280 "to study what people do with themselves when they don't have something to do".

Mr. Collenette: They speak in the House of Commons.

Mr. Kilgour: I think this one is priceless: $170,000 "to study air-breathing fish of the Amazon River". The preparation of a book on the functioning of the state cost $30,000. A study on the structure of households and social mobility in Graz, Austria from 1857 to 1910 cost $25,390.

The next item is under the heading " 'Madness' as reported by the Auditor General", and I quote:

A judge who sat on the bench for only seven months was given a pension of $18,677 a year and was paid a salary of $98,591. He was arraigned on criminal charges arising out of stock dealings of Northern Ontario Natural Gas stock. The judge was acquitted at his second trial.

Under the heading "What's a Million", Don Sellar of the Southam News Service wrote in November of 1977:

As even the wealthiest of men will tell you, a million dollars won't buy very much these days.

Probably no one knows this better than the Trudeau government, which spends several million dollars each year while running up deficits of several million more.

Here's a $1.1 million federal government shopping list culled from the files:

—Flag display kits, the answer to our national unity woes, $421,000;

—Preparations for a study of "dynamic fatigue in flat grass," a measly $100,000;

—A supply of "projectile simulators," $308,227;

Another item in the Vancouver Sun of June 27, 1974, carried the heading "The public paid $99,000 to create two jobs". It explains how $99,000 of our tax money went to create two jobs. I wonder if the jobs are still going.

The following might be of some interest particularly perhaps to members of Parliament. This item is entitled "It's a Sweetheart of a Pension Scheme".

A member of Parliament is eligible for pension after six years of consecutive service. It is possible for a person to be elected to the House of Commons at the age of 18, retire six years later, and go on immediate pension for the rest of his life.

The pension is based on the best consecutive six years of earnings by the MP Example: based on an average salary over the last six years of $20,000, an MP with—

Then it gives some figures. A member of Parliament with six years' service would receive $325 a month; with eight years' service, $466 a month; with ten years' service, $583 a month; with 15 years' service, $833 a month. How the Canadian public puts up with that is beyond my ken.

The next item is headed "The Prime Minister's Office, Cost of Operation Year by Year". In 1968-69 the cost was $767,000. In 1969-70 the cost was $1,103,000. In 1970-71 the cost was $900,000. In 1971-72 the cost was $1,131,000. I am rounding these off a little bit. It gets boring, does it not? In 1976-77 the cost was $2,270,000. In 1978-79 the cost was $2,676,000.

Mr. Evans: Try 1979-80.

Mr. Kilgour: I am sorry. I do not have that figure, but perhaps that question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Put it on, John.

Mr. Anguish: If you are out of words, count the members again.

Mr. Kilgour: I think some of the members are getting restless. I will quote from a letter to an editor to try to perk them up. This letter was written by Simma Holt, who used to be a member of this House. It is hard to pick out which part to quote.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Quote it all.

Mr. Kilgour: I will just quote the first paragraph. I know hon. members would like more. Simma Holt was writing to the editor of the Vancouver Sun, and she wrote the following:

On November 12 you carried a letter with a large picture of a dewy-eyed girl suggesting that I was a cruel, heartless woman because I refused to give this young lady and her small group $50,310 in Local Initiatives Project funds, thus depriving the old, young, disabled and sick—all those who sound helpless and pathetic.

She did not tell you, nor did you check far enough to find out for yourself:

—That this small group, using several names, working out of one small office, have been living off the public purse for the past three years;

● (1650)

If anybody wants to see more, I will be happy to show them the article.

The next one is a piece headed "Liberal Ridings Cash in on LIP" and the subheading reads "$106 million". Then I will quote Ian Hunter from the Vancouver Sun Ottawa Bureau. It reads:

Liberal ridings received nearly twice as much as Conservative ridings in LIP funds in 1972-73. Urban affairs minister Ron Basford's—

He is more or less defunct as a member of Parliament.

—riding received more than any other represented by a cabinet minister.

It mentions some other ministers' ridings. It says that the riding of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) only got $2.8 million, that Westmount—which again has a Liberal minister—got $2.6 million, that Rosedale got $1.6 million—I wonder how much it will get this year—and the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) riding only got $615,000.

The final item here is a simple quote from an article of December 1, 1977, headed "Federal Spending Still Out of Control", quoting J. J. Macdonell. It would appear from the amount of the loan that the government is more than ever out of control in terms of spending.

I see I am going to run out of time, Mr. Speaker, so let me say something about the connection that this sort of spending has with inflation. At least in my riding inflation is one of the largest concerns of people who expressed this view to me. Again I am referring to a projected deficit of $14 billion, which hon. members opposite have indicated to us during the throne speech debate.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly now about what some of the leading world economists have said about inflation, and this might be applicable to Canada. I say that in that context, to buy what 45 cents would buy in 1968 now requires slightly more than $1 in Canada. First is Paul Samuelson who, I think, members will be aware is probably the dean of the economics profession in the United States. Literally millions of Canadian and American students have read his books. I think his views on inflation might be of interest to the House. He wrote that inflation —can be stopped by reducing government spending, raising tax rates and swinging the budget into balance or surplus.

This appears to remain Dr. Samuelson's thoughts on inflation and deficit spending.

Second, let us refer to Milton Friedman who, like Samuelson, writes a weekly column in Newsweek magazine and won the Nobel prize for economics a few years ago. As hon. members here will know, he is the leader of the monetary school of economists and is clearly more professionally concerned with inflation than is Dr. Samuelson. Friedman has written that the way a government—

An hon. Member: What are your views?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kilgour: There are nine members opposite left in the House, if my adding is right, and they are making a noise over there. Here we are talking about inflation. Mr. Friedman wrote that the way a budget deficit is financed is the heart of the inflation problem. In his view, money supply changes alone account for long-term price changes. In his opinion, the only condition for prosperity without inflation is for the central bank to:

—stabilize the rate of increase in the money supply at a rate approximately equal to the real rate of growth in the economy, say 4 per cent to 5 per cent per annum.

What is not appreciated is that he is not opposed to deficits in times of unemployment, but would not allow governments to pay for them by means of new currency printed for that exclusive purpose. He says that politicians permitted to meddle with money simply print too much of it, which in turn brings inflation, destroys the frugal instincts of its citizens and in turn:

—creates conditions that force governments to play a larger role in the system. In due course, inflation leads to economic collapse, climbing unemployment, and hence an even larger role for the state.

Some hon. members will recall a few years ago when the government of Mr. Callaghan in Britain was finally converted, I think. Inflation then was running in Britain at about 25 per cent a year and unemployment, interestingly, had never been higher since the great depression. Trying to convince people that inflation and unemployment are connected is a difficult but worth-while task, in my view.

Next I should like to refer to John Kenneth Galbraith who, as we all know, was originally a Canadian and has written many books. It is interesting to note that as early as 1952 he concluded that inflation was:

—the clear and present economic danger of our times.

In "The Affluent Society", which we probably all read, Galbraith wrote that inflation:

—falls on the weakest members of society, those with fixed incomes and those too poor or powerless to bargain for compensating wage increases.

His solution, as many of us know, is price controls backed by appropriate fiscal and monetary policy.

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to conclude at five o'clock, or perhaps just before five o'clock to allow my hon. friend a question. But before concluding let me say that, in my view, Canada can have full employment without inflation. Members opposite, particularly members of the NDP, might ask: how can you do that? My submission is that the only way we can do it is the way that West Germany and Japan have done it, namely, with a sound fiscal and monetary policy.

I have a friend who recently visited Japan where, incidentally, unemployment now is at about 1.6 per cent. You will get disputes on what inflation is presently in Japan and West Germany, but it is certainly below the 9 per cent we have in Canada. In fact I understand it was less than 4 per cent in Germany until very recently. I see that hon. members opposite are disputing that. I did say it was open to dispute as to what it is this month or last month, but over the last year my understanding is that it is less than 5 per cent or 6 per cent in both countries, for a very good reason. The reason is that they recognize what inflation will do to their country and what continued gross financial irresponsibility will do to Canada or to any other country, and it is on that basis that I think members on this side of the House recognize that we cannot go on running up larger and larger deficits or we will end up, as West Germans know so well, literally using a wheelbarrow to go to the store to buy groceries.

An hon. Member: Call it five o'clock.

Mr. Kilgour: I do not wish to call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, because my friend in the NDP will call me a coward. May I accept his question and stop prior to five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It will have to be with the unanimous consent of the House because it is now five o'clock. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been quoting from the book "A Legacy of Spending" written, I believe, by a Mr. Murphy, and he has been quoting it with some approval. I wonder if the hon. member is aware that Mr. Murphy has been convicted in court in British Columbia of attempting to bribe a cabinet minister in the British Columbia government in order to remove land from the agricultural land resource.

● (1700)

Mr. Kilgour: Of course it has nothing to do with the quotes.

Mr. Manly: It has a great deal to do with the quotes.

Mr. Kilgour: I can assure the hon. member that the quotes were almost entirely ones from newspaper articles or other material. Even the Minister of Finance will tell us things which, if they are correct, we accept. Having been a Crown attorney in British Columbia for nine years, I can assure the hon. member that I have no sympathy with Mr. Murphy.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman)—Environmental Affairs—Detrimental effects from volcanic ash eruption of Mount St. Helens; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—External Affairs—Reunification of families—Representations to U.S.S.R.; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Nuclear Energy—Underground water disposal research project in Manitoba.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY AND INCREASE IN MONTHLY BENEFITS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $400 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I suppose I shall be stating the obvious if I suggest that this motion is in a field concerning which I have made a few speeches before today. As a matter of fact, although my concerns for the people I represent touch all areas of their lives, my concern most often expressed in this House during the years that I have been here has been for senior citizens, veterans, and others who deserve better than they are receiving.

As I have said on previous occasions, it was probably in the stars that I would have this interest in the House of Commons. It so happens that on the day I was born, which was June 18, 1908—please, that is 1908, not 1808—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We heard that, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles: —this House was debating the second reading of the first piece of legislation dealing with a form of pensions for the people of Canada. It was the Government Annuities Act that was debated and passed that day. I was not involved in that day's debate, but I guess it got me started. However, it was not long after that, when I was about 18, that I learned of the effort being made in the House of Commons by Mr. Woodsworth, my predecessor as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which resulted in the first old age pension. It was payable at the rate of $20 a month at age 70, with a very severe means test.

Not many years after that, indeed in the early years of the depression of the 1930s, my own father lost his job as a railway machinist and found himself at the age of 58 without any pension or any resources other than the meagre savings which he had been able to put together.

I did not get up with the idea of telling my life story or doing that sort of thing—

An hon. Member: Go ahead; it is Canadian history.

Mr. Knowles: —although I am being encouraged to do so. It so happens that at that time I was a minister in the United Church in downtown Winnipeg. I had studied many years to be a United Church minister, and that was the career which I had intended. I still have that status, but the shock of what happened to my own father in 1933, and then the misery that I saw among so many people in so many of the homes I visited in connection with my work as a minister of the United Church, led me to the feeling that I had to do something more than preach about a better future; I had to get into the struggle. So, I was propelled into political life by a number of factors, but largely by what happens to older people in a society that is not really concerned for them.

I am proud to have been a member of this House through these several decades in which we have greatly changed the picture from what it was in the early years about which I have just talked. Instead of a pension of only $20 a month payable at age 70 with a severe means test, now we have a pension of about $186 a month payable to everyone in Canada who is age 65 or more, who meets the residence requirement, and we have the guaranteed income supplement which can be had on top of that, and also the Canada Pension Plan. Then we have other pension plans that have developed and in recent years. We have been able to improve the position of our veterans. So, the story is one of improvement, but it is no time to stand still.

Our senior citizens, for the most part, are still living below the poverty line. No matter how much we might boast about what we have done, we cannot be content when anyone can stand and say that, that most of our older people are living below the poverty line. To be specific, the fact is that all senior citizens who are single are living below the poverty line. Those who are married and living in rural parts are about up to the poverty line, and that is also true or will be true in July for those who live in smaller cities. But even for married couples who try out the proposition that two can live cheaper than one, many of them are still below the poverty line. That is why I put this motion on the order paper year after year. It usually gets talked out. Surely the attentive audience I have today will not talk it out. Surely we are all sympathetic. Surely we will pass this motion today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I say to the government that consideration ought to be given to the propositions set out in this resolution.

The thing I feel is most needed is what is stated in the first part of the resolution, namely, the lowering of the eligible age. We have it down to 65, but the number of people, particularly women, in years just below that, from 62 to 65 or 60 to 65, or even younger for that matter, who are in dire straits, is a disgrace to the good name of Canada. The arrangements we now have for the spouse's allowance do not meet the situation at all. The spouse's allowance helps some women in that age bracket, namely, those who are married to spouses who are over 65, but it provides nothing at all for women who are single, whether they are unmarried, divorced or what have you. The plight, as we all know, of unattached older women in this country is something of which we ought to be very deeply ashamed.

I feel very strongly that the answer to that is not more programs like the spouse's allowance, not programs that have a marital test in them, not programs that have a means test in them. My contention is that the most logical and humane approach is to provide the pension at age 60 to persons who are out of the labour market. It is very simple to apply that test. We had that kind of test once on the Canada Pension Plan benefits between the ages of 65 and 70, but we removed it in favour of no test at all.

In other words, I am not advocating that pensions be universal at 60 as they are at 65, but I say that those who are out of the labour market ought to get that opportunity, ought to have the right to receive their pensions, both old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. It would not take long for that kind of program to do far more by way of providing jobs for young people than was proposed today by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). Just make it possible for persons between the age 60 and 65, by leaving the labour market, to draw old age security and the Canada Pension Plan and, I suggest, several hundred thousand jobs would be opened up right away.

That, however, is not my main purpose in making this proposal; the main reason I do so is that I think it just does not make sense and does not accord with the way we think about things in Canada for our older people to be suffering at all.

I suppose if this debate is not finished by six o'clock some of those who take part will say they are sympathetic with my viewpoint, that they want to do something for older people but we cannot afford it, that this is a time of restraint. That is what finance minister Charles Dunning said to J. S. Woodsworth when he first proposed a pension of $20 a month at age 70—the treasury could not afford it, the country would go broke. When the bill went to the Senate their honours opposed it because they said it would not be good for the old people to be getting pensions out of the public treasury! The pensions they were getting over there for life did not seem to bother them. It did not drive them to the dogs but it would do that to older people generally.

Let us not have that kind of statement today, Mr. Speaker. Even if it is a time of restraint it is not the time to put the burden of that restraint on the weaker members of our society. Families do not do that. If a family is in economic straits it does not put the main burden on the weakest and most helpless members of the family; it does some sharing and sees to it that the family as a unit gets along. Let us not put the burden of our economic problems today on those who are older by condemning them to continue to live below the poverty line, while we find money to spend billions on aircraft, while we find it possible to bail out Chrysler Corporation and outfits like that, while we appoint Dr. Cliff McIsaac and the Hon. Léon Balcer to study the possibility of raising the pay of MPs. If they do recommend that, I hope we will have enough decency not to go for it while senior citizens are still living below the poverty line. Do not tell me that restraint has to be borne on the backs of those least able to bear it.

The whole business of government is one of deciding where to spend the money. Sometimes in this place you would think the job of Parliament is to keep government from spending money. I am not against government spending money but I want it spent fairly. It is not being spent fairly when our senior citizens are suffering as they do today.

As I say, this applies generally, Mr. Speaker, but it applies particularly to elderly women who are unattached. These things could be resolved by accepting the proposition set out in this motion.

I say in the first part of the motion that I think the eligible age should be brought down to 60, and I say in the latter part of the motion that the amount of the pension ought to be increased. The figure I give is $400 per month which is a little bit more than the total of old age security and guaranteed income supplement will be after July 1. My proposal is that it be on a universal basis. I am still as sold as I was the day I first came here on the proposition that it is not just, decent, and humane to say to older people that to get what they need they have to prove their poverty. Tax it back from those who do not need it. We could do it if we had a sensible income tax system. We should not require people to submit to an income or means test, however. My proposal is that it be paid universally and that the few—the 8 per cent or 10 per cent at the top who do not need it—can be required to pay it back. Let us not continue this concept of a means test as it applies with respect to the guaranteed income supplement.

I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) agrees with me, but she always has to defend the other position. The other day she said she wondered why we kept pushing the concept of universality when, after all, it had been won. Then she said she suddenly got the idea that maybe the reason we do it in this corner of the House is because we are afraid that it has not been eternally won. She is dead right, Mr. Speaker. Battles do not stay won if people do nothing about them. There have been voices in this very session saying that we should reconsider the whole position and not stay with universality, that maybe we should take it away from some and give it to others. Unless some of us keep fighting for the principle of universality, we could lose even the universality we have as it applies now with respect to the basic amount of the old age pension.

I said the other day that I got out of character a bit, a while back, by attending a Senate function. It happened to be that testimonial dinner—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles: Don't worry; it was not over there in the Senate chamber. It was in the West Block, which is a House of Commons office building. The guest of honour for the evening was David Croll, who deserved a testimonial dinner. In his speech, speaking as a man who has been through the same decades I have been through—although perhaps almost one more—he pleaded with the people who were there that night to realize that the two principal diamonds in the crown of social legislation that we built in this country are universal old age security and universal medicare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: David Croll said, "Dont't let anyone take away from those basic victories." Every time we add a little more to the guaranteed income supplement and do not add any more to the basic old age security, we are moving from universality to selectivity. When we do it in respect of medicare by fees and that sort of thing, we are moving away.

These, in my view, along with some other things like family allowances and the improvements we have made for veterans, are the best things that Parliament has done in the years that I have been here, since 1942. I want to see them preserved. I do not want us to lose any of them whatsoever, but I also want to see them improved.

I feel very strongly that Parliament is at its best when it is concerned with those who need concern expressed for them—those who are ill, disabled, children or older people. We have done well, but we must stay with it. That is why I ask this House today not to go through the usual ritual of talking out this motion, but to give it a chance. Even if the motion passes it does not put these things into effect. The motion cannot read that way because I am a private member and I cannot move anything that involves the direct expenditure of money. The passing of this motion would say to the government that it is the opinion of this House that these things should be done. I hope that is the view of hon. members who are in the House this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke mentioned the year of his birth, and I am glad he clarified that. There are some in this House and in the other place who feel he has been here for much longer than that. Although you and I, Mr. Speaker, were born long after the hon. member, and came to this House long after him, I want to report that I came to this House for the first time as a visitor in 1950 when I sat in the gallery. My party was then in opposition, under the leadership of George Drew. I looked down upon the bald heads of the then Liberal government at such members as the Hon. Jimmy Gardiner, the Hon. C. D. Howe, and the Hon. Douglas Abbott. When I cast my mind back on those giants of Liberalism, I am really shocked at how this party opposite has crashed and tumbled down in ability and substance. But that is beside the point. I am not here to castigate the government, but I could not resist that comment.

During that period of time I also saw and heard my first speaker for the New Democratic Party, which was then called the CCF party. The first speaker whom I heard was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I do not know whether that was the name of his constituency then. He has nodded his head that that was the name of his constituency.

The hon. member was speaking during the course of a debate on the subject of the plight of old age pensioners—those who have left the work force, those who are dependent at that point on others for their way through life. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has mounted a tremendous crusade during the course of his parliamentary life, a crusade from which he has not deviated one foot. It is a crusade which the hon. member continued when I had the honour to act as House leader for a government in this chamber. During the Thirty-first Parliament there were calls by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), who became the minister of veterans affairs in the Clark government, both then and while he was in opposition, asking for improvement in the plight of veterans, veterans' pensions and the widows of veterans. That call had been mounted for some time by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

When the hon. member for Victoria became the minister of veterans affairs—and I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will back me up on what I am about to say—one of the priorities of the then minister and the government was indicated in one of its earliest pieces of legislation, a bill which I think would be acceptable to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if it was introduced today. The bill deals with improving the lot of veterans. I hope that the government, when the questions are asked in the House of Commons with regard to the position of veterans—a group of people to whom this country owes a great obligation and its independence—whether the questions come from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the hon. member for Victoria, that the answer will not be that the matter is before government. This matter has been before government for some time. There is a bill ready, and it should be introduced and dealt with expeditiously. When that bill is introduced—and I say now, doffing my hat as a private member and as a leader of my party in the House of Commons—we will give it speedy passage.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Such a bill is important, and it would have received speedy passage by our government. It is important that the bill be introduced and passed now.

While I pay tribute to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has urged that cause, I want to pay tribute as well to the hon. member for Victoria who, being a veteran himself, when he was minister, and knowing the plight of these people, pressed the case in cabinet and brought a bill to the House of Commons which, I wish, could have been dealt with before the government fell.

There is not a member of Parliament, no matter from whence he or she may come and regardless of the constituency which he or she represents in this House, who will not say to anyone who asks that there are people in his or her own constituency who are disadvantaged as a result of raging inflation. Elderly people are disadvantaged by the requirements of old age, being unique in themselves, and the absolute inability of the present pension system and the amounts paid under it, even with the $35 which we added to the GIS last week through the mutual consent of the House. I am sure that there is no member who is prepared to say that the present amounts are adequate. If there are such persons, then I think those members are out of touch with the system.

A week or so ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) released a study on the future of the nation's elderly. The study said that if the prognosis for the future is to be gleaned from the report, one would have to describe it as bleak, and the largest burden would appear to be falling on women who tend to live longer. I hope that the government, spurred on by this motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will speed up consideration of the changes which must be made in the pension system.

The changes apply not only to the public area, with which we can deal directly once the study which is under way is completed, but to the private sector which also has problems that must be addressed. The big bite with the whole pension system is with respect to inflation. This report notes that only a handful of private sector pension plans offer increases to help offset the effects of inflation on employees. In many places there have been ad hoc contributions to partially offset, but according to the report, such adjustments really only go about half way to answer the effects of inflation. That report was tabled in the House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

With respect to the public sector plans which have been described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and with respect to the private sector plans, what we have is an inadequate system which cannot meet the needs of a population which is aging, not to mention the increase in the proportion of that population which is growing old. People are living longer today, and the figures in this area are quite dramatic.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that, in the name of restraint, it is inhumane and improper to look to those who are no longer in the work force, who are no longer contributing to inflation and who are, in fact, the victims of inflation to bear the burden of that restraint program. I am not suggesting that the balancing in government is easy. I was in government and I know that it is difficult. However, this is an increasing problem and that is why I am concerned.

The Globe and Mail of this morning indicated that the government is considering removing the indexation of income tax in order to reduce the government's budget deficit. Such a measure would not impact very heavily upon me or upon any other member of this House, but it will impact very heavily on people of lower incomes. Before the government moves to implement such a proposition, it must think very carefully about what it is doing. I believe that the index feature was put in place to help taxpayers escape the ravages of inflation. I think that that indexing feature as it applies to income tax can have a very important bearing on taxpayers of moderate income, and that includes old age pensioners.

When the government considers its programs for pensions and superannuation that are available to its own public servants, it is equally important that it not give with one hand and take away with the other, all in the name of restraint.

There has been a considerable amount of discussion over the years. It was discussed by the government of which I was a member, and it was discussed during the course of the Thirtieth Parliament. There was an attempt during the course of the thirtieth Parliament to come to some balancing of the equities in the course of that debate. I think that that balancing of the equities should at least be maintained. I think our efforts should be directed toward looking at the somehow private and the public system and attempting to marry them so that out of it there will come some adequate form of security for one's old age.

The most significant statement that appeared out of that report on the plight of the elderly, tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, was this:

> If the real value of such pensions is allowed to erode to the extent that occurred in the 1970s, the whole employer-sponsored system could well be seriously called into question.

What does that say to people who grow old, leave the work place, and have these inadequate pension plans in the private sector? They could ask about the obligations of the government in the public sector. What it says then is that we have an obligation, growing at an alarming extent, to examine the public sector side to see whether there can be an appropriate marrying. If we allow the pension systems in this country, both public and private, not to meet the needs of Canadians, and the failure to meet that need grows with the reality of the economic situation in the country, then I want to ask everyone in this House what they are going to say to old age pensioners, what they are going to say to retired people when they come and ask what the government intends to do about the situation that exists.

I guess a lot depends on one's view of the role of government. Quite frankly, I think if it is any role at all to govern, its primary role is to protect the disadvantaged. They can be disadvantaged because of physical handicaps, because they need new training to get other jobs, because social programs have changed or because they have grown old. They have become either unable to compete or are in such a position that one ought not to ask them to compete in the work force. So those are the problems that face us as we go down the road.

The motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a very timely one. I want to give you some indication of the seriousness of the problem that is facing the men and women of our generation and the generations that are to come who will sit in this House. I want to give some information that was in the study tabled by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles: Tabled by the minister.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tabled by the minister in this debate that has been brought on by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The study had some alarming conclusions for all of us, one of which was:

> Only 48 per cent of workers were members of employer-sponsored pension plans in 1976. Many of these will never collect an adequate pension because most plans are not portable and rules regarding an employee's right to ownership of pension credits—known as vesting—are too stringent.

In other words, what is being said is that while we have to look at the private sector pensions, the writers are pointing down the road to a time when we will be asked by the general public to look at some augmentation from the public pension sector to enlarge those plans. Another conclusion reads:

> More than half of two million retired persons collecting pensions also receive guaranteed income supplements—

These are the additional benefits paid to needy pensioners. Continuing, the conclusion reads:

> This makes clear that many people who were not in straitened circumstances during their working lives find themselves in that situation after retirement.

That is what that statistic means. It is nice to have augmented it by $35 a month. It really means our assault on that problem with the provision of $35 a month is probably not sufficient, and we will probably have to face it again down the road. It was also pointed out in the report as follows:

> The Canadian employer-sponsored pension system is behind most other western industrialized countries in terms of coverage and vesting provisions.
> Less than half of workers with employer-sponsored plans have survivor benefits, leaving widows without any extra support in their later years.
> Up to one-half of middle-income earners making between $12,000 and $24,000 will see a significant drop in living standards after retirement unless the public and private pension system is reformed.

I think that study which was tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare just a few weeks ago indicates how serious is this problem that we face.

I say to you that it is not an appropriate response to say that pension plans now indexed should cease to be indexed in order to meet the problems of government and the problems of restraint in government. That is and always was an improper approach to take. I think rather that our efforts in this House of Commons through the studies that are going on within the government—and I wish there was a study by Parliament to do it as well—ought to address how to improve the public pension program of the government, how to better marry that public pension program with the private sector programs and how to supply the benefits for that 48 per cent of workers.

What about the 52 per cent of workers, who were not members of employer-sponsored pension plans in 1976? How do we deal with the people who must go for a means test to get the GIS? This indicates an inadequate compensation under those pension plans. Those are the problems with which this Parliament should grapple. We should not let our efforts with respect to reform and review of the social system be overshadowed by events outside this place.

It is in that spirit that I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has brought forward this motion time after time. There are arguments about retirement ages. The member for Winnipeg North Centre thinks the retirement age should be reduced to 60. I think that is something that ought to be reviewed very carefully, particularly by the groups studying the pension system. That hon. member is himself the best argument there is against compulsory retirement age in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Those are matters that we must address. We do not have the luxury of putting under the rug, putting aside and handling with little band-aids some very fundamental problems in our society as it changes. That is the spirit with which I greet the motion in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I want to thank him for giving the House an opportunity to debate and discuss this important matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss this motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I was interested in his biographical remarks made at the beginning. I believe the hon. member was born in Los Angeles. At the time he was born, my mother was living in Los Angeles, moved to Winnipeg shortly after when her father, my grandfather, became a minister of a church in Winnipeg. So we have that background in common.

This motion reflects the hon. member's ongoing interest in our public pension system. I consider the debate quite timely, particularly in view of the fact that we have recently debated plans to improve the retirement income system in Canada.

In my opinion, it would be most appropriate for me to focus my initial remarks on a brief discussion of these plans. In so doing, I am hopeful that at least some of the concern raised in the hon. member's motion will be alleviated.

I wish to refer specifically to two announcements made in the Speech from the Throne which give proof of this government's commitment to meet the social challenges of the 1980s. First—is the following:

Inflation strikes hardest at the old and those least able to take care of themselves.

● (1740)

We announced our intention to introduce legislation that would raise the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month per household beginning July 1 of this year. As the hon. member knows, we have acted promptly in this regard. On May 24, all parties gave approval on third reading to Bill C-16, which proposes amendments to the Old Age Security Act.

The measures endorsed by this House will, as has just been mentioned, provide a $35 a month increase to each pensioner couple currently in receipt of the GIS and spouse's allowance benefits. It should be noted that this increase will be added to the quarterly cost of living increases already provided.

The fact that 1.3 million persons, representing over half the OAS population, receive these income tested benefits indicates that clearly there is prevalence of poverty among elderly Canadians. In effect, this means that all GIS recipients who are unmarried or who are married to persons who are not OAS or spouse's allowance beneficiaries will receive the $35 increase. In the case of a GIS recipient married to another GIS recipient or to a spouse's allowances recipient, each spouse will receive a $17.50 monthly increase so that the over-all increase in benefits will be $35 per household.

I have just described how the government's proposals will benefit current GIS and SPA recipients. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. member to another important aspect of the bill, namely, that an additional 45,000 persons will automatically become entitled to receive these benefits as a result of the increase in the GIS income threshold.

Broadly speaking, the proposals which I have just outlined reflect the government's concern for the economic hardships faced by pensioners on low incomes. For now, hon. members opposite should recognize that Bill C-16 represents an early attempt on our part to provide relief to elderly people who are facing immediate economic hardship.

What about long-term solutions for the retired population as a whole? I want to assure those present today that we are looking beyond immediate solutions in this short term. Indeed, during the course of the debate on Bill C-16, we stated many times that it is our intention to seek solutions to the many pension issues facing us now and in the years ahead.

During the debate we emphasized a commitment to convene a national conference on pensions this fall. This conference is being planned because we know there is a tremendous challenge awaiting us in terms of coming to grips with existing problems in Canada's retirement income system. Make no mistake; I am referring here to problems in both the public sector and in the private sector.

We know, for example, that the system we have is not giving pensioners enough retirement income to maintain their standard of living. It is not giving pensioners enough protection against inflation. It is not meeting the needs of women working in the home or women in the labour force. It is not doing enough for the disabled or the handicapped. It is not protecting the pension rights of workers who change jobs. In short, the system is not doing its job.

This fact is well recognized by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre whose motion today is testimony of his commitment to positive reform. As the hon. member knows, we now have at our disposal a substantial body of well-researched material which identifies problems in the pension system and recommends alternatives. I could point, for example, to the report of the Task Force on Retirement Income Policy, which the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) tabled on April 21.

Among others, the report of the Ontario royal commission which is due this fall will undoubtedly provide important input to the discussions ahead.

So the background research is near completion. What we need now is a forum in which to focus our attention on the options open to us. That is the reason the National Pension Conference will be convened. It will provide such a forum. It will enable us to bring together members of society who represent pensioners, workers, employers, advisory bodies, the pension industry and the various levels of government. We want to obtain their views and to develop a co-ordinated course of action for the reform of the pension system. I should stress that any process of reform will require close consultation with the provincial governments, whose support and co-operation will be vital if the necessary improvements are to be achieved. We hope the result will be the find of adequate and effective pension system that Canadians want and deserve.

I realize I have devoted quite a bit of time in this debate to describing the steps now planned for improving Canada's retirement income system. It seems to me the motion before us cannot, and should not, be considered in isolation from current pension reform initiatives.

In effect, today's motion is, for all practical purposes, identical to the one put forward by the hon. member in January, 1979. This certainly speaks well for the hon. member's tenacity. When that earlier motion was debated on the floor of the House, the hon. member recommended that the basic old age security pension be increased to $350 a month. This time round, I note that the figure has been revised upwards to $400 a month.

I am sure that, in an ideal world of unlimited resources, we would all readily adopt the hon. member's suggestions. However, we all know only too well that these are far from ideal times, in economic terms at least. Our economic resources are limited.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) give support to the goals of the motion. However, when the government of which he was a member was in office, I do not believe there were any initiatives along the line we recently demonstrated when we raised the supplement by $35 a month. His party is continually berating this side for the existing deficit, to say nothing of what the deficit would be if this motion were to pass. Our economic resources are limited.

One of the principal messages delivered in the throne speech was that "Canadians recognize the need to live within their national means, and they understand that in doing so the state cannot meet every demand or satisfy every group." This government would be irresponsible to ignore the economic reality. And so, we are seeking to direct the limited resources available to those who need them most. That is exactly why we have introduced Bill C-16.

In contrast, this motion implies that we should eliminate the guaranteed income supplement program altogether, and opt instead for an increased OAS pension in the amount of $400.

That brings about some serious inequities. For example, assuming the OAS pension were raised to $400, persons now receiving the basic pension of $186.80 would derive a net increase of about $213. Certainly they would be at the low end of the need scale. But what about OAS pensioners who are now entitled to receive the maximum guaranteed income supplement? Already, these persons receive $314 at the married rate and $340 at the single rate. So their net increases would only amount to $86 and $60 respectively.

Over all, those in greatest need would benefit least from this proposal. Instead of narrowing the gap between rich and poor, this measure would cause it to widen considerably.

Aside from the question of equity, the suggestion to raise the basic OAS pension to $400 a month is simply too costly. As mentioned previously, the current OAS benefit is $186.80 a month, which adds up to a cool $5.3 billion a year. That does not including the guaranteed income supplement or the spouse's allowance which, together with the $35 GIS proposed for July, add another $2.2 billion to the over-all projected program budget for 1980-81. Were we to raise the pension to $400 a month, as the hon. member suggests, the annual program costs would skyrocket to $10.8 billion; $3 billion in excess of our projected budget. That figure only reflects the increase which would result if the age criterion remained at 65. If it were reduced to 60, the figure would be astronomical; it would go through the roof. Just imagine the increased costs if we were to follow another of the hon. member's suggestions, namely to pay the pension as early as age 60 to those who are not in the labour force.

In addition, since the Canada Pension Plan is a contributory program, the increased costs of paying earlier benefits would have to be borne by Canadian workers and their employers. We have known since the plan's first inception that the contributory rates would have to rise from the current 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings. Indeed, questions concerning how much this increase will be, and when it will come into effect, are currently being studied by a committee of federal and provincial finance officials. Although their study has not yet been completed, we do know that the contribution rate will have to rise to about 8 per cent over the course of the next half century. And that is the rate projected without major changes to the plan. If, on top of this, you were to add the increased costs resulting from retirement benefits payable at 60, contribution rates would start escalating dramatically. Before passing on that burden to future generations of contributors, I think we would need to weigh carefully the long-term implications of the hon. member's suggestion.

I would like to move on, now, to the suggestion that any means test or income test be eliminated from the Old Age Security Act. First, let me clear up any misconceptions here. Neither the guaranteed income supplement nor the spouse's allowance benefit is means-tested, if we define a means test as an examination of both income and assets. Rather, these benefits are determined by an income test, based on the income of the individual as defined by the Income Tax Act. The latter is a more generous approach which enables a pensioner to own assets such as a home, and still remain eligible to receive some financial assistance. It is also a more humane approach in that the individual's personal possessions are at no time subjected to scrutiny, as they would be under means-testing.

But I know the hon. member is more concerned with a discussion of principles, here, than with semantics. What he is really proposing is to raise the old age security benefit and to do away with the income-tested guaranted income supplement and spouse's allowance benefits. In other words, he is questioning the principle that financial assistance should be provided to those in greatest need, a principle which, as I said earlier on in this debate, will be the cornerstone of this government's approach to social policy for some time to come.

Given the limited economic resources available, I think it is fortunate that we have a vehicle such as the guaranteed income supplement program through which the government can continue to direct assistance to those who need it most. As mentioned previously, Bill C-16 will enable us to accomplish this goal.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I note that the hon. member remains committed to automatic indexation of benefits based on some measure of the Canadian standard of living. This point was discussed at some length during the debate on Bill C-16. As we all know, old age security, guaranteed income supplement and spouse's allowance benefits are indexed four times a year, taking into account quarterly increases in the consumer price index. I must say I find the frequency of the increases and the close relationship they bear to recent rises in the cost of living to be two very commendable aspects of these programs. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would probably not agree with me on this issue, but I think it would be very difficult for him to come up with an indexation tool which would be as available as quickly as the consumer price index is. The speed at which the index becomes available is one of the factors which ensures the responsiveness of these programs to the increasing costs of accommodation, food, clothing and so on which our pensioners must face.

One of the most common criticisms of the method we use to index these pension benefits is that the consumer price index is not representative of the increases in the cost of living of pensioners. Critics often say that the basket of goods used to determine increases in that index contains many items which pensioners do not include in their own shopping baskets. Many of them suggest that a separate index should be devised to reflect increases in the costs of items which pensioners actually purchase. In response to this suggestion, a number of studies were undertaken by Statistics Canada, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Economic Council of Canada. The Economic Council stated in its 1976 Annual Review that consumer price indices calculated for different income groups deviated only slightly from the price index published by Statistics Canada. The health and welfare study substantiated this finding. Statistics Canada produced an experimental price index for a group of low-income families based on the 1969 family expenditures survey. They found that for the period from June, 1973, to June, 1977, the official CPI had increased to a higher level than the experimental CPI for low-income families. In other words, if the experimental CPI had been used to index pension benefits pensioners would not have been as well off as they actually were when their benefits were increased by the official consumer price index. Incidentally, I understand that Statistics Canada is in the process of analysing data received from the 1978 family expenditures survey. This may reveal a substantial change in the spending patterns of low-income persons and pensioners. If this is so, then perhaps the studies I mentioned might be redone to determine whether the results obtained the first time are still valid.

Other critics of our indexing methods have suggested that benefits be increased in line with changes in other indicators such as average wages and salaries, the average of salaries of persons in five designated categories of workers in the public service, the total disposable income of persons in Canada as measured by taxation data, and so on. On this subject I would like to say to hon. members who are concerned about a quick response to changes in the cost of living that most of these indicators are not available as quickly as the consumer price index, and for a variety of reasons. Wage and salary data is required from employers; contract settlements often take place months after the contract has expired and income tax returns are required only after four months from the end of the taxation years. The use of indicators such as these would involve an even greater time lag than the current method using the C.P.I. Further, I cannot see how salary or tax information could be used to provide quarterly indexation.

In the second place, the goal of the indexation of benefits is to maintain the purchasing power of pension benefits and protect pensioners from the effects of inflation. On the grounds of equity, it would be nice if pensioners could share in the increasing prosperity of the Canadian economy. However, it has been estimated that to increase OAS/GIS benefits according to increases in average wages and salaries would have cost us over $100 million in 1979. As most hon. members know by now, the government has chosen to adopt a policy of granting assistance to persons most in need. Thus, instead of granting assistance to all OAS pensioners—some of whom have enough income to disqualify from receiving GIS—we have chosen to direct funds only to GIS pensioners. If we were to have changed, at this time, the vehicle for indexing benefits, there might not have been sufficient funds for the $35 per household increase that we approved in this chamber last week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Knowles: Question!

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have just a minute or two left in which to make a few observations on this subject. I say the motion does not help those who need help the most. So it is not in line with what the Liberal government did when it brought down its proposal to increase the GIS by $35 a month. Furthermore, it would tend to worsen the plight of pensioners on fixed incomes, and do so in the following way: by increasing government spending we increase our deficit and accelerate inflation, and inflation hits the pensioner the hardest. This motion disregards the cost of such a program to the taxpayer.

Mr. Knowles: That is what Dunning said to Woodsworth.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock!

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon, the motion for second reading of Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, was under consideration, and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) had the floor. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona not being present, I will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, but I do want to say a few words about this. I have always worried about giving the government a blank cheque, and that in essence is what we are doing at this time. I can recall on other occasions in another place discussing similar kinds of legislation, and it worries me when the government asks, as it does here and it does traditionally, for authority to go into the marketplace to borrow money at any time subject only to the approval by itself.

The government is saying that it wants us in the House of Commons to allow it go to any part of the world to borrow in whatever amounts it requires up to many billions of dollars—$12 billion, to be exact—and to borrow in funds of any country from which it wishes, and to repay in those same funds. It makes no reference to how it will be responsible to this House. We have to understand that in this year 1980 and into the year 1981 we are dealing in the House of Commons with expenditures of a new government for which there has not yet been a budget.

We are dealing with expenditures of a government which has not yet presented to the House of Commons any indication of how it intends to spend taxpayers' money and how it intends to finance the ongoing programs of government. What we are being asked for today is somewhat unusual. We are being asked, prior to seeing what the government's expenditures are going to be or how it intends to finance its expenditures or how it intends to raise its money or how it intends to pay whatever portion of the deficit it may accumulate over the next 12 months, to authorize extensive borrowing. If not from here, at least from elsewhere my understanding has always been that prior to the government's asking for such authority it normally places before the House of Commons or the representatives of the public its intentions with regard to how it proposes to deal with the finances of the country or of the jurisdiction. We have no budget, we have no economic strategy, we have no clear program for reducing the deficit, and we have no employment strategy. We do not have any idea which area of the world the government intends to turn to in order to do its borrowing. We do not know at what rates of interest it may be interested in borrowing money. We do not know how it intends to pay it back.

We have no idea where the Canadian dollar will stand vis-à-vis other currencies in the world, and yet we are being asked tonight to authorize government borrowing of up to $12 billion.

However, and more importantly, the government has abdicated its responsibility with regard to fiscal policy in any event. It has said that we are going to pursue the same basic fiscal policies of the United States. It has handed over to the governor of the Bank of Canada absolute carte blanche—

Mr. Evans: That is monetary policy.

Mr. Deans: I am coming to that—with regard to monetary policy, so that at this point there is absolutely no responsibility on the part of cabinet for the monetary policy of the country.

Mr. Evans: That is totally false.

Mr. Deans: The governor of the Bank of Canada at the same time has turned around and said that he will allow interest rates to float in whatever way they may during whatever period of time he is in office.

In fact what we are doing is saying we are prepared to give to this government, which has run up substantial deficits, the right to continue to borrow for whatever programs it deems are necessary at whatever rates of interest and from whatever countries, without we or the government—"we" meaning the House of Commons—having any jurisdiction over any aspect of monetary or fiscal policy.

● (2010)

Mr. Blenkarn: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Thank you. Nice of you to drop by. I needed your help.

Let us put this into perspective for a moment. I think it would be more appropriate if the government, first of all, were to tell us what it intends to spend in ball park figures and with what goals over the course of the next year.

Mr. Blenkarn: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Thank you. Before the government asks for authority to borrow, they should tell us what it is their budget is likely to contain. That is the first point. The second point is that the government should then set out for us, at a time of considerable economic stress, what their strategy is for dealing with the economic problems of this country. I think the government should establish for the House of Commons and the people of Canada how it intends to deal with the ever-declining economic conditions of this country and how it intends to use the necessary strengths that the House of Commons has given the government in order to try to develop a new and more progressive economic strategy. I think we have to learn from the government how it intends to raise whatever it intends to raise in order to begin a program of clearing up, over a long period no doubt, the deficit position in which we continue to exist. I think we are entitled to know from the government how it intends to deal with the ever-increasing unemployment in the country so that we can see who is going to pay the bills, and how the people are going to pay the taxes which will have to be levied in order to pay back the $12 billion that will be borrowed.

An hon. Member: You talk like a Conservative.

Mr. Deans: No, I am not a Conservative. I am talking about common sense.

Mr. Blenkarn: You are talking about sensibility.

Mr. Deans: I want you to know that the Conservatives and common sense are, generally speaking, poles apart.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that at this point in time it would be very difficult to convince the public of Canada, given what we do not know about the expenditure programs, about the fiscal and monetary policy, or what we do not have before us about the government's intentions in these important areas, that it is appropriate for the House of Commons to turn over to the government the authority to borrow.

Mr. Blenkarn: Blank cheque.

Mr. Deans: It is funny; that is the term that I used when I started. Had you been here, you would have heard it.

That is what worries me about it. I do not see how any government can ask for approval to borrow money until it tells us, at least in general terms, what that money would be used for. I do not see how the government can legitimately expect that the House of Commons would give approval to the government to go out and borrow this money without any understanding of how this government proposes it would repay that, over whatever period of time and in whatever way. I can recall the debate in which I was involved some years ago when the Ontario government borrowed in Germany in Deutschmarks. Perhaps for the first time in the Ontario government's history, it borrowed in foreign currency.

Mr. Blenkarn: This bill allows them to do it.

Mr. Deans: Having borrowed in foreign currency, it discovered that not only did it have to repay the principal plus the interest agreed, but when it took into account the disparity in the value of the dollar—a considerable reduction had taken place in the time that it had the use of the money—it discovered that the actual interest rate it was paying was almost twice as high as the rate at which it would have been able to borrow the money on the North American money market. Incidentally, those were fiscally irresponsible Conservatives.

I want to suggest that, therefore, when this government puts into this piece of legislation that it should be given the authority to borrow in foreign money markets, you must understand that what the government is saying is that the effective interest rate must also take into account the value of the Canadian dollar in the money market and that the effective interest rate will undoubtedly be considerably higher, if all the current trends continue, than we would expect to pay were we able, with careful management over a period of time, to self-finance.

I want to say to the government that I think this is an inappropriate piece of legislation at this time. At least, I think that portion of this legislation is inappropriate. I am not so dumb I cannot understand that governments from time to time require to borrow just as other people do, and I am not pretending for a moment that I do not approve of the government borrowing money from time to time in order to finance long-term projects. I am not suggesting for a moment that we are able in any society to self-finance on an immediate cash flow basis. But I am suggesting that when we see a piece of legislation without knowing exactly the intent of the government with regard to expenditure and revenue, and when we see a piece of legislation which allows for interest rates about which we have no idea, when we get this from a government that has no real control over the monetary policy of the country, and when we see a rapid deterioration of the Canadian dollar against other currencies, and then we see the Canadian economy suffering as it is now suffering at the hands of multinational corporations which frankly do not care that much about what happens in Canada, and when we see people unemployed and unable to pay their share which they must ultimately pay if we are going to be able to repay these loans, and when you see the government bringing in, as it did this afternoon, a piece of legislation dealing with employment which in fact does not even begin to address the major problems which confront the majority of constituencies across the country from the east to the west coast; when you see all of those things happening and you understand that the unemployment that we are currently facing will continue to rise, then you have to ask yourself, where are we going to get this money from and at what rate of interest? You have to ask yourself, how are we going to pay it? What are we going to pay? What are we going to use as collateral? What do we have that other people need?

Mr. Blenkarn: The savings of our older people.

Mr. Deans: We have energy that other people need. We have certain natural resources that other people need. We have certain natural benefits, water being one of them, that other people need. What is it that we are going to mortgage away over the next ten or 20 years? I would like to know the answer to some of those questions because, frankly, I believe that it would be better if the government were to come to the House of Commons quarterly and ask for permission to go into the money market and raise whatever capital they require on that basis. I would much prefer that we agree to divide this bill so that at the end of the first quarter the government may have borrowed a quarter of what it requires, and at the end of the half year it may borrow another quarter, and so on, so that it is answerable to the House of Commons, having to come back to the House and justify its expenditures and its borrowing, its interest, and the depreciation of the dollar. I would suggest that an appropriate amendment to this might be made at some point in the future which would make the government answerable to the House in that way. I am really not prepared, as one member at least, to give the government carte blanche. I am not prepared to say I accept as a matter of course that the government will handle this borrowing appropriately, that it will not misuse it as it has in the past, that it will borrow with care and consideration, that it will get the very best deals, and that analysts will do an analysis of what the money trends will be at this time as opposed to what they were last time. Quite frankly. I feel that this piece of legislation, although no doubt it is necessary to give the government power to borrow, is asking for too long a period. I do not deny that it may be tradition in the House of Commons, but tradition is something we can change. It asks for too much too soon. I would much rather the government reconsider it and came back with a piece of legislation which enabled us in the House of Commons to look much more critically and much more carefully, not only at the expenditures, but at the way in which it is going into the marketplace, the rates of interest, and the actual total dollars it would have to pay. For those reasons I feel very reluctant to see this piece of legislation passed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to fight the February election all over again.

An hon. Member: You lost.

Mr. Wenman: No; as a matter of fact I won. In fact the message from western Canada was very clear. One of the obligations I must fulfil is to express the concern that at least western Canadians feel about the size of government. In the last campaign I campaigned largely on the basis of fiscal responsibility based on restraint in government spending and a gradual reduction of the national deficit. That was the basis of every speech I made. It was the basis of my campaign material, and the basis upon which the people of my constituency voted for me. Therefore, it is absolutely essential that I should stand up and object when in fact the people of my riding in western Canada are getting just the opposite.

Extending the authority of government to borrow lessens the will, the necessity and the capacity of government to repay and work toward balanced budgets and reduced national debt. In 1980 western Canadians voted against increased government spending and deficits. They voted for an end to the paternalistic control and domination of the manufacturing base of central Canada and domination of the manufacturing base of central Canada and the federal government. Somehow in western Canada there was in fact a double protest vote this time. It was more than just against large central government; it was against the paternalistic central control of big government. I think that needs to be recognized particularly at this time in the House.

This is a bill which further centralizes economic power through the onerous burden of escalating national debt. This bill can only add more fuel to an already growing sense of western alienation. The roots of western alienation or separation are complex and difficult to express. The roots are historical, geographical, sociological, emotional, traditional, but, above all, the roots of separatism in the west are economic. Western alienation is not a new phenomenon. Perhaps in the past the roots have been a bit dry and weak, but in the 1980s, watered by new economic powers in the west, they are blossoming forth with an identity that must be listened to, and must be understood. This must be responded to in the same way that Quebec has been heard and, hopefully, will be responded to, again with more than this traditional paternal pat on the head with some token words about responsible Canadianism. Somehow in the west we are not supposed to say anything. It is somehow unCanadian if this comes from the west.

Specifically, what are the kinds of things the west is talking about? The question always comes up: "What are you complaining about? Do not tell us you are mad, angry, upset or that you do not like this. What specifically do you want?" Of course the question of oil pricing is paramount. But just to list a few, there is interference in the resource control management, unfair freight rate systems, inadequate transportation systems, inadequate incentives to process upstream, that syndrome of the hewers of wood and drawers of water. In addition there is insufficient access to the United States and Pacific rim markets in terms of the products we produce, lack of secondary industry and lack of representation on national boards and institutions. Somehow in the west they feel the great potential that is there is wasted, unrealized and held back. The reality is that westerners feel at this time politically impotent, ignored and exploited by both Ottawa and Bay Street.

Central Canadians have dominated the Canadian economic and political scene for so long it seems to anyone who comes from the west to central Canada that everybody believes it is his natural right to continue to do so. But I want to tell this House that central Canadian feudalism ended with the total rejection of the Liberals in western Canada, just as surely as it ended in Quebec with the election of Rene Lévesque.

Mr. Kaplan: Temporarily in both cases.

Mr. Wenman: I hope they are temporary in both cases, I really do. But if we take them lightly and pass them off, neither will be temporary. In fact they will become a reality. If the Government of Canada does not get the referendum message from Quebec, I can promise that it certainly will from western Canada. We often talk about "the true north strong and free". We stand up and sing about it, but the western part of this nation is strong and free also. We intend to remain that way. We want the understanding of the Quebec referendum and of the 1980 election clearly understood. We want to see a strengthening in a renewed confederation, a renewed confederation which recognizes the coming of age of western Canada.

Some people keep saying that it is just a few, that it is the lunatic fringe out there who are talking in terms of western alienation toward the centre. I used to think that perhaps that was true. In fact, approximately three or four years ago I sent out a questionnaire to my constituents, like so many others. I asked in that questionnaire: Do you want your province or region to remain as a part of Canada? At that time I was pleased with the response. I sent out some 45,000 and 95 per cent of the people who responded to that questionnaire said, "Yes", we want our province or region to remain within Canada. But I sent the same questionnaire out last month. I should like to report to the House of Commons tonight that it was the same basic group of people responding to the same question 3.5 years later, but this time it was not 5 per cent, but 14.7—15 per cent. There was a 300 per cent increase in western separatist sentiment in British Columbia over the last three years.

An hon. Member: It is your fault.

Mr. Wenman: It is the fault of members opposite because they are not listening. It is not because of the way I am talking in the House. I have been here five years and I have never stood up and said that. I have tried to say that 95 per cent wanted to stay. I was not worried about it then, but I am worried about it today. I am very worried about these results. I believe them to be so. It is true that a lunatic fringe was speaking approximately six years ago. At least, we thought that is all it was. We passed them off, and I passed them off as a member of Parliament, but today in western Canada these are the businessmen and the men on the street. The number is increasing, no doubt. Dick Collver represents a certain sentiment which is much stronger in western Canada now than it has been in the past. It needs to be recognized.

• (2030)

An hon. Member: That is the trouble with the Liberals; they do not listen.

Mr. Wenman: The concern that I have with my questionnaire is not just that we had an increase of 300 per cent, from 5 per cent in favour of complete separation to 15 per cent, but that 76 per cent of those who responded answered yes to the second question which was, "Do you wish British Columbia to negotiate a new status in confederation?" They want a new status for their province in confederation. That is pretty loud, pretty strong, and pretty clear to me, and hon. members opposite better hear it.

An hon. Member: They laugh on the other side.

Mr. Wenman: I see that. Again it is the central Canadian indifference. How can I tell you, Mr. Speaker? Do not underestimate it. We might be small in numbers in this House of Commons but we are the elected representatives of the people in British Columbia and we are telling this government how things are. Speaker, after speaker has pointed out that this feeling is on the increase. It is not just a popular issue but a deep seated concern. Perhaps the Quebec referendum gave people the courage to say, "Yes, I feel that way too." There is some kinship between the people of Quebec and the people in western Canada.

It may be asked, what does Quebec want, what does British Columbia want, what does Ontario want? Perhaps to start with we should talk about what British Columbia wants.

British Columbia wants recognition, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that the strength of Canada lies in the total sum of its individually strong parts. That is a pretty important basic fact of nature in Canada that must be realized. Westerners, like individualists, feel that the strength of Canada lies in the sum of its individual parts, and to keep the centre strong does not require the usurping and sapping of the strength of the parts but, rather, the opposite; the centre is as strong as realization of the potential of its parts.

I am concerned that this bill is a centralization of economic power through the onerous burden of increased and escalating national debt. I see a little response from the other side. It seems to be a doubt, a wonderment.

An hon. Member: They are asleep.

Mr. Wenman: Sometimes we think they are asleep too, but there was a little response indicating, "Oh, come on now, it is not that bad." I see that response. Why can the paternal central government of Canada, instead of seeing the west with resentment or as something to take, not see us as a potential source of strength in the growth of this nation? Why can it not see the potential that is here?

Mr. Blenkarn: They don't believe in that.

Mr. Wenman: We in British Columbia are proud to be native sons of Canada. Why can the centre not take pride in us as we take pride in being Canadians? Instead of taking pride in us why does the central government just try to take from us? Why do they fear us? Why keep confronting western Canada; why keep fighting us? Why does the minister continue doing that?

An hon. Member: Name calling.

Mr. Wenman: Why do they not work with us to protect our resources from both international and national exploitation? Why should western Canada not expect the central government to help protect our resources from those other parts of the nation that are clamouring to steal our financial base? Why should we not feel we have the right to protection from the central government rather than exploitation? That is what concerns me, Mr. Speaker, because that is the attitude with which we are faced.

The potential of the west is just beginning to show as is the potential of the Pacific rim. I could list so many things in Vancouver and British Columbia that do not need subsidies. We are not looking for a subsidy mentality in British Columbia; we are looking for an investment mentality. We are looking for a recognition of investment in the Pacific rim. We are looking for a new face, a new western face for Canada. That is why the initiative started with the Pacific conference was good. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that is to be carried on. Mr. Speaker, we do not just want it carried on, we want it to grow like a snowball, to get bigger and stronger. We want the government to work on the Port of Vancouver. We want that bill to be passed in this House in order to give some autonomy to the western region. One of the architects of the bill is from the west. We want a trade and convention centre that can be a showcase on the Pacific face of Canada.

Somehow, in western Canada we get the feeling that we are a bunch of lumberjacks or something, and there is nothing wrong with that. We are very proud to be the lumberjacks of Canada, the hewers of wood and drawers of water. Those are things to be proud of. But some people think it ends there, that we do not need a symphony or an art gallery, so that somehow our symphony gets a little less than the eastern Canadian symphony and somehow our art gallery is forgotten. We want those attributes of Canadian society and we expect equalization in that sense as well. We want the commitments made by the previous Liberal government, the Conservative government and this government, carried out to establish these amenities, as well as the investment in the development of this new Pacific face. We wonder about the constant subsidization mentality that is particularly prevalent in central Canada.

I wish we could get to the point where there was no subsidization in respect of cars in western Canada; in other words, that there was not a special pricing policy in western Canada. They are more expensive in western Canada and that is the special price; the double standard. There are not just two standards in time, there is the eastern standard and the western standard for prices. We do not ask that the price of our cars be subsidized but then we should not be asked to subsidize the price of gas for the east. That is exactly what is happening again, and again and again to the tune of billions of dollars. That is what a lot of this debt is for. That is what this borrowing is for; it is borrowing to exploit the west.

An hon. Member: $17 billion.

An hon. Member: That is the way to create unity.

Mr. Wenman: That is right, it is the way to create unity. If the hon. member thinks we should keep these things festering and not have them out, here in the House of Commons, then he is mistaken. We have been put down enough. I am tired of being put down and told that I am not supposed to express these concerns for western Canada. They are real, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You had better start listening to them.

An hon. Member: You are a dreamer.

Mr. Wenman: Somebody says I am a dreamer. If I am dreaming that there can be a better position for British Columbia in this confederation, if I am dreaming that the west cannot get a better deal out of confederation, then I think the hon. member had better watch out. He better be careful. Those are the sorts of words that are going to drive the west out of confederation and drive those splinters deeper and deeper.

My friends on the left had better hear what Premier Blakeney has to say. He says the west's resource wealth should be used to initiate a vigorous manufacturing sector because secondary industry provides more permanent jobs and greater spin-off into job-creating service areas than resource development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: I like that too. It is the NDP and the Conservatives who have the base in the west and we applaud that kind of talk. We like being the hewers of wood and drawers of water but we also want an industrial base.

What does Premier Lougheed say? He says that decisions are going to be made more in the regions.

An hon. Member: Boo.

Mr. Wenman: Why would a member boo a premier of western Canada in this House of Commons? Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? I hope my colleagues from Alberta who heard that booing of the premier of Alberta report it to him. That was right here, in the chamber of the House of Commons. Talk about unity!

● (2040)

Will you hear what Premier Lougheed has to say or will you continue booing him down?

An hon. Member: Give us the punch line.

Mr. Wenman: Well then, listen. Premier Lougheed says, "Decisions are going to be made more in the regions; not just political decisions but economic decisions will be made in the west. We are going to have stronger regions and a stronger country because the regions are strong." That needs to be recognized, but it does not seem to be recognized here. What does Premier Bennett say?

Mr. Deans: You're getting worse.

Mr. Wenman: It is interesting how I am willing to recognize all western leaders, because the leaders of all the provinces are saying the same thing, but the NDP are not willing to listen. Why not listen to Premier Bill Bennett of B.C.? He speaks for the people of that province because he was elected with a majority government.

Mr. Evans: Who do you speak for?

Mr. Wenman: I speak for my constituents.

An hon. Member: We speak for the people of Canada.

Mr. Wenman: My constituents are people of Canada, and we want to remain as people of Canada. But with your attitude and your division-causing ways, the country will take a long time to heal. Listen to what Premier Bennett has to say and take his message. If you do not want to take my message, you can take that of Blakeney, Lougheed or Bennett.

An hon. Member: Speak on your own.

Mr. Wenman: Premier Bennett says, "Energy resources will be the cornerstone of his province's growth strategy for the 1980s, but if the federal government dips into the B.C. gas revenues, it could mean a further $50 million penalty to the people of B.C. and it could make it difficult for us to carry out our policy of lessening our dependence on oil.

These aspirations are not hard to understand, nor are they anything but reasonable and responsible under any form of renewed federalism. Provincial control of resources is seen as the primary instrument to redress the balance. But recent federal actions and court decisions challenge their control. Only western resources are singled out to be sold in Canada at less than world prices. No one imposes a federal export tax on Ontario or Quebec exports of hydro energy. No one subsidized Saskatchewan when it had to pay four or five times the Ontario price for electricity. No one in the east suggested a national subsidy or equalization of gas prices when it was more expensive in the west than in the east. That is very real among the people on the street.

There are those in the government who have the fantasy of twinning with members from the west. I wish you would come out west and hear what is being said. This bill thwarts the aspirations of the west by overcommitting the tax resource of Canada to the federal government. Any hope that moneys accruing to the federal government would be returned to develop the resource potential of the west seems slim indeed—in fact, even slimmer as I stand here tonight and listen to the response of the government. Almost all the evidence so far indicates that the fat eastern standard and the slim western standard continue with such things as subsidies, protective tariffs, government waste, central government patronage and so forth.

Let me give an example. This House was in an absolute crisis for two weeks while we worried about the jobs in the car industry. It is good that this House should worry and should be concerned. The government came forth with a guarantee of $200 million. That $200 million would provide a ratio of $1 billion in investment and would save 15,000 jobs. At the time there were discussions that Ontario's contribution would be between $10 million and $50 million. I want hon. members to remember those figures because they represent the eastern standard.

Now, let us look at the western standard. We are not talking about $1 billion in investment, but about $5 billion, five times as much, for developing the coal industry in British Columbia. They are talking about $75 million on a $1 billion investment. The federal government offers some $70 million and expects the British Columbia government to pick up the rest. The British Columbia government is forced to say "I guess we will have to go it alone as usual". That is the kind of standard this government has toward the west. Based on the eastern standard of five to one, the government should invest $1 billion to British Columbia's $5 billion.

If the government were to do that it would not just be subsidizing or maintaining jobs that are questionable, but investing in the most viable industry in the world right now, the energy resource industry, and the great coal resource of British Columbia. But you drag your feet, and when you come out west you cannot understand why the British Columbia government complains. You feel that because you have offered some $70 million the British Columbia government should say, "aren't you wonderful". We are talking about a $1 billion capital investment requirement and you say that you are doing us a favour by offering some $70 million.

The minister spoke this afternoon and talked about creating a few jobs which would cost anywhere from $1,000 to $22,000 per job to create. I am glad he is concerned about those jobs as we all are, but why did the minister apply the strategy, that the jobs which that money would create could be created with the same investment in coal and related energy products in western Canada, if we could but apply the eastern standard to the west?

Too often it seems that not much has changed since 1938 when the then government of British Columbia stated that approximately 80 per cent of the manufactured commodities imported into B.C. are from eastern Canada while 75 per cent of our main primary products are sold in open competition in the world markets. This means that B.C. has to buy in a protective market and sell in an unprotected market—in other words, buy the dearest and sell the cheapest. Still we compete, but imagine what we could do if the federal government reduced those tariffs.

My hon. colleague from West Vancouver, Howe Sound, stood up here and fought you on the steel tariff. Day after day after day no one listened to him. In my riding all kinds of jobs were lost because of these eastern and western standards. How many days have been spent in this House discussing the potential of the British Columbia coal dig—how much concern, how many hours of cabinet time? The jobs are sitting there waiting. The largest market in the world, the Pacific Rim, is sitting there waiting for Canada to begin to participate.

The majority of people who I represent do not want to join the Collver movement to join the United States. They do not want to separate from Canada. What they want is to rejoin Canada, and 78 per cent want a new deal, a better deal for British Columbia and all the regions within confederation. Central to these very real aspirations is the sanctity of the resource base as a building block toward growth in the west. How can Canada assume this vast new debt we are talking about tonight, unless there is some thought in the cabinet of trying to steal the resource base revenue of western Canada?

If this government feels that somehow it received a mandate in the last election to equalize, steal, take, borrow or share the resource base of western Canada in another form of equalization, they completely missed the message and they have completely underestimated the depth of the feelings held by most western Canadians. This is the kind of miscalculation that could lead to severe stress and a break up of this nation. Surely the government learned from the Quebec referendum and from the 1980 election that the message of both Quebec and British Columbia is that it must respect the aspirations of the regions of Canada.

If the government forces this bill through the House and proceeds to borrow more and spend more because it has a majority government, then it will only lead to trouble. You throw good money after bad in subsidizing uneconomic industries in central Canada, and fail to develop the secondary industrial base of western Canada. Surely some of that money, and we are talking about billions of dollars, should be spent on new jobs and new industries in western Canada.

When the minister responds, if he does, let him tell us how he plans to do this. We hear this request echoed here and over there. What we are concerned about is, being asked to pass the bill before we have heard what the bill is going to do. Would the minister stand up and tell me that the government is going to recognize the potential of the west and is going to develop the secondary industry, that it is going to work in partnership with British Columbia to develop a common front that it will meet the entrepreneurs of the Pacific rim, the Japanese, the Asian nation representatives and develop the west?

Talk about the excitement of the west; it is an exciting frontier and it has an exciting potential. If the minister can tell me that he is going to do those things and tell me how much money the government is going to give us to do it, then I might have to reconsider my position. History has told us that that will not happen. I hope history can be proven wrong.

My hon. colleagues who spoke before me have already asked this question again and again. I wonder if it will be heard. The government does not choose to tell us what it is going to do with the $12 billion. This is the same group that defeated the Conservative budget then promptly reintroduced most of its measures. This is the same group that protested interest rates while in opposition and let them rise unimpeded once they returned to their cosy chairs on the other side. This is the same crew who criticized the Conservative finance minister for seeking borrowing authority before introducing a budget. The same bunch is asking us in Parliament and the Canadian people to trust them. "Trust us", they say, "and we will look after you". They have certainly looked after us. They have done such a good job that they are asking us for more money than ever before to bail them out of the huge deficit of their own making.

The interest on the public debt has grown at an average rate of 17.7 per cent over the period 1969 to 1979. It has increased at a rate of 22 per cent since 1974. So the Liberal government has looked after us since 1979, to the point that interest costs amount to 15.4 per cent of federal government expenditure. The record is tragic indeed.

The Conservative government was going to operate on a borrowing requirement of $8.2 billion for a full fiscal year, yet still offering within that package a mortgage and property tax credit. The people of my riding voted for those too.

An hon. Member: What about the 18-cent tax?

Mr. Wenman: And the people of my riding voted for that too. They found that acceptable. They understood the issue in western Canada. That is what I am trying to tell hon. members.

An hon. Member: That is what you told me; that you were rich.

Mr. Wenman: We are rich? I think we are all rich in Canada, but the basic richness of Ontario is that it is the major benefactor of all of this confederation.

Mr. Malone: That is why the Liberal beachhead stops at Winnipeg.

Mr. Wenman: That is exactly right.

Where is the relief for those who need it the most? The economy is in trouble with no shining light at the end of the tunnel. All the government can do is continue on the same old path of subsidy. I was so disappointed in the western minister today, namely the minister of immigration. Humanist and fine man that I know he is, either because of his liberal leanings or because he is not far enough west yet, he cannot catch the excitement of western Canada and its potential. He should have looked for the creation of new jobs in that section or region with its potential.

I am introducing a private member's bill. As part of the legislative program. It seeks to limit federal government expenditure to a fixed percentage of the gross national product. With this I would hope to ensure that government spending would always be present to ensure a proper functioning of the economy without being so great as to stifle productivity.

Until we realize that government spending will not cure all of our ills, that massive borrowing will not solve problems it created in the first place; until that time comes one cannot expect to realize the full economic potential which our country possesses. With the bill I am introducing to restrict government spending, it would in fact impose a limit relative to the gross national product. Ideally, of course, such a limit would also apply only to provincial governments, but those kinds of arrangements are outside of the authority of this House. As it presently stands, there is plenty of room for improvement within the federal government alone.

Federal government expenditures rose from 17.8 per cent of the gross national product in 1970 to 21.3 per cent in 1978. There is quite simply nothing to prevent the federal government's expenditures from rising to 30 per cent, 50 per cent, or even 75 per cent of the gross national product except, of course, that the government would have to borrow more money to do so. That is exactly what we are being asked to approve here today.

How much will the government borrow next year? Will it be $16 billion or will it be $20 billion? Where is it all going to end? Are we to expect the provinces to limit their spending when they are witnesses to the magnanimity of the federal government freely tossing around the money of Canadians? It is unfortunate that the government should have to pass a bill to limit its own excess. The government should be responsible enough to do that without legislation.

I had the naive belief that Parliament was supposed to play the watchdog role. Unfortunately, Parliament has little role to play in the control of expenditures. The government has unfortunately seen to it that certain fiscal matters are above the authority of Parliament. Now it would appear that we cannot even debate spending proposals because the government has no intention of telling us what it wants to do with the $12 billion. The government has no intention of bringing in a budget until after this bill is passed.

Mr. Malone: Just keep coming back to the trough.

Mr. Wenman: Obviously there has to be some level of external control. Part of that control is in fact this debate in the House of Commons tonight.

In conclusion, I would like to remind hon. members that one of the bases of western alienation is the growth of the central government. This bill promotes that growth. Because this bill presents the growth and the abuse of unlimited spending, I do not feel I can support this bill. I look forward to hearing the minister's response in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, today I should like to refute the reproaches addressed to the government by the financial critic of the opposition in his speech last week. My remarks will go from the general to the particular. Speaking generally, I shall start by explaining why the government needs borrowing powers and why the House should approve the bill now before us. I shall also give a certain amount of information in answer to the specific question put by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) within the scope of the study of this bill. I shall close my remarks with a few observations on more general matters raised by the hon. member and other colleagues.

[English]

I would like to start by stressing, contrary to the assertions of the hon. member for St. John's West, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has been quite forthcoming with this House. In his statement of April 21, he presented a projection of the government's fiscal position for 1979-80 and 1980-81 to Parliament for the consideration of the borrowing authority bill. This statement was intended as part of that background information.

The minister was very conscientious to make this projection available to the House at such an early date. Parliament had only been sitting for a week when the minister made his statement. I would suggest this is indicative of the high priority which the minister attaches to keeping Parliament informed on the government's fiscal position.

The hon. member for St. John's West has criticized the Minister of Finance for not presenting a fiscal plan to Parliament. He also suggests that the minister should bring down a budget by late June. Surely of all the members in this House, the hon. member for St. John's West should appreciate the difficulty of putting together a fiscal plan.

Mr. Blenkarn: Feed us a budget. Why can you not bring one in?

Mr. Evans: This is not something that should be done in great haste. It is important to take the time to do a proper job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: Order.

• (2100)

Mr. Evans: In response to the comments being made at the moment by hon. members opposite, I suggest that is the reason the hon. member for St. John's West waited some seven months before bringing down his budget.

There are complicated issues of expenditure planning which must be resolved. There is the envelope system of expenditure management which was established by the previous government. I believe this system is a major improvement over its predecessor, however if it is to function properly, the cabinet committees involved must be given time to prepare strategic plans and carefully consider the issues before a fiscal plan is finalized by cabinet. Hon. members opposite are surely aware of the time it takes to resolve a matter of this importance.

Another difficult issue is that of energy pricing. I need not remind hon. members that the previous government sought to establish an energy price agreement with the provinces and still had not succeeded in finalizing it some seven months after taking office. The present government is now involved in the process of negotiation with the energy producing provinces. It is important not to create an atmosphere which will make the negotiations more difficult.

[Translation]

The minister will table his budget when he feels these matters have been dealt with satisfactorily. The financial strategy of the government will be part of this budget. I cannot predict just when the minister will table his budget. For the time being, however, I should like to return to the reasons we are seeking authority to borrow $12 billion. In his statement of April 21, the Minister of Finance indicated that he expected financial requirements of $11.7 billion for the fiscal year 1980-81. This figure was based on the current structure of revenue and expenses. The minister had also emphasized that setting up a blended price system for oil could in itself reduce the financial requirements by up to $1 billion. Should this saving occur, it is clear that the financial requirements could come down to $10.7 billion. Therefore, the financial requirements range from $10.7 and $11.7 billion.

[English]

We are seeking a $12 billion borrowing authority to allow us to meet these financial requirements and to allow us some margin for contingencies. I believe it would not make much sense for the government to plan to seek borrowing authority more frequently than once a year. Hon. members will have adequate opportunities to debate on the estimates and on the budget, to express their views on the government's financial policies without having to allocate scarce parliamentary time to a more frequent consideration of borrowing authority bills.

I turn now to answers to some specific questions raised by the hon. member for St. John's West. Then I will turn to answer some specific questions raised by other hon. members.

First with respect to updated figures on the precise burden of the oil import compensation program, it is true that the minister undertook to provide these figures to the House. The reason that these figures were not provided to the House more quickly is that it took some time to do a thorough costing of the program. As a result of this costing, it has been estimated that the recent increases in the international price of oil would raise the oil import compensation program to $3.32 billion this year and would increase the deficit on the petroleum compensation revolving fund out of which the Syncrude subsidy is paid to $275 million.

There were also questions about indebtedness and public debt charges. As of March 31, 1980, the outstanding stock of treasury bills was $16.3 billion. The stock of domestic marketable bonds was $32.9 billion. The stock of Canada Savings Bonds was $18.1 billion.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is as of what date?

Mr. Evans: As of March 31, 1980. Of the marketable bonds outstanding, approximately 28 per cent could be characterized as long term, meaning that they have a term of maturity of over ten years. Of the $72.2 billion in unmatured debt outstanding, $67.5 billion is payable in Canadian dollars and $4.7 billion is payable in a foreign currency.

Public debt charges in 1980-81 were estimated by the minister in his April 21 statement to be in the order of $10,750 million. This represents 17.8 per cent of the total government outlays and 3.7 per cent of gross national product. The current estimate of the outcome for public debt charges in 1979-80 is $8.6 billion, the same as that contained in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West. Final information will only be available in August and we will be glad to provide hon. members with the final figure at that time.

[Translation]

The hon. member also asked what percentage of the funds—

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can confirm what he said, that the amount required to borrow this year will be $8.6 billion.

Mr. Evans: No, Mr. Speaker. The figure that I gave, the current estimate of the outcome for public debt charges in 1979-80, the year ending March 31, 1980, is $8.6 billion. That figure was given in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West in December, 1979. That is what the $8.6 billion refers to.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also asked what percentage of the funds will be borrowed by the government on the capital market and from the public pension plan. The funds will be entirely borrowed on the market. The borrowing authority provided in the bill under consideration does not take into account the increase in commitments with respect to the public pension plan which should assure to the government $2.3 billion during this fiscal year.

[English]

I will now respond to a few general issues raised by the hon. member for St. John's West. First, the hon. member quoted with approval Mr. Carl Beigie's statement, as reported in The Globe and Mail, that Canada will not begin to solve its inflation problems until the federal deficit is reduced. The hon. member appears to believe that this view distinguishes him and Mr. Beigie from the minister.

To disabuse him of this notion, I would suggest that he re-read the April 21 statement. The minister was clear in saying that he was "particularly concerned to ensure that government deficits and financial requirements diminish as economic growth resumes." I share this concern.

The hon. member for St. John's West correctly noted that the government has authority to borrow to replace previously issued securities and asked what implications this had for the borrowing authority. He made particular reference to the redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds since April 1, 1980. The net Canada Savings Bond redemptions have amounted to about $1.3 billion to date in the current fiscal year and, therefore, the government has had to raise this amount of cash from other sources. The source of these new funds has been the issuance of marketable debt with a particular reliance on treasury bills. This switch in the source of government funding from Canada Savings Bonds to marketable debt has not provided any new net cash to the government, nor has it used up any portion of the $2.9 billion of borrowing authority which was outstanding on April 1 of this year. The hon. member states that there was $2.9 billion of unused borrowing authority outstanding on November 1 of 1979 and which was available to be carried forward. However, the Minister of Finance has stated that this was still the case on April 1, 1980, and the hon. member would like to know the facts. The facts are that the Borrowing Authority Act, 1979-80, introduced by the hon. member last October to provide the government with $7 billion of supplementary borrowing authority contained a clause stipulating that the new authority came into force on November 1, 1979. Consequently, all new moneys raised between November 1, 1979, and March 31, 1980, were charged to this authority and the $2.9 billion of unused authority obtained earlier and which was outstanding on November 1, 1979, was left intact. Since all unused authority provided—

Mr. Blenkarn: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us how much was raised on the authority for the $7 billion between November 1 and March 1?

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Evans: I am sorry to inform the hon. member I do not have that information with me but I will make a commitment to get it to him at the earliest possible opportunity.

Since all unused authority provided by the 1979-80 act was cancelled on March 31, 1980, the government has charged all new moneys raised in the current fiscal year, that is, since April 1, 1980, to the $2.9 billion which was carried forward from a much earlier borrowing authority. So far in this fiscal year the government has borrowed $1.645 billion through treasury bill issues and $1.625 billion in marketable bonds including an issue sold May 13 for delivery on June 1 and net CSB redemptions have been $1.35 billion. In addition, the equivalent of $357 million Canadian was drawn on our stand-by credit in April. The hon. member for St. John's West has asked how the government plans to raise the $12 billion being reflected in this borrowing authority.

Mr. Blenkarn: How much is left?

Mr. Evans: I am sure the hon. member can appreciate that in financing the cash requirement the amount of cash raised through the issue of various types of security in Canada varies from year to year and depends on prevailing economic and financial conditions. The actual debt program for the past two fiscal years illustrates how the cash requirements have been met in the past. This is illustrated in a table entitled Cash Requirement and Sources of Financing which I intend to have tabled in the House.

In 1978-79 foreign exchange transactions substantially reduced the cash requirements and the $8.8 billion debt program resulted in a $1.9 billion addition to cash balance. In fiscal 1979-80 foreign exchange transactions had almost no impact on cash requirements and these were financed by a run-down in cash balances which had been built up in the previous year and a $7.9 billion debt program. In 1979-80 a greater use was made of treasury bills and marketable bonds than in 1978-79 and there were net redemptions of CSBs over the fiscal year. In fiscal 1980-81 we do not plan to make much use of cash balances to finance cash requirements. Consequently, we plan to raise all the cash requirements in the capital market. Since the government has for some time being playing down the role of Canada Savings Bonds we do not expect to raise much new money from this source during fiscal 1980-81. We have also been making more use of the treasury bill market in this year. Consequently, we expect that the proportion of the debt program met through the issue of treasury bills will be larger than in the past two fiscal years and the proportion met through issue of marketable bonds will be closer to that in fiscal 1978-79.

[Translation]

The hon. member asked what we intended to do about the Canada Saving Bonds and about the volume of redemptions that the government could absorb. I agree with the hon.

member that the government should continue to resort less to CSB issues and that is exactly what it has been doing since 1974. The proportion of outstanding CSB issues relative to the whole amount of the debt in Canadian dollars has dropped from a high of 43 per cent in 1975 to somewhere in the range of 27 per cent now.

[English]

The hon. member asked how many CSB redemptions we can absorb. So far this fiscal year net redemptions have amounted to about $1.3 billion and this amount has been paid out of our cash balances. In recent weeks we have offset virtually all of this cash drain through our borrowing operations in marketable securities. Very recently net CSB redemptions have fallen off rather sharply, which to a large extent reflects the sharp decline in interest rates that has largely eliminated the gap between interest rates payable on competing financial instruments and on outstanding CSB issues. We expect that the CSB redemption problem is over.

The hon. member for St. John's West also asked how much of the government's indebtedness was in the form of various types of instruments, how much was short-term debt, how much long-term debt and how much is payable in foreign currencies. The answers to these questions are provided in the Bank of Canada Review. However, I will briefly provide an outline of the current debt structure as at the end of March, 1980.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA DIRECT AND GUARANTEED SECURITIES

($ millions)

Payable in Canadian Dollars		%
Treasury Bills	16,325	23
Marketable Bonds	32,939	44
CSBs	18,189	26
Total	67,453	93
Payable in Foreign Currencies	4,701	7
	72,154	100

The average term to maturity of the government debt is seven years, two months. This compares with three years, eleven months at the end of 1974. Excluding loans and CSBs, 49 per cent of their direct and guaranteed debt had a term to maturity of less than three years, 17 per cent a term of three to five years, 6 per cent a term of five to ten years and 28 per cent a term of ten years and over.

The hon. member asked how much of the domestic debt program was taken up by the Bank of Canada last year and how much will be taken up in this current fiscal year.

While I cannot forecast who will buy the government's securities over the balance of this fiscal year, the following table, which I will read to the House, provides the distribution and changes in holdings of marketing securities for 1979-80 and up to March 21 of this year. As of March 31, 1980, the Bank of Canada held 14.6 per cent of the domestic marketable Government of Canada securities. As of May 21 of this year it held 12.7 per cent, a drop of 1.9 percentage points. The government accounts held 1 per cent as of March 31, 1980, and as of May 21, 1980, it was down to .9 per cent. Chartered banks held 9.7 per cent as of March 31, and as of May 21 held 10 per cent, an increase of .3 per cent. The general public held 24.5 per cent on March 31, 1980, and now it holds 27.9 per cent as of May 21.

As the figures reflect, the major purchases of government debt this fiscal year and the last have been by the general public. So far in 1980-81 the Bank of Canada has been a substantial net seller of Government of Canada securities.

The hon. member for St. John's West has stated that the interest costs on the foreign debt last October were $326 million and has asked what they are now and what are the net interest costs.

In answer to the first question, these interests costs are substantially unchanged from what they were last October. The specific net interest costs, however, are difficult to determine at this time. To the extent that the foreign currencies raised by these loans are maintained in official exchange reserves they are invested in short-term U.S. dollar government securities. To the extent that the U.S. dollars are converted to Canadian dollars through foreign exchange operations the Canadian dollars are deposited with Canadian chartered banks where they earn 90 per cent of the current Treasury bill rate. In this latter case, government cash balances are increased, and this offsets the need to borrow in Canada.

Most of the foreign currency loans were made in 1978 and early 1979, and since official U.S. dollar reserves are currently around $1.8 billion, most of the proceeds are either deposited with Canadian banks where they currently earn around 10.35 per cent or have been spent to offset borrowing in Canada at current high levels.

The U.S. dollars in official reserves earn interest at a level of around 8 per cent. Much of the interest cost on foreign loans is below these levels.

With that as a background and in an attempt to respond as fully as possible to the questions raised by the hon. member for St. John's West I would like to turn to commenting on some of the questions raised by other hon. members, first of all the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) in his statements on Bill C-30 late last week. I would like to quote passages from the statements of the hon. members and then try to give a frank appraisal of the answer which can be brought forward with regard to each of these statements.

First, the hon. member for Edmonton East stated, and I quote:

> Rather interestingly, in this new Parliament what has now been given to us in the economic statement is an indication that the federal level of spending in relation to the gross national product will grow by 2 per cent in one year from approximately 20 per cent of the gross national product to 22 per cent of the gross national product.

This is simply not true. As the hon. member for Edmonton East will see when the budget is presented, federal government expenditures or a percentage of GNP will remain in the same range they have been in since 1975.

Slight fluctuations may occur in either direction due to the changes in gross national product, but the hon. member can be assured that they will not be in the order of 2 percentage points.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary would not want to mislead the House with that last statement he just made. I think the statement he likely should be adding to that is that one of the reasons the percentage figure has gone down is the very substantial increase in government spending that the Minister of Finance announced in his so-called mini-budget earlier in this session.

Mr. Evans: No, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, I would not want to be accused of misleading the House or mislead the House in any way. However, the facts of the matter are that the statement was made by the hon. member for Edmonton East, and I have responded to that statement with our best estimate of what will happen to federal government expenditures as a percentage of gross national product. We are saying that at the end of this fiscal year they will be in the range that they were in 1975, and they will not be increasing by anywhere near 2 percentage points over what they were in the last year.

There is another statement to which I would like to respond, if I might. The hon. member for Edmonton East has indicated, and I quote:

> The federal debt has risen to dangerous proportions.

I have heard this being stated by a great many hon. members opposite during the debate on Bill C-30. Well, the net debt will be at 26 per cent of gross national product in 1980. That is net debt. This is not a dangerous proportion of gross national product. In fact, it is below the 27.7 per cent of gross national product which was the case in 1966 and far below the 33 per cent to 34 per cent range recorded during the period from 1957 to 1962 when hon. members opposite formed the government.

The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) raised an issue, and I will quote from his statement as follows:

> Since the April 21 statement projected cash requirements of $11,730 million why is the Minister of Finance asking for $12 billion? Furthermore, there is also the $2.9 billion unused borrowing authority which is being carried forward. These two authorities, in effect, would provide the government with $14.9 billion of borrowing authority.

Then the question the hon. member asked was the following:

> Why does the government need this amount when the cash requirement is only $11,730 million?

As I mentioned earlier in my speech, the $12 billion of borrowing authority now being requested is related to the government's cash requirement. There is also a need for contingencies such as borrowings in foreign currencies should the need arise from foreign exchange operations. This does not imply that such a need is imminent or that the government has any preconceived level for the value of the dollar. It simply is a margin for contingencies should any arise. Furthermore, all unused borrowing authority provided by Bill C-30 will be cancelled on March 31, of 1981.

In his statement before the House—I think it was on Friday—the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) made a statement that I think should be responded to as well, and I quote:

> In fact in 1969 this government had a surplus of $605 million. In one decade the situation has changed so that we now have a deficit of $16.185 billion.

Being a member of the public accounts steering committee, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake should know that the 1978-79 fiscal year figure of $16.185 billion is not a true representation of the fiscal position of the government.

It merely results from recording accounting adjustments in one year which had occurred during a number of previous years. The true figure was presented by the hon. member for St. John's West in his last budget, and that figure, as we all know, was $12.103 billion.

Later in the debate as well the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) made two or three statements which I think deserve an answer.

● (2130)

First, and I quote:

> In the spring 1980 review, the Friedland Mercantile Group . . . set out the comparative CPI figures, the wholesale increase figures and the current account positions with respect to ten of the most industrialized nations in the world . . . The first chart deals with the consumer price index. It ranks Canada sixth among the ten.

While I cannot comment on the validity of the consumer price comparisons of the Friedland Mercantile Group review except to say that the statistical methodology varies from country to country and from statistician to statistician, however, in the latest issue of the highly respected periodical The Economist, Canada is ranked fourth out of ten at 9.5 per cent on a year over year basis for the latest month available, only slighly behind West Germany at 6 per cent, Holland at 6.5 per cent, Japan at 8 per cent, and far ahead of such countries as France at 13.5 per cent, Italy at 20.5 per cent, Sweden at 13.5 per cent, the U.S. 14.5 per cent and the United Kingdom at 20 per cent inflation. The hon. member for York-Peel also said:

> For example, what that review highlights is the tremendous imbalance of taxation in this country compared to that of the United States. I refer to page 136 of the review, table 11.22.

We are here to debate Bill C-30 which concerns federal government borrowing, but the hon. member for York-Peel will notice that table 11.22 of the economic review to which he refers indicates that the federal Government of Canada spent a full percentage point of GNP less at 21.5 per cent than does the federal government of the United States at 22.5 per cent.

An hon. Member: In what year?

Mr. Evans: In the year referred to by the hon. member for York-Peel.

Finally, I should like to refer again to the hon. member for York-Peel who said:

—there is an international comparison of central government expenditures on page 135 of the review at table 11.21. It is interesting to note that there is only one country that has a higher central government expenditure than Canada.

With due respect, the hon. member for York-Peel must be reading his copy of the review upside down. It is clear from page 135 of the review to which he referred that Canada is tied with Switzerland with the lowest central government expenditure at 21 per cent of GNP, and far below the average of 31.5 per cent of GNP for the nine countries that are listed in that review.

An hon. Member: Tell us the whole story.

An hon. Member: That is misleading, John, and you know it.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member for St. John's West has asked in his statement before the House, in referring to the Minister of Finance, what is he going to do? He said the minister should not just come to the House and ask for $12 billion and refuse to tell us or give us any indication of what he is going to do. I will simply refer the hon. member for St. John's West to the estimates that have been tabled and reviewed by this House and that indicate what the spending plans are for the government.

Mr. Blenkarn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hate to say this, but the parliamentary secretary is certainly misleading the House. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: —when introducing the estimates that were tabled in the House—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: —specifically said that the estimates do not indicate the spending plans of this government. If they indicate the spending plans of the government, we are happy, but the President of the Treasury Board said they did not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) will realize that other hon. members have been calling for order. The first question is the language, which may or may not be parliamentary, and I would like the hon. member to give it some thought. The second question is that the hon. member seems to be entering into a debate, not a point of order. Under the circumstances, I think I should recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans).

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, the estimates, until modified, are the official spending plans for this government, and until the supplementary estimates have come in. Every government, not only brings in the main estimates, but brings in supplementary estimates. Members opposite, when they were in office, also brought in main estimates and supplementary estimates. As soon as supplementary estimates are brought in, the main estimates are no longer the official spending estimates of the government. But until those supplementaries are brought in, the main estimates represent the spending plans of the government. There are always supplementaries as conditions change.

The Minister of Finance of this government is concerned about the deficit. I want to make that point extremely clear and I hope the gentlemen opposite are listening. He is working hard to prepare a budget, but you know as well as I do that this depends on the development, as I have said earlier, of a fiscal plan to ensure the kind of equalization mentioned here tonight, for example, by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), and it depends also on agreement on a national energy policy. Until we have these, a budget simply would not be appropriate. Regional schizophrenia and other things are what I have been hearing throughout this debate on Bill C-30. I hear on the one hand from hon. members that we should reduce the deficit—and we agree we should reduce the deficit and the minister is working on ways to reduce it—and on the other hand we hear a call from hon. members opposite to spend more money on their particular regions. You cannot have it both ways; you cannot reduce the deficit and increase spending at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Listen and learn.

Mr. Evans: I should like to conclude by saying that we must all look at the nation as a nation. If we are to reduce the deficit, we must all share the burden. If we are to have vibrant regional development, we will all have to co-operate on priorities. The budget that the minister is now preparing will attempt to allocate equitably the burden of deficit reduction and honestly realign national priorities.

Tonight I have tried to answer a great many questions that were raised by hon. members opposite with regard to borrowing authority and what the debt position of the government is, as well as to some extent what the government spending plans are without the presentation of a formal budget. I think the time has come for us to move forward on this bill and get on with the business of the House in looking at legislation that is extremely critical, and to stop the kind of delaying tactics that have been used and will be used tonight and tomorrow to stop the passage of a bill which is a fair and honest bill, a bill of borrowing authority the same as ministers of finance have brought down in every government in the past. I think we should get on with the bill, pass the bill and move to other pieces of business.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could answer some questions. Could he tell us, as of the end of May—we are now in June and perhaps he has those figures—or, shall we say, as of May 15, what Canada Savings Bonds are outstanding, what ordinary market bonds are outstanding, what ordinary bonds held by the Bank of Canada are outstanding—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again but the hon. member for Mississauga South is not, in my understanding, raising a point of order or an appeal to the standing rules of the House. It has been known that when an hon. member has some remaining time in his speech, with his permission, another hon. member, such as the hon. member for Mississauga South in this instance, might want to put a question. But there must be a limit to that. So, the Chair will recognize a question hopefully composed of not too many parts, and then it will be time to move on to the next hon. member.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I presume the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) spoke tonight in order to answer a number of questions asked by hon. members on this side. Unfortunately he did not answer all of the questions. I was hoping that we could impose upon him sufficiently to answer some of the questions which I think not only members on this side but the people of Canada would like to have answered.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the number of questions which seem to be in preparation by the hon. member opposite could not in any way, shape or form be answered verbally in the House tonight. I would request that the hon. member submit the questions to me. I will prepare answers for the hon. member, and I will return them to him at the earliest possible opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) that I must agree with the parliamentary secretary. I tried to leave some room for a quick exchange on a point of clarification, but again the hon. member for Mississauga South seems to indicate that he has quite a series of questions in mind—

Mr. Blenkarn: I have one simple question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —that does not fit within the rules of the House. We have tried it twice, and I am afraid the Chair will have to move on and recognize the next hon. member.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was trying to seek Your Honour's attention just for a brief clarification. It is not worth writing letters back and forth, but I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary would answer it. If I tallied up his statement properly, the parliamentary secretary is saying that Canada is in debt to the tune of about $72 billion of secured debt at the present time. Over and above that $72 billion will be the $12 billion which is being requested at the present time. Is that correct?

An hon. Member: For a total of $84 billion!

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that on a net debt basis that is what we are talking about. That is a net debt basis, and I think the hon. member should understand the distinction between net debt and gross debt.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by complimenting the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) for answering a good many questions tonight. But I must say to him in all seriousness that I think he spoiled the effect of his speech by accusing the opposition of delaying tactics. I would suggest to him with deference that perhaps because members on this side of the House have quite rightly refused to give the kind of blank cheque the government initially seemed to want, he came forward tonight in a very constructive manner and gave what I thought was a very good speech. Had he or his minister been a bit more forthcoming initially, I believe there would have been a lot of time saved in this House and a lot of hon. members on this side of the House would have been spared the time and effort of putting very valid questions forward, which he has only just now answered.

I was very interested in the content of the speech of the parliamentary secretary. He is quite right when he talks about the difference between the net debt and the gross debt. As hon. members know, in fiscal 1980 the net debt amounts to $67 billion as I understand it. This is the gross public debt minus certain assets. These assets normally include such items as repayable loans to Crown corporations and national governments and equity investments like Petro-Canada and the Canadian Development Corporation. But I believe that in fiscal 1980 the gross debt was $105 billion which indeed is a great deal of money. Following what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) said, I also understand that the gross public debt charges for fiscal 1981 will amount to $10.3 billion and as I think he said tonight, 17.7 per cent of budgetary expenditures.

These matters are very esoteric to most of us. I do not pretend to understand all the subtleties of finance. I was always told that if your outgo exceeds your income, your upkeep will be your downfall. I understand that, but also I understand that there has been a great increase in the total amount of public debt since I first came to this place nine years ago. Whether we get into proportions of debt or not, vis-à-vis the GNP, it is fair to say by way of emphasis that the amount of the deficit now is as much as the total budget was when I first came here. Whether or not this is as alarming as it sometimes seems when one relates it to the proportion of the GNP, I leave that to the judgment of my peers here in the House. But nonetheless it is a striking figure.

In looking for historical parallels and wondering just how the Liberal party conducted financial affairs in its early days, I looked at Canadian Quotations and Phrases, Literary and Historical. That is not hysterical, but historical, compiled by Robert M. Hamilton. Wanting to be fair and equitable, I looked through the section on the Liberal party, wanting to find the good and the bad. I found some fairly complimentary things that were said with some justification. For example, I found a quote by William Lyon Mackenzie King when he was speaking to his Liberal supporters in August of 1919. It reads as follows:

> The Liberal party will continue to stand as its illustrious leaders stood in the past, for unity, good will and the open mind.

That is a fine tribute, but I looked forward to see if I could get something that was a little more objective than the assessment of the leader of the party, however, related to the kind of spending and fiscal and monetary capacity this party exhibited back in those early days. I was fortunate enough to come across something which was featured in a supplementary to The Montreal Gazette, a paper with which Mr. Speaker is familiar, back in 1891. It is a quotation from The People's Almanac. I will read it just for a little bit of change in pace in this debate tonight to see what the assessment was of the Liberal party by The People's Almanac, regarding its financial management capabilities away back before the turn of the century. It reads as follows:

> See the faces of the Grits.
> Grizzly Grits,
> What a woe-begone expression at present o'er them flits.
> They are thinking, thinking deeply
> How to run this country cheaply
> And they wonder
> How in thunder
> It is going to be done.
> But the people—they who vote—of their twaddle take no note,
> For they know the dismal, dreary, direful dole
> Of the Grits
> Of the moribund, morose and melancholy
> Grits, Grits, Grits, Grits.
> The greedy, grubby, garrulous old Grits.

Now, I would never say anything like that myself, but I thought it might be worth while to put it on the record from such an objective source as The People's Almanac. Despite the fine speech made by the parliamentary secretary, I believe there is still a bit of room for constructive criticism and suggestion as to how some of this vast sum of money, the $12 billion, might be allocated.

The hon. parliamentary secretary, to do him some justice, answered a lot of questions, but he quite properly added in response to comments from this side of the House that of course there are some details which have to be filled in yet. However I think one of the things he said that is interesting before we get to that stage, was the bit of information which he gave us, if I took it down properly, that we owe $4.7 billion or close to $5 billion to foreign countries payable in their own currencies. Having in mind the state of the Canadian dollar relative to most of the countries where we do our borrowing these days, such as the United States, Switzerland and West Germany, I presume that that $4.7 billion in effect means a lot more indebtedness than it would first appear. To be fair about it, I suppose there must be a discount there of at least 15 or maybe 20 per cent when we have to pay those funds back. When the parliamentary secretary is answering more questions, as he indicated he would do, I wonder if he might give us the premium we will have to pay. This leads me back to the point the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) made in his speech as to why we need that particular, explicit authority in clause 2 of the bill, if we have already managed to incur that kind of a debt. Perhaps it is related to trade, I do not know. As you know, Your Honour, subsection 2 states very clearly that this government does want authority, for greater certainty that they can borrow, in effect, currency other than that of Canada. I would hope that until our currency improves a little bit more in terms of its relative value to most others they would not avail themselves of that option—that if they already have it they would refrain from doing it and that if they get it, they will use it very carefully.

I think it was the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in his always quiet, persuasive way, who pointed out that we were away behind value in most currencies in the world, including the Zambian kwacha. Whether we owe any Zambian kwachas or not, I do not know but I hope not.

I believe that in considering the large amount of money this government is requesting—and properly so—it would be in order for a member such as myself to make some suggestions about how some of this money—which is about $5 billion more than the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West required last fall—might better be spent by this administration as they bring forth their budget and prepare their special estimates.

It seems to me, for example, that recent events on the international scene indicate very clearly that if there is one place where the Canadian people would find it advisable to see their hard-earned, borrowed money, spent, it would be in the improvement of the capabilities of this country to defend itself and to take a proper place in the defence of the western world.

I know these figures have been put on the record before and I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House but it seems that when talking about GNP, percentage of spending and so on, these figures issued by the Institute of Strategic Studies in London on the military balance which are fairly new, might be interesting to hon. members.

The percentage of government spending of our budget in 1979 was 8.6 per cent, less than it has taken to service our national indebtedness by far. On the other hand, the United States which carries the burden of our western defence, spent 21.6 per cent; the United Kingdom 11.5 per cent; the Netherlands 9.1 per cent; Sweden, a supposedly neutral country, 8.4 per cent and Czechoslovakia 7.1 per cent. I know it is very difficult to precisely relate the percentages for some countries, particularly those in the eastern bloc which sometimes bury their military expenditures in other ways.

The percentage of the GNP, which is another way of expressing the priorities of these countries that I picked out at random in reporting their military spending, indicates that 1.8 per cent is all that this country spends; United States 5 per cent; United Kingdom 4.7 per cent; The Netherlands 3.3 per cent; Sweden 3.4 per cent and Czechoslovakia 3.8 per cent. It is evident we are not doing our part. We are a nation, small in population, that controls a very large percentage of the real estate on this planet and a disproportionate amount of its natural resources. I say to you and to my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, that unless we are kidding ourselves we cannot believe that we can even patrol the treasure house we have in the north, much less defend it.

I certainly hope in considering what is going to be done with these funds the government is asking Parliament for, that very serious consideration be given to doing something about protecting the future of this part of the continent. If one can take seriously the reports emanating from different parts of the world, the Soviet Union is now in a very, very interesting position. Their military machinery, their electronic capability, the relative disarray of the west, puts them in the position where, between now and 1985, they might be very tempted indeed to go to some other type of military adventure.

Surely every country in the western world including ours, in particular, as we are so close to the United States and so deficient in meeting our own defence commitment, has an obligation to do something quickly to send out signals showing that we are prepared to act.

Henry Kissinger was interviewed for an article in Time magazine recently. As he was one of the principal architects of détente it is interesting to note that he said it is absolutely imperative to get across to the Soviet Union that their definition of détente is simply unacceptable. He said their definition of détente is to be committed to defeat the United States peacefully and that they would either have to accept that they could not undertake a geo-political offensive or would have to give up détente. He went on to list some of what the Soviet Union has done since 1975: Cuban troops in Angola; Cuban troops in Ethiopia; Soviet bases in South Yemen, Ethiopia and Libya; for the past few years the Soviet occupations of Afghanistan, the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia under the cover of a friendship treaty, and a Soviet brigade in Cuba which he claimed happened after 1976 no matter what nonsense is being put out.

In a recent magazine article Maclean's magazine reminded us of the grizzly anniversary of the massacre in Katyn Forest in Poland which up to this point the Soviet Union has tried to blame on Nazi Germany. It is becoming clear that it was perpetrated by the Soviets.

I only mention these things to show that in my humble opinion there is much to be said for the definition that Winston Churchill gave of Soviet diplomacy at a time when he was holding all parliamentarians enthralled with his picturesque and accurate speeches in various parts of the western world. I do not know where it was he made the observation that the Soviet Union's diplomacy is like a burglar in a hotel: They go down the hall trying every door until they find one that is open.

The détente policy and the way we have been conducting ourselves has been an open-door policy but the doors have all been opened into our resources. I believe that some $60 billion has been loaned to the Soviet Union by western financial institutions. I doubt if they can service the interest on that debt, since we are talking large figures tonight, so what is going to happen about that?

I am trying not to stray too far from the bill before us, Mr. Speaker. I want to make my feelings known to hon. members opposite, however, regarding the priorities they might seek to establish for this rather large amount of money they are asking this House to give them.

Regarding another priority, I should like to quote some words of the parliamentary secretary—"a vibrant regional development priority"—or policy, I believe is what he said. As he said, we cannot have it both ways—we cannot cut the budget and spend money at the same time. We can re-examine our priorities, however, even if it is almost a cliché to say that it is a good idea to spend money in order to make money.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), whose aims and philosophies I support, spoke eloquently in this House in a rather unusual fashion not long ago when he made a public plea to his peers for more money for regional development. It is interesting to note that in the priorities of this government, this department, which is perhaps the newest major department to be created in the last ten years, was once the recipient of about 2 per cent of the budgetary allotment of the government; it is now barely half that. Its thrust has been changed. The legislation that governs its use is becoming almost obsolete. Surely the RDIA, which is the basis for these grants, must be changed to bring them in line with different practice and to make sure there is adequate lead time to do this. The minister knows this and I knew it when I was minister. We were proceeding to bring forward legislation to improve the operations of DREE. That is not enough, however; additional funds will have to be found for DREE if it is going to continue to have a useful role in developing this country.

It is ironic that the transfer payments have been going up dramatically while DREE declines. That is not all bad, but the amount available for DREE has been going down, which shows again that the proportion of money that this government has available to create the wealth which some departments are so anxious, and properly so, to distribute to our people; that this amount of money is disproportionately larger than the amount of money which goes to departments like Industry, Trade and Commerce and DREE to develop our country.

Surely this is a situation that must be looked at in the context of the large amount of money which is being borrowed. As large as the deficit is and as large as the amount which is being borrowed is, I am not as concerned about the fact that it is being borrowed as I am about the way in which it will be spent. Sometimes in the past I think that this government had an edifice complex, not an oedipus complex, and that has to stop. These fine and imposing buildings like the Bank of Canada building, are very nice and very energy inefficient, but they do not do much for the productivity of our country. The Bank of Canada building is nothing more than an elaborate financial temple. It is probably as elaborate, if not more elaborate, than those in any country of the world. I see that it is past ten o'clock. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the government what the order of business is for tomorrow. Can it confirm that the business for tomorrow will be continuing the debate on Bill C-30?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we will continue to debate Bill C-30.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CIVIL DEFENCE—REQUEST FOR NEW EMPHASIS ON POLICIES AND INCREASED BUDGET

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and indeed the Prime Minister of Japan have all stood before this House and warned that we are entering a dangerous decade fraught with instabilities and deteriorating super power relations. The global build-up of arms is a reality. Widespread proliferation of weapons and technology is becoming an increasing reality. The accelerated efforts of both our friends and potential foes to provide protection for their civilians against nuclear threat is a further reality.

We are all charged to work toward global peace, and we can take pride in the fact that Canada's history as a peacemaker is internationally recognized. But to pretend that the nuclear holocaust will not or cannot happen is to lose touch with reality. Worse still, it is shirking our responsibility as members of Parliament toward the people of Canada.

It is certainly not the fault of the Canadian people that civil defence is so misunderstood. In other countries of the world governments have ensured that their people have the maximum amount of safety and are well versed in emergency measures in the case of nuclear war. I am sure that many hon. members saw the television show on Sweden which talked in part about the underground parking lots which were built to also act as fall-out shelters. Yugoslavia, Finland, Norway and Switzerland have similar programs for their citizens. China has the capacity to move most of its millions of citizens in Peking underground in a matter of minutes.

It is reported that the Soviet Union has spent $65 billion on civil defence in the last ten years. In the United States new plans are being announced and accelerated for mass evacuation of cities in the event of a world crisis. In Britain recently, the House of Lords devoted seven hours of debate to the subject of civil defence. The French Senate called recently for a new and accelerated program for their nation.

However, we in Canada still cannot find out who is the minister of civil defence. In fact, we find that all ministers are ministers for civil defence, but no one is really in charge of civil defence policy and planning. There is no mention of what are the roles of the members of Parliament, the cabinet ministers, the municipal government or the provincial government. It is all very muddy and unclear with each government shifting the buck back and forth.

There is far too much at stake to allow this kind of indifference and this state of unorganization. A congressional committee in the United States estimated that in the event of a nuclear attack on targets in the United States only, there would be two million casualties in Canada. At the present time in our current state of preparedness, a nuclear attack on Canada as well would wipe out over half the population of this country—over half of 23 million people, which amounts to 11 million Canadians. That number could be reduced considerably if the government were to take appropriate action similar to any of the other allies or even our potential enemies.

Some military people say we are being optimistic with those terrible statistics. They argue that Canadian cities would be prime targets. If there were in fact nine prime targets in Canada, that could be a threat to half of our population. If 100 people were threatened and we knew about it in this House of Commons, we would be outraged and calling for action right now.

I direct this question to you, Mr. Speaker. Do you know what you would do if a nuclear bomb were to drop in downtown Montreal? Would you know how to direct the citizens in your riding? Would any member in this House of Commons know what to do as a responsible leader in his community if there were a nuclear attack? I do not think so. I do not think the person who will respond to me can tell me even after he has researched the subject.

We are in an appalling state of affairs with respect to civil defence in Canada. The Prime Minister knows where to go. He has told us; he has his bunker. Some of the cabinet know. They have their protection. There are about 7,000 people out of 23 million who can find a place of reasonable safety in a nuclear war. But what about the other 23 million? There is no place for them, no protection for them and there is no plan for them.

We spend billions of dollars. We just spent $4 billion on planes, guns and tanks. How much do we spend on civil defence, I think it is $1.9 million. The figure is about $2 million. The ratio in $2 million to $4 billion, the amount spent for planes. Civil defence has become a nonentity in Canada unfortunately.

For the past seven years since October, 1973, when the Government of Canada announced that there would be changes in the emergency planning structure within the federal government, there has been almost deadening silence about what the government intends to do. One of the problems stems from the fact that no single minister of the Crown has clear responsibility for civil defence preparedness. Heightening the difficulties is the division of responsibility among the federal government, the provinces and municipalities. Perhaps civil defence must be decentralized. But surely this refers only to the post-attack phase, not to the program policy-making and planning that precedes a nuclear war. To slough off responsibility on to the provinces is to abdicate one of the primary roles of a central government—of any government—to protect its citizens in time of war.

It is clear that the federal government is passing the buck in terms of its responsibilities for civil defence.

The Prime Minister on Friday, May 16, said that he had not received a request for increased civil defence funds nor did he believe that increased funding was necessary. Where has he been among the leaders of the world? I would not like to say that the Prime Minister was misleading. He did not seem to be referring to the true facts of the situation. The Prime Minister did not mention that the federal government has undercut the federal-provincial financial assistance programs to such an extent that the provinces today can scarcely devote any attention to war preparedness. Yet, the Deputy Prime Minister in his response last Wednesday placed the responsibility for implementing existing civil defence plans, such as they were, firmly in the hands of the provinces.

Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that the Department of National Defence is responsible for establishing public information programs for use in an emergency—just brought up to date—and that the emergency broadcasting system is not reinstated? Their siren system must be enlarged to provide coverage for expanded urban communities, and evacuation plans need to be established in our major cities in any type of war.

There are so many things that need to be done. Canada is not ready. Canada's concern for its citizens must come up to that shown by other countries of the world. Other countries have shown a desire to face the unfortunate reality. It is time that Canada did the same.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the statement that responsibility for detailed implementation of the necessary plans is in the hands of the provinces, and that public works and national defence are the federal departments having the most direct responsibility, is indeed correct. Public Works Canada has responsibility for carrying out planning at the federal level for protection of the population of Canada against the war time effects of radioactive fall-out from nuclear weapons. This work is being carried out under the national shelter program. At the present time, emphasis is being given to completing surveys of fall-out protection inherent in existing buildings.

Information collected by these surveys is made available to provinces and includes the levels of fall-out protection in existing buildings throughout Canada and the people capacities of these buildings, having regard for natural ventilation and physically usable space. These data together with detailed population distribution by city block and small area, constitute the key ingredients to development of both provincial master shelter plans and the more detailed community shelter plans. The work of planning for protection of people certainly points to significant involvement by provinces and communities as well as the federal government.

Provincial master shelter plans and community shelter plans already exist for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but the major planning work for the rest of the country has yet to be accomplished, and this can only be achieved if the provinces concerned are willing to co-operate actively in the planning. Although the major survey work across Canada is expected to be completed by the end of 1980, it will take significant effort and resources to bring to fruition the balance of the necessary plans and arrangements that would reduce the vulnerability of Canadians to the effects of radioactive fall-out under nuclear war conditions.

The hon. member opposite decries the confusion and lack of ability of the various jurisdictions to get together. Perhaps the hazard that he speaks of, the threat that he calls to mind as a result of changing world conditions may motivate the various jurisdictions in this country to pull together. At a time when the first ministers are getting together to talk to a total review of our constitution and governmental arrangements, this question is timely and should be on the agenda as this level of government considers its role vis-à-vis the other levels of government.

In conclusion, civil defence cannot be solely a federal responsibility. Provinces and municipalities must of necessity be involved in development of emergency plans affecting the health and well-being of people, whether they be wartime emergencies or peacetime emergencies.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REUNIFICATION OF FAMILIES—REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on May 20 the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille), speaking from the government side of this House, moved the following motion:

> That this House strongly urge the Soviet government to fulfil its undertakings in regard to the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, specifically those calling for the reunification of families, and to allow the Jewish refusenik, Lev Ovsishcher, to emigrate to Israel.

The motion was seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), a member of my party. I congratulate the House because the motion received unanimous consent, which is unusual. That indicates some expression of regard for the seriousness of the issue that was raised. On May 26, I raised the matter in a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). I would like to speak for a moment about Lev Ovsishcher. He was born in Russia in 1919 and was raised as a boy in the city of Minsk. When he was 17 years of age, in 1936, he enlisted in the Soviet army in which he served loyally and with distinction for the next 25 years. He rose to the rank of colonel and retired from the army in 1961.

It is a sad commentary on human events that today in the Soviet Union it would appear to be government policy to denigrate the patriotism of Soviet Jews. Colonel Ovsishcher's military record was outstanding. He was wounded in action at Stalingrad and fought in many of the major battles on the Russian front, including the defence of Moscow. At the end of the war he had received 17 medals for extraordinary bravery and efficiency as a soldier in the terrible struggle to repel the Nazi enemy.

Colonel Ovsishcher emphasized the patriotism of Russian Jews in a speech he made in 1976 quoting statistics well known to the Soviet government. He pointed out that more than half a million Soviet Jews bore arms against the enemy during World War II. Of these, 150 rose to the rank of general. One hundred and seventy thousand Russian Jews were awarded medals or citations for bravery and 160 received the title "Hero of the Soviet Union" for extraordinary valor and devotion to duty. These Jews fought for their homeland, Russia. To us, it seems extraordinary that today only because some of them wish the right to emigrate to Israel they should be cast as traitors to the state.

Colonel Ovsishcher applied for an exit visa to Israel in 1972 and stated his desire to emigrate to that country. The harassment which has become commonplace in such cases commenced immediately. He was deprived of his rank of colonel. He was demoted in his place of employment. His mail was intercepted, his telephone calls disrupted and in 1973 his telephone service was discontinued. Government agents searched his apartment, Yiddish and Hebrew books were confiscated and he was interrogated numerous times by the KGB.

Colonel Ovsishcher defiantly reminded the authorities of his civil rights under the constitution. The harassment continued and in June, 1975, he was advised that he would not be allowed to leave for Israel for at least another three years. As of today, he is still not allowed to emigrate to Israel, unable to join his daughter who is now there.

After the war ended, Colonel Ovsishcher returned to his home in Minsk where in March, 1943, the Nazis executed 5,000 Russian Jews. He and other veterans erected a memorial to that evil act in memory of the victims. This year, as in past years, ceremonies were planned at the site of the memorial; they were especially significant as it was the thirty-fifth anniversary of the defeat of Hitler's Nazi regime. Colonel Ovsishcher was to have attended but was prevented from doing so by the KGB.

On March 6 of this year, with the help of friends in Canada and Russia, I was able, along with others, to put a telephone call through to Colonel Ovsishcher from my Vancouver office to him in Minsk. We later received from him a moving letter which reads in part:

> I want to express my gratitude to you for your help in our difficult life and for your support which you have shown in your telephone call of March 6. The fact that you have not forgotten us in our hard fight is so important, not only for me but for many other families who are now in the same situation. You know, one man alone can be very weak but we are strong because we know we have supporters and friends. This is what gives us faith that we shall overcome.
> When the war against the Nazis was over, we hoped victory would bring us not only peace but also human rights. Unfortunately, it was not so and today the voices of suffering people from many countries ring in the free world asking for your help. It is very important for us that you may hear and listen to these voices.

We must not break faith with Colonel Ovsishcher and the suffering peoples of whom he speaks. I urge the government to convey to the government of the U.S.S.R. the unanimous motion of this House and the remarks which I have had the privilege of making in this House of freedom, the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we are, indeed, aware of the case of Colonel Lev Ovsishcher, a Jewish refusenik who wishes to join his daughter in Israel. The Canadian government has had no involvement with this case and since it is a third country which is concerned there is little we can do in the way of representations to encourage the Soviet authorities to grant him an exit visa, much as many of us would like to help him.

● (2220)

Past experience has made it clear that the Soviet Union might well challenge Canada's involvement in the case and that our interests could be jeopardized in other questions with a direct Canadian interest.

Although direct intervention is not a viable option, cases such as that of Colonel Ovsischer are relevant in the context of the 1975 Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. Basket III of the Final Act of this conference refers to human contacts, including the question of the freer movement of people and, in particular, with humanitarian cases of this nature, involving the reunification of families. While progress has been made in this area with the U.S.S.R., there remains, unfortunately, considerable scope for improvement. For this reason the Canadian delegation to the review conference in Madrid this autumn will press for a more forthcoming Soviet attitude toward family reunification, including such cases as that of Colonel Ovsishcher.

NUCLEAR ENERGY—UNDERGROUND WATER DISPOSAL RESEARCH PROJECT IN MANITOBA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my purpose tonight is to comment on the complete inadequacy, and worse, the cynicism, of the answers I received on May 12 from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) respectively.

I asked about a specific project at a specific place, the underground waste disposal research project in the vicinity of Lac du Bonnet, inquiring as to whether further work on this project might be suspended and that public hearings be held to provide a forum for the discussion of all the attendant scientific, economic, social and ethical issues.

Instead, I was blandly assured by the parliamentary secretary that the whole question of radioactive waste disposal was under active consideration with provincial governments, and particularly the governments of Ontario and Manitoba, and that he would be glad to report to the House any further developments. The parliamentary secretary's kindness in not burying me with specific or even remotely relevant information pursuant to my question, is not appreciated.

He seems to have been taking lessons from AECL in how to keep a closed mouth about difficult questions, breaking secrecy only to indulge in badly disguised propaganda, to brand concerned citizens as emotional or irrational or to admit that accidents which they previously denied have actually occurred. No more irrational, emotional or intellectually craven state of mind could be imagined than that of the promoters of nuclear energy in this country who would have Canada pursue a nuclear future without adequate public debate of any kind. Instead, they blindly advocate that the public uncritically accept their self-interested overconfidence in their own abilities and hide from appropriate political and moral discussion about this issue behind the façade of technical expertise and the urgency of maintaining the viability of the industry, as they call it, an answer which begs the question, to say the least.

Therefore I call on the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to tell us now whether there will be public hearings into this research project at Lac du Bonnet, whether he can assure the House that this will indeed always be a research project and that this is not the first step in Manitoba's becoming a burial ground for Ontario's radioactive waste.

Mr. Speaker, there is already a great deal of nuclear waste in this country that needs to be safely disposed of—there is no question about that—if indeed it is possible to dispose safely of it, so research into safe disposal is in order, but only because we have arrived where we are now without choosing. It is now time to make a choice and to initiate a public debate about nuclear energy through the framework, as I suggest, of a moratorium, public hearings and a referendum. For this reason I hope the parliamentary secretary will say something tonight about the government's intention in this regard and not just put off the question in the way the Prime Minister did on May 12. An internal departmental review is not enough. The people must be allowed to think and to speak openly about this issue, and a conscious decision must be reached, whatever that decision may be. My personal hope is that Canadians might choose to change their way of life in such a way as to permit a more renewable, decentralized, conservationist and less risky energy future, not just for their own sakes but for the sakes of future generations. But if the people should choose otherwise, so be it. All I ask for, and all others who are interested in this issue ask for, is that we be given such a choice and that the government demonstrate that it is not simply a tool of the nuclear establishment in this country but a servant of the people.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, since June, 1978, the Ontario and Canadian governments have been working on the first phase of a long-term project to ensure that nuclear spent fuel can be permanently disposed of in an environmentally safe manner.

• (2225)

Most of the geologic research, conducted under the auspices of AECL, is at present being carried out in the Ontario portion of the Canadian shield. On May 28, the Manitoba government approved the plans for the construction of an underground research laboratory near AECL's Whiteshell research establishment in the municipality of Lac du Bonnet. This new research facility is estimated to cost $7.5 million and will no doubt create many additional jobs in the area.

This is another example of how the two levels of government are capable of reaching agreement on matters of importance to all of us.

I should like to add that there has been extensive citizen involvement in the decision to locate the research laboratory in this area. For the past several months, there have been public meetings examining the question in the Whiteshell area. A citizens' liaison group formed by the reeve of the rural municipality of Lac du Bonnet found, according to the reeve, that between 96 per cent and 98 per cent of the citizens in the area approved of the project. A total of five local municipal councils passed resolutions approving AECL's plans for research in the area, and on May 7, the municipality of Lac du Bonnet informed the Manitoba government that it supported the AECL proposal. Contrary to critics' charges of a lack of citizen participation, the public is informed and is an integral part of the decision-making process.

We can all be proud of our country's unique contribution in the area of nuclear energy. In a world of decreasing energy sources and increasing energy costs, Canadians find themselves at the forefront of one of the most technologically advanced fields. We must continue our efforts to ensure that adequate energy sources are available to all in the future. I am certain that all members support accurate and timely scientific research to ensure the continued development of our full energy potential.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

IRAN—RESCUE OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS BY CANADA—STATEMENT BY CANADA PARTY OF LABOUR DELEGATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement by Michael Smith, a Canadian who is an official delegate of the Canada Party of Labour to the International Conference on the Alleged Crimes of the United States in Iran, that the action taken by the Canadian government and Ambassador Kenneth Taylor in rescuing several Americans from certain illegal and cruel detention by Iran is "a disgrace to Canada", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That Canada and its people through unanimous consent of this House of Commons totally and irrevocably dissociate themselves from any statements of Mr. Smith's ensuing from this shameful performance the world has now witnessed from one who has, by his irresponsible and ignorant action, himself become a disgrace to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, unanimous consent is required before the motion can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

LAY-OFF OF 109 EMPLOYEES AT MASONITE CANADA LTD. IN GATINEAU, QUE.—POSSIBILITY OF OFFERING MORE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Yesterday the president of Masonite Canada Ltd. of Gatineau announced the gradual lay-off of 109 employees between now and August 1. A sharp drop in construction as well as a very limited demand for wood fibres used by that plant to make insulating material have led the president to take that decision. Considering the social impact of that massive lay-off under current economic circumstances, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That at his earliest convenience the Minister of Employment and Immigration meet the president of the union at the plant to consider with him the possibility of rehiring the dismissed employees elsewhere on the labour market and to provide them, if necessary, with some retraining.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNITED NATIONS

ALLEGED BREACH BY CANADA OF ARTICLE 15 OF COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a subject on which there has been some consultation with both sides of the House. In view of the fact that the United Nations human rights committee has received communications made on behalf of a number of inmates that Canada has breached article 15 of the United Nations covenant on civil and political rights, to which Canada is a signatory, in denying early release to prisoners and parolees with street time served on parole prior to October 15, 1977, and in view of the fact that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has stated that "should any member of Parliament be ready to raise the question in the House under Standing Order 43, the government would have no objection to debating the issue", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That the subject matter of the communications pending before the United Nations human rights committee be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for a recommendation as to the appropriate response to these communications.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No!

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUPPORT OF GOVERNMENT BOYCOTT BY EQUESTRIAN COMPETITOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canadian equestrian competitor, Cindy Neale, of King city, Ontario, has declined an invitation from the Soviet Union to participate in the Olympic Games at the expense of the Soviet Union, and that this action by the Soviets demonstrates that the Olympics in Moscow are in danger of failure in that the Soviet Union must attempt to bribe athletes in order to entice them to participate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That this House congratulate Cindy Neale for supporting the Canadian government's decision to boycott the Moscow Olympics in light of that country's barbaric invasion of Afghanistan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LIONS INTERNATIONAL

SIXTIETH ANNUAL CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which I believe will have the unanimous consent of hon. members on both sides of the House. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson):

That this House welcomes the members of Lions International Multiple District "A" to Canada's capital, on the occasion of their sixtieth annual convention, which is their diamond jubilee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY

PETERBOROUGH, ONT.—STEPS TO SAFEGUARD JOBS AT CANADIAN GENERAL ELECTRIC PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in view of the assurance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his throne speech that, and I quote, "amendments will be introduced to ensure that major acquisition proposals by foreign companies will be publicized prior to a government decision on their acceptability," I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that Canadian General Electric in Peterborough will be phasing out its power cable and building wire operations at the Peterborough plant, a move which would result in the lay-off of approximately 200 employees with another 100 affected in support industries, because an application is presently before the Foreign Investment Review Agency, known as FIRA, requesting permission for CGE to sell this wire and cable operation to a Swiss-controlled company known as Pirelli Cables Limited, and due to the detrimental impact this application would have on the area of Peterborough, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That this government urge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to intercede in an effort to safeguard these 200-plus vital jobs in the Peterborough area and that CGE be advised by FIRA that these 200 jobs at the Peterborough plant must be safeguarded.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

CF-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT ACQUISITION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government has entered into an advertising campaign concerning the acquisition of the CF-18 fighter aircraft, with the self-congratulatory theme of "A good choice and a good deal for all Canadians", at a cost of at least $260,000.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is it more than $260,000, Madam Speaker?

In order that the poor, unsuspecting taxpayer of Canada might obtain clarification as to whether or not this advertising constitutes crass political advertising at public expense, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty):

That this House direct that the Minister of State (Multiculturalism), who is responsible for government advertising and external political communications, make a statement to this House explaining, first, the rationale of the advertising program respecting the acquisition of the CF-18 fighter aircraft, which is a fait accompli; second, the cost of the program; and third, the reason why the advertising differs in each region of the country.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EMPLOYMENT

STAFFING OF MANPOWER AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICES WITH INTERPRETERS TO ASSIST CLAIMANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Toronto labour council and the Dovercourt NDP community action centre have requested the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to staff employment centres and UIC offices with interpreters to assist non-English and non-French speaking claimants, and in view of the fact that the minister has not done so, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration provide appropriate interpreters in Canada Employment Centres and UIC offices to ensure that clients whose language is neither English nor French will no longer be denied legitimate services which are provided to other Canadians and that this be done by hiring additional staff for that purpose.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. On April 24, just after the April 21 financial statement when the Minister of Finance indicated there will be a deficit this year of $14.1 billion, $3.7 billion more than had been contemplated on December 11, the Prime Minister said:

We are not obsessed by the deficit in the same way as the Clark government was.

Since the Prime Minister's statement there have been two other statements. One was by the President of the Treasury Board, who said:

We want to reduce the deficit—

This statement was made on May 27 before the CMA.

—because we realize that the costs of such deficits result in an unacceptable burden. Deficits tend to erode investor confidence.

The deputy minister of finance said to the Senate committee on May 27:

You all recognize the federal government is in a deep budget deficit . . .

Indeed, the deficit problem is going to have to be solved by generalized tax increases ultimately across the board.

My question to the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: At last!

Mr. Crosbie: A little patience, please. My question to the Prime Minister is this. Who speaks for this government on the matter of the deficit? Is it the Prime Minister, who does not care what the deficit becomes, or is it the President of the Treasury Board or the deputy minister of finance? If it is the Prime Minister, is it the case that all of the agitation about the increased taxes, doing away with the indexation of the income tax, a refinery products tax, is the result of his not caring about the deficit? Is he giving the policy on this or is he surrendering to the other?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would read the statement carefully, he would conclude that the statements speak for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I know the Prime Minister is not in his field, the financial and economic field.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Let me try this on the Prime Minister, who is in a financial bog. The Prime Minister said on April 24:

We will not reduce the deficit at the expense of creating more unemployment.

The deputy minister of finance, on Tuesday of last week before the Senate committee, pointed out to the committee that the forecast made last December 11 of unemployment during 1980 rising to 8.3 per cent from 7.5 per cent in 1979 was already too low. He also forecast that the unemployment rate was going to rise and would increase during the 1980s. In view of these statements by the deputy minister of finance, what will the Prime Minister now instruct his Minister of Finance to do with the deficit? Will it be reduced or will he instruct the minister to increase the deficit to carry out the statements he made on April 24?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as the former minister of finance, I think the hon. member would realize that the answer to these particular questions will come in a full and complete way when the Minister of Finance brings down his budget.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister does not realize that there are some people in this country who still listen to what he says. They do not wait for a budget; they listen to the Prime Minister because they think he expresses the policy of the government.

Would the Prime Minister answer the question: Will his policy be to allow the deficit of $14.1 billion to increase and to cover his aim of combatting unemployment; will the policy be that of the President of the Treasury Board, to reduce it; or will it be the policy of the deputy minister of finance that it is essential to Canada that the deficit be reduced? Please give a lead to the investors, the people of Canada and the taxpayers. Which is it going to be? We cannot afford to wait for the waltzing Matilda who does not want to bring down the budget.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it would seem to me that the former minister of finance is in a curious position to make that argument when he himself took so long to bring down a budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We are not there now. You are there now.

Mr. Trudeau: The former minister of finance points out he is not the government now. That is a fact, but it is perhaps because of his misunderstanding of these questions that he is now sitting on that side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATEMENT OF DEPUTY MINISTER ON GENERALIZED TAX INCREASES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the right hon. Prime Minister, following on the questions of my colleague and referring to Dr. Stewart's statement, which presumably the Prime Minister has read thoroughly. I am referring to Dr. Stewart's statement before the Senate committee

> Indeed the deficit problem is going to have to be solved by generalized tax increases ultimately across the board.
> I do not believe it would be fair to suggest that the deficit problem is going to be solved by major reductions in federal expenditures—

Would the Prime Minister say that he generally agrees with that observation of the deputy minister of finance?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the result of an analysis made by the deputy minister of finance would stand for itself. It seems to me to be a perfectly valid statement. We cannot cut expenses to the tune of some $14 billion. Therefore, if we want to reduce the deficit, at some point there will have to be an increase in taxes. But the hon. member, like his seatmate, is trying to argue that one can have in advance all the answers to these questions.

Mr. Crosbie: You had them last fall.

Mr. Trudeau: Surely the questions themselves are rhetorical in nature. Hon. members opposite are experienced enough to know that the business of drawing up a budget is a matter of trying to counterbalance at the same time the measures which would increase inflation and those which would increase unemployment. The position that this government takes now and took when we were in the opposition is that, contrary to the Conservative party, we think that rather than have a fetish on reducing budgets, we must try to ensure that jobs are created and that unemployment is reduced over the long haul. That has been our position. It remains our position, the way it will be attacked—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: So much for Ian Stewart.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I should like again to put a question to the Prime Minister who appears to be simply saying, "Ask us not how we will cut our expenditures, but we will tell you how we intend to tax you to pay for them".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: In the Prime Minister's general approach to the budget, which will hopefully come down in due course, has he given up the five-year overview set out in the budget of last December in which my hon. colleague was able to show a picture of reducing the budgetary deficit by half, seven-ninths of that reduction coming from expenditure restraint and cutbacks and only two-ninths coming from revenue increases?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must disagree with the summation of my answer made by the hon. member. I did not say that the government was not attempting to cut expenditures. I was saying that we could not expect to raise the deficit by cutting expenditures in one year to the extent of some $14 billion. That is what I said.

Mr. Clark: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Even the Leader of the Opposition is guffawing at that.

Mr. Andre: Guffawing at that!

Mr. Trudeau: I think his seatmate should try to understand what we are saying. As to the substance of the question, I think the hon. Minister of Finance has dealt with it before. He will be happy to deal with it again when he returns.

SOCIAL SECURITY

STEPS TO IMPROVE INCOMES OF THE POOR

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the publication of a report by the Canadian Council on Social Development which shows that more than three million Canadians are still below the poverty line, with the bottom 20 per cent of Canadian families still getting only 4 per cent of the total income while the top 20 per cent get more than 40 per cent of the total income, and in view of the commitment of the Prime Minister when he first came to office to a just society, to ending great disparities in income, will he with his government now lead this House in a determined effort in the next few years to end this disparity and to bring in a state in Canada where there no longer will be these millions of people below the poverty line?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to read this particular report. I am sure it will be referred to me and it will be studied, particularly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, I remind the hon. member that the last time we looked at the figures the percentage of Canadians below the poverty line had been considerably reduced between 1970 and 1978 or 1979. I do not know if these particular figures contradict or support that assertion, but I would be surprised if they contradicted it. That does not mean that there is not still a large gap, but it does mean that the percentage of Canadians below the poverty line has been reduced under the period of a Liberal government.

As to the suggestion by the hon. member, he was not only in the House but an active participant in the debate which precisely attempted to alleviate this discrepancy between the rich and poor in Canada by helping us adopt in this House last week the increase in the guaranteed income supplement.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE WILL NOT BE CUT BACK

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I trust the Prime Minister realizes that whatever the percentage figure may be, for the three million Canadians who are below the poverty line it is a disastrous situation, bearing in mind that the Prime Minister said when he began his term of office as Prime Minister that "we can improve the quality of life, we can catch up to the rising expectations."

However, in view of the reference that the Prime Minister has made to the $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement which this House passed last week, I wonder if I may put my supplementary question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

In view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has made a strong emotional appeal to the provinces not to cut back any of their supplements but to make sure that every guaranteed income supplement recipient will receive an increase in his income of $35 a month, will the Minister of Veterans Affairs make sure that the recipients of war veterans allowance do not have their allowance cut back because of an increase in the guaranteed income supplement?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question, this is now under review by our department—

An hon. Member: Can't you give a better answer than that?

An hon. Member: How can it be under review?

Mr. MacDonald: Hold your horses!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Show a little respect for the minister.

Mr. MacDonald: Those who are entitled to the $35, Madam Speaker, will be receiving it.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, does the statement just made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs mean that the $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement will be treated as exempt income under the War Veterans Allowance Act so that the recipients of war veterans allowance will not have their allowance cut back by virtue of the $35 increase?

Mr. MacDonald: That is what I was indicating, Madam Speaker.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY MEETINGS—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN COMMITMENTS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In testimony before the national finance committee of the other place, the deputy minister of finance predicted sharp gaps in the availability of adequate oil supplies by 1985 and described this as the greatest threat to the economy of the world and to Canada. Given that Canada has now passed the United States as the world's largest user of oil on a per capita basis, and given that our partners in the OECD and IEA have recently criticized Canada for that fact, will the minister tell the House what commitments he made on behalf of Canada at the recent Paris meetings of the International Energy Agency, and did he at least confirm the commitments Canada made at the Tokyo Summit last June, which, incidentally, his leader roundly criticized at the time as being too hard on Canada?

● (1430)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to advise the hon. member that there was no criticism of Canadian policy at the recent International Energy Agency meetings. Secondly, with regard to the content of the understanding between the various countries, they are all part of the communiqué which has been made public. If the hon. member bothers to read it, he will find that no additional commitments were required from Canada.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the deputy minister of finance at the same Senate committee meeting previously referred to stated only what every other rational observer has also noted, and indicated in essence that only the achievement of self-sufficiency in oil can give us the capacity to manage the economy in the 1980s. Does the minister reject that position and, if not, will he indicate to the House when he expects to reach that target or, in other words, when he expects to reduce our net reliance on offshore oil supplies to zero.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it is very difficult to give a exact date or year in reply to that question. As the hon. member said, if, on the one hand, there are some commercially viable finds off Newfoundland and in the Beaufort Sea, Canada could become self-sufficient very shortly. If, on the other hand, our explorations are not as successful, we will obviously have to postpone our target date for self-sufficiency. However, we hope that with the co-operation of industry and a bit of luck we will quickly become self-sufficient before the end of this decade. But no one can hazard a precise date. It would be misleading the people to say, as the previous government did, that by a certain date Canada could become self-sufficient.

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I might remark that it is difficult to achieve self-sufficiency when government policy chases employees and capital out of the country.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hawkes: My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, the minister announced in the House:

> The employment development measures outlined today will themselves have a considerable impact on the employment of women.

Page 15 of the background paper which the minister presented at the same time states:

> The new employment programs and budget increases for training will provide employment and training to about 12,200 women in 1980-81.

Given the fact that the minister claims he created 81,000 jobs, of which 12,000 are for women, which amounts to 15 per cent of the jobs created, could the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating the speech which he made yesterday. Would he please ask his question.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I had a little more time to think about it!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: Will the minister please explain to the House how the creation of 12,200 jobs will have "considerable impact on the employment of women", considering that there are almost 400,000 women in this country and that the minister's program will help only 15 per cent of the 45 per cent who are unemployed?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am certainly pleased that the hon. member took some time to think about his question. I would simply point out that, as he was somewhat guilty of misusing his figures yesterday, he has not changed today. What I indicated yesterday was that close to 40 per cent of the benefits that we announced in the employment program yesterday would be applicable to women.

More important is the direction and the approach of the programs. We introduced some innovative programs to provide incentives to private employers and to bring women into non-traditional areas. We introduced an employment program to provide for additional social services to enable women to come into the work force. These are all important steps to provide the basic framework which will allow more women to participate. It will also give us an opportunity to evaluate those programs and, if they are successful, to expand them substantially in future years.

REINSTATEMENT OF OUTREACH PROGRAM—RESTORATION OF FUNDS FOR 12 PROJECTS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I read with great interest the minister's comments in the House yesterday, particularly those at page 1642 in Hansard:

—that the funds to Outreach have already been restored—

There were originally 22 Outreach projects. There are now ten. When the minister says that the funds to Outreach have been restored, does he mean, and I trust that he does, that the 12 Outreach projects which were cut by the previous Liberal government are now being reinstated and that their funds are being restored?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I meant, that the present level of spending in the estimates for the Outreach program is $9.7 million, which is a restoration to its original level.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, the minister has not replied to my question. I wonder whether he would tell me specifically if the 12 projects that were cut have been restored. Would he also be good enough to tell his director of employment and immigration in Manitoba not to discontinue the funding of a very major women's Outreach program in his own city of Winnipeg, the affirmative action program? One week ago today that program was told not to expect any continued funding and, indeed, even not to apply for further funding. Would the minister tell the House, not only whether the 12 Outreach projects which were cut under the previous Liberal government will be restored, but whether the ten that are still remaining, including the affirmative action program in Winnipeg, will be continued?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as I have discovered over the last few months, there are certain officials in the employment office in Winnipeg who say things about which I have no knowledge. I will be very glad to take the information provided by the hon. member. I have no knowledge of the particular project which she has mentioned. I would indicate to her that the application for renewals of Outreach programs are presently being submitted and evaluated. I am personally responsible for agreeing to approve or not to approve the applications, and I will make enquiries about that particular project.

HIRING OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Because the situation of hiring native people in Canada is deplorable, and since the program which the minister announced yesterday will assist only about 2 per cent of those status Indians unemployed—and that statistic does not include non-status Indians or Metis people—how can the minister think that this aid will begin to satisfy the magnitude of this problem? Can he also assure the House that this money which has been set aside is not really just window dressing in this area?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the programs which were announced yesterday, particularly the additional $10 million for native training, are designed for a specific purpose. The native training program is designed to allow native people in areas where major resource projects are beginning to take place to acquire the skills and training which will allow them to become part of those projects. By no means is it the exclusive amount allocated to help the native people gain employment. In fact, under our present budget estimates we have $72 million in the LEAP program which provides a substantial number of work programs right across Canada. These programs are used substantially by native groups, and they are proving to be very successful.

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, I gather from the minister's comments that there is no money to zero in on programs for the native unemployed, particularly for native women who are unemployed in urban areas. Would the minister state that in fact there is no money to zero in on such areas where unemployment is drastic and in need of improvement immediately?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, perhaps the hon. member was not in the House yesterday during the question and answer period following my statement. What I indicated very clearly is that under the community development program which we announced there will be an allocation to every constituency and every region in Canada. Those allocations will be based upon a design which will suit the needs and demands of local employment problems in those areas.

One of the criteria which will be used in determining the allocation is the ratio of native unemployment. Where there is a high incidence of native unemployment, the allocation will be substantially increased. This proposal contrasts substantially with the decision taken by the hon. member's government, which totally eliminated any Canada Works projects in western Canada in which most native people are employed.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY WHETHER PLACE GUY-FAVREAU PROJECT MODIFIED AND AT WHAT COST

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and concerns something that dates back quite a while, namely the Place Guy-Favreau project. Can the minister tell us, in light of his colleagues' statements to the effect that the government will finally go ahead with this project, whether there will be substantial changes made to the original project and what the Place Guy-Favreau complex will cost?

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in Montreal some weeks ago, the project is under review in terms of modification of land use; that is, the residential component is being restudied inasmuch as changes in the environment around the Guy-Favreau project have been changed and because of the introduction of plans by the provincial government. It may be that a residential component in association with other residential components is no longer viable.

The ministry is presently considering alternatives to that by way of commercial office space or possibly some specialized residential use. The estimates in the blue book tabled in Parliament reflect the commitment of the government of approximately $100 million to complete the project as planned recently.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I just want to ask the minister if, considering those studies that are being made, he can say approximately when tenders will be called and when it will be possible to carry out this interesting project for Montreal's economic situation.

[English]

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, bids are either being called for at this time or will be within the next few weeks for the beginning of work at the understructure level. That work should be imminent. We are held up because there was no activity owing to a construction strike in Montreal, but that initial work is imminent.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last evening the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance indicated that the Bank of Canada has significantly reduced its holdings of government securities. The effect of this reduction is to increase interest rates above what is normal. Is the government's policy at the present time to keep interest rates higher than the market forces would normally indicate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance or the parliamentary secretary answered this question a week or two ago. I recall distinctly what the answer was; it was that the policy of the government was to try and even out abrupt movements but not to act in any way which was contrary to market forces over the long term.

Mr. Blenkarn: A supplementary question on an interest rate related matter, Madam Speaker. Throughout last spring, last fall and last winter, as interest rates went up and as the Bank of Canada rate went up with market forces, the chartered banks' rate went up and stayed approximately 100 index points ahead of the Bank of Canada. Interest rates have started falling now but the chartered banks are out of step. What action has the government taken to get the chartered banks back in line with the Bank of Canada rate so that business is not paying 182 index points more in interest than it should?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the fact is that there is no fixed relationship between the interest rate that is quoted by the Bank of Canada as being the bank rate and the rate charged for prime business loans by the chartered banks. That relationship fluctuates over time. It has fluctuated between the time that rates were going up and the time, now, that rates are coming down.

ASSISTANCE TO NATIVE GROUPS TO PREPARE POSITIONS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. More than a month ago the three national associations for native peoples—the National Indian Brotherhood, the Inuit Tapirisat and the Native Council of Canada—were promised government funds to help prepare their constitutional positions. Since the first constitutional conference will take place next week and the process will proceed quickly, will the minister explain why his department has not yet paid these moneys to the native associations and can he say that this will be done soon?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that these moneys are in the form of contributions which are administered by my department and not in the form of grants. I have instructed my officials to process the agreement as soon as possible. At the moment officials of the native citizens directorate in my department are developing supplementary contribution agreements which we hope to discuss with each of the three organizations in the very near future. It is our expectation that this process will be completed at the end of this month at the very latest.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE PROGRAM—ANNOUNCED INCREASES IN PREMIUMS BY BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I have a very important question that I should like to address to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that the province of British Columbia has just announced an increase of approximately 15 per cent in medicare premiums and, further, 20 to 40 per cent in daily charges to patients for hospital visits? If so, will she get in touch with the government of British Columbia and tell that government that these regressive, reactionary increases are unacceptable to the federal government under both the medicare and hospital legislation?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, that information has not been confirmed officially to me yet. I have a meeting tonight on that question, at my request.

Mr. Rose: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Once the information is confirmed, since the government has tied further increases in health care fees to the cost of living and since these increases are irresponsible, shocking and pick the pockets of the poor and the old, would the minister be prepared to take immediate action along the lines that she proposed when she was in opposition—that is, give notice to B.C. that she intends to cut off federal funding unless and until the medicare guidelines of universality and comprehensiveness are reinstated?

Mrs. Bégin: Madam Speaker, not until the report of Mr. Justice Hall has been presented. I am sorry to be late for the question period this afternoon but I was finishing a meeting with Mr. Justice Hall where we discussed these problems.

My objective and that of the government is not to enter into confrontation with B.C. for the fun of it; the problem is far deeper. I think the hon. member knows that it is far deeper than just these signs we have seen in some provinces which, by the way, are being corrected.

I want to remind the hon. member of the beautiful job the population—and, of course, the Liberal opposition—did in New Brunswick in correcting that situation. I think it is proper that we talk of it right now in this public forum of the House, but we are not ready to withhold payments at this point in time. The Hall commission's work is to advise us on this very subject.

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH SATELLITE STATION AT B.C. LEGISLATURE—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. On Friday the minister threatened to lay charges against the owners and operators of unlicensed earth stations. On Monday the B.C. government put up an earth station on the grounds of the legislature in Victoria. When the minister makes these threats about prosecutions of owners and operators of unlicensed earth stations, does that include the earth station on the lawns of the B.C. legislature?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, there seems to be a lot of confusion about the installation of the earth satellite station at the B.C. legislature. For instance, it was reported on the national news last night that all such earth stations are illegal. As you know full well, Madam Speaker, they are not. As long as an earth station is licensed it is, indeed, a legal earth station.

In answer to the hon. member's question, I should like to tell him that the British Columbia government made an application for a licence some time ago and that this licence was issued in due course.

Mr. Beatty: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We learn from the Minister of Communications that he does not intend to lay charges against the B.C. government. That leaves several thousand Canadians in rural and remote areas, particularly in northern Canada, to be considered. In view of the fact that the reason people in so many northern and remote areas are putting up unlicensed earth stations is that they want to receive the same variety of signals as are available to people in southern and urban areas, may I ask if the minister is prepared today to order a stay of prosecution against people living in such communities until such time as Canadian signals are available to provide the same variety of programming to them that is available to people in southern Canada? Will he put an end to the sort of discrimination which takes place when the government allows such signals into southern Canada but forbids rural and northern Canadians from receiving a variety of signals?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to hear "hear, hear" coming from across the floor, because the policy we are pursuing at present is the policy that was pursued by the Leader of the Opposition's government and by my immediate predecessor in this portfolio.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Fox: There were no prosecutions at that stage.

Mr. Clark: That is right. That is the point.

Mr. Fox: It was a question of tolerance, not a question of issuing licences.

I should like to get back to the answer I gave last week to members of this House. On this side of the House we are interested in getting to the root of the problem. That is why we are hoping that the CRTC, through its present hearings on the problem of extension of TV services to northern communities in Canada, will come up with a set of recommendations which would then lead to the licensing process some time this fall. We would like to get to the bottom of the problem, which is really one of extending services to the north in a legal manner. In the meantime, we indicated, and the CRTC indicated, that we would have a look on an ad hoc basis, on a case by case basis, at the operation of unlicensed satellite stations in Canada, particularly in areas where these unlicensed stations were interfering with the activities of licensed cable operators in this country.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NARCOTICS SEIZURE—INQUIRY WHETHER CHARGES TO BE LAID

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Will charges be laid with regard to the RCMP seizing the drugs on board a ship off the coast of Nova Scotia last weekend?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, that was a successful operation by the RCMP. The smugglers, from our intelligence, were trying to land in Connecticut and were chased by the American coast guard north into Canadian waters, or close to Canadian waters. They never intended to land in Canada. They never came to Canadian territorial waters. Therefore, in the intermediate zone where they were seized—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Kaplan: I am coming to the answer. In the intermediate zone where they were seized—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. The Chair is having difficulty following what is going on in the House. Those who are having conversations with their seatmates will please do so in a lower voice.

Mr. Kaplan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In the intermediate zone where the seizure took place, international convention does not permit a coastal state to lay charges, but the coastal state is entitled—and the RCMP did—to seize the ship, to seize the cargo, and of course they will be confiscated.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATION PREPARED RESPECTING AGREEMENT WITH WEST GERMANY ON DOUBLE TAXATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have a very important question for the Minister of State (Finance). I gave him notice of the question in the form of a 43 a couple of weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: It relates to the rather discriminatory practice of double taxation of Canadian citizens who have earned certain pension rights in the Federal Republic of West Germany. It is my understanding that there is an agreement about to be signed. Can the minister inform the House today whether we have responded to the request of the Federal Republic to enter into this agreement, and does he have the legislation prepared to facilitate such a request?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I recall the notice the hon. member gave me about the taxation agreement. As the hon. member knows very well, we are negotiating such agreements with several countries. There have been some references to several of those agreements in the House. Many of those agreements are ready to be signed. Some have already been signed and legislation in that regard is being drafted. If we made good progress in the business of the House, we could soon proceed with consideration of a bill concerning those taxation agreements.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Can the minister tell me whether the particular agreement with the Federal Republic of West Germany has been signed and, if so, would it have to await the signing of a number of other agreements before legislation would be introduced to approach the problem in a global sense?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I do not remember whether the agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany has been signed. I shall inquire and give the reply to the hon. member. We would rather wait and conclude as many agreements as possible before incorporating them into a bill.

TRADE

COMMITTEE STUDY OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF PROPOSED NATIONAL TRADING COMPANY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, can the Prime Minister tell the House when we can expect to receive the terms of reference for a study by a committee of this House of a national trading company?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with regard to that parliamentary task force, according to the discussions I had with my colleagues of the other two parties, I was to consult the minister who was absent, so that we reached an agreement on setting up five parliamentary task forces. As for the sixth, I must say it was only agreed that if it must exist—

My colleagues are pointing out to me that the minister is present. I was about to say that I was aware of his presence in the House.

We decided to pursue our consultations. If we go ahead with setting up a task force, we will respect the principle of the agreement, that is that the task force will report to Parliament, and will be made up of a limited number of hon. members from both sides of the House who will be asked to report within a certain period, that is before December 19. If, on the other hand, we decide not to set up a task force to deal with that subject, obviously the problem will resolve itself automatically. We also agreed that if we do create a task force to deal with the topic, it will be similar to the five that have already been set up.

[English]

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister's announcement made it very clear that there was going to be a study of a national trading company along the same lines as the other subjects established for task forces. Will the President of the Privy Council or the Prime Minister explain why this House of Commons is being denied the right to consider the question of a national trading company in the same way that we are considering other questions that have been proposed by the government? What is so special about a national trading company that the government is not prepared right now to let that question be considered by a committee of the Parliament of Canada with the same rules that apply to other subjects originally forecast for task force study?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if there was what my colleague calls a violation of the rules, which I cannot admit, it is simply because the Prime Minister has indicated clearly to the House, in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, that he had asked me to negotiate with the leaders of the other two parties a formula for the establishment of these task forces. We had to decide whether these task forces were to report directly to the minister or to the House of Commons. Following negotiations and consultations held in accordance with the spirit of Parliament, we succeeded in meeting the goal set out by the right hon. Prime Minister, that is to set up action groups acting rapidly and without partisan lines on matters of public interest and reporting after a short delay. We achieved such an agreement, thus avoiding what the Leader of the Opposition did when he was prime minister, namely task forces which did not report to Parliament but rather to ministers. We, on the other hand, have simply followed the wish expressed by the Prime Minister: after having consulted with my colleagues, we have established task forces which will report to Parliament.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister has answered a question that was not put. I asked why is the Prime Minister not prepared to extend to the matter of a national trading company the same parliamentary treatment given to others subject matters referred to task forces. Why the difference, and can the minister assure the House today, before he leaves again for Mexico, that this matter will receive the same treatment that is given to other matters?

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the subject matter raised by the Prime Minister when he made his announcement covered one element. The other elements were the participation of members of Parliament on both sides. Also, it was the small task forces that we wanted to act quickly and to report. The question raised was whether it was to report to the minister or to Parliament. All those elements were discussed among House leaders. We came to some agreement. We made some concessions and they made some. In the end, we have five parliamentary task forces that will report to Parliament and will have the participation of members from both sides of the House, especially members from western Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition would like us to make concessions on all the elements. This sixth item, the task force on trade, is actually under consideration. We might come forward with an additional offer to create more task forces in the future on any subject that is of national interest. However, at this time we are experimenting. We succeeded in concluding an agreement on five task forces. We might agree on a sixth one shortly, and if not there might be many other task forces in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADIAN DELEGATES TO INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON ALLEGED CRIMES OF UNITED STATES IN IRAN SANCTIONED AND FUNDED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps I could direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that one of the Canadian delegates to a so-called conference on alleged crimes of the United States in Iran called the action taken by the Canadian ambassador, Ken Taylor, in helping six U.S. diplomats to escape from Iran "a disgrace to Canada", would the Prime Minister advise the House whether the three delegates who attended this conference were officially sanctioned by the government and whether they, and the organization they represent, are receiving any assistance from the federal government in attending this so-called conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the first part of the question, the answer is emphatically no. As to the second part concerning assistance, I would have to inquire and ensure that the hon. member gets an answer.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege following a statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in response to questions from the opposition. I want to give you notice of my intention; I should like to look at the blues. As I recall the minister's words, he made the allegation that certain officials in his department were releasing information contrary to the rules, and taking actions with respect to his activities contrary to his wishes or instructions. Since, as you know, there is a question of privilege which has been referred at the minister's request to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with respect to certain of his activities, I should like to have the opportunity of looking at the minister's statement to determine the nature of those allegations so that I might have the opportunity of raising the matter before you, Madam Speaker, at a later date.

MR. EPP—HANSARD REPORT OF REPLY GIVEN BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, in regard to the question I asked of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) yesterday regarding the program of rail relocation or the Sherbrook Street overpass in Winnipeg, there is a difference between what appears on the blues and what appears in Hansard at page 1631. I wish to reserve my right to raise the matter as a question of privilege when the minister returns to the House.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD ON COST OVERRUNS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, on May 28, as shown in Hansard at page 1496, I raised the question of an apparent oversight on the part of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in filing a record of 497 projects which had overruns of $1,062 million. Unfortunately, as you will recall, Madam Speaker, the actual figures which were tabled came to only $820 million and there were about 20 fewer projects than the President of the Treasury Board had indicated, and on May 28, the hon. gentleman said, "I will check the point and if there is any misunderstanding I will ensure that it is cleared up." My point of order is this: I would appreciate it if you could give the President of the Treasury Board an opportunity, now, to clear the record.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have written to the hon. member clearing up the item in question. Specifically, the difference arises from the fact that the documents which I filed in the Committee of the Whole had cost overruns valued as of September, as I recall, in 1979. I indicated that the amount of cost overruns was, in fact, $1,062 million which varied from the amount which was enclosed in the document, that being the result of a subsequent evaluation which went back to the original budgeted cost figures.

The $1,062 million to which I made reference, also included the 22 projects which were included in the computer print-out which I filed in Committee of the Whole, but there were no numbers given opposite the project titles because that information was apparently not complete or not available at the time that particular print-out was prepared. However, as I have indicated, the difference between those two figures of which the hon. member made mention is composed of the evaluation going back to the original budgeted cost of the projects plus the cost overruns with respect to the 22 projects in question.

PETITIONS

MAINTENANCE OF IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT SYSTEM

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House of Commons in Parliament assembled a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 67 which, in brief, prays that the system of weights and measures known as the Imperial system shall always be legal and acceptable in Canada regardless of any other system which may happen to be used.

The petition attached bears the signatures of 2,111 electors and was sent to me in my capacity as member of Parliament for Red Deer for transmission to the House of Commons in Parliament assembled. If the petition is found to be in order, I pray it may be referred to an appropriate committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary what is causing the delay with starred question 876. It is with regard to funding for either railroad relocation or building overpasses in Winnipeg. The funding is causing considerable confusion in the province and in the House here. In particular we want to know where the funding is going to be coming from. It was announced last Friday, and there have been statements, that the funding will come out of DREE programs. All members of the House are very anxious to find out which DREE programs the funding will be obtained from, for the rail relocation and the building of the overpass in Winnipeg, so I would appreciate if the parliamentary secretary would make some inquiries with regard to starred question 876.

Mr. Collenette: I shall, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1980-81

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed, from Monday, June 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, when the House adjourned last evening I was addressing some remarks to the parliamentary secretary, who had responded in a commendably detailed fashion to some requests for information emanating from this side of the House. I was at that time suggesting to hon. members opposite that, regardless of the amount of money that ultimately this House of Commons decided to allow the government to have in this or subsequent appropriation bills, it was time for a reappraisal of the priorities which would be given to these large amounts of money. I believe I said that two of the priorities which I was urging upon this House were a greater emphasis on defence and a greater defence on economic development.

It seems to me that I also said at that point in my speech that there was no greater tribute to vulgar cost overruns and edifice complexes than the Bank of Canada building which is so near Parliament Hill and stands conspicuously among many of the other edifice complexes which have been built around the country, which may provide some satisfaction for the egos of the inmates, but does not do very much to assure the economic development of our country.

When one looks at the priorities and at the opportunities available to Canada, one sees very quickly how our rather precarious financial position reflects on our economic opportunities. I believe, although I am not certain, that a good example of this was illustrated recently when the President of Mexico came here and departed without leaving very much assurance that our country would be able to benefit very much from the Mexican oil that we had once hoped to get in larger amounts. I recall reading shortly thereafter that Japan was able to make a far more advantageous arrangement simply because there were funds available from that country, which is in far better shape economically, to invest in Mexico, and presumably they were able not only to improve their export position but also to get badly needed petroleum, something which we cannot do.

I suggest to hon. members of this House that federal priorities must change, regardless of the amount of money this House allocates to the government. Some departments are not paying enough attention to regional matters in their operations, and it is on this aspect of my speech that I would like to spend the last few moments available to me.

Some departments are not paying enough attention to regional matters. Some departments are almost anti-development, and I suggest that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is perhaps the worst of these. If I had more time I could deal with others such as the Department of Supply and Services. The anti-development departments, as I call them, have almost become DREEs in reverse. Some of the departments and agencies of our national government actually discriminate against the less developed parts of the country. This "kick them when they are down" mentality has created patterns in government purchasing, industrial development incentives, and export financing which discriminate in favour of the developed. At present DREE receives little more than 1 per cent of the federal budget.

Other federal departments and agencies control substantive funds which could be well used in a manner more consistent with regional development priorities. The present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) is well aware of this, and when he was minister of supply and services for a few months, as he pointed out recently, he did his best to try to correct the situation, and I trust that some of his cabinet colleagues will continue to work with him in this new administration to change what has been an impossible situation for DREE simply because that department does not have enough money to do what it is expected to do because other line departments which have not been paying enough attention to their regional responsibilities are not co-operating.

In 1979 the Economic Council released an investigation of regional underdevelopment entitled "Regional Disparities and Growth in Canada". It found an important ingredient of Canadian regional disparity to be in the adoption of new technology. In the same year the C. D. Howe Research Institute reported that the output per capita in the Atlantic region since 1970 has declined when measured as a percentage of the national output.

At a time when industrial output is declining, the region requires strong and effective action, but rather than attempt to resuscitate the patient when things are tough, this particular administration appears to have chosen to withdraw the medication and the life support systems. First, the regional development incentives which were in the budget of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), have not been reintroduced by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), nor were any other incentives to benefit the Atlantic region, which is perhaps the most underprivileged region in the whole country. It is not just that the present administration failed to reintroduce the provisions and tax contracts and capital cost allowances for newly built fishing vessels, for example; they have also stalled, I trust for not too long, the previous incentives of our government for the older industries like SYSCO and the new and expanding ones like Michelin.

Let us now look at the actions of one other department capable of generating real development, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This department directly contributes to this industrial impotence in the Atlantic region. It is an anti-development department, as far as we are concerned. It operates a number of programs which attempt to deal with the crisis of Canada's technological underdevelopment, but it does not do anything for us. For example, between 1970 and 1977 the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology, called PAIT, spent $146 million, but only $63,000, or .4 of 1 per cent, was spent in our region. During the same period the Industrial Design Assistance Program spent $64,000, or less than 3 per cent of its budget, in our region.

A third program with great potential but little action is the Defence Industry Productivity Program, DIPP. Considering the way it is now administered, it is well-named. It will provide the basis for most of the ostensible benefits of the F-18 offset program which has been widely advertised, as was mentioned here in the House today. Between 1970 and 1977 DIPP spent nearly $340 million but only 1.5 per cent, or $5 million, in the Atlantic region. In fiscal year 1978 the region received only .15 per cent of the DIPP funds, or $70,000.

In the same year Ontario and Quebec received 99 per cent of the available funds. We can readily see how this program has failed miserably to spread the economic potential that it has across the country in those areas where it is most needed. One might naturally assume that this region would receive a similar portion of the F-18 offset program. On this matter the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion stated in Parliament when he was DREE critic in the opposition, "I would like to see DREE involved in the F-18 picture, not all spent in metropolitan areas". He said that last fall.

This program is in great difficulty because it does not have funds available, and many of the widely touted benefits, which are advertised at such expense to the taxpayers of this country, I suspect cannot be realized. If Canadian industry does not have the funds to re-tool or to take advantage of these offsets, then all of the industrial benefits will not be realized. The McDonnell Douglas Corporation cannot wait indefinitely. It has a production deadline, and so the benefits which could come to Canada will go back either to the United States or to other countries.

By fiscal year 1979 many of the industrial incentives of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce were integrated into the Enterprise Development Program, or EDP, as it is called. Unfortunately, the EDP has shown itself to be just as incapable of dealing with Atlantic Canada as its predecessors. In that year EDP spent $150 million, but only $850,000, or 0.57 per cent of 1 per cent of its budget, in the Atlantic region. During the same period, Ontario received about 60 per cent of the total assistance. This totalled some $91.4 million.

I do not mention this matter in the spirit of antagonism or to complain about the benefits which other parts of Canada receive, but only to emphasize and to show, I hope graphically, that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is failing miserably in working with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other departments to try to do something meaningful to alleviate economic disparities in this country. If I have time I will talk about transfer payments in a moment, which also have generated some strange results in Atlantic Canada.

Another aspect of the attempt of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to stymie Atlantic Canada may be found in the export financing activities of its Export Development Corporation. Since Atlantic Canada's economy is one of the most export oriented of any region of Canada, it should appear normal for EDC to be heavily involved in export support activities in that region. In fact, it is not.

In 1977 the corporation provided nearly $2 billion to support Canadian export transactions. In that same year its annual report's list of principal exporters in each of its export financing ventures with foreign nations includes none—I emphasize none—from Atlantic Canada.

Today this department, the Department of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), is providing $200 million to Ontario's Chrysler Corporation. It has not changed so far as its approach is concerned, in my view, to the rest of Canada. It is a department that gave more than $60 million in direct funding to Ford in Windsor. In a few months the department is likely to add Massey-Ferguson to its list of welfare recipients. This corporation, which does not operate in underprivileged parts of the country, in fact barely operates in this country. It is true that it employs substantial numbers of people, but in relation to its worldwide operations, both its investment and its employment are very slight compared to the operations in countries as spread around the world as Argentina, West Germany, the United States, and so on.

I know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been approached. He may very well be approached by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce which has a trifling loan that they are worried about of some $400 million in Canadian dollars. I do not know what their plans are, but I would be very upset, and I am sure many members would be upset, if large amounts of money, $100 million for example, were allocated to Massey-Ferguson, unless there were some pretty stringent guarantees that this money would not be allowed to go out of Canada to settle some of the debts that this company has incurred in other parts of the world, unless there were some guarantee of jobs, and unless the Argus Corporation, and other sources of money that Massey-Ferguson has, make a substantial contribution as well.

This is very interesting, when one looks at the incompetence and the anomalies in this government. I do not want to stray too far from the subject of the bill, but I do want to make one side comment because it relates to another contradiction in policy. I had hoped to raise it in the question period today, but I will just put it on the record because I think it is rather funny that when we are talking about economic development we are talking about energy conservation, and there is nothing that is as dear to the heart of the government, ostensibly, as energy conservation. Yet I find that as of April 1 there is a conditions of permit document, as it is called, at Toronto international airport. I do not know whether or not the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pépin) knows about it—I doubt it—but just for his information and that of his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), "who work so hard" to conserve energy, let me say that it is a fact, so I am informed, that the limousine service to the Toronto International Airport, by the conditions of the permit as of April 1, are restricted to using Lincolns, Cadillacs, and Chrysler New Yorkers. Anybody who had a more energy-efficient car by definition, such as a diesel equipped automobile, just cannot operate.

An hon. Member: A Mercedes Benz.

Mr. MacKay: I should say to my colleague that Mercedes Benz is being discriminated against, I am sorry to say.

But I would like to point out, at this stage how contradictory government policies are, and ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to check with his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to see whether it is now official government policy across Canada that, in an attempt to promote energy efficiency, they are restricting limousine services to those operators who can afford Cadillacs, Lincolns and Chrysler New Yorkers.

I want to speak for a moment, in talking about economic development, on the anomaly of the federal government's transfer payments. One would assume that a government committed to regional development would gradually increase the transfer of payments to provincial governments in a region such as the Atlantic region at a rate beyond that provided to provinces with fewer economic problems. In this period of extremely high regional unemployment, it would be necessary to do this to allow all provincial governments to maintain their level of services and to allow regional economies to make a greater contribution to the national economy. Unfortunately, this did not happen.

The portion of federal transfer payments to provincial governments in the Atlantic region remained static between 1970 and 1978. In 1970 the Atlantic region's provincial governments received $605 million, or 18.3 per cent of all transfers to provinces. If the unemployment rate is used as an indicator of economic well-being, in 1970 the region was only performing at slightly less than the national average, that is to say, at 6.2 per cent unemployment as opposed to 5.7 per cent. By 1978 the region had clearly fallen behind the nation. It had a 12.5 per cent unemployment rate as opposed to 8.3 per cent nationally, and yet during this period the transfer payments to the region stands at $2 billion or 19 per cent of all federal transfers to provincial governments, compared to 18 per cent in 1970—not much of a selective effort or targeting, to use a current word that is quite popular.

The transfers to provincial governments can also be analysed in terms of their net growth over the 1970 level, and this makes a very interesting analysis. Once again, the growth of transfers to the Atlantic region as compared to the Nation as a whole is less than dramatic. Newfoundland provides perhaps the best example of lopsided growth in transfers of payments to provincial governments. In 1970 Newfoundland received $194 million in transfers. In 1978 the provincial government was receiving $579 million, quite a healthly increase, it would seem. This represented a growth of 298 per cent. But during the same period, transfers of payments to the government of Alberta increased by 269 per cent to $627 million. Thus the growth of transfers to Alberta, the richest province, paralleled those of Newfoundland, of course.

Over the last period of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) administration, the economy of the Atlantic region became, according to the Atlantic Development Council "more dependent upon federal transfer payments". Dr. T. J. Courchene of the University of Western Ontario, stated before the Senate National Finance Committee in November, 1978:

—their—

the Atlantic region's —relative position has deteriorated vis-à-vis the 'have' regions to the point where several of the provinces are in danger of being reduced to the level of 'dependencies' of the federal government.

The dependence of gross regional expenditure on total federal transfer of payments to the Atlantic region has increased from 20 per cent in 1970 to nearly 30 per cent in 1978. The growth in comparative dependence for the rest of Canada was from 8 per cent to 10 per cent.

So, Mr. Speaker, I put these on the record only to show that, in my humble opinion, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion requires a great deal of support, not only with an increased budgetary allocation, not only in getting legislation through this House, but also he requires a great deal of support from his colleagues. I noticed, when I was minister of DREE, that all kinds of co-operation existed until it came time to pay the shot. Even when we went out to lunch, poor old DREE had to pay because DREE had a little extra money. The other departments, because of their huge budgets and their complexes, they analysed their responsibilities, were willing to pay lip service to DREE, but they were not prepared to give any money, or at least only very grudgingly. There are areas where budgetary flexibility must be achieved.

If DREE were operating as efficiently as it could, if the line departments of government were doing their job—as so manifestly the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not, in looking at regional responsibilities—we would not need such a doubtful effort, I might say, as this government job program which was introduced yesterday in the House by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). As was indicated in today's issue of the Ottawa Citizen, "it looks good, it is impressive on paper only", and that is about the size of it.

The fact that we must spend hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to create temporary jobs to alleviate areas of high unemployment, without getting any lasting benefit, without building up the country, without leaving any trace of economic development behind when the benefits run out, is an indictment of the kind of economic development policy which have been developed in this country over the last number of years. Surely at a time when the government is requesting an amount of money as vast, as huge, as almost incomprehensible as $12 billion, which as I said last night is $5 billion more than the hon. member for St. John's West in our government requested only a few months ago, there will have to be a more judicious and careful analysis of how it is expended. If this is not the case, we are simply adding a massive amount to our deficit, a tremendously high proportion in one fell swoop to the already large amounts of money the parliamentary secretary and I put on the record last night as owing in our national indebtedness.

We will not achieve one single thing except put ourselves further in debt, unless there is a reassessment of the way this money is spent. Whether the House of Commons gives its consent ultimately to the government for $5 billion, $10 billion, $12 billion or whatever, unless those funds are allocated properly and spent to develop the economic potential of this country, unless there is some investment that is designed to achieve the generation of some wealth, the accompanying activities of all these other departments which are intent on distributing the wealth will not ultimately assure the future of this country. All it will do is bankrupt us a little sooner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I should like to begin my remarks by seconding in part some of the things which have been said already about the lack of accountability to Parliament for just how the government spends these large sums of money on which it is in the habit of coming to Parliament for approval.

We in the NDP believe that there ought to be more accountability to Parliament for how the government spends its money. In fact, as a relatively new member, I should say that it is one of the things I have yet to get a sense of, how we in this Parliament are in any way like the Parliaments I came to know in abstraction through learning about the role of Parliament in British history, for instance, that the first and fundamental role of Parliament was control over spending. I certainly have no sense as a member of Parliament that I have in any way exercised any form of meaningful control over how the government spends its money. In fact the whole process is somewhat confusing.

I think moves should be initiated which would make life simpler for members of Parliament. I do not say simpler in any way that would reflect upon the intelligence of members of Parliament, but simpler so that all members, and indeed the citizens of Canada, could understand just what was going on with regard to the spending of their tax dollars. I think this is an erosion of parliamentary democracy about which we ought to be very, very concerned.

I want to make clear that we at this end of the House, in any case, are not against government spending on principle. We do not see government spending as some form of demonic force which ought to be opposed simply because of its very existence. Sometimes I hear that kind of perspective coming from my Progressive Conservative colleagues to the right. We believe it is not accurate and it does not do a service to Canadians to just get up and talk about government spending as if it could be talked about as a homogeneous lump of spending. There are differences between kinds of government spending.

There is a difference between investment in the future of Canada, whether that investment be in the health of Canadians, which I will have something to say about later, or whether that investment be in building the transportation systems and the energy capacity we will need for a strong future. We think a distinction needs to be made between that kind of spending and spending that is just so much money down the drain for projects which are more aptly described as Liberal patronage rather than investment in the future. Distinctions need to be made between long-term spending—investing of public money in those things which will produce assets for the future—and short-term operational spending. Also distinctions need to be made between that money which we owe ourselves and that money which we owe foreign countries.

My opponent in the last election campaign wanted to describe the deficit. I just forget how he said it, but it was something to the effect that if we piled up the one dollar bills they would be seven miles high. He never made any distinction between to whom that money was owing and for what purposes it was owing. It was kind of a scare tactic designed to create within Canadians a fear of their own government. If there is anything Canadians need more of and not less of, it is a positive view of government. They need to begin to see government as an instrument through which they can act to enhance their personal freedom over those forces which by now are much, much larger than most of the governments of the world. I am thinking particularly here of global and multinational corporations. It is through perceiving government as a positive instrument that Canadians will come to see alternatives to the forms of domination which they know now. This sort of uncritical talk about the size of deficits and the harm which governments do to the country is a very, very one-sided and dangerous way of speaking about society, as if there were only governments and individuals involved and not these other very, very large and powerful actors on the same stage.

One thing we hear a lot about when we hear people talking about government spending is the soaring costs of health care. I am particularly referring again to my colleagues on the right and their provincial counterparts in the various Conservative provincial governments. As a result of their believing this, we have seen an attempt to cut back on expenditures in health care at the level of provincial spending on the part of many provincial governments. I think it is important to say that only a while ago—in 1971, I believe—both Canada and the United States were paying approximately 7 per cent of their GNP for health care costs. Canada is still paying approximately 7 per cent of its gross national product for health care costs, and the United States, which has a private system of providing health care for its citizens, now is paying 9 per cent of its GNP for health care costs. This is not only a significant numerical difference, it is a significant human difference when one considers that the extra percentage is being paid not by governments but by individuals who happen to have the misfortune of being sick and therefore have to put forward the increased costs they experience by virtue of living in the United States and not in Canada where we have a publicly-funded health care system.

There is a growing anxiety about our medicare system related to costs and also related to a number of other phenomena which I want to mention briefly. There is the anxiety of health care workers who now see that they are doing much more work with much less staff for a much lower standard of living than they used to have. People are overworked, and underpaid, and we see the results of this in the frustration which health care workers in Manitoba are now expressing through their strike action this very week.

We can only expect our health care workers to go on for so long, doing very strenuous physical and mental work as they look after patients. They are constantly on the edge of human suffering and are constantly being faced with the most difficult of human situations. Yet we expect them to operate within tighter budgets than almost anyone else. We put ceilings on the amounts of money available to maintain their standard of living. This is done in a way that we do not do for other sectors in society, and it is no wonder that we are now experiencing things like strikes.

We see a growing anxiety about the percentage of money that is going toward health research in this country. Since I became the health critic for the New Democratic Party, I have received a number of representations about the dismal effort that the Canadian government has played with regard to the provision of funds for health research.

We see more and more doctors opting out. More and more of them are extra billing, or balance billing as it is sometimes called. As a result of this, more of the costs of health care are being transferred to the private sector, and in this case to the individual patients.

As I mentioned before, we see cutbacks in hospital staff and services. We see people waiting in the hallways on Monday morning, and lying on stretchers in the hallways because laundry is no longer done on a weekend as a result of cutbacks in staff and a refusal to have people in on the weekends because they might have to be paid overtime.

Recently we have seen premium increases of 22 per cent in Alberta, 15 per cent in British Columbia, and exorbitant premiums already in the province of Ontario. These are the three richest provinces in the country, and yet those three provinces are the ones that charge premiums. This brings me to another matter that I will mention later and that is that fundamentally the problem with our medicare system is not one of cost but one of attitude.

We need to arrive at a place where we do not talk about how much health care costs, but instead talk about how much ill health costs. It costs us not just in the short run but in the long run. It costs us in terms of human resources and in terms of human happiness. I presume this is the goal of our getting together here in this Parliament. It is not to toss back and forth abstractions about deficits and government spending and what-not, but to ask how we can put our minds together and build a better life for Canadians, not only for the present but for the future. If that is not the goal that we are about, perhaps we ought to pack in this whole exercise.

There are concerns about health care costs. I think it is important to mention them, but not the cost concerns that we are so sick and tired of hearing about from our friends on the right. Our friends on the right here are so afraid that somebody might be coming in and getting a service from a doctor when it is absolutely not necessary. Two of my Conservative opponents in a row now have made much about how people might be coming to see the doctor for every little ache and pain. This is supposed to be an argument to tighten up our medicare system.

Some provinces have introduced deterrent fees and other measures that will reduce the use of the health care system. Deterrent fees will not deter those people who are in the habit of wanting to see a doctor every time they are not feeling well. Deterrent fees will only deter those who cannot afford the deterrent fee. That set of circumstances has been proven in Saskatchewan, and it is an issue that I am very sad to see and sad to say that we are having to fight again. Talk of this kind of measure is being heard again, in New Brunswick and in other places.

As I said before, there are some cost factors when it comes to health care. There are legitimate cost concerns. There are cost concerns about the overemphasis on institutional care and the high cost of this kind of care. This is a problem which can be resolved in part if we were willing to use our imagination, and our knowledge that people get well faster and feel better when they are at home, or when they are in a more human setting than that which can be provided in hospitals. But we must not use this insight, as some governments have done, to do what they call deinstitutionalization. This must not become an argument for just turning people out on the streets and then providing them with no back-up support. Nor must it become an argument in which glib phrases are uttered about how the family ought to be looking after family members more than they do now, and in a way that they used to care for them. In our modern society where there is so much mobility and anonymity, often people who are turned out on the streets do not have any family in the particular city where they are to look after them.

As we de-emphasize institutional care to the extent that we perceive it to be necessary, we need to provide the financial support and services and staff to look after people in their homes and to provide them with that kind of service. That will not only be a more human kind of health care system, I believe it will be a less expensive health care system than the heavily institutionalized form that we have now.

There is a lack of co-operation between hospitals when it comes to high medical technology. There is competition between hospitals to see who can get the most expensive technological unit. There is a hoarding of these kinds of capabilities. Here again we see the spirit of competition acting in its usual destructive way instead of having a health care system based on co-operation, enabling hospitals to make the maximum use of machines no matter where they were located. That is a cost factor that we would like to hear more about.

Of course there is the cost factor of lifestyle, that is, people who do not take enough responsibility for their own health. In this connection I believe all Canadians find themselves guilty in one way or another, some more obvious than others. More emphasis will have to be placed on this aspect as we move into a more preventative notion of what it means to be healthy, and a more preventative notion of what it means to have a quality health care system.

Our doctor-centred model comes to mind, where too many things, things that do not need to be treated in this way, have to happen within the context of the fee-for-service-doctor-centred model of medicine. If we had the freedom to seek more use of paraprofessionals and others who would be able to deal with problems that do not necessarily have to be dealt with by a doctor within our medicare system, we would again be addressing ourselves to a legitimate problem of cost and how we might reduce our health care costs.

Of course, in the whole question of health and its relationship to other matters, including health and its relationship to social policy, and its relationship to social services, one cannot separate a person's health from the kind of house in which that person lives. We cannot separate human health from the total context in which human beings are asked to live out their lives. Providing excellent quality health care in the absence of providing people with decent living conditions, working conditions, and a decent environment in which to live, is to have a very single-minded and inadequate view of what it means to promote human health in the long run.

We are not against government spending on health care, because we make a distinction between government spending on something which is as fundamental as health care and government spending in other more frivolous areas. The government must spend money on existing services which will not only expand but live up to the original vision of the health care system which was embodied in the report of the Royal Commission on Health Care Services headed by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall in 1964. Canada needs a comprehensive health care system.

The government has lived up to only a very small part of what was originally envisioned by that commission. More money must be spent, as I implied earlier, in the whole area of prevention and enhancement of health before one becomes sick. I referred to enhancing the environment, the living conditions and working conditions under which people exist. In all these areas the federal government and provincial governments have been and are responsible.

We once had a cost-sharing program in which the federal government and the provincial governments shared the costs of the health care system. But in 1977 the federal government initiated what came to be known as the Established Programs Financing Act. It was a federal initiative which was designed to cap federal expenditures on health care. It is important to remember this fact because so much political attention has been paid to the way in which the various provinces have abused the freedom they received under the block funding system. Many people have forgotten the origin of this particular scheme. It was initiated by a federal Liberal government and was a move to put a lid on its commitment to health care spending.

The federal government is not only not blameless with respect to the gamble which it took with health care, but also with respect to its original intention in suggesting this block funding scheme. Whatever changes may be forthcoming to the health care system, the federal government must not put us in the situation where it hassled the provinces into health care and then leaves them without the capacity to fund the program as it withdraws from this very important field.

Some of the insights behind the block funding program were very good, and I think that it is important that I point some of them out. One feature was that it would give the provinces more freedom to decide where the federal money would be spent. One of the limitations of the old system was, for example, that if the federal government decided to fund acute care beds and not fund chronic care beds, then there would be an overbuilding of acute care beds and an underbuilding of chronic care beds. This led to the serious situation which can now be found in many Canadian hospitals, that there is a serious shortage of chronic care beds, and people who are in need of chronic care are taking up acute care beds.

The provincial governments were given a certain amount of freedom under this scheme, as it was felt that since they are closer to the people they should have more say over where the money should be spent. But this proposal came at a bad moment in history, because the arrangements of federal-provincial cost-sharing programs do not happen in a political vacuum. They, of course, happen at a particular time and place in the political history of Canada. In addition to certain inadequacies inherent in the block funding proposal, it was introduced at a bad political moment, just as we had a wave of so called neo-Conservatism spreading across the country like a plague, and just as the provincial governments thought that their first duty was to use health care as an avenue of fiscal restraint. Instead of the freedom which the provinces were supposed to receive under the block funding arrangement being utilized to innovate and to expand, this freedom turned into licence to use health care as a means of fighting what was perceived to be inordinate government spending.

To a certain extent and, on those grounds, it is fair to say that block funding never really received a decent chance. There is some question as to whether or not it should be given a second chance because of its inherent faults. But because it came at this bad historical moment, block funding never really had a chance. Two exceptions are the provinces of Quebec and Saskatchewan because they used this freedom in a more creative way.

The federal government will have to take action to bring the provinces which are abusing their freedom under block funding arrangement into line. To a certain extent the answer given three times now by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in response to questions about health care, to the effect that nothing can be done until the review of the health care services by Justice Hall is completed, is legitimate. I can understand why the minister does not want to comment on this subject before the Hall report has dealt with some of the problems about which she has been asked.

But I have no illusions as to whether or not the Hall report will be implemented the day after it comes down, given that the government agrees with its contents. In the meantime we are hearing more and more every day about how the medicare system is being eroded at the provincial level through the charging of premiums, deterrent fees, extra billing, opting out and cutbacks in hospital services. We must act now. If the minister must wait for the Hall report, then that is fine. But after it is completed I call upon the minister to act expediently to bring the provinces into line.

I call upon the minister to act soon, so that when the subject of health care comes up with regard to what will be the federal responsibilities and the provincial responsibilities at a constitutional conference, we will still have a health care system to discuss, and so that we can debate legitimately which government will provide the funding, instead of being in a situation where far too much of the health care costs has been transferred to the private sector already by all these devious means. At this point the debate on who will administer and fund health care would become, to a certain extent, academic.

We have a very young health care system. It is only 18 years ago that the battle for health care as a right was fought in Saskatchewan. We have a very young, philosophical mongrel type of system. We have a publicly funded system mixed with a fee-for-service view and an entrepreneurial view of medicine. Some of the strains which were built into the original compromise are becoming more tense. The battle, as I said before and as we see it from this corner of the House, is fundamentally not a battle of cost, but a battle of attitudes and how we are going to perceive health care within the context of the society which we wish to create in Canada.

We must see health care as a right of individual Canadians and as something which the community and the country which we call Canada perceives in such a way that to the extent that individuals suffer, then we all suffer, because we are connected not merely in the phony connection of the market place, but as human beings. When we begin to see health care in that way, we will not have to ask where the money is going to come from for health care. We will not pass millions and millions of dollars without debate in one day in the form of tax expenditures, and then spend months and months moaning and groaning about the cost of health care. It was $32 billion in tax expenditures alone in 1978.

● (1600)

When we come to the point that we regard health care as a right and not a consumer commodity to be exchanged in the marketplace, all these problems of cost will disappear, at least in the way we so often hear about them. We will be willing to pay the costs in order to ensure a future of which we can all be proud. We will not have to fight the battle for our health care system in Canada every ten years. It should have become part of the fabric of Canadian society long ago. It should not be something that is attacked periodically, as it has been recently. I hope, when we consider supplementary borrowing and all these questions of government spending, that we will take into account that it is important to spend money on health care.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a number of comments on the bill now before the House because when I look back on what has happened in the last 24 months in this House, I believe that the attitude of the government in introducing this bill is the worst example of irresponsibility that I have ever seen.

I well remember and realize the purpose of this bill which asks for a borrowing authority of $12 billion to meet cash requirements and provide a sufficient margin to deal with contingencies. All Canadians, and the government especially, are well aware of the present economic situation. This economic situation has been brought about by the present government.

I do not think that anyone can accuse us of having accumulated a debt of nearly $70 billion after four months in power, but it seems that the administration of the last 15 years has brought about this situation which looks more and more like a bankruptcy of horrendous proportions. The members of the government who worry about our reluctance to support such legislation, should understand that, in all honesty, it is not only difficult but impossible for us to comply with the invitation made to us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who was in such a hurry himself to refuse us much less than what he is now asking for.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important for the Canadian people to know one thing. I would like to go back—and this is directly relevant to this bill—to about May, 1978, when we were already speaking about an election campaign. I remember quite well that the then minister of finance, who understandably no longer holds that portfolio, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), and the then minister of energy, mines and resources were already speaking about the importance of increasing the price of gasoline because it already was a heavy burden for Canada to continue to subsidize the price of oil so that Canadians could pay less than world prices.

The mandate of the government was over and elections were postponed three times for totally political reasons, and it is important, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians remember these events which are not so far behind us. The government therefore refused to face its responsibilities. The year came to an end and, in 1979, an election was finally called, which enabled us to make an in-depth study of the economic situation of Canada.

The Canadian people should remember that because the government refused to face its responsibilities at the time, the Minister of Finance, who condemned us only four months ago because of a budget which I shall explain later, now asks for a borrowing authority of $12 billion even though everyone recognized several months ago that government expenditures were already exceeding the normal level. And in May 1979 we had an opportunity to make in-depth analyses of this government's economic failure. And the senior officers, I remember very vividly for having been part of cabinet and therefore tremendously lucky in obtaining information, told us this increase in expenditures had to be stopped, they had to be cut and contained, as the warning had been given the government two or three years past, but for purely political reasons the price of gas had not been increased before the May 1979 election, expenditures had not been restrained, because certain projects were cut for purely partisan reasons. The responsibilities of any member sitting on either side of this House were not assumed.

And for that reason the analysis was not easy. However, we are now blamed for not having brought forward a budget before seven months. But although four months have now gone by and the Minister of Finance has yet to give us any indication, he is now requesting a blank cheque for $12 billion on money he needs of course. The government needs money, but they have not yet found any, and God knows, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is aware of this country's economic plight, though he has been in cabinet for 15 years.

That budget did not undergo major changes, except that we attempted in those seven months to make a difficult analysis, as I said, that forced us in Canada's interest to restrain expenditures and show courage toward Canadians, placing them squarely before the economic situation with which we were confronted by the previous government. And this we did. Ours was a tough budget and it was necessary. I think that in the country as a whole, including my colleagues opposite if they showed any sincerity, people would recognize today that our proposals were taking into account the reality and the difficulties experienced by Canada now and some seven months ago. But it was not a popular measure, it would not pay up political dividends and as the thirst for power was more acute than the care for Canada's interests, it is for that reason that we were defeated barely three and a half months ago. There are no other reasons, Mr. Speaker. At that time we were fully guilty of having tabled such a budget because we wanted to put Canada back on the track to prosperity and stop letting it go adrift, finally to end up in an embarrassing failure when having to explain it to people who are not Canadians. Those seven months had also enabled us, I think, to give evidence of a new sense of direction thanks to the proposals that we had made and I was quite pleased to see my cabinet colleagues make proposals and give an account for everything. One had to show a good deal of audacity to explain to Canadians that belt tightening was not simply empty talk but that it meant action on our part. And the point was that we had begun acting by bringing forth corrective and drastic measures regarding government expenses and most ongoing projects.

An hon. Member: The people passed judgment on that.

Mr. La Salle: I'll get back on that subject later.

● (1610)

Well, Mr. Speaker, we knew that the measures we were putting forward three and a half months ago were the necessary remedies. Of course, because of its craving for power the government now in place, in collusion with the members of the New Democratic Party, considered it was time to bring the government down because we were in a minority position, of course, but even in a minority position we did not have the right to refuse to face our responsibilities, and that is what we did.

An hon. Member: The people have spoken.

Mr. La Salle: During the election campaign, Mr. Speaker, this government showed unprecedented hypocrisy, bordering on dishonesty. First, they condemned our position on the gas price increase. There is nobody opposite suggesting now that the price of gas will not go up. But they did not talk much about it. They did not talk about it as long as possible, and they said we were wrong. Of course, for the everyday man, an increase of 18 cents is a lot. But those Liberals opposite knew full well that has been necessary for the past three and a half years if we were serious about self-sufficiency.

When we were talking about self-sufficiency, it was a way of going and getting the revenues where we had to go and get them because we did not want through a general taxation formula to tax those who do not have a car, a poor lady who would have had to pay taxes to help those who use a car. We thought that was an unpopular, but fair, and particularly necessary measure in view of the unprecedented spending and deficit we had. Our budget, I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, included in addition to those measures that were necessary, the assurance that our budget deficit would be reduced over three to five years, and that was interesting and important for businessmen. Indeed, businessmen did not blame us on the proposals we had already made public. But in spite of the increase in expenditures that was turning out to be ridiculous as the result of the policies being carried out by the present government, they wanted to go ahead with things like a second rail line in western Canada, a second phase at Mirabel which is currently in the red. Of course, it was tempting for older people to have been offered the small amount of $35, which adds up to approximately $400 or $450 million, I think. We could have promised $50, Mr. Speaker. We had already considered the whole issue. The then minister of national health and welfare (Mr. Crombie) did a thorough analysis of the situation in order to increase the amount and give elderly people a decent income while managing to keep within the limits of the economic envelope and avoiding a larger budgetary deficit. That is the difference.

But no, the Liberals told the public that we were wrong and that the government was still in a good borrowing position. Today the parliamentary secretary points out that things are getting more difficult to manage because it will cost us nearly $11 billion to service the debt this year. That is the situation we are in now. That is $11 billion spent in a very negative way; there is no doubt about it. Think of all the things Canada could do had the government not sunk us so deep into debt, Mr. Speaker. But Canadians will have to realize that time has come to restrict government spending and put the economy back on its feet, and the sooner, the better.

Will Canadians be spared the increase in the price of oil? I ask the question of our friends on the other side.

An hon. Member: No tax.

Mr. La Salle: No tax. They will pay the price through their income tax, then. It is only a different formula. How much will Canadians have to pay for this enduring mismanagement? Of course, my friends opposite remain silent.

As usual they will be party to such a legislation which will compel Canadians to pay more for servicing an enormous debt. But that is not new, and the people will wake up.

An hon. Member: There is no need to shout so loud, the people have heard you!

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the people cannot maintain in power for many more years representatives who demonstrate such irresponsibility and such incompetence. That is impossible, Mr. Speaker. And I am sure that the time will come when Canadians will realize what sort of treason they fell victims to during the last election campaign.

An hon. Member: Vox populi—

Mr. La Salle: It is perhaps because we have been more honest than our hon. friends opposite, Mr. Speaker, and it is not easy for anybody involved in politics to be honest.

An hon. Member: That is why you are still in the opposition.

Mr. La Salle: My hon. friends opposite are not aware of that. It is not easy to show enough courage.

Indeed, during the last election campaign, I saw Liberals behave like wolves in my constituency—and I said so not such a long time ago—roaming everywhere to bother elderly people and get then all worked up about the $35. They were telling them if you vote for the Liberals, you will get $35 a month, but if you don't you may not get it. They went so far as to make Quebeckers believe they would lose their family allowances and might have their old age security pension reduced. That is how they campaigned—

An hon. Member: Louder!

An hon. Member: Why did you support those $35 earlier, then?

Mr. La Salle: In my constituency they did not vote for that, they did not vote for you. That I want to point out.

Mr. Speaker, here we are today after this hypocritical campaign—and the word is not too strong—facing a Minister of Finance who refuses to bring down his budget to tell us what he intends to do with these $12 billion. Moreover, these gentlemen are so inconsistent that they think we will bend to their will because Canada is in a delicate situation. It is the responsibility of the gentlemen who sit on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, we are not eager to make ourselves accomplices of such an economic failure. I am one of those who will prove that our budget was a factual budget and, incidentally, all that the Minister of Finance has come up with until now were propositions which were made by us. To date, he has not brought up anything new, just his old habit of getting Canada into debt. He wants us to increase Canada's debt by $12 billion. We think that enough is enough and we will not be accomplices or refuse to march to the tune of such incompetent people, Mr. Speaker. This is really true, Mr. Speaker. I would be so embarrassed to be on the other side of the House and to ask for a credit of something like $12 billion whereas those people asked us to reduce the budget deficit only four months ago. We were asked questions, and the then minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) demanded proposals to reduce the budget deficit because Canada could not afford it, and because Canadians could not go on paying for debt servicing through their taxes.

It is unbelievable, Mr. Speaker, and Canadians should know that there are people in this House who were on this side hardly four months ago and who blamed us, who requested an oil price, who urged us to cut down our expenditures, and today, most of them are very silent and let the Minister of Finance—and I understand them, it is embarrassing. How can they justify an increase in government spending, an increase in government deficit, when the evidence of this economic failure is most obvious. That is the type of government we have. It is important for Canadians to know why we cannot support this measure.

When we talk about contingencies, Mr. Speaker, just for your information, to show you how our affairs are managed by this government, to demonstrate how this government has been not only irresponsible but incompetent, I shall tell you—

An hon. Member: It will be the third time you have said it.

Mr. La Salle: I shall never overemphasize the fact that this government is incompetent and some Canadians are going to believe it. Indeed, a great many Canadians did believe it. Recently, I had a look at what the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) endorsed as supplementary estimates. For the Lachine canal in Montreal for instance they had figured $50 million. I was only going to ask the President of the Treasury Board if they had decided to build a second canal since the additional funds total a mere $45 million, 90 per cent over the initial cost, only peanuts.

I take the example of Trois-Rivières where the initial cost of a small contract of $15 million has been increased by 65 per cent. The President of the Treasury Board authorizes those expenditures with a stroke of the pen. It amounts to $639 million. I do not have time to list them all as there are 400 such projects. This goes to show you, Mr. Speaker, what type of administration Canadians have chosen for themselves. It is important to emphasize it. It is important because the people opposite will not tell it. So, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that my co-operation will not be forthcoming in this debate.

Before I resume my seat I should like also to remind you that in our proposals we had something for poor owners. It was a compensatory measure well thought out and well prepared, in the spirit of that just society that the Prime Minister has long since forgotten. We were going to help the construction industry and today I heard, and I think that the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) is here, that 120 workers in his riding are losing their jobs because of problems in the construction industry. The assistance we wanted to provide for home owners in view of interest costs was a highly useful and positive measure. However, this was defeated because, as I remember quite well, when we introduced the bill, we were told that we had forgotten about tenants. What has the government introduced for tenants in the last four months?

The Minister of Finance refuses to present a budget, supposedly because he does not know the price of oil. At least, we had an agreement in principle on oil. We had an agreement in principle, but the present government certainly does not have one. In any case, Canadians will pay more for their gas, they will go deeper in debt, and they will see part of their taxes used for the service of a debt which has become excessive. This is the type of administration that we now have, and we are asked for a blank cheque, for a borrowing authority of $12 billion for a government which is unable to present at the same time a paper which would provide explanations and information on how these $12 billion will be used. Mr. Speaker, this is asking too much. I believe we have no right to accept this blank cheque that the Minister of Finance demands because we have proof of his lack of knowledge in view of the reluctancy he has shown in this House about presenting a budget which could stimulate the Canadian economy. I have said that we gave a new direction to the Canadian economy by the service and the role that we wanted to provide for the private sector, and we would have obtained rather extraordinary results.

For political and partisan reasons, this government decided to defeat a government which wanted to implement measures to correct the situation, and Canadians are now disappointed, as we shall see in the months and the years to come. We shall continue to urge the government to present budgets within reasonable time limits and to introduce measures to correct the situation, and I believe that the House will agree that it is urgently required, but for this we need much less irresponsibility or fewer irresponsible people than we now have, and I hope that Canadians will realize what is happening and allow us to put this country on the way back to prosperity and prevent the bankruptcy which seems imminent because of the present government.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to the debate will be brief. Listening to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), something I have had the pleasure of doing for many years, I could not help but note, as I listened to his useful contribution, that perhaps it is time members opposite forgot the fact that they lost an election. It seems to me that most of their contributions, covering the widest range of subjects, reflect a preoccupation with the fact that they are no longer in power. I have listened to the hon. member for Joliette, to the former minister of finance, and to other members rising at every opportunity, repeating, retracing the events in December which led to the defeat of that government. Every time I listen, the events are depicted or described a little differently.

The government which was defeated in December was defeated because the opposition, exercising its democratic right, in its collective wisdom decided that the government was not capable of administrating the affairs of the nation. That is the political process under which we operate. But what the members opposite never state is that on February 18 the people of Canada, in record number, went to the polls after listening for two months to the arguments of the government as to why the opposition parties were irresponsible. They listened to the explanations as to why the concepts of the then minister of finance were logical, to assurances that there was a master plan which would restrain spending, revitalize private industry, and do all the proper things.

The people of Canada had 60 days in which to evaluate the events of that fateful night in December, to listen to the arguments of the minister of finance, the leader of the government of the day, the hon. member for Joliette and others. If the party of the hon. member for Joliette had a case, then the people of Canada had an opportunity on February 18 not only to return that government to power but also to do it by a substantial majority. They did not do that, and I am surprised that hon. members opposite are still discussing, reviewing, and moaning over the events of December 14, or whatever the date was, and saying nothing at all in debate about the events of February 18.

As I recall that election campaign, night after night the then minister of finance and the then leader of the government went on television and leading ministers went across the country, talking about the irresponsibility of the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party, and the copping out in their responsibilities of the Creditistes. The message was pure and simple. Hon. members opposite said that if they were re-elected, they would bring back exactly the same budget, and they gave their reasons. That is exactly the message which came through every day and every evening on the news. It dominated, quite logically, the speeches of the members of the government of the day. Why? Because they believed in their philosophy. They believed that it is necessary to put more people out of work in order to balance the budget.

They went back to Adam Smith's concept. They tried persuasively to tell Canadians that in December the opposition parties had acted collectively and irresponsibly. The Canadian people did not accept their version of the events. If anything, the Canadian people applauded what took place in this very democratic Parliament in getting rid of a government which, if it had not been defeated at that time, would have brought us back to the good old days of R. B. Bennett. There is nothing different in the philosophy of the former minister of finance and the minister of finance of the hungry thirties. There is nothing different in the policy re-enunciated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Joliette and those which brought us the terrific depression of the thirties.

I am not a cabinet minister; I can criticize. In the United States the President said on television Saturday or Sunday—it was Sunday morning when I heard him—"We miscalculated, it is not going to be a recession, it is going to be a deep depression," and he urged Americans to start spending. "Spend, spend, spend", was exactly the message which came from Schultze. There has been a whole series of speeches and public interviews on American television over the last four weeks. Schultze, the economic adviser to the President, was really saying that once again the ability of the American administration to fine tune has been miscalculated. To fine tune what? The level of acceptable unemployment? I never thought the day would come as a politician or as a member of Parliament that one's success would be measured by one's ability to put X number of people out of work. I am talking now about the previous government for the moment.

Mr. McDermid: You are the one complaining about relevancy.

Mr. Mackasey: I will be talking about this government in a moment. I am responding to the speech of the hon. member for Joliette, who had every right to make a speech. He had every right to get up and say that his government was right, that its policies in December were accurate, and that we should never have defeated it. He was unable to sell that argument to the Canadian people in February, and if we are back in the House of Commons as the government it is not because the party of hon. members opposite was defeated in December but because when the Canadian people, when given an opportunity, decided that they preferred to re-elect a Liberal government with a majority.

Mr. Malone: Two provinces.

Mr. Mackasey: If there had been any substance to the argument of the hon. member for Joliette that somehow we defeated the government because we were being expedient, ganging up and taking advantage of a minority government, and if Canadians really believed it, they would have shown their displeasure with the opposition parties by seeing not only that they did not form a government but also by making sure that the Conservative party came back with a majority.

Canadians, in their wisdom, said, "No, thank you". The older generation remembered the Bennett days, and the younger generation could not understand a policy which, as pointed out in the support papers to the budget, would result in a level of unemployment of 11 per cent, 12 per cent or 13 per cent. That is as I remember the document.

An hon. Member: Read it again.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman is a little excited. The support papers of the budget predicted a much higher level of unemployment than that which prevailed when the government of the day took its place. The minister at that time explained that it was unfortunate that it would create a terrible burden but that it was a natural reaction to the policy of his government in the short run. However, he said, "Cheer up, in the long run we will all be better off".

What was the big issue in that election campaign? I know that in the area I represent it was not so much an increase in excise tax on gasoline, although that became the big issue. After all, there had been precedents for excise tax. If I recall correctly, there was a seven-cent excise tax in place. Perhaps I may be forgiven if I am a little rusty. I have not been around for four or five years, but if I recall correctly there was an excise tax of seven cents, and I do not think the average Canadian would have been too concerned if that was increased. Canadians were angry because it was increased to provide money for a mortgage interest deduction scheme. However, more particularly in my riding what made the difference, and what made people vote for the Liberals and against the Conservatives, was who that excise tax was levied against.

For the first time in Canadian history a government imposed an excise tax on the gasoline being used by the farmers of the country, which was a discrimination. For the first time in history there was an excise tax on the gasoline being used by the fishermen of this country.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the rebate.

Mr. Mackasey: The rebate comes to the same thing. How could hon. members opposite expect people who travel 15, 20 or 25 miles to work by public transportation to accept an excise tax on the gasoline used by public transportation?

An hon. Member: You are going to do the same thing.

Mr. Mackasey: I am sure hon. members opposite did not realize that the excise tax applied even to the transportation of handicapped people.

Mr. MacDonald: Terrible.

Mr. Mackasey: I can only commiserate with the backbenchers who had to live through those days. Somebody in that party had to be extremely insensitive to apply increased excise tax to those categories I have just mentioned.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know the hon. member would not want to mislead the House, because he is one of the finer members in this chamber, but I want to bring to his attention that there was a tax rebate for any person who was disabled, as far as the excise tax on gasoline was concerned.

Mr. Mackasey: I know that there was indeed a rebate through the income tax, not only for disabled people but also for anyone who had to pay increased excise tax. That was recoupable through income tax. I simply say that hon. members opposite did not sell that concept very well. However, that does not in any way, shape or form change the fact that for the first time taxes were imposed on farmers and fishermen, and for the first time an excise tax was imposed on public transportation. If disabled people were being asked to recover it somehow through their income tax, and half of them have no income tax to recover it through, it was at best an insensitive application of an excise sales tax. There might have been some justification. After all, the government has ways and means of discouraging the use of automobiles for unnecessary purposes.

If the government felt that the money should have been directed to people to help them with their mortgages, so be it. That was the policy of the government. The point I am getting at is that the Canadian people realized that, sure, some day they are going to have to pay considerably more for gasoline, but they did not think the method of application of that excise tax on gasoline should have been so insensitive.

Normally hon. members opposite would have been sitting on this side of the House for four or eight years. That is the normal pattern of politics in this country, but the reason they are not sitting on this side of the House can be summed up in one word: insensitivity. They were insensitive in applying increased excise sales taxes to the farmer. I recall people saying in my community, "I do not understand. No matter what the price of fuel is, no matter how difficult it is to live with these interest rates, we have no choice but to use gasoline in our daily work; we have no choice but to use gasoline for our tractors, our trucks and our automobiles."

I cannot understand why the hon. member for Joliette failed to understand the anger in the rural community when people realized for the first time that, in the eyes of the government, their use of the tractor was not that necessary in the economy of the country. So they showed their collective anger on February 18 in the most legitimate way it can be done in a democracy, namely, by voting against the government and voting a new government in.

So long as the opposition members want to devote most of the time in the question period and in their speeches rationalizing the policies which led to their defeat, that is great for us. It means they do not have time to come up with new ideas, new principles, or new concepts or to show that they have learned anything from their defeat. As a matter of fact, one of their most laudable traits, a positive trait, to me, of the minister of finance of the day or the prime minister of the day, was to say, "If we are re-elected, we will bring back the same budget without any change. We have learned nothing. There is nothing we have learned in the 60 days. We have not made a mistake". It would not have been hard to say they made a mistake. They could have said, "If we are re-elected, we will not apply the excise tax on gasoline to the farmers, to the fishermen, to public transportation, to travelling salesmen and to other people who have to use their cars and use gasoline in order to earn their living, not for luxury. In that respect perhaps we are wrong and we will provide for an exemption for these groups, even if it means adding, in the spirit of conservation, two, three, four, five or ten cents to the tax of other people who use their cars part of the time for unnecessary travel."

I think that kind of flexibility on the part of a government seeking re-election might have had a dramatic impact on the outcome of that election. When you go into the rural areas, or into the Atlantic provinces and say to the people "Re-elect us and we will guarantee that we will impose the terrible tax which you have to pay for the first time, despite the problems you have in earning a living or to break even, but we will do so for your own good and you will feel the beneficial results 20 years from now," and then to come out and refer to the background papers in the budget predicting the state of the economy five years down the line, predicting a substantial increase in unemployment figures, all this is hardly designed to win friends and influence people in the industrial sector. So I am at a loss, as a friend of hon. members opposite, to understand, even at this late date, 60, 90 or 120 days after the election, their motivation for saying that they were right in December, they were right in the election campaign, and that even if the people defeated them on February 18, the people did not know what they were doing, and in the next election they will come back with the same outmoded concept. That is music to my ears.

An hon. Member: Why is MacEachen doing the same thing?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman over there is doing very well looking through his papers. If he has an argument with the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), I am sure that he is quite capable, as one of the future leaders of that tired little band in the corner, to make his case during the question period.

I am pleased and satisfied with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today that no matter to what degree we are committed to restraint, to reducing the accumulated deficit, we will not do it at the risk of increasing unemployment in a country where the level of unemployment, so far as I am concerned, is already too high.

It was consolation to know that despite the pressures of the opposition in the question period, despite the pressures from certain financial institutions, despite the pressures from some editorialists, we will not be decreasing the deficit by cutting back on those programs that are so badly needed to stimulate the economy at a moment when we are suffering from an over-reaction by the United States government to the whole issue of inflation. I have never been convinced that inflation in the United States is the result of too much money chasing too few goods. On the contrary, I think it is self-evident that it is related to the high cost of petroleum, and I think the opposition is right when they make that case. I think we make the same case. But be it as it may, unemployment in the United States spills over into this country if for no other reason than that as our best trading partner they take in many of our exports, and if they are not buying because their economy is, or will be, at a stand still, this is bound to have a negative effect on this country.

It is at that time in our economic history when the government of the day has to stimulate the economy. The hon. member from the New Democratic Party spoke very recently and very persuasively about the tendency of some bureaucrats to advise this government. Perhaps the difference between the two governments, the Clark government and our government, is our ability to resist bad advice. Whatever the reason, medicare is a perfect example of what happens when private enterprise and government are competing for the same shrinking funds.

I have often likened our system in Canada, particularly the one that this party has fashioned by reason of the fact that it has been in government for so long, to a marriage of convenience between private enterprise and social policy and social reform. We believe in private enterprise because obviously it is the most effective and successful generator of capital in world history, as compared to communist, socialist, or social democratic countries. Private enterprise, as epitomized by the Americans in the United States and, to a lesser degree, by ourselves, is still the best way of generating the capital we need. What does the government do? Our government simply said, "We would like to distribute some of that capital on those types of programs that should be synonymous with our way of life, that is, universality of medicare, universality of education, equality of opportunity, and minimal regional disparity through our transfer of payments". That is our responsibility.

When that pool of available capital becomes smaller and when there is legitimate competition for funds between free enterprise and social policy, then you have to, as the French people often say, pour a little water in your wine. Surely you do not want that marriage of convenience to end in divorce. It is obvious that the strategy and the policy of the Conservative party is to say, "This is not a convenient time for one of the partners in the marriage to advocate social policy and to be making demands." Perhaps it is not, nor do I think it is time that we should cut back these policies to the point that we destroy them, because these are the things that distinguish Canada from the United States.

Medicare is a perfect example of the difference between our two countries. When we say, as a government, that we are dedicated to equality of opportunity for Canadians, that should apply to all Canadians. It should mean that the level of medicare available to the people in the Atlantic provinces is equal to that in Alberta, in Quebec or Ontario. Already through block funding we have evidence that that is no longer the case, that the "have" provinces are able to make medicare available with other features to their people, and to the more hard pressed provinces in the maritimes this is not possible. It is equally true in the field of education and in many other areas, that if you are going to have equality of opportunity, that equality should not end at the frontiers of the central provinces.

The minister is asking for the right to borrow $12 billion during the course of the year. The bill specifies that this is for public works and other purposes. I can only give you the description in the bill, which is not as hon. members opposite describe it. But I want to say that this party does not tend to balance the budget or reduce the deficit by cutting back our social programs to the degree that they would be outmoded and, in fact, unfair to most Canadians.

In conclusion, I would just say that it is time members opposite remember the election is over. When they are tracing the course of events leading up to today, they should start earlier, or not skip from December to today. They should remember that on February 18, after listening to their arguments as to the irrationality of the opposition for two months, the people of Canada had an opportunity to evaluate the programs of both parties. Perhaps they came to the conclusion that there was very little difference between the two programs of the parties. The main difference that I would agree to is the application.

I shoud like to come back to one example of many, that is, the increase in the excise sales tax in order to conserve energy and provide needed funds to help middle-class people with their mortgages. I cannot quarrel too much with that objective, but I quarrel with the application because, as usual, it wreaked the greatest hardships on farmers, disabled people, people dependent on public transportation, fishermen, and people less able to protect themselves. On election day everybody is equal in the country. The will of the people was that we have a change of government, after listening to the eloquent persuasion of the minister of finance and prime minister of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), I should like to deal with the late show for this evening.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—External Affairs—Soviet Union—Reported reinstatement of cultural, scientific and educational exchanges; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek)—Metrication—Economic development programs to improve employment in automobile industry; the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo)—Canadian Wheat Board—Losses to farmers due to U.S. embargo on grain to U.S.S.R.—Government policy.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have all been entertained by the fatherly advice of the peripatetic hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey). I am sorry he had to leave so soon because I would have liked to comment on some of the things he brought to our attention. One important observation he made was that after a certain progression of government policy, as the French describe it, we mix water and wine. That is one of the principal messages I should like to leave with the House today. When we have had over a long period of time the government policies that have been followed since 1968—and going back even prior to that—the result is that we are mixing water and wine. We are getting a diluted product which, in the illustration of the hon. member for Lincoln, was bad wine. Also we have bad dollars because the dollars today are worth less than half what they were back in 1968 when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office.

I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-30 to provide the government with the borrowing authority to raise $12 billion. This is a very, very important debate. Passage of the bill will provide the government with the opportunity to continue its programs for the balance of this fiscal year. The shocking part of it is that we know nothing about these programs. That is the key message which members on this side of the House are trying to get across to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

I used to be an investment dealer before I got into politics. As an investment dealer, any time one of my clients came to me and asked if they could raise some capital through the capital markets, I said, "What are you using the money for; what is the purpose of the issue?" We have seen nothing about what is the purpose of the issue today. We could debate this for the next two or three months if we wanted. Also we looked at the usefulness and the quality of management of the organization, and again I must say that it is an area we could be debating for the next two or three months as well.

We heard clearly from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that he is very disappointed with the quality of management in this organization. That quality has been building up over many, many years. Another aspect that we look at is whether there is any attempt whatsoever to reduce the loan or to reduce the demands on the public purse. I have seen nothing to indicate that in the period of time I have been here since February 18. Many times members on this side have said that the government is asking for a blank cheque. It is just as simple as that, because we have no idea what is happening. Ministers are asking us to provide them with the authority to continue the disastrous policies of the 1970s, with no accounting to Parliament. It is incomprehensible why there has been no understanding built up during this period of time as to the effects of high government deficit.

I fully support the various things the hon. member for Lincoln raised in the course of his remarks as to the importance of social programs. But the key thing we must realize is that if we cannot afford those social programs, it will hurt this country very, very seriously. The long-term damage being done to this country by continuing and accelerating levels of budget deficit are things we will be living with for many years, as will our children and our children's children. There is no way of getting away from that.

On many occasions we have said that it is essential the government bring forward a budget at the earliest possible opportunity, because the sorry excuse for a budget that was brought down in April is simply not good enough to get an understanding of where the government is going. Again we tried to get some understanding from the Prime Minister today and from the Minister of Finance on previous occasions. We are getting nowhere in understanding the direction of the policies of this government. That is why we say we need a budget.

The last time a budget was passed by this House was in November, 1978, a year and a half ago. That is why we need a budget before the summer recess. The distressing fact is that either this government does not have the wisdom and the intelligence to recognize the existence and the magnitude of the problem of a major series of deficits, or it understands the problem and continues on its way with a full understanding of the impact it has on the people of the country. They are borrowing money at today's rates and at today's value for the dollar, and they are paying it back in reduced dollars. As I said, in 1968 the dollar was worth over twice what it is today. If we continue doing that, the only organization that benefits from it in the country is the Government of Canada. To hear the possibility that this government is considering removing indexing from personal tax exemptions is just removing one more discipline from stopping them continuing on the basis they have been for years. It is a classic example of buying the votes of Canadians with their own money.

What the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was trying to do with his budget of December 11 was to show Canadians a way to get out of the sorry state we are in now. But we get from the government opposite policies which will permit them to get short-term gain unfortunately with long-term pain for this country.

May I call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, and notices of motions.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

USE OF UNION DUES FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES

Mr. John Gamble (York North) moved that Bill C-203, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to introduce Bill C-203 for second reading and of exercising a right common to all members of this House, the right to change the laws by which Canadians are governed. I mention this rudimentary fact because it is often forgotten when we, as members of Parliament, are caught up with concepts of party solidarity and partisan politics. While I might have preferred to introduce Bill C-203 under circumstances where, with amendments to the rules and practices of the House, there was a greater likelihood of a vote on the same, I am nevertheless pleased to be able to address the issue contained therein with hon. members of this House.

Naturally I would be extremely gratified if Parliament shook off the mantle of executive control and provided a forum where individual members might freely debate the affairs of state and provide a direction for our country, unhindered by an all-powerful bureaucracy. Practice today, regrettably, precludes the realization of such a lofty hope.

The Canada Labour Code sought to be amended by Bill C-203 endeavours to regulate labour and management affairs touching on or involving federal works. In essence, it governs labour matters that fall within federal jurisdiction, and accordingly has no direct bearing on provincial legislation of a similar kind.

The code contains the customary provisions relating to the rights of employees to join a trade union of their choice, the certification of bargaining agents for a unit of employees, and provides for the regulation of the affairs of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Pursuant to section 161(a) of the code, a collective agreement may include a provision requiring, as a condition of employment, membership in a specified trade union. Subsections 1, 2 and 3 have the combined effect of obliging an employee to contribute his union dues to his bargaining agent on a check-off basis from his salary.

While sections 184 and 185 relating to unfair practices by both employer and trade unions respectively list unacceptable conduct of both parties, the dismissal of an employee is provided either by the employer on his own volition, or at the request of the union, where the employee has failed to pay his required union dues.

By the interaction of sections 161, 162 and 185 of the code, the payment of union dues is therefore linked directly with the right to gain and retain employment. Bill C-203 deals effectively with what may or may not be done in the political sphere with some of those dues so contributed by individual members of Canadian trade unions.

The purpose of the bill is to grant to the individual employee the right to determine whether any part of his union dues are made available for political purposes, and the bill provides, in that portion of the code which relates directly to the deduction by way of check-off for union dues, as follows:

> Any provision in a collective agreement requiring an employer to make a deduction from the remuneration paid to an employee and to credit the deduction to a trade union, is invalid if any part thereof is, or is intended to be, contributed to or used to support a political party, unless the employee has expressly so authorized in writing.

Several trade unions in Canada have constitutions which permit individual members to opt out of the political contribution portion of their dues. These situations are rare, however, and require an overt act by an individual member of a trade union to gain what must be a fundamental right of all Canadians, the right to determine which political party, if any, is supported by them financially.

Peer pressure within labour organizations, and labour leadership disfavour, prompt many to fail to avail themselves of the opportunities to opt out of making a political contribution as a part of their union dues payments. As I have said, it appears that there are few labour unions under whose constitutions an individual member thereof may take advantage of the right to which I have made reference.

It is fundamental to individual freedom that Canadians, including members of trade unions, be granted the right to exercise freely, and of their own choice, who shall benefit from their financial support of political parties.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): What option do the shareholders have?

Mr. Gamble: We will deal with that, and I am sure the hon. member will too.

I submit to this House that no money should be extracted from Canadians in the fashion that union dues are to be spent on a political party which the contributor does not support. This bill will guarantee that funds contributed as union dues and directed to a political party will have the express written consent of the donor.

An hon. Member: Taxes.

Mr. Gamble: The New Democratic Party, the alleged supporters of individual civil rights, have long been the benefactors of enforced political taxation, and I can well understand why I now hear the clamouring from the left.

From the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, I have determined the following information pertinent to the 1979 general election.

An hon. Member: Let's hear where you got your money first.

Mr. Gamble: Individual candidates by political party affiliation received the following contributions from trade unions during and with respect to the 1979 general election: Progressive Conservatives, $280; Liberals, $100; Social Credit, $50; and the New Democratic Party $420,186. Registered political parties, by party affiliation, received the following contributions from trade unions: Progressive Conservative Party, $430; Liberal party, $2,849; and the NDP, $1,765,083. On the basis of that analysis, I well understand why the most vociferous opposition has come so far and will continue to come from the NDP part of this House.

● (1710)

That party has proclaimed itself as the champions of civil liberties, but its members are undoubtedly blinded by their own financial well-being when it is confronted with a proposal which grants to individuals the right and freedom to refrain from contributing to political party coffers through enforced political taxation. Fundamentally, economic freedom is permanently linked to political freedom. The recognition by individual members of trade unions that a percentage of their union dues support the NDP may, indeed, be one of the chief reasons that that party does so very poorly at the time of general elections.

Although they have been able to induce labour leadership to follow them, the NDP have signally failed to persuade the rank and file. It is well understood that the antagonism against NDP enforced taxation has the effect of alienating those people when they exercise their free will at the ballot box. Having regard to the practice in the House and the clamouring of the NDP benches, I have the decided advantage of confronting my NDP opponent, at the time of the next election, with the fact that I sought to relieve trade union members of a financial burden and members of the NDP party, as I am sure they must, blocked passage of that remedial legislation.

What of the inevitable comparison between the shareholders of corporations who make political donations and the members of trade unions who indirectly do the same? The question, of course, has already been screamed out at me in this House by members of the NDP. The individual shareholder who disapproves of the actions of the board of directors or officers of a corporation in which he has shares may, at any time, dispose of his investment. But individual trade union members have no such luxury.

I have already described the fact that their continued enjoyment of their occupation is dependent on the deduction of their trade union dues. I have already described what happens to those dues. They cannot simply divest themselves of their jobs. If an occupation is an investment, then it must surely be a very special one. It is an investment of one's life and the comparison, accordingly, cannot be drawn between a member of a trade union movement who is obliged by the constitution of that organization to make political contributions to a party that he may or may not support, and the shareholder of a corporation who may simply divest himself of his investment and walk away.

There is one other matter to which I would draw the attention of this House. It relates to the tax consequences to individual trade union members when a portion of their dues is contributed to a political party. In computing the income of members of a trade union, one may deduct, pursuant to the provisions of subparagraph 8(1)(i)(iv) of the Income Tax Act:

> Annual dues to maintain membership in a trade union as defined
> (A) by section 3 of the Canada Labour Code, or
> (B) in any provincial statute providing for the investigation, conciliation or settlement of industrial disputes,

In interpreting that subparagraph, however, one must have regard to subsection 8(5) of the Income Tax Act which provides that:

> Notwithstanding subparagraphs (1)(i)(i) and (iv), annual dues are not deductible thereunder in computing a taxpayer's income from an office or employment to the extent that they are, in effect, levied—
> (c) for any other purpose not directly related to the ordinary operating expenses of the association or trade union to which they are paid.

It is my understanding that the Department of National Revenue interprets those two sections in the same fashion that I do. That being the case, I suggest that it is imperative that members of trade unions be apprised of the consequences of actions taken by the union leadership which render ineffective statutory provisions granting their members specific tax relief. Undoubtedly, the general provisions related to tax credit arrangements in connection with political contributions under the Income Tax Act which are made available to all Canadians would be a preferred way that individual members of trade unions might make, both freely and economically, a contribution to a political party in a fashion which would benefit them more than the simple deduction and the computation of income in the fashion authorized by subparagraph 8(1)(i)(iv) to which I made reference.

Canada Labour Code

There is much in the labour laws of Canada that requires change, change designed to grant to Canadians as members of trade unions a greater degree of control over their own destiny. This bill is but a part of that process. The bill is short and concise, and so are my remarks. I would conclude these remarks by urging passage of Bill C-203 on second reading.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I gladly join in this debate on Bill C-203 which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Gamble) has brought before the House. I do not intend to engage in any of the invective to which we have been subjected so far this afternoon. I thought perhaps I could inject a note of rationality into the debate. I would do that, first of all, by reviewing, for the benefit of some hon. members of the House, the legislative enactment with which we are concerned, namely, the Canada Labour Code.

The Canada Labour Code, which was alluded to by the hon. member for York North, as the legal instrument pertaining to employment within the federal jurisdiction. This jurisdiction encompasses some half a million working Canadians from coast to coast, and it covers such national industries as railways, airlines, shipping, grain elevators, trucking, broadcasting, telephones, banking, certain Crown corporations—in effect virtually all undertakings which are of national significance. The code itself consists of three parts, the first one dealing with employment standards, the second one dealing with employment safety, and the third one dealing with what we are involved in today, industrial relations.

As it appears in the statute books, part V contains an interesting preamble which, with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote, as I believe its essence is pertinent to the subject matter which is under discussion. I quote from the preamble:

> Whereas there is a long tradition in Canada of labour legislation and policy designed for the promotion of the common well-being through the encouragement of free collective bargaining and the constructive settlements of disputes;
> And whereas Canadian workers, trade unions and employers recognize and support freedom of association and free collective bargaining as the basis of effective industrial relations for the determination of good working conditions and sound labour management relations;
>
> And whereas the Government of Canada has ratified convention No. 87 of the International Labour Organization concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize and has assumed international reporting responsibilities in this regard;

● (1720)

> And whereas the Parliament of Canada desires to continue and extend its support to labour and management in their co-operative efforts to develop good relation and constructive collective bargaining practices, and deems the development of good industrial relations to be in the best interest of Canada in ensuring a just share of the fruits of progress to all;
> Now, therefore, Her Majesty—

There follows part V of the Code.

In the present context I would particularly refer to the way in which existing labour legislation in Canada follows this long tradition, a tradition which has been in effect for decades. It has been closely tailored to the requirements of the parties primarily concerned, that is to say, labour and management.

Through its traditional nurturing of good industrial relations—and it is paramount if there is going to be co-operation that there be good relations between the two groups and this is essential to good industrial relations—the federal government has always been at pains to ensure that the legislation which is enforced is, as far as humanly possible, legislation that is best suited to, and most acceptable by, the prevailing circumstances and conditions.

In the case of part V of the Canada Labour Code, a part of the code which has had, over the years, an immense amount of attention focused on it, its various requirements and provisions are well tested and well proven.

As I have indicated, the code is in many ways a culmination of the input of many different people, people with a direct knowledge of and concern for the industrial relations environment. This input has been commensurate with the tradition in Canada of promoting the common well-being referred to in the preamble—by encouraging free collective bargaining and the constructive settlement of labour-management disputes. This, I think, is the essence of the labour code, to see to it that these two groups can attempt to reach the end which they see they need and must have in order to function, but to do so with compassion and, surely, the understanding we need in this very fast changing world today.

Having said that, I would respectfully make the point that it would be folly indeed to introduce any amendment to the provisions of the act that has not been vociferously and specifically requested by one or preferably both of the parties directly concerned.

To my knowledge, neither labour nor management side has made any sort of a concerted call for the proposed amendment that is now before the House, introduced by the hon. member for York North. And I think it is true to say that the government has no desire whatever to set what may well be a dangerous precedent by agreeing to an amendment which does not have widespread support, to say the least.

The point should also be strongly made that when it adopted part V of the Canada Labour Code, Parliament was in effect reaffirming the principle of actively encouraging unions to be masters of their own affairs—and indeed to operate with an absolute minimum of government involvement and interference. I am sure the hon. member for York North would agree with that concept because he is an advocate of more laissez-faire rather than more government involvement in whatever the issue may be. This has been, and remains, the Canadian way, and I for one heartily encourage it.

It was because of this strongly held principle that Parliament decided not to enact the twin Woods task force recommendations of automatically granting unions the agency shop or compulsory check-off to which my colleague alluded, and legislating procedures to guarantee the freedom of dissenting members to opt out of plans that channel union funds to political parties.

As you know, the Liberal party is not funded by the unions. I would say, on the other hand, that although some funds are brought in by bigger businesses throughout Canada it is, by and large, the rank and file, the ordinary Canadian who has chosen to donate moneys for our campaigns and to our party.

It is also interesting and relevant to note that Parliament's approach on the issue of regulation of union contributions to political causes also indicated that this had not been a source of problems. In addition to this, Parliament's approach paralleled the provincial practice of non-regulation.

Some may ask what provinces have legislation with regard to the specific use of moneys from union dues going to support political parties. I would point out that both Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, in the 1960s, did possess legislative provisions controlling the use of union funds for political purposes. They removed these provisions in the early 1970s. That, to my mind, say a lot, and adds further support to the federal government's stand.

I venture to suggest that another and equally compelling reason for opposing Bill C-203 is that it can very easily be viewed as being against the best interests of the union movement. Let it be known that this party is not opposed to unions. We are in favour of unions, and of unions organizing so that they can get the best possible deal for their membership.

As I have already indicated, there are no problems my department knows of that stem from the practice of unions contributing to political parties. I think this is another important point, and should be underlined. Over all, I think Canadians can take some satisfaction in knowing that federal labour legislation is generally viable, responsive, and effective.

I am by no means implying that the legislation as it presently stands is perfect—no legislation is—far from it. It can always be improved. Indeed the Department of Labour is continually reviewing and comparing the Canada Labour Code with its many counterparts in the provincial jurisdictions, as well as with legislation in force in other countries. To this end I will be attending the International Labour Organization Conference next week in Geneva, with my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin). At that time we will have a chance to compare our legislation and ideas with other countries. This will give us a better idea of where our government and ideas fit into the over-all scene as it is looked at by those countries.

The government is only too willing to give due consideration to any well-founded suggestion that might materially improve the operation of industrial relations in this country. Indeed, much of the legislation contained within our Canada Labour Code does, as I have indicated, reflect a high degree of input from the various players in the field of labour affairs. However, in my opinion, by no judgment can this bill presently before us be considered as offering any improvement whatever in the existing legislative framework.

For the reasons I have mentioned, I urge my colleagues in this House today to oppose the passage of this bill, and I trust that they will give due consideration to the points I have put before them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it was very gratifying to see that small standing ovation on the other side for my friend who just spoke.

I too rise to oppose Bill C-203 presented today by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble). I say, in commencing, that this bill represents an insult not only to the union movement of this country but to all working people who have chosen to join unions to defend their rights. We in the New Democratic Party are proud to be associated with the trade union movement and proud to receive the support that we have received from them. I would point out that it has been the union movement in this country that fought, in many cases long before Parliament, for civil liberties, a safe and decent work place, a healthy work place, a fair share of the wealth that is generated in the work place and to ensure that the strength of working people together is represented when they come up against what is becoming an increasingly more concentrated corporate sector.

● (1730)

This bill hearkens back to the days of W.A.C. Bennett in the province of British Columbia who, when the New Democratic Party was being formed, brought in legislation which banned outright any contributions on the part of the trade union movement to any political party. Of course, that was a back-door way of getting at the New Democratic Party and preventing any money from the trade union movement being processed to the NDP.

There is a suggestion in this private member's bill that somehow the union movement is not responsible and that somehow it is perhaps abusing its rights in collecting funds and duly deciding how those funds will be expended. I would point out that democracy exists within the trade union movement to a far greater extent than it does within the corporate sector. In many cases in the corporate sector the decisions are made behind closed doors by a board of directors who often are not responsible to anyone but themselves.

In the union movement, before any decisions are made to spend money in an election or any other major expenditure of funds takes place, a democratic vote is taken of the membership of the particular local. It is only following such a vote that the funds are expended in the direction that is desired. Is it any wonder that it is the New Democratic Party and not the Liberal party or Conservative party which is the beneficiary of these funds?

One only has to look at the track record of the Conservatives, for example, in Nova Scotia, which smashed the movement that is attempting to organize Michelin Tire. One has only to look at the Liberal record. My friend talked about how the Liberal party supports the union movement and encourages them to bargain collectively.

It was the Liberal party that brought in wage controls. It said it was all right to bargain collectively so long as you did not try to get more than a certain percentage of the wage. That iniquitous piece of legislation will be remembered for a long time by the working people of this country.

It is no surprise that members of the trade union movement, members of union locals in many parts of this country, have voted to support the party which has gone out of its way to ensure that the voices of ordinary men and women are heard in the councils of this country at the highest levels, and has been responsive to the concerns expressed by those working men and women.

A democratic vote is taken by the members of the local. I would point out that virtually all union constitutions go beyond that. Not only is there a requirement that there be a vote before any funds are expended of a political party, but virtually all union constitutions have a provision whereby any member who pays dues and does not wish to see his or her dues being used to support a particular political party can have a portion of those dues returned. What we have is the union movement in a democratic manner doing exactly what the hon. member for York North is suggesting be imposed upon them by legislation.

I point to a typical provision of a union constitution. This happens to be in the constitution of the labourers union, section 4:

> Any dues paying member or person who pays dues or agency fees pursuant to union security provisions of a collective bargaining agreement shall be entitled to a rebate of the portion thereof which has been expended for political causes to which such person objects.

That kind of provision is found in virtually all trade union constitutions. I suggest that if we are looking for democracy, examples of democratic decision-making in the expenditure of funds, we should look at the trade union movement. I suggest that the hon. member for York North hang his head in shame if he suggests that the corporate sector is any kind of example of deciding how political funds are going to be expended.

It was in 1974 when we had a minority government that, because of the pressure from the New Democratic Party, we had a requirement for the first time that all donations over $100 be publicly disclosed. Prior to that time corporations were making massive donations to both the Liberal party and the Conservative party with absolutely no accountability to absolutely anybody. Their shareholders did not even know about those donations. For my friend to suggest that somehow the shareholders can object is, frankly, not at all feasible.

It goes beyond that. Many of these corporations which give donations to the Liberal party and Conservative party are extracting a tax from consumers and working people. The money which they take in assessing a price for their product or service, part of that amount is being used to support a political party. Therefore, in respect of the Royal Bank or some of the other corporations which so heavily support the Liberals and Conservatives, many people are not aware of the fact that they are in a sense contributing indirectly to a political party.

I have a list here from the most recent returns before the chief electoral officer of some of the contributions which have been made to both the Liberal party and the Conservative party. I think these belong on the record of this debate. To start with, these are to the Liberal party, that great defender of working people: the Alberta Gas Trunk Pipeline, $15,800.

An hon. Member: Build that pipeline.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): As my friend says, build that pipeline quickly. The Aluminum Company of Canada, $15,000; Cadillac Fairview Development Corporation and land speculators, $11,090; Campeau Corporation, another big developer, $16,400; Canadian International Paper, $15,123. Lo and behold, we find the Canadian Pacific donating $25,000 and $15,000 the previous year to the Liberal party, that great defender of the working people and the rights of working people.

How many people who board a Canadian Pacific train are aware of the fact that they are indirectly contributing to the Liberal Party. What does the hon. member for York North have to say about this tax? They can and they should stop flying CP as a protest against this invidious form of indirect taxation.

Then we have the Conservative party, the party of my friend from York North, receiving donations from the Aluminum Company of Canada, $15,000; Denison Mines, $51,000; Dominion Foundries and Steel, $31,678; Gulf Oil of Canada, $41,000. How many people are aware when they drive up to the Gulf oil pumps to fill up their gas tank that they are contributing to the coffers of the Conservative Party of Canada?

I suggest the hon. member for York North should ask that a little sticker be inserted on every Gulf Oil gas tank indicating when there is a fill-up being made there that a contribution is going to the Conservative party and the Liberal party. What do my friends on my right have to say about this form of corporate taxation to support their political parties? They are strangely silent on that subject.

What about the banks? In the most recent year for which there was disclosure, the Bank of Montreal gave $25,000, not just to the Liberal party but also to the Conservative party; the Bank of Nova Scotia gave $20,000 to the Liberal party and the Conservative party; and the Royal Bank gave $25,000 to both the Liberal and Conservative parties.

How many consumers are aware of the fact that when they go into the bank to cash their cheque that they are contributing to both the Liberal party and the Conservative party? How voluntary is that contribution? What proposal is my friend from York North making to ensure that that is voluntary? "Sell your shares", he says. Well, Mr. Speaker, how many old age pensioners in this country, how many working people have pension funds which are invested in some of these corporations—invested in the Royal Bank, invested in the International Nickel Company? What kind of voluntarism is that? Are we to tell these pensioners whose funds are being invested in their best interests that they can stop receiving their pensions if they do not want their pension fund to invest in some of these companies which give money to both the Liberal party and the Conservative party? There is no suggestion of that.

So it is not surprising to see a Conservative member coming forward with a bill which suggests there has somehow or other been an abuse of the power of working people organized collectively through their unions to make decisions about the way in which their funds should be allocated, to make decisions about which political party represents them best.

I am not ashamed to say, in fact, I am proud to say, that I received substantial support in the last election from the largest union in British Columbia, the International Woodworkers of America. I am proud of the fact that my campaign manager, John Jantzen, was elected by the membership of that local and that the membership of the local chose to donate funds to help elect me to this House. I am proud of that. I am proud the decision was made democratically at an open meeting of the members of that local. I might say in passing that this local was headed until very recently by a gentleman named Syd Thompson, one of the great labour leaders in the province of British Columbia. He is retiring this year having given many years of service not only to his own membership in the IWA but to working people both organized and unorganized in British Columbia. I am certainly very proud to have been suppported in the last election by a union whose leadership is as outstanding, a union which is as democratically organized as is that particular union. Contrast this with the organization of, say, the Royal Bank, or of Inco and some of the other corporations which support the Liberals and the Conservatives. The hon. member advises people to sell their shares. That is his answer to those who suggest there is perhaps an element of hypocrisy in the bill before us.

I have laid my record on the line. I have received no corporate contributions. I thought it might be interesting to place before the House the record of the hon. member for York North. It is a very interesting document and perhaps it makes it clear why the hon. member for York North is bringing this motion before the House today. Where did the hon. member for York North receive his funds in the 1979 election, from trade unions? I suggest he received not a penny from them, and it is no wonder, Mr. Speaker. The record shows: from individuals, $10,148.81; public corporations, $1,000; and private corporations, $23,363.57. That is what the hon. member for York North received from his friends in the corporate sector. What does he have to say about how voluntary those donations were as far as the people who happen to hold shares in those companies are concerned?

Let us examine the return of the hon. member for York North a little more closely. We see here that he received some $15,000 from various elements of the building industry. He received $1,000 from Milo Management. He received $1,000 from Aztec Steel Manufacturing Company. I wonder whether the customers of Aztec Steel are all aware of the fact that they are contributing to the election campaign? The same applies to the shareholders of Doubletex Incorporated. Or what about Union Carbide of Canada which contributed $300 to the campaign of the hon. member for York North? I wonder how many customers of Union Carbide were consulted. One of my hon. friends suggests there should have been consultation before this donation was made. How many of the shareholders of Union Carbide were asked whether they wanted to assist in the election of the hon. member for York North? I would be interested to hear the hon. member tell us what kind of consultation took place with respect to that particular donation. The same applies to the $300 from the Ontario Arms Collectors Club. It would be interesting to learn how the hon. member voted with respect to certain legislation which affects the Ontario Arms Collectors Club. What sort of consultation took place with regard to the $20,000 received from various corporations involved in the building industry in his own riding.

We see here yet another example of the duplicity of the Conservative party. They suggest that somehow there is something wrong with working people deciding democratically to donate funds and labour to the party they have decided best represents their interests while on the other hand remaining completely silent about corporate donations going to their own party on a massive scale and on an involuntary basis.

Again, I would draw attention to the fact that in 1978 the Conservative party received from corporations some $2.67 million. That was in the most recent year for which figures are available. We are told the Liberal party did not receive very much, really, from the corporate sector—that they receive a lot of money from individuals. That certainly is not the case, Mr. Speaker. The Liberal party received $2,500,000 from the corporate sector and $2.1 million from the private sector. So it was a case of Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Both are in the pockets of the corporate sector and neither should be coming before the House suggesting that the union movement which democratically gives certain moneys to candidates in the New Democratic Party should in any way be criticized. Such decisions are made freely and openly and democratically and they are made by the trade unions with which I and members of my party are proud to be associated.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to direct some remarks about the bill now before the House. I represent a riding where the major union supports a political party financially. Even though I may not like this and even though I may speak against it, as is my right, it is the democratic right of that union to decide its own affairs, and as a member of Parliament I must protect that right. Parliament has no business making that activity illegal.

It was with a sense of amazement that I listened to the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). He says it is okay for a union member who presumably has the right to vote in a free society privately, to go down to the union office, because that is where he has to go, and sign a paper saying he declines to support a particular political party. Mr. Speaker, if you believe in a principle you believe in the whole principle, not just half a principle because it happens to help an hon. member's party politically.

As hon. members of this House are well aware, industrial relations in Canada have in recent years become a topic of prime concern and interest to Canadians in all walks of life. Today nobody is untouched by the workings and breakdowns of a country's industrial relations system. As the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) said earlier, all countries have been affected by the worldwide problems of inflation and other associated economic and social upheavals. However, Canada has also had to come to grips with factors which have conspired to challenge the industrial relations system and to challenge the leadership and flexibility of those government departments responsible for the conduct of labour affairs.

Labour Canada is, of course, the federal department responsible for developing and administering the framework in which labour affairs are conducted within the federal jurisdiction. The legislation which Labour Canada administers consists principally of the Canada Labour Code, which is the product of some 80 years of trial and error.

While success may be a difficult quality to measure in the world of labour affairs, I think it only fair and accurate to say that the present legislation is generally successful, appropriate and effective in an area noted for its volatility and for its capacity to threaten the success of the country's socioeconomic operations. We should therefore not arbitrarily introduce off-the-cuff changes to this legislation which involves such a delicate balance between the legitimate rights and duties of labour and management and the protection of the broader public interest.

If the hon. member who introduced this bill is so concerned, he should be prepared to propose a similar bill which affects corporations. He said today that shareholders can say something at annual meetings, but for how long is that remembered after elections? If he is prepared to use a shotgun against unions, he should be prepared at least to use a BB gun against corporations.

As I have indicated, our labour legislation has not been developed overnight. It is the product of a vast amount of deliberation, common sense, expertise and good will on the part of innumerable Canadians. Each of its provisions which has been developed over these 80-odd years has been developed with painstaking care and much debate by legislators, union leaders, industrial relations professionals, constitutional experts and a host of others.

What I am saying is that neither the legislation itself nor the institutions of labour and management are about to benefit by any ad hoc amendments such as that proposed in Bill C-203. As a matter of fact, the bill is so anti-labour I am surprised the hon. member placed it before this House. In the case before us today there appears to be no real cause for the proposal.

This proposal would amend part V of the Code by the insertion of the following words after section 162, and I quote:

> Any provision in a collective agreement requiring an employer to make a deduction from the remuneration paid to an employee and to credit the deduction to a trade union, is invalid if any part thereof is, or is intended, to be contributed to or used to support a political party unless the employee has expressly so authorized in writing.

The intent of this proposal might seem fairly obvious, but what it would do, in effect, is trespass into the preserves of union responsibility. Let the men who have to run the unions and who have to vote in the unions make their own decisions, and let not the legislators decide.

The handling of internal union matters—and those matters might well include the question of financial support provided to a given political organization—should in all cases be left to the democratic processes which are duly provided in the various union constitutions. They may be imperfect, we may not agree with them, but they are still their constitutions and their rights.

There are a number of traditional precedents which support this statement. To quote from just one of them, I refer to the much respected Woods Task Force on labour relations. This task force, in a section dealing with trade unions and political action, reported, and I quote:

> Historically the labour movement has always been active in politics. Individual unions have different degrees of involvement depending largely on their ideological orientation and the extent to which they are affected by government policies. Union political action may range from lobbying, through the approach of rewarding one's friends and punishing one's enemies, through the support of a particular political party.

Lobbying is legitimate. The report continues:

> Today in Canada unions tend to involve themselves in the political life of the country for one or more of three reasons. The most common relates to a desire of the labour movement to improve the statutory and administrative framework of rules and regulations within which it must operate.
> Beyond this, many unions are interested in the pursuit of legislative goals which will complement and supplement their gains at the bargaining table. Among these objectives are more generous social security arrangements and the vesting and funding of privately negotiated fringe benefits, particularly in the pension field. A large number of unions seek the implementation of more radical social reforms through economic and social planning.

The Woods task force went on to say many things about the union movement and the balance within the movement. It is interesting to relate that Parliament decided not to enact major proposals of the Woods task force report, which would automatically get us into the agency shop or compulsory checkoff. Parliament did not enact these recommendations because it wished to reaffirm its strongly held principle that unions in Canada should be given every encouragement and incentive to regulate their own affairs and to operate within a bare minimum of government interference.

I listened to the hon. member representing the Progressive Conservative Party say that we should outlaw this spending of money by unions on political parties without specific written notice from union members. On the other hand, representing the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Burnaby said he thinks it is just terrible that we should even be getting into this. Because certain unions support his party he thinks it is a good idea even though in another timeframe he would support the democratic vote of individual union members. I know today why the Liberal party has the best policy. It takes the middle of the road. It is fair to both sides and does not tolerate bills such as Bill C-203.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the brief couple of minutes available to me I would like to touch on just a couple of things. First, the union I have been associated with is perhaps the most politically active and involved plant, of the most politically active local union, of the most politically active union as a whole in Canada, the IWA. I have been the financial secretary of that local union for the past year. I signed some of the cheques to which my friend probably takes exception, and I can assure him that democracy is no healthier anywhere than it is within that particular local union. I have been one of its officers ever since 1972, and we stand vigorously to defend the rights of Socreds, Liberals or Tories in our membership who want to speak out against our actions and policies at local union conventions. We have continuously paid affiliation to the New Democratic Party since its founding in 1961 on the basis of a proportion of our membership. Whether or not people sign out, they are guaranteed that moneys are not paid on everyone's behalf because we recognize that everyone does not support the same party.

I think we have to look at this bill not in isolation but together with private member's Bill C-267 in the name of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) which basically is a right-to-work bill. I think those two things taken together lead us to understand better from whence all this comes. There is a poem, which I do not have time to read, called "The Free Rider's Psalm," which seems to me to relate to an attack on the labour movement. The principle that is implicit in this bill follows the same principle which chooses to attack all of the labour movement and the right to collective democratic action, as enunciated in the private member's bill of my friend's colleague. I oppose the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I believe I can now call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1980-81

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-30, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock p.m., the motion for second reading of Bill C-30, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81 was under consideration. The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) had the floor.

An hon. Member: Question.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

An hon. Member: We are ready for the question.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to see that members opposite are so pleased to hear what I have to say.

An hon. Member: None of your friends are.

Mr. Wilson: I might touch on a few remarks that I was making just prior to the private members' hour. I said at that time that the government was taking advantage of the people of this country by borrowing in today's dollars and repaying those dollars in depreciated dollars some years hence. Now, any of us who is borrowing any money, whether it is by way of a mortgage, or whether it is by way of a bank loan, is doing the same thing. The point I want to make is that it is very wrong when this is being done by the federal government, for the simple reason that its action contributes directly to the devaluation of the currency. The government has the greatest control over the level of inflation in this country, particularly with the tremendous demands on capital we have in this country, and that is what makes their actions so wrong, so unfair, and so damaging to this country.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has recognized some of the aspects of this problem. Recently he is quoted as saying that the government remains committed to limiting spending growth, but he has argued that this has disadvantages because it forces cuts in government spending during times of economic downturn.

We are at that point of time right now, and it is not going to be easy for this country. I hope the government has begun to understand that it does not have the flexibility to adjust its policies and priorities, and it does not have the flexibility to change the tax structure to give the incentives required to bring the business of this country to a higher level. The province of Ontario has also shown the benefit of fiscal restraint.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Wilson: They have had a policy of reducing the level of their deficit over the past few years, and last year the level of the deficit did drop by some $200 million. This year, in anticipation of a slowdown in the economy, they have been able to increase their deficit by a significant amount, and direct that money to small business development, employment development, assistance to pensioners, and energy development. This illustrates the benefit of flexibility in fiscal policy, a flexibility which is now, as the President of the Treasury Board has pointed out, completely non-existent in the affairs of the federal government of this country. But I am sorry to say that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) does not understand it yet. Some days ago, in the House of Commons, he was referring to the amount of money that Canadians saved through the reduced cost of energy in this country.

An hon. Member: It cost them 12 per cent.

Mr. Wilson: What he does not understand is that Canadians are not saving that money. They are just shifting the load from today to tomorrow. Instead of paying that money today, we are paying and will be paying for many years through the increased taxes that we will have to pay.

An hon. Member: Tomorrow at 12 per cent.

Mr. Wilson: Today that subsidy is costing the government and the people of this country, through their taxes, and through increasing the size of the government deficit, some $3 billion. At current rates of interest, in just six years' time, the amount of money that will cost the Canadian taxpayer is $6 billion—double in six years. That is the problem we are faced with today.

I do not understand, as I said earlier in my remarks, why the government has consistently ignored professional comment, the advice and the experience of other governments, and the comments that have been made many times by people on this side of the House. Let me just quote to you here, Mr. Speaker, what Mr. Carl Beigie said in a recent speech:

> This year the federal government's budgetary deficit is expected to reach $14 billion, compared with about $30 billion in the United States—

That is a country with a population ten times the size of Canada. He went on to say:

> There is a total lack of concern, at the political level about the budget deficit in Canada.

I am sorry to say that I am going to quote an economist who does not seem to understand that so long as the federal government borrows domestically, in other words, borrows from its own residents, it is like a father lending money to his son. The son pays the interest to the father and it is all in the family, therefore it does not really matter. In this way we can continue to go on and on.

● (2010)

Let us carry that illustration just a little bit further. The son starts to pay more and more money in interest, so he cannot take that trip out of the country or he cannot buy that new car. Then it starts to cut into his ability to spend money on the necessities of life. That is the point we are at right now. There has been a total misallocation of federal resources as a result of the very high level of interest payments in the country.

This year it will amount to 19 per cent; that is nearly $1 in $5 of federal government expenditures, or to put it another way, $1 in $4 of federal government revenues will be spent on interest. That is just interest alone; no repayment of the debt, no reduction in the size of the government debt. That is the point we have reached right now. We cannot redirect that money to other more worth-while uses than the payment of interest and we cannot use that money to reduce the government deficits.

Mr. Speaker, $12 billion or $14 billion is a very large amount of money. It is hard to understand how much money that is. But is it very hard to understand that because of that deficit today we are spending 30 per cent more than we are taking in revenues? That figure is lower than last year. It is hard to know what it will be this year because we have not had any figures from the government. Clearly it will be of that order of magnitude. That is the problem we are facing today, and until some action is taken, we will be facing that problem for years ahead. This is why we are concerned about passing this bill at this point in time.

Another aspect of the deficit worth noting is that the federal government is borrowing far too much just to pay current bills. This is not for capital expenditures, but for the bread and butter daily expenses of government. The C. D. Howe Research Institute estimates that from 1975 to 1979 the federal government borrowed $30 billion more on the current expenditure. That is over and above the deficit from capital outlays. A recent analysis of the United States federal budget indicates that current revenues in recent years have financed all the current outlays plus half of the capital outlays. That is the difference right now. That is the difference between the fiscal position of the Government of Canada and that of the United States.

Is this prudent financial management? Let me illustrate my point in a basic way. This type of borrowing to cover current spending is like taking out a bank loan to buy food and the other basic necessities of life. That is the reason we cannot use Chargex at the supermarket or the liquor store, because normally, the use of Chargex results in a loan. This is one more reason why the government should not be borrowing on a continuing basis just to finance spending on day to day expenditures.

Recently we had two statements by the governor of the Bank of Canada which I think are very important. We received a clear message from the governor of the Bank of Canada in his statement to the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance and in his 1979 annual report. I should like to briefly paraphrase what he had to say in his statement. He said that what he wanted to register was that the way in which the real economic variables in the economy respond to changes in financial flows, which are heavily dependent on other policies and practices throughout the economy about which the Bank of Canada can do very little. He indicated there is little doubt that the key reason for this slide toward even more inflation was the result of an effort by public policy in most countries to achieve and maintain more output and employment from their economies than was consistent with price stability. This view should have been discredited long ago by logic for it implies that people can be fooled indefinitely.

It has now been discredited by events. The governor of the Bank of Canada is clearly linking excess government spending to inflation. He also made the point I made earlier that the government is trying to fool people by giving them something now with the feeling that they are getting it for nothing. But there is no such thing as a free lunch, to paraphrase a statement that has been made many, many times before. He also indicated that people have learned to be sceptical about public promises to reduce inflation, for the fulfilment of such promises would require a radical break from a long-established inflationary bias in public policies. The inflationary bias on the part of people in this country is so ingrained it is very, very hard to break the inflationary spiral.

Let me just look ahead to what the governor said later on in his statement about the spiral. He indicated that there is a clear need for leadership in the country. He said the Bank of Canada certainly has a central role to play and that it was trying to play it, but that governments at all levels have a major role to play and the role of the federal government is clearly of crucial importance. It is important that those policies and practices throughout the economy which are inflationary—and clearly he identified the federal government deficit as inflationary—should be modified, that all policies and practices should be reviewed in this light.

I should like to refer briefly to the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada which reads as follows:

> But if large fiscal deficits are continued when the economy has little more effective capacity to increase output they will discourage such investment. The restraint on investment is felt through various channels. One of them is that the fiscal deficits absorb savings that could otherwise be channelled by financial markets into financing the expansion of plant and equipment. This can militate against the increases in productivity and income that capital formation makes possible.

He pointed out that governments can crowd out private sector investment. He made the point further on in his report that private sector investment can be crowded out and into international markets. I will come back to that later.

Governor Bouey provided an eloquent illustration of the link between economic growth and the low inflation rate. He stated clearly that the tax policy and the level of the deficit is important to increasing the amount of productive plant and equipment in the economy. We must have this to avoid shortages of supply of goods and bottlenecks in our lines of supply, both of which will cause great pressures. The message is clear. The governor of the Bank of Canada has put the government on notice, that there must be greater spending control and a reduction of the deficit if we are to tackle the inflationary problem more effectively. But I am sorry to say that today that commitment is lacking. I made that comment during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, and I will say it again.

In the Speech from the Throne there was practically no reference to fighting inflation. It was mentioned just twice in passing; inconsequential references. Whatever sense of commitment there is, and it is not apparent, has been redirected so that the government is only concerned with fighting the symptoms of inflation and not getting to the root cause. Again, they are buying our votes with our own money. This makes it all the more difficult for the House in conscience to approve this borrowing authority.

Let me return to a point which governor Bouey touched on but did not develop further, the link between the impact on domestic savings from high government deficits and the level of our current account balance of payments. Let me just trace it through. As I said, between 1975 and 1979 we borrowed $30 billion just for the current account, just for the day to day expenditures. The government is borrowing for current spending and forcing a redirection of the savings of Canadians away from productive investment in plant and equipment. In the long run, this has a very damaging impact on the economy through the impact of inflation. It causes the crowding out of other borrowers to external markets. We are seeing this happening now. Just last week we had the largest amount Government of Canada financing ever, $1.6 billion. I predict that figure will grow higher as this year goes on.

During the 1974-1976 period we had a classic example of what happens when this combination of policies takes place. That was one of the most damaging periods of economic mismanagement in this nation's history presided over, I might say, by the hon. blue eyes. I hope we do not have another one of those again.

I will only focus on fiscal policy at this time, but monetary policy and settlements by the federal government in collective bargaining were equally debilitating in their impact on government fiscal requirements. Recently we saw a settlement in the postal service that could have some of the same damaging effects, in that it may lead people in the public service to demand larger and larger settlements. When we compare what has been publicly stated by the union as to the levels of remuneration that have just been negotiated for January 1, 1980, we see that the settlement is between 23 per cent and 26 per cent higher. What the government has done here—and for the life of me I do not understand how the President of the Treasury Board could congratulate the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) for this—is added a COLA clause which adds 79 cents an hour to a $7.11 or $6.84 basic hourly salary plus 8 per cent. The government calls that an 8 per cent settlement. I do not know any other business in the country that would call that an 8 per cent settlement. I do not know any other government in the country that would call that an 8 per cent settlement. That is why we are calling it a 23 per cent to 26 per cent settlement. I challenge either the President of the Treasury Board or the Postmaster General to deny that.

The heavy borrowing in the 1974 to 1976 period by the federal government to finance the deficit forced up interest rates in this country. It pushed other issuers into other markets in the world and the result was that the Canadian dollar was held at a far too high a level at $1.03 and $1.04 U.S. The necessary adjustment that was needed so badly by our manufacturing industry was delayed. Their loss of competitive position was deferred for two or three years. We are seeing the results of that today in the $17 billion trade deficit on manufactured goods. Our balance of payments deficit therefore was affected in two ways; first, in the increase in interest payments that we have to continue to pay on an ongoing basis to service this foreign debt, and second, in the poor trade figures that I have just referred to. The increased deficit is going to require further financing year in and year out down the road. It is going to keep further downward pressure on the Canadian dollar, and in so doing continue to encourage higher levels on inflation than we need.

Let me point out that during a more recent period, 1977 to 1979, Canada was by far the largest international borrower in the world. We borrowed $25 billion over the period 1977 to 1979. That compares with Mexico at $16.9 billion. So one can see the amount of interest that we will be required to pay outside of the country. It is substantial and it will be with us for many years. That is why governor Bouey is concerned. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should be concerned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) criticized us during the election for our doctrinaire commitment of reducing the deficit. There was no doctrinaire commitment. It was just a simple recognition of the dollars and cents facts of the impact of these high levels of deficits.

I watched and I listened to the Minister of Finance wringing his hands as the interest rates rose in this country, saying we are helpless to avoid the effect of increases because of what was happening in the United States. He is absolutely right, but we are in that position because of the foolhardy and shortsighted policies of the 1970s which his government followed. It will get worse unless he starts now to move in new directions, similar to those followed by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in his budget of December 11. The short-term effects are not pleasant, a combination of higher taxes and lower spending. Cost pressures will increase in the economy and economic growth may well be slower in the short term. But the government has a majority. It has the power to make these adjustments without the political risk that we encountered. The longer-term results will clearly benefit this country through more sound, less inflationary economic growth. If this government fails to act, it deserves to be defeated at the earliest opportunity. The answer is to withhold at least one-half of this borrowing authority and request the government to return to this House after a budget has been brought down so that we can assess the policies and commitments toward the new direction of which I speak. We should not be giving the government a blank cheque. I am not prepared today to move an amendment, but I say on behalf of our side that we are prepared to consider such an amendment.

Let me return to the purpose of this measure. We do not know the purpose for which these funds will be used. We do not know the direction the government is proposing to take. There has been no accountability to Parliament. This is a fundamental problem in respect of what the government is asking us today. We do not know the broad direction of fiscal policy, nor do we know what combination of fiscal and monetary policy we will be having or whether it will be consistent. We do not know whether the Bank of Canada will be able to live with what the government is going to be doing after the budget comes down. Until we know that, this House in good conscience cannot provide the government with the borrowing authority for a full year. To do so would be irresponsible, and it would not be fulfilling our obligation to the Canadian electorate.

Let me close by referring to one of the long-term problems of inflation. It is a problem that I believe we in this House should be very concerned about. We have a free country. We cherish this free country. What inflation does to that freedom is erode it on an ongoing basis. We are living here in an unreal world with low income taxes in Canada. They are much lower than they should be for the size of our government spending. We have to close that gap. We are living here with unrealistically low energy prices. That is very comfortable at this point in time, and we can sit here with a big smile on our faces and feel comfortable, but consider what it does to the freedoms of our children and our children's children. When the time comes they will have to support the higher tax load that will be required in Canada. This is a tax load that will go on and on and get higher as we continue to endure these very high rates of interest. That is why we have to take action, Mr. Speaker. That is why it is very important that we try to project ourselves a little bit further beyond the easier times we have today with lower energy prices and lower taxes. If we do not do, the legacy we are leaving our children will be something I personally will be unable to explain to my children why we in this House allowed government deficits to go on and on.

A few years back I recall that the deficit was $4 billion, then $5.4 billion, then $9 billion, then $11 billion and this year it could be as high as $12 billion or $14 billion; who knows? That is why we must take action now. I ask members opposite to consider making an amendment to this bill which would reduce the amount of borrowing to $6 billion. We can then return to consideration of this very important problem at a later stage.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of every member of this House, regardless of party, to stand up at this time and express his concern over this excessive spending of our tax dollars. I congratulate the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) on the remarks which he made with respect to the generations which will follow us.

The present government has been in power just under three months. All we are really sure about at this point is that it will not be any different from the Liberal governments of the past 16 years. We know they have not learned anything from being in government for all those years, and that they did not learn anything when they were in opposition last year. They are still the same old crowd, devoid of ideas, short of talent and long on arrogance. They still do not answer any questions as to where we are going and what they plan to do about the serious problems which continue to plague our country.

During the last election campaign the Liberals from across the floor could list all the problems plaguing our country, and they had instant solutions for those problems. Today they cannot even remember what the problems are. When we ask about all the magic solutions which they had a few months ago, every member on that side of the House suddenly becomes tongue-tied. My distinguished colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said in this House the other day that when it comes to answering specific questions the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) appears to be in slow motion. The finance minister and his colleagues are not in slow motion when it comes to asking this House for additional borrowing authority.

We have before us a bill comprising two paragraphs and a subparagraph requesting authority to borrow $12 billion. This bill is hardly more than a casual gesture, yet it proposes to plunge us $12 billion deeper into debt before we even know how the government plans to spend the money. Where are all the specific programs to back up the grand solutions which the Liberals had just a few months ago? Where is the national energy policy, the magic pricing formula promised to the Canadian public in the last campaign?

The government's energy minister seems to have run out of steam, or out of oil. Instead of a solution to our energy problems, we appear to be heading for still another head-on collision between the federal government and the provincial governments. Last week the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) accused some provincial premiers of waging war against the federal government, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was quick to back him up. The government's so-called blended price formula for establishing domestic and foreign prices for oil seems to have run into a snag, and it is not surprising.

The energy minister approached the provinces with a take-it-or-leave-it attitude when he tried to sell the government's pricing formula. Now that he has been rebuffed, he chooses to blame the provinces. I am very concerned about the apparent failure of the government to come up with a national energy policy for a number of reasons, and I am not comforted in the least by the threat of still another clash between the federal energy minister and his counterparts in the provinces.

We are led to believe that one of the main reasons our government was defeated last December was that we proposed to raise the price of gasoline at the pumps by 18 cents per gallon. Many people called it the 18-cent election. Now we are faced with a price rise of close to 18 cents per gallon for this year, if not more, and we have no way of knowing how much it will rise next year and in the years following. This makes a farce of the present government's support of the NDP's non-confidence motion against our government last year.

There are two things which Canadians must know about our energy situation and which we ought to know as soon as possible. All of us want to know just how much oil and gas prices will rise. We also want to know and be assured that there will be sufficient supplies of oil and gasoline to meet domestic requirements now and in the future. Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has told us whether those contingencies are to be met by the borrowing authority requested in this bill.

Another of my great concerns is the small business community in Canada. Small businesses provide approximately 60 per cent of all the jobs held by Canadians. Yet, small businesses are the most vulnerable and the least protected segment of our economy. When interest rates soar small businesses are the first to suffer. When we were the government, the interest rate for small business loans was about 11.5 per cent. When the rate climbed to 17 per cent and 18 per cent, the point spread was, in many cases, greater than the profit margin of many small businesses in Canada and they were forced out of business.

There is one other point which must be made while I am on the subject of small businesses. The vast majority of people employed by our small business sector are people who do not have professional or technical skills. When the shop or store for which they are working goes out of business, these people cannot easily or immediately be absorbed into the manufacturing or industrial labour force. In many cases they become part of our growing army of permanently unemployed.

That is a vital reason why we must provide financial assistance on a continuing basis for our small business community. The only answer provided so far by this government is to increase the funds available under the Small Businesses Loans Act. That is not the answer. It has been shown that there have always been sufficient funds available to small businesses. That is not the problem. The problem is that they have had nothing in the way of a cushion against the effects of wild fluctuations in interest rates, such as those we have experienced in the past few months. Availability of capital is one thing; whether or not one can afford to borrow is yet another thing.

Another excellent case in point is the government's own Federal Business Development Bank. Recently it shut down its operation, not because of a lack of funds—the Federal Business Development Bank has money to lend small businesses—but because the rate of interest which it is required to charge was so high it was no longer of any advantage to a small business to borrow the money at that price for the purpose of inventory, expansion, or for many other purposes.

Small business people have told me that over the past few months they have been working 12 to 16 hours per day just to pay the interest on the principal of their debts. When I consider the government's request for authority to borrow $12 billion, in addition to the $2.7 billion borrowing authority which it already possesses, I have to think that this would be an excellent opportunity to initiate something in the way of meaningful legislation to protect our small business community. The small business act is simply not enough, and that is a proven fact.

What we need is a more comprehensive act which takes into account the traditional vulnerability of small business to changes in the economic climate, both in Canada and in markets that have a direct effect on our small businesses. We have seen recently that even some of the larger, multinational corporations can get into serious financial difficulties, and we have also seen that there are times when it is expedient for government to bail them out of their difficulties.

I am thinking, of course, of the Chrysler Corporation. Canada's share of the loan guarantee to keep Chrysler alive is $200 million, and we will not know for a while whether this is really a cure or just a short-term remedy. I believe this was a legitimate risk venture for our government to undertake, because something obviously had to be done to protect the thousands of jobs that were hanging in the balance.

However, Mr. Speaker, I also have to think of how important it would have been to our small business community if $200 million had been made available to them over the past few months to provide guaranteed small business loans at an affordable rate of interest. It is easy to calculate the loss of jobs through the failure of a large industry, where 10,000 or 15,000 jobs can be wiped out by one failure. It is not quite as easy to assess the over-all effect of thousands of small business failures where the employment figures are more in the order of 10 or 15 jobs per business, but, the effect on our economy and on our small towns and villages is every bit as great.

Before I move on, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to clause 2(2) of Bill C-30, which would authorize the government to borrow "in a currency other than that of Canada." There are two aspects of this that are disturbing to me, and I am sure they are equally disturbing to many of my colleagues on this side of the House. The government says this provision is to ensure greater certainty of being able to borrow this much money.

This subclause implies that the government is concerned that it will not be able to raise this money from Canadian sources, and I believe this raises the question of whether the government is already so deeply in debt that all domestic sources of funds are exhausted.

I would also remind hon. members that the spread in the value of U.S. and Canadian currencies is an important factor in authorizing the government to borrow heavily in the U.S. money markets. The premium on U.S. dollars is about 15 per cent, and when the interest charges are added, borrowing in the United States is an expensive proposition. I really do not think we can afford it, especially at the rate the present government engages in deficit spending.

Mr. Speaker, I think that passing mention might be made of the present government's abuse of political patronage. I wonder if a part of the $12 billion might be used to fatten the government's pork barrel. I see more and more defeated Liberal candidates and hangers-on in cushy jobs around Parliament Hill and the government agencies. While I cannot agree with the government's policy of secrecy concerning its blatant abuse of patronage, I can understand why they would want to hide it from public view and scrutiny. It is a national disgrace.

Many of my colleagues have drawn attention to the fact that the Minister of Finance has not yet tabled a budget, and that he will not give us any indication of when a budget will be forthcoming. This is quite a contrast to the Liberals' demands for a quick budget when they found themselves in the opposition. When we did table a budget, they could not resist jumping on the NDP bandwagon to defeat our government and prevent our budget proposals from taking effect.

Now that the shoe is on the other foot, they have the audacity to ask for authority to plunge us $12 billion further into debt, and refuse to match it up with a budget so that we can see where the money is going. Unfortunately, we do not have the numbers on this side to prevent Bill C-30 from passing, but we will certainly let it be known just how we feel about this matter.

I want to address myself to a subject for a few minutes that has a very personal aspect, one that directly affects my riding and the welfare of my constituents, and that is the matter of regional economic expansion. DREE could be one of the most important functions of government if the present Liberal government had not allowed it to degenerate into an arm of its political machine.

This government has no hesitation in blatantly favouring Liberal ridings in designating areas eligible for DREE grants, and my own riding is a classic example of how the DREE program functions. According to the guidelines used to designate DREE areas, my riding compares favourably to many Quebec ridings that are designated, and yet I have not been able to get one square foot of my riding designated.

On May 14 I had a meeting with officials from DREE in Hull, and I can sum up the results of the meeting by simply saying that I got the run around. When I returned to my office there were two press releases on my desk from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. One announced that $1,566,250 was granted in respect of five industrial projects in the Montreal area. The other release announced that $2,724,-900 was granted to 12 firms in the Quebec city region. Five hundred and thirty-five jobs are supposed to be created by these expenditures of millions of dollars.

Yesterday I received a copy of the monthly report from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the month of March, showing the grants approved in that month. There were 71 grants approved, and 50 of those were in Quebec. The next highest number of grants approved was six, for projects in Nova Scotia. The others were scattered around the country.

I have made representations to various ministers of DREE over the years, without success, to have the northern part of my riding designated. I have not asked for special consideration or favours. I have only asked that this area be judged by DREE's own guidelines, and that I be given the same consideration under those guidelines as other areas in the country.

I think I can be forgiven for being a little upset when I read press releases announcing DREE grant awards to ridings in Quebec that do not qualify any more for these grants than my own riding. The riding of Mount Royal, in Montreal, for example, is considered to be one of the most affluent ridings in the country, and yet, Mr. Speaker, the riding of Mount Royal is designated as an area eligible for DREE grants. At least a part of Mount Royal is designated, and that is all I have been asking for my own riding—that a part of it be designated.

Last Thursday, May 29, there were two articles on page nine of the Ottawa Citizen that would be well worth discussing while we are debating whether to allow this government blanket authority to add another $12 billion to the current operating deficit. One article deals with the cost of the government's decision to cancel the relocation of Parks Canada's regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough. The other article deals with the matter of more than $1 billion in cost overruns on about 500 government projects.

To take up the matter of the cost overruns first, Mr. Speaker, I was astounded, as I am sure most other members were, to hear the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) say in this House last Wednesday that there is no need for a special committee to investigate the reasons for these cost overruns. While that might appear to be a matter of little importance to the President of the Treasury Board, it represents more than one-twelfth of the total funds being requested in this bill we are debating. When costs of government projects exceed estimates by $1 billion, it is a matter of sufficient urgency to call for investigation by a special committee.

On the question of the cancellation of the move of Parks Canada's regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough, it is quite obvious that the government had expected the Liberal candidate in Peterborough to win the last election, and return Peterborough to the Liberal fold. That did not happen, but Cornwall is still held by a Liberal member. Naturally the move was cancelled.

The minister responsible for Parks Canada has said there is absolutely no basis for the charge that the cancellation was politically motivated. I suppose it is mere coincidence that Peterborough is represented by a Conservative, and Cornwall is represented by a Liberal member. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the cost to the taxpayers of Canada of the cancellation.

Treasury Board places the cost of the cancellation at $1.1 million, and it must be remembered that this is not the cost of the move itself but the cost involved in cancelling the move.

Because of the disruption of moving plans, the cost of the re-establishment of the regional office in Cornwall will be greater than the original estimates.

According to the Treasury Board submission, nearly half of the compensation paid to employees because of cancellation, or $536,000, will not be covered by current Treasury Board policy. The Treasury Board more or less dismisses this little discrepancy by calling it an act of grace.

Here are some examples of where this money will go. The spouse of one Parks Canada employee will receive a lump sum payment of $30,000 to cover "career injury, interim costs and lost income" caused by the cancellation. Another employee who declined a promotion elsewhere because he preferred to move to Peterborough will receive a lump sum payment of $10,000. The list of such payments is too long to read here, but these examples should give some idea of the ridiculous position the taxpayers have been placed in unnecessarily.

The $1.1 million cost of the cancellation does not take into account the potential legal actions that are likely to be launched by employees for personal suffering, career prejudice, mental anguish and other suffering. There is also the question of a decline in employee morale due to the uncertainty of their situation. The government has certainly bungled this Parks Canada transfer, and that is a high price to pay just to thank the people of Cornwall for voting Liberal.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on Bill C-30, an act that may be cited as a borrowing authority, 1980-81. Before I get into discussing the bill, I would just like to mention a couple of debates that have gone on before and the shock and the sadness I experienced last night when my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), was discussing some of the problems in the west.

I believe it is fair to say that the members of this House have a very great duty to all of Canada, not just their specific regions. Although they do represent their constituencies, they have to assess Canada as a whole. I will quote the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who, speaking in Regina on June 2 said:

> It is important now for all Canadians, members of both founding groups, native Canadians and those that have come from many other lands, to join together to build a stronger Canada. We must work together to meet legitimate aspirations of all parts of this great country.

However, last night when my colleague from Fraser Valley West was discussing just those regional problems and expressing concerns of the west, the names of three provincial ministers, all of a different political stripe, were mentioned in this House. When their names were mentioned, some members in this House booed them. I am from Ontario. I am a Progressive Conservative and proud to be one. Also, I am from Brampton where the premier of Ontario resides. In fact, he is my MPP. I do not always agree with him. I do not always agree with Mr. Blakeney, Mr. Lougheed or Mr. Bennett, but I have respect for them and the constituencies they represent.

I was shocked and saddened in this House to hear members here boo provincial premiers. We should all be ashamed of that action last night.

An hon. Member: It was the Liberal members.

Mr. McDermid: It was Liberal and NDP members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: Read Hansard and you will see. I will now discuss the borrowing bill. I was interested in listening to my friend from Ottawa Centre last night, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), come here to bamboozle us with some figures, figures that quite honestly do not mean a thing to the public.

How can the general public relate to $12 billion? There it is, $12 billion, represented in that one piece of paper. I tried to break that down so maybe the average Canadian could understand what it is. In round figures, it is $33 million a day. Really, that is a little hard to conceive, so let's break it down to an hourly rate. It is $1,400,000 an hour. That is also difficult to comprehend. There are very few millionaires here, except for a few on the other side.

Let us break it down to a minute. It is $23,000 a minute and, as we know, that is far above the average Canadian salary. Let's break it down to per second. This government wants us to approve a bill that will allow them to borrow $400 a second over the next year.

Mr. Chénier: He can count!

Mr. McDermid: Certainly I can count. You guys can't. Do we really need to approve this borrowing authority? I think not, not without giving the specifics. If you, Mr. Speaker, went to your bank manager in Ottawa West and asked for $10,000, and you would not tell him what it is for, how you were going to spend it, how you were going to pay it back, just asked him to give it to you, he would kick you out of the bank. We should kick these guys out for their nerve in asking for $12 billion.

Mr. Chénier: That's what Canadians did to you, and don't forget it.

Mr. McDermid: Perhaps Parliament should tell the government that same thing, since it does not want to tell us what the $12 billion will be used for, or where the Liberals plan to steer this country in the next four years. The other day in question period the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said part of the deficit is going to go to the guaranteed income supplement, the $35 income supplement this House passed within the last few days. That is not what he said in the campaign. I remember very distinctly that on January 12 his great platform was that there would be no new expenditures, that we would redirect old funding to provide these things. Specifically, with regard to the guaranteed income supplement, he made the commitment to the Canadian people that the money would come from increased corporate taxes, yet yesterday at page 1626 of Hansard he said:

This very House has adopted, as recently as last week, measures which will increase that deficit, precisely to assist people receiving the guaranteed income supplement and the hon. member was supportive of it.

Certainly we were supportive of a guaranteed income supplement increase. However, the Prime Minister in his campaign told us it was coming from increased corporation taxes. Now he is telling us he is going to deficit finance—another flip-flop, another broken campaign promise.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his "bootleg budget", as the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) would say, said "Our latest forecast is that the economy will grow by one half of one per cent, which actually means no growth." Why then should the government need $12 billion? This question remains unanswered. The minister also stated that "government expenditures on goods and services will continue to be affected by policies of expenditure restraint." I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what kind of restraint is this? If the statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are to be believed there is no need for an increase in government spending this year. In fact, however, spending this year under the Liberals will increase by a whopping 13.5 per cent. Asking Parliament to approve borrowing authority for $12 billion without bringing forward a proper budget is an abuse of Parliament, not the first such incident, and as long as this government is in power I am sure it will not be the last. It is an attempt, as we have seen so often in the past, to operate in secret and keep the facts about the public purse from the country. We are left in the dark as to their conception of the future of Canada and what plans they may have to guide the country over the next few years. It represents a disastrous deepening of the debt already placed on the shoulders of Canadians. It is an horrendous imposition upon future generations of Canadians. Do hon. members opposite not have the integrity to bring down a budget in line with proper parliamentary procedure and allow it to be debated in this House, thus giving the Canadian people a chance to judge the legacy which is to be left to the youth of this country—nothing but unpaid bills. We shall have to pass the torch to the young people of this country to carry on but I am worried as to whether they will be able to carry it because it is going to be so heavy with debt—$84 billion if we approve this thing.

● (2100)

An hon. Member: Assuming they do not use the existing authority.

Mr. McDermid: That is assuming they do not use the existing $2.9 billion and all the money they can get from savings bonds.

Since the opening of this session the Liberal government has really not put forward any legislative proposals to improve the economic climate and this includes the new "employment program" that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced. We have seen nothing but the usual fillers and housekeeping measures and now we have this one-page bill before us, a bill which will do nothing but saddle our children with overbearing debt. And members opposite wonder why the people of Canada become a little cynical about parliamentarians when they take a look at one sheet of paper and it calls for $12 billion. Why is it they require this money so urgently? Do they intend to wait that long before presenting the House and the country with a budget? It looks like it. We shall be in dire financial difficulties if we fail to give the country the economic direction which is so sorely needed. Bill C-30 asks the House to approve borrowing authority for $12 billion as well as authority to borrow the remaining portion of the amount authorized in days gone by. I understand this would be around $2.9 billion if the figures are correct.

In his statement of April 21, the Minister of Finance projected that expenditures for 1980-81 would require $11,730 million. These figures are based on the current revenue-expenditure structure—we are not sure exactly what that structure is. I am sure the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) over there is scratching his head, wondering the same thing. He also stated that these figures did not reflect foreign exchange transactions which resulted in a requirement of $222 million in the fiscal year 1979-80.

An hon. Member: That went down the sewer.

Mr. McDermid: How much will the authority asked for to repay loans in foreign currencies cost the Canadian people? I had the privilege recently of crossing Canada and fulfilling speaking engagements at youth gatherings.

Mr. Regan: They voted Liberal!

Mr. McDermid: They listened. Let me tell the minister something. I was out in Alberta the same time as he was. His convention was held in a phone booth and he rented out the extra space. Our meeting was held in a hotel and we had a jam. I will tell you another thing. The boys from Ontario didn't go out there and "knock" any of the premiers out west like you did, either. You did a great job for national unity out there.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair!

Mr. McDermid: Let me get back to the young people. I had the pleasure of discussing their concerns across this country of ours and they are asking: why don't you people pay your bills; why are you putting them all together and packing them into a debt and passing them on for us to pay down the road; why don't you pay when you fill up your car, why don't you pay what it's costing you; why should I pay your gas bills? That is a legitimate question and I want to know why the minister of energy doesn't answer the youth of Canada when they ask that question. Why isn't the government paying what it costs? Everybody is willing to pay their share. We are subsidizing it now to the tune of $3.4 billion, or whatever it is, and it is growing every year and his blender has broken down, he can't get the darned thing to run.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. McDermid: Someone says "Oh, come on." Well, all we have heard since Christmas is "blender, blender, blender" and we haven't seen a darned thing come out of it yet.

A turning point in the history of this great country has just passed. It has shown me that Canada wants to stay united. I hope the government realizes that it has an opportunity not seen since 1867 to let the youth become the new pioneers in shaping Canada. Obviously, they ought to commit themselves to a program of reducing the enormous burden with which our young people are confronted. They ought to be giving them a fair fighting chance. But they are not. They are just piling up this debt. The party opposite has no concern at all for the youth of Canada or for the future of Canada.

Mr. Regan: Enough concern to put a 13-cent tax on.

Mr. McDermid: Slow down, you will have your turn. When members of our party were on the government side we had respect for this House and for the Canadian people. The present government continues to shroud its feelings—

An hon. Member: They voted you out!

Mr. McDermid: Well, we are represented in every province of this country. So keep yapping over there. The Canadian people need, and indeed deserve, honest government, a government which is not afraid to tell the public the cold, hard facts about the state of the economy. Open and honest government is the key to a democratic society. It was a great honour to serve as a member of that government, a government that was open, a government that was approachable, a government which was honest. Why is it that the born-again leader of the Liberals and his recycled cabinet are letting this great country slip into a serious state of financial dependence on foreign countries?

An hon. Member: Sour grapes.

Mr. McDermid: I heard sour grapes this afternoon. I heard my leprechaun friend from the great land of Lincoln get up and criticize us for dwelling in the past. I am talking about a bill which is current, but let me just cover a couple of the facts that he referred to this afternoon. I know he is Irish. I know he is full of the blarney and I know he likes to exaggerate a bit. But he stood up this afternoon and stated that the budget presented by the former government projected 13 per cent unemployment. Well, I don't see that in it at all. In fact, there are no projections over 8.3 per cent for unemployment. The hon. member did that during the campaign as well and misled the Canadian people. He also said this afternoon—and the record will show it—that tax credits are great except they don't help the poor. Something he forgot to mention was that it was a negative tax credit and that, in fact, the money would be received even if the recipient did not pay taxes in that year.

● (2110)

That is the way he won his campaign, by stretching the truth a little bit with just a little bit of the Irish poetic licence, perhaps, or a little bit of the blarney that he spread over the great riding of Lincoln. The same old gang is over there, with the odd one left out of the cabinet. Those who dared to question their leader are the odd ones out of the cabinet. Now they are being slapped into committee chairmanship jobs as fast as possible to keep them quiet, but it is the same old gang over there, and they are continuing the same practices which have burdened the Canadian taxpayer for 12 years.

I get the impression that the government cannot grasp the magnitude of the staggering figure it is asking for. In order that it may be more enlightened I am going to use the following example. Let us try to put this into perspective. If from the day that Christ was born a man had spent $1,000 every day of every month of every year, by the end of this century he would have spent $730 million. That is all, at just $1,000 a day.

That would still be almost $300 million short of $1 billion. The government is now asking for $12 billion in a two-clause bill. Surely the government realizes what this is costing the Canadian taxpayer. Surely hon. members opposite realize that to pay off our existing net debt, without adding this one on, would cost $7,725 per taxpayer. I do not know what this government is thinking by burdening the Canadian taxpayers like this, but hon. members opposite sit over there and smile. They are smug and safe for another four years, but they will be hearing from us over the next four years, and we will be keeping them honest.

An hon. Member: That is impossible.

Mr. McDermid: My colleagues say it is impossible to keep them honest. My colleagues are always right. I bow to their wisdom. They do know of what they speak. Many of them have been here much longer than have I.

Mr. Regan: And will be.

Mr. McDermid: Be careful, sir.

Right now one out of every four tax dollars is used to service our debt. If the Liberals continue to spend money at this rate, who knows what deficits will face our children?

Mr. Regan: Which programs do you want to remove?

Mr. McDermid: In short, this borrowing authority adds substantially to our debt and was really not expected at the start of the year. It will mortgage our future for years to come.

The minister asked which programs to cut. I heard him say that very clearly. He has now buried himself in his letter writing. I want the minister to tell us where he is spending the money first so that we can see if there is anything there to cut. He should come clean with the Canadian people and tell us where he is spending the money.

Mr. McKenzie: You can't cut what you can't see.

Mr. McDermid: My friend from Winnipeg tells me we cannot cut what we cannot see, and that is right.

I am sorry the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is not here. He made a great statement last night. He made a few errors in his statement which he had to correct today. He said he wants to borrow $1 billion with a margin for contingencies. Then he said that the government may need $1 billion less than it is asking for once it gets its blender into operation because Mr. Magic, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), is going to plug in his blender, put it on high speed and come in with a saving of $1 billion on the deficit.

He is passing it on to the consumer, but he will not admit it.

I feel it strikes at the rights of Parliament for this House to approve borrowing authority in the amount of $12 billion—that is $400 per second—for the next fiscal year, without estimates, which are in fact the true estimates, even to be asked for that approval in the face of massive inconsistencies and errors on the part of previous Liberal finance ministers in presenting previous numbers, forecasts and figures. This time they do not even present the inconsistencies.

According to the record of proceedings, the minister simply said that the government requires the authority to borrow $12 billion to meet this fiscal year's cash needs, including the present margin for contingencies. That is some margin for contingencies. How can we remain financially solvent when we think of the millions of dollars we already pay in interest every day and of our debt which increases visibly? I am sure that since I have been speaking it has built up but by how much?

Mr. Corbett: It is probably up to $10,000 now.

Mr. McDermid: We must stop and think of future generations. We must think of our children and our children's children who will have to pay back this money. How can anyone explain this bill otherwise? How can we be silent when faced with the amount of interest the government will have to pay if Parliament passes this bill before us? Just when will the Minister of Finance finally announce tax measures and policies which will speed up our economic recovery instead of always increasing the burden of the national debt? Come on, Mr. finance minister, answer our questions through a budget.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McDermid: Canada deserves no less at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-30 to provide borrowing authority for 1980-81—

Mr. Pinard: Filibuster.

Mr. Malone: —the first question which comes to my mind is whether this is going to be the first request for borrowing. This bill is labelled 1980-81 borrowing authority. I have been a member of Parliament now for some six years.

Mr. Pinard: Too long.

Mr. Malone: While I am not in any way a veteran of this chamber, it is a fact that in that period of time I have had the occasion every year to write a blank cheque for this Liberal government. They have asked for money without giving any indication as to what it is to be used for. We should recognize tonight that there has been a very interesting phenomenon here. Through numerous speakers the members of the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative Party, have taken the position, first, that we ought not to be borrowing these expansive amounts of money. That is not the nature of Canada with our wealth or our resources. The second position we have been taking is that at no time should the Parliament of Canada be asked to allow the borrowing of money without being given any idea as to what the budget for the expenditure of those moneys is.

I find it interesting to note that the members of the New Democratic Party to my left have been taking a very similar position; that is, that the government ought not to be asking Parliament to authorize borrowing by the government without having any idea what it is to be used for.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stood in his place, I doubt if it was for longer than five minutes, and explained that he needed the money, but did not give any reason which convinced me that he was particularly in favour of the bill. He was followed by two or three other Liberal members, one being the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), who did not speak about the bill at all. Then the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) rose in his place to talk about the campaign of the 1980 election. If it takes some courage to speak against this bill, I wonder why it takes such a mustering of courage on the part of hon. members opposite to even rise in their places and support this bill. Surely this now beccomes a question for the people of Canada. Considering that we have a debt at the present time of some $60 billion, is the trend going to be to come to Parliament asking for borrowing authority to go into the international money market to ask for another $12 billion?

I think it is time we set certain facts before the Canadian citizen. The largest single portion of the tax dollar the Canadian taxpayer pays goes to pay for the interest on accumulated debt.

This does not buy any new fighter plane, it does not buy a new health service, it does not provide any new agricultural research. The largest portion of our tax dollar goes to pay for interest on the debt, to the extent where today of all the money raised by governments in Canada—and I am speaking about the three levels of government—42 cents out of every $1 goes on government expenditure. I think the two are hand in hand because what we must see in this country is a nation with one third of the world's fresh water, the largest supply of fresh water of any nation in the world, but no developed inland fresh water fishery of any significance. This is a country with all the resources of agriculture, forestry and mineral rock, all the resources which could make us into a nation which could develop and grow. But here is a government which has adopted for a dozen years now the notion, not that citizens should be given the incentive to build, to manufacture and to have a kind of growing mentality which says, "let us make this country into something great", but instead has stooped to say, "let us borrow more money, not to generate more wealth so that we could be richer both in our private lives and in government, but to run to the international marketplace to borrow and on the basis of that borrowing to look after our social needs."

One of my experiences gleaned from being a member of Parliament is that I do not think it matters very much if you are a Liberal, a New Democrat or a Conservative in terms of being able to identify a problem in the country. When any member of a party looks at a problem, he tends to see it. If we note that the native people of Canada are not satisfactorily housed, I believe that, regardless whether we are Liberal, NDP or Conservative, we all see the fact that they are not satisfactorily housed. The difference between political parties is how we respond to the question. We find it to be the tradition of Liberal members of the House that instead of allowing this country to grow in an exciting and beautiful way so as to match the country's potential, they have taken the strong centralist government notion of, first, controlling and, second, of believing that we have reached our limits of growth in the country and that all we can do now is to simply borrow further in the international markets and make ourselves more and more dependent on the deficits being created.

We are now spending $15 billion a year more than this government collects in taxes. I do not expect, for a moment, that any citizen who is aware of that fact will not say simply that at first sight this is a situation we cannot tolerate today, nor can we tolerate its extension year after year, because citizens of this country know they cannot run their farms, their corner grocery stores, or Stelco or Chrysler or any other corporation, if there is not a sense of balance between what you do, what you earn and what you spend. Yet somehow this regime in 1968 came in under that great new something who swept the nation in 1968, looking like the hon. member for sanctimony. He came to the public of Canada which believed he was the answer. He probably came out of the new line of economics which is often referred to—

An hon. Member: Keynes.

Mr. Malone: Yes, the Keynesian theory. It was on the tip of my tongue but I did not have a tongue quite as long as do some others. But the Keynesian theory is somehow the belief that if you always save money, your system will not grow. Keynes' idea was that if the government were allowed to spend that money for you, the private sector would not have to do that spending. I think that theory has been put to rest, and with it should go the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all the people in the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: Somehow they have the notion that we can tax the people, take their money, spend it as we wish, and then when we do not have it, borrow more and go into debt. I think it would be worth while for Canadians to know the extent of debt they are being put into, because the debt of today's government, if we take the perspective that debts must be paid, is over $3,000 for every man, woman and child in the country. Interestingly enough, for a family of four, in just three years time, there will be a family debt of some $20,000 built up by the federal Government of Canada. This will become the albatross and the cement blocks around the necks of the children of the future.

I think it is quite one thing to say that we need certain social policies and, therefore, we are going to stand by them because our hearts are big and they bleed for the people of Canada. I think it is quite a different thing to say that we all in this House have a social conscience. You do not have to be a socialist to have a social conscience. Surely, in doing that which we call the common good for the country, we are not just running back to the international trough and saying, "fill it up again," especially in Canada where we have the resources to make the country work and to earn the kind of a life standard we all want.

I would like to diverge for a moment to say that Canadians can surely do that, because if you take a country like Japan, with 110 million people, having only the resources of fish and tin and having zero unemployment and one of the highest economic standards in the world, why is it that this country, with all the resources, all of the blessings of educated people, with the talent of a democratic system and court system, cannot put it together?

An hon. Member: We have a Liberal government.

Mr. Malone: Well, my colleague says we have a Liberal government. It is amazing how liberal it is when it goes looking to the international trough. I have been here, as I said, some six years. All I know is that, just looking at this decade, 1970-71, the federal government came before the Parliament and asked for borrowing authority for some $3 billion. Then they came back for borrowing authority for another $3 billion. In 1972-73, they wanted another $3 billion, and in 1974 they came for another $3 billion. Note that in the first four years of this decade they needed $3 billion each time they came. Thereafter, in 1974, they wanted $5.5 billion, then $6 billion in 1975-76. In 1977 they needed another $6 billion. Then in that great year of 1977-78 they wanted $28 billion, and now in 1978-79 they want another $28 billion. They say that this bill requests borrowing authority for 1980-81. They are after $12 billion now. There is absolutely no guarantee this is the last time this year they are coming back to Parliament. If past experience counts for anything, they will be back to the trough again saying they need more money. The simplest thing that Canadians can ask for and that Parliament should expect is that there be no granting or borrowing of money unless the government is willing to show accountability for the money they are given.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: I listened to the speech made yesterday by a member of the NDP, and I thought it was a good speech. He said that appropriations should be divided up into quarters and accounted for by the government on a quarterly basis. That makes sense to me. As a matter of fact, I would think that is the most logical thing we could expect and that the citizens of Canada should expect the presentation of a budget. The basis of that budget gives a projection on how we intend to spend money. On the basis of how we make the projection, then the government has the right to say, "This is the way in which we will spend it". At the present time we have a total deficit of $66 billion and a request for an additional $12 billion. We also have the knowledge that if we add on to that the service and interest charges, it will cost Canadians over $80 billion.

● (2130)

We ran out of billionaires in my constituency a long time ago. We do not have any. In fact, our millionaires are very limited. But if one took a dollar bill which is precisely six inches long and laid one million of them end to end, that million dollars would stretch for approximately 85 miles. If one took a billion dollars, it would go from Vancouver to Halifax and back five times. The government is asking us to give them 12 of those so that they can spend them without giving any idea to the people or the Parliament of Canada as to what they want the money for. They indicate that they just need $12 billion and they expect us to say, "Yes". Why are they requesting $12 billion, for what reason? Perhaps they need only $6 billion or $11 billion. Surely it is unacceptable that the government can ask for $12 billion without the slightest indication as to what the money will be used for. That is unacceptable. It shows what I see as the style of the Liberal government. They love to spend money, but they do not care very much about accountability to Parliament. They do not care very much about how much they must tax people or the debt. Within their mentality of running the Parliament of Canada, power becomes more important than achievement, power becomes more important than Canadians and the purpose for which they became the government in the first place.

If any citizen of this country loses his Chargex or MasterCharge, he should worry and immediately phone the head offices of those companies to let them know his cards were gone. But if he ever lost them around Parliament Hill in the presence of Liberal members of Parliament, he ought to change his identity and get out of the country as quickly as possible. There is only a 24-hour protection period, and they have the ability to run up a debt quickly. So, he should not leave his cards lying around this place.

I should like to change the emphasis of my thoughts for much of the remaining time I have this evening. I want to talk as an Albertan and as a Canadian about one of the very important problems facing our country at this time. I should like to reflect to a large extent upon energy and the way in which I think a new approach to the energy question in fact could provide us with a situation where we would not have to go out and borrow money at the present rate. It would provide all Canadians with a far higher and greater sense of wealth than exists at the present time in this nation. At this moment in 1980, we in Alberta do not need more tar sands plants, smoke stacks or industrialization. But there is a view among Albertans that as Canadians they must accept the fact that there is a need for more energy in Canada. For reasons which will affect our lifestyle, we do not want the influx that will bring us a great deal more labour, a great deal more welfare, hospital and school costs. We must accept the burden that in the national interest we need to assist somehow in getting away from our dependency on foreign energy, but we will not take a rapidly depleting resource and simply put it on the shelf at any value. We must be aware of what will happen if western provinces go down the tube. I should like to tie in the important question of energy with the important question of borrowing. In fact energy is one item of cost that could provide more money for the running of government than is necessary. At the present time we are importing some 500,000 barrels of oil per day. The cost this year will be some $3 billion. That means that we are taking an amount of money out of the pockets of Canadians and simply transplanting it somewhere else in the world. It goes to Venezuela, Mexico or some country in the Middle East. It does not create a single job in Canada. It does not roll a piece of pipe out of any of our steel mills dotted across the country. It does not employ anybody and it does not use a Canadian resource. I cannot understand why the government is so bent on paying the world price for Mexican oil when it cannot even make a suitable deal for Canadian oil from Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. It is obvious and well known that there is an agreement with the provinces to give a price at below the world price that would enable us to become self-sufficient in energy and would place us at a competitive advantage far and above that of the world situation.

We must recognize that the governments of western Canada are willing to make our country self-sufficient in energy. It should also be noted that in the past number of years we have lost money in the production of oil out of the tar sands. Any money which has accrued to the coffers of Alberta came from what we call traditional supply, the old pumped oil. A report released three weeks ago indicated that traditional supply has a limited capacity of about another 11 years. That resource took the people in my province from the old coal oil lamps, the drafts and the old Eaton's catalogues in the outhouses into a province which enjoyed a standard of living equal to that of other more well-to-do provinces in the country. I say to all members of the House quite sincerely that the citizens of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta are still quite young. They remember all too well what it was to be living in a situation of poverty in the prairies. Every boy and girl growing up there today is just one generation away from a reminder of what it was like not to be a part of the central mainstream of wealth in this nation. It should also be understood that in the 1910s and the 1920s we knew that there was an oil production capacity in those provinces. We rapped and rapped upon the doors of the money markets of central Canada. We begged for them to come and help us develop. There was nary a response and no one would even take a look at the development of petroleum in western Canada. Finally the Americans came in and they gave us assistance through five fairly large companies.

In the Speech from the Throne one of the objectives of the Liberal government was to make the oil industry 50 per cent Canadian-owned by the end of this decade. I wince at that; it makes me angry, it makes me bitter. It would not make me angry if they said they were going to make industry 50 per cent Canadian-owned or even if they said that they were going to make the energy industry 50 per cent Canadian-owned, but when they singled out petroleum, they singled out my province. At the same time they talked about a government agency that is not just 50 per cent Canadian-owned, it is government-owned. Following the Speech from the Throne I was called upon in this Parliament to grant some $240 million to the Chrysler Corporation. We must ask the question: What is so awful about our multinational corporations that somehow a central Canadian multinational corporation receives the blessing of government. They are told, "Here is a cheque, go forward, boys and do what you can. If you can survive it, then away you go". Frankly, I think this expresses an insensitivity to the fact of what is happening in terms of looking after control of resources.

• (2140)

I mentioned that we have 11 years of oil supply left in our country, that is traditionally pumped oil. I think it would do members good if we had some understanding as to why the price of oil is going up. I have various data that reflects upon what would happen if different things occurred in the oil industry.

For example, in 1949 the average Canadian worked for 21 minutes in order to buy a gallon of gasoline. In 1979 that same Canadian had to work eight minutes in order to buy a gallon of gasoline. I set that aside. I do not think that is the reason gasoline should be more expensive. We could become a more wealthy society. We do not need that as the reason. I suggest we take a look at the price of gasoline around the world. We note that in Toronto at the present time it is about 22 cents a litre, in Melbourne it is 25.1 cents a litre; that is Melbourne, Australia, for those who might wonder. In London, England, it is 42.5 cents a litre, or double the Canadian price. In Tokyo, it is 56.3 cents a litre. In Paris, it is 68.8 cents a litre and in Zurich it is 73.7 cents a litre. I set that aside. I do not think because the price is double or triple in some other place ncessarily means that the price of gasoline has to be higher here. We can then say that gasoline is a certain price, gasoline is a liquid and it comes in litre measures. What else is liquid, and what else comes in litres? Let us take a look at some comparisons.

Here in Ottawa when I came to work this morning I saw a sign displaying 24.9 cents per litre of gasoline. The easiest way to think of that is that it costs you two bits to get a litre of gasoline in Ottawa. Maybe it would do Canadians some good to reflect upon the fact that for a litre of orange juice we pay $1.16. For vinegar, we pay 71 cents a litre or almost three times as much as we pay for a litre of gasoline. St. Lawrence corn oil—that sounds like some minister opposite, and here we find a Liberal price tag—costs $2.45 a litre. Corn syrup has a sticky price of $1.60 a litre, and even Bessie the cow will not produce, because it costs 66 cents a litre for milk. Then comes Downy fabric softener. I do not know why my researcher chooses Downy, but it is $1.53 a litre. Pine-Sol—we need a little of that for this chamber—costs $3.23 a litre. Next I asked what we could get that would be as cheap as gasoline.

An hon. Member: What about whisky?

Mr. Malone: We will come to whisky in a minute here, sir. I asked what the cost would be for distilled water for irons. I found out it costs 40 cents a litre or about twice as much as we pay for gasoline. I am from the oil-producing province. But I ask hon. members whether they know how we get gasoline? First, one sends out seismographic crews who send shock waves into the earth. After receiving some information they put test holes in those formations where they think they might get some samples. The average is about one well to ten test holes. If they get enough wells, and I underline the word "if", they will develop a field. Once the field is developed, the oil is piped to the refinery. From the refinery it goes to central Canada to a tank farm. A man with a truck picks up the oil at the tank farm and drives it to a service station. There the fellow with the little cap comes out and fills your car with gasoline charging you 24 cents a litre for it.

An hon. Member: You can get gas a lot easier by talking to a Liberal.

Mr. Malone: You can get gassed talking to a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: I set that aside, Mr. Speaker, and say that is not even reason enough that the price of gasoline should go up.

The reason the price of gasoline has to go up is that it costs more today to get it than it did in earlier years. Those who have had the opportunity to reflect upon the photos or even to see first hand those wells of 1949 in the province of Alberta, especially Leduc No. 1, will recall that this was a well the media referred to as a gusher, a wildcat and a blowout. It shot oil some 200 to 300 feet into the air. There was oil over everything. The derrick in the ground and the men were all covered with it. These were the early gushers of this century. Most Canadians do not appreciate that oil is not in the ground like water in a lake. It is in what we call a tertiary formation. It is locked into sandstone in the pores and the molecules of rock. When that oil first came up, we ran for about a decade simply having to pump the oil horizontally along the ground and off to the refinery. Then the time came when there was simply no more pressure. We then had to use the rocking donkey-head pumps to suck the oil from down below, put it into the system and so off to the refinery. That was the end of what we call our primary recovery. From then on, and quite by accident, and we knew there was much more oil down there, another method was developed by which we could bring it to the surface. This was accomplished by pumping down hot brine, hot salt water. This added to the cost, but it brought the oil to the surface. As you do not want salt in your crankcase, that of course must be extracted. Again, the cost goes up.

An hon. Member: That is a Liberal plan.

Mr. Malone: It would be a Liberal plan indeed.

An hon. Member: It would salt their crankcase.

An hon. Member: We got it in our crankcase.

Mr. Malone: When it came to the point that we could no longer bring the oil up by what we call the hot brine method, we moved then to a method of fizz carbon dioxide. This again brought more oil to the surface. This is a method we are using today. It brings our oil to the surface at $13.75 a barrel. We have 11 years' supply left of that conventional oil, and that is all. Canadians should know that 70 per cent of the oil in those fields is still underground. The problem is, if we go to an additional secondary recovery to get any significant amount of that oil, it will cost close to $50 a barrel. Naturally, the choice is made. Secondary recovery is left for new technology and for some period in the future.

In the interim we moved to tar sands oil. It baffles me that Canadians do not know that it costs more to mine oil than it does to pump it. If people could see the operation in the tar sands where we are able to bring oil out at some $20 to $21 a barrel and they could see the kinds of machines working there. The wheels on trucks are so large that when a man stands beside one his head is below the rear axle. This project is comparable only to that of the James Bay project. Surely that mining of oil, its extraordinarily high costs and the fact that the tar sands projects today are losing money, should make us realize there is a middle road here. We can use Canadian resources, employ Canadian people, develop Canadian industries in central Canada to produce the steel, the pipe and the valves, take them to where they are needed anywhere in the country, and put this resource into place. That reflects a difference in mentality, that I see, between the Liberal government and those who would like to develop and grow in the nation. There is a difference between the ones who want control in Ottawa, those who want to borrow and do not care if they borrow, those who want to buy oil—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) on a point of order.

● (2150)

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question at this particular point?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, my concern is whether or not the member can ask one.

Mr. McRae: The hon. member just used the figure that oil recovery by secondary treatment would cost about $50 per barrel. I wonder if the hon. member can justify that figure. I have heard figures of around $7 per barrel or $8 per barrel, but I have never heard a figure of $50 per barrel. I would like the hon. member to explain how he came upon that figure as a general figure for secondary recovery.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I did not know that I would have to do a secondary treatment on the hon. member. I already said that is not the price today for secondary recovery. I mentioned the two stages, the hot brine stage and the fizz carbon dioxide stage, and I said that when those methods of technology are gone, the next significant stage of secondary recovery with our present technology will constitute that price. I said that we will run out of oil in about 11 years time and that therefore the supply will be from the tar sands.

I invite the hon. member to pay attention because, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) said last night, the mood of this country is not what members opposite may think. The glue in this confederation is very, very thin. The mood in western Canada is one that I do not wish to harbour. I hear my constituents week after week talking about separation. I talk to the people who suggest this, and I listen to what they have to say. I have come to the conclusion that when they make this suggestion they are not expressing a wish or a desire, they are expressing frustration.

Mr. Regan: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: It should be noted that while I talk about one of the serious problems facing this country, the minister of sport chooses to heckle across the House as if he does not need to pay attention to that part of Canada.

Mr. Regan: I certainly do not need to pay attention to that sort of guff.

Mr. Paproski: Just cash that cheque.

Mr. McDermid: He goes west and knocks everything.

Mr. Malone: The other myth which must be dispelled relates to the use of the acronym OPEC. There is no doubt that OPEC was brought about because of an unfortunate and unfair cartel of more than a decade ago. OPEC came about because of the most unfair, extraordinarily low pricing of five American oil companies which were operating in the Middle East. These companies held the price of oil so artificially low that the members which later formed OPEC said they simply could not tolerate it any more. At that point they formed what has become known as OPEC. I was about to list the countries, but that is not necessary. These countries, united under OPEC, discovered that they were a world power.

But OPEC does not exist as a cartel today. In 1972 and 1973 OPEC did exist as a cartel, but if one looks at the list of countries in OPEC and notes the great variations in the price of their oil, one can hardly refer to OPEC as a cartel. For example, the price of oil in Saudi Arabia is $28 a barrel, Nigeria $36.71 a barrel, Iran $35 a barrel, Ecuador $36 a barrel, Kuwait $29 a barrel, Qatar $31 a barrel, Iraq $30 a barrel, Libya $36 a barrel, Indonesia $31 a barrel, Algeria $35 a barrel and Venezuela $31 a barrel. A cartel refers to groups joined together to establish a fixed price on a commodity.

It is also interesting to note that there are many other countries which are not members of OPEC but which have prices just as high. I cite Great Britain which is self-sufficient in North Sea oil. There is also West Germany and other countries around the world which have oil prices just as high, but which are not dependent upon an oil supply from an OPEC country. The question as to whether the oil price today is led by OPEC or whether it is a world commodity price is a question we must ponder.

As long as we continue to say that we are being gulped up by OPEC, then surely there will be a greater division in the country, particularly in view of the fact that the western premiers have said they are not after the world price, but after a certain percentage of what is the world commodity price. That is an entirely different factor when one refers to an international cartel that sells at one price. We have countries outside OPEC like Great Britain and West Germany which charge prices that are equally as high.

We also have situations where, for example, in Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, it takes one barrel of oil to recover two barrels. In other words, for every three barrels of oil, one barrel is required to bring the other two up, or 30 per cent of the energy brought up is required to bring the oil up. I am referring to a secondary recovery system which requires steam for heat and hot brine to loosen the oil from the tertiary formation in order to bring it up.

I plead with all members to acquire an understanding of this industry and the great potential it offers Canada. There is no nation which has the blessed fortunes of this land and all the resources; its human capacity, its forestry, its fisheries, its minerals or its energy. We have a great supply of this form of energy, but we must be willing to pay the cost to get it into the Canadian market. This in turn will create Canadian jobs, particularly in the Canadian pipe industry. It will save us from paying the world price and put us at a competitive advantage in the world.

However, if we choose to take this projected $8.5 billion out of Canada by 1985 and send it to Mexico, Venezuela or the Middle East and not create a single job or employ a single Canadian—or a married one for that matter—then surely it does not in any way behoove us as a nation to take the position that that kind of throwing away of our money is of any standard that in this country should be looked upon—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I will begin my remarks and call it ten o'clock in a moment. It is difficult to know just how to begin debate on a bill now, after having read the column by Doug Small the other day in which he referred to the conventional, "I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate". Members of Parliament will have to find a new introduction.

This particular bill is to give authority to the government to borrow $12 billion, or as an hon. member mentioned earlier this evening, "$12 billion toward a blank cheque government". What we must look at is when was this blank cheque government introduced to Canada. It was introduced in 1969 when one of the first acts of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was to change the rules of the House of Commons in dealing with parliamentary expenditures. The last thing he wanted was any proper scrutiny over expenditures. Ever since then we have had blank cheque government in this country.

The philosophy of the Liberal government today is that the only solution to any problem is to print more money, spend more money and borrow more money. Any members who use the phrase blank cheque government certainly know what they were talking about. Canadians are still paying for this rule change introduced by the present Prime Minister. He could not wait to get into this House to change the rules so that we would not know where the tax dollars were being spent. As an hon. member mentioned earlier, the Auditor General cannot find out where half the money is going. This government has something like a $52 billion budget, and the Auditor General can only account for half of that. I want to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but I will be back tomorrow afternoon.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SOVIET UNION—REPORTED REINSTATEMENT OF CULTURAL SCIENTIFIC AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGES.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, Mr. John Anderson, the alternate candidate I guess we could call him, in the United States for the office of the presidency of the United States has said:

> We enjoy the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought.

If any caption could characterize the comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on television last Sunday it is the statement of Mr. John Anderson which really captures what the minister said, "—the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought". Talk about comfort of opinion! I should like to read to you, Mr. Speaker, one of the things the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, as follows:

> I see no indication at all of any Soviet activity in Europe that would be aggressively directed against a country that they don't now control directly or indirectly.

That is the minister's opinion. For the facts, I should like to quote Mr. Alexander Haig who, I imagine, is an authority on the subject. He said:

> Whereas the west has exercised considerable restraint, . . . we find the Soviet Union has maintained defence as its first and overriding priority. Former western superiority . . . has been replaced by a roughly 3:1 superiority by the Soviets.

If, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs says, there is no aggressive intention, pray tell why have the Soviets increased their superiority to a ratio of three to one? Another authority, Mr. Kissinger said this:

> The dominant fact of the current military situation is that the NATO countries are falling behind in every significant military category with the possible exception of naval forces . . . Never in history has it happened that a nation achieved superiority in all significant weapons' categories without seeking to translate it at some point into foreign policy benefit.

That, sir, is the situation in Europe, a situation in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs says there are no aggressive intentions by the Soviet Union. It is the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) allows that maybe we should have been a little bit guilty of foresight rather than hindsight, when questioned in the House about this yesterday.

Again, speaking of the Soviet Union the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> They don't go against the heart of western civilization and western Europe, for instance, except maybe through the communist parties—

So the Soviets are nice guys! "They don't go against the heart of western civilization and western Europe." Then pray tell, why did we, 18 months ago, expel a dozen or so Soviet so-called diplomats if they all had nice intentions in Canada? Why is it that we are concerned and our NATO allies in Europe are concerned about NATO superiority, or at least NATO balances if, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs maintains, the Soviets, "don't go against the heart of western civilization and western Europe."

He is living in Alice in Wonderland. He went on to say that the Soviets will not attempt an adventure in western Europe. He added:

> I think that's completely out of the question.

That is the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought. As I said, the Prime Minister allowed that maybe we should have been guilty of a little bit of foresight rather than hindsight. In effect, on Sunday on television the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked where the United States was two years ago, or three years ago, when the Soviets moved into Kabul. Where were they? Well, I do not know exactly where the Soviets were or the Americans were, but I do know where Canada was. Two years ago when the Russians were already in Kabul establishing a puppet regime, Canada was installing a printing press in Afghanistan so that the Afghanistan people could print their material. I am sure it is all nice Alice in Wonderland stuff they were printing. Canada went right on selling them their printing press.

Two years ago, when the puppet regime was already in office, Canadians were designing the Kabul water and sewage system in Afghanistan. Two years ago, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was wondering where the Americans were, the Canadians were studying the Kabul River basin for storage, power and irrigation purposes. This was being done by a Montreal firm. Canadians were doing a hydroelectric survey, done I might add, by B.C. Hydro.

Two years ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs was wondering where the Americans were. The Canadians were supporting the establishment of a girl's vocational training school, done by the Red River College in Manitoba.

If the minister wants to question America's leadership, I ask him where Canada was during those days. I would like to ask, as I did in the House yesterday, what was the purpose for the unprovoked gratuitous comment about the lack of American leadership during the time of a pre-election campaign in the United States? What was the purpose of those gratuitous, unsolicited comments by the man who is supposed to be the master of diplomacy?

If in the last year when we had two general election campaigns in Canada, plus a heavy referendum campaign, the Americans had offered that kind of comment regarding the internal and domestic politics of our country, we would have been infuriated, and rightly so. Yet this man at the end of a TV show, when he could have said, "the time is up, we don't have time, it would not be right to comment on it," goes on to expand on what he thinks is the nature of American leadership.

In the last minute, I just want to raise one more point. Is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seriously—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just made some very valid points in a very tough manner, but I suggest that many of the points he made were his own personal observations. He asked where was Canada during these times of crisis. Canada was where it normally is, helping the poor and underprivileged countries of this world which include Afghanistan. I might suggest to the hon. member that not far away from Afghanistan is another country that is very poor. It is considered one of the five poorest countries in the world, namely, Nepal. There is a great deal of work being done by our NGOs, other groups and by bilateral agreements as well to assist countries of that nature. It is a poor country, the likes of Afghanistan. Actually the exchange we are concerned about this evening is really between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) which occurred on June 2, 1980. The subject of the matter was the educational, cultural and scientific exchanges with the Soviet Union.

I have now read the article in The Toronto Star by Professor Jean Edward Smith to which the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta referred. Frankly, I am surprised at the suggestion of a dramatic "reversal of policy" to which the author alludes. Professor Smith refers to the "reinstitution of cultural, educational and scientific exchanges with the Soviet Union as of next spring", which is to say, in 1981.

As the hon. member will recall, the measures taken in February by the previous government in response to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan included a one-year suspension of government sponsored cultural, educational and scientific exchanges with the Soviet Union. In March, the present government confirmed this policy and decided that the measures taken would not be diminished, nor would they be extended, except in concert with other allied governments, which would include the United States. This policy remains in effect and no dramatic reversal is currently envisaged. Therefore, one can only assume that Professor Smith has taken the reference to a one-year moratorium literally and that once one year had passed, these programs will be automatically reinstated. The exchanges may or may not be reinstated next year. Any conclusion at this stage would appear to be somewhat premature. Before any course of action is taken the situation in Afghanistan will have to be carefully assessed, the impact of the measures taken in response to the Soviet invasion will have to be carefully weighed and we shall have to consult with our allies. Only then will we be in a position to consider whether our current policy should be changed.

METRICATION—ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS TO IMPROVE EMPLOYMENT IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my subject this evening stems not only from questions I put in this House on May 1 to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) but from numerous other questions, recommendations and suggestions which I and my colleagues have been making ever since the automobile industry in Canada was hit with massive lay-offs.

At the outset, I would like to say I am well aware that the primary reason for the slump in the automobile industry in Canada is based on the drastic reduction in car sales in the United States and the over-all decline in the American economy as a whole. However, there is no excuse, in my view, for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the government to stand idly by while tens of thousands of Canadians are hit with massive lay-offs within one industry, affecting hundreds of thousands in the secondary manufacturing industry which serves the auto industry while still more lay-offs are being contemplated. Perhaps the minister has been preoccupied with the $200 million package to Chrysler Canada which, as you know, Mr. Speaker, happens to be located in his own riding in Windsor. Perhaps the minister does not realize that the auto industry is suffering in other parts of Canada as well, in places such as Oakville, Oshawa, Brampton, St. Catharines, St. Thomas, to name just a few. No action has been taken to alleviate, at least, the massive problems in these areas and across the country. Even the Chrysler proposal seems to have been a sham since less than 48 hours after receiving the $200 million loan guarantee Chrysler Canada laid off a further 1,400 people without even a peep from this government. When I asked the minister what specific action he would be taking in this matter he simply suggested that he had had discussions with representatives of the auto industry and other high-level officials, that's all. Well, Mr. Speaker, so have I had discussions and consultations and so have others. But we are passed the point of consulting, we are passed the point of mere studying. It is action that we want; action that is needed. There are ways and means at least to assist the industry and curb unemployment within this sector. I will give a few examples. Why has the minister not taken up the suggestion to remove the 9 per cent federal excise tax from cars assembled or manufactured in Canada? This alone would reduce the cost of vehicles built in Canada and thereby stimulate sales. The loss of revenue from the tax to the government would be offset by the saving in unemployment insurance benefits which, as of today, have already reached a staggering $5 million per week within the auto industry alone, not to mention the secondary manufacturing sector which supplies the auto industry. Why has the minister not taken up the suggestion of eliminating the $100 excise tax on vehicles with air conditioners? This would provide another much needed stimulus. Why has the minister not adopted the recommendation to impose quotas on offshore imports of automobiles? It would not be a precedent-setting act, Mr. Speaker. The same government imposed textile quotas when the Canadian textile industry was in trouble, and this side of the House supported it.

It imposed shoe quotas when the Canadian shoe industry was in trouble, and we supported it. Does it mean that the Canadian auto worker is a second-class citizen or that the auto industry does not exist in Canada? I do not think so, but it is questionable as to what the minister thinks because all we have heard from him in this regard so far is cheap talk and no action.

What about the Soviet Lada cars which were being promoted by the government in this country when the Soviet Union was invading Afghanistan? Our auto workers are being laid off in this country, and this government is promoting the Soviet-built Lada cars in this country. Why has the minister not taken the suggestion, for example, to promote—or legislate, if necessary—the assembling of offshore imports here in Canada? That would create jobs. That would stimulate the industry. We do not have to assemble only American-made cars. We could assemble Japanese and German cars. There are many options, and that is what really bothers me.

It is not as if the government and the minister did not have any options. There are options. I have just mentioned a few. However, if the minister is unable to deal with the problems affecting the auto industry in Canada, which seems to be the case, and if the minister is unable to improve the provisions within the auto pact for the benefit of the auto industry in Canada, which seems to be the case—in short, if the minister is unable to take any action in this regard, which seems to be the case—then I urge him at least to bring this whole matter before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs forthwith for an immediate review of the state of the automobile industry in Canada, as well as an over-all review of the obsolete and inadequate auto pact in order that all concerned—namely, management, labour, government and opposition parties—could come to a positive, fair and equitable solution in a much needed public debate.

The minister and the government have options. For God's sake, let us take them. Let us have some action.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, certainly we have long been concerned about the economy of our neighbour to the south which is so dependent upon the auto industry, but I would like to point out to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) that if he examined the potential of the contents of the Speech from the Throne, I am sure he would realize the potential there and the foresight of our government when it mentioned the creation of a Canadian agricultural export corporation. It will create jobs based on a renewable resource that will offer spinoff effects to all Canadians and will assist in the face of the lay-offs which were announced last week in the Brantford area.

Many of the problems facing the Canadian automotive industy are the direct result of a downturn in the U.S. market. We cannot take actions to stimulate sales in the United States.

There are, in addition, further problems facing the Canadian automotive industry which result from changing consumer demand and the need to conserve energy. These problems are being faced up to by the industry, but the solutions are necessarily of a longer term nature.

As a result of vehicle down-sizing and weight reduction the industry is increasingly turning to new materials which require new technologies. It is in this area that opportunities appear to be for Canada.

We have told the House recently that we have been holding meetings with vehicle manufacturers and parts manufacturers. These meetings have necessarily covered a broad range of topics, but clearly we are interested in identifying areas of opportunity for Canada.

Our officials are working with the auto companies to evaluate sourcing patterns and to help ensure that Canadian capability is used or developed to meet the requirement for auto parts manufacturers to retool and expand in order to capture in parts which are currently produced in Canada.

The full range of research and development grants and loan guarantees available under the Enterprise Development Program is also available to that industry. Additionally, we are working to develop a special program aimed at assisting auto parts manufacturers to retool and expand in order to capture significant incremental business.

Auto parts manufacturers are also participating in fairs and missions at selling more parts in Japan, the United States, Europe and other countries. These have resulted in substantial sales and, in fact, many companies which have developed offshore markets are operating at capacity. One of our objectives is to increase further both the sourcing and production activity in Canada by offshore producers.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—LOSSES TO FARMERS DUE TO U.S. EMBARGO ON GRAIN TO U.S.S.R.—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): On April 15 I asked a number of questions. I have asked them several times since. Those questions were to find out what the situation was so far as the embargo was concerned, whether there was any chance that the government would reimburse the farmers for the loss of income due to the embargo. The answer to those questions from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was:

> My information and knowledge at this time is that western farmers are not being affected by the policy that Canada has had with respect to the export of grains to the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in answer to my question, said that they did have a policy of helping out farmers affected by the grain embargo.

Here tonight I think it is necessary that we try to reach the truth as to exactly where we stand and what the effect of the embargo has been. There are a couple of ways to get to this truth. What has happened to grain prices since the embargo? We find that the evidence is different from December 28 until April 15—there have been some changes since then. Since the question was asked on the 15, the price of wheat fell from $233 a tonne to $188 a tonne, or from $6.34 a bushel to $5.11 a bushel. This is a direct, demonstrable loss of $1.23 a bushel caused by the overhang of 17 million tonnes of U.S. wheat which would have gone to the Soviet Union but instead went to the general market with which we were competing.

The second possibility of finding out exactly where we stand as far as our losses are concerned is to compare Canadian prices with those of countries that did sell to the Soviet Union, outside the north American block, not following the U.S. embargo. Here the best example is Argentina which has kept on selling grain to the Soviet Union. Argentine wheat prices have averaged, since March 7, at $204 a tonne, or $5.67 a bushel. Canadian wheat prices have averaged, since March 7, at $183 a tonne or $4.98 a bushel. This margin has narrowed to 70 cents a bushel, principally because Argentina has now sold all its export wheat, and the other countries hit by the embargo, including Canada, the U.S. and Australia, are coming back and strengthening prices.

We are selling to other countries which in turn are selling to Russia. So the answer to those two questions demonstrates the truth of the situation, namely, that we have been hurt by the embargo.

What can we really expect if suddenly there is no market for 17 million tonnes of grain? It is bound to depress the market. What about next year? Douglas Mutch, a commentator on agriculture said:

If the embargo remains in effect, it also means that Soviet grain purchases from the United States next crop year will be limited to eight million tonnes. As current market supplies are more than adequate to meet current needs, this curtailment also will result in a build-up of U.S. grain stockpiles.

We will have twice as much grain on the market by the end of next year, unless we have a crop failure.

What else has been affected by the embargo? I can list a number of prices that have been depressed by the embargo. First of all, Argentina has done very well, but prices of other products have been depressed. Soya beans are down $25 a tonne; rapeseed is down about $1 a bushel; corn is down, and livestock has been affected indirectly. Yet the minister had the audacity to say that Canadian farmers are not being affected by the policy that Canada has had with respect to the export of grain to the Soviet Union, or at least the embargo against the Soviet Union.

● (2225)

Argentina has done very well in this situation. According to a story which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor, Argentina has doubled its sales of wheat and corn to the Soviets. It is the biggest single supplier to the Soviets. It has sold more wheat to the Soviets than it has ever done before. What happened in Argentina is what could have happened in Canada if we had made the same kind of effort. The Canadian Wheat Board was established to make these kinds of economic attempts to help Canadian farmers and the Canadian economy. Instead we allowed that opportunity to go to Argentina. We have demonstrated that it has affected all Canadian producers and that all Canadian producers are entitled to compensation. If there is to be an equality of sacrifice with the Americans in this foreign policy venture, having regard to wheat, then now is the time for the government to try to make some compensation to the farmers who have been affected by the embargo.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that the decline in grain prices since January 4 is a direct consequence of the embargo restrictions on grain trade with the U.S.S.R. In some of his other questions he also recommended that the 1980-81 initial payment for wheat be raised to $4.25 per bushel.

In reply I want to explain that the initial payment for producer deliveries to the Canadian Wheat Board is set at a level which reflects anticipated market returns for the crop year. The government will reconsider raising the initial payment level prior to the commencement of the crop year on August 1, should the market outlook at that time warrant such an increase.

This government is following the approach of the previous government concerning grain sales to the U.S.S.R., including a willingness to consider compensating producers for losses that may be experienced as a direct result of grain trade restrictions. I would remind the hon. member that there are many factors in addition to the restrictions which are influencing grain prices; factors such as the increased estimate by the United States of their own 1979 corn crop, positive crop prospects for 1980 in the United States, Europe and elsewhere, general economic factors such as the interest rate level and a reduced rate of growth in the world economy as a whole.

The grain trade restrictions do not seem to be having a negative effect generally on the volume of world trade in grain. In fact world trade in both wheat and coarse grains for 1979-80 are projected in both cases to be over 12 per cent greater than for the 1978-79 crop year. Most recent projections indicate that the total reduction of U.S.S.R. imports of grain in this crop year will likely be less than five million tonnes. The United States government has announced steps to counteract the impact of the grain trade restrictions by removing U.S. grain from the market. Canadian grain exports generally in the current crop year are approaching record volumes. Canadian exports to the U.S.S.R. are being maintained at normal and traditional levels.

In summary, it is our position that it would be premature to attempt at this time to answer the question of market impact and determine whether producer compensation will be necessary. I can assure the hon. member that the government is closely monitoring the effect of the restrictions and other factors on the market. In the event that compensation is warranted, an appropriate program will be developed and brought forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

AIRPORTS

ST. JOHN'S—INSTALLATION OF INSTRUMENT LANDING SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I wish to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion which is of pressing and urgent necessity.

As the Ministry of Transport is now in the process of dismantling the radar approach system at St. John's airport, which would constitute in certain circumstances a hazard to the travelling public, and indeed would lower the operational capacity of the airport, with the unanimous consent of the House I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House directs the Minister of Transport to issue the necessary directive in order to ensure that the precision approach radar system at St. John's airport continues to operate until the instrument landing system has been installed and is operative.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

EXTENSION OF LETTER CARRIER SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, I wish to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises from the renewed freeze of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) on the extension of letter carrier service to new suburbs in Canada's growing cities.

In view of the loss of jobs resulting from the freeze, with the consequent increase in unemployment insurance payments, and the Postmaster General's announcement that he is planning a substantial increase in postal rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Postmaster General end forthwith the freeze on letter carrier service, thereby providing job opportunities at a time of continuing high unemployment, and the traditional door to door delivery service which will ensure the quality of service necessary for the survival of Canada Post.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR NATIVE PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the native training opportunities announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on Monday will only help those who wish to work in large resource development projects or in large urban centres, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this training program be expanded to provide substantial opportunities for native people to work in all sectors of the economy, and to include training which will help native people develop their own opportunities within their own communities.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMIRAL FALLS—CRITICISM OF EXPENSIVE BRUSSELS RESIDENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise concerning Admiral Robert Falls, former chief of the armed forces general staff and recently appointed Canadian NATO representative in Brussels, and the fact, as outlined in a National Defence telex which I have in my possession, that the government selected 30 potential Brussels residences for him, retained—presumably by option—15 for his consideration, subsequently on his instructions selected 8 Avenue de Fuji, which he now occupies at a rental cost to the Canadian taxpayer of $8,200 per month, or almost $100,000 per year on a reported nine-year lease, with possible escalation clauses. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House strongly condemns the government, especially at a time when Canadians suffer from high mortgages and high rentals, for permitting Admiral Falls to indulge lavishly in apparent lust for luxurious living beyond the bounds of common sense, and demands a government statement on this opulent, elaborate self-indulgence which makes a literal lie of the government's pious, pompous urging of restraint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES

CONSERVATION OF CHINOOK SALMON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to put a motion of urgent and pressing importance before this House.

In view of the recent decision by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to close the Fraser River to salmon fishing for an indefinite period, a measure designed to conserve chinook salmon but which will wreak immense economic hardship upon the gillnet fishermen who operate in the Fraser River, and since no equivalent sanctions have been applied against other Canadian and United States fishermen who intercept these same chinook stocks outside the Fraser River, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be directed to take steps immediately so that the burden of responsibility for the conservation of chinook salmon will be shared equally among all west coast fishermen and, furthermore, that special sanctions be imposed against U.S. fishermen so that they do not benefit inadvertently from Canadian attempts to conserve chinook salmon.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISBURSEMENT OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the former Conservative government abandoned the approach of direct job-creation spending, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain):

That this House congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration for redirecting job-creation funds to give more help, particularly to women, youth, the handicapped, native people, refugees—

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

SPORTS

REJECTION OF LOTTERIES AS FUND-RAISING VEHICLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of importance to all Canadians.

Last week the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, once again—like other Liberal cabinet ministers—bypassed Parliament by holding an in-camera meeting with the executive directors of the various sports associations of Canada at which he indicated his intention of renegotiating with the provinces the possibility of bringing back a federal lottery.

The minister conveniently omitted to point out that the federal government now receives $24 million a year from the provinces as a result of the previous government's positive actions in this regard. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House instruct the minister of state for sport to remove himself and his government from the promotion of any further gambling operations under federal jurisdiction, and instead concentrate his efforts on improving and expanding recreation, fitness and sports programs by, among other things, establishing tax incentives within the industrial and private sectors in order to develop alternate and additional sources of funding for these important programs.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NATIONAL TELEVISION NEWS—IMPORTANCE TO ALL REGIONS OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Both of them indicated they will not oppose it. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), I move:

That this House calls on the CBC, in the Across Canada segment of its nightly national television news, not always to go from the east to the west, but once in a while to go from the west to the east, or even to start from the north or from the prairies, as a gesture to the proposition that all parts of this country are equally important.

TRADE

POLICIES WITH BENEFICIAL OUTCOME FOR OIL AND MARINE INDUSTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Last month, Canadian firms sold more than $29 million in marine and oil technology and services at the Offshore Technology Conference 80 in Houston, Texas. Those sales constitute a phenomenal success for a trade fair at which 30 Canadian firms, sponsored by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, can expect sales worth close to $110 million over the next 12 months as a direct result of the conference. To this end, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That this House give unanimous support to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on his current policies which helped produce this most beneficial outcome for our oil and marine industries.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL UNITY

SUBSTITUTION OF "CANADIAN" FOR "ANGLOPHONE" AND "FRANCOPHONE"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order, 43 to present the following motion which is urgent and pressing.

Whereas the Canadian Bill of Rights refers to the Canadian nation, and whereas in Canada, in recent years, terms like "Anglophones" and "Francophones" have been coming into common usage, and whereas when an individual becomes a Canadian citizen he or she is told by the judge "Now you are a Canadian", therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That members of this House urge the government to ban terms like "Francophones" and "Anglophones" in government usage and adopt the word "Canadian".

ENERGY

FIRM PROPOSAL TO PRODUCING PROVINCES ON ENERGY PRICING AGREEMENT

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In connection with an energy pricing agreement, has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made a firm proposal to the producing provinces and, if so, will he indicate to the House the basic elements of such a proposal?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have had the opportunity of discussion with the ministers of the producing provinces. We have considered elements of the pricing formula. The general elements of the pricing formula are known to this House. They include a formula of the blended price for oil sold in Canada.

As to the specific elements of this proposal, they are still being considered and discussed with the provinces. When those discussions are further advanced or concluded, I would be very pleased to inform my hon. colleagues of the details of this particular proposal.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, will the minister confirm that he proposed to the producing provinces an annual price increase of $1 per barrel on Canadian crude oil, plus an export tax on natural gas?

Mr. Lalonde: "Non, madame le Président."

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I wonder, then, whether the minister would confirm that it is not the intention of this government to reach an agreement by the end of June but, rather, it is government policy to permit the present agreement to expire on June 30 and then act unilaterally as a federal government to set prices after that date?

Mr. Lalonde: Absolutely not, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING IDENTICAL PRICE FOR GAS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister announced recently the construction of a pipeline in Quebec. In connection with natural gas, in view of the fact that Quebec is levying, I understand, an 8 per cent tax on natural gas, did the minister meet with his counterpart or with authorities in Quebec to discuss that matter which is, on one hand, a revenue for Quebec but could also be an additional cost for other areas?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I thank the hon. member for raising this matter which is surely an interesting point for Quebeckers, especially for those who reside between Montreal and eastern Quebec and who, as the result of our recent announcement, will finally have natural gas available. I must say that so far it has been impossible for me to meet my Quebec colleague. As the hon. member knows, in recent weeks Quebec politicians were busy dealing with other matters. We have agreed to meet on Monday or Tuesday two weeks from now, that is, on June 16 or 17. I will be pleased to acquaint my Quebec colleague with the problem raised by the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the same minister. If I understand correctly, the purpose of the negotiations with the producing provinces is to ensure uniformity of prices in some areas. Could the minister indicate whether he will recommend identical prices for Ontario and Quebec? I am not referring to the 8 per cent tax, but to the price of natural gas.

Mr. Lalonde: This is certainly a possibility we will consider. No final decision has yet been made, as the hon. member is certainly aware, for Montreal is still included in the Ontario price zone. What must now be determined is whether this price zone should be enlarged to include Quebec City and even, some day, the maritime provinces. This issue has not been settled yet but will be dealt with during the next few weeks.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I should like the minister to give more information, for instance whether he is thinking of having identical prices in Ontario and Quebec, considering the zones that will be identified with regard to the arrangement?

Mr. Lalonde: As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, this theory is now under study and consideration. However, no decision has yet been taken in that regard.

INDUSTRY

NEGOTIATIONS TO IMPROVE AUTO INDUSTRY AND GUARANTEE JOBS FOR CANADIANS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Given that a large number—30,000 or more—of Canadian auto workers are unemployed and that, in spite of the fact that most of the cars manufactured in Canada under the auto pact are sold in the United States, we are still suffering an $11 billion deficit, and given that foreign car manufacturers are making great inroads into the U.S. market, which will undoubtedly result in cutbacks in our sales in the United States, what negotiations are presently taking place between the Canadian government and foreign car manufacturers to try to offset the difficulty that we are presently facing and to guarantee jobs for Canadian workers?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my officials have been in contact with a number of manufacturers, but I want to report to the House particularly about my personal efforts to ensure that Canada gets a fair share of Japanese automotive investment in North America.

I raised this question directly with the Prime Minister of Japan and his minister of finance when they were in Canada some weeks ago. I followed this up with discussions with the Japanese ambassador, and I intend to go to Japan to meet with officials of the Japanese government and the heads of motor vehicle manufacturing companies as soon as their election is out of the way and they form a new government. This is a matter to which I intend to apply, and have been applying, the very greatest priority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question, if I may. I applaud the minister's intent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Unfortunately, however, the United States government has already entered into negotiations and has received commitments from manufacturers in Europe and Japan for the manufacturing of vehicles in the United States. The minister is much too slow off the mark.

When can we expect to hear from the hon. minister exactly what kind of commitments have been obtained by this government to protect Canadian jobs in the auto field?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, as usual the NDP is desperately trying to play catch-up in attempting to match our present efforts on behalf of Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I have already reported to the House on our considerable efforts to obtain our fair share in both parts and motor vehicle manufacturing in Canada. In fact, when we begin, hopefully at the end of this month, our formal consultations with the United States on the auto pact, we will be discussing with them a common framework for dealing with the matter of third country imports, particularly from Japan.

I want to assure the House that this matter continues to have my highest priority. I welcome the support of members of the NDP, even though they have been rather late in recognizing this priority matter when it comes to the interests of Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1425)

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the minister reminds me of Gerald Bouey: he waits for the U.S. to do something. Is it the minister's intention to hope to latch on to the end results of the negotiations between the United States and the foreign car manufacturers, or does he intend to initiate any action on his own in an effort to protect the Canadian economy and to provide job opportunities not only for workers who are unemployed but for people right across the country?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend had listened as carefully as he talks loudly, he would have heard that we are taking our own, independent action to protect the interests of Canadian workers and Canadian communities.

I have already said to the House that I raised this matter directly with Prime Minister Ohira of Japan, as well as with his minister of finance. I have called in the Japanese ambassador to insist that Canadian interests be taken into account with regard to Japanese investment in the automotive industry in North America. I will be going directly to Japan to talk personally with the new government and with heads of the automotive companies. I thought I had made this all very clear. I am sorry that my hon. friend, as I said, is more interested in making loud talk than listening carefully to our constructive action to help Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ENERGY

INVESTMENT ENERGY PROJECTS—CREATION OF JOBS—AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it also concerns the area of jobs. The minister is aware that investment in energy projects in this country in the 1980s is projected to create approximately 350,000 jobs. That means a great deal to people in the province of Ontario as well as to people in other industrialized areas of the country.

I was hoping that the minister might be able to commit to the House today his intention to achieve an agreement with Alberta by the end of this month so that those jobs can be created.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would hope to achieve an agreement by the end of this week, but it takes two or three people to make an agreement.

Mr. Andre: You cancelled the meeting.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER OF ENERGY AND MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT ON JOB CREATION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Since these jobs which will arise, from investment in energy, throughout the 1980s amount to 350,000 industrial jobs, has the Minister of Employment and Immigration had any discussions whatsoever with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding these jobs, and where do they fit in with respect to the minister's own projections for job creation over the next five years?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and myself have a variety of conversations about a variety of topics, including the question of how the investment of the federal government in the past, present and in the future will aid substantially in creating jobs in this country.

We are in pitch with our own priorities and our own targets. We want to use many of the major resource projects that are being planned to incorporate, enlist and recruit the labour available in this country that is not being used, particularly women and native people. That is part of the reason we established the kind of training programs which I announced on Monday.

PROJECTED PRICE INCREASES FOR CRUDE OIL

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As a member who comes from a consuming province as far as energy products are concerned, I was rather startled to hear some of the replies given by the minister to the questions of the hon. member for Perth.

My question to the minister is this. If one dollar is not the price which the minister has suggested to the producing provinces as a suitable price increase, presumably in July, for crude oil, would the minister indicate—notwithstanding his blended oil formula, and that type of thing—what, in fact, he did suggest as a price increase in July or for the next six months of this year?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I said that we are in the process of negotiation. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to negotiate on the floor of the House of Commons. Discussions are going on with the producing provinces and further discussions will take place. As soon as we have reached a conclusion of those negotiations, I will be very happy to inform my hon. colleague about their latest results.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since this is the first time since mid-1977 that we are coming to the conclusion of an existing crude oil pricing agreement between Alberta and Canada, I would ask the minister: on July 1, in the absence of a further extension to the June, 1977, agreement, and considering that the minister has stated the Canadian government will take no unilateral action, is it fair for us to assume that Alberta and, presumably, the other oil producing provinces are free to raise the price of their crude oil?

● (1430)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have stated repeatedly in this House that our purpose is to achieve a negotiated agreement. This is still our objective and first priority. I hope by the end of the month to be able to announce to my hon. colleague that indeed we have reached agreement.

INDUSTRY

ENERGY SELF-SUFFICIENCY—GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS TO ACHIEVE OBJECTIVE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question further to the one raised by the hon. member for Rosedale. It is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

A central theme of the Conservative party energy policy—a theme which is well accepted by the Canadian manufacturing industry, many of whom are located in central Canada—is that there is a massive economic opportunity for manufacturing companies in supplying the requirements of the energy industry in reaching Canada's energy objectives, particularly in reaching self-sufficiency in oil. Does the minister agree with this point of view? If so, is the government developing any programs whereby Canadian manufacturing companies can be encouraged to participate fully in reaching self-sufficiency in oil in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, if I understand the hon. member's question correctly, he wants to know what we are doing to encourage Canadian manufacturing companies to take full advantage of the job-creating opportunities in efforts to reach energy self-sufficiency.

The answer is yes, we are working now on a number of programs designed to have that effect. We have committees working in touch with companies undertaking major energy projects to make sure that they take full account of the availability of expertise, machinery and other materials from Canadian sources. I hope a further, definite announcement will be made on this score very soon.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the response of the minister is as vague as all the other responses we have received from him in the House. I was looking for some specific programs that will encourage companies to source their supplies from Canadian companies and not go offshore and exacerbate our balance of payments problem.

Is the minister's reticence related in any way to the recent bail-out of the Chrysler Corporation, and is the Chrysler program in any way cutting into our ability as a country to encourage Canadian manufacturing companies to take advantage of some real opportunities in the future, rather than bailing out companies of the past?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am sure the many Conservative members who have written to me and spoken to me personally asking for support for Chrysler will be dismayed, to say the least, if not astounded by the negative response of my hon. friend at this effort to save at least 40,000 Canadian jobs. Now we know where this key spokesman for the Conservative party stands when it comes to saving 40,000 Canadian jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Keep going, Herb.

Mr. Gray: It is on the record. I want to add, with respect to the program to assist the Chrysler Corporation, that there is no immediate loan or subsidy. There are loan guarantees that come into effect beginning in two years only if specific commitments are met. Among those commitments are requirements for greater sourcing from Canadian companies.

Not only does this program help Canadian companies and Canadian workers, but it does not impede in any way our ongoing efforts to make sure that companies undertaking major projects in Canada use Canadian companies for sources of supply, and much more than was the case or would have been the case had the Conservatives stayed in office.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHARGE OF RAPE—DEFENCE OF CONSENT—AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice, to whom I have given notice through his parliamentary secretary.

On May 20 last, the Supreme Court of Canada handed down its decision in the case of Pappajohn v. The Queen, which was an appeal from conviction on a charge of rape. In the decision the court held that if an accused person honestly believed that the woman was consenting, even if there were no grounds whatsoever for that belief—no reasonable grounds at all—the accused should be acquitted completely. Our court thus followed the Morgan decision, a bitterly criticized decision of the English House of Lords.

Is the minister prepared to reverse the effect of this ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in the amendments which he will be introducing, hopefully, shortly to the Criminal Code and, in so doing, will he remove this very serious injustice to all women in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to make a complete review of this issue. This is a very important decision, and following the review we are now making of the Criminal Code of Canada we shall see whether this decision should bring changes, or not, to the Criminal Code.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. I am very pleased to hear that this question will be receiving priority attention in the review of the Criminal Code.

I would ask the minister, however, whether he will assure the House that, rather than waiting for an omnibus Criminal Code amendment bill, he will move quickly in this area and introduce a separate bill dealing specifically with the question of sexual offences against women, and whether in that bill he will remove the totally unacceptable spousal immunity whereby a husband cannot be prosecuted and convicted of rape against his wife?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, a review of that problem has now been under way for several weeks in the justice department, and I hope to be able to go ahead very soon. However, because we are dealing here with very complicated problems, I feel that I am not now in a position to give a more specific answer to the hon. member.

[English]

ENERGY

HIGH PRICE OF FUELS—POSSIBILITY OF SUBSIDY FOR LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the price of transportation and heating fuels will rise very rapidly when the $3 billion per year subsidy on imported oil is phased out and the government sets a new Canadian oil price, is it the intention of the government to greatly assist low income families meet these increased fuel costs by introducing an energy subsidy similar to the one introduced by the former government in its budget, which would pay $80 per adult and $30 per child, per year, to a family with a combined annual income of less than $21,000?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. colleague for his interesting suggestion, but I want to point out to him that this government did not wait for an increase in the price of oil to take care of a group for which it is particularly responsible. Far from increasing the benefits by only $80 a year, as the Progressive Conservatives intended to do, my hon. colleague will surely recall that this government recently increased the guaranteed income supplement for all our senior citizens by $35 a month, which is much more than what the Tories had suggested.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, it is very easy to see from the minister's answer how he has gained the reputation of being the elusive minister in the cabinet.

An hon. Member: The Artful Dodger.

Mr. Hees: In addition to the old age pension supplement, which was supported 100 per cent by all members of the House, would he give consideration to introducing, also, energy supplement to assist low income families meet the very high and steadily increasing fuel costs which they will have to meet in the very near future?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague is asking whether or not I shall consider his suggestion. As he knows, the government gives the greatest possible consideration to everything that comes from him.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ADMIRAL FALLS—CRITICISM OF EXPENSIVE BRUSSELS RESIDENCE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I would direct my question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the lavish arrangements made by the government for living accommodation for Admiral Falls, Canadian NATO representative in Brussels and former chief of our general staff, at a rental of $8,200 per month—not far short of $100,000 per year.

● (1440)

Is it government policy to permit rental of extravagant and sumptuous living accommodations for any such senior Canadian official stationed abroad, and how does the government justify the expenditure of almost $100,000 per year in this particularly outrageous example of ripping off the taxpayer? I hope the Prime Minister himself, rather than the parliamentary secretary, will answer this question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No, he will not.

Mr. Crosbie: Silent behind a woman.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: Belgium is as important a country as it is a delightful one. When it comes to Brussels in particular, I might point out to the hon. member that it does have the headquarters of the EEC and NATO, among other things. Therefore, it attracts a certain number of foreign dignitaries, as a result of which rents are rather high in Brussels.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Does it have a swimming pool?

An hon. Member: That will teach you Pierre.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. Appolloni: Therefore, it is incumbent upon Canada to provide suitable accommodation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: I am sure even the hon. member, who is not noted for his generosity in this House, will realize that neither a shack nor a lean-to are suitable accommodation for a man who represents the finest forces in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I would like to preface my supplementary. With all due respect to the parliamentary secretary, I realize that question was difficult for her to answer; it was sloughed off on her by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. Will he guarantee that a full investigation will be carried out by the government with regard to the Admiral Falls' situation, and that all details will be made public as soon as possible? Particularly, will the Prime Minister also guarantee to the House whether it is now, or not now, established government policy that the office of the Minister of National Defence be staffed primarily by persons approved or recommended first by Admiral Falls?

An hon. Member: Come on, Pierre.

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, the only guarantee I can give is, if the hon. member decides to go to Brussels, I shall personally ask Admiral Falls to entertain him in a shack or in a lean-to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

STATUS OF WOMEN

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY HIRING PRACTICES OF CNR—CROWN CORPORATIONS AND AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. Just two hours ago, three women announced at a press conference that they have filed complaints with the Canadian Human Rights Commission against CNR because of sex discrimination in hiring.

Will the minister tell the House whether he is prepared to negotiate an affirmative action agreement with CNR promoting women into skilled trades and prohibiting discriminatory exams and height requirements?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, all I can tell the hon. member is that I will be very pleased to look into the case. The fact that a complaint has been filed before the Canadian Human Rights Commission means that, very clearly, it is within the jurisdiction of that commission. The legislation sets out that the responsibility for looking at the case now rests with the Human Rights Commission, as it is proper to do. But I will certainly be glad to look at the case. We have constant communication with Mr. Fairweather, who is the head of the commission.

The affirmative action program that we are now establishing, as we have said before, will certainly come before cabinet. We are looking at questions about how it may apply to Crown corporations.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear that the minister will be pleased to look into this specific case. With regard to affirmative action, let me ask a supplementary question. Considering that this charge against CNR follows on the heels of another sex discrimination case in a Crown corporation, that being the firing of two women from skilled jobs by Canadair, in Quebec, will the minister tell the House whether Crown corporations fall under the affirmative action program he referred to on Monday and, if so, when compliance with equality standards will be enforced?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would like to make this plain to the hon. member. He may forget that it was the previous Liberal government that established the Canadian Human Rights Commission and put the legislation into effect which now gives these people the opportunity to take their grievances forward to the commission.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It was this Parliament, unanimously.

Mr. Axworthy: And that is the reason it is there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: That is why we had a human rights bill, and why we have a commission which allows these particular cases to be heard on a case by case basis.

On the more general question of affirmative action, we have stated in the throne speech and I have stated in this House that we are presently preparing an assessment of the affirmative action program. This will be brought before cabinet in a matter of two or three weeks to be examined, and we will be making an announcement as to how it will apply generally throughout the public service and the area of Crown corporations.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY WHETHER SETTLEMENT REACHED WITH CUPW IN NATIONAL INTEREST

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I will try to put it with at least as much humility as that displayed by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland.

Can the minister assure this House and the Canadian public that the settlement reached with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is in the national interest and is not the 26 per cent give-away as reportedly alleged by the hon. member for York-Peel?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to announce to the House that yesterday afternoon the Treasury Board ratified the agreement between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Madam Speaker, this wage agreement represents an increase of 8.1 per cent for the entire contract period. As for the other benefits awarded under this contract, including the wage agreement, they represent an increase of 10.4 per cent for the entire contract period.

Madam Speaker, it should be noted that this agreement is in the best interests of all Canadians. It is quite a reasonable agreement and one which we are very happy to have reached with CUPW; it augurs well for labour relations within the Post Office.

[English]

SETTLEMENT WITH CUPW—EFFECT ON MAIL RATES—COST TO DEPARTMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, my question is almost supplementary to the one asked by the previous questioner.

Now that the contract with CUPW has been ratified by both the union and Treasury Board, will the Postmaster General inform the House how much it will add to the Post Office budget for the fiscal year and the deficit—which has been running at a half billion dollars for the past five years—and could the hon. gentleman indicate whether his plan to increase first-class mail rates possibly up to 25 cents a letter flows directly out of this rich settlement?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member has somewhat lost touch with the Post Office Department in the last few years, because the deficits have varied from one year to the next and have not been consistent, as he would have us believe.

Furthermore, we must surely revise certain postal rates periodically. This is done every two years or so, and I expect we will follow this tradition and soon submit new proposals to the House of Commons which, Madam Speaker, will not come into effect immediately since we agreed several years ago with postal users to give them the required time to adjust to proposed increases.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Madam Speaker, I think you will agree that that is a rather oblique response. Perhaps I can approach the question from a different direction.

In view of the impossible financial straitjacket in which Canada Post has placed itself, as evidenced by the renewed freeze on letter carrier service, for example, which is the most visible service of the Post Office, is this the beginning of the phase-out of traditional postal service in the face of growing competition from private couriers and the new technology of electronic mail?

● (1450)

Mr. Ouellet: I am glad the hon. member is now asking his questions, rather than following the common practice of some hon. members who do not have the courage to ask questions but, instead, use Standing Order 43 as a means of making all kinds of wrong assertions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Allow me to tell the hon. member, because he has the courage to ask questions directly, that the last time letter carrier service was extended was by a Liberal government. Under the Conservative government, nothing significant was done in relation to increasing the service of letter carriers.

I am pleased to tell the hon. member that, now we are back with a Liberal government, we shall be looking at our commitment with regard to postal services in a number of cities where letter carrier service is already in effect, and hoping to extend those services.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REHIRING OF LAID-OFF PERSONNEL

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Using the analogy of the Postmaster General, who now says we are under a Liberal government with its generosity toward public servants, I wonder whether the President of the Treasury Board would tell the House what is intended by him with respect to a host of professionals and other public servants who were laid off by his government in 1978, some of whom have been placed but many of whom have not been placed notwithstanding promises made by that government that they would be placed.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I would remind the hon. gentleman that no lay-off policy was introduced by the Liberal administration. He may be referring to the policy introduced by my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel, who had to introduce such a policy when he inferred that he would eliminate 60,000 jobs in the public service.

The hon. member knows very well that efforts to find other employment within the public service for people laid off because of the Liberal constraint program preceding May 22, 1979, have been exceedingly successful.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Surely the minister must be aware of the famous shot in the dark of the night by the Prime Minister on August 1, 1978, when lay-offs of public servants began. The Prime Minister can aim Justin's gun at me if he wants, but that is what happened to the public service. One of the things that Liberals—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Could we have the question, please?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the minister himself, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, the hon. member for Ottawa West and I have called for the development of retraining programs for the public service.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am doing my best to put my question. If you could caution hon. members over there and ask them to do their best to stay quiet, the President of the Treasury Board knows—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The President of the Treasury Board knows—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier knows, and the hon. member for Ottawa West knows—

Madam Speaker: Order. The question period is designed to receive answers to things the hon. member does not know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Given the promise by the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —when is the President of the Treasury Board going to make announcements with respect to the retraining programs for public servants which were promised during the course of the election and about which he has been strangely silent since the election?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I take exception to any suggestion that I have been silent. In fact, I discussed with the hon. gentleman the importance we attach to training and to retraining. We are, I hope, bringing forward some significant programs in this regard, and I hope to be able to make announcements in the House in the very near future. I shall be delighted to discuss further with the hon. gentleman some of his ideas which sometimes, I must say with respect, are quite good.

PARKS CANADA

CANCELLATION OF MOVE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH—GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, this is not entirely in keeping with the claim of members opposite to generosity in their dealings with public servants. It was brought to my attention a few hours ago that 35 employees of the Parks Canada regional office in Cornwall—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, in the interests of the civil servants concerned, I hope hon. members opposite will listen to this. Thirty-five employees of the Parks Canada regional office in Cornwall have either asked for transfer or given notice of their intended resignation as a result of the cancellation of the Parks Canada move to Peterborough, there is also a mass grievance presently before the Civil Service Alliance as a result of that cancellation and, in addition, there are signed petitions.

I ask the Minister of the Environment to tell us what he intends to do. In the light of what is taking place, does he intend to reconsider his cancellation of the Parks Canada move to Peterborough from Cornwall?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Patronage.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that if the hon. member started to talk, he would get silence.

Mr. Roberts: No, Madam Speaker.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSION—DREDGING OF KEATING CHANNEL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question also is directed to the Minister of the Environment. I am sure the minister is aware that the Toronto Harbour Commission has begun dredging activities in the Keating channel with funds partially provided by the federal government. According to officials, some of the highly contaminated toxic waste may affect the Toronto water supply.

Given the serious reservations felt by both federal and provincial officials, and the doubts expressed by the minister's own officials as to whether flood control is a realistic reason for proceeding, would the minister tell us why no attempt has been made to begin EARP hearings over the past five years?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): As the hon. member has explained, we are opposed to the development and we have expressed that view very strongly. As I understand the situation, the determining factor here is with the municipality or the land use responsibility of the municipality.

As far as the EARP process is concerned, I would have to check and give the hon. member a reply. But we share the concern he has expressed and we have communicated that concern to the people responsible.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has just told us that his department is opposed to this project. Is he indicating to the House and to the people of Toronto that federal funds will be withheld from this project?

Mr. Roberts: I am not ready to make such a commitment at this point. At the present time we are examining the kind of approach we should take to the decision which has been reached.

TRANSPORT

SEAWORTHINESS OF CN FERRY "WILLIAM CARSON"

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, the Supreme Court of Newfoundland indicated in a judgment that the Canadian National ferry William Carson was unseaworthy. This is the ferry which sank in 1977 and was the subject of an investigation sponsored by the Ministry of Transport which found that the vessel was seaworthy.

In view of yesterday's finding by the Supreme Court which cast serious doubt on the inspection capability of the minister's department and which, indeed, placed the minister's department in a situation of conflict of interest in this respect, I would ask the minister whether he is prepared to order an independent inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the sailing of the CN ferry William Carson in 1977 before she sunk off the coast of Labrador.

● (1500)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the decision came out only yesterday, and I think the cautious thing for me to do would be to inform myself of the decision and to read the decision before commenting on it further.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS ASKED TO ADVISE MINISTER ON PROGRAMS—CONSTITUTIONALITY THEREOF

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It deals with asking members of Parliament to advise the minister on the various programs the minister has. The letter he wrote to me says:

—I am now inviting you to participate by indicating your support or non-support of all eligible proposals within these streams.

This is a very disturbing type of invitation to a member of Parliament, in view of our knowledge of what responsible government consists of and that only ministers should be able to propose the spending of money.

I would like to ask the minister, in all seriousness, if he could relieve the uncertainty that is in my mind about the propriety and even the constitutional aspects of this type of approach. I think the correct procedure is for the minister to ask the Speaker of the House if he might consult with the Law Clerk of the House to see if this move, or this request by the minister meets the propriety which should exist on the part of a member of Parliament, and also to consider the constitutional aspects.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I take the hon. member's question in the seriousness with which it is posed. I want to assure him that what we were doing was simply putting into effect a practice which has been used by past governments in a variety of ways, which is to seek advice from whichever sources. We, as a government, have felt that the best source of advice as to local priorities in the various regions of Canada is members of Parliament.

I simply recall, for the hon. member, that we have had in the past ministerial advisory groups in each of the constituencies. Unfortunately, in the past administration the Conservative government abolished any form of consultation or advisory system involving members of Parliament. When I took over responsibility for the summer program, we attempted to reintroduce a program whereby members of Parliament would be able to provide their advice and recommendations to me. At the same time, we were soliciting the advice and recommendations of our officials, provincial bodies and other community people. Those different streams of advice came into my office and judgments were made as to the best projects.

As I indicated in my speech on Monday, under the new job-creation program we will be reintroducing the idea and concept of the ministerial advisory group. But it is neither unconstitutional nor improper. If it is, it has been improper and unconstitutional for many years. I suggest, although the hon. member is certainly far more experienced than I, that it is really the prerogative of the minister to seek advice from whichever source, and I happened to conclude that members of Parliament are the best sources of advice on our regional priorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, in all seriousness, I suggest to the minister that many of us in the House who take very seriously our oath of office, and so forth, would feel much happier if the minister asked Your Honour to ask the Clerk to speak to the Law Officer of the House and get a judgment from him. I would take that as a much better precedent than just the viewpoint that previous governments have done this.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's years in Parliament warrant his advice being taken very seriously. I am simply saying that, by precedent alone, this practice has been followed many times in the past. To satisfy him, I would be very glad to speak to Your Honour, with whom I enjoy speaking at any opportunity, and the Law Clerk.

However, I simply assure the hon. member that there was no intention to do anything improper. This is something many governments have practised. There are all kinds of advisory groups, councils and organizations the government uses to get the best and broadest range of opinion.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MALONE—FAILURE TO CONVENE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

Madam Speaker: Order, please. On Thursday last, May 29, 1980, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) raised as a question of privilege the failure of certain committees of the House to meet and attend to their usual business. The hon. member said that a number of those committees had not been organized, that others had met only to have their organizational meetings take place but that they really had not met at that time.

The hon. member for Crowfoot referred in his intervention to a number of specific problems which he thought should have been raised in the Standing Committee on Agriculture or the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to which the estimates had been referred.

As I indicated in my remarks last Thursday when listening to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot, there were two main points at issue. The first was that certain committees had not met at the time the question of privilege was raised in the House. Hon. members will have noticed, of course, that since then at least four committees have been organized and several others have held meetings. For instance, yesterday alone 12 committees were having their meetings, today three more meetings have been scheduled, and there are five scheduled for tomorrow. I hope this will help solve the problem raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot. However, I must again remind the House, as I did at the time the question was raised, that the scheduling of the meetings of the committees does not come under the jurisdiction of the Chair but is the responsibility of the whip of the government as it is stated, and as it was referred to by some hon. members, in citation 579 of Beauschesne.

The second question raised in the question of privilege of the hon. member of Crowfoot dealt with the possibility, or the lack of it, of debating an urgent issue. This difficulty seems to have been resolved in part, as indeed it is possible to resolve these kinds of difficulties, as I myself have suggested in previous rulings. The difficulty raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot has been cured, at least in part, since last Friday the House debated a supply motion dealing with some of the problems referred to by the hon. member and other hon. members who have risen in the House to speak about this subject.

I have to agree with the hon. member that the reasons for allowing a question of privilege are, to use his own word, narrow. It is true that it is not easy to define what is privilege. The reasons are extremely narrow, and questions of privilege are too often used in the House to disagree with another member, or to express dissatisfaction with the manner in which a question has been answered. There are all sorts of other grievances members might have.

However, the reasons for allowing questions of privilege are indeed extremely narrow. I agree with the hon. member on that point. I can understand the hon. member's frustration over the circumstances in which he raised his question of privilege because the problem was a serious one, and he did want to debate it, but he and other hon. members did have a chance to debate it.

As I say, I agree that the reasons for allowing questions of privilege are narrow. As a matter of fact, I remind the House that the reasons are extremely narrow. In this case, as in many other cases in which questions of privilege have been raised, I must state that I cannot find a prima facie case of privilege in the question raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot.

MR. DOMM—PROCEDURE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege flows out of the question period today. I feel that as members of Parliament in this House we should all be treated equally. It is obvious to me, as a result of the business which flowed out of the question period, that all members in this House were offered opportunities for supplementaries. As it will be recorded in Hansard, Your Honour asked me to sit down and be quiet in order that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) might answer the question. If my memory serves me correctly, the exact words Your Honour used were that, if the Minister of the Environment would answer the question, the House might remain more quiet. Your Honour's words were something to that effect. So I sat down. The minister answered "no" and sat down. I was immediately on my feet, noticed by everyone on this side of the House, in an effort to pose my supplementary question.

I suggest that this be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to find out if all hon. members are entitled to supplementaries. If they are not, I would respectfully request that you supply to this House some reason why we are not allowed a supplementary.

● (1510)

Madam Speaker: It is true that I did not allow the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) a supplementary question today. The reason for that is that that precise question had been asked several times of the minister, and answers to it had been given. I cannot make any judgment on the quality of the answer; I can only note that the question was asked several times. All hon. members are equal, but the decision on whether or not to allow a supplementary question is left to the discretion of the Chair.

Today the question period was very busy. Members on this side of the House wishing to be recognized were extremely numerous. Some hon. members had wished to be recognized for several days, and I was feeling just as frustrated as hon. members might have been that I was not able to recognize them. Therefore, since the question from the hon. member had been asked several times in the House, while many other members were asking to be recognized, I decided to give the chance to another hon. member to ask a question. That is not a question of privilege. Again, the supplementary question is at the discretion of the Chair, and if the hon. member will look up in Hansard he will know that he is not the only one who does not always get his supplementary question. In most cases, on the other side of the House, supplementary questions are never allowed; and even on this side of the House, supplementary questions are not always allowed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. OLIVIER—USE OF BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES WITHIN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been a member of Parliament for eight years and as we are aware, this House has made it quite clear that each member could use his mother tongue, or that any person inside the Parliament buildings could also be answered in his or her tongue.

Madam Speaker, I have to inform you that twice last evening, and again this morning, certain persons could not be served in French nor obtain answers in French in the House of Commons, despite all your efforts, Madam Speaker, to change this.

I feel it is most important, at this point in time, that every member in this House realize, whether he speaks French or English, that he must be able to obtain service and answers either in French or in English within the House of Commons. The incident happened outside of this place, inside the Centre Block, and also in the Confederation Building and in the parliamentary restaurant.

Madam Speaker, I would appreciate your diligent attention to this problem to help those who want to be understood, and they understand once and for all that this is everyone's Parliament rather than the Parliament of one culture in Canada.

Madam Speaker: I am taking good note of the remarks made by the hon. member, and I must tell him that very precise and constant instructions are given that there be at all times, at both main entrances to the House of Commons at least, persons capable at any time of answering visitors in this country's both official languages. I shall inquire once more, and if today nobody in a position to communicate in French with visitors was posted at the main entrance to the House of Commons, I will take immediate steps to remedy a situation that I find unacceptable just as much as the hon. member does.

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I agree with the tenor of the remarks made by the hon. member, but I think the error that he has made is in casting aspersions on everybody in particular who works in all the buildings which he named. He did not say whether he meant the protective staff, the Mounted Police, or who it was. In other words, he is putting under a cloud all the public servants in this building who try to render bilingual services in both official languages.

I think that if a member is going to raise a matter of this kind he should be prepared to produce evidence, say what he is talking about, when it happened, give the names of the people who were unable to speak French or English, as the case may be, rather than come in here and cast aspersions on all the many good people who work in the protective service and the other services in this building.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has completely misunderstood the point of order, the question of privilege I should say, raised by my knowledgeable colleague for Longueuil. My colleague for Longueuil never had any intention of criticizing the good services given by civil servants or the staff of the House of Commons who do their best to answer the general public and more particularly hon. members in both languages. The hon. member for Longueuil had no such intention, on the contrary.

What he said with much pertinence is that it happened in some cases and he was careful not to give any names or specific examples today because he does not indulge in gossip like some other members in this House. He said that he was aware of two or three instances when people had not been able to get service in their language. I think that his complaint is justified and that the reaction of Madam Speaker to the comments made by the hon. member for Longueuil is also very justified and very favourable. I deplore that the hon. member should seek to brand these fully warranted remarks and objections as mere gossip. We are not here to single out civil servants who refuse to deal with people who demand to be served in the language of their choice, but to see to it that the policy of bilingualism is applied as much as possible, and that the Canadian public and hon. members are served in their own language. We are not here to write a gossip column where we can censure this or that civil servant for not doing a good job. What matters is the spirit of the remarks the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) has made, not an effort to show that such and such individuals have not done their duty. I am sure the Chair has understood the gist of the remarks the hon. member for Longueuil has made, and that the hon. member opposite will realize from now on that these kinds of objections are not made for him to spice his gossip sheet but to make sure that the House of Commons is recognized as a truly bilingual institution.

Madam Speaker: I should like to put an end to this discussion, if I may. The purpose is not to accuse anybody of not speaking both languages but to assign duties. Surely there are places and areas on Parliament Hill where visitors should be dealt with in either of the official languages. The whole idea is to assign duties properly. I assume full responsibility for this, and I shall personally investigate the facts which the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) has brought to light.

[English]

MR. HNATYSHYN—STATEMENT MADE BY POSTMASTER GENERAL DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the exchange today in the question period involving the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not here, but I feel that it is incumbent upon me, as a member of this House, to raise this question of privilege at the earliest opportunity because, in my estimation, in my submission, the Postmaster General has cast aspersions, not only on the members of this House, but also with respect to the operation under the Standing Order, and indeed, on the Chair, Madam Speaker.

The Postmaster General, in response to a question from the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), indicated that he appreciated receiving a question, because in effect he suggested that a device had been used by members of the opposition in moving motions under Standing Order 43, that somehow this was wrong, and not a procedure in accordance with the privileges and rights of members of Parliament.

An hon. Member: They lacked courage.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They lacked courage with respect to moving motions under this particular provision.

I take very serious exception to that suggestion in view of the fact that there is a specific provision for the moving of motions under Standing Order 43. The Postmaster General will know that there is opportunity, in the event that unanimous consent is granted to the motion, to debate the issue, and for the Postmaster General to participate, as any other member of this House, with respect to any motion that is moved.

I resist the temptation to suggest that the Postmaster General is unfair and that he is, in fact, thin-skinned, and that he is a person who very often resorts to this kind of underhanded device. But I will quote, in support of this particular statement of privilege, citation 145 in the fourth edition of Beauchesne's, in which it states very clearly that no member, including a minister of the Crown, shall stand in his place and impute motives with respect to the activities or actions of any member of the House of Commons.

We have here a situation on a daily basis where members of the opposition have the right to move motions under Standing Order 43, and you, Madam Speaker, are the sole judge of the appropriateness of those motions. In fact you ask whether the individual motion has received unanimous consent of the House. I object to the Postmaster General casting reflection on Madam Speaker in the performance of your duties in this House. The Postmaster General ought to stand in his place, if he has the courage, if he is the man he likes to pretend he is, and if he is interested in the House, to withdraw any implication of motives by any member, including Madam Speaker.

● (1520)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Of course Liberal members have no respect for this House; they laugh at this. But Madam Speaker has a very difficult duty to perform. The fact is that it is clearly within the rules and the citation I have indicated. The Postmaster General in his remarks, as I heard them in the House, cast aspersions with respect to people who stand in the House and move motions under Standing Order 43.

I have one final comment in relation to this question of privilege. I feel I have moved motions with respect to the responsibilities of the Postmaster General relating to the operation of the Post Office in the province of Saskatchewan. I have attempted to obtain answers from the Postmaster General. I wrote him something in the vicinity of 50 letters on behalf of constituents, people in the Post Office and people interested in the operation of the Post Office. I have not had the courtesy of a reply from the Postmaster General to any of those letters. I still have not received one. I suggest that the motion under Standing Order 43 was one step toward convincing the government to change the wrong-headed policy that it was considering. There is some merit in motions under Standing Order 43. It has been demonstrated that, in using that device, we in the opposition can bring the government to its senses, and the Postmaster General in particular.

With respect to the operation of this House, if the Postmaster General continues to cast aspersions on members moving motions under Standing Order 43, Madam Speaker should ask him, under the citation I have indicated, to stand in his place and withdraw any implication of motive with respect to the operation of that rule.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief in my intervention. There is another aspect to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and that is the direct statement of the minister accusing those on this side of the House who raised motions under Standing Order 43 and not putting questions to ministers, of lacking courage. Those were his words, that they lacked courage and that is why motions under Standing Order 43 were moved. Page 111 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne clearly lists the word "coward" as being unparliamentary. The accusation that a member or members lack courage is a clear implication of cowardice, and I ask the Chair to apply that logic.

If the hon. member for Saskatoon West has not already convinced the Chair that there is merit in his submission, certainly I suggest that there is merit in my submission to the Chair, that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) be asked to withdraw a reference he made in today's question period to a member or members moving motions under Standing Order 43 because they lacked the courage to put questions.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, in a brief word or two I should like to support the position taken by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and to urge that when the record is available Your Honour study it and see if something should not be said tomorrow about it.

The two points have been made; I simply underline them. On the one hand the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), in my view, imputed motives to an extent not permitted by the rules. Also he accused certain hon. members on this side of the House of being cowards or of lacking courage. Surely that kind of language is not appropriate, and I hope Your Honour will study the matter overnight.

While Your Honour is looking at the record of today's proceedings, I wish you would also look at the answer made by the same Postmaster General to the question put to him by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). I think Your Honour will find that nowhere in the answer given by the minister was the question itself answered. The minister simply used the question for the purpose of making a statement. If the minister wants to make a statement he can do so on statements by ministers, but he should not bootleg it in, in that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, obviously, it is not a question of privilege. The hon. member complains that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) replied to him that, in some cases, members opposite used that famous motion moved under Standing Order 43 for partisan purposes, but that they did not follow up with questions to the minister, thus preventing him from retorting to allegations which at times are far from the truth. So, I fail to see how an allegation made by the Postmaster General to the effect that they lack courage violates the members' privileges.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said that to lack courage in English is synonymous with "coward", but I think that our rules forbid unparliamentary language, and if the Postmaster General had called the member a swine, I realize the latter would have been justified in raising an objection and you would have been right in asking the minister to withdraw, since it is an unparliamentary term. But I do not think there is anything unparliamentary in saying that, generally speaking, hon. members who misuse the procedures lack courage. What I understand from the attitude of both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Yukon is that they would like to be allowed to lack courage and not be reminded they so do. Further, I think the House of Commons is not a place where hypocrisy should reign, Madam Speaker.

It is obvious that since the beginning of this session hon. members have misused Standing Order 43. Indeed, a large number of members move motions under Standing Order 43 for reasons other than those provided for. It is clearly stated that motions should be of urgent nature and that hon. members are dispensed with giving notice of their motion only when it is a matter of urgency and of pressing necessity.

But when hon. members want to congratulate certain organizations or mark political points and make allegations against government members without asking questions later on on the same subject, thereby preventing us on this side from answering back, if that is not lacking courage I fail to see how else I can describe it.

And if we, on this side of the House, are required to keep quiet, to refrain from commenting and to let members opposite misuse that procedure at times, I suggest it would be unfair to prevent the Postmaster General from taking this opportunity to complain as he did today.

So, Madam Speaker, I do not hesitate to assert that first, the language and behaviour of the Postmaster General was quite parliamentary, that he did not reflect on the privileges of any member, and I even commend him for having seized this opportunity to bring to the attention of the hon. members, especially those opposite, the fact that since the beginning of the session, they have clearly abused your patience and Standing Order 43 and that most of the time, they move motions under this Standing Order for purposes quite different from those for which it was really intended.

Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that after two elections in one year, when we have such a heavy legislative workload, hon. members manage to take 10, 15 or 20 minutes of the time of the House to raise matters as frivolous as the one that was raised today by the former minister of energy, mines and resources, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon. I think it is a shame and I suggest all those who are at present watching us on television rightly deplore the fact that parliamentarians do not act as they should. This is the kind of frivolous question of privilege that reflects on the image of this institution, Madam Speaker. It is because of this kind of filibustering that we do not always command as much respect as we should from the Canadian people.

• (1530)

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should have thought there was nothing more prone to deteriorating the reputation of Parliament than to have the leader of the House stand up and defend the indefensible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I would rather have had him, as the leading parliamentarian in the House, except for yourself, Madam Speaker, rise in his place and say that he would bring forcefully to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) the matters that have been raised, rather than hiding behind legalisms by saying this is not a question of privilege.

It is either a question of privilege or a point of order; it is one or the other. I do not want to repeat all the arguments, in order to save time, but it is one or the other. It was abusive and, however you want to deal with it, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was right. You should take a look at it overnight; you should review it not only in terms of a question of privilege, which has come to have quite a narrow interpretation in this House, but in terms of a point of order. You should review it in terms of whether it is appropriate, from the point of view of the operation of this Parliament, for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to cast doubts about this institution, that is, whether it is appropriate for a minister of the Crown, experienced like the Postmaster General is, to accuse other members when they use legitimate parliamentary devices of lacking courage.

Perhaps the President of the Privy Council should take his own advice and talk to the Postmaster General. In that way we might proceed in a much better way in this House.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I too wish to support the suggestion that you take these remarks under consideration. Surely the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is wrong. This issue does not involve motions under Standing Order 43, but rather it involves the abusive remarks of the minister, or whether the remarks of the minister were abusive. Although I was concerned when I sat through the debate on the Speech from the Throne when a minister spoke about the press in Quebec, and quite frankly spoke with rather fascist tendencies toward that press, I could accept that because that is part of debate. But we do not have to sit here and accept the kind of language he was using with the Quebec press, language used toward members of Parliament who are simply doing their job when standing and raising matters in the House of Commons under the provisions of Standing Order 43. When that occurs it becomes a matter of privilege.

I say the issue is not whether motions under Standing Order 43 are properly broad or improperly broad, or about the content of those motions; the issue is whether the minister can get away with this kind of abusive remark, in effect calling members of the opposition cowards.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, my intervention will be short, and it is in support of the position taken by the government House leader.

An hon. Member: Shame, shame!

Mr. Daudlin: There is absolutely no shame in supporting that position, from my point of view. I do not share the point of view expressed by some members on the other side. I suggest that at the very least there can be nothing more wrong with the phrase that was used, "lacking in courage", than in the phrase "fascist tendencies" as used by the hon. member who spoke just most recently. How they can argue on the one hand that the one is objectionable and the other is not, is beyond my comprehension.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre, the House leader for the Conservative party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) suggests that he has substantial difficulty in understanding why the House leader would stand up and argue what he calls legalese. You are here, Madam Speaker, to administer what amounts to justice in this House and, indeed, to deal with legalisms. For him to find it strange that we should be dealing with legalisms is to admit that he is unable to understand the workings of this House, and surely he has been here long enough to understand that.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has indicated that, in fact, he wants you to examine the record to determine whether the question posed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) had, indeed, been answered. His question essentially dealt with two points. You will find that the hon. member had asked whether the contract that had been signed, was in the nation's interests, and whether it was at the level of 26 per cent as alleged by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Both of those points or aspects of the question were answered in the response of the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Daudlin: I think you will find that is so when you examine the record.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I think the point being raised by the Postmaster General, and what gives me cause to rise and join in this debate, is the fact that members have sat on this side of the House and have recognized, as I am sure you have, that members opposite raise all kinds of allegations in motions under Standing Order 43, and present facts that are dubious and cannot be proved. They then fail to seek the floor in this House and put a question that would force them to substantiate those allegations, or prompt an answer by a minister that would in fact prove the allegations wrong. They do this when they fail to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to change the direction of the business of the House, thereby refusing to allow the government to go forward with the work of the day. They do this when they fail to obtain consent.

I am sure this persistent use of the rule, and I hesitate to say "abuse", which admittedly does exist, in a manner such as this leads one to question whether it would not be appropriate for hon. members opposite to pose a question, having failed to obtain consent under Standing Order 43. This leads one to question whether the hon. members really are sincere or are attempting to use Standing Order 43 as a tool to accomplish some other end. I have in mind their use of Standing Order 43 and their failure to follow up those motions by seeking the floor to ask a question, even recognizing that you, Madam Speaker, cannot recognize everyone who seeks the floor during the question period.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe we have two things taking place at the same time, a question of privilege and a point of order. The question of privilege relates to the matter raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and the point of order came later during the intervention by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on the same question of privilege. I am not clear whether the point of order was raised in respect of the language used by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) in his reply. I will have to check the record, because at the time the minister spoke I was not struck by anything that seemed to be unparliamentary. However, since several hon. members have raised questions about the language that was used, I will check the record.

I am not clear whether the word alleged to have been used was "coward", or the phrase "lack of courage" as suggested by some hon. members. Sometimes when an hon. member uses a word different from the one he might like to have used, the hon. member does so to soften the expression. Perhaps the minister followed that course in order not to use unparliamentary language. However, I want to look at the record.

I am sure the minister said of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) that he did have courage. If the implication was not well taken by some hon. members, that anybody else who did not do what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris did, did not have the courage and therefore was called a coward, I will have to look at that matter and review the exact wording in Hansard. I will speak to that matter another day.

● (1540)

I can deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with regard to the point that the answer was not related to the question. That is not for me to judge. A question was asked, an answer was given, and I do not have any opinion of the quality or the relevancy of an answer. This opinion is often expressed in the House. Many members feel that the answers are not related to the questions they have asked. I think that that disposes of that point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is entitled to his opinion in this regard.

[Translation]

With regard to the question of privilege of the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), it seems to me it will be easier for me to rule since, in his intervention, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) expressed an opinion on the way hon. members rise under Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Saskatoon West does not share the views of the minister, but that again is an opinion. Therefore, there is nothing here for me to decide.

The hon. member for Saskatoon West also brought up the possibility that the remarks of the Postmaster General may have implied indirect criticism of the Chair. Frankly, at the time the minister spoke, I did not feel I was being alluded to. But the hon. member is entirely correct when he says that it is up to the Speaker to decide whether or not the motions presented under Standing Order 43 respect our rules, and when I ask for the unanimous consent of the House, I suppose one must conclude I consider them in order. Consequently, the Chair alone decides in the matter and I thank the hon. member for having pointed that out; but in all honesty I must say I doubt that the Chair was criticized, even indirectly. Therefore, I am sorry I cannot hear other hon. members who would like to speak to the two questions that were brought up. I gave a ruling on the first. As for the second, concerning unparliamentary language, I shall look at Hansard and give a ruling a little later.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, very briefly, it was not my intention to raise a second question. It was merely to add another point to the original question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn). The submission was that it was simply either a question of privilege or a point of order, taken together.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. SIDDON—ATMOSPHERE IN CHAMBER WITH RESPECT TO S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order which is somewhat detached from the question of privilege which was just raised. However, I think that it does have to do with the atmosphere in the House this afternoon and the subsequent attack by government members opposite on the motives of hon. members on this side of the House with respect to placing motions under Standing Order 43.

In putting my motion under Standing Order 43, which was fourth on your list, I found the banter and the clamour in the chamber very difficult to deal with. Perhaps there are some ministers and members opposite who are under a lot of pressure these days which is making them temperamental. I believe that the background hubbub was coming from that side of the House because I believe that members on this side want to hear the motions under Standing Order 43. I think that that atmosphere of banter, or collegiality if one wishes to call it that, is really a frustrating calamity which is distracting to hon. members on this side when they are trying to put their motions.

With all due respect, Madam Speaker, I suggest that the atmosphere and the environment of the House, particularly during question period, are very important. I do not wish to see cabinet ministers provoked to the kind of exchanges which the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) seemed to be guilty of this afternoon. I suggest, Madam Speaker, that you speak to the House leaders in an attempt to prevent a recurrence of the calamity which we witnessed this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I think that the hon. member realizes, as I am beginning to learn, that from day to day the atmosphere in this House varies. I am trying to understand it, but I am not sure that I can understand fully the reasons which cause the House to be rowdy one day and more silent the next day. Sometimes it is merely that spring is in the air, and other times it is something else.

When members of the opposition feel that they have a point, they get very excited, and justifiably so. That makes for a lively question period. I do not like to rise like a springboard all the time to call order. I am sure that that would not be acceptable to hon. members. I watch for the moment when the House seems to be getting too noisy before I call order. I do not wish to cry wolf too often because I do not think that is a good tactic. I have been receiving the co-operation of the House. It is true that the atmosphere was a bit more rowdy this afternoon, but I do not think that hon. members were prevented from listening to the hon. member's motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon). It has to do with the whole business of Standing Order 43s with regard to the atmosphere and the works. Your task, Madam Speaker, is a very onerous and difficult one. The reason that it appears sometimes that motions under Standing Order 43 are placed on various subjects which may not be truly of a national nature, pressing or urgent, is because of the difficulty of hon. members on both sides of the House in bringing up important matters relating to their constituencies, and the fact that it is not possible to get on in the question period as frequently as some hon. members would like.

I suggest that all members of this House look toward some method which will offer greater opportunity for members to put short questions or motions before the House on matters of urgent concern to them, so that they may be debated. Perhaps, as an example, they could be debated during an expanded adjournment debate. I would like to emphasize, Madam Speaker, that when hon. members put motions under Standing Order 43 it is not because they wish to stand up and apply hit and run tactics toward a particular minister. Nor is it cowardice that makes hon. members put motions under Standing Order 43, rather than ask questions. It is not cowardice at all; it is desperation in an attempt to get the floor.

All hon. members should consider the problems not only of Madam Speaker but of many hon. members and their frustration in trying to bring up important and urgent topics about their constituencies.

Madam Speaker: I take note of the remarks made by the hon. member. I would only add that if the members co-operated in making their motions under Standing Order 43 briefer, we could get more in, and that also applies to the question period.

MR. TOWERS—INTERPRETATION OF STATEMENT MADE BY PRESIDENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief point of order. I think that it casts a reflection on you, Madam Speaker, when the government House leader says, and I believe that I heard him correctly, that motions under Standing Order 43 take up to 20 minutes. As you know, prayers take five minutes and are usually completed by 2.05. I have noticed that you have been very punctual, Madam Speaker, in going on to oral questions, as the orders prescribe, no later than 2.15. Therefore that would leave us with about ten minutes for motions under Standing Order 43.

Perhaps the House leader would like to look at his blues, and if he did say that motions under Standing Order 43 take 20 minutes, which I believe he did, he will wish to correct the statement and not leave this reflection on you, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, just to clarify very briefly, when I referred to the phrase "20 minutes" I was not referring to the time used for motions under Standing Order 43. I was referring to the time used on the frivolous question of privilege raised by his colleague.

MR. EVANS—REPLY TO QUESTION RAISED IN DEBATE BY MR. BLENKARN

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, on Monday night the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) asked a question. At the time I did not have the answer. I have that answer now, and if I could have the unanimous consent of the House I would read it into the record.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order. We are reverting to the request of the hon. parliamentary secretary who asked for the unanimous consent of the House to answer a question. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker, on Monday night the hon. member for Mississauga South asked how much of the government borrowing was raised under the borrowing authority of $7 billion which came into effect November 1, 1979, and which terminated on March 31, 1980. The answer to that question is that $4.6 billion of the Borrowing Authority Act of 1979-80 was used. This use took the form of $1.6 billion in the form of treasury bills, and $3.2 billion through the issue of marketable bonds and finally, $.2 billion was credited to the account through the paying off of drawings on the standby credit facilities.

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—STATEMENTS MADE DURING PRIOR PROCEEDING

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I will be very brief, Madam Speaker. I want to speak on the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on the question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I did not interrupt hon. members. They should listen now.

Madam Speaker, I want to say very briefly that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) did indeed answer my question very completely. I want to raise a point of order—

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order. I have ruled on that part of the question which was raised. If the hon. member wants to speak of parliamentary language, I will hear him, but I think I have already ruled on the part he is commenting upon, so I can no longer recognize the hon. member. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

[English]

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—LANGUAGE USED BY MR. WADDELL IN REFERENCE TO POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What a waste of time.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I will rise on a question of privilege concerning the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) in reference to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) when he referred to, and I quote, "the fascist tendencies of the minister". I suggest, Madam Speaker, that that is not parliamentary language. I suggest also that the hon. member should look to his own tendencies and the tendencies of his party with regard to the referendum in Quebec before he criticizes the actions of the Postmaster General, particularly when that party had a tendency to take no tendency with regard to the integrity of the nation and the referendum in Quebec.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, the hon. member from New Brunswick is bootlegging all kinds of issues into this debate that should not be bootlegged into it. He said that we did not care about the future of this country and did not express ourselves. I want to say to you, Madam Speaker, that we have expressed ourselves about the future of this country many times. We want Canada to remain as a federation. We want to have one country with all the ten provinces in that one country called Canada. I do not think it is fair that somebody should put a false statement on the record, as the hon. member for New Brunswick has.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) will read the blues himself and perhaps see fit to withdraw that kind of remark made in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I just want to clarify one matter. Let me tell you that the words I used were words that every Anglophone newspaper and editorial in this country used with respect to the remarks of the minister in that debate. They were the words of all the newspaper editorials. They said the minister showed lots of promise as a young minister with experience and so on, but they were shocked by his remarks, and the reports said that they showed fascist tendencies.

That is not what I accused him of in this debate. I said that this is something different and that the kind of tone of those remarks, while it may be a political mistake on his part I think, to have raised in that debate, he was entitled to raise it in that debate. But he is not entitled to take the same kind of line with the opposition in terms of what we are trying to do in Standing Order 43s and our questioning. That is why this is an important matter of privilege, and the minister should not be able to get away with it.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) made a hasty exit from the chamber while the member from the New Democratic Party was speaking. Maybe that denotes fright; I do not know. When he returns I think, for the benefit of the House, he ought to clarify what he meant by the words "tendency to take no tendency". That is what he said. What does it mean?

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will examine this new point of order in light of the comments and see whether any hon. member has used unparliamentary language, and let the House know what my conclusions are later on.

PETITIONS

MAINTENANCE OF IMPERIAL SYSTEM OF MEASUREMENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Deputy Clerk has laid on the Table the fifth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

LOCATION OF PARKS CANADA REGIONAL OFFICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I should like at this time to present a petition signed by 51 employees of the Parks Canada regional office in Cornwall, Ontario, which calls for the government to continue with the transfer of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough. On behalf of the petitioners I ask for serious consideration of their request by the government. I hope that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), on behalf of the government, today will look more seriously at these 51 signatures from the management and staff of Parks Canada in Cornwall, and move the office from Cornwall to Peterborough in the interest of economy, efficiency, and good government.

Mr. Fretz	Mr. Schroder—7
Mr. Frith

To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on Critical Skills for the '80s:

Mr. Allmand	Mr. McDermid
Mr. Hawkes	Mr. Orlikow
Mr. Lonsdale	Mr. Tobin—7
Mr. Marceau

To act as a Parliamentary Task Force on the Disabled and the Handicapped:

Mr. Dinsdale	Mr. Pelletier
Mr. Halliday	Mr. Smith
Mrs. Killens	Mr. Young—7
Mr. Lang

Madam Speaker, shall I dispense from reading the list since it is rather long?

Madam Speaker: The proposal of the hon. minister—

MRS. OLGA FARMAKOVSKY

Question No. 59—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, did a Russian, Mrs. Olga Farmakovsky, defect some time ago and, if so (a) was she an interpreter (b) what were the circumstances of the defection?

2. Was her husband a Colonel in the GRU, Russian Military Intelligence?

3. Is she now living somewhere in Canada under another name?

4. Was she at any time in contact with, in association with, or did she in any way communicate with Mr. Leslie James Bennett, formerly of the RCMP Security Services, or did he in any way make contact or communicate with her and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The Montreal Gazette of November 10, 1966, carried an item outlining the defection of one Olga Alexandrovna Farmakovskaya on October 16, 1966, at Beirut, Lebanon.

(a) This same article mentioned she was a secretary and interpreter in the Moscow bureau of the Toronto Telegram.

(b) The article further stated she defected after coming ashore with a group of Russian tourists from a liner from Odessa. Lebanese authorities refused to hand her over to the Russian Embassy saying they would abide by international law and give her freedom to go where she wanted.

2. In so far as official knowledge of the RCMP is concerned, their policy, which I endorse, is to preserve the confidentiality of all information it holds on individuals and organizations.

3 and 4. See answer to part 2.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—PERSONNEL

Question No. 130—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the total number of persons in the Canadian Armed Forces and how many (a) are male (b) are female (c) have (i) English (ii) French as their mother tongue?

2. Does the government intend to enlarge the number of Armed Forces personnel and (a) if so, what are the details (b) if not, for what reason?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. 79,909 as at 31 March, 1980. All figures below are in respect of regular force personnel.

(a) 74,421;

(b) 5,488;

(c) (i) 59,619;

(ii) 19,903.

Three hundred eighty-seven personnel have indicated another language as their mother tongue.

2. Yes.

(a) The increase will be to about 83,000 (regular force personnel) in accordance with the decision announced in 1977. The increase will be in annual increments, the size of which will be governed by the needs of the forces and the fiscal constraints existing each year.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Question No. 195—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The information sought by the hon. member is equally accessible to him, being reported annually in the Public Accounts of Canada. To assist him, however, this information is as follows:

1. The total revenue of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation was $9,298,043 in 1977 and $10,573,199 in 1978. The net income of the corporation was $4,822,445 in 1977 and $5,459,210 in 1978.

2. (a) No direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits were conferred on the corporation by the government during 1977 or 1978.

(b) No loans, advances or guarantees were extended to the corporation by the government during 1977 or 1978.

(c) The government's investment of $10 million in the capital stock of the corporation was redeemed by the corporation on August 26, 1977, by means of a payment to the government of this amount. The government also received a dividend of $491,667 from the corporation during 1977 in respect of the period January 1, 1977 to August 26, 1977.

LANGUAGE TRAINING PROGRAMS—UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

Question No. 241—Mr. Herbert:

Will the government consider the provision of language training programmes for unemployed persons on the same level as is available for immigrants?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Language training under the Canada Manpower Training Program is available to unemployed persons on essentially the same basis as it is to immigrants seeking employment. Such training is available to Canadian workers who have moved to other provinces and who require this training to find employment. Workers who have not relocated are expected to make use of provincial and private language training facilities.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ANNUAL REPORT

Question No. 344—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Canadian Film Development Corporation submit its annual report for audit to the Auditor General and, if so, on what date?

2. Did the Auditor General complete his audit and pass the corporation's report to the government and, if so, on what date?

3. Has the government held up the release of this report and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows:

1. The corporation's financial report was submitted to the Auditor General early in May 1979.

2. Yes. The report was given to the Secretary of State and the corporation on July 16, 1979.

3. No, report tabled on December 4, 1979.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE—PERSONS IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 368—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of Finance (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979, and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): In so far as the Department of Finance Canada is concerned:

1.	(a)	34
	(b) (i)	3
	(ii)	1.
2.	(a)	35
	(b) (i)	3
	(ii)	1.

3. No.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 626—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

> One hundred ninety-five persons are engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations as of April 1, 1980. This is inclusive of 136 officers and 26 support engaged in the promotion of tourism with the travelling public and the media, at home and abroad.

In so far as Metric Commission Canada is concerned:

Twelve people.

NATIONAL REVENUE—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 705—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of National Revenue for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the national capital region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue):

	Taxation	Customs and Excise
1.	2	1
2.	(a) none	1
	(b) 2	none
	(c) none	none
3.	none	none
4.	$41,580	$1,980

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—DECENTRALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OPERATIONS

Question No. 787—Mr. de Jong:

1. Did the Minister of Supply and Services take action to decentralize government printing operations?

2. Will the government be altering its policy so that western printing companies have more opportunity to participate in government contracts?

3. What amount does the government spend each year on printing?

4. What dollar value of printing is done for the government in each of the provinces?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Government printing operations have been decentralized since the mid 1950s. Each supply region of the DSS across Canada has a regional printing manager who is responsible for both government printing facilities and the purchase of printing requirements from commercial suppliers for Government of Canada customers located in their respective regions.

2. Present policy provides extensive bidding opportunities for all printing companies in Canada, including those in the western provinces, to participate in government contracts offered in respect of both local and national requirements for printed matter. Also we continually monitor our procedures in order to provide better opportunities to all printing companies in Canada.

3. $138,889,000—Requisitioned through DSS during fiscal year 1979-1980.

Motions for Papers

4. National Capital Region	$57,410,000
Ontario	36,105,000
Quebec	33,521,000
Manitoba	3,894,000
British Columbia	3,758,000
Alberta	1,335,000
Nova Scotia	1,252,000
New Brunswick	706,000
Saskatchewan	585,000
Newfoundland	283,000
Prince Edward Island	40,000
	$138,889,000

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 736 could be made an order for return, this return be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: It is the pleasure of the House that question No. 736 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TREASURY BOARD—POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFERRING COMPUTER OPERATIONS TO THE PRIVATE SECTOR

Question No. 736—Mr. Nystrom:

In the period June 1, 1979, to February 25, 1980, was there, within Treasury Board, any consideration given to the possibility of transferring some or all of the government's computer operations, especially those of Statistics Canada, to the private sector and, if so, what were the details of such considerations and what was the nature of any recommendation to that end?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 1 and 19?

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—DECENTRALIZATION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Motion No. 1—Mr. Cossitt:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the Province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Veteran Affairs would ask that the hon. member from Grenville-Carleton withdraw the motion on the grounds that the total volume of papers is such that the expense, in time and personnel, of producing them would be extremely high. As well, some of these documents involve the government of Prince Edward Island, and that government's consent would have to be obtained prior to their tabling. However, the minister does invite the hon. member to visit the department, and the minister undertakes to make available to the hon. member all possible material.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, first I would like the record to show that my riding is Leeds-Grenville, and not Grenville-Carleton as mentioned by the parliamentary secretary.

Why I must ask that this matter be transferred for debate is as follows. While I may be able to go and look at the material, the people of Canada and members of the Canadian Legion, in particular, who are highly interested in this subject, as all members know, are not going to be able to look at the material. There is nothing secret about the documents. It is the old excuse that it costs too much money, and we have heard that too often. I feel that it should be transferred for debate, and that the members of this House should have an opportunity to talk about it.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposition that the motion be transferred for debate. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Transferred for debate.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—REVIEW AND RESTRUCTURING

Motion No. 19—Mr. Siddon:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the government, its departments and agencies and the governments of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Territorial Council of the Northwest Territories, since January 1, 1978, relating to the review and restructuring of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), who, I notice, is here, would respectfully ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion as a review of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is currently under way. The minister, however, would be willing to table the final report of the review committee of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, subject to consent of all participating provinces and territories.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I did put down this motion for the production of papers because I am well aware of the fact that the review of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is under way, and in fact there are certain meetings that should have occurred in the month of April, and certain decisions that should have been taken by this date with respect to that review. I believe, in view of problems faced by fishermen, in particular in the freshwater region, and concerns that they have with respect to the management and financing of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, that it should be a matter of public record as to certain exchanges of correspondence between the provincial governments involved and the Northwest Territories Council. Therefore I put this motion for the production of papers and I would humbly request that this matter be transferred for debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Transfer for debate.

Madam Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the other notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Madam Speaker: Stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF AND INCREASE IN GUARANTEED LOANS

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill C-28 which is legislation to extend and simultaneously to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

As hon. members know, this is an act whose purpose is to facilitate the availability of credit to fishermen for a variety of fisheries improvement projects. To encourage private financial institutions to make such loans to fishermen, the act authorizes the federal government to guarantee lenders against loss incurred on loans made in accordance with its provisions.

[Translation]

This bill sets out the balance which may remain unpaid by a borrower at any time and the maximum period for reimbursement of each loan. It also determines the loan term and the aggregate principal in loans guaranteed by all lenders during this period.

[English]

This act was originally administered by the Department of Finance, and was transferred to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in June, 1978. Hon. members are no doubt aware that the existing legislation does not go beyond June 30, 1980. In the interest of the many fishermen who depend on this act for credit, it is therefore a matter of some urgency that the amendments be approved as soon as possible. This is what the amendments will do. They will extend the act for a further three-year period from July 1, 1980, to June 30, 1983.

In addition, to meet the expanding credit requirements of fishermen, the borrowing limit will be increased from the present $75,000 to $150,000, and the maximum repayment terms of each loan will be extended from ten to 15 years.

[Translation]

Loans made by chartered banks and other lending agencies designated in the act have increased considerably in recent years. The total amount of loans granted in the 1978-79 rose by some $28 million, or 55 per cent compared to the preceding year. This year, this amount might go up to $35 million or more.

[English]

Such a trend indicates a definite need to increase the over-all financial ceiling on guaranteed loans under the act. The amendments, consequently, will raise the aggregate principal amount of loan guarantees from the present $80 million to $250 million for the three-year lending period.

A number of things have been occurring to bring about the need for changes in the act. Canada's extended offshore jurisdiction to 200 miles has given new vigour to the fishing sector. Fishermen now require more efficient vessels to harvest the resources within our zone and, very important, to preserve the quality of fish until it reaches the processing plant.

[Translation]

I am sure that it will be recognized as well that this guaranteed loan program gives fishermen a solid credit base and that banking institutions would probably not offer them such favourable conditions. Without such a program, it is probable that a large number of small independent fishermen would attempt to get support from the large operations, which would jeopardize their status as independent fishermen.

[English]

In this regard I feel it important that any measure which contributes to the goal of maintaining and, hopefully, increasing the independence of Canada's fishermen should be supported.

It is not easy for fishermen to maintain an independent status, particularly when it comes to paying out thousands of dollars to purchase a new boat or modify an existing one to keep up with technological advances. The danger here is that if the fisherman is unable to raise the necessary funds on his own, the processing companies move into the picture. And if the fisherman gets locked into the position of having his boat mortgaged to a processing company, he is in such a poor position to bargain over prices for the fish he has to sell.

So the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program is one avenue the fisherman can take when looking for financing to enable him to maintain his independence. It is also increasingly popular with fishermen, particularly on the west coast, where there is no provincial loan board. It is also increasingly important in the Atlantic provinces, and I expect it will become more valuable to fishermen because of rising prices. I might add that fishermen are a good credit risk. The loss ratio of this program since its inception has been less than three-quarters of 1 per cent.

May I also emphasize that this approach of providing credit to fishermen is very much in accordance with current fisheries policy as outlined in the Speech from the Throne. There is a great deal of support for this program. The provinces are familiar with it and have indicated their approval for its continuing existence. I am sure hon. members recognize its importance to the fishermen of this country, and I believe they will willingly endorse Bill C-28.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-28. As the minister has stated in his brief remarks, it is really a housekeeping bill, but I submit that its introduction is long over due. I say this because the bill, in its explanatory notes, states that at present a guaranteed loan cannot exceed $75,000 repayable in ten years, whereas the amendments permit a loan of $150,000 repayable over a period of 15 years.

Naturally this measure will be helpful, and I can assure the minister that we on this side intend to support it even though we feel that, once again, it is too little and too late to help the fishing industry in the manner in which it should be helped. There is nothing, in my view, which demonstrates more to those of us who come from Atlantic Canada or, indeed, from other fishing areas whether in central or in western Canada, the complete lack of knowledge and the disregard the government shows in its approach to the problems of the fishing industry.

Here we have a government which has been in power for some 12 years, with the brief exception of the period in which my party was in office. There can be no question, in the light of the facts which have been revealed during the debate on Bill C-30, that the 12 years under the Liberals have been a period of spend, spend, spend, accompanied by deficits, deficits, deficits. It took $10 billion to run this country in 1978. In 1980 it cost $60 billion, and of this amount almost $15 billion will have to be borrowed in order to cover the deficit. This type of fiscal mismanagement has created horrendous inflation which has affected every phase of industry from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the fishing industry is no exception.

Both fishermen and processors today are hurting, and hurting badly. Conditions may not yet have reached the crisis stage, but the troubles in the eastern Atlantic ground fishing industry arise less from marketing difficulties than from the general cost-price squeeze. As processing costs grow, the profit margin is narrowed.

The cost of almost everything has skyrocketed. Workmen's compensation, chlorine, salt, transport, communications, insurance, capital costs, cutting tables, cutting knives, electricity and fuel oil, along with fish prices and labour—the list is endless. Trawl doors, for example, have gone up lately by 68 per cent, and net sections by 40 per cent. In 1975 an average trawler refit cost approximately $165,000. Last year a refit of a trawler of the same size cost in excess of $400,000. Passing on these increased costs to buyers has brought a reaction which I can tell this House is not too favourable.

All companies, large and small, have to borrow money to buy fish, to build boats. The present high interest rates are compounding their burden. In some cases fish dealers, reluctant to face higher interest charges, are lowering their inventories thus forcing the processors to hold fish in storage for longer periods. Last year, for example, many Atlantic based companies found themselves forced to hold much of their summer and autumn production through the winter into the spring.

To add to those problems, the industry is facing uncertainty due to present federal policies as they apply to the inshore, the midwater, and the offshore fleet. Unfortunately, the bill before us does very little to minimize these problems.

It is true the government guarantees payment to any lender in respect of any loss sustained if the loan was made under the terms of the act during the period from July 1, 1980 to June 30, 1983, and that it is setting a ceiling of something like $250 million, I think the minister stated, which would be used to guarantee all loans. The minister nods his head in agreement. I cannot put that nod on the record but I am glad to have his assent. However, I say to you, Madam Speaker, and thus, through you, to the minister, that there is nothing in the bill which states that a bank manager is obliged to accept any or all of the applications made under this legislation. For this reason the government can have no idea how many loans the banks may have declined to make.

If the principle behind the loans is not being properly exercised by the banks, the government would not necessarily know what is going on under the provisions of this act. For example, if a bank manager in any community in my constituency of South Shore were to state that in no circumstances could he make a loan to a fisherman under the terms of this act because of the difference which exists between interest rates on the free market and interest rates under the government's guarantee, how does the government know how many loans are thus refused, or the types of loans which are refused, or the names of the banks which may have refused to grant such loans?

Fishermen who are successful in securing loans are obviously a very good risk, and I commend the minister for his statement in that regard. According to the March 31, 1979, annual report, out of the total number of 11,493 loans made from December 12, way back in 1955, to approximately the present date, only 124 claims had to be paid. This is a good record, an outstanding record, and it indicates the soundness of providing guarantees to those engaged in this important primary industry. Nevertheless, as I stated earlier, the amounts to be guaranteed under this bill are totally inadequate. I say this because of the manner in which the cost of boats as well as gear has escalated in the past ten years.

According to figures obtained from the Fishermen's Loans Board of Nova Scotia, a 40-foot lobster boat cost $11,000 in 1970, $30,000 in 1975, and $55,000 in 1980. A 65-foot dragger cost $150,000 in 1970, $285,000 in 1975, and $675,000 in 1980. A 65-foot longliner cost $95,000 in 1970, $150,000 in 1975, and $450,000 in 1980. Finally, a 150-foot stern dragger cost $1.5 million in 1970, $2.5 million in 1975, and $8 million plus in 1980. The cost could easily, as the minister is well aware, escalate to something like $12 million depending on the number of radar, sounders, depth sounders and other new technology and new instruments which are available today. These quite quickly build up the cost of a modern fishing trawler.

I place these figures on the record to show the total inadequacy of the bill, and the problems it is supposed to cover. Obviously when we look at these figures we cannot help but realize that the government will not exactly be swamped by loan applications because there is too much discrepancy between the amounts available and the amount required.

I should add as well that there is too much uncertainty about the cost of the loans. Under the existing regulations the fisherman may borrow from a chartered bank or an authorized lending institution at the prime rate plus 1 per cent. This rate fluctuates as the prime interest rate fluctuates. Because of this the fisherman really does not know what his interest charges will be from year to year. A substantial interest rate hike such as we have recently experienced, for example, would put the fisherman in a real economic bind, just the same kind of bind he would be in if his anchor rope got caught in his propeller. He would be anchored. I believe the fisherman should be able to plan his finances so that he will know at the time of borrowing what interest payments he will be expected to pay, and the rate of interest. If this could be arranged, he would be in a better position to know whether or not he can meet his obligations.

It is my understanding, subject to correction, that interest on loans from the Federal Business Development Bank are made at a pegged rate for at least five years. This type of policy, if applied to this act, would not protect just the fisherman but, I submit, it would also protect the Crown. I say this because, as interest rates rise, so does the possibility of a fisherman defaulting on his loan.

I am also concerned about how the fisherman must repay his loan. According to the regulations, the terms of repayment are based on a repayment schedule which is agreed to at the time the loan is negotiated, and it is agreed between the lending institution and the borrower. Under this arrangement the lending institution could insist that the loan be amortized over a longer period of time than might be comfortable for the borrower. This type of arrangement, of course, would allow the lending institution to receive much more interest than is reasonable.

There should be some provisions, I submit, in the act which would cause the lending institution to realize that the fisherman's income is dependent upon seasonal employment, and therefore the fisherman should be able to repay more of his loans, if earnings warrant, during peak periods of the season, and much less when the weather dictates that his operations cease. This provision would allow the fisherman to reduce his debts during high liner periods, and he would not be so devastated when hit by a long period of high winds, high seas, and no fish.

When looking at the annual report for 1978-79 as printed under this act, I cannot help but note on pages 10 and 11 that the Bank of Nova Scotia has lent much more in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland than some of the other banks, especially the Royal. It would be interesting to know the reason for this difference. I have a suggestion to throw out to the minister. He is always interested in suggestions from this side of the House, and sometimes the party opposite is not averse to adopting some of our proposals.

I say to the minister that perhaps the time has arrived, in light of the present high cost of ship construction, for the government to consider establishing a Canada mortgage and shipping corporation from which loans and lines of credit could be made available for ship refits and for new ship construction. This type of corporation could help finance the construction of needed ships of all sizes in Canada, especially as we begin the renewal of our existing fleet. The rebuilding of our aging fleet, I submit, is something which cannot be put off indefinitely. New technology is required if we are to capitalize fully on the vast fisheries resources which are within our 200-mile limit, and not only within the 200-mile limit but beyond the 200-mile limit as far out as Flemish Cap, which is something like 400 miles off the coast of Nova Scotia. If we are to capitalize on the resources that are in this area, I submit that there is an immediate need for a fleet development policy to be established by this fisheries minister. By this I do not mean the continuation of the policy which was followed by the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) in the spring of 1978.

I may be wrong in my estimate, but I understand he issued at least 14 permits to buy new or used fishing vessels offshore. This meant the loss of something like anywhere between $50 million and $80 million in work to Canadian shipbuilders and to allied industries. When the Canadian shipbuilding industry heard this news, it naturally came as quite a shock, for the minister had indicated to the shipbuilders repeatedly that new permits and imports would be kept to a minimum pending the finalization of a Canadian fleet development policy.

The views of the Canadian shipbuilding industry were strongly supported by my leader when he was prime minister, for it was his intention to set out a policy which called for the building of fishing trawlers and freezer trawlers in Canada, rather than importing them. He stated at that time that he envisaged the expenditure of between $500 million and $800 million over a four-year period for a rebuilding of the Canadian fishing fleet in the Atlantic region. It is a matter of some regret, in our area in particular, that he was not given the time and the opportunity to carry out this worth-while policy which would have brought substantial economic benefits not just to Atlantic Canada but to Canadian industry in general.

As the minister is well aware, when a ship is built it is not unlike the building of a small town. Heat, light, and all the facilities required by a crew of 20 or more men are needed, depending on the size of the ship. Unlike any other industry, ship construction stimulates the entire economy not just in the immediate area where the ship is being built but halfway across the nation. I submit that there is very little this minister or this government can plan to undertake of a comparable nature to shipbuilding which would stimulate our entire economy, especially at this time.

When my leader was prime minister, he obviously believed firmly in rebuilding the fishing and shipbuilding industries, for in a speech to Toronto's Empire Club on April 19, 1979, he said: "It is foolish and it is wasteful for a coastal nation like Canada to let our shipbuilding capacity run down and then buy our fishing and ferry ships abroad". Since we are dealing with a bill which would provide only minimal aid to our fishing and shipbuilding industries, I commend the words of my leader when he was prime minister for consideration by the present government.

This leads me to ask what the government's present policies are as they apply today to new boat construction. Normally the fisheries department starts considering applications for assistance in April at the start of our fiscal year, and fishermen were well advised to do whatever they could to push their applications forward. It is my understanding, however, that for 1980-81 the government has in hand only something like $2 million to pay carry-over costs on boats which were started last year.

I would like to have the minister tell us just what the actual budget for the 1980-81 program is, and what the guidelines for that program are, that is, if the government has a program. The provinces would also like to have an answer, not only to this question but to many others. I say this because the ministers of fisheries in the three maritime provinces who met recently in Montreal expressed their dissatisfaction at the lack of meaningful consultation over the issue of direct so-called over-the-sides sales of fish to the Soviets. In fact they have charged that this year's allocation was decided by the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans prior to a meeting that he held in Moncton, New Brunswick, to discuss this very matter. They also questioned whether the minister has the legal authority to allocate amounts of fish to foreign buyers without the approval of the provinces.

● (1630)

The over-the-side sales contract that was given by the minister to the Soviets was, in my opinion, not really a good deal for Canada. Basically, the minister gave certain maritime groups, as I understand the issue, permission to sell some 6,000 tonnes of mackerel and 950 tonnes of squid to foreign vessels. However, the catches, when the time came to deliver, fell far short of this level.

The buyer, which was called Joint Trawlers of Sweden, which makes deals for the east bloc vessels, paid maritime fishermen only about $500,000 for some 2,300 tonnes of fish. As part of this deal, however, Joint Trawlers could then make use of what we call guarantee fish, namely, in this case, offshore squid.

Because inshore sales fell short, Joint Trawlers, on behalf of the Soviets, received permission to catch somewhere between 3,000 and 4,000 tonnes. The minister can give us the correct figure—because he was the one who lined up the contract—of offshore squid, which is worth somewhere in the vicinity $2 million. Naturally, this guarantee clause outraged Canadian processors, who said that foreign countries could promise big inshore purchases and high inshore prices, secure in the knowledge that inshore catches would fall short, and they could then catch the profitable offshore squid.

Canadians claim that in some cases the guarantee fish caught by Joint Trawlers have been sold. Where were they sold? They were sold in western European markets, undercutting Canadian exporters, and causing a direct loss of sales for Canadians. This is the result of the present minister's fishery policy, a policy which brought about a shortfall for Canadians in the fishing industry, in excess of $2 million, plus the loss of shore based employment.

The provincial fisheries ministers agreed, and I share their view, that there should be no direct sales involving guarantees—"Involving guarantees" are the two words that are basically important to what I am saying—unless prior consultation is had with the provinces. They have suggested that all conditions, including guarantees, be offered, as well, to Canadians firms. This gives the Canadian firm that little bit of leaway that has already been given away to the Soviets.

All we are asking for is the same opportunity for Canadian firms that the minister was so keen to give to east bloc countries; basically, to the Soviets. Just give us the same consideration that you gave to the Soviets when it comes to buying these quantities of mackerel, gaspergou and inshore fish. Do not leave the Canadian industry at a disadvantage. Treat us fairly, treat us squarely, and we will then be in a position—the minister waves his hand and says this is an unjust request.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Crouse: Well, it is a feeling that is shared not only by me, not by one, not by two, but by three provincial fisheries ministers who have examined and re-examined what the minister did in an effort to determine the justice and the fairness of his policy. They have come up with a statement that they printed in the press, which indicated that they found this policy wanting to the tune of $2 million, wanting to the tune of taking away direct employment, shore employment, for the people of Atlantic Canada, some of whom I represent in this House.

Mr. Rompkey: That's the only thing they agree on.

Mr. Crouse: Well, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) says, "That's the only thing they agree on". This is his view, but I am referring today to something that is of basic economic importance to Atlantic Canada. All I am asking for is a just and fair policy to put all of us upon an equal basis.

They have also asked that any participating foreign vessel be granted a permit from the respective provincial authority to fish in their own zone. I submit that possibly this is a request that would be endorsed again in agreement by all of the provincial premiers. I point out that this request was made by provincial fisheries ministers, but I feel certain that prior to meeting, prior to making these requests public, that they did so following consultation with their premiers and with the members of their own cabinet.

Mr. LeBlanc: Not Newfoundland.

Mr. Crouse: Well, the minister states, "Not Newfoundland". I have no way of judging whether consultation was held between the fisheries minister of Newfoundland and his premier—

Mr. LeBlanc: He refused to gang up on me.

Mr. Crouse: The minister says that Newfoundland has refused to gang up on him. I will let him argue his case.

I submit to you that the present minister of fisheries, with his Gallic attitude and his keen intellect, is quite capable of taking care of himself, whether it be Newfoundland or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or even tiny Prince Edward Island. No matter which group decides to gang up on the present minister of fisheries, I feel that he is quite capable of taking care of himself.

An hon. Member: Not out west.

Mr. Crouse: My colleague, said "Not out west." All I am saying is that there is obviously considerable unrest in that part of Canada over present policies.

We felt, when the 200-mile limit was established, that we would gradually phase in Canadian operators, Canadian fishermen, whether they be inshore or midwater or offshore, and as we gradually phased in Canadians we were hoping that the government would gradually phase out the foreigners because, after all, the agreements were that we, as Canadians, would make fish available to foreigners that were surplus to our needs. Unless we adopt a policy which will permit the construction of some freezer trawlers, and the conversion of some of our existing trawlers so that we can take the offshore squid and the silver hake and the capelin and the other soft species, the round nosed grenadiers—to name a few—unless we adopt a policy that will enable us to take these quantities of soft species, I submit that they will always, and for ever and a day, be surplus to our needs, and there will always be this requirement to give, not part of them, but all of them, away to others.

Under the leadership of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he was prime minister, we did start on a policy of licensing some freezer trawlers to take advantage of these soft species. The start was made, but all too little was done in the brief period. Time just simply did not permit a follow through—as I would have preferred—under that administration.

I mention these things, in closing, as some of the problems which should be examined very carefully by the minister, and I hope that when this bill is before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry we will have an opportunity to study the proposals and, I hope, some of my own suggestions, in more detail. Aside from the concerns I have expressed, I want to go on record as agreeing in principle with the bill and with its reference to the standing committee.

● (1640)

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to be speaking on Bill C-28 today. As a matter of fact this is the first fisheries bill which has come before the House since the period of time before the last two elections. It is an important bill, not in its effect on fishermen but in its effect on banks. It would seem that this bill is more important to the banking community which insists on having loan guarantees to fishermen, small businessmen and farmers, rather than it is to the fishermen themselves.

I am pleased the minister recognized the increasing cost of equipment and vessels in the industry, and therefore has raised the ceiling on these loan guarantees to $150,000. In speaking on the Bank Act, my party was very critical of the banks for their failure to meet the needs of primary producers and small businessmen. With this increased loan guarantee, I think we may find more acceptance on the part of banks to lend money to fishermen who find meeting costs and high interest rates more and more difficult each year.

The purpose of the bill is to encourage, through taxpayer guarantee, the banks to help fishermen purchase or repair vessels, to buy new equipment or make necessary repairs, or to construct shore facilities. The minister referred to the number of claims against the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. It was an impressive figure. Only three-quarters of one per cent have been claimed by the banks in Canada over the 24-year history of this program.

However, I should like to look at the history a little bit and relate it to what is happening at the present time in the fishing industry. From the beginning of 1955 to March of 1979, $857,573 was paid to the banks in defaults under this loans act. Although this may not seem to be a great cost to the Canadian treasury over 24 years, it does not show that of the $857,573 paid to the banks during that period of time, $700,000, or 81 per cent, was claimed in 1978-79. I think this is quite significant. Although I cannot confirm it, I would suggest that the claims in 1978-79 were most likely paid in British Columbia. The capitalization in that industry, and some of the failings in the salmon industry, have resulted in the Canadian government having to pay some of those loans.

It would be more appropriate if the minister would consult the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and suggest that there should be some amendments to the Bank Act which would place some obligation on the banking community to small businessmen, farmers and fishermen, rather than the government always having to give ironclad guarantees to the banking community. It is time the banking community in this country saw some of its responsibility to small businesses and primary producers.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has helped a large number of fishermen in the past, and I am sure it will continue to do so in the future. Although my party disagrees with a system which must bribe banks to aid in the development of our fishing and farming potential, we recognize that this act is necessary until a government is elected that will obligate, through banking legislation, a more responsible role for banks operating in Canada.

Now I should like to turn my attention to the essence of this bill—to encourage investment in the fishing industry. Exciting prospects on the east coast of Canada call for massive expenditure in the coming years which will further increase our export of Canadian fish to an ever-increasing number of countries. The need for new vessels and shore installations to meet the challenge of higher quality products from ship to shore to market will demand new equipment on the seas and on our shores. Already there is growing interest for a large fleet renewal which will stimulate shipyard construction and the demand for government and private investment in new modern vessels.

Fleet renewal in Alantic Canada, whether through tax proposals in the previous Conservative budget, or through encouragement by provincial or federal government programs, must be done cautiously. The past Liberal minister of fisheries was a cautious man, as is the current one. He is able to wait long periods of time before he jumps into action. As a matter of fact sometimes he is so cautious that he does not act at all.

The minister will argue that a fleet development plan must be in place before his government will permit a large-scale renewal of the Atlantic fleet so our fishermen can better handle their catch—gut, bleed and ice their fish and handle them in a sanitary manner. Then they will receive a better price for the catch and Canada can sell to the more discerning consumers in Europe, Japan, and other importing nations. However, there is a need to act rapidly on a fleet development plan. I would encourage the minister to table in the House and make public a fleet development plan in the near future.

The industry in Atlantic Canada is in need of some direction as to the kind of fleet the minister will permit. They do not know whether it will continue to favour inshore fishermen, whether more offshore fleets should be established, including freezer trawlers, or whether in fact the minister has a plan at this time. Fishermen must be aware of the type of vessel mix the department sees developing, before a wholesale influx of unacceptable vessels takes place. They can only run into conflict with regulations and in allocation of stocks if the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) does not table a fleet development plan soon.

The greatest danger for the east coast fishery is a repetition of the errors of the salmon industry in British Columbia. The dilemma of the British Columbia industry is accurately demonstrated by the figures published in the annual report of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act of 1978-79. In 1978-79 a total of $28,317,786 was guaranteed under the provisions of this act. Of the total, $23,515,041 went to British Columbia. This guarantee amounted to 81 per cent of the funds lent to British Columbia in 1978-79, while Quebec and the Atlantic provinces shared $4.5 million.

The minister is aware of the need for fleet development in Atlantic Canada, as well as the need for fleet restriction in British Columbia. He has not acted through Parliament on either of these critical issues despite the urgency on both coasts. I urge the minister to consider what is happening on the west coast of Canada in terms of fleet development. Also I urge him not to make the same mistake in Atlantic Canada by allowing the same amount of overcapitalization to occur there as occured in British Columbia.

The experiences of the late 1960s remain and are worsening despite the highly-touted licence limitation and buy-back program initiated by a former Liberal minister of fisheries. It was referred to as the "Davis" plan. The object was to reduce the number of fishermen and vessels in the salmon industry so that those remaining could expect a good economic return from his or her efforts. In fact many smaller fishermen and vessels were eliminated over the ten-year period of the plan, but the failure of the government to recognize growing technologies producing more effective gear, sophisticated electronic equipment and larger more powerful mobile vessels, has resulted in a far greater pressure on salmon stocks than before the buy-back program. Indeed the plan has made it questionable as to whether the managers can accurately and safely manage the stocks, faced with an ever-increasing fleet capacity.

● (1650)

The most damaging evidence of the failure of the minister to initiate programs to protect and enhance Pacific salmon is his inability to curtail the rapid capital investment in the salmon fleet. The public of Canada will invest close to $150 million in salmon enhancement between 1977 and 1984 during this first stage. The object of the program is to increase salmon production by 120 million pounds in the long term, over a period of approximately 30 years. Public support, both in dollars and in emotion, is great. The public in British Columbia feel that the Salmon Enhancement Program is going to bring, and should return, much money and many jobs to the B.C. fishing industry. Public support then is there, and the expectations exist.

One of the premises on which the Salmon Enhancement Program was based is expressed in the following quotation from the Department of Fisheries and the Environment Publication "The Salmonid Enhancement Program", published in 1977:

> It has been determined that the commercial salmon fishing and processing industry does not require any appreciable quantities of additional capital and operating inputs in order to double its outputs. The economic rationale of the program, however, demonstrates that industry will have to be constrained from making unnecessary new investment in response to the increased production, otherwise economic gains could be dissipated.

That was one statement in the premise to the Salmon Enhancement Program, that we really do not need to curtail more capital investment in the industry in British Columbia in order to harvest the output of the Salmon Enhancement Program over the long term. In spite of that, in 1978-79 another $23 million in loan guarantees by the federal government was placed in the salmon industry in British Columbia. That amount does not take into account the kinds of capital put into that industry without government guarantee.

An additional quotation from the same publication is as follows:

> Investment by government in salmonid enhancement could greatly improve the efficiency of the industry, assuring that additional capital inputs will be disciplined.

I would suggest that capital investment in the British Columbia salmon industry has not been disciplined. In fact the managers of the resource in British Columbia are having a tremendously difficult time managing these stocks simply because there are too many vessels in the industry for them to determine accurately what the catch should be. This results in frustration of the fisheries officers and managers in the industry in accurately predicting what kind of openings there should be, when the closings will be, as well as great difficulty in determining gear types that should be used to catch the salmon in British Columbia.

Fishermen are frustrated because they do not know from one year to the next what the gear regulations will be, and they do not know from one week to the next, in many cases, what openings there will be, where they will be, or what their quotas will be.

Figures for the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in British Columbia show a colossal failure by the present minister now and in the past to curtail the construction of vessels that are not needed to catch the fish available.

In another government report on licences on the west coast, referred to as the "Sinclair Report", published in 1978, it is estimated the fleet is three or four times larger than necessary to catch available stocks, yet the B.C. shipyards continue to construct larger and more efficient vessels for an industry that has seen fishermen forced out to pave the way for renewed stocks, stocks that to this point in time show little evidence of co-operation with the best laid plans of the minister.

I would encourage the minister to look critically at the kinds of vessel construction which continues in British Columbia, and which in fact jeopardizes the Salmon Enhancement Program, and those kinds of exciting things the fishermen and the industry in general were expecting from him.

I feel, and most people in this House and across Canada feel, that good programs are something we are all supportive of, in this case the Salmon Enhancement Program. However, we cannot be expected to put money into salmon enhancement and also put more money into catching more and more of the salmon, dissipating that income from our salmon stocks.

On B.C.'s coast the problem results from too many efficient vessels and processing plants. The task for the department is to stop further investment until the need is demonstrated. The failure to do this to this point has contributed to the fall of all five species of Pacific salmon to below average returns for the past ten years.

An example of overfishing can be found in the Vancouver Sun of May 30, which referred to the Fraser River being closed to salmon fishermen. In our industry we are getting shorter and shorter periods of fishing time, particularly for the gillnet fleet, with more and more restrictions on the gillnet fleet, particularly for those people fishing on the Fraser River who were only given 17 days of openings last year and have had, I understand, just six days up to this time. Our seine fleet, because it is so large, is also being restricted in the number of days they can fish. The gross overcapitalization, if I may use that term, in the salmon industry, is restricting the number of days worked by fishermen, and is also bringing about difficulty to shore workers in very efficient plants.

The $23 million invested under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in 1978-79 only takes into account guaranteed investment. At the same time that we were spending $23 million to catch salmon we spent $19 million in British Columbia under salmon enhancement to produce the salmon, despite the warnings of the "Sinclair Report" and other government publications that we did not need more capital in the industry.

The complexity of the Atlantic coast fishery and the haste with which Canada must act to improve our handling of fish to improve our quality, increase our income and make inroads on world markets, make it essential to have a comprehensive development and marketing plan which would allow fishermen to reach the expectation they have in relation to the 200-mile zone and the ability of Canada to manage the fisheries in that zone.

A great deal of capital is needed on the Atlantic coast to change our fleet, to provide the quality of product that Japan, Europe, some of the developing nations and the United States require. This will mean a great deal of input.

The minister must not permit himself, however, to allow a wholesale fleet redevelopment plan without looking at the example in British Columbia. The minister must not permit himself the luxury of procrastination as he has in respect of the B.C. salmon industry. The urgency for a licensing program, a fleet development plan, quality and marketing plans, and an attack on industrial and municipal pollution to satisfy the marine and aquatic environments of our coastal and inland fisheries, cannot be exaggerated. The minister can continue to exalt the virtue of Canadian fish and the potential, but he can no longer ignore the basic fact that decisions must be made now.

The bill before us today will provide additional borrowing power to fishermen. It is really a minor bill, but it is the first fisheries bill we have seen in this session. I hope it will not be the last. I hope the minister will come to this Parliament and the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, submitting to us a plan for a licensing program and allowing the committee and this House to discuss that plan.

I hope that the minister will soon provide this House, the committee and the public, with a fleet development plan so that the fishermen and processors in Atlantic Canada are aware of the direction which this minister intends to take in terms of upgrading the fleet and providing the quality for which we are looking. Up to this time we have not seen those programs coming forward for discussion. The Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry only met just yesterday, and the steering committee met just this afternoon.

Hopefully the minister, when he is in front of that committee, will provide us with a timetable of some of the important programs which, I am sure, he has under consideration. While I am uncertain of the value of this bill to the west coast, considering the amount of capital that we have in that industry there, I do see a need for it in Atlantic Canada and in the prairie provinces. As a result of those considerations, my party will be giving support to this bill and hoping for its early passage.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to offer some observations on Bill C-28 which is presently before the House.

An hon. Member: Positive criticism.

Mr. Siddon: Of course my criticism is always positive. We think that the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has been a relatively successful program. It is the kind of program that puts the burden of initiative upon the fishermen themselves. We commend the proposal in this legislation which will increase the ceiling in terms of individual loans. It will extend the repayment period from ten years to 15 years, and it will create a ceiling on loans over the next three-year period of $250 million.

It is interesting to note that in the last 23 years this program has been in existence, there has been some $125 million in loans granted under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. This bill will allow $250 million in additional loans over the next three-year period. I commend the government for that initiative. The default rate under this legislation has been less than 1 per cent, as the minister indicated in his opening remarks. The cost of this program to the taxpayers of Canada has been less than $1 million over the past 23 years of its history.

As other speakers have indicated, we are prepared to see this bill through the second stage of debate as quickly as possible. But we do want to see the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry so that we might extract some responses and receive clarification on a number of questions which have already been put and others which I will be putting in the next few moments as well. Whereas we are supportive of the bill, there are some disappointments and reservations about the general thrust of this initiative.

I will quickly summarize those reservations, and then go into further detail. First of all, it is startling to me that there is no mechanism to determine or monitor where the loaned money is going. I will elaborate on that in further detail later. It is notable that in the annual report of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Board there is not much detail as to how the money which is being loaned under the provisions of this act is being related to the management policies of the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

As my hon. colleague for South Shore indicated, in these times of wide fluctuations of interest rates, it is a concern that there are no guarantees written into the legislation or some requirement that banks guarantee interest rates over an extended reasonable period, such as three years, four years or five years, as compared to the present situation where the interest rate is held at 1 per cent over prime and fluctuates with the bank rate.

As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) indicated, there is a conflict of policies in this program. On the one hand, particularly from the west coast perspective, this legislation is being used to loan large amounts of money for the development of a fishing fleet, while at the same time we are implementing increasingly restrictive management policies which frustrate the developmental instincts of fishermen. That is legitimate in its own right because it is consistent with the need to conserve and manage the resource as wisely as possible. There is a serious paradox in that there does not seem to be a tying together of the questions as to where this money is going and how it is being used to develop various sectors of the fishing fleets, particularly on the west coast, and how that ties together with the management policies of the department for which the minister is responsible.

There is a strong bias in the amount of money being loaned on the east coast vis-à-vis the west coast. If one looks at the recent annual report it is noteworthy that over 75 per cent of the loans made under this legislation went to British Columbia. Something less than 25 per cent of the loans went to Atlantic Canada, and a very small quantity went to the interior provinces. We in British Columbia have a genuine concern as to how this large amount of money, over $20 million, is being dispersed within British Columbia for the benefit of our fishing industry.

But the questions which I will ask now go beyong British Columbia. They are legitimate questions which must be asked about the program in general. First of all, it would be very, very helpful if the minister, when we get to the committee stage, would provide information on who is borrowing this money. By that I mean a detailed breakdown on the division of loans as between various gear types and various licences that are carried by the vessels and ancilliary equipment which is purchased with these loans. It would be interesting to know how the money is being dispersed between various sized vessels.

It would also be pertinent if the minister could provide us with information as to the background of the borrowers. In his opening statement the minister indicated that the ordinary fisherman is benefiting with these loans. I believe that to be true because he has said so, but in British Columbia there is a suspicion that much of this capital is being used by various larger interests in the industry, corporate interests one might say, and in fact perhaps by speculative investors and professional people who have no history in the fishing industry.

I believe that it is very important that the minister supply, by tabling a detailed breakdown, information as to who is getting these loans and in what sums they are being dispersed. In particular I think it is important that we examine the extent to which this money might have been used, either directly or indirectly, to produce concentrations of ownership in the west coast fishing industry. I am thinking particularly of the recent takeover by B.C. Packers of the Canadian Fishing Company, the concern which many west coast fishermen feel about the tremendous leverage they command in the industry and the extent to which capital loaned under this program might, by one means or another, be used to benefit those kinds of takeovers and consolidations of ownership. As I indicated a moment ago, I think that in view of the tremendous frustration which fishermen in British Columbia have experienced over the complicated and increasingly tedious licencing system which is evolving, it is important to determine which type of licence classes are getting the loans under this program. As I hinted earlier, I think probably the most important question that the minister must answer is to what extent the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is exercising control over the disbursement of these rather large amounts of money, and to what extent that disbursement is matched to the management objectives of the department.

It was a surprise to me, upon doing some checking, to learn that there are no fisheries loans review boards at the federal level on either the east coast or the west coast. There are provincial review boards in Atlantic Canada. I would expect some kind of a tie of that nature to ensure that fishermen and the department have some say in how these loans are disbursed.

I would also like to raise what is to me a philosophical dilemma. I look to the economics of the fishing industry and I see that the uptake of loans under this act is very much lower in Atlantic Canada than it is in the case of moneys needed to develop the west coast fishing industry. In contrast, I see large amounts of direct capital assistance going to the east coast fishery through the small craft harbours projects, gear subsidy programs, vessel subsidy programs and the like. I do not condemn that particularly, but I wonder what the minister has to say about this dichotomy between the east coast fishery and the west coast fishery. Is it perhaps that the east coast fishery is so dependent on grants and federal largesse that it does not need to seek out loans and take the additional risk that entails? If that is the case I think we all want to understand, if this is a matter of government policy, what the implications of it are.

I believe that the loans route is a commendable route, and when the government can assist with risk taking, to a degree that is desirable. Unfortunately this government has not agreed to pursue the tax incentive route by introducing write-off provisions in the Income Tax Act. This was proposed by the former minister of finance in the Conservative government in order to encourage investment in the construction of vessels and related equipment in a direct sense, not by depending on government but by allowing the private sector interests to pursue their initiatives and to reward that by some form of tax credit.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni, there is a problem in the B.C. fishing industry in particular, regarding overcapitalization. The minister is very familiar with that problem. We have many large vessels and, of course, a much larger number of small vessels. The large vessels are capable of harvesting the lion's share of most species of fish on the west coast. They are equipped with sophisticated sounding gear, powered winch gear and all kinds of ancillary equipment, to make them a very powerful force in the west coast fishing industry.

I would be alarmed if I were to learn that many of the larger vessels, particularly seiners, were those that are benefiting most under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. We do have the dilemma of overcapitalization. However, fishermen also mortgage their homes and borrow large amounts of money, as much as $250,000, to build larger vessels. The viability of those investments is predicated on stable markets and a stable management policy.

Conflicting with that, in recent years we have seen the continual rearrangement of management policies, relating to licensing in particular, to the extent that the fisherman exists in a world of uncertainty and is subject to the vulnerability of the boom and bust cycle which prevails because of natural factors or inadequate management information on which licensing policies and decisions are based.

I believe that the management policies that the department has created and developed ever since the days of the Davis plan, exacerbate the problems we face. On the one hand we are confronted with a 200-mile limit and we want to develop those new resources consistent with good management policies in a way which will be to the net benefit of fishermen. On the other hand the various actions of the department in recent years have frustrated and dispirited individual fishermen who need to invest in rather large vessels and associated gear.

Halibut is an example. We have an agreement with the United States involving halibut caught in Alaskan waters. That led to the closing of an area of the fishery in which a number of investors were just embarking. The federal government was caught in the ludicrous position of buying back gear and buying fishermen out of that industry, perhaps financed with funds that had originally been loaned under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. The minister shakes his head, and I would be pleased to get information to the contrary.

I have a secondary problem consequential to that halibut agreement which might be of interest to the minister and to the House. As a consequence of the gear buy-back program, a lot of gear is being sold through Crown Assets Disposal at less than half the market value. Small manufacturing enterprises engaged in the business of building gear—drums, power winches, net handling gear and the like—in British Columbia are frustrated because gear is now being dumped on the market by this government which is supposed to be interested in their welfare. The government's decision to restrict the halibut fishery results from what I believe was a rather hastily conceived and poor agreement with the Americans regarding northern halibut. It frustrates the entrepreneurs who service the fishing industry.

There is also a problem with black cod and other forms of bottom fish which are presumably available to west coast fishermen as a result of the 200-mile limit. The information on stock levels is inadequate. No projection of future yields is available as a basis on which to predicate investment—investment which might well be funded under this program.

We also have the very serious problem of the depletion of herring stocks. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) has a deep and personal interest in this problem. The consequence of the depletion of the herring stocks was the closing of the herring roe fishery this spring. I wonder how many of those powerful herring seine boats were financed with moneys obtained under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

An hon. Member: It was a strike.

Mr. Siddon: It was not entirely a strike, it was a question of quotas and stock levels resulting from overfishing in bonanza years which the department permitted in years gone by, and which built up expectations. Now those people who may have mortgaged their homes or incurred commitments under this act are hard pressed to make the payments against those loans.

I now come to a very important problem, Mr. Speaker, that relating to Chinook salmon. A decision was taken just last week by the department, in the name of the minister, to close the Chinook salmon fishery in the Fraser River. That decision will impose tremendous hardship on the small boat owners who gillnet fish in the Fraser River. No similar sanctions have been imposed on the seine boat owners, the trollers or the sport fishing community. The squeeze is being put on one sector of the industry. I should like to know how many of their vessels have been financed through loans made under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. The squeeze is not being applied against the larger vessels nor indeed against the American vessels which intercept the Chinook salmon beyond the boundaries of our territorial control. We have not found an acceptable solution to this because the department have not resolved the Canada-U.S. fisheries treaty question on the west coast.

There are a variety of paradoxes here, Mr. Speaker. They all point to the very important need for loans, for financial incentive and initiatives relating to the development of the fishery to be properly and carefully integrated with the management objectives of the department. I would welcome any information the minister could offer which would clarify the genuine concern that I have. There is a definite need to complete the white paper policy review initiated by his predecessor in the Conservative government. This would have led to a fisheries development policy for the 1980s. Many of his departmental officials put much effort into this, and the people of Canada made a considerable contribution to it. The problems we have heard of this afternoon point to the need for a policy paper which addresses these very important questions.

There must be more effective consultation. The Sinclair and Levelton reports on licensing have been circulating for almost two years. They deal with difficult conservation questions which we should consider at the standing committee level. I submit that is where members who represent fishing industries can make a contribution and assist the minister in resolving this important paradox which comes from taking a development oriented approach to the industry on the one hand and, on the other hand, talking about restricting, conserving and restraining the natural initiatives of fishermen.

• (1720)

I hope the minister will consent to allow the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to review the Sinclair and Levelton reports. We are not too far along with that initiative so far, but I believe the members of that committee could be of great help to the minister in getting out to the regions and listening in detail to the fishermen.

In closing, from surface impressions at least, I see a rather haphazard approach being taken to the disbursement of funds under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I think the Department of Fisheries and Oceans must be held accountable for rationalizing their management initiatives against their desire to provide capital for the building and development of our fishing industry.

I believe that we must have some type of review process and some reporting method so that the fishermen of Canada and members of Parliament can view the ways in which these moneys are being disbursed and the way in which they integrate with the management policies of the department. I would hope that the minister will comment on that recommendation this afternoon. In any event, we certainly look forward to pursuing it at greater length when this bill reaches committee stage, which I am sure it will.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of moving concurrence in the first report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, notice of which appears in today's order paper on page 4.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary seeks unanimous consent to revert to motions for the purpose he has described. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the first report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments presented to the House on Monday, June 2, 1980, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF AND INCREASE IN GUARANTEED LOANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc that Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this bill is certainly one which should go to committee and which should be discussed therein at quite some length. Like many other government intentions, the act finds itself in a position as it stood prior to the introduction of this amendment in which it was impossible to make a significant loan to a boat owner whose boat might require extensive improvement. For instance, in the Bay of Fundy herring industry it would have been impossible to put in a good refrigeration system in an old boat within the $75,000 limit, and I question whether $150,000 will adequately do the job for some of the larger boats that are afloat today. Therefore I believe that we are failing to recognize, even with the limits outlined here, the need of a modern fishing industry.

We have discovered, much to our chagrin, that many of the fish packed or otherwise processed in this nation have not met the quality standards to which some of our foreign potential buyers are accustomed. Some of us have had meetings in parliamentary committees, for instance with European buyers, and we have been advised that our quality does not necessarily meet that to which others are accustomed. Therefore our markets are tenuous. We must have a policy which will improve the capability of our fishing fleet as well as of our processing industry to deliver the quality which is required to sustain the markets and to extract the price which would be available under proper quality circumstances. However, the $150,000 will do some things for some people, but in this structure they will have to be quite small things.

I am concerned by virtue of the fact that, as the fishing industry modernizes and as inflation gallops along behind—or stays out in front in many cases—fishermen have not been able to qualify for loans. The fishermen have not been able to get loans and they have been denied the privilege of safe and adequate fishing vessels. I am saying quite frankly to the minister that I hope he will give some consideration to increasing the size of this limit as it is presently offered.

There are good grounds for making this statement because a joint presentation of the Atlantic provinces to the minister implied some time ago that in 1977 we were looking at a $900 million-plus requirement to upgrade the Atlantic fleet so that we might take proper advantage of the 200-mile limit. When one couples that with the demand that the inshore fleet must improve its capability of delivering quality, we are looking at a lot of money required to do the job.

As a party or as a government we had proposed there become a bank type of facility which would finance the construction of these boats for individuals or groups of individual fishermen so that they could take advantage of this opportunity. The industry would then end up in a vertically integrated structure on the east coast of Canada as it has in many other spheres of our industry. We have many problems, and I hope that we may get a chance to discuss them in greater detail when we get into committee stage on this bill. There are a number of items which we should have an opportunity to discuss. I do not think that we should compromise the independence of the fisherman. We should give him an opportunity to buy a new boat and I think that this is a provision we should have.

One of the problems with the fishing industry, as with the agricultural industry, is the fact that the federal government over the last 15 years has chosen to withdraw itself as a participant in the financial structure to keep the industries in place. As a result, the provinces have had to move in. Some might have moved in anyway, because there are provinces that are inclined to top load the agricultural, the fishing and other industries. I submit that it was the vacating of the historic federal responsibility that has enhanced, encouraged and expedited the interference of the provincial structures into the financing of the fishing fleet.

The federal government should take a long hard look at trying to arrange with the provinces for an equitable opportunity. Province A should not be pitted against province B by the creation of a more attractive loan structure in one province over another. As a result of that, certain ship owners are finding it convenient to move from one provincial jurisdiction to another, taking their boat and their licence with them. This leaves processing facilities behind. It takes the employment with it or leaves unemployed behind, and it is becoming a rather serious social problem as one province competes with the other.

Why do we not give some consideration to making this a bill which might replace the competitive financial proposition placed before fishermen by one province after another in order to attract that industry away from one province and into another? The transfer of a fishing capability from one community to another leaves an isolated community which may well become a ghost town. I think there must be more co-operation between the federal government and the provincial governments.

● (1730)

As has been mentioned earlier, the offshore sales conducted and negotiated by the minister were not conducted with the consent or the approval of the provinces. There is no excuse, in view of the commitment of fisheries ministers in the past 15 years, including that little recess in which we had our opportunity to govern, for a minister making a hasty decision and then confronting provincial counterparts with it, having given them no opportunity to consult. This is wrong. The minister decided that he knew who should market the fish, and he knew who should buy it. He knew everything that ought to be done. Serious objection was expressed by all interested in the fishing industry: if there were to be offshore sales, guarantees should not be supplied by the government and, certainly, any such guarantees should not be in the form of an opportunity to catch fish additional to the quantity already allocated to foreign sources. It is not good for this to happen.

The uncertainty which exists in the fishing industry throughout many of our coastal communities is intolerable, and I believe it could be corrected. We are predicting larger catches of various species of fish and I should like to discuss the herring seining operation, for instance. We have consistently reduced the quota which the herring seining fleet can catch and we have constrained that sector of the industry from going to certain historic grounds in which it used to fish. This is perhaps because Quebec thought the Fundy fleet should not be up in the Gulf, or maybe because Newfoundland thought it should not be off Newfoundland, and Nova Scotia people thought it should not fish off Nova Scotia, ignoring the fact that the seining fleet had created an ongoing year-round fishing operation to which the coast had not been accustomed before.

If it be necessary that the minister accept the pressures of politics from certain areas within Canada, then it becomes equally necessary that when there are additional quotas of any species available, if you rob Peter you had better pay him back. And don't just rob Peter to pay Paul. You had better pay Peter back. For instance, some of these seining boats were only allowed to be bought, built and financed by regulation of the federal government which stated, "You cannot build a boat unless it is licensed both to seine and to be a dragger as well." They were able for years to make their living from herring seining alone. They were never told, "If you do not use those dragger licences you are going to lose them." Consequently there are boats which originally had more than one licence but which had no need to operate under those other licences. The owners are now told they cannot operate under those other licences; they cannot renew them and they will not be able to make a living.

I cite this as an example because I believe there are fishers of other species who are likely to find themselves brought under constraint. I submit there has to be additional licensing opportunity so that, where possible, these boats could be used to make a living for a very proud group of people who have been accustomed to making their living in a hard way but who are now being deprived of that possibility. All these things have to be taken into consideration in the management of supply. If you deprive a guy of one privilege, let us look around and find him another one as we increase the total allowable catches, or, barring this, let us make it possible for him to participate in another fishery because, as I look through the charts which the government has provided, and see what has been the total allowable catch, what has been the historic catch, what has been the foreign catch, and what is the predicted catch, I find that there is a greater fishing opportunity with respect to a large number of species. Perhaps some of those who were deprived of their present living could be extended the privilege of fishing in the areas in which quotas are to be increased for other species—it may be haddock, it may be halibut, it may be cod. Let us not leave these people completely isolated and hung out to dry to go broke. Maybe the dragger licences could be extended to the seining fleet which cannot make a living under existing quotas.

Mr. Speaker, we have talked about a lot of things, including the salmon enhancement program on the west coast. I should like to say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that we need a salmon enhancement program on the east coast. I recently had a conversation with the president of the Bay of Fundy Salmon Fishermen's Association and he told me that when he was a boy he and his father had fished salmon in the Bay of Fundy. As a boy, I knew there was a good opportunity for sportsmen all along the Saint John River Valley. But a low point was reached in the twenties and it was during this period that the Government of Canada undertook an intensive program of the development of fish hatcheries. They built one in the community in which I lived, another one 50 miles north of there, and another 150 miles south. They were scattered over New Brunswick. They were built in Bedford, Nova Scotia, and Margaree, Nova Scotia, among other places. That man reported to me that within a reasonable period of time, because of this intensive effort on the part of salmon hatcheries, in the scattered hatcheries throughout Atlantic Canada, the salmon population did in fact return to the Bay of Fundy to a point at which it was again a viable fishery.

I beseech the minister to examine in a practical way the increment in salmon population which occured when salmon hatcheries were developed—salmon and trout, for that matter. This may be contrary to some of the recommendations he has received from a strictly scientific point of view. The little hatchery near my home hatched up to 2.5 million salmon eggs. The little streams in which I went fishing as a boy soon became populated with "shiners", fingerling salmon which went to sea and returned, fully grown, in adequate numbers to bring about both a professional fishing industry in the Bay of Fundy and excellent sports fishing in the streams of New Brunswick.

Now this little hatchery in my community has been closed down, phased out. It has a good water supply. It is a good facility. I wish the minister would at least consider reactivating this hatchery and experimenting in a stream or streams in New Brunswick with this one hatchery, if with no others, to determine whether or not the older fishermen in the Saint John-Bay of Fundy area are right when they say that hatcheries will, indeed, increase the number of salmon in the streams of New Brunswick and in the Bay of Fundy. I have already written to the minister on this subject and I hope he will give it serious consideration.

All the things we may wish to do with regard to financing the industry and preserving the stocks will be in vain unless we improve our surveillance program. I had the privilege of discussing this program off the Atlantic coast with a chap who worked on it for the summer. He gave me some rather startling information. In his summer employment he did not see the gear hauled on a foreign fishing vessel to know what came ashore. He did not see one haul. He spent his summer on a boat which did not see the foreign fishing vessels which he inspected haul their gear from the water. I think this would be something for the press to pursue. I do not have all the information I would like to have on this, but I think the press should do some very careful interviewing of people who have worked aboard the surveillance vessels off the east coast of Canada. They are slow. The fishing vessels are far faster than the surveillance vessels. Some fishing vessels have sailed beyond them and were not apprehended getting out of our boundary waters and into American waters where we could not apprehend them.

The inspection of freezer boats is such that once a boat is half loaded, what is it loaded with? How are you going to get into the holds to determine what in fact is in them? I am very skeptical of the surveillance on the high seas as I watch the surveillance on the streams. I have pleaded with the minister, I believe every year since 1972, to put the type of surveillance on the streams of eastern Canada which would put the fear of the law into those who are poachers and on who I lay the blame for a large portion of the depletion of our salmon population.

It is all right to say that the native people on the streams have taken them all. They have taken some, but when we know through the grapevine that there is an organized marketing structure through which poachers work to get rid of their illegal catch, and that is marketed with good returns to those who caught the fish illegally, then there has to be something seriously wrong with the enforcement system. I plead with the minister. I think I made an element of progress with his immediate predecessor with respect to what should be done for surveillance of these streams and the penalizing of those who poach upon them, and I hope that this too will not have been lost by a change of government.

This bill certainly should go to committee. It should be discussed. It has some very important aspects, and it gives us in this House who are interested in fishing one of very few opportunities to discuss the industry. I think we can under this bill.

One of the things we have learned is that if we would put our foreign fishing licences into the hands of some countries which would provide markets, we might indeed get better trading opportunities. Western Europe is prepared, I think, to make some duty concessions if we are prepared to put some of the foreign fishing licences into the hands of European nations. We might have to take them from those who already have them, because I am not suggesting that we give additional foreign fishing capability to foreign fishing fleets. Rather, we should reduce it, but there is reasonable indication that it becomes negotiable if we place our foreign licences in the proper hands.

Once again I wish to repeat what the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) said with respect to tax credits. If ever there was a hazardous industry which has cyclical opportunities of market and fish runs, it has to be the fishing industry. It and agriculture are the two riskiest industries in Canada. I think there should be the greatest opportunity possible for tax credits to make it possible for fishermen to feel that they have a future in the purchase of vessels which would be capable of earning them a living regardless of their cost. They should not be burdened with 20, 30 and 40 year mortgages as we are when we buy houses. Rather, they should be granted an opportunity so that within a short period of time they could pay for them. This is not a loss of tax money. It is a deferral of the collection of tax because, once it is paid for and once it is depreciated, then the government gets its pound of flesh in full fashion. I think this is an important and imperative thing to do.

I look forward to meeting the minister in committee, discussing this bill to a greater extent and getting to some of the finer points of some of the problems which we have on the east coast which need attention.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize I had percolated to the top of the list.

I just want to poach in a few comments of concern and take this opportunity as a member from the west coast who has been involved in fishing. Actually I was a gillnetter at one time trying to get myself through university, and when I am out on the coast and on the water I do use the opportunity to have dialogue with fishermen. I visit the up-coast fishing plants. I stop and have great evenings on some of the fishery patrol vessels and with the people clearing streams. I get a grassroots feel for the problems out there.

Before moving on to that, I would just like to remind the House that this bill is needed at this point in time, but it should be part of the over-all review in terms of credit and the type of financial service the Government of Canada is making available to the various sectors of the Canadian community.

As the minister said in his opening remarks, we are now moving into guarantees, and the guarantees are moving from $80 million up to some $250 million. That in itself is not serious. The cost of these guarantees is about three-quarters of 1 per cent, but the Federal Business Development Bank is also substantially involved in guarantee programs, the cost of which before the recent rash of bankruptcies was running at about one half of 1 per cent and is probably now up over 1 per cent.

We are getting ourselves into a downstream liability under these guarantee programs, and I think we in the House should ask ourselves just what contingent liability we are placing upon tomorrow's taxpayers and upon the treasury of the country.

We are getting into guarantees like $200 million with regard to the Chrysler Corporation. We see possibly $250 million as the expanse of this program for east and west coast fisheries, which benefits many people. It is true that the Chrysler program will benefit workers a couple of years down the stream, but we are also in a patchwork quilt dilemma with the various programs we keep sustaining and extending for another couple of years. The review that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) has told us about, and which has been in the works now for some time, is a very important review, and this particular subject matter should be part of that review as it fits into this whole question of the types of financial services delivered to the community and the contingent liability we are getting into, in the form of guarantees.

One of the things which has concerned me is the fact that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans seems to be moving into a marketing stance on both coasts. I am not familiar with the detailed aspects regarding the east coast, but I do know that everything we harvest on the west coast is marketed and sold. I suppose it is because I am on this side of the House, I am a Conservative and I believe in limited government and that there is a better lifestyle and more efficiency in activities widely dispersed in the private sector, that I keep questioning why the Department of Fisheries and Oceans should be moving in and making threats to move into marketing when I think the job it is doing in the enhancement and protection of species deserves examination. That should be where the total effort is concentrated, and if the department needs more resources in terms of protecting, enhancing and developing the species, that is where its activities should be concentrated, particularly on the west coast.

The spawning streams in the state of Washington have been wiped out. When we see what Mount St. Helens has done, we know what nature can do to nature in terms of distortions. True enough, British Columbia and the B.C. coast are more stable geologically than that particular area down there. Perhaps we should be moving into hatcheries that are at the mouth of our river systems so that we can protect the species. As the minister knows, the protection of the species, or the escape of the species into the spawning grounds now, has an added pressure on it and we have to allow more and more of the salt water escapement to move upstream in order to adjust to new harvesting pressures that are on the upstream spawning grounds.

I am not knowledgeable enough to enter a debate on this, but it troubles me when I see, up in the rivers and in the hinterland of British Columbia, power boats and gillnets. It is putting a pressure on that is very difficult to control, and it causes factions and pressures between the native peoples, who have a right to the usufructuary rights of the land. I will stand and argue and debate that, but here is a problem that has to be resolved, and we have to be moving in with the federal knowledge, with the provinces, to try to do that. Perhaps some of this problem can be resolved if we move into the technology of hatcheries down lower at the mouth of the Fraser river end of our streams.

Let us consider herring. One of the things that has truly troubled many of us on the west coast is what we have done to our herring. It was not the Department of Fisheries that outlawed pit lamping in the gulf of Georgia. It was the skippers of the seine boats who outlawed that rape of the water. They would go out there and set their seines, and the pit lamps would be down there, and they would pull these seines in, and they could pull up juvenile salmon, not herring. Every time you gather in a ball of fish like that, the mortality is tremendous.

We need a lot of interface and a lot of talk to prevent some of the things we are doing to ourselves on the west coast. But when we allow a harvesting operation to move right up into the spawning beds of herring, right up on to the kelp, right up on to the rocks where they are about to spawn, and we take that resource away, particularly in light of what most of us on the west coast feel who know the waters, when you allow that, you are putting a pressure on that resource at which we should really be taking a good hard look.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: There is a big sports fishing industry out on the west coast, and I am a sports fisherman. But perhaps we must take a really good look at disallowing the use of herring in the sports fishery. I can tell you that there are little bays and coves all around with sand bottoms, which formerly had tremendous, boiling populations of herring and feeder fish, and people who are making their living from it sweep these bays out. Where you used to be able to go in and jig for your bait and put it on a hook and catch your salmon, there are bays now where you cannot jig for herring because there just are not any herring there. I took to my colleague on this side of the House, formerly the Minister of Fisheries, a series of letters expressing deep concern from residents on the coast as to what had happened to that little bay and this little inlet and this little area here that historically had had herring in it. That herring had now gone because they had been swept out.

We just cannot remove that feeder source for our salmon from the Gulf of Georgia, and I make an appeal to the minister that we look at it very hard, that our very talented people in fisheries out there should really be devoting themselves to the protection of the resource.

When I presented these letters and this concern to the former minister of fisheries in the last Parliament, I got a letter back, very detailed, but it was pure bureaucratic pap, sir. Even the former minister has had to realize that the concern which was being expressed in the letters that I submitted to him has turned out now, in fact, to be true. Yet there was a defensive letter written for him that he passed on to me, that I passed on out there, and of course I got it back with comments on it that would not be fit to repeat in the House.

I would plead, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister, that we give very serious concern to what we are doing to the feeder stocks out there. This also moves into the lack of common sense—or perhaps there is common sense to it, but nobody on the west coast can understand why the department of fisheries was asking the previous minister to put a limit on 20 inch fish. In other words, if you caught anything under 20 inches in the sports fishery, you had to throw it back. That makes no sense at all, and if there is scientific rationale for that kind of regulation to be placed on the people on the west coast, we have to understand the reasons why. I think that if people are given the reasons why these regulations are drafted and needed, and if they can understand them, particularly in light of the call from people like Mike Crammond, who, for 20 years has been warning us that we are wiping out the herring fishery of the Gulf of Georgia. That call in the wilderness has always been denied by the officials in the department of fisheries, yet I think that if you are going to be honest with yourself today, and you go out on to that coast, you will find that the herring population inside the gulf is indeed threatened and must limit the availability of feed for the fish returning to the spawning grounds.

I would urge, through you, sir, that the minister look seriously at resolving the dispute with the International Salmon Commission because there are engineers sitting there, frustrated, waiting to implement some of the technology that is sitting there, in terms of hatcheries, in terms of improving the breeding of species. Every time I sit down in a boat or on a dock or in a yacht club, I hear these frustrations, and I think that there would be unanimity in this House, from all parties, in urging the minister to move and deliver resource into hatcheries and start protecting the feeder systems that these returning salmon need in order to mature in the gulf.

Surveillance has been mentioned on the east coast. I would say that we also need to look seriously at a merger or an overlapping of responsibilities between the resources of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Transport, the Coastguard, and the Department of Fisheries. I think we can make far more effective use of our physical plant if we get into a merger there. True, the inspection process now, for the new international role we are playing in trying to protect the species, and hence, the continuity of harvest within the 200 mile limit, requires that we be equipped in a modern and efficient manner.

In terms of marketing, if I might come back to that subject, why is the SaltFish Corporation now being moved into the marketing of frozen fish? Is the information that reaches me true, that they have received some $15 million for their involvement in this? Is there a legal status for the SaltFish Corporation to enter into the frozen fish market? Perhaps the minister, in reply in the second reading debate, could shed some light on that, because I seriously question why a Crown corporation that was put in place for a specific need should have its marketing activities expanded when the private sector is equipped and is equipping itself, and is quite capable of handling that aspect of the fishery market.

An hon. Member: No $15 million.

Mr. Huntington: No $15 million? That is good news, then. Perhaps the minister will just advise us why that corporation is being expanded and, if it is not $15 million, are there any dollars being put into that aspect?

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

• (1800)

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): I recognize that Mr. Speaker is entitled to see whom you will in their place, but I want to point out to the House that when the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) completed his intervention and took his seat, I rose in my place to be recognized. If I am not mistaken, I believe I was the only one who had risen, and Mr. Speaker did not see fit to recognize me. As I say, I realize that is for Mr. Speaker to determine, but I wanted to report and record that fact.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. To pay due consideration to the comments of the hon. member, throughout this afternoon the Chair has been having some difficulty because reports have reached this place that, on the one hand, there was a disposition to put this bill through second reading before six o'clock, and on the other hand, increasingly larger numbers of members have approached the Chair to be on the list.

As to the problem raised by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), I think he will find, if he consults with members of his own party, that he will have the explanation as to why he was not recognized at that time.

It being after six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and I hope the opposition side will give this matter serious attention.

In view of the fact that since January 1, 1976, 13,500 senior citizens have been illegally denied unemployment insurance benefits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to immediately bring forward legislation which will overcome the government's previous insensitivity and provide a mechanism that will allow these senior citizens to receive the benefits that they have been owed since 1976.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

FAILURE TO NEGOTIATE ENERGY-PRICING AGREEMENT—CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to place before this House a matter of urgent and pressing concern.

Whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has failed in his attempts to negotiate an energy-pricing agreement with the producing provinces, and whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has given up on new negotiations and asked that a pricing agreement be now negotiated by the first ministers, and whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has, in a speech to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, made inflammatory remarks which have seriously damaged harmony and accord between provinces and the federal government, I move, seconded by the Alberta caucus and by all concerned Canadians:

That the Prime Minister remove the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources from the portfolio he now holds, which he neither understands nor appreciates, and that he be replaced by a new minister with some grasp of this important and sensitive subject.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

DATE FOR ACHIEVEMENT OF NEW CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a motion which, given its importance at this time, I hope will gain unanimous approval of the House. There has been some discussion on both sides to achieve this end.

Considering the national importance of achieving constitutional change and a renewal of Canadian federalism at an early date, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the House urges the first ministers' conference meeting on June 9 to set, as an outside date for the achievement of a new Canadian constitution, July 1, 1981.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Joe said no.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

RECOGNITION OF KETTLE VALLEY RAIL HERITAGE SOCIETY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I seek the unanimous support of the House on a matter which affects every citizen of Canada who values our history and heritage.

Inasmuch as the Kettle Valley Rail Heritage Society, a self-financed group with some 2,000 members in the Okanagan Valley, is dedicated to the preservation of a unique 56-mile abandoned section of the Carmi subdivision of the CPR which was immortalized in the filming of the Pierre Berton inspired movie "The Impossible Dream", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House urge the responsible authority in the CPR to recognize the worthy purpose of the aforementioned society by declaring a moratorium on track removal of one year's duration in order that the terms of preservation may be established.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

DONATIONS TO NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The NDP passed a resolution in 1977 which states that the party would not solicit or accept funds from any sources other than individuals, labour unions, co-operatives, small businesses and recognized non-profit organizations. George Johnston of the British Columbia Federation of Labour said:

● (1410)

Our role is in opposition to corporate interests and there is no way we can maintain our integrity while accepting donations.

Robin Sears, chief agent for the NDP, reported to the Chief Electoral Officer that in 1978 the New Democratic Party received more than $172,000 from private corporations, including contributions from such small businesses as Holiday Inn, Canadian Tire and Dominion Securities.

An hon. Member: Canadian Tire?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: In view of these facts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House call upon the NDP to return immediately to these private corporations this money, with interest, and to write an open letter of apology for misleading the Canadian people, in order to ensure the future integrity of the party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chénier: The NDP said "No".

REQUEST HOUSE CONGRATULATE GORDIE HOWE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce an important motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that hockey is the national sport of our country and that yesterday one of the greatest hockey players of all times, Mr. Gordie Howe, decided to retire, considering that this great athlete from Saskatchewan has been the idol of hundreds of thousands of young Canadian athletes over three decades; and considering that Mr. Gordie Howe has been a credit to his province and his country throughout his long career, more especially in international games, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre):

That this House pay tribute and warmly congratulate Mr. Gordie Howe, one of the greatest hockey players of all times, for his exceptional contribution to our national sport over 32 years.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is moved by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre):

That this House pay tribute and warmly congratulate Mr. Gordie Howe, one of the greatest hockey players of all times, for his exceptional contribution to our national sport over 32 years.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

HUMAN RIGHTS

BREACH OF UNITED NATIONS COVENANT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact the United Nations Human Rights Committee has received communications made on behalf of a number of inmates that Canada has breached article 15 of the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Canada is a signatory, in denying early release to prisoners and parolees with street time served on parole prior to October 15, 1977, and that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) stated that "should any member of Parliament be willing to raise the question in the House under Standing Order 43, the government would have no objection to debating the issue", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), and not opposed by the government House leader:

That the subject matter of the communications pending before the United Nations Human Rights Committee be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for a recommendation as to the appropriate response to these communications.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BROADCASTING ACT

HEARINGS BEFORE CRTC—COMMITTEE STUDY OF POSSIBLE BREACH OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The CRTC has an established precedent of not requiring further public hearings for licence applicants who have been granted a provisional licence.

In view of the case of Family Radio of Vancouver, British Columbia, the quasi-judicial body has not only required an appearance before two further public hearings, but has even permitted a negative intervention after the granting of provisional licence, a break with its own operating policy. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That the CRTC be called before the Standing Committee on Culture and Communications to explain this action which has jeopardized the objectivity of its quasi-judicial status, and to see whether the commission is indeed in breach of the Broadcasting Act.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT CONSIDERING HOLDING NATIONAL REFERENDUM—DISCUSSION WITH PREMIERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I accept that applause on my side of the House, Madam Speaker, as being an indication that my colleagues hope my forty-first year, which begins today, will be more totally satisfying than my fortieth year was.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I have a question for the Prime Minister, but before posing it let me take the opportunity of expressing my appreciation to the Prime Minister for starting the practice of consultation with leaders of other federal parties prior to a federal-provincial constitutional meeting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One matter that was not discussed specifically in the conversations between the Prime Minister and myself yesterday was the possibility of a federal referendum. I raise the question now because there have been references to such device made by the hon. member for Labelle speaking, I believe, in his capacity as chairman of the Quebec Liberal caucus.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate to the House if the government is now considering legislation that would empower a national referendum.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to begin my reply by wishing the right hon. member many happy returns of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as our meeting yesterday is concerned, I am very happy it took place. I hope, indeed, that the practice will continue. The Leader of the Opposition was good enough to consult me on some matters when I was in his seat, and I am very happy to continue that practice.

In so far as his question is concerned, I am sorry we did not discuss it yesterday, because I would have been happy to have the views of the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: He asked for your view.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that. The view of the government is that this matter is not being considered by the government at this time, but the House will remember that we had a referendum bill which would have been supported, with some modification, by the opposition party a couple of years ago. I am not saying the matter is discarded forever, but I am saying we are not considering such a move at this time.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would take the opportunity to confirm publicly his interest, which we discussed yesterday, in working with other parties in the House of Commons to promote an appropriate reference for a resolution that would allow this whole federal Parliament to discuss questions relating to the renewal of Canadian federalism and the development of constitutional change.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, I would be very interested in having a resolution which all parties in this House could support and which would bring us somewhat closer to the moment when we could have a truly Canadian constitution satisfying all parts of the country.

I am not in a position yet, not having met the premiers, to say whether this should be in the form of a resolution or any other form of motion or debate. I have taken, as a position, that before meeting the premiers—I told the leaders of the opposition parties this yesterday—I would not want to solidify my position in any direction because I want to hear their views. But certainly I would hope that anything which is discussed on Monday with the premiers would not preclude—on the contrary—that we could come to the House of Commons for some, hopefully, universal support for a course to be determined.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would indicate his agreement with my view that, barring some extraordinary position of the premiers, it would be useful for this Parliament to have the opportunity to debate those questions before we rise for the summer recess.

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, at the present time that is my view. Subject to anything which might arise in the meeting with the premiers, and subject to the views of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, I would hope that before we recess for the summer we can debate this matter. I would go further and hope that we can take some action, but of course that will depend on what the premiers are prepared to consider and to say on Monday.

As far as we on this side are concerned, we see the matter as a very urgent one and we would like to see more than debate; we would like to arrive at a resolution of at least some of the constitutional matters.

FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING—PROPOSALS FROM PROVINCES

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received any specific proposals from the provinces in preparation for the June 9 first ministers' meeting? Has he, on behalf of the federal government, given specific proposals to the province, or has the communication to date been primarily concentrated in the letters which were exchanged between the Prime Minister and the premiers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, neither the Minister of Justice nor myself have received any concrete proposals from the provinces beyond the verbal exchanges which took place when the Minister of Justice met with them. I have had no further communications from the provinces beyond the letter which was tabled in the House.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, in view of the interest across the country and, of course, resident here in the House on participation in constitutional talks, could the Prime Minister indicate whether after the meeting of June 9 he would be willing to make a report to the House, either of motions or by whatever mechanism he finds suitable, to report on the progress of that meeting, rather than having to rely on eliciting the information only through question period?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to make a statement on motions on the results of the June 9 meeting, shall we say in the several days following that meeting. Of course, if it appears that the kind of debate referred to by the Leader of the Opposition is to come reasonably soon after June 9, it might be convenient to wait for that debate before I make any statement. Assuming we are given a couple of days to decide on that latter matter, if it appears that debate is not reasonably imminent then I will be happy to make a statement on motions.

FEDERAL POSITION ON CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE—DATE FOR ACHIEVEMENT OF NEW CONSTITUTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. According to the chairman of the Quebec caucus of the Liberal party, as he is quoted in today's press, Quebec MPs of the Liberal party plan to spend the summer—to use his words—"to sell" the federal position on constitutional change.

Considering that the only position the Prime Minister has taken so far which seems to be eminently sensible, going into a meeting of the first ministers, is a commitment to a charter of rights, would the Prime Minister tell the House if anything other than persuading Quebeckers as to the desirability of a charter of rights lies behind that statement by the chairman of the caucus, or is something else intended?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I attended part of that caucus meeting yesterday. There are several subjects on which the caucus would like to see the Canadian Constitution improved and federalism renewed. The hon. member mentions a charter of fundamental rights. The caucus seemed very interested, also, in entrenching linguistic rights. These were opinions which were expressed: there was no resolution, to my knowledge, of the caucus.

The significance of the whole debate, as far as I was able to perceive it, is that our Quebec members, having participated very valiantly in the recent referendum in Quebec, are anxious to see that this government and this Parliament live up to the undertaking which we all made in our province, that there would be renewed federalism and that it would come quickly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, following the conversation that I had with the Prime Minister yesterday on this particular matter of constitutional change, I should like to ask if he is prepared at least to indicate the desirability—keeping in mind that he has to obtain agreement from the premiers when they meet—of providing a forum in the constitutional change process for the direct presentation of views by the people of the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the native peoples, as opposed to working simply and exclusively through the federal government?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party will undoubtedly recall that in February 1979 we, the federal government, had put on the agenda of the constitutional conference an item along the lines the hon. member referred to, that is, we had suggested that Indian and Inuit spokesmen present briefs directly to the constitutional assembly. On that latter point we do not differ.

As to the participation of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, I repeat what I said about the position I took last week and the week before. Those, are in a sense, different levels of government. I remind the House that many times we receive representations from mayors and municipalities, which also represent another level of government, and that those representatives also wanted to take part in the constitutional talks.

With regard to those two catègories—other levels of government—I shall be very happy to raise the matter with the premiers. I do not promise that it will be done on Monday. I remind the House that the matter of broadening the debate through increased participation was discussed between the leader of the New Democratic Party and myself and that I even suggested to him that at one point we might be moving toward such a solution. But I do not think that at this stage I must invite representatives of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to attend this conference, unless the premiers and I decide to broaden the participation.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A further supplementary question. I certainly hope, Madam Speaker, that the Prime Minister is successful in what I take to be his undertaking to try to get a commitment from the premiers to widen participation.

My final question to the Prime Minister is this. Considering the need for speedy constitutional change, does he consider that as an outside date it would be desirable for us, as a Parliament, to agree that we should have a new constitution established in Canada by July 1, 1981?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party probably noticed that this side of the House gave support to his earlier motion to that effect. I would only want to modify it. While I would first welcome that rapid date—that deadline set by the New Democratic Party—and say that we are indeed grateful that at least our two parties are of the view it is that urgent, all I would add—I told the hon. Leader of the Opposition this yesterday in our talks—is that if we can do it sooner, in total or in part, that would be our preference. We on this side feel there is a great deal of urgency for a variety of reasons.

Oral Questions

COMMUNICATIONS

EARTH STATION ON GROUNDS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGISLATURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. He will know that, despite his blandishments on Tuesday, the licence given to the British Columbia government for the earth station located on the lawn of the B.C. legislature does not confer the right to receive American programs from American satellites and that, despite that fact, the British Columbia government is currently receiving signals from American satellites.

Does the minister accept the argument made by the British Columbia government that the earth station on the lawn of their legislature is not covered by federal legislation? If he does not accept that argument, what action does he propose to take?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, on this question I should like to point out two things to the hon. member. First of all, as far as the legality or illegality of the earth receiving station is concerned, I have asked for a full report and advice from the legal officers of my department.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that this goes beyond the question of legality or illegality. As far as I am concerned, an undertaking was given to this government by the government of British Columbia—particularly, by its minister responsible for science, universities and communications—to the effect that the satellite would be used exclusively to receive CBC commercial signals. This undertaking has not been followed by that government. In that sense I find it extremely disturbing that a minister of the Crown of a provincial government would put himself in the position of not living up to his word.

• (1430)

I would like to point out that we have some ten to twelve ongoing possible projects with the B.C. government, in particular with that minister, and I would like to know whether or not this government can count on that minister living up to his word.

Mr. Andre: Take him into the constitutional talks, too.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister a very direct question. Is he threatening the B.C. government at the present time that if, in the opinion of the Minister of Communications of the federal government, the B.C. government does not live up to what he believes is an undertaking that it made, the federal government will not participate in these other joint agreements with the B.C. government?

Further, on Tuesday the minister went out of his way to studiously avoid giving the assurance to Canadians living in northern, remote and rural areas that prosecutions would not be launched against them because they have set up earth stations to give themselves the same freedom of choice in programming as is freely available to Canadians living in southern Canada. May I also ask the minister whether he is prepared to give that assurance to Canadians in that area now, that Ottawa will not intercede to ensure that that discrimination continues?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, it has always been stated quite clearly that our main concern, or our main area of interest was in earth receiving stations that were used to rebroadcast programs received from satellites. We have always indicated that as far as the domestic use of these satellites for home personal purposes was concerned, it was not a matter of general concern to us.

The hon. member is mixing up two very different questions and is trying to identify or to render equal the two problems involved, one which concerns home receiving satellite stations, and satellite stations which are used to rebroadcast programs. We have always indicated quite clearly that the only earth satellite stations that we are looking at for prosecution purposes at the moment are earth satellite stations that were being used for rebroadcast purposes and that were, at the same time, interfering with other licensed cable operations, or interfering in general with the management of the spectrum.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the House will note that the minister did not answer the question as it related to the B.C. government and whether the minister intended to withdraw from agreements with B.C.

The minister knows full well that in dozens of communities in northern and remote areas, whole communities have banded together to put up earth stations to ensure that the whole of those communities will be able to receive freedom of choice in programming. Will the minister now remove his threat to launch prosecutions against Canadians living in rural and remote areas of Canada where communities have banded together to give themselves that freedom of choice?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is trying to create confrontation where none exists.

Mr. Beatty: I did not threaten to prosecute anyone.

Mr. Fox: I have gone out of my way over the past week trying not to build up the matter with the B.C. government into a question of a federal-provincial confrontation.

Mr. Beatty: I did not threaten to prosecute anyone.

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member will let me answer, he may learn something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Arrogance.

An hon. Member: Listen, Joe Clark.

Mr. Fox: I fully expect that the minister of communications for the province of British Columbia will want to conform immediately to the conditions set out in his licence. The licence was issued according to the terms that he requested, and I expect him to live up to those terms.

The hon. member is once again raising the question of possible prosecutions against communities in the north. The hon. member knows full well, because he was in the House this week when he asked the same question, that it is not our intention at the moment—

Mr. Clark: At the moment.

Mr. Fox: —to prosecute those communities. We have always indicated quite clearly, Madam Speaker, that it was our intention to await the outcome of the hearings of the CRTC, as was the position of the previous government, on the question of extension of television services to the north. From that point on, the CRTC would consider applications for licences for the north, and we would hope to bring an end to this problem by addressing the root of the problem and not simply by bringing up confrontation as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Beatty: Don't make threats next time, Francis.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—ABILITY OF INCO TO MEET PROVISIONS OF CONTROL ORDER

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact that the minister and his department were a party to the Ontario government's recent pollution control order aimed at limiting acid rain-producing emissions from Inco, and in view of the fact that last night the president of Inco Metals announced that his company was unable to meet the provisions of that control order for technical reasons, does the minister give any credence to the statement by the president of Inco and, if not, what steps is he and his department going to be taking, presumably with the Ontario government, to ensure that Inco will reduce sulphur dioxide emissions from its Copper Cliff smelter to 1,950 tons a day by 1983, in accordance with the terms of the control order that I have mentioned?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I think I have seen one press report giving information which the hon. member has just given to the House. I have not seen a transcript nor have I seen a full account of those remarks. I have no reason to believe that the order cannot be met.

I know that there is concern on the part of the company about their ability to do so , but at the present time I do not have any information which would change the view I have previously expressed, which is that I believe the company will be able to meet those objectives.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of the Environment. Given that the minister himself and the leader of the Liberal party in Ontario quoted quite extensively from what seemed to be private, confidential studies from the federal Department of the Environment arguing that Inco can, in fact, adhere to the provisions of the control order and, indeed, can go well beyond that in terms of lowering its acid rain producing emissions, will the minister table such studies in this House so that we, as members of Parliament, and the public at large can assess the validity of the statements made by people like the president of Inco, that they cannot adhere to those pollution control standards?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the view that we expressed was that within four or five years we believe that Inco would be able to bring down the level of emissions considerably below those indicated in the first two stages of the control order.

We have announced that we will be prepared to make available the study on which that estimation was based. However, it would have to be done in a way in which certain names and certain aspects of the information, which were given to us on a confidential basis, were removed. But I have already indicated that the substance of the report would be made available to those who wish to see it.

INDUSTRY

REBATE PROGRAM FOR CANADIAN PURCHASERS OF AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am going to ask it very quietly, so I do not offend him.

The minister no doubt noticed that there has been a dramatic downturn in the sale of North American-built vehicles in Canada, and a dramatic downturn in the sale of Canadian-built vehicles in Canada. When can we expect to see the introduction in Canada of a rebate program similar to the one introduced by the Big Three in the United States, in order to assist not only the workers but the dealers and the consumers in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the rebates mentioned by my hon. friend have been as a result of reaction by the motor vehicle manufacturers in the United States to market conditions there. I will certainly be checking with them urgently to see whether they are contemplating similar action here.

An hon. Member: You said that two weeks ago.

Mr. Gray: Certainly, one would want to offer to Canadian consumers opportunities similar to those available in the United States where the market conditions are also similar.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, if I understood the minister correctly, he said that he would check into it to see.

An hon. Member: Two weeks ago he said that.

Mr. Deans: I am sure the minister is not sufficiently absent-minded not to recall that he said the same thing on May 16. Has the minister checked? What was the answer? And when can we expect to see the rebates?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend has demonstrated that he is the absent-minded one, because his question related to Chrysler Corporation.

Mr. Deans: I did not ask the question; the hon. member for Churchill did.

Mr. Gray: My hon. friend says the question was from the hon. member for Churchill. I knew there were a lot of divisions in that party, but I did not realize they were so severe that one member does not take credit for something asked by another one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1440)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend may already be planning to launch a leadership campaign of the type he launched unsuccessfully at the provincial level, and which caused him to abandon provincial politics and come to the federal scene. Perhaps the municipal scene will be next for him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: We did make inquiries of Chrysler Corporation. Their response was that market conditions at that time had not justified a similar response here. If my hon. friend is in agreement that the market situation here has deteriorated to an equivalent level to that in the United States, I am sure he will be happy to join with me in adding to the force of my representations with respect to all the automotive companies here.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF TRANSMITTER IN CHAPLEAU, ONT.

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, responsible as he is for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Given the fact that the corporation persists in believing that the construction of a transmitter in Chapleau cannot proceed because winter is not over yet, could the minister inform the corporation that the spring thaw did take place in Chapleau in late April, and could he assure the residents of Chapleau that work is going to resume very shortly? Finally, could the minister tell the House when the CBC television programs will be aired in Chapleau?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I know that CBC programming in his area is an issue of utmost concern to him. He told me about it several times in recent weeks. I am glad to announce that according to information I received from the CBC, we are in a position today to state that the access road to the transmitter will be opened by June 9 at the latest. The corporation also informed me that, starting June 4, Bell Canada will be able to instal the lines necessary for broadcasting television programs and that CBC expects to start broadcasting TV programs in Chapleau very soon after August 1, 1980.

AIRPORTS

MONITORING OF X-RAY MACHINES TO ENSURE NO DANGER FROM RADIATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, perhaps this question and answer will be a little more spontaneous.

A few days ago I had a lengthy discussion with several security personnel at a major Canadian airport. They voiced very real concern about standing for prolonged periods of time beside the x-ray machines that examine hand luggage.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport if he is aware of these anxieties by his department's security personnel, what is the minister doing to monitor these perpetually operational x-ray machines, and can he assure his own people and the travelling public that there is absolutely no danger from a build-up of radiation when in the immediate vicinity of these potentially dangerous devices?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I read of a certain case in the paper having to do with this. My inquiry revealed that it was a case of a particular attendant who had been overzealous about controlling the passengers. I will inquire to see if there are more issues of this kind, and report accordingly.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Will the minister at least instruct his department's security personnel to wear docimeters, which are required by the military who work in a radiation environment, in order to detect the slightest leakage or minutest build-up of radiation?

Mr. Pepin: I will make such an inquiry, Madam Speaker.

POST OFFICE

INTRODUCTION OF STAMP TO COMMEMORATE MOSCOW OLYMPICS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I have a short question for the Postmaster General. Could the minister confirm or deny whether or not the Post Office is in the process of introducing a new 35-cent Canadian stamp commemorating the Moscow Olympics? "Yes" or "No" will suffice.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer the question put by the hon. member. The former Conservative government had intended to introduce a new stamp commemorating the Moscow Olympics on July 4, 1980. Since Soviet troops have not withdrawn from Afghanistan yet, it is quite possible that the Post Office will decide very soon to drop the introduction of this stamp.

[English]

Mr. Jelinek: My supplementary is this. When this government took the decision on that stamp, the Soviet Union had not yet invaded Afghanistan. As of yesterday, Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Jelinek: They get very nervous and edgy over there when they hear the truth. As of yesterday, the Post Office confirmed that indeed a stamp commemorating the Olympic Games in Moscow is to be introduced on July 4.

My question to the Postmaster General is this. Why, since the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, has not the government taken the necessary action to remove that stamp from production?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, the former government did not take the necessary action to withdraw that stamp from production after the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops. Further, I can assure members of the House that no final decision has been taken and the hon. member cannot say that the stamp will be issued on July 4. I pointed out to him, in answer to his first question, that a decision would be taken in the coming days.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SEIZURE OF TELEPHONE RECORDS—INVESTIGATION BY McDONALD COMMISSION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. The CBC has revealed that in the districts of Halifax, Dartmouth and Sydney over the course of the past two to three years approximately 99 warrants were issued with respect to the seizure of telephone records, including the records of the CBC. In the information forming the basis for those warrants, at least 45 out of the 99 did not contain any basis upon which the warrants should be issued.

Has the Solicitor General examined that matter through the RCM Police? Has he given directions with respect to the policies of the RCM Police which will ensure that they will be more forthcoming as to the basis upon which they apply for these search warrants? Is the McDonald commission being seized of this particular situation, so that a full investigation can be made of the practice of the RCMP in this regard?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have the information which appeared on the CBC television program, but I do not yet have a full report from the RCMP about it. I have examined the operational policy manual which applies to the information required for obtaining a warrant. I am satisfied with the operational policy which is in place, but I am not yet certain whether the policy was complied with in these cases.

The provincial attorneys general have jurisdiction to examine such matters that take place in their own province. Of course, we are prepared to co-operate fully with them. As to the McDonald commission, that independent commission will make its own decision, I am sure, whether to review these matters.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I was going to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, but he is not in his place at the present time. Therefore, I will direct it to the Solicitor General.

After this investigation, will he report to the House, not only whether a practice has or has not been established to put forward the basis upon which these applications are made on the information of a sworn statement, but if he finds that is not the case will he institute a policy by which that is required in the case of RCMP activities? Also, will he assure us that this practice is not widespread, that it does not apply also to Chargex or Visa investigations, or involve the general public who are very concerned with respect to their privacy?

● (1450)

Finally, is the Solicitor General in fact considering bringing forward limitations on writs of assistance, which are open-ended writs available now to law enforcement agencies in this country, the undertaking of the previous government being to bring forward legislation to do something to regulate that particular search warrant?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, so far as writs of assistance are concerned, there is a moratorium in effect on their issuance. No position paper has yet been taken to cabinet on that question, so it would be premature to indicate what steps the government will be taking except that the moratorium will be continued until some further decision is taken.

On the question of the policy which applies to the issuance of warrants, as I indicated, I spent time this morning reviewing that operational policy and I am satisfied with it. The question I am not certain about yet is whether the policy was complied with in these particular cases. I am looking into that, and I will be prepared to answer questions about it as soon as I am informed about it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Report back.

ENERGY

OIL REFINERY TAX—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Both before and during the last election campaign he and his party campaigned against the infamous 18 cents excise tax increase proposal of the Clark government. He said at the time that it was regressive and that it would have a bad effect on the economy.

I understand now that the minister has proposed to Alberta, in negotiations with that province, that there be an oil refinery tax which, I am sure the minister must know, would be just as regressive, or even worse for the consumer. Could the minister confirm that he has proposed such a tax? Could he confirm that it is just as regressive as the previous tax, and even more so? If that is so, why has he done this?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as I have already indicated, the government has various alternatives in mind regarding a possible oil price increase.

In his question, the hon. member indicates that this is one of the alternatives. After we hopefully reach an agreement with the producing provinces, my hon. colleague can come to any conclusion he pleases him about the agreement.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, perhaps the minister has forgotten he promised the consumers of Canada that they would have lower oil prices than those which the Conservatives proposed. It sounds like another broken promise.

Let me ask the minister about one of his other promises. Can the minister tell the House why, during the election campaign, he and his party promised that they would maintain the compensation fund to offset the cost of imported oil to the Atlantic provinces, and could he tell the House why he no longer feels obliged to keep this promise?

Mr. Lalonde: On the first point, Madam Speaker, the government has indeed made a commitment that the cost of our proposals on oil pricing will be lower than it would have been under the Conservative budget. That is a commitment we intend to honour in all respects. As a matter of fact, already this year consumers have been saved about $2.8 billion in additional taxes which the previous government would have had them pay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Short-term pain for long-term gain.

Mr. Blenkarn: Borrow the money instead.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I note, Madam Speaker, that truth is painful to hear for the Progressive Conservatives. What can we do?

As for the second part of the hon. member's question, I hope that, in view of his experience in the field of energy, he will avoid spreading the false interpretation inherent in his question.

[English]

The question is not that the oil compensation fund would be reduced at the expense of the maritime provinces. As my hon. colleague knows, we have had one price in Canada since 1974 for all of Canada and we have given every guarantee—and we maintain that guarantee—that there will remain in this country a one-price system and that the Atlantic provinces are not going to be in any worse situation than any other part of Canada. That is government policy, that has been government policy since 1974, and it is the one we intend to maintain. So the Atlantic provinces are not going to suffer from the position adopted by this government. They will be in exactly the same position as the rest of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

PROPOSAL FOR INSTALLATION OF SYNCROLIFT IN ST. JOHN'S DOCKYARD

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of his efforts with reference to Chrysler in the Windsor area, is he now in a position to go forward with the proposal in connection with the dockyard in St. John's for the installation of a syncrolift, which will cost $21 million and for which there are funds in the estimates this year to go forward, creating 130 new permanent jobs and maintaining the present 330 jobs at that dockyard? When will the minister make a decision on that?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we are pursuing this actively. My recollection is that the project as originally proposed was found to be in a form in which the cost seemed to be above the amounts originally allocated, so it is being actively reviewed to see if we can make a decision which will be satisfactory to the area and the demands on the public purse.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue has intimated in Newfoundland that the government might have to scrap the $2.5 million in the estimates for this project for this year, so it can be spent on expanding airport facilities in his district or for some other project like that which might have higher priority.

Could the minister assure me that funds dedicated to economic development projects, no matter in whose district they are—opposition or government—if the scheme is sensible, feasible and economic, as the minister's officials assure me this one is, will be used for that purpose and not devoted to pump-priming or patronage purposes in other districts just because they happen to be government districts? Would he assure me that he will see that they are devoted to the purpose for which they are in the estimates?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I would like to confirm that this government is committed to the balanced development of every part of Canada, including the province of Newfoundland.

POST OFFICE

DEPLORABLE MAIL CONDITIONS IN CALGARY—STEPS TO IMPROVE

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General and it is with regard to the deplorable mail conditions in Calgary North. There are approximately 4,000 homes in Calgary North without any type of mail delivery at all. The people there have to drive up to ten miles to get their mail from a letter depot. This amounts to 50,000 barrels of crude oil a year, or $2 million based on the price at which we are buying oil from Mexico.

Can the minister tell this House why he condones this type of waste, and why he will not tell the Post Office immediately to commence mail delivery in these areas in Calgary North, especially since it would only cost $200,000 a year—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that this question is under active discussion between officials of my department and the letter carrier unions. Indeed, there is the suggestion of the establishment of a certain number of extra positions to carry out delivery services. Within the actual budget and the person allocations which we have, we are trying to find ways to improve letter delivery services in Calgary.

SETTLEMENT WITH CUPW—COST TO GOVERNMENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. It arises from a press release put out by him and the Postmaster General yesterday in which the following is stated:

Mr. Ouellet said the over-all wage and benefits package represents a 10.43 per cent increase in expenditures over the life of the contract.

That is, the CUPW contract settled between the Treasury Board and that union. Unfortunately, this morning the Postmaster General's mind went blank when I asked him what was the dollar amount represented by the 10.43 per cent. He suggested that the President of the Treasury Board could give me that figure. Would the President of the Treasury Board give me the figure?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity. I also received a press release, issued by the hon. member, and it would appear that his mind went blank when he wrote it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I am surprised that he has the courage to rise from his seat and put a question to me today after issuing such a document, which is a complete distortion of the facts of this settlement. I can only suggest that he does not understand how these wage settlements are calculated, or else he had some help with his arithmetic from the opposition House leader.

● (1500)

The specific answer to the hon. gentleman's question, which I gave yesterday, is that the cost of the settlement is $36,068,-232 that is inclusive of COLA, cost of living index adjustment and improved fringe benefits, and it is calculated on the base of a straight-time payroll plus COLA, which is $345,829,659.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board is this. Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate why—if, in fact, the extra cost is $36,068,-000—Treasury Board's last suggested mandate to the Post Office, certainly when we were in office, shows the maximum cost to be $26,100,000, and that anything over that would require a larger Post Office budget? Where did the $10 million get left on the table during the negotiations, and why?

Mr. Johnston: Once again, Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman was my predecessor in the Treasury Board, and apparently he does not understand his own estimates, because the amount included in the estimates for the settlement was not $26 million.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—STATEMENT MADE BY POSTMASTER GENERAL DURING QUESTION PERIOD—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) rose on a question of privilege concerning certain words used during question period by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). As I stated yesterday, hon. members are entirely free to choose the procedure they prefer in this House, as long as they abide by the rules, whether they proceed under Standing Order 43, by asking oral questions or by using any other procedure. I would add that, of course, only the Chair can determine whether a motion is in order and whether the procedure used in the House is appropriate.

As for the question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West, I must say that this does not constitute a question of privilege, but rather a question of order and decorum. Standing Order 12 stipulates that it is the duty of the Speaker to preserve order and decorum in the House. This is why I reserved the right to examine the official report to determine whether the hon. Postmaster General had indeed used the words suggested by some members in this House. I have therefore checked what was said, and I must say that I have not found anything in the words that he used that might be considered as strictly unparliamentary even though the hon. minister went very far in what is allowed. I should remind him and other members that that type of intervention could quite easily lead to a lack of decorum and order in the House. I imagine that this is not exactly the image we want to project of the House of Commons.

However, it is interesting to note that Bourinot, on page 363 of its fourth edition, considers that it is not acceptable to say of another member that he lacks courage. On the other hand, on page 11 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne it is stated that the term "coward" has been judged to be totally parliamentary. Of course, this word was not used by the minister, but some members suggested that he used an equivalent expression.

I should remind the House that these liberties taken with language occur on both sides of the House. For instance, yesterday, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) also used certain terms which might not be quite acceptable in describing the comments made previously in the House by the hon. Postmaster General. I therefore take the opportunity afforded by this question of privilege to appeal to the spirit of moderation which should obviously prevail in all proceedings of the House.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION AMONG HOUSE LEADERS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, before I ask the usual House business question, I want to deal with the matter that arose during the course of the question period, an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) involving the participation by this Parliament in the process of constitutional renewal. I wonder if, given the willingness expressed to him, as House leader of the opposition, to consult with respect to the framing and the timing, and the process in that debate, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) would also undertake—given the importance of the subject matter, and the importance of this Parliament being involved in this process of consideration of our future—to consult with the Prime Minister so that he and I and my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may sit down rather soon to decide this process?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has mentioned that Parliament will certainly be consulted but of course I intend to consult with the Prime Minister as well, Madam Speaker, and following next Monday's meeting with the provincial premiers we will be able to determine how and when Parliament will be consulted. Therefore, all I can say to my colleague for the time being is that I intend, obviously, to respect the opinion of the right hon. Prime Minister. As to how this will be done we will see later.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, thank you very much. I will say, while the Prime Minister is in the House, that we on this side of the House appreciated very much his answer with respect to the matter of consultation with Parliament, and I appreciate, as well, the answer given to us today by the President of the Privy Council, which is the appropriate one, I think, in the circumstances.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if I could go on to some more mundane matters, I wonder if the President of the Privy Council could give us some indication of his plans for the rest of this week and into next week, as far as he can see.

Mr. Pinard: I cannot see very far, Madam Speaker, but starting today, we will try to end the second reading stage of Bill C-28, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; and I understand that there is a good chance that we will also give second reading to Bill C-19, the Employment Tax Credit Act.

I committed myself to my colleagues this morning that if we were to end the second reading stage of Bill C-19 before five o'clock today, tonight we would switch to Bill C-3, the Unemployment Insurance Act amendment. Tomorrow we will deal with the report stages, and hopefully, the third reading stages of Bills C-17, C-27 and C-21, in that order.

[Translation]

As to the business for next week, I can confirm to my colleagues that Tuesday will be an opposition day and I would like to tell them also that depending on the business the House will get through today and tomorrow, we would also like to be able to complete the Committee of the Whole stage of the bill concerning the employment tax credit; we would also like to get through second reading of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act next week and toward the middle of the week, the second reading of the bill to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980-81. On the whole, Madam Speaker, this is the work schedule for the rest of this week and next week.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There is one other matter. There was another exchange involving, I believe, the Leader of the Opposition the other day with respect to the special committee of the House which we now style as a parliamentary task force dealing with the national trading corporation. The questions and the answers given last week indicated there was some consultation to take place. Has that consultation taken place as yet, and can the government House leader indicate if and when we might be seeing a reference, on the understanding, of course, that our undertaking with respect to no debate on such a reference would apply as it did on the others?

Mr. Pinard: On that understanding, I can confirm to my colleague that consultations have been held successfully and I should be in a position to put a motion in front of the House next week dealing with that parliamentary task force. Before seeking unanimous consent, I will show my colleagues the terms of reference.

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, first may I confirm the arrangement that has been made among us, namely, that if the terms of reference for parliamentary task force No. 6 are agreed to by the representatives of the parties, we see no need to debate the motion setting up that task force. We would like the committee to get to work.

It is becoming rather obvious that certain legislation some of us thought would be in the Speech from the Throne, or that we would have in and passed by now, is still having to be fought for in cabinet. As the hon. minister will realize, I refer to the legislation respecting veterans, having to do with the widows of disabled veterans, the amount of the basic rate of the disability pension, and the need for some increase in the war veterans allowance, particularly for veterans who are below the age of 65.

Will the President of the Privy Council, with the weight and the clout of his position, get on the side of the Minister of Veterans Affairs in cabinet in an effort to get this legislation before the House very soon? Veterans just do not understand why they have to wait so long for this urgent legislation. I hope he is now in a position to tell us that it will be in the House in time for us to pass it before any summer recess.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it all depends on when there will be a summer recess, if any. I agree with the hon. member that the subjects he just talked about are very important and are priorities on this side. I witnessed his questions to the hon. minister during the week, and I can assure him that those subject matters are under consideration.

As far as the legislation itself is concerned, surely the hon. member will know that there are many items on the order paper which must be dealt with before the summer recess. I hope we are in a position, with the collaboration and good will of both sides of the House, to get through the backlog and at the same time deal with the very important issues raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, as a supplementary question, may I ask something of the minister. I do so because I would not want my suggestion that this should be done before the summer recess to end in nothing because there is no summer recess. We will work that out. I hope something can be done this month with a view to its being passed certainly before the end of July.

While the government is considering this matter, may I point out that certain legislation before the House last December had an effective date of April 1, 1980. I hope the government will consider making any legislation for veterans retroactive to that date.

Mr. Pinard: I will take the remarks of my hon. colleague under serious consideration.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PURCHASE OF SITE IN CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 272—Mr. Herbert:

Has the waterfront site in Charlottetown, P.E.I. been purchased for use by the Department of Veterans Affairs and, if not, has an alternative site been purchased and, if so, in what location and what amount was paid for the site?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): No, the waterfront site in Charlottetown, P.E.I. has not been purchased for use by the Department of Veterans Affairs. An alternative site (Site 9) located-part of block bounded by Kent, Grafton, University and Prince Streets has been expropriated at an estimated cost of two million to date. Expropriation process allows owners with an interest in land one year from acceptance of offer to commence court proceedings for additional compensation.

POST OFFICE—EMPLOYEES IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 361—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Post Office Department (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979 and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SXs employed?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General):

1. (a) 34
   (b) (i) 7 (ii) 0.
2. (a) 33
   (b) (i) 7 (ii) 0.
3. No.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION—CONTROL OF SALMON FISHING—NORTH ATLANTIC

Question No. 867—Mr. Gass:

Has Canada taken initiatives with respect to a new International Convention to control salmon fishing on the high seas in the North Atlantic and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Over the past year Canada has been engaged with the U.S.A. and the EEC in the development of an International Convention to contribute to the conservation of North Atlantic salmon. Canada has transmitted to the EEC and the U.S.A. the draft of a convention which would provide for management and control of intercepting salmon fisheries in North America, Greenland, and in the Northeast Atlantic. A meeting between the three parties was held in Washington, D.C. April 29-30 and a further meeting is planned for some time in June.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise briefly on a point of order in regard to one specific question. As the parliamentary secretary knows, I have a number of questions which have been on the order paper for two and three years that have not been answered, but I should like to refer to just one at this time.

Question No. 15 asks how much government business has been received by Mr. Martin Goldfarb or Goldfarb Consultants Limited. They are the chief public relations surveyors for the Liberal party and also do government work. I do not think the fact that they have Liberal party connections should mean that the government should not answer a legitimate question about government business with this company for a period of over a year or two.

I raised this matter several times before May 22 last year as a point of order. I was assured by the then parliamentary secretary that an answer would be forthcoming soon. Unfortunately no one was able to define the meaning of "soon". I am wondering whether the parliamentary secretary who is now holding this position can perhaps enlighten us as to what "soon" really meant. Obviously it meant a long time, but does "soon" now mean perhaps tomorrow or the next day?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, to me "soon" means some time in the future. Whether or not that is in the immediate future or the prolonged future is a question over which I have no immediate control.

I try to get answers to questions. In fact, I think we have answered almost 250 questions to date, so I think the record is quite good. I realize the objections of the hon. member and I will do everything I can to get an answer for him. But I might say that the failure to answer a question does not mean to say that question will not be answered some time in the future. I do not think the hon. member should draw the kind of conclusions he does—

Mr. Cossitt: After two years!

Mr. Collenette: —from the fact that this question has not been answered.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF AND INCREASE IN GUARANTEED LOANS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc that Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

[English]

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, last evening I rose to make a few remarks about concerns that I have been receiving over the years from people on the west coast dealing with matters pertaining to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I am using the debate on Bill C-28 as an opportunity to put those concerns on the record and to remind the minister of them.

● (1520)

If I may continue, there are just a few other matters I would like to comment on, and one is an apparent attitude that troubles some of us. I realize there are two sides to all of these stories, but sometimes a beef or complaint can arrive on a member's desk when officials of the department do not see eye-to-eye with a constituent, and we have to find the second side of the story. I bring this before the House again because it seems to be an attitude problem that is all too prevalent and that comes to our attention quite often.

We have people in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans serving the west coast with great skill. These men are scientists, bio-scientists and engineers who have entered the field of applied bio-sciences. Sometimes it has been my observation, rightly or wrongly, and I will ask the minister to take the opportunity perhaps to correct me, that a degree of possessiveness sometimes reaches these men in respect of their examination of ideas or inventions that come in from the marketplace.

One of these in particular was an application to the department on the west coast for some assistance or research for a herring pump. The Department of Fisheries, so the newspaper article and the individual involved reports, did not take up the suggestion although the performance of this pump had been demonstrated and did need improving. I should like to point out that this was an entrepreneur, an inventor, a mechanic, a man who had applied knowledge and was seeking some assistance from the department in respect of this mechanical aid to the industry.

That pump, that project, did not receive encouragement from officials in Canada on the west coast and it was taken to Los Angeles. That pump is now being manufactured in Los Angeles for a wider market than specified—

An hon. Member: And exported into Canada.

Mr. Huntington: Yes, and is being exported in Canada. Canadians are buying these pumps now manufactured in the United States for one of the purposes intended. The principle of the pump can be expanded and researched into other areas. It is this type of thing that causes an unnecessary level of anxiety in the community. Perhaps more open-minded attitudes, more discussion and less elitism between the scientist, the mechanic, the entrepreneur and the marketplace would be in order and advisable.

I mentioned yesterday that we are very concerned about the diminishing herring population inside the Gulf of Georgia. I will not repeat all of my remarks on that other than to say that on March 13, 1980, there was an article which appeared in the Vancouver Province that said officials had rapped herring research, and that they had only a mere pittance for studies. If it could be substantiated that they are not getting enough money for research and they want to come before a committee and make a case, I am sure every member from the west coast would help them impress upon the government the need for that research.

However, following that article I did receive input from people who are very interested in the performance of the department on the west coast. One gentleman who keeps me informed on a variety of matters pertaining to the coastguard, fisheries and environmental matters said he just did not agree with the newspaper article, that federal fisheries people say they are short of funds in herring research, and implied that the disaster is the result of penny pinching.

I do not want to see the herring resource on the west coast dry up for any reason, whether it is from overfishing, moving in on the roe harvest, or whether it is for lack of research.

In support of his statement, he goes on to say:

Any half-intelligent commercial fisherman could see what was happening.

That is so, Mr. Speaker. Anybody knowing the waters, knowing the resource and the marine resource on that coast, could see that there was a serious imbalance and a reduction in a very important feed resource for salmon. He points out that even he could see it, as I have just said, and could have given them, as could any fisherman, the advice for a lot less than the $600,000 appropriated. He goes on to say:

Actually the detailed reports prepared by the department over the last eight years are very complete and very informative.

He points out that the department has all the technical know-how and all the facts, but for some reason or other does not properly use the information available to it. He suspects that either there is political interference or union pressure.

I have also noted that newspaper articles coming from the unions on the west coast express the same concern I am expressing here and codify this concern. They also point to the fact that perhaps we should be putting more emphasis on the herring fishery as a food herring industry similar to that which has been developed, and which we admire very much, on the east coast of Canada.

In summary, then, I want to echo the voice and the concern on the west coast that we should stop the herring roe fishery until maintenance of that species of population is assured and protected, and under a sustained management load. I would like to see us stop the harvest of herring for sport fishery use so we can replenish the stocks of herring in all the little bays, ponds and holes in the ocean bottom where they used to be in abundance. The populations are being removed. If there is other scientific evidence that this is for reasons other than man's harvest, or excessive harvest of the herring resource, then let us hear it from the minister.

I should like to see the problem between Canada and the United States resolved through the international salmon commission. I would like to see that commission start to move on the development of technology that is well known, well established and ready to go in the development, enhancement and implementation of hatcheries closer to the ocean on our river systems on the west coast.

We have already had an announcement from the Thirtieth Parliament that we were to spend some $119 million on salmonid enhancement. We on the west coast, and I guess everywhere else in Canada, get magnificent bulletins on a regular basis on the salmonid enhancement program. I would like to see some fundamental things take place that will enhance and improve that resource. If we are going to see that, and in fact if we are going to have in place the program announced back in the Thirtieth Parliament, we must have advanced research or advanced knowledge used in the protection of the feeder species upon which that salmon industry relies as the salmon return to the spawning grounds.

The minister would be well advised to take a bit of a holiday on the west coast, perhaps talk to some of the people in the fisheries service who are on the frontiers of that service up the coast, and talk to some of the fishermen during those periods when there is closure on the docks, as I am sure he would find it an amazing experience and would get a real feeling of the importance of this to the community.

The 20-inch limit, which I understand has been postponed or put in limbo for awhile, is of very real concern to a lot of people. We do not understand why the officials would even recommend that sport fishermen who catch a salmon species of less than 20 inches throw it back into the water. That to us is a waste. We would like to know what the scientific analysis or reasoning is behind even thinking that such a method is a sensible way of protecting the chinook species, if that is the reason for that type of threatened legislation.

That about wraps up the comments I wanted to make on Bill C-28. I took forward to receiving some answers from the minister in his wrap-up comments.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my reason for participating in this debate is based on the fact that this bill has a very direct bearing on my riding. I have no great expertise in this area, although I have had an opportunity to observe this industry in operation over a long period of time and to draw basic conclusions about how a bill such as the one before the House today affects the people who live and work in my riding. In reference to the previous speaker, my riding is adjacent to his riding and covers more than half the coast of British Columbia. The riding of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) covers the rest of the coast of British Columbia.

Every community in this area is vitally affected by this bill. This particular industry is presently in chaos and many people who live and work along the coast of British Columbia have little confidence in the industry. What little confidence there is is held with uncertainty. The people who invest in and try to earn a living from the industry live from hand to mouth on a daily basis. It is a very desperate situation.

I would like to outline a few areas of particular concern to me. The major area is corporate concentration, which I see taking place right now. This particular legislation, in a very small way, according to my interpretations, will foster corporate concentration. Another area of concern to me is management of the industry.

First, I would like to discuss corporate concentration. Historically, the coast of British Columbia has had as its major industries fisheries and forestry. Up and down the coast for some 350 miles of my riding, there were once numerous small communities which thrived on logging and the catching and processing of fish. Then came the development of large fishing companies such as B.C. Packers and the Canadian Fish Company, which are basically foreign operations. For example, Garfield Weston and the New England Fish Company own the Canadian Fish Company.

These companies operate on the coast of British Columbia much like a feudal system. They own the major fleets, they provide the financing to put people in vessels to catch fish and they control the buying, the processors, the processing and ultimately the market. As the control by these companies developed, they moved to Vancouver. Loans and other forms of encouragement from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the natural process of monopoly rationalization brought about the move. As a result of this move, the coast of British Columbia became depopulated. Like so many other resource boom-and-bust industries, people came out of the major centres such as Vancouver, moved on to the coast and shared in the harvesting of this resource.

However, one group of people left behind in this depopulation process was the Indians. Many of the Indian communities today are in social and economic chaos. They are in that position due largely to the operations of the fishing companies and the corporate concentration of that industry. These companies did not consider the interests of the people of British Columbia, particularly the interests of the people who lived in the small communities along the coast. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, through its short-sighted and inadequate programs, such as the one before the House now, has aided and abetted this situation.

In the recent past, from the late 1950s, changes have been occurring in the industry. Recently we saw the Canada Fish Company fall not by the wayside, but sold to B.C. Packers, which is Garfield Weston's jewel. They have taken over many of the assets of Canada Fish Company and, as a result, part of that market. They will probably gain the rest of it. There is a very real concern that the move toward monopoly control is intensifying. This bill will assist that development.

In the recent past, Japanese entrepreneurs have intruded into the fishing industry in British Columbia. This intrusion is of great concern to the people in the industry because the Japanese appear to be moving into areas in which the Canada Fish Company moved and in which many of the small Canadian enterprises have been trying to establish their presence at all levels of harvesting, processing and marketing.

As these Japanese companies begin to control the industry along the coast of British Columbia, there is the fear that the depopulating process will increase and that they will eventually have a monopoly. Many people who live in these small communities up and down the coast of British Columbia are very concerned about what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has in mind for the future. They want to know how this particular bill will aid and assist the Japanese to take over the industry in British Columbia.

There is also the thought in some areas that the Federal Business Development Bank and fisheries improvement loans, are in fact financing people who are fronting for the Japanese. There is a great deal of concern. I would ask the minister to tell us in British Columbia whether this front financing is taking place, if it will continue and what the prognosis is for the future.

There is also the presence in British Columbia of Japanese fishing companies and trading companies. The government has introduced a bill, the Bank Act, which will allow the Japanese banking community to come to Canada and particularly to British Columbia. Once these Japanese firms gain a foothold and begin to work together in British Columbia, there is the concern that they will, by helping each other, gain complete control of the entire fishing industry. I am very concerned for my riding and for the entire west coast fisheries.

I want the minister to state how this bill and the policies which he will develop will affect the eventual control of the fishing industry. I sincerely recommend that Garfield Weston and the Japanese should not be controlling that industry, but that, in fact, it should be controlled by Canadians.

There is another area of concern, which has been discussed by previous speakers who are probably better versed than I on the matter. However, there are a few examples I would like to present to highlight some of the things which were said by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller) and other hon. members from British Columbia who have spoken. The topic to which I refer is management of the resource.

This bill will allow the government to lend money to build fishing vessels. Apparently the bulk of these loans in the past has been used in British Columbia. It is questionable whether this was wise or necessary. It is fine to build a fishing fleet in British Columbia, but people there are saying that there are not enough fish and that it is the Liberals' fault.

I would like to know how the government intends to come to grips with this problem. The management of this industry is concerned with such areas as salmon enhancement, conservation, allocation of the resource and licence limitation. I would also add, under this area, the business of the Indian fishery. I hope that the minister in his summary remarks, or perhaps in a policy statement at a later time, will comment on this subject.

The salmon enhancement program is a jewel in the crown of the fisheries department. The program is perceived as one of the most popular and most positive programs in British Columbia. Approximately one year ago the Department of Fisheries and Oceans trouped through the province of British Columbia touting this very successful program and asking for public input. They received public input. They received an expression of a few concerns. One is that the major hatchery program should, in the long run, be abandoned. We have concentrated our fishing production in a few small areas. Such concentration could be vulnerable to disease or environmental pollution and, in fact, might be lost. Some people went so far as to suggest that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans was plotting to get rid of the boat fleet, while at the same time placing the hatcheries at the mouths of the rivers to fish there.

● (1540)

A strange thing was happening, Mr. Speaker. In many small streams, aboriginal stocks were being wiped out as the vessels were required to fish intensively the hatchery stock. At the end of the Alberni canal there were originally diverse stocks of fish feeding into many streams and lakes. A hatchery was built at Robertson's Creek and now they have to fish right up the Alberni canal, almost on top of the hatchery, in order to make full use of it. In the process, steelhead and all the other runs have been wiped out. The aboriginal stocks are gone and we are left with the hatchery stock. If that should be struck by disease, then we have nothing. This is a serious concern which has been expressed time and time again and I am sure the minister is aware of it. I wonder what the minister sees for the future of this fishery which is so vulnerable.

Many people in my riding have brought up the question of the government's failure to be heavily involved in the general development of the enhancement program on the coast of British Columbia. The big hatchery program was in place before the salmon enhancement program came along and I do not think the department moved far beyond that.

In the communities of Bella Bella and Bella Coola and some Indian communities, the herring season was closed down and as a result the residents have not earned any income from that source this year. The price of salmon has also dropped dramatically and as a result their incomes are low. There is intensive logging in those areas. Unfortunately, the loggers are flown in from Vancouver so the Indian communities do not participate in the forest industry and remain dependent upon fishing. The forest and fishing industries conflict, however. In areas like the Kimsquit River Valley the fishing habitat will be so badly damaged that the runs will be light, and as a result the economic base of the communities will be affected. We have seen that happen in the Queen Charlotte Islands and other places. There are still a number of grandstand areas with major hatcheries. The whole process could lead to the depopulation of the coast of British Columbia. I call this to the attention of the minister and would be pleased to hear his response.

How does the minister plan to distribute the benefits that will accrue from the salmon enhancement program? The program itself is good but it has some very serious weaknesses, such as the way the benefits from the resource are allocated. Some very serious questions about this will arise in the future.

A colleague alluded to the problem of the penny-wise-pound-foolish approach to restraint. It appears that in the restraint programs there is cut-back in human resources which has affected the research program to support the salmon enhancement and other fisheries. As an example, a contract system was used for hiring researchers through a labour recruiting agency outside government. The agency would recruit and pay the staff and the government would pay the agency a contract rate, but the rate was so low that the staff would not stay. This meant the continuity of research projects could not be maintained. In the end, there was no point in doing the research. Not only were the people assigned to the task on a contract basis frustrated, but so were those directing the program.

What we need is a clear commitment to research. I see that as an investment. I separate investment from spending here, Mr. Speaker. Spending provides a service and that can be judged as positive or negative, while investment returns income. Investment in the fishing industry, investment in the enhancement program and investment in research will ultimately return substantial income to the people who live on the west coast of Canada.

Another aspect of the situation is the technical base that is required. We need people to run the hatcheries and to lead the move to upgrade the salmon producing habitat. Staff recruited by an agency in Vancouver for the hatcheries are not always suitable. They are on contract and are paid something just above the minimum wage. As a result, they are ready to leave at a moment's notice if something else turns up. We would be better to make an investment and train a group of individuals to run hatcheries who would be available if the program is expanded. Instead, the enthusiasm of the dedicated people we have is being diminished. I know my colleagues from British Columbia would be pleased to hear a response from the government on this aspect of the question. There does not seem to be any point in investing in this area unless the spade work is done.

My next concern is conservation. There is no point in building fishing vessels unless we look after the place where the fish live. Before I came to this House, the former Bill C-38 had been hailed as bringing a new era in conservation and fish habitat protection. The government has encountered some difficulty in enforcing the provisions of that legislation, however. If the fish habitat is destroyed, the stocks will disappear. A continuing source of wealth for British Columbians will be destroyed and this will bring social change to the whole coast of British Columbia.

Strong legislation is needed and to this end I would urge the Department of Fisheries to enforce the provisions of Bill C-38. There seems to be a lack of will to take care of the habitat which will result in a loss not only to this generation but to future generations. My children and their children have as much right to that resource as does the present generation, but unless we protect it, it will be lost to them.

There is also a problem with estuaries, Mr. Speaker, and the tremendous competitive demand for land. This is an old story. Estuary land in British Columbia is being gobbled up because it is more productive than other farm land. Estuaries are being used as municipal sewage dumps or as log booming grounds, even when there are alternatives available. The estuaries are more productive as farm land, so there really should not be competition for use. I urge the government to join with the province of British Columbia to negotiate a strong coast zone management law. This seems to have worked in the state of Washington. We cannot continue to wreck this resource of British Columbia's estuaries by continuing to use them as booming grounds. If we do, they will be useless within 20 years. If we are to practice conservation, a coastal zone management law must be introduced in co-operation with the province of British Columbia.

I do not want to dwell on the question of openings and closings, Mr. Speaker. At the present time an area will suddenly be opened, the whole fleet will race to it, then a couple of big seiners go in, smack it a couple of times and next thing, it is closed. This distorts the allocation procedure and, indeed, can put a lot of people out of business. Unless we are vigilant now the situation will get out of hand. Since the resource belongs to all the people, I wonder if it is legitimate for the Department of Fisheries, under tremendous pressure from different competing groups, to make the decision on this. Or should the ultimate decision on the way fish are allocated be set by Parliament, the province of British Columbia or by the people on the west coast of Canada? We need direction for the fisheries department. This is something they need. They are under tremendous pressure and are trying to rationalize this insane procedure. Down the road many people are going to be hurt by this lack of direction unless some action is taken very soon.

I return now to allocation in the management of resources. This must be a nightmare to the department and to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We see a problem with allocation between the commercial fishery, the sport fishery and the Indian fishery. Within the commercial fishery we see a tremendous competition for gear type, the seiners, the net fishermen, the trawlers; these people are all fighting for their share.

The situation has gone so far that one can never rationalize it. Most people say it is impossible to rationalize without hurting a lot of people. However, the longer one waits and the more you put in the fisheries improvement loans—to encourage people to put new seiners in the water and overcapitalize those vessels, before asking this institution to take some action on that—the more people you are going to hurt and the more you will endanger the resource. It is a very serious situation.

The question of the Indian fishery is one of allocation. A beautiful comment was made yesterday by one of my friends in the Conservative party; it was a slip of the tongue, but it was very relevant. He suggested that we needed a white policy paper in the fishing industry. I suggest that we do have a white policy paper at the present time, but what we may need is an Indian policy paper.

My riding is home to many Indian people who live in Indian communities. The only economic base is the fishing industry. There is a need for access to that resource. One cannot keep hiding in the bushes on this issue, they have to have meaningful access. It is their only hope. But one cannot just give them access to the resource; a mechanism has to be put together by which they can become involved in obtaining the harvesting equipment and the capital to harvest it—for instance, licences, vessels, etc. Once they have those things, the Indians need assistance with processing. It has to be developed. They almost have to have the assistance to vertically develop it. Finally, the Indians have to be given a share, almost guaranteed a share, of marketing. There is a market for fish and it is an excellent one.

The only way to realize the economic benefits of the only resource that can really provide assistance to the Indians who live on the coast of British Columbia is by guaranteeing access to this resource and its economic returns. Social problems, such as housing and health, are there. These are communities where there is 75 to 90 per cent unemployment. Unless there is a commitment made or at least an Indian policy paper on fishing presented, these people are going to continue to wander in social and economic chaos.

Now I come to the licence limitation scheme. I recall from days that have passed the fact that licence limitation was going to help the industry. There were too many boats chasing too few fish. We wanted to get them into manageable proportion and make them efficient so that the people who did fish could earn income. We would therefore take the pressure off the resource, and for the people who did remain involved, those bona fide fishermen—that term was cast around so often—would be provided with a decent living.

From the people I have seen in the industry, and in my opinion, the industry is in absolute chaos. The scheme failed to achieve its objectives. A lot of bona fide fishermen have been forced out of the industry. It is virtually an adversary system now where the fisherman is against the fisheries department. There is no attempt to co-operate whatsoever. Many bona fide fishermen have been forced out and now it is a business. Instead of a labour-intensive operation supplying a lot of jobs for people, we now have a very exclusive, highly capitalized operation that is operated by people who are not fishermen. They are entrepreneurs who may be farmers in Saskatchewan or small businessmen, logging contractors or whatever. But basically bona fide fishermen have been forced out of the industry. They have lost their vessels and their incomes and a great deal of harm has been done.

The fleet size comes to mind. There were too few boats chasing too many fish. The boats chasing those fish now could fish out the industry. We are continuing to slide seine boats off the ways. There are more and more of them every year, bigger and more capable seine vessels. I do not understand the application of this particular program when it is producing more vessels and more efficient ones that not only go out to take the target fish but take all the other fish around. They have virtually put a stop to the herring fishery.

With regard to the whole question of capitalization, this legislation being put before the House encourages a program which is absolutely opposite to the one that has been cited. It will increase overcapitalization and the size of the fleet. That is not in the interests of British Columbia.

The licence limitation program is literally beyond hope. It is unfair and unsuccessful. It has placed the management of the resource in British Columbia in chaos.

Now I come to the question of international agreements, again as part of management. The halibut agreement has harmed a great number of fishermen. There is a feeling that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans of the Government of Canada did not negotiate with the United States vigorously enough. With respect to the boundaries and the Dixon Entrance, there is a feeling among the fishermen of B.C. that the Government of Canada does not represent their interests: first of all, that it is not western in orientation, and second, that it only promotes the interests of central Canada. When we go to the table to negotiate in Washington with representatives of the United States government, B.C. fishermen feel that other concerns come up. It seems that we are concerned about matters that affect other areas in Canada and fisheries get traded off. Short-term political gains seem to come to the fore in favour of the long-term protection of our share in this particular resource, whether it is reciprocal fishing agreements or environmental protection, whether it is a halibut agreement or fishing boundaries. There is a profound feeling that we do not defend the interests of the west coast fishery. It seems that we are willing to sacrifice those interests.

I am not sure how one remedies that kind of a situation, but I am certainly concerned about it. I am also concerned about the mechanism we use with the United States where we negotiate with their committees and then the United States Senate determines any treaty arrangement after that. We are bargaining twice. We are invited to make representations twice. It is extremely unfair and frustrating for Canadian fishermen.

In conclusion, I have said that these are general observations, but I would invite the minister to comment on them. I know that the people in my riding and in all the other ridings in British Columbia are deeply concerned. I recognize that this legislation is designed to suit a particular purpose, but I think it is on the wrong track, that the policy statement that is implied or read into it is probably on the wrong track for the west coast, though as my colleagues have said, it may be very appropriate for the east coast.

The management program is erratic and unfair. I seriously urge the minister to make some statement to this House about where the fishery is going, so that we can provide some stability to people who want to invest and work in it. People cannot earn a living with these uncertainties. Loss of income and bankruptcy is an all too possible future scenario.

Specific recommendations have been stated before by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni. Some of them are simply observations and recommendations that I would ask for comments on by the minister. First of all, before we get into an ad hoc approach, such as this improvement loan bill before us today, we need a clear statement. One does not exist.

I suggest the way a clear statement could be developed is if we follow the model of the forest industry in British Columbia.

It is an important industry to our province. A major royal commission was appointed years ago under the name of the Sloane commission. Since then we have had royal commissions every ten years to examine the state of the industry and to determine what happened to the last royal commission's recommendations. I would hope the minister and also my colleague from Nanaimo-Alberni will be expounding in more detail the need for a royal commission in B.C. to inquire into the fishing industry of British Columbia on a continuing basis. We cannot go ahead with that in such a state of chaos and mistrust unless we get a Canadian of such repute that the individual will enjoy the confidence of all the parties, someone along the lines of Justice Berger. This is extremely important.

• (1600)

The third thing I would recommend is this. I urge the minister to comment on the enforcement provision of Bill C-28. On the one hand, there seems to be the law. On the other hand, there is a lack of will to enforce that law with vigour. Basically, I would like a clear statement on the problems there and the suggestions he might have to recommend to Parliament or the province of British Columbia.

Next, I urge the minister to obtain early passage of this bill, to work with the province of British Columbia and to urge early passage of a coastal zone management act. I urge his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), to investigate immediately corporate concentration in the fishing industry in British Columbia. I am seriously concerned about this. It is time for a review, with a Canadian fish company going down. Now one major company, B.C. Packers, largely controls the entire industry from harvesting to market. It is time we had a look at this practice.

Also, there is the penetration of the Japanese with their fishing companies and trading companies. I am concerned about that and about the Japanese banks coming in because of this government's legislation on banking. I am concerned where those three sets of companies will eventually take our industry, because we will be dealing with probably one of the most powerful economic cartels in the world when we have that set-up. I urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to have his colleague examine that particular issue. We in British Columbia would like to know about it.

Finally, what is seriously needed is for the minister to outline his intentions with regard to Indian people. I again state that this is their major resource. They need guaranteed access to it. They need not just access but a complete economic package, from access and harvesting capabilities right through to marketing. My colleague in the Conservative party suggested we need a white policy paper. As a counterpart to that, we need an Indian policy paper which is very clearly stated. People on the coast of British Columbia and especially the Indian people would appreciate that. I look forward to hearing about this in the summary remarks, or at some later time, and I know the people of my constituency do as well.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that I join in the debate on second reading of Bill C-28 because it involves assistance to the fishing industry. For that reason, it is of special interest to all members who are concerned with the accelerated development of our inshore and offshore Canadian fishery.

Let me note the presence in the House of my friend and colleague from the neighbouring constituency of Halifax, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan). I am sure he shares with me a special interest in the development of the fishery in Nova Scotia and along the Atlantic coast. I am sure he shares as well the perception that the fishing industry in Nova Scotia, and the Atlantic provinces generally, extends to more than those directly involved in it. It is a matter of our hope for the future. We in the Atlantic area rest much of our future on the success and development of the fishing industry. It is with those thoughts in mind that I review this bill before us, Bill C-28.

Although it is properly characterized as too little and too late, I am inclined to agree that the bill should go forward with due speed to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for consideration. I am mindful that the processing of the bill involves some urgency. Before making some remarks on the principle of this bill, let me review briefly the act that it amends.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in simple terms provides for the guarantee of loans to fishermen from banks, credit unions and private lenders. As I understand it, the bill would raise the loan limit from $75,000 to $150,000 and increase the maximum term for repayment from 10 to 15 years. The new total amount that may be guaranteed has been increased to $250 million. That is the total amount under the act.

There is a reference in the bill to regulation establishing the rate of interest. I do not recall whether the minister specified the rate that would be fixed or whether any change would be made. I understand at the present time the practice is to charge one point over the bank's prime rate of interest. By current standards, that is a very high rate of interest with the way the bank interest rate is now determined.

While that, in summary, is the effect of Bill C-28, it is worth while to examine the use that has been made of the provisions of the act by fishermen. The last report tabled in this House under the act shows a total of $28 million approximately in loans for the 1978-79 fiscal year to which the act relates. The minister tells us this may increase to $35 million in the current year, but who is borrowing these funds? One of my colleagues has pointed out that the major portion of the total loan funds are borrowed in British Columbia; in fact, $23.5 million of the $28.3 million total relates to B.C. loans.

There is a reason for this and it is important to place that reason on record in this House. The Atlantic provinces—and I speak particularly of Nova Scotia—have government agencies that deal in loans to fishermen. For that reason, there is less recourse to the provisions of federal loan guarantee legislation.

To put the matter in perspective, my information is that the fishermen's loans board of Nova Scotia, in the same period covered by the last report under the act, being the fiscal year 1978-79, provided loans that totalled over $50 million. Right now the board is engaged in trawler construction financing of $28 million for three vessels. That alone equals the amount spent under the federal act.

It should also be recorded that the provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island would probably provide financing for fishing vessel construction through boards and agencies equal in amount to Nova Scotia. Through the provincial agencies in the Atlantic provinces, there is financing for construction of fishing vessels to an amount that probably exceeds $100 million. So you can see that the federal government is not the only government supporting fishing vessel construction.

That is not all the story when it comes to defects in the act. The limits are not realistic for the east coast. I am told a 65-foot dragger would cost over $500,000 and a 45-foot dragger at least half that, so financing vessels over 45 feet is precluded by the $150,000 limit that will be imposed under the act.

The act extends to the financing not only of fishing vessels, but to onshore installations. This has no value when applied to the east coast fishery where a fish plant that provides for the freezing of fish would cost a minimum of $1 million, and probably much more.

Then there is the interest rate which I have already mentioned. I understand that under the amending bill the rate can be fixed, with the co-operation or approval of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but it will still be related to the bank prime rate and could result in rates of 18 per cent and more.

In Nova Scotia, and I believe in the other Atlantic provinces a New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, for boats under 45 feet—and that is the only size that would benefit under the federal act in view of the cost of construction—the interest rate for those vessels is 6½ per cent. We can see why the federal act is little used in Atlantic Canada.

● (1610)

That brings me to another point regarding the principle of Bill C-28. We must consider any assistance to the fishing industry in the light of all the available assistance, federal and provincial, and assess it on that basis. What lies at the real heart of the fishing industry in eastern Canada is the disputes and the problems which arise from joint federal and provincial jurisdiction over the fishing industry. I include in the term "fishing industry" the inshore and offshore fisheries plus the shore installations and facilities that we have in our fishing plants.

To confirm that this is very much a consideration relevant to this bill, let me refer to the minister's own remarks when he introduced this bill and said that the provinces approve the assistance provided by this federal legislation.

In considering the principle of this important change which is provided by Bill C-28, I want to examine some of the problem areas in federal-provincial relations in the fishing industry. The matter of direct sales—that is, sales over the sides of local inshore fishing vessels to foreign interests—has caused great concern and consternation, particularly with provincial ministers of fisheries. These sales have disrupted the orderly development of the fishing industry in Nova Scotia and, I believe, in other of the Atlantic provinces, and it is a matter under the direct control and supervision of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the minister of that department.

It has been said that these direct sales would be discontinued, but there are still rumours that they are taking place or are going to take place, and this is a real concern to the fish-packing plants which, I remind the House, employ many more persons and provide a living for many more persons than the fishing vessels themselves. This is not to discount in any way the contribution of the inshore fishermen who benefit from these direct over-the-side sales. It is merely to point out and underline the fact that this federal-provincial dispute disrupts the orderly development of the fishing industry. I for one—and I am sure many of my colleagues feel the same way—feel that we want attention paid to the inshore fisheries and fishermen equal to that paid to the offshore fisheries. We support any measures which provide benefits to inshore fishermen, but the matter of direct sales over the sides of fishing vessels to foreign trawlers and fish factory ships is not conducive to the orderly development of the east coast fishery.

I have talked on many occasions to inshore fishermen and their representatives, and I realize and recognize the benefit that they receive directly from these kinds of direct sales. However, we have seen situations in which the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, through the minister, has approved transactions which did not benefit the fishing industry as a whole. In some cases—and I refer to St. Margaret's Bay in my constituency of Halifax West—there has been very little benefit to the local fishermen. What has happened in some cases is that the minister, or his officers, has purported to negotiate arrangements with foreign trawler owners who in fact appear to be representatives of the Soviet Union. They have arranged transactions which involved quotas which in many cases could not be met. That is to say that in these transactions the Canadian government promises to provide, through its inshore fishermen, a certain quota of a certain species, and if that quota is not met, usually some other provision is made so that another species like squid can be substituted, and the foreign trawlers are allowed to fish for that particular species.

On the face of it, this arrangement results in the inshore fishermen receiving a higher price for these species that they are providing. That is in competition with onshore purchasers, so that it may involve the inshore fishermen getting a price of 11 cents or 12 cents, apparently, as opposed to a price of eight cents or nine cents per pound for the species involved. However, through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), the government has not given the opportunity to local purchasers, fish companies and fish packers, who would normally purchase the particular species, to meet the deal given to foreign vessel owners. That is to say, they have not given to our local Canadian fish packers the same arrangement they have permitted foreign trawler owners to make.

This is something I point out and underline because it is an area in which there is a great deal of dispute and concern. It disrupts the orderly development of the fishing industry, and when he is considering this bill and related matters I would like the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to pay close attention to that and to recognize the difficulties which are caused by direct sales arrangements.

There is another area which pertains to this bill but which is not directly covered by it, and that is the vessel construction subsidy. This again has been a source of annoyance between fishermen and both the federal and provincial governments. I say that because for some time the federal government provided, for certain vessels, a 35 per cent subsidy, but only when funds were available. This again contributed to uncertainty in the fishing industry. Because of this subsidy, people who might otherwise not have been prepared to replace their vessels or build other vessels or engage in the fishing industry were prompted to replace their vessels or for other reasons construct vessels. The subsidy, however, has dried up on occasion or been cut off, and I understand it is now frozen and unavailable. This again is not the sort of thing which is conducive to the orderly development of the fishing industry. It has in the past, however, resulted in the building of Cadillac fishing vessels when Chevy-type fishing vessels would have served the purpose equally well.

This is an area in which the federal department should co-operate with provincial departments and the fishermen's loans board to make sure that they are properly serving the fishermen when they turn on or turn off the tap of this federal vessel construction subsidy.

Let me say in that connection that many now think that a preferable method would involve something similar to the registered home ownership program which prevailed in the past. Under such a program, fishermen would be able to put aside, with appropriate tax benefits, a certain amount of money a year which could be collected in a fund to assist in the construction of new replacement fishing vessels. This is one item I put forward to the minister as a possible benefit to fishermen in the same area which is covered by the bill.

One of the things which is of great concern in my constituency of Halifax West and along the east coast of Atlantic Canada is small craft harbours. In the debate on this bill we are talking about construction of fishing vessels, but if one were to tour the south shore of Nova Scotia and examine the wharves fishermen have to use in order to dock their boats and offload their catches, one would realize that a great deal of money and effort has to be put into the development of small craft harbours.

Mr. Regan: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: The Minister of Labour applauds because I am sure he has been to some of the small craft harbours in Halifax county that I have visited. I could tell some horror stories about small craft harbours. For example, notwithstanding a budget of millions of dollars, it is virtually impossible to get the small craft harbours administration to instal lights on some of the wharves about which I am concerned and interested. It is ridiculous because here is a wharf the construction of which cost in excess of $100,000, it is dark at night, and the fisherman who lands there has to offload his vessel in darkness or with the aid of a flashlight or lantern. For the sake of the $100 or so involved to instal a light and the few dollars a month it would take to maintain it, I really do not wonder why people lose faith in government and government officers.

● (1620)

So we in Nova Scotia look forward to small craft harbours development programs which would go side by side with the vessel assistance program to enable our fishermen to make proper use of the vessels, to become more efficient and to utilize, to the best advantage of all Canadians, these government sources that are made available to fishermen through programs such as the fishermen's loan program.

One of the ideas that has been given to me and which makes a great deal of sense is the possibility of developing fisheries service centres as part of the small craft harbours program. As you go along the coast of Atlantic Canada, you see a great many small craft harbours, each with their own wharf—in some cases in dangerous disrepair—yet maintained under the small craft harbours administration, but there are no facilities beyond the wharf and, as I say, without a light which can be used at night, which comes very early in Nova Scotia in the fall and in the spring, I assure you, Mr. Speaker.

There are no facilities at small craft harbours, so some people, and I tend to agree with them, realize that the money would be better spent if larger service centres could be established at which other facilities beyond just a wharf, docking and off-loading installations would be available. One of these facilities—and I use this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House that this particular program for providing very special facilities has been discontinued—is the ice-making machinery program which the federal government assisted and contributed to through, I understand, the provincial departments of fisheries. Funds for this program have been cut off so that ice-making machinery is not available to many of our fishermen at a time when all experts in the fishing industry say you must improve the quality of the fish, and that the only way to do this is to ensure that the fish, as soon as they are caught, are put in a state nearest to frozen as they can be, and continued in that state. Certainly they should be kept cool if the facilities are not sufficient to freeze them.

That is one area in which the federal government and the minister have shown a lack of concern for the real problems of fishermen. By continuing that program, it could have meant in particular cases that the fishermen could get their catch to a packer in prime condition suitable for the world markets, and in a quality state which is demanded by the persons who purchase for those markets.

Another area in which the federal government and the minister have shown their disdain for the problems of fishermen—and I seek again the opportunity to put this on record—is in the matter of fisheries research. You will recall the minister of fisheries in 1978 discontinued the fisheries laboratory facility in Halifax. This caused a great deal of difficulty and consternation, and again it came at a time when research was a very important element of the fishing industry. Without proper research, the Canadian fishery is in danger of not being developed along the lines that it could be developed, and with very grave consequences to the fishermen and the fish packers and all of those concerned with and engaged in the fishing industry.

Another area of federal-provincial relations in the fishing industry that demands some examination is the area of aquaculture. Aquaculture involves oysters, clams, mussels, and indeed some of the sea plants and seaweeds that are used and can be used commercially. This is an area that probably should and does come under provincial jurisdiction, but it is an area in which the federal government should take an interest because it provides the opportunity for other income for fishermen who, during periods of bad weather, may not be able to go to sea in their vessels but could engage in some aspect of the aquaculture branch of the fisheries industry. I would like to see the minister give a little more attention to that problem and involve himself with his provincial counterparts to work out some of these problems and provide some of this very important aid.

Let me close, Mr. Speaker, by again underlining the importance of good federal-provincial relations in the fisheries industry. The future of the industry depends on that. Matters of licensing, fish allocation, the fostering of international agreement, are all dependent upon the provinces, through their fisheries ministers and the federal fisheries minister, reaching decisions on these very vital areas.

As I understand it, the maritime ministers of fisheries met just this week in Fredericton, New Brunswick, considered many items of common concern, and I believe formulated a statement which was either available or soon will be available in which they list some of these areas of real concern. I hope the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will regard very seriously the recommendations made by this group, and bring about a change in what has been a continuing problem in the fisheries industry.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe that it is at all a case of favouring the inshore fishery versus the offshore fishery. I do not believe that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should take the position as he has done in the past, that he is the advocate of the inshore fishermen and is protecting them against the fish barons, the offshore industry. Because whether it is inshore or offshore, there are many people who are dependent on the fishing industry for their livelihood and for their future. I do not think anybody can seriously believe that we can withstand these interprovincial and federal-provincial squabbles, and I do not think there is anybody who does not believe that, unless these areas of differences are ironed out and worked out, we can not progress as we should in the fishing industry.

With those remarks, I would close by saying that I welcome any federal provisions that would benefit fishermen. The bill now before us, Bill C-28, does not have particular application to the Atlantic area, but as I said before, viewed in the context of all the assistance that can be and will be made available to fishermen, it is a welcome item and one that should go to the committee and be considered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-16, to amend the Old Age Security Act, without amendment.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 5, 1980

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 5th day of June, at 5 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger)—Energy Conservation—Inquiry whether legislative action proposed; the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes)—Employment—Training programs for women; the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose)—Health and Welfare—Medicare program—Announced increases in premiums by British Columbia.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF AND INCREASE IN GUARANTEED LOANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc that Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): I appreciate this opportunity to speak on Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. As I look at this bill I have certain concerns. Fisheries plays a very important role in the economy of my riding, Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands. I do not wish to cover the waterfront in my talk; however, I do want to concentrate on one or two features.

First of all, I want to endorse the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller), when he spoke about undisciplined overcapitalization. The cliché that we usually apply to this—and like all clichés, it has a degree of truth in it—is: Too much gear chasing too few fish. The fact that there is too much gear chasing too few fish is hurting fishermen.

Different answers are proposed to this dilemma, and one of them is the salmonid enhancement program, a program which we endorse. While we endorse the idea of the salmonid enhancement program as providing the possibility of more fish, we do not understand how the government can be proposing that program and at the same time failing to protect adequately fish habitat where these same salmon will be growing.

● (1630)

The hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) referred to the need for a more adequate program to protect our estuaries. I am very concerned about the Cowichan estuary in my riding. It was two years ago that a task force was appointed by the provincial government on which the federal department of fisheries had representation. That task force heard numerous submissions for the citizens of the Cowichan area and from environmental groups desiring to protect that estuary from increased industrialization. Estuaries are easy places on which to expand industries, but we are only beginning to recognize the tremendous potential of estuaries for producing life and protein, and the place they occupy in the life cycle of many fish. Increased industrialization of the estuary involves land fill and dredging. This will be harmful to fish habitat.

While we have been waiting for two years for the report of the task force to be handed down, we have seen many small examples of this movement for increased industrialization going on apace. Log booms are more prevalent now than they were five years ago, and they are found outside their established leased areas. The destruction to estuaries because of log booms is becoming more and more known.

I should like to raise the following question with the hon. members and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc): What has the Department of Fisheries and Oceans been doing in order to protect this estuary? Where is the report of this task force? What has the department been doing to reassure the people who are fighting for the life of this estuary? When I meet with people who are involved in trying to save this estuary from industrialization, I realize that they are becoming discouraged; they are becoming disillusioned with coming before government with petitions and letters. They are beginning to wonder about the whole political process. In good faith two years ago, they put their submissions before the task force, yet the report has not been tabled. I should like the federal department to use some of its clout to get the provincial government to table that report. At the very least the department should move to reassure the people of the Cowichan Valley that there will be no further industrialization which in any way will adversely affect fish habitat.

We on the Pacific coast are very much concerned with the threat of increased tanker traffic. When tanker traffic is increased, not only is the danger of eco-disasters increased, but inevitably the day-by-day increment of seepage and small spills is increased, and this has a very detrimental effect upon our fisheries. Quite frankly, we are not happy with the very inadequate response so far from the government.

As we look at the salmonid enhancement program, we are happy that it exists, but we wonder what the point is of trying to provide this program. On the one hand, while on the other we do not preserve the existing fish habitat.

That brings me to the question of the bill before us which will provide more capital for more gear. What is the point of providing this capital unless we are willing to protect the existing fish habitat?

As I pointed out, the fact that we have too much gear chasing too few fish is hurting our fishermen. One group of fishermen that is being hurt the most is the Indian people.

They are being squeezed out of an industry in which they have always played a very key role. In fact, the entire culture and civilization of the native people along the Pacific coast has been dependent upon the resources of the sea. I am not only referring to the native people on the Pacific coast of British Columbia, but to those right from California north to Alaska. This is one of their aboriginal rights.

When the reserves were being set up for the people of British Columbia, instead of the larger reserves that are found in other parts of the country, the reserves for coastal Indians were very small. It was recognized that they faced out toward the sea and got their living from the sea, in large part, rather than from the land. In the early years of this century, a federal-provincial commission, the McKenna-McBride commission, recognized this fact and urged that certain plots of oceans and certain streams be put aside for the exclusive use of the native Indian people. This indicates the historic relationship between the Indian people and the fishery of our coast.

When the commercial fishing industry was first established in British Columbia, it depended very heavily upon native Indian people for labour. As those people began to relate to the impinging white culture, they came to depend very heavily upon commercial fishing as their means of livelihood. Now they are being squeezed out of this industry; they are being left behind. One trend that is taking place now—and it has taken place over a number of years—is that many of the small canneries on river inlets were shut down. They were moved to central places like Namu and Prince Rupert. Now the cannery at Namu has been closed and Prince Rupert has less of an industry than before. More and more of the fishing industry is being concentrated in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Not only is this leaving the native people behind and leaving no economic base for their communities, but it is a tremendous waste of our human resource. Also it is a very energy-intensive kind of centralization. At a time when we in Canada are facing an energy crisis, perhaps we should be asking questions as to whether this is the route we should be going. It is a waste of human resources and a waste of our energy resources.

The native people of British Columbia have a growing population, a young population. Increasingly these young people find that there is no place for them in the fishing industry. An industry which provided work for their parents and their grandparents has no place for them. Also we can look at the rising suicide rate, the rising crime rate and the rising rate of illness, and we do not need to ask too many questions about some of the reasons for this. The unemployment rate among young native people on the Pacific coast is directly related to their lack of opportunity in the fishing industry.

There are several reasons why they are being squeezed out. First of all, we can point to the failure of our educational programs and the failure to help these young people cope with new developments in technology and in managerial skills.

Second, we can point to the licensing program which was introduced by a Liberal government some ten years ago. At that time the minister of fisheries talked about getting rid of some of the marginal people in the fishing industry. Perhaps these people were marginal from the point of view of the western empire, and perhaps they were marginal from the point of view of the Canadian fishing company before it became marginal itself; but I want to assure the House that these fishermen were not marginal from the point of view of their communities and they were not marginal from the point of view of their own families. They were the mainstay of these communities and the mainstay of their own families. What we have done with our licensing program is crowded them, not only out of their margins, but pushed them right off the edge. This licensing program has not accomplished its own stated objectives, but it has very effectively helped to squeeze the native people out of the fishing industry in British Columbia. Again there is a problem resulting from the lack of capital. Does this act help native Indian people in its terms? I suggest it does not.

● (1640)

Along with native groups I am glad the minister has indicated he intends to restore funds for the native fisheries assistance plan. I think that is good, but we need to realize this is a very small group of fishermen who will be helped in this way. In this connection, I would like to read a letter I received from a young Indian woman. It states in part:

> We are a young couple trying to stand on our feet, but with a lot of hindrance from the fisheries and the licence system we are now without a licence for our troller, we have no way to make a living. We have wrote letters to Sol Sinclair, who was supposed to have worked on the "B" licences. So far he has gotten nowhere. We weren't able to save enough money to purchase an "A" licence because of the income tax we have to pay.

She continues:

> My words may not be strong enough to affect or get heard by anyone. But at least I am trying. I would like your opinion on what I am saying. Also who can help us. My husband and I have a lot of pride, we don't want to resort to welfare cheques.

This very moving letter I think speaks for a lot of young Indian people who would like to be able to have a stake in the fishing industry in British Columbia, who would like to be able to build and plan their lives with some pride and dignity. This legislation does nothing to help them and, indeed, there is no legislation or program I have seen which will help them.

The Native Brotherhood in British Columbia has submitted a brief to the minister outlining some of their concerns in this area. In this regard they say:

> In the case of coastal Indians historically and presently dependent upon the fisheries resources of British Columbia, there is an obvious requirement to guarantee continued and increased opportunities in all aspects of the fishing industry.
> This is a prerequisite for meaningful participation in the economic activities of the areas in which Indians live and for achieving a measure of control over their own social, cultural and economic destiny.

The brief goes on to state:

> The response of both the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of Indian Affairs—both key departments in so far as Indians in British Columbia are concerned—to the above priorities, related programs and funding, is one of nominal support for the self-development concept. However, in practice, the efforts of departmental personnel and the programs initiatied are severely restricted in their scope and potential for achieving true self-development.

There is nominal support but there is little real help. I would ask this government, through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and in conjunction with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to bring into this House a comprehensive program to ensure the place of the Indian fisherman in British Columbia.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to cause any nervous spasms over on the other side, and I do promise after I have made a comment or two to make certain that this bill is allowed to go through before five o'clock. However, I think this is an opportunity for me to deal with a matter of pretty grave importance to a lot of the people I represent along the Fraser River system in British Columbia, and I want to say one or two words about their present concerns while the parliamentary secretary to the minister is in the House. I do not suggest I am going to come up with any great profundities related to solutions to the problems of concentration of ownership, habitat destruction, or the loss of wetlands for spawning grounds which is occurring all over the country, especially on the west coast as it applies particularly to the salmon fishery.

I will say, however, that there seem to be signs that the salmon fishery in British Columbia is on the decline because of the concentration of very advanced and highly capitalized fishing and hunting equipment. The people I represent, or some of them, especially those who are engaged in a special kind of river fishery, are in fact the last in line when it comes to the distribution of the catch. Consequently, in addition to the suspicions that abound when people's livelihoods are at stake, through the natural competition within the industry, and from foreign sources, again with highly efficient and efficacious gear, there is within the fishery a natural suspicion that I think needs to be explored and perhaps laid to rest because it is based on facts and on rumours. I do not think we can ignore the fact that it exists whether factually based or not.

We have had in the Fraser River fishery this year only six openings for spring salmon, and these openings have occurred approximately once a week. To date there have been six, and last year by this time there were 17. To date we have caught 2,600 fish. That is the total catch for Fraser River gill netters.

Because the gill netter is the last in line, if there is overfishing by foreign fleets or by our own domestic fleets with other kinds of methods, set up in different ways, such as the trollers and seiners, the catch of these fishermen is much reduced.

This situation was described, I thought very eloquently, by my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). He described these radio-controlled, fast, efficient fishing machines which, once an opening was called, raced from one point to another in a moment, practically, in terms of the season, rapidly depleting that particular area as it is declared open. This has led to overcapitalization with larger and larger vessels costing more and more money, employing fewer and fewer people. That seems to be the story of our life.

I would not want to occur in British Columbia the kind of demand that occurred in Newfoundland where the inshore fisheries were declared at one point to be redundant, and the only salvation for the Newfoundlander was to move him into large communities, destroying his particular culture and way of life, taking what was once an independent, self-reliant family living in a small village, to which he could relate, and making another welfare case in a larger vicinity.

It is very important, I think, in our headlong rush to greater and greater efficiency that we also keep in mind that there is a human factor, and that the large, advanced fishing machines do not pay for very much at the local store. We must remember that the destruction of many small, independent communities is the result of what we call our headlong rush to modernization. I think the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) would agree that the same thing has happened to some extent, perhaps to a large extent, in prairie areas which he represents.

• (1650)

Many, many monuments to the initiative and self-reliance of individuals have been destroyed as the smaller towns disappear because of larger farms. That seems to have been the trend in the last quarter of the twentieth century. We must make certain that there is a place for people and that that place will provide self-fulfilling and useful occupations. We must make certain that we do not allow ourselves, through various kinds of government initiatives, such as the bill we were discussing now, to allow people to be displaced and misplaced.

What is happening as a result of the intense competition within the groups of seiners, trawlers and gill netters and the foreign competition which has already been alluded to in this debate is that the industry is experiencing practically a fish war on both coasts. There have been instances in Alaska where declarations of open fishing in certain parts of shared waters have been such that the fisheries department has—and I hope that this is not too strong a word—unleased Canadian fishermen. In other words, it has removed the discipline of our conservation measures to the point where Canadian fishermen are competing wholesale with American fishermen and intercepting fish bound for American rivers.

The Americans may retaliate if this kind of thing is allowed to proceed and if we are unable to reach an agreement on both coasts with regard to this commonly shared, natural, renewable resource. This bill is not a matter of small consequence. Unless we can get ratification through the U.S. Senate in a relatively short period of time, we will be back at square one. In the meantime, we may have lost a resource or so seriously damaged it that it will take years to recover it, at a time when the demand for protein is increasing as populations grow. I do not think that we can afford that kind of frivolous, unco-operative management of a resource which is so valuable not only to Canada and the U.S. but to the world.

When these closures, such as the one which I described as the beginning of my remarks, result, fishermen on the Fraser River who have a large investment in gear, who must meet these investments and who are denied an opportunity to recoup this investment—in other words, to pursue their livelihood—are the ones who lose. We must realize, though, that there must be a certain amount of escapement or there will be no tomorrow for the fishing industry.

There are at least three advisory committees to the ministry of fisheries on the Pacific coast. There is an advisory committee in the north, an advisory committee to the sockeye commission, which is an international commission, and an advisory committee for the Frasher fisheries. At the moment these committees do not make reports publicly. Their recommendations to the ministry do not, in the normal course of events, see the light of day in the public press. The reports are not published and distributed to the fishermen, unless it is through the fishermen's union paper and, of course, all fishermen, particularly gill netters, do not necessarily belong to the fishermen's union.

I would like to pay tribute once again to the kinds of things that have been happening in the enhancement program. However, besides underlining the gravity of the problems in the British Columbia salmon fishery at the moment, I suggest that we try to obtain the co-operation of the groups involved and make certain that the knowledge of the amount of catch, escapement, and the amount taken by native fishermen—which is their right—is made available on a regular basis and on a highly public basis within the industry, so that there can be a fair and equitable distribution among the people who are dependent upon this resource for their livelihood.

At the moment it is felt among the gill netters, the people I largely represent within the industry, that since they are the last in line and since they may possibly be, because they operate in the river, not as highly mechanized as other groups, that they are always asked to pay the price through early closures resulting from the excesses of others. They also feel there are not enough fisheries inspection officers or habitat control officers to make certain that their rights are protected, that the fish which they lose through escapement to the spawning grounds are, indeed, used efficiently once they get to the spawning grounds. This is because there is a lack of investment in proper spawning ground management and control.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to say these few words on this subject. As far as my party is concerned, we are prepared to let the bill go through this stage.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this bill, but I do want to make one short point. I will be brief so that we can pass this bill before five o'clock. I want to highlight what is happening on the west coast in the fishing industry. As the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) has indicated, some of the regulatory habits of the department of fisheries are frustrating the fishermen.

However, there is another aspect which I think should be brought to the attention of this House, and that is the pyramiding of corporate power, which is frustrating the independence of the fishermen. Fishermen by nature are independent businessmen. When B.C. Packers bought out the Canadian Fish Company, it effectively left British Columbia with only one corporation with which the fishermen could deal. That means that the fishermen will be forever indentured to that one corporation. Such a move is very destructive of the fishing industry of that province.

Secondly, there used to be fishermen who were unhappy with B.C. Packers and moved over to Canadian Fish Company. Now that the Canadian Fish Company has been bought by B.C. Packers, these fishermen are, really, people without a country because there is nowhere for them to go. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and his parliamentary secretary must look at this situation because it is no good to pass a bill such as the one before us which extends the borrowing power and refinancing possibilities of fishermen if they have nowhere to go once they have refinanced their vessels.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to have this opportunity to speak, very briefly of course, in support of Bill C-28. The debate has been very interesting. I have listened with great interest, both today and yesterday, to all hon. members who spoke, and many good points were raised. However, many of the points were very global in nature and were not apropos the bill itself.

The bill increases the borrowing power from $75,000 to $150,000 for vessel construction or improvement. Certainly members who took part in the debate had very different views on what the bill would do and would not do for the fishery. There may have been some misunderstanding as to its purpose, but since the bill will go to committee, many of the questions will be answered at that time.

I think one hon. member mentioned that the bill could influence and assist in corporate concentration of the fishery. Given the amount of money involved in this bill, it would probably work directly opposite to that suggestion simply because the purpose of the bill is to help the small independent fisherman. I do not have much more to say on the bill, with the exception that we will move it to committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers).

Classification Audit

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CLASSIFICATION AUDIT REPORT

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert (Vaudreuil):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the data base upon which the Report on the Classification Audit in the National Capital Area and the Non-National Capital Area was based.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and if I may be permitted I will continue the debate begun a few days ago on the motion introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). We were then talking about the classification of government employees and in that respect, I personally talked about what is called the red circling of employees. I explained the procedure we used so people would not be penalized as a result of the reclassification of their positions. With your permission, I will continue today to discuss that point and a few other matters.

[English]

Madam Speaker, in the earlier part of the motion the hon. member for Vaudreuil stated that the objective of the motion is to try to obtain more information on what is happening in the public service in the area of classification. It is to that point that I am going to address my remarks. I will attempt to respond to this request by outlining some of the more important changes Treasury Board has made to the policies and procedures governing classification in the public service.

As you may recall, Madam Speaker, the classification of 4,000 positions throughout the public service was conducted in two distinct phases. After the initial findings of the audit of the national capital area were communicated to the departments, Treasury Board continued with the audit outside the national capital area. In addition, Treasury Board undertook a pilot study of the classification system in the personnel policy branch of Treasury Board and in one operating department, as well as a detailed review of all policies and procedures related to classification in the public service.

These reviews indicated that there were significant problems in the conduct and management of, and results being realized from, the classification system as it stood. In terms of the quality of classification decisions, they indicated an unacceptable degree of overclassification; that is, putting people in a higher category than they should have been. As well, there was some underclassification and some allocation to the wrong occupational category or group. These were few and did not account for the high misclassification rate.

It was concluded that some of these problems were caused by attempts to use the classification system to solve problems in other personnel areas, such as recruitment and retention of personnel. Other problems were caused by the policies and procedures themselves.

Specifically, the classification was not—I repeat, not—designed to allow the classification of individual positions to, first of all, attract, reward, retain, sanction or remove employees. It was not designed to circumvent the intent of wage controls or bargained pay rates by reclassifying positions and individuals upwards. It was not designed to reflect perceived intergroup pay relativities. The common perception is that the pay relationships do exist between groups as well as incomes.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, it is the desire of the Honourable Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable House attend immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

And being returned:

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to a certain bill:

Bill C-16, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act—Chapter 4.

CLASSIFICATION AUDIT REPORT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the data base upon which the report on the Classification Audit in the national capital area and the non-national capital area was based.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank you for permitting me to continue after the very brief interruption when we had to go to the Senate. It is always a pleasure for us to visit the other place. I had occasion to walk with my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and he was saying that he was looking forward to the day when he could more than just visit there, or words to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. No doubt the hon. member is having fun, but I am sure he knows that in this place one is supposed to speak the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: That remark is as far-fetched as it can possibly be. The hon. member was probably speaking for himself.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, I did not intentionally mislead this House; I probably misunderstood. But if anyone deserves to be honoured by being placed in the Senate, in my humble opinion, it would be the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member call that an honour? It would be a living death.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parent: As for myself, I will let history take its course.

I was saying what the classification system was not designed to do and I had mentioned three things. Fourth, it was not designed to provide protection from the impact of reorganizations which result in a reduction in number of positions or responsibilities.

● (1720)

On December 18, 1978, the document entitled "Report on the Classification Audit in the National Capital Area and the Non-National Capital Area" was tabled in the House. As a result of this report and the review of all existing classification policies and procedures, Treasury Board moved systematically to revise its policies and procedures to overcome the problems and difficulties identified with classification in the public service. These changes to the policies and procedures are designed to improve the classification system and correct the misclassification of positions.

In summary, the various changes and actions undertaken by the Treasury Board are as follows. The Treasury Board advised all departments and agencies of the results of the special audit and instructed those with positions identified as misclassified to undertake corrective action. Wherever appropriate, the follow-up action was initiated by the Treasury Board and the process of correcting the misclassified positions has now been completed. In terms of information, this should be pleasing to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

The Treasury Board secretariat began a review of the classifications systems and procedures in all departments and agencies and in 1979-80 completed the review in 10 departments. Each department is required to prepare an action plan in response to the recommendations made and the secretariat monitors these plans to ensure that corrective action is taken.

The Treasury Board secretariat reviewed all occupational groups identified in the audit report as having special problems and has initiated corrective action. The board withdrew from all departments and agencies the authority to classify positions in the higher levels of the personnel administration, financial administration, economics, sociology and statistics groups. These proposed new positions or classification level changes in these cases are submitted for final decision to Treasury Board. Treasury Board has established specific procedures and time frames for correcting any misclassification. Here it must be understood that great strides have been taken to correct any misclassification areas which were built into the system. I am proud of the progress that has been made over the last short period of time.

In conclusion, over the past few years the administration and the policies and procedures of the classification system of the public service have been subjected to a comprehensive and detailed review—the first such detailed review since the current system was put in place—which has brought about an improvement and strengthening of the administration of the classification system of the public service of Canada.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allowed me to wind up this debate, I will in just a few words go over what we were intending to do in putting this motion on the order paper.

The motion deals with the subject of classification, but the intent is to underline again the desire of members of Parliament to be informed on the progress the government is making in implementing the recommendations of the various reports and studies that have been submitted to this House. I have said before, and I wish to reiterate, that nothing in my remarks in this debate is intended as criticism of the individual public servant. It is my opinion that the great majority of public servants have a position attitude toward their work. They regret and want to see an end to the widespread criticism of the efficiency of the public service, a criticism which should be restricted to the system and not to the individual.

I had some discussion in the last week or two with various individuals concerning the difference between the position of a member of Parliament and the position of a senator. When a report is tabled in this House, that is effectively the end of the discussion. There is no means by which the member of Parliament can continue the debate, in committee or in the House, or to pressure the government to report on progress, whereas in the Senate they have their own means to continue the debate on the subject as they desire.

In the future when we change the system in this House, we must find some means by which we have continuing discussion on the various reports that are tabled.

I would like to list three reports to which I referred earlier to indicate why it is so necessary that we have something from the government on the progress they made either in implementing recommendations or in deciding not to take action, and if they decide not to take action, we should know that.

The first report to which I referred was tabled in this House on Thursday, February 26, 1976, by myself as co-chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the public service. It contained 72 recommendations. As I said in my opening remarks in this debate, those recommendations were almost unanimous in the opinion of the members of the committee. That report is commonly known as the Finkelman report.

The second report to which I referred is commonly known as the Lambert commission report, the final report of the royal commission of financial management and accountability, which was presented to His Excellency the Governor General in March, 1979, and contains 165 recommendations.

The third report to which I referred, commonly known as the D'Avignon report, the report of the special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle, which was submitted to the then president of the privy council on September 30, 1979, contained 179 recommendations. In three reports there were a total of four hundred and some odd recommendations about which I as an individual and most members of this House would like some indication of progress.

After I made my initial remarks, we were told by the spokesman for the government that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) was making an effort to ensure that there would be more information flowing to the members. Based on this commitment by the President of the Treasury Board to inform members of Parliament on the progress of the implementation of these recommendations, I request leave to withdraw my motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the hon. member for Vaudreuil. Is this agreed by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it might be in order at this point to ask that you respectfully see it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.29 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed, from Friday, May 9, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister of Employment and Immigration could begin by giving us some idea of what we face in the way of an unemployment situation in the next couple of years. What kind of figures is he using in terms of estimates of the number of people who will be unemployed in this country in the next two years? In what month does he expect the highest rate of unemployment? Will it be next January, 1981? Will it be January, 1982? About how many people does the minister think will be involved?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think if the hon. member would revert to the statement which was made by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, when he outlined the government's economic position some two or three weeks ago, he would find those kinds of assessments made. As the chief economic officer for the government it is his responsibility to provide those kinds of estimates. As the hon. member will well know, such estimates are always subject to a great deal of variation, but I would refer him to those estimates. The Minister of Finance did indicate at that point in time that, in an over-all sense, with the recession we are contemplating taking place in the United States, and which is already in fact there, we could be looking at an unemployment range of 8 per cent to 8.2 per cent beginning in the winter of the forthcoming year. I obviously hope that that will not be the case, but considering the way we are affected by economic downturns in the international arena and in North America, we are looking at that kind of projection.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, as I remember the statement in the House of the Minister of Finance it was notable for its lack of completeness. It was a partial budget. I think the average unemployment rate which the minister was predicting at that point referred to this year, and I think if we look at econometric projections we will see that the situation is likely to get worse before it gets better.

Given the fact that this year began with a 7.4 per cent unemployment rate, an average rate in the neighbourhood of 8 per cent gets us moving very close to 9 per cent by the end of this year. I am interested so much in the percentage as to whether it is 7 per cent, 8 per cent or 9 per cent; I would like to ask the minister, because I think it is a very reasonable question and an absolutely essential piece of information for us as we look at his portfolio and the bill which he proposes here tonight, to give us some sense of how many people he thinks will be unemployed in this country during the worst month in the next two years, because that is absolutely essential to his planning.

Certainly I would assume that the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as he deals with the unemployment insurance fund, with job creation, with training opportunities with the mega projects, should have a set of numbers available to him in his department which would tell us how many people he thinks will be unemployed.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not agree with the Cassandra-like prophecies of the hon. member. I am a little surprised that he wants to dwell so distinctly in the depth of gloom and doom that he seems to be prescribing. As someone who has some acquaintanceship with the technicalities of projection and economic forecasting, he would know that the kind of precision for which he is asking is not possible. It is absolutely impossible to predict, to the exact month, what the unemployment rates will be. There are far too many factors and variables to take into account. He mentioned some of them himself.

We are certainly subject to variations, whether it is on exchange rates, interest rates, downturns in the international economy, varying degrees of supply and demand rates, programs of intervention that may take place, investment procedures, and while those things can be built into certain kinds of computations on an aggregate scale, I do not think anyone has a scale to pinpoint absolutely that, let us say, on January 15 there will be 973,000 unemployed, and that is why we tend to use percentages, because it is a better indicator of the kind of general patterns that we have to face in the economic forecast. Those patterns and indications were provided for in the statement of the Minister of Finance. I should point out, just to make sure that the record is perfectly clear, that those projections that the present Minister of Finance was making were not quite as severe as those that were predicted by the minister of finance under the previous administration, who was predicting, at that point in time, excess unemployment of 200,000 people, beginning in 1981-82.

I think that we have been able to scale those down, but I would say to him that until we are able to clarify some of the general economic factors that are affecting this country, particularly in relation to the pricing of energy, which is a very major depressant in terms of job creation, because it vacuums out so much investment capital from other parts of the region, then I think we have to be very careful about trying to cite specific figures because, as he would well know, those figures are picked up very readily and used, and we would not want to create any false sense of panic on the part of people simply by speculating on an area, which is very dangerous.

Mr. Hawkes: I believe it is a fair assumption, but I would like to check it out. Does the minister believe that the government has a role to play in the creation of jobs? Does the minister believe in that?

Mr. Axworthy: Well, obviously, Mr. Chairman, judging by the actions taken by this government in the past three months of its office, we obviously believe that there is a very important role to play in stimulating employment in this country. There are decisions that have been taken by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in his guaranteeing of the Chrysler loan in order to create tens of thousands of jobs in the automobile industry, the action taken to decide on the fighter aircraft, which will create employment for 15,000 to 20,000 people in the aerospace industry, the decision to negotiate the COLA arrangement in British Columbia to create several thousand jobs in those areas. So we have a major program of stimulus for economic development. My colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, has a budget of over $600 million, which is directly related to the creation of employment in those areas in which there is some degree of inequity or inequality.

That is a very major commitment that we are putting into it, so obviously this government believes that we have a role to play, and we will play that role in a multitude of ways. We will play it in direct job creation, where we can help those who need the help most, where we can target into those groups that have the most severe economic needs. We will also help in a general aggregate sense of creating an economic climate in which employment can take place, and we will do it through our economic development initiatives, such as the ones I have announced. So our commitment is very clear, and I think it is one that has been proven out in the first three months of this government.

Mr. Hawkes: The minister's use of the word "target" is one that we encountered last Monday, in answer to a question of mine previously. It is certainly a clear-cut principle of the employment creation philosophy of this party, that we do, in fact, target employment where it is needed, when it is needed.

If I could back to my original question, I think a rational man, an organized man, who believes in job creation, would believe in creating the jobs when they will be needed most. Surely the minister can guess when the unemployment rate will peak in this country. Is it going to be January, 1981, February, 1981? It is going to be 1982? Surely, in planning for job creation, in a targeted sense, he must have a target as to when we should be creating the most jobs, because that is when we will have the greatest problem. In that context could the minister give us some sense as to when he thinks we are going to have the most difficulty in terms of unemployment?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the hon. member asked that question, because I think it does pertain to the kind of planning that we are doing. As I stated in the House earlier, one of the serious difficulties we faced when we resumed government was the fact that the previous administration had basically wiped out many of the direct job-creation programs. So there was nothing in preparation, nothing available for us to bring to bear on the cycle of unemployment which we face in this country. Certainly, in the historical sense, we know that unemployment peaks, in this country, during the winter months. That is why we had to introduce a program of which the hon. member was, unfortunately, critical. We had to introduce a program in an interim way that could be announced in June, so that it could start in operation in the fall so that it would be fully operative through the months of December, January and February, when seasonal unemployment is at its highest.

As I admitted in the House, we had to put together a program that did not give us the kind of time that we would have liked, simply because the cupboard was bare, there was nothing to bring forward. As a consequence, the programs and the budget and the estimates for that program had some limitations to them.

But to answer that question, that is why we have designed a program, as we have, to begin operation in September of this coming year, to reach its peak in providing specific targets into high unemployment areas beginning throughout the winter months, when unemployment tends to be at its highest.

But I should also like to point out to the hon. member that, in a way, we should not get ourselves lulled into believing that we can simply respond to seasonal variations, because one of the underlying philosophies of our own direct job-creation program is to tackle the hard core unemployment, whether it is in the youth sector or in the sector of people who have a minority status in this country. If you look at the figures, the way the labour market turns around in this country, there is a fair degree of fluctuation and mobility within that market.

The most severe difficulties are faced by those who are, in a sense, permanently unemployed, because they cannot get the first entry into the job market. That is why we are increasingly orienting our own investments and our own practices towards tackling that hard-core problem. It may be only 10 per cent of the young people who are the hard-core unemployed. The rest, eventually, over a period of time, find jobs. That is why we have to target, particularly on training programs, target in particularly on those who need first entry experience.

Mr. Hawkes: I would just like to follow up on the last comment first. Is the minister telling us that in his department he has research data which suggests it is a characteristic of the young people that makes them hardest to employ? This 10 per cent that he is talking about, are these characteristics inherent to the people, or are people more difficult to employ because of the characteristics of the region?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would say it is some of both. As a trained sociologist, which I believe he is, he would certainly be aware of the kind of studies and analyses that have been produced in the last several years. Perhaps the most pronounced and comprehensive study was the OECD study, about two years ago, which indicated that the problem of youth unemployment is not just a Canadian problem. It is a problem shared by every country in the industrial world. We are, frankly, facing a product of a population boom which took place, for example, after the Second World War. In fact, in Canada, we have had, unquestionably, the largest growth in the number of young people in the job market, over the last seven or eight years, of any country in the industralized world. It is a problem we share.

As well, as a sociologist, the hon. member would know that the handicaps people face in the job market are partly a product of their own environment. Lack of education is an obvious difficulty for those who grow up in a region where they do not acquire skills or educational capacities, for whatever reason. Sometimes it is a product of geography. Unfortunately and tragically there are regions of our country where there is not much of an economic base upon which to build jobs.

Some of my colleagues in this caucus have brought their constituents to see me. For example, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria brought a group of people to see me who were honest, hard-working, dedicated people. They wanted to work in his region of the country and there was just not the economic base there to provide employment. They spend most of their summers travelling to do agricultural work in Ontario, but when they return to their home areas in New Brunswick, simply there is no work for them. That is one of the reasons why we went into direct job creation, to ensure that they would have opportunities to work if they wanted to do so. The hard core areas of unemployment are products of population problems which are shared industrially throughout the entire world. Partly they are a product of geography and individual deficiencies, sometimes not of a person's own making, such as family characteristics or whatever. In this situation we see substantial changes taking place. That is why we have entered into a very major review of the employment issues of the 1980s.

We have asked for a parliamentary committee to be formed under the chairmanship of the Honourable Warren Allmand. I believe the hon. member will be a member of that committee. It will be an opportunity for parliamentarians to cross this country in order to look at and assess the problems of shortages, and unemployment issues across Canada, in a public manner. We have put together a major task force of my own commission on employment and immigration. We are pulling together people from different departments in the government to begin to understand what changes are taking place in our economic structure, so that we can put together a proper design which will enable the government, provincial government and the private sector to begin to combine their efforts more effectively to meet the new employment demands and requirements of the next decade. In the meantime we have this interim program to make sure we can handle the short-term problems.

That is one of the things I felt very strongly about when I took over this portfolio. I realized that we had to do a very careful review and analysis of the kinds of things we had to look forward to, so that we could change the programs which required change and put together a package of employment initiatives and partnership within the public and private sectors.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I presume the questioning must shift fairly soon to someone else for a while, and perhaps it will return to me, but after 20 minutes I am becoming increasingly disturbed. Can the minister tell us why he has no officials here? I think it is fairly common knowledge throughout government that, next to Statistics Canada, the minister probably has the largest budget for researchers.

I have attempted to identify a couple of very, very basic sets of numbers, but I have not been able to get them in 20 minutes. It would be irrational and somewhat irresponsible for the Parliament of Canada to deal with this bill which provides taxpayers' funds for the creation of employment when we have no projected sense. I realize that estimates are estimates, but we have no projected sense of how many unemployed we are dealing with here. Do we really need to create jobs? The minister's rhetoric seems to exceed his knowledge with some frequency, but if he tells us in his rhetoric that he is concerned about targeting employment, giving help to those who need it most, then I think one would expect the minister to be able to tell us the characteristics of those who need the help the most. Is the geographic problem the dominant one that we are dealing with here? Is it characteristics of individuals who are amenable to training?

With the large budget the minister has available to him, surely he could have a couple of officials here who may have better data than the minister is carrying around in his head. How can the minister expect us to approve an expenditure which is unlimited in terms of this bill? According to his own figures, it is at least $100 million. How can he expect us to approve that if we do not know what it is for? What is the dimension of the problem that this piece of legislation is intended to solve?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member if he has been unable to understand what I have said. I have attempted to be very forthcoming with him. I do not quite see the logical connection between having a research budget and having two officials sitting here at a table. If he feels he needs the security blanket of two officials sitting across from him, I would be quite happy to provide them.

In the short time I have been in this ministry, I have made an effort to acquire the information. I think it is a ministerial responsibility to provide it. I am providing it to the hon. member. Unfortunately he does not want to listen to it. If he does not want to listen, there is nothing I can do in my power to make him listen. I am not using rhetoric. I have told him exactly what we expect in the way of unemployment figures. I have given him the percentages and assessments of the Minister of Finance. I have told him that we see specific areas of real need in the country caused by changes in the population pattern. There are still a large number of young people who will need employment assistance. There are still major initiatives which have to be taken to assist women to come into the work force and to gain more equal salaries for the same kind of work. There are regional variations of very severe kinds. Those are existent matters which are both historical and contemporary. That is the basis upon which the planning is taking place.

I should like to go back to the remarks of the hon. member, who seems to be so absolutely preoccupied about how we will target things. It is curious. When he opened the debate in this House in response to this bill, he claimed that we apparently could not do any targeting with this bill, it was a shotgun approach. The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He cannot be arguing that somehow we should be targeting when he is also saying that it is a shotgun approach. We are talking about one means of creating employment, the employment tax credit. It is designed to provide an incentive to the private employer to provide for incremental work. The reason we have combined that with other kinds of measures is that we do not feel there is any one solution to the problem. We need a variety of solutions. We need to be able to orchestrate those solutions. That is why we are providing a combination of measures, so that we can focus in on the problems.

If the hon. member feels insecure, disturbed, and overwrought by the lack of the presence of some public servants on the floor of the House, then I would be very glad to provide them. I would not want to be the cause of a nervous breakdown of the hon. member for Calgary West, but I would suggest that he is receiving exactly the answers deserving of the kinds of questions he is asking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I live not too far from Mount St. Helens. I think there is a correlation that can be drawn between the eruption we got here and what the people back home have been getting.

Mr. Kempling: The fallout is just as bad, gas and ashes.

Mr. Friesen: Gas and ashes, that is right. I should like to direct a couple of questions to the minister, but I will preface them with a little bit of background. As I understand the measure, it deals with two changes in the UIC program. One is the change in premiums and one is a change in administration or the funding.

Mr. Hawkes: You are not on the right bill.

Mr. Friesen: Am I not on the right bill?

Mr. Epp: Does it ever make a difference?

Mr. de Corneille: That is just about as relevant as all the other stuff.

Mr. Friesen: That is right. I have been listening to the torrent coming from the minister and I could not tell what bill he was on. As the former hon. member for Timiskaming used to say—and I am sure the minister took lessons from him—it really does not matter if one knows nothing about the bill; one can make a real good speech, in fact a better speech, if one knows nothing about it. I will defer until we come to this next bill, but I will be ready for you then, sir.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of things on which I would like to seek a response from the minister this evening regarding problems of unemployment for which the employment tax credit bill ostensibly proposes to provide a solution, at least partly.

● (2030)

In my riding of Winnipeg-Birds Hill just last week there were a number of employees of the Canadian National Railway, some 49 at Transcona shops and another five at the Symmington yard, who were laid off their jobs, and there is a similar number scheduled to be laid off in the coming weeks. Indeed there are rumours of even more lay-offs.

I should like to ask the minister, in view of his concern about unemployment, what the government, and what he in his capacity as minister of employment, are doing about this latest move of the Canadian National Railroad in abandoning its extensive hiring and expansionist intentions of only a few months ago and now proceeding to lay people off? I ask this particularly in view of Canada's high unemployment rate, certainly much higher than any of the statistics being tossed about tonight would indicate: Unemployment is higher than those statistics if we consider the hidden unemployment and the tremendous concentration of unemployment, not just in various regions but in various parts of our cities.

I should like to ask the minister what he thinks himself capable of doing in respect of this latest action of the CNR, taking into account particularly the unfairness of hiring people, creating expectations of permanent employment, only to lay those people off in a short time, facing them again with economic uncertainty. Will the minister undertake to speak with his colleagues, the Minister of Transport and the hon. gentleman in the other place, who may or may not be responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, to see whether the CNR could use this time to catch up on its repair work, repairing all the many grain cars and hopper cars that require repair, continuing the employment of people in this important enterprise, rather than contributing to the unemployment problem we have by allowing these layoffs?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's question is very important, but I am not sure I would judge it as relevant to this bill.

The issue of lay-offs in railway yards is one that would give those of us who live in the Winnipeg area some concern. I would ask the hon. member to treat it with some degree of perspective. As long as I have been living in Winnipeg the railways have been laying people off and hiring people. It is a cyclical industry; it goes up and down according to the season. I have not read of massive lay-offs by the railways. If I remember the figures accurately, the railroads in Winnipeg have been very consistent employers with a reasonably stable work force.

If the hon. member is asking what measures I am taking, I would draw his attention to the initiative that we announced only last Friday. Through the co-operation of several of my colleagues we were able to put forward a major proposal for the city of Winnipeg to create substantial renovation and rejuvenation of the core area, including work in some of the railroad yards, both CN and CPR, if that is the choice of the city. This will create several thousand jobs in Winnipeg over the next five or six years. Already we have taken substantial action to provide a major stimulus to the employment situation in Winnipeg.

I would like to thank the hon. member and some of his colleagues in the NDP caucus for their support during the period when we were trying to get the kind of encouragement that was necessary to bring those measures about. This is one significant measure that will have a major and beneficial impact on the employment picture in Winnipeg.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Chairman, the minister knows just from listening to what I had to say that I was not trying to portray any sort of cataclysmic event happening at the CNR, but merely trying to draw his attention to a fact, a situation, in which I think management is making some errors of decision.

We have an opportunity to build up the grain car and hopper fleet of those railroads which are in the habit of saying they do not have the equipment to move the grain. The minute they experience a revenue drop they begin to cut back on their intentions to rebuild their fleets. I think this is something that would merit conversation with the president of the CNR, to discover why they are doing this, whether there might not be alternatives, and whether they might be able to put this time to better use.

My second concern, and it follows on something the minister said, has regard to what was announced last Friday in Winnipeg and, indeed, what was announced on Monday in regard to the employment strategy of the government.

The minister is overplaying the extent to which the announcement he had to make on Friday and, indeed, the announcement of Monday, are going to solve or even come close to solving the problems the city of Winnipeg is experiencing in many different respects. The program announced on Friday involves money, as I understand it, that is not going to come into play until 1981. There is going to be a study first, as if the core area of Winnipeg had not been studied enough, and as though we did not know what kinds of things need to be done there already. The minister in his former capacity presided over many studies, and I presume that if those studies had any quality we can go to them for recommendations on what should be done in the core area of Winnipeg. I think much is being made of little in the rhetoric we are hearing about what was announced on Friday. There has been no articulation of how that money is going to be spent, what programs are to be in place, or any indication of just what form the spending of that money is to take. Until we hear that we cannot make a judgment as to whether, indeed, what was announced last Friday will address itself to the problems of Winnipeg.

Another aspect of the very same problem is related to unemployment in the inner city of Winnipeg. I read in the minister's speech of last Monday something about the Community Services Project, this new program which will do so many good things for the cities in which it is implemented. I suggest to the minister that this is very much a recycling of what existed before, the Canada Works plan. If it is intended to be an improvement of the Canada Works plan, I suggest it does not go anywhere near meeting the aspirations of those who have had experience with the Canada Works plan and know the inadequacies thereof.

There was a meeting in Winnipeg during the election. The hon. member for Provencher was there and perhaps he will recall it, at which a group presented recommendations for further employment programs in the inner city. One of the things they asked for was a three-year cycle in respect of any kind of program, whether it was to be called Canada Works or Community Services.

I notice that the three-year cycle of the Community Services Project is a diminishing three-year cycle. It is to be funded fully in the first year, and the percentage of funding is to diminish over the next two years. Certain conditions are attached to the programs to be funded in the first place and whether or not they are to be continued. An example of those conditions is whether they have any possibility of being sustained by user fees in the future, introducing the concept of user fees into social services. The minister should know from his experience in the city of Winnipeg that any program which is asked to be dependent on user fees in the inner city will not address the problems of that particular area. He should know that such a program will not address problems of unemployment.

We have heard about rates of unemployment of 7 per cent, 8 per cent and 9 per cent. A study done by Winnipeg School Division No. I shows that among the adults around Dufferin school in the inner city of Winnipeg there is a 60 per cent unemployment rate. Also in the inner city around William Whyte school there is a 55 per cent unemployment rate, around David Livingston school a 45 per cent unemployment rate, around Norquay school in North Point Douglas there is a 44 per cent unemployment rate, and around Strathcona school across from where I used to work, Robertson House, there is a 39 per cent unemployment rate. There are 28 schools in whose areas there is a 13 per cent or greater rate of unemployment among the adults of the children who attend those schools.

Clearly the program which the minister announced on Monday will not address itself to these sorts of problems, and neither will the employment tax credit program. It is incumbent upon the minister not to mislead the public and say that these programs will solve our problems, particularly when there is nothing within them which is geographically specific to address the particular problems of the inner city. For instance, the whole Community Services project is designed to continue the very problems which people for years have been asking be corrected in those kinds of employment programs.

What kind of problems should be corrected? We must get rid of certain problems and introduce programs so that there will be some security, so that people who embark upon jobs will know whether or not they will have that job next year at the same time, when the grant must be renewed. I notice that the community development aspect of the program is for a term of one year. This does nothing to eliminate the insecurity of working on these particular programs.

In the one program which is of a longer duration, three years, people will still have to look for other moneys every year because of the diminishing effect. The minister should know the problems which the community school's programs in the core area of Winnipeg had when it had to find money because the provincial government and the school board began to pull out. He should know the work that went into getting United Way funding for that particular program. This is exactly the kind of burden which the minister is laying on every project under the auspices of this Community Services project.

It is a grossly inadequate answer to the kinds of concerns which have been placed before the minister in his capacity as minister and in his capacity before he was elected, concerns of which the minister should be well aware. These are problems which have been apparent for years. I invite the minister's defence of these particular programs, and ask him not to indulge in the kind of hyperbole to which we have become accustomed in listening to him describe his initiatives. Would the minister tell us how these particular programs will solve the problems of the 60 per cent and 55 per cent of the people who are unemployed in some of the areas around the inner city schools?

I hope that the minister will not try to tell us about the great things which will happen because of the announcement that he made last Friday, because it is not clear, and it will not be clear for some time, whether that money will be used to redevelop the core area of Winnipeg for the benefit of the low income citizens of Winnipeg, the tenants and the people who inhabit that area, or whether it is to be channelled according to the dictates of the ICEC on city council. The things which have just occurred to me that I would like to say about the ICEC, Mr. Chairman, would be unparliamentary, and I had to pause for a moment. It is not clear how this money will be spent and whether it will in any way be beneficial to the people who are unemployed to this great extent.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the members of the committee if this is beginning to sound like Winnipeg night in the House of Commons. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill brings up some very interesting questions about job initiatives and how they might affect the inner core of Winnipeg, an area about which he and I have had concern for several years. I find it somewhat strange that the hon.

member is attacking me and my government on its great failures after we have been in government for only three months, for not solving the unemployment problems of inner city Winnipeg.

Miss Jewett: For 12 years.

Mr. Axworthy: I was just about to say, Mr. Chairman, I have always taken the posture that each new government starts afresh in its approach, and that we cannot be laid down with the sins of our forefathers. But before members opposite get too agitated, I would like to remind the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill and his colleagues that we had an NDP government in Manitoba for eight years. During those eight years I did not see the unemployment rate go down one percentage point, or any great improvement in the inner city of Winnipeg. They were there and they had the opportunities, the commitments and the resources.

I would also like to remind the hon. member that the initiative that we took on Friday was the first major social economic initiative in the inner city that has been taken by a major government, including the hon. member's provincial government which was NDP for eight years.

I do not wish to debate the point, but I think that it is important that the hon. member understand and that we exchange thoughts in a reasonable way. The problems of hard core unemployment will not be solved overnight. I did not say that they would be in my statement in Winnipeg on Friday, nor in my statement in this House on Monday. I said that we must work at these problems with all the resources at our command, but I did not say that they would be solved right away. These problems have been with us far too long and in far too many ways.

Any government is restricted by the kinds of resources that it can bring to bear, because there are demands from across the country, not just from the inner city of Winnipeg, but from the northeast corner of New Brunswick, the Gaspé of Quebec, northern Ontario and Athabasca. There are unemployment problems of a hard core nature which have been around for years because of the very nature of the economy and the geography of our country. I can tell hon. members that I will work as hard as I can.

I said earlier in response to questions raised by the hon. member for Calgary West that in the three months of this government we have taken decisions on the northeast coal in British Columbia, on the fighter aircraft, on Chrysler, and a number of other decisions. We debated this afternoon a bill on fisheries enhancement to raise the opportunities for people in the maritimes. We are working at the problems in a very consistent and enduring way. But if the hon. member from Winnipeg-Birds Hill thinks that we somehow can wave a magic wand and unemployment will vanish overnight, then he is living in a dream world. I suggest that he come back down to earth where we are and work on the problems in a very realistic manner.

Miss Jewett: Well then, cut out the rhetoric.

Mr. Friesen: On a point of clarification, Mr. Chairman, did I understand the minister to say the fisheries enhancement program which he announced yesterday?

Mr. Axworthy: No.

Mr. Friesen: The day before yesterday?

Mr. Axworthy: No.

Mr. Friesen: Within the last one, two or three days. Did I understand him to say that that program is restricted to the east coast?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to mislead the hon. member. We are not talking about that bill either. We are talking about the bill which was given second reading today and which was introduced by the Minister of Fisheries, to provide increases in loan agreements. I understand, having sat in the House this afternoon and listening to the debate from both sides, that it will apply to anywhere there is fish.

Mr. Friesen: That is not fisheries enhancement. He doesn't know what he is talking about.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Chairman, nothing is more amusing and more cynical than the Minister of Employment and Immigration rising and disowning everything which the Liberal party has done prior to his election in Winnipeg in May, 1979. Who was the major contact person, the major voice of the Liberal party in Winnipeg? Who was the person who told the Liberal party what decisions to make with regard to Winnipeg, if it was not the Minister of Employment and Immigration? Maybe this is the beginning of a trip down the road to Damascus because we now find him getting up and disowning everything which the Liberal party did before his election. He is saying, "Well, I admit that things were rough, but now I am in cabinet and things will be different from now on."

I would also remind the minister that there were major initiatives taken in the inner city by the NDP government when it was in power. The minister says I live in a dream world. I make no apologies for dreaming about what we could do in the city of Winnipeg and other inner cities in this country if we had the political will and imagination that is so desperately lacking in this legislation.

● (2050)

I would remind the minister that the NDP government initiated the community schools program; the NDP government built housing in the inner city, and the NDP government did a number of things within the inner city that the minister was wont to defend when the Progressive Conservative government of Manitoba that came to office in 1977 started to dismantle them. Has he forgotten what he used to say in the legislature, Mr. Chairman? It seems that his memory is indeed short.

I submit that all this hoopla about announcements on Monday, and particularly announcements on Friday, is meant to cover up the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration was unable to live up to the expectations he deliberately created in the city of Winnipeg in the spring of 1979, prior to the May 22 election, about rail relocation. Now he flies to Winnipeg, saying, "We could not get rail relocation, but how is $50 million or how is $180 million?" depending on which paper you read in Winnipeg. That is what was really going on last Friday afternoon.

Instead of accomplishing rail relocation and instead of living up to the hopes that were deliberately created in the futile hope of defeating members like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—trying to create some political subterfuge in the inner city and trying to garner Liberal candidates from the unsuspecting group of citizens who were trying to defend their community against the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass—that is what was really going on in the spring of 1979. All the hoopla last Friday afternoon was designed to save the political face of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and put the ball back in the city court. Perhaps that is where it belongs. He is certainly not the only culprit in this drama. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is what has been going on in all these announcements made by the minister. I invite his response to my submission. We will see how short his memory is on other subjects.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that the NDP is now taking the position that a $50 million investment is simply hoopla. I think taxpayers will be glad to know that they have such disregard for the public purse, such disregard for the most major initiative taken in the city of Winnipeg in the last several decades.

I want now to respond to this total distortion that the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill is trying to perpetrate. I am surprised at him; he is not usually prone to that kind of parliamentary tactic.

Just to make sure that the record is straight, and that he has things straight, Mr. Chairman, the announcement that was made concerning Winnipeg's rail relocation made it clear that the federal government was prepared to live up to its financial commitment if there was a decision to take relocation. That is the only decision we could make. Because of constitutional requirements we are not in a position to dictate priorities to local governments.

Mr. Blaikie: You did not tell the people that last spring.

Mr. Axworthy: The only question put to us was to know if we were prepared to pay our fair share of the cost. On Friday we were prepared to pay our fair share of the cost, but we cannot do that unilaterally. We depend upon the co-operation and participation of other levels of government.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill is telling me that he is prepared to ignore totally other levels of government, to disregard totally the constitutional responsibilities of the BNA Act, and is prepared to forget about any spirit of co-operation, that does not say much for his approach and his philosophy. It sounds very autocratic to me—he will get his way regardless; he does not care what the other levels of government think; he is not prepared to work with them. I point out to the hon. member that we have to work the way the country is constructed, not remake it to suit anybody's illusions. There was a commitment. The money may still be spent on rail relocation because there was an agreement to study that as a possibility.

I see the hon. member who represented Elmwood in the provincial legislature in the House. He stood up in that legislature and said, "Forget relocation; our party does not stand for that." He was the worst critic, Mr. Chairman. The things he had to say about me shocked me, and made me embarrassed. The language he used, Mr. Chairman!

An hon. Member: Poor Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy: It touched my sensitive nature that the hon. member from Elmwood was prepared to reject completely any concept of relocation, and spoke on behalf of the NDP caucus in the provincial legislature on that issue. I think that was unfortunate. I regret that a political ally of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill was prepared to take such an outlandish position. It helped destroy the spirit of co-operation that we were trying to build and which we have succeeded in building through our initiative. The federal, provincial and municipal governments are now working in a spirit of harmony for the betterment of the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to advise the hon. minister that the last speaker for the NDP was correct. Unemployment under the NDP in Saskatchewan did go down; thousands of people from Saskatchewan moved to Alberta!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: That shows what free enterprise can do because that is the way they are moving in that part of the country.

I should like to ask one or two questions and I should like them answered as simply and as accurately as the minister can manage. The reason I say that is that I think if there is an employer listening to this debate or watching it on television tonight, nothing has been said that would indicate to him how he can benefit under this legislation. If I were an unemployed person with a hungry wife and youngsters living on welfare, nothing has been said tonight that would give me very much hope.

Surely the purpose of the bill is to provide employment for some people. I do not think any bill can solve all the problems of unemployment, and it is ridiculous to say that it will. It will take a combination of things to get this country working again. May I ask the minister if there is any geographical area in the country where the bill is not applicable?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, before I correctly answer the hon. member's question, I would point out to him that in Manitoba we think somewhat differently. When the NDP was in power in Saskatchewan people left, and when we elected a Tory government they left in even greater numbers to go to Alberta. So it works both ways, Mr. Chairman.

To answer the question, Mr. Chairman, I must say there is no geographic limitation at all. The bill applies right across Canada. The only requirement is that it must be an employer who makes the application. In the initial evaluation we found that about 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the applications are from employers with less than 20 employees, so it tends to be the smaller employers who use the program with the greatest frequency. This means that certain regions of the country use it less because they do not have the employment base, so that there is some regional variation. It is applicable across the country, however.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Now let us suppose there is a grocer who would like to extend his business and wants to hire one or two more people. What steps would he take to derive benefits from this legislation, and what would those benefits be?

Mr. Axworthy: I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that one of the important provisions of the bill is that any applicant must demonstrate that there will be an actual increase in the work force. It simply cannot be a replacement of workers. There must be some demonstration that there is a base of employees that has been in existence for some period of time and that the employer wants to add additional numbers to that. What is then required is that the employer is able to get a benefit under this bill of anywhere from $1.50 to $2 an hour in terms of a tax credit against his taxes for that year. If he does not have actual taxes in that tax year, he can spread the benefits over a five-year period.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, how would that grocer go about it? Does he have to get approval for additional staff that he is going to hire, or does he simply do so and then fill it in on his tax forms at the end of the year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the easiest way for that grocer or any other employer is to contact our regional office. In the province of Alberta, for example, we have close to 13 employment commission offices. If they were contacted they would be very glad to send the forms, and provide any counsel or advice that they would require under the program.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, would the minister enlarge on that? I am wondering if the grocer has to get approval before he comes under this program?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The grocer and the employer would have to be approved. They would have to submit the application. It would be evaluated by our office. If it met the criteria and the conditions, then it would be approved, but there are certain standards that they would have to meet.

I would be very pleased to send the hon. member a package of materials, with the application forms and instructions, so that he can look at them himself and use the material for any referrals. I will send that to him in the next day or two.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Who actually gives the approval? Is it the district office, the minister or, to put it move broadly, does the hon. member in the House of Commons representing that particular area have anything to do with it? Who actually gives the approval?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the approvals would be departmental approval. Because we are dealing with several thousands of applications, it is not something for which the member of Parliament has an advisory capacity. We are using that mainly in connection with job creation because it is community oriented. This is something where there is a direct contractual arrangement between the employer and the commission of employment and immigration. They would submit the application. It would be evaluated and approved at the regional level and then monitored from that point on. The only other criteria that I should mention is that we would then be in a position to refer employees from our registry to that employer.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one or two short comments. As I believe the minister would know, we have a difficult problem in getting employees to work on farms. Many of our farmers are really up against it. They get frustrated when they read of the number of people who are unemployed in cities such as Calgary, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Winnipeg and so on, and yet they cannot get anyone to work on their farms. Some of it is specialized labour because a farmer does not want just any Tom, Dick or Harry, or Mary, Ann or Josephine to operate his $40,000 tractor. But a lot of it is pretty simple work, such as fencing and looking after turkeys, etc..

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: Is there provision made for a farmer to come under this program?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am tempted to respond to the hon. member's latter point, but I will not!

The agricultural area is not covered by this bill because of the tremendous seasonal variation and the work that is required. But I would suggest to the hon. member that there are programs under our department dealing with agricultural workers. We do set up agricultural pools. He probably knows that within his own province of Alberta there is a very active student exchange program for agricultural students, where we bring in a large number of students from European countries, in particular, to work on farms in western Canada. But this particular program would not apply in that case because it is much too difficult to measure and evaluate whether it is incremental work or additional work or that it would continue, say, for the full 46 or 50-week period.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned about the exchange program bringing students over from Denmark, Sweden, and so on. This is an excellent program. Many of these young people come for a definite period of time. It is quite frustrating for the farmer when he gets a real good lad from Denmark or Sweden, and there are some excellent lads who have come from those countries who understand farming and who are a real asset to any farmer, but then they have to go home. Many of them would like to stay here and I think they would make excellent citizens. I would urge the minister, because this comes under his jurisdiction in the immigration branch, that his department be more tolerant in allowing these excellent young people to stay in Canada. They are an asset to this country. I know of two or three who have had to go back. The farmer was left really helpless in a couple of cases because he could not find help, and the young men wanted to stay and become Canadians. I would urge the minister concerning that particular aspect, but I realize that I am a little off course with regard to this particular act.

There are one or two comments I would like to make following the information which the minister has given us about employees getting into this program. Every time a small shopkeeper hires one more employee, we reduce the number of unemployed in this country and help make that individual and his family happier, and we create a better country. If we can get thousands and thousands of our small shops hiring one or two employees, expanding to that degree, and many of them can do it with a little help, then we will make a dint in the unemployment statistics.

I would suggest that the procedure of coming into the program be kept as simple as possible in order to keep control of it, and that we concentrate on trying to get more and more of our small shopkeepers—many of whom are working 12 to 14 hours a day, who would like to cut down on their own hours—to hire another employee. This could be done if they could just get a little help at the financial end to do it. It is surprising that, once they hire another employee, the business increases. Many times they are able to keep that employee. I think that this program can do a lot of good. I would suggest that it be administered with as much simplicity as possible so that people will not get frustrated and discouraged when they are trying to get approval for the hiring of employees and the expansion of their business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, would the minister be kind enough to enlighten the House on how farmers can take advantage of any program which is a part of his portfolio? He mentioned that there were programs within his department and within his jurisdiction of which farmers could take advantage. Will he tell us to which programs he refers and how does one go about taking advantage of them?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out in the answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Bow River, farmers can use this program if they are talking about 12-month employment. If it is simply the seasonal variation, part-time worker, then they are not applicable. If it is full-time additional work, then they are available to him.

The other way in which we assist farm workers is through the departments agricultural pools. Those are most common in southern Ontario where they have a very strong demand for seasonal workers. I think this also takes place in my own province of Manitoba where there is a very strong demand for agricultural workers in the Portage la Prairie area in market gardening. We organize agricultural polls. At the same time we are prepared to bring in offshore workers on certain occasions, or workers from other provinces and we undertake to help in the mobility in those kinds of areas. Those are the kinds of things which the organizers in each of the regional offices implement.

Mr. McCain: You are not speaking there of money that is part of or in lieu of wages for training. You are speaking of the department of employment seeking people to fill jobs, yes for agriculture, but you do not spend any money on that other than going through the exercise of aiding to locate the individual who will then be employed on the farm. In terms of grant money which is going to help every other industry, do you have any programs, 12 months or otherwise, whereby there will be money spent in aid of training of agricultural help? If so, under what act does it come and how is it arranged?

Mr. Axworthy: First, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should be too disparaging about the value of the ability of our department to act as the mechanism for making sure that farm workers are able to go where they are most needed.

Mr. McCain: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am not being disparaging of the department. I merely defined the field in which they worked. That does not include supplements of income or income training money in any part of that program. In what part of the program, under what act and what regulation is it possible for a farmer to employ somebody and have you pay part of the cost of that employee as training for a farmer?

I am asking the question in ignorance. I do not know the answer. The minister mentioned that they do help farmers. I want to know if they help them in this way and, if so, under what program.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member. I was just saying that I think in many ways there is a substantial financial value to the farmers by the services we provide. What I did indicate in answer to the hon. member for Bow River is that they can use this program as long as they are talking about a full-time employee over an extended period. If it is simply a matter of a seasonal worker coming in for a short period of time, this program obviously will not apply. If there are, as they say there are, certainly in our part of our country, very large farms with major numbers of employees and they see an opportunity to add incremental workers—and I would point out this is not a training program, it is an employment program—that means they are simply adding an incremental worker.

Obviously the experience of that work will be of some assistance, but that is the way in which we can directly help in the using of the tax credit program, namely, a farm operation that is able to cover that kind of more extended work opportunities, not the seasonal variations which most farmers experience.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, applicants for assistance in training programs in my constituency have applied for as few as one person and they have been denied any assistance, while applicants who are applying for anywhere from five to 100 have on occasion been given assistance under legislation of this type. I would like to know why it would be that, let us say, a tradesman such as a machinist who wants to bring somebody in and train him, a tradesman who is properly qualified and has his licence, that he would not be eligible when he applies for a single person.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that if the hon. member would like to put down the exact case and circumstance, we will look into it. Under our training programs we have the Critical Skills Training Program which is designed to provide major incentives to employers for high technology skills. It is a program that is applied across the country, as I announced in my statement on Monday. We just added an additional $10 million to it to bring it up to standards, but that is for high technology jobs. Most of the other training programs under the Canada Manpower Training Act are designed for institutional training. We buy positions, in effect, in the community colleges and institutions run by provincial governments. What we do is pay the allowance of the applicant for them and we provide certain support for those institutions to continue.

The actual training is offered by the provincial community college or vocational college system. We buy places with them and then they refer to our employment offices those who apply for them. That is the way the system works. If the hon. member is suggesting that we look at a special program for the training of agricultural workers—

Mr. McCain: I said machinists.

Mr. Axworthy: If someone is to be trained as a machinist, there is certainly every opportunity through our training programs for them to acquire those particular kinds of skills, but up to this point in time the major emphasis has been through the institutional system. I would just say from the figures that offhand we have 240,000 to 250,000 participants in that training program on an annual basis, going at different time periods. We have committed well over $800 million of this government to training programs. With regard to their ability to work on farms as machinists, there is certainly no limitation or restriction whatsoever.

Mr. McCain: I am glad to hear that, because in practice it has not worked that way. The employer who might need an individual person has had great difficulty in obtaining an apprentice or a new body to enter into the machine shop trade in our area. Since the minister referred to its value to the constituency of Madawaska-Victoria, I hope it will extend all over New Brunswick and that there will be additional latitude extended to employers who want one man at a time. That is very important.

It is also important that there be some very careful guidance supplied by the offices of employment. I received a phone call only today with respect to two people who have applied for a short training course which is supported by the department. Both people work for the same employer, both applied for the same course, and both put in the same application. One received the assistance, the other has been asked to refund it.

There is something wrong. This is a very gross misunderstanding between two people who have gone through the same course to get exactly the same training and exactly the same help. I will be writing to the minister. I hope we can resolve this problem because it is just a matter of some misunderstanding, some regulation, and some guy has made a decision in the department which is very discriminatory to one against the other. I hope the minister will be able to consider it.

I would like to ask the minister, in consideration of the work of his department, if he would give some thought to a variation in the decision-making process and in the allocation of funds in the make-work projects under both Canada Works and Young Canada Works.

I have written to the minister with regard to some applications made in my constituency, applications which stood for the long-term good of the young people of the community. The applications were made by new applicants who found themselves under difficult circumstances for a particular period of time. They have been rejected for various reasons. I would point out to the minister that when these applications passed over my desk, I inquired how much input I would have as a member and as to any influencing of the decision. I was advised virtually none, that the discretionary power, if any, would rest in the hands of the minister, that the selective committee of the make-work branch of his department would pass on these, make the decision, and make recommendations to the minister.

I made my representations on behalf of some which I thought should be considered, after I was advised that they were precluded from being eligible. One, for example, is the development of an athletic facility in a town where they are doing an outstanding job and could have used some student help this year very advantageously. It was decided that because the work was menial, it would not be proper to ask students to do that work. Second, and this disturbs me, it was decided on information from other than the sponsors that the work was not necessary. With no communication with the sponsor, the project was rejected. I approached the staff of the minister's office and appealed to the people who made the decision before it arrived on the minister's desk.

I am particularly concerned about the status of the member of Parliament in this decision-making process. The minister's Liberal predecessor had established—and I am sorry it was abolished; that was not right—a ministerial advisory board drawn from the constituency which knew the constituency and, in particular in rural constituencies, the community. It made very sound recommendations both to the minister and to the member. I respected those recommendations totally when they were made. Those boards have disappeared. This has now come into the ministerial office.

I have been advised by an applicant—not in my constituency; otherwise I would be much more angry than I am at the moment—that a letter has come from the minister's office to say that the member involved did not recommend this project and therefore he is not getting anything. Where that letter came from I do not know and I did not see it, but it was a rather bona fide source. Where there is a little smoke, there is bound to be some fire. I do not know how those letters came out, but some did. I do not want to get caught in that bind, but I give the minister notice that I am sending him a letter. If it did not go out today, it will certainly go out first thing in the morning. It pertains to five applications for Young Canada Works projects which would have very long-term and lasting social effects for the benefit of young people, all of which were declined in spite of the strongest recommendations I could make.

What I would like to know is whether there is any possibility that the minister will add to the regulatory structure of the make-work project that very pertinent and badly needed regulation, that one of the things which must be considered in the awarding of funds to make work projects is whether they will be of long-term beneficial use to the communities or groups served by the expenditure of public funds for, let us say, the improvement of a playground on the ongoing operation of a young people's camp whether sponsored by a church, a Kinsmen Club or whatever. I am referring to very long-term benefits. Would the minister give that serious consideration? At the moment it can be precluded by existing regulations, and is being precluded in my constituency.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that that is exactly what the intention of our government is under the new Canada Development Program I announced on Monday. We felt that not only should we be creating employment but also that that employment should be attached to some very important and significant priorities and objectives such as restoration of communities, conservation and what-not.

Furthermore, what we have established is a system whereby each of the regions will be able to have a high degree of choice and selection of what those priorities are. They will not be made on a national basis, but we have given clear instructions to our regional officers that they should consult with local, provincial and community organizations and authorities and private employers to blueprint a work program or training program which is particularly applicable to their own regions, and that they will have the opportunity to design that program within those kinds of criteria.

I also tell the hon. member that there is a further safeguard to that. I announced that we would re-introduce the ministerial advisory group per constituency. I too regret that they were cancelled by the previous government. I think it was a mistake. I think many hon. members opposite also know it was a mistake to do that because members of Parliament and the advisory groups played a very important role. I apologize to the hon. member.

When I took over this ministry in early March, the summer youth program was already well advanced. All we could do under that circumstance was simply offer the opportunity to individual members of Parliament to advise or recommend on those applications. We did not have enough time to re-establish the advisory groups. The time was just too short, so we simply had to rely upon those recommendations.

With respect to the particular projects the hon. member is talking about, if the hon. member felt that they were overlooked, I would be glad to review them. I cannot promise that they will be funded, but there is a circumstance whereby in some cases we have awarded grants to projects and, for one reason or another, they may not be able to carry the projects forward, and the money comes back. If there is a second circulation of that money, we then may be in a position to review those particular applications. I will welcome the hon. member's letter, but my parliamentary secretary, who was very much responsible for looking after that part of the operations, says the kind of letter he refers to would not have gone out because he remembers the application and can say that the hon. member recommended most of the projects.

The reason some were not selected was simply that there was not enough money to go around. We had to allocate according to the resources we had. As the hon. member knows, there was about $110 million in the summer youth program, and when you divide that evenly across the country, you cannot satisfy all the demands. That would be one reason. I am certainly prepared to review it, but I can assure the hon. member that the projects which will be selected will be according to local priorities. Second, there will be an advisory group in place with a constituency allocation in every constituency to ensure that the member of Parliament and that selection group can reflect those local concerns.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, the minister has not sat very long beside the Minister of Agriculture but he certainly has brought with him the deft ability to avoid absolutely answering questions which are asked. I am going to ask my question very directly. Will the minister inject into the regulatory structure under which the decision-making process is governed that the value to the community or the service rendered by the applicant must be appraised as part of the decision-making process in the awarding of the money? That is not necessarily the guideline. Other regulations such as the benefit to the employed student may be prior to the benefit to the community for which he would be employed under the project. Do I make my point clear?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Mr. McCain: If that regulation were injected into the structure, or even if a ministerial letter were to go out for the guidance of the selecting procedures and particularly for the civil servant structure of it, stating that the benefit to the community must have high priority as part of the selection process, the ones which I find now denied all would have been approved. However, by virtue of other regulations they were cast out of hand without consideration of this value. Will the minister take that into serious consideration and issue such a letter, or have a change in the regulation?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any disagreement between the hon. member and I. I hate to read from my own words of wisdom, but just to assure the hon. member, I made the following statement on Monday. I announced three principles upon which the job-creation program would be based, and I quote:

> The second principle upon which today's measures are based is the recognition that employment must have continuing and genuine value.

I went on to announce that that value will be set according to very specific priorities and that those priorities will be judged based on the worth of the project to the community. To check to make sure that happens and that it is not just a regulatory instruction but in fact will be implemented, we will have the advisory group, which is the best way of ensuring that an assessment of what is really of great concern and of great value to a community can be introduced into the evaluation. So we have built in a number of safeguards to ensure exactly what the hon. member is asking, and I think he will find, as much as an imperfect world allows the system to work, that it will work according to those criteria.

The Chairman: The hon. member's time has almost expired.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, I just want to give one example. The Woodstock branch of the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded applied for assistance to build a workshop. The only reason I can determine that that application was rejected was that menial work was involved and that they would only be painting and driving nails. That is the type of regulatory structure I want to get out of. I think the minister does too. I cannot think of a better group than that group in Woodstock New Brunswick, which is working so hard for the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded. That application will be included in the letter which I am sending.

My time is up, but I plead with the minister that if there are additional moneys which are not spent, or if there is anything the minister can allocate to these from any other source, I think these are special cases. I think the regulatory structure should not force them through the griddle of selective exercises long before it gets to the minister's desk. I think the minister would have approved all five of them had he been making the decision, and I say that sincerely.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I could not begin to make a few comments without making some reference to that somewhat snide remark by the hon. member for Bow River when he suggested that the reason there is such low unemployment in Saskatchewan is that people from Saskatchewan are leaving to go to Alberta. The hon. member surely knows that that is not true. If he can read, and if he looks at the reports which are made by Statistics Canada, the hon. member will know that the only province in this country which has lost population or which has had a net decrease in population in the last two years is the province of Manitoba, which, unfortunately, has had a Conservative government since 1977. Last year, the last year for which we have figures, according to Statistics Canada the province of Manitoba lost 20,000 people.

• (2130)

I hope the hon. member for Bow River is not attributing the prosperity which his province enjoys purely to the present Conservative government or to the former Social Credit government, about which he knows a great deal more than I do, because surely the hon. member knows that provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan, which has an NDP government, are doing extremely well, not because of the kind of government they have—although, of course, government actions can help or hinder prosperity—but mainly because they have tremendous resources which are now needed to a great extent in all parts of the world.

Manitoba, at the moment, is a have-not province, and I would not suggest, for a moment, that an NDP government or a Liberal government could make Manitoba as prosperous as Saskatchewan or Alberta. But what we have seen in Manitoba, with a Conservative government, is a very sharp slowdown in the economy, and more unemployment than Manitoba has had since before World War II.

We have seen a Conservative government which was elected largely by convincing the people of Manitoba that they had done too much, and that a Conservative government would get the economy moving in Manitoba by leaving it to the private sector, not having government interference.

We have seen them, in the last three months, suddenly have a conversion. Suddenly they are prepared to spend money. Suddenly they are prepared to invest with private industry and in the development of mines.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Bow River that he look at what is happening in Manitoba, that he look at a daily newspaper like the Winnipeg Tribune—which is not, by any stretch of the imagination, in support of the NDP; indeed, in all my years, it has been in support of the Conservative party—and see the kinds of reports that they have been publishing lately about what has happened to Manitoba universities, and about what has happened to Manitoba hospitals under a Conservative government.

I want to say to the minister that I wish he would not be so partisan, I wish he would not be so enthusiastic about the Liberal party that he could forget all the things that he saw before he came here. I am not going to suggest, for a moment, that the NDP government of Manitoba solved all the problems of the inner city, or anything else, but the minister cannot help but know, because he is not blind, that there are few, if any, cities in Canada in which he will see as many senior citizens housing, retired people, living usually with only their pension, living in comfort, in up-to-date apartments, and paying a very small rent.

The minister will say, I am sure, that the bulk of the money came from the federal government. Of course it did, as it does for all housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: But until the NDP government came to power—and the minister knows this—there was no public housing, no senior citizens housing built at all.

Mr. Epp: Not true. There was senior citizens housing.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, the member says it is not true. On another occasion I will bring the exact figures here. I am speaking from memory, but I am 95 per cent certain—

Mr. Epp: I do not really want to get into a debate, but I think it has to be made clear that if the hon. member wants to make a statement that there was no senior citizens housing prior to the election of the NDP government in 1973, the facts simply do not bear that out.

Mr. Orlikow: In fact I am speaking from memory, but on another occasion I will bring the actual figures. There were less than 1,000 units of public housing, or senior citizens housing before 1969, when the NDP formed the government. In the period from 1969 on, there were more than 10,000 units. I, for one, never thought it, did not think then and do not think now, that my own government did as much as it could have. But they did make substantial improvements in the inner core of the city. The minister knows that the NDP government began projects like the Winnipeg Centre project which is, at the present time, training 50 people in the inner core of the city, most of whom are natives, to be teachers, something we never saw in Manitoba, or probably in any of the other provinces, until the last two years.

Mr. Chairman, what bothers me about this bill, and what bothered me about the minister's statement on Monday, is, not that they are necessarily bad in themselves, but in his enthusiasm it seems to me that the minister creates an impression among people—if they take him seriously—that these kinds of projects—and the minister says, and he is right, that we should not expect there to be a single simple solution to the problem of unemployment that is correct, but we have a right, and the people of Canada have a right, to know what the government's over-all objectives are, the government's over-all assessment of the problems we are going to face, and how the government expects to deal with those problems.

When one looks at the actual scope of the problem, one can only be struck by the smallness of the government, the meanness and the niggardliness of the government's response to what is the most serious problem of unemployment that this country has faced since before World War II.

The latest figure we have for unemployment is that 7.5 per cent of the labour force is unemployed. Around 900,000 are unemployed. Economic research organizations, such as the C. D. Howe Institute and the Conference Board, estimated that the present rate of unemployment, the present rate of 7.5 per cent, would rise this year to 8.3 per cent, because they could see several months ago that the United States was facing a recession. What we saw in the last month or so is that the recession in the United States and in Canada is going to be much more serious than most people expected.

The minister surely knows that in the United States there are some 250,000 unemployed auto workers. The minister surely knows that in Canada there are 30,000 auto workers unemployed. The minister surely knows that sales of north American cars this last month were down by something over 20 per cent in both Canada and the United States.

Mr. Epp: Thirty-one per cent.

Mr. Orlikow: That has a ripple effect. Because automobiles are not being sold, and therefore, not being produced, the rubber industry will slow down, the glass industry will slow down, the plastics industry will slow down, the iron and steel industries will slow down, and this is the reality.

Today in the Toronto Globe and Mail the business columnist quotes Wood Gundy, certainly not an NDP organization—

An hon. Member: A friend of the NDP.

Mr. Orlikow: Not an NDP-sided organization, a very respected financial institution. It predicted that unemployment this year in Canada will reach 9 per cent.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, we have a right, the people of Canada have a right to know what is this government, which was elected largely because it told the people of Canada that the go-slow policies of the Conservative government, which was in power for such a few months, were the wrong policies, and that they would get this country moving, planning to do.

We see in this bill which we are discussing today this employment tax credit act, I suppose $100 million. We see the announcement the minister made on Monday.

An hon. Member: Friday.

Mr. Orlikow: Whatever it was, $160 million, whatever it was. Let us take the minister at his word. We have the right to ask the minister a question. This is not the only thing which the government is doing, that is, the employment tax credit bill, and the statement he made on Monday about programs to provide job opportunities is part of it. What are the other parts? When the year 1980 comes to an end and the government has had an opportunity to put into effect all the programs which it has either announced or is now planning, what will we see? What will the unemployment rate be?

• (2140)

Mr. Hawkes: Why ask him?

Mr. Orlikow: I would like to know what the minister has to say about this. The minister ought to ignore the implied suggestions of some Conservative members of Parliament that unemployment is not very serious, that there are jobs out there, and all the rest of the arguments we hear so frequently from backbenchers in that party. Unemployment is a very serious problem. It is a serious problem for people who have been employed for ten or more years in the automobile or forest industry. It is a serious problem for the thousands of young people who are finishing schools or universities and cannot find jobs. I and the people of Canada would like to know what is the total package. What are the plans of the government? What do they think will happen as a result of their plans? How many unemployed will there be by the end of this year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, many of the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North were presented earlier on in the discussions. I will briefly summarize the answers I made at that time. To begin with, as I said, we are presently engaged in a major review of the employment requirements in Canada in the next decade and how we can best answer them. We have established a parliamentary committee to look at that. It will be composed of members from all sides of the House. We have established a major task force in our department.

As I indicated in my statement, I hope to have a paper available which can be presented and tabled in Parliament by the end of this year, and then we could have a major discussion about the employment strategies which should be followed. Very many changes are taking place. In the last ten years we have been relying upon ideas about job creation at which I want to have a new look. I intend to have a new look at them. We will welcome the participation of the hon. member in that parliamentary committee, so that we can come to grips with many of the new changes which are taking place.

He mentioned the problem of industrial dislocation which is taking place in the automobile industry. I assure the hon. member that we are presently meeting with the UAW—and have over the past several weeks—to work out programs to develop income support and assistance. We have had very cordial relationships with UAW in working out those common problems. But this is a new problem which has never been experienced in the industrial heartland before. We are aware of it, and we want to provide a solution which has been worked out with the unions and employers involved. That is what we are engaging in right now.

I can assure the hon. member that we are looking at a new strategy. We will be consulting with a wide variety of organizations. If he is the member from his caucus who sits on this parliamentary committee, then he will have a full opportunity to travel across Canada and hear the briefs and representations from various organizations. He can apply his own wisdom and experience to the problem. This is something we intend to do. In the meantime, as I have said, we are faced with a very major problem of creating work in the short-term, so that we have something available for Canadians while this review is taking place. That is why we announced the programs on Monday.

They are not necessarily the total strategy, but they are indicators of the kind of direction in which we would like to go, the kind of incentives we are offering employers to provide work for women in non-traditional work. There is increasing emphasis upon training programs, particularly the additional $10 million which is a 50 per cent increase in that program for native people to begin working on native projects. Those are the kinds of areas we want to go into.

We are establishing an experimental program of local economic development. It will have 15 to 18 to 20 pilot projects across Canada. They will provide long-term jobs and economic development across Canada. We could not get into a massive program of that kind until we saw how it actually worked. But we put enough money into our spending to provide a wide variety of long-term community economic development programs in communities across the country. As we evaluate them as part of our over-all review, and if they seem to have real promise, then we will incorporate them in a much larger way.

We are using our job-creation programs that we announced on Monday to provide us with an indicator of where we might go to deal with contemporary and future problems in the employment field. It is all designed to come up with an answer which I hope will provide us with good strategies that will be useful for the next eight to ten years.

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister made a mistake. I think he said that he had increased the funds to Indians for their economic development by 50 per cent. Did I hear correctly? If that is what he said, he might wish to change it. Also, before we move on, I wonder if the minister would care to clarify why the things he just finished saying were not in his statement on Monday?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North has the floor. The minister will have an opportunity to make comments. It seems to me that it is a comment rather than a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: I thought the minister might want to correct the statement about Indians in particular.

Mr. Orlikow: It has been said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. After listening to the minister, I would suggest the road to hell also is paved with past studies. This country has been buried in studies done at the federal, provincial, and municipal levels. While I will be happy to act on that new parliamentary committee, task force, or whatever its title will be, I do not believe that there are any new ideas. I agree with the minister that very few people predicted in advance the intensity of the recession we are in now. But we have known for a number of years some of the fundamental problems we have in the country. These are problems which developed not while the minister was in office but while his party and his colleagues were in office.

Let me list some of those problems very quickly. I know we will have lots of time to discuss them on other occasions. It is now obvious, as many people have been pointing out for years, that our whole industrial strategy, or lack of strategy, has meant that our major manufacturing organizations, which are Canadian subsidiaries of multinational corporations, have been geared not to be so efficient that they are able to compete for their share of the market not just in Canada but on the international level. The result is that they are now being battered and destroyed, not only for international markets but right here in Canada. The Liberal government of the past has done nothing for that.

Despite the fact we are spending, as the minister said, over $800 million a year on manpower training, we see a very strange and sad situation on one end. I look at what is needed in the way of skilled workers, and I refer the minister to a study which was done by machinery manufacturers in Ontario. I know the minister must have seen the study which shows that the bulk of skilled tradesmen, machinists, tool and die makers, and electricians are now well over 40 years of age. We have recruited most of these skilled people in the past from other countries, despite the billions of dollars we spend on manpower training. They are not coming to this country now, and I say to the minister that the training programs he announced will only train several hundred people, when in fact we need thousands, or several tens of thousands of people.

We are not even beginning to do the job. There is nowhere we can see that more vividly than in the minister's and my city of Winnipeg. It has been estimated by educators in Canada that three million people, speaking from memory, but I think, if anything, I am underestimating, in this country are functionally illiterate.

We have noted in the city of Winnipeg the movement of native people from their reserves to the city, as well as to the city of Regina and others. They feel they will be better living in the cities than on the reserves where they were born. Their educational level is so bad they do not fit into the program being offered at the present time by our community colleges and manpower training schools.

What has been the response of the minister's department in recent years? Has it been increasing the money so that those people who are functionally illiterate can take courses? The answer is no; in fact it has been doing exactly the opposite. I wish the minister would scale down the kinds of speeches he makes and give us some solid facts.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I want to say how important this employment tax credit bill is, though it has its limitations in the rural and remote areas of our country. I was pleased when the minister announced his employment strategy last Monday that he included a number of programs such as the Youth Employment Program and the Canada Community Development Program, with an indication that there would be some $120 million for funding.

There are a couple of things I would like to know about this Community Development Program. First, will the assistance be given in terms of money for materials for the construction of projects? As most hon. members know, a number of these programs like Canada Works and the Local Initiatives Program have been going on for the past several years in many communities, especially rural and native, where many of the projects have involved no capital investment and have been completed. These communities are now moving on to more sophisticated things like the construction of buildings, wharves, parks and so on. These require some capital investment.

Following along with what I think the minister has in mind, that the projects have a long-term development advantage, I am interested in knowing whether there will be funds provided over and above those provided under the Canada Works Program, I believe something like $30 per man-week, for materials and overhead costs. Will additional funds be provided for native groups and other small rural communities which do not have the financial wherewithal to provide materials for long-term facilities?

In this regard there has been an excellent working relationship with the Small Craft Harbours Branch of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, at least in the Great Lakes region and in central Canada, where that branch of that department of government has provided material costs for repairing wharves, the development of marinas and so on. Has the minister made any arrangement for that kind of funding to be provided through that department, or is there a mutual agreement in this regard? If that is not the case I hope the minister will make representations to that department to obtain those funds. It is fine to have funds for labour under a community development project, but if there are no materials at the local level then these projects simply cannot go forward. I should like to know whether that arrangement has been made, or if in fact his department is providing additional funding.

I was very pleased to note in the minister's statement on Monday that he will be establishing a local economic development assistance program, LEDA. When this program was cancelled last summer by the former government we in fact had two local economic development groups in the Algoma constituency, one on Manitoulin Island and one on the North Shore, traditionally two of the highest unemployment areas, that were considering the establishment of local economic development corporations.

How soon will the minister establish these 15 or 18 pilot projects, and will the concept be the same as that proposed by the department a little over a year ago when it suggested that there be a fund of up to $250,000 per year provided to the LEDA corporations, part of which could be used for administration, perhaps $100,000, with $150,000 for equity investment, loans, advances and so on in order to establish these local economic development corporations?

It seems to me this would really provide a tremendous stimulus of opportunity for the local communities to band together to achieve something. In my constituency they have already established this kind of association of municipalities, but they do not have the funds to seek out prospective industries or develop indigenous industry in the area.

I hope this program will go forward and will not get bogged down in a lot of red tape as happened a year ago when there was an effort to make it completely acceptable to the provinces. Sometimes you have to move ahead and try the project rather than sit and wait until every "t" is crossed and every "i" dotted by provincial governments, because their objectives in creating employment are not always identical to those of the federal Department of Employment and Immigration.

I hope the minister will be able to give us some indication of how soon and what form these LEDA corporations will take, because I know they are eagerly sought after by groups like the Manitoulin Economic Development Association and the North Shore Economic Development Association, both of which have already been established but do not have the kind of funding this concept would provide.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for Algoma I would like to indicate that the amount of capital that will be available to each project will be quite a limited amount. We would like to use the greatest proportion of the money for employment, the actual labour aspect of the project itself.

What I can indicate to him is that we have had discussions with a number of federal departments—the hon. member referred to Fisheries and Oceans—and we will work out combinations. If federal departments want to undertake some capital works projects, the individual department will put up the capital and we will put up the employment money. This is why we are trying to decentralize it in each region so if there is a wharf project, or a special capital works project that Fisheries and Oceans or Public Works might wish to carry out, we will be able to combine our efforts and give it priority.

I think it is incumbent upon members of Parliament, who see the kinds of priorities in their areas, to develop that kind of a project and approach the minister who has the capital side of it, and we will then supply the labour side. I think that is the way we will work those projects.

I should also indicate to the hon. member that, contrary to the last phase of Canada Works, we will be applying development money in each constituency. There will be a base allocation and we will then add to that, based upon unemployment figures, an additional amount; the higher the unemployment figures and the labour surplus the more money will be put into the constituency. In addition, we will put special criteria in for native unemployment. As a result, in an area like the hon. member's there will be a special allocation based upon native unemployment.

As for the LEDA program, I should say it is a program about which I am personally excited. I think it may provide one of the answers to long-term unemployment problems in Canada, helping small communities and others to develop an economic base of growth.

I see that you are going to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman. We will continue this dialogue another day.

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY CONSERVATION—INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATIVE ACTION PROPOSED

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, on May 26 and May 27 I asked some questions of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) regarding certain documents which I had in my possession, one a confidential document from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources policy and analysis sector, and the other a transcript of an interview with the assistant deputy minister of energy, Mr. Clark. These statements were of concern to me because of the obvious problems which were noted in those documents with regard to the department wanting to get the nation off oil and on to other non-renewable energy sources.

At the same time they were considering that policy they were saying that they could not have two policies, one dealing with getting the nation off oil and one dealing with conservation of energy. The minister said that he was not aware of those statements within his department, and that is why I wanted to carry this debate on more fully this evening. I want to quote some of the statements which were made within these documents. One is from a source within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which states that:

—policy rationale within EMR is getting narrower and narrower. The decision-making balance is off keel. Though conservation will still make advances, the heavy emphasis on off-oil has gone beyond what reasonable economic analysis would allow.

Mr. Clark, the assistant deputy minister, stated in response to that:

—you don't want to give the public too many confusing signals so you really have to decide whether you are telling them to get off oil or are you telling them to conserve energy.

That does not show much faith in the intelligence of the Canadian people. He goes on to say:

Since in the short run what we really want them to do is to get off oil, we ought to concentrate our communications efforts on getting them off oil rather than conserving energy.

This is of deep concern to me because there is such a quick and cheap supply of energy available to Canada through the conservation policy. When the assistant deputy minister makes statements like this, it makes me wonder about the policies of the department.

Mr. Clark goes on to say:

—it would be nice to conserve all sorts of energy but it does seem to me—at least my advertising people tell me—

Is the department now considering its policy through its advertising department? Mr. Clark goes on:

—that it is difficult if the public gets different messages. So our conservation campaign concentrates on saying let's conserve oil. First get off oil. Then start to conserve—

Those statements are astonishing. One of the bureaucrats in the department said in response:

The feds have very little money yet they are going to spend it on substituting to another non-renewable fuel.

This document states that the off-oil policy is to get people off oil and onto natural gas, which is fine if we are prepared for that kind of program. The bureaucrat went on to say:

This will not result in much public confidence. But Clark doesn't know how to grapple with substitution to conservation and renewables.

The minister must get a hold on his department. If these kinds of statements are coming from the assistant deputy minister and are being contradicted by other officials in other sectors of the department, then how will this minister receive the proper advice which he needs from his department from time to time? I think he must get control of that department and tell them, as he told me in this House, that his policy is contrary to that and that he is concerned about conservation.

● (2205)

This government does not have a very good record in that area, Mr. Speaker. The report of the International Energy Agency of 1976 concluded that Canada's conservation record, over all, was one of the worst in the world. Our consumption of oil and natural gas per capita is the highest in the world. This waste of energy is costing us billions of dollars per year. If we could just get ourselves into a conservation frame of mind we could save hundreds of thousands of barrels of oil per day.

The Conservative party policy was to reduce consumption of oil and gas, or energy generally, by a 2 per cent factor per year but it seems as if the factor for this government as expressed in their document "Energy Conservation in Canada" is a 3.5 per cent increase per year. Between 1975 and 1990 the difference between the 2 per cent and 3.5 per cent factors would be from 482,000 to 600,000 barrels of oil per day. We just cannot overlook that, Mr. Speaker, and we must get serious about our conservation policy.

Through CHIP and by insulating the 70 per cent to 90 per cent of homes that are insulatable, by 1990 we could save another 104,000 barrels per day. There are many other ways that we could save on the energy that is necessary to meet our demands, through conservation programs in the coming years. I think the minister should answer my questions and tell us how serious he is about conservation.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's support for the conservation efforts being made or planned by Canadians, including the federal government. There can be no question of the commitment of Canadians to conserving energy. The challenge is to find how all Canadians can be assisted in realizing that commitment.

A variety of steps are being taken to help Canadians achieve our conservation goals. The few minutes available to me this evening are obviously insufficient to do anything more than note a few of these, but if the hon. member would like more details I shall be pleased to provide them to him.

The hon. member has inquired about legislation to promote conservation. As was set out in the Speech from the Throne, legislation will be brought forward soon to set mandatory efficiency fuel standards for automobiles, and our highly successful Canadian Home Insulation Program, CHIP, will be further improved.

With regard to co-operation with the provinces in conservation measures, in recent weeks the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) signed two federal-provincial agreements on energy conservation with the province of Manitoba. Existing agreements with Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have been extended until details are worked out of new agreements which meet the specific needs of those provinces. We have federal-provincial conservation and renewable agreements with all other provinces and territories, and expect that the total expenditure on them will reach well over $200 million in the next four years, of which $114 million will be from the federal treasury.

Co-operation in the private sector has been equally encouraging. Members may be aware that voluntary task forces of business, working with the government, have already made major progress and show every promise of achieving even greater energy savings in the months and years ahead.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should perhaps add that the government itself has a vigorous energy conservation program which has achieved accumulated savings in the past four years of more than $100 million. This is a remarkable achievement, helping to indicate to all Canadians what can be done in this vital area of energy conservation.

EMPLOYMENT—TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this adjournment debate tonight because of increasing dissatisfaction with answers we tend to get from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I hope his parliamentary secretary will be more forthcoming. We had an example of what I mean about eight o'clock this evening which showed the difficulty of getting the minister to respond to questions.

My initial question, and the source of much concern to me tonight, was asked in this House some two weeks ago. At that time I brought to the attention of the minister the fact that there is a morale problem in his department in western Canada. The minister has over 5,000 employees in the four western provinces.

I was informed about mid-April for the first time, and on subsequent occasions by two or three of the minister's officials in his department, that there was a morale problem that was, in part, a consequence of what was reported to be the minister's decision to hire a defeated Liberal candidate from the riding of Calgary West to be a special adviser in the minister's office. Part of the discontent with that decision, which perhaps is not normal that civil servants should be so affected by such an appointment, was caused by the special adviser himself who, on April 7 in an interview conducted by a representative of the Calgary Herald, indicated that he was going to work in the minister's office in Winnipeg effective May 1 at a salary which was "the same as the salary he was receiving in his previous job". In that previous job this special adviser was the president of a small junior college in Calgary. The salary that was paid to him in that position was $50,000 a year.

I rose in the House to point out to the minister that there were morale problems in his department because the top civil servant in each of the four western provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, is classified as an SX-2. The salary range for these experienced people with heavy responsibilities for budget and other staff, begins just a little over $38,000. In this case the minister had appointed somebody without that background, without that experience and without those kinds of responsibilities to provide advice at a salary of some $50,000.

That situation is causing serious morale problems in the west. Those morale problems show themselves at the riding level in decreased service to people. If people do not work for an organization or for a minister in whom they can believe, or who treats his whole department fairly, then their morale goes down and their willingness to serve the Canadian public is adversely affected.

I think it might be in the minister's best interests, or the parliamentary secretary's best interests this evening, that if the minister was correct when he said in the House the other day that the $50,000 salary was not correct, it would be useful to morale in western Canada, if the parliamentary secretary could tell us exactly what that salary is.

All that the minister told us was that the salary was not $50,000. It could be $50,000 and one cent. It could be more than $50,000, it could be less. But I think it would be in the interests of this nation and a service to the people in western Canada if the minister or the parliamentary secretary could be forthcoming and tell us.

A little more than a week later I rose in this House as a consequence of the minister's statement to this House on Monday, and as a consequence of the press reports which followed. We heard a great deal of impressive rhetoric about the minister's concern for jobs for women. In news reports on Tuesday, the day after the minister's announcement, the minister was quoted in the press as saying that the program he announced in this House on Monday would create 81,000 jobs total. In that same press report his officials are reported as saying that the announcements made in the House on the same afternoon would create 31,000 jobs total.

The minister handed us background papers on that same day. If one was to total up all the subparts, they indicate that 192,000 jobs were created. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could take this occasion this evening to tell us whether there were 31,000 jobs created, 81,000 jobs created, or 192,000 jobs created. However, the really important part of that question is the fact that in the minister's background paper he estimates that of the jobs created, and it does not matter whether we are talking about the 31,000, 81,000 or 192,000, 12,200 of those will be filled by women. That is a number that almost boggles my mind, if I may use that expression. Whether it is 31,000, 81,000 or 192,000, 12,200 jobs is considerably less than half.

• (2215)

The minister has repeatedly stated that he cares about women and the employment opportunities available to them. Possibly the parliamentary secretary can tell us whether the minister will consider that whole job-creation package with a view to putting in some rules, regulations and procedures that will guarantee that at least half of the created jobs go to women. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can give us an answer to that.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly give an answer to the second part of the question, but I remind the hon. member of the motion before us. Your Honour read it at five o'clock:

> It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:—
> Employment—Training Programs for Women.

I do not know about the morale of employees in western Canada. I do not know about the problem the hon. member raised concerning the salary of the personnel concerned. What I had was a question concerned the training of women. That I will deal with.

I have to tell the hon. member that if he wants us to co-operate with him as far as Standing Order 40 is concerned, he will have to co-operate with us. He wants us to carry out research in order to answer his questions. He knows that we only have three minutes in which to give an answer.

The hon. member talked about questions raised in three different question periods. They had nothing to do with the Standing Order 40 debate this evening. If the hon. member wants us to co-operate, we will be glad to do that. As I said, we have three minutes to answer. Therefore, we will need to have the same co-operation from him.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if we add to the existing employment and training programs those announced on June 2, we note that more than 183,000 women will receive training or find employment this year.

However, more than figures are involved, interesting though they might be. The announcement of June 2 emphasized the proposed reorientation of the program, which will not only provide opportunities for women, but will also offer them other benefits.

For the first time in their history, Canadian women will be offered assistance in the form of on-the-job training in types of work traditionally reserved for men, where salaries are generally higher. Employers will receive a training grant of about 25 per cent more to train a woman for a non-traditional job rather than for a traditional job. Post-secondary graduates will be encouraged to use their skills in stimulating professions in research and development and in applying technological innovations in areas such as energy conservation and the development of manufacturing processes.

These programs, and especially the community services projects element, will be a useful tool for those who have difficulty in finding employment or rejoining the labour market. As everyone knows, these people are mostly women.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the programs announced on June 2 are truly innovative both in their orientation and in their approach and will offer immediately to women an income and opportunities through training and job creation. These programs are an essential step toward the development of a framework which will enable more women to be active on the labour market, and this in a greater variety of jobs and a more meaningful manner. These programs reflect a new orientation and a new initiative. With the co-operation of the private sector and non-profit organizations, they represent one more tool to help women reach their potential on the labour market, and if what we hope comes true, there is every reason to believe that they will be substantially extended in the years to come.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—MEDICARE PROGRAM—ANNOUNCED INCREASES IN PREMIUMS BY BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for taking the trouble tonight to show up personally to answer the question I raised the other day about medicare in British Columbia.

Some say that most modern medical practices are some combination of band-aiding and pill-pushing, and criticize them on the ground that we tend to treat symptoms rather than causes. That may be true, that may be our emphasis, but that is not really the point. The point is that we are constantly hearing people complain about the soaring costs of health care. They seldom consider, though, the cost of being sick, and fail to recognize that a healthy society is money saved. I do not think the minister falls into that category, but there was a long and bitter fight to establish medicare in this country, and when we see evidence that it is being eroded, some of us are extremely alarmed. I know this feeling is shared by the minister.

I raise this matter because the spiralling health costs of the last few years have prompted certain provinces, which now have the right through certain legislation which was brought about in 1977, to deflect money normally going to medicare to other provincial priorities. Consequently, more and more of the costs of medical care and health care generally are being loaded upon the consumer of health care, often the old and the sick, and they are often one and the same. As a matter of fact the troika of being old, sick, and poor is not at all uncommon in this country. Sure, there should be more money going into preventive medicine, into more training in terms of improved lifestyles and into advice about fitness and all the rest of it. Nevertheless, whatever the failings of medicare may be in this country, most of us are extremely grateful that we have it, and we are extremely concerned if there are indications that we might lose it.

Some people say medicare costs too much. The most recent figures I have indicate that it costs about 7 per cent of our gross national product. That is a pretty fair chunk of money in this country, but in the United States there is only private medical care, and it is a tragedy to be sick in the United States. A lifetime of savings go down the drain if you are sick in the United States. The cost of medical care there is 9 per cent of the U.S. gross national product, so ours is better, cheaper, and the envy of North America.

In my question the other day I asked if the minister would get in touch with the government of British Columbia and tell that government that its regressive, reactionary increases announced recently by the British Columbia minister of health are unacceptable to the minister because they offend the guidelines of accessibility and comprehensiveness outlined in the principles of national health care.

I would like to quote some of the figures which I read and which are associated with the costs announced. According to the Vancouver Sun of May 30, "Monthly medical premiums will be increased approximately 15 per cent". That does not perhaps seem alarming, except when you recall that it is 15 per cent on top of an already large increase. From 1974 to 1978 British Columbia premiums went up 50 per cent per family of four. British Columbia is not alone. In Ontario between 1974 and 1978 premiums went up 80 per cent. In Quebec they went up 88 per cent. In Alberta they went up 33 per cent.

As my party predicted during the debate on the established programs financing bill, money would be diverted, but we thought it would be the poorer provinces which would do the diverting. However, it has not been that way at all. It has been the more affluent provinces. So, naturally, we are alarmed.

To get back to the increases contemplated:

—$8.50 from $7.50 for a single person, to $17.50 from $15 for a couple and to $21.25 from $18.75 for a family.

Then there are increases for ambulances and daily charges for daily visits as well.

● (2225)

What I attempted to do in my question was to provide the minister with some impetus, some encouragement to let the province of British Columbia know how the federal minister, who is responsible for three-quarters of a billion dollars in health care, more accurately $750 million or so each year, or $778.8 million which was the figure I received from the minister's own department feels about increased user charges. During the campaign, and at the medicare conference on November 5, 1979, the minister said:

I see now that two years ago when block funding for health care was instituted, the well-intentioned gamble has backfired.

At the same conference she went on to say:

Notice should be given of the commutation of block funding and the renegotiation of cost-sharing arrangements with the provinces. The federal government must re-establish control of the medicare program. That is the official policy of the Liberal Party of Canada.

She went on to say in Winnipeg, during the campaign, on January 21, 1980:

The federal government has the right to stop medicare financing if residents are not getting reasonable care when they need it.

She also said:

Opting out is a threat to universal accessibility when doctors "balance" or "extra bill" their patients.

These are all things that have come about in provinces which are putting the lid on health care. We have had all kinds of labour strife with health care workers, doctors and nurses in the richest parts of this country, and that is why I want the minister to remember it was a Liberal bill, this Established Programs Financing Act. It was designed by the Liberal government to put a cap on federal spiralling medicare costs. She should not wait for the Hall report, but let the provinces know that the way they are proceeding is completely unacceptable to the basic principles of medicare.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I have noted the action of the British Columbia government in increasing user charges under its hospital insurance plan and in increasing the premiums charged for coverage under its medical care insurance plan. What is most disturbing is that such increases and charges are not in the spirit or faith of medicare, which is free, good quality services to people wherever they live in Canada, in whatever province, and regardless of their income.

At the outset let me say that while I personally dislike very much these types of charges and the increases which are to commence on July 1, 1980, and I especially dislike the premium system which unfortunately is used in British Columbia and two other provinces in Canada, because premiums represent a regressive form of taxation, I must inform hon. members that, based on the information received, there is no action that the federal government can take immediately, such as withholding payment, and I will explain why.

Withholding payments can be done. It is the only tool provided in the legislation, a tool for the control of the use of the funds, but it can only be done based on the evidence that one or more of the five conditions is violated—the five principles on which medicare is based. I suppose it is fair to say that these principles or conditions are extremely general concepts and we are now faced with the problem in many provinces, unfortunately, where actions in the last two years, often in the last year and a half—unfortunately that is the case in British Columbia right now—may be breaching this concept, but withholding payment would cause a disruption of service to the people.

The previous government did appoint Mr. Justice Hall to make an inquiry which he will be completing, with recommendations, in a few weeks' time. There will just be the problem of translation left to finalize the inquiry and the publication of the report, and then I think it will be very urgent for all of us to make a great effort to save medicare, which I am sure we will do.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

REQUEST BUDGET BE TRANSFERRED TO NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL OR UNIVERSITY RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the Ministry of State for Science and Technology was created nine years ago and since then, according to figures just released, the research and development performance of Canada has gone from deplorable to disastrous, notwithstanding that six different Liberal ministers have each made vigorous and, I am sure, sincere statements about their government's commitment to improving this deplorable situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Ministry of State for Science and Technology be disbanded and its budget turned over to the National Research Council or to university research, since this is apparently the only manner in which this ministry can tangibly increase the R and D efforts of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

CONGRATULATIONS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SCIENTISTS FOR DEVELOPING TELIDON SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House congratulate federal government scientists for developing and selling the Telidon system in the United States, and urge that the Government of Canada establish a Crown corporation to build and market Telidon systems for sale throughout the world, rather than selling it off to the private sector, since it was the public that assumed all the financial risk for Telidon's research and development.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

CRITICISM OF POLICY ON BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the stated intentions of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to rescind orders in council 1980-83 and 1980-84 which preserve some 30 branch lines in the prairie provinces that are necessary to serve the needs of the producers and the grain elevator companies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Minister of Transport, the Liberal cabinet and the New Democratic Party, particularly the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, be condemned for wanton disregard and disrespect for the producers and communities affected and, further, deplores another obvious attack upon western Canada at a time when conciliation and co-operation are so vital to preserving the fabric of this nation.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Andre: The NDP said "No", Madam Speaker; they are attacking the west.

BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT—IRREVERSIBLE DAMAGE TO WESTERN AGRICULTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the stated intentions of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to rescind orders in council PC 1980-83 and PC 1980-84, which will place ever-increasing hardships on about 7,500 prairie farmers and cause irreversible damage and disrupt the planning and marketing strategy of every grain elevator company in western Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House condemns the Minister of Transport, his ineffectual assistant in the other place, the President of the Treasury Board, along with the New Democratic Party of Canada, for their deliberate disregard and lack of compassion for the people of western Canada which they purport to represent.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MARINE TRANSPORT

REQUEST "SAMSON V" CONTINUE SERVICE ON FRASER RIVER, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the tradition of long, useful service provided to the Fraser River by the sternwheel steamer Samson V which contributes to the safety of all marine traffic in the harbour of New Westminster and on the lower Fraser, and in view of the fact that 14 jobs will be lost if the Samson V is put out of service, this being the intention of the Department of Public Works, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House instruct the Minister of Public Works to take steps immediately to ensure that the Samson V continue its important work of ensuring safety on the Fraser River and, therefore, that the Samson V be continued in active service.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEST WISHES TO FIRST MINISTERS IN UPCOMING DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter which I am sure will gain the support of all members of this House.

On Monday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will meet with the provincial premiers to discuss matters relating to our constitution. In view of the fact that the recent referendum in Quebec resulted in a vote of confidence for renewed federalism in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That this House convey its best wishes to all the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister in the hope that, through serious consideration and compromise and in a spirit of co-operation, progress can be achieved toward a renewal of the Canadian federation.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

DELAY IN PAYING BENEFITS—CRITICISM OF COMPUTER PROGRAMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I would like to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Given the fact that since the Canada Pension Plan changed over to a new computer, the programming and operation of that computer system has been so badly devised that civil servants with many years experience are quitting their jobs in despair of ever getting the program back on track, and the fact that these departures are compounding an already untenable situation so that even routine applications under the Canada Pension Plan are taking upward of six months to process, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urge the responsible minister to immediately facilitate the processing of Canada Pension Plan applications by swift and judicious means, so that widows and orphans will not suffer unnecessarily at the whims of a machine.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF M.V. "PATRICIA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, presumably with the advice of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) or the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), made a dramatic seizure of the motor vessel Patricia and its cargo of 22 tons of marijuana and arrested its crew off the coast of Nova Scotia.

Reports that the action may have been unlawful are supported by the return of the master to his U.S. residence without a Canadian criminal charge being laid, the transportation home of the Columbia crew at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer, and the disappearance from public view of the illicit cargo valued at $50 million. To protect the interests of the officers involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That this House direct the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice to report on all aspects of the seizure on May 31, 1980, of the MV Patricia, the arrest of the crew and confiscation of the illicit cargo.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON UPGRADING AND EXTENSION OF CERTAIN LINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The urgency arises from the fact that the governments of Canada and British Columbia have agreed on a deadline of June 10 to arrive at a decision with regard to sharing the costs of certain rail extensions and upgrading of facilities in connection with the delivery to export markets of coal from northeastern British Columbia. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

● (1115)

That the Minister of Transport avail himself on the first opportunity under the rules of the House to make a statement with respect to any federal participation toward the upgrading and extension of certain BCR rail lines, the upgrading of certain sections of the CNR and the improvement of port facilities on the west coast, all designed to meet the objections of delivering and handling coal for export from northeastern British Columbia to tidewater.

STATISTICS CANADA

MODIFICATION OF LEGISLATION TO PRESERVE RIGHT TO PRIVACY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the proposal by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to sell information collected by Statistics Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That the legislation forcing Canadians to provide information to Statistics Canada be modified and that the Liberal government be condemned for unilaterally proposing such an invasion of Canadian privacy.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

CONDEMNATION OF SUGGESTION TO ABOLISH INDEXATION OF PERSONAL TAX

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Finance). The Minister has stated that Canadians face a 50-50 chance of losing the indexation on their personal income tax this year. The finance critic for the NDP has said that they oppose indexing, in any event.

The tax expert, Mr. John Bossons of Toronto, has said that abolishing indexing would "hit low income people the hardest, and harder every year after the first year". He says that a one-worker family with two young children, earning a taxable income of $10,000, would have a 31.3 per cent tax increase this year, while a taxpayer with an income of $40,000 would have an increase of only 4.5 per cent.

In view of these facts, would the minister now assure the Canadian people, and particularly low-income taxpayers, that the government will not abolish or interfere in any way with the indexation of the personal income tax this year or in any year in the future?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, at this time of year there is naturally a great deal of speculation on the various measures that the Minister of Finance will take at budget time. All I can tell the hon. member is that this issue is of great concern to the Minister of Finance but he has taken no decision on the matter. As is customary, when a decision is made, the minister will certainly not announce it during question period but rather during the budget speech.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear that the minister is a little less positive. A few days ago he said it was a 50-50 chance and his minister has said it is a probability. Mr. Robert Brown, of Price Waterhouse, calls the suggestion "the most retrogressive step in Canada taxation in 25 years".

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Crosbie: Members opposite seem very anxious to have me put my question and get this over with. The Prime Minister has said that a Liberal government would make the tax system more equitable. That was a promise he made on January 12, 1980, in Toronto—that his party would make the tax system more equitable if they were returned to power.

How can the government now contemplate de-indexing personal income tax? Is this to make the tax system more equitable, as the Prime Minister promised, or is it another promise which has been cast aside by the Liberals now that they are back in power?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I think the issue is serious enough to warrant more than impassioned rhetoric. The Minister of Finance is considering ways and means to make the system much more equitable. As I have indicated, these are just speculations, hypotheses, and the Minister of Finance will make decisions which will continue to honour the promises and commitments made by the Liberal Party of Canada and this government, and those decisions will be aimed at making the tax system much more equitable.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, we had an underhanded election campaign, an underhanded budget, and now we are getting an underhanded tax increase. The Prime Minister said in Toronto on January 12, 1980, that he had five main thrusts if he were re-elected. The fifth was to protect low and middle-income Canadians "by helping first those who most need assistance". Is he going to do this by putting the blocks to the low income taxpayers so that they get an increase this year of 30 per cent in their income tax, while the higher-income taxpayer will have an increase of 4.5 per cent?

• (1120)

Is this the way the minister is studying to carry out the main thrust of the Prime Minister, or has the Prime Minister's promise been forgotten altogether by the Department of Finance?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, save for a short interruption the Liberal Party has been governing the country for several years and since our return to power we have shown not only to the hon. member but to the entire country that we are keeping the promises and commitments made by our party leader and the government will continue to honour its commitments.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INDEXATION AND TAX INCREASE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, we can certainly see that, among other things, the truth is not highly valued in St. John's West in representing the positions of other parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not here to answer this question, but I will put it to the associate minister of finance. In all the speculation that has arisen over the past two weeks concerning the government's position on indexation and a tax increase, is it their view that there is excess demand in the economy at the present time?

Also, is it the government's view that when the economy is heading into a recession is the best time to bring in a massive tax increase which will affect all Canadians? Is that the government's new economic policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the member would like to obtain an answer which would conciliate inconsistent factors. First, the question refers to a recession and to pressures on demand. It is quite obvious that the recession in the United States is not felt in the same way as in Canada and that pressures on demand are stronger here, according to the indications now available to us. It also refers to tax increases in a very difficult period and the speculations which are beginning to spread on tax increases are more specifically related to another problem which is also the basic concern of the government, namely the reduction of the deficit. Those matters must not be considered singly but as a whole and we should not try to conciliate inconsistent factors but rather take the best steps in accordance with a comprehensive picture of the economy.

[English]

Mr. Rae: A supplementary question to the minister, Madam Speaker. It is a novel approach, that the time you start bringing in tax increases is the time the economy is heading into a tailspin. That is novel economics.

Will the minister give the House the commitment that a cost of living tax credit scheme, which will give the most benefit to Canadians who earn the least, will be provided in the budget, that there will be a budget—

Mr. Crosbie: There was one in the last budget.

Mr. Rae: —and that there will be a commitment from this government that there will be no net increase in personal taxes for those Canadians who can afford it least?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I feel that this government's concern for the needy is evident. A few weeks ago this Parliament was called upon to approve a $35 increase to the GIS, which I feel is an indication of the government's concern for the small wage earner.

The hon. member is seeking from the Minister of Finance during oral question period a commitment with regard to budgetary legislation. This is not our custom and, as I have already indicated, the Minister of Finance will continue to protect those whom Liberals have always tried to protect, that is the needy within our society, and he will make public his decisions during his budget speech.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR

CONSTRUCTION OF REFINERY IN BLIND RIVER—FINANCING THEREOF

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister announced last month his decision to force Eldorado Nuclear to build a refinery in Blind River. This decision was made without prior consultation with the board of directors of Eldorado, against the recommendations of the management and the directors of the company, and reversed the decision of the previous government.

Given the fact that the cost to the company of the minister's decision will be in the vicinity of $60 million, given the fact that the company is 100 per cent government owned, and that the company has been forced to borrow money on private markets to cover its capital costs, would the minister—at least in the interest of honesty—effect the transfer of moneys involved from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to Eldorado in order that the accounts of the government would reflect the true costs of this blatant Liberal patronage?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I regret to inform the hon. member that he is misinformed as usual. First, I did consult the board of directors before announcing the decision.

An hon. Member: We know what your definition is.

An hon. Member: Consult?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, I did consult them.

An hon. Member: You told them.

Mr. Lalonde: I met with them, but the decision was a government decision. I indicated that the government made that decision on the basis of fairness and on the basis of helping a region that needed help.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Then let the blue book reflect that.

Mr. Lalonde: Second, as far as additional cost is concerned, the hon. member may speculate on increases, but I have indicated that the cost would increase by moving the refinery in northern Ontario. This was made as a definite government policy decision to the effect that we should be ready to incur additional costs and, as I said, to bring jobs to areas where in good part the raw material is found.

As far as the request for additional financing by Eldorado is concerned, that request and plan was made and was in the works before the decision to move the refinery to Port Hope was taken. It was a decision independent of the decision to open a new refinery in Blind River rather than in Port Hope. It is a totally different situation. In any event, Eldorado needed additional financing for its capital expansion. The company proposed to take that decision, and I am very glad that they have been successful in arranging the financing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the mere fact that Eldorado is now scurrying around trying to rationalize the unfortunate decision imposed upon them by the minister in setting up a sort of Mickey Mouse operation in Blind River, and reversing, in effect, the decision of the minister is an indication of whether or not there was adequate consultation or any consultation at all.

The minister's parliamentary secretary indicated last week that it was not the policy of this government to interfere with the affairs of Crown corporations and that they would act independently. Would the minister now stand in his place to either repudiate his parliamentary secretary and indicate that he was wrong in that assessment, or will he tell us whether or not he will allow Eldorado to make decisions in their best interests under their mandate, and not continue to interfere? Also, will he indicate that the policy is not to get involved in the management of Crown corporations under his jurisdiction?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am afraid, again, that the Mickey Mouse is not in Blind River but comes from Saskatoon West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Watch out, Pinocchio.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the question of the hon. member is concerned, I want to assure him—I have stated it quite clearly in this House—that the job of the minister is not to second-guess management decisions, but there are government responsibilities that have to be fulfilled.

Mr. Andre: At least blush when you say that.

Mr. Lalonde: When the government decides, for policy reasons, to vary a decision by any corporation, the government makes it publicly and takes responsibility for it. This is what we have done in the case of the refinery that is being opened in Blind River. We are very proud of that decision. We think it is the right one. I am very happy, also, to endorse the plans of the corporation to expand and modify its operations in Port Hope, which will ensure that Port Hope will have a very active operation in the next few years.

● (1130)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my final supplementary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In light of the cost—some $60 million—to the taxpayers of Canada for government patronage, which is about one-half the cost of the total program announced by the minister this week with respect to employment, has the minister discussed with his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, whether this money would be better applied to employment programs for the people of this country, particularly women and native people? Is he going to allow himself and the cabinet to be pushed around by the Pinocchio of Canadian politics?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, not only have I discussed this matter with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources; I have also had the benefit of constant consultation with my seatmate, the Minister of State for Mines, who has assured me on many occasions that the move of Eldorado mines is one of the long-term employment developments that will assist northern Ontario, which is one of the regions needing a high degree of employment.

Furthermore, one of the conditions attached to the move was that there be a major program of employment of native people in northern Ontario. We can thank the Minister of State for Mines for that particular intervention. I think we will see very productive results in a very short period of time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ELDORADO NUCLEAR—COMPENSATION FROM CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who has been given responsibility by the Prime Minister for devising a Crown corporations' policy for this government.

The President of the Treasury Board will know that Bill C-27 introduced by the previous government provided for corporations which had been issued directives by the federal cabinet to be able to apply for compensation from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the cost of those directives. Will the minister indicate whether that continues to be the policy of the Government of Canada, and will Eldorado Nuclear be able to apply to the Government of Canada to receive compensation for this patronage decision that was made by the federal government?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the whole area of Crown corporations' legislation is under review.

An hon. Member: No kidding!

Mr. Johnston: The hon. gentleman laughs. There is good reason for it to be under review, as the hon. member knows. Many suggestions and modifications have been put forward with respect to Bill C-27. I hope to bring forward a discussion paper and, hopefully, some legislation will be brought down in the relatively near future.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, my question is a very straightforward one. Will Eldorado Nuclear be able to apply to the Government of Canada for compensation as a result of this patronage directive which was issued to it by the Government of Canada? Does the government intend to incorporate in any subsequent legislation respecting Crown corporations the right of Crown corporations to apply for that sort of compensation?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it seems that my answer was very straightforward.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: The provision to which the hon. member is referring is not in the law at the present time. Obviously, that bill and its provisions are being reconsidered. Accordingly, when the bill is brought down, whatever Crown corporations are subject to directives from the government will have the opportunity of taking advantage of whatever provisions the bill contains.

INDUSTRY

UNITED STATES REGULATIONS ON URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister is no doubt aware that there are regulations in the United States which effectively exclude exporters of urban transit facilities from access to that market.

Is the minister aware, specifically, that Flyer Coach of Manitoba, a successful corporation, is now considering establishing a plant in North Dakota, thus moving Canadian jobs south, because of these U.S. regulations? If so, what is he doing to get them changed?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have been working actively with American officials to reach agreement to change these regulations. In view of the case brought to my attention by my hon. friend, I will instruct our officials to expedite these discussions.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, this problem has existed for many years, before the Liberals were in power. We have successful urban transit companies such as Bombardier, Hawker Siddeley, as well as Flyer Coach. We have a multibillion dollar trade deficit in manufactured goods every year with the United States. When will the government be able to announce to Canada that we are to have fair access to the United States for manufactured goods, just as they have to our markets?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we will make the announcement as soon as we have the right type of agreement for Canadian workers and the Canadian economy.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, with this government we can wait forever for that announcement. Since success with the American government on this matter will depend ultimately on their decision, I would like to ask the minister a question with regard to this government's promises that we heard so much about earlier in the question period.

Since the Liberals promised to provide assistance in the way of funds for urban transit to Canadian municipalities, will the minister now assure the House that they will implement that promise, so that cities from Vancouver in the west to St. John's in the east will at least have money with which to buy urban transit facilities that are produced in Canada?

Mr. Gray: This is an important point, Madam Speaker. I will be discussing it with my colleagues, the Minister of Transport and the minister responsible for urban affairs.

AIR TRANSPORT

STATUS OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION DECISION ON HALIFAX-TORONTO ROUTE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, who I believe is also the acting prime minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Acting is right.

Mr. Crosby: The minister is aware of the decision made on April 9 of this year by the Canadian Transport Commission, whereby CP Air was granted permission to serve the Halifax-Toronto route and Eastern Provincial Airways was denied access to the same route.

The Toronto Globe and Mail said the decision demonstrated an "utterly lazy incomprehension of Canada's problems" and should be overturned by the cabinet. Will the minister confirm that the decision has been appealed, and to what authority? Will he also indicate when any such appeal will be heard and determined, and what considerations will be involved in the appeal process?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can answer this question in part, for sure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: First, one's view on the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission on this matter depends very much upon which region of Canada he comes from. I have heard varied views on the subject; some totally opposed, in fact.

Second, this decision has been appealed to cabinet, to the Minister of Transport. Third, all documents relevant to this appeal will, I believe, be filed by June 16. A decision by cabinet will then be made on the subject one way or the other.

Mr. Crosby: The minister referred to the views of the people in Atlantic Canada. I know he is aware that all four Atlantic premiers supported the position of Eastern Provincial Airways. Most members of Parliament from the Atlantic area, members of the legislatures and even municipal councils supported the position of Eastern Provincial Airways. I would ask the minister what relevance this has to the decision-making process of the Canadian Transport Commission: if they do not pay any attention to these kinds of representations, why do they hear them?

I would, at the same time, ask the minister to indicate if there is anything he can do to stop CP Air advertising the route as though the decision had already been taken on appeal, by advertising new and very competitive rates and the like.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the views of the people of the Atlantic provinces have been taken into consideration by the CTC. These people, in great number, made representations to the CTC. Obviously, they will be taken into account by the government as well in the appeal procedure to which I referred a moment ago. Without appearing to take sides—I would not want to do that at this moment—a number of people from the maritimes have written to me indicating their agreement with the decision. Reference has been made to substantial travel which would take place to the maritimes from western Canada. So it is not a black and white situation, and that is why it will be a difficult decision to make.

TRANSPORT

UPGRADING RAIL AND PORT FACILITIES—COST-SHARING

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question, too, is addressed to the Minister of Transport. It will take him from the east coast to the west coast, where he has spent a lot of time negotiating with the province of British Columbia in an attempt to reach an agreement by June 10 with respect to the improvement of certain infrastructures which will facilitate the transportation of northeast coal to export markets.

Is the minister in a position today to tell the House what assurances he has been able to give the British Columbia government, whose representatives are leaving for Japan to sign coal deals, that the federal government will live up to the commitment made by the former government, namely, to share in the cost of extending certain sections of the British Columbia Railway and upgrading the facilities of the CNR and certain port facilities to bring about these objectives?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am glad it is now recognized that I am doing my job with respect to the west coast. Thank you very much. The situation is this: on May 5 a number of members of this cabinet were in Victoria and had a long discussion with the committee on economic development of that province. At that point, an agreement in principle was reached and a certain sum of money, quite substantial, was left on the table by the federal government.

Following this agreement in principle, however, the government of the province changed its mind with regard to two major aspects of this project. One of them concerns the question of responsibility for putting together, maintaining and operating the transportation of the coal from the mine to the port. Originally, it was supposed to be the BCR; now the government of British Columbia has asked CN to do it, and CN, energetically and valiantly, has agreed to accept this responsibility—in difficult circumstances, it must be said. Using figures which were available, they have tried to put together a package, on which they reported to us yesterday. That package is now being refined, hardened and analysed, and the minister in charge of economic development at the federal level will be in touch with his counterpart in British Columbia in a few days.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DUTY-FREE SHOPS AT BORDER CROSSING POINTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the hon. gentleman advise the House when the administration intends to implement a decision taken many months ago by the previous administration to provide for the opening of duty-free shops at border crossing points with the United States?

Can he advise us that the delay in implementing this decision is a matter of inertia? Or is it the intention to make the announcement with due fanfare about the end of the tourist season?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): I want to thank the hon. member for the question and tell him that the record of this government is certainly not one of inertia, but indeed the opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: We are reviewing the work which was done previously. I doubt there will be substantial change, but there will be some changes. I share the hon. member's concern with regard to bringing forward this policy as soon as possible. I think it is important for business in Canada, particularly the tourist industry, and I hope we can bring forward a policy in the shortest possible time.

Mr. Lambert: Would the minister indicate the area in which revision is required, or is it merely a formality of dotting the "i's" and crossing the "t's" and making some changes for the sake of change in a decision which had been years in preparation, which had involved years of planning and which had been hardened and firmed by the cabinet many months ago?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, particularly in the area of licensing, I want to be assured that the best possible policy is put forward. I hope we shall be in a position very shortly to bring forward that policy.

An hon. Member: The machinery will be good for Liberals.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR VANCOUVER ART GALLERY

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the acting prime minister. Some months ago—in fact, almost a year ago—in the city of Vancouver a number of private citizens raised over $4 million as a contribution to a new art gallery. As a consequence of those funds being raised on the basis that pledges would be sustained as long as the federal government matched them, the Conservative government made a commitment that the money would be available for a new art gallery in Vancouver, which is long overdue. Almost all those who are knowledgeable in this matter, from the east coast to the west coast, have supported and endorsed the object of the exercise in Vancouver.

I want to ask the acting prime minister, or whoever is prepared to answer, whether this commitment which the government I represented made to the city of Vancouver is to be honoured, or whether we must put up with what a Vancouver editorial called the "blackmail argument" put forward by the Secretary of State, that it would only come along if, indeed—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has already put his question.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, speaking today for the Secretary of State, I would reply that the situation of the Vancouver gallery is one of very great concern to us, particularly to me, as I was secretary of state at the time the original discussions took place.

I think it fair to say, Madam Speaker, that as a government we are very anxious to provide what support we can, but it is undoubtedly true that the initiative of the Conservative government in turning over to the provinces essential control of Loto Canada funds has made it much more difficult to respond to the request which was made to us. As you know, Madam Speaker, the question of the status of Loto Canada is one which preoccupies the government at the present time. I simply express the hope that it will be possible at some stage to provide the kind of support which is very much needed in the area. But at the moment—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: I want to ask the hon. member whether it is now the policy of the government, because of changes in the lottery situation, that there is to be no way for something as vital to the cultural community of western Canada as that art gallery.

That is exactly what I started to put to the minister before Your Honour, quite appropriately, I must confess, cut me off. That is the kind of blackmail which the citizens in Vancouver are saying is not satisfactory.

Can the minister tell me whether the proper federal contribution to that art gallery, which is not out of line—it has been done with other cities, and the hon. minister knows it—is going to be stopped because of the change in the lottery situation?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman's words accurately reflect the response I made to him. There used to be a program of capital assistance for a variety of cultural institutions across the country. In my view, regrettably but necessarily in view of past restraint programs, that capital assistance came to an end. It was the hope of the government that the accession of Loto Canada revenues to the federal government would enable the government to support a variety of very useful projects such as the one the hon. member has described.

I do not agree that it is a question of blackmail to simply reiterate the fact that the previous capital funding program disappeared under restraint, and it was hoped to use Loto Canada funds to make up the difference. The fact of the matter is that under the previous Liberal government there was a guarantee of a much stronger flow of funds from Loto Canada to support sports and the arts than could take place as a result of the arrangements which the Conservative government made to turn over the essential direction of Loto Canada to the provinces. That is not a question of blackmail, Madam Speaker; it is a question of the fact.

The decision which the Conservatives took, with whatever purposes in mind, has made it much more difficult to find funds for those purposes. This does not exclude the possibility that other funds may be found, but the action of the Conservative government has made it much more difficult to respond to that kind of request.

MINING

COMPOSITION OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE IN QUEBEC MINE TRAGEDY

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Mines. It arises from remarks made by the minister on May 28 at the annual meeting of the Mining Association of Canada, that she——is prepared to meet with any group from the mining industry, whether they represent industry, the union, or others, to seek ways to make the mining industry a safe and healthy place to work—

In view of her intention to "open the doors to labour", to overcome "insufficient communication" between labour and management in the mining industry, and in view of the minister's recent announcement of the names of those who will serve on the national advisory committee on the mining industry, can the minister tell the House why—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I feel that some preambles are really too long. Would the hon. member come to his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: We are not able to do justice to all members who want to be recognized. It is important that hon. members discipline themselves and not precede their questions with long preambles, especially when they are reading them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I was just about to begin my short question when you rose. Will the minister explain, in light of those remarks, her recent announcement that all those who were serving on the national advisory committee on the mining industry come from the top executive level of management, and there is no one from labour; and will she give a commitment to change that in the next few weeks?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, may I assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that I intend to do just that. I opened the doors to labour just this morning. I spoke with Stewart Cooke, of the United Steelworkers of America—I speak to him on an average of twice a week—and in fact I discussed with him the possibility of including the coal miners from the east coast in some sort of committee in which we can discuss the health and safety of the workers. I intend to pursue it with great vigour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. In the same spirit, and in view of the message just received from the United Steelworkers of America and the Ontario president of Inco regarding the eight miners buried at Val d'Or, Quebec, and in view of the apparent inability or lack of will on the part of the federal government so far to do anything, will the minister now act on this offer of Inco and the Steelworkers and co-ordinate assistance in this emergency? Further, will she undertake to form a standing, mobile national rescue team which can assist in this kind of life and death emergency in the future?

Mrs. Erola: It is just such a discussion that I had this morning with the minister of mines in Quebec, the hon. Mr. Bérubé. He assured me, as the hon. member is aware, that the matter is under provincial jurisdiction, that it is well co-ordinated and that they require at present no additional assistance. We have offered him whatever assistance and expertise is necessary through our department, and we are awaiting the call for help.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS IMPROVE SERVICE IN MARITIMES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the sympathetic Minister of Transport. First, I want to make it clear that I have nothing against EPA flights between Halifax and Toronto. Could the minister assure hon. members from the four Atlantic provinces that he will seek a commitment from EPA to improve their intraregional service, and especially to provide service to the areas of the region which do not have one now?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will add this concern to those I already have.

RAILWAYS

CONSULTATIONS ON QUESTION OF BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Having regard to the minister's intention to rescind orders in council which preserved the status of some 30 branch lines in western Canada, and given the fact that such a decision to preserve these branch lines was taken after full consultation with the elevator companies and the producers involved, may I ask the minister if he has discussed his plan of action with the elevator companies?

Also, can he advise the House whether he consulted the minister in the other place in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Minister of State for Economic Development, since the decision that he is proposing will have a negative impact upon grain producers in western Canada and, indeed, upon the economy of western Canada? If so, do they agree with his proposed course of action?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must say I was surprised to hear this morning that a decision had been made. I was specific in the committee yesterday in saying that this matter was being reviewed.

I have a number of preoccupations of which I spoke yesterday in the committee. The first one is the rising percentage of lines to be rehabilitated and the rising costs that result from it. By this time, with this recent addition, 82 per cent of the branch lines would have to be rehabilitated and the cost would be the equivalent of two years of the present budget, which is substantial; that is, $70 million a year. So I am preoccupied by the lack of priority, the lack of discipline in this process.

My second preoccupation is the process itself. In the past, these rail lines to be rehabilitated were identified by an official or a semi-official process. Consultations took place, explanations were given and decisions were made. In the last instance, this process was conducted by elected members of the party then in power and it is very difficult for me to justify the prohibition orders in view of the fact that I do not have access to the reasoning that preceded them. I was frank enough with the committee to say what my preoccupations were at this time.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is quite obvious that the minister is clearly not satisfied with the decision taken by the previous government in so far as costs are concerned. Even the railways would indicate to him that those costs could be reduced rather dramatically.

My supplementary question is as follows: Since the minister's action will simply further delay the disposition of branch lines—which is something that has been kicking around for some five years—does he not consider his action to be blatantly unfair to the 7,500 producers who will be affected, as well as to the communities that will be affected? This will simply perpetuate further anxiety, apprehension and hardship on the producers and communities affected. Cannot he accept the sheer fact that the elevator companies want these services retained, and so do the producers? If he were at all interested in western Canada, he and his government would ensure that those services were retained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I can only repeat my reasoning. It may be that if all these lines in orders 16, 17 and 18 are not retained for rehabilitation, some farmers might be discontented. But the decision has not been made. A number of these lines could be rehabilitated.

I have in mind, also, the discontent of people on lines that have already been identified for inclusion in the system who will not have the benefit of that rehabilitation because money will not be available. That is a consideration which my friend should have in mind also. I am looking at the total number of people involved in this matter, and I am sorry if a limited number might be affected by the decision that will be made. But, again, the decision has not yet been made.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR SERVICES BETWEEN ATLANTIC AND CENTRAL CANADA

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, as one who had, by virtue of our mutual profession, the obligation to use the air services between Atlantic Canada and central Canada, I should like to draw to your attention the fact that the scheduling of the competitive lines with EPA has been such as to make it so inconvenient for travellers travelling by EPA that there might be some element of discontent expressed from Atlantic Canada in that regard.

I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he would take into consideration, for the convenience of all the citizens of Atlantic and perhaps central Canada, the idea that his office should be exercised to ensure that there be reasonable connections between EPA and the regional carrier in Atlantic Canada and the airlines which serve the rest of Canada.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I welcome this representation, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McCain: The situation is that there are parallel flights by Air Canada and EPA to the same destination.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask his question and make it brief?

Mr. McCain: What will the minister do to eliminate simultaneous flights by competitive lines? What will he do to eliminate three-hour waits in Montreal when flying from Ottawa to Fredericton? What will he do to make it possible for the people in Atlantic Canada in general, and for EPA in particular to become a viable unit? This company is of great importance to the Atlantic area and should be granted the Toronto franchise.

Mr. Pepin: I will do my very best, Madam Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—FALSE STRIKE ALERT—EFFECT ON CANADIAN SQUADRONS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the acting prime minister regarding NORAD being placed on strike alert on Tuesday as a result of a computer error—the second such error in seven months—and at least one plane taking off from Hawaii.

I should like to ask the acting prime minister whether any Canadian bases were put on alert, as Comox was last time, and whether any planes in the Canadian squadrons assigned to NORAD took off.

An hon. Member: And have they returned?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am advised that of course this was a false alarm and that Canada was informed of the false alarm. I am also informed that no action resulted from it on Canadian soil.

INDUSTRY

TELIDON PROJECT—APPLICATIONS UNDER ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the success of the Telidon project announced today, is the minister prepared to lend his support to the development and demonstration of private enterprise communication proposals such as the Cable Link Company project in Sault Ste. Marie which has applied for assistance from the enterprise development program, but so far seems to have been bogged down by red tape and now will probably be developed in the United States?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will be very happy to look into the status of the enterprise development program application in question and report back to the hon. member as soon as possible.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—INDEXATION OF PERSONAL INCOME TAX—POSITION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my point of order has to do with the remarks of the finance critic of the NDP during question period, who suggested that truth was somehow lacking in a comment I had made about the NDP opposing the indexing of personal income tax. As a matter of fact, this may be a question of privilege.

I should like to refer to Hansard of June 2, 1980, which clearly shows that the NDP is opposed to indexing of personal income tax, an opposition which was first expressed by them in 1973. At page 1625 of Hansard of June 2, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) asked this question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> While we may agree that the index is particularly regressive and we oppose its introduction—

That is what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said, that he was opposed to indexing and indexing was regressive.

That was no surprise to me because in 1973 his party pooh-poohed the whole suggestion made in the Turner budget of that year. I should like to quote from Hansard of February 21, 1973, at page 1527 when the NDP finance critic spoke in the House about indexing in reply to the budget speech of Mr. Turner. Mr. Saltsman then said that the NDP had "reservations about the indexed income system". They did not care about the low-income taxpayers of Canada. Further on the same page he indicated that indexing was "phony". So the hon. member's indignation was certainly phony when I said that they opposed indexing.

Further on at page 1529 Mr. Saltsman said that the NDP "did not think it is a very good idea". This was the official position of the New Democratic Party on a matter which is to help the ordinary taxpayer when faced with inflation. The New Democratic Party does not care what happens to the taxpayers of this country when they are faced with inflation or in any other way. "Sock it to the taxpayer, the low, medium or high-income taxpayer."

I call on the member for Toronto-Broadview or whatever the district is—Greenwood-Broadview; it is green, anyway—

An hon. Member: Broadview-Greenwood.

Mr. Crosbie: Broadview-Greenwood—to retract his statements that we did not recognize the truth when we saw it in St. John's West. The truth is that the NDP is opposed to indexing personal income tax so that taxpayers will avoid being unfairly taxed because of inflation. They opposed it in 1973. They opposed it again on June 2, 1980. The member might as well face the fact that they are opposing indexing. We are opposing the government's removing indexing; they will support it. We will meet them on the field of battle if the government dares to try removing indexing from income tax.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and I have met before on the field of battle. I look forward to meeting with him again.

An hon. Member: Get on with it.

Mr. Rae: Of course, I appreciate his clear analysis of the position of the New Democratic Party. I did not raise this question of privilege; he did. Instead of giving us an opportunity to respond, he introduced his question by way of an introduction to a member for the Liberal party, as a form of aside, giving what is an extremely partial account of the position—

An hon. Member: A half-statement.

Mr. Rae: A half-statement, a half-baked and half-truthful statement.

Mr. Crosbie: What is your position?

Mr. Rae: The hon. member should wait a while. If he wants to hear our position, I can give it to him at great length and with tremendous clarity.

Mr. Crosbie: It is time you did.

Mr. Rae: No, there is no problem. It was a half-statement. I think that is niggardly. One talks about the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) sneaking in a budget. I think the hon. member for St. John's West is no better.

An hon. Member: He is worse.

Mr. Rae: He is sneaking in a casual aside which is a misrepresentation of the position of the New Democratic Party. The member should read into the record the entire exchange between the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and myself on June 2, and the exchange between myself and the Minister of State for Finance today. Yes, it is true that we were opposed in 1973 to the kind of indexation which was produced in 1973—

Mr. Crosbie: You had to admit it.

Mr. Rae: —for the simple reason that, like everything the Tory party presents, it gave the most to those who had the most and the least to those who had the least. Why the hon. member for St. John's West was defeated as a minister when he brought in his pathetic budget on December 12 was because he was giving the most to those who had the most and the least to those who had the least.

Mr. Crosbie: Read that budget again.

Mr. Kempling: Where were you when we needed you?

Mr. Rae: I have read the budget many times. I have not read it as often as the Minister of Finance, but I have read it a number of times. That is precisely why on the principle of indexation our party has said consistently that rather than having a system of indexation which gives the most to those who have the most and the least to those who have the least, there should be a principle of protection from the effects of the cost of living which would take the form of a cost of living tax credit. That tax credit would give the most to those people who have the least, and the least to those people in the higher income brackets. That is the clearest difference between our two parties.

I do not mind the hon. member for St. John's West saying that he disagrees, but he thinks he has a monopoly on the term "indexation". He thinks the indexation invented by him is the only kind of indexation known to mankind. That is an absurd position. The hon. member did not invent the wheel, he did not invent good budgets and he did not invent the science of economics. Certainly he did not invent the science of fair, forensic display in the House of Commons. If he wants to be fair and if he wants to be a man about it, he would come out and say exactly what his opposition is to the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: He would say that we in the New Democratic Party have a principle of indexation and that they in the Tory party have a principle of indexation. We do not know what members opposite have over there because they have never made up their minds on anything. But he should at least have respect for the integrity of other members and respect for the integrity of our party to say that no party has fought harder for protection against the effects of the cost of living than the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Well, I am just a woman, but I must say that this is not a point of order; obviously it is a point of debate, and the two members have had a chance to have this exchange under the disguise of a point of procedure.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HAWKES—ALLEGED FAILURE OF NOTIFICATION OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE STAGE OF BILL C-19

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege related to the government business of yesterday. I sat in this House at 3.30 in the afternoon and listened to the hon. House leader respond to the House leader from this side about the business to be discussed in the House yesterday. I have subsequently had an opportunity to check my recollection by reading Hansard. Nowhere in the Hansard record and nowhere in my recollection was there any indication that this House would go into Committee of the Whole to discuss the employment tax credit. There was no indication subsequent to that 3.30 announcement.

We had members on this side of the House who wished to address the principle of Bill C-19 during debate on second reading. They were here all afternoon but did not have the opportunity. Acting on what we felt to be the information given to us by the House leader, we had speakers arranged for the evening to speak to the unemployment tax credit bill starting at eight o'clock. We arrived in this House to discover that we were moving through second reading stage and into Committee of the Whole. The opportunity to debate that bill on second reading was lost for many of the constituents in this country because members were not warned that it would happen and they were not present.

Perhaps of more importance, if one checks the record last evening, is that I think it is proper procedure in Committee of the Whole for members of this House to have an opportunity to gather from the minister the information required to make an intelligent decision about a bill and perhaps to move amendments. The minister responsible for this bill was in the House last evening. I suspect that moving Committee of the Whole was a surprise to him. Certainly there was no evidence that he had officials present. If one examines that two-hour record, it becomes relatively clear that the minister did not have the information in his head to answer the very simple questions that were put on occasion; that he did not have the assistance of officials who would have the normal kind of documentation to provide him with the detailed information which this House required; and that that process was an infringement of privileges of all members of this House.

If we are to make this place function as efficiently as possible, then we must have some sense of warning as to the issues which will be debated on any given day and the sequence of events which are likely to occur. I hope Madam Speaker will use her good offices to ensure this kind of situation will not arise in the future.

● (1210)

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I would like to make two short points on the same question of privilege. I too was in the House yesterday at three o'clock, I was here when the House recessed for the dinner hour, and also when the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod came in to summon us to the other place. I came back shortly after eight o'clock. I was about five minutes late but I had been prepared to speak on Bill C-3, which was supposed to be the bill to be called. I had prepared myself for debate on that matter, only to find that the House was then in Committee of the Whole dealing with Bill C-19.

There are two points I wish to make. First, I was frustrated in my attempt to contribute to informed debate in the House. I think it is an offence against my privilege that I was not given the courtesy by this Liberal government of being notified of its plans. I should not be the victim of poor planning on the part of the Liberal government in terms of its legislative program, or of its discourtesy in not letting hon. members of the House know of the change in plans.

Second, I believe it frustrates members of the House, given the government's stated intent that it wants quality and informed debate in the House, to find the order of business suddenly changed. This frustrates that kind of informed participation, particularly when the House goes into Committee of the Whole. This tells members of the House, in effect, that the government really does not care about the quality of debate, but that it simply plans to go through Committee of the Whole stage. If the government cared at all, it would allow hon. members some time for preparation and would permit proper, informed debate. The very fact that such a thing is sprung on us on the spur of the moment tells me that the government really is not calling for informed debate or participation, but is simply going through the motion. I consider that an affront to all members of the House, including government members, and certainly an infringement of my privileges.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, may I draw page 1786 of Hansard to the attention of the two hon. members who have just spoken, specifically my answer yesterday to a question put by the House leader of the official opposition. It is very clear from what is recorded in the second column that it was possible that we would go into Committee of the Whole yesterday on Bill C-19. What I said was:

> I committed myself to my colleagues this morning—

I was speaking of the House leaders.

> —that if we were to end the second reading stage of Bill C-19 before five o'clock today, tonight we would switch to Bill C-3—

That was not the case. What that meant was that if we had concluded second reading stage of Bill C-19 before five o'clock, we would have gone to Bill C-3 in the evening. The fact is that at five o'clock we had not concluded the second reading stage of Bill C-19 and, consequently—well, I suppose they are intelligent enough to understand the consequences. I think they were the victims of their lack of attention, Madam

Speaker, or a lack of communication with their own House leader.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise in light of the rather unfortunate suggestion that our House leader was not performing his duty properly. I am the acting House leader of our party today.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I suggest that in light of this typical activity on the part of the government House leader, who should be interested in developing an atmosphere in this House of co-operation, if he is legitimately interested in getting legislation through, he should not make the smart aleck remarks for which he is so famous. Perhaps, Madam Speaker, we might want to reserve this point until my House leader returns to the House. He is on business today that caused him to be out of Ottawa.

In light of that kind of smart aleck remark, I suggest that perhaps we should wait until our House leader returns in order to determine what kind of arrangement, consultation and discussion took place between the government House leader and opposition members. Maybe in this way we can get to the bottom of this very important question of privilege raised by my friend, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes).

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I do not propose to spin this argument out. I have to say that my colleagues and I were not taken by surprise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: The item in question, Madam Speaker, the debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill, is still before us. Any day next week we can have all of the discussion anyone wants. Are we not just wasting time having this discussion now?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think I am sufficiently informed of what seems to have taken place that I do not need to listen to further argument. I apologize to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) for not recognizing him.

It seems to me that in some area there must have been a lack of communication. The information was available either on the order paper or in statements made in the House. It is not a task of the Chair to stipulate in respect of this matter. The affairs of the House of Commons are entirely in the hands of the House of Commons, and the government is, of course, responsible for determining the order of business. That seems to have been done.

There might have been a lack of communication, but I am sure that members will, among themselves and with their House leaders, take the necessary steps to prevent again being taken by surprise. I am sorry the hon. member seems to have been taken by surprise, but it seems that the information was available.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF SERVICE OF "SAMSON V" STERN WHEELER

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I should like to present a petition on behalf of over 7,000 residents of British Columbia who want the Samson V, a stern wheel steamer with 43 years of service, to continue its long history of providing service on the Fraser River by tending navigation buoys and removing snags and deadheads from the river, thereby ensuring safety for fishermen, freighters and pleasure boaters in the harbour of New Westminster and on the Lower Fraser River. On behalf of the petitioners, I ask for serious consideration by the government of their request that the Samson V be continued in active service.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—CAFFEINE

Question No. 165—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is caffeine considered by the Department of National Health and Welfare as the drug consumed the most in Canada in various forms and, if not, what is such drug?

2. Is it an established fact that caffeine can often cause cardiac arythmias?

3. Has the department any evidence that caffeine may cause cleft palates and other deformities in unborn children, still-born babies and spontaneous abortions?

4. Is the Department aware that the United States Food and Drug Administration has tested caffeine on rats with the result that some have been born without toes?

5. Is caffeine regulated by any federal law and, if not, for what reason?

6. What level of caffeine, in the department's view, can be consumed daily by the average individual without causing physical harm?

7. Is the department considering the labelling of products containing caffeine as potentially dangerous above certain amounts of consumption?

8. What amount of caffeine is in (a) ten ounces of Coca-Cola (b) one cup of coffee (c) one cup of ordinary tea (d) one bottle of Pepsi-Cola?

9. Is there evidence to show that caffeine can cause anxiety, tremors, higher blood pressure, inability to sleep and ulcers?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Definite evidence to answer this question is not available. However, the Department of National Health and Welfare estimates that on the basis of the amount used by Canadians, alcohol ranks first.

2. Caffeine may produce cardiac arythmias in some susceptible individuals.

3. The department is not aware of any evidence indicating that the ingestion of caffeine causes birth abnormalities in urborn children, stillborn babies, or spontaneous abortions. Two retrospective epidemiological studies of more than 14,000 mothers whose caffeine consumption was tabulated revealed no apparent association between caffeine consumption was tabulated revealed no apparent association between caffeine intake and abnormalities in their offspring.

4. The department is aware of a preliminary study conducted by the United States food and drug administration in which fetuses were observed with missing digits when caffeine was administered at a massive dose level of 80 milligrams per kilogram of body weight by mouth to pregnant female rats. There is no evidence that caffeine consumption during pregnancy is associated with missing digits in humaninfants.

5. Caffeine is regulated in part B of the food and drug regulations, specifically table 8, division 16, restricting its use as a food additive to cola type beverages, the maximum level of use n to exceed 200 parts per million. Caffeine is used as a drug and is regulated in the same manner as all drugs.

6. Although it is known that reversible pharmacological effects of caffeine become manifest at doses in excess of 300 milligrams, there is no evidence that lasting harmful effects occur below the lethal dose of approximately 10 grams.

7. Based on the scientific data available at this time, the department is not considering the labelling of products containing caffeine as potentially dangerous.

8. (a) and (d) A ten-ounce bottle of cola beverage (Coca Cola, Pepsi Cola) contains approximately 40 to 50 milligrams caffeine. The caffeine content of an average cup of coffee is approximately 85 milligrams and an average cup of tea 50 milligrams.

(b) and (c) These values may vary slightly depending on the method and length of time of brewing.

9. Reactions in some individuals may be observed following the ingestion of excessive amounts of caffeine. These occur mainly in the nervous system producing insomnia, restlessness, excitement and tension, but these symptoms are readily reversible. There is no concrete evidence that caffeine induces high blood pressure or peptic ulcers.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—CALCIUM PANGAMATE

Question No. 166—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are all the details possessed by the Department of National Health and Welfare regarding calcium pangamate, sometimes sold under the name of Nyamik 15?

2. Is the drug sometimes referred to as Vitamin B-15 and has it been classified as such in Canada or is it being considered?

3. To the knowledge of the department, have certain American doctors referred to it as vitamin B-15 and have they claimed that their studies have shown that it gives energy to a person within a 1/2 hour to an hour after consumption?

4. Has the drug, in the department's view, any valid use whatsoever and (a) if so, what are such uses (b) if not, is its promotion therefore questionable?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Calcium pangamate is a salt of pangamic acid which can be extracted from apricot kernels, peach stones and rice bran. It is found in many seeds and is also present in brewer's yeast, ox blood and animal liver.

2. Calcium pangamate is not a vitamin and labelling it as vitamin B-15 would be at variance with the food and drug regulations.

3. There have been claims made to the effect that calcium pangamate can provide the body with extra energy but the department has not received credible evidence to support this claim.

4. (a) Pangamic acid and its calcium salt have been promoted for the treatment of a variety of conditions including heart and blood vessel diseases, diabetes, cancer, liver disease, asthma, arthritis and alcoholism. Neither the acid nor its salt has been shown by adequate and properly-controlled studies to be safe or effective for treating these or any other disease.

(b) No medical or nutritional use for pangamic acid or its calcium salt has been established to the satisfaction of the department, and any promotion of that nature is not considered valid by the department.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—NUMBER OF WAR VETERANS HOSPITALIZED

Question No. 244—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many war veterans are presently hospitalized and considered the responsibility of the government?

2. How many are in hospitals administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs and what was the cost in the last fiscal year for their care?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs):
1. On average 1,220.

2. (a) On average 430.

(b) $7,007,439.

DRUG RECALLS

Question No. 319—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what was the number of (a) drug recalls recorded (b) drug recalls by dosage?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) and (b) See list "A"

BRAND NAME DRUGS—COUNTERFEITING

Question No. 320—Mr. Herbert:

What evidence has been obtained by the government, if any, to indicate the extent of counterfeiting of the shapes, colours and sizes of brand name drugs?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: No evidence has been obtained to indicate the extent of counterfeiting of the shapes, colours and sizes of brand name drugs.

PARKS CANADA—PURCHASE OF LAND—COUNTY OF LEEDS

Question No. 594—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Parks Canada or anyone acting on behalf of its subsidiaries, such as the Rideau Canal, purchase land, islands or any property in the County of Leeds in the past three years and, if so, in each case (a) what is the nature and location of the property and on what date was it purchased (b) what was the purchase price (c) what was the name of the vendor?

2. What was the purpose of the purchase and what use is being or will be made of the property?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. Yes. Since April 1977 the following lands have been purchased in the County of Leeds by Parks Canada:

(a)	Nature/Location	Authority/Date	Closing Date	(b) Purchase Price	(c) Vendor

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 692—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of Justice for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. One.

2. (a) 1

(b) None

(c) None.

3. None.

4. $6,000.00.

SNOW CRAB—ADDITIONAL LICENCES—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 870—Mr. Gass:

Will there be additional licences issued for snow crab in the Atlantic provinces and, if so (a) how many (b) how will new entrants be selected?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): It is not the intention of the department to issue this year additional snow crab licences in the Atlantic provinces.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bob Kaplan (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Kaplan (for Mr. Gray) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate briefly in the debate on third reading of Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. At the very beginning of my remarks, I want to apologize for the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) who had to go away. He is now in Fredericton to meet the representatives of the commission for the development of the capital region of New Brunswick and those of the chamber of commerce, while the parliamentary secretary (Mr. Ferguson) is on official duty in Toronto along with the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I feel however completely at ease, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this bill, particularly as it is a piece of legislation in which I am very interested, as much in fact as in the bill to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act to which I contributed last week, during the debate on second reading. This legislation comes under the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) whose parliamentary secretary I am. Finally, I think small business is a very important sector of the Canadian economy; it employs a great many workers and provides a solid base for our economy.

Mr. Speaker, I looked at the contributions of my hon. colleagues in the debate on the second reading of this bill as well as their contributions in the standing committee and I want to thank them for their support for this measure, their constructive comments and the diligence with which they considered it so it could be brought back so rapidly to the House, and in view of the June 30 deadline, which is fast approaching, I hope third reading will go rather quickly.

As a general rule, the remarks by hon. members were most constructive and favourable to this bill which deals with the financing of small business and which is actually an effective, low-cost measure, as the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) pointed out in his remarks. Last year we had losses of only 0.42 per cent. This is a legislation that supports financial institutions and provides an incentive for small business.

The fact still remains that the minister wanted to register and receive favourably the suggestions made by hon. members. Of course, since they do not relate directly to this measure and it is urgent to endorse these changes rapidly, they will have to be considered another time. Most of the suggestions do not relate directly to this measure but rather the legislation itself or again other legislation dealing with small business. Hon. members' suggestions will have to be examined in the context of the review of the funding problems of small business which should be completed within two years and is being carried out in co-operation with the Economic Council of Canada and the bankers' association.

Mr. Speaker, those are two over-all reviews of the funding programs for small business and the difficulties facing businesses at this time.

[English]

A very valuable suggestion was made by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), the former minister responsible for small business, to ensure a broad range of input in the consideration of this examination of the whole problem of small business. The minister has committed himself to this suggestion and so have I. I hope that small business, the department and those who are involved in this review will not only receive the recommendations or suggestions of the traditional advisers, such as officials of the department, the banks, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, but all those groups which have been involved in previous revisions of this legislation or policies that have been put forward in the past to help small business. I am sure that the suggestion of the hon. member for Capilano must include members of Parliament, and their input would be invaluable.

● (1230)

At the same time, many hon. members have spoken about the possibility of the act including working capital in small businesses. This is a complicated step but it is also a worth while one which could render great service to small business. This suggestion has been put forward by many hon. members who have contributed to this debate. Some have suggested that the amount of the loan be increased, but I would remind them that in 1977 the maximum amount was increased to $75,000. This has had an increasing effect on the total amount of loans made under the act.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) also referred to the possibility of relating loans to patent acquisition. In this present era of high technology this is something that could be considered. He also referred to the possibility of increasing the maximum amount of the gross income provision to make companies eligible under the act. At the present time the maximum is $1.5 million. He suggested it could be increased to $2 million or $2.5 million and this, of course, would make more small businesses eligible. Hon. members might want to comment on this suggestion during the present debate.

Many other suggestions have been made and I hope all of them will be given very serious consideration during the comprehensive review of small business financing. It is imperative that this legislation receive third reading as quickly as possible as the present act expires on June 30. The ceiling of $600 million established by the act has probably been reached by this time, although I must say I have not checked on it this morning. I hope we can give this bill third reading today if possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I suppose most hon. members are acquainted with the bill now under consideration which has just been reported from the standing committee without amendment. In short, the bill increases the maximum capacity of the legislation from $600 million to $675 million, as of July 1, 1977 to June 30, 1980 which will allow additional loans and make money available for other loans till June 30.

At the same time, the bill allows for a maximum increase in individual loans from $75,000 to $100,000 while the maximum amount of loans is increased to $850 million. In addition, the legislation is extended for two years. We know that usually such legislation is reviewed every three years. In the present case, the minister wanted it to be extended for two years only so that it would parallel as closely as possible the review undertaken by the department with the Economic Council of Canada and the Canadian Bankers' Association to consider the whole matter and the problems concerning the financing of small businesses. That review should be completed within two years.

There are two other points I consider rather important. First, the legislation goes back to where it belongs. It gives the responsibility back to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has to answer for it, and at the same time it restates the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, jointly with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), will have to share responsibility for setting the interest rate. In my opinion, the fact that the implementation of this legislation comes under the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is very significant because he is now the one who is doing a full review and preparing a comprehensive economic development policy for the country.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is a bill I commend to all hon. members, a non-ambiguous bill, an explicit bill which draws support from all hon. members and from small businesses, and an urgent bill, and I hope our deliberations will be brief enough to allow us to pass it today.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my comments will not take long as I hope to see this bill passed today. There are a couple of matters that I should like to raise that I believe to be important, however.

The problem is that everyone in our society has a different definition of small business, and for a moment I should like to speak about very small businesses. Given the regulations which govern the making and guaranteeing of loans, it is difficult for many small businesses to find their way through the muddle.

For a lot of them, and for one in particular that I have in mind, it appears that if they can qualify for assistance them they do not really need it. So much is required by way of collateral and guarantee that it is virtually impossible for many very small businesses, particularly in the early stages of their endeavour, to take advantage of the program.

I should like to suggest that particular attention be paid in the comprehensive review of small businesses to the unique problems of the very small businessman—the one who may have only one or two employees and is in the process of developing the business. All the paper work and the time involved in taking advantage of a program such as this one or of the small business development bond—if and when it becomes available—will prevent a great many people from getting the money when they need it. From speaking to a number of small business people in my community, I know they regard all this red tape and paper work as a stumbling block to their efforts.

I hope the review will cover not only those high technology small businesses—which are really more of medium size—but that the role of the very, very small business will be recognized. Some of these employ only two or three people either full or part time but need small sums of money to expand or indeed to support them through a downturn in the economy such as we are now experiencing.

In the discussion of another act I pointed out that the majority of small business people, particularly in the retail business, depend upon a buoyant economy. Whatever action we take will be of little value to them unless they can convince those who make judgments about the potential of their business that the economy is sufficiently buoyant that they will be able to repay the loan. At the moment many small business people find it difficult to see a rosy picture of what the future holds and, consequently, it is difficult to justify the expense of maintaining their competitive position.

In addition, if we could see the general direction that the government intends to take with the small business development bond legislation, and if we could see in the much larger area the intention of the government with regard to renewing the purchasing power of the general population so that people can buy what the small businessman legitimately attempts to sell, then I think a lot of people in small business would feel much more comfortable about their future and their place in future economic development.

With respect to regulations, I ask that they be made simple and written in language that the average person can understand, to the extent that is possible. I ask that these regulations not be written for lawyers because once the small business person is given the documents he will then have to spend half of what he gets on obtaining a legal opinion as to whether or not he is entitled to what is offered. As the regulations are written, I ask that they be written in language that we all use. I ask the government to attempt to find a way so that the average, reasonably educated person will be able to pick them up, read them and be able to answer the questions. That has to be one of the biggest problems confronting the small business person.

Small business people get frustrated with legalese as well as with the interminable number of documents that have to be filled out. And what about the time taken away from their business? In most of the cases I am thinking about, time taken away from their business means that they have to find someone else to fill that time, because they are not managing the business, they are running the business. They are part of the business and they are there ten hours a day or more every day. Therefore, if we require that a great deal of time is taken away from small business people, then that is money lost and it does not help them one bit.

With those things in mind, I too would like to see the bill passed. I hope that it will be accepted by the money lending institutions in the way that it must. I hope that they will move swiftly so that anyone who is able to take advantage of the legislation will, in fact, be able to get that financial assistance in time to offset the difficulties that may confront them during this fiscal year.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am quite fascinated at the quiet, very able articulation of the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain (Mr. Deans), a member of the New Democratic Party who has just urged that third reading of this bill pass in a hurry and that the government get on with the implementation of the bill. I find the fascination of the New Democratic Party within the last year or two and within the provinces of Canada with the world of small business, which is really the world of the strong individual, strange. Since the New Democratic Party has found out that small business makes up some 66 per cent of the work force, I find its increasing interest is indeed strange outside of the political need for paying attention to that community.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) stood in the House today on a question of privilege and one of the NDP members spoke to the emphasis which they place on taxation against the wealth-creating sector and the wealth-creating individuals of the country. They want an egalitarian state and they want to collectivize us. Yet they pay this quiet, beautiful, magnificent attention to a bill that serves individuals and the small business community. I say to them that they are on both sides of the fence.

Mr. Deans: I disagree. If you listen and address yourself to the question before you—

Mr. Huntington: It waxes strange, Mr. Speaker, that their total attention these days is on the matter of taxation and on the distribution of wealth. If they want to distribute wealth and do the right thing for those people at or below the poverty level, we will have to direct the attention of this House, and of all members of this House, to the creation of wealth. With the creation of wealth we will address the distribution problem.

I stand here and debate with the hon. member because I do not believe that we can address the distribution problems in the country by attacking wealth creation. The small and medium enterprise business sector is a wealth-creating sector of major importance to the quality of life in this country. That is the reason I wax strange on the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain.

On the other hand, last evening when we were dealing with Bill C-28, which is a bill to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, I was fascinated by the remarks made by, and I pay great compliment to, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), a member of the New Democratic Party. His address was eloquent, his sincerity was in place, he had a great grasp of the industry on the coast and of its needs, and I compliment him for his contribution to the debate on Bill C-28.

I want to return now to the subject of Bill C-17, third reading of which was introduced by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel). We have had a good debate on Bill C-17, and much of the debate on Bill C-20, which is to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act, has overlapped it. We had a good discussion with the minister and his staff in committee. However, there are a few points that I think are pertinent to interject into third reading debate.

The parliamentary secretary paid compliment to a suggestion I made in that the debate and forum for inputs to the over-all financial review that we are talking about and anxiously waiting for are important. All of these bills, such as Bill C-28 and Bill C-17, are bills that amend different patchwork programs of need within the Canadian economy and community. These are going to get us into trouble. All we are doing is running after amendments to take care of the inflation component within our society and allow a measure of catch-up in these different programs.

The review which the minister has under way should take into effect all of these bills and give us an over-all program. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said in committee, we should project ahead for 25 years the financial needs of the Canadian economy rather than spending all of this time amending bills just to take care of the inflation component that has eroded the purchasing power and capital of the country. The review is important. In committee we were seeking to have that review opened up.

We can either go the way they have in the United States by putting in a small business act where we create a magnificent plethora of regulations, rules, administration, Senate and parliamentary committees, and we heap more and more regulations on to that wealth-creating community with very little activity. Or, we can perhaps start working toward and calling for a standing committee of the House of Commons for the small and medium enterprise business sector, where the advocacy role of the small business secretariat and the minister for small business can have a forum to discuss all of the legislation that comes into this House affecting positively or negatively that sector. That would strengthen immeasurably the advocacy role of the secretariat and the function of the minister, who represents the economic wealth-creating community in Canada.

At the moment we have a dedicated secretariat and we have a minister of state. But other ministers have more power to deliver the cookies and the goodies than the minister of state. He is really a eunuch within the delivery system. The small business community in Canada needs a forum in which its needs, aspirations and problems can be discussed. It needs a forum to protect it from the imposition of legislation coming down from other departments and ministries.

I suggest once again in this third reading debate that we give serious consideration to the creation of a standing committee of the House of Commons responsible for matters pertaining to the small and medium enterprise sector of Canada. It would be a vehicle that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) and the secretariat serving that minister of state could staff as the secretariat of that committee. I think we should strengthen the advocacy role and be an open part of deliberations such as the whole study of financial needs of that sector.

My colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West had a suggestion that is also worthy of consideration. The member of Parliament, you and I, Mr. Speaker, are not technicians in all aspects of expertise within the economic community or within the social community. We need a forum or vehicle whereby the experts of the country can deal one with the other and make reports. Those reports are very valuable to the members of the House of Commons who are representing the emotional level of their constituency in the over-all country of Canada.

The hon. member for Edmonton West said that we need a royal commission as the vehicle for involvement in that study. He and I are both afraid that that financial review in Canada is going to be limited to the experts within the civil service, the Canadian Bankers' Association, which is another body that is dealing in expertise in a narrow field in terms of society at large, and the Economic Council of Canada, all bodies of absolute experts. These experts could in a royal commission that is open to the public broaden the inputs and the audio-visual portion of those inputs so that, when the matter comes to a parliamentary committee or to parliamentarians who are not experts in any one specific field, we judge as a jury.

If we are going to make Parliament work, which we are going to have to do to build a better Canadian community and society, we have to start taking on more the jury function as members of Parliament and strengthen our standing committees so that members, representing the emotional level of the land, can meet the experts in those committees.

Maybe we are not equipped to handle the experts directly. Maybe we need to be able to staff ourselves so that the right questions can be asked and much of the time that is lost in our deliberations can be cut down. We could then have very valuable inputs to our record of proceedings.

The review is a very important one. It involves all of these amendments we are now passing, such as Bill C-28 and Bill C-17. All of these are taking care of inflation. What we need is a vehicle whereby this automatically takes place so that we know what our needs are, that we have a vision of 25 years down the road in terms of our economy, the financial management of our monetary system and our fiscal system serving that community.

It was requested that working capital be part of the Small Businesses Loans Act. In committee the minister pointed out that was probably too complicated a subject and had a degree of risk that was not in the present guarantee structure of the Small Businesses Loans Act. I will buy that, but working capital and the need to increase the working capital of the small and medium enterprise sector of Canada is an aspect that needs attention.

If we are going to move on wealth creation and the creation of stable jobs, we are going to have to assess the degree of risk that is involved in assisting the community with venture capital, working capital and the guarantees that we have in our program. Part of this review, and I come back to it, is that we should start to take a really solid, hard look at what we are getting into when we say we are going to guarantee this and guarantee that.

We know in the Small Businesses Loans Act that guarantees are only costing 0.42 per cent of the amount outstanding. That might be a $3 million cost to the treasury; I have not done the arithmetic on that. We also learned in committee that there is no risk in a Small Businesses Loans Act guaranteed loan to a large lending institution. It is pooled up and there is no risk to them. Any loss is in a pool and they pretty well have a 100 per cent guarantee of lending under this act.

It is not just guarantees here, guarantees in the fishing sector, and so on and so forth. We are now into guaranteeing $200 million in loans for companies like Chrysler. True enough, there is a political need and demand for attention in that area, but have we really got the implications of guarantees figured out? No, sir, we have not. We create these contingent liabilities and we do not know what burden we are creating for tomorrow's taxpayer, our children today. All that is a very important aspect of this review.

Guarantees have contingent liabilities to the balance sheet of Canada, to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to the cash flow. If something like a $200 million guarantee to an organization like Chrysler fails, what will that affect in the way of programs and the delivery of programs into the future? Everybody in this House knows that about 80 per cent of our cash flow is delivering statutory programs. It is very difficult to cut back and retrench out of the remaining 20 per cent of discretionary spending that we have. Where is that pressure coming from? What reserves are we setting aside for these guarantees? If we are going to be responsible members and a responsible House, we should start calling for an immediate review, probably by experts. It should be part of a royal commission examining this whole area of community need.

There is little further I want to say on this bill. We want the bill to go through. We want to assure the House that we consider it only temporary in nature. It is only more patchwork on the quilt. We would like to examine the design of the quilt. We would like to bring forward the thrust, emphasis and visibility on the review that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and the parliamentary secretary spoke about during the debates on the FBDB bill and on the Small Businesses Loans Act bill. If this House is to function and serve the wealth-creating community, it is essential that the design of that economic quilt receive our serious consideration and attention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): For the convenience of members, I will ask the table to indicate the order of business for two o'clock and then call it one o'clock.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

DEFINITION OF "MINISTER"—INCREASE IN PRINCIPAL AMOUNT OF LOANS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

DEFINITION OF "MINISTER"—INCREASE IN PRINCIPAL AMOUNT OF LOANS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Kaplan (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words during the third reading debate of this bill and ask hon. members to support Bill C-27, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

As we all know, this act expires on June 30 and we would deprive Canadian farmers of an important and well-appreciated service if we did not pass this amendment today. Mr. Speaker, the bill aims at providing for Canadian farmers better access to short and medium-term credit to improve and develop their business and to improve their living conditions.

Today, we are asking the House to re-establish this act for a period of three years. Since its introduction in 1945, the Farm Improvement Loans Act has been extended several times. In the present situation, it is very important to provide better credit for our businesses, especially in the agricultural sector, and we are also proposing to increase the maximum amount of the loans outstanding to a farmer by increasing from $75,000 to $100,000 the amount of loans granted for land condition improvements. Mr. Speaker, the second amendment simply takes into account the increasing costs of agricultural production, such as machinery, fuel, fertilizes, pesticides, labour and so on.

The Farm Improvement Loans Act enables the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to guarantee term loans granted to farmers by chartered banks and other designated lenders, such as credit unions and caisses populaires, for various farm improvements which include, of course, the purchase of farm implements, machinery and material, land clearing and plowing, the installation of irrigation systems, the construction or repair of fences, drainage works, the building, repair or conversion of farm buildings, the purchase of cattle or additional land and major repairs to or the restoration of machinery and tools.

At the present time, the federal government is greatly interested in farm financing through two major instruments, the Farm Credit Corporation which deals with long-term mortgage financing under the Farm Credit Act and which grants medium-term loans to farm syndicates under the provisions of the Farm Syndicates Credit Act, and the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which protects designated lenders against any loss incurred because of medium-term loans.

Under the act, Mr. Speaker, the interest rate that lending institutions can charge farmers cannot exceed their prime rate plus one per cent. May I recall that these institutions must assure and also ensure the solvency of borrowers, as in the case of any other type of loan. In view of this, and since agriculture is one of the areas where investments are safest, the Farm Improvement Loans Act is not very costly to the Canadian government. Indeed, in 1977 the cost was less than $190,000 to the government, increasing to $289,000 in 1978 and declining to $222,000 last year. This is very little compared to the total loans extended during the same years $132 million in 1977, $225 million in 1978 and $262 million last year. These figures show the real cost to the government of the huge investments made possible by the act. I am thinking of the increased productivity made possible to farming by these investments, and the benefits for the Canadian economy as a whole. Mr. Speaker, all these points were made in support of amendments when the legislation was introduced, again on second reading and when it was discussed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture. The points made against the bill seem rather minuscule and weak when one looks at the numerous benefits of Bill C-27 for Canadian agriculture. Mr. Speaker, during the next decade, Canadian farmers will have an increasing need of short and long-term farm financing, and I feel the federal government has a duty, through the Department of Agriculture, to implement acts promoting the development and improvement of our Canadian agriculture.

During the coming decade, certainly there will be much more emphasis on the food industry than any other, even energy. So many countries are still underfed, while in Canada we have the land, the farming potential and the skilled farmers needed. Bill C-27 is one piece of the legislation under which they can get short and long-term financing. I therefore urge every member to support the amendments to ensure the prosperity of our agriculture and economy, and in turn the well-being of all farmers throughout Canada.

• (1410)

[English]

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment to indicate that the official opposition is willing and prepared to see this bill passed as quickly as possible and become the law of the land.

I would only add that during the second reading debate four of our speakers made some very appropriate comments on the bill, but they were generally supportive of the bill. It is my understanding that the bill cleared the standing committee yesterday morning, and now we would be quite happy to see it passed by the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too will not delay the passage of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Althouse: I would like to make a couple of brief comments about the bill, about the procedure and some of the discussions which went on in committee, so that the House will be aware of what took place there.

It was my position in committee that the current Farm Improvement Loans Act should have been amended. As the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, the act is available to farmers for the purchase of farm machinery, for the purchase of breeding stock, for the purchase of building and for the purchase of land on a medium-term basis.

Over the course of the life of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, it has been reintroduced at three year intervals and various amendments and improvements have been made to it. The original purpose of the act was to provide loans only for the purchase of farm machinery, but then other items were added. It was only in the last two or three amendments to the act that land was included under the act.

There was a time when the act was amended to allow for major repairs to farm machinery, and now we can also make major repairs to farm buildings. So the act is not just used for the purchase of capital goods by farmers but is also being used, to some extent, for the refurbishing of farms, and it now comes very close to supplying a form of operating credit. If your tractor breaks down and you have a large bill to pay, you can take out a farm improvement loan to have it repaired. Similarly, you can get the loan if a windstorm hits a building.

The amendment which I proposed was ruled out of order as one for an opposition member to present. It was considered to be one that the government should more properly introduce. I am a little disappointed that the government did not see fit to do so. It would not have cost any more by way of increasing the amount of guarantees beyond the budget which was already allocated. We were told in committee that the current guarantees are available on a three-year period up to a limit of $1,550 million. We were also told that that limit had never been approached. In the last three-year period we were told that the maximum reached was a ceiling of about $750 million. So we did not quite use half of the allotted funds that were already there. It would not have required an additional amount of global guarantees, so that the amendment would have probably fitted within the funding that the government had indicated it was prepared to allocate.

The amendment would have allowed, in addition to repairs and improvements to farm machinery and buildings, the repair and improvement, if you like, of the farmer's soil and of his breeding stock by way of artificial insemination services, the purchase of fertilizer, herbicides, seed and nursery stock—the kind of things which are very important for the improvement of farms.

In the general mind of the public, I think there is a conception that, because we are dealing with something like farm land, we are dealing with a so-called renewable resource. But if we do not have any funds or do not make certain that there are inputs into that land, the so-called renewable resource will soon die off. I am aware of some soil studies on the prairies which were done by Dr. Rennie of the University of Saskatchewan. They show that the fertility of prairie soils on the average is now approximately half what it was only 60 or 70 years ago. Without some firm programs for farms and assistance for financing such programs to rotate crops and use fertilizers judiciously, the results of the renewable resource to the economy of the country will gradually wind down.

It is important that these loans be allowed for some of the operating expenses incurred by farmers each year, particularly in years such as the one we have just come through where interest rates were quite high and some regions of the country suffered. I am thinking of the potato areas in the maritimes which have suffered three bad marketing years and were having great difficulty financing the seeding of the current crop. We think such guarantees would allow the banks to make further funding available to farmers for seed and fertilizer.

That was the rationale behind the proposal. We are sorry the government did not choose to include it in the amendments. However, we were pleased to hear from the director of the Farm Improvement Loans Act that a study of the whole farm credit field will be put in place. We were not told how it was to be conducted, whether it would be a public inquiry. I ask the parliamentary secretary to use his influence to see that farm groups and farmers have some input into such an inquiry. It is high time that the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Credit Corporation Act and the acts where government has involved itself in the supply of farm credit be reviewed, updated and become more pertinent to the real needs of today's agriculture.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION ACT

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the members of the committee that reviewed this bill. It has been brought to the House and almost to completion on four occasions. This is the fourth time it has come before the House. Through this process, it has been duly refined and all the objections seem to have been met. I had indication from both opposition parties that they concurred in this bill. It will bring about the possibility of ratifying the international convention that should be concluded before September, 1982.

Until this bill is passed, we do not have a vehicle to ratify that international convention. The bill will facilitate the transport of Canadian containerized cargo through application in Canada of internationally accepted standards of container safety. Passage of the bill will be received positively by the industry that will be directly affected by the provisions of the convention. I would urge all members of the House to support the bill.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, one area that has concerned me for some time is relatively new in terms of hazardous cargo. Of late we have been seeing more and more in the press and in other places about the problems which are now confronting many municipalities regarding liquid industrial waste, the mixing of liquid industrial waste, and its transportation. I have noted with some alarm that the containers presently used both for storage and transportation really were not designed for many of the liquids that are mixed together and therefore become something other than what they were in the first place.

I should like to suggest that in the processes we set up for inspection we pay particular attention to that area, both in terms of storage and transportation. I am sure we have all read of the recent Love Canal incident in Buffalo, New York, where a lack of knowledge and a consequent lack of concern resulted in the dumping of hazardous materials which turned out to be injurious to health. I would not want us to use the practice that is presently carried out of simple tanker carriers for transporting liquid industrial waste which heretofore were used for any other number of less noxious, less hazardous substances.

When the minister and the ministry undertake a review and establish the standards of the convention, they must pay particular attention to that extremely difficult, somewhat new and very hazardous area. They must ensure that we do not have the kinds of things happening in this country which have been happening for the last number of years, where carriers simply have allowed, either inadvertently or sometimes, I suspect, on purpose, the leakage of waste to become a hazard all over the countryside.

Perhaps a nod from the minister would either verify or deny my understanding that this legislation is not retroactive and therefore not applicable to existing carriers. Is it or is it not retroactive?

● (1430)

Mr. Bockstael: It is not retroactive.

Mr. Deans: It is not retroactive; that is what I thought. Therefore, I would like to suggest that, because this is an extremely difficult area and will be more and more the subject of debate both here and in other houses across the country, we take a serious look at the methods used for transporting liquid industrial wastes at this time. We should attempt to find a way to bring into conformity with this legislation, which is intended to protect the public, guarantees that these carriers of liquid industrial wastes are appropriately inspected, and make sure that the vehicles used are up to the standards of the convention over a period of time. As a result, we will not have people who are presently in the business circumventing the protection we hope to provide by using vehicles and tankers that were manufactured prior to the implementation of this act, thereby continuing a practice that has been extremely hazardous in a number of areas across the country.

As we review how this legislation will be applied, we should look carefully at the methods of storing these selfsame wastes. For most of us there is a degree of apprehension and anxiety that develops when we are not fully aware of what happens when certain industrial wastes, now being developed on a day by day basis for industrial purposes, react on being subsequently mixed within holding tanks; because what can emerge can be an entirely different substance with a considerably greater impact.

I would, therefore, say to the minister that with the passage of this bill we are taking some steps forward. There is yet a vast area of concern that has not been dealt with in this bill, and that ought to be addressed by the House of Commons in the very near future.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak very briefly on this bill. We had an interesting discussion in the committee earlier this week on Bill C-21, at which time I raised the issue of the transportation of chemicals on passenger aircraft. The parliamentary secretary and his officials informed members of the committee that cabin crews have access to cargoes so that if they detect fumes or smoke coming from the cargo they can check it. However, we were not given a satisfactory explanation of how the crew can gain access to cargo holds, and the officials undertook to obtain more information.

Would the minister also have his officials determine how Air Canada, CP Air or any other airline in Canada can determine what chemicals are actually in containers? There have been situations in the United States and Canada where shippers have put wrong labels on containers, for whatever reason—perhaps to speed up the shipment or get a shipment on a passenger jet instead of a cargo aircraft. Certain chemicals can be shipped by cargo planes only, while other less dangerous substances can be shipped on passenger jets. How do these people determine what actually is in these containers? Do they open a certain number of them to see that the content is that which in fact is on the label, or do they go strictly by what it says on the label?

I ask this because a number of years ago there was a fatal crash of a Pan American World Airways cargo jet at Boston. The aircraft was carrying half a dozen different chemicals, some of which leaked into the sawdust in the box which caught fire. The aircraft crashed killing the three crew members. The unfortunate thing in this accident was that while the crew was trying to track down where the smoke was coming from, the aircraft was flying over a series of airports, and had the aircraft landed at the first airport at the first sign of smoke probably the plane and the crew would have been saved. One can see how important it is that we know what is contained in the shipments, particularly when chemicals are involved.

I would ask the minister to have his officials determine whether a certain number of packages are opened to check the contents or to determine that the chemical contained therein conforms with what is on the label, and will his officials also find out just how the crews of these aircraft can gain access to the cargo hold on passenger jet aircraft?

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two about this proposed dangerous products act. One of the main areas with which I am concerned has regard to interprovincial traffic when dangerous products are being hauled from one province to another. We must consider this aspect very carefully as it is of concern to many provincial governments and other people, particularly in view of the fact that the regulations in each province may differ. This bill should establish responsibility in respect of dangerous products moving from one province to another.

One radical change in the bill is its departure from the normal approach in respect of the establishment of responsibility after proof of negligence. If negligence is proven, then responsibility should certainly be established. Responsibility should not simply be taken for granted because there was negligence on the part of certain individuals.

Another item that should be carefully considered by the committee is the method of haulage by trucks. Truck drivers have to assume a great deal of responsibility when they go out to pick up their loads. In many cases it is virtually impossible for those drivers to open every package to determine what they contain. For this reason it is a little unfair to hold the truck driver responsible for everything he is hauling on his truck. How we can overcome this difficulty I do not know. If everyone was absolutely honest the difficulty would not exist. However, when a truck is carrying a quarter load for one shipper, and eighth load for another, and a third for another, it is virtually impossible for the trucker to know what he is actually carrying. Many of these companies must pick up on that basis in order to have a full load moving across the country. The truck driver does not pack the goods or open the packages, and to do so would be an impossible job.

I hope this matter can be discussed in some detail at the committee stage in order that we can avoid placing an unfair burden on the many truck drivers who are excellent workmen, but who may unknowingly be hauling something dangerous. I know there is a legal maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse, but, by the same token, there has to be some fairness exercised in placing the responsibility.

Another matter of importance is the use of safety devices. This is a subject that came to light in the investigation of the Mississauga mishap. There are safety devices that indicate what is happening inside a wheel, an axle and so on. Truckers must, under provincial laws, have their trucks checked regularly. There should be a similar requirement for trains to make sure that railways are not unduly putting the lives of many people at risk.

This bill does not cover another aspect which I think is very relevant, and that is measures to avoid accidents in the first place. What I have in mind is what could be done on railway lines during relocation. I do not think any reasonable person would suggest that we embark on a multibillion dollar program to replace every railway line passing through a populated centre. The board of transport commissioners should take the responsibility of not permitting the rebuilding of railway lines in areas where they could be a hazard. What is happening now in many centres is that people want the lines moved, and that is when it should be put in a safe place away from populated areas. Then if an explosion occurs nobody will be killed.

I have referred in this House before to the illustration of what happened with the CPR in the town of Lake Louise. The people there strongly objected to the twinning of a rail line within that village. The CPR could have built the other line in a safer place away from the village, but as it is now, if there is a mishap in Lake Louise during the summer, when the town is full of tourists, thousands of people could be hurt. This line could have been located outside the town at very little extra expense. That expense would be nothing compared to the costs that would be incurred if there were a mishap in the centre of the village and they then had to relocate the line.

A similar type of mishap occurred in Stirling about three or four years ago, but we were lucky there, as we were in Mississauga. Through the tremendous efforts of the local citizens, RCMP, firemen and so on everyone was moved and no lives were lost. One of these days, if we do not begin watching carefully where these lines are placed, we will not be so lucky and a number of people will be hurt. Then there will be a real holler. I would much rather holler now. If the board of transport commissioners, the group which controls matters concerning rail lines, would use every day, common horse sense and not say yes to everything which the railways ask for, it would help us avoid many of these problems right now.

Not only myself but a number of other people appealed to the board of transport commissioners not to allow the twinning of that CPR line in Lake Louise. Although the line was essential, we did not want it to go through the village. But our pleas fell on deaf ears. To my notion, there was no proper reason given by the board as to why it agreed to the recommendations of the CPR. If there is a mishap and someone is killed, the blood will be squarely on the skirts of the board of transport commissioners which could have ordered that the other, safer route be taken.

This is something which is happening all across the country. I would plead with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to use whatever authority he has with the board of transport commissioners to ensure that it will try to prevent accidents from occurring by foreseeing the possible causes. Again, I emphasize that nobody is asking for the relocation of every rail line across this country, but just that when these lines are relocated they be put in a safe place where any errors will not endanger human life.

There are some other points with regard to this bill which I feel are very important. I hope to raise them before the committee if at all possible.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to be talking on this bill today and on the other bill which we are currently dealing with in committee, the transportation of dangerous goods bill. Coming as I do from Mississauga, these are topics which affect us and with which we have had some experience. I am quite interested in the passage of these bills and very encouraged by their provisions.

I have had the opportunity of listening to the officials of the department in committee. This particular bill deals with the standards concerning containers as they affect the transport of goods across international boundaries. I am pleased that we have been able to increase the quality of our standards through the ratification of this international convention.

In Mississauga we found that the containers themselves were a vital part of the accident. Double-walled train cars did not explode, despite the fact that they were subject to enormous stress and enormous heat in that accident.

It would probably help hon. members present if they knew exactly what went on in that accident. As the train began to go off the track, an explosion occurred instantaneously. Within a minute, a second explosion occurred sending a ball of fire 40 storeys high. A similar explosion occurred within an hour. The end of one of the train cars blew off and the car travelled along the ground 2,200 feet, shooting fire out of its back. Throughout the following week as the propane and chlorine burned, one tank car sat in the middle of the debris and the heat without exploding or leaking. At the end of the week a truck emptied out the liquid inside the car, and the fire department determined that it was a double-walled tanker car. Other double-walled cars experienced fractures and slow leaks, but none exploded.

I was most encouraged to hear from the minister's officials while in committee that railroads are now phasing in the use of this type of car. I am further encouraged by the fact that the railroads, truck carriers and air carriers will be forced to face increased responsibility for inspection. They will be required to justify much more firmly their behaviour when such accidents occur.

I am concerned over the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway does not want to take on that kind of responsibility, as was stated by its representatives before the Grange inquiry in Mississauga. Basically, the railroad is running the same train through Mississauga every night as it was running last fall. The railroad's officials have said repeatedly to Mr. Justice Grange that they have not changed their procedures and that they do not intend to do so.

I asked the fire chief of Mississauga about the ramifications of the decision of CPR. He indicated that any individual living within 2,500 feet of either side of the CPR line was vulnerable in the event of another accident. In Mississauga 40,000 people live that close to that track. I encourage the CPR to take its responsibilities more seriously and to begin to introduce some fundamental and inexpensive safety procedures in the operations of its trains. I refer to such procedures as hot-box detectors, rear view mirrors and slower inspection procedures.

I am encouraged to see in this new legislation that more responsibility is being placed on the carrier in the area of inspection. I hope that the railroad in Mississauga will not wait until this legislation is passed before it takes up its responsibility.

Those are the points which I wanted to raise with regard to this legislation. We were very fortunate in Mississauga. We went through not one miracle but two miracles. The first miracle happened in the first minute of the accident when the train went off the track into an empty field. There were only industrial buildings within 2,500 feet of that field. There were no homes nor congested construction going on. There were plenty of fire hydrants and open roads for access by the rescrue and prevention equipment. That was the first miracle.

The second miracle was that out of the 250,000 people evacuated, nobody was hurt. The crime rate in the area actually dropped. We owe a great deal to many local officials, such as the mayor, the fire department and the police department, for their diligent efforts during that week. Had they been armed with some of the provisions in the new regulations under this legislation, they would have been able to perform their duties even more easily.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the clerk said and I am sorry that there is some confusion this afternoon. All hon. members have co-operated and now we are desperately trying to find out what will be the next item of business before four o'clock. It was our intention to go on with Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act. I have been trying to locate the former postmaster general so that we could deal with Bill S-4. I do not know the propriety of asking for a couple of moments' grace in order to speak to him. Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would comment on the propriety of this. If we do move to Bill S-4 I believe that there may be a disposition to pass it. We could then move to Bill S-6 and that would take us to four o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, rather than commenting on the proprieties, may I comment on the probabilities. If the hon.

member for Vancouver South were here I think we could proceed with Bill S-4. I also suspect that it would take only ten or 15 minutes to deal with that bill. Perhaps we could proceed with Bill S-6 now and adjourn it at 3.45 p.m. so that Bill S-4 could be dealt with this afternoon. It is a bad bill but it has to be considered.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gets us out of hot water. I thank him very much for that suggestion.

I understand there is no disposition to let Bill S-6 go through today. If we could proceed with it now, then we could halt debate on second reading at 3.45, immediately dispose of Bill S-4 through all stages, then go on to private members' hour. I wonder if that is agreeable to the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is moved by the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council that the next order of business will be Bill S-6, that debate will cease on Bill S-6 at 3.45 p.m.—

Mr. Knowles: That the debate be adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I apologize—that the debate will be adjourned, whereupon Bill S-4 will be taken under consideration. Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed and so ordered.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as I was not aware this bill was coming up so soon I had to put a few notes together rather hastily.

This is a matter of concern to farmers in western Canada. The act was repealed some time ago, although it is still on the books. I suppose, therefore, that if a farmer really wanted to contest it in the courts he would have a good basis for doing so.

The basic purpose of the measure was to establish two prices for wheat. If the price was below $5 per bushel the government would pay a subsidy to bring the price up to $5 per bushel for red wheat. In contrast, millers would pay $3.25. This would ensure consumers in this country of a reasonable price for baked goods and bread.

In November, 1978, the Liberal government of that day decided not to pay the subsidy any longer but the act was not repealed. Subsequent governments agreed that there should be two-price wheat and there has been a disposition to bring in new regulations to set the limits at $5 and $7 per bushel under the Wheat Board Act.

The only problem we see is that this bill will not be proclaimed until August 1 this year. In effect, the government proposes to write off the last crop year. Consequently, farmers will not have the advantage of the maximum and minimum for two-price wheat.

We are also concerned about the flexibility of these prices. Most western farmers believe that they have been subsidizing the consumers of this nation for a long time, as the world price of wheat has been well above the maximum set in the old bill. As we all know, farmers are not in a position to subsidize consumers. Because of the high cost of production and the price they are paid for grains, they are having trouble balancing their books. For these reasons, many western producers of bread wheat have been very concerned about the limits established in that bill.

The new limits were set out in a press release issued by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). There is no problem with the lower limit as it appears that wheat is selling today at approximately $5.50 per bushel. The price has risen above the upper limit, however, which really results in the farmers paying a subsidy to consumers. Our concern, therefore, is not with the lower limit established by the Minister of Agriculture, but with the upper limit. We would have more confidence in the bill if there was some flexibility in the upper limit.

I realize that the bill provides some ability to be flexible in the upper limit from time to time, but governments are notoriously slow in dealing with flexibility.

What this bill will do, in effect, is to make legal something that has been going on for some time. Basically, this party has no difficulty with that part of it. We have two problems with the bill which have already been put on record. When the bill moves to committee we would like to deal with the problem of missing the subsidy for a crop year. We would also like to deal with the upper limit and ensure some flexibility.

The price of wheat must be thoroughly discussed by the government and the leaders of farm communities in the country. For some time I have felt that there should be a minimum price for wheat on the international market. This has been recognized upon occasion and ignored at other times. Last summer I spoke with my American counterparts in Calgary and they were open to discussion being resumed in this area. I think part of that has been because many cartels have been established in this world respecting certain commodities. Canada and the United States probably ship in the neighbourhood of 70 per cent of the world's wheat to other countries. Canada and the United States should get together to establish a floor price for wheat below which we would not sell. That should be based on the cost of production plus what is considered a reasonable profit for farmers so that farmers can have a standard of living acceptable in this nation. That topic was discussed again just last weekend at a recent Canada-U.S. meeting in San Diego.

I understand that there is disposition among wheat producers who were at that meeting and our members of Parliament to get together in the next month and a half, and as members of a House of Commons discuss whether there is a possibility of coming to some agreement. We could then take it to our ministers and they could take it to their administration in the United States.

For many years over the past decade we have been selling grains in the international market below the cost of production to farmers. Farmers have been living on such things as depreciation, good research that our agricultural research stations are capable of putting out, and tremendous economies within their own farms and businesses. But this cannot go on forever. Farms are growing larger and costs of production are rising very rapidly in western Canada. It is becoming more and more difficult for farms of any size to continue to sell their products below the cost of production.

When I looked at my fertilizer bill this year, I was astonished at the increase in price. Because of the difference in the Canadian and American dollar, the standard inflation costs of employment in the manufacturing plants, it is becoming virtually impossible for small farmers now to re-equip themselves to go on into the 1980s and 1990s with the present price of grain. New equipment is expensive.

About three years ago I did a study. I compared the price of grain with the price of grain in the 1930s and 1940s. If one bases the dollar at the 1965 level, we find that farmers are really getting less for their wheat and barley today by quite a bit than they were at that time based on costs of production. The only way they have been able to survive is because tens of thousands have been driven off the land. Farms have become larger, more efficient, and farmers have used the basis of chemicals and fertilizers to increase production per acre in order to stay alive. I am not sure how much longer that situation can go on. If we continue on with our present policies we will continue to drive more farmers off their lands. Eventually we will have very large integrated units producing the food for this nation. I can assure the minister that the price will go up then because farmers will not continue to produce below the cost of production, as many of them have done in the past.

It is imperative for us to attempt again to negotiate with the U.S. first. Hopefully we can then later on bring into the discussions Argentina and Australia to attempt to establish a price below which no country would sell. That price would be based on costs of production.

No farmer is asking that we use this as a cartel to rip off other nations. All we are saying is that we want a fair price for our labour and for the costs of producing food in this nation. What this bill is doing, and has been doing for a long time, is subsidizing the consumer in Canada for cheap red wheat. We should draw our attention to other markets as well.

Mr. Pepin: It does both. It protects both the producer and the consumer.

Mr. Schellenberger: If we cannot work out this kind of an agreement with other countries, then surely we have an obligation in this country to set a price two or three months before the crop year, based on the cost of production that would, in effect, allow our producers to make the proper decisions about the crops they should grow. We are capable of doing this. We have found this year that the wheat board is running out of barley to meet its obligations under the contracts it has sold because the right signals were not given to our farmers a year or two ago. In fact, we gave them wrong signals. We put a quota on the off board grain which scared farmers away from producing feed grains.

Now we are having great difficulty based on the price that the wheat board sold that grain, and based on those quotas that were established, in getting feed barley into the wheat board elevators in order that it can meet its contracts. The minister in charge of the wheat board should seriously look for an arrangement, and if it is not possible to look at the international market, to look, as they have done in the United States, at setting a minimum price before a farmer makes his decision to seed his crop. Then the wheat board can give indications to farmers about what crop it believes it can sell in the international market. If the price is established at a reasonable level, then the farmer will make his decision based on that price to grow a certain amount of those grains so that the wheat board can meet its obligations. Then we will not have, as we have now, farmers caught with quotas that are open—and grain, such as utility wheats and rapeseeds in their bins—and no barley to deliver based on that open quota.

Those are a few of the remarks I wanted to make on Bill S-6, the Two-Price Wheat Act. I hope the minister will take into consideration our two concerns with the bill, that of inflexibility in the upper limit, and the fact that in repealing this act we are, in effect, doing away with the subsidy to farmers for one year, and as a consequence farmers will be subsidizing consumers for that year.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has been the government's policy throughout the 1970s that a minimum price be maintained to producers of wheat for domestic human consumption at a reasonable level. This minimum price has been raised periodically as average market prices and costs of production increased. The price charged to domestic millers in 1969 was fixed at $1.95 and one-half cent per bushel which was raised to $3 per bushel in 1972. On September 12, 1973, it was again increased to $3.25 per bushel. During 1977 to 1978 the government made supplementary payments to producers to support domestic producer returns at $3.55 a bushel. In the fall of 1978 the minimum price was set at the current level of $4 per bushel.

In 1973 the government combined the fixed price for producers with a consumer subsidy payable to producers when export wheat prices were above $3.25 a bushel. Authority for the payments under this program was provided by the Two-Price Wheat Act. A maximum subsidy of $1.75 per bushel was established which, in turn, set a maximum domestic price of $5 per bushel to producers. In the case of durum wheat, the domestic price was allowed to vary between $3.25 and $5.75 per bushel, and the subsidy was payable between $5.75 and $7.50 per bushel.

Under these subsidy arrangements, the government made payments totalling $396 million between 1973 and 1978 to the benefit of consumers. In the fall of 1978, as one of a number of measures designed to restrain government expenditures, the government decided to terminate subsidy payments under the Two-Price Wheat Act. This action was designed to save the government $200 million up to the end of this crop year.

At the same time a new domestic pricing scheme was introduced by establishing, through regulations under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, a minimum price of $4 and a maximum price of $5 for wheat sold for human consumption. The minimum price for durum was also raised to $4 per bushel, but the maximum was left at $7.50 per bushel. This action continued to provide a minimum price for the benefit of producers and to protect consumers against wheat prices rising above $5 a bushel or durum prices rising above $7.50 per bushel. In this respect the maximum domestic wheat price has remained at $5 a bushel since 1973, although average market prices have been significantly higher throughout this crop year.

● (1510)

The purpose of Bill S-6 is to remove any obligation for the government to pay the subsidy in the light of the changes made in the domestic pricing system. Consumers have been paying market prices up to a maximum of $5 a bushel. This has resulted in some increase in bread prices, although a number of other cost items have also contributed to the price rise. It is estimated that the impact on the consumer price index of the change in wheat prices was an increase of 0.04 per cent, while the food component of the index is estimated to have increased by 0.1 per cent during the three months following removal of the subsidy in 1978.

The Two-Price Wheat Act, and the current domestic wheat pricing scheme, apply up to the end of the current crop year. The government has announced a new policy to be implemented for the next crop year. It was announced in a bulletin, and I quote:

> The new minimum and maximum prices for Canadian wheat sold for domestic human consumption will be $5 and $7 per bushel, basis No. 1 Canada Western Red Spring Wheat at Thunder Bay (i.e. a range between $183.72 and $257.21 per tonne).

I would point out to hon. members that the Two-Price Wheat Act came into force in July, 1974. It is to be repealed the earlier of the date to be fixed by proclamation or July 31, 1980. It is due for repeal July 31 this year. The purpose of Bill S-6 to bring into line what has actually been the practice throughout the years. I urge hon. members to support this bill.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the Two-Price Wheat Act before us today will prompt a lot of debate and discussion in the farm community because we have just gone through a year when there was a considerable amount of subsidization by farmers. At one point farmers were being asked to contribute in excess of $1 million a day because the ceiling has been fixed.

The original intent of the Two-Price Wheat Act probably came out of arguments and discussions in the middle and late forties when the Government of Canada under Mackenzie King and later Louis St. Laurent made agreements with the government of Great Britain to provide wheat at guaranteed prices.

Those guarantees were not lived up to by either the British or the Government of Canada, which had made the agreement. This prompted farmers to ask for some restitution. After four or five years' debate, from statements having been made by various ministers of the day it became clear there was no excuse for the farmers not being paid a higher than world price for bread wheats consumed in Canada. It was argued that a great many other industries in this country were subsidized through tariffs. They are protected from competition outside our borders and cheap goods coming in. It was thought that a similar kind of protection should apply to domestically produced grains in the higher priced domestic market.

It was argued that at least the cost of production should be recovered for grains produced in Canada. It was realized that with the amount of exports and the size of the Canadian economy at the time, it was unrealistic to assist to the full cost of production. In most years those grains amounted to less than 10 per cent, and it was felt there should be a guaranteed cost of production.

It was a long time before that kind of act was introduced. As is always the case in politics, from the moment of conception until the moment of birth of the act, a great many changes had taken place. Instead of having a guaranteed cost of production for those grains produced for consumption within our boundaries, we had a floor price and a ceiling with a range that prices could fluctuate within. If the price on the world market dropped below the floor, the farmers were guaranteed the floor price for milling wheats in this country.

There was some protection for consumers in the proposal in that, if world prices went above the ceiling, domestic millers did not pay more than the ceiling price. For most of the time in the past year, world prices exceeded the ceiling. As a consequence, Canadian farmers in effect subsidized consumers because of the way this act is written. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) gave figures for the past three years. He stated that by dropping the subsidies here the government saved something like $200 million.

At the same time as reducing the commitment to assistance in Canada occurred, we began operating under a different grain marketing system. We shifted the marketing of feed grains, lower grades of wheat, out of the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board on to the open market. The effect of that has further eroded the income of farm producers in western Canada.

A study was done by the grains committee of the Saskatchewan department of agriculture. It showed that approximately $160 million was lost by Saskatchewan producers over the past three years because of the use of the open market for the marketing of feed grains. If we had perfect markets, which we never have, theoretically that should represent a reduction in the cost of food for consumers of about $160 million. When you are aware of the kind of economics that play in the grains industry, you very quickly see that that did not happen. Rather than reductions in production costs of those industries that use mill feeds, there has been a greater concentration and build-up of feed mill capacity shifts in ownership, particularly in the production of hogs, especially in the province of Quebec where marketing boards were not a factor in the marketing of hogs.

● (1520)

Packing companies with their feed companies subsidiaries moved in to take advantage of the possibility of lower prices because effectively grain offered on the open market is distress grain. Prices are usually under pressure, and instead of purchasing grain through the Wheat Board where the board offers the product on behalf of the farmer and is in a strong position to argue about price, we have degenerated again into a position where individual farmers are attempting to make their own deals in competition with each other. Of course the price is depressed as a result.

The two factors combined have meant a considerable drop in income to farmers who live in the Wheat Board area, and we feel the whole situation could have been handled better had feed grain marketing remained under the Wheat Board and realistic guarantees been given on the consumption of grain in Canada.

We would propose that the subsidies be reimplemented. There is no real saving to be made by the government or the people of Canada through their abolition. We believe the open market for feed grain should be disbanded and that the Wheat Board should be put in control, not just because it provides better incomes for producers but for a whole range of reasons we cannot go into on this occasion. I have in mind factors which relate to the marketing, transportation, handling, allotment and movement of grain.

We think consideration should again be given to the original concept of the two-price system—instead of a floor and a ceiling within a range presented to the House every three or four years, annual negotiations should take place between the government, or an agency of government, and the farmers, to work out an acceptable cost-price formula for each year. The grain would then be purchased by millers. We think this would be in keeping with the market situation which exists in Canada today and that it would be more in harmony with the original idea of the two-price system as conceived by farm groups and others 20 or 30 years ago, and that it would be fairer to both producers and consumers.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-6, and particularly to reflect the view that in the scale of wheat one of the most important things to which we need to pay attention is that in the whole field of agricultural production, farming and farm people are not given the attention in the market place that they ought to receive. It is fair to emphasize that invariably, in any country, fisheries, forestry, and agriculture are given bottom priority in terms of government expenditure or attention. It is neglected in this way despite the fact that yesterday 12,000 children under the age of five died of starvation and that today another 12,000 face the same fate, and tomorrow yet another 12,000.

We live in a world where at the present time four-fifths of the population are suffering from malnutrition. I am sure it is shocking for most Canadians in this rather affluent society to learn that some 70 million people in the world suffer from permanent and irreversible brain damage due to a lack of protein in their diet. So when we talk about farmers and wheat the first thing we should recognize is that the farmer is a businessman in the business of food production and there are only two sources of food in the world; one is soil and the other is water.

Traditionally those of us who have a prairie background used to think of wheat prices as running parallel to oil prices. The price of a bushel of wheat was roughly equivalent to the price of a barrel of oil. Those who remember the days when we got three dollars for wheat will recall that a barrel of oil also cost approximately three dollars. As the price of oil increased, so did the price of wheat. When oil cost four dollars, wheat cost four dollars, and things continued that way until the recent past when the separation between oil and wheat prices widened very rapidly. But the price of oil has gone up to something like $35 a barrel on the world market, while the price of wheat remains at between five dollars and seven dollars. This has meant an extremely sharp increase in import costs in the farm community in the area of chemicals, land values, machinery costs, labour costs and so on.

Of special importance is the increase in the cost of capital. I am not blaming the government, in particular, for this, but the interest rate situation at the present time puts pressure on the farming community, and we should all be aware that while farmers are in receipt of an income which is more or less fixed in terms of the prices they receive, they are unable to control the costs they must undertake in order to do their job adequately.

I have before me an interesting notation taken from a recent copy of the Edmonton Journal, a newspaper somewhat west of The Ottawa Journal. We learn that to pay for ten ounces of instant coffee at current prices a farmer has to sell 150 pounds of wheat. To buy a loaf of bread, which takes hardly more than one pound of wheat to make, he has to sell 13 pounds of wheat. When he leaves his automobile to be repaired, for one hour of shop time, let alone the cost of the parts, he has to sell about 600 pounds of wheat which is enough to make some 500 loaves of bread. If he has to spend an hour, not in your chair, Mr. Speaker, but in the dentist's chair, he finds he has to bring three tons of wheat as the equivalent to the price of the service he is getting. It is very interesting to consider that in the hypothetical loaf of bread costing 25 cents it would still cost the consumer 23½ cents if the farmer gave his wheat away free.

When we talk about two-price wheat we are not merely talking about a second price which somehow guarantees to the farmer his ability to produce one of the most needed commodities in the world. Unfortunately, we find that this two-price system, because it is not regulated in relation to world market conditions, ends by forcing the farmer to sell his wheat at a price which subsidizes Canadian consumers.

We accept what the minister has presented to us today. This is only sufficiently satisfactory if we find that the world price for wheat does not rise above seven dollars. As soon as that happens, the farmer is subsidizing the consumers of Canada as he has done in past years on a number of occasions. Perhaps I will be excused by my hon. friends in this party if I quote from a Liberal senator, Senator Hays, who says that, with the exception of Denmark, Canada supports its agricultural industry to a lesser extent than any country in the industrialized world.

It is interesting to note that while farmers are not looking for subsidies or that kind of program in terms of income, there are mechanisms which we can put in place, particularly in terms of research, transportation and marketing, that would be of great assistance to the agricultural community, particularly in terms of getting the wheat price we want. With that in mind, I should like to note that government contributions to the agricultural income of farmers in Great Britain amount to some 67 per cent. In France that contribution amounts to 50 per cent, in the United States it is 17 per cent, and in Canada it is 1.7 per cent. It is clear to me that if we could have the systems in place which would allow for marketing plus a much more aggressive marketing activity in the international market place, we could begin to get a much more acceptable price into the farmer's pocket.

When I speak about putting a transport system in place, it should be known that farmers in each of the last several years have lost over $500 million in the prairies, not because they could not grow the grain, nor because they did not have the grades of grain, but rather because countries came asking for grades of grain which we have but for which we did not have the transport system to get that grain to port.

In a country that has a deficit as large as we have in Canada, where the largest single item on which we pay our taxes is interest on our accumulated foreign debt, not to have a transport system in place which would bring $500 million to the Canadian economy annually is an unforgivable fact in 1980. We have had ample time, and ever since the ample representation that was made at the WEOC convention in Calgary in 1973, we have been promised, as prairie people, that these needs would be attended to. In short, what we find is simply the echoing and re-echoing of the same promises, and little action is taking place in terms of getting the infrastructure in place.

I should also point out that because of the failure to put into place the kind of support system that we really need to have, demoralization is taking place in the agricultural production communities today. The fact that we have decreasing numbers of farmers, because nearly 10,000 farmers each year leave farm production work to go into other lines of business, and the fact that farming operations are becoming larger, indicate that the family farm concept is not feasible under the present kind of policy. While that is of concern to the farming community, it should be of particular concern to the world at large that our farmers are not able to stockpile food which traditionally we have done.

Throughout much of the 1950s and 1960s we thought that if all food production were to stop in the world, we would have food stockpiled to last us for more than 80 days. Four years ago, that amount dropped to a supply of food for 36 days, and at present we have food stockpiled for only 18 days. In part, that reflects not just the attitude of this government but the attitude of all governments toward the three industries which I mentioned previously, namely, agriculture, forestry, and fisheries. Governments of all nations, whether they be democratic, dictatorial, or of other kinds, give an unusually low priority to these industries. It is an attitude that I have never been able to comprehend or appreciate. I say that, in view of the fact that there is no need in life as basic as food, and that need remains until the end of life, it is a requirement in all countries, and it becomes the focus on the international scene today as hunger.

I note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), in listening to me today is finding great humour in my words as if I were not speaking seriously to him, or as if this were not a matter about which he could do something. So long as farm people are subsidizing the consumers in this country, at a time when Canadians are getting some of the cheapest food of any peoples in the world, I would say to any consumer group that I challenge them to go out and find any other country that can produce food as cheaply as it can be bought in Canada. In addition to that, let me remind the House that the average hourly earnings of a Canadian farmer in 1951 earned him two dozen eggs. In 1975 his average hourly earnings would buy him seven dozen eggs. If we compare the farmer with the consumer, we find that in 1976 the net farm income dropped some 20 per cent, and again in 1977 it dropped 11 per cent. I am short of data for the years between 1977 and the present, but I know that there was a drop last year and I know that for next year we are anticipating another significant drop in farm production incomes.

I plead with the government today that, in terms of the two-wheat policy, flexibility should be built into the bill before us so that when the world price increases above the ceiling, the price here can be moved upward. We must avoid the situation where producers find themselves in a tight squeeze but at the same time have to subsidize the consumers. If for some reason it becomes the judgment of the government that food prices are too high—which I argue they are not in this country in relation to the percentage of our disposable income which we spend on food—then surely the onus is on the government, through the Parliament of Canada, to subsidize the consumer. The decision should not be reached automatically by way of a statutory act that subsidization should take place by forcing the farm producer to put his products on the market at a price below its value.

What this bill will do is to force us into the situation where we must put on the shelf cheaper food than what you could sell in the international market place, allowing Canadian consumers to purchase it more cheaply than they would normally be able to do, rather than the government taking that responsibility which is naturally theirs.

If we take a look at some of the increased expenses of the farm community, we note that the borrowing debt of farmers has almost doubled during the past six years. It has risen from $8.5 billion to the present situation where there is an increase of another $4.3 billion on top of that. Also it is worth while noting that out of every dollar spent by consumers only 38 cents go to the actual production of food or the farmer himself. The budget of the federal Department of Agriculture totals some $673 million, which is less than 2 per cent of total government expenditures. The one thing every Canadian does is eat three times a day, generally. What I have just said underscores the low priority given to agriculture and an agricultural commitment.

With a two-price wheat system, it is important to note that the obligation of the government is simply and absolutely to make an amendment to this bill of a nature to guarantee that, as the world market increases, the upper level remains flexible to the extent that farmers are not locked into the present system which I find unacceptable. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) so ably stated earlier in this debate, August 1, 1980, will be the date of the application of Bill S-6, which means in effect that farmers will have been without a program throughout the past year.

Even if total food costs have risen higher than other sectors of the economy, Canadians are spending less of their disposable income on food dollars than any other country in the world, including the United States. Canadians are spending approximately 17.5 cents of their disposable income for food dollars. In the United Kingdom it is 29.3 cents; in Ireland 32.6 cents; in Austria 28.6 cents; in Sweden 27 cents; and in France 23.4 cents.

In terms of the amount of disposable income which Canadians spend on food, and the fact that it is down to 17.5 cents out of every dollar, this means that we cannot listen to the hue and cry of consumers who say that farmers and producers should subsidize it. Rather, we must look at the data and recognize that on the world picture there is no nation, including the United States, that puts food on kitchen tables as cheaply as Canada. Surely that cheapness ought not to be the obligation of farmers. It must be public policy, for whatever reasons the government deems. Then it becomes incumbent upon all taxpayers to see that that policy is in place, and not one particular sector such as farm producers. I think Canadians have a respect for the value of farmers and their production, in view of the fact that they bring in the highest amount of capital which eases the balance of payments more than any other industry in Canada. Certainly it is of great importance that the agricultural community is the largest employer of any community in the country.

I see Mr. Speaker is indicating that it is about time for me to wind up the great address I am giving this afternoon. I had only a few moments notice to get ready for this; I did not know that it was to be brought on. It being 4.45 o'clock, I should like to take the opportunity to move to adjourn the debate today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member is quite correct in all respects except for his reference to the time. It is only 3.45. Earlier it was suggested by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that at this time the debate on Bill S-6 be adjourned and the House would proceed to the consideration of Bill S-4.

Before we proceed with the hon. member's motion, I should like to indicate to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) that he retains his right to continue this debate when Bill S-6 next comes before the House for consideration.

Is it the pleasure to adopt the motion to adjourn the debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH "LABOUR GAZETTE"

Hon. Francis Fox (for the Minister of Labour) moved that Bill S-4, to amend the Department of Labour Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: No!

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely thank hon. members on all sides for their co-operation this afternoon. Since we have been so diligent in our work, as I mentioned earlier, we have been scurrying around for other work to do so that we do not waste any time. I understand there is a disposition on all sides to allow this bill to go to committee at four o'clock.

I rise to speak on second reading of this bill to amend the Department of Labour Act of 1900. I am sure the large majority of hon. members are familiar with the objective of this amendment. I am very sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) or his parliamentary secretary could not be here this afternoon to introduce this bill for second reading but, as I mentioned, it was decided on short notice.

The effect of the amendment is to put into effect the elimination of the requirement of the Department of Labour to publish the Labour Gazette and its companion publication la Gazette du Travail. It will be recalled that this enabling legislation was originally placed before the House in December, 1978, and again in October, 1979. These proposals were based mainly on the realization that the substantial cost of the two publications could no longer be justified at a time when major expenditure reductions were being ordered throughout government departments. I need scarcely point out the need for government restraint in expenditures. It is a continuing need on the part of this government, so the rationale for the earlier proposals remains just as effective today.

It would be fair to say that the Labour Gazette became a victim of changing tastes and technology over its 78 years of existence. For much of that time it was virtually the only journal of record in labour affairs, but in recent years several of its functions were taken up by advancements in communication methods and media, with the growth of specialized newspaper columns on labour affairs, trade and professional publications, and the electronic media, due to the high profile labour matters have continued to attract.

As a result, the role of the Labour Gazette evolved into a type of forum for the expression of points of view from the spectrum of participants in labour affairs, principally organized labour, management, and academics. Its audience tended to be a specialized one, and therefore a comparatively small one. It would be appropriate to note that the cost of publishing the Labour Gazette and la Gazette du Travail in the fiscal year 1979-80 was estimated at $225,000.

● (1550)

By ceasing publication at the end of the calendar year 1978—a logical time for librarian and archival purposes—a saving of some $83,000 was realized in the 1978-79 expenditures.

I mentioned the small size of the Gazette's audience: in fact the paid circulation of the Labour Gazette at its demise was only 2,800 copies and that of La Gazette du Travail just 750 copies.

Efforts were made to increase this low circulation, and the above figures actually represented an increase of some 590 copies in the Labour Gazette's circulation over the seven months preceding cessation.

These figures meant that while each annual subscription cost the subscriber only $7.50 for ten issues, the production cost amounted to about $60.00—a situation in which justifying the underwriting of more that $50.00 per year for each subscription was indeed difficult.

Furthermore, the Department of Labour Act does not, in fact, require issuance of a publication such as that into which the Labour Gazette evolved. The original legislation called only for the publishing of statistical records. Although the later version of the Labour Gazette still carried statistical data, its prime role had become that of a forum. It does without saying, as well, that over the years a vast range of statistics has become available from numerous other sources.

In the Department of Labour a careful study was undertaken to determine if any alternative reductions, in either programs or services, could be made to preserve the vehicle of the Labour Gazette. With regret, however, no alternative was available, and in fact a number of other publications also had to be terminated to meet the required expenditure reductions.

The decision was made, therefore, after much deliberation, to cease publishing these periodicals. This had the effect of reducing 1978-79 and 1979-80 expenditures by at least the amounts I have mentioned.

I would make the point that the provision of a forum for independent labour-related opinion, as distinct from a vehicle for partisan thought, still has merit, provided it can be produced at reasonable cost. As I have indicated, there is absolutely no lessening of the real need to continue curbing financial expenditures. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the effect of this legislation, while reacting to the restraint demands, eliminates the requirement to publish the Labour Gazette and La Gazette du Travail but does not prevent introduction of periodicals under the same or similar title if circumstances justify such action.

In the present circumstances, however, I have no option but to confirm the earlier decision to discontinue these publications.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am personally astounded at the way in which the government has tried to justify the elimination of this historic and very useful document in terms of the world of labour in Canada. Frankly, I am not prepared to get into debate as to whether everyone on my side of the House agrees with me, because frankly I do not care. I was opposed to the elimination of the Labour Gazette when I had the privilege of serving my leader as critic on labour matters in the House of Commons. I was opposed to the elimination of the Labour Gazette while I had the privilege of being a minister of a government, and I am absolutely and utterly opposed to the elimination of the Labour Gazette today, as a member of Her Majesty's Official Loyal Opposition.

I listened with great care to the reasons put forward by the parliamentary secretary who has given a speech which, of course, is the bureaucratic answer to the request of somebody in the Department of Labour that we find some way to cut down on expenditures.

We are talking about a publication that has been in existence, not just for years but for some decades. This has been a publication, to those of us who have had the privilege of reading it over the years, which has given an insight into the world of labour in this country. I have spent a great deal of time considering this matter and I must say that this publication is second to none.

The suggestion being made this afternoon by the government, and I know there are members on both sides of the House who will support it, is absolutely and clearly erroneous that is, that this publication has no useful purpose in the management-labour world of Canada today.

I have to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to other members of this House, that, as a Conservative who believes in the civility of the community, the Labour Gazette is one of the most useful publications the Government of Canada has ever produced. If hon. members will send their researchers to look at this publication over the years they will find that on every great social issue this country has faced for many decades the Labour Gazette has treated the matter with intellectual competence and human understanding.

What distresses me so much is that in a wave of what I have to say is false economy we have destroyed this vital and very necessary publication. The hon. member who spoke on behalf of the government for the dissolution or ending of this publication, referred to the fact that its circulation is limited. There are easy ways to increase the circulation of a valid document. There obviously has been no attempt to increase circulation. What that hon. member did not talk about was the loss of those people who have put this publication to work and to press periodically throughout the years. They are now lost to us.

The terrible shame of this whole thing is that we could have kept this document in existence for years for less than what it is costing the taxpayer of Canada for those great full-page ads that have been appearing in the national newspapers of this country about the benefits to their areas of the purchase of a fighter plane. This fatuous advertisement has involved sums of money that have been carelessly thrown away.

When people come to the House and say they want to destroy this publication because of the need for economy, I must say to the House and the public that there are reasons for economies, and there will always be such reasons, but there is nothing more disastrous than mindless moves to limit expenditures for a certain thing when we have nothing to take its place. In this case we will have jettisoned, thrown over, eliminated something that has been of great benefit to the very many Canadians in this country who have needed something like the Labour Gazette.

I must say personally that I have no sympathy for anyone in this House, and I care not where they sit, who presumes to support what I think is a fundamentally shortsighted move. I tell those people, and I do not care whether they are in my party or in another party, that this is a mistake. It is a mistake which is breaking a great tradition and which is diminishing the capacity of an independent minded governmental group to comment on matters which are of essential importance to the economy of this country that is, the relations between management, government, and the working men and women of this country. I am sorry to have to do this, but I must register most violent opposition to this bill. I deeply regret that the government has not had the wit or the wisdom to realize that this kind of uneconomic move, which is what it is called, is a self-defeating move.

• (1600)

I ask all hon. members in this House this afternoon to stop and consider the advertising bill of this government and the countless thousands and millions of dollars which are spent promoting advertisements like some kind of pale, imitation tea party type of program. I would like them then to ask themselves if that money could have been used to save something which is so legitimate and crucial to whether or not this country pays its way in the coming years. I say, with no fear of contradiction—and if anyone wishes to contradict me, I will take them on in any form at any place—the fact is that the relations between management and labour in this country are essential to whether or not we ever balance a budget or get out of the trade deficit situation we are in now. We must provide a civil community in which the people, whether they are being paid a salary or a wage, or whether they are making the decisions within industry or government, are to live together in peace and some kind of reasonable accord.

I deeply regret this move, and I think that it is folly. There will be a time when we may well stand in this House and ask that the publication be reinstated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member at this time, but perhaps we should seek the unanimous consent of the House if we intend to debate this bill beyond four o'clock.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to thank the House again for its collaboration this afternoon. The agreement was that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would speak for a few minutes on Bill S-4 and that we would then give it second reading and send it to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. We would then immediately proceed through all stages of Bill S-3 without debate, and then to private members' hour, which may go a little beyond five o'clock. If there is unanimous agreement to that, it will be completed within a matter of five minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent to that proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) is correct, namely, that we are prepared to keep this debate short and to send this bill to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. However, when the bill is called after I sit down, I shall be shouting, "on division".

Like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), I am strongly opposed to this bill, the purpose of which is to bury the Labour Gazette. It is not a case of a funeral immediately at the point of death, because the government killed the Labour Gazette a year or so ago. It is a case of Parliament being asked, after the event, to approve what the government has done.

Mr. Fraser: You are absolutely right.

Mr. Knowles: However, the reasons I am opposed to the bill have in large part been stated by the hon. member for Vancouver South. In the first place the Labour Gazette has been a very important instrument in labour relations for decades. I suggest that to bring it to this unceremonious end is a mistake. In the second place I do not like the government taking these actions first and then asking Parliament to approve of them afterwards. In the third place I do not like the unfairness to the employees involved in the publication of the Labour Gazette which is represented by the action of the government in bringing this publication to an end.

I should like to take a minute or two to warn every Liberal member of this House that tonight the ghost of Mackenzie King may stalk their bedrooms. I hope that he scares the daylights out of them. I remind the Liberal government that in effect it is bringing to an end an important piece of Canadian history and a highly important piece of Liberal history. I invite members of that party to read books such as "William Lyon Mackenzie King", a political biography, by R. McGregor Dawson, and in particular to note the experiences which Mackenzie King went through in the summer of 1900.

Mackenzie King spent part of that summer in Rome and part of it in London. At that time the institution of the Labour Gazette was being considered, and its publication was to be under the direction of the then postmaster general, the late William Mulock. In the middle of the summer Mr. Mulock sent a telegram to Mackenzie King in Rome offering him the editorship and management of the new Labour Gazette which would begin in July, at a salary of $1,500 a year. Mr. King at that point was trying to get into academic life. He thought he had an opening at Harvard University. He knew that if he got such an opening at Harvard, it would pay $400 or $500 a year.

According to this diary, he went through great travail of soul as to which of those offers he should take. It seemed to bother him that he was leaning in the direction of taking the choice that made the most money. But, of course, he was prepared to do that only if it was for the common good. However, when he leaned the other way and considered accepting the offer at Harvard, he found that Professor Taussig at Harvard, whose books on economics some of us had to study some years later, and his father, the late John King, both urged him very strongly that the place for him to come was to Ottawa to take on the important function of editing the Labour Gazette.

That is the beginning, in a practical sense, of the Liberal party having some interest in labour relations. Mr. King went from that position to other positions in the Department of Labour, to become its deputy minister and so on. Then in 1908 he took the further step of becoming a member of the House of Commons and, of course, we all know what happened from that point onward, how he became the Prime Minister of this country and held that position longer than any other person, at least thus far.

But now we have the Liberal party saying that this patron saint of theirs, who is capable—according to his beliefs—of coming back and bothering them, is to be brushed aside with all his interest, as I say, in having a publication which would play a part in labour management relations. It has done that through the years. I think that it is a serious mistake to discontinue the publication, and that is all that this bill does. It substitutes a clause in the Department of Labour Act for one that is already there, and it brings to an end a requirement to publish the Labour Gazette. It is a mistake, and a move to which I am strongly opposed.

However, we have agreed not to spend too long debating it this afternoon, but in return for that the government has agreed that the bill will go to committee so that it may be considered further and, if necessary, considered again back in the House. Along with the member for Vancouver South and on behalf of my colleagues, I register very strong opposition to this bill, to what it does to the Labour Gazette and to what it does to the memory of the Liberal party's patron saint, Mackenzie King.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I understand that there has been a House order and some sort of agreement on this bill that there will be no further speeches. Is that the understanding of the Chair?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is the understanding I sought, a moment ago.

• (1610)

Mr. Kilgour: I discussed the matter with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). If I understand my friend correctly, I should like to add something in support of his position on the bill, but if it is the ruling of the Chair and the understanding of hon. members that there be no further speakers today, obviously I shall abide by that. I just wonder if Your Honour could clear this up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If we are to reverse the prior decision it would have to be with unanimous consent. Unanimous consent was granted by hon. members a few minutes ago that we not see the clock at four o'clock and go beyond five o'clock for private members' hour. It was understood that there would be one more speaker.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the agreement was that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) would speak, then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would reply to what I said and that now we would call the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is what the Chair understood. It has been brought to my attention that I referred to hon. members a few moments ago as "honourable gentlemen". To the lady members present, I wish to apologize.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

QUEBEC AND MONTREAL PORT WARDENS ACTS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-3, to amend an Act to provice for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and to amend an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave, now.

Mr. Pepin moved third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. It being 4.15 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Order No. 4. Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works of Bill C-204, an Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (provincial representation and sunlight provisions).

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): As it is already pretty late, Mr. Speaker, that is, past the normal time for consideration of private members' business could you tell us in advance at what time we are expected to adjourn, following consideration of private members' business?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary is seeking accurate information on what time the debate will end. I thought it was understood in the prior commitment that we would not see the clock at four o'clock and that we would give one hour to private members' business. The House will therefore sit until 5.15 p.m.

Shall order No. 4 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

AMENDMENT RESPECTING MATERNITY BENEFITS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved that Bill C-205, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (maternity benefits), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There has been some doubt over the years respecting the ability of members to introduce bills amending the Unemployment Insurance Act without infringing the financial prerogative of the Crown, the benefit of which was given to the member.

Currently, the government shares the cost of the first two phases of the regular unemployment insurance benefits with the private sector, that is, initial regular and labour force extended benefits, on the basis of a cost sharing formula which features an eight-year moving average of unemployment rates, also called the threshold rate of unemployment. In accordance with this formula the government finances the cost of such regular benefits that is attributed to the excess of the actual rate of unemployment in a calendar year over the "threshold rate" of unemployment. The government also finances the cost of benefits paid during the third phase of benefits, also called regional extended benefits, the net cost of benefits paid to self-employed fishermen as per subsection 146(2), and the cost of benefits paid during any extension granted under sections 38, job creation, and 39, training.

The above points clearly to a scheme which is sustained not only by contributions from the private sector but also by charges on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

When a private members' bill provides for an extension in the benefit period, for an enlargement of the class of possible claimants, or for an increase in the benefits payable under the act, the charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund would consequently be increased. Therefore, in my view, any such bill would be a "money bill" which must be introduced by a minister of the Crown and accompanied by the recommendation of the Governor General.

However, because there has been some considerable latitude given in the past, the Chair will, in this instance, enter a caveat as to the procedural acceptability of Bill C-205, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (maternity benefits), since it infringes the financial intitiative of the Crown, in the light of the scheme of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Notice is now given, however, that members should accordingly govern their requests to the office of the law clerk and parliamentary counsel to draft such bills.

I intend to allow the debate to take place on this bill until such a debate comes to an end and then will rule on the acceptability of the bill.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank you for your ruling and for permitting debate to take place on this bill. I appreciate the difficulty you have encountered in deciding whether it would be acceptable. I certainly appreciate your conclusion, and thank you for your permission to go ahead with the bill.

For the benefit of hon. members, may I ask you to cast your mind back to 1971 when the then Liberal government decided to include the concept of maternity benefits in unemployment insurance, despite strenuous opposition from several quarters.

We all thought that the idea of maternity protection for women in the labour force was good Liberal ideology and one with which a modern industrial state could come to grips and implement. The good Liberal policies of 1971 were like a good wine which needs time to settle and improve itself. Now, nine years later, it is becoming clear, and a number of national organizations have brought this to our attention, that changes are needed in order to improve what was rather radical and advanced thinking in social legislation.

● (1620)

Let me briefly illustrate for the benefit of members present what Bill C-205 intends to do.

In the existing legislation, which we propose to amend with this bill, ten of the first 20 weeks of pregnancy must coincide with the minimum 20 weeks of contributions. If a woman who is in the labour force has only nine or less weeks at work at the beginning of her pregnancy, she is disqualified even if she has worked 20 other weeks.

Second, we can take the case of a woman who is not eligible for maternity benefits, because of the description that I have just given, expecting a child and is unemployed. She cannot qualify for unemployment insurance in the period eight weeks before and six weeks after the birth of the child. In other words, within a period of 15 weeks, which happens to coincide with the birth of the child, that woman cannot draw unemployment benefits.

Third, take the case of a woman who lives in the Atlantic provinces where she needs 15 weeks of contributions to qualify for unemployment insurance in general. But if she has contributed 16 weeks she will not qualify for maternity benefits because the law says that she has to have 20 weeks. This rule applies across the entire nation regardless of regional qualification for unemployment insurance benefits. She will not qualify for regular benefits for 15 weeks, again around the date of the birth of her child. That woman in the labour force is penalized twice—and I am using the word "penalized" in a very narrow sense—in relation to her colleagues in the labour force who may become unemployed for different reasons other than maternity.

Finally, let us take the existing case today. For every week that a woman is on unemployment insurance because of unemployment or sickness during the preceding year to her maternity, one week is deducted from her maternity benefits, if she qualifies. That means that if in the preceding year the woman has been covered for unemployment insurance purposes for five, ten or 15 weeks, these weeks are deducted from her total maternity benefits.

With these illustrations in the background, I suggest that Bill C-205 represents one small step in the direction of a more extensive maternity policy. It is really an effort to bring equality of access to unemployment insurance benefits. It is nothing more than that.

I would suggest also that in the 1980s and in an industrial society like ours we do have to develop an approach which will go well beyond the scope of Bill C-205. This bill before us somehow redresses imbalances. It attempts to establish certain equality and, as I mentioned earlier, access to benefits—nothing more than that. Certainly we do need more than that. That, of course, can only be done within the scope that is given to a government and to a minister in charge of this type of policy.

I would say in commending Bill C-205 that it is meant to bring parity in the treatment of working women, who apply for maternity benefits, in line with the treatment of others who apply for regular benefits. At the present time the requirements for maternity benefits are stricter than those for other benefits.

With this bill we are proposing to replace section 30(1) with a clause that will make maternity benefits available to pregnant women who have worked 20 weeks in the 52-week benefit period. At present, and I am going to repeat the illustration of a moment ago but in a different way, for a woman to be eligible for maternity benefits, the time when she becomes pregnant is crucial to whether or not she is eligible for benefits. She must have worked 20 weeks, like any other worker, but ten of those weeks must overlap with ten of the first 20 weeks of her pregnancy. I shall repeat that: a woman must have worked 20 weeks, like any other worker, but ten of those weeks must overlap the ten of the first 20 weeks of her pregnancy.

For instance, if a woman stopped working nine weeks after becoming pregnant, she would not be eligible for maternity benefits even though she would qualify for other benefits. This has the effect of making women who apply for maternity benefits work longer than other people.

In this bill we are proposing to delete part of section 30(2) so that maternity benefits can be claimed at any time once the person qualifies. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, a woman can only claim maternity benefits during the first 15 weeks of the initial benefit period. This means that if she had already collected ten weeks of benefits in the preceding 12 months, because she was sick or lost her job, she could only collect five weeks of maternity benefits. Therefore the aim of this bill is that maternity benefits should not be reduced because a woman has collected benefits for other reasons. Other reasons are in a different category. Maternity benefits ought not to be touched by benefits received for other reasons.

Bill C-205 proposes to delete section 46 so that pregnant women who are not eligible for maternity benefits can collect regular benefits. At the present time the law says that women do not qualify for maternity benefits, even though they have worked 20 weeks and cannot collect regular benefits in a period which starts eight weeks before the expected date of delivery and ends six weeks after the birth of the child. For a period of 15 weeks these women get nothing, even if they are out looking for a job and even if, under other circumstances, they would be collecting unemployment insurance. On the part of the state I submit, therefore, that there is an arbitrary and somehow inflexible assumption of the period during which women are not available or capable of work. I submit that is not a decision for the state to make.

Bill C-205 also proposes to amend section 25 so that regular benefits are available for pregnant women who are not eligible for maternity benefits but who do meet the regional requirements which may be, in some parts of Canada, less than 20 weeks. This amendment would complement the removal of section 46, to which I made reference a moment ago, by ensuring that the woman is not prevented from collecting regular benefits in the 15-week period around the birth of her child, and that she will be eligible for regular benefits if she is unable to work because of pregnancy and has contributed to the fund for the number of weeks required in her region, like everyone else, if it is less than 20 weeks.

This bill proposes to bring in line our Unemployment Insurance Act with the recommendations made by the Human Rights Commission in recent times. Hon. members may be familiar with the case of Stella Bliss who was not able to obtain maternity benefits because of what is called in the departmental jargon in Ottawa "the magic 10 rule". She was disentitled from regular employment benefits even though she was capable of work and had a major attachment as a claimant. She claimed this was discrimination on the basis of sex. The Supreme Court of Canada did not agree that discrimination on the grounds of pregnancy was discrimination on the grounds of sex, and therefore her appeal was disallowed.

• (1630)

The Human Rights Commission said that the case of Stella Bliss illustrates that women can suffer economic penalties if they attempt to combine the social roles of work and childbearing, both, of course, a necessary and valuable contribution in the development of our country. In pursuing the idea of Bill C-205, namely, that of equal access to unemployment insurance benefits, one inevitably has to ask what would be an ideal period for coverage of women in the labour force who are pregnant and have a child before this type of economic support comes to an end.

The present period of coverage is far too short. At the same time it is extremely difficult to obtain an indication of what would be an adequate period of time. Some feel the coverage should be extended to two, three or even four years. It would say the first step would be to amend the act so as to provide a maternity benefit of six months. This would be an increase of 11 weeks on the existing 15.

Some may ask why this should be done. Perhaps we ought to look at this matter from the point of view of the child as much as from the point of view of the mother and what benefits are derived for society as a whole. If we were to increase the benefit period to six months, we would have an investment in the future of our society, the future generations. The happier the child is, the fewer problems he will have later on which fall into the category of juvenile deliquency, need for institutional care, and behaviour of adults that sometimes degenerates to what we learn from the headlines.

It must be clear that every step along this path is addressing itself to and is meant for women who need help most. In this country there is an increasing number of women entering the labour force and an increasing number of single parents. The women we think of with regard to this bill are not those with the glamorous jobs. After a pregnancy, they would not go back to a terrific job. They would go back to factory jobs, clerical, assembly line or cleaning jobs, mostly in our cities.

These women have to bundle up their children between six and seven in the morning, winter and summer. They must take the subway in order to get the child to a day nursery in another place. The child is left there, picked up at the end of the day, and contact is again re-established with the child.

These situations are increasing in number and are more and more typical of our industrial society. The emphasis must be in considering the mother and the child. Last week in this House the report was submitted by the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child. I would like to put on record two quotations from that report because they seem to be helpful for the consideration of the government once it moves in this direction.

One thought in that report indicates that benefits should follow the child. Distinction should not be made between male and female parents when considering those benefits which provide for the care and nuturing of a child. In other words, the main stress or concern ought to keep in mind the interest of the child in the long run and our responsibility as members of society to the next generation.

In the same report the commission put forward the idea of a parenthood insurance scheme whereby a long-term strategy would enable both men and women to participate in the paid labour force while, at the same time, fulfilling their responsibilities as parents. There would be a nine months "child leave" with 75 per cent of regular income, and so on.

The province of Quebec has legislation whereby that provincial government pays expectant mothers a benefit during the first two weeks of their maternity leave while waiting to receive the unemployment insurance cheques to which they are entitled. This measure could be adopted by other provinces, including my province of Ontario, since it is fully and squarely within the realm of the power of provincial governments in the field of social security.

There are weaknesses in the present act. Something can be done about them. One has to do with disentitlement because of labour disputes. During a strike by Air Canada last winter there were women who were due to go on maternity benefits. Once the strike began, they were disqualified because of that development. They were denied benefits until the strike was resolved. Evidently the strike was beyond the control of the workers in that company. That matter should be redressed for the benefit of the mother and the child.

There are certain aspects of the Canada Labour Code that should be brought into line. These should be brought to the attention of interested members if this bill is given second reading and allowed to go to committee.

In conclusion, I want to put some figures on record. In 1974 the total number of women in the labour force was 3,276,000. In 1979 that figure jumped to 4,408,000. In 1974 the number of women in the labour force between ages 20 and 44, the child bearing years, was 1,968,000. Last year that figure increased by almost one million to 2,778,000, a substantial increase of 41 per cent.

I see that my time has expired. Before concluding I wish to thank all those who helped in the drafting of this bill and in gathering the necessary information.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak this afternoon as the member responsible in my party for matters affecting employment, and that includes the unemployment insurance measure before us.

I would like to thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for once again bringing the attention of the House to a continuing problem with a piece of legislation which was passed for the first time in 1971. It was a bad piece of legislation at that time, and it is a bad piece of legislation today. Considerable time has been spent by the House of Commons in trying to correct the legislation, and the hon. member opposite brings another illustration of its inadequacy to our attention today.

One of the issues which the hon. member raised was that to qualify for maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act an applicant should be able to specify the exact date on which she became pregnant. Unless medical science has made advances of which I am unaware, I believe we have a somewhat elusive phenomenon here that one cannot prove, and therefore claimants experience problems when they go to unemployment insurance offices and attempt to establish their right to benefits. This speaks, I think, to the complexity of the unemployment insurance legislation and to the difficulties which are created for claimants across the country.

One of the remarkable features of the bill is the relative proportion of the premiums from employers, employees, and government contributions which today go into the administration of the act itself, not into the benefits, not into the support systems or to the men and women in this country who need that kind of support, but simply into the administration which is a consequence of a badly designed act, one which is difficult to administer.

I would like to bring it to the attention of the House that the government which was elected in this country in May of 1979 undertook as a matter of priority a complete review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. In mind were several principles. One of these was to introduce—reintroduce might perhaps be a more accurate term—and reinforce the use of basic insurance principles. The unemployment insurance fund was originally to be a form of insurance, not different from health or car insurance. Those who through no fault of their own found themselves unemployed would be entitled on an insurance basis to income support which might ride them over until they were able to secure employment again. That principle was abandoned in 1971 and there has been a continuing problem ever since.

The second important purpose of the review was to simplify the plan both for ease of administration and public understanding. Anybody who sits in this chamber representing a riding in this country can speak, I think, to the degree of public misunderstanding which cuts across this country. People do not understand the Unemployment Insurance Act. We have situations where people who live across the street from each other have different eligibility requirements, not different premiums but different eligibility requirements. Some have to work for ten weeks, while their neighbour, right across the street, has to work for 14 weeks before becoming eligible for benefits. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, that speaks to the complexity of the act and the high cost of administration attached to it.

In our review we set out to make the measure more cost-effective. I think this suggests the need which exists to direct the benefits of the measure to those who need them most.

As a new member of Parliament elected for the first time in May of 1979 and sitting in the previous Parliament, I found that on the first occasion our Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration met to examine main estimates, it was brought to our attention that the Auditor General some two years previously had alerted the officials and the minister of manpower and immigration to the fact that some $300 million worth of overpayments were being made out of this fund. We inquired of the minister's officials what had been done in the preceding two years to streamline the administration of the fund to tackle this problem. The answer we received on that occasion, Mr. Speaker, was: nothing. Three hundred million dollars worth of overpayment, a two-year alert to that situation and still the bureaucracy and the minister had done nothing! One of the first things we did was to attempt to ensure that for the same premiums more money would be available to people who would be eligible for the benefits.

One of the other measures we took, Mr. Speaker, was to circulate a discussion paper to provinces, to the unions to management, and to women's groups across the country, proposing amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and we began to hold, in the short time we formed the government, working-level meetings to discuss and clarify the options we were proposing. We were seeking input, not on one aspect of the legislation, such as we are discussing here this afternoon, but on all the necessary aspects of the measure. We did this with a view to getting to a point at which the legislation would make sense to Canadians. This bill has been one of the irritants.

Canadians, as I experience them, are people of good will. They do not enjoy paying taxes, but there is a sense of willingness to pay taxes provided people can be convinced that the money they pay to the support of government is being used in worth-while and equitable ways. That was the thrust of the process that our government started and it is a thrust which, as near as I can tell, has not been continued. I think the government opposite has a rather clear and consistent track record of arbitrary decision making, arbitrary confrontation, and minimal consultation with affected groups.

I sat here this afternoon and heard the hon. member opposite defend his bill and, for the most part, I found that defence commendable. I think he did bring to our attention some of the inequities which exist. But I found myself here wondering where was the principle which should guide government policy in this area. What principles are we addressing when a bill such as this is proposed? Where is the fundamental decision as to whether or not the people of Canada would like the government to have sets of social policy that would encourage more rapid population growth in this country? I think we could find lots of people who might testify to the need for a policy which would accelerate population growth.

If you start with that kind of principle or goal for government policy, does that lead one normally and naturally to a revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act? Does it lead to a revision of the Family Allowances Act? Does it lead to a revision of pensions? Where does that starting point take you? It is in that context that we should examine any expenditure plan. Surely this is a component of an expenditure plan.

● (1650)

Is it really equitable to propose that those people who may have been unemployed or are not part of the labour force for an extended period of time and who choose to work on what is perhaps a short-term project of interest to them, perhaps as short as ten weeks, and who subsequently find themselves pregnant, should receive in those circumstances several weeks of benefits at $100 or $120 a month? Is that a priority in federal expenditure as compared to benefits for someone who chooses to raise a family? Perhaps that person would like to have four or five children. Should taxpayers' money be used to support the first case or the second case, and if we have unlimited funds or if we see it as a priority, should we be devoting public money to supporting both cases?

I think it is a mistake for members of Parliament to make decisions regarding the spending of money in one area without sufficient examination of alternate possibilities.

Another option which was presented in the discussion paper and which, I think, bears repeating in this forum and making it part of the public record, is whether there should be a difference in the eligibility for unemployment insurance between those who voluntarily terminate their association with the labour force and those who are terminated in a job through no choice of theirs. In the Chrysler situation where a company lays off a great number of workers, clearly a case can be made for unemployment insurance benefits to be paid, but when people voluntarily choose to leave the labour force, should they have the same rights to benefits from this fund as do others?

Another principle which was important in our discussion paper and in our way of thinking about this fund was the need, at a time when we are experiencing dramatic price increases, to give more careful consideration to the economic needs of those who have dependants, such as single parents, married people who are the sole support of their children, or perhaps relatives who are handicapped. Should they be eligible for a higher level of support than those who only need to support themselves? That is a fundamental principle which should be addressed in terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and perhaps in terms of this bill.

One of my colleagues asked a few minutes ago whether the same level of benefits should be granted to a recently widowed woman with three children to support as to someone who might be classed as a millionaire or a multi-millionaire. Do we really believe that public money should be expended equally in both cases? That is a fundamental debate in which this House has not engaged for some time, and in the present circumstances it might be wise some time in the future to have the House engage in that kind of debate because it is an issue which cuts across individual pieces of legislation. It might perhaps speak to the different philosophies of the parties in the House.

The NDP, clearly and consistently, argues in favour of the principle of universality, the paying of the same amount of money to millionaires and to poor people. That is how I would describe that principle. On the other hand our party believes that the taxpayers of Canada are more willing to support and have more faith in governments if they could believe that the money which the government takes away from them is being spent on purposes which they believe they can support.

There was a set of paragraphs in the discussion paper which addressed the issue raised by the hon. member opposite in the House today. There was an examination of the issue of part-time employment within the process. There was an examination—I think this would be a fundamental change in the use of these benefits, the money which exists in the unemployment insurance fund—of the development of sets of principles and conditions which might provide a more developmental, long-range view of the use of this fund. Perhaps more emphasis should be given to the utilization of the benefits to provide income support for people whose occupation has become obsolete and who, therefore, need more training, to use, perhaps, some of these benefits to provide income support and employment to people who engage in projects of benefit to their community.

Those are the kinds of ideas which we, as the government, wanted the people of Canada to examine with us before making a decision. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be a mistake—if you were to rule that this bill is legal in the context of what members of Parliament can do—to pass a piece of legislation that is not in the context of our social services policy and in the entirety of our social insurance act.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this legislation because I think the principle involved in this bill is a very important and crucial one. As you stated before, Mr. Speaker, there was some question about the procedural correctness of this bill being a private member's bill. While I claim no knowledge of procedure, I must say that from a substantive point of view, from the point of view of social justice and public policy, this bill should not be a private member's bill but should be a government bill. If it were a government bill, of course, it would be simply a bill in which the Liberals were correcting mistakes which they themselves had made in the past as they changed colours and weaved from this side of the road to the other side.

Let me come to the substance of the bill. Clearly the unemployment insurance legislation at this point discriminates against women, particularly against women who work and raise children. This is a kind of discrimination which we must remove from legislation and from public policy. This has been clearly recognized as a matter of discrimination by the Human Rights Commission, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, and also it would be recognized as discrimination under the Canadian Bill of Rights.

● (1700)

In these times there is a lot of discussion about entrenching the Bill of Rights, about putting that in the constitution. Often when we talk about the constitution we talk about it in a very legalistic fashion. Considering this kind of legislation, and thinking about the constitutional discussions which are presently ongoing, makes me think a better way to talk about the constitution, other than in a legalistic fashion, is to look at our basic values, the basic objectives of society, and to bring the legal framework into line with them. If we allow this kind of discrimination to continue, then it does not matter what kind of legalistic framework we have for governing the country. What is important is how we govern it, and toward what end.

Discrimination against women cannot continue in our society if we are to have a just and equitable society. We should remind ourselves that probably the most important social movement in Canadian society is the women's movement for equality and justice. Certainly it is the movement which offers the greatest potential for over-all social change, and change for the better in our society.

I am reminded of a study which was recently released in Winnipeg. By the way, this study was funded by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion; it was done locally in that city. It related to poverty in the inner city. It clearly highlighted the fact that the most devastating and blatant poverty is suffered by women in the inner cities, more particularly women of native ancestries. By and large these women are single parents who need the most help and who, under the present Unemployment Insurance Act, are penalized and discriminated against when they attempt to work. It seems to me one way to save the public purse money is to have people working rather than on welfare. If there is any group that could save the public purse money by moving from welfare to work, it is single parents, yet we continue to discriminate against them and to penalize them in their efforts to be a part of the work force.

A further part of this bill which I find very puzzling is the so-called magic ten weeks because of the fact that it is based upon the assumption that we know when a child is to be born. I am a relatively recent parent, a father of two children, and certainly I had no way of knowing when those children were to arrive. Given the best medical advice and the fact that I attended pre-natal classes and was very intimately involved in the process of my children being born, I was totally surprised when my children eventually arrived. It is hard for me to know how a bureaucrat who is very far removed from this situation in any particular family can set a date on the arrival of a child. In other words, this magic ten weeks is in no way magical; it is absurd. Of course it is discriminatory and should be removed.

The other basic underlying philosophy behind the present unemployment insurance regulations is that the unemployed are to blame for being unemployed, that it is because of them we have high unemployment insurance costs. Simply that is not true; it is a myth. The ones who are to blame for very high unemployment and the related high costs, of course are those who are in charge of managing the economy. If we were to direct our attention to better management of the economy, rather than attempting to appear tough with regard to the users of unemployment insurance, then the cost of unemployment would be reduced and the wealth of the nation would be increased. Rather than simple legislation which appears to alleviate problems, we need better management of the economy, and we need a more just approach to the distribution of wealth.

Let me just say, Mr. Speaker, that the principle of this bill is worthy of support. This is something that needs to be done, and, hopefully, it is something the government should allow to be done, and done today.

[Translation]

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, any legislation "to reduce the economic penalties suffered by women", as stated in the explanatory notes of Bill C-205, is quite laudable in my opinion.

It is a fact that the provisions of the unemployment insurance plan as a whole must be constantly reviewed in light of ever changing conditions and recent experience. As everyone is aware, because of past experiences, governments have always made in-depth studies of the basic principles of the unemployment insurance plan before making any important changes. The frequently long and complex process of reviewing plan objectives and operations to make it more flexible and to simplify it is always necessary. One of the general elements of such a review is the examination of all special conditions and benefits.

In the context of such a general review, the government could also look at the problems and the issues surrounding maternity benefits to determine whether they are sufficiently fair and flexible or to see how special benefits, including maternity benefits, function within the framework of the unemployment insurance plan.

Some of the issues dealt with in this bill will certainly be included in any eventual review of the unemployment insurance plan. I am talking about the restrictions concerning the eligibility of pregnant woman for ordinary benefits and of the period during which a pregnant woman can receive maternity benefits. These issues, including the so-called ten-week rule greatly concern the government.

I believe that the basic purpose of this bill is quite laudable. However, Mr. Speaker, I think that my male colleagues have not considered certain subtleties of the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations. This act and these regulations constitute a series of provisions which are interdependent to a certain extent. Very often one cannot be amended without affecting the other.

For instance, Bill C-205 proposes that conditions for maternity benefits entitlement be the same as those for sickness benefits entitlement. More specifically, a woman would have to prove that, if it were not for her pregnancy, she would be available for work. The idea would be to assimilate maternity benefits with sickness benefits. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I find this idea totally unacceptable.

To suggest that maternity benefits should be ruled by the same conditions which apply to sickness benefits implies that pregnancy is a sickness. Which is clearly not the case, as hon. members of the fair sex will recognize readily.

The second point which I should like to raise is not so evident to the non-specialist because of its technical aspect, but it is not less important. Now, a pregnant woman must submit a medical certificate to prove her pregnancy. This certificate must show the expected date of her confinement. Under the current provisions, a woman may choose to begin collecting benefits ahead of the eight-week period before her expected date of delivery.

She does not have to prove she would be available for work during that eight-week period. This is a criterion that applies to anyone claiming sickness benefits. If a pregnant woman had to prove she was available for work, often she could not do so. That would reduce the quietude pregnant women now enjoy to prepare themselves for giving birth. By specifying the same criteria for both maternity and sickness benefits, this bill could complicate things uselessly.

I think that is neither fair nor reasonable. Why make it more difficult to prepare for the birth of a child, which is a privileged and important moment in the life of a woman and, I am convinced, critical for the health of the woman as well as that of the child. Current provisions on maternity benefits are flexible and take those factors in consideration. That is why they must be preserved.

But, Mr. Speaker, it should be understood here that I am not suggesting the eligibility criteria governing maternity benefits should not be reviewed or even amended. What I am saying, however, is that those provisions and others should first be considered more carefully so all other new provisions will be equitable.

Mr. Speaker, this bill touches sensitive and controversial issues, issues that have brought women to exert considerable pressure on the government so it would change what they perceived as inequalities in the current provisions on maternity benefits.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, this matter will be given all the necessary importance so our unemployment program will be amended so as to allow women to live their lives fully and according to the rights of every individual. So women should have the right to be on the labour market, the right also to stay at home during a pregnancy and to educate their children but at the same time they must have access to an unemployment insurance program that pays them just and fair benefits.

Mr. Speaker, society needs all its individuals but, without any pretention, I would dare say that women are indispensable because you must certainly know the proverb, and I do not know where it comes from, which says: Being unable to look after everything, God created woman."

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if there is someone left over there who can tell us what the menu will be on Monday?

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Here I am again, Mr. Speaker. I could say to the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Knowles) that, in principle, we will continue Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary secretary a supplementary question? Does the failure of the parliamentary secretary to mention the closure debate for Monday mean that the government has dropped that ridiculous idea?

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Since the hon. member insists, I can tell him that it is possible, if not probable, that the motion will be introduced on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

It being 5.15 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1) the House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEST WISHES TO FIRST MINISTERS ON CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, in view of the importance of the events taking place in another part of the city today, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), the following motion under Standing Order 43:

That this House welcomes the provincial first ministers to the national capital, and extends to them and to the Prime Minister its best wishes for productive discussions and a hopeful beginning to the process of constitutional reform.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DR. C. M. KAO—PLACING IN SOLITARY CONFINEMENT WITHOUT PUBLIC TRIAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the recent arrest and detention of Dr. C. M. Kao, General Secretary of the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan, who, along with other church officials, has been placed in solitary confinement without public trial, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Government of Canada express its concern about this violation of human rights—the summary arrest and subsequent solitary confinement of Dr. C. M. Kao, General Secretary of the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan—to all Canadian companies transacting business in Taiwan so that they, in turn, may impress upon their trading partners in Taiwan the urgency that Canadians feel for the release of these persons; and that a similar concern be conveyed to those governments which still maintain diplomatic ties with Taiwan, so that Canada's views can be brought directly to the attention of the government of Taiwan.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

PENSION EQUALITY FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the subject matter of this motion grows more urgent as time goes on, and I hope this is the day the House will agree to it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):
