THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Royal Highness the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Royal Highness was pleased to deliver a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I take this public opportunity of expressing to you all my deep sense of gratitude for the comfort and support that were afforded us at the time of the serious illness of the Duchess of Connaught, by the numerous messages of sympathy that were received from Canada, and by the knowledge, that the hearts of so many Canadians were with us during those dark days. I can only regret that my enforced absence made it impossible for me to fully exercise the duties of my high office during a considerable portion of last year.

It gives me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you upon the remarkable expansion of Canada's trade with other countries in the past fiscal year, during which our total trade far exceeded that of any preceding year.

The bountiful crops with which the Dominion has fortunately been blessed during the past season have been harvested under unusually favourable conditions, which have enabled the transportation companies to make full use of all the facilities at their disposal. Thus the difficulties, which sometimes arose in former years have not been manifest, and an unusually large proportion of the crops have been conveyed to the sea-board before the close of the season of inland navigation.

Canada has been favoured by a long series of prosperous years, and, although at the present moment business is slightly restricted by the financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, I feel convinced that this condition will be merely temporary, and that the boundless resources of this Dominion which are so fully and universally known and recognized, give us the fullest assurance of continued material prosperity and progress.

As a result of the recent decennial census the representation of the different provinces must be readjusted, as required by the British North America Act, and a Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

A Bill consolidating the Railway Act and its various amendments, as well as Bills relating to the Civil Service and to Trust and Loan Companies, will be submitted for your consideration.

Several other Bills will be submitted, including measures providing for increased representation of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, in the Senate.

The volume of immigration during the present fiscal year promises to be greater than that of any preceding year. It has come in greatest measure from the British Isles and from the United States, but a large stream of desirable immigration has also reached our shores from other countries.

You will be pleased to learn that satisfactory arrangements have been made with the various provinces under the Agricultural Instruction Act passed at the last session. My advisers are convinced that the co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces which is thus afforded, will accomplish excellent results, in assuring better agricultural instruction and needful improvement of existing methods of agriculture.

The work on the National Transcontinental railway has been rapidly advanced during the past year, and, notwithstanding the difficulties attending the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and the provision of terminals, every possible progress has been made in bringing that important project nearer to completion.

In connection with the highly important subject of transportation of our products, the provision of adequate terminal facilities at our great national ports has received and is receiving the attention of my advisers.

You have doubtless learned with satisfaction that the new government terminal elevator at Port Arthur is completed, and that it has been in operation since October last. In conjunction with this, a system of interior terminal elevators has been begun, which will provide largely increased facilities for the farmers of the great grain producing provinces.

The International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, which has been in session in London for several weeks, has had under consideration questions of the highest importance, and it is hoped that its deliberations may result in more effective measures for assuring the safety of the passengers and crews of ocean-going steamships. Representatives of Canada were appointed by Order in Council and have been in attendance at all sessions of the conference.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. You will be pleased to know that the revenue has been ample to cover both ordinary and capital expenditure.

The estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date. They have been prepared with due regard to the necessary development of the resources of the Dominion, coupled with careful attention to economical administration.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the subjects to which I have called your attention, I pray that the blessings of Divine Providence may attend your deliberations.

On motion of Hon. Robert Rogers, it was ordered that the Speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, until disposed of.

TITLES OF HONOUR.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to abolish Titles of Honour in Canada. He said: It has been rumoured that there is some danger of the spirit of democracy in Canada being compromised, perhaps not by this Government, but by the existence of conditions whi h will enable the representatives of the people, through a misconception of their duty, to create titles of honour which are contrary to the spirit of democracy in Canada. This Bill refers to the powers and jurisdiction of this Parliament, and is intended to abolish such titles of honour, and to restore things to a normal condition of democracy.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE, moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Criminal Code. He said: The Bill is self-explanatory. Its purpose is to amend the Criminal Code with the view of abolishing in toto the death penalty in Canada. I feel that the death penalty is a blot on Christendom, a blight on religion and a reproach to any Christian nation allowing it to stand on its statute-books.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HOURS OF LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, respecting the hours of labour on public works. He said: The Bill which I now present to the House has been on the Order Paper for the past two sessions. Every one knows why the Bill was not reached last year, but I hope that this year we shall have time to reach it. As I said last session, I trust that the present Government will have the same disposition to accept this Bill as they had when they were on the opposition side of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. H. F. McLEOD (York, N.B.) rose to move that an Address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General offering the humble thanks of this House to His Royal Highness for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament. He said:

I appreciate the kindly reception which has been given me on rising to-day, a reception, I fancy, that is accorded to every new member who makes his initial step in this House of Commons. I may be forgiven, Sir, if I find myself a bit embarrassed when, for the first time, I rise in this Chamber to say a few words, a Chamber that has with it and in it and about it such a wondrous wealth of tradition of the days gone by, such a glory of historic memories of the men of both political parties who have shaped the destinies of this young nation. The thought that will perhaps be uppermost in the mind of any man rising to address this House for the first time, as it is in mine, is that, after all, it is worth while to sacrifice something of material advantage to enter public life, to serve, in even the most humble capacity, this young nation which we all love.

His Royal Highness, in the speech which he was pleased to deliver at the opening of this session, made reference to the comfort and support that went out from the Canadian people to himself and his family during the illness of the Duchess in the summer just gone. May I say—and I think I voice the feeling not only of this House but of the Canadian people—that from every city, hamlet and farm in this broad land there went out a genuine feeling of heartfelt sympathy not only because His Royal Highness comes here as a member of the Royal Family, not only because following a long line of illustrious predecessors in the office of the Governor General, he has fully lived up to the high tradition maintained in the past in that office, but because of the kindly courtesy and the heartfelt sympathy which the Duchess herself has shown wherever she has gone in Canada.

A word should be said in regard to the fact that in the fiscal year just closed, Canada reached the high water mark of her trade with other countries. This country to-day is no longer content to sit quietly by while other countries are gathering up the trade markets of the world. Our people and merchants are seeking every port and every country for their merchandise; and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), not now in his place in this House, has in his portfolio and position no sinecure although it may have been created as such. No; his office is a living vital factor in the commerce and trade of this country, making for the upbuilding of Canada, so far as its trade and commerce with other countries is concerned. Canada is not doing business in any back street to-day. Canada to-day is just leaping into prominence. She is commanding now the admiration of the world and sending her products to all corners of the world; her merchants are competing on equal terms with big merchants all over the wide world. And what is the result? The result is the building up in Canada of the happy home of the labourer, the mechanic and the artisan to make this country great that we live in and that we of both political parties are here to do our best to serve.

We in Canada, in common with all the countries of the world, have felt some of the financial stress, the tightness of money and financial stringency prevailing everywhere during last year. It would be folly for any man to stand in his place here and say that Canada to-day was not feeling the touch of hard times, to assert that Canada was not touched by the tightness of money as every other country in the world was touched; but I know of no country in the world that has stood up against those hard times and that period of money tightness in the way Canada did. That is absolutely true of the Maritime Provinces, and New Brunswick especially, the province from which I come. In our province, we never had a better business or a better Christmas trade or easier money than we had in 1913. In a year when there was money tightness and financial depression all over the world, it was fortunate that we had in Western Canada—and not only in Western Canada but in Eastern Canada as well, humbler perhaps in production but none the less a producing element in this country—I say it was fortunate that we had in Western Canada the most bountiful wheat crop that this country ever knew. It was eminently fortunate also that we had transportation facilities such that the wheat crop was moved as it never was moved before in the history of this country, making the most prompt money return to the farmers of the middle West at a time when such was the best thing that could happen to them and the best thing that could happen to Canada generally. I do not know that I may claim any credit for the Government or party which I support, because of the condition of the transportation facilities. But I do know that if the crop had not been moved the people would have been hammering at the doors of this Government and worrying this Government to death because it was not moved expeditiously.

Perhaps the most important subject mentioned in the speech from the Throne is the Redistribution Bill. Certainly it is a matter of vital importance to the province from which I come, and to those other provinces down by the sea. I just wish for a moment to discuss the Redistribution Bill, not in any narrow, sectional or provincial aspect, because, Sir, I take it that when a man enters this House—or whether he does not for that matter—whether he comes from one province or another, he is a Canadian first of all. He forgets the narrow boundaries of provinces, and remembers that he is a Canadian and has regard only for the upbuilding of this nation.

I may be permitted to discuss just for a moment the question of redistribution from the point of view of a Maritime provinces man. If we follow the same principle that was followed after the census of 1891 and 1901, the representation of the Maritime provinces after the next Redistribution Bill will be: Nova Scotia, 16; New Brunswick, 11; Prince Edward Island, 3. That is, we will have 30 representatives in this Parliament where, at the time of Confederation, we had 40. I want to frankly admit to this House, and to you, Mr. Speaker, that from a legal point of view we have absolutely no status. The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, affirmed by the Privy Council, has settled, so far as present decisions are concerned, that we cannot hold our original representation, but I submit that though we have not a strong or in fact any legal status, we have the strongest moral and equitable standing. It is undoubtedly correct that at the time of Confederation the Fathers of Confederation had no thought in their minds of a re-adjustment downward. The only thought in their minds was a re-adjustment upward. They were optimists, that is true. They could not at that time foresee the growth of the West. Prince Edward Island, I want to frankly admit, stands in the best position of all, and it can be shown, although I do not wish to trouble the House with any citations to-day, that there was a distinct agreement at the time Prince Edward Island entered Confederation that she should have a minimum representation of six members. That was not made a part of Section 149 of the British North America Act, but I submit to this House that population is not, and should not be, the sole guide in representation. Self-governing colonies must have adequate representation. In the minds of the men who represented New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, there was no thought of a loss in representation. It could not have been in the minds of those men, sublime optimists as they were, that there would grow up in this country a great western country that they knew little of in those days. They could not foresee that there would rise up from their own firesides in those provinces down by the sea their best blood to go out into Western Canada and to make that western country great. I say this in no narrow spirit. I am as proud as any man can be of the growth of these magnificent provinces, but I do say that we should devote our best efforts to enabling our young men and our young women to build up all our great and mighty provinces under one flag of empire, the empire we love. This country owes something of equity, something of justice, to the provinces which have suffered by the marvellous growth that we all delight in of the West. Just these words to-day in regard to the matter of re-distribution; I thought I ought to say something about it.

Representing a farming community as I do, I want to say one word and to bear my tribute, honestly borne, to the gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Agriculture in this country. Since this Government has come into power, the farmers of my province, at all events, have known that there was a Department of Agriculture. In my province—and this applies to every province in the Dominion—agricultural schools have not only been made possible, but we already have one agricultural school at Sussex just about to be opened, and another in Woodstock that will be opened in a very short time. We have realized the goal of technical education for the farmer and the son of the farmer. And in these days, when unfortunately the city does attract the boys and when the scarcity of labour is the tremendous problem that the farmer has to solve; in these days when you have to make farm life attractive to keep the boys and girls on the farm, we have provided technical education not only in the agricultural schools but we have technical education expounded throughout the summer time on the farms themselves, so that it is brought right down close to the farmer and he and his son have opportunity to become real scientific farmers, to love their work, to stay on the farm. In this way it is to be hoped the problem will be solved of bringing the people back to the land.

We are passing through in this country—I suppose it is the history of the world—a period when the drift of population is away from the land, a most unhappy condition. Women's institutes, which the present Minister of Agriculture has assisted so much, are designed to remove what some people are pleased to call the humdrum of farm life, to make cheerful and pleasant the farmer's home life in the evenings, and to cause him to be contented with his surroundings. All this must be of great advantage to our country and its people, because Canada can only maintain its position as a wealthy and growing wealthier country if the people stay on the farm so that we may be a great producing nation.

While I have said that one word in regard to farming, may I be allowed to say just another word in regard to immigration? It is predicted in the Speech from the Throne that this year's immigration will be greater than ever in the history of the country, and we trust it may be so. But, modestly, may I suggest this, that the great lesson we must learn in Canada is not to have indiscriminate immigration but to keep the breed pure, and I believe the breed can be kept pure. The great majority of the immigrants which have come to our shores in recent years have been English, Scotch, French and Irish. I want the Northern races; I want them because they are adapted to this country. The French people come from a more southern clime, it is true, but the French people in the early days of our country's history came to Canada, and, in face of hardships almost unrecountable, they helped to make this country great. We want the races I have referred to, but we do not want such immigrants as came to us in days gone by, and especially do we not want such as those which helped to swell the population of the United States to such great number, but to the great disadvantage, in my judgment, of the people of the United States.

Reference has been made to the National Transcontinental railway and to its early completion. I regret very much to interject a harsh note into a function which is supposed to be without any harshness, but I must point out that we in the province of New Brunswick are building a railway down the valley of the St. John known as the St. John Valley Railway. It extends from a point on the National Transcontinental railway at or near Grand Falls, 220 miles down the river, to the port of St. John. The burden upon the province of New Brunswick—notwithstanding the very material assistance already received and more to be asked for from this Government—the burden entailed by this railway upon the province of New Brunswick has been tremendous. The necessity for this burden upon our Province need never have been had the National Transcontinental Railway been located by the only route sane men would have chosen. The Transcontinental railway in New Brunswick runs from Edmundston, in the county of Madawaska, across to Chipman, in the county of Queens, and on its route through that province it will not pick up one pound of local traffic; it only means the burning up of the revenue producing forests of the province. I would not be doing justice to the people I stand for in the province of New Brunswick did I not openly declare that a great wrong has been committed against them, and that line in its course through the province stands as a monument of that great wrong. There is one way, not to right the wrong, but there is one way by which it can be to some extent remedied, and that is if we could build a small branch from the divisional point of Nappodogan to connect with the Intercolonial railway at Cross Creek, getting running rights down over the railway to the port of St. John. Unless that is done —and I purpose in so far as I have power to urge it upon Parliament and upon this Government—unless that is done, the money already expended on the Transcontinental railway in New Brunswick (and I am fair in saying it has cost $100,000 per mile) is worse than wasted. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, to have had to interject that harsh note.

I want to say, Sir, that there are two things not in the Speech this year, but which have been in the Speech in days gone by. One of these is a reference to a Bill in aid of the highways in this country. In 1911 and in 1912, as you will remember, a Bill was introduced providing for the expenditure of one million dollars on the highways of our various provinces, and providing also for the distribution of that money under the fairest and most equitable terms. That Bill caught the heart of the provinces of Canada. Nothing else could be done that would appeal more to the farming population that I represent. Nothing else could be done to make it easier for the farmer to stay on the land, because his mode of transportation to get his crop to the nearest railway station is over the roads. It meant in my province $50,000 to $60,000 in 1911-12. If the roads had been built, it would have greatly improved transportation facilities. I could hardly understand the partisanship run mad, and that again in 1912-13, when a million and a half of money was voted by the representatives of the people of this country, the Bill should again be defeated. I tell you frankly that we, in the province of New Brunswick, looked forward with the greatest anticipation to receiving that money. We needed it; other provinces needed it, and I can only regret that men found it possible, through a spirit of partisanship, to take away from their own people those things that came nearer to doing practical good to the people whence they came than any other thing could possibly do.

Before I sit down, I wish to speak with regard to another matter that is not mentioned in the Speech. I am not specifically informed as to why no reference is made to naval aid to the mother land, but I fancy that the right honourable leader of this Government (Mr. Borden) having once had the humiliating spectacle of advertising to the world that any body of men, whether responsible or otherwise, would refuse to help Canada to enter upon her duties, her privileges and her responsibilities in the matter of naval aid, did not desire to undergo a similar experience a second time. I am not going to go into sky-rockets. I simply want to say this, Mr. Speaker. For many years before Canada found her feet, before we were possessed of the buoyant revenue that we have to-day, Canada allowed the taxpayers of a little sea-girt island to put their hands into their pockets and to pay the bill. Now we have grown big. We consider ourselves quite a people. We call ourselves a nation. We have at least this, that to this country has come, as has come to every country under the flag, to black and white, to yellow and red, to every creed and colour, the right of liberty and equal citizenship under the flag. Yet, with our buoyant revenues, with our wealth of potential greatness, we have said that we are not willing to bear our share of the defence of that nation, of which we so often say we are proud to form a part. I rather sympathize with the Government and with the right honourable Leader of the Government in the disposition which made him refrain this year from mentioning naval aid in the Speech.

I thank you, Sir, and honourable members on both sides of this House for the kindly feeling with which you have listened to the rambling remarks of a novice. I am not partisan enough to think that honourable members on both sides are not endeavouring to serve this great country and this great Empire, and I hope that with honourable members on both sides of this House I shall do my humble part in advancing the interest of this young Canada that we love.

Mr. J. O. LAVALLEE (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, considering my lack of experience I should undoubtedly have shun the honour of seconding the mover of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, had I not realized at the same time that the invitation was intended as a compliment to that community of farmers and settlers in whose midst I consider myself happy to dwell.

Moreover the compliment thus paid is presently being turned into a priceless favour, since I am permitted to express myself in that language which my fellow-countrymen appreciate so highly and which the right hon. leader of this Government, as well as the majority of his colleagues, is proud to be able to understand and to speak.

Whenever my hon. friends on the other side have an opportunity of meeting the French-Canadian electors of the province of Quebec or elsewhere, they should to my mind thank Providence for having entrusted with the management of public affairs in this country, a prime minister who understands and enjoys speaking it, though sprung from a different stock.

And in making public acknowledgment of this fact, they may be making amends for having allowed a despicable prejudice to gain currency in their interest, viz. that an English-speaking prime minister could not possibly be as well disposed towards, or as devoted to, the French-Canadian people.

On behalf of my constitutents and on my own behalf, on behalf of those pioneers of colonization who are carrying on the work started three centuries ago for a greater and more united Canada, I beg to tender to the right hon. Prime Minister the assurance of my most hearty gratitude for this kindly courtesy.

It has been stated that the twentieth century will be the century of Canada. I may add that it will be such only insomuch as agriculture and the agricultural class will have been granted their due share of influence in public affairs. It will be the century of Canada only in so much as this quarter of a century will have been the golden age of agriculture.

It was incumbent on this Government to accomplish for Canada what a Sully, under Henry the Fourth, accomplished for France in the sixteenth century. We read in history that, with a view to allaying the hard times which France had been suffering for a number of years, and with a view at the same time to improving the financial status of his government, that great statesman endeavoured to foster agriculture by having more land cleared, by building and repairing bridges, improving means of transportation, in short by doing for the farmer's benefit all that was of a nature to help him on and to improve his opportunities. 'Ploughing and pasturage, those, he was wont to say, are the real gold mines of Peru.'

Those means which ensured to France in the early seventeenth century a period of real and solid wealth and prosperity, should benefit our country to a large extent. Similar means are bound to bring about similar results.

Such is my sincere belief, Mr. Speaker, and I am satisfied that this same policy would successfully, and once for all, solve the problem of the high cost of living which has been growing on us for the last decade, and which has its starting point in the fact that agricultural production has not kept pace with the increase of population in business and industrial centres.

I say that within the last ten years the progress of agriculture, as well as of the live stock industry, has not been on a par with the growth of population. The last census contains interesting statistics in this connection. They go to show that the population of several countries in the older provinces, instead of growing has diminished, and that business and manufacturing towns and cities have grown in proportion. Rule of thumb and slipshod methods have had the upper hand over the suggestions of a reasoned and progressive husbandry, such as would have resulted from a practical and painstaking teaching of agriculture. Accordingly we have witnessed the exodus of farmers' sons towards the cities, and the consequent scarcity of that labour with which farming cannot dispense.

So it was that on reaching power this Government had to find some immediate means of preventing an imminent crisis, by means of legislation for the encouragement of agriculture and an appropriation of ten millions towards that end.

It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that we have not yet in such short time felt the beneficial effects of such a policy. In the province of Quebec peradventure, we may have to wait longer than elsewhere for such beneficial effects; despite the safeguards taken and the agreements entered into, the Quebec local authorities do not deem it advisable to conform to the spirit of the law and the views of the Dominion Minister of Agriculture. There, more so than elsewhere, people allow themselves to be too closely inspired and guided by considerations foreign to the progress of agriculture.

I hope to be granted an opportunity later on to recur this matter and to show in what way Dominion subsidies are expended in some counties for the mere purpose of making electors believe that things in Ottawa are actually managed by the Liberal party.

Referring once more to the Address, I may say that the people of this country rejoice with His Highness the Governor General on account of the bountiful crops which Providence has bestowed on this country in the course of the year just expired.

Whoever has had an opportunity of visiting the various provinces of the Dominion in the harvesting season of last year, must have realized, indeed, the unspeakable prosperity of this great Dominion. The yield has been immense and the quality good, as a rule.

Providence has been lavish, and hon. gentlemen may possibly condescend to thank her for showing such generosity in favour of an administration whose views and principles they do not always approve. Considering how superabundant the products, some apprehension was entertained as to the possibility of carrying to their destination that wealth of the farms. Fortunately, thanks to the foresight of the Railway Department, thanks to the prompt action taken by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that much feared congestion of traffic and grain transportation was avoided. Early in the season, and without any undue stoppage, the grain from the West was moved to the elevators and other terminals along the railway lines and canals, and in greater proportion than heretofore through our Canadian ports and state-aided railway lines.

That shows plainly, Mr. Speaker, that by continuing to develop and improve our means of transportation, by ensuring the completion of our great railway lines now in course of construction, such as the National Transcontinental, the Hudson Bay railway, and I might add, by bringing about the building of the Georgian Bay canal, as soon as the Government are in a position to start that great work, they will be not only setting the framework of Confederation on a solid basis, through a closer union of the provinces, but besides they will be giving greater stability to market conditions and prices, and fostering commercial intercourse between the East and the West for the greater advantage of the country as a whole.

The continuous carrying out of a well matured plan for the improvement of our transportation facilities will accomplish more towards allaying that crisis and that craving for new treaties with the United States to the detriment of Canada, than would reciprocity, which some people look upon as a sort of cure-all the ills with which our country may be afflicted.

We still hear at this moment the voice of two provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, praying for reciprocity, on account of the surplus value their products would acquire on the United States markets, and which tariff barriers prevent them from securing. But, to my mind, Mr Speaker, that appeal will become less insistent, as our transportation facilities between the eastern and western seaboards grow and reach their full development, for then these people will find it just as advantageous to sell their products here or in Europe, as to ship them to the United States, especially now that our railways are provided with proper cold storage facilities at their terminals.

It may not be irrelevant and without interest, Mr. Speaker, to recall just now an event, an epoch-making event in the annals of the old city of Champlain, which has left a profound impression on the minds of its inhabitants. I refer to the visit paid during recess to Quebec and Levis by the right hon. leader of this Government in company with the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Marine.

They did not, as so many had done before them in later years, come in quest of laurels or encomiums; they came as promoters and builders of works, large, durable and great, in accord with their dreams of the great future they foresee for that region, heretofore practically ignored and neglected.

The days of trifling and dilly-dallying are over. Confidence is gaining ground on every hand, whether in agriculture, in finance, in business or industry. This Government, faithful to its traditions and to its national policy, guides Canada in its ascent towards its true destiny. The empire, I might say the whole of Europe, have their eyes on us, and we are in a way to secure for ourselves an enviable place among the nations of the world, under the protection of the British flag.

Is it any wonder that an ever increasing stream of imigration should be turning towards Canada? The Dominion has become as it were the centre of attraction for Latin Europe, the promised land of the empire. It is no longer that snow-bound and ice-bound country, it is the wheat granary of the world and the finest gem in the British Crown.

Accordingly the Department of the Interior has been called upon to exert itself to the utmost, in order to be able to properly look after these new arrivals and locate them on homesteads at its disposal, with a view to facilitating their first efforts as settlers on the land.

If, on the other hand, and with the object of securing work in the cities a certain proportion of those immigrants, through motives which the department is not in a position to control or cast aside, have temporarily been drawn away from the farm, the greater part have settled thereon. This is no longer the time when roving Doukhobors, satisfied that they had some divine mission to fulfil, roamed through the western country singing the praises of the powers that be.

As soon as this Government reached power, the problem of immigration and of the bringing home of our people was taken up. Commissioners were appointed to look into the conditions under which that branch of the service had been managed.

While I do not wish to anticipate, I think I am safe in stating that there was brought to light a state of things such that this Government will find itself under the necessity of bringing about important changes in the system advocated and applied by our predecessors in this connection. Some ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, large numbers of Canadians had under our eyes been induced to cross the border; and those people were unable to come back home on account of the apathy of the then Government.

Nevertheless all of them remember their native land; their manners are after our own, and they have preserved the best traditions which make hardy and energetic peoples. At heart and in mind they have remained Canadians, they are attached to our institutions and are still loyal to the British Crown, though living under the Stars and Stripes. As I have said, the overhauling of that branch of the department of immigration on a more practical, fairer and more thoroughly national basis, will, if I am not mistaken, be taken up by this Government, and our Canadians settled over there will thus be enabled once more to enjoy the bracing conditions of our Canadian clime.

True, owing to the enterprise of our pioneer parish priests, with no other resources than their self-sacrifice and fervour, which recall those of the early makers of Canada. that return home is taking in larger numbers from year to year; new churches are being built in parts heretofore unexplored. In northern Ontario as well as in the farthest west, at the foot of the Rockies, French-speaking emigrants brought back from the United States are settling down and enlarging the realm of civilization and of the Canadian fatherland. I entertain the hope that in years to come, further impetus will be given to the work of bringing back home our people, through the painstaking action taken by the Conservative government in the matter.

The hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat, aptly characterized and described the present administration from the business point of view; he gave us a thorough insight into the country's financial conditions. The conclusion is forced upon us that, notwithstanding the large amounts appropriated for public works, notwithstanding the heavy expenditure incurred towards the utilization of our industrial and trade opportunities and the development of our transportation facilities on land and on water, notwithstanding the great works being carried on at Halifax, Québec, St. John and elsewhere, the hon. Minister of Finance has still in hand funds available for the cutting down of the public debt and the registering of surpluses.

That is the best of evidence that a wise government is not impoverished through the proper expenditure of public funds. What characterizes bad governments is the improper spending of the revenues left at their disposal. Such unprecedented success in the financial history of the Canadian Government is the result of the strictest economy, of an umimpeachable honesty, combined with industry and genius in the supervision of all and every department. We hear it stated in all quarters, and rightly so, that it was a business government the people put into power in 1911. That reputation has been well sustained, since after holding power for a period of only two years, without boasting or trumpery, this Government has made for itself a record which recommends it irresistibly to the confidence and respect of the Canadian people.

And should I recall the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the province of Québec, one of whose sons was honoured with the premiership of the Dominion, seemed for a while as if in a state of lethargy; but now they are awakening and taking their place along with the other provinces under the colours of the great Liberal-Conservative Party. That means the vendication of the Conservative party, the conversion of the people to the men who advocated the National Policy and laid the foundation of the Canadian nationality in America. Quebec acknowledges as her benefactors and leaders those who carried on the life work of Macdonald and Cartier.

Their names stand for honesty, perseverance, industry and patriotism. Such are the facts which entitle the representative of the province of Quebec in the Cabinet to hold in the public opinion, in the hearts and minds of the French-Canadians, the place which was held by Cartier some fifty years ago.

It may not be amiss to state right here that the Post Office department has in the person of the present Postmaster General not only a man of push and progress, but also a benefactor of the people. Not content with adjusting and increasing the salaries of hosts of underpaid civil servants, he resolved that the whole country would have the benefit of that important service, and acordingly provided for the establishment of numerous post offices, extended the rural delivery system and, particularly caused Parliament to pass that parcels post legislation from which great results are expected by the country folk.

Differently from some of his predecessors, unmindful of what it might bring to himself, he has accomplished results out of his own mind, which are of great benefit to the people. In less than two years, the Post Office Department, as well as the Public Works Department, has given results which overshadow all that had been done during the fifteen previous years. I am merely speaking aloud what the people feel and think, despite the back-sliding and slanders of a blinded press, organized and paid for the purpose.

As soon as a fairer redistribution of the constituencies will have been effected, so as to enable the electors to make known their will, this Government (there is no undue optimism in thinking so), will be sustained by a majority of them. Have we not had, during recess at different times and in various parts, expressions of the popular will?

Considering those indications of the trend of public opinion, considering the facts which proclaim the good management of this Administration, considering the advance made in so short a period, this is the time to state and repeat that, since Providence and the people are with us, you should join us also. Why should gentlemen on the other side wage war on us, now that industry, commerce and agriculture have shaken off the fetters of the past, and entered an area of progress and prosperity? Why should they wage war on us when we have the support of the people?

As I said a moment ago, dickering, dilly-dallying, encomiums are no longer in season. Canada, our common country, is in need of the co-operation of all men of good will. As representatives of the people, we are entrusted with the glorious task, I should say the privilege, of applying our energy to the building up of this country, not only into the finest colony, but into the nation to-morrow.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to thank my hon. colleagues in this House for having kept in mind that youth is generous, confident and enthusiastic, and for having shown indulgence on this occasion.

I wholly approve of the remarks made by the eloquent mover of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, and it is with infinite pleasure that I second the motion.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have all listened with great interest and still greater pleasure to the observations with which we have been favoured by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallee). I say we have all listened with interest and pleasure, though some of us, and I amongst them, cannot subscribe to many of the statements both of fact and of opinion made by these hon. gentlemen. Notwithstanding all differences, however, we on this side of the House are all happy to join with our friends on the other side in extending congratulations to both the mover and the seconder of the Address. My hon. friend from York, N.B.—if he permits me to apply that term to him—came into this House preceded by a reputation earned in another sphere; and it is only fair to him to say—and it is a great pleasure for me to say—that on this occasion he has been quite equal to his reputation. Though I differ with him in many things, as I said a moment ago, I recognize the felicitous manner in which his views were expressed. He was especially happy in the terms in which he expressed to Their Royal Highnesses the sentiments of deep sympathy which we and all the people of Canada have felt for them in the cruel ordeal through which they have passed, an ordeal which involved for the one long days and weeks of suffering almost between life and death, and for the other a long agony of suspense and anxiety. It is the simple truth, as has been said by my hon. friend from York, N.B., that there was sincere rejoicing among all classes of the community at the almost miraculous escape of Her Royal Highness, not solely on account of the high position she occupies, but still more because of the many domestic virtues and womanly graces, the many high qualities of heart and mind, of which she has given so many evidences during her short stay amongst us. All classes of Canadians have learned, and every day learn more and more, to appreciate these qualities of mind and heart, and daily the prayers from millions of Canadian homes rise fervent to Heaven for her complete recovery.

Perhaps my hon. friend will not be surprised, however, if I say that when he departed from this subject and dealt with the public business of the country, his remarks were not altogether so felicitous, at least in my opinion. He adopted toward the Administration, so far as the course of public business is concerned, a most eulogistic tone, a tone which, I believe, was not altogether in accord with the sober truth of the record. But if I say this it is not at all because I wish to take issue with my hon. friend on this point or to quarrel with him; for, remembering that once I myself was young, I know that it is always allowable to youth to be enthusiastic and even to carry enthusiasm not only to the extreme limit of exaggeration but even to the extreme limit of blind misconception.

Had my hon. friend been in this House before, I am sure he would have asked some explanations from the Government for having been so tardy in summoning Parliament together, for having allowed the months of November and December to pass without moving a finger toward the despatch of the busness of the country. My hon. friend is not aware, as you, Mr. Speaker, and I are aware, and as the Government I am sure cannot have forgotten, that it is a part of the law of this Parliament—the well-recognized though unwritten law—that Parliament ought to meet in the early fall and in any case not later than the month of November unless some great public event should interpose. Indeed, so well recognized is this law that the financial year was some years ago, changed in consequence of it, so as to run from the 1st of April to the 31st of March, instead of, as before, from the 1st of July to the 30th of June. What can be the reason why Parliament was not summoned as it should have been summoned, in the early fall? What is the public reason which can be invoked by the Government for having been so tardy and dilatory? What reason can there be except the reason which causes the insolvent debtor with a small list of assets and a long list of liabilities to put off the day when he must meet the creditors to whom he must give an account? So the Government has been putting off, and putting off, and putting off, until the very last moment when they had to meet Parliament, their creditor and their master—and meet it with a very small list of assets and a long list of liabilities.

Had my hon. friend from York, N.B., been longer in Parliament he would have noticed something new on the Treasury benches. My hon. friend from Bellechasse may well have noticed it, for he has been here for two sessions. There are two features to which I wish to call attention, of which one is new and the other is not new. The new feature is that we have on the Treasury benches, at long last, a Solicitor General. It took a long time to fill that vacancy. The mantle remained suspended for something like two years, but at last it has fallen on the shoulders of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). My compliments to the Solicitor General. I speak my mind frankly when I state that I believe he is well qualified for the position—well qualified from the legal point of view and still better qualified from the political point of view. He has been in this House for some years. It has been my pleasure to observe him almost from the day he came here; and almost from his first appearance we have had evidences not a few that he is endowed with a very subtle mind, that he is a past master dialectician. But, if I must speak my mind fully and give my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie all the credit to which he is entitled, I must say that while he is a clever dialectician, he is a still cleverer sophist. There are few men in this House or out of it who can clothe fallacies and paradoxes with more fitting garments than can the hon. gentleman. When it comes to the task of making the worse appear the better reason, few men can do more than my hon. friend the new Solicitor General. And, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) were in his place, I would tell him that he had better look to his laurels, for even at his own game the Solicitor General can give him points. But the mystery to me is here: The qualifications of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie were obvious; not only we but the public—everybody—knew them. Why, then, has it taken so long for my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to discover them? I cannot imagine that my right hon. friend with his acute mind did not see that which was obvious to everybody. The mystery is why he should have allowed twelve months, twenty-four months, to elapse, without filling the portfolio which he has at last filled. Of course, the reason may have been that, while he was as well aware as others of the qualifications of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, yet that hon. member was not the only pebble on the beach. The beach was strewn with pebbles. Looking before me now, I can see one, two, three four, five, six—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, six I can see, the friends of each of whom believed that he was entitled to occupy the position, and each one of whom believed that he was more entitled to it than his neighbour. How is it that they have been left and my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie chosen? That is where the subtle mind of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie served him. That subtle mind taught him that something more than legal ability must play a part in the choice to be made. He was not satisfied to show only his ability as a member of this House; he showed his teeth also. And when the Prime Minister saw those sharp teeth bared and ready to sink into his quivering flesh, all hesitation was gone.

You will remember that towards the end of last session the Bank Bill came back from the Senate, with some amendments. The Minister of Finance, who was in charge of the Bill, accepted the amendments, and explained them to the House. He said that they were trivial, nominal, and of no consequence; that although they were, perhaps, of some improvement to the measure, they affected in no way the principle of it. Thereupon there was a storm of indignation, or rather of pretended indignation, on the other side of the House. Some hon. gentlemen rose to protest, and the most valiant of these was the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). He attacked the amendments most violently; he said that they changed the whole tenor of the Bill; he shot at the Senate, which he could not reach, and over the heads of the Government, whom he wished not to hurt. It was more than an attack; it was a warning. The right hon. gentleman remembered a page in the parliamentary history of England upon which it is recorded that when Sir Robert Walpole was prime minister a young cavalry officer was elected to Parliament, and the moment he had spoken the Prime Minister said to his friends, 'that warhorse must be muzzled.' It is evident that when my hon. friend the Prime Minister heard the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, he said to himself that that hon. gentleman would have to be muzzled. Unfortunately, as my hon. friend has chosen the great William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, as his model, and as the Minister of Finance has gone so far as to approve the action of the Senate, my hon. friend the new Solicitor General will have to use his best ability to approve also, whatever may be his own feelings.

The other circumstance to which attention should be called, and one with which we are unfortunately commencing to be familiar, is the absence of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I am aware that that hon. gentleman is absent in England, and that he is attending the sittings of a commission appointed in consequence of a resolution passed by the last Imperial Conference. These duties are important, but they are in no way connected with the Department of Trade and Commerce; in fact, such duties should never have been entrusted to a Minister of the Crown. The late Government had recommended a man of great commercial ability, and of high standing in the financial world, Mr. P. C. Larkin; but this recommendation was disregarded and the appointment cancelled by the present Government when they came into office. This was, I believe, the first act in their debauchery of dismissals; the last we have not heard. The Minister of Trade and Commerce should never have taken these duties to which I have referred. He should have remembered that, according to Scripture, no man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. This is exactly what has taken place. My hon. friend has adopted his duties as commissioner and he has forgotten his duties as minister. He was absent during the greater part of last session; he may be absent the greater part of this session. It is true that last year he had the excuse, as was hinted a moment ago by the mover of the Address, that he was in search of trade for the growers and producers of Canada—a most laudable ambition. He went to China, and he went to Japan. I speak not by way of condemnation, but I may add that we have it upon good authority that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce contemplates sending bakers to China and Japan to teach the Chinese and the Japanes the superiority of a wheat diet over a rice diet. Again I say I do not condemn; I entirely approve. Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce send not only bakers, but confectioners, pastry cooks, and culinary missionaries of every description, and let their mission be to wean the celestials from their gastronomical proclivities; from swallows' nests, sharks' fins, bamboo roots and ducks' eggs two years old, and induce them to substitute for these delicacies the modern preparations of wheat flour, and anything and everything in the way of cereals, not forgetting porridge, the food of the strong and the free in this part of the world. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as a result of his pilgrimages to Japan and China, will succeed in obtaining for this country the sale of one more barrel of flour than we have exported hitherto, the Government will have done more than they have so far accomplished during their four years of office.

The Speech from the Throne is remarkable for two things: first, for what it contains, and, second, for what it omits. Before I pass to what it omits, let me refer to what it contains. It has a paragraph referring to the Hudson Bay railway, about which I do not propose to say anything upon this occasion; we must have more information than is contained in the Speech from the Throne before we discuss that subject. But let me read this paragraph with regard to the Transcontinental railway:

> The work on the National Transcontinental railway has been rapidly advanced during the last year, and, notwithstanding the difficulties attending the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and the provision of terminals, every possible progress has been made in bringing that important project nearer to completion.

If the National Transcontinental railway has been rapidly advanced, we have only the word of the Speech for it, and we are not in much of a position to discuss the whole matter. At all events, we know enough to say, without any fear of contradiction, that if the work of the Transcontinental railway has been advanced, it has not been on the section between Cochrane and Quebec city. This part of the road should be open to traffic to-day, but it is yet far from completion. On the 19th of Februarv last, in the other branch of the legislature, a question was put by Senator Casgrain with regard to the section of the railway between Cochrane and the city of Quebec, in these words:

> Q. What was the length of the gap, in miles, on the 1st of November, 1912, where the grading has not been made between Cochrane and the city of Quebec?—A. Thirty-five miles.
> Q. What is the distance between both ends of steel of this gap to-day??—A. Eighty-eight miles.

So at the end of the season last year there were thirty-five miles of grading and eighty-eight miles of steel to be laid on that section; not a very heavy task, and one that should have been accomplished during the summer. I believe that the thirty-five miles of grading has been done, and that the section between Cochrane and Quebec has also been graded.

But yet the road is not in operation in any way and cannot be put in operation. For what reason? For the reason that the Government of the day have completely neglected to provide terminals at the city of Quebec. What have they done during the two years they have been in office? When we left office, in October, 1911, we had passed contracts to provide provisional terminals. We had a contract amounting to $1,000,000 for a station at the Champlain market. We had contracts ready to be given and I think they had been awarded for the building of wharfs on the front of the St. Lawrence, something like 2,000 feet in length, which were to cost something like $5,000,000. These works were absolutely necessary for the operation of the road. It is impossible to operate a railroad unless you have a station. It is impossible to connect the road with what we hope to have, an ocean service, unless you have wharfs also. What has been done about these wharfs? Not one foot of them has ever been undertaken up to the present time. What has been done at the station? Nothing at all, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) has cancelled that contract. He told us nearly two years ago, in the session of 1911-12, that he would not have the station at the Champlain market, that he was contemplating a union station elsewhere. He told us at the same time that he would have a small station at the Champlain market place. Has this small station been commenced? Not up to the present time. What has been done? The only thing done towards the provision of terminals has been the commencing of shops at St. Romuald. The late commission has laid out the shops at St. Foy; the ground had been purchased and prepared; but the new commission thought it advisable to change the site of the shops and to place them at St. Malo; that is, to transfer them from the valley of the St. Lawrence to the valley of the St. Charles. As to this I pass no judgment because we have not yet had information on this subject. But I know one thing: even if it be good policy, for engineering reasons, to have the site of those shops changed, you cannot use those shops, as has been stated by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) himself, unless you have a tunnel from the valley of the St. Lawrence to the valley of the St. Charles. Has this work been commenced? It has not. When will it be commenced? It is impossible to say; we have no information. What time will be required for its construction? We do not know. Have the surveys been prepared? I am not aware that they have. No, nothing has been done up to the present time in order to complete the road and make it available. More than that, I understand—and we shall have to ask the information from the Minister of Railways on this point—that an arrangement has been made to have a joint station between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Transcontinental railway. I would like to know if the Grand Trunk Pacific railway has been a party to such an agreement as that. I have reason to believe, and I think I can assert—and I challenge contradiction on this point—that these changes which I have just mentioned, the removal of the shops to St. Malo and the removal of the station from the Champlain market place, have been made without the approval of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and, under the law passed by this Parliament in 1903, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway must be a party to any such changes as these. If the Grand Trunk Pacific railway had been a party to this arrangement, Parliament, I am sure, would have been made aware of that fact long ago; but up to the present time we have received no information that it is a party. If I am in error in this I would be glad to be informed, and I hope the information will be laid before us at the earliest possible moment; in fact, I may venture to say to the Minister of Railways that he is bound at the earliest moment to place before us not only the report of the Commission of Inquiry which has been investigating the work performed by the late Administration, but all information respecting all changes that have been made by the new Transcontinental Railway Commission upon the work of the late commission.

My hon. friend the mover of the Address referred to some things that were not referred to in the Speech. Yes, there are two things not referred to. One is the Highways Bill. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend the member for York, N.B., (Mr. McLeod) tell us that the measure which was introduced was a fair measure in every particular. I say to him—and we shall have to debate this more than once in this House—that the Highways Bill which was introduced was not only unfair but was in direct violation of the constitution of Canada. It has been stated more than once that the object of this Bill was to help the provinces. I do not deny it; we never denied it; we have always affirmed the principle of the Bill, but we condemned the manner in which it was proposed to help the provinces in this Bill which was in marked contrast to another Bill introduced by the Minister of Agriculture to help the provinces in the matter of agriculture. One was passed and became law. The other was passed with an amendment, and if it is not law to-day it is not the fault of the Opposition; it is not even the fault of the Upper Chamber; it is the fault of the Government who could not introduce a Bill in accordance with the terms of the constitution. Here is the Bill which was introduced last year with regard to helping the provinces in regard to agriculture. It became law; no objection having been taken to it. Section 4 of that Bill provides that Parliament shall appropriate a certain sum of money. Subsection 1 of section 4 provides:

> The remainder of the appropriation for each year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces in proportion to the populations of the said provinces respectively as determined by the latest decennial census.

Is that fair? This is fair and this is constitutional? Every year an appropriation shall be made according to the census then in force and the money shall be paid to the local Government. Are those the terms of the Highways Bill? They are not. If those had been the terms of the Highways Bill, the Highways Bill would be law to-day as the Agricultural Bill is law to-day. Here are the terms of the Highways Bill; compare them with the terms I have just read from the Agricultural Bill:

> The Governor in Council may, in any year, and upon such terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by Order in Council, grant to the several provinces of the Dominion in aid of the improvement of existing highways or bridges, or the construction of new highways or bridges, or for all or any such purposes, subsidies not exceeding in the whole such sum as may in such year be voted by parliament for that purpose.

The Government may, at their sweet will, not pay directly to the provinces, as provided for in the Act for aiding agriculture, but pay or not pay to the provinces, or keep for themselves if they want to do so, the money appropriated by Parliament. I ask the hon. member for York, N.B., who was not in the House last year and who perhaps has not given this legislation the attention which we who were in the House have given to it, to compare the Act with the Bill and then to tell us that he can approve of the Highways Bill. Would he not say, on the contrary, in fairness, that the only method which should have been adopted was the one adopted by the Minister of Agriculture of paying the money to the provinces and letting them expend it themselves. This is the constitution. If we admit—and that nobody can deny—that the highways are under the control of the local Legislature, why was it not done and why was the same principle not adopted in the Highways Bill as in the Agriculture Instruction Bill? Up to the present time we have not received a satisfactory answer on this point, and never shall we, because there is no explanation to be given.

The other thing which is not to be found referred to in the Speech from the Throne is the Naval Aid Bill. It was not more than three weeks ago that the correspondent in the London Times, who is supposed to be deep in the secrets of the Government, wrote to his paper, in a letter which everybody could have read if he had cared to, that the Naval Bill would be introduced again. It is not to be introduced. As to this, I have no comment to make, except that the non-introduction of the Bill to-day is the best possible justification of the attitude of the Liberal party on this question and of the amendment voted by the Senate last session.

The action of the Senate last session, on almost the last day of the last session, just before prorogation, called forth strong animadversions from the other side of the House. The Minister of Finance (Mr. White) on that occasion reviewed the action and attitude of an old friend of his and mine, Sir George Ross, now the leader of the Liberal party in the Senate. He endeavoured to be severe, and very severe to Sir George Ross. He compared him with Daniel Webster, whom he called the great apostate, and applied to him the verses which were applied to Webster:

> Walk backwards; with averted gaze
> And hide the shame.

The passion of my hon. friend has had time to cool. At all events, I tell him—and I hope he is cool enough to understand—that the strictures which he passed upon the dead were the greatest eulogy which he could pass upon the living statesman, because the strictures which were put upon Daniel Webster have not been justified by the impartial judgment of history. On the contrary, men there are to-day, and men there were in the day of Daniel Webster, to take exception to the strictures passed upon him for the action which was adverted to by my hon. friend last session. In 1850, as my hon. friend knows, the differences between the North and the South in the American Union were becoming very acute. There was a chasm which was every day growing greater, and Henry Clay, who was the greatest apostate of the Union of that time, brought in a resolution which was destined—no, I will not say destined, because it failed of its object—but which was intended to reconcile the growing dissension between the two branches of the Union. Daniel Webster supported that legislation, and for having taken that action he was censured by some of the abolitionists of the Northern States. Among those abolitionists I must say there were some men of the highest character, such as Theodore Parker, Horace Mann and James Russell Lowell. The issue showed that even the brightest intellects could be clouded by passion, and that some well-intentioned men never can realize that any stand on a public question different from their own can be as nobile as their own, and that there are men who will never forgive those whose intellects plunge deeper into the horizon than their own. It was the good fortune of Daniel Webster to live long enough to see many of them recant their opinions, and, as I said a moment ago, the judgment of history has not confirmed the strictures upon Daniel Webster adverted to by my hon. friend. And, if my hon. friend will take the last and the best of all, he will find that the speech which was delivered by Webster, though criticised in parts, is declared by Cecil Rhodes himself to have shown statesmanship of the highest order. There is more. The whole matter has been well summed up by one of the greatest minds in the last generation. James G. Blaine, in his work entitled 'Twenty years of Congress,' says:

> The thoughtful reconsideration of his severest critics must allow that Mr. Webster saw before him a divided duty, and that he chose the part which in his patriotic judgment was demanded by the supreme danger of the hour.

I commend these words to my hon. friend. The patriotic judgment of Sir George Ross showed what was the supreme danger of the hour, and it was because he saw the supreme danger of the hour that he acted as he did. Sir George Ross is well known as an intense imperialist, but upon that occasion there was a question which was uppermost: It was a question of the autonomy of this country, and by that principle he stood. My hon. friend will allow, now that the matter has passed, for the present at all events, that the Bill which was brought in last session, was not even a measure of emergency, although it was so called. It was simply a measure of expediency involving a policy of contribution, a policy which had been denounced by the very men themselves who introduced the Bill, a policy which was not justified by anything which then existed. They introduced it upon the shallow pretense of emergency. Emergency? Who speaks to-day of emergency? Twelve months have passed since my right hon. friend the Prime Minister introduced his measure. Twelve months and more have passed since that time when he saw the German peril. He saw Germany almost ready to jump at the throat of Great Britain. He saw clouds on the horizon; he saw these clouds rent by lightning; he heard the murmurs and rumbling of distant thunder. But my right hon. friend to-day may live in peace: The atmosphere is pure, the sky is clear. My right hon. friend, I think, heard the words of the Lord Chancellor, which were pronounced in this country last year, to the effect that the relations between Germany and Great Britain, were cordial and he must have read with the greatest satisfaction that not later than five weeks ago a cause of difficulty between the two nations about some territory in Africa had been amicably settled. And from that time to this moment the relations between the two countries which were cordial in the month of September last have been absolutely friendly. The light has been let in on that question, and we know now how much the country and the empire and the civilized world has been deceived upon that question of so-called emergency. We know now, we have the evidence, how the panics of which we have heard in this House more than once, are created and engineered. We have had the evidence that these panics are engineered by the armour-plate builders and by the great ship-building firms who do not hesitate to create false news in order to obtain contracts for their ships. The matter was brought up in the German Reichstag, and the following letter addressed by the firm to one of its agents in Paris was read:

> We have just wired to you asking you to await in Paris our to-day's letter. The reason for the telegram was that we should like to obtain the insertion in one of the most widely-read French journals—preferably the 'Figaro'—an article to the effect that the French military authorities have decided to accelerate considerably the re-arming of the troops with new machine guns, and to order double the quantity of the latter as against their original intention. We shall be much obliged if you could succeed in getting such an article published.

That letter was signed by two directors of what was supposed to be a respectable firm. The thing was denounced in the German Reichstag, and it could not rest there, because it was found that army officers received bribes to promulgate this false news, and they were tried and convicted and are now serving sentences. Now we know why we have so often these recurring panics which are disturbing the peace of the world, and which, if they do not bring war, always bring fat contracts to the armament firms. Not only that, but we have the evidence—no, I will not say evidence—but it has been charged, and so far as I know the charge has not been denied, that the information which was given to us upon the German armament could not be relied upon, but was false and exaggerated. I do not speak of my own knowledge as to that, but I give as my authority an article published by Mr. A. G. Gardiner in the Daily News and Leader of London. I call attention to this paragraph in that article:

> How that is done was revealed in the case of Mr. Mulliner of the Coventry Ordnance works. It was Mr. Mulliner who was the true author and begetter of the famous panic of 1908-9. It was he who supplied Parliament and the press with the material for that memorable agitation. It was he who was quoted with such effect by Mr. Arthur Lee, Mr. Duke, Mr. Balfour and others. It was he who was finally solemnly received by the Cabinet—the British Cabinet—to tell them all about the goings-on of Krupp's, the 38,000 new workmen whom Mr. Lee said they were employing—as a matter of fact there was a decline in the number of men employed between 1907 and 1909—the acceleration in shipbuilding and the menace of that fatal year 1912 when the Germans, we were led to suppose, intended to make short work of the British Empire. Fresh from that momentous interview Mr. Asquith and Mr. McKenna told the House of Commons that Germany would have 17 dreadnoughts in 1912 instead of the projected 13; Mr. Balfour, not to be outdone, said there would be 21 and possibly 25. When in due time 1912 arrived the Germans had 12 dreadnoughts completed.

This information, which was given by Mr. Mulliner, was repeated by ministers on the floor of the House of Commons in England, and repeated also on the floor of this House by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not charge any intention of deceit on the part of the Prime Minister in this regard, but I will charge deceit if, in the face of this evidence, we again hear of such a thing as an emergency.

The German peril has disappeared, if indeed there ever was such a thing; but we have another menace and another peril which is far more dangerous; a peril which affects not the fate of the Empire, but which is bound to bring suffering to hundreds of thousands of His Majesty's subjects in Canada. I may say that this peril has found the Government singularly callous with respect to it. Within the last four weeks the Minister of Finance has reviewed the economic situation in Canada twice; once in Montreal at the commercial travellers' banquet, and again at Gananoque, in his riding. On both occasions he pronounced the financial condition of the country perfectly satisfactory. According to him, it has not always been satisfactory, but at the moment he was speaking it had become satisfactory again; there were no more clouds on the horizon, the storm had passed. That I may not do injustice to the Minister of Finance, I quote his words as reported in the Montreal Gazette, which authority I suppose he will accept. At Montreal, he is reported by the Gazette to have said:

> Our country has experienced its time of stress, and will come through it well. I believe the crisis has been reached, and passed in Canada, as in other countries of the world.

According to these words of the Minister of Finance, the crisis has come and passed, and once more navigation is easy and Canada is in a good position. I am not surprised at these words, in view of the fact that two years ago the gentlemen opposite were exclaiming in times of prosperity: let well enough alone. The Minister of Finance was satisfied two years ago to let well enough alone; he would not then improve the situation; he would not improve what was good in prosperous times, and now, in bad times, he and his party will not reform what is bad. We have had it from my young friend from York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod) that we have reached hard times, and the people of Canada have, I believe, come to the conclusion that, as the Government did not improve what was good in prosperous times, we are now not far away from bad times. Well, the bad times are here. When the Minister of Finance stated, as he did that the crisis was over, he had two things staring him in the face. For the first time since 1897 we hear of such a thing as non-employment in Canada. It is well known that at the present time prosperous establishments of long standing are reducing the number of their employees, that others are reducing the hours of work, that others are reducing the number of their employees and the hours of labour as well and that others have closed down. And yet, in the face of that situation, when there are to-day, in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver, not fewer than 100,000 men asking for work, the Minister of Finance says the crisis is over, and that we can be as confident as we were before. And at this very moment, when labour is scarce, and when the purchasing power of the people has been reduced to its lowest point, the cost of all prime necessities of life has risen abnormally. But the Minister of Finance says there is no crisis, and therefore there is nothing for the Government to do. He is not the only one of the ministry who has taken this stand; we have more instances than one to prove that the Government is singularly callous to the present condition of affairs. The Minister of Labour spoke on this subject, giving it as his view that there was absolute prosperity because the prices of commodities were so high. The Minister of Trade and Commerce also gave his opinion on this subject, as published in the Montreal Gazette of the 10th of December last. The reporter says:

Charging that Canadians were extravagant and must correct this weakness as the first step forward in reducing the high cost of living, the Hon. Geo. E. Foster made one of a number of notable speeches here in the Rideau theatre.

Then the reporter puts these words into the mouth of the Hon. George E. Foster:

Referring to the depopulation of the farming districts, Mr. Foster said he would not admit that young men were driven to the cities, but were lured there. He did not favour a commission to investigate the question. 'The Lord knows,' Mr. Foster continued, 'we have had enough commissions. They are as plentiful as blackberries. Commissions are roaming the country wasting good ink and paper preparing reports which are laid on the shelf and nothing done with them. It is not a commission that will right this matter. The action must be taken by the people themselves. Teachers and parents must not only give advice to the young people, but must instruct them to the fact that the oldest industry of agriculture is also the noblest.'

This is good advice, but it was not followed by those to whom it was given, because in a week from that day, I understand, the Government appointed a commission to investigate the high cost of living and the cause of the depopulation of the farming districts. That commission is composed of three gentlemen well known in the city of Ottawa. Mr. McDougald, Commissioner of Customs is the chairman, and in regard to him I have nothing but good to say. He is a most competent and valuable officer. I would say the same of Mr. Coats, who is the assistant Deputy Minister of Labour. Mr. James I do not know so well, but I have good reports of him also. What I want to say, however, is that if this commission is to be effective, if it is to accomplish any good, it should not be entrusted to civil servants. It should not be placed in the hands of the Commissioner of Customs, the assistant Deputy Minister of Labour and the other gentleman. It is evident that they must be restricted in their operations. There is one field into which they cannot enter. If, as many of us suppose, if, as the country supposes—I will not say more than that—the high cost of living is due to political causes, and I believe it is partly due to political causes, will these men dare to investigate that part of the subject? They will not dare to do so; they cannot do so; they are estopped from entering into that field. In appointing that commission, the Government have taken a course which will simply end in nothing. If there is to be an investigation of this kind, it should be placed in the hands of some of the members of the Cabinet—for instance, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster)—to mention these three alone—who should travel over the country from Halifax to Vancouver, and hear all classes of the community—producers, consumers, farmers, mechanics, professional men, clergymen, housewives—these last especially, because they are the most interested of all in that question. Nothing of the kind, however, has been done. The task has been entrusted to a commission which, as their report will show, can do only half the work.

We come now to the Speech from the Throne. I was not present, of course, when the Speech was prepared, but I can imagine that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) must have had a hard task when it came to preparing this part of the Speech:

Canada has been favoured by a long series of prosperous years, and, although at the present moment business is slightly restricted by the financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, I feel convinced that this condition will be merely temporary, and that the boundless resources of this Dominion, which are so fully and universally known and recognized, give us the fullest assurance of continued material prosperity and progress.

When it came to these words:

Canada has been favoured by a long series of prosperous years—

That was hard to fathom, because it was paying a pretty good compliment to the late Administration which had been in office for several years. But when it came to the other words:

Although at the present moment business is slightly restricted—

I can imagine my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), saying: I made a speech a few weeks ago saying that the crisis was over. How can I say that it still exists? He was drawing too long a bow at Montreal. The Speech only says what is in everybody's mind, and puts it very mildly and gently when it says that business is slightly restricted. But when we have the admission from the Government that business is not in a satisfactory condition, what are we to say of the conclusion which is reached by the Government? We have the admission that the economic condition of the country is not satisfactory, and a confession on the part of the Government of its impotence to deal with such a problem. When the Government stated in the Speech —a statement which I am sure they placed very reluctantly in the mouth of His Royal Highness—that the economic condition of the country was not satisfactory, all that they did was to express the highest hope that matters would rectify themselves. They say that the resources of the country are boundless. So they are, but is it the business of the Government simply to rely upon the resources of the country? Are they to do nothing themselves? Are they to be simply flies on the wheel? Are they not to take any action at all? It is very true that the resources are boundless, but it has been shown that the resources of the country do not yield their treasures to those who rely simply upon statements; they want to be tapped; they want men to use power and judgment in order to develop them. This is not what is done by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. The Government thus stands to-day convicted before the people that, while admitting that the economic condition of the country is not satisfactory, they have nothing to suggest in order to make it any better. Is this what we are to expect from the Government? Is this what the people of the country have reason to expect in view of the fact that two years ago they placed the government of the country in the hands of the gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches? Are we to be told in this age and at this day that the Government are in power simply to enjoy the sweets of office and to take no responsibility to better such a condition of things as exists to-day? If the Government will not take any responsibility, perhaps it may be well that I should tell them that they must act. They cannot afford to remain silent. They must act in order to carry out the duties which they have to perform. What action are they to take? There are several things which they can do, which they ought to do, and which the people expect them to do.

In the first place, they must give to the country, which is a young, expanding country, as stated a moment ago by the hon. member for York, N.B., wider markets than it has at the present time. There is one thing which they can do simply by a stroke of the pen; they can give to the producer of wheat the American market. They have received delegation upon delegation asking for that. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who told us last year that he knew how to win elections, stated, during the election in Macdonald, that, if it was in the interest of the people to have free wheat, free wheat it would be.

What more evidence does my hon. friend want? He has received a delegation from the grain growers of the western provinces asking for free wheat. In the very legislature of the province which he represents here a resolution has been passed unanimously, not moved by a Grit but moved by a Conservative, to the effect that wheat ought to be made free. There was a delegation only a few days ago of some twenty members of the Alberta Legislature asking for free wheat. How is it, then, that the Speech from the Throne does not contain the announcement that wheat will be made free? When this admission was made that the economic condition of the country was not satisfactory, we had reason to expect that some action would be taken. We have been disappointed in this. Is that all they should do? No, they ought to do that which they have been asked many times to do,—they ought to relieve the farming community of the burden of taxation which the farmers are carrying at the present time. There is one fact that is beyond doubt, a fact on which we must have more explanation before the session passes. Everyone knows that in regard to many commodities of which at one time we produced far more than we consumed we do not now produce enough to meet the home demand. Years ago we produced a surplus of butter and of meat of many kinds; at present we are importing butter, mutton and other commodities. The agricultural classes have found labour so expensive that they have been unable to carry on their operations as they desired to do. It becomes more and more evident that if you wish to stimulate the farming industries you must provide wider markets than you have provided up to the present time. By a happy circumstance for which the present Government is not responsible, the American market has been opened to our cattle and the farmers of the western provinces have received for their cattle higher prices than they ever received before. The consequence will be that in two or three years there will be more cattle in the western provinces than there have been for many a long year. It is only by the stimulating of the activity of the farmer that he will develop his industry and lead to the whole of this country producing what it ought to produce.

One thing more we should do. At the present time the farming community of the West is suffering from a combine of the shipping interests of the Great Lakes. They have petitioned for a remedy of that grievance. It is a serious grievance, because it involves a tax upon both the producer and the consumer; and the Government will have to deal with that problem whether they wish to do so or not. The law is there to be executed, and if the law is not sufficient it ought to be amended so as to enable the Government to cope with such problems.

The Government must also take into consideration the problem of the high cost of living. I know I shall be told at once that that is not a question that affects Canada alone. I am quite aware that it affects the whole civilized world. The fact that the cost of living has risen in all civilized countries shows that there are causes which are universal and which may perhaps be beyond our control. At the same time, when we reflect that the cost of living has risen in Great Britain ten per cent and in Canada fifty per cent, it is plain that there are causes operating in Canada which do not exist in Great Britain. Now, I wish to state the question clearly; I do not pretend that the increased price of products is a thing in itself to be deplored. One cause for it I state at once: for the last ten or fifteen years the price of labour has increased all over the world; therefore it was natural that the price of agricultural labour should increase also, and this has had the effect of increasing the price of the product. This increase went on for years normally and gradually, and nobody complained. But at the present moment things are different. We see to-day that between the price paid by the consumer and the price received by the producer, there is a wide margin, and it is that margin especially which it should be the effort of this Government and this Parliament to reach and to cut down. If the price paid by the consumer were the price received by the farmer, no one could seriously object, and no one would object. But we have the right to object when the prices received by the farmer are not those which are paid by the consumer. I have seen it stated many times that the tariff is not responsible for the high cost of living. I do not pretend that the tariff is responsible for the high cost of living in its entirety, but I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), who, more than any one else, must have this matter in hand, that the restrictions imposed by the tariff are used by the combines in order to promote their interests and charge those abnormal prices. And we are told that nothing is to be done. We are told that everything is satisfactory; we are told that the Government is powerless in this matter. It is not for me to give advice to the Government; if I were to offer it they would not take it from me. But I have to tell them, whether they wish it or not, that they must act; they cannot afford to lie idle. They are not free to remain still like logs; they must move. There has been stringency before in this country. We are told in the speech from the Throne that the resources of the country are boundless. So they are. So they have been at all times. So they were in 1893-4-5 and 6. But, though the resources were boundless in that way, yet the people suffered. It was only when a new Government came in that had the courage to take the matter in hand that there came an era of prosperity which terminated only when the present Government came into office.

These are some of the duties which face the Government. Whether they accept what I say or not does not matter. But I tell them frankly—no, I will not tell them, but I tell the country frankly—that if they take up these duties and perform them with courage, with energy and good judgment, the shops will be reopened, trade will revive, prices will reach an equilibrium between consumer and producer, and we shall have another era such as we had after the enactment of the tariff of 1897. But if they will not do so, there are other men who will have to take their places, men who have shown before by actual experience that they have the minds to plan and the courage to execute, men who have proven that when difficulty arose and when the time of stringency came, they were equal to the occasion. This Government may accept it from me or not, but if they do not, the people will have to pronounce between them and us.

We have been told that in taking the attitude which I have taken and again take here we have been moved only by a desire for a restoration to office. I do not pretend to be indifferent to office. If I were so to pretend I should not be worthy of my position here. But there are things which to every right-minded man are more precious than the possession of office, and one is the welfare of the country in which we were born and for whose affairs we are responsible. We have made great sacrifices for our convictions, but if our convictions are not accepted we have no fault to find with any one. This is a free country, and every man is welcome to his opinions. But, Sir, I repeat that no man should be indifferent to the conditions which exist to-day, and therefore in conclusion I beg to move that the following words be added to the Address:

We regret to have to represent to Your Royal Highness that in the gracious Speech with which you have met Parliament, whilst it is admitted that business is in a depressed condition, yet there is no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps towards relieving such a situation.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to associate myself with all that has been so aptly and eloquently said by my right hon. friend in extending his congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address. Both these hon. gentlemen have made admirable speeches, and while hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cannot be expected naturally to take precisely the same view as to the conduct of public affairs as that which was expressed in those speeches, nevertheless I observed with a great deal of satisfaction that the remarks of these gentlemen did in many respects meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The mover of the address, the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod), has already had a distinguished career, having attained at a very early age a high position in the public life of his province, and it was with every feeling of anticipation, I am sure, that the House awaited his observations this afternoon. I entirely concur with what has been said by the leader of the Opposition in this respect: that he amply fulfilled all the expectations which had been formed of him as a parliamentary debater. So my hon. friend from the country of Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallée), of the old historic province of Quebec, has maintained the reputation of the worthy race which he so eloquently represented on this occasion, and has delivered to the House this afternoon a speech which reflects credit not only upon himself, but upon his province as well.

I desire also particularly to associate myself with what has been said not only by my hon. friend the member for York, but by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, in expressing the great satisfaction of the Canadian people that Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught has recovered from the very serious illness from which she suffered for many months, and that she has been enabled once more to accompany His Royal Highness to this country. Those who know, as all of us, I think, do know, the keen sense of duty which animates Their Royal Highnesses and the very great sympathy and interest which they have on all occasions exhibited in everything that pertains to the welfare of this country, must have been inspired by an especial satisfaction in knowing that Their Royal Highnesses have been enabled once more to undertake the important and often very onerous duties of the high position in this country to which they have been called. I voice, I am sure, the feeling of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when I express the hope that Her Royal Highness' progress to complete health and strength, such as she enjoyed before, may be rapid and continuous, and that their Royal Highnesses may have —and I am sure they always will have— none but the happiest memories with which to look back to the years during which they were citizens of this country. I am sure also that when at some later date they do return to their home in the British Islands, Canada and Canadians will have no warmer friends and advocates on the other side of the Atlantic than will be found in Their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught.

My right hon. friend dwelt upon a great many matters in the course of his discursive speech; to some of these, particularly those relating to controversial politics of the great neighbouring republic, I will not follow him, because his observations in that regard do not seem to call for any special reply. He has spoken in the first place of the delay in summoning Parliament, and he has asked for an explanation. If he wishes the fullest explanation, he should look around him and see among the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who come from the different parts of this Dominion, one man, if he can, who has not thoroughly welcomed the suggestion that Parliament should meet in January instead of in November. The suggestion has been made to me over and over again during the past two years that in this Parliament we accomplish very little indeed before the Christmas vacation; that the Christmas vacation is usually a somewhat protracted period, and that the members who come from distant parts of the country, and particularly those who come from the West and have to close their homes for the winter, are left in Ottawa for two or three or four weeks with absolutely nothing to do, awaiting the convenience of those who, like my right hon. friend, live in or near the capital, and to whom it is a matter of no inconvenience whatever that the public business should be so conducted. I venture to hope that members of this House may be inspired with a desire to expedite business, and I think that my friends from the Maritime provinces, from the West, and from the distant portions of Ontario and Quebec, will welcome the innovation upon which we have embarked this year, and will justify the Government in the course it has taken in postponing the meeting of Parliament until January.

Then my right hon. friend tried to make merry at the expense of the Government and to make some more or less caustic observations at the expense of my hon. friend the Solictor General (Mr. Meighen). I am pleased to know that he considers the choice an excellent one, and I am also glad that he realizes that there is a very great number of men in the Liberal-Conservative party in this House who are capable of filling that office with honour and ability. That is absolutely true, and if all the observations of my right hon. friend were as apt and as much to the point as that particular observation I would have no fault whatever to find with him. He has referred to these gentlemen as pebbles on the beach. Fortunately we were not in the position of my right hon. friend who on five different occasions could not find any pebble on the beach on his own side of the House, because he went outside of the House to select a Minister of Justice, a Minister of Railways and Canals, a Minister of Labour, a Minister of Public Works, and last but not least a Secretary of State. Under these circumstances I am sure my right hon. friend will be disposed to congratulate the Conservative party that it is not afflicted by that unfortunate poverty of talent which was indicated by the course that the right hon. gentleman adopted on five occasions. We have an abundance of splendid material on this side of the House, and I join with my right hon. friend in congratulating the Liberal-Conservative party of this country that it does possess in this House so splendid an abundance of the most excellent material.

My right hon. friend also found fault with the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). Whatever might be the possible detriment to the public interest which would be occasioned by the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am very much inclined to think that my right hon. friend, in his own heart, would be very glad to see him remain absent, would be very glad not to have him here during the session at all. As a matter of fact, let me either encourage or discourage my right hon. friend, as the case may be, by informing him that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is on the ocean now and that by about next Monday he will be here ready to answer my right hon. friend on that point. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a member of a very important commission which had its origin in a resolution passed by the Imperial Conference of 1911. The right hon. leader of the Opposition thinks that a minister of the Crown for Canada ought not to be a member of that commission. I do not concur in the view which the right hon. gentleman has expressed, because I consider it exceedingly important that a man occupying the very important and responsible portfolio of Minister of Trade and Commerce, the duties of which are especially concerned with questions of trade between the various dominions of this Empire and with the resources which exist within those dominions, should be on hand in Great Britain, in Australia, in Canada and in South Africa to make a comprehensive and close study of those conditions; and I know of no man in Canada who is more thoroughly competent to undertake the duties of a member of that very important commission, representing Canada in that behalf, than is the Hon. George E. Foster.

My right hon. friend spoke on many subjects. Among other things, he dealt with the failure in the Speech from the Throne to make any reference to the Highways Bill. I desire to say in the presence of this House and of this country that the Highways Bill, as we introduced it in two successive sessions, and as it passed the House of Commons on both those occasions, was a perfectly fair Bill which conserved the interest of every province in Canada. Further than that, I am in a position to state that the majority of the pro vinces of Canada, representing a large majority of the people of Canada, were perfectly willing and are perfectly willing to take that Bill just as we presented it. When we first introduced that Bill in Parliament the right hon. gentleman and his friends pretended to give it a half-hearted and lukewarm support. They debated it; to a certain extent they obstructed it both in the last session and in the previous session. Notwithstanding their pretended support of some features of it, at least in the first instance, they ended their career by standing up, every one of them in his place, and voting solidly against that Bill. We placed the Bill before Parliament in what we believed to be terms perfectly fair to every province in Canada. Further than that, the Minister of Railways and Canals and myself as well gave a distinct pledge, which we kept on both occasions, that when the vote was brought down for the appropriation of a certain sum of money in aid of the highways of this country, the Parliament of Canada would be asked to make that vote in accordance with the populations of the various provinces of Canada. We made that pledge. If we did not observe that pledge, it would have been perfectly competent for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and for their friends in the Senate, when that vote was brought down, to have taken the stand that the vote and the appropriation did not do full justice to the provinces of Canada. We had no intention then or at any other time of dealing with any of the provinces otherwise than in accordance with the pledge which we then gave; but my right hon. friend, or at all events his friends in the Senate—and I understand he takes full responsibility for their action—after he and his friends had voted to defeat that Bill, took upon themselves by their majority the still greater responsibility of inserting in that Bill an amendment which the Government had rejected a year before, and which they knew the Government would certainly reject again. Therefore, notwithstanding all the efforts of my right hon. friend to escape from the responsibility of defeating that Bill, I intend to fix that responsibility upon him and upon his friends, because I say it is due to them and to them alone that a vote of $1,000,000 in the session before last and of $1,500,000 last session, has not been made available for the improvement and maintenance of the highways of this country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Mr. BORDEN: When the House took recess at six o'clock, I was speaking of the Highways Bill and pointing out that, as the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had used their majority in the Senate for the purpose of defeating the Bill in two successive sessions we had decided that, until the majority of the Senate in the course of events comes in accord with the voice and will of the people of this country, it was useless and undesirable to take up the time of the House further with it; and therefore at this session we did not propose to introduce the Highways Bill.

There are at least four, and perhaps more, important measures which the Government has proposed to Parliament, and which the Liberal majority in the Senate has seen fit to reject or to encumber to such an extent with amendments that we could not accept them. I need only mention the Highways Bill, in two successive sessions, the Tariff Commission Bill in the session before last, the Branch Lines Bill, of which I shall say a few words in a moment, and the Naval Aid Bill of last year, of which I shall also speak.

The situation of this country with regard to its Upper Chamber is somewhat peculiar. Canada has less control over a majority in the Senate which puts itself in opposition to the popular will than any other dominion of the empire that I know of to-day. The colony of Newfoundland with one twenty-fifth of the population of the Dominion of Canada has infinitely more effective control over a situation of that kind than this Dominion. If friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, appointed during their tenure of office and before the will of the people was declared at the last election, are disposed to force upon us the question of the constitution of the Senate and the nature of appointments thereto—well, speaking for myself, and I think speaking for the great majority of the people of this country, we are ready to accept that issue.

The Branch Lines Bill of last year is a notable illustration of what I have just now alluded to. A resolution was introduced into this House by my colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane). The resolution was very broad in its terms, and, as he and I decided after its introduction and after some criticism had been made of it, that it was too wide in its terms, I myself drafted a modified form of resolution which I took informally across the floor of this House and submitted to hon. gentlemen on the other side. I submitted it to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), all hon. gentlemen who had taken part in that debate, and every one of them without exception told me that the resolution in the amended terms in which I proposed it was absolutely acceptable to them. The only dissenting voice, and that only with regard to one minor feature of the Bill, was the voice of the hon. member for Westmorland, who thought that the power given by that proposed resolution to the Minister of Railways and Canals to build a line not exceeding twenty-five miles in length was too great a power. I was about to consent to modify it when another hon. gentleman on the other side, the hon. member for Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) strenuously objected to any change, and desired the resolution to remain as it was, and it did remain as it was, and the Bill founded upon it went through this House without one dissenting voice. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was in his seat, as 'Hansard' will show, when the Bill passed this House, and he did not raise his voice in opposition to it. The Liberal majority in the Senate saw fit so to mangle that Bill with changes and amendments that it became absolutely useless for the purpose for which it was intended. It came back here and I asked that those amendments should not be assented to. To my astonishment the leader of the Opposition stood up in his place and defended the action of his friends in the Senate, although the Bill in the form in which it left the House of Commons had been unanimously assented to not only by hon. members on this side but by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well. So the Bill failed to carry because we could not accept the Senate amendments. And so it was with the Tariff Commission Bill.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has referred to the Naval Aid Bill, and I desire to say a few words in explaining the action of the Government in that regard. Let me review the situation in a few words. Firmly convinced that the conditions disclosed in the Admiralty memorandum demanded immediate and effective aid from Canada, the Government, in accordance with its mandate from the people introduced in this Parliament on the 5th day of December, 1912, the Naval Aid Bill by resolution. That Bill provided for the construction of three battleships of the most modern and powerful type to be placed at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the empire and to be subject to recall upon reasonable notice if and when the Canadian people should decide to establish one or more fleet units or other distinctive naval forces. The measure was debated at great length in this House and was persistently and defiantly obstructed. It did not pass this House until the rules had been so amended as to prevent such obstruction. Eventually the Bill was rejected in the Upper Chamber by senators appointed by the late Government previously to its defeat in 1911. The measure proposed by the Government created a profound impression not only within this empire, but throughout the world. There is little doubt that if the Bill had passed, the determination of Canada thus expressed would have constituted an important influence in bringing about a most desirable cessation in the rivalry of armaments. The partisan considerations and misguided influences which occasioned the perverse and maladroit action of the Senate were not realized or understood either within the empire or throughout the world. In certain important quarters the Senate's action was welcomed with rejoicing as a clear indication that in providing for the common defence of the empire upon the high seas the mother country must stand alone so far as Canada is concerned, and that this Dominion must be regarded not as a strength but as a weakness to the empire in time of peril. That the impression created by the Senate's action was profoundly unfortunate and mischievous is evidenced by many comments in great European journals. As an illustration one quotation must suffice, although many might be given. The quotation to which I allude is from the Hamburger Nachrichten of June 5, 1913:—

> Whatever may be decided upon later, the decision of the Canadian Senate means at any rate a heavy moral and material loss for the defence of the empire.

I heard, a moment ago, some gentlemen opposite cheering the Senate's action; Would they still cheer in face of that? Well, we are at least glad to know their appreciation of the duty of this country to the empire. (Reading):

> Whatever may be decided upon later, the actual decision of the Canadian Senate means at any rate a heavy moral and material loss for the defence of the Empire, for Mr. Borden's promise had been foolishly enough counted on. His offer made an enormous impression in the whole world. Mr. Churchill pointed out this fact especially in the wellknown memorandum of the Admiralty. This impression will now not only be destroyed, but people will everywhere obtain the conviction that England cannot depend upon such help from her colonies. 'By rivals and enemies,' says the Morning Post to-day, 'the decision will be eagerly welcomed. By friends it will be regarded as ominous. The impression must inevitably be created that the solidarity of the Empire is a myth and that those powers which would like to see the overthrow of British naval supremacy need not be discouraged in their efforts by the thought that their challenge would be met by the united resources of the mother country and of every one of the daughter states.'

It has been avowed and declared by leaders of the Opposition and by their organs that the Bill if introduced again under present conditions would again be rejected in the Senate. We have no reason to doubt that such is the determination of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Under these circumstances we do not regard it as desirable either in the interests of the empire or of Canada that the Opposition majority in the Senate should be given another opportunity of rejecting the Bill and of again bringing discredit to this Dominion and detriment to the empire. Nevertheless we are firm in our determination that these ships shall be provided, and we adhere to the declaration which I made on the last day of the past session, and which I take the liberty of repeating:

It is the firm intention and determination of this Government, if it remains, as undoubtedly it will remain, in power, to bring down at a later date a proposal for the acquisition or construction of three battleships, as was provided in the Naval Aid Bill of 1912. In that way, before their completion, we hope to be able to say to the British government 'Canada is prepared to do now what the unworthy action of a partisan majority in the Senate prevented it from doing before.'

In this connection it is appropriate to call attention to the striking utterances of Mr. Churchill during the past year wherein he invited the nations of the world to stay the construction of these enormous engines of war. I take the liberty, therefore, of quoting from his utterances at some length. On March 18, 1912, in the British House of Commons, Mr. Churchill said:

Let me make clear, however, that any retardation or reduction in German construction will, within certain limits, be promptly followed here, as soon as it is apparent, by large and fully proportioned reductions. For instance, if Germany elected to drop out any one, or even any two, of these annual quota and to put her money into her pocket for the enjoyment of her people and the development of her own prosperity, we will at once, in the absence of any dangerous development elsewhere not now foreseen, blot out our corresponding quota, and the slowing down by Germany will be accompanied naturally on our larger scale by us. Of course both Great Britain and Germany have to consider, among other things, the building of other powers, though the lead of both these countries is at present very considerable over any other power besides each other. Take, as an instance of this proposition which I am putting forward for general consideration, the year 1913. In that year, as I apprehend, Germany will build three capital ships, and it will be necessary for us to build five in consequence. Supposing we were both to take a holiday for that year. Supposing we both introduced a blank page in the book of misunderstanding; supposing that Germany were to build no ships in that year, she would save herself between £6,000,000 and £7,000,000 sterling. But that is not all. We should not in ordinary circumstances begin our ships until she has started hers. The three ships that she did not build would therefore automatically wipe out no fewer than five British potential super-dreadnoughts, and that is more than I expect them to hope to do in a brilliant naval action. As to the indirect results, even from a single year, they simply cannot be measured, not only between our too great brother nations, but to all the world. They are results immeasurable in their hope and brightness. This, then is the position which we take up, that the Germans will be no gainers, so far as naval power is concerned, over us by any increases they may make, and no losers for the basis I have laid down by any diminution. Here then, is a perfectly plain and simple plan of arrangement whereby without diplomatic negotiations, without any bargaining, without the slightest restriction upon the sovereign freedom of either power, this keen and costly naval rivalry can be at any time abated. It is better, I am sure, to put in quite frankly, for the parliaments and peoples to judge for themselves.

Mr. Churchill, in the British House of Commons on March 26, 1913, said:

This time last year I offered, on behalf of the British Government, publicly and openly, not to build any British capital ships this year, if Germany built none, and I pointed out how advantageous such an arrangement would be to the relative strength of the German navy.

That proposal has not so far borne fruit. Since then we have had the new German Navy Law, and since then the German ships of 1913 have been sanctioned. Every event in this world brings its consequences with it. Since then all over the British Empire men's minds have been turned to this subject. Canada has come forward, the Federated Malay States have come forward, Australia and New Zealand are already acting, and South Africa is already on the move. A sustained impetus has been given to the opinions of millions of men spread all over the surface of the world. Great communities under their different conditions of sky and climate have shown themselves actuated by a common impulse. The results, so far as it can be foreseen, are that nine capital ships will be constructed on behalf of the British Empire in the year 1913. That year is settled, and there is no going back on that. Take the year 1914. I have no reason to believe it is the desire of the German Government to postpone or cancel their programme for that year, but, if it be their desire, they have only to make it known. No one builds 'dreadnoughts' for fun, and we can see no practical difficulty in the absence of unforeseen dangers elsewhere in arriving at a good and complete arrangement for that year, not only on behalf of the British Government, but on behalf of the British Empire as a whole. As the year 1914 is one of those years when we shall be building four ships to two, a mutual cessation could clearly be no disadvantage to the relative position of the next strongest naval power.

It is clear, however, that such an arrangement would probably involve other powers besides Great Britain and Germany. The programmes of France and Russia on the one hand, and of Austria and Italy on the other, would have to be taken into consideration. I am sanguine enough not to see any insuperable difficulty in that. The influence of the British and German Governments, acting together for the peace and welfare of the world, is priceless and measureless, and, if an arrangement between them, be it only for one particular year, for the prevention of what can plainly be shown to be a wasteful, purposeless, and futile folly were to acquire a wider international scope and significance, that would be all the more cause for general rejoicing and all the more honour to those who had taken part in bringing it about. Here, again, we are in a very good position to ventilate such ideas and to advance them to the best of our ability, because we have proved in recent years, and are proving, our capacity and resolve as a people and as an empire to maintain and, as I shall presently show, to improve our naval position whatever action may be taken elsewhere. No one can accuse us of wishing to gain by negotiation or by supplication an advantage which we cannot win by sacrifice and effort. At any rate, there is the suggestion renewed again for 1914 or, if 1914 is too near, for 1915.

Addressing a Liberal meeting at Manchester on October 18, 1913, Mr. Churchill, in proposing a naval holiday, said:

The proposal which I put forward in the name of His Majesty's Government is quite simple. Apart from the Canadian ships or their equivalent, apart from anything that may be required by new developments, we should lay down four great ships to Germany's two. Now, we say, while there is plenty of time, in all friendship and sincerity, to our great neighbour, Germany: 'If you postpone beginning your two ships for twelve months, we will postpone beginning our four ships, in absolutely good faith for exactly the same period.

'That would mean a complete holiday of one year, this holiday to be as far as big ships are concerned, between Great Britain and Germany.

'That would mean a saving of nearly six millions of pounds to Germany and of nearly twelve millions to Great Britain, while the relative strength of the two countries would be absolutely unchanged.'

And again on November 12, at the Guildhall banquet he said:

The measured and unbroken development of the German navy the simultaneous building by many powers, great and small, all over the world, of modern and large modern ships of war will undoubtedly require from us expenditure and exertions greater than those we have ever made in time of peace, and next year it will be my duty, if I should be responsible for this important Department of State, to present to Parliament estimates substantially greater than the enormous sum originally voted in the present year. His Majesty's Government will embrace and will work for every opportunity of abating the competition in naval and military armaments, which is the bane and the reproach of modern Europe. But what is necessary has got to be done, and we shall not hesitate for a moment, once we are satisfied of the need, to go to Parliament boldly for those supplies of men and money which the House of Commons, whatever its party complexion, has never refused to vote in living memory for the vital services of the State.

And it is within the memory of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that on the 8th day of December last the United States House of Representatives, after a full debate, passed a resolution on the same subject by an almost unanimous vote. That resolution is in the following terms—I shall quote them in full as I think it is desirable that they should be impressed upon the attention of hon. gentlemen of this House and of the people of this country:

Resolved, that in the opinion of the House of Representatives the declaration of the First Lord of the Admiralty of Great Britain, the Right Honourable Winston Churchill, that the Government of the United Kingdom is willing and ready to co-operate with other Governments to secure for one year a suspension of naval construction programmes offers the means of immediately lessening the enormous burdens of the people and avoiding the waste of investment in war material.

That a copy of this resolution be furnished the President, with the request that, so far as he can do so, having due regard for the interests of the United States, he use his influence to consummate the agreement suggested by the Right Honourable Winston Churchill.

That resolution passed the United States House of Representatives by a majority of 317 to 11.

These declarations that have been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty invite a few considerations. No thoughtful person can fail to be impressed by the considerations which Mr. Churchill has set forth so lucidly and so eloquently; and it is most satisfactory to know that his proposals have received pronounced approval in the federal legislature of the great neighbouring nation. It is not only depressing but humiliating to realize that the progress and development of modern civilization have been accompanied by this powerful and incessant tendency of the nations to arm themselves against each other. It is not apparent that in this respect humanity has made much progress in the past two thousand years. I trust that the day is rapidly drawing near when differences between the nations may be settled by appeal to some great tribunal established under international authority, and so constituted that its decisions will command unquestioning respect and obedience. But, until that day dawns, and while war is still the last court of appeal between the nations, we cannot forget that a great heritage has been committed to our keeping, and that we are the trustees of its safety, not for ourselves alone, but for those who are yet to be born.

The Government are naturally most desirous that the aid which we proposed last year, under conditions of urgency and need, and which we still propose to bring in due course to the common defence of the empire should be so proffered or given as not to prejudice or retard any international agreement for the cessation of battleship construction. When we are in a position to press the Naval Aid Bill to a final and satisfactory conclusion in the Senate, it will be our duty to consult with the Imperial Government respecting these grave and important considerations. If it should then appear that, by any naval arrangement entered into or about to be entered into by the great powers, a restriction or diminution of the present lamentable rivalry in armaments could be brought about, we should always be ready, until our ships have actually been begun, to review the situation so far as these proposals are concerned; and if a general cessation or temporary suspension in the building of great ships of war were at any time to be seriously entertained, Canada would gladly participate in such a desirable result. Otherwise, we should proceed in due course with the construction of the three ships, holding it to be our duty, under the conditions disclosed last year, and for reasons then elaborated with great fullness, to bring this assistance as speedily as possible to the great purpose of our common defence and security.

Our opponents, especially in the Senate, have taken the ground that our temporary proposals of last year, although not embodying a permanent policy in any respect, ought not to be undertaken without an appeal to the people, but that a permanent naval policy might properly be formulated and carried out without such an appeal. We entirely dissent from that remarkable and unjustifiable view. So far as a permanent policy of naval defence is concerned, I gave my pledge to the people, on more than one occasion previous to the last election, that it would be submitted to them at a general election before it should effectively be undertaken. That pledge still holds good, and faith will be kept with the people in that regard.

Now, my right hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, went into some matters upon which I do not desire to detain the House at any length. He spoke of the good relations between the British Empire and the German Empire. I am glad to know that they are good relations. It is my fervent hope and wish that those relations may always continue to be as satisfactory as they are at present; but, as I pointed out last year, the destinies of the world are sometimes influenced by the mere fact that predominant naval power does exist and can be utilized in one quarter or another, and I venture to think that if the right hon. gentleman will look at the observations made by the First Lord of the Admiralty in the British House of Commons on the 5th day of June, 1913, and on the 17th day of July, 1913, he will find that his view as to the necessity of maintaining and even increasing the strength of the naval forces of this empire is not borne out by the view of the British Admiralty. Mr. Churchill, in the observations which I have under my hand, but which I will not weary the House with repeating here to-night, takes it to be the duty of the British Government to make good that which was lost to the Empire by the unfortunate action of the Senate. That is the situation, so far as I understand as it exists to-day.

Just one other observation with regard to my right hon. friend. He has on various occasions during the recess urged that the people of this country should not embark on any project of aiding in the naval defence of the Empire; and he put the question of the high cost of living, I think, against dreadnoughts in the speech he made at Hamilton. He deplores, and his organs deplore, the establishment of any armament trust in Canada. Well, who was it that, last year in this Parliament, advocated the establishment of an armament trust? If I mistake not, it was the right hon. gentleman who has since made these interesting speeches in various places throughout the country. Who was it that last year desired this country to embark on a permanent naval policy which within the next ten or twelve years would have cost this country at least $150,000,000? And who was it who desired that this should be done without giving to the people of Canada any opportunity to express their views on the subject? Why, it was my right hon. friend and his supporters on the other side, and their partisans in the Senate who desired to take that course. If there is any advocate, any strenuous advocate, of the establishment of an armament trust in Canada, that advocate is to be found in the person of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition. But I have heard that in various parts of the country my right hon. friend was not quite so explicit as he was in his speech in this House. I did not observe that in his speeches in the county of Chateauguay he put that policy in the very forefront. If, however, I am mistaken in my appreciation of the course which he took in that campaign, I will sit down in order that he may correct me.

My right hon. friend seemed to be distressed at the condition of affairs in connection with the terminals at Quebec. I had the honour and pleasure of speaking at a banquet in the city of Quebec a few months ago, and I went into the question somewhat fully at that time. I regret that my right hon. friend is so much under a misapprehension as to some matters on which he has spoken to-day. He has taken it upon himself to say that the management of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company are not in accord with this Government in regard to certain changes that have been made. I would like him to state his authority for that declaration. I am informed by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) that that statement is not stamped with the hall mark of accuracy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not say it was so. I said that no information has been given to show that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company had agreed to the changes.

Mr. BORDEN: I am sorry if I misunderstood my right hon. friend; I did really understand him to say what I have just stated. If it is merely a thirst for information which led the right hon. gentleman to allude to this subject, I may give him the information now, that the Grank Trunk Pacific Railway have assented to the changes. I trust that declaration will do much to relieve the inquietude from which my right hon. friend seems to be suffering in that regard. The terminals at Quebec will be ready, I am assured by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, by the time the road is completed, and the road is being advanced with all possible expedition. Unfortunately, certain delays arose out of incidents connected with the Quebec bridge under the administration of my right hon. friend which I shall not pause to consider to-night. These have put the enterprise back to a certain extent. The station at Champlain market, and the joint station to be used by the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which will be a station worthy of the city in which it is situated, and of the great railway companies which it will serve, will shortly be under construction, I am assured. The shops at St. Malo are already commenced and will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. Further than that, we have taken a step at Quebec, which my right hon. friend might well have taken long ago, that is, we have undertaken the construction of as fine and commodious a dry-dock, for the use of the great ships using the St. Lawrence waterway, as can be found anywhere in the world. The contract has been let for that work and the work will be proceeded with as soon as the spring opens, in fact my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) informs me that it has already been begun.

My right hon. friend has summoned to his aid the cry of hard times, and he considers that the Speech from the Throne is absolutely insufficient inasmuch as it does not point out any direct or immediate remedy for hard times and for the high cost of living to which he also alludes. He confused these two subjects in the course of his remarks, as it seemed to me, and I was not sure from time to time, whether he was dealing with one or with the other. However, it may be that they are properly dealt with together. I would like to refresh the memory of my right hon. friend in one respect. He seems to think that the reference in the Speech from the Throne calls for the expression of some declaration of policy which will provide an immediate and effective remedy. He has forgotten the words which he put into the mouth of the then Governor General in 1908, words which were much more calamitous, if I may use that expression, than anything to be discovered in the Speech from the Throne on the present occasion:—

> The Dominion has been blessed by a long series of prosperous years, and though at the present moment its business is being restricted by the financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, I feel assured that this unfavourable condition will be temporary and that the illimitable resources of Canada and the world-wide recognition of them give us ample guarantee of continued material progress.

I have examined this speech—it is very lengthy—and up to the present time I have not discovered in it a statement of any immediate or effective remedy. Perhaps, if I yielded the floor my right hon. friend would explain to the House why that omission occurred. We did not put the word 'unfavourable' into our speech on this occasion. The Government of that day seemed to take a very gloomy view of the situation. We do not take a gloomy view of the situation. We do really believe that the resources of this country are so great and so widely recognized that any slight restriction in business is not to be seriously regarded and that this country in 1914, as in 1908, will make it manifest to the world that the check, if any there be, is only for the moment.

My right hon. friend has alluded to the inquiry which the Government has directed into the increase in the cost of living. We have thought it wise to follow the British example in this regard, and to select civil servants of ability and experience to make an examination into this question. We have selected them without regard to what may be supposed to have been their political views, knowing that they are all men not only of ability and experience, but of integrity as well, and that they will bring to this important task the best that is in them, and give to the country the very best of their services in coming to a conclusion.

My right hon. friend has moved a resoluiton on this subject. He desires that the Address to His Royal Highness shall not pass in the words proposed, but that the following shall be added thereto:

We regret to have to represent to your Royal Highness that in the gracious speech with which you have met Parliament, whilst it is admitted that business is in a depressed condition, yet there is no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps towards relieving such a situation.

When I said that my right hon. friend had forgotten the speech which he put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in 1908, I evidently made a mistake; he was thinking of that speech when he drafted this resolution. His Royal Highness has not stated in the Speech from the Throne that business is in a depressed condition. I would like to observe in regard to this amendment that it does not quite come up to some of the speeches which the right hon. gentleman has been making in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; there is a remarkable difference. When my right hon. friend spoke at Hamilton on the 26th of November last he was ready with a policy. Why is it that the policy which he announced at Hamilton is not embodied in the terms of his resolution? Have some of his friends expressed the opinion that he was a little hasty? What is the reason for the marked difference? In the one case he shouted loudly; in the other case he whispers softly. My right hon. friend did not wait until the opening of Parliament to change his policy. His policy as expressed at Hamilton was this:

The policy I give you at this moment; the policy I believe every patriotic man in Canada ought now to support, and the policy I believe it to be the duty of the Government immediately to inaugurate, is a policy of absolutely freed food—food free from customs duty.

That was on the 26th of November, and on the 9th of December he reached Montreal. But in the meantime, he seemed to have received a new light and wisdom. His proposal when he reached Montreal was to have a few perambulating commissions of ministers such as he had in 1897, and in 1907, if I mistake not. That was a remarkable change, but he has not suggested either one or the other of these policies in the resolution which he has introduced to-night—a resolution of the vaguest character, which permits my right hon. friend to retire within the lines of Torres Vedras whenever he finds it convenient to do so. Let me point out to the right hon. gentleman—because he has insisted, outside of this Parliament, if not within, that the high cost of living is due to the customs tariff—that a perfectly impartial observer and writer, and one whose opinion would not be influenced by any lack of sympathy for him, has made a rather remarkable pronouncement on the tariff of 1897, which was not materially altered in 1907. In his recent work published in the latter part of 1913, Professor O. A. Skelton, in dealing with the general economic history of the Dominion, says at page 201, with regard to my right hon. friend's tariff of 1897:

Yet, with all this tinkering, the tariff remained substantially the National Policy tariff of the old régime.

I do not intend to-night, especially having regard to the fact that a commission is investigating this question at the present time, to deal at any length with the causes that have brought about the increase in the cost of living. My right hon. friend himself has admitted that the increase in the cost of living is world-wide. In the same work from which I have just quoted, a General Economic History of the Dominion, 1867-1912, by Professor Skelton, I observe at page 272 the following:

> After 1896 the rise was rapid and almost unbroken; the index numbers prepared by the Dominion Department of Labour showed that by 1912 the average wholesale prices of the most important commodities had risen nearly thirty per cent above the average from 1890 to 1900, and the retail prices and rents had soared to still higher levels. This rise, as English railway strikes, French food riots, German Socialist victories and United States urban discontent revealed, was not peculiar to Canada; under the price-equalizing influences of international exchange, all the leading countries shared in the increase, in fairly proportionate degree.

That is the opinion of a disinterested writer who has made the study of economics his lifework. Many considerations have been put forward by economic writers as reasons for the increase in the cost of living. It has been asserted that a higher standard of living has been established throughout the world during a period of great prosperity. According to the opinions of others, it has been based, to a certain extent, upon the increase of urban population and the relative decrease of rural population. It has been urged that the large immigration to Canada of persons, many of whom locate in cities, and none of whom became producers of food within a year or eighteen months, has also had its effect. The increased cost of labour, resulting in an increase in the cost of producing and distributing food products, including the cost of delivery in cities and towns, has been put forward by others as a contributing cause. Then it has been urged that the increase is to some extent dependent upon the lack of organization among producers and consumers, and part of it has been laid at the door of waste and extravagance. Great losses occur in all civilized countries through unnecessary fires; Professor Skelton says that in the United States there is a yearly loss by fire of buildings which placed side by side would constitute a block extending from New York to Chicago. Waste, loss and extravagance of this character are urged as causes. Then other economic writers put forward the decrease in the purchasing power of money owing to the remarkable increase in gold production in the last two decades.

I do not intend to pass upon any of these causes. It may be that all of them have contributed in one way or another. But when my right hon. friend urges, as he has urged, that this increase in the cost of living is due to the tariff, I would like to point out to him that the increase has not been restricted to recent years. Taking the number 100 as representing the average prices from 1890 to 1899, the index numbers, so-called, were as follows: in 1890 it was 110.3. In 1897 it had decreased to 92.2. My right hon. friend will observe that that was under the National Policy which he had undertaken to destroy. In 1907 it had risen to 126. In 1908, during a period of financial stringency and business restriction, it fell to 120.8. In 1911 it had risen to 127.4. In 1912 it had risen to 134.4. In 1913 there was a trifling increase to 135. It is a remarkable fact that from 1890 to 1896 the cost of living in this country decreased, and an equally remarkable fact that from 1896 until the right hon. gentleman went out of power the cost of living increased in every year except one, 1907. By 1901 the cost of living in this country had reached the figure at which it stood in 1890, far above the figure of 1897. If my right hon. friend believes what he seems to believe, if one may judge by his speeches throughout the country, that this is all due to the tariff, why was it that during the fourteen years between 1897 and 1911 he took no step whatever to apply a remedy? But, if I mistake not, in the United States it is almost universally admitted that the reduction or abolition of the duties on food has had little or no effect upon prices in that country. My right hon. friend makes a comparison between the cost of living in this country and the cost of living in Great Britain. I have here a quotation, but I shall not take up the time of the House by reading it, from Mr. Coats, the statistician in the Department of Labour, who points out that although the cost of living is higher in Canada than in Great Britain, it is not by any means so much in excess as is indicated by the figures which the right hon. gentleman gave to the House this afternoon.

The abolition of duties as against the United States could hardly have the effect which the right hon. gentleman has claimed for it in his speeches outside of this House. He has declared, as I have understood his speeches, that the cost of living had been increased in Canada by the fact that the markets of the United States were taking our food products, and then, in connection with that, he suggested that the people of this country could obtain relief by abolishing the duties on food as against the United States. If the prices in the United States are so much higher than they are in Canada as to cause a flow of food products from this Dominion into the United States, how in the name of common sense are you to get relief by going to the United States and buying food products there at the high prices prevailing in that country? But, my right hon. friend may say: Let us throw down the bars altogether and open up our home market to all the nations of the world. Does he not realize the truth of what was expressed by Prof. Skelton, and what is expressed in more homely phrase in one of the United States journals which was attracted by certain utterances of my right hon. friend, that if we are going into the markets of the world to buy food products for the people of Canada, we shall meet Uncle Sam there, and the prices in the United States will, to a certain extent at least, control the situation? The markets of the world are governed by international conditions and demands.

Further, it has been pointed out by one of the foremost journals in the province of Ontario that the most obvious deduction from the speech of my right hon. friend in Hamilton would be this, that the only relief that could be brought to the people of Canada, if his theory is correct, would be to place an export duty on cattle, sheep, hogs and meats. I do not think my right hon. friend will be prepared to maintain a proposal of that kind.

He has also alleged that the high cost of living is due to trusts and combines. Well, if it is due to trusts and combines now, was it not due to trusts and combines during the fourteen years in which he saw it increase? If it was due to the causes which he suggests, why did he not apply some of those remedies which he has been putting forward to the people of this country but as to which he was absolutely silent when he rose to speak in this House? And, further, does he not think that the trusts and combines in the United States are more numerous and highly developed than in Canada, and does he not believe that if we threw down our tariff bars and exposed the home markets of every province in Canada to competition from the United States, the trusts and combines of the United States would be just as powerful in Canada and just as detrimental in Canada as they could be in the United States?

Just one thing more in that connection. I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that the difficulty is not wholly due to decreased production in Canada. Between 1901 and 1911 the population of Canada increased 34 per cent. The total production of milk increased 44 per cent. The export of dairy products decreased 11 per cent. The importation of dairy products increased 14 per cent and the total consumption increased 74 per cent. The per capita consumption in Canada during that period increased 30 per cent. Between 1900 and 1910 the production of eggs increased from 84,000,000 dozen to 143,000,000 dozen and their value increased from ten and a quarter million to twenty three and a half million dollars. During the same period the export of eggs decreased from 11,000,000 dozen to 92,000 dozen and the imports increased from 950,000 dozen to nearly two and a half million dozen. This indicates that the standard of living in Canada has increased, and the consumption in Canada, not only the actual but the per capita consumption, of a great many articles of food has very greatly increased in the meantime. What is the remedy? I say that the remedy is properly to be considered in this country and in this House, and the Government is giving it consideration. I say, in the first place, give every reasonable assistance and encouragement to maintain and increase the number of people on the land. I say, in the second place, assist the farmer with good roads, as we proposed in the Highways Bill against which the Opposition voted, and which was defeated by their friends in the Senate. Aid him with instruction in improved methods of production, as is proposed by the Agricultural Instruction Act. Thus increase the ratio of production to the labour and capital employed. Promote co-operation among the producers and the consumers and find more effective and cheaper methods of marketing. I do not say these are the only remedies that can be devised, but they are remedies that commend themselves strongly to me, and so far as is possible this Government will be prepared to act along those lines and to assist in every possible way in keeping the people upon the land, and in promoting co-operation between the producers and the consumers throughout Canada.

My right hon. friend's remedy is to abolish the protection now afforded the farmer in the home market and at the same time to subject him to a tariff protecting other industries. That seems to be a remarkable proposition. If my right hon. friend makes that proposal to the urban population of Canada, I venture to say it will be no more effective among them than it is among the farmers of Canada. If we are to protect our industries, that of agriculture is at least entitled to the same consideration as any other. I say, however, to the labouring and urban population of Canada that if the farmers' home market is not protected, then the labouring population of the cities cannot expect that the industries which afford them employment can be protected. We believe that under present conditions in this country, Canadian industries ought to enjoy reasonable protection in order that our natural resources and raw materials can be worked up into the finished product by our own population instead of being exported to foreign countries to be employed in the support and development of their industries.

My right hon. friend has had many fiscal policies. He has had, in the first place, the policy of protection with which he started out in public life. He has had the policy of commercial union. He has advocated the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, and, among other policies, Continental free trade, free trade as it is in England, revenue tariff, restricted reciprocity, and now free food. My right hon. friend has not stood by these policies very thoroughly. He has asserted them in very energetic terms, but when it came to the final conclusion of the matter he has not lived up to the mark. I have a great many quotations from my right hon. friend's speeches, but I shall use only one or two of them. In 1894 my right hon. friend was very strong upon the theory of free trade as it is in England. He said in Winnipeg in 1894:

When the Liberal party are in power they will at once give a measure of freedom of trade and step by step they will follow it up, and if God spares our lives we shall progress steadily until we have it as full as Great Britain has it. I come before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of free trade. I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage, yes bondage and I refer to it as bondage in the same way as American slavery was bondage. Sir, our policy is freedom of trade such as exists in England, such as is practiced in Great Britain.

There are many similar references. In a letter written by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Mr. Bertram less than two years afterwards, my right hon. friend did not stand very closely to that policy. He said:

Whether a policy of absolute freedom of trade would or would not be injurious to the manufacturing industries of this country, is a question which I will not stop to discuss here. There is no occasion for such a discussion as the intention of the Liberal party is not and never was to establish free trade in this country.

Under these circumstances, it would seem to me that the people could not have a great deal of confidence that my right hon. friend will persevere in the policy of free food which he advocated at Hamilton, which he partially abandoned at Montreal, and which he seems to have altogether abandoned now that he has reached this House.

My right hon. friend has also referred to unemployment. He has stated that there are 100,000 people in Canada at the present time out of employment. Has my right hon. friend any authority for that statement?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think that I am within the mark.

Mr. BORDEN: Of course, we can all have our own opinions on such subjects. I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that his somewhat despondent opinion as to conditions in this country does not seem to be shared by some of his political friends. I observed in a great Liberal organ, in its issue of January 1, a number of messages from the provincial premiers. Four of these gentlemen are friends of my right hon. friend. I shall only extract a sentence or two from each one, and I am bound to say that it is to the credit of his friends who are at the head of provincial affairs, that they do not take the same pessimistic view of conditions in Canada as that which my right hon. friend has expressed to this House. Sir James Whitney, whose illness we all so sincerely deplore, and who will, I hope, shortly be restored to health, said:

Ontario has had a year of great prosperity and can see still greater things ahead.

He was not looking at conditions in Ontario through the same spectacles that my right hon. friend uses.

Sir Lomer Gouin, Premier of Quebec, said:

The province of Quebec has every reason to be satisfied with the measure of progress and prosperity which has been vouchsafed to it in 1913.

There is no note of pessimism in that such as my right hon. friend has uttered.

Hon. G. H. Murray, Premier of Nova Scotia, said:

There was much less decline in trade in Nova Scotia than in the western and central provinces. Moreover the present indications are promising.

Hon. J. K. Flemming (N.B.):—

Notwithstanding 'tight money,' the slackening of business energy within the province dur-the last year has been limited. We are hopeful that 1914 may prove a banner year. Our people are optimistic and better satisfied than formerly to remain and help to develop the wealth and possibilities in New Brunswick.

Hon. J. A. Matheson (P.E.I.):—

Generally speaking the year has been characterized by great corporate activity, as above referred to, and in other lines by a large and profitable trade, a fair production in the farming and fishing industries, a good measure of general prosperity, and the largest provincial revenue in our history.

Sir Rodmond Roblin (Manitoba):—

The year 1913 has been one of steady and satisfying progress along all lines for the province of Manitoba. In agriculture, in commerce, and along all industrial lines the year has been especially satisfactory.

Hon. Walter Scott (Saskatchewan):—

Saskatchewan reaches the end of the year with her farming population in better position and in better spirits than was the case a year ago.

Hon. Arthur L. Sifton (Alberta):—

Judged by every standard of the economist, Alberta exhibits a condition of prosperity. Nineteen hundred and thirteen has been one of the best years in this period.

Hon. Sir Richard McBride (B.C.).—

British Columbia has made remarkable progress in the year just ended, and there is every reason to anticipate continued growth and prosperity in 1914.

Under these circumstances my right hon. friend cannot afford to sing the doleful song he has chanted to us.

Let me tell the leader of the Opposition that if he looks abroad he will find that there are countries in the world possessing magnificent resources and which are undoubtedly looking forward with certitude to a great future, in which the conditions as to non-employment are very much worse than they are in Canada. Between November 15 and December 1, idle freight cars in the United States increased from 22,000 to 57,000.

Any observations which I purpose making as to conditions in the United States for the purpose of comparing those outlined by my right hon. friend as existing in Canada, are not made with the idea of reflecting in any way upon the future of the United States. I might point out, indeed, that that great economic and business authority, Sir George Paish, is convinced that conditions in the United States at present are such as will lead to an early and very marked advance of prosperity and business activity in that country. I am merely pointing out that there are conditions in the United States of a temporary character which seem to me to transcend anything that my right hon. friend has been able to point to in Canada, even if we accept his statement as to non-employment at its face value. The Daily Iron Trade estimates that in the United States there are in the iron and steel industry 1,000,000 men on the idle list with a wage loss of fifty millions a month; also 270,000 miners out of work. Blast furnaces in operation declined from 306 to 183. The Daily Iron Trade also estimates that one million men have been thrown out of employment who were engaged in industries allied to the steel and iron business. In South Chicago district nearly 6,000 men were recently discharged within three weeks and a much larger number placed on half time. In Washington 227 shingle and lumber mills have been closed and 15,000 men thrown out of employment. The New York Journal of Commerce estimates that the present wage payments throughout the United States are 1,250,000 dollars per day below the normal, indicating a falling of four hundred million dollars for the year. The same journal states that out of a total of 627,000 union men employed in New York state, 101,150 are out of work, representing the highest unemployed average for many years.

Although the conditions in Great Britain are fairly satisfactory, so far as most branches of the trade are concerned, there were, during the year ending November, 1913, 38 blast furnaces (pig iron) out of 321 closed down, 28 tin plate mills out of 508 closed down, and six steel sheet mills out of 77 closed down. There are similar statistics as to loss of employment in other European countries, but I will not inflict them upon the House to-night.

I will merely add this, that when my right hon. friend asserts that there was not any non-employment in Canada from 1897 to the present year he is absolutly forgetful of the conditions which prevailed during the latter part of 1907 and the early part of 1908. If I am not mistaken the conditions as to non-employment during that period were quite as severe as those which prevail in Canada at present. I hope the manufacturing and commercial establishments in Canada, and other large employers of labour will bear in mind that during a period of great prosperity things have been going well for them and well for the country, and if owing to a certain financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, business may be checked a little now, it is not desirable that they should be too ready to throw men out of employment. They ought rather to have a little patience and to use a certain foresight and to look forward to that recovery of business which we have every reason to believe will begin when spring opens.

I have transgressed upon the time of the House much longer than I intended to. Let me say in closing simply this. The Government have in mind and will have in mind the prevailing conditions, whether restricted to Canada or of world-wide scope, and the Government will endeavour to do their duty by the people of Canada and by this country. The Government are firmly impressed with the belief that any little check at the present time is purely temporary and that the people of this country have every right to be optimistic and to look forward to the future with confident hope that the development and progress in the years to come will be infinitely greater than any which have characterized past years.

As to the resolution which my right hon. friend has proposed: it is designed to invite the opinion of the House adversely to the Government; it is a want of confidence resolution pure and simple. Under the circumstances, in view of the paucity of argument which my right hon. friend was able to bring forward in its support; in view of the fact that we have these conditions under consideration at the present time; in view of the fact that my right hon. friend has not been able to point out in his speech one single measure which he himself would advocate at present for the purpose of relieving the conditions which he claims to exist, I ask the hon. members of this House to mete out to this resolution the treatment which it deserves and to reject it by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I should like to be allowed to associate myself with the expressions that have been used on both sides of the House, both as to the sympathy of the people of Canada with their Royal Highnesses and as to the ability displayed by the mover and seconder of the Address. I would like to congratulate my right hon. friend the Prime Minister also on the fact that he appears to be in very good health as compared with the reports we heard about him during the recess. I am very glad he has been able to give us abundant evidence that these reports were very much exaggerated.

I have a somewhat unpleasant duty to discharge in my next sentence, and that is to take absolute sides with the leader of the Government and against my right hon. friend in one particular. I am a western man, and personally I am grateful to the Government for the time at which they have called the House together. I have good reason to know that that action of the Government was taken not without sympathy for the members of this House who live at great distances from the seat of government. I do not think that the late meeting of the House should lead to any undue lengthening of the session. I think that, if we get to work as we should do, it would rather have the effect of the business going through in a more expeditious and business-like way than sometimes it has done.

There is a great deal of purposeless talk, I think, in all parliaments. Not that I think that that applies to the talk of the Opposition last session. There was nothing purposeless about our talk. We had a very definite purpose in view and we accomplished it. Our purpose was to bring the Government and their supporters to a better frame of mind in regard to naval proposals. What that frame of mind is now, I am in a little haze about, so far as the Prime Minister's speech is concerned. I am glad, however, to recognize, in the business-like address which has been brought down, that the Government desires to shorten the session and to shorten discussions. Certainly, the programme of the Government for this session is most unambitious in its nature. I think they have introduced only one Bill, and that they are compelled to do, under the circumstances, by the last census—the Redistribution Bill. With regard to that Bill, I would only say this: that I have found a very general opinion amongst the people of this country—and an opinion which I share—that there will be two considerations, which at any rate will be present in the mind of the Prime Minister of this country in regard to that Bill. The first is that he is most unlikely to go outside the recognized constitution of the country, and the second is that there is a widespread confidence that he would not lend his personal authority to anything like a gerrymander. I share that view, and I shall continue to share it until evidence is brought to the contrary.

Now, there are one or two points in the Speech that I think the Opposition may fairly pass. We are promised an economical administration. There is a good deal of the compulsory feature that overtook the prodigal son in that promise. The fact is that that promise would have been more useful to the country, if it had been followed by performance, if it had been made two years ago. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), in the art of dissipating a fortune, has made the prodigal son a beginner. He got a legacy of $50,000,000 of a surplus. That surplus has gone, and then he, who, I presume, is responsible for that particular paragraph of the Address, promises economy. Even deathbed or late repentances, however, are not to be discouraged in this world, and I can only express the hope that that paragraph of the Address will at any rate be carried out, and I am sure that is a hope which is shared by a very large majority of the people of this country.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has taken rather a peculiar course in the very lengthy speech which he has delivered to us. He has shown a distinct disposition to revive the controversies of last session, while he has dropped the Bills of last session. That is a most peculiar course. In fact, this is a very peculiar Government. Last session they gave us the Bills and they gave up the controversies. This session they have dropped the Bills, and my right hon. friend renews the controversies. Well, I can only say in regard to that that if there is a general disposition to renew the controversies of last session, we still have some physical strength and ideas left, and the challenge will be taken up at once. I am very glad to take it up in regard to the Highways Bill. There have been very numerous statements made about this Bill, and very peculiar statements. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), who is usually a man of very moderate language, went into the west, and I think in the town of Minnedosa he said that the Senate had throttled or killed the Highways Bill. This is a fair selection of the words he used. There was some excuse for his using strong language on that occasion—I do not believe in using strong language myself—because he was accompanied by no less an exemplar than the Premier of Manitoba. The Premier of Manitoba on that occasion referred to my fellow countryman in the person of the Postmaster General of Great Britain, first as a grampus and then as a jelly-bag Englishman. Well, they say that evil communications corrupt good manners, and so I can understand the strong language of my hon. friend.

Now, against all this talk about strangling and throttling and killing and throwing out, what happened to the Highways Bill? I have never found any difficulty with any audience in this country in getting them to be absolutely enthusiastic about the Senate's action in regard to the Highways Bill, when they knew the facts. This talk of strangling and throttling must all be given up when we come to the facts. There were six clauses in the Highways Bill. The Senate passed five of them. Is it fair controversy to charge that Chamber with having killed the Bill when they absolutely passed five-sixths of it without alteration? What was the sixth clause? My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod) talks about this Bill having reached the hearts of the people of this country. The sixth clause was devised to reach their votes, and to reach their votes by using the money, as the clause gave them power to use it when and where they liked, and we know an election was on, and for the purpose of helping Tory candidates. Now, my right hon. friend says, in the only answer he gives to this charge, that he intends to fix the responsibility for the killing of this measure upon the Senate. My right hon. friend will not have the fixing of the responsibility. The responsibility will be fixed by the people of this country when they know the facts. He says that he and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) expressed an intention that the moneys would be spent pro rata among the whole of the inhabitants of the country. I want to put it to my right hon. friend: is it a fair manner of conducting the legislation of this country that it should depend upon the expressed intention of any minister? Is there not a possibility of binding all ministers, so long as the Act remains in force, by the simple process of putting their intentions in the Bill? This they persistently refused to do, and by persistently refusing to do it, they showed that they wanted carte blanche to spend the money when and where they liked. Now, these are all the facts in regard to the Highways Bill.

Mr. BORDEN: Is my hon. friend referring to clause 6?

Mr. CLARK: The amendment made by the Senate provided that the money should be spent according to population, that is according to the way that my right hon. friend himself said he personally intended it should be spent. Clause 6 was cut out altogether, because the Government refused these amendments. But, with the five clauses and the Senate amendment, every cent of the money could have been spent upon the highways. No one on the other side will deny that. But the Government refused to spend it, without their precious sixth clause. The Senate threw out that clause and the Government destroyed the Bill. The action of the Government in this affair reminds me of an incident that occurred in my own professional practice. I happened to be present at the birth of a baby born with a supernumerary thumb—six digits upon one hand. With the help of the nurse and the approval of the parents I took off the extra thumb. The child looked better, and it lived and throve. What would have been thought of the parents if they had killed the child because I took its deformity away? But this Government was much more unreasonable even than these parents would have been if they had killed this child themselves, for they killed their child and then blamed the Senate for doing it.

I thought it better to take up this highways matter at once. But a number of interesting things politically have occurred since last session. My right hon. friend referred to the Chateauguay election. I wonder he mentioned it, especially in connection with the Naval Bill. I wonder if he knows what went on in that election. The Chateauguay election was won by a double appeal. The first appeal was to the cupidity of the electors—and about that I do not want to talk. I do not wish to spend my time upon it, and, to be candid, I am afraid that such appeals are all too common on the part of both political parties in Canada. The great majority of the people of this country hope that the time is soon coming when we shall have purer politics in that regard. But there was another appeal made, that to the pusillanimity of the electors, and to that I wish to refer. I am personally concerned. Words that I used last year in the naval debate were printed upon a leaflet and circulated in that constituency. I will read them to the House. I said, in the course of a few brief and imperfect remarks that from time to time I had to make last winter:

> If the storm of which Mr. Borden speaks were to break, not a drop of Canadian blood would be spilt or risked.

When I used that language, in the innocence of my heart I believed that I was pointing out a defect in the scheme of contribution which would make it stink in the nostrils of every right thinking Canadian. But here it is reproduced as a recommendation of this measure,—and then the Prime Minister comes here and makes a feeble effort to revive his flag-waving. What a lot of tame jingoes my imperialist friends become when they get into the neighbourhood of Mr. Bourassa. There was another election in the recess which was quite a good offset to what happened in Chateauguay. I make my compliments to the Government upon the win they made in Chateauguay, especially to the imperialistic section of the Government. But there was an interesting election in South Bruce. My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) went down there. I do not know why the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) sent him. He seems to have made a very good diagnosis as to the scenes in which he himself should operate. I should like, by the way, to join my compliments, my very sincere and heartfelt compliments, to those of my right hon. friend and leader on the appointment of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). I think he knows that I am very sincere in offering them; but I noticed that when he went to that election he made the remark that the Government, everybody must admit, had been riding on a flood tide ever since they came into power. It occurred to me it was a pity he went there, he soon turned it into an ebb. It was not quite so apparent to some of us that the tide had been so strong behind them; certainly, it was not so strong as in the case of other governments that have come into power. The reason why I mentioned the South Bruce election was that the Naval Bill was an issue, a very distinct issue, in that election. I heard in Nova Scotia a most interesting instance of how it was made so. In Amherst, the Tory journalist wrote a long article—such articles were written all over the country—to the effect that this was an ideal constituency to test the naval issue. This gentleman wrote just such an article as any Tory journalist would have written who was a prophet and saw a Government victory ahead. And when he got the result of the election, I am told, he nearly fainted. I refer to the election to say that the result of that contest in the province of Ontario has had far more to do with the dropping of the Naval Bill than even the action of the Senate itself. I cannot understand the method of discussion followed by this Government and by its right hon. leader. I should have thought that he would have admitted that there had been an enormous change in the position of naval matters since last session. The fact is that during the recess there has been a great clarifying of the empire's position in the naval issue.

My right hon. friend méntioned the memorandum of Mr. Winston Churchill, the first memorandum, and he actually defended his contribution policy in a kind of postscript by referring to that memorandum. He seems to forget that in the course of the debate his first memorandum went by the board, and Mr. Churchill sent a second. The second memorandum shifted the trouble from the North sea a thousand miles to Gibraltar rock. The right hon. leader of this House is very curious in his dealings with Mr. Churchill. First, he goes with Mr. Churchill, he bases himself on what Mr. Churchill sends him; and then, at the end of the session, he takes him up once more and makes a considerable part of his speech by reading from recent speeches of Mr. Churchill in Great Britain. The whole case of contribution was a case of emergency, and the emergency disappeared when the fleet went to Gibraltar. And if it disappeared at that time, where is the emergency to-day? My right hon. hon. friend knows, and every one of his supporters knows, that the fleet has been dispersed to the seven seas and the German fleet with it—and every lover of civilization is very glad to see that come about. And that dispersal of the fleet is the second absolute justification of all that the Opposition did last winter, whether it was in the House of Commons or in the Senate. If they required further justification for their attitude, if they required any further defense as being as good British Empire men as sit on the other side of the House, it would be found in the fact that during the recess the little colony of New Zealand has given up the policy of contribution and has taken the policy of the Liberal Opposition in this Parliament.

Now, I want to come a little nearer to the amendment and dwell upon some other aspects of the Address. I felicitate the Government on being able to announce an increase in the foreign commerce of the country. By the way, I am the only man in this House, if it be true that I am the only free trader in the House, who can thoroughly and properly rejoice in that paragraph. The contradictions of protection are most wonderful things. We have a Government which puts a paragraph in the Address rejoicing in the extension of our foreign commerce, and then lecturing me, a solitary free trader, for a year after that on the importance of a home market. I do not know what right the Government has to rejoice at the extension of foreign commerce in a protection country. However, there are some things in connection with our foreign commerce which would give students of economics good reason to pause. The fact is that our foreign trade has been largely increased by the increase in prices, and that the increase of exports is not anything like what it should be if Canada were doing her duty in the development of her resources. As a free trader, I am confronted not only with this paragraph of the Address, but with another very interesting spectacle. Under the predecessors of my hon. friends opposite we had eighteen years of what has been called the National Policy; then we had sixteen years under a Liberal Government, with what I am bound to confess were somewhat microscopic modifications of that policy; then we have had two more years of a continuation of the policy with the microscopic modifications. Now I am confronted with an amendment to the Address asking us to recognize that the Government has taken no steps to remedy the depression of trade in this country. It is a remarkable spectacle; there is something wrong with the country. The slogan ' leave well enough alone ' now appears to be supplanted on the part of this Government by the slogan ' leave ill enough alone.' I do not think that at the present moment, despite the brave show my right hon. friend puts on this matter, that he would repeat his slogan of two years ago, and tell us to ' leave well enough alone.' In the presence of this depression, which the Government sees fit to admit, what do they do? They fall back upon the boundless resources of the country. Well, the boundless resources of the country, Mr. Speaker, are not an asset peculiar to this Government; they were in existence when there was practically nothing in the country except buffaloes and Indians, but they did not make a prosperous and happy country. What is wanted by the country is some little resource on the part of the Government, and there are a great many people who, however brave a show my right hon. friend may make about this depression not being very serious, are of the opinion that dreadnoughts at the present moment are not so important as the cost of living, and who are coming to the conclusion that in a country of boundless resources it is unfortunate to have a Government of very limited resources. I am bound to say that in that view they will be largely borne out by the Address, and by the speech of my right hon. friend in regard to the high cost of living. But hon. gentlemen opposite not only tell us about the boundless resources of the country; they tell us also that they have appointed a commission. I went down to Halifax the other night and said we had a government of dissolving views, not of strong convictions and settled policy, and we certainly have a government of dissolving views in regard to the matter of commissions. In the first session of Parliament they brought forward a Bill to establish a tariff commission, and one of the horrible misdeeds of the Senate is that they are said to have destroyed the tariff commission. They did nothing of the sort; they put in an amendment which would make the commission look after the interests of the consumer as well as the interests of the producer, and the Government would not accept the amendment, thereby showing that they were tied to the producing interests and cared nothing about the consumer. Where does the condemnation of the Senate come in? My right hon. friend says of that most experienced member of this Administration who went down to Lanark and used the language quoted by my right hon. friend this afternoon, that he is now on the sea, coming back from England. Well, personally, that does not strike an extraordinary amount of terror into my heart; I only wish he were here now. I would like to have asked him what he meant by his language in South Lanark, especially when it is considered in relation to other langauge used in regard to this very tariff commission. We have not forgotten how at the end of the first session, with finger outstretched and voice upraised, he charged my right hon. friend with having opposed the mandate of the country to appoint a tariff commission, and one would have thought he were going to carry the fiery cross through Canada. When you have a government that means business in regard to an upper chamber, then that business will be done. When Mr. George's budget was thrown out by the House of Lords, he did not hesitate about what he should do with that body—he went to the people, and for the life of me, in regard to the Naval Bill, I cannot see why my right hon. friend should not follow that example, if he feels as courageous as he seems to be. For the life of me I cannot see what my right hon. friend's quarrel with the Senate is on the Naval Bill. I did not wish to speak about this; I said so at the end of last session, but if my right hon. friend persists in charging the Senate with these things, we must see where the blame really lies. My right hon. friend came home from Europe after being there the summer before last, and, I think, on three occasions he said: 'I have consulted the Admiralty, as I said I would; I will lay my proposals before Parliament.' He did that, as he said he would, but he also said: 'If they are not accepted by Parliament, I will submit them to the people.' Now, in regard to the Naval Bill the Senate only said: 'Very well, submit it to the people.' Where is the quarrel between my right hon. friend and the Senate? That is another case of our having no fear of where the people stand once they know the cold facts in the matter. However, speaking of the tariff commission, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce excommunicated my right hon. friend with bell, book and candle because the Senate had destroyed the Tariff Commission Bill in opposition to the mandate of the people. But he himself is the best justification of the action of the Senate, because, having heard from the people of South Bruce, he goes to the people of South Lanark and says: 'The Lord knows we have far too many commissions; they are as plentiful as the berries in Kazuabazua.' That is one of the places, I suppose, where the hon. gentleman has been seeking a market. And then he goes to England, and, after he has expressed this opinion to the people of South Lanark, the Government straightway appoints another commission. If that is not a case of dissolving views, I never saw one. The real emergency to-day is, as I think my right hon. friend has said, not a question of dreadnoughts. The German scare never was a real emergency; it was a sham emergency, and the high cost of living is the real emergency which confronts the people of this country. I do not propose keeping the House very long, and I certainly do not purpose making a budget speech upon the Address. I think that would be a highly inconvenient method of conducting public discussion in this Parliament. I want to show that I am rising to grace just as the Prime Minister is falling from it. I have had occasion to compliment him on short speeches before, but he will have to reform a little to get back to my good graces in that matter. I want to show that I am following his good example and not his bad one. But I do want to state this that I do not think there is any doubt whatever about the main cause of the high cost of living in protectionist countries. The Minister of Finance said last year in a somewhat light and airy way which he puts on with very great grace, that this is not a local trouble, it is all over the world—and there he left it. But we must look into this a little more closely. We are told that the high cost of living exists in Great Britain as well as in this country. It is not the case, not to anything like the same extent. The simple fact on that matter is that in the one free trade country in the world today, the one absolutely free trade country, you can get pretty well value for your money. In regard to foodstuffs the prices are high because Great Britain has to import the surplus of other nations and I think a very good argument could be set up in favour of the view that protection in other nations raises the price of foodstuffs in Great Britain, for if you talk the home market you will produce for the home market, you will have no surplus to sell and that must make a scarcity in Great Britain. But the British Board of Trade has issued a publication recently in which, taking the index number as 100, they show that the cost of living has risen since 1902 to 115 in Great Britain, while it has risen to 151 in Canada. That is a very serious question, and it will not be settled by party quips and passes as to what happened during the previous administrations. That is a very serious matter for the people of this country and a matter upon which we could have got light without the establishment of this commission of inquiry. Let me say that the cost of living in Great Britain ought to have risen far more than in Canada according to all a priori reasons. For what have you in Great Britain? You have five hundred people or nearly so to the square mile on an area, including Ireland, of one-half the province of Alberta. Here you have less than two people to the square mile upon a continent of resources. That is a most singular and significant fact. Why, we should be all well off in this country and well off at a cheap rate, if our economic arrangements were proper. Although not making a budget speech I wish to state my conviction that in protectionist countries the high cost of living is due, in the first place, to tariff and, in the second place, to combines which arise out of the protection of the tariff. I do not have any doubt upon that subject. If I had, I think I could quote from good authority to convince hon. gentlemen opposite of both those opinions. The effect of a tariff is no mystery. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce said years ago in this House: Of course it is perfectly true that the effect of a tariff is to raise the price of the article carrying that tariff by the amount of that tariff.

There is no good economist on the face of the globe who can successfully controvert that position, and that settles all controversy on the matter. It cannot be successfully controverted. When an article costing say $100 comes to one of our ports and a tariff of 33 per cent is put on it at the port, that 33 per cent goes into the price of the article and the $100 becomes $133 and more than that, because a profit must be charged upon the tariff as well as upon the original price of the article. In regard to the effect of combines, I am going to quote an authority who ought to have more weight than even the Minister of Trade and Commerce with my hon. friends opposite—I am going to quote the Prime Minister himself. In a memorial which he put out last election in regard to the objections to the reciprocity pact, he remarked in the first place, that they are profound and abiding. After that remark he went on to enumerate those objections, and I want to call my right hon. friend's particular attention to this objection. He said: The reciprocity pact will for the most part reduce the prices which our producers will receive for their output while the control of the trusts will prevent any reduction to the consumer. That language is an admission on the part of my right hon. friend that at the last election he knew that the effect of the trusts was to raise the prices to the consumer and on that point he need not have appointed any commission now. If he will put together the opinion I have quoted from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his own opinion he will find himself in this position that he is bound to admit from their own statements that the rise in prices in a protectionist country is due in the first place to tariff and in the second place to the combines which arise under the protection of the tariff. Confronted with the difficulty of living, what did Peel do? He attacked the tariff. What has Woodrow Wilson done in the United States ? He has attacked the tariff, and I submit that if my right hon. leader follows the example of these hon. gentlemen and sets up serious arguments about this subject, neither his actions nor his arguments should be made the matter of jollification as they were in this House to-day. Inconsistency on the part of the right hon. gentleman only proves him to be human, but he is, at any rate, following the example of great statesmen both in Great Britain and in the United States, in the course which he has taken, and I submit that amongst all the events of the recess probably the event which most particularly affects the destiny of Canada and which will certainly affect the thoughts of Canada is the fiscal revolution which has been carried out by the President and the Democratic party in the United States. When I first came to this country and dared, I hope always respectfully, to give my opinion upon tariffs, I used to be regarded as a sort of benighted islander who had strayed somehow out of my proper path and the one recipe for my complaint was that some gentlemen on the other side of the House got up and said: Look at the great country to the south. I see the hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod) still gets lessons from that great country, because he quoted it in one particular in his speech to-night. Well, I looked to the great country to the south and I kept on looking, and now I turn to my hon. friends opposite and I say: Look at the great country to the south and what do you see ? We see a great, simple and sincere man coming into office and cutting up protection and tearing its economic fallacies and false arguments into shreds and casting them to the four winds of heaven. There is no argument by which protection has been supported anywhere that he did not expose and we see that man with the approbation apparently of the whole people, because there is one peculiar thing about this reform: both Republicans and Democrats recognize that they have a statesman who means business and they are prepared to give a fair trial to what he has introduced. My right hon. friend in discussing this subject used an argument which I did not think worthy of him. It is an argument which is being sent out, canned (probably from the Manufacturers' Association), and which is appearing in little country newspapers, proving that there has been no reduction in the price of foodstuffs in the United States since the reduction of the tariff. I put it to my right hon. friend, if forty years of the National Policy here and sixty years of high protection in the United States were needed before the people would take a fair dose of free trade, is it fair to free trade to expect it to produce a revolution in two months? A reduction in food stuffs is the very reduction which would not come at once. How could it? The moment Mr. Woodrow Wilson lowered the tariff a yearling could not become a three-year-old steer. I wish they could have. It would have been a very profitable business for me in Alberta, but it takes two years for a yearling to become a three-year-old. I could give my right hon. friend shoals of advertisement from the business men of the States showing that upon the other articles on which the tariff was reduced, prices came down immediately the tariff came into operation. Wannamaker's had a page advertisement in the New York papers mentioning the articles upon which their prices would be lowered the day the tariff came into effect. So I say the argument of my right hon. friend is scarcely worthy of him. This fiscal revolution in the United States has made it impossible for us to have reciprocity as it was proposed two years ago. I think everybody will recognize that as an absolutely necessary outcome of the change in the United States, but it does not follow that reciprocity is dead. It means that fifty per cent of it is very much alive and in operation on the other side of the line. I see the Minister of Finance making a note on that subject. I dare say he will tell us once more that reciprocity is dead. I very well remember when he first told us that. It was in his maiden speech. He said:

> As far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I may say that practically all classes were against reciprocity—farmers, manufacturers and artisans. And, sir, when a verdict is got from such a province as that, is it not the part of wisdom to accept it?

I have a conundrum for my hon. friend in connection with that quotation. When Ontario changes its verdict, what is our duty? There have been two elections in Ontario recently which have shown that they are not sure that they took the part of wisdom. They have cut down the majority in Middlesex lower than ever before, and I hope we shall hear from the member for South Bruce that reciprocity was made an issue in his county. After all it is not the name, it is the thing I care for. Reciprocity is a term applied to mutual trade arranged by governments; but while that may fall through, the cry of ' no truck or trade with the Yankees ' can never be raised again, because the trading between the two peoples has risen by hundreds of thousands of dollars since the pact was defeated.

This fiscal revolution has another bearing. While it did not kill reciprocity, it did kill in my judgment the policy of mutual preferences within the empire. May I remind the Government that one of the things they did last year was to pass the West Indian treaty. What has happened to that treaty as a result of the fiscal changes in the United States? The Minister of Trade and Commerce said to the delegates from the West Indies: We will help you by giving you one-fifth advantage on sugar over the rest of the world. President Wilson comes along and says: Little Canada away to the north is going to give you one-fifth advantage on sugar. I will do more than that for you, I will give you a ninety million market, fifty per cent off, and free sugar within three years. What becomes of your preference then, and the charge against the Opposition that we wasted time last session? That West Indian treaty is a piece of waste paper to-day. Their sugar will naturally go into the United States. Take the case of wool. What preference can we offer to Australia upon her wool, which is her staple product? The fact is mutual preferences within the empire are only possible so long as the other countries of the world remain protectionist and Britain stands for free trade. Great Britain shows no sign of deserting free trade, but the moment the other countries of the world desert protection there is no possibility of mutual preferences within the empire. And the fact that my right hon. friend advocates mutual preferences within the empire, shows that in his trade outlook he is a benighted protectionist.

I want to say a word or two in regard to another matter which is of vital and immediate moment to the people in the part of the country come from, and through them to the whole of Canada, a question which is raised in an acute form by the rearrangement of the United States tariff. I refer to the question of free wheat. If I wanted to impress upon them the importance of it, I should call their attention to the fact that the Argentine Republic has already availed itself of the United States' offer, and this I take to be a most vital matter for the Government of this country. I am surprised that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had nothing to say upon this subject. If we want to increase the prosperity of this country we cannot do it by putting a paragraph in the Address referring to our boundless resources. As my right hon. leader said: you have to develop these resources and you will only develop them if you show yourselves acute enough business men to contend with your competitors in the Argentine and elsewhere for the markets of the world. I put it to the Government that the Argentine Government have already shown that they know the value of the offer of the United States and have availed themselves of it. What is the position of the Government of Canada? Echo answers, What? I wonder if they know their own position on this matter. The fact is that they have two positions. They had one in Manitoba six weeks ago; there is no doubt about that. Mr. Harvey Simpson, the Conservative member of the Legislature, was no doubt in communication with the most prominent member of this Government before he dared to put that resolution in favour of free wheat upon the table of the Manitoba House. That resolution has been carried by the political friends of the Government and carried unanimously in a Conservative House.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Did Roblin vote for it?

Mr. CLARK: Presumably, Sir Rodmond Roblin must have voted for it, because it was carried unanimously. There are some other friends of my hon. friends opposite who came down from Alberta, and there is no possibility of them successfully denying the fact that they came also voicing the opinions of Western Conservatives as well as Western Liberals, to ask for free wheat. But this Government is a government of dissolving views; not only a government of dissolving views, it is a government of double views because the same Minister of Public Works who said to the Manitoba Conservative legislators: ask for free wheat; he apparently said to the legislators from Alberta: don't ask for free wheat. In the presence of such a peculiar spectacle I am surprised that the Prime Minister did not give us some light upon this subject, and I certainly think we ought to hear from the Government and hear from the Government at once: whether in this country we have not statesmen as acute-minded, or at any rate as resolute as the statesmen of the Argentine Republic. Personally I cannot understand the Government hesitating a moment in this matter; that is to say, if they are actuated purely by a desire to do what is best for Canada. Many arguments that were used in regard to the reciprocity pact of two years ago do not apply to this matter at all. This question is not now part of a large general agreement; it cannot be argued that it interferes with our fiscal independence. We simply have to take the tariff off wheat, which would be no sacrifice whatever, and we get entry into the United States market for our wheat. I want to remind the ministers that they know as well as I know that Western grain growers do not fear competition from the United States or anywhere else. In fact, one of the peculiarities of this Government, as distinguished from the Opposition, is that they have no faith in their own country. They tell us we must not trade with the United States or we should be annexed; they told us last year we could not build ships in this country, and now they are afraid apparently that our wheat in the West can be successfully competed against from abroad. I want to tell my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who no doubt is seriously considering this question, that we in the West have confidence in our country, that we have confidence in our wheat, and that we believe that no wheat anywhere can compete with it because we produce the best in the world. That is the kind of Canada we believe in and that is the kind of Canadianism we believe in. There was another argument used two years ago that need not frighten my hon. friends opposite now. They told us: there is no market to the south of us. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in that wonderful four hour speech, used the famous illustration of the jack knife. He said: why, you cannot do any business with the United States because they produce the same materials that we do; it would be like two men trying to make themselves richer by exchanging jack knives. But, let me call the attention of the minister to the enlightenment which they no doubt have already got as to the substantial nature of the exchanges that are going on between us and the United States. The tariff on cattle has been removed entirely. In the year 1912, 7,600 head of cattle all told went from Canada to the United States, and it is admitted that since the Woodrow Wilson tariff went into operation 100,000 head of cattle have gone below the line. So, our friends opposite need not tell us any more that we cannot do business with the United States. I never argue this question on the ground of price, but I am pleased to inform the Government and their supporters that those who argued that reciprocity would bring us higher prices have been fully borne out by events, because it is a fact that the cattle raisers of Alberta have received one dollar per hundred pounds more for cattle last year that they have ever received during the time I have been in this country. The result of the Woodrow Wilson tariff has been that there is an enormous increase in the sale of Canadian cattle. The tariff on oats has been reduced, and what has been the result? It is established that in the year 1912 we sold the magnificent quantity of 183,000 bushels of oats to the United States, whereas since the Woodrow Wilson tariff came into operation we have sold something in the neighbourhood of twenty million bushels in a couple of months. There is no question any longer as to whether there is a market for us in the United States; we know now we have a market there. And, Sir, I want to point out what would be the result of these dealings with the United States. The result must inevitably be increased production of cattle and oats in the western provinces. Increased production will lead to increased settlement; increased settlement will lead to increased immigration, increased immigration will bring in increased capital, which will benefit every portion of the Dominion. That is what we lost by the rejection of the reciprocity pact.

I want to go a little further into an examination of this free wheat project. It is a very peculiar spectacle which presents itself to us in the matter of the grain growers and farmers of the West coming to the Government and seeking the abolition of the tariff upon their own product. I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that usually when an interest comes to the Government in connection with the tariff it is to request that the tariff be increased upon their products, or that it may be allowed to remain without reduction. And, curiously enough, in a protectionist country like this, and with a protectionist Government like this, these people get an extraordinary amount of consideration. Now, representing the farmers of the West, I want to ask the Government why it is they do not give the same consideration to the men engaged in the industry of agriculture when they come to ask that the tariff upon wheat should be abolished—and that is all they are asking for—that they give to the manufacturers of this country who come to them with respect to the tariff on their products. Have the farmers not the right to speak for their own industry? What is sacrosanct or holy about manufacturers so called that they should receive very much attention from the Government and that no heed should be paid to the plea of the farmers who are engaged in the most important industry of all. I contend it is the right of the wheat growers to be the judges in this matter. They go on the prairies and they face the hardships of pioneer life, which I have shared with them in another branch of industry for twelve years, and when they come to this Government and say, we understand our industry and we want the tariff on wheat removed. The Government sits passive and lets the Argentine Republic get into the United States markets in front of them. The Government's treatment of the farmers is not fair to the agricultural industry as compared with their treatment of other industries which come to them. Why is it that the Government did not attend to this matter? Have the millers had anything to do with it? Have they had representations from the millers? I am afraid the Government has paid too much attention to the millers. Well, what about the millers? What about the milling industry? Sir John Simon, speaking in Birmingham, England, the other night, said: I do not suppose, at this moment, there is any industry in Britain which is more flourishing than the milling industry under free trade? That opinion is well worth weighing by the Government when the millers come to it. That is the opinion of Sir John Simon in regard to the milling industry of Great Britain, where they have to import their raw material; but here our millers are in the midst of the finest raw material in the world for their business, in the midst of an overwhelming abundance of that raw material. I say that if they cannot mill in Canada, they are not meant to mill; they should come out beside me and take up homesteads. They should certainly not be allowed to prevent the farmers from getting this market, if it is to be of any good to them. The millers say they would be put out of business. They are not afraid of being put out of business. What they are afraid of is that they will have to accept the same price for flour in Canada as they do in Great Britain. I believe they get higher prices for flour in Canada than they can secure in Great Britain. Their fear is that they will have to take the same prices in Canada as in Great Britain, and I do not think that a fear of that kind should be allowed to interfere with the Government in this matter.

This is not a western question. It is a Canadian question. I have just indicated how it is a Canadian question. Everybody knows—my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) knows, and will not deny, that the development of Canada in the last half generation, the great prosperity of Canada has been due to the development of western Canada, not that there has not been a development of industries here; but, if you place more farmers on the land of the west, you benefit every industry in western Canada.

Just compare the methods of freedom in this matter with the methods of protection. Compare the steel bounties' policy which has been supported by both Governments in this country with the method I propose of giving our wheat a free exit into the United States market. Protection begins at the wrong end. I was in Nova Scotia lately, and I looked over the Steel Works in Sydney. Very good works they are; but, while being shown over them, I came to two mills that were standing idle. I said to the manager, a courteous fellow countryman of mine: What is the matter with these mills? He said; We have got no orders. Now, what amount of tariff or what amount of bounty will send orders into those mills? If you gave them a million dollars a day, it would not give orders to those mills. All it would do would be to pay interest on the capital invested in the works. But, if you begin at the other end and develop your farm lands and develop western Canada, you will develop your transportation. You cannot do that without steel and you will, therefore, develop the steel works at Sydney and in other parts of the country. I bring that before the Government as an important consideration in connection with this matter of free wheat. A far-seeing statesmanship—and it does not require a very long sight—would give free wheat at once to the western farmers; and with it, if the Government wanted to do a wise act to cure the present depression, they should take the duty off agricultural implements. I trust my hon. friend the Solicitor General got a guarantee upon that subject before he entered the Government. It would be customary in Britain for him to have got such a guarantee. When any gentleman, in the position of my hon. friend in the old country, has spoken as strongly as he has in regard to the reduction of duty on agricultural implements, he ought not to have taken his seat in that Government unless he has got a guarantee that his views will prevail there. He must be true to himself and to his constituents. I have considerable confidence, however, that he has looked into this matter. The two things together would be a splendid start in dealing with the tariff, in the way statesmen have done in other countries, and would have a bearing upon the development of Canada, the relief from the high cost of living, and from the depression in trade from which the speech acknowledged we are suffering.

The Government, so far from providing any means of relief from the conditions under which we are suffering at the present time, rejoice in certain things which are calculated to aggravate our distress. Until we provide more markets for the sale of our agricultural produce, until we alter our economic system, no Government in this country ought to rejoice, as the Address rejoices, in the increase in immigration. Where is our immigration going? I very much fear it is not going on to the land. It is going into the towns. It is increasing the number of unemployed in the towns. A great many people in the cities of the West, who are unemployed at the present time, were working at harvest time and have gone into the towns. I contend that no Government has any right to go on promoting unlimited immigration unless it takes proper means to get the people onto the land. The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) tells us that what we are suffering from at the present time is too little production. We shall not increase our production by adding to the unemployed in the towns. The only way in which we shall increase our production is by adding to our rural population. There is something that is wrong with the economic condition of Canada. This question has a bearing not only upon the question of immigration but upon the question of rural depopulation, upon the question of the prosperity of the whole country.

I just want to tell my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his supporters that this extra price for cattle has not in the slightest degree affected the loyalty of any cattle raiser in the province of Alberta. Personally, I want to give my right hon. friend the assurance that, although I have received, myself, a dollar a head more for cattle this fall than I ever received before, so far as I can search my heart and conscience I am as loyal to the Old Country as ever I was. I am glad to give that assurance, and I want to enter into a similar guarantee on the part of the wheat producers. I am perfectly sure, if they did take their wheat to the United States and sold it there, it would not interfere with their loyalty. I do not think we shall fight a campaign again when that cry will be raised. It gained a few votes, but it was an extremely foolish cry, because, after all, men are not disloyal on account of thriving under a flag; men are disloyal when they fail to thrive under a flag. Make men poor; make them discontented, and then you will increase their disloyalty. That is the condition that we have as to poverty and unemployment at the present time. The responsibility of the Government is great in this matter. I trust they will not be deterred from doing what is right by any consideration of their own consistency. I trust they will look at this matter from the point of view of the interest of Canada and their duty to the people of this country. The fact of the matter is, there are large numbers of people in Canada, both Conservatives and Liberals, who think that we have had just a little too much attention paid to the great imperial matters upon which my right hon. friend spent so much time to-night, and too little attention paid to the affairs of our own country.

The Government has duties to Canada, and Canada is looking for them to discharge those duties. And if the Government wish to see how those duties should be discharged, they must follow the advice they give to me and look to the great country to the south of us. My right hon. friend says there is unemployment, there are distressed conditions, in the United States as well as here. It is extraordinary to hear that, because his friends the Tariff Reformers of Great Britain have been proclaiming that Great Britain was the only place where you had unemployment, and that that unemployment was due to Free Trade. But you have only to take up a paper published here in Ottawa this evening to see the headline, 'The Old Country cannot see any slackening in trade.' The one country in the world which was a commercial miracle in the year 1913, the country which has the smallest rate of unemployment in the world, the country which has the largest business in the world, is this country of forty-five millions of people living in a territory half the size of Alberta. And against this, we have this admission, this proclamation, of unemployment in the United States and Canada. Look to the great country to the south of us and you get ideas on this subject—for there is one kind of commerce that is not prevented by a tariff, and that is the commerce in thought. I see a market where my right hon. friend does not see it. That market is there. The Government have a great responsibility with regard to this matter, and we all trust that they will face that responsibility in the interest of the country. If they do not, then I am sure of this—that so far as Western Canada is concerned, they will go down to an inglorious defeat, unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): I am sure it will be a cause of astonishment that I rise at this juncture, but it is not altogether my fault. It arises, I presume, from a desire on the part of some people to take advantage of this late hour of the evening to take a nap. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, in opening, that I should like to join my humble voice in the congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address for the manner in which they carried out that pleasant duty. The strength of argument, the breadth of view, the fluency and finish of their diction, excited general admiration. It is a great pleasure to see that the Government benches can do something of which the Opposition approve. We all wish to join our voices also in the universal praise of the pluck displayed by Her Excellency after her severe ordeal of illness in returning to preside in Canada. It is very gratifying to us to find that the Opposition unite with us in discerning the good qualities, the very brilliant qualities of the new Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen.)

I cannot understand why so much time is wasted by the Opposition in denouncing the statements made by their own provincial Prime Ministers. We are told that, through the inaction or mistaken action, the ignorance or otherwise, of the Conservative Government, Canada has failed to measure up to the standard as she should have done; and yet in the face of that, in the face of the great problem which a young country like this has before it, we have the universal testimony of the provincial Prime Ministers, that Canada is exceedingly prosperous. Logically what justification can there be for taking a fling at the conditions in this country at the present time? I think I may safely say, without being considered impertinent, that it is not only illogical and inconsistent, but distinctly improper to fly in the face of the provincial Prime Minister who is the best exponent of local conditions. Are we to suppose for one moment that the Prime Minister of Alberta, or the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan, is anxious to place a feather in the cap of the Conservative Government of Ottawa? We know that he is more likely—being human and a Liberal—to minimize the conditions in Alberta and Saskatchewan than to magnify them. We must surely be allowed to rely upon the statements made by these men, and we do rely upon them more than upon the statements of those whose duty it is to find fault and to endeavour to resume their places on the treasury benches where they committed homicide by misadventure in 1911.

It must be remembered that the Naval or Imperial policy of the Conservative party springs from the fact that first and foremost—first, last and all the time—they desire to remain within the British Empire. The weakness of the Conservative position unquestionably is—admittedly is—that $35,000,000 or thereabouts will be expended, to a certain extent outside the country. It is admitted that half of that, even under the divine management of the Liberals, would have to be spent out of the country, because they simply could not build all portions of their navy here. I confess that is the weakness of our position; we do not say—or I presume we do not say— that our position at all points is invincibly strong; we do say that, in comparison with anything else that has been devised or suggested, our position is incomparably strong. But, who wants to embark upon a great military policy such as the Liberal policy is? Who wants to unfurl the Canadian flag of practical, if not nominal, independence, and sail the seas provoking conflict and disaster? The Liberals are either sincere or insincere. If they are insincere, we do not wish to have anything more to do with them, nor does the country. But if they are sincere, then they propose to develop a policy which would place us alongside of such nations as Germany and France, who are now making a mad rush to complete a naval policy such as will be suitable to their station. I am told that Canada must do likewise. Now there is no force in the argument of building a little tin-pot navy. There is no such idea on the part of Liberals Their desire is to build and develop a great naval force. I am free to acknowledge that while that is an exceedingly extravagant and unwise proposition, I am sufficiently imperialistic and sufficiently loyal to wish to adopt that plan rather than do nothing at all. But we find no reciprocity of spirit exhibited by our friends. They will not have the Conservative policy, and, not having that policy, they will throw down their arms and wreck the whole scheme; they will sneer at emergencies, and let everything, to use a common phrase, go to the devil. We are not like that. If these gentlemen were on the Treasury benches we might disapprove of their policy and say we had a much better one, but we are not so narrow, so stupid, so unloyal, if I may not use the word disloyal—so unloyal, so entirely anti-imperialistic as to decline to do anything to help the empire which we are supposed to adorn, if we cannot have our own way. It is well to talk about sheep and cattle, but we had better see if we cannot develop some sort of a manly spirit as well. What kind of an education did they give in Newcastle to the Leviathan of Alberta? Is it absolutely impossible for us to develop an independent spirit, a loftiness of conception, along with the material advantages of the world? Has the hon. gentleman never heard of Athens? Does he not know that twenty-five hundred years ago there was developed the spirit of freedom, of independence, of philosophy and of science the like of which the world has never seen? The whole history of Athens simply teems with the spirit displayed by her people. Many and many a time she might have sacrificed herself to material advantage, but she preferred to bequeath to posterity a noble name and a noble example. This we should never forget. Canada is in danger of becoming very materialistic. From one end of this country to the other we hear talk about free food, about dear food, about the high cost of living, and about the tango. That is all that is going on in the country now. Theories of government are not being worked out; they are not working themselves out, and the Liberal politicians will not allow them to be worked out. The hon. member for Red Deer is deluded by baits; he sees a fish flashing by, with sparkling scales, straightway, makes a bite at it. He would say: 'Why do you seek fish in the South Sea when you can get them right here? He has no broad conception of things. The evolution of government has brought us to the time when the freedom of the people allows them and prompts them to manage their own business, but, strange to say, there are so many anomalies in the twentieth century, and we are now confronted with a vicious paradox. Over-supply produces scarcity; over-production produces starvation, and surplus of material produces stringency. It would be difficult indeed to unearth anything more absurd than this illogical fact. Why is it that we do not set ourselves to find out why these things are so? Is it that we must devote ourselves to something sentimental; to some esoteric theory such as the free trade which exists only in the imagination of the hon. member for Red Deer, the gentleman who voted for bounties? He despises tariffs; yet he overlooked the tariff which collects money for the public treasury and voted for bounties that put money into the private pockets of individuals.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I rise to a point of order. If my hon. friend is stating this as a fact, I may say that I have never consciously voted for the imposition of a tariff or the payment of a bounty. I do not think my hon. friend has the information as to when I gave such a vote.

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not wish to be in the slightest degree inaccurate, and I was particular to make my assertion when the hon. member was present. I refused to vote for the lead bounty last year, but the hon. gentleman, on one occasion at least, I think, voted for it. If, however, he did not vote for it, if I am not misinformed, he certainly spoke in favour of it.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I rise again to correct my hon. friend. I made as good a speech as ever I could against it.

Mr. BURNHAM: All I have to say, then, is that I am utterly unable to understand the English language as spoken by the hon. member for Red Deer. I could a tale unfold, but I will not unfold it. However, as the hon. gentleman said in the course of his fine speech that he has a conscience, I will leave the matter with that conscience.

No branch of industry—and I must be excused for being, perhaps, a little irrelevant—could possibly thrive if it were not given proper attention; if the stock were not taken and a balance struck; if there were not some intimate control and supervision exercised in regard to it. And yet, notwithstanding the fact that this House and the people generally are concerned most intimately with everything that takes place in this country, they are reproached in the most scathing language by the hon. member for Red Deer for failing to know all about the conditions of industry in Canada. He reproaches us with our ignorance, but would not allow us a commission which would find out why we do not know these things. And yet he says we are inconsistent. There are some very striking passages in the hon. gentleman's address, but I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this fact, that whilst government ownership and government control, that is to say, public ownership and public control, are spreading the world over, there seems to be a disposition to leave them in a haphazard condition here, so that they are neither one thing nor the other, and we are confronted with the extraordinary fact that we decline to provide a decent living wage for the working man, and yet demand that he shall live in a decent manner. We also decline to deal with the problem of unemployment and wonder that a starving man is inclined to strike. The injustice is done on both sides. We fail to regulate and provide for the employer those peaceful conditions which would enable him to develop his industry and we decline to provide conditions which only a government can provide for employees which will enable them to provide for the present and for the future in some respectable and certain manner. These things of course are extremely obvious. Books galore have been written upon them. Every president of every university in the world has written a book this last year or two upon that subject. Every man of prominence in every government has dealt with the question. Commissions have found out causes and commissions have failed to find out causes, and yet here we are in Canada, industrious as we are, painstaking as we are, capable as we are—and I think I may be forgiven for saying so—and yet we are not endeavouring to bend our energy to the solution of the most obvious and the most pressing of problems. It is useless to say that free trade is a powerful or effectual buttress against such a thing as the unduly high cost of living. It is admitted by the very speaker who lauds free trade in this connection that it has not had the effect of lowering or preserving the cost of living in Great Britain. That cost has risen by fifteen per cent or thereabouts. Well, all we can say about that is that it is not a question between free trade and protection. It is a question of the comparative effect of economic policies under the conditions that exist. It is idle to suppose or to assert that the logical conclusion is that one is right and the other is wrong because they are diametrically opposed when, as a matter of fact, they both run in the same groove. We must be consistent. There is no use listening to great statesmen and the enunciation of tremendous principles if those propositions and the enunciation of them do not bear out the conclusions.

I would like to deal just for a moment with one or two statements made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He scoffed at an emergency. Are we to understand that there is no emergency in the British Government at this minute over the navy question? I do not wish to meddle in other people's affairs, but the cables all tell us that at this present moment Great Britain is convulsed with an emergency and yet, because the hon. member for Red Deer has not had it proved to him in black and white so that everybody would laugh at him if he did not admit it, he will not provide for an emergency, he will do nothing, he will throw his arms down and let it all go. He follows only too well the motto of the free traders, laissez faire, let everything go, let well enough alone, that is what that means. There are 4,500 millionaires by the last census in Great Britain, and who has the audacity to tell us there is no poverty there? Why are people fleeing from Great Britain? If the people were leaving this country as they are leaving Great Britain wages would be high and there would be no unemployed; but the fact is they are leaving Great Britain in such tremendous numbers that they themselves consider it a reproach that the people should leave Great Britain for another country under the conditions. It is not fair to argue in that way, it is inaccurate.

One half of the magnificent speech of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred to the very bad business of the Prime Minister in calling the House on the 15th of January instead of the 15th of October. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) knocked that all on the head in one minute but all I can say is that if the Opposition are going on like this, fighting each other in mortal combat, we will have to put a ring around them and charge an admission fee. Strange to say in criticising the Highways Bill the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), admitted that five-sixths of that Bill was perfect, five clauses out of six were all right, the Senate admitted that. The sixth clause, which refers to the administration of funds under the Bill being apparently the key to the position and referring to what the hon. member considered possibly a political advantage, was so distasteful to him and to the Senate that they decided to throw it out. That is to say, rather than forego a political advantage they would throw the material advantages of the people of this country to the four winds of Heaven. Are they aware that this Government is not responsible to the Senate? This is not oligarchical government, notwithstanding the fact that they are trying to make it so; we have still popular government in Canada, and if the Government passes a Bill against which the Opposition think it their duty to make a protest let them make a protest and preserve their position without prejudice if they like; then, when this Government go to the country on their record, if the people disapprove they will turn the Government out. But the hon. gentlemen opposite knew that the people would not disapprove and that is the reason why they burked that Bill. If that Bill meant that the Government were committing suicide, does anybody tell me that the hon. gentlemen opposite would not have provided a halter? Not at all, they would have said: certainly we disapprove of the Bill, go to the country; go further if you like, that is where you will end. But they did not do that, for they knew that with that Bill and other Bills of first importance and advantage to this country, they were not only out of the Treasury benches but hopelessly out, and that they might never see them again in their lifetime. That is what affected them, and that is why the Senate was called upon to be so judicial

Let me say one thing which convinces me, although it may not convince hon. gentlemen opposite. Living is cheapest in this world in that country which has the highest measure of protection, namely, France. Of all the countries on the face of the earth the country that is the cheapest to live in is France. She, two years ago, so approved of the policy of protection that she raised her whole system of protection by 20 per cent. If that is not a direct argument in flat contradiction of the statement of the hon. member for Red Deer I do not know what is—and it is not borrowed from theory but from practice and fact. I was very much upset,—although I may recover—by a statement of the same hon. gentleman about free wool from Australia. Why, Australia is a protected country the same as Canada. Why does he not treat the question in a logical way and treat free wheat from Canada the same as Australians do their wool from Australia? But that unfortunately is generally his failing. He is very quick, very picturesque, very defiant and very polite, but as to being cogent we must confess to having our reservations. He said the price of Canadian flour was higher in Canada than in Great Britain. Is he aware that quality for quality it is not so? Flour is flour, he thinks. Well, I can tell him it is not. There are several brands of flour and that makes all the difference in the world. If he wants an analogy, a small one it is true, let him take the case of the old country tailor who sends his goods out to this country, pays the tariff and yet sells them at the same price he charges in England. How does that happen? I do not buy these clothes myself, I make my own, but if we are to have these monstrosities of trade brought up before us all the time, why are they not dealt with in a fair manner? There can be no question that the Conservative party has made mistakes in the past and has profited by them. It is admitted that different conditions are suitable to different countries and to argue at large as if Canada were Britain and Britain were Canada but shows the ineptitude of the hon. gentleman on these questions. However, I fancy that a due regard to patriotism and a certain virility which we have inherited from our ancestors both Gaelic and British, will enable us to weather the storm. I know that the Americans do not start to howl as if everything had gone to the bowwows. When they get into a bit of a slough, they set to work to get out of it, and they have set an example to the whole world. They cannot be excelled for strength of mind, and body and character, and surely we are not going to throw our doors open and howl as if the country was something we should be ashamed of. Let us bend our energies together. Let us find out by commission and cease to draw our illustrations from impossible and irrelevant conditions. Let us face the facts in a scientific manner and deal with them accordingly, and then we shall be much more edified than by a tissue of sarcasms, and, I am afraid, absurdities.

On motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Borden the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Tuesday, January 20, 1914.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, resumed from Monday, January 19.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): In rising to address the House in this debate, there are one or two matters to which I wish in the first place to refer very briefly. The announcement in the Speech from the Throne that the estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted to Parliament at a very early date is gratifying, not only to Parliament, but also to the country. Last year we voted approximately $200,000,000, which included some very large appropriations, and these being submitted to us during the last days of the session they did not receive from this House the consideration which their importance deserved. I do not approach this matter in a censorious or partisan spirit, and indeed I think it might be said that the system I am now disapproving of has been followed by all governments in Canada. It may be fairly said that many millions of dollars of the estimates we voted last year were unproductive expenditure, and represented an absolute waste of public money. Many of these expenditures were proposed, not for the welfare of Canada, but rather to meet parochial and partisan demands throughout the country. It is very obvious indeed that expenditures of this character must have a tremendously evil effect upon the political morality of the people, and make for waste, inefficiency, and corruption in the various public services. I am glad, therefore, to learn that these estimates will be submitted to Parliament at a very early date, and I trust that the Government will not expect the House to vote them without ample time being given for their proper consideration. Might I express the further hope that in the consideration of the estimates the Government will see that from time to time during each week of the session we shall have an opportunity of dealing with the estimates, and that Parliament shall not be asked to approve of them en bloc in the dying hours of the session.

Just a word as to the promised redistribution legislation, made necessary after the last decennial census, under the provisions of the British North America Act. I trust that when that measure is presented to Parliament, it will bear evidence of a desire on the part of the Government to make a fair redistribution of the constituencies, and that a spirit of fair play will be exhibited in the measure. If the Government should make their proposal in that spirit they will have for it, I am sure, the cordial support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

There is not a great deal in the Speech from the Throne which should occasion very much discussion. The hon. gentleman from York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod), who spoke yesterday, readily saw that the Speech was more remarkable for what it did not contain than for what it contained, and so he dealt with matters which were not included in the Speech. It is very evident from the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, that it is the intention of the Government to abandon all their pre-election promises and programmes and to engage in a campaign against the Senate. If an attack on the Senate is to be the political programme of the Government for the future, then I would suggest that the gauntlet should be thrown down at once, and that the conflict alleged to exist between the Government and the Senate should be submitted to the people and settled by them at the very earliest date possible.

The omission of any reference in the Speech from the Throne to the so-called naval issue, cannot but occasion astonishment throughout Canada and the Empire. At the last session it precipitated the greatest parliamentary contest known to the political history of Canada. It was naturally expected that that issue in some form or other would be again before us this session, and surely it is indicative of cowardice or incapacity or both on the part of the Government that it has not again in some form brought this issue forward. It is hard for one to believe that the Government or the advisers of the Crown are so indifferent to their obligations and to their mighty professions as to treat this very important issue with silent contempt, as they evidently propose doing. It was only four years ago that Parliament, after calm deliberation, unanimously concluded to embark upon a naval policy in the direction of the construction of a Canadian navy, which it was believed would be a proper discharge of our duty in the burden of the defence of the empire. For purposes which were purely political and in order to obtain the good offices of a political party in the province of Quebec, the present Government abandoned that policy, and they have never yet been bold enough to return to it. After a year or more of sleep upon this policy, doubtlessly disturbed by many nightmares, there was presented to Parliament last session a measure providing for the expenditure of $35,000,000 for the construction of three battleships and the presentation of the same to the British Admiralty. This policy was urged upon the ground that Britain's supremacy was imperilled and that a great conflict was imminent between two great European powers. Tokens and signs, we were told, were not wanting; there were pealings of thunder and flashes of lightning, premonitions of this terrible naval conflict between two great naval powers. And upon this ground we were urged, cajoled and threatened to support this measure of the Government. We were told it was purely an emergency policy; that the Government had in mind the adoption of a permanent policy which they would shortly present to Parliament. Several months at least have passed since then. The evidence of the emergency conditions and of the European Armageddon has vanished. Time has vindicated the position which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took upon that occasion. The relations between Great Britain and Germany have improved immensely since then; better still, there is not wanting very impressive evidence that among the peoples of these two great countries there is rising a storm against the ever-increasing expenditures for naval purposes; and to-day in this country, in this House or out of it, is anybody to be found bold enough to say that emergency conditions now prevail? Therefore the reasons given by the Government last session for their naval policy being now non-existent, I ask what explanation can be given by the Administration for their silence upon this subject. Is the Postmaster General the impediment in the way of the adoption of a permanent naval policy? Is Mr. Henri Bourassa as powerful in the counsels of the Government to-day as he was in 1911 and 1912? Is Mr. Armand Lavergne as powerful with the Ministry to-day as he was in 1911, wnen he selected the Quebec representation in the cabinet? Is any valid reason to come from the Government? Is any valid reason possible for their silence upon this occasion—a silence which we are told will prevail for a very considerable time. The Prime Minister told us yesterday that he was awaiting the political transformation of the Senate ere he re-introduced the legislation of last session. This is postponing our naval programme with a vengeance. It does violence also to intelligence, because it predicates collusion between Providence and an organization of political opportunists upon this question. Again, it does honour to the Senate, to even the most vainglorious member of that body, that European hostilities can be conveniently postponed so as to synchronize with the death of members of the Canadian Senate and the appointment of other Canadians to that House. If the European emergency condition is so accommodating as to be pleasing indeed, in all these circumstances, I say that the Government is in honour bound to declare its permanent policy upon the naval question. They have virtually repealed, without parliamentary authority, the Canadian Naval Service Act; they have by their acts impliedly repealed it; and I say they are in honour bound to replace it by something else, or to put it again into operation. The country to-day expects a declaration of policy upon this issue from the Government; and, if they cannot ascertain their own views, if they are incapable of framing a policy as promised, then I submit it is their duty to appeal to the people, as indeed they have often threatened and promised to do if the legislation which they submitted to Parliament was not approved. It speaks ill for the political institutions of this country, or for the intelligence of the Canadian electorate, if, in all the circumstances, it is possible for a Government successfully to maintain a policy of silence upon this issue, and at the same time disregard their own professions and the natural inclinations of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod) yesterday said that this country was to be saved a further humiliation by the reintroduction of the naval policy of last year. It was quite evident to hon. gentlemen sitting upon this side of the House and observing the hon. member for York while making that statement, that he was speaking facetiously and not seriously. Canada has been humiliated in this respect by hon. gentlemen opposite. Canada was humiliated when, without cause, they abandoned the unanimous policy of Parliament declared in 1900 upon this issue. Canada was humiliated when, in the last session, they asked the approval of Parliament, on alleged grounds which were false, namely, the existence of an emergency, of their naval policy. We are to be further humiliated this session by a policy of cowardice and silence on the part of the Ministry, and if so I suppose this humiliation will continue until the Ministry itself has been extinguished, which, doubtless, will occur when first they appeal to the people of the country. I anticipate that we never shall again hear from hon. gentlemen opposite a word concerning an emergency naval policy. I do not believe it is their intention again to return to that policy. From the statement made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister last evening, one would gather that he is already preparing the ground upon which he may fall, and preparing the justifications which he may give to this country for not re-introducing the naval measure of last year. Speaking last evening, he said:

There is no authority whatever for this statement. The emergency not now prevailing, one would anticipate that if they introduced any measure at all it would have reference to a permanent naval policy, and I say that they would not be justified in anticipating the defeat of such a measure by the Senate. He proceeds:

> We have no reason to doubt that such is the determination of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Under these circumstances—

The paragraph which I particularly wished to quote from was another and not that which I was reading. Let me read again. The Prime Minister said:

> The Government are naturally mast desirous that the aid which we proposed last year, under conditions of urgency and need, and which we still propose to bring in the due course—

Whether urgency now prevails and obtains or not > —to the common defence of the empire should be so proffered or given as not to prejudice or retard any international agreement for the cessation of battleship construction. When we are in a position to press the Naval Aid Bill to a final and satisfactory conclusion in the Senate, it will be our duty to consult with the Imperial Government respecting these grave and important considerations. If it should then appear that, by any naval arrangement entered into or about to be entered into by the great powers a restriction or diminution of the present lamentable rivalry in armaments could be brought about, we should always be ready, until our ships have actually been begun, to review the situation so far as these proposals are concerned.

That, Mr. Speaker, I take as an express intimation to this country—at least we on this side of the House may be justified in accepting it as such—that never again will we hear of the naval aid measure of last year, and that the reason which the Government propose giving to the country for this will be that the emergency conditions have passed away, and that there is an expressed desire among the nations of the world to lessen the expenditures of public money for naval purposes. I think that the threats made by the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite yesterday against the Senate are both puerile and absurd. It is simply an attempt to cover their own nakedness by the fig leaves of useless threats against one of the legislative bodies of this Parliament, and I believe that the people of this country will pay little heed to these threats.

There is another matter upon which the Government propose to conduct a policy of silence, or of awaiting a change in the political colouring of the Senate. I refer to the Highways Bill. Again the Government's views smack of absurdity when they prophesy as to the expectation of the life of fellow-legislators and their own tenure of office. Do they not know that they are already considered in Canada as a one-term government? Their own supporters so prophesy; it is predicted openly in the market-place even. Their own record of incapacity makes this almost an accepted fact even to their own supporters, and one may even postulate the fact that this Administration is a one-term Government. If they propose to distinguish themselves by placing upon the statute books any legislation respecting highways, this is their opportunity, for it will not likely come to them again. They say that the Senate has prevented the execution of their policy with respect to highways. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is but a figment of political fancy or an innocent fabrication on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Senate has never, as far as I can recollect, done anything to negative any principle involved in any government measure in the past, unless it be in connection with the naval measure of last session. We may expect to hear during this session, and during the remainder of this Parliament, as an excuse for the non-fulfilment and implementing of Government policies, that the Senate has prevented the same. That apparently will be the defence of the Administration from now until the time when they receive their deserved rebuke from the Canadian electorate at the next election.

It might be worth while to ascertain if the Senate has been an impediment in the way of the non-fulfilment of several matters of policy promised by this Government since their advent to power and prior to that time. It may be worth while to ascertain what these policies were, and to inquire if they have been delayed by the action of the Canadian Senate, and if so to what degree. I hold in my hand a publication entitled the Liberal-Conservative Handbook of 1911, which sets forth a declaration of matters of policy of the Government party. I find there a declaration of the tariff policy of the Government, as follows:

> A fiscal policy which will promote the production within Canada of all useful articles and commodities that can be advantageously produced or manufactured from or by means of her natural resources, having due regard to the interests of the consumer as well as to the just claims of our wage-earning population.

That was the promise of the Administration in the direction of the adoption of a new tariff policy. In 1911, they promised many of their supporters the adoption of some new tariff or fiscal policy. Many of their friends and supporters paid for the adoption of an amended fiscal policy. Has there been any effort on the part of the Administration to implement that policy? Has the Senate of Canada in any respect interfered or been an impediment?

For many years, we heard of the great necessity of adequate protection in this country. Why, Sir, since hon. gentlemen went upon the Treasury benches, we have never yet had even a definition of adequate protection, let alone any legislative effort to put it in concrete form. When did the Government endeavour to enact tariff legislation which was in the interest of the consumer? When did the Senate interpose any obstacle? I would say that this is the year; this is the session; this is the time and the place for hon. gentlemen opposite to give us some tariff legislation which is in the interest of the consumer.

They also promised us tariff legislation which would meet the best claims of our wage-earning population. This is the time and the opportunity to implement that particular promise.

We were also promised some preference in tariffs within the empire. Their policy in this respect was set forth in the publication from which I am reading. It is as follows:

> The promotion by negotiation, legislation and constitutional means of a system of mutual preferential trade within the empire.

Has any effort ever been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to implement this promise to secure imperial preferential tariff relations between the various portions of the empire? Has the Senate of Canada interposed any obstacles in this respect?

Again, we were promised the appointment of a tariff commission which would obviate many inconsistencies and difficulties in connection with tariff making and tariff legislation in this country. Has the Government made any serious effort to fulfil that promise? It is true that in the first session of this Parliament a Bill providing for the establishment of a tariff commission was introduced and passed through this House, but I say that it was defeated in principle by the Government itself and not by the Senate of Canada. If the Government were sincere with respect to this measure, they certainly would reintroduce that Bill in the following session. It is a well known fact that, although the Tariff Commission Bill received the assent of hon. gentlemen opposite, it did not meet with their personal favour, and that members of the Government were personally told by many hon. gentlemen opposite that it was not a wise measure, and that having once failed of approval in the Senate of Canada, it should not be reintroduced for our consideration. I believe that to be a fact, and still hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that this part of the ministerial programme was frustrated by the Senate of Canada.

We were promised further by hon. gentlemen opposite a restoration to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan of their natural resources. Did the Senate of Canada place any obstacle in the way of the fulfilment of this part of the Government programme, or did the Opposition come from friends of the ministry in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan? Will hon. gentlemen opposite tell us what recommendations were made to the Government a few days ago when they were visited by a delegation of friendly politicians from the province of Alberta? Will they tell us what policy was recommended to them to pursue by Mr. Michener, I think, the leader of the Conservative party in the legislature of Alberta? Has the Senate of Canada prevented the fulfilment of this policy, or is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) responsible for this particular failure? Surely the Minister of Public Works, the especially assigned guardian of ministerial interests in the prairie provinces, could have secured such necessary legislation as would give to these provinces their natural resources, as was promised them by hon. gentlemen opposite before they came upon the treasury benches. Surely this was not a task too great for the Minister of Public Works. He is said to be very agile and adept in every respect, even afoot. I heard it said of him by a friend that he could walk on a row of eggs from the Red River to the Ottawa river without breaking a shell. If he could successfully perform a feat of that character, surely he was strong enough and powerful enough to prevail upon his fellow members in the Cabinet to fulfil this number of their pre-election programme.

We were also promised by hon. gentlemen opposite the nationalization of public telegraphs and telephones. We have had no legislation from the Government in respect to this policy since they entered into power. They surely cannot blame the Senate for the non-fulfilment of this particular programme.

Further, we had a promise of the reform of the very body which they have now been attacking for many years and upon many occasions. Where are the Senate reformers within the Conservative party to-day? Where is the great exponent upon the question of Senate reform, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster)? This is now the third session of the present Parliament, and that hon. gentleman has been as dumb as the mummies in the tombs of the Pharoahs. His voice is stilled absolutely, and you cannot get one hon. gentleman opposite to advocate Senate reform in this House to-day. Has the appointment of Mr. Donnelly, or Mr. Taylor, or Mr. Smith, or Mr. Gordon, the friend of Mr. Bourassa, reformed the Senate? Will the appointment of many hon. gentlemen opposite, who are now billed, and ticketed, and routed for the Senate, reform it according to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite in days gone by?

We had a definition of what Senate reform meant to hon. gentlemen opposite, as expounded by themselves. The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), whose powers of exposition are ample and lucid, once defined what the Government party meant by Senate reform.

He was asked by the present leader of the Opposition what this actually meant, and he read from the platform of the Conservative party in respect to Senate reform, and after reading it, said this:

> That is fairly explicit. Does the right hon. gentleman think that in enunciating a platform the leader of the Opposition is bound to draw up a Bill such as he will introduce? All he can do is to place before the people of the country the principles upon which he will act. But my right hon. friend says, I don't want any 'ifs' and 'ands' about it, I want to know just what you are going to do. Well, I might give the answer that my hon. friend gave once. Do you want to know how we will do it? Well, then just let us over to that side of the House and we will show you. That is the reply I have heard the right hon. gentleman give before this. It is sufficient for us to show the principles upon which the party means to act.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, in days gone by, promised to reform this particular body which they are now attacking. But they have made no efforts in that direction. In fact pretty nearly every hon. gentleman has his eye upon that body and would like to hear the voice that shall call him yonder. If you, Mr. Speaker, were to read a command from His Excellency in this Chamber summoning to the other Chamber one member, with the name left blank, I imagine that nearly every hon. gentleman opposite would think himself mentioned and there would be a general stampede to that Chamber. It would be almost as bad as an alarm of fire in a crowded theatre; and we should find many dead bodies of patriot statesmen who had been crushed in the aisles between this Chamber and the other. They tell us that the Senate has interposed impediments to the carrying out of their policy, but surely none have been interposed by the Senate in this particular matter at least.

There is another promise of the Government which has not yet been fulfilled, nor any effort whatever made in that direction. I refer to the promise respecting honest election laws. I think I should read this although it may take a few moments of time. It is as follows:

> More effective provisions to punish bribery and fraud at elections, to ensure thorough publicity as to expenditures by political organizations, to prevent the accumulation of campaign funds for corrupt purposes and to prohibit contributions thereto by corporations, contractors and promoters, to expedite the hearing of election petitions—

As is now going on in the courts of the province of Quebec with respect to the election petition of Chateauguay.

> —to provide for a thorough investigation of corrupt practices, and if necessary to appoint an independent prosecuting officer charged with that duty, to simplify the procedure therefor and to enforce the laws so amended.

Now, have the Government up to this moment observed even the spirit of that declaration of policy respecting honest election? If they have, I am sure the Minister of Public Works with his corrupting hordes would not have been heard of in the constituency of Macdonald and in the province of Quebec. Has the Senate, directly or indirectly intimated to the Administration that if they attempted the legislative fulfilment of that policy such legislation would meet with opposition there? We had a very strong illustration of what were the views of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce respecting the urgency and scope of legislation regarding elections. On January the 22nd, 1907, a Bill was before the House, and to this Bill the present Minister of Trade and Commerce moved an amendment. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this in order to refresh their memory concerning it so that possibly they may endeavour to enact in some form and at some time the legislation which the Minister of Trade and Commerce had in mind. He said:

> On July 16, 1904, I had the pleasure of moving the following resolution:
> That the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending the said Bill so as to provide punishment by fine or imprisonment for any minister of the Crown or other person who as an inducement to any voters or class of voters in any election in any electoral district to vote for any candidate promises to procure or threatens to withhold the expenditure of any public moneys of Canada or the undertaking of any public works within such electoral district.

That is a very commendable suggestion with respect to our electoral law. It is very desirable indeed that we should have such legislation on our statute books at this time. If we had had it a few months ago we should not have had the Minister of Public Works in the county of Chateauguay. I am told he was not there personally, but he was there by proxy, represented, as we are assured by the responsible representative of a reputable Toronto journal, by persons numbering two hundred who trod the shores of the St. Lawrence, shod in rubber boots, not for penance, but for corrupting purposes. I may safely assure hon. gentlemen opposite that if they would undertake to amend our laws relating to elections in the direction suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce they would find no obstacle interposed by the Senate.

The people of this country were promised very many other things by hon. gentlemen opposite, but up to this date we have had no evidence whatever of their intention to fulfil the same. Down in my province, in the election of 1911, the fishermen were promised free medical aid and free medicine if hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. But since that day we have heard absolutely nothing whatever about the matter; and so ignorant were some of the colleagues of the Prime Minister about this particular policy that in the session of 1912 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) denied that there had ever been any such declaration of policy by the Prime Minister, and he later expressed his surprise that such a promise should have been made by the right hon. gentleman when informed it was a fact. Still, there is no evidence of any attempt on the part of the Government to fulfil this particular promise. So, we have had promises without number with respect to matters of public policy from hon. gentlemen opposite, and still we have had, as I say, no evidence of their intention to fulfil those promises. I suppose we never shall have such fulfilment and the reason which they will assign for this will be that it was purposeless to attempt fulfilment by legislation because the Senate of Canada was so hostile to the present ministry that they could not hope for the approval of that body.

Now, let me refer for a moment to the Highways Bill. Did the Senate of Canada prevent the enactment of the principle of the Highway measure as promised us by hon. gentlemen opposite? I say no, and I do not think it possible for hon. gentlemen opposite or any of their supporters fairly to deny the correctness of my position. Was the Senate of Canada justified in amending that particular Bill as they did? I say, yes, and I believe the people of this country are of the opinion that the amendment made by the Senate was a fair and just amendment. Members of the Government have repeatedly stated that the principle contained in the Senate amendment was their policy, and if that be true, I would like to know how in the name of common sense and reason hon. gentlemen opposite protest against concurrence of the Senate amendment and why they so loudly protest to-day against that amendment of the Senate. The Prime Minister told us last evening that he and the Minister of Railways particularly promised that the distribution of money to be expended under the Highways Act should be according to the population of the several provinces. If that be true, then why did not the Government concur in the Senate amendment? Why should we be asked, in relation to the manner of distribution, to take the word of the Prime Minister of Canada or of any of his colleagues whether the Government be Conservative or Liberal? This country is not governed by Cabinet Ministers, but by Parliament. The will of this Parliament should be crystallized into statutory form; It is the enunciation of a new principle altogether to state that the word of the Prime Minister or of his colleagues must be accepted instead of express legislative enactment. The principle involved in the Senate amendment was invoked in the Agricultural Bill, it was invoked in the British North America Act, in that part of it which deals with provincial subsidies. In essence, the Highways Bill was a measure to supplement limited provincial revenues in respect of a public service which under the Constitution comes absolutely within the jurisdiction and purview of the local legislatures. I say that the view that these supplementary revenues should be distributed according to population was absolutely sound; and I cannot but believe that hon. gentlemen opposite believe this, as do the people of this country generally. That being so, I say that the principle involved in the Senate amendment is one which was absolutely fair. Now, one should naturally ask himself, as I am sure the people of Canada do, whether the Government seriously endeavoured to carry out their Highways policy as announced to the public in 1911. I doubt it; I go further and deny it. I say there is absolutely no evidence of their sincerity in this respect. They have not spent a moment of time nor a dollar of money conferring with the provincial governments in respect to this proposed expenditure, nor in devising a policy upon which to spend the money should the Highways Bill become law. They have taken no preliminary steps whatever, prior to requesting Parliament to pass such legislation and to vote the money, to formulate a policy of expenditure or a policy of maintenance, which policy, after all, was of more importance than the policy of expenditure. If Parliament had voted last year the money for expenditure on our public highways which the Government asked, would a single dollar of it have been expended in 1913? I say it would have been utterly impossible to have expended one single dollar of it. If they had attempted any expenditure it could not have but resulted in a woeful waste of public money. I say this Government have failed, miserably failed, to carry out their policy with respect to highways. They themselves killed their highways measure, and they now seek to attach the blame to the Senate of Canada. I believe that no fair-minded man in this country will concur in the view taken by the Government. They have exhibited no desire whatever to implement their promises respecting highways. The people of this country are not worrying with respect to the action of the Senate on this measure. Their interest rather is in the conduct, the cruel conduct, of the parents of the Highways Bill who purposely and deliberately destroyed it. I have had occasion, as, I suppose, have most hon. members of this House, to discuss with many persons the action of the Senate. I have yet to meet a single political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite who, having heard a fair, honest explanation of the facts and the effect of the Senate amendment, did not readily concede that that amendment was eminently fair and businesslike. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot conceal or cover their duplicity and insincerity with respect to that highways legislation by making empty, and futile threats against the Senate.

Now, I desire to say a few words respecting one or two other features of the Address. The Address states that there has been and is a restriction of trade owing to financial stringency. But we are told that we are likely to readily recover from that condition, owing to the boundless resources of this country. We upon this side of the House hope that these conditions are not permanent. In common with hon. gentlemen opposite, we have faith in the future of this country. We have no desire to exaggerate the depressed trade and monetary conditions prevailing to-day, nor are we inclined to take a pessimistic view of the future. However, the conditions now prevailing are worthy of a moment's consideration. We find, in the first place, that to-day trade depression and financial stringency exist concurrently; but this is not always the case, for in the past it has happened that we have had a financial stringency with trade conditions normal, or perhaps better than normal. We find that imports and exports are gradually declining, and I imagine that this will be even more marked during 1914 than it was in 1913. We have a contraction, quite noticeable, in industrial operations, and generally there is a most pronounced contraction in Canadian productions of every kind. We have also a very large number of unemployed people in the country, which is very regrettable indeed. We have a diminution—I was going to say an almost absolute cessation—of borrowings of foreign capital. We have a falling revenue. I do not say that some of these conditions may not have a very corrective effect upon the country, and prove of great value. They will prevent, for a time at least, the rampant speculation which has prevailed in Canada for some years, and enforce a return to sound fundamental economic laws. These conditions had a depressing effect upon the Prime Minister himself, because he has ransacked the papers of Great Britain and the United States to show that the conditions in those countries are very much worse than they are in Canada. It is quite obvious, of course, the trade depression being world-wide, that the number of the unemployed, for instance, should be greater in large and populous countries like the United States or Great Britain than in Canada. These being the conditions, what has the Government done to remedy them, or to minimize their disastrous effects? This, I think, is a fair inquiry; it was a fair assertion on the part of the leader of the Opposition that we should have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite in respect of this matter, but unfortunately they are still further pursuing their policy of silence.

We have not been promised any remission of taxation, which would be quite a natural and desirable thing at this stage of our financial and commercial history. The well-recognized high cost of the necessaries of life is a subject which compels and is compelling the attention of everybody in this country. It presses hard upon the wage-earner, and particularly hard upon those who at the present time are unable to obtain employment. It produces social unrest; it is the hardest test and the severest strain to which democracy can be put. Therefore it is quite natural that we on this side of the House should expect to hear from hon. gentlemen opposite in this matter. Then, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) pointed out last night, might we not have expected to have from the Government notice of their intention to afford to Canadian wheat producers the benefit of the additional market for their products which is openly offered to them, and the securing of the benefits of which requires only the definite action of the Government of this country? What possible objection can be urged against giving to the Canadian wheat growers the market which is now offered to them? Surely we might have expected some intimation from the Government of their intention to do something, be it ever so little, towards relieving the effects of the depressed commercial conditions which now prevail in this country. We might have expected an announcement of the temporary remission of tariff duties upon foodstuffs and other articles of ordinary necessity. We have had during the days of the present ministry a temporary remission of duties upon cement and steel rails, and if the policy of remission of duties was justifiable in respect to these two particular articles, surely a remission, even though temporary, of the taxation upon many other articles of necessity, the prices of which are extremely high to-day, would be justifiable in the extreme.

Have hon. gentlemen opposite been recently devoting their efforts towards securing wider markets for the exports of this country, so that there may be no recession in the volume and value of our exports, which are so invaluable and so necessary in a new country—a country which is a great borrower of foreign money? In the campaign of 1911 the people were promised by hon. gentlemen opposite that, if they were placed upon the Treasury benches, they would receive for their products a market fully as good, if not better, than the markets we were to secure under reciprocity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has returned from Australia without having made any trade arrangements with that country. En route he had a conference with the statesmen of the Celestial Empire and of Japan; and we were told by him that in these countries were to be found great markets for Canadian produce, but evidently nothing can be found in the commonwealth of Australia. We were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Halifax in 1911 that there was a splendid market in South America for Canadian produce. I suppose that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce returns to Ottawa and is permitted to extend his New Year's greetings to his colleagues he will be bidden to depart to South America. Apparently his colleagues have no desire for his company in Ottawa, during the session of Parliament at least, and possibly there might be opportunities in that great country, South America, for him to secure markets for the Canadian people.

We have a trade depression in Canada; our revenues are falling. Has the Minister of Finance appealed to the god of adequate protection for relief? Has he appealed to the idol of preferential tariffs? Where is the tariff commission that was to do so much for Canadian trade? What has become of the doctrine of protection, and its healing powers? We were told that in sunshine and in shower it would impartially bestow its blessings upon the capitalist and the wage-earner, upon the consumer and the producer at the same time. Where has the god of protection of hon. gentlemen opposite gone? Has he gone on a long journey? Is he not accessible? We were told that a high tariff was a good thing for this country, and we assume that a higher tariff would be better still. Well, then, in the present circumstances, would it not be well for hon. gentlemen to give to this country the benefit of an experiment in higher tariffs, and let us see whether the people will accept it? If hon. gentlemen opposite did this, they would only be fulfilling a promise which they have often made to the country, and which they made to many friends at the last election.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will say that in the appointment of a commission to inquire into the high cost of living in this country they have done something to minimize the seriousness of the conditions now prevailing in Canada. But I doubt whether hon. gentlemen really have any belief in the efficiency of the work which may be done by this commission. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that no good purpose whatever will be served by the appointment of that commission. In the first place, respecting the personnel of it, the gentlemen composing it will not have the opportunity of engaging in such a thorough investigation as will be of any benefit to the country. They are men who are already engaged in the public service and naturally they must devote some of their time to the discharge of such duties. Further, when that commission was appointed we were told by the press that they were to be under the direction and control of three ministers, which would seem to indicate that the members of the commission were never intended to be endowed with the scope of investigation and report, which they should have if their work was to be of any value whatever. I further say that it is not possible for this commission to report any additional reasons for the prevailing high cost of living than have already been furnished to the world by commissions appointed in other countries. There is not a condition stated in the text book of Professor Skelton, as quoted from by the Prime Minister yesterday, that was not known to students of the problems years and years ago, and you can find the same enumeration of the causes in a host of publications dealing with the subject. Of course, the enumeration of the causes will afford no remedy whatever, and what the people want is a remedy, and what they expected to be announced in the Speech from the Throne was that some remedy would be provided. The Minister of Labour himself can have very little faith in this commission. He visited my province last autumn, and he told the people that he desired his department to be known as the Department of Play and he himself as the Minister of Play rather than as the Minister of Labour. There are of course many reasons why that department might be called a Department of Play and the Minister a Minister of Play. The Minister of Labour announced in Halifax that the reason for the prevailing high cost of living in this country was, that while we had prosperous times prices were bound to be high. But at the present moment we have not prosperous times as hon. gentlemen opposite admit. Therefore, we find ourselves confronted by the situation that we have times that are not prosperous while at the same time we have high prices prevailing. Therefore, conditions are doubly bad at present. But, if in order to secure a reduction in the high cost of living it is necessary to have even harder times than exist, then heaven help Canada and the Canadian people. We can hope for very little enlightenment or for anything of value from the inquiry proposed.

A word or two as to the effect of commercial conditions upon matters of government finance, and revenue. The conditions of trade have a very pronounced effect of course upon the revenues of the country. I find that for the nine months ending September 30 our revenues from Customs are nearly $3,000,000 less than for the corresponding nine months of the previous year, and strange to say while there has been a reduction in our revenues there has been an increase in our expenditures, because during the first nine months of the present fiscal year consolidated fund expenditure, over the corresponding nine months of the previous year, amounts to nearly $9,000,000. I find that our capital expenditure for the same period is greater by $18,000,000 and I find that the combined capital and Consolidated Fund expenditure for the first nine months of this fiscal year are greater than for the corresponding nine months of last year, by the very large sum of $27,000,000. I find further that the combined capital and consolidated expenditure for this nine months period is only less than our total revenue by $2,000,000. That is a condition of affairs which calls for comment and explanation on the part of the Minister of Finance. The Appropriation Act of last session authorized a huge expenditure, and when one considers the well known capacity of some of the colleagues of the Minister of Finance, to indulge in lavish extravagance, one cannot be surprised at the very great increase in our expenditures in this fiscal year as compared with the last fiscal year. It is not surprising to find that the expenditures have almost absorbed our entire revenue and that the predictions of the Minister of Finance at the last session of Parliament are not likely to be fulfilled. Delivering his Budget Speech last year, the Minister of Finance in estimating the revenue and expenditure said:

> Without attempting to forecast with any degree of accuracy, I feel confident that the revenues of the year will not only prove adequate to meet the current expenditure, but to meet possibly the whole and certainly the greater portion of capital and special expenditure for the year.

This estimate of the Minister of Finance will hardly be fulfilled; every indication is that the revenues will not meet the expenditures as anticipated by him when he made his Budget Speech last session.

The amount which the Government has required to borrow this year has been a matter of great astonishment to the people of this country and to the money lenders of Great Britain who are asked to supply the same. Without pretending to be strictly accurate as to the amount of borrowings by the Government during the year, I believe that two permanent loans aggregating $35,000,000 in round figures have been made; two temporary loans aggregating $18,500,000 have also been made, making a total borrowing of about $53,000,000. It was but a few months ago that the Minister of Finance told us that he expected to meet all consolidated fund expenditures and all capital and special expenditures out of revenue. If his expectations had been fulfilled, or approximately so, surely it would not have been necessary to have borrowed to the extent of $53,000,000? It is only fair to say that there has been a refunding of debt amounting to nearly $10,000,000. One cannot object to that. The only special expenditures that I know of that could possibly have been made during the year, or are likely to be made during the balance of the fiscal year, would be the purchase of the Grant Trunk implementing bonds, which would amount to $1,000,000 a month since the 1st of April, and the payment of special railway subsidies to the Canadian Northern Railway. But, taking into consideration these special expenditures, and the refunding of loans which matured during the year, I think some explanation is due Parliament and the country as to the necessity for these very extensive borrowings. It was unfortunate, indeed, that Canada had, during the past calendar year, to engage in such borrowings. The market was unfavourable during the whole year. The interest rate and other charges in connection with these loans were unusually heavy. These borrowings met with a protest from the lending public in Great Britain. Further, they affected adversely the borrowing powers of other interests all over the country, and it is almost as important to conserve the borrowing powers of individuals and corporations in this country, as it is those of the Government. These borrowings have more or less disastrously affected Canadian credit in the British money market.

Just a word or two in reference to the expenditures during the year, which were, I assume, the cause and the necessity of a very considerable portion of the moneys borrowed during the year. As I said before, the Government asked authority at the last session of Parliament for the expenditure of an unusually large amount of money, aggregating nearly two hundred million dollars. Last year the signals of distress were out. The Minister of Finance himself intimated that he could hardly expect to see the revenues maintain their strength throughout the year. The expenditures authorized were in many respects absolutely unnecessary, particularly for this year, and could have been very well postponed until a more convenient period. The facts of hon. gentlemen opposite were very censorious against previous Administrations for their heavy expenditures during a year of falling revenue, and nobody was ever more censorious than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). Unfortunately I have never been able so far to have the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in Parliament when referring to such matters. I think it would be very pleasing and instructive to the House to have the statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce harmonized with or distinguished from the practices of the present Minister of Finance. Similar conditions respecting revenue prevailed in this country in 1909. I want to read for the edification and instruction of the Minister of Finance the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the year 1909, and I trust they will give him at least a very correct idea of what his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks of his administration of finance during the past few months. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, on April 20, 1909, was criticising the expenditure of the then Minister of Finance for the preceding year, and he spoke as follows:

> But I, and I think others on either side of the House, could not fail to ask ourselves why he as Finance Minister, in 1907, when every third-rate man in a bank, not to speak of the managers and directors of banks, knew that the stress of weather was coming on, felt the forebodings and set themselves by every possible means to strengthen themselves financially for the blast, took no precaution at all. He crowded on all sail, and in that, the worst year in our experience for fifteen years, authorized and carried out his largest, most lavish and most wasteful expenditures.

How applicable that is to the past few months of the present fiscal year respecting financial affairs?

> It would have seemed befitting in a Finance Minister who was careful and prudent to have made his provision when the danger was coming, to have drawn in his sail when the storm was about to burst. My hon. friend did not do that—why? Because sound principles of finance were against such a course? By no means. All sound principles of finance and every consideration of good business were in favour of that course.

I thought it might not be objected to by the House nor by my friend the Minister of Finance if I gave him what was the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1909, respecting conditions which then prevailed, and which in some respects are very similar to those prevailing this year, only perhaps conditions this year are far worse. And I do hope that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce is ever seen in Parliament again during the lifetime of the Government, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will urge upon his esteemed colleague the necessity and propriety of telling us whether the opinions he entertained in years gone by respecting the administration of finance are or are not applicable to present day affairs.

I have seen it stated in the press that the Government considered it was pursuing a wise financial policy in making extensive borrowings by reason of the depressed commercial conditions in this country; that is, they consider it sound finance to manufacture prosperity by increasing public expenses for the balance of the fiscal year and for the next fiscal year. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the intention of the Government. I am told that the late Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), in a letter which appeared in some newspapers in the province of Quebec, recommended increasing the public expenses from a quarter of a billion dollars to half a billion dollars and more for the next fiscal year. If that is true, it is a good thing for Canada that that hon. gentleman left the Government. It is bad enough to make such a wicked suggestion made to the present Minister of Public Works, but it would have been far worse to have a minister presiding over that department who believed it sound policy to endeavour to manufacture prosperity by increasing public expenditure without regard to whether those expenditures were productive or not. There can be no distinction between public and private expenditure. You can attach no more special significance to national expenditure than you can to what is termed international trade. There is really no such thing as international trade because that which we call international trade is after all but the trade of individuals within the nation and there is no distinction between borrowing money for the construction of a railway by a Canadian railway corporation and borrowing money for the construction of a railway by the Government. The wisdom of borrowing money and the expenditure of the same for public purposes are altogether dependable upon whether such expenditures are necessary and whether they will be productive and in the interests of the country.

I have seen it frequently stated in newspapers friendly to the Administration that it was a wise and sound economic policy to borrow lavishly this year because business conditions were not in as prosperous a state as we would wish them to be. I can hardly believe that this country will regard that as sound finance and sound policy. If great national public undertakings were desirable and necessary, and, if we were compelled in any event at some time to borrow for the same, and if these moneys could in the present year have been borrowed at favourable rates, then possibly it would have been sound business for the Government to engage in such borrowings, but such a condition respecting the borrowing of money did not prevail this year. Interest rates were high, money was dear and it would be only under the most favourable and pressing conditions that the Government would have been justified this year in borrowing money even for national undertakings, when money was not cheap but was very dear indeed.

On the whole, I think that hon. gentlemen in this House, on both sides of you, Sir, and people outside in the country, will be disposed to think with us that the Speech from the Throne has been exceedingly disappointing in every respect. The deliberate abandonment of the Naval Aid Bill and the Highways Bill by the Government must astonish this country. Their declaration that they propose pursuing a policy of absolute silence respecting these two great public measures must be a matter of great astonishment to the entire country. It must be a matter of surprise and regret that we have had no promise of tariff reform or reduction of taxation, no promise of the accomplishment of a preferential trade arrangement such as was promised, no promise of Civil Service reform, no promise of Senate reform, no promise of the fulfilment of the many promises of public policy which hon. gentlemen made frequently in this country, no promise of any action on their part to minimize if possible the effects of our trade depression, no promise of any substantial effort to meet the difficulties of the high cost of living, no promise on their part to give to the producers and exporters of wheat the additional market which they might have had, no promise of anything substantial or expected, but of empty and vain threats against the Senate of this country and their ghoulish suggestion that the implementing of their promises must be deferred until by death or Act of Parliament the personnel of one of the legislative bodies of this Parliament has been changed. Well might the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod) say yesterday that these conditions are humiliating in this country. Humiliating indeed they are, I say, but the only ray of hope is that within the very near future, or at least within a limited time there will come to the country an opportunity to remove from the Treasury Benches a Government that has frequently proved its incapacity to administer public affairs.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I have listened with close attention to my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I am sorry that I am not able to compliment him upon that moderation which sometimes, but not always, characterizes his utterances. Nor has he fulfilled the promise which he made at the outset of his remarks that he would deal with the matters that he proposed to bring before the House in a non-partisan manner. However, I may say to my hon. friend that I am not disappointed because, frankly, I did not expect too much. My hon. friend has gone over a great deal of ground and with respect to most of the matters with which he has dealt I do not propose to follow him. He expressed as his conclusion the pious wish that an opportunity might be given at an early day for the people to put themselves on record against the incompetents who now occupy the Treasury benches. Well, let me say this, Mr. Speaker, that since this House prorogued there have been seven by-elections and that six members from various sections of Canada out of the seven elected have taken their places upon this side of the House. If there is any comfort for hon. gentlemen opposite in that statement they are welcome to it. In my opinion it represents the view of Canada upon their performances and ours since October, 1911.

My hon. friend has spoken of the naval issue and has stated that the abandonment—that was the word he used—abandonment of our naval policy has been a matter of astonishment in Canada and throughout the Empire. Let me say, Sir, that that astonishment was of a much earlier date. The astonishment has been that a branch of this legislature could be so partisan and perverse, not to say unpatriotic, as to reject the Naval Aid Bill brought forward by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend has spoken of cowardice on the part of the Government. I do not intend here and now to go over the ground so fully covered by the discussion of last session nor to renew that bitter and, in my view, deplorable controversy which raged throughout its length. What I have to say on the matter of the navy can be said within very small compass indeed. I do not propose here and now to discuss what my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did or did not do during the period of his administration. I simply desire to say this, and it seems to me to be the great, central and outstanding fact in this matter, that if the Naval Aid Bill introduced by the Prime Minister last year had been enacted into law by the Senate of Canada, there would have been now under construction, at the expense of Canada, three powerful ships of war ready to take their places in 1916 in the British line of defence for the purpose of the maintenance of Great Britain's supremacy at sea and representing the loyal contribution of this country to the world-wide defence of the British Empire. The aid that would have been given would have been practical and effectual, and would have been so recognized in Canada, in the empire, and throughout the world. I believe it would have clinched the question of Great Britain's invincibility at sea, and I believe it would have been a decisive factor in bringing about a cessation of armaments, which seems to be the world's desire to-day. The Naval Aid Bill, so fruitful of peaceful results, was defeated in the Senate, I believe at the instigation of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and upon him and upon hon. gentlemen opposite must rest the blame and the responsibility for its rejection. My right hon. friend says that it is cowardly upon the part of the Government not to re-introduce the measure. What would be the use of doing so? It would meet with precisely the same fate as it met with last year. We do not propose to plough the sands. We do not propose to winnow chaff. We shall simply have to wait the slow processes of time and of mortality, until the Senate of Canada is brought into accord with the popular will.

My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) referred to the estimates. He desired to know if they were ready for presentation to Parliament. They are ready; they are in print and they will be presented immediately after this debate is concluded. My hon. friend referred to the amount of this year's Estimates, $200,000,000. He said that many of the items were dubious in their character. Let me ask my hon. friend, here and now, what member of the Opposition during last session of Parliament raised any question as to the amount of the Estimates? What attack was made upon this Government in respect to the Estimates brought down to Parliament last year? What item was challenged? The attitude of my hon. friend reminds me of the story of Oliver Twist, who wanted more. That was the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the Estimates. My hon. friend from Halifax, instead of attacking the Estimates, repeatedly put forward his request that branch lines should be acquired for the Intercolonial railway, and it was the same with all hon. gentlemen opposite. Some wanted drill halls; others, armouries; others, post offices. As I say, it was like Oliver Twist; they all wanted more. There was no criticism of the amount of the Estimates.

My hon. friend has raised the question of Estimates and Expenditures; and I am very glad he has done so, because it gives me an opportunity of replying to criticisms that have been made by the Liberal press of this country of the expenditures and of the borrowings of this Government, since we have come into power and especially during the past year. It has been charged that we have increased expenditures. It has been charged that we have been extravagant and improvident. My right hon. friend has likened me to the spendthrift heir who has come into the possession of a splendid estate; and I think, in the tour conducted by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who I am sorry to say is not in the House, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), referring to that large expenditure, represented me as the prodigal son. No doubt he spoke more in sorrow than in anger.

I propose to compare, or rather to contrast—for "contrast" is the better word—the record of this Government with the record of hon. gentlemen opposite, in the matter of expenditures and in the matter of borrowings referred to by my hon. friend from Halifax. In 1908, the Liberal expenditure was $112,000,000, and in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912, the year in which we adopted the Estimates of hon. gentlemen opposite, which Estimates by the way exceeded $155,000,000, the expenditure was $137,000,000. That is to say, the expenditure of Canada had increased, during a period of four years, from $112,000,000 to $137,000,000, or an increase of $25,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was it in 1910?

Mr. WHITE: In 1910-11 $122 000,000.

I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that, although expenditures have been increasing, revenues have also been increasing. Where my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) makes the mistake in dealing with the administration of this Government is this, that he imagines that because he has ceased governing, Canada has ceased growing. That is the fundamental error made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course, our expenditures will increase, because the country is growing. The revenue has been expanding. The first year we came into power the revenue was $137,000,000. This year it will be about $170,000,000, about the same as last year. Immigration has been increasing up to a thousand to twelve hundred a day. Our trade has been expanding. The year before we came into power, the trade of Canada was $750,000,000. The next year it was $850,000,000. Last year it reached the total of $1,000,000,000, and this year, notwithstanding the financial stringency, notwithstanding the scarcity of money, the trade of Canada, so far as we can judge at the present time, will exceed the highwater-mark trade of $1,000,000,000 of last year.

It has been charged against us that we have increased the debt of Canada, as if that were a new experience for Canada. In Liberal papers, because I read all the newspapers, I have found ominous headlines to the effect that the debt of Canada is being increased, as if such a thing had never happened before. I do not claim to be what is called a 'Heaven-born financier.' I am just a plain, everyday, and, I hope, common-sense financier. For the higher flights for the aeroplane finance of my predecessor I confess I have not the genius. With the consent of the House I propose to put on record something as to the borrowings of hon. gentlemen opposite, both directly and indirectly, during the period they were in power. In literature sent out from here under the authority of the Liberal organization, it has been stated that, whereas we are increasing the national debt, our friends opposite were engaged in the reduction of the national debt. What are the facts? For the four years preceding 1911, the increase in the national debt of Canada under the Liberal Administration was no less a sum than $76,000,000. In 1909 alone, the net debt of Canada was increased by $46,000,000. Nor is that all. That was in a year in which there were many maturities; and I myself could scarcely believe the figures when I looked up the record. What were the borrowings in the year 1908 and the early part of the year 1909? My predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, from the 11th day of December, 1907—and I desire you to note the year because that was the year of the money stringency—to the 23rd day of January, 1909, a period of thirteen months, borrowed the staggering—I had almost said the appalling total of £20,500,000, or over $100,000,000. Of that money £5,000,000 was borrowed in June, 1908, £5,000,000 in October, 1908, and £6,000,000 in January, 1909—£16,000,000 within a period of seven months. My predecessor, Mr. Fielding, is not in the House at the present time; I understand he is the editor of the Montreal 'Daily Telegraph.' I only wish he were here, because I am going to read to the House an editorial published in a recent issue of the Montreal 'Daily Telegraph.' In this article the writer is referring to the loans of £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 which was put on the London market, £2,000,000 of which were required to meet maturities. This article was cabled to England and published in the 'Daily Chronicle' of December 20, 1913, under the caption 'Frenzied Finance in Canada.' I am sorry to say that there is a great deal of news matter of decidedly partisan origin going from this country to England. Whilst Canada has been borrowing money in the London market, despatches have been sent from this country that should never have been sent, and this is one of them:

It is here—

Referring to my loans of £3,000,000 and £4,000,000:

—that the financial interests rise in indignant protest. They say that already, owing to the finanical extravagant borrowings in the London market, no one else, whether banker, railway man or manufacturer, can sell his securities.

This was written by or under the direction of my predecessor, the ex-Minister of Finance, who in the year 1908, within a period of thirteen months, borrowed no less a sum than $100,000,000.

5 p.m. £16,000,000 within seven months. from July to January, 1909.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How much of this was to meet maturities?

Mr. WHITE: I can only tell my right hon. friend that the national debt was increased by $46,000,000, and although a process of subtraction would not give the precise sum, it would represent substantially, I should think, the maturities that had to be met. My predecessor knew very well that these maturities had to be met, and the point is that notwithstanding this fact he increased the national debt in the year 1908 by no less a sum than $46,000,000. I do not know that I should have been on my feet here criticising him for that were it not because the cry of extravagance has been unjustly raised against me and against this Administration. My hon. friend talks about borrowing. As a matter of fact, this Government, in the two years during which it has been in office, has borrowed, apart from the sums required to meet maturities, the amount that he mentioned—except that he added $53,000,000 instead of $43,000,000. Of that $43,000,000, $10,000—£2,000,000—were required for the purpose of meeting maturities in October and November last. As to the balance, I shall explain in a moment the necessity that compelled our borrowing.

The charges made against this Government of extravagant administration and of wasteful borrowing are founded upon anything but fact. I asked my deputy to prepare a statement as to the net debt of Canada on October 11, 1911, the date on which this Government came into power. The net debt of Canada on that day was $321,000,000, and the same statement gives the net debt, on December 31, 1913, as $303,000,000. That is to say, the net debt of Canada on December 31, 1913, was $18,000,000 less than it was when this Government took office. I will go further, and say that at the end of the fiscal year 1914 the net debt of Canada will be less than it was on October 11, 1911.

As yet, Mr. Speaker, only the half has been told. I have spoken of direct borrowing. In 1896, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, there was no borrowing by way of guarantee. There were no outstanding Dominion guarantees, so far as I know or can ascertain. What did the Government, presided over by my right hon. friend, inaugurate in the way of guarantees? The guarantee was a new principle; the parent of that principle was the late Government. The Government became contingently liable for vast sums of money, and the issue of the securities guaranteed had an effect, of course, on the money market from which the Government draws its loans. Let me now call the attention of my right hon. friend to the guarantees given by the late Government. The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Railway Company received guarantees under the late Government of a sum in excess of $55,000,000, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company received guarantees to the amount of $70,000,000. So that the guarantees, that is to say the contingent liabilities incurred by the Dominion during the administration of my right hon. friend amounted to a sum in access of $125,000,000.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the estate which the spendthrift heir inherited. What was the character of that estate? During the session before we came into power my right hon. friend gave guarantees to the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company of $35,000,000. None of these securities were sold; they were overhanging the London market, and millions of dollars had been spent in anticipation of their sale. Of the $70,000,000 of guarantees given to the Grand Trunk Pacific, £7,200,000 had been sold, but £6,800,000 remained unsold. I desire to say, with regard to the guarantee of £14,000,000 that was given to the Grand Trunk Pacific, that no more unwise thing could have been done. In anticipation of a railway construction that would extend over a period of years, to fix a three per cent rate upon those bonds was one of the most grotesque pieces of financing that has ever come to my attention. What was the result? The bonds were first put out at ninety-two, and before my right hon. friend went out of power they had fallen to eighty. My hon. friend at an earlier date had been compelled to bring in legislation whereby he agreed to implement to the par value the selling price of these bonds, and one of my first transactions as Finance Minister of the new Government was to pay a sum not less than $5,000,000, without receiving any consideration in return to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in respect of implementing upon those bonds. Further, what was I confronted with? £6,800,000 to be thrown on the market. During the year 1912—a year in which money was almost as scarce as it has been during the past year, I was confronted with the alternative of placing those bonds on the market in the seventies and paying the amount of implementing, which, with the $5,000,000 which had been paid, would have totaled about $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 for which the Government of Canada would receive absolutely nothing or of purchasing the bonds. And what did I do?

I took the sensible course; I took a course approved of by every financial man either in Canada or London, who knows anything about the transaction. I brought in the Grand Trunk Pacific Bond Purchase Act, and under the provisions of that Act during the last two years, instead of wasting our surplus, we have devoted it to the purchase of these bonds. And what is the result? I have repaired the loss that would have taken place by reason of the financial bungling of 1905; I have purchased no less than twenty-two millions of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by the Dominion. Of course they are absolutely good; the money put into the purchase of these bonds is not lost money; but I have saved the implementing and I have prevented these bonds from being thrown upon the London market. That is what I have done with the surplus of 1912. It may be said: you had a surplus in 1912 of $25,000,000 and so we had; our revenues were $168,000,000 and our expenditures $143,000,000. That is to say, we had a real surplus of $25,000,000 in 1912 that we did not spend. That money was not devoted to paying off the national debt in London; most of that money went into the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific because it represented the proceeds of these bonds we bought, and as construction proceeded that money was paid out by the Receiver General under the provisions of the statute authorizing the issue of the bonds determining the disposition of their proceeds. When I think of the record of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to expenditure; when I consider that they constructed the National Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg and that my predecessor, Mr. Fielding, estimated that it would cost $60,000,000, and the right hon. leader of the Opposition said it would only cost $13,000,000—to be fair to him I should say that that represented the interest during the seven years the Grand Trunk Pacific was to have the road free of interest, but the hon. gentleman based that estimate of interest upon a cost of $60,000,000 as announced by Mr. Fielding—and when I consider that the National Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, instead of costing $60,000,000, as was said by the Finance Minister of the Liberal Administration, cost over $200,000,000 in cold cash, I am astonished that hon. gentlemen opposite can have the boldness to speak as they do now. And when I consider the borrowings to which I have drawn the attention of the House, when I consider that my predecessors borrowed in one year $100,000,000—and personally I would have hardly believed that to be possible—when I consider all these things, and when I consider further the guarantees which were given by the former Government, amounting to over $125,000,000, I cannot help but think that Satan reproving sin would be consistency itself compared with hon. gentlemen opposite denouncing our expenditures. I have spoken about the estate we inherited, and I hope that I will not hear very much more about it, because if I have to describe it—although I do not wish to injure the standing or credit of the country—I would describe it as an hereditas damnosa.

We have had unusual borrowing this year, and I am always glad to give the House details of our borrowing. If I had had to deal only with the estimates of $205,000,000 and the expenditures made under these estimates, I should have been able to finish this year, I believe, showing a surplus. But, at the end of the last session we know that a larger programme was taken on. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) in the late Government inaugurated by his guarantees the Canadian Northern line between Montreal and Port Arthur, and I have explained how my hon. friend gave the guarantees of the Government of Canada to the amount of $70,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific. During the Administration of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, it was understood that the Grand Trunk Pacific would receive a loan—at least, so I was told by the late General Manager and President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, Mr. Hays—of $15.000,000.

So, then, what has been my programme for the year? I have had to take care of an expenditure under the estimates of $205,000,000; I have had to take care of subsidies to the extent of $12,000,000 or $14,000,000; I have had to pay one-half the Grand Trunk Pacific loan; because the arrangement was that I should pay one-half this year and one-half next year, during the period of the completion of the line. And, in addition, we avoided the loss which would have been sustained by preventing these bonds being thrown upon the London market; we have bought not less than $22,000,000 of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. Of course, I have had to borrow some money. My hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says I borrowed £3,000,000 in September, and that is correct. I had £2,000,000 of matured indebtedness in October and November. I made an issue of £4,000,000 in December, and treasury bills to the amount my hon. friend has mentioned are outstanding and will be taken up in due course. But the total of borrowings in the year was not $53,000,000, but $43,000,000, as my hon. friend will find out if he casts up his figures again. However, this is not the time to discuss this matter to a finality, and I only deal with it because of the criticism made by my hon. friend from Halifax.

I purpose, Mr. Speaker, to devote a little time to the amendment proposed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, which reads:

> We regret to have to represent to Your Royal Highness that in the gracious speech with which you have met Parliament, whilst it is admitted that business is in a depressed condition, yet there is no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps towards relieving such a situation.

My right hon. friend occasionally speaks outside of Ottawa; he always speaks well, but sometimes possibly not discreetly. On this occasion, however, I do not say he was indiscreet, but I desire to read a portion of his speech made in the city of Montreal upon the subject referred to in his amendment. The right hon. gentleman said:

A new condition has arisen at the present time. For the first time since the year 1896 men are seeking work and are not finding work. For the first time since 1896 there is such a thing as unemployment in this country. The mayor of Winnipeg stated yesterday according to press reports, that there were three thousand unemployed in the city of Winnipeg. He also said that three years ago he would have blessed heaven that there was not a single unemployed person in the city. To-day, as we know, in Montreal, in Toronto, in all of the large cities of Canada men are seeking employment and not finding it. The most powerful industries, those the longest established and the best known for their strength, are decreasing the number of men in their employ or the number of days employment that is given to them. Some just as strong are decreasing both the number of men and the hours of work.

My right hon. friend has certain delusions. One of his delusions, and I say it with all possible respect, is that the fifteen years of his administration were a sort of halcyon period in which prosperity was continuous, in which trade was always buoyant, in which revenues were always expanding, and in which there was no unemployment. Now, my right hon. friend has a memory to which I have before directed attention. It is one of the most marvellous memories that has ever been brought under my observation. It is what one may call a collapsible memory: my right hon. friend can draw it out and to the uttermost detail it responds truly to his call. On the other hand, when he so desires he can close it up and it becomes mute, voiceless, and utterly forgetful. The amnesia, to give it its technical name, may be total or partial, but there is no doubt about it—he is able to summon it at any time. My right hon. friend has moved this amendment as if nothing in the nature of a financial stringency or money scarcity had ever been brought to his attention during all his public life. He has entirely overlooked the financial stringency of 1907 and the trade slackening of 1908. He says there is a slackening of trade at present for which the Government is not finding any remedy. I desire to read to my right hon. friend and to place upon 'Hansard' some extracts from the budget speech of his Finance Minister in 1908, Mr. Fielding, immediately after the financial stringency in 1907, which was very similar to the present, only not so prolonged and not so severe.

Turning now to the fiscal year 1908-1909 upon which we shall soon enter, I think I am correct when I say that the general feeling of our business men is one of hopeful confidence united with much caution. We are just emerging from a period of world wide financial stringency. Financial systems and institutions of all countries have been severely tried. It should be a gratification to us all that none have stood the test better than those of Canada.

Then he made some reference to the banks, and went on:

Business has received a check, but I do not look for a continued period of depression. Conditions should improve in the early summer.

My right hon. friend in his Montreal speech said that for the first time since 1896 men were seeking work and not finding it. I put it down to that amnesia which I say characterizes my right hon. friend, because I do not believe he would make a deliberate misstatement. If I should appear a little tedious in the quotations I am about to give, it is only with a desire to refresh the memory of my right hon. friend. I tried to get some information that was authentic, that he would not controvert. I knew it was not much use going to the Canadian Annual Review, because he might challenge the correctness of the statements therein contained, but there was a publication that I knew my right hon. friend would not contradict. I have it here. It is the Labour Gazette for 1908, and bears the superscription of the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Minister, and of W. L. Mackenzie King, Deputy Minister. I knew, Sir, that whatever I found in that publication would bear the hall mark of the living truth. I am going to read a few extracts from this Labour Gazette, which I am satisfied is entirely acceptable to my right hon. friend. It reviews the industrial and labour conditions for the month of December, 1907, and the various correspondents write in as follows. Philips Thompson reported:

With the setting in of the winter season and the general cessation of most outdoor occupations conditions are duller than those of last month with large numbers of both skilled and unskilled workers out of employment. The continuance of the financial stringency has induced a slackening of activity in nearly all lines and the problem of providing for the unemployed has become serious.

London, Ont.—A marked depression in the labour market occurred this month especially in the building trades which were almost at a standstill. A large number of foreigners have left for their homes. As an indication of the number of unemployed the military school here which for the past five years has only had 75 men has now recruited up to 288 and more were coming in every day.

Vancouver.—There were more men out of work during the month than in the previous history of the city, there being fully 5,000 men idle. The building trade was practically at a standstill.

In the issue of January, 1909, I find the following:

In British Columbia the year opened with most of the mills, both coast and mountain, shut down and with heavy stocks on hand. These conditions continued throughout the season, production and sales falling far below those of 1907.

Under the caption, Canadian Trade and Revenue, I find:

The world-wide commercial depression which set in during the latter half of 1907 and which continued during 1908 was reflected in the trade and revenue returns of Canada for the past year which showed a considerable falling off compared with those of 1907. Total foreign trade declined by about $70,000,000, the decline being almost wholly in imports in which the chief gains had been shown in the past two years.

Simply history repeating itself, due to the same cause—a world-wide and acute financial stringency. I read further:

Niagara Falls.—There are idle men in practically every class of labour.

London.—There are more unemployed men and women in this city at present than for years past and there is not a factory or a foundry but has a reduced staff.

Brantford.—The general opinion is that there is more unemployment at present than is usual at this season and also those that are unemployed are in a worse condition (owing to a poorer season) than last year.

Montreal.—Last year was a hard one for Montreal, poverty being more apparent than for a number of years back. This fall there have been a great many out of employment as many factories and shops had been forced to reduce their staffs owing to lack of orders, but in the past three months there has been a general industrial revival in the city and the number of workers who are walking the streets is now but very little if any larger than is usual at this season.

Then it goes on to describe the commercial failures in Canada, and it shows that the public revenue of the Dominion, which in 1907 reached the highest level recorded, declined by upwards of $11,000,000 in 1908. It was during that very period of decline that my predecessor, the Minister of Finance, borrowed on the London markets the colossal sum of £20,500,000. It says:

Declines show largely in receipts from customs duties.

And then it goes on to describe in general terms the conditions in Canada. It says that in Kingston the consensus of opinion is that there was more unemployment existing than there had been in any corresponding period for years.

It is a deplorable fact that at times—such times as we have under review and the present time—through no fault of individuals or of governments, there is unemployment in the land and unemployment throughout the world. The point I am making is that there is nothing exceptional or peculiar about the present situation. It is history repeating itself, and the future will see it repeated again when the causation is the same. We find an industrial slackening in the United States and in Great Britain, as was pointed out by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister yesterday. In the United States we are told that industrial works are closed or are running part time, and we are informed by press despatches that one million men in the iron and steel trades are out of employment, and that a hundred thousand men in the one city of Chicago are looking for work. I refer to this, as did my right hon. friend yesterday, not for the purpose of specially calling attention to it as being a condition existing in the United States, but simply to show that the condition complained of and referred to in this amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is a universal condition, a condition found everywhere, and due, as I have said, to the selfsame cause, namely, financial stringency, which has curtailed and limited the credit and commitments of commercial and industrial people throughout the world.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) spoke last evening of the condition in Great Britain, and I should like to read and place on record for his information an extract from a speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for whom, I am sure, he has a great admiration. The right hon. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking in his constituency on December 23, 1913, said:

The trade of this country has been doing better during the last few years than it has ever done before .

Just as has been the case here.

It shows signs now of wanting a rest for a while after a great effort of exertion and strain But as soon as it recuperates, no one doubts that it will be stronger than ever.

What is the position of Canada as far as its industrial conditions are concerned today? We have passed through a very trying period. There has been a monetary stringency, I believe, unparalleled and unprecedented in the experience of any one in this House, in its length and severity because it has covered practically a period of two years, and it is very seldom indeed that a period of financial stringency extends for so long a time. The banks a year and a half ago foresaw what was coming, and they did what they were bound to do; they warned their clients to limit their commitments so that while they might extend to them the same credit, or in some cases curtail their credit, they were not furnished with funds for the extension of their enterprises. That was quite the proper course for the banks to adopt. Any other course would have led to catastrophe. The effect of the curtailment of credit and of the curb that was put upon real estate speculation throughout Canada is now being felt. It is felt in the slackening of trade. I mentioned in my budget speech of last year that it could not be expected that in view of the financial stringency business could continue because usually following financial restriction trade slackens. We are in a period at the present time of trade slackening. I believe, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, that the check is temporary only, and I would repeat almost the words of my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, that if the spring opens up well and crop prospects are good, because I am happy to say that the money conditions are easing off in all the great international markets, Canada will again go ahead as she has in the past following similar periods of financial stringency and trade cessation and restriction.

My right hon. friend said that in Montreal I had stated that the crisis had been reached and passed. He quoted me correctly, but I was referring to the financial crisis. I think that was in December, and I believe it is a fact that the financial crisis just about that time was reached and was passed. As evidence of it I may state that in the London market, and in the other markets of the world, money is easier, the bank rate has come down, and it will probably come down further, which means that more capital will be available for the enterprises of the world, and this, of course, will almost at once ameliorate and alleviate the situation because, with the exception of Great Britain and France, nearly all the nations of the world are borrowing nations dependent for their supplies of capital upon these two great nations—Great Britain and France.

Our revenues, I expect, will show some decline. Our customs revenues have shown decline, as was pointed out by the hon. junior member for Halifax, but as I have stated, the revenues for 1908 showed a decline of over $10,000,000 following the stringency of 1907. With the good harvest of 1908 matters began at once to improve, and Canada went ahead again in 1909, 1910, 1911 and 1912 upon her career of prosperity. History will repeat itself in that respect. What is required is confidence and, as I have said, the prospect for a good harvest in Canada. Money conditions are undoubtedly improving.

Mr. MACDONALD: If you do not have the prospect again of a good harvest, what are you going to do?

Mr. WHITE: Well, I think that in Canada we will have the prospect of a good harvest. I am sorry to see that even such a big, outstanding man as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is, particularly in a military uniform, has become a pessimist on Canada. He has become a bear on Canada. We drove the bears out of Ontario years ago, I do not believe there are any in Nova Scotia and I do not believe that in his heart of hearts the hon. gentleman is a bear. I do not see how he can be pessimistic. Optimism is the only thing for Canada at the present time. When I listened to my right hon. friend the other day, and when I listened to the hon. junior member for Halifax to-day, I could not help but think —it is probably a misfortune that I have a fairly good memory for verse—even blank verse—of lines in King Richard the Second. My right hon. friend was describing the conditions in Canada. He said that there were a hundred thousand men out of work. I think that he greatly overstated it and that it was just my right hon. friend's estimate. I do not say that he wilfully or deliberately mis-stated it, but I think that my right hon. friend's estimate was too great.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many are there?

Mr. WHITE: I have not the information before me from which to make an estimate, and consequently I decline to make one. I like information; I like the facts before me before I commit myself to an estimate, especially one which may damage the country. When I listened to my right hon. friend dealing with the question of the unemployed, and when I heard him moving this resolution with regard to the cessation of trade, and when to-day I listened to my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) painting a gloomy picture of conditions in Canada, I thought of those lines in Richard II:

> Of comfort no man speak;
> Let's talk of graves, of worms, of epitaphs;
> Make dust our paper, and with rainy eyes
> Write sorrow on the bosom of the earth.

That seems to be the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day. In sharp contra-distinction to that, let me read an extract from the address of a bank president, taken just at haphazard from the reports presented to the shareholders of the chartered banks of Canada. It is a report of the speech of Mr. Pease, who is a very level-headed financier, one of the out-standing bankers of Canada, an exceedingly well-informed gentleman, and one who would have no motive for misrepresenting the situation. I desire to place it on 'Hansard':

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What date?

Mr. WHITE: Within the last two weeks it was presented at the meeting of the shareholders of the Royal Bank of Canada:

Regarding the general situation in Canada, the dominating influence at the beginning of the past year was the money market crisis in Europe, resulting from the Balkan war and the fear of a general conflict. Although the banks were alive to the necessity for extreme caution and retrenchment in Canada, it was impossible to call an immediate halt. The momentum of trade following several years of prosperity required that commitments be taken care of. During the first eight months there was no diminution of the volume of mercantile business or curtailment of railway and other general construction work, for which foreign capital continued to be freely supplied. In that period the commercial loans of the chartered banks increased $30,000,000, while deposits decreased $20,000,000. Fortunately, however, our excellent crops rapidly marketed, liquidated debts and brought about a reversal of the financial situation. Commercial loans on the 30th of November last compared with August last showed a decrease of $24,000,000, while deposits in the same time increased $38,000,000. We could offer no better evidence of the vitality and wealth of the country.

I cannot help but contrast that with the doleful utterances of my right hon. friend and my hon. friend who spoke this afternoon. I am sincerely sorry that my right hon. friend is becoming a pessimist on Canada. The Prime Minister read in his speech last evening the messages sent from the prime ministers of all the provinces of Canada, and I thought how unfortunate it was that when in all that chorus the most eloquent voice of all might have been that of my right hon. friend, he is now using it for the purpose of discord and disharmony, proclaiming that conditions in Canada are precarious, and pursuing a course which I cannot help but think will reflect upon the credit and standing of the Dominion. I think I need not point out to my right hon. friend that he owes a good deal to patriotism, and that he should not, unless on the strongest grounds, disparage Canadian conditions and take a course which may have the effect of depreciating the credit of the country.

I come now to the new fiscal policy that has been put forward by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I was amazed last night to hear my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) mention the variety of fiscal policies to which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has given adherence in the past.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So was I.

Mr. WHITE: In 1893—I think my own memory will serve me correctly—my right hon. friend proclaimed himself in favour, ultimately at all events, of free trade as it existed in England. My hon. friend has been a free trader. He has been in favour of reciprocity, restricted and unrestricted. He has been, I think, a commercial unionist.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You think so?

Mr. WHITE: Well, if my right hon. friend denies it, I will withdraw it at once. Then, my hon. friend—and the Prime Minister omitted to mention this—is reputed to be the possessor of a Cobden medal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That goes with free trade.

Mr. WHITE: Precisely, as in England. Then, in 1897, he came into power and adopted the National Policy. I confess to a degree of admiration for a statesman who can wear such a variety of fiscal clothes, and come through so long a public life as my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did you not follow him down to two years ago on that?

Mr. WHITE: Well, I did not know. My right hon. friend's personality is the strongest and most outstanding feature about him. No man could give adherence to all these policies without being regarded as a sort of fiscal chameleon. My right hon. friend, from the tariff standpoint, has been everything by turns and nothing long. In fact, he was longest a protectionist, because he was fifteen years in power, and during that time he followed the National Policy. My hon. friend has now embarked upon a new policy and characteristically of him, he has not attempted to define it. At Hamilton, he came out in the most unequivocal fashion—because I took a clipping from the Toronto Globe—and we all know what an accurate publication that is. My right hon. friend spoke as follows—and this was featured on the first page of that great journal:

The policy I give you at this moment—

Notice the qualification:

At this moment—
The policy I give you at this moment, the policy I believe every patriot of Canada ought to support, and the policy I believe to be the duty of the Government to immediately inaugurate is a policy of absolutely free food, food free from customs duty.

That is the new policy of my right hon. friend, and the amazing thing to me is that he did not refer to it more strongly than he did in his speech yesterday. It almost seems to me as if the announcement of that policy at Hamilton had thrown consternation into the ranks of some of his followers, because, as I shall show, free food means a great deal. Free food, in the first place, means that butter, eggs, livestock, all the products of the farm are to be put on the free list, and my right hon. friend might possibly hear from some of his followers in the mixed farming provinces with regard to that. In addition to that, free food means that the policy of my right hon. friend affects in Canada, according to the statistics of the Year Book, 6,985 establishments with a capital of $133,000,000, employing 52,000 men on wages, paying $14,000,000 in wages every year, using material to the amount of $175,000,000, and with an output of $245,000,000.

Now, I am not quite sure that my right hon. friend realized, when he said, 'free from customs duty,' that this would affect such a large body of our citizens—all our farmers and also the manufacturers of food products to the number I have mentioned. Let us see what our products in these manufactures of food are. In the first place, we have bread, biscuits and confectionery. I wonder what my right hon. friend's friend, the former Minister of Customs, Hon. William Paterson, would have said to him had he proposed to take the customs duties off bread, biscuits and confectionery. Then, there is cheese, one of the most important industries of Canada. The output of cheese in Canada for the last fiscal year amounted to $37,232,969. There were 3,625 establishments, and they employed men to the number of 6,147. Yet, the right hon. gentleman proposes to take the duty off cheese. Probably some of the representatives of rural constituencies whose people are engaged in that industry may have something to say about that. I omit those industries in which only a moderate capital is invested. We have in the fish-preserving business an output of $12,309,237; in flour and gristmill products, $82,494,826; in fruit and the vegetable canning, 5,971,082; in slaughtering and meat packing $41,000,000, and in sugar refining $21,260,011. These establishments afford employment to thousands and tens of thousands of men, but my right hon. friend lightly said to his audience in Hamilton, 'a new policy I give you for the moment.' I am glad he said 'for the moment,' because if by chance he should come into power and be tempted to carry out such a policy I should be afraid for the consequences to this country. But as he said it was only 'for the moment,' that leaves him free to say—that it was only for the moment.

Now we come to this question of the high cost of living. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has dealt with that question generally, and I shall not traverse the ground covered by him. But I recognize to the full the importance of the high cost of living and what it means to the average family. I take second place to no man in my sympathy for those who have to provide for their families and are confronted with the high cost of living—the increasing cost of living. Having said that, I do not necessarily jump to the conclusion that the tariff has brought this about. I examine the situation, I investigate the conditions, and try to come to a rational conclusion as to what is the cause of the high cost of living—the higher cost of living.

This phenomenon of the increasing cost of living is a world-wide phenomenon. It is not confined to protectionist countries or to free trade countries; it affects all countries at the present time, and has done so for fifteen or twenty years. It has been made the subject of many reports; it has been reported on by commissions; by special committees of legislature, by officials, by consuls and others. I have read an immense number of publications on this question, and so feel that I can emphasize what I have said—that this phenomenon is not confined to any one country. We find, for example that in Belgium, in 1912 as compared with 1900, the cost of living increased 32 per cent; in France 28 per cent; in Germany, 28 per cent; in Japan, 28 per cent, and in the United States, 43 per cent. I will deal with Canada's increase in a moment. This report goes into the details of the various causes put forward academically by both theoretical and practical men. I desire to call attention also to the report of the Massachusetts Commission in 1910; for, although I do not wish in any way to influence the deliberations of our commission at present sitting upon this question, yet the Massachusetts Commission of 1910 seems to me to epitomize two or three of the principal causes at any rate that enter into this problem of the high cost of living. They mention these causes:

Increase in gold supply.

For myself, I do not take that factor as seriously as economists generally seem to do. Gold has been increasing, but the trade of the world also has been increasing, and the gold is used increasingly in the arts and is hoarded increasingly in India and other parts of the world. The Commission says further that:

The main factors in restricting supply and enhancing the cost of commodities are the drain of population from the land, exhaustion of natural resources and uneconomic methods of production and distribution, especially the latter. The chief influence on the side of demand, the growing concentration of population in great cities, increasing the proportion of non-producing food consumers, the general advance in standard of living, the national habit of extravagance which has further extended and diversified the demands for comforts and luxuries.

And they find this also:

With regard to the tariff, the trusts and the unions the commission finds that none of these factors can be regarded as a direct and active cause of the increase in prices.

Now, we have had in Canada this situation. The most outstanding and striking fact in the census returns of 1911 was that the rural population of Canada increased only 17 per cent, while the urban population increased 62 per cent. In Ontario and the Maritime provinces, there was an actual falling off in rural population. There has been also, as pointed out by the Prime Minister last night, an increased consumption per capita. I think it is a fair statement to make that production has not kept pace with consumption, or to put it the other way, consumption has increased more rapidly than has production. There has been a higher standard of living in Canada, and there has been much greater waste. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) spoke the other day at a place called Atwood, I presume in his own constituency. He is reported—misreported I have no doubt—as saying in reference to our commission of investigation, that the establishment of this commission is a 'rotten farce.' For my own part, I say, I do not believe the hon. gentleman used that expression. I think the newspaper correspondent was aiming at a sensational or lurid effect. What the hon. gentleman probably said was, that, in his opinion, the commission would be ineffectual, or that its appointment would hardly be an adequate solution of a very difficult question. But he did say this—and I attach a great deal of weight to what the hon. gentleman says, because he has a sound, strong, practical mind—that the trouble was that we are not producing enough in Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: When the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the speech of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) at Atwood, in which he was reported to have given it as his view that the chief factor in the high cost of living was under-production, and in that view I was disposed largely to agree. The matter has been one of very considerable interest to me, and in the course of some investigations I recently made I looked into the matter of the raising of live stock in Canada, in Australia and in New Zealand. I found that in Canada the number of cattle per head was a fraction of one, and that the same may be said with regard to sheep and swine. In other words, the number of cattle, or of sheep or of swine in this country is only a fraction of the population. Turning to Australia and New Zealand, I found that in respect of cattle the number was two per head of population; of sheep, over twenty per head of population. It is apparent, therefore, that both Canada and the United States—because I have ascertained that the United States is in a similar position to Canada—we are not raising a sufficient number of cattle, swine, or sheep.

Mr. NESBITT: Where did my hon. friend get the statistics with regard to Canada?

Mr. WHITE: I am unable just at the moment to answer my hon. friend, but I will supply him with the information later. Coming to the question of the increased cost of living, which has been dealt with by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition both in this House, and in speeches at Hamilton and Montreal, I desire to call attention to what my right hon. friend said at Montreal. The Daily Telegraph which, I assume, would give a fairly accurate report of what my right hon. friend said, reports him as saying that:

During the fifteen years of our administration you never heard a word against the cost of living.

If I take the opportunity of reading a number of quotations which I have here it will be only for the purpose of refreshing the memory of my right hon. friend in connection with this matter, as I did this afternoon in regard to the question of employment and trade slackening following the money stringency. I quote from the Labour Gazette of January, 1909, published during the regime of my right hon. friend and under the immediate direction of Hon. Mr. Lemieux, then Minister of Labour, and Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. I assume, therefore, that what I shall read is authentic:

> The advance in retail prices which has been so pronounced during the past five years was continued during 1907. Milk, butter, eggs, potatoes, canned fish and vegetables, cereals and other staple articles of consumption were higher in price than in the experience of present householders. A special and detailed investigation conducted by the Civil Service Association at Ottawa, Ontario, into local price tendencies during the past ten years showed that expenditures on necessaries by a family of five living on an income of $750 per year had increased thirty-four per cent during the decade. The investigagation was conducted in June prior to a pronounced advance in fuel, breadstuffs and dairy produce which was maintained to the close of the year.

So much for the summary of the Labour Gazette for the year 1907. Now we come to the Labour Gazette of January, 1909, and I shall read just one extract:

> On the whole the rapid advance in general cost of living which has been so pronounced since the beginning of the century received a check, and the general situation was one of stationary or easier conditions.

That is precisely what I should expect. After a period of trade slackening, such as we have at the present time, and such as we had in 1908; after the stringency through which we have been passing in 1913, and through which the people of Canada passed in 1907, I should expect a fall, if only a slight one, in the cost of living. I do not desire to pose as a prophet, but I would hazard the prediction that the upward trend of prices will show a decline before the end of the year 1914. I may be entirely wrong, but I venture that prediction.

Let me now call attention to the facts referred to by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister last evening as to the upward trend of prices during the whole course of the administration of the right hon. gentleman opposite. I shall quote from the reports of the Labour Department. The House understands that the prices are measured by index numbers based upon the average prices of from 230 to 272 commodities selected during the period from 1890 to 1899. That is to say, a period of ten years is taken as 100 and the index number of the succeeding years has relation to that number, so that if the average cost increased by ten or fifteen per cent, the index number of the year in question would be 110 or 115. In 1890 the index number was 110; it fell steadily until 1896, when it reached 92. In other words, the cost of living was lowest in Canada in 1896. From that date forward —and I do not charge this to my right hon. friend—the cost of living has steadily advanced. In 1900 it, the index number, had grown from 92 to 108; in 1907 it had reached 126, and it then receded to 121. In 1911 it had reached 127, in 1912 it was 134, and in 1913 about 135. I may say with regard to the index number of 151, which appears in the report of the Board of Trade of Great Britain, it is perfectly clear that the comparison was not made upon precisely the same basis with regard to the several countries referred to.

In the case of Canada the prices were wholesale; in the case of the other countries the prices were retail, and the relation of a particular year, 1913 let us say, of the ten-year period between 1890 and 1899 would therefore be unfair as a comparison to Canada. These figures as given show a general increase with respect to these two or three hundred commodities, but so far as the cost of living is concerned the increase has principally taken place in animals and their products. The figures are very striking with regard to the rise in the prices of these products between the year 1906 and the year 1912. For example, in animal and meats—that is, taking them by groups—we find that while the index number in 1896 was 82, in 1900 it had reached 103, and in 1912 it had reached 160. The same statement will apply to dairy products; the index figure with respect to them has risen from 90 in 1896 to 131 in 1907 and to 159 in 1912. And with respect to 'other foods,' in 1896 at the beginning of the administration of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the index number was 102 and by 1912 it had risen to 126. In other words, from 1890 to 1897 the movement was consistently downward, while from 1896 to 1912 the movement was consistently upward, with the exception of the year 1908 in which there was a slackening or recession of trade following the financial stringency of 1907. I think the reason the index number lowers in a year like that is that there is a curb set upon extravagance, and consumption is not so great as in years of so-called abounding prosperity.

I have shown that this is not a new question, but that on the contrary it has been very much discussed privately and publicly for many years past. I doubt if there is any question before the public to-day that has been more widely discussed throughout the world than this very question of the high cost of living. I desire to point out to my right hon. friend that not only is the question not new, but that it has been actually brought before Parliament and dealt with by his Government. Let me again recall the words used by my right hon. friend in Montreal. He said:

During the fifteen years of our administration you never heard a word against the cost of living.

I will refresh the memory of my right hon. friend by calling his attention to the fact that the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King when introducing the Combines Investigation Bill in the year 1910, as reported in 'Hansard,' referred to this very matter. I desire to point out to my right hon. friend that this question of the high cost of living was before the public at that time and was deemed of sufficient importance to warrant legislation on the part of his Government. The Hon. Mackenzie King, in introducing the Combines Investigation Bill, said:

Perhaps there is no question to-day which has attracted so much attention in this country, and particularly in the United States, as the question of the cost of living for the mass of the people of the country. We have during the last few years experienced a very serious and considerable rise in prices. This increase in the cost of living has not been confined to any one class, rich and poor alike have had some experience of it, but it has a very serious effect upon men of limited incomes, upon the wage-earning classes, upon those whose salaries are fixed and those who do not receive very much in the way of remuneration. It is this question of the cost of living which has helped to make the question of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers and the possible effect they may have on prices, so important. In the popular mind there has come to be a gradual association between these two phenomena.

That is almost the same statement as my right hon. friend made in his speech in Hamilton. Mr. Mackenzie King continues:

Just taking a casual glance at them one observes that in the past 20 years prices have, broadly speaking, increased something like from 30 per cent to 40 per cent in most of the commodities which are in the nature of the produce of the farm and the field. Manufactured articles have not increased to quite the same extent, but there has been a very perceptible upward lift during the last ten years over what was the average rate between 1890 and 1900. As a matter of fact prices were at their lowest ebb in 1896 and 1897. Since that time they have gone up very steadily, and if we look at the movement from 1896 to the present time, we will see that in some commodities prices have increased as much as nearly 70 per cent or 80 per cent over what was the average in the years 1890-1900.

And yet my right hon. friend in his Montreal speech said that no one ever heard of this issue of the high cost of living during all the years of his administration. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King went on to read a table showing the increase in wholesale prices by groups of commodities, and the figures given there are very startling. It shows that animals and meats, fourteen commodities, as compared with the decade from 1890 to 1899 increased in price by forty-eight per cent and as compared with 1896, which was the last year of the Conservative Administration, by eighty per cent. In fish, the increase compared with the decade from 1890 to 1899 was thirty-four per cent, and as compared with 1896, thirty-one per cent. In other foods—thirty-seven commodities were taken—the increase was seven per cent compared with the decade from 1890 to 1899 and twenty-two per cent as compared with 1896. It seems perfectly clear then that, upon the figures given by the Labour Gazette, confirmed as they are by this statement filed by the Minister of Labour in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government, during the years of the Liberal Administration this was a live question, discussed publicly and privately, and considered to be a worthy subject of legislation in this House. The Hon. Mr. King continued:

Throughout the Dominion the steady increase in the cost of living, especially since the beginning of the present century, has been the subject of repeated comment, and, in almost every city or centre of employment, of more or less careful examination. In 1906 the Ontario Educational Association went carefully into the whole matter, in connection with the arrangement of teachers' salaries, with the result that an increase amounting to thirty per cent in ten years was shown. In 1907 an estimate made by the Synod of the Church of England in the city of Quebec placed the increase within the decade at a much higher rate.

The House will observe that all these bodies were considering this question.

In the city of Toronto, an investigation conducted with care and minuteness during 1907, by the Department of Political Economy of the University of Toronto, also showed a higher rate of increase. These examples could be multiplied.

All show upward movement since 1896; 30 to 35 per cent higher average, 1890-99; 40 to 45 per cent higher average, 1896-97.

The cost of living has increased from 30 to 40 per cent. in the case of incomes ranging from $2,000 down to $500. That is a fact which has impressed itself upon all classes of the community. We find the increase in the cost of living going on simultaneously with the organization of capital on a large scale, the formation of trusts, mergers and combines of one kind or another.

Let me point out, therefore, to my right hon. friend that this question, far from never having been raised during the fifteen years of his administration, was a live issue and was made the subject of legislation by his own Government. It was on account of the high cost of living that his minister was introducing the Combines Investigation Bill as a sovereign remedy. That was the remedy of my right hon. friend, not the abolition of customs duties. That was never suggested by my right hon. friend when the debate took place in the House. Many members on that occasion participated in the debate, among others the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). He was not sure about this Combines Investigation legislation. He raised doubts about it, as appears from the report of his speech in 'Hansard.' So far as I know, there was only one man in the House who was true to the traditions of free trade and who raised his voice and stated that the high cost of living was due to the tariff. That was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). He was true to his free trade principles. It is true, he has not always been consistent. He apostatized last session on the Naval Bill when he wanted the ships built here instead of at Glasgow. He denied the free trade policy on that occasion; but it is not on record that, like Peter, he went out and wept bitterly. On the contrary, he rather gloried in it.

I have pointed out that my right hon. friend never suggested at that time that the tariff was the cause of the increased cost of living. Of course he could not do so. His Finance Minister would not have let him. Let me illustrate what I mean for the benefit of my right hon. friend, who is going to abolish all duties on all foods—not only on farm products but manufactured articles as well. How can my right hon. friend argue that the tariff is the cause of the increased cost of living when the tariff upon the natural products of Canada has remained stationary for about twenty years? I have taken the trouble to look up the rates of duty on foodstuffs since 1890. I am not going to weary the House by reading this table, but it shows clearly that on butter the tariff has remained stationary or been slightly reduced under the British preferential, at four cents a pound until the revision of the tariff by the Finance Minister of my right hon. friend at the time the Labour Gazette was pointing out the high cost of living. The same remark applies to cheese, the duty on which was three cents a pound in 1890 and lower in 1907 under the customs tariff of to-day. The duty on eggs in 1894 was five cents a dozen and in 1907 three cents a dozen, and so on down the line. I make the statement that upon all these items that enter largely into the question of the high cost of living the tariff has remained constant for twenty years. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the tariff is not the cause of the increased cost of living.

We come now to a rather perplexing problem. As my right hon. friend has offered no explanation, we must do a little guessing. What is the explanation of the new fiscal policy put forth by my right hon. friend, not in the House of Commons, although he referred to it yesterday, but put forward at Hamilton as the policy which he gave the people for the present? Why this sudden interest on his part in the consumer? I think the explanation lies in the attitude that my right hon. friend took on the question of reciprocity. I had hoped that I should not have again to discuss this question in the House, but it appears from what my hon. friend from Red Deer said last night that there is a grave difference of opinion between himself and his leader as to the condition of reciprocity at the present time. My right hon. friend in his Hamilton speech said, speaking of reciprocity: Let the dead past bury its dead. My hon. friend from Red Deer dropped a rather cryptic utterance last night. He said: Reciprocity in its old form will not be with us again, but it is not dead. My hon. friend from Red Deer must be a political Buddhist, believing in reincarnation. He evidently believes in the transmigration, not of souls, but of reciprocity pacts. Now, I regard my hon. friend as not only a very able debater but as a physician of some distinction. I am beginning to entertain some doubts of his capacity as a physician, because it has taken him two years to find out what is the undoubted fact—and he has not even found it out yet—that reciprocity is dead. My hon. friend said last night that reciprocity was now 50 per cent. in operation. I think we shall find in that statement the explanation of the free food policy of my right hon. friend. He desires that the other 50 per cent. shall come into operation. My right hon. friend will remember that when the reciprocity treaty was under consideration in this House, there was no suggestion, so far as I have been able to learn from his speeches, that any benefit would inure to the consumer. Let me read to my right hon. friend what he said in the House of Commons on that occasion. He said:

> One object to-day is to open the door of a nation of 90,000,000 which has been closed to us.....I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made, is simply to get better prices for the product of the Canadian farmers. This is a proposition so obvious that I am surprised it should have received the treatment it has received on the part of our friends opposite.

The point I wish to make is that my right hon. friend had not the consumer in mind at all at that time. To clinch that argument, let us see what my right hon. friend did. It was pointed out that the farmer would not get as much benefit as appeared upon the surface, and that by reason of the operation of the most favoured nation treaties the markets of Canada would be opened to the farm products of the thirteen most favoured nations. That argument was put forward, it had some weight, and my right hon. friend thought it worth while to meet it. At the Imperial Conference in June, 1911, my right hon. friend presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

> That His Majesty's Government be requested to open negotiations with the several Foreign Governments having treaties which apply to the Overseas Dominions with a view to securing libetry for any of those Dominions which may so desire to withdraw from the operation of the treaty without impairing the treaty in respect of the rest of the empire.

What objection had my right hon. friend at that time, in view of the high cost of living that prevailed then—and if he had any objection, is it consistent with his course now? —to these thirteen most favoured nations having access to the markets of Canada in the interest of the consumer? His position at the present time, in view of this agitation as to the high cost of living, and in view of the Combines Investigation Bill, introduced as a sovereign remedy by his minister, is not consistent with his position then. It is not consistent that at the present time he should advocate the abolition of duties when at that time he was bending all his energies not only against the abolition of duties but to prevent the most favoured nations from having free entry to the markets of Canada in the interests of the consumer. I just leave my right hon. friend to think it over as to why he did that.

During the process of that campaign an argument was developed that, as far as I know, had never been heard before, in order to catch the city and town vote. It was put forward that under reciprocity the farmer would get more for his products and the city dweller would pay less; that is to say, that a farmer living ten or twelve miles out of Ottawa would receive more for his butter and eggs and that a citizen of Ottawa, buying his butter and eggs, would pay less. That puzzled a great number of people in Canada, but it was put forward as an argument, and I do not see how the Liberal party can refuse to continue to argue that. As the tariff can have absolutely no bearing whatever upon the increased cost of living, one possible explanation of the fiscal policy of my right hon. friend is that he desires to bring the other half of reciprocity into operation. He hopes that by his persistency he may ultimately bring it about that we shall have reciprocity between Canada and the United States. We pointed out in that campaign that the farmer in Canada would retain his home markets, which are his steady and stable markets, and his best markets, and that he would, in the process of time, get access to the markets of the United States. To a large extent that position has been confirmed. The Underwood Tariff Bill does open the market of the United States to a very great number of the products of Canada, and the farmers of Canada at the same time have their home market, which they showed by their votes in 1911 they so much appreciated and valued.

Let us see what a free food policy means. My own view is that free food means free trade. I believe that, carried out to its logical conclusion, it is a reversal of the policy under which, during the time of my right hon. friend and of preceding governments, this country has prospered for the last forty years. I believe that it involves a reversal of that policy. A quotation given by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister last night showed that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had referred to the protection policy as bondage. Well, in the words of Abraham Lincoln, if it is bondage, I do not believe that the people will consent to be half bond and half free. This Government believes in that reasonable protection where required—believes in a reasonable protection for the industries of Canada in order that her industries may be developed and her home market built up. We believe in protection, and a reasonable protective policy is one that we feel should include not only the industries of Canada, so called—that is to say, the manufacturing industries—but that it should, in so far as may be necessary, include also the farmers. That has been the policy ever since 1878 and that was the policy in the United States until this year. We are fond of making comparisons between Canada and the United States, but we forget that the United States has has almost a century's start of us, that she has a hundred million of population, that specialized industries have been built up for generations and that it is not fair to compare these two countries as if they were on all fours. Because a certain policy is satisfactory to the United States and suits the people of the United States, it does not necessarily follow that that policy would suit the people of Canada with our population and at our stage of development. I think that very often men with the best of intentions make a mistake in jumping to the conclusion that whatever policy is adopted in the United States is necessarily good for Canada.

Now I come to the end of this discussion as far as I am concerned, as to the increased cost of living. What is the remedy for it? It is perfectly clear that the abolition of customs duties is not the remedy. That is not going to change the trend upward of the cost of living, because, as I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, this phenomenon is not confined to Canada. We find it in protectionist countries, we find it in free trade countries, we find it on the continent of America, on the continent of Europe, in Great Britain—it is a universal phenomenon. The solution is not in the abolition of customs duties. What is the solution? I pointed out to the House that, according to comparative statistics between this country and New Zealand and Australia, we were not raising sufficient cattle, sheep and swine in Canada. The most practical way to meet this question of the high cost of living—because it is involved with the consideration mentioned by the hon. member for North Oxford more than any other and with the trend cityward—the two are involved together—is to increase the production in Canada. That is the solution of the high cost of living problem—increased production. In Canada for many years we have been in this position that the trend cityward has been such that in the last decade between 1901 and 1911 the urban population increased sixty per cent and rural Canada increased only seventeen per cent, with a decline in Ontario, or a very slight increase—I forget which—I think a decline—and in the Maritime provinces only seventeen per cent of an increase in the rural population and a sixty per cent increase in the urban population at a time when we were getting immigration at the rate of a thousand or twelve hundred a day and at a time when we have large undertakings under construction employing an army of men, all consumers. Yet, we have a declining rural population. What is the remedy? The remedy is unquestionably increased production. That is my view—I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: How are you going to increase it?

Mr. WHITE: We will come to that. The way not to increase it is to disregard the interests of agriculture, as my right hon. friend did from 1896 to 1911. I am going to show precisely what was done. If a fraction of the money that has been spent upon the National Transcontinental between Moncton and Cochrane had been spent for agriculture, I do not believe this question of the high cost of living would have been to the front to-day. There is an overlapping jurisdiction in agriculture between the Dominion and the provinces.

I asked my department to prepare a statement as to the expenditure upon agriculture for the past four or five years, just in order to get a comparison between the two Administrations in the matter of agriculture. What do I find? I have the items here, and I intend to place them upon 'Hansard.' The total expenditure upon agriculture in 1910-11 was $1,192,417.13. In 1911-12 it had risen to $1,489,973.46. In 1912-13, the first year that we were in power, the expenditure had been increased to $2,436,103, and in 1913-14 we spent more than double the amount that was spent in 1910, namely, $2,630,500. That is not by any means all that this Government has done to promote agriculture.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: What has been the result?

Mr. WHITE: Did my hon. friend hear the eloquent address of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) last night? If not, he missed a treat. My hon. friend from Red Deer said: Give it time for operation. The impatience of my hon. friend surprises me sometimes. A Bill was introduced last session by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), one of the most important measures, one of the most statesmanlike measures ever introduced into this House, setting aside the sum of $10,000,000, at the rate of $1,000,000 a year for the promotion of agricultural education throughout Canada. I shall be much surprised if that Bill does not produce very substantial results, just as soon as it is possible for it to get into operation, taking agricultural instruction to the farmer, teaching him as to his soils, as to his grains, as to his breeds of cattle. At all events that is a statesmanlike measure. A government that does that is doing something to promote agriculture. Therefore we have expenditures in the Estimates of 1913-14 of $2,630,500; and, notwithstanding the financial stringency, the Estimates of the coming year for agriculture are going to be greater than that. Notwithstanding that increased expenditure, there is $1,000,000 a year set aside for ten years. Whatever money is required by the Minister of Agriculture for the purposes of promoting husbandry throughout Canada, the raising of cattle, the raising of grain, is going to be supplied, so far at all events, as I can supply it. Therefore, in our humble way we have done something to deal with this question of the high cost of living by increasing production in Canada, because I think that is the very gist of the question, to increase production in Canada, to make farm life more agreeable, to make it brighter, to make it more attractive, to counteract the lure of the city and to make it more profitable. Let me ask my right hon. friend this question: how are you going to increase the attractiveness of farming, how are you going to appeal to the farmer's boy to stay on the farm, if you cut down the price of his product? The object of my right hon. friend, as I understand it, by abolishing customs duties upon food, is to cheapen farm products, eggs, butter, cattle, swine, sheep. Is that going to be a sovereign remedy? Will that appeal to the farmer if he gets less for his products? Will it? I ask that question.

I think that concludes that branch of the subject as to the high cost of living, brought into the discussion of my right hon. friend, and the fiscal policy which he announces as the policy of the Opposition —free food—that is to say, the abolition of all custom duties upon natural products and manufactured products constituting food.

The tariff has been somewhat under discussion in this debate upon the Address, although I entirely agree with my hon. friend from Red Deer, who fairly observes the rules of this House—in fact, who is somewhat of a stickler for the observance of its rules—that this is not a Budget occasion, and consequently it is not the time, properly speaking, to discuss questions of the tariff. I am not suggesting for a moment that it is not in order, because any question can be discussed in connection with the debate upon the Address, either on the ground that it is not in the Speech from the Throne, or that it ought to be in the Speech from the Throne. While that is acknowledged, it is a fact that the proper time for a debate upon the tariff is when the Budget is brought down. My hon. friend from Red Deer is a consistent free trader, with one notable exception of backsliding, to which I shall not refer again; because I can imagine that he might be sensitive about it. After all, one fall after a long consistent course of adherence to conviction should not be imputed too harshly to a man.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: Speaking personally?

Mr. WHITE: Well, I am always willing to apply a rule to myself, but when I supported my right hon. friend he was a good protectionist. My hon. friend from Red Deer eulogizes and I join in the eulogy, Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States as a great man. I join sincerely in that tribute to President Wilson. It gives me great pleasure to associate myself in the admiration of my hon. friend from Red Deer for the great head of our neighbouring republic. I have so expressed myself upon previous occasions. My hon. friend from Red Deer is nothing if not vigorous, and he told us last night in the most picturesque and forceful language how President Wilson has taken the American protective system and torn it up by the roots and scattered it to the four winds of heaven. Those were his words.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am sure my hon. friend will allow me. My recollection is that I said he had taken protectionist heresies, not the system. It would take time to take the system.

Mr. WHITE: I do not quite see how it is possible to separate the heresies from the system. I do not believe my hon. friend quite realizes what is involved in that statement. President Woodrow Wilson is the President who has brought about the revision of the American tariff under the terms of the Underwood Bill. And, in order that my hon. friend may see just how far he has 'torn up' either the protectionist system or the protectionist heresies, I want to point out to him that the rate of duties upon dutiable articles in Canada at the present time is under 26 per cent, and I will read to the House what Mr. Underwood, who introduced this Bill, said with regard to its effect upon the tariff of the United States. That will enable the House to see how far he has 'torn up' the whole fabric of protection—although my hon. friend from Red Deer did not use that term. This is from the Congressional Record of September last:

> With few exceptions the House agreed to the Senate reductions. The Senate receded on about one-half of the raises that it made in the Bill, with the result that the Bill as it is now presented to the House, as ascertained by the calculations made by the experts, will reach an average of about 26 per cent—almost as low as the famous Walker Bill, which carried a low tax on liquor and tobacco—and the tax on liquor and tobacco raises the average of this Bill very much.

I see an estimate in the London Times as to the average rate upon dutiable goods entering the United States under the new tariff, and that estimate was that it was 29 per cent—three points higher than the figure named by the parent of the Underwood Bill. The point I desire to make is that my hon. friend from Red Deer is filled with admiration for the President of the United States for tearing up these protectionist heresies because he has brought about a situation in the United States under which their tariff is higher than that of Canada to-day, and yet the hon. gentleman is opposed to the tariff of Canada because it is a protectionist tariff. That seems to me to be a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What are the respective tariffs of the two countries on agricultural implements?

Mr. WHITE: At present agricultural implement in Canada—that is, the principal agricultural implements such as binders, reapers, mowers and harvesters—pay 17½ per cent. Under the reciprocity agreement negotiated by my predecessor this duty would have been reduced to 15 per cent to remain there practically for all time.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What is the tariff in the United States?

Mr. WHITE: I think these articles are free.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Absolutely free.

[Mr. W. T. White].

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong. I try to carry as many of these matters in my head as I can, but I cannot carry them all.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That abolition of duty means something 'torn up.'

Mr. WHITE: The point I am making is that while my hon. friend from Red Deer is continually attacking our tariff, the tariff of the United States to-day, with the changes made to which he has referred, has a higher average of duty on dutiable commodities than has the tariff of Canada. I deal with the tariff as a whole because the hon. gentleman was dealing with it in that way and not with any particular duty. Mr. Underwood goes on:

> To all intents and purposes, the Bill that is now presented to the House for its consideration provides an average of lower taxation than any Bill that has been presented in three-quarters of a century.

It follows, then, that the tariff of Canada which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is advising us to revise—and in a year like this of all years—is lower than any tariff in the United States for three-quarters of a century. Yet my hon. friend from Red Deer tells us to look to the United States. Mr. Underwood proceeds:

> The Wilson Bill carried an average rate of duty of 39.95 per cent. The Payne Bill carries an average rate of duty of 40.12 per cent, as compared with about 26 per cent that this Bill will carry.

My hon. friend has asked the Government to make an announcement as to certain matters brought to their attention by a delegation of farmers. There has been in Canada, I believe, ever since Conderation and earlier, what I regard as a sound practice, namely, that announcements respecting the tariff are made only to Parliament, on the floor of Parliament and in the Budget speech. Personally, I have jealously guarded that rule. I consider it an eminently sound practice. I do not propose, and the Government does not propose, to depart from that rule, that custom, that sound practice. Whatever announcements the Government has to make respecting the tariff will not be made on ill-timed, unexpected occasions, but will be made in due course, at the proper time and in the Budget speech, and in the proper place, upon the floor of Parliament.

My right hon. leader (Mr. Borden) has called my attention to the language of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) in connection with this matter. He said:

I see the hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod) still gets lessons from that great counrty, because he quoted it in one particular in his speech to-night. Well, I looked to the great country to the south and I kept on looking, and now I turn to my hon. friends opposite and I say: Look at the great country to the south and what do you see? We see a great, simple and sincere man coming into office and cutting up protection and tearing its economic fallacies and false arguments into shreds and casting them to the four winds of heaven.

Notice the vigor and enthusiasm of that utterance.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is what I said—'fallacies and false arguments.'

Mr. WHITE: Scripta manet. Having read the words of my hon. friend from Red Deer, I do not see any reason to change the view I expressed as to his utterance, unless he meant what he said about 'cutting up' protection to be taken in a merely figurative sense. I supposed that by 'cutting up' he meant making mincemeat of protection.

I fear that I have engaged the attention of the House for too long a time on this occasion; and I am very grateful to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House for the close attention they have given me. I desire briefly to go over the heads of the subjects upon which I have touched. I referred to the naval question, and in this connection I want to ask my hon. friends opposite one question. In the speech of my right hon. friend I did not hear very much with regard to these two splendid battle units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, which were to be the immediate programme of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have not heard anything about the expenditure of $50,000,000 that would be required, $25,000,000 for each fleet, or the annual upkeep of $6,000,000, representing four per cent interest on $150,000,000. Perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) when dealing with this matter will tell us whether that is his programme at the present time. Will hon. gentlemen opposite engage in this expenditure, to say nothing of the enormous expense that would be involved in establishing armament manufactories in Canada in order that the ships composing those units may be constructed wholly in Canada, afterwards to be manned and operated by Canadians?

In so far as the attack upon our expenditure is concerned. I contend that, as compared with the record of hon. gentlemen opposite, this Government has been a prudent and economic government; that we have conserved the revenues of the Dominion, and that our surplus revenues have really been used to repair the mistakes made by our predecessors in office. In the fiscal years 1911-1912 our revenues were $168,000,000 and our expenses were kept within the moderate bounds of $143,000,000, giving a surplus over current, capital and special expenditure of $25,000,000. We used that $25,000,000, as I have said, for the purpose of repairing the blunder made by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the giving of the guarantee to the Grand Trunk Pacific. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite have the temerity to attack this Government for retrieving the errors which they themselves made, and for avoiding the loss of money and national credit which might have resulted from those mistakes. Considering the fact that we have devoted the greater portion of our expenditure to the completion of enterprises promoted and inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite, I must say that their attitude is something like the unnatural parent denouncing the benefactor of his children. Any unusual financing we have done this year is not due to any programme initiated by this Government; it is but the aftermath of my right hon. friend's financial methods during his term of office, resulting in the expenditure of $22,000,000 with $10,000,000 more to come, to pay for the three per cent bonds guaranteed by the Government of Canada to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I hope therefore, that we shall hear no more about this question of lavish expenditure since we have taken office.

With regard to the cost of living, as I have said, the best remedy is to increase production, and we intend to do what we can, by the promotion of agriculture, to accomplish that most desirable end. The new fiscal policy of my right hon. friend is simply a re-incarnation of reciprocity, which was pronounced against by the people of this country in 1911. As to the tariff, I have this to say to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). From time to time there are, of course, changing conditions which have to be met, but to consider as he suggests, a revision of the tariff downward in a year such as this—a year of slackening trade—and after such a period of financial stringency as that through which we have passed, would be to dislocate the industries of this country. So far as I know, there is no public opinion in favour of a revision of tariff at this particular time. As I said in the beginning of my speech, we have gone through a very trying period; a long continued and severe depression. But the light is now beginning to break; money is easier in the international centres, and that is the most hopeful sign to-day. Last fall was a good season for ploughing in Canada, and, with the promise of a favourable crop in the spring and the easing off of the money situation, this country should soon resume its wonted prosperity. No doubt we should go ahead cautiously for a time; it is very proper that we should, but the people of Canada should proceed also with confidence, and hon. gentlemen opposite should not, I think, discourage that confidence.

With regard to government expenditure, this Government has vast enterprises in hand, most of them inaugurated by our predecessors. We propose to carry out these public works; we propose to complete the great works to which we have committed ourselves. Extravagance is always to be deprecated, and I will never stand up in this House and defend the spending of money simply for the sake of spending it. That is unsound; on the other hand a policy of parsimony or timidity is more unsound. The middle course is the sound and sensible policy from the standpoint of private or national finance, and that is the course we propose to pursue.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): In attempting to offer some remarks to the House in this debate, I hope that my hon. friend the Finance Minister will not understand me as accepting on behalf of hon. gentlemen on this side the somewhat lengthy apology he has given for the position of the Government and its inaction in regard to the crisis which exists throughout the country. I was particularly interested in the remarks which my hon. friend had to offer on what at one moment he was pleased to call the new policy, and what at other moments he was pleased to designate as the old policy of the leader of the Opposition. I will not spend further time in criticising that part of my hon. friend's remarks, except to say that, carefully following them, it seemed to me that the latter half completely answered the first. Whereas he declared specifically in the beginning of his remarks that certain industries to the extent of hundreds of millions of capital and thousands of people would be in danger if the policy enunciated by the leader of the Opposition were adopted, in the latter half of his remarks he was at great trouble to prove that by no possible change in the tariff could the cost of living be reduced.

The remarks of my hon. friend followed very closely the lines laid down in the Speech from the Throne, as well as in the addresses delivered in support of the position of the Government as there set out. This, I believe, is the first occasion in the history of the Canadian Parliament on which the Government has met Parliament with what can only be described as a purely ostrich policy. They have dropped, or forgotten, or ignored their policy regarding highways which at last session was one way of saving the country; they have ignored and dropped their policy regarding extensions of the Intercolonial railway; have they ignored and dropped that great policy that was not only to save the country but also the empire, the naval question? And, Mr. Speaker, although they have relieved their minds of these important questions, in all the broad expanse of this Dominion of Canada, in its three thousand miles from ocean to ocean, with its seven millions of people and its rapidly growing interests, they have not found anything that requires the attention of Parliament at this session of sufficient importance to be mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, with the one exception alluded to by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), legislation that is automatically required by the British North America Act.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: And even with regard to that they are late.

Mr. OLIVER: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the attitude of the Government in the two previous sessions was that of the ostrich that runs around in a circle, but this session it is that of the ostrich which, having found no result from the circling process, sticks its head in the sand and thereby hopes to protect itself and to deceive its enemies. May I be pardoned if I suggest that the position is not graceful; it is not creditable, and it is decidedly vulnerable?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that our friends are under a misapprehension as to their responsibilities and as to the conditions in this case. I observe that so far from giving any intimation to the country that they have any views or intentions with regard to legislation, they have so far confined their allusions to expressions as to the policy of the party of the Opposition and of their honored leader. Far be it from me to in any way minimize the importance of these views and expressions by the leader of the Opposition and his followers in the House, but let me suggest that the questions at issue before this country are to be decided by the Government on its responsibility and not on the views or opinions of the members of the Opposition, or even of the great leader of the Opposition. And may I suggest further that these gentlemen cannot escape from their responsibility, nor can this House afford the time to discuss or consider opinions that may have been expressed years ago; actions that were taken years ago; opinions that were proper and well supported at that time; actions that were taken for good reason and with sufficient results at that time. The fact of these actions and these reasons having been taken has no necessary bearing on present conditions. My hon. friends opposite in their attitude as expressed this session, bring to my mind the criticism of that great royal Bourbon family, of whom it was said: they never forgot anything and never learned anything. But our friends of the Government have gone the Bourbons one better, for judging by their policy as expressed in the Speech from the Throne, they have forgotten everything, and judging of it as expressed in the speeches of their supporters delivered in this House, they do not seem to have learned anything.

I may be permitted to deal at some length with the situation of the country as it is and with the duties and responsibilities of the Government in connection with that situation. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have an easy way of dealing with it. They say: True, the times are hard; the times have been hard before and possibly will be hard again; what is that to us; why in 1907 times were hard and the then Government met Parliament with a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne parallel to the announcement which is inserted in the present speech. That is their idea of the fulfillment of their whole duty in a great national crisis. But let me remind them that the paragraph they have been good enough to quote from the speech of 1907 did not state that action had been taken by the Government of that day to meet what was on their showing a crisis parallel to that with which we are face to face to-day. My hon. friend knows well that on the occasion of the depression of 1907 this Government did take such action to meet the conditions then existing; that when Parliament afterwards met they were criticised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in words to the effect that they might as well have taken crowbars and gone down to the treasury vaults as take the action they did. While gentlemen opposite say: Yes, times are hard, they were hard before and will be hard again, and we have nothing to do with it, the late Government took drastic action, action which was I believe outside the law, in order to meet the conditions, and they did meet them. And that was one reason why the country recovered as rapidly as it did on that occasion. I ask my hon. friends, charged with the direction of the public affairs of this country as they are, what warrant have they for presuming that matters will improve if they will only leave them alone? I am not prepared to say but that their judgment may be right in this particular instance, but I do say that they have no right to assume that that is the case. Nor have they any right to assume that they are doing their full duty that being the case. I would ask my hon. friends, to what end does Parliament meet, for what purpose is the Government in office, if it is not to meet from day to day conditions as they arise, so that the people of this country will be benefited. If the Government has not that authority, if Parliament has not that responsibility, I ask, to what end are we here? Is the Government and Parliament a body whose sole duty is to levy taxes and to spend money? If that is my hon. friend's idea of the sole duty of Parilament, I take issue with him here and now, and so I think the country will.

I was struck by the stress that my hon. friend laid on the amount of money that was being spent in aid of agriculture, and particularly in agricultural education, by this Government as compared with expenditures by the previous Government. He brought out strongly the difference in the amounts spent, but I think it was when he made his claims as to the result of the expenditures by his Government that he excelled himself. We are to have a reduction in the cost of living without a reduction in the tariff. We are going to have a result that will mean many many millions of dollars to the people of this country by means of this expenditure. My hon. friends are spending about a million dollars a year more than their predecessors did in aid of agriculture. It is peculiar that our hon. friends who are so generous to agriculture, who expect such magnificent results from that generosity, should have up to date specifically refused, so far as the records show, every request that has been made by the authorized voice of agriculture in this country. I have here a report of a delegation which visited Ottawa recently. It comprised representatives from the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, the United Farmers of Alberta, and the Ontario Grange. They met members of the Government, including the Premier, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of the Interior and the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), to whom they stated their views and desires. May I point out that one of their specific requests read as follows:

> We ask that all foodstuffs be placed on the free list, as we believe that the taxing of food is a crime against humanity.

Hon. J. D. REID: What did the other deputation of farmers say on the same day?

Mr. OLIVER: I was speaking of the organized farmers of the four great agricultural provinces. I say their demands expressed in formal manner lead me to believe what the farmers believe rather than the Finance Minister or the other gentlemen who heard the farmers. I am one of those who believe that the farmers speaking by and large generally know their own business and know what they want.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Did the organized farmers ever come to the late Government?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Did they get what they asked for? I will endeavour to show before this debate is over that they did not.

Mr. OLIVER: We will be glad to hear from my hon. friend, but I do not know how he can fail to remember that something like one thousand came here. They made certain demands and the Government of that day acceded to those demands, but my hon. friend and his friends were able ultimately to defeat the Government because of those demands. Notwithstanding that fact, we still believe that the farmers knew what they wanted and, speaking for myself, I believe they wanted what was their right, and am prepared to stand behind that principle, win or lose.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: When you are in opposition.

Mr. OLIVER: I think perhaps I could not do better than to place before the House and on the record some statements made by this delegation to the members of the Government, as they bear very strongly on this question of the high cost of living. They say in their memorial:

> In four years previous to January, 1913, fifty-six industrial mergers were negotiated, with an aggregate authorized capitalization of $456,938,-266. The fifty-six amalgamations absorbed 248 individual companies. The aggregate capitalization of 206 of these individual companies was approximately $167,289,182, indicating that, whereas the people of Canada had to provide dividends on $167,000,000, they have now to provide dividends on three times that amount. This enormous increase in capitalization is almost wholly made up of common stock, which admittedly represents very little real investment, being simply protection capitalized. A few outstanding illustrations are: The Canada Cement Company, Montreal, capitalized at $38,-000,000, absorbed eleven companies with a total capital of $17,750,000; Ames-Holden & McCready, boots and shoes, capitalized at $11,-500,000, absorbed two campanies, capital $3,-500,000; Canada Cereal and Malting Company, capitalized at $3,250,000, absorbed eight companies with $809,000 capital; Dominion Canners, Hamilton, capitalized at $12,500,000, absorbed forty-five individual companies whose capital was given as $1,324,000. The total capitalization of manufacturers for the Dominion of Canada, according to the census returns, increased from $446,916,487 in 1901 to $1,247,-589,609 in 1911; the ascertained surplus after deducting cost of raw material, wages, power, &c., from the gross revenues, showed an increase of net earnings on capitalization from 19.82 per cent in 1901 to 25 per cent in 1911.

I noted in the remarks, I think, of both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, that they could not understand how the farmer could receive a higher price and the consumer pay a lower price; but the farmers in this memorial throw some light on this subject. They say:

> The average price paid farmers for tomatoes last year at Ontario factories was 30 cents per bushel. In some cases the price ran as low as 27½ cents. It is stated that a bushel of these tomatoes will, under ordinary conditions, fill ten cans, the price of which to the consumer in western Canada is 20 cents per can.

I will place it before you if there is not ample room for an increase in the price for the producer and a decrease in the cost to the consumer. It is a puzzle for the Government to work out to show that the spread between the price received by the producer and the price paid by the consumer is not an inordinate one and does not represent extortion upon either the producer or the consumer. That is their business, Mr. Speaker. To follow on:

> That is to say, what the Ontario farmer gets 3 cents for (the Manitoba farmer pays 20 cents for. The manufacturers' census of 1911 shows the surplus earnings of canning factories of fruit and vegetables to be equal to 50 per cent. of the capital employed in the business. At the annual meeting of the Dominion Canners, Limited, in December last, it was given out that the net earnings of the company, after paying all fixed charges were 12 per cent on the common stock, which is supposed to represent nothing but water, and was selling on the stock exchange at 86.

Protection is intended to increase the cost of goods in the interest of the home manufacturer. It may be safely assumed that he will add the full amount of his protection to the selling price of his goods. Now the census and trade returns show in 1911 that for every dollar's worth of dutiable goods we imported, we manufactured $4 worth, consequently for every dollar we paid to the Government for revenue we paid four to the manufacturer.

I do not intend to traverse at any great length the question as to the condition of the country as it is; but I think it is no harm to bring in the evidence of authorities that no one in the House or the country can dispute, for the purpose of showing that the Government of Canada have a responsibility and that the country calls upon them to discharge that responsibility. In the Ottawa Citizen, which is generally supposed to be a supporter of the Government of the day, and is published near enough to these halls to have a knowledge of the facts, I read as follows:

Unemployed in Canada.

Reports come from practically every center of population in Canada of large numbers of unemployed who are feeling the pinch of poverty. In the cities of the West there has been industrial distress for several months. The number of unemployed has been greatly in excess of the number to be expected by reason of the end of the demand for seasonal labour in the prairie provinces, and the consequent unemployment of the men so engaged. In British Columbia the same conditions have existed. In Regina, Sask., the situation is such that the police find it difficult to maintain order, it being feared for a time that martial law might have to be declared. That ominous institution, the soup kitchen, has made its appearance in this young and prosperous country. In Montreal hundreds of men stood in line at midnight to receive coffee and bread. In Toronto it is estimated that there are at present 15,000 men out of work, with the number on the increase.

In to-day's Ottawa Free Press, published here in the Capital city, I read the following:

Toronto Wants Work Started—Thirty Million Dollars Worth There to Help the City's Unemployed.

Toronto has adopted the plan resorted to in India in times of famine and has asked the Government for relief works. There are plans and appropriations for ten million dollars harbour improvements, for a new customs house, a new post office and the railways have plans for a new union station.

Altogether there is about thirty million dollars' worth of work in sight. Some has not been started and what has been commenced is being proceeded with in a leisurely fashion.

To-day—

To-day, when the Minister of Finance took his place in this House and tried to make Canada believe that he did not know what the conditions were, or that the conditions are as they are—

To-day Mayor Hocken, Controller Church and Controller Simpson waited upon Hon. Robert Rogers, Hon. J. D. Reid and Hon. L. P. Pelletier, and asked that operations be started full blast upon all of these works to provide relief for the army of unemployed in Toronto.

Hon. J. D. REID: The Free Press is not stating the truth; I was not there at all and never heard of it until I saw the Free Press.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

They also waited upon Chairman Drayton of the Railway Commission and asked him to make a peremptory order directing the railways immediately to begin work upon the union depot.

A sympathetic hearing was given the requests and it is understood that strong efforts will be made to meet the situation disclosed by the Toronto representatives.

The Minister of Finance read from the Labour Gazette of 1907 as to the conditions then. Would it be any harm to read from the Labour Gazette of December, 1913, as to conditions now?

Victoria.—Labour conditions were dull, not so good as during October, and much worse than the same month a year ago.

Nanaimo.—The labour situation shows very little change from last month, the city and district being full of idle men owing to the strike in the coal mines causing a general slackness in all branches of business.

Vancouver.—Industrial activity was less than it was at this time last year. Large numbers of unemployed men were walking the streets, and so serious is the situation that at a special meeting of the city council, held on November 21, a sum of money was voted for the purpose of opening up relief work for married men at $2.00 a day.

Lethbridge.—There was no improvement in labour conditions over last month. Farm help was not in demand. The city has been extending sewer and water connections, giving work to a number of men who otherwise would be idle. The building trades were dull. Work in the railroad yard is still being pushed ahead. Coal mining was very active, giving work to increasing number of men. All other branches of employment were dull.

And so on, practically all along the line.

I think, in view of all these quotations, it will not be argued that there is not a condition that requires the attention of the Government, if the Government has any purpose or business as such. If they are to take the position, as they have so far taken it, that they have no responsibility; that it is only their business to levy the taxes and spend the money as they please, and wait for things to right themselves, it is desirable that that point should be nailed in the public mind, and that they should stand before the country of Canada as a Government in office and in power, not only unable, not only unwilling, but absolutely unknowing as to the conditions that require their attention.

Admitting that there are conditions that require attention, may I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to bring before the House some information and views of my own as to how and why that condition exists, with a view of directing attention to the means necessary to secure its removal. My hon. friend has said, and has repeated and repeated that conditions in Canada are only as they are elsewhere throughout the world; that conditions are only as they were in 1907. What were the conditions in 1907? Everybody knows that the conditions in Canada were immediately, directly and unquestionably due to a condition of financial panic in the United States, such as that country had seldom seen, such as seldom occurred before and such as never has occurred since, and certainly such as does not exist now. At that time Canada had suffered from serious failure in production. We had had a terribly severe winter in the West that wiped out possibly half of the range cattle, thus cutting off several million dollars in the winter of 1907-8. The summer was unfavourable. The harvest was late. The crop was damaged. Conditions were unfavourable in Canada; but still it was the panic in the United States that caused the financial stringency and made the difficulty that had to be coped with upon that occasion. To-day, as has been said and as has been repeated, Canada has harvested the largest crop that she has ever harvested. She has harvested it under the most favourable conditions; she has marketed it under the most favourable conditions, except as to price. There is no panic in the United States. Conditions of finance and labour in the United States to-day are better than they are in Canada. In Great Britain conditions not only are good but are magnificently good, both in regard to labour and finance. Canada is the country to-day that stands by herself as the country of depression, in the face of the most magnificent crop it ever harvested. In 1907, in the face of a bad winter, in the face of a bad summer, Canada still stood as the best of the countries within our immediate range, as far as finances were concerned. There is no comparison between the conditions in 1907 and the conditions of to-day.

Just as the conditions of 1907 had a cause, which was the panic in the United States, so the conditions of to-day have a cause, and the conditions of to-day call for a remedy. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) repeated and repeated that the cure for the present condition, for the high cost of living, for the financial stringency, was increased production, more people on the land, and more production from the land. There is no doubt that is the cure; but my hon. friend did not give us any indication as to how he was going to apply the cure, and he did not even hold out the idea that he was in any way responsible for its application. Let me point out how the disease has come about, as I understand it. Enough has been said to demonstrate beyond question that, when all the great financiers, all the great industrial institutions and all the great transportation organizations are set on one side, the source of the wealth of Canada is the land; and the progress of its wealth is absolutely dependent upon the progress of the cultivation of the land, which again is contained in the agricultural development of the prairie provinces. If we have had increasing prosperity in Canada, we have had it because there has been increasing production in our prairie west.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance almost shed tears over the fact that the late Government had practically ignored the agricultural industry. Does my hon. friend know that under the late Government, if I may quote from the material which was presented to himself, amongst others, by the delegates from the western provinces and Ontario, the acreage under crop in the three western provinces in the year 1901 was about 2,500,000 acres, and in 1911 it was over 17,000,000 acres? This agriculture that the late Government did not encourage increased seven-fold during ten years under the administration of the late Government. I ask my hon. friend, has he any hope or prospect that it will increase seven-fold under his administration, with the aid even of his $1,000,000 a year for agricultural education? It was that increase in cultivation in the West that made Canada; that built the railroads, that started the factories, that gave dividends to the banks; that created the great commercial houses; that did whatever has been done that amounted to anything in those years. It was the foundation of it all. The homesteader on the prairie with his yoke of oxen or his team of horses and his plough, who has been held up to obloquy as the miner of wheat, who has been advised by my hon. friend to go into mixed farming in order to save the country, this was the man who made Canada. What treatment has he had at the hands of my hon. friend and his friends since they came into office? They will educate him. Yes. But he needs something more than education. I would like to say to my hon. friend that the western farmer is fairly well educated in what constitutes his own business. The fact that he has done what he has done is all the evidence that is necessary upon that point.

Let me call the attention of the House back to the year 1911, the year when my hon. friend took office. There were unfortunate weather conditions at that time. There was a damaged crop. There was a grain blockade. I had the honour to bring to the attention of the House facts and figures, which were not denied in any degree, showing that the direct loss to the wheat farmers of the prairie west that year, because of the grain blockade then existing, which did not need to exist, which should not have existed, and which would not have existed if this Government had taken proper action, was not less than $10,000,000 in cold cash.

In the year 1912 there was another occasion of unfavourable harvesting conditions, another year of late forwarding of the crop, another year of partial grain blockade. I shall not trouble the House with figures; but, if my memory serves me right, while in the year 1911 the condition became so bad and the facts were impressed so strongly upon the attention of the Government, that they did finally take certain action, in the year 1912, as far as I recall, the grain blockade existed without any relief at the hands of the Government of the day.

The farmer of the West does not raise wheat for fun or for the sake of its appearance. He raises it to sell, and upon the price that he gets for that wheat depends the possibility of his continuing in business. If he makes a profit, he stays in business, let the profit be never so small. If he does not make a profit, what happens to the banker or the manufacturer or the merchant, happens to the farmer; the sheriff gets him; he goes out of business. One of the factors affecting the price of wheat to the farmer is the cost of transportation. The distance from the wheat field to the ultimate market is stupendous. Toll is taken at every point, by the receiving elevator, the railroad, the terminal elevator, the steam-boat over the lakes, the receiving elevator again, the railroad, the ocean elevator, the ocean vessel, and again the ocean elevator.

We have been told at great length in this House about the steamship combine on the Atlantic ocean and how that has unduly increased the rates of freight upon the western farmers' wheat, causing the depression in prices. There is no doubt that combine has taken place. There is no doubt that fact has materially affected and limited the profit of the farmer in the West. Ocean transportation is not within the jurisdiction of this House. It is a magnificent subject for declamation, and speeches made on that subject look well on 'Hansard,' but they do not mean anything. They do not get anywhere; they do not take anything off the rates of transportation, and they do not add anything to the price of the farmers' wheat. But there is a link in that line of transportation which is within the jurisdiction of this Government and Parliament of Canada, that link which extends from Fort William at the head of Lake Superior to such port at the foot of Georgian bay or other lake ports as may occur. This is a link of transportation that is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and what has taken place on the ocean has taken place on the lakes. A lake merger has been formed and the rate of freight across the lakes has cost the farmer from one to two or even three cents a bushel during this and the previous year. What have our friends on the other side done in that regard? Everybody will remember that last session a Bill was before the House to make provision for an increased capitalization for the express purpose of giving that merger firmer control of the situation, and facts advertised in the newspapers, stated the reason for the forming of the merger as being for the purpose of levying toll upon the transportation of wheat. When the question was brought to the attention of the Government, they were asked to take action. Votes were taken upon it in this House and what was the answer? They have money to spend for the education of the farmer, but they have no attention to give to secure for him a fair price for his product, or to protect him against the rapacity and extortion of mergers and combines. We have this year 150,000,000 bushels of wheat marketed up to this time. The price of every bushel that is actually marketed is based upon the export price. That is to say, the price of every bushel of that 150,000,000 bushels has been subjected to a reduction by the amount of the extortion of the lake merger, an average of two cents a bushel, as I am credibly informed. That means that there has been taken out of the farmers' pockets this year, out of the pockets of the raisers of wheat, in a winter when the price is abnormally low, $3,000,000 with the knowledge and consent and assistance of this Government and their majority in Parliament. And they are going to save the country by the amount of education they propose to give the farmers. They are teaching the farmer a good many things he did not know a few years ago, but I think that the farmer will teach them something when the next opportunity occurs.

I have told the House that the farmers of the West lost $10,000,000 on the crop of 1911. I have not given the figures for the crop of 1912, but I have given $3,000,000 with regard to the crop of 1913. What is the result? The result is that while the farmer some years ago was farming at a profit; while farming was increasing from year to year, it having increased from two and a half to seventeen million acres in ten years, it has practically been at a standstill during these three years. The increase of production which was the gold mine of Canada has not occurred in those years, and for that reason. Immigration into Canada has increased, but homestead entries have decreased; there were 10,000 less entries in the year ended March 31, 1913, than there were in the year ended March 31, 1911. This is how my hon. friends opposite have been pushing people on to the land; this is how they have been encouraging increased cultivation and helping to bring down the cost of living.

I have read from the memorial of the farmers' delegation a quotation showing the burden that has been placed upon the whole of the consumers of this country, and upon the farmer more than any other, by the capitalization of protection and the formation of mergers. I have mentioned the canners' combine, which increased to the consumers of the West the cost of the product of that combine, a necessary of life in that country, by seventy per cent.

Again we are told that the farmers need education; what I say is that the farmer needs a living chance; he needs a fair opportunity, and it is for this Government to meet conditions as they arise and to give the farmer the opportunity to which he is entitled, and of which if he gets it, he will take full advantage for the good of himself and the good of the country.

But what has that to do with the conditions of finance and labour in Canada as a whole? I said in the beginning, and I say again, that as the increase of cultivation in the West was the gold mine upon which the increase of Canada's prosperity was built in the last ten years, so when that gold mine ceases to increase in production, will the prosperity built upon it cease to increase in corresponding degree. If the farmers in the West do not make a profit, they cannot buy the products of the factories of the East. If there are factories closed up in the province of Ontario to-day—and there are; if there are others running on half time and on reduced wages—and there are; if collections are difficult and money is tight, it is in a large measure because the farmers of the western prairie have not been dealt with fairly or justly by this Government since it came into office. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say 'this does not concern us.' I say it does concern them. When there is a lack of employment, when there is a lack of business, it is for the Government to search out the cause and apply the remedy. I give them in a large measure the cause; I give them the remedy. Give us favourable conditions in the West in regard to transportation, in regard to the tariff and in regard to land conditions generally, and we will give you increased cultivation; we will give you increased production; we will give you increased prosperity. But we cannot make bricks without straw. If you tie our hands; if you burden our backs; if we must pay excessive tolls to the railway companies, the steamship companies, the canners' combine, and every kind, shape and form of business interest that can claim the protection of this Government, then you cannot get favourable results. The result will be that you must face the same condition that faced this country during the unfortunate period when the predecessors of the late Government were in office, when the same policy as the one which my hon. friend has vaunted here to-night was the policy of the Government, and when the country wound up in the same condition as that towards which it is rapidly going to-day.

My hon. friend says we cannot change the tariff in an era of hard times. I ask him when should we change the tariff, if not during a period of hard times? Why are times hard? Because—I am speaking now to the Minister of Finance—because people spend more than they have; because they need to get more money and to spend less. Then surely it is obvious, even to a minister of finance, that to give the benefit of wider markets to the great productive interests of the country and to lessen the taxation paid by the whole people would surely be a measurable remedy for the shortage of money. But my hon. friend says no. He says that at this time we cannot do anything; we must wait until, I suppose, times get better. I take my hon. friend at his word; he has declared the policy of his Government, and I desire to register my strongest opposition to him.

I have a clipping here which I wish to place before the House, following up the idea that the burdens which are carried by the western farmer and by the whole of the consumers of this country are unreasonable, that they have tended to bring about the present condition, and that they call for remedy at the hands of the Government. It will be said that the late Government did not apply any remedy. That is true. There were many things that the late Government did not do. If that Government had done everything that ought to have been done, there would be no need for this Parliament. I quote from the Canadian Grocer of Nov. 29, 1912:

> There are many staple lines of groceries that no one except a legitimate retailer can purchase,—

This was in 1912, it will be noted. That was not under the late Government; this is an announcement made while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office.

> —and they must also be bought from legitimate wholesale groceries at prices set by the manufacturer. These include well-known brands of sugar, cereals, syrups, canned goods, soups, etc.

That is to say, the ordinary necessaries of life, articles of food and of the greatest utility, we are buying in an absolutely restricted market and at prices fixed, not by the law of supply and demand, but by the avarice of those who control that market.

My hon. friend says that the tariff would not make any difference. Well, as I have said, he answered that theory himself so well that it would be out of place for me to spend any time upon it. I do not know that the tariff would make all the difference, but I do submit—and it is a well-known fact—that it is the foundation upon which the combines build their arrangements, and the taking away of the tariff would be the first step, and the most necessary step, towards breaking the combines. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) reminds me that I am beating the air in making this argument to the House. I call upon my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who has already proved absolutely, not by words but by acts, the truth of my argument. He did this when he took off half the duty on cement. Why did he do that? Because there was a combine. He then believed that the reduction of the duty would have a beneficial effect in favour of the consumers of cement. And he was right; the place where he was wrong was when he put the duty back.

On the question of the high cost of living and the advice of my hon. friend that we all go out and raise steers, let me give the House some information from a point of view that I have not gathered from the newspaper criticisms of the situation that I have seen. There seems to be a general idea running through the newspaper comments that beef is scarce because prices are high. Now beef is scarce because the price a few years ago was so low. The arrangements as to marketing beef in Canada were such that the price was forced down to the lowest possible margin, and hundreds of people went out of keeping cattle because the keeping of cattle did not pay. The increase in the price of beef will mean an increase in the quantity of beef in due course; and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he will only not shut our beef out of the American market, can depend upon it that the price that we have received because of our access to that market will insure an adequate supply of beef in due course. In 1908 the average price of beef cattle in Winnipeg was $3.53 per 100 pounds. In 1913, the average price was $6.07 per 100 pounds. The price nearly doubled in that time. And to-day the price in Chicago is $7.50 per 100 pounds. Now I need not labour the argument:—that in the case of the farmer as in the case of every other business man it is the profit on the business that enables him to carry it on; that if he does not make a profit he cannot remain in business; and that when the price of his wheat or his cattle is forced down so that he does not make a profit, he cannot pay his debts, he is forced out of business, and production is reduced to a corresponding degree. Give the farmer a profit and the farmer will give you the production. If you are not going to let the farmer have a profit; if you are going to back the railroad companies against him, if you are going to back the canners' combine against him, if you are going to back the bank against him, if you are going to back every interest that comes along against him, you are going to put him out of business and you are going to get the results you have got.

That reminds me: At the last session of Parliament we had a revision of the Bank Act. An amendment was inserted to make provision that banks might lend money on wheat. When the Bill was before the House the proposal that banks should be allowed to lend money on cattle was brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance. It was considered advisable that there should be the same privilege in regard to cattle that was given in regard to wheat. Did my hon. friend make this Chamber ring with his assertions as to the desirability of the farmer going into mixed farming, and everybody going out to raise cattle and hogs, and that every assistance that legislation could give would be given? Not at all. He stood in his place and absolutely refused the request made. He kept out of the Bill the provision that would permit the banks to advance money on cattle on a parallel with the advance upon wheat—another instance of the encouragement that my hon. friend gives to the farmer in the prosecution of his business. He is willing to educate the farmer; he is not willing to let him do business in a business way.

I take issue with my hon. friend on his view with regard to the inadvisability of action being taken by the Government at the present time to remedy existing conditions. I say that if ever action was necessary it is now; I say it is demanded at this session of Parliament and without further delay. If we must wait for the Budget, then the Budget should come down; if there is to be any remedy provided by the Budget that remedy should be applied at once. So far as the crop of the past year is concerned, it is out of the farmers' hands now and the price of wheat, as will be seen, is gradually going up. The Finance Minister and his Government could have put into the pockets of the farmers in the West as a part of the price of that crop—and could have put it in the pockets of the farmers of the West by the stroke of a pen—anywhere from $4,000,000 to $8,000,000. That would have been encouragement. All he had to do was to repeal the duty on wheat; what he half did in regard to cement he could have all done in regard to wheat. The difference in prices between Winnipeg and Minneapolis on the same quality of wheat has run anywhere from three cents to six cents a bushel this year; to-day it stands at about six cents. Had the Finance Minister been minded to give the Western farmer the benefit of free access to the Minneapolis market, he could, I am advised, have done it without waiting for Parliament. He did not have to wait for Parliament in the case of the reduction of the cement duties; he did not need to await Parliament to reduce the duty on wheat. And, if he had done so he knew there would be no doubt about his receiving the sanction of Parliament. To-day the farmers of the western country have from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 less money than they would have had if the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the Ministry had simply put pen to paper. I ask you, would not that have made some difference in the present financial condition of this country? Would the distribution of that $5,000,000 throughout the prairie West not have saved many a farmer from bankruptcy; would it not have kept many a man in this poor year out of the hands of the sheriff? I say it would. I say it would have helped to keep open the factories of Ontario; it would have helped collections by the banks and commercial houses, and it would have helped every interest in this whole Dominion. But the Minister of Finance has a policy; it is the National Policy, he says, of 1878. He is for high tariff and he won't admit that a change of tariff will make any difference in the cost of living, and I suppose he will not admit that any change in the tariff can make any difference in the price of wheat. His Government will have to stand on that and they will be judged by it. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) told him what had happened in the case of oats, and that because the United States reduced the duty on oats to six cents a bushel we have been able to send many millions of bushels of oats to that country. That saved the situation in regard to oats. We were selling oats at from 16 to 18 cents a bushel. That did not pay the cost of production. The Minister of Finance was raised on a farm and he knows it did not. It was the reduction in the United States duty which enabled us to ship some of our surplus oats to the United States that saved the situation so far as oats is concerned, and even on what we did ship we had to pay the six cents a bushel, because it was not the United States consumer who paid it, it was the Canadian producer who paid. And yet the Minister of Finance says this is not the time for us to make changes in the tariff, when the prairie farmer will be able to buy his fruit at a price less the amount of the duty; this is not the time to make changes in the tariff or accept the provisions of the reciprocity arrangement and enable the Canadian apple grower to sell in cities of hundreds of thousands, where he is now restricted to cities of tens of thousands? Surely, if ever there was a time to call for energetic action on the part of any government; if ever there was a time that called for action that would reduce the burden upon the people of this country, that time is now. The occasion calls for the Government; it is for them to respond or not. They have had their opportunity; they have declared their policy; there is nothing in sight for this country; the Government is in the hands of the men who put them there to do their bidding and the country may save itself so far as they care.

I do not know that I would be justified in closing without making a reference to a subject that has been mentioned by all of the speakers on the Address up to the present time, namely, the naval question. I do not speak of the naval policy of the Government, because, however they may have a tariff policy, aparently they have no naval policy. I will not delay the House at any great length on this point, but I will say this: the right hon. the Prime Minister, and his colleagues who have spoken, and his supporters, and his press in the country, have been vociferously claiming that their naval policy was actuated by and founded on the principle of Imperial loyalty; the idea of strengthening this great empire which stands for liberty throughout the world. It is strange, it is pasing strange, that conditions have so changed in such a short time that that which only a year ago called for a definite policy and for a vast expenditure, and called so loudly and insistently that it was necessary to deprive this House of its traditional and necessary privileges; it is strange that the same Government comes to this House now and has not a word to say in regard to the policy of naval defence. May I say that, in my humble judgment, if they are to claim credit for a sound imperialism, if they are to claim credit for a patriotic Canadianism, they will have to make some declaration before this session closes in regard to a permanent naval policy; a permanent policy of Canadian naval defence, having regard to Canada's position and Canada's imperial obligations.

These gentlemen have made high claims for themselves. They have gone out of their way to heap discredit upon the position and views of their opponents. They have raked the dictionary for words to express the depth of their loyalty and the urgency with which they were prepared to rush to the rescue of the empire. To-day their desire to rush to the empire's rescue has degenerated into a quarrel with the Upper House of this Parliament; and while a year ago they were declaiming about the sacrifices they were prepared to make in the interests of the empire, to-day they are satisfied with making threats against the Upper Chamber. I need not say that such action on their part is not only improper, it is unparliamentary, and may I suggest that it is even unconstitutional. I submit that it is unheard of, that the motives of the Upper Chamber of this Parliament should be called in question in this House. By what right does the Premier of Canada say that the Upper Chamber, a body co-ordinate with this House, does not act on its own motion and for its own good reasons. I say that such a statement as the Premier made here is improper and to my mind unparliamentary and should not have been made under those conditions. The Senate of Canada has a certain responsibility given it by the Imperial Parliament. Because it has seen fit to discharge this responsibility according to the judgment of a majority of its members it is to be called in question in this House, to be threatened as it was threatened by the Prime Minister. That is not parliamentary government in its proper sense. Everybody knows that a threat made against the Senate is an absurdity. There are no means whereby that threat can be carried out, even with the high authority of the leader of this Government. Our constitution comes from the Imperial Parliament and it is only there that our constitution can be revised. If there is to be a question before the Canadian people as to the right or wrong of the Senate, then I say it is for the Government, if they have a policy that they believe in, and that the Senate does not believe in, to get their views before the country by bringing forward that policy just as often as they have an opportunity. If they had believed that they were right and that the Senate was wrong they would have done it and they would have had their Highways Bill, their Branch Lines

Bill and the Naval Bill before the House at this session. But they knew they were wrong and that the Senate was right, and they did not dare to come before the court of public opinion again with that legislation. They preferred to keep in the background, to send out threats and insinuations, depending upon taking the country by surprise, upon misrepresentation and lack of understanding on the part of the people at the next general election. If these measures are right let them be brought forward and threshed out before the people of the country. We on this side of the House are prepared to stand behind the position that we took and I am satisfied that the Senate will again take what action its judgment may commend to it, when the occasion arises. But aside from the quarrel between the Senate and the Government, I say the Government cannot evade the responsibility that properly rests upon them to provide for the naval defence of Canada as a part of the British Empire. The combination between Nationalists and Imperialists which was to be carried through under cover of an emergency policy has now no excuse, and if those who claim Imperial loyalty are loyal, now is the time to show it by bringing before Parliament proposals for a permanent naval policy. The fact that the Government have not done so is evidence that they dare not and shows that the claims they made of loyalty to the empire are empty and were made under false pretenses. They have the opportunity and they are not able to make good. They have been in power for two years. They have tried to pass the question over by an emergency policy. They were not able to do it. They are not now bringing forward a permanent policy. Let their present position be contrasted with the position they held at the last session when they came to Parliament with great declarations of imperial loyalty and with great propositions for the salvation of the empire. To-day they dare not even say they have a policy that will have any effect either for the safety of Canada or for the empire. I can only repeat what I said in the beginning that never was a Parliament of Canada met by a Government with such a lack of policy and such a lack of proposals as upon this occasion. As at the last session they hoped to defend themselves by a policy of silence, so now they hope to protect themselves by having no policy at all. But I say that in this country of 7,000,000 people, of 3,000 miles in distance, a country with problems that are growing from day to day and demanding solution, I say that in this country they cannot satisfy public opinion by a policy of seeing nothing, knowing nothing or doing nothing.

[Mr. Oliver].

Mr. MARSHALL: I was not in when the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was referring to canned goods, but I understand that he stated that canned goods have increased in price 70 per cent in the last five years.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what I understood.

Mr. MARSHALL: You are entirely wrong. Canned goods are cheaper to-day than they have been for five years. Tomatoes are 30 per cent. cheaper than they were a year ago, peas about 25 per cent cheaper, and corn about 10 per cent cheaper.

On motion of Mr. Edwards the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, January 21, 1914.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SINCLAIR moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Shipping Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to enable captains holding coasting licenses to sail as far south as the mouth of the river Plate. In former times captains holding coasting licenses were allowed to sail to any part of North or South America and around the Horn if they chose to do so. A few years ago the distance which they could go south was restricted to Cape Hatteras, but since then the distance has been extended to somewhere about the mouth of the Amazon. There are a large number of ships commanded by coasting captains who have business in South America, in such places as Rio and the river Plate and I see no reason why captains holding these licenses should not be allowed to sail to those ports. The object of this Bill is to define the places to which coasting captains can sail and to enable them to go further south than at present.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEATH OF LORD STRATHCONA.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is fitting, and I am sure that in this all the members on both sides of the House will agree, that we should pay a tribute of respect to the memory of the grand Canadian who passed away yesterday. I speak of Lord Strathcona as a Canadian because, although born in the old land beyond the seas, his life work was almost altogether carried on in this country to the service of which he consecrated so many years of his life. He had a notable career, a career carried on especially in the early part of his life in the face of conditions and difficulties more arduous than those which most men are called upon to meet. When one looks back upon the great span of years over which his lifetime stretched, one is tempted for a moment to recall all that has transpired in His Majesty's dominions on this continent since Lord Strathcona first came to this country at the age of 18. At that time there was much political unrest in Canada carried in some parts of the country even to the extent of rebellion. At that time we had not achieved the right of self-government, or enjoyed many of those constitutional liberties which have since been developed and have come into force from time to time Nearly half the period of his allotted life was passed before this Confederation was formed and after his first arrival in Canada in 1838, he saw in the succeeding years what one might call without exaggeration the complete transformation of the northern half of this continent. He had been a notable figure in the public life of Canada for more than a quarter of a century before he undertook, at the age of seventy-six, to discharge the duties of the great office of High Commissioner for Canada. My right hon. friend knows perhaps better than I do the devotion which Lord Strathcona gave to those duties. I have known many men who were imbued with a high sense of duty, but I do not know of any man among all of those of my acquaintance or knowledge who was more profoundly inspired by a sense of public duty than was Lord Strathcona. As the weight of increasing years bore upon him, it was almost pathetic sometimes to see the devotion with which he insisted upon performing even the minor duties of his office. In all the time that I had known him, and that was during the later years of his life, I was especially struck by the fact that time did not seem in any way to have dimmed the freshness of his spirit, the vigor of his will or the strength of his purpose. The duties of the office which he discharged as High Commissioner for Canada were always important and sometimes delicate; and it is satisfactory to us to remember that no man more than he had a high pride in this country, in all that it has achieved and in all that it may look forward to achieve in the future and no man more than he had a deep and abiding interest in all that concerned the honour, the dignity and the interests of Canada or was more concerned to discharge fully his duty in that regard.

I need not recall to the memory of the members of this House the notable events of his great career. Through many difficult conditions he advanced with indomitable will and unshaken strength of purpose to great things, and for many years he has been truly a great Imperial figure.

I believe that the example of his life may well be an inspiration to all Canadians and indeed to all the citizens of the Empire. Some one said many years ago that Thomas Carlyle spent his life in preaching earnestness to the most earnest people in the world. Some lessons in earnestness, perhaps, might not be thrown away even upon the people of the British Dominions; and I am sure that the earnestness of purpose which is set forth in all the record and career of Lord Strathcona may well serve as an inspiration and an exemplar to us in Canada. It is not for me to-day to speak at length of his great public service. In the office which he filled he discharged very important duties indeed and performed services of the highest character to this country and the Empire. Besides that his many benefactions for great charitable purposes are known to all men so that I need do no more than allude to them to-day. I consider that it would be a fitting tribute of respect to his memory that this House should stand adjourned until to-morrow and I shall move, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that the House do so stand adjourned; but before doing so I should like to read to the House a message which has been received by His Royal Highness the Governor General from the Secretary of States for the Colonies. It is in these words:

London, 21st January, 1914.

I desire on the part of His Majesty's Government to convey through Your Royal Highness to the Government and people of Canada an expression of deep sympathy in the loss which the Dominion has sustained by the death of Lord Strathcona, High Commissioner for Canada in London for the past seventeen years, a sympathy shared by his many friends in the United Kingdom and throughout the Empire.

His name has been for many years a household word among us embodying to all the thought of Canada and her marvellous progress, as well as of his own notable career distinguished by large public usefulness and magnificent liberality, and his memory is assured of an honoured and abiding place in the annals of the Dominion, to which he devoted his faithful service to the end.

(Sd.) Harcourt.

In conclusion, I am sure that I may, on behalf of Canada, of all the members of this House and of all the people of this country, convey to his daughter and to all the members of his family, the assurance of our deepest sympathy and of our sorrow for their loss.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in whatever might have been proposed or suggested by the Government to do honour to the memory of the illustrious dead whose loss we deplore, we on this side of the House would have heartily and willingly agreed, believing that whatever might be done would hardly express the deep sense of regret which now prevails from one end to the other of this land. Since Sir John Macdonald's time I do not know that there has been any Canadian who, on departing this life, left behind him such a trail of sorrow as Lord Strathcona. He is mourned by His Majesty the King, whose personal friend he was; by the peers of the realm, in whose illustrious House he had found an honoured place; by the authorities of commerce and of finance in the commercial and financial metropolis of the world, who had found in him an equal; by the poor of London, to whom on repeated occasions he was the incarnation of benevolent Providence; by the people of Scotland, the land of his birth, with whom he never completely severed his connection, and in Canada, the land of his adoption, by all classes of the community, rich or poor, high or low, of whatever creed or race it might be. This universal sense of sorrow is a tribute bestowed only upon men of strong personality, and to this class he undoubtedly belonged. Perhaps the secret of this regret, so universal and so deep, may be found in the fact that wherever he passed, amongst those with whom he came in contact, whether it was the Indians of the forest or the prairie, or the most eminent political or commercial men in Canada, or in the highest sphere in London, he everywhere created a deep, a lasting, and a profound impression.

He came to Canada when he was only eighteen years of age, more than seventy-five years ago. At that time all his possessions were the sound, practical education of a Scottish country lad and more than a full share of the characteristic qualities of his race: keen business acumen, courage, caution and firmness—firmness never loud and assertive, but always unflinching, the whole constituting a strong nature, adamant against all reverses, and never spoilt even by the most phenomenal success.

He came in the service of the Hudson Bay Company as a simple junior clerk, and from that humble station he rose step by step until he became, after the death of Sir George Simpson in 1860, at first in fact and afterwards both in fact and in name the Governor of that historic company, a position which he held to the last day of his life. Here, perhaps, it may not be unfitting to remark that since the amalgamation of the Hudson Bay Company with the Northwest Company in 1821, almost one hundred years ago, that powerful institution has been ruled by two men, and two men only: Sir George Simpson and Lord Strathcona.

When the territories of the Northwest and Rupert's Land were acquired by Canada, Donald Smith, as he was then, had acquired over these then distant territories a paramount influence; an influence of which we in these later days have little conception, and which was invaluable to Canada. It may perhaps be truly said that without that influence the transfer of those lands to Canada, which was not accomplished without bloodshed, would have been even more tragic than it was. His services in this connection never, it seems to me, have been properly appreciated, and certainly they never can be too highly extolled. The policy of the Hudson Bay Company had been to keep these distant lands solely as a vast hunting ground; but the keen business instinct of Lord Strathcona showed him that no force could resist the tide of advancing civilization, and, with characteristic promptness, he at once took steps to make the necessary change. The steps which he took were then eminently valuable to Canada.

He realized that the first need was communication between the East and the West. At that time railway communication had advanced westward only to the Mississippi river, and he organized, as we remember, a powerful syndicate to give communication by rail from the Mississippi river at St. Paul to the Red river, and from that point by water up to the junction of the Red river with the Assiniboine, at a point which has since become famous as the city of Winnipeg. But this was only a preliminary step; he bent his whole mind and gave his whole soul to the project of having the Eastern provinces connected by rail altogether on Canadian soil with the provinces of the West, and hence arose the project of the Canadian Pacific railway. It is a matter of history that in the construction of that railway he took a most prominent part; but it is not perhaps as well known as it ought to be that before the Canadian Pacific railway became an accomplished fact it was often perilously near collapse, and it was due to the splendid courage of Lord Strathcona and his associates, who more than once risked their all, that at last the Canadian Pacific railway came into being.

We are proud to remember that he was at one time a member of this House, and those who, like myself and yourself, Mr. Speaker, had the privilege of being his colleagues, can testify that his sound judgment, his moderate views, his dignified conduct, always commanded the respect of both sides of this House.

It is due to the Government of Sir Charles Tupper to say that it is to that Government we owe the appointment of Lord Strathcona as High Commissioner at London, and no wiser selection could have been made or ever was made for a high office. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government has given some inkling of Lord Strathcona's intense devotion to duty in that capacity, and, as the right hon. gentleman has said, perhaps I am in a better position than he to know the particulars in that regard. Lord Strathcona's devotion to duty, his courtesy in all matters of business as well as in social matters, his generous hospitality, and above all his ever-watchful eagerness to put Canada to the front in all matters whether important or unimportant, made him certainly an ideal High Commissioner. The manner in which he discharged his duties was a constant source of pride to his compatriots.

Every one knows that his private life was on a par with his public life: he was a model husband, a good father, and a true friend. It was his privilege to attain a very great age, and perhaps it was still a greater privilege to him to realize, if he cared indeed to realize it, that as he advanced in years he grew more and more in the respect, the admiration, and the affection of his countrymen. His, on the whole, was a fortunate life, and it must be told that whatever he acquired of wealth, of reputation, of fame, and of public esteem, he fairly won and thoroughly deserved. It is my privilege, Sir, to second the motion of my right hon. friend.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.35 p.m.

Thursday, January 22, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the table his recommendation and the Clerk's report in the matter of the appointment of Mr. Francis H. Gisborne to the position of Parliamentary Counsel; of the promotion of Mr. A. G. Troop, Clerk of the Law Branch of the House, from Grade B of the Second Division to Grade B of the First Division; of the appointment of Mr. John Lockhart Godwin to the Assistant Clerkship in the Votes and Proceedings Office, with the grade of B in the Second Division, at an increase of salary provided by the Civil Service Amendment Act; of the appointment of Mr. Joseph Smith as the Chief of Stenographers for Members, to be graded A of the Second Division under the said Act.

COLLISIONS AND SALVAGE AT SEA.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the law relating to Merchant Shipping. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to amend the law in respect to collisions and salvage at sea so as to enable the Government of Canada to give effect to their adherence to the International Maritime Convention on these subjects held at Brussels on September 23, 1910.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Has this reference to the convention recently held in London?

Mr. HAZEN: No; this has reference to the convention which took place at Brussels in 1910.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a complaint which I have received from Toronto, and to several other complaints on the same matter, which I have received from members of the Montreal Board of Trade. These complaints have reference to the Atlantic Mail Service. I shall read two paragraphs from one of these letters so that the minister may give his explanation:

Dear Mr. Lemieux:

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst the business community here, and I have no doubt elsewhere in Canada, over the English mail service which is now being furnished. As I understand it, we are so excessively patriotic that we will not let our letters go by New York, although in that way they would reach their destination several days sooner than by the Canadian service. I can speak from personal experience in saying that this has caused serious business inconvenience to my firm on many occasions, and I am sure you would have no difficulty in getting many expressions of a similar nature.

As a concrete example, after the English mail closed here last week at six o'clock on Tuesday morning, there was no mail until Thursday night at six o'clock when it closed for Saturday's sailing of the Tunisian.

I wish further to ask the Postmaster General if the arrangement still prevails that if one routes his letter 'via New York,' that letter will be sent by the New York route and not by the Canadian route?

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): There has been some dissatisfaction with the Atlantic mail service, due principally to the fact that we have been disappointed by the two new and splendid ships of the Allan Line, the Alsatian and the Calgarian, not coming into service at the date we expected when the contract was entered into. On account of strikes, and for other reasons, as I am informed, these steamers, which should have gone into the service in July or August, are not yet in commission. I am, however, pleased to say that the Alsatian will begin her Atlantic service from Halifax this week. The arrangement is only for a year, and if any other similar arrangement is entered upon, the Government will see that the ships are such as to render first class Atlantic mail service to the people of Canada. The rule is in force that all Canadians who wish to have their mail sent via New York have the privilege of doing so if they so direct their mail matter.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, resumed from Tuesday, January 20.

Mr. CLARENCE JAMESON (Digby, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, it must have been something of a surprise to this House a day or two ago when the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) criticised the Government because of its large expenditures. It is not so very long ago that the hon. junior member for Halifax used to applaud large expenditures upon the part of the Government. He used to defend expenditures made by the Government. In this House and outside of it, he used to support expenditures made by the Government whether they were great or small, whether they were wise or otherwise, whether they were good, bad or indifferent. But there seems to have been a change since the old days. To be sure, in those times, the hon. gentleman had a seat upon this side of the House. He was supporting the Liberal Administration. Can it be that, having crossed over to the other side of the House, and having followed his party into opposition, he has so materially changed his view-point? If there ever was an occasion when the junior member for Halifax should have come into this House with gratitude in his heart towards the Government, it is upon the present occasion, for the constituency which he represents is now, for the first time, receiving justice and ample justice at the hands of the federal Government.

Throughout the length and breadth of the land other great works are being undertaken by this Government in their comprehensive scheme for the development of Canada east and west; and the hon. junior member for Halifax, who by the way did not object to the expenditures for the splendid terminals and docks in his own constituency when they were being discussed last year, should not lose sight of the fact that throughout Canada other places like Halifax were long neglected by the Liberal Government, and that they are entitled to consideration which they are now receiving from this Government. I think that the hon. junior member for Halifax, when he has more fully considered the matter, will conclude that it would be only fair and just for him to congratulate the Government upon its expenditures rather than to condemn it.

From passing references which were made by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the recent by-election in South Bruce, we may conclude that the Liberal party was rejoiced at being able to carry one seat out of the seven by-elections which were held during the late recess. But there is something which this House might well remember and which the country should remember as well. That is, that in three constituencies in which by-elections were held recently, the Liberal party was unable to place a candidate in the field. It should also be remembered that Chateauguay, which since Confederation has always been in the Liberal column, has recently returned to this House a Government supporter whom we on this side of the House very cordially welcome. The Liberal party should also bear in mind that South Bruce—of their winning of which they are so proud—in the local elections of 1911 gave to the Liberal candidate a majority of 398. That election was held two months after the general Dominion election in September, 1911, and at a time when Sir James Whitney, Premier of Ontario, was at the very height of his power.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) set himself the task of commiserating certain members of this Administration who vainly expounded the policies of the Government in South Bruce. If they were chagrined at the result of their mission, no person is better able to sympathize with them than the hon. gentleman's leader, for he has suffered from bitter experiences in the past. It is not so long since his tour of the Maritime provinces in 1911, but that we may recall the result. He came attended by that gifted orator, who was, Sir, your predecessor in the last Parliament; by his Minister of Finance, as purse-bearer; by his Minister of Public Works, who with lavish hand dealt out breakwaters, public buildings and docks, and by his Minister of War, whose pockets bulged with epaulets, stripes and medals, as rewards to those who, against conviction, might still be induced to remain steadfast in the faith. Never did a political warrior come better equipped to re-establish his power in the Maritime provinces, 26 of the 35 seats of which were then held by his supporters.

He spoke in a large number of places, and in several of them great meetings were held. Digby was one of such. All that special trains, free tickets, bands, processions, bunting and American tourists with their flags, their mottoes and their cash could do to make the event of immediate and lasting benefit to the Liberal cause, was done. Even free food, on which the right hon. gentleman is now very strong, was to be had.

In the ridings of Westmorland, St. John, Digby, Annapolis, Kings, Hants, Halifax, Colchester, Cumberland, Pictou and Queens, Prince Edward Island, the people gathered to listen for the last time to the right hon. gentleman in his capacity of Prime Minister of Canada. With what result? In Westmorland, the majority of his Minister of Railways was reduced from 1,395 to 64; in St. John, that of his Minister of Public Works from 496 to 65. In Digby, my own majority of 131 became 260. In Annapolis and Hants, seasoned Liberal veterans were defeated. In Kings, his Minister of Militia went down before the lance of his young opponent. From Halifax, we welcome the Prime Minister. In Cumberland, the Liberal candidate was overwhelmed. In Colchester, the Conservative majority was three times doubled. In Pictou, the Liberal majority was reduced.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much?

Mr. JAMESON: Some reduction.

Mr. MACDONALD: The great amount of ten.

Mr. JAMESON: While Queens, Prince Edward Island, which had formerly elected two Liberals, sent two Conservatives in their stead. To sum up, the right hon. gentleman's majority in those provinces declined from 16 to 3. In every constituency in which he spoke, except three, his candidates were defeated, and the extent of the disaster was only limited by the field of his operations. If any political leader might well sympathize with another in like case should he meet him, it would be the right hon. gentleman.

The country has heard much of late from the right hon. gentleman and his followers in regard to the high cost of living in Canada. We all deplore it, but no one should do so more than the right hon. gentleman himself, for the high cost of living in this country, while due in part to world-wide conditions, is largely due to the policy pursued by the right hon. gentleman during his term of office. To an immigration policy which brought into this country many consumers and relatively few producers; to an agricultural policy which studiously avoided all problems, but more particularly the problem of increased consumption and decreased production, and to the disastrous effect of bad roads upon the rural life of the Dominion, with which he made no attempt whatever to grapple.

To lessen the cost of living, is it not necessary to popularize life in rural communities and to increase production? Is the right hon. gentleman sincere when he deplores the high cost of the dinner table? If so, why did he use his artificial power in the Senate to twice defeat the Highways Bill, which was the first step, and a long one, towards reducing that cost?

This is the record, but it is not all. In 1910 the right hon. gentleman's Minister of Labour, with all the enthusiasm of youth, laid on the table of this House a report which showed that the cost of living in Canada had steadily increased from 1897 to 1910. Does the right hon. gentleman forget this, or does he merely think that the people have forgotten it, when he berates this Government for conditions which his own policies did so much to create, and did absolutely nothing to redress.

During the right hon. gentleman's term of office the cost of living in Canada increased 35 per cent, and because of conditions created by the policies which he had pursued, and which could not be immediately arrested, it has since increased 7 per cent. The right hon. gentleman ignored the 35 per cent increase which was heaped up during his term of office, but he has been making the country ring with that 7 per cent increase.

It is related of a captain whose ship had been cast away and was sinking, owing to an error of judgment on his part, that seeing the members of the crew lashing themselves to spars and floats, he tied himself to an anchor. The right hon. gentleman's party recently experienced shipwreck owing to an error of judgment, and now we find him tying himself to an anchor—the anchor of the high cost of living.

The right hon. gentleman has recently declared a free trade food policy. Is it not rather surprising to find the right hon. gentleman reverting to the practice of former Liberal leaders in opposition: the practice of coquetting with the Nemesis of his party in the form of a trade policy? What misfortune has it not brought to the Liberal cause? Look at the political history of this country. 1878, defeat; 1882, defeat; 1887, defeat; 1891, defeat; 1911, defeat—and on each occasion a Liberal trade policy! What a record of defeat, disaster and disappointment! And yet we find the right hon. gentleman applying the same old Liberal remedy to his hurts; the remedy of a hair of the dog that bit him—a trade policy once more. What a record that policy has had, to be sure: always good to raise a cheer, it never could produce a majority.

But the right hon. gentleman appears to have ignored certain facts which the people of this country cannot afford to allow him to forget: first, that during fifteen years of office he boasted of a prosperity that was the direct outcome of a protective tariff policy, the National policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. And, second, that the great and constant warfare which is being waged between the nations of the world to-day is the struggle for commercial supremacy. The generals are the statesmen of the respective countries; the weapons with which they fight are the tariffs, while the rank and file of the army consists of the princes of agriculture, the captains of industry, and their employes. 'Disarm your men, throw away your weapons, expose yourselves to your adversaries,' says the right hon. gentleman, 'and we, the great Liberal party, the party which always goes out of office and stays out on its trade policies, will defend you.' Sir, do you think that the farmers of Canada would subscribe to that doctrine? I do not believe they would.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) visited the province of Nova Scotia recently on a political mission. It has been said of the hon. member for Red Deer that he has buffaloed the trade policy of the Liberal party. I do not know whether that is the case or not.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Would my hon. friend tell me again what the verb is?

Mr. JAMESON: Well, it means something in the nature of a stampede. The hon. gentleman made a self-conducted tour through the province, and he spoke in a number of places. The burden of his lay was that he had had some steers which had gone into the United States under the new Wilson tariff and for which he had received one dollar per hundred pounds more in the United States market than he would have received in Canada. And now we find the hon. gentleman's leader seriously suggesting the removal of the tariff, with the view of meeting the problem of the high cost of living, so that our Canadian consumers can purchase in the United States market, in which the prices according to the evidence of the hon. member for Red Deer, are higher than in the Canadian market. It would appear that the great Liberal party, which has so many heads, and consequently so many minds, is becoming quite distracted.

The hon. member for Red Deer, during the course of his speech the other day made an interesting remark regarding the removal of the tariff on wheat. He said:

> Have the farmers not the right to speak for their own industry? I contend it is the right of the wheat growers to be the judges in this matter.

I presume the hon. gentleman means in the matter of the removal of the tariff on wheat. I would like to ask, if it is a fair question, whether the hon. member would take the same view with regard to the stock-raisers, whether he would say that they also should have the right to speak for their industry and to say whether or not the tariff should be taken off. The hon. gentleman does not reply.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I must not be understood as not wishing to reply; I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend. My meaning was that the farmers ought to be the judges as to how prices would be affected by the removal of the tariff. If I did not make that clear I wish to make it clear now.

Mr. JAMESON: I am glad that the hon. gentleman has made the statement clear, it was not quite clear to me as it stood; it is perfectly clear now.

There must be some better remedy, some better method of dealing with the high cost of living than that proposed by the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition, namely, the purchasing of our commodities in a higher market.

During the last ten years the Canadian urban population has increased 60 per cent and the rural population 17 per cent, although in the Maritime Provinces the rural population has actually decreased. This means, of course, that the consumption of farm products has tremendously increased and the production has not been increasing correspondingly, with the result that the cost of the dinner table has gone up.

This Government, when they came into office, recognized that to have cheaper food the production of farm products must be increased, and they set about popularizing rural life and so starting a movement of the people back to the land. Towards that purpose they have bent their energies, and I think I may fairly and frankly say that during the two years which they have been in office they have done more in that way than was accomplished during the whole fifteen years of their predecessors.

The measures which they have taken were, first, a good roads policy. This is something for which the country has been hoping and asking for many years, something the value of which cannot be overestimated. Good roads would increase the value of farm lands, bring his market closer to the producer, lessen the cost of carriage of products to market, and so lessen the cost to the consumer.

Secondly, the Government provided for a grant of $10,000,000 for instruction in agriculture, to enable those desiring to become farmers to obtain that knowledge of the science of farming which is now regarded as essential to the successful prosecution of the industry; to help those who wish to go back to the land to fit themselves for their great undertakings and enable them to get the greatest return for their labour.

Thirdly, they instituted the parcel post system which will establish communication between the country merchant and the farmer, between the producer and the consumer, thereby saving both time and expense.

Fourthly, the extension of the rural mail delivery which has been energetically proceeded with all through the country.

Tariffs may or may not affect the cost of the dinner table, but there is no doubt that by increasing production the cost of living will be decreased and by the popularizing of life in the rural communities these desirable results will be attained.

It is to be regretted that owing to the partisan action of the Senate the Highways Bill has been destroyed. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in office for fifteen years during which time they might, had they so desired, have introduced legislation to this end. They could have framed it to suit themselves, they could have moulded it as they chose, but when it was introduced by this Government they took the only possible way of preventing the country from getting the benefit of this splendid piece of legislation.

Surprise has been expressed by some hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not know whether or not it was simulated surprise, that the Prime Minister does not intend to reintroduce the Naval Aid Bill of last session. The hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), in referring to this, spoke of 'cowardice on the part of the Government,' as he termed it. There is no cowardice on the part of the Government, neither do I think there is anything in connection with this matter regarding which hon. gentlemen opposite should be surprised.

After weeks of debate, discussion and obstruction last session; after this Parliament had been compelled to amend the rules of debate; after the Government had been obliged to apply closure, the Naval Aid Bill passed in this House and went up to the Senate. There, at the dictation of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, it was destroyed, destroyed by men whom he had placed in the Senate.

What is the condition of affairs to-day? We have the same hon. gentlemen opposite, we have the same right hon. leader of the Opposition—I do not believe he has experienced a change of heart—and we have practically the same Senate. Why should the Prime Minister invite further humiliation for Canada in the eyes of the world by a repetition in the Senate of what occurred last year?

Mr. Speaker, the issue is clear before the people of this country. We have, on the one hand, an Opposition navy of the type of those two great bulwarks of Canadian autonomy, the Niobe and the Rainbow, and we have, on the other hand, the Government proposal of a Canadian division of the Imperial navy. We know what the naval policy of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition means. It means, as he has very clearly explained in the past, the severing the ripe fruit from the parent tree, in other words the taking of Canada out of the British Empire, the beginning of the disintegration of the British Empire. Canada, he says, is a nation, and no one I know of disputes this fact, although lately he has been finding fault with some of those who agree with him on that point. But it should not be forgotten that not long ago the right hon. gentleman was busily engaged, with President Taft, in endeavouring to make Canada an adjunct. Canada is a nation but for my part—and I think that in this I may speak generally for the people of Canada—I do not desire to be simply a citizen of a minor nation when I am today and may honourably continue to be a citizen of the greatest Empire that the world has ever seen. And because I believe in the maintenance of that empire, because it can only be maintained by an efficient navy, because I believe that the maximum of efficiency at the minimum of cost can, for the immediate future be provided by the proposals of the Prime Minister, I shall continue to support those proposals.

Since he came into office two years ago the Prime Minister has been attacked by the Liberal press and Liberal speakers probably more bitterly and more persistently than any other man who ever occupied the same office. But my right hon leader has been selected by the people of this country to perform great and important duties. Even as Sir John A. Macdonald was chosen by the people of Canada to initiate the National Policy and to develop our manufactures, so the Prime Minister of to-day has his mandate from the Canadian people. The mandate to protect and to encourage our agricultural, fishing and other great industries, to equip and develop our national ports, to preserve for Canada and Canadians the benefit of our growing transportation, and to maintain, so far as Canada is concerned, the integrity of the British Empire and secure for Canada in the councils of the empire that voice to which her importance now entitles this Dominion.

And right well has the Prime Minister entered upon these great and important duties. But though he has entered upon them ably and prosecuted them with energy, they cannot in the very nature of things be brought to fruition in two years or in four. And the people of Canada who have entrusted the Prime Minister with the carrying out of these splendid policies have confidence in his integrity, his judgment and his ability. They will not be turned aside by the carping criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite—which they know to be inspired by burning jealousy and remorse at loss of office. But on the contrary they will accord to the Prime Minister, by legitimate and constitutional means, whatever time may be reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of his great and important purposes.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): As, owing to the regrettable illness of my colleague from Prince (Mr. Richards), I happen to be the only member from Prince Edward Island on this side of the House at the present time, and inasmuch as I have some views on the subjects that are now before the House, I take this opportunity of expressing my opinions thereon before the debate closes. I listened the other evening with a great deal of attention to the speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister and I gathered from that speech that the right hon. gentleman does not approve of the Senate as at present constituted and that he certainly does not approve of the action of the Senate in regard to the Naval Aid Bill of last year. My impression is that the right hon. gentleman with the very valuable assistance of Winston Churchill, Windermere and the Montreal Star, not being able to bring on a war with Germany, would not be opposed to having a scrap with the Senate, but my right hon. friend might find these gentlemen fairly formidable opponents if pressed into active service. The speech of the right hon. the leader of the Government more than justified the action of the Senate last year in regard to the Naval Aid Bill. He stated that at the present time arrangements of an international character are being considered as a result of which there might be a retardation or cessation of the mad armament building which the nations of Europe have been carrying on for the last few years. Under these circumstances the Government of this country, he says, is going to wait and see the result of these arrangements before doing anything further in regard to supplying the dreadnoughts that were to be constructed under the Naval Aid Bill of last year! Could there be a better justification of the attitude of the Liberal party on this question, could there be a better justification of the action of the Senate in asking the Prime Minister to consult the people of Canada before embarking upon that course? The Prime Minister has stated in effect that those ships may never be needed and that our action or interference might be an embarrassment to the mother country in her negotiations with other countries. The Prime Minister on September 21, 1912, speaking at the Windsor hotel, stated that he would ask Parliament for a contribution and that if Parliament did not grant that contribution he would appeal to the country. He repeated that statement on December 5, when introducing the Naval Aid Bill in this Chamber. All the Senate did was to take the Prime Minister at his word and to say that in their estimation also, an appeal to the people was the proper course to pursue, and further that inasmuch as the Bill was a departure from the policy laid down by both parties and unanimously agreed to by Parliament a year or two before, they considered that the people of Canada had a right to be consulted before the Bill became law. The Prime Minister did not carry out his promise in that respect, and appeal to the people.

With regard to the permanent policy, he has stated that that policy will be evolved later and the people consulted upon it at the next general election, and he has stated that he will keep this promise whatever happens. He laid emphasis upon that. He stated that the Liberal party and the Senate were willing to embark upon a permanent policy without consulting the people of Canada and he considered that a remarkable and unjustifiable thing. Surely the right hon. gentleman will remember that he gave his consent to a policy of that kind in 1909 and 1910. He says now that it was remarkable and unjustifiable. It is more than that. When the resolution introduced by the then leader of the Government looking to the establishment of a naval organization in Canada was submitted to this House, the then leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, thought that no time should be lost in embarking upon that policy and suggested that the word 'immediate'—

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: 'Speedy'—

Mr. HUGHES: No, he suggested that the word 'immediate' should be put before the word 'organization' and they compromised upon the word 'speedy'; now he says there is no need of the word 'immediate', that there is no need of being in any hurry. He says that it is not the part of a gentleman to hurry anyhow, but that before the next general election will be time enough to formulate a policy. The next general election may take place next year; it may take place next summer, or the summer following in 1915, or possibly in the summer of 1916 and that will be quite time enough. There is no emergency now, there is no thunder and lightning, there is no need of haste. The Nationalists of Quebec have to be consulted and Mr. Bourassa has to be consulted before any kind of a naval policy is adopted by the Conservative party.

What is the history of the naval question? We all know that the first time that it really took concrete form was when the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), in the ablest speech that has ever been delivered upon this question, in the session of 1909, introduced a resolution. The then leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed with the proposition of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Borden) stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke for the Conservative party and both parties then agreed to a resolution which was finally submitted and unanimously passed by this House.

I think that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was the only member who did not support the policy that was then adopted. Shortly after that certain parties in the province of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Lavergne, Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Nantel, Mr. Blondin and a number of other gentlemen thought that they could make political capital out of that question against the leader of the Liberal party and against the party itself. An election was held in Drummond and Arthabaska. The Conservatives put up no candidate, the Nationalists had a candidate and the Liberals had a candidate and quietly the Conservatives gave their support to the Nationalist candidate. When the Montreal Herald telegraphed the Minister of Trade and Commerce and asked him how Conservatives should vote in this contest, the reply was: Beat Laurier by any means. What course would honourable and patriotic gentlemen pursue in a case of that kind? When they had assisted the Liberal party in passing that resolution through this House and when they saw that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was unfairly attacked and misrepresented in Quebec, was it not their duty to stand by the policy that they had assisted in passing through the House? Would that not be the duty of honourable and patriotic men? But they threw their principles to one side for the purpose of trying to make political capital on that occasion. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said that this is a Government of dissolving views. It is worse than that; it is a Government of dissolving principles. That election was held, the result was that the Nationalist candidate was elected and from that time forward the alliance with the Nationalist party of Quebec has been an accomplished fact, to the great, to the eternal discredit of the Conservative party, and from that time the naval question has been a political football in this country. Publicly the Prime Minister is endeavouring to blame the Senate for the course that he is now pursuing, but privately I believe that he is pleased with the course that the Senate took, that he is pleased that he has not been obliged to spend $35,000,000 to build ships that he now admits himself may never be needed.

There is another chapter to this question. Under the Naval Service Act, passed unanimously by Parliament, two training ships were purchased from the Admiralty and brought to this country, and provision was made for the training of young men who wished to enter the service of their own country. I noticed the other day that Windermere, in telegraphing to the Montreal Star, quoted from a statement made by Lord Selborne, who was the first Lord of the Admiralty under a Conservative Administration, to the effect that the greatest need the British Admiralty has is men to man the ships, and not ships themselves. Without men ships are of little use for fighting purposes. That was the one feature of the Naval Service Act that the Nationalists of Quebec and the Conservatives denounced in the strongest possible terms. That was the one feature of the Naval Service Act that the present Prime Minister promised to repeal, and did cancel, and that was the one feature of the Naval Service Act which enabled the Nationalists of Quebec to misrepresent Sir Wilfrid Laurier's attitude to the greatest possible extent. If these men did not wish to enter the naval service of their country, and there was nothing compulsory or obligatory about it, they had no right to deprive young men of British or French origin who had a vocation for a seafaring life from availing themselves of the opportunity of entering the naval service. Young men who wish to follow the sea, or who wish to enter the naval service, are now obliged to go to the United States to give their services to a foreign country and to serve under a foreign flag. That is the result of the unholy alliance which the Conservative party entered into with the Nationalists of Quebec.

The Prime Minister told us that the Senate of Canada, in refusing to pass the Highways Bill, had committed a very improper act. As was well pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), the Senate did not kill or mutilate that Bill in any way; the Senate amended it so that the Government would be compelled to do what they declared they intended to do anyhow, and the Government would not accept that amendment. The Prime Minister told us also that he and the Minister of Railways had given a very distinct promise that the money expended under that Act would be expended in the different provinces on the basis of population, but the Prime Minister would not consent to put that provision in the Bill. Suppose the right hon. the Prime Minister were drawing an agreement between two parties and that one of the parties said: I intend to do so and so, but I do not want it to be put in writing, would the Prime Minister, in his capacity as a lawyer, advise any man in his senses to submit to an agreement of that kind? And yet, that sort of thing is what the Prime Minister says the Liberal party of Canada should agree to. We had good reasons for doubting the sincerity of the Prime Minister and the Conservative party in that respect. This Bill was not yet before Parliament, it had only been mentioned, when a by-election was held in South Renfrew, and five ministers of the Crown, including the Minister of Railways, went into that county and told the electors that if they voted for the Conservative candidate enormous sums of money would be expended in that county under the provisions of the Highways Bill; and, conversely, if they did not vote for the Conservative candidate, that very little money would be spent there. With that fact staring us in the face, we were asked to take the word of the Government that they did not intend to use the money under the Highways Bill for political or corrupt purposes. We were justified and amply justified in asking for guarantees. The hon. member for Red Deer asked the Prime Minister, while the Bill was under consideration, to state to what extent the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition could in any event prevent him from doing what he said he intended to do, and the Prime Minister did not and could not answer that question. The amendment offered by the Opposition in no way prevented the Government from doing what they said they intended to do under the Bill, and yet they refused to accept that amendment. Did they want the Bill to pass? I am doubtful about that. But there is more. There is nothing in my opinion that shows the insincerity and duplicity of this Government better than their action and attitude on that very Highways Bill. During the last days of the session we had in the Estimates an item of $1,500,000 to be expended under the provisions of the Highways Act among the different provinces, when the Government knew that there would be no Highways Act in existence under which to expend it, and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), wishing to have the use of that money during last summer, moved that the words 'under the provisions of the Highways Act,' be struck out and that the money should be given to the provinces to be expended by them on their highways. And, Sir, every Conservative member present in the committee on that occasion voted against that amendment, and I am sorry to say that my Conservative colleagues from the province of Prince Edward Island voted with the majority against the amendment, showing clearly that the Government had no intention of allowing that Bill to pass, or of voting that money unless they were in a position to use it for political and corrupt purposes.

I wish now to say a few words on the high cost of living. I listened attentively to the speech of the Minister of Finance in this debate, and I recall that he stated that a great many people in Canada were puzzled, I suppose he among the number, at the arguments advanced in favour of reciprocity, when that measure was under consideration. He said he could not understand how the farmers could get more for their products, while at the same time the consumers in the cities could get these products at a reduced price. I do not think the Minister of Finance is so obtuse as he sometimes wishes to appear; if he is, with all due respect, I do not think he is qualified for his position. This is a country of very great extent and transportation is difficult and expensive, and it should be plain to the Minister of Finance that it would be just possible for people living in the eastern part of Canada to be exporting products and produce to the United States, while those in another part of Canada might be importing similar products from the United States, and, to the great advantage of both countries. I will take the commodity of potatoes as an example. Potatoes are a valuable article of food, and Prince Edward Island produces them in great abundance. We send to Halifax, and Sydney, and Newfoundland, but not in great quantities; our natural market is in Boston, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, the cities of the New England states, and chiefly because of the cheap water transportation and climatic conditions. At the same time that we would be exporting potatoes to the New England states, the inland cities of Canada, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and others, might be importing potatoes from the United States. Even if the price were the same in Montreal and Toronto, we could afford to sell our potatoes to the United States; and because of cheaper transportation, the producer would get more for them. Producers in New York and other border states might send their potatoes into the inland towns and cities of Canada and get more for them, and the consumers in those towns get their potatoes for less than we could sell them at. That is easily understood. In addition to that, we could ship to the eastern cities, to the cities in New England, much later in the season than we could to the inland cities of Canada, because the mercury does not fall nearly so low in the late autumn on the seaboard as it does in the interior part of Canada in the same latitude. We could not ship at all late in the season to the cities of Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa.

The same thing holds true of other products, but particularly of vegetables and fruit at other seasons of the year. In late spring and early summer, before the fruit and vegetables of Canada are fit for consumption, except when raised under hothouse conditions, the consumers in the cities and towns of Canada might be greatly benefited by having the privilege of importing fruit and vegetables from the United States. Later on in the season, when our fruit and vegetables would be at their very best, and the season for them in the United States had passed, it might be to the great advantage of the producers of these articles in Canada to have the privilege of sending them to the United States, in fact, to the great advantage of the consumers and producers in both countries. That is how and why the producers might get more for their products and the consumers might get them for less.

Another article of food that might be taken into consideration are eggs. At certain seasons of the year, we cannot produce eggs economically in this country because of weather conditions. The Canadian hen, for some months in the winter is not on the job. In the spring and early summer months the Canadian hen is right on the job, and at that season of the year we have more eggs than we can consume, and we are putting them into cold storage. Cold storage is an expensive way of preserving food, but it is better than letting the food spoil. It would be a great advantage to the Canadian farmer if, at that season of the year, he could ship his eggs to the United States. It is quite conceivable that he could get more for them; and that the consumer in the United States could get them for less. In the months of December, January and February, when the Canadian hen is not producing eggs, except under very difficult and very expensive conditions, it would be to the great advantage of the consumers in Canada to have the privilege of importing eggs from the southern states of the United States, where the Yankee hen is then on the job. This is not such an abstruse question that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) can not understand it. At first sight it might appear a paradox, but I think the paradox has vanished. If the hon. Minister of Finance cannot understand that, I repeat the statement that he is hardly qualified for the position which he now occupies.

Wheat is an article of food that the producers of Western Canada would certainly be benefited by being permitted to ship to the United States. I know that there is a millers' combine. I do not know whether it enhances the price of flour or not, but this I do know that you cannot buy a car of flour in Canada from any milling house in Canada for one cent less than the combination price. There is a combination in price, at all events, and I am quite satisfied that the miller's combination do not regulate the price of their flour according to the price of wheat. They regulate the price of their flour in accordance with what they think they can afford to sell it at, and with what they think the Canadian consumer is willing and able to pay, in fact, what he must pay.

The hon. Minister of Finance has stated that tariffs and trusts and combines have very little to do with the high cost of living, and he said that a commission, appointed by the state of Massachusetts some years ago, had brought in a report to that effect. That commission, I presume, acted under the instructions of the body that appointed it, and republicanism and high protectionism were then the policy of the United States. Somebody must pay the duty; and, if the duty does not enhance the price, then what in the name of common sense is the duty for? Of course, this is an old question. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) in this House some years ago stated that that was the very object for which a customs' tariff was imposed, namely to enhance the price. The present hon. Minister of Finance seems to have a different opinion. The Prime Minister, the other evening, stated that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was returning to this country and he thought his return might cause dismay in the ranks of the Liberal party. I am not of that opinion. If his return causes dismay at all, I am afraid it will be in the ranks of the Conservative party and in the Cabinet itself, because, as is well known, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, before he left this country, stated that a commission to ascertain the cause of the high cost of living was absolutely useless; that there were more commissions in this country than we had any use for; that they were as thick as blackberries, and that no commission for that purpose would be appointed. Yet he was hardly out of the country when the Government appointed a commission, against the advice of the man who, the Prime Minister stated, was the most capable man in this country to give advice on that subject.

This commission, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, will spoil a good deal of paper, use a good deal of ink, and make a report which will probably never be read, and certainly will not be acted upon. I think I can give hon. gentlemen opposite some information with regard to the high cost of living. One of the things which make it difficult to live in this country at the present time and which is responsible for the increase in the cost of living is the reckless, wanton and unparalleled extravagance of this Government. The Minister of Finance the other day took exception to the word 'unparalleled' as applied to the expenditure of this Administration, but I will use the word, and I think that before I sit down I shall justify its use. The government of this or any country are the trustees of the public funds, and they should guard the expenditure of public money just as carefully as trustees would guard the expenditure of trust funds. Has this Government done so? I think not. I will point out to hon. gentlemen opposite several considerations which have contributed to the high cost of living in this country. First, let me call attention to the fact that the Minister of Public Works sold to a political favourite for the sum of ten dollars a piece of public property worth at least $100,000, situated within the confines of the town of Prince Albert. Do not such transactions contribute to the high cost of living? The Postmaster General last year gave a contract for 350,000 padlocks for $350,000—

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER: Never.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, perhaps he did not give the contract for them, but he ordered padlocks for the mail bags sufficient to last forty or fifty years, I am told.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not a fact.

Mr. HUGHES: More padlocks than have been used in this country since Confederation.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have told the hon. gentleman that that is not a fact.

Mr. HUGHES: What are the facts in connection with the matter?

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend should know the facts himself, since he is speaking about the matter.

Mr. HUGHES: The Postmaster General will not tell me the facts; I know that statement was made repeatedly in this House.

Mr. PELLETIER: It was denied repeatedly.

Mr. HUGHES: How many were ordered?

Mr. PELLETIER: There were 10,000 ordered, and not one delivered.

Mr. HUGHES: The Postmaster General evidently intended to order them, but someone interfered, and prevented that item from being added to the other transactions which have tended to increase the high cost of living. Then there is another item: the expenditure in the Militia Department. I dare say the Postmaster General knows something about that; at any rate the Minister of Finance is well informed. Armouries and drill halls are being erected all over the country at enormous expense, and in many instances there is no more use for them than there is for the fifth wheel to a coach. Do these things not add to the high cost of living? Then there is the fact that it cost $40,000 to carry the Minister of Militia and Defence, Sir Ian Hamilton and party, from Vancouver in the west to Sydney in the east; is not that a reckless and unparalled expenditure, and would that not add something to the high cost of living? I understand also that twenty or twenty-three militia officers, with their wives, families, and invited guests and twelve or fifteen lady secretaries travelled all over Europe at the public expense, which amounted, it is said, to at least $100,000—and this to gratify the curiosity and vanity of the Minister of Militia. Do not these things add to the high cost of living? I think they do. The Minister of Militia and Defence dined with marquises, earls, kings and emperors in full dress, and at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. If the Minister of Finance was properly guarding the public funds of this country and doing his duty as a trustee of those funds, he would compel the Minister of Militia and Defence to pay these bills out of his own pocket. Then there is the $15,000,000 which Mackenzie & Mann got last year as a gift. I am sure the Finance Minister must agree that this would add something to the high cost of living. Then there are the ten or twelve millions paid on foodstuffs by the consumers of this country in customs duties. These are the things which, in my humble judgment, add to the high cost of living, and these are the things which, I venture to say, the commission now investigating the matter will not mention. But the people of this country ought to be informed, and, having the information, they will draw their own conclusions.

I listened attentively to some figures given the other day by the Minister of Finance, and his statement that the cost of living had advanced more rapidly in Canada during the past few years than in any other country he mentioned, notwithstanding the fact that the countries of Europe are burdened by enormous expenditures for armaments and military equipment from which we are happily free, and notwithstanding the fact that a large proportion of the able-bodied men of those countries are taken away from the productive walk of life at an age when they are capable of doing their best work. That, I think, should give food for reflection, because something must be wrong with this country, with all its boundless resources and with the population that we have, when the cost of living is relatively so high. Considering these things, and in view of the fact that the present Government apparently are not willing to do anything reasonable to remedy these evils, considering their attitude with regard to the naval question from which they would now like to run away—considering the fact that the emergency has been exploded, that there is no such thing now, considering their record on all these points during the last three years, I do not wonder at their putting off an appeal to the Canadian people to the last possible day, and saying that, in the meantime, they will consider all these things that were quite emergent a few years ago. I am inclined to think that, under these circumstances, when this Government next appeals to the people of Canada they will go down, as has been stated by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. FREDERICK L. SCHAFFNER (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I assure you, I do not intend to delay you or the House for any very great length of time this afternoon, but I feel that every representative who has the honour to have a place in this House should feel that he has a duty to perform to those who have sent him here. So, this afternoon, I have a very pleasant service to perform to not only the Conservatives of my constituency, but to at least 85 per cent of all the people in that constituency, in extending to this Government the congratulations of my people for the splendid manner in which they have fulfilled the promises and the pledges they made previous to the last election in connection with my own constituency and the other great prairie provinces. We have in Canada what might perhaps be classified as three forms of government. We have our municipal government, which deals with the people at home. That is enlarged into what is called our provincial or local governments that deal with a wider sphere. Then we come to the great federal Parliament of this country, whose duty it is to legislate in the best manner possible for all the people. I refer to those three forms of government to show how different are the functions of these three legislative bodies. The municipal government has to do with local affairs all of a similar character. We might say that the provincial governments of this country, whether in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia, are concerned with the affairs of people who are engaged in about the same vocations of life. But how vastly different is the legislation required in this House of Commons! We have a great variety of creeds, a great variety of languages, a great variety of industries; what may be good for one province or locality may not be the best thing for the whole country. So I claim that whether a government be Liberal or Conservative, every member in this House should sympathize with them; they have to direct the way, to formulate policies and to enact legislation which will make for the good of the people of the whole country.

Then, Sir, we must have in this country what is called party government. It is the form of government of the British Empire. It is the form of government so far as I know, of the whole civilized world. It may have its defects, it may not be perfect; for while I suppose there are still a few people who will tell us they are perfect, most of us, I presume, are willing to admit that we have not reached perfection, whether it be in our local or in our federal administration. Yet I hold that the aim of all governments is to legislate for the good of the people. Hence it is necessary for us to watch very closely the actions of any government. I am prepared to say that I have never been altogether satisfied with what any Conservative Government has done, and I do not suppose there is any one sitting on the other side of the House who has been entirely satisfied with all their Liberal friends did. We are more or less independent, perhaps I should pay the hon. member for Red Deer the compliment of saying that his independence is perhaps as great as that of any of us. Yet, however much it is to be desired that we should be more independent so long as we have this form of government, we must endeavour to convince those who form a Cabinet and who practically rule, whether, it be on the other side of the House or on this side, of the wisdom of adopting measures of which we approve; conversely it is the duty of a government to seek interviews with the members of the House and to ascertain from them what is in the best interests of the individual provinces. A government which will assimilate the views so ascertained will probably do what is in the best interests of all concerned.

I listened very closely the other afternoon to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). My hon. friend is a bold man, he is a brave man, and I thought he was a more accurate man than the last speech he delivered in this House proved him to be. He started his speech with that old story about the ostrich hiding its head in the sand and likened that quality to the humility shown by members of the Cabinet. Well, after all humility is not a thing to be entirely despised whether it be in the Cabinet or among any other set of men. He ended up by saying that these men had circled around like the ostrich and then stuck their heads in the sand. When I heard that I began to look around for the heads of the Cabinet. I have observed, as no doubt you have, Mr. Speaker, that some of them have pretty large heads, which would make quite a hole in the sand and it occurred to me that if ever our friends opposite came into power in this 20th century and tried to put their heads in the holes made in the sand by the members of this Government, I think the holes would be much too large for them and that their heads would be rattling around like peas in a dry pod.

I was bold enough to interrupt my hon. friend from Edmonton the other night when he was speaking of a delegation of farmers that came to Ottawa to interview the Government. A delegation came here a few weeks ago, with what success I do not know, but I know this, that when our friends opposite were in power a delegation of from 1,000 to 1,200 farmers came to Ottawa, I remember distinctly they came in at that door, and filled up this entire chamber, and put us right out of the door opposite, and I could not help thinking how delighted I would be if I could get a seat in the House of Commons just as easy as those fellows. They were a splendid lot of men, good-looking, intelligent and well-dressed—yes, well-dressed. A man down town said to me the other day in reference to some well-dressed fellows who had just passed us: Those are not farmers from the West, they are bankers, Cabinet Ministers or something of that kind. The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that, while it took 1,200 farmers to storm the late Government, their grievances have so disappeared under the present Government that it was required to send in 1913 less than a baker's dozen of delegates. I do not know why a farmer should not have the right to dress as well as anybody else. I had the temerity the other night to ask the member for Edmonton if any delegation that visited the late Government had had their requests granted, and he said—they came and asked for reciprocity and Sir Wilfrid Laurier tried to give it to them. I propose to show this afternoon that not one request that any delegation of western farmers ever made of the late Government was ever granted. My hon. friend from Edmonton is very often inaccurate. He is not very well fortified with facts and he fell down badly there. Let us see what the hon. the leader of the Opposition said in reply to that delegation. Referring to the tariff he said:

> You have suggested to us that the first thing we should try to get is a treaty of reciprocity with our neighbours.
> Mr. Drury: I think you are misinformed as to the contents of our recommendation.
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I understand that what is proposed is closer commercial relations with our neighbours—whether by treaty or concurrent legislation is another matter—I suppose you would rather have it in the form of a treaty than not have it at all. If what you have in view is better commercial relations with the United States we are at one with you. I am happy to say that at this moment we are negotiating with the American authorities to do this very thing which you ask—to improve our commerical relations with our neighbours.

The point I wish to make is that Canada's representatives had already gone to Washington before this delegation had approached the Government and therefore my hon. friend from Edmonton was wrong when he said the late Government had tried to grant the request of that delegation of farmers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a play, real vaudeville. I do not intend to give it this afternoon, but it may be presented in this House before the session closes. It was acted in Winnipeg some time about the first of December last, when an election was held in the constituency of Macdonald. I fully expected my hon. friend from Edmonton to refer to the Macdonald election. Anybody that sat in this House last year will remember that whenever my hon. friend spoke and he spoke often and long, he always dragged in the Macdonald election, but in his speech the other night I cannot find a word about it. But to continue. There was to be an election in Macdonald. My good friend, Mr. Norris, leader of the Opposition, a well-respected man in the province of Manitoba, did not want an election, neither did Mr. McPherson, a valuable Liberal member of the local House and this play was staged by the hon. member for Edmonton and had as its particular stars the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and Senator Watson. These gentlemen forced upon the citizens of Macdonald an election, and have they not been sick since? Talk about the ostrich! If these men could have buried their heads any deeper than an ostrich they would have been mighty glad to do it. The Minister of Finance the other night accused the right hon. the leader of the Opposition of being troubled with amnesia, which means loss of memory. That was not the trouble with my hon. friend. He had no amnesia; he had a good memory. That Macdonald election is written right on his heart and he remembers it well.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is it true that any one on this side of the House accused my hon. friend of suffering from amnesia?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I did not say that; my hon. friend has misunderstood me. I say that the Minister of Finance referred to amnesia, which means loss of memory. If I said that anybody on that side of the House accused him I take it back, because that was not my intention at all. What I want to assure you of, Mr. Speaker, is that the hon. member for Edmonton was not suffering from amnesia, but that he was suffering from aphasia or aphemia; that is, impossible articulation—he could not say the word 'Macdonald.' He made some strange statements. I did not know that such a good-natured man could be so pessimistic as that hon. gentleman was that afternoon. He said that Canada stands by herself to-day as a country of depression in the face of the most magnificent crop ever harvested. I think that the hon. gentleman knows better than that. I think he knows very well that the depression to-day is world-wide. Were it not so the depression which we may have in Canada to-day would not be so severe and would not be felt to the extent that it is. But my hon. friend does not agree with other great men in his province. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister the other day referred to the remarks made by the premiers of the different provinces upon this subject. I am not going to refer to all that has been said by the different lieutenant governors of the provinces, but I would like to show what the Hon. Mr. Bulyea, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Alberta, from which province my hon. friend comes, has to say on this matter. He said on December 16, 1913:—

Since the prorogation of the fourth session of the second legislature of your assembly, the people of the province of Alberta, in common with the whole civilized world—

The hon. member for Edmonton thinks it is confined to Canada, but Mr. Bulyea, with the responsibility of his high position, stated that the people of the Province of Alberta, in common with the whole civilized world——have felt the strain of a severe financial depression, which, I am pleased to say, is now lessening.

He goes on to say:—

Notwithstanding the stringency, however, general business throughout the province has been good. The population has largely increased with the natural consequences, increase in buildings and improvements, and with the unmatched harvest with which it has pleased an all-wise Providence to reward the labour of our farmers. The prospects of all classes of people in the province are better than ever before.

That is not very pessimistic, yet that is what the Lieutenant Governor of Alberta thinks. I said that my constituents sent me down here to congratulate the Government upon the splendid manner in which they have fulfilled their promises. There are some things that the farmers who have been coming down from Western Canada in recent years have been asking for. To be provincial for a moment, we have been asking for years for the extension of our boundaries; that is No. 1. We have been asking for a reduction of freight and express rates, we have been asking for a government system of terminal elevators and we have been asking for aid to agriculture, aid to roads and the Hudson's Bay railway. I think that hon. gentlemen on both sides will agree with me that these were the chief requisitions of the people who came down from Western Canada, and I say without fear of contradiction that not one of these requests was granted by our friends opposite. What about the extension of our boundaries? We were the little province of Manitoba for years, termed the postage stamp province. I said in this House before, and I want to repeat it, that I am not provincial. If we are to have a great country here we must get away from provincialism and must try to advocate what is in the best interests of the whole country no matter from whatever province we may come. But we did feel in Manitoba that we were not being treated with that fairness which we had a right to expect. We were the pioneer province out west and no one has a higher estimation of that western country than I have. I have lived in that country since 1882 and I have practically grown up with the people there, but yet I say that we are interdependent one upon the other in every part of this country. Manitoba, as I say, is the pioneer province. It is the province that taught the people that the western country was worth living in. It is the province that taught the people from Ontario and other parts of Canada who went into Saskatchewan and Alberta that what Manitoba had done could be done in these western provinces and it is being done to-day. We were kept down for many years to a province of 72,000 square miles, while Ontario on the east had 250,000 square miles, and Saskatchewan on the west had 250,000 square miles, the responsibility for which fact I lay at the door of hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, for some reason or other—I am not going to say what—refused time and again to give us our rights and to extend our boundaries. But the people of this country said that they would formulate a new government, the Borden Government came into power in 1911, in 1912 our boundaries were extended and instead of having 72,000 square miles we have now 250,000 square miles, or a territory about equal to that of the province of Saskatchewan, and equal to what the province of Ontario had. That is one of the things that the farmers of Manitoba were asking for, and it is one of the things that they got from the present Government.

What about transportation? If you could have heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) going through Souris, and no doubt other parts of the province, and talking about how terribly high freight rates are you might have thought that he really was in earnest in regard to the matter. The freight rates are too high yet. But let me ask him what his Government did to reduce the freight rates. They talked, and talked and talked, but so far as anything to the advantage of Western Canada is concerned they did nothing but talk. The Conservative Government attained power and in 1912 a delegation came from the West which presented a petition to the present Minister of Railways, who, in proper course, sent it to the late Chairman of the Railway Commission, Mr. Mabee, in the death of whom the country has sustained a great loss. There is on file a letter from Mr. Mabee stating that this petition was the first intimation he ever had received that the farmers of the West were asking for reduced freight rates. But the present Minister of Railways took further action. He referred the whole matter to the Railway Commission and the lawyers were appointed to represent the people before that commission and a remedy was demanded, and ever since the Railway Commission has been wrestling with the question. We have heard our friends opposite speaking a great deal about Mr. Cowan, who appeared before the commission on behalf of the provinces, and Mr. Cowan has proved himself a most efficient advocate of the rights of the people, and he has done good work for the Western provinces, but Mr. Cowan or no other man would ever have had opportunity to advocate reduced freight rates if the late Government had stayed in power. It was not until the Conservative Government took the helm of state that the Railway Commission was asked to take up seriously the disposal of this very important question. Then, with regard to express rates, Mr. Mabee stated in the communication to which I have referred that he had previously heard of the demand for the reduction of express rates, and although that matter came before the Railway Commission in 1904, it was not until 1910 that a decision was arrived at and then a report was made against the reduction of express rates in Canada. That was under the late Government; but, what did the present Government do? It has not been in power long, but it has had time to have the express rates dealt with and a reduction of twenty per cent made in these rates west of Sudbury. That is a very good beginning and no doubt other reductions will come in due course. But what will do more than anything else to reduce freight rates in Canada is the inauguration of the parcels post system by the present Government. So far as I know, we heard nothing of the parcels post system under the late Government, but we have heard considerable about it since the present Government came into power. I have no doubt that in inaugurating the parcels post system the Government is facing difficulties which the ordinary member of parliament and the people outside are unable to appreciate, but they have to encourage them the splendid success of the parcels post system in the United States. No doubt the Government of the United States instituted its parcels post system with many misgivings, but the results have been most satisfactory and no doubt far and away beyond the anticipation of the United States Government. I trust the parcels post system will be as successful in Canada as in the United States, and I believe more than anything else will its success enable us to get reduced express rates in Western Canada.

May I refer to the energetic action of this Government in prosecuting the Hudson Bay railway project? In every election from 1896 to 1911, while the Liberals were in power, they used it as a political football, and they were always promising to build the Hudson Bay railway, but that promise they never fulfilled. The position of the Hudson Bay railway, when the Liberals left power, was, that there were a few piers erected in the Saskatchewan river at The Pas, and that was all. But what is the position to-day? The Government now in power is rushing that railroad to completion with great energy; I believe the contracts have all been let, and that some 160 miles are graded. And not only that, but the Government is proceeding energetically with the construction of terminals at Hudson bay, so that everything may be ready when the railway comes to be operated. And, what are some of the Liberal papers (I hope not all of them) doing to-day? They are trying to prejudice what has been done by the Government to make possible the safe navigation of the Hudson bay, that body of water which I believe the good Lord put there for the benefit of the people of the prairie provinces, and especially the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The Liberal papers are complaining because out of ten or twelve ships sent to navigate these uncharted waters one or two have met with misfortune and have not been able to entirely unload their cargoes. When we take into consideration the marvellous success the Government has had in the difficult work they have undertaken in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway project, it is a matter in respect to which every Canadian should feel proud.

Amongst some of the things to the credit of this Government, I might mention the enlargement of the boundaries of Manitoba, the reduction of freight rates and express rates, and the aid given to agriculture. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) spoke of the freight congestion in 1911, and the consequent loss sustained by the farmers of Manitoba through not being able to get their grain to the market. Of course, no fair-minded man should blame the present Government for the conditions which existed with respect to the crop of 1911, because the Government had only a short time before come to power and had not had the opportunity to provide facilities for the transportation of the crop of that year. But what about the conditions in 1912? The hon. member (Mr. Oliver) says that while there was great congestion in 1911 there was partial congestion in 1912, and for that small concession on his part I suppose we must be thankful. But the fact is that never before were there such facilities for the transportation of the grain crop as in 1913. There may have been a few points in the West which did not get all the cars they needed, but I do not believe there is a single man on either side of the House who will say there has been any real shortage of cars in the three prairie provinces in 1913, or that the grain crop was not expeditiously taken to market. Under the progressive and businesslike Government now in power, transportation facilities were improved and the farmers of the West reaped enormous advantages thereby. The western farmers asked for Government owned terminal elevators and under the efficient supervision of our Grain Commission one is in operation at Fort William, and internal terminal elevators are being erected at various points in the West. My hon. friend spent some time discussing free wheat, and told us what we had lost by not being able to ship our wheat to the United States. When he went through Macdonald, he said that we had lost from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000 because of that. That figure has grown since, until the other night he said we had lost from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000. He argues on the basis that every bushel of wheat shipped from western Canada would go across the border, which is certainly ridiculous. The farmers of Macdonald knew that it was ridiculous. My hon. friend went there in 1912. My friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) did not go then. There were reasons why he did not go—I mean no disparagement of him at all, but he did not go. This year he went, and my hon. friend from Edmonton went through that constituency talking about free food. In his speech on the 1st of December he says 'You must fight; when you see a head hit it.' Well, a head got hit, and it has not yet recovered. He went through the splendid constituency of Macdonald, and he said: We have got a new policy—it was so well put the other day—momentarily, a new policy for the moment. But he explained that policy of free food, told all about it, told about the terrible things that the present Government had done, and what the Liberal party would do for the people. Now the constituents of Macdonald are nearly all farmers. What was the result? What could be the result of a speech like that, a speech similar to that which he delivered before the House the other night, and which I trust you will all read carefully? What did the constituents of Macdonald do? They raised the previous majority of 784 to about 1,000. That was the result of this splendid speech, and the splendid arguments that you listened to the other night.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was there any talk about free wheat in Macdonald?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, there was talk about free wheat in Macdonald, and there was talk about protection in Pictou, and my hon. friend talks protection when he is down in Pictou.

Mr. MACDONALD: What did the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) say about free wheat?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Well, I have nothing to do with the Minister of Public Works. If you ask him, he will tell you. He can take care of himself. He has been able to do so so far.

I want to say something with respect to agricultural education. Education is a good thing, no matter in what department it is, whether in regard to agriculture or engineering. This Government promises to give $10,000,000, at the rate of $1,000,000 a year, in aid of agricultural education. This Government will be derelict to their duty if they do not increase that sum before the end of ten years to $50,000,000, and I believe that will be done.

I used to have conversations, in the House and out of it, with the late Minister of Agriculture. I said to him: 'Mr. Fisher, your experimental farms are good things, but I know from experience, living not very far from the experimental farm at Brandon, that they are not doing the work.' He said: 'Why?' 'Well,' I said, 'Mr. Fisher, it is because they are not reaching the people.' That is my opinion, but the people are somewhat to blame. The people should take advantage of these experimental farms; they should visit them, but, as a matter of fact, very few do so. Now what is this aid to agricultural education doing towards taking the work of the experimental farms to the people? We got this year, I think, about $50,000, and that, with the additional sum granted by the Provincial Government, has enabled the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Manitoba, Hon. George Lawrence, to establish in every local constituency that asks for it, a forty acre plot right in the neighbourhood of the people, where all classes of people, coming to town or going out of town, would pass by and thus see the results. To me that is a splendid example of affording agricultural education. If we wanted an example, we could refer to Belgium and France. Belgium farms produce $50,000,000 more annually than they did twenty-five years ago, at a cost, for every kind of agricultural education, of not more than $200,000 a year.

These are the things that the farmers came down here asking for, enlargement of boundaries, reduction of freight rates, reduction of express rates, Government owned terminal elevators, parcel post, aid to agricultural education and aid to roads. If I have heard the late Government condemned for any one thing more than another, except the navy, it has been for throwing out the Bill for good roads. One way of helping to reduce the high cost of living is to keep the men on the farms, the boys and girls on the farms. Nothing will keep the girls and boys on the farms more than to give them good roads. In the constituency of Souris the people have felt very keenly the fact that the Senate saw fit, under the direction of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to throw out the Highways Bill.

Mr. PROULX: Would the hon. member have confidence in the Manitoba Government to spend the money properly?

[Mr. Schaffner].

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Why, certainly. Is there anybody on earth who has not confidence in the Manitoba Government?

Mr. PROULX: Why did not the hon. gentleman induce the Government to accept the Senate amendment?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think I have shown that this Government has been the Government of action, the Government that has helped our western people. Do you wonder that I come down here so delighted, bearing with me the congratulations of both Grits and Tories in the constituency of Souris for the splendid work this Government has done in helping that great country?

I am not going to say very much about the high cost of living. In my opinion, an editorial in this morning's Citizen has summed up the causes of the high cost of living fairly well. It speaks of what the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) says, as follows:

> With wider and truer view he enumerated other contributory causes which have large influence in creating the present unfavourable living conditions, and which must be reckoned with by those who are seeking economic rather than political advancement. The drain of the people from the land to the city has decreased agricultural production, and thereby raised the cost of food. It is well known that by far too great a margin exists between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays, and that much of it is due to the lack of scientific and co-operative principles as applied to agriculture.

I believe that that is an exceedingly strong point. There is to-day too much difference between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. What we want in this country, and what I believe the western farmers are working for, is a co-operative system by which existing conditions can be remedied, at least to a considerable extent.

> It must be apparent to all careful thinkers that every non-producer, whether rich or poor, is a direct burden upon the community. It could be shown that the demands of the people to-day have far outrun their financial ability to pay, or their economic ability, under present conditions, to create.

This thought is, I think, worthy of consideration. People to-day are too extravagant.

> The importance of the free food cry of the Liberals has been greatly exaggerated. It has been cunningly devised as a vote-getter for a general election yet ahead. In spite of the fact that the Liberals for fifteen years allowed the general tariff to remain practically untouched, until it was attacked in the desperation of an impending defeat, they are now declaring that it is the cause of the high cost of living.

And so on. The article concludes by referring to the land monopoly in connection with the high cost of living. There is no question about the fact that the land speculator and the subdivision man has done Manitoba and the West a great deal of harm, and I would like to see something done, by legislation or otherwise, to remedy this evil. It may be said that if a man wants to buy, he has a right to do so, but if I had time I could relate some very sad experiences of persons who have bought subdivisions in western Canada.

Just a word about the navy. What I have to say about my constituency—and I have lived in it for 27 years—is this: During the past year I have gone up and down among my people, and I never in my life saw such evidences of humiliation as exist in the constituency of Souris at the present time because the Senate thought fit to refuse to do something for the British Empire. This Government tried its best to relieve the British taxpayer, and eighty per cent at least of the people of Souris are absolutely in sympathy with the policy of the present Administration in regard to the navy. It has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the policy of the Government was a permanent policy, but I would call attention to what the right hon. Prime Minister said in Toronto:

> I do not advocate—I have never advocated a policy of permanent contributions. We propounded no such policy, but propose under urgent conditions to build, to own—

That is another thing hon. gentlemen opposite like to dwell upon. They are fond of saying that we were giving the ships to the British Admiralty. We were doing nothing of the kind; the ships were to be ours. The right hon. Prime Minister said again and again that when in the future a permanent policy was inaugurated, those ships would be ours; they could be recalled and used in accordance with whatever policy the Government might see fit to establish.

> —to own and to utilize for the common defence of the empire three battleships which will be in the fighting line in the day of peril.

I do not know about other constituencies, but I can tell hon. gentlemen that my constituency was mighty anxious that we should have an election on that important point. I cannot understand why my friends opposite, only on the ground of political partisanship, should refuse to do something to help Great Britain. Do we remember today that we are the largest and the oldest of the overseas dominions of the British Empire? Australia, New Zealand, far-away India, South Africa, and even little Newfoundland, have done at least something to relieve the British taxpayer, but we have done nothing. As I have said the people of my constituency feel very deeply the humiliation of having done nothing to help that great empire of which we are so important a part, and upon which the sun never sets; that great empire whose flag, whose ships and whose sons have carried the great ideals of justice and fairplay across every ocean and into every port. Yet we stand idle here to-day because a partisan Senate refused to permit us to do our little share in assisting this great empire.

I set out to prove, and I believe I have done so, that this Government has been the friend of the West, and just so long as they continue that way, whether through myself or through someone else, they will have the support of the constituency of Souris. They have got to walk straight, for the people out there are a mighty independent people, but the Government will have their support if they continue as at present and proceed to fulfil and carry out the good work they have begun.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): It is my pleasant duty to offer my tribute of appreciation of the speech delivered by the mover of the Address (Mr. McLeod) who comes from the same province as myself; a man who has won for himself a reputation in the province of New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman had risen high in the estimation of his people, having for four or five years held the position of solicitor general under the administration of the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and had been more recently promoted to the higher position of provincial secretary. He has delivered in this House a speech in which he has well maintained the reputation he acquired in the province from which he comes and which is now extended throughout the Dominion of Canada. In entering the sphere of Dominion politics, because of the high position he held in the provincial government, no doubt he made a sacrifice, but it was a sacrifice for which he may have some compensation in the fact that he will come in closer touch with his former premier, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Certainly I have every reason to give expression to my appreciation of the able manner in which the hon. gentleman acquitted himself of the duty which has been allotted to him by the Prime Minister of Canada. It has been his good fortune to have received the felicitations of the great statesman of Canada who leads this Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

I wish, as I come from one of the smaller provinces of this great Dominion, to call your attention and the attention of the House to one of the first remarks of the mover of the Address, the hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod), in reference to redistribution, the subject which forms perhaps the most vital part of the speech from the Throne. The hon. member for York has expressed his views upon the principle of representation by population in this House of Commons. He has not altogether expressed the views which some from the Maritime provinces have urged in the past. Owing to unforeseen events since the Fathers of Confederation adopted the system of representation by population, we are to lose some of our representation. My hon. friend has admitted that we have no legal status, but he intimated that something might be done in sympathy with our position. I thought we might have learned that it was his intention or that the suggestion might have been made to him that in the Redistribution Bill some possible remedy might be introduced for the province of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, which has not yet been defined, but which might possibly again be found a just cause for the postponement of the Redistribution Bill for another session, if we are not to have an election this summer. I for one have always entertained the opinion that it is better for the Maritime provinces, for the smaller bodies of this Dominion, to be very careful before departing from any of the fundamental principles of the British North America Act. I know that these views are supported in the province of New Brunswick by men of the most intelligent class in that province. They feel that the future development of this country depends not on such questions as representation in Parliament, but upon the development of the resources of this great country, to which there is no limit, and I, standing in the province of New Brunswick, viewing our great harbours, through which will flow the products of the great West, feel just as much pride as does the farmer in the West who surveys every morning his endless wheat fields from which he will reap a crop which will be the astonishment of other countries. We should cease finding fault with the Fathers of Confederation, more especially as the Fathers of Confederation, in anticipation of the preponderance of the West in the future, did not confine the Maritime provinces or the smaller provinces to representation in this House alone, but provided that they should have a fixed representation in the Upper Chamber, in the Senate, in compensation for the sacrifices which the Fathers of Confederation from the Maritime provinces had to make for their people, and that representation in the Upper Chamber is just as essential to us as our representatives in the House of Commons. Our representation in the Senate is to be equal to that of Ontario or that of Quebec, or of all the western provinces combined, and therefore I find reason to believe that the Fathers of Confederation had foreseen the marvellous future development of the West. Twenty-five or thirty years before Confederation, Joseph Howe, from the city of Halifax, foresaw a new British Empire in those prairies of the West, together with the great resources of British Columbia, and was predicting that, perhaps before the century was over, the centre of the empire would be transferred to the very middle land of Canada between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

Mr. TURGEON: When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the fathers of Confederation had provided the Maritime provinces with a permanent representation in the Senate in compensation for the loss of their representation in this House; but it is not the representatives in the Senate alone nor the representatives in this House, but the combined representation in both chambers that forms the Parliament of Canada. Although I feel sorry as a Canadian for this loss in the Maritime representation, it is not due to the British North America Act, nor is it due to the lack of vision on the part of the fathers of Confederation, for Sir Charles Tupper himself said at the time of Confederation that the only way in which he could compensate the Maritime provinces was by giving to them permanent representation in the Senate. Whatever the circumstances are we shall have to stand by them, we shall have to suffer in the interests of the constitution. Sacrifices have often been made by minorities in the interests of the constitution and as a New Brunswick man I know that our province has had to make many concessions in order that the fundamental principles of Confederation should not be disturbed, and I am again willing to submit with resignation for the sake of the Constitution. We are hearing a great deal about the Senate just now. It was the wisdom of the fathers of Confederation that created that upper chamber, whose duty it is not only to undo, if it sees fit, any legislation the lower house may pass, but more particularly it was created to protect the minorities in the Dominion of Canada. I have faith in that body, and I believe the smaller provinces, as well as all minorities will always receive from it the justice and protection to which they are entitled. The Catholic minority in the province of Ontario has always enjoyed through the Upper Chamber due representation and similarly with the province of New Brunswick, whose Catholic minorities (English and Irish) are not represented in this House to-day. But through the Senate these Catholic minorities have their representation. Therefore, I say that if you wish to change the representation of the smaller provinces, you must change the representation of both chambers of Parliament. I maintain that to overthrow the principle of representation by population would be to destroy wittingly or unwittingly the Act of Confederation itself. We all know that without the admittance of that principle there would have been no such thing as Confederation. Ontario and Quebec would never have consented to it, and the Maritime provinces who were called upon to make a great sacrifice received as compensation the Intercolonial railway which has proved to be the greatest factor in uniting the East and West. The newspapers carried on an agitation urging that the Martitime provinces would not get fair representation, but those newspapers were not giving correct reports to their readers.

I have always been advocating the acceptance of the Act of Confederation as it is for the people of New Brunswick and of the other Maritime provinces. I do not wish to take up the time of the House by giving quotations but at the same time I speak with conviction. This is a question to which I have given close study all my lifetime and the more I consider the question and the progress of the country, the more I consider the progress of the West, the more am I convinced year after year, that it would be committing suicide for the people of the Maritime provinces to undertake to tinker with the principle of representation in this House. If we commence to interfere with or treat lightly the fundamental principles of our Confederation, we do not know what the consequences may be. Since Confederation we have been inviting people by millions to come to our land and we have been guaranteeing them that permanence of constitution and happiness that it was the view of the fathers of Confederation to secure. We have shown them the permanence of our constitution, we have pointed to our aspiration to become a great Canadian nation under the British flag and we do not wish to give these people to-day the pretence of a change which would certainly react to the detriment of all localities in Canada. It is by the principle of permanency that we are going to build up this nation. That was the great consideration of the Fathers of Confederation and it was with that object in view that the Act of Confederation was framed. To-day we are living happy and contented and if we wish to be happy and contended we must endeavour to keep true the principles which actuated the framers of our constitution. A great many of us in the Maritime provinces are willing to make some sacrifices in order to contribute to the permanence, happiness and contentment of Canada as a great nation under the British flag.

There was only one way in which an amendment to the constitution could be made that could justify Parliament in making a change. The way was a reference to an Interprovincial conference. The only way in which a change in the status, of a province can be made is by securing the consent of that province to it. No change can be made in the status of any number of provinces without the consent of each province. Every province is interested in the representation of Canada, every province is interested in that principle and, therefore, the united demand of all the provinces of Canada for a change in the constitution alone can possibly effect such a change. It is the only thing that can justify a request by this Parliament for such a change in the constitution. We have had different conferences; we had one as recently as last October or November. The Premiers of the Maritime provinces—I am sorry to say in one way—submitted the question of representation to the Interprovincial conference in October in the Capital of Canada. They were not able to agree at the Provincial conference with regard to the representation of the Maritime provinces and therefore that ended the question. That is the only way; no other method would be practicable. That was the way which was adopted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he was leading this Government. The provinces for some years had been clamouring for an increase in their subsidies, asking for more money to spend on their roads and upon education and this demand came more particularly from the Maritime provinces. Before changing the principle with regard to provincial subsidies the Prime Minister of that day (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) called an Interprovincial conference composed of the Premiers of all the provinces of the Dominion and he told them that if they agreed upon one principle the Government would ask the Imperial Parliament to make a change based upon such agreement. They came to an agreement and the policy laid down by the Prime Minister of that day was carried out. But the premiers of the provinces, during the conference last October, were not able to agree upon such a principle. We have had some reference during the present discussion to the question of subsidies. The premiers agreed upon the necessity of granting further subsidies to the Maritime provinces, but there is nothing in the speech from the Throne which mentions that part of the proceedings of the Interprovincial Conference. I would have been pleased to have seen something in the speech from the Throne giving some hope that that part of the proceedings of the Interprovincial Conference would be looked into. Such an announcement may, let us hope, come before the end of the session. I sincerely hope that it will, but so far we are at a loss to know whether the Government of the day is willing to entertain the unanimous recommendation of the premiers of the provinces for an increase of these subsidies.

Meanwhile, do not think that I am indifferent to the position which may be created for the provinces by this diminution of representation. Perhaps if I were to view this question from a party standpoint I might say—although I do not say it with the intention of blaming the Government in advance—that it is most likely that it will be the Liberal party that will be affected most seriously by the change of representation owing to the Act of Confederation. Meanwhile we are willing to submit to it. It is not with indifference that I take up that point and recommend it to my fellow countrymen and to the people of the Maritime provinces in whatever position they may be. In anticipation of the possibility that the representation might be decreased in certain portions of the Dominion, the fathers of Confederation inserted a provision in the British North America Act guaranteeing as far as possible the representation which the provinces acquired at the time of their entrance into Confederation. It is provided by section 51 of the British North America Act that:

> On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained, at the then last census, to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

This means that although the Maritime provinces might not perhaps possess the unit of representation made necessary by the unit of representation in the province of Quebec, there is still the safeguard that unless the population of the provinces is diminished by more than one-twentieth as compared with the figures of the preceding census—not with the first census taken after Confederation, or after two or three decades, but the last census—these provinces shall keep the representation which they possessed at the time. Therefore, I wish to call the attention of the Government to that point. It is more particularly in order to call the attention of the ministers and of the members of any committtee which may be formed to look into a redistribution of seats in this House that I have undertaken to speak on that question this evening.

I ask the Prime Minister, who represents Nova Scotia, and I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen), who represents New Brunswick, to take care that they safeguard the interests of their native provinces, and, if in the computation to be made there is any chance of one member holding his seat in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia by the operation of this saving clause in the British North America Act, then I ask that it be applied. I know that our population is very close to the necessary number and I trust that the computation may be carefully made so that we shall be justly dealt with. There can be no object in delaying further the introduction of the Redistribution Bill and pressing it to a conclusion at the present session. If only one-half of the people in the Maritime provinces, who are in the United States to-day, had stayed at home, we would have the necessary number of people to give us full representation in this Parliament. We have invited the citizens of the world to come to our shores and we have filled up the West, but in time to come that huge volume of immigration must lessen or cease altogether, and then, when in the future we have to depend upon the natural increase of population, I believe the Maritime provinces will be able to maintain the standard of representation which was allotted to them at Confederation. We have been in a rather unfortunate position in the Maritime provinces, because in the early days of Confederation when wooden ships were superseded by steel ships, thousands of our people were thrown out of employment at home and they had to seek their means of livelihood in the United States.

Let me say, Sir, that I look with hope to the day when the island of Newfoundland will be included in the Dominion of Canada and when will be consummated that grand idea of rounding out the union of all the British people in North America. I urge upon every member of the House the importance of securing by all proper means the inclusion of Newfoundland in Confederation, for our benefit as well as for the benefit of Canada, and especially of the Maritime provinces. The interests of the Maritime provinces and the interests of Newfoundland are cognate in many respects, and should the ancient colony come into Confederation with a representation of ten or twelve members in this House, and her share of representation in the Senate, then, Sir, the Maritime provinces would become a powerful entity in this Parliament. I quite understand that to induce Newfoundland to enter Confederation is not an easy task now, but I do regret that the efforts in the past which at one time seemed near to being crowned with success proved futile, and especially do I regret it because of the fact that on one occasion only a sum of half a million dollars stood in the way, a sum which to the Dominion of Canada at the present day is of comparatively small account. Now that we are thinking of establishing a navy, the inclusion of Newfoundland with its hardy maritime population becomes a matter of prime importance. I know of my own personal knowledge that the best people in Newfoundland, the professional men, the clergy of all denominations, are educating the people of that island to appreciate that the destiny of their colony is to become one of the provinces of this prosperous Dominion. For my part I would rather see New Brunswick or Nova Scotia represented here by ten or eleven members, holding their seats by the strength of the constitution, than by thirteen members holding their seats by the charity of the West or the sympathy of Canada. We want to be here by the right of the people and the right of the constitution. We do not want to be here otherwise. We do not want to encroach upon any principle of the constitution, nor do we want to encroach upon the rights of any other province of the Dominion of Canada. I hope that after this debate is concluded the Government will bring down the Redistribution Bill. I expect that the redistribution will be made in all fairness to every party and every province. The Government, in bringing down this measure, will at least be acting according to the constitution, as it should have been done last year, if not two years ago. According to the constitution it should have been done immediately after the figures of the census were obtained, so that the country might be ready for an election.

After speaking in regard to immigration, my hon. friend the mover of the Address (Mr. McLeod) spoke of the Transcontinental railway as it affects New Brunswick. He spoke of the Transcontinental railway having been brought down through the middle of the province of New Brunswick as a great mistake. While I am on this question of redistribution, I must say that this railway is of advantage for this very reason alone, the increase of our population, the opening of our territory to the people in order to bring more population to the centre of the province. New Brunswick has its population to-day merely scattered along the boundaries of the province between Nova Scotia round the north shore, and between the province of Quebec and the state of Maine. We have immense areas of virgin forest lands which have seen no homes yet. By introducing the railway to the centre of the province we are opening up that portion of the province to the lumbering interests and the farming interests, and are thus bringing in many people. We have increased our population already by bringing the Transcontinental railway to the centre of the province. That was one of the considerations which, I remember, the right hon. the leader of the Government of that day (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took into account, namely, that it would bring more population to New Brunswick, which we desired so much, and which we needed to retain our representation.

I shall not speak of the other advantages, which would accrue to the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island as well, by the building of a branch line from either one point or another to St. John, New Brunswick. It would connect St. John by the centre as well as by the other route. It seems strange to me that the hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod) blames the Government of that day so much, because the railway has gone through the centre of the province of New Brunswick, a province the interest of which I am sure he has as much at heart as myself. He ought to see that the representation, the very principle upon which he is working to-day, would be greatly benefited by the increase of population in that district.

He has spoken of the forests which were destroyed by fire owing to the railroad going through. Railroads go through other forests in the Maritime provinces and through other forest areas in Canada. At the same time, I would sooner see the immense forest area of New Brunswick in danger of fire caused by railroads than see it without any railroad at all, because, if the railroad was to set fire to the forest traversed by it, you would be sure to have quick communication and speedy assistance, and you would be able to control the fire; whereas you have not been able to do that in large forests where there is no communication of any kind. In northern New Brunswick, before the building of the Intercolonial, you had the Miramichi fire, which destroyed millions and millions of feet of lumber of the best quality. There was no railroad, no communication, and you had to wait until the elements were able to subdue the activity of the fire. Since the Intercolonial has been built fires have done some small damage, but they have been stopped at once, and the same would happen in the centre of the province.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. McLeod), who moved the Address, is a man of many virtues and good qualities. He is a man who recognizes no limitations; and as the speech from the Throne was not big enough for his ambition, he would not be bound by its subjects, but went further afield. He discussed the Highways Bill of last session and the session before. Following what we have heard from the other side of the House during last session, he has blamed the Senate for having killed the Highways Bill, which was to be so beneficial to the province of New Brunswick, from which he comes, as well as to the other provinces. As I said a short time ago, it was merely in the exercise of one of their protective functions, the protection of provincial rights, the protection of the Constitution, that the Senate made an amendment which would have rendered the Bill constitutional, which would have made it fair to every province in the Dominion, and which would have preserved the rights of provincial governments, whether Conservative or Liberal. The Senate has the custody of the rights of the provinces under the Constitution, and the Constitution states positively that road-building and road-structure belong to the provinces. We only asked that they be left to the provinces, and an amendment to that effect was moved on this side of the House. The right hon. the leader of the Government replied that it was his intention to do so. We asked him to put his intentions in black and white in the Bill. The Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals refused to do that. The Bill went to the Senate, and a majority of the Senate took the same ground as we did and added the same amendment. It is said that the majority was a servile majority. If there was any servility, it was servility to the Constitution.

No senator would be true to his mission unless he intelligently and conscientiously exercised that function when he felt it his duty to do so. The Senate put the matter down in black and white; the Bill was referred back to this House, and the amendment was rejected by the Government. It would be better for the provinces to wait a year or two than that the money should be given them against the provisions of the constitution. The hon. member for York (Mr. McLeod) said that it would have been a great benefit to the farmers of his province to have obtained that money for the improvement of their roads. The matter was debated in this House, and I do not wish to go over it again, but I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that while the Minister of Railways and Canals and the right hon. the Prime Minister said that the money would be distributed to the provinces according to their population and under their own supervision, when the Bill went to the Senate the representative of the Government in that body put upon the Bill an interpretation different from that of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Railways and Canals. Mr. Senator Lougheed, who addressed the Senate on behalf of the Government side on May 22, 1913, as reported in the Senate Debates, page 661, had this to say:

> It seems to me that hon. gentlemen who have been performing the role of critics of this Bill have a very great misconception of the policy, the nature and the origin of the Bill.

Hon. gentlemen seem to be obsessed, if I may use that term in its more courteous sense, with the idea that a great constitutional wrong has been done not only to the province but to the Senate of Canada by the Government in the introduction of this Bill. Hon. gentlemen seem to be equally obsessed by the idea that a very great discourtesy has been extended by the Government of Canada to the Senate on account of their failure to attach that importance which certain gentlemen think should be attached to this amendment which the Senate made to the Bill last year. If hon. gentlemen will look at the preamble of the Bill they should come to a different conclusion than that which they apparently have arrived at as the object of this Bill. If they will observe the language in the preamble of the Bill they will find that this is not a local undertaking. This has not for its object the improvement of roads in a particular municipality, or group of municipalities. It is not intended for a moment that this assistance should be given to the ordinary highway in a local sense. . . . . Then I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the first clause of the Bill in which this is entitled the Canadian Highways Improvement Act. A proper distinction should be drawn between the Bill and the meaning which hon. gentlemen are disposed to attach to it. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that the Government of the day in its generosity has suddenly come to the conclusion that municipalities should be helped and that the provinces should be helped only so far as the development of local highways is concerned. But there is a larger object than that in view. The Government has the object in view set out in the preamble of the Bill. I maintain that while highways in their local sense are peculiarly provincial undertakings, that this is more than a provincial undertaking. This is an interprovincial and national undertaking and does not come within that class of cases referred to by my hon. friends, and particularly the hon. gentleman from De Lorimer, who cited to us last night section 92 of the British North America Act, in which he sought to bring this undertaking under subsection 10 of section 92, and within the language 'local works and undertakings.'

Another interpretation, therefore, was placed upon the Bill by a member of the Government in the Senate: an interpretation which had not been given in this House, and which would seem to make it impossible for the farmers living along the byways and byroads of any of the provinces to have obtained the benefit of a single dollar of that money if the Bill had passed and the money had been appropriated according to the views of the hon. gentleman of the Senate from whose remarks I have quoted. I ask the hon. member for York, who pitied the farmers of his constituency because they have not been given that money, would that money have been of any benefit to his friends the farmers of York, or to the farmers of Gloucester, Queens and Sunbury, or any of the other portions of the province? It is not the farmer who lives within a few miles of a town or city who need this money the most; it is those who have to go from ten to twelve miles over roads that are sometimes impassable, who should obtain the benefit of any money to be appropriated for the improvement of roads. If the recommendation of the Interprovincial Conference is put into effect by this Government, the money given to the provincial governments will be used on behalf of the farmers who particularly want it, and therefore it will pay the farmers to have waited a year or two to get the money in the way they want it.

There are other considerations which demand the attention of the people of this country. We have heard a great deal during the last few years about reciprocity with the United States. We know that the arrangement which was made by the late Government did not meet with the sanction of the people on September 21, 1911. Although the majority of the people, for many causes and because of many influences, did not appear to approve that policy at that time, I still maintain with all respect that the verdict of the people was a popular error—an error for which the people of Canada have already repented, and which they are ready to repair at the earliest opportunity. I am convinced, although the verdict of the people was against reciprocity, that if the question had been given a fair trial; if the reciprocity pact alone had been considered; if the question had not been diverted by other considerations, the result would have been different. In the meantime, things have changed. The United States has taken action, and in this country we are confronted with conditions which have changed considerably during the last few years. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has made an offer, as leader of the Liberal party—a leader who has always stood by the principles of true Liberalism—he has told the people of Canada in a speech at Hamilton that he would advocate, free food for Canada—that is food free from customs duties. The Minister of Finance, the day before yesterday, did not consider very favourably the proposition; he did not, in my estimation, treat it with the seriousness and the consideration with which he should have treated it as coming from the greatest Canadian statesman of the day. Meanwhile, under the circumstances in which we are situated, with an increasing cost of living and with a great number of our working men out of employment, my right hon. friend, in his policy of free food or food free from duty for the masses of the people of Canada, has a determined follower in the person of the member from Gloucester. They say: but you have been promising the farmers of Canada a larger market. Yes, we have been promising the farmers a large market and we would have given them the greatest market that any country can look for, a market of ninety five millions of people, which was refused to them by the erroneous policy of the Government supporters in defeating the reciprocity agreement. To-day the right hon. leader of the Opposition appealed for free food for the people and the Minister of Finance says: What effect would it have on conditions? He says that the tariff is not the cause of the increased cost of living. It is not the only cause but it is certainly one of the causes and one of those causes which can be removed at any moment by the action, not of this Parliament, but of the Cabinet itself by the removal of the prevailing duty on wheat and flour. It will not remedy everything but it will remedy one great burden which weighs on the shoulders of the people, more particularly on the working classes who, like the farmers, earn their bread and the bread of their families by the sweat of their brows, the workingmen in the factories, the men on the railroads, the men in the merchant marine of Canada, the men working at days wages. During the last fiscal year the workingmen have paid into the treasury of Canada an amount of over $10,000,000 of duty upon food introduced into Canada for the sustenance of the Canadian people. You must add to that $10,000,000, as was well illustrated by the scientific member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), the other day, a profit of 25 per cent or 33 per cent which the importer will add to the cost of the food he imports and then you have another $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 to add to that $10,000,000. There is, therefore, in the customs duty upon food for the masses of the people of Canada during a portion of the year, the winter season, when the supply of food from Canada is bound to get short, $13,000,000 that, by the removal of the duty, you can spare to the people and more particularly to the class of wage earners. That class compose the largest portion of the population and they also consume the largest quantity of food products. The poor man has at his table a larger number to feed than the rich man and, therefore, though his table may be more modestly served, it is as expensively served as the table of the rich man with two or three children, and while you save $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 for the people you have done something towards reducing the high cost of living. This is particularly necessary in a period of depression in business and in trade, when you have a lack of work in Toronto, Montreal, Regina and every other city in the Dominion. Under these circumstances, certainly one of the best remedies that can be employed and one which can be applied at once is the removal of the duties on food stuffs, and then we can look for other remedies.

The Minister of Finance talks of education and he says his Government did a great deal last year because it voted $1,000,000 for the education of the farmers of Canada. I submit that the farmers of Canada need, in many respects, more education, but that cannot be done in six months, in three months or in three years. It is a matter of time to give education to the the farmers, and it will have to be made permanent and to be made effectual. The hon. member told the House that his Government had been ahead of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in this respect. He ignores the fact that four years ago the Liberal party and Liberal Government created that Commission on Technical Education which has gone around the world and is preparing a report which I am sure, when it is published, will command the admiration of the people of Canada and will result in the establishment of a real system of technical education for farmers as well as for mechanics. But all of that will take time, that is, for the generation that is growing. It is not a remedy for the conditions of to-day. However, I claim that the Liberal Government must be given the credit of having appointed that Commission in consideration of the conditions existing in Canada. They say that production is not sufficient to meet consumption. I admit it, but the best way to increase production would be to give a market, and, four years ago, the Liberal party, under the supervision of its devoted and admired chief, asked the country to accept an agreement with the greatest market in the world, the United States, by which our people would have all the market that would be required at any moment, and that market would have benefited the people of the West as well as those of the East.

But they say that by that agreement Canada would have lost its fiscal independence. Are we British subjects? If we are British subjects, if there is any British spirit in any Canadian, he will never lose his fiscal independence any more than he will lose his loyalty to the flag we all revere. Lose our fiscal independence! Look to-day and compare the agreement of 1911 between Mr. Fielding and ex-President Taft with the tariff that the United States, looking only to their own interest, have adopted for themselves. It is in their own interest that they have made a new tariff, they have not looked to Canada but to themselves, and we find that the pact agreed upon by both the Canadian Government and the United States Government would have given Canada a great many more advantages than Canada secures by the tariff framed by the United States looking solely to their own interests. Therefore I claim that conditions have changed in Canada to-day owing to the enlightenment of the new President of the United States. I claim that the people of the West would have saved over $20,000,000 if the reciprocity treaty had gone through. To my mind its defeat has contributed very largely to the condition prevailing to-day.

I heard with interest the hon. member for Edmonton say the other night that but for the reduced duty on oats going into the United States the people of the western provinces where the crop of oats this year has been immense, would have made a dead loss. It was the reduction of duty that saved the farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan. But supposing the six cents duty were taken off altogether, what a difference that would make.

The revision of the American tariff has been an immense relief to the people of this country; but there is one thing the farmers of the West want, and that is the removal of the duty on wheat going into the United States. It is up to the Government to open that market to the farmers of the West. They can do it at any moment by simply removing the duty on American wheat. If that had been done this year the people of the West would have shipped their immense crop of wheat across the border and made bigger profits. The Argentine Republic was quick to remove its duty on wheat in order to get the benefit of the American market and are we behind the Argentine? I do not wish to be severe in my remarks but I must say I cannot understand the attitude of the Government in maintaining the duty on American wheat. If it were removed now it would at once let free the immense amount of wheat in the elevators and granaries of the West. The Minister of Public Works told the electors in the constituency of Macdonald last December that the Government would consider the advisability of removing the duty on wheat. Is it possible that the 13 or 14 wise men of Canada have taken that matter into consideration and have not been led to the conclusion that it was to the advantage of the West that that duty should be removed? They will not take advice from their best friends, not even from Premier Roblin of Manitoba. They would not take advice from the Conservative members from Alberta who came here a few days ago with a resolution from their friends in that province. It would seem however, that they must have left the resolution in the train, because, as soon as they get here they vote a motion of confidence in their present leader. I addressed several meetings in my constituency before coming up here—I do so every year—and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of my country in expressing their desire for free food were voicing the opinions of all the farmers of Canada. What we want is large markets which would benefit both the working classes and the farmers. When we claim larger markets for the farmers we claim also the reduction or elimination of the duties on farm implements. The farmers to-day are expecting that more particularly since they became rich had the advantage of that great market which should have been placed at their disposal a few years ago. When you tax the farmer for his implements, for any article of necessity he has to purchase for the maintenance of his family—boots and clothing for himself, his wife and his children—you increase the cost of living, whereas, if you free these articles from taxes you decrease the cost of living and it is by this policy that we can ensure greater happiness to all classes of the community. I repeat that I stand here to-day a determined supporter of my right hon. leader, that the population of Gloucester county sent me here at the last election by a thousand majority and that they are prepared to send me here again with 2,000 majority. We are advocating to-day as strongly as ever, and more strongly than ever, that change of which I speak. It is not because we have been defeated once that we are going to abandon our principles and change our views. We were for larger markets before, we are still for larger markets and we will be in opposition as we were in the Government for larger markets and not till the Government of the day sanctions our policy or gives free food to the people of Canada and opens the markets of the United States for the wheat and oats of the people of the West will we cease to proclaim the necessity of removing these burdens from the shoulders of the people. They say that the people of the West should go into mixed farming but I believe that the people of the West have gone very largely into the mixed farming of late. We saw published the other day a statement of the immense crop of the West. It is composed not only of the wheat that they have been growing in Saskatchewan and Alberta but also of millions of bushels of oats, barley and flax. Considering that they have been settled only for thirty or thirty-five years, which is a short period in the life of a country, they have made remarkably good progress in mixed farming. While I am a free trader in principle and theory I know that you cannot bring in absolute free trade all at once, but when our friends opposite, because they were accidentally transferred to the other side of the House by the vote of September, 1911, say, that the Liberal party has done nothing towards free trade, I say that under the tariff revision of 1897 there were changes which were notable not so much for the volume of the decrease in the tariff as for the decreases which were made in the rates upon articles required by the mass of the people.

The introduction of the British preference was a great step towards free trade, it was a great step in favour of the farmers of Canada who have to buy a number of articles imported from Great Britain or else from the United States, and if a farmer buys an article from Great Britain in consequence of the lowering of the tariff against that article, which he would otherwise have purchased in the United States, it is an advantage to the country, and it is also an advantage to those poor workers in the British Isles, who are receiving so much sympathy at the hands of the Conservative party to-day in connection with this talk about a contribution, but who never get much sympathy from them when we are talking of purchasing articles from them at a lower rate of tariff. If in this country it is desired to decrease the cost of living without at the same time hurting the manufacturer, let the manufacturer be inspired by the sentiments which inspire the manufacturers of France and Germany; let them so improve the processes of manufactures that they will be able to produce at a cheaper rate than they have ever been able to do before. If we lower the cost of production we lower the price at which the article can be sold in the country, and if an article is sold at a reasonably low price, or as low as it can be sold, the better it is for the home manufacturer, because the manufacturers of other countries are not so interested in trying to fill the markets here with their own goods, and therefore look for markets elsewhere.

There is another subject which was discussed by my hon. friend the mover of the Address; I refer to that great question of a contribution. He also joined the concert on the other side in stating that Canada had been humiliated by the position of the Liberal majority in the Senate, which had in a sense objected to the passing of the Naval Contribution Bill granting $35,000,000 with which to build three dreadnoughts as our contribution to the British navy. I do not wish to speak at length on that question, as I had occasion to give my views to this Parliament and to Canada with regard to it last session, but let me tell you again that I see no humiliation for Canada in the position taken by the Senate in asking the Government not to pass that Bill before an appeal is taken to the people, and to put into execution the promise which was given by the right hon. leader of the Government himself when he introduced his measure, and also before he introduced it. He stated publicly upon his return from England that he would introduce the Bill, and that if Parliament did not grant the money he would appeal to the people. The Senate said: Appeal to the people first, and if you are sustained by the people we will vote your Bill. We are told we have brought about national humiliation because the members on this side of the House did not agree to endorse the changed views of the ministers and their supporters with regard to the navy, but when we remember that in 1909 they were in harmony with us in suggesting a Canadian navy and protesting against the contribution, it is not to be wondered at that we were not able to swallow the altered views of the Government. And if these gentlemen opposite thought our action led to humiliation of the empire, why have they not brought on an election to test the feelings of the people of Canada. Where is there an emergency to-day; why have they not sought the opinion of the electorate? Let me point out that the people of England, as represented by the First Lord of the Admiralty, have not looked upon the action of this Parliament as a humiliation. The Hon. Winston Churchill, speaking in the English House of Commons on the 16th of July last, after the prorogation of this Parliament, said:

> Although the Naval Aid Bill was rejected, the question of Canada participating in her own defence and in that of the empire is by no means dead. Whether we read the speeches of members of the Government or of the Opposition we see that although there are differences of opinion and method, and although the matter is one of party disputation, there is an overwhelming consensus of opinion that action should be taken and that soon.

Mr. Churchill knows that there was an overwhelming expression of opinion that action should be taken by Canada, and that it was only a difference of method between the Liberals and Conservatives, which difference of method was because of the withdrawal of the Conservative party from the Naval Service Act, to which they had given their adherence two years previously. Mr. Churchill went on to say:

> The position is not yet clear, and I am very much inclined to think that harm rather than good may result from our attempt to debate it much in public. Canada is absolute mistress of her own destiny. Although I cannot attempt to forecast the course to be finally decided by Canada, I think that these speeches taken by themselves, apart from all other public and private information plainly show that the question of Canada taking effective part in the general naval defence of the empire is by no means closed, and we have no right to assume at present that we are to be left to face the emergencies of the future unaided and left to bear the whole burden alone.

Later on, Mr. Churchill said:

> By next year, however, it is probable that the Canadian situation will have defined itself and we shall be in a better position to judge whether further acceleration of next year's ships or alternatively, direct addition to our programme will be forced upon us. That is the policy which we recommended to the committee and which we regard as a wise, sober and adequate provision. We shall not be drawn from it by any agitation.

In view of the statement of Mr. Churchill, that the action of Canada would be known this present year, it is inexplicable to me why the Government have not introduced their naval policy. The Prime Minister knows that the question of contribution is awaiting the determination of the people of Canada; he knows that his promised permanent policy will have to be submitted to the people, and why then does he not introduce a fair redistribution Bill, pass it this session, and submit the question to the people. I challenge the right hon. gentleman to take this course. I thank the members of the House for the kind attention they have given me.

Mr. DONALD NICHOLSON (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. H. F. McLeod), on the able manner in which he presented his views, and I specially thank him for the kind references he made to my province. Judging by the applause which the seconder of the Address received from his own side of the House, I have no doubt that he acquitted himself creditably in presenting the views of his party on the different questions at issue. Reference has been made by several speakers to the non-introduction of the Naval Bill this session, and without going into the details of the question at any great length, I want to say that I voted for the Naval Bill last year, and I voted for it because I am a true Canadian, because I am a Briton, and because I believe that anything which strengthens the British navy strengthens the position of Canada and of the British Empire. References have also been made to the omission of the Highways Bill from the Speech from the Throne, but I commend the policy of the Government for not introducing that Bill and sending it from this House up to the Senate to be slaughtered there. I believe the people of Canada are heartily in favour of the Highways Bill as introduced by the Government last year, and I believe that the farmers are specially interested and favourable to it. I know that in my part of the country there was much disappointment when the Senate rejected the Bill. As to the question of the high cost of living, it is needless for me to say that I would be in favour of any policy which would reduce the cost of living to the consumers of this country, but certainly gentlemen on the other side have not shown in their speeches how that may be done. We all know that there are many articles consumed in the household which cost no more now than they did some years ago, and that remark applies particularly to groceries. Sugar costs no more and tea costs no more, and I can give a number of other instances in the grocery line to show that the prices of such articles are certainly not higher, and in some cases they are lower than they were four years ago, or ten years ago, or even twenty years ago. It is true that, with the exception of wheat and vegetables and flour, there are few articles which the farmers produce that are costing more now than they did some years ago. It would require a long time to enumerate the reasons why the cost of living is more now than it was some years ago, but it is not in the articles that we consume in our homes that the increased cost lies.

In 1911, the United States proposed to let our farm products and manufactured goods in free. The late Government adopted a reciprocal policy. That was the late Government's proposal to the people of this country, but in my opinion the people of Canada refused to adopt that policy for the following reason: I represent a constituency with as large a farming population as any in Canada. Formerly the people down there were free traders, but they saw the benefits of the protection they enjoyed under the tariff. Everybody knows that under our fiscal policy a certain amount of protection is enjoyed by the farmers in lieu of the protection that the manufacturers have. Suppose a farmer in Canada raises a horse worth $200; if he goes over to the United States and buys a similar horse for $200, when he comes back to Canada he has to pay $50 duty. That protects the Canadian farmer to the amount of $50 in lieu of the protection that he allows the manufacturer. On oats there is a protection of ten cents a bushel. On cheese, a farmer is protected to the amount of four cents a pound and on eggs three cents a dozen. To-day eggs are worth about fifty cents a dozen, and a matter of three cents a dozen duty paid on eggs coming into Canada surely would not reduce the cost of living very much. On all these articles, farmers are enjoying a certain amount of protection under our fiscal policy. A man who produces or raises 2,000 pounds of pork—and lots of farmers do that—is protected in his own market that protection and let the country be flooded with the products of other countries? That is the reason why progressive farmers of this country turned down the reciprocity pact of 1911.

I was surprised to learn from my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) the other night that 20,000,000 bushels of oats had been shipped from Alberta this year. He appeared to be pleased. I think it is a great mistake. It is simply removing the rich loam of that province to the run-out farms of Dakota and Illinois. I have met farmers out in the West where the hon. gentleman lives. They occupied their farms in the United States for about thirty years. They run-out the farms and then they came out to the virgin soil of Canada, and they are attempting to do the same thing on this side of the line. This kind of farming is ruinous, because if you keep on cropping oats or wheat year in and year out, finally fertilizers will have to be used and you will not get as much as if you had mixed farming. That is the experience of the older provinces of Canada. That is the experience that the farmers of Dakota have had, because they persisted in the raising of wheat continuously.

I would suggest that our wheat be milled in Canada so that our farmers, both in the East and in the West, may be able to procure the by-products, bran and shorts, for feeding purposes. In addition to that we would produce a high grade of flour for export and home use. I believe we ought to do everything in our power to encourage the milling of wheat in this country, as the by-products would be very much appreciated by the stock raisers of this country.

I remember the time in this country when our young men and women had to go to the cities of the United States for employment. In fact, in New England there were large colonies of French Canadians manufacturing boots, shoes, hats, stoves and cooking utensils, besides tools for artisans and also farm machinery, for shipment to Canada. We had reciprocity at that time, and the prices that we obtained were not half as good when we bought our goods in the United States as they are now in our home market. These young men visiting their homes on their summer vacations some years ago, were missionaries in favour of the National Policy that was adopted in the year 1878. They said: Why, we have to leave our Canadian homes and go to the United States in order to manufacture goods for you there. Hardly anything at all was manufactured in Canada, in the lower provinces and especially in the province of Quebec. The city of Lowell, Massachussets, is almost a French city, populated by French Canadians. The rush of young Canadians to the United States factories and cities was enormous thirty years ago.

I believe one of the great troubles in Canada is that the farmers do not produce enough to supply the wants of the home market. I need not weary the House with illustrations that go to show that although ours is a farming country, yet we have to import large quantities of produce, including beef and eggs, from other countries. The fact of the matter is that there is not enough stuff produced to feed our own people. That, however, will, I believe, be finally adjusted. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak about the great market we should have in the United States. Only three or four years ago the cities of St. John and Halifax, and other centres throughout New Brunswick, including Chatham and Newcastle, were importing pork and beef from Chicago at a lower price than that at which it could be procured in Ontario or any of the other provinces, notwithstanding the fact that they had to pay a duty of $4 a barrel. Our great competitors were the United States, with their cheap production of pork and beef. As hon. gentlemen all know, Prince Edward Island, the province from which I come, is adjacent to Newfoundland, which has an independent fiscal policy. The duties on goods going into Newfoundland from the United States are the same as the duties on goods coming into Canada; therefore they have been our competitors, and, with regard to the articles I have mentioned, and others, they undersell us.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that after the election of 1911 the very best farming districts in the lower provinces returned members opposed to the right hon. leader of the Opposition. In the lower provinces the right hon. gentleman has been very highly thought of, but on account of the arrangement which was entered into with the United States by his government, his candidates in those counties were defeated. I do not think I should have entered politics at all if I had not really believed it to be in the best interests of the country, and I know that many Liberals turned against him on that very issue. The farmers of Canada fully appreciate the policy of the present Minister of Agriculture, for they recognize that his is a live, wide-awake department. I am informed also that the western farmers appreciate the work of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the matter of the improvement of transportation facilities.

I would like to ask the hon. members of the Opposition why they did not stand up in the House and insist on the late Government accepting the offer of President Taft instead of a partial or jug-handled agreement, but were content to allow the manufacturers to enjoy protection, whom they always alleged were bleeding the farmers to create bloated monopolists? It appears, to me, Sir, very inconsistent that hon. gentlemen while in opposition should be conducting a campaign in favour of free manufactured goods when they let the opportunity slip in 1911. Although I make this assertion, I desire to say that I am a protectionist; I stand pat for the protection of every industry in Canada, farming and manufacturing alike.

There is another clause in the Address upon which I wish to say a few words, namely redistribution. The people of my province know that in you, Sir, they have a sympathetic friend, and I ask the indulgence of the House while I state the case of Prince Edward Island. I do hope I shall not weary the House, but this is a matter in which I as well as the people I have the honour to represent, feel very much interested.

I offer no apology for referring to a subject which has already been so frequently and so ably threshed out upon the floor of this House and in the press of Canada. To some, the question of representation in the Maritime provinces, and particularly in the province of Prince Edward Island, may not seem to be of that vital importance that it is to the people there; but Mr. Speaker, I hold that no subject that can be discussed here has greater bearing upon the loyalty, the welfare and the solidarity of the Dominion of Canada.

Next September it is proposed to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary, or the golden jubilee of the first conference held in regard to the formation or federation of the then provinces of Canada. It is significant, Sir, that Prince Edward Island, the smallest, but by no means the least important of all the provinces, should be selected as the cradle of Confederation, for it was there that the first conference, which resulted ultimately in the confederation of all the provinces, was held. Now, Sir, under the circumstances, it would be a great deed, a deed of justice, a deed I might say, of righteousness, on the part of the Canadian Parliament, recognizing this great historical fact and the rights guaranteed to Prince Edward Island at the time the contract was entered into between Canada and Prince Edward Island, if the number of her representatives, as named in that contract, was restored. It is well known, Sir, that at the time of that union, the province of Prince Edward Island was given six representatives, although upon the basis of representation set forth in the Quebec terms, its population was not sufficient to entitle it to six members. As a matter of fact, taken on a population basis, the island at that time was only entitled to five. This, Sir, ought to prove clearly that representation of the island was at first not fixed exclusively in proportion of population.

In the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of 1872, in regard to the resolution by which this province was admitted into the Dominion, I find the following set forth in the addresses at that time presented:

> That the population of Prince Edward Island having been increased by fifteen thousand or upwards since the year 1861, the Island shall be represented in the House of Commons of Canada by six members; the representation to be re-adjusted from time to time under the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867.'

It was further contended and insisted upon, that if the province were to enter the union, a representation of six members at least, would be one of the chief conditions.

I could quote extracts from the speeches of the island delegates at the Quebec conference, which showed definitely their reasons for standing out for the six representatives. I could give you the speeches of Messrs. Haviland, Palmer, Grey, Hensley, Howlan and others, but these have all been set forth, together with a splendid representation of our special claims in this matter, by the memoranda submitted by the provincial government. Why Sir, I could go on and quote from the transactions of that period in the provincial House of Assembly and in the Legislative Council, and show, beyond successful contradiction, that the union would never have been consummated, had it not been thoroughly understood that the island was to have six members, and that there was never to be any reduction of that number.

No man who reads the reported speeches of the Island delegates, can have the remotest shadow of doubt. We insisted on six representatives, two for each county, because nothing else would suit our conditions. The rest of the provinces insisted on our having only five, and that based on the population of Quebec. Not being able to agree, we stayed out of the Union. The same problem presented itself in 1873. Our delegates continued to fight then and on the same grounds. Less than six of a representation would give us no proper status or influence at Ottawa. At last the federal government gave way, we were to have six, the question of confederation or no confederation was submitted to the people. We voted for the Union on these terms and no other. Surely it would be a fraud on the electorate of this province for the federal Government to go back on the promise held out to us, forming as it did the main inducement moving us into the Confederation with Canada. The people believed we were to have a minimum representation of six, and that for all time, and voted accordingly. Is there any doubt on this point? Has it ever been questioned? And where is the suggestion anywhere that our representation was to be dependent on the population of Quebec or the rest of the Dominion? We knew that the Dominion would soon fill up with inhabitants. We knew that our population was comparatively stationary. Were we fools enough, were our delegates dishonest enough to lead us into a trap, whereby our members would go on diminishing, till in fifty years, perhaps, we would have none at all? The proposition is too absurd for belief. Then look at our representation in the Senate. Would any sane man believe that we stipulated for four in the Senate and in the same breath stipulated for a membership in the Commons that would soon be less than our representation in the Senate? We respect our senators, but God forbid that we should ever be deemed so disloyal to popular government as to make our voice and influence at Ottawa dependent on our senators!

Then, look at the treatment accorded to Manitoba and British Columbia when they entered Confederation. The latter was granted six members when only entitled to one, and that concession was never revoked. When such concessions were made to these larger provinces, it seems only reasonable that like, or even more generous concessions should be made to the smallest member of the Confederation, without which, despite its smallness, the Confederation would be very incomplete. Why not extend the same treatment to all? That is what is meant by the history and surrounding circumstances.

Again, Sir, it is quite clear from this determined insistence upon six representatives that the Island was not asking for this for a limited time, but as a permanent concession. Had they understood that this representation of six was likely to be reduced, possibly after the very next census taken in Canada, our delegates would not have contended so persistently for it. On the other hand, they evidently regarded six representatives as the smallest number at all consistent with the dignity and importance of a province of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that that view of the matter was apparently at first accepted by this Dominion Parliament, for at the redistribution following the census of 1881 no change was made in the Island's representation, although on a strictly proportional basis it would then be entitled to only five members. But later this course was changed, and after the census of 1891

we were shorn of one of our representatives, and after 1901 of another; and so we have already lost two of the six, and by the Redistribution Bill of this session we stand to lose a third, leaving the representation of Prince Edward Island exactly half of what it was at the time of its entrance into Confederation.

It naturally must follow, as the years pass and the population of Quebec increases at a far greater ratio than that of the Island, that before long there will not be a solitary representative from the province of Prince Edward Island to the Dominion House of Commons, if representation by population be then severely insisted upon. This would create a unique situation because, as far as I can see, it will nullify the contract of union between Prince Edward Island and the rest of the Dominion. Now, Sir, this would be an intolerable situation. Taxation without representation is, under constitutional government, impossible, and into this condition Prince Edward Island is steadily drifting.

Imagine, if you can, Mr. Speaker, the lapsing or the rendering void of the terms of Confederation between the smallest province and this great Dominion. It would be but a beginning of a most dangerous course. It would establish a precedent fraught with danger, danger not only to the little island, but danger to the great nation of Canada and danger to the British Empire, of which we form so important a part. It is not the area; it is not the number of people; it is not the extent of the trade; it is, Mr. Speaker, the part we are of the nation, which is as important, small though we may be, as any of the greater provinces forming the Confederation, which is termed the Dominion of Canada. Is it the intention because the Island is small and its population only about one hundred thousand, is it the intention of the bigger brothers between the Atlantic and the Pacific, to ignore the smaller brother and cast him adrift without a compass, without an anchor, like a derelict of the waves? Canada has already in other ways failed to fulfil its contract. Prior to Confederation, the island had a well established commerce with Great Britain and the West Indies, as well as other lands. The colonies now comprising Canada had only a very small proportion of its commerce. By entering the union, the direction and control of its commerce and industrial development were delivered over to Canada. The independent lines of trade which this island had established, were diverted to Canadian channels, and continuous communication with the mainland followed as a consequence. Before Confederation this island was doubling its population every thirty years. Its revenues doubled every twelve years. If the pre-confederation ratio of increase had been maintained, the population would now be 219,000. It is only right to assume that the unfavourable conditions brought about in the province, were the result largely of the non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation regarding the maintenance of an efficient steam communication both summer and winter between the Island and the mainland.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the report of the delegation from the Island to Ottawa for better terms in the year 1873. It would appear that their demand for six representatives was granted without any reference whatever to further reduction, and they fully believed that they were receiving six representatives as a minimum number.

I have endeavoured to show to this House that one of the chief terms of Confederation between the Island and Canada was the concession of six representatives. I have proved that prior to Confederation our population was steadily and rapidly increasing. I have shown that afterwards our trade and population steadily declined because the terms were not carried out in their entirety. I maintain that Canada is responsible for this condition of affairs and that it is the duty of the Dominion Parliament not to rob or deprive the Island of the representatives justly accorded to it. Otherwise a grave injustice will have been perpetrated, and ere long Prince Edward Island will be altogether cut adrift from the Confederation.

I do not ask for generous treatment from this House. I do not ask favours at the hands of greater powers. I do not present the humiliating spectacle of Prince Edward Island crawling to the Parliament of the Dominion and begging for the restoration of its six representatives, no, Mr. Speaker; on the contrary, I stand upon the floor of this House in the interests of justice, on the firm foundation of right. I stand here as a representative of a people who ask for nothing but their rights, and their rights they must have, if the solidarity of Canada is to be maintained.

There are those who scoff and sneer and scorn to treat with others who may be smaller in circumference, smaller in trade and smaller in population; but let me tell those people that it is from the foundations, the walls and the roof that the fabric of a nation is constructed. Destroy one part of these and the whole thing falls in ruins to the ground. The people of Prince Edward Island were not anxious to enter Confederation. I believe such has been in the order of things to the greater advantage of this wide and glorious country; but I am also firmly convinced that this representation question, which some seem to think of so lightly, may yet prove that power within the nation which, working outward, will shake the very foundations of Canada, and set back our country for years to come.

There are many other phases of this question that I might present to the House; but I do not care to occupy your time further. It is monstrous to suppose that the province is to continue losing its representatives until none are left, because the draughtsman, in drawing up the terms of the union, overlooked the conclusion that would be arrived at as to representation, and neglected to use words necessary to provide for a minimum representation.

I want to call attention to another point. On the Atlantic there is the independent colony of Newfoundland and this great country will never be complete until Newfoundland joins the Confederation and I want to point out this: Prince Edward Island deals very largely with Newfoundland and if our representation is reduced, it will furnish an argument to the anti-confederates in Newfoundland. They will be able to say, look at Prince Edward Island; forty years ago she joined Confederation with six representatives but the Canadian Government has broken its agreement with the Island and now they have only two or three representatives as the case may be. That will be one of the strongest arguments they could use against Newfoundland becoming a part of this Dominion and it is well that the leaders of both parties in this House should take this matter into consideration. I say that it is not too late now to hand back to Prince Edward Island the number of representatives that it had at the time of Confederation.

I am and have always been an ardent supporter of protection for Canadian industries, and I would like to see a resolution brought down granting subsidies to shipbuilding firms in this country. I cannot understand why this Government that appealed to the country with the cry Canada for the Canadians does not at once take hold of this matter. I understand the late Government were prepared to grant such subsidies, and I urge upon this Government to do the same thing. There is another article which is largely produced in this country and which ought to be protected—copper. Our annual output of copper for 1912 amounting to about 80,000,000 pounds. All that was taken away in its raw shape to be refined in other countries. The United States got 75,000,000 pounds and Great Britain the other 5,000,000 pounds. If our Government would subsidize this industry we should see refineries started in Canada giving employment to thousands of our people. What is the use of saying we are in favour of protection if we do not carry it out. We cannot afford to wait and the Government should take hold of these two matters immediately. Let us not worry about the criticism of outsiders, we have the credit and let us go on, or we shall see a young Canadian Government rise up and do this in our stead.

On motion of Mr. E. W. Nesbitt, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Friday, January 23, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. D. O. LESPERANCE (Montmagny): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I read in the Ottawa Citizen and in the Montreal Gazette, both published this morning, an article which is as follows:

Motion to repeal Laurier Naval Act brought down in the House of Commons.

D. O. Lespérance, M.P., for Montmagny, gave notice last night of a Bill to repeal the Laurier Naval Act of 1910 establishing a Canadian navy. Mr. Lesperance is a Conservative, but in taking this action he is not in accord with the Government.

The notice he has given has caused somewhat of a flurry in the House, more especially among the members from Quebec, for in that province, at the general elections, the Act in question was a very big issue.

To Embarrass Minister.

It was rumoured about the House yesterday that a deal was in prospect whereby the Liberals would join with a section of the Quebec Conservatives and vote to repeal the Act on the ground that the Government is not carrying it out, and that while it remains on the statute-book an alternative permanent policy cannot be brought in. There is likely to be nothing in this, however, because, apart from the inconsistency of any such action on their part, the Liberal leaders have little in common with certain interests understood to be behind the move to repeal the Act. The bona fides of this action are also questioned, and allegations are made that it is aimed at a Quebec minister recognized generally as one of the ablest members of the Cabinet. With him certain people are not in accord, and an attempt to embarrass his position is hinted at.

This article contains two distinct accusations and insinuations which I consider as reflecting on my honour as a member of this House and a supporter of the present Government. I wish to give an absolute denial that, I at any time, either directly or indirectly, negotiated or attempted to negotiate with any leader, member, or representative of the Opposition in connection with this Bill. I also give an emphatic denial to the malicious charge that the aim of this Bill is to embarrass a member of this Government. In presenting this Bill I am actuated by a sense of personal honour and public duty, which this House will be in a position to appreciate when I move its second reading.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, resumed from Thursday, January 22.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, coming from Ontario, I should like to join my voice with those of others who have congratulated Their Royal Highnesses upon the restoration of Her Royal Highness's health, and I especially congratulate His Royal Highness because he has been preserved from the greatest calamity that can happen to any man in this world of trials and troubles.

I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address, more especially the mover because I know of nothing that would have a greater tendency to make a man nervous than speaking for the first time in this House, no matter whether he had spoken before other assemblies or not. The mover certainly made a splendid speech; and I have no doubt the seconder did also, although I could not understand what he said. That, however, is my loss.

One or two things were suggested by the mover with which I am not entirely in accord. He said that the Government were at present building up happy homes for working men and artisans. Just at present I do not see much to favour that statement, I am sorry to say; quite the contrary.

He also objected to the Transcontinental Railway in New Brunswick running through fifty miles of virgin forest where there would not be a pound of freight, and stated that the forests would be destroyed. The people living in New Brunswick must be of a peculiar character, because in Ontario a railway going through fifty miles of virgin forest would be considered as the means of developing an enormous quantity of freight. Saw mills would be erected all along the line; and therefore, judging from ordinary humanity, I am sorry that I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman that the Transcontinental would not also develop a certain amount of freight, if not a large quantity, even in New Brunswick.

I am not one of those who were surprised that the Prime Minister did not say anything in the Speech from the Throne with reference to reintroducing his naval contribution, because I imagine that the Prime Minister and the country at large had quite sufficient of that Bill last session. I was rather surprised, however, that the Government did not, in the Speech from the Throne, give us some intimation of what their permanent naval policy would be. They did say that they were going to introduce a Redistribution Bill, and one would think that after the redistribution was completed they would go to the country. In that case, they should be educating the people in regard to their permanent naval policy, if they ever intend to have one. I was not surprised that they dropped the contribution, because I imagine that the country at least did not endorse it. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) said that he thought that, if the three ships had been gone on with, as proposed by the contribution last year, it would have been the means of reducing the armaments of the world. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend should make such a suggestion. I hope that he does not think he can make us believe that he really thinks so, because that is contrary to human nature. My hon. friend himself, if he had an antagonist, no matter in what capacity, mental or physical, would be one of the very last to cease getting prepared, if he thought his antagonist was busy getting prepared. The mere fact of our contributing to an increase in the British navy would have been sufficient, in my judgment, to have stirred the German Empire, which is the nation that has been principally mentioned, to greater effort. We know that the Germans are very human in that regard. We know also that they have the means, because they did not reduce their naval expenditure, while they enormously increased their expenditure on their land forces during last season. That surely is an indication to us that, if we had joined with Great Britain in building more ships, that would have been the very thing that would have made the Germans increase their navy instead of decreasing it. There is nothing else that we could have done that would have assisted Great Britain to a greater extent in arriving at the naval holiday requested by the First Lord of the Admiralty than what we did do. It showed that while we, at least we Liberals, were perfectly prepared to do our share to relieve Great Britain from our defence, we were not willing to enter into preparations for war in Europe. I think we did what the people of Canada expected us to do. With all due deference to the jingo and imperialistic elements in the country, I think the ordinary people who have to make their living, no matter what their vocation, whether farming or labouring, are very well satisfied that the Liberals, by their efforts, were the means of defeating a proposed grant of $35,000,000 towards increasing the naval armaments of Great Britain, which grant would have had the effect of increasing the naval armaments of the other European powers.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman mean that the Liberal policy was such that the Germans would take no stock in it and therefore would not increase their armament?

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman no doubt heard what I said; I think I spoke plainly. As to the attack that the Prime Minister made on the Senate, in my humble judgment, the Senate was absolutely justified in the position it took. I do not think the attack made by the right hon. gentleman will have any effect upon the mass of the people of Canada. The mass of the people, if they never were in favour of the Senate before, I believe, were in favour of its position in that case. The Senate simply asked the Government to carry out its promise and allow the people to express their views on the question. The other day I read in the London Times an article which I ask leave to quote. We all know that, since last session, New Zealand has decided to build its own navy. The following article from the Australian correspondent of the London Times struck me as rather odd in view of what the Times has published from its Canadian correspondent:

Sydney, Oct. 7.

The first Dominion squadron, 'manned, controlled, and paid for,' as Lord Denman said on Saturday evening, 'by the people of the Commonwealth,' has come to show itself to the people who made it. Every one is just a little proud; a little inclined to dilate with more emphasis than is absolutely necessary on 'our boats' and the show they make in and about Farm Cove; a little pleased to remind you that, though the United States fleet was bigger and far stronger in the aggregate, 'our battleship' could blow any two of the vessels out of the water with ease. When that fleet was here the most characteristically Australian result of its visit was a cheerful and immediately popular song to the effect that We're hanging out the sign from the Lecuwin to the Line,

This bit of the world belongs to us!

It was no less characteristic that the people who so boasted at once began to make good the boast. 'We live in hopes,' said Mr. Deakin then, 'that from our own shores some day a fleet will go out not unworthy to be compared in quality, if not in numbers, with the magnificent fleet now in Australia.' Five years have gone by; the flags are up again, once more the main streets are triumphal avenues, and the great public buildings are ablaze every night from tower to basement with coronals and festoons of light; for in that five years such a beginning has been made of the Imperial enterprise which the then Prime Minister foreshadowed as neither he nor any of his auditors could then have dreamt of.

It is impossible not to make comparisons between the two occasions, but I need write down one only. Amid all the enthusiasm and curiosity which marked the crowds of 1908 one note was lacking—the personal—that is very notable to-day. Never before have Australians, especially Australian mothers, watched the entrance of a squadron largely manned by their own boys. 'My boy's on the Sydney, and I must get down to the Heads to see him come in,' said one eager, tearful woman to the tram-driver when he slowed his overladen car on a steep grade. 'Our Tom was on duty when we went over the Australia; he wouldn't look at us, and quite right, too!" a father proudly told his fellow passenger on the ferry this morning. This is the note for the absence of which no amount of contributions, skillfully engineered through Parliament, could possibly compensate. 'Our' ships and 'our' boys will serve the empire better in times of stress than would twice the millions that Australia is spending on them.

That is our answer—at least that is my answer—to the assertions made here last year. I am sorry, as I have said, that the Prime Minister did not see fit to give us some information of what his naval policy will be, for, so far as I know the minds of the Liberals, they are not opposed to doing their duty in any form to assist the mother country and relieve her of the burden of defending this country.

As to the Good Roads Bill, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) thoroughly explained that subject. Of course, we know that the Prime Minister said that this money could have been in the hands of the provinces for use this year, and that the lack of it was a great detriment to the provinces. I remember distinctly hearing him, and also the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane), tell us that it was their intention to give the money under the Good Roads Bill to the provinces according to population. But he will remember that we moved a resolution to the effect that this should be put in the Bill. No person in this House, or in this country, knows better than does the Prime Minister that that is the only way to legislate; no person knows better than he that such a provision should have been in the Bill. Had he been on this side of the House and we on the other, and had our leader made a statement that such and such would be the case but that he did not propose to put it in the Bill, I can quite easily imagine how indignant the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) would have been and how capably he would have discussed that question from the standpoint of the public right, and quite properly too. The hon. member for Red Deer told us that wherever this matter had been properly explained the people did not hold the Liberals to blame. I can endorse what that hon. gentleman said, for I took the trouble to explain the matter to the farmers of our section of the country, and not only did we not get blame, we got praise, and so did the Senate. The Prime Minister seeks to use the failure of the Good Roads Bill to pass as an argument against the Senate, but I do not think that cat will fight.

There is one thing on which I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), and that is on the fact that he has told us that he will bring the Estimates down at an early day. I hope he will carry that into effect. Last year, the time of the House was taken up largely with the discussion of the Navy Bill. The Estimates were not only not brought down at an early day, but they were brought down at an absurdly late day. Every person in the House was tired out. The Minister of Finance, referring to the fact that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) had found fault with the expenses stated that we had voted last year for those expenditures. Now, I was here during all the time of the passing of the Estimates, and I know that we opposed very strongly some of the votes. Of course, we passed them. But why? Because hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had just shown us the power they held over us by passing their pet Bill, the Closure. We knew very well what would be the effect of a prolonged discussion of any of the Estimates. We knew that our friends opposite, who had taken the great power conferred upon them by that Closure, could and would promptly pass the Estimates over our head regardless of our opinions.

Therefore it does not lie kindly with the Minister of Finance to tell us that we voted for the Estimates. After all, the Estimates are theirs, the expenditures are theirs, and they are responsible to the country; and I have not the slightest doubt that the country will hold them responsible. They are aware, as the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) pointed out, of the very extravagant expenditures voted last year. The Minister of Finance says he foresaw the stringency that would affect the country during the latter part of the year, but, so far as I could read from the papers, the enormous and unnecessary expenditures in some lines have gone on. I need not discuss these expenditures. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in discussing the borrowings that he had made this year, told us that his predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, had increased the national debt in 1908 and in the forepart of 1909 by about $100,000,000. I looked up the public accounts after that, and I found that from 1897 to the 31st of March, 1911, the public debt of Canada had increased by $78,503,456. That is to say that when the Liberals came into power in 1897 the public debt was $261,538,596, and on the 31st of March, 1911, it was $340,042,052, making a total borrowing in round figures of $78,000,000. In 1908 and 1909 the borrowings were, in round figures, $100,000,000, but the maturities in 1908 were $37,000,000. So, during the whole time of the fifteen years regime of the Liberal party, the increase of the national debt was, in round figures, $78,000,000.

The Minister of Finance asked the right hon. the leader of the Opposition what legacy the Laurier Government had left him in 1911. He told us about the legacy of protecting the country against loss on the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds. He did not tell us that the real legacy left to him and to the country was a surplus of somewhere about $37,000,000 that year, which was followed during the first year of my hon. friend's regime, as I think he told us, by a surplus of $25,000,000. I know of no finer legacy that could have been left to the Finance Minister or the manager of a large corporation than an immensely profitable business. Canada certainly was in the position, when the Liberal party went out of power, of such a corporation, with an immensely profitable revenue. Yet immediately following that, two years afterwards, we find that the Government in power have not only commenced to lose that revenue to a certain extent, but they have begun to increase the public debt, they have begun to borrow money to carry on their business.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance also said that the Laurier Administration commenced the system of guaranteeing bonds. He said that the policy of guaranteeing bonds was a very bad one. I wondered at the time whether it was worse than giving away immense territories of the country. I wondered if it was worse than the policy that was followed with the Canadian Pacific of giving away, free of taxation for twenty-five years I think, large quantities of land in the western country that properly belonged to the people there. Was it worth these double and treble subsidies that were given to another transcontinental railway? As a matter of fact we did guarantee the bonds both of the Canadian Northern and of the Grand Trunk Pacific in place of making them direct loans. Had we made them direct loans we would have had to borrow the money ourselves, and could probably have done it slightly cheaper. The policy may be bad, but I doubt whether we could have adopted a better policy at the time.

That brings me to this question of the financial stringency of the present day. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance read from the Labour Gazette a lot of notices from different parts of the country, in the fall of 1908, saying that there was a lack of work in the cities at that time. That is true. He read from a speech of my right hon. friend and leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in Montreal, saying that there was no cry during the fifteen years of the Liberal regime of the high cost of living; and to contradict that he read these reports of the Labour Gazette showing that there were at that time men out of employment in the various cities throughout the country. I cast my mind back to that time and I quite appreciate that there were many men out of employment; but, as a matter of fact, there was no great cry or no cry that I remember at all, with reference to the high cost of living. The reason of the stringency in 1907 and 1908, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), was because of the lack of money to pay their way by the bankers of the United States, You all know that while some of us are unwilling to have truck or trade with the Yankees, we follow very closely the events that take place in the United States. We copy them very closely in very many ways, especially in commercial life. Nearly all the banks of the United States in the fall of 1907 and the early part of 1908 practically suspended payment, in fact I am not too sure that Mr. Forgen did not say, before the Banking and Commerce Committee last year, that all the banks of the United States at that time had suspended payment. Certainly most of them did and a great many failures took place. Now, our banks were alarmed that that feeling of unrest would spread to Canada and the consequence was that they reduced the lines of credit to the various manufacturers and commercial interests throughout Canada at that time. The fact is that at that time the banks reduced the lines of credit to the manufacturers and the consequence was that the manufacturers were unable to manufacture up to their limit. There was no lack of orders that I know of, but the state of things this year is quite different. So far as I am aware the banks have been prepared and have supplied the manufacturers throughout the country with all the money they wanted. The commercial interests also could have got all the money they wanted from the banks.

My hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Clare) shakes his head. I do not know what his experience has been, but I am only speaking from my own experience—and I am interested more or less in various manufacturing industries in this country—and my experience has been that the banks were prepared to and did supply this year just as full lines, to put it that way, as last year to the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country. But the manufacturers this year could not get sufficient orders. In 1907 and 1908 the manufacturers could get all the orders they could handle. But so far as I was concerned, we could not get the money to supply the material and labour necessary to fill the orders. Therefore I think our right hon. leader was perfectly justified in stating at Montreal that there was no complaint at that time of the high cost of living. I do not remember there being any great cry about the high cost of living at that time and I must say that probably nobody here was more actively engaged in business of various kinds, though perhaps in a small way, than I was.

The Minister of Finance also told us in an ironical sort of way that our right hon. leader has had many fiscal policies. He told us that at one time he was a free trader as they have it in England and that he is now a free food trader for the moment, and my hon. friend emphasized 'for the moment.' But I did not hear the Minister of Finance say that our right hon. leader had brought about the preference with Great Britain. Our leader did introduce the preference with Great Britain. Perhaps he was an advocate seven years ago of free trade as they have it in England, but at the present time he is an advocate of free food. You will notice that while he may have had many policies, to all appearances different on the surface, yet he has always been consistent. In all his policies his tendency has been to a reduction of duty and so it is to-day. I was present at the meeting in Hamilton and heard the speech of our honoured leader but I did not construe it as the Minister of Finance would like to construe it, that by free food our leader meant the duty being taken off all foodstuffs. I recognize that there are certain classes of foods from which it is not necessary to remove the duty, such as fancy canned goods, fancy cheeses, fancy pickles and that sort of thing, which we get occasionally on the tables of the swell restaurants and hotels, or on the tables of the rich. As far as I am concerned, I have never seen them except on occasions of that kind and I do not think any of us will advocate the removal of the duty on such goods because at the hotels and restaurants goodness knows they charge us enough to pay for the duty. By free food I understood our leader to mean free staple food. I am not speaking for the whole of the Liberal party but simply for myself and that is what I understood him to mean. The Minister of Finance also stated that if the duties were removed from all foods, it would affect according to the statistics of the Year Book, 6,985 establishments with a capital of $133,000,000, employing 252,000 men, paying $14,000,000 in wages every year and using material to the amount of $175,000,000 and with an output of $245,000,000. That is a good argument to use to frighten the people, but when you dissect the proposition of our right hon. leader you will see that very few of those establishments would be affected. The minister went on to say that the output of cheese in Canada for the last fiscal year amounted to $37,232,969, and that there were 3,625 establishments employing men to the number of 6,147. And yet, he said, our right hon. leader proposed to take the duty off cheese. During the reciprocity debate I did not hear that any of our farmers were opposed to taking the duty off cheese. As a matter of fact at the present time the dairying interests of this country are prepared to see the duty taken off cheese if the American duty is taken off. Our dairymen want the American market. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said that the removal of the duty would destroy the cheese factories in this country and I could not help thinking when he was talking, of something I heard when I was a boy. I had an Irish friend who was ridiculing to a certain extent another chap that he was with. The other fellow got angry and said: Do you mean to make a fool of me, and the Irishman replied: No, the Lord took advantage of me; and I say the Lord, through Mr. Woodrow Wilson and the Congress of the United States has already taken advantage of my hon. friend. Let me tell the hon. minister that there will be a lot less cheese factories in Canada next year than there were last year—a lot less in Ontario at any rate and I think Ontario produces the bulk of Canada's cheese. And why? Because while at one time you could tell the farmers that they were entitled to the protection of their products just as the manufacturer is, to-day, so far as I know, there are no farmers that can be deceived in that way any more. They are not afraid of the duties being taken off; they are perfectly willing to have them removed. What they ask for is the open market and cheap transportation. What will happen the cheese industry? As a matter of fact, our export of cheese has been going down for some years. Why? Because, for one reason, there is a great consumption of milk in the larger cities at the present time. Since the Americans took the duty off milk, the price of milk in the western portion of the riding that I have the honour to represent has increased to $1.90 per hundred pounds. They are giving $1.90 per hundred in the western portion of my riding and shipping milk to Detroit. Cheese at 12½ cents is supposed to net the farmers $1. Cheese at a price of 13½ cents, which was paid late this fall, would net the farmers from $1.15 to $1.20 per 100 pounds. The City Dairy Company of Toronto have a depot at Woodstock and dozens of teams come in every morning taking in a territory covered by half a dozen or more cheese factories. They are paying $1.60 per hundred, and they are paying in Thamesford, only 14 miles away, $1.90 and shipping the milk to Detroit. You may ask the question: Why do they not all send their milk to Detroit? The answer is that people in the vicinity of Woodstock had made a contract to deliver their milk in Woodstock. They are also shipping milk from Lakeside on the Canadian Pacific railway to Port Huron and Detroit at $1.90 per 100 pounds. While the farmer may occasionally be told successfully something that you want him to swallow, he is not so foolish that he does not know the difference between $1.20 and $1.90.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance told me, speaking of the commission that had been appointed to look into the high cost of living, that I was reported to have said at Attwood, Ont., that the appointment of the commission was a rotten farce. I am not so sure whether I said it was rotten or not, but I certainly said that it was a farce. I would not be surprised if I did add the other word, because I think that it had the germs of decay in it from the start. It was certainly built on a very tottering foundation and will do no good to the people of this country in so far as a reduction of the high cost of living is concerned. I did say that the appointment of the commission was a farce. I did also say that the main cause of the high cost of living was the lack of production. I still say so, but I also said at Attwood, and I still say to-day, that the Government had it in their own hands a remedy, in so far as it is possible for a government to remedy it, the high cost of living by taking away the duty, by opening the door, so that when goods went too high, no matter what the goods were, on this side of the line, there would be an inducement to the people of the other side of the line that have them to sell to send them over here. That, I think, you will acknowledge, because I think it is a proposition that has a strong basis. If there are no artificial doors, production and supply and demand will regulate the market.

As to mergers or combines, if they are controlling to any extent the food supply of this country, the same would apply. If there is one thing that would do away with the control either by mergers or combines it is the opening of the doors to the other side of the line. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that the combines and mergers on the other side of the line are worse if anything than they are on this side of the line. That may be true in a sense, but there are no persons who fight each other more than these mergers and combines, and it would be some years before the combines on the other side of the line could establish a working connection with the combines on this side of the line, if they wanted to do so in order to affect the cost of food. I am not one of those who think that the cost of food is seriously affected in a wrong way by cold storage. Cold storage may raise the price of food at a certain time of the year, but taking it on the average, the usual effect of cold storage is to keep the price down to a reasonable amount. In the summer time it does increase the price of perishable goods, but if it were not for cold storage at other times of the year the price of food would increase very much more than it does. If there is any combine in the cold storage business I am perfectly willing to see it investigated. I am perfectly willing to see any of these things investigated, but if there is anything in the world that would do away absolutely and entirely with any control of that kind it would be to take off the duties and let food circulate freely. The farmers of this country are perfectly willing that that should be done.

The hon. Minister of Finance says that his proposition to reduce the high cost of living is to educate the farmers, and he illustrates that by the Bill for $10,000,000 that was passed last year for agricultural education. There never was a newspaper, yellow or otherwise, with a bigger headline than that $10,000,000, and there never was a big headline that was a greater deception. It might as well have been $1,000,000 a year and nobody would have paid any attention to it, but it was a great headline, a great advertisement, and nothing more or less in my judgment. I am not opposed to money being spent on the education of the farmers any more than I am opposed to what is being spent on the education of any other class of the people, but I want to tell the House that in so far as I know the farmers and I think I do know them, the farmers of Ontario are quite capable of farming properly if they have the inducement to farm properly. All they ask you for is cheap transportation and open markets. You talk about educating the farmers. The hon. Minister of Finance said that he would educate the farmers in order to do away with the high cost of living. I cannot help but think of the poor fellows that were on the submarine 7A, who went to the bottom of the ocean the other day, and I wondered if it would do them any good if in some years to come somebody undertook to educate the officers and men on submarines as to how to raise themselves from the bottom of the ocean. That very well illustrates the attitude of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance with reference to what he proposes to do for the education of the farmer.

My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) told us the other night that the Government had reduced express rates by twenty per cent, but I always thought it was the Railway Commission that reduced those express rates, and I would remind him that it was the Laurier Government that appointed the Railway Commission and made it possible for any public body in this country to reduce rates. And, if in their wisdom the Railway Commission should reduce freight rates, they will do so because the power was conferred on them by the Laurier Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) also told us that under the new agricultural grant, educational plots of forty acres had been opened in each township or municipality in the West, and he pointed out that this would prove of wonderful service to the people of Manitoba. Well, that depends on the way these forty acre plots will be worked, and while no doubt many of these things have been so carried on as to reflect credit on the people and on those who manage them, others have proved failures. However, I hope this system will be a success in the West. In my section of the country we have nothing of that kind. If the Minister of Agriculture were present I would point out to him that the Ontario Government sends what is called a district representative to my section of the country and he has recently established a class in the collegiate institute for educating the farmers and their sons in scientific agriculture. I cannot help but think that if he would establish such classes once or twice a week in the schools in various parts of the country he would do more good than he would be liable to do in the city of Woodstock, although at the same time he is doing good work there and I have nothing to say against that. But I was wondering if that is to be our share of the agricultural grant. At the various meetings of farmers which I attended this fall, I asked them if they had seen any signs of benefit from these grants which the Government are boasting so much about, and I could not find a farmer anywhere in our county who had heard of any benefit that had accrued.

Let me deal now with the duty on wheat, which is an important question at the present time. I understood from the Minister of Finance and from the Prime Minister that they are not inclined to grant the request of the western farmers for free wheat. I can inform them that, as far as I have been able to find out, the farmers of Ontario, of both sides of politics, have no possible objection to free wheat. So far as I have discussed it with them they say: If the western men think it will be a benefit to them, why not give it to them? After listening to the speech of my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) as to the results in connection with oats and barley and flax, I ask: Why does not the Government rise to the occasion and extend the benefit to wheat? The Government were the means of keeping the people of Canada from getting free markets in the United States two years ago, and if free cereals would be a benefit to the people of the West, why not let them have it? If the manufacturers want a duty put on or taken off any article, I am quite sure this Government or any other Government that might be in power at the time would be perfectly willing to listen to them, and I think it rather strange that while the farmers of the west are unanimous for free wheat, the Government should say to them: You do not know your own business, we will give you protection. I cannot for the life of me see why the Government is disposed to refuse this boon to the farmers of the West, except it may be that they think it will hurt the millers. The milling industry is a large one in Canada, and I grant you it is the duty of all governments to look out for the interests of all the people and to legislate in the interests of the majority, no matter whether they are party friends or otherwise. It may be that this may hurt the miller, but why should it hurt the miller? As a matter of fact the flour made from Manitoba wheat is supposed to be the best in the world. The millers tell me that the millers of Great Britain require a certain amount of Manitoba wheat to mix with the softer wheat from southern countries, and I understand that the millers of Great Britain are ahead of the millers of the United States or of Canada in their system of mixing, which they have reduced to a science. But, after all, the best of their best quality of flour is made from Manitoba wheat. Then, if the Manitoba flour is better than any other flour, why should not western millers mark their flour so that they will get the advantage of that throughout the world? I cannot understand why that cannot be done, because after all people will pay for quality, and in that respect why have not our home millers an advantage over the millers of England and the United States? Of course, there is no possible doubt that if there were free wheat a great deal of western grain would be shipped to the United States by southern routes, and I recognize that we have built transcontinental railways at great expense to carry the grain from the West to the seaboard.

I recognize that fact, and as a Canadian I am proud to see these railways built. At the same time, I can quite appreciate that the Government fear that the grain might be shipped to the south where the western farmers could obtain a better market. If that is not the fear of the Government, then why do they not give free wheat to the people of the West? There must be some reason of that kind. I think that the ordinary every day farmer in the West, with 160 or 320 acres, is not making money; and, if he is not making money, he will not continue to reside there. In that event we shall lose our great market in the West. We who do any manufacturing in the East know that Western Canada has been our greatest market during the last ten years. If these people in the West are not making money—and they cannot make money under present conditions—then why not let them have an open market to the south of them, so that they can put themselves in a position to buy goods from manufacturers in the East. That is the question that faces us and that we have got to decide. I hope the Government will decide it wisely, because it has got to be decided one of these days. You may refuse the market to the people of the West and you may cajole, although I doubt it, the farmers of Ontario to believe that they are protected and that they need protection. For two or three years, however, I have not found a farmer who will claim that he needs protection. He is perfectly willing to compete.

At the present time, in my judgment, you will have to do more than to give free food. The hon. Minister of Finance was absolutely right when he said that there are thousands of industries in this country that, perhaps, are not in a position to compete with the very keen and severe competition from Europe and the United States, because the European and United States manufacturers have greater markets at their command than we have. They have also got their business down to a greater science. We manufacturers in Canada will have to learn to systematize our business; but, at the same time, while there are thousands of industries in this country to which we must give a certain amount of protection, there are others that compete now in the open markets of the world. Why should they be protected here? There are some of the latter industries that come into direct touch with the farmers, and I, as a farmer, may tell you that, while there may be no combines in other lines of business in this country, the sellers of agricultural implements have a peculiar way of showing competition. To save your life, you cannot in our country buy a plough or a binder or any other agricultural implement that I know of from one salesman a particle cheaper than you can buy it from another. That is a strange thing, but I have tried it time and again. In my humble judgment, the prices are also too high. These sellers will be forced, if the duties are removed or lowered to a great extent, to come into keener competition, and that will be a benefit to the farmers. The farmer cannot afford to do everything. He will be perfectly willing to give up any protection that he may have, either on his animal products or his cereals. He also will require something that this Government can give him, that this Government will be forced to give him. The time is coming, and we may just as well make up our minds to do it, as you cannot cajole the farmer any longer into thinking that he is protected by protection. He knows that he is not, he knows that he can compete, but he also wants a fair show in the open market. The hon. Minister of Finance, I dwell on what he says, because what he says to the country should be important—tells us that instead of spending the money on the Transcontinental railway, it would have been better had we spent it on agricultural education. At the time the Transcontinental railway was started, there was the greatest possible demand from the West for a means of moving the crop. We heard from one end of the country to the other the cry: What is the use of growing the crop when we cannot get it out, when it rots in the field? That is why we spent the money in building this new Transcontinental railway to move the crop. This last day or two I have heard speakers on the other side of the House say, with the greatest of pride, that there was no block in the moving of the crops this year. Why? Because otner railways had come in to assist the Canadian Pacific railway in the moving of the crops. The building of the other railways, the mere fact of the suggestion that other railways would be built made the Canadian Pacific railway improve its rolling stock and double-track its line. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are like all other corporations. I have nothing to say against any corporation. Let them do the best for themselves. The Canadian Pacific railway are absolutely sane, and they will not do anything until they are forced to do it, and they were forced by competition and nothing else to improve their rolling stock and their facilities for moving the grain. If it had not been for that compulsion, there would be still the same old story, and the grain would be rotting on the ground there still as it did several years ago. That has been improved upon. If it will improve the opportunities of the people of the West to have an open market to the south, although the railways may suffer to a certain extent, the railways will look after themselves. If the grain is taken to the south, it has still to be carried to the markets in the east to the south of us. Why cannot our railways carry it to those markets just as cheaply as the railways on the American side of the line can? I think they can; and what is more, I think they will.

The people of the West tell us also that the transportation charges are too high. They tell us that if they grow wheat, say at Regina, and they get sixty-five cents a bushel for it, that is not sufficient money to pay them. I have figured it up time and again with some of the best farmers to be found in the West, and I do not believe it is sufficient money to pay, except to farmers in a very large way of business. Remember that the country is not made up of farmers in a large way of business, and after all it is the ordinary farmer whom we must consider; it is the ordinary businessman whom we must consider. It is not the exceptions that we must consider in legislation of any kind. I could not help but smile when I heard my hon. friend (Mr. White) say that it would have been better if we had spent the money on agricultural education that we spent in building the Transcontinental railway.

There was another thing, very funny, that I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Finance say, and that was when discussing a statement made by my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) as to the duty on agricultural implements. He said that under reciprocity the duty was only reduced to fifteen per cent, which, he said, would have been there for evermore. The whole challenge from end to end of the land, when the reciprocity discussion was on, was that reciprocity was simply the thin edge of the wedge. But now the Minister of Finance tells us that this duty of 15 per cent would have been left there forever if we had passed the reciprocity agreement. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not always consistent, but surely he is quite as consistent as hon. gentlemen opposite, especially as consistent as the Minister of Finance when he makes ironical remarks. The whole question at this time, after all, is, what is best in the interests of the country, not a question of what is best in the interests of the Liberal party or in the interests of the Conserva- party. I believe that at heart we all recognize that. There is no denying the fact, I am sorry to say, that there is privation and hardship in the country at this time. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said that times will improve. I believe as firmly as I believe that I am speaking to you now that, unless there is some change in the administration of the country for the benefit of the West, the times will not improve there. They say to the people of the West: Go into mixed farming. They might as well tell me to go into flying. It takes money to go into mixed farming, and it takes time. It is the same as with the agricultural education which the Minister of Finance advocated. It is true you may educate the farmer to a better system of farming under which he will grow more grain. The farmers in Ontario could raise from two to three times as much as they are raising now on the land which they use if they would farm properly. But it takes time to bring about these changes. In the meantime, what are the people on these 160-acre farms, and 320-acre farms—the small farmers of the West—going to do? Such a man, if his farm does not pay him, will desert his farm and let it fall into the hands of the mortgagee, and that will be a great setback to the country. He requires relief; he knows what that relief should be, and why not give it to him?

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron): Mr. Speaker, speaking, as I do, for the first time from my seat in the front row of the Government side in this House, I trust you will excuse my diffidence and not allow any imperfection in my presentation of the matters which I wish to submit to prevent you from giving due attention to the facts which I desire to lay before you, and through you before this House.

I was disappointed at not seeing in the Speech from the Throne some reference to the transportation question in relation to the great inland waterways of Canada. I fear that many hon. members, coming as they do from parts of Canada distant from the centres of lake traffic, have no idea of the hugeness of that traffic. To convey to you some idea of what that traffic means, I desire to lay a few facts before you. Sir, we are fortunate in having in Canada a waterway of thousands of miles—to put it accurately—2,384 miles—reaching from the head of salt water navigation to the heart of the country and affording, to a great extent, deep-water navigation to the heart of the continent and making the line of least resistance for the traffic of the one hundred millions of people who line that waterway. To illustrate the size of this traffic, let me give a comparison of canal tonnage. Take the great Suez canal which now takes the traffic of the entire continent of Europe and the British Islands through to Australia and the Orient,—that traffic which originally went around the Cape of Good Hope—and we find that in the year 1911 there were 5,200 vessels passed through that canal, with a freight tonnage of 25,000,000 tons. In the year 1911 there passed through the Sault Ste. Marie canal 25,000,000 vessels. In the year 1913, instead of 25 000,000 of freight, as in the case of the Suez canal, there went through the Sault Ste. Marie canal, 79,718,344 tons of freight. And I am proud to say that the quantity which went through the Canadian Sault Ste. Marie canal was 5,674,943 tons more than went through the United States canal at that point. Add to this the traffic that comes through from Lake Michigan on which are the great cities of Chicago and Milwaukee, and the traffic which comes from our own Georgian bay, and it will easily be seen that the amount in the year 1913 must have been over 100,000,000 tons. This immense traffic on its way to the lower lakes passes in front of the riding which I have the honour to represent. But it will be seen that the questions involved in this traffic are not local questions merely but are of national importance. On the 9th of last November, Sunday evening, while the people on shore were in church, there occurred on the Great Lakes, a catastrophe absolutely appalling, the greatest that ever happened either on the ocean or on the lakes affecting Canada or the United States. The gale that arose at that time wiped out of existence fourteen great steel steamships, eight of them disappearing absolutely, not a soul aboard being left to tell the tale. The loss was 205 stalwart young men. And the vessels, as I have indicated, were not old, unseaworthy hulks, but fine steamships. One of them had been on the ocean for years. Another had been built in a Canadian port. And when the representatives of the owners of that vessel in the city of Toronto were told that the steamship Carruthers had been lost they simply laughed; they said that no gale on the lakes could hurt her. She was a vessel over 600 feet long, and had been built by the best men on the continent. One steamship 505 feet long, laden with 9,740 tons of coal, turned over as if she had been a cork, without a scratch. Of the great number of young men who were lost in front of that port, sixty-four bodies were recovered. Only one of these had been drowned, the others had all died from exposure, and no bodies were recovered so far that had not life belts on. I refer to the vessels by name, the Carruthers, the Wexford, an ocean steamship which had been on the lakes for years, formerly in the Mediterranean trade; the Regina, a Canadian boat; the Price, the one of 505 feet long that was overturned with 9,700 tons of coal; the Argus, the Hydrus, the McBean, and Scott. These boats, Sir, could have been saved—I say so here from the evidence that was given at the inquest—not a soul need have been drowned, had we been advanced in our aids to navigation. They have on the ocean a wireless call, I believe S.O.S., which gives notice when a boat is in distress, but this is an entirely different proposition. There is no boat in the world that could have lived or effected a rescue in that sea at that time with the heavy snow storm that then prevailed. To show you the force of the storm, I may say that one boat which was cast ashore on the American side, on which there was an insurance of $300,000, had a hole broken by the sea in her iron plates in the bow, into which you could put a barrel. Her inside bulkheads saved her until she went ashore—in fact all the boats that went ashore were saved.

Nothing could better illustrate the danger of the approach to Goderich harbour in a northwest gale than the fact that since the tragedy of November three steamers on three different occasions had attempted to enter that port in a northwest gale but had to put back to the open water. I contend that had the port which I represent and, which for the last ten years, the Government of this country have designated a port of refuge, and have been trying to make a port of refuge, had that port been a foul weather port instead of a fair weather port, and had there been a wireless station with a hurricane call, there was not one of those boats that could not have been in shelter inside of three hours. As a basis for that opinion, I give you the record as produced at the inquest of the weather bureau in the city of Toronto. On Friday morning, the 7th of November, the weather bureau sent out to the stations a warning that there was a strong northwest gale coming. The stations of all the upper lakes put up signals to that effect so that every captain had warning. That was on Friday the 7th. That storm continued through the 7th, and through the night of the 7th and on the 8th, but abated on the evening of the 8th. In the morning of the 9th of November the barometer on all the ships went up; the northwest storm signal was still up, but the storm had abated and the Kamanistiquia left Goderich for Fort William at seven o'clock on the morning of the 9th of November. At half past ten o'clock she met the Wexford thirty-five miles northwest of Goderich bound for that port, but that boat and her crew were never seen afterwards. At 10.40 o'clock on the evening of the 8th of November, the weather bureau in Toronto, according to the evidence in Toronto, had distinct information and evidence that there was a northwest hurricane approaching. They were asked why they had not sent out that notice. They said that the telegraph lines were not working. They were asked why they did not use the telephone. I think, Sir, that on one or two occasions since then I have seen telephone messages sent to the lighthouse after the telegraph service was closed, to bring word of a storm. We have at Goderich the highest point on the whole of the shore of 200 odd miles, it is 120 feet above the water. To the north and south of the town the shore declines. I have asked that we should have a wireless telegraph station there. Even with the harbour entrance protected as I hope it will be, there should be still this extra call, because of late years the captains have not placed much credence in the weather bureau reports.

As to the importance of this port which I have the honour of representing, and to show you that this is not a local or parochial matter, but a national matter, we are a link in the great chain of inland navigation from our great northwest to the sea, and you all know that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. We do not compete with the great ports on the Georgian bay, Collingwood, Owen Sound, Depot Harbour or Meaford. Our trade is entirely different, although we are eight miles nearer to Fort William and have a straight open course from the entrance to Sault river. The port with which we do compete is the port of Buffalo. To show you how the grain which is grown in Canada and should go through Canadian transportation systems is drafted away, I merely cite that up to the first of last September, 31,483,952 bushels of wheat; 2,465,490 bushels of oats; 1,721,679 bushels of barley; 6,319,303 bushels of flax, making a total of 41,990,990,423 bushels, went through the port of Buffalo from Fort William and Port Arthur.

We have in Goderich two large industries, one an elevator of over one million bushels capacity, which this year and the year before made over 50 per cent of its total value in earnings. That elevator is owned by people in western Ontario; every miller, in almost every town in western Ontario, from Toronto, Guelph, and London, to the Great Lakes, has stock in that company. We also have a mill which is directed by and connected with the Winnipeg Western Canadian Milling Company, with a capacity of one million, and that mill grinds every day over two thousand barrels of flour from Manitoba wheat. That flour is shipped to every place in Canada. The stockholders of that mill are in almost every place in Canada showing you what I said is the fact, that the matter is not one of local concern only.

To show you that the water traffic that passes through lake Huron is the greatest in the world I would cite the traffic of the great port of London which, during the year 1912, had 37,676,142 tons of freight and the great port of Liverpool which had 30,273,355 tons, the two together not making much more than two-thirds the amount which passes through lake Huron. All of this traffic is diverted to the other side of the lake because on our side of the lake there is no port with an entrance properly protected in case there is trouble from the northwest. We have a marine engine works in Goderich second to none in Canada engaged in building engines and repairing boats for this Dominion. Were that entrance properly protected a great trade would develop there. When I say we do not compete with the Georgian bay ports we do in this way: Every dollar that is spent on a port in the Georgian bay is for the trade that goes to that port, while there is no dollar spent in Canada on public work which can produce the result that would be secured if spent to protect this harbour on this two hundred and seventy miles of coast line, on the second largest lake in the world which has a depth of six hundred feet. I contend, contrary to some statements of one or two at the inquest—and the matter was gone into exhaustively, and all the marine evidence that could be was taken—that the plans as set out by the engineers of this Government are amply sufficient to make that a safe harbour. The only thing necessary is that it should be done at once, not piecemeal. This is not a matter of politics, it concerns one side of this House just the same as the other. There is only a certain amount that need to be expended and a great deal would be saved by quick completion because owing to the conformation of the harbour it now fills in each year, involving yearly expenditures for dredging. In the name of Canada, I ask this Government, and this House, in the interests of the country and in the interests of humanity, to make this port a safe port of refuge as it was formally constituted by this Government many years ago, and I ask that it should be completed at once.

It is to be noticed that after the recent disaster the United States Lake Carriers Association spent thousands of dollars in rescue work on our shore and paid for the rescue and other costs irrespective of whether the sailor found was a citizen of the United States or of Canada. Every dollar properly spent in public improvements is well spent. Too much cannot thus be spent.

In that connection I would like to recall to the House a Bill which I had the honour of introducing in Parliament some years ago. It was a Bill, a very proper Bill, I think, in reference to the load line on ships —Bill No. 98, January 20, 1911. I think our ships on the Great Lakes should have a load line. While it has always been contended by ship owners that a vessel properly built with proper steam capacity and properly loaded would be safe in any storm, the recent disaster proves the contrary to be the case. The only Canadian boat saved that went through the storm was the Kaministiquia. She was absolutely light and left the harbour of Goderich ten hours after the weather bureau in Toronto knew there was to be a northeast hurricane on the Great Lakes. The hurricane began at three o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday the 9th of November, and it was all over apparently that evening because the watches of all the men were found stopped about the same time.

There is another matter which seriously affects the people of western Ontario. I know more of western Ontario than other parts of Canada and I hope other parts of the Dominion are not affected as much as we are in the east. I refer to bank interest. Bank interest has recently been raised from 6 to 7 or 8 per cent. I know that because when I applied for some money to come down here to discharge my duties as a legislator I was told that I should have to pay 8 per cent on the money, although I believe the law says they cannot collect 8 per cent. But we cannot afford to go to law with a bank. I contend—and I ask the Minister of Finance to bear this in mind, for I have already brought this matter before the House—that when a bank raises its interest on loans from 6 to 7 per cent, it should also raise the rate it pays to depositors from 3 to 4 per cent. If they were compelled to do this it would benefit a great number of people because it is well known the farmers of western Ontario have many millions of dollars in the banks at 3 per cent. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways.

I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to another matter which has been called to my attention in several communications and to which a great deal of publicity has been given in the press. I refer to some indemnity being given to a man or his family in the case of a man who has been imprisoned and afterwards found to be absolutely innocent of the offence with which he was charged. In the year 1907 I drew up a Bill at the request of some legal gentlemen in Toronto, men of large and kindly spirit, but on presenting the same to the law officers of the House I was informed that I could not present the Bill as it was a Bill including the expenditure of money and must therefore be introduced by a member of the Government. Here is one letter which I have just received in connection with this matter:

> Let the country know that Parliament had been given the opportunity to clean the skirts of Canadian justice, over this gross miscarriage of justice. It seems to me, that it is one of the strangest travesties of our laws, that there is absolutely no redress, from the State, in cases of the kind, where innocent men are punished, and imprisoned by the State, on the principle that 'The King can do no wrong' when every one knows that a cruel wrong has been perpetrated by the representatives of the King, in the name of justice. Surely a compensatory Act could be framed to meet just such cases. That the King can do no wrong is surely a survival of mediæval darkness, and the blind worship of an ancient fetish, that no legal redress can be obtained from the State, when the liberty of the subject has been subjected to gross injustice by the same State.

I do not believe that there will be very many cases requiring this kind of compensation. For eighteen years I was in charge of the criminal jurisdiction of one of the largest counties in Ontario, and I remember discussing this matter with the jailer who was a man of great thought. He stated that in the whole of his many years' experience as a jailer he only knew of one man who had been imprisoned and afterwards found not guilty.

The hon. gentleman who last spoke made some remarks in reference to the navy. I do not purpose entering into that question, but I would ask this Government if they could not see fit, in the interest of the sea-faring men of the Great Lakes and of Canada generally, to enter into negotiations with the mother country by which five or six large cruisers could be sent here at the Christmas season of the year in order that the young sailor men and fishermen of Canada, who have nothing to do from the end of November to the first of April, might be allowed to take a cruise from Halifax or St. John to the West Indies or other places, and to exercise with the big guns, they to be paid their wages by the Dominion of Canada during that period, and, after three years of such exercise and winter cruising, to be called naval reserve men, and paid a certain amount in consideration of the fact that they would be at the beck and call of the State when needed. I agree with Lord Fitzwilliam, and other authorities, that the one great need of the British navy is men, and as we have 80,000 odd fishermen and sailors who have nothing to do during this portion of the year, and who would only be too glad of the three months' training and service with the guns, I contend that this would be a very effective way of showing our loyalty to the empire. These men, I think, would be fully entitled to the amount which they would receive up to a certain age limit after passing through their three years of training. There is no more deserving class in Canada than these men who are fishermen or sailors on the Great Lakes or the sea coasts of Canada. The farmer in our fine country knows very well when he goes to bed at night that when he wakes up in the morning he will find his fields in front of him, and his barns in their proper places; or, if they are not in their places, he will find his insurance policy, and not be at any loss if anything occurs while he sleeps. But the poor fishermen, generally hardy men of no great means, when they go to sea, have no idea whether they shall ever return or whether they shall find their nets or what they are looking for. It would be a deserving payment to men of that class.

There was one more question brought forward by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt); that was in reference to immigration. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that I had a Bill before this House at one time to restrict immigration from certain parts of Europe. I refer to the southern parts of Europe. I think we should take warning from the example of the great nation to the south of us. From the time of the formation of that nation until 1830 they doubled and trebled in population out of the loins of their own people. They grew strong in stature and intellect. From 1830 to 1880 they doubled and trebled with an immense immigration, but where from? From the proper parts of the Old World in which to get a good class of immigrants—from the British Isles, from the north of France, from Denmark, Germany, Sweden, Norway, and they still grew a nation of men and women strong in stature and mighty in intellect. I do not say this of my own knowledge, but I take it from the report of the United States Commission appointed to investigate that matter under oath, and on the authority of that report I make the statement that from the year 1880 until the present day that nation has deteriorated, both in regard to the stature and intellect of its people. Why? Because of the immigration of nearly a million people a year from southern Europe. There is only one way to remedy the high cost of living, and that is to produce more. We do not want a nation of organ-grinders and banana sellers in this country. They will not assimilate with us, but they send the money they make back to the Old Country. All you have to do is to ask the Dominion Government post office as to how much is sent over every year. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you will give due consideration to these matters that I have brought be-

5 p. m. before you. I think they are of great concern to the people of Canada, and I thank you, Sir, for the kind indulgence which you have shown me.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysboro): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Lewis). He always makes an interesting speech when he addresses the House. I look upon him, Sir, as a sort of radical among the supporters of the Government, and I doubt not that his gaze pierces further into the future than does that of some of his colleagues on the other side of the House. I am not an expert in regard to steamers on the Great Lakes and the question of wireless telegraphy, but I wish to assure my hon. friend that we on this side of the House are very much interested in making traffic on the Great Lakes as safe as it can be made, and if it is necessary to have wireless telegraph stations built on the Great Lakes in order that the ships may be able to find their way safely, then I think I can assure him that the Opposition will vote for any measure of that kind that is proper and right. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) raised a question in regard to the traffic on the Great Lakes that I expected my hon. friend from Huron to make some reply to. He informed us that there is a combine controlling that traffic, and that the western wheat is compelled to pay some two or three cents a bushel more than usual on account of that combine. I expected my hon. friend to deal with that question and to advise the Government what he supports in regard to it. It will be necessary, I suppose, for the Government to send out an S. O. S. call to the farmers of this country within the next two years, and that question of traffic on the Great Lakes and the cost of conveying wheat from Port Arthur to Montreal ought to be a very interesting one to my hon. friend. In regard to the breakwater that my hon. friend wants built in his county, I scarcely know what to say. I am not able to get a breakwater for myself or for my constituents from this Government. I think that the best I can do for my hon. friend is to refer him to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). If he can make out a case, if he has a close constituency, and if it is necessary that a breakwater should be built in order to win the next election, then I think he should have a pretty good chance of getting his breakwater.

In regard to the Speech from the Throne itself, there are two or three questions that we all agree about. We all agree with respect to the reference as to the pleasure the country feels in the restoration to health of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught. We all agree that the time has arrived when the redistribution of the constituencies should be dealt with. But, otherwise the Speech from the Throne appears to me to be an attempt to make the ship of state look seaworthy by plugging holes above the water line and paying no attention to the bad planks or the worm-eaten hulk below the water line where all the trouble exists. It is the duty of a leader to lead; it is the duty of a government presiding over the destinies of a country like this, in a commercial crisis such as we have to-day, to point the way, and when a government fails to point the way as this Government has failed, it is the duty of the Opposition to do so. I submit that my leader has not failed in this respect. In the very able and interesting speech he delivered on Monday, he indicated several ways in which relief could be given to the country; first, by granting wider markets; second, free wheat; third, lessening of the burden of taxation on the farmers; fourth, relief from the operation of trusts and combines; fifth, lessening the undue margin between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. Any one of these reforms if brought about would confer untold benefit upon the people of this country, but we look in vain in the speech for a mention of any of them. There is not a word of cheer in this speech for the people whom I have the honour to represent. There is not a single ray of hope for the fishermen of the Maritime provinces, who may be seen on these frosty winter mornings pushing out their boats into the surf to search for cod and haddock among the whitecaps on our stormy coast. There is not a word of cheer in that speech for the hard-working farmer; there is none for the man who swings his pick in the coal mines or the gold mines of my province, or for the man who swings his axe in the lumber woods. These are the kind of people I have the honour to represent, and any man ought to be proud to represent them.

In my view, the reason why this speech contains no word of cheer for the working men and consumers of this country is because the Government does not represent the people of this country. This Government was elected by the combines; it is owned by the combines and it does not now and never did represent the people of Canada. Some may think this is pretty strong language, but I do not mean to imply that all my hon. friends on the other side of the House are consenting parties to that state of affairs. On the contrary I know that many of them are high-minded public men and would not tolerate any outside influence on the Government if they knew of it. But the inside operations of this Government are only known to a few men who work the machine. This proposition that I am making is of its nature a very difficult one to prove. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, in New Testament times how difficult it was to distinguish the saint from the sinner, and a test was applied: by their fruits ye shall know them. That test holds as good to-day as it did nineteen hundred years ago. I submit, Sir, there is strong evidence to be found in the conduct of the Government since they come into power, to go to the jury, to show they are tied up with the combines and trusts in this country. In the first place, who were the 18 prominent men in the city of Toronto who led the revolt against the Laurier Administration in 1911? Was there a representative farmer, or a representative artisan, or a representative fisherman among these eighteen? Not one. Every one of these eighteen men were rich men, men of wealth, who left the Liberal party—I was going to say not for patriotic but for financial reasons. These eighteen men became protectionists and Conservatives, not because there was any advantage to the labourers and consumers of this country by their doing so, but because their safes were full of bonds and debentures and shares of corporations, and the profits of these corporations were flowing into their pockets. They were not thinking about the labourers and the consumers; they were thinking about the coupons on these bonds. These eighteen millionaires inspired by this coupon patriotism, were largely instrumental in bringing the province of Ontario into line for the Conservative party at the last election, and it is now up to the Government to do their part and to stand by the men who put them where they are. I must say that the Government is doing that to the best of its ability. My proposition is, that this Government is controlled by the big interests, and I want to be permitted to call witnesses to to prove that statement. The first witness I will call is the Toronto World. The Toronto World, as every hon. member of this House knows, is controlled and directed by a prominent member supporting the Government, a man occupying a seat in the front row on the other side of the House and who is a loyal supporter, I think I can say, of the present Administration. He does register a kick once in a while, but when the time arrives he comes back and as a rule he votes in support of the party measures of the Government. I think I can say he would be one of the last men to allow anything to be said in his newspaper in regard to the present Administration that he did not believe was true. My hon. friend from York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is a candid man and when he sees a shovel he calls it a shovel. The article I am going to quote from appeared in the Toronto World three or four days after the defeat of the Government candidate in South Bruce, and my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) was endeavoring to find some explanation for the defeat of the Government candidate in that riding. This is what he says:—

> But the most significant fact of the election is the lack of leadership in their province of the Ontario ministers.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that he does not indicate that there is any lack of leadership among the Ontario members; it is a lack of leadership among the Ontario ministers he emphasizes. (Reading):—

> Ontario won the lest election, but the Government is anything but an Ontario Government; it is a Western-Maritime-Government, controlled in Montreal and its policy and legislation is not Ontario-desired legislation but legislation desired by the banks, by the railways, and dictated from Montreal. Ontario which put up the lines of the fight of two years ago and won the seats is represented by ministers who were not able to hold South Bruce and who are treated with some contempt by the more astute politicians who sit in the ministry from the plains of the fertile West. More than wheat grows there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a very significant statement: more than wheat grows on the plains of the fertile West. We have some positive statements in this article. One is that this Government is controlled in Montreal. He goes on to say:

Not only the legislation alone, but the policy of the Government is dictated by the railways and the banks and the big interests in the city of Montreal.

Now, there could not be a more sweeping indictment against any Government, and I wish you to note that this indictment is made by a man who ought to know.

That is not all. In addition to the outside influences that we are told control this Government, there is a system of internal boss rule. Special reference is made to an astute minister from the plains of the fertile West, who not only controls the ministry, but treats with contempt the members of the Cabinet who come from the province of Ontario.

In Japan, before they adopted western ideas, some fifty years ago, we are told that there was an official called the great Shogun, who had complete control of all the legislation and of all the official business of the Empire of Japan. He was supposed to be second in rank to the Emperor; but he was not second to the Emperor in power; in fact, he had authority above the Emperor himself. He had complete control in the Empire of Japan. When the great Shogun said: Go, the people went; and when he said: Do this, they did it; for, if they did not do it, why, their heads were cut off.

To speak plainly, my reading of this article which I have just submitted to you, Sir, is that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) suggests that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) is the great Shogun of this Government, and that this great Shogun goes so far as to treat the Ministers from the province of Ontario with contempt. I do not call this witness, however, for the purpose of showing that there are dissensions in the Cabinet. I produce this evidence for the purpose of showing that the policy and the legislation of this Government are dictated by the big interests. If any one on the other side of the House disputes that fact, I would ask him to fight it out with my hon. friend from South York.

The second witness I am going to produce is no less a gentleman than the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen).

We all know that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a man of very great ability and energy. When he took up the important portfolio of Marine and Fisheries, very high hopes were entertained of him in the Maritime provinces; and I have no doubt that it was felt on all sides that he would administer the affairs of the department for the development of the great fishing industry of this country. I feel sure that he would have lived up to those high expectations, if he had not in some cases been ruled by outside influences.

Let me give you an example of how the Department of Marine and Fisheries is dictated to by the big interests. There is an old regulation, which was passed, I understand, in the year 1894, prohibiting the export of sockeye salmon from the province of British Columbia. It was not a tariff regulation; it was absolute prohibition. The fisherman who caught the salmon could not sell them to the American buyers. If he did so he incurred the penalty of confiscation of his boat and his license, and he was put out of business. He must sell to somebody within the province of British Columbia, or not sell at all. That was a regulation which occasionally bore hard on the fishermen. I have been told by hon. members from British Columbia that often the price on the south side of the line was better than the price on the British Columbia side, and even on some occasions the canners in British Columbia would not purchase the fish from the fisherman at all, and that he had to dump them back in the sea. I am not dealing just now with the question as to whether that regulation is a bad one or a good one. It was passed by the old Conservative Government in 1894, and has existed throughout the whole period of the Liberal Administration up to the present time. It may be a bad regulation or it may be a good one; but the question that I am discussing is that the Conservative members from the province of British Columbia, when they were in opposition, took the ground that it was a bad regulation, and that it ought to be repealed. My hon. friend the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) was the champion of the fishermen on different occasions for ten years during the time of the late Administration. I often listened to the speeches on that question and I used to think that he made out a pretty strong case. In order that I may give him fair play, I shall quote his own words as they appear in

'Hansard' referring to this regulation. They are to be found on page 8424 of 'Hansard' 1910-11. He was applying at that time for the repeal of the regulation. He makes the statement that there is an absolute fish combine among the canners of British Columbia. Then he goes on to charge Mr. Brodeur, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, not only with preventing them from selling their fish on the Canadian side by limiting the number of licenses, but with prescribing an absolute prohibition of export so that when a Canadian fisherman has 400 or 500 fish in his boat ready to sell, and no Canadian canner will buy them, and when an American canner within a few miles away holds out his hand for those fish, the minister says, I prohibit you by force of law taking those fish across the boundary line. My hon. friend from New Westminster described the regulation as a cruel one. He goes on to say:

> We find the Minister of Finance standing up for the capitalists against the fishermen. The minister should be of all men the first to stand by the poor fisherman who is not able to protect himself.

Later on in the same debate, he speaks as follows:

> Under the law as it has stood the fishermen are absolutely prohibited from selling their fish on the American side. They are prohibited from exporting it at all, but the canners have not been prohibited from importing fish. Upon bringing it into the country, it is true, they pay a duty, but as they export the greater part of their product, that duty, minus a very small charge for office fees, is always refunded to them, so that the transaction costs them nothing more than putting up a cheque from the time they bring the fish into the country until the time they export it.

After the present Government came into power, I must say it is to the credit of my hon. friend from New Westminster that he endeavoured to carry out his promise to the fishermen. In the session of 1912, the matter was brought before the House. I think it came before the House on the motion of my hon. friend the member for Comox-Atlin (Mr. Clements). Several hon. gentlemen from British Columbia on that occasion repeated the old protest against this regulation. They said it was a bad regulation; that it should never have existed, and they demanded its repeal. They said it was not in the interests of the fishermen, and that it was altogether in the interests of the canners. They condemned the Laurier Administration for not having repealed it. After the discussion which lasted for a day, I think, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) summed up the debate. He denounced the regulation. He said he was surprised that such a regulation could be possible. He stated that he had already repealed it and that statement was received with tremendous cheers by his supporters from the province of British Columbia. We on this side of the House thought that our friends on the other side had scored a kind of victory over us. Let me read a part of the minister's speech on that subject. I quote from page 2492 of the 'Hansard' of 1912. This debate took place on the 5th of February, 1912. The minister said:

> The effect of that regulation was this: A boat might catch 300 or 400 salmon and on bringing its catch to the cannery would find a notice posted up to the effect that on that day the cannery would not take more than 100. One would think that the fisherman could then take his fish to the American or some other market; no, under the regulations he was absolutely prohibited from doing so, so that he had to dump his extra supply, in come cases 200 or 300 salmon, back into the sea.
> Acting on representations or representatives from British Columbia endorsed by the officials of my department on Saturday last I had that regulation repealed, so that now the fishermen can send their fresh fish to other markets than to the canneries.
> The regulation we have repealed was probably passed years ago, before the fisheries were properly understood, and when probably some wealthy men had sufficient influence to have this regulation made in their own interest. It was then continued in force from year to year until it became a serious scandal and a great subject of grievance to the fishermen.

I wish you to mark these words of the minister: 'On Saturday last I had that regulation repealed.' Now, Mr. Speaker, you will be surprised to learn that this regulation was not repealed at all and that it is still in full force. What is the explanation? No sooner was this declaration of the minister's sent abroad in the newspapers than the combine in British Columbia woke up and for the next day or two kept the wires hot with messages to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the Prime Minister, to everybody who, they thought had influence with the Government. We had these telegrams placed on the table last year in response to an order of this House, and from that return I wish to quote. The first telegram which I will quote is addressed to Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and is signed by W. D. Burdis, secretary of the British Columbia Canners' Asociation. This association, I am told, represents all the large canneries in British Columbia. There is evidence of this in the papers submitted to the House. Among these are the following: The Fraser River Canning Association, Limited, British Columbia Salmon Cannery, Canadian Canning, Limited, the British Columbia Canning Company, Limited, the British Columbia Packers' Association, Limited, the Anglo-British Columbia Packing Company, and the Wallace Fisheries, Limited. All these fish canning companies are in this combination, represented, we are told, by Mr. W. D. Burdis, who signs this telegram:

To Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

Repeal of fishery regulations prohibiting export of raw fish reported in the press. If correct, salmon canners in British Columbia desire respectfully to enter their earnest protest against the removal of the restriction, as it would be disastrous to the industry, already seriously handicapped. It would constitute a reversal of a carefully considered policy adopted by the Conservative Government in 1894, would promote piracy and dishonesty, and deprive citizens of this province of much labour, to the advantage of competitors in the United States. You are prayed to suspend action in this connection, pending receipt of a memorial setting forth the facts.

W. D. Burdis,
Sec'y B. C. Salmon Canners' Assn.

You will notice incidentally that this telegram says that it 'would promote piracy and dishonesty' to allow a British Columbia fisherman to sell fish to the Yankees. In eastern Canada, in the last election, we were told that it would be unpatriotic, and bad for the flag, if we were allowed to sell a barrel of fish or a bundle of shingles to the Yankees. But they go further in British Columbia; it would be piracy—which is punishable by death—in the opinion of the British Columbia Salmon Canners' Association, for the fishermen to sell their fish in the United States.

The next telegram I shall read is one to the Prime Minister, which that right hon. gentleman turned over to the Minister of Marie and Fisheries, in the following letter:

Ottawa, Ont., February 19, 1912.

Deputation from British Columbia salmon canneries arrive Ottawa Monday morning next to interview Minister of Fisheries and Cabinet regarding new regulations authorizing export of Canadian Sockeye salmon to American canneries, taking business away from our canneries and Canadians employed. Last year every man and boat was put into service. We were short sixty-five per cent of deliveries in actual sales. If exportation allowed it will be resented by Pacific salmon industry, wholesale grocers, consumers everywhere. Election decided against reciprocity. This new movement will reverse will of people by Order in Council. Cancelling of boat taking very objectionable. Hope nothing be done until deputation heard. Regret Hon. Hazen's departure for Washington before deputation arrives.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) R. L. Borden.

Hon. J. D. Hazen,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa, Ont.

The third telegram is from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto. It appears that the canners' combine in British Columbia, fearing that they had not sufficient influence with the Government to secure the reversal of the Order in Council, decided to apply to headquarters. They went to the Manufacturers' Association in Toronto and asked them to send a message to the Government in regard to this matter. And here is the message:

Toronto, Ont., Feb. 20, 1912.

Hon. J. D. Hazen,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Ottawa.

Advisory Committee Canadian Manufacturers' Association, in conjunction with the Association's British Columbia Branch, strongly urge retention of regulation prohibiting export of raw salmon pending a thorough investigation of the situation by experts, believing that its cancellation at this time may injuriously affect the canning industry of that province. This association stands firmly by the principle of manufacturing Canada's raw material as far as possible in the Dominion.

G. M. Murray, Secretary.

To sum up the whole story, which is a rather long one for me to go through today, it comes to this: First that regulation was condemned by the Conservative members from the province of British Columbia year after year while they were in opposition. Second, it was an issue at the election in the province of British Columbia in the general election, and I am informed that hon. gentlemen opposite who were candidates in British Columbia, in that election pledged themselves that if they were elected they would have it repealed. The third point is that this was declared to be a bad and oppressive regulation by a number of British Columbia members who spoke after the election of 1911 in the discussion in the session of 1912 to which I have referred. In the fourth place, the minister consulted the officers of the department, and the officers of the department said that it was a bad regulation and ought to be repealed. In the fifth place, it appears from the statement of the minister himself that he consulted the British Columbia members supporting the Government—and it happens that all the members of this House from British Columbia are on that side—agreed that the regulation was a bad regulation and ought to be repealed. The sixth point is that an Order in Council was prepared, and, as I am instructed, was passed, cancelling the regulation and declaring it repealed. The seventh is that the repeal of that obnoxious regulation was announced in the House by the Minister of Marine; and, after all this had happened, a telegram from the combine in British Columbia, and another telegram from the Manufacturers' Association at Toronto, were sufficient to send them all to the woods, and to hang up the regulation which the Minister of Marine declared was iniquitous, and it is still in full force. I submit that, in that case at all events, I have proved my case. But if it is necessary I can give you further proof. Let me refer you to the fact that when the fishermen on the Atlantic seaboard, in the session of 1912-13, applied for free cordage for their lobster traps, a privilege that had been granted to them for years by the late Administration, they did not get this privilege because the cordage combine had more influence with the present Administration than the fishermen had. Let me also refer to the fact that when the western settlers, after the election of 1911, applied for a proper construction to be put on the tariff clause relating to rough lumber imported into this country, the Government listened to the lumber combine of British Columbia rather than to the settlers, and the settlers had to fight their case through the highest courts of the realm before they could beat the Government out and regain a concession which had been granted to them by the late Administration. And last, but not least in consequence, let me refer you to the fact that when, a few days ago, a unanimous resolution was passed by the Legislature of Manitoba asking for free wheat, they apparently got the cold shoulder from this Administration because free wheat is not acceptable to the railway companies and to the millers. The member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), I understand, is to follow me. Perhaps he will tell us whether the Government are really in favour of giving free wheat to the West or not. We would also like to hear from him on the question of free agricultural implements. I understand he was the champion of the farmers some years ago in regard to free agricultural implements, and moved an historic resolution in regard to this question. I presume he did not accept the office of Solicitor General without some understanding about these two important questions, and it would be interesting to know just what attitude he and the Government he supports take in regard to these questions.

In the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the fact that there is a certain amount of depression in Canada at the present time, but no remedy has been suggested, and may I venture to say that there is no remedy possible without an attack upon the privileges of the big interests, and we can hardly expect that there will be any remedy applied by this Government; it would be a kind of suicide for the present Government to apply any remedy of that kind. But they have tried to administer consolation to us by telling us that we have in this country unbounded resources. No doubt that is a good thing, but such resources are not much good to a hungry man. Think what a comfort it would be to one of the poor fellows waiting in line to get into some soup kitchen in Montreal or Toronto to be told that in this country we have boundless resources! It reminds me of the story of the Bourbon princess who, when she heard that people in the streets of Paris were crying for bread, at the time of the French revolution, said: 'If bread is so scarce as that why do they not eat cake or biscuits?'

Reference has been made in this debate to the navy, although it does not form any part of the speech from the Throne. It is a strange thing that the speech does not refer to this important question. Hon. members who have spoken on the other side, or most of them, have condemned the Senate for their action in regard to the navy. Let me ask, what is the offence of the Senate in reference to that question? As far as I understand, the offence of the Senate is that they have adopted the Conservative policy. The Conservative policy was that no step be taken until first there was an appeal to the people. I suppose that every Conservative in this House who was here in 1911, in the preceding Parliament, voted for Mr. Monk's amendment that no steps should be taken in regard to that very important question of a navy until first there was an appeal to the people. How is it that these hon. gentlemen are in any position to criticise the Senate in regard to this matter when the Senate has simply adopted the policy they themselves laid down? Why, Sir, about twelve months ago, the Prime Minister himself proclaimed that policy of an appeal to the people. Everybody remembers that in the citv of Montreal a banquet was given to the Prime Minister which was attended by four or five hundred of the leading Conservatives in this country, and that at that banquet the Prime Minister made a very impressive and eloquent speech which appeared in the press of the country with great headlines, and no doubt made a great impression on the people of this country. He said that there was a crisis in the affairs of the empire; he heard the German guns in the North sea, he had visions of trouble for the empire and he said that, so far as he was concerned, he would do his duty, he would clear his skirts, and he laid down a policy which he said ought to be adopted. He said: 'I will call Parliament together, and submit a vote to Parliament asking for $35,000,000 for the immediate help of the empire in regard to naval affairs; if Parliament refuses to vote the $35,000,000 I will appeal to the people of Canada. He carried out part of his programme. He called Parliament together, he appealed to Parliament for $35,000,000; Parliament refused it but he did not appeal to the people of Canada. He thought better of it. No man knew better than the Prime Minister that an appeal to the people of Canada on that question would meet with defeat and consequently he did not make the appeal and I submit that neither the Prime Minister nor anv of his supporters is in a position to-day to criticise the Senate for having adopted the policy that was approved of by the Conservative party and their leader. There has been a very large number of vagaries in connection with this naval discussion and when the history of it comes to be written it will be a very interesting chapter indeed. Two years ago or a little more, hon. members from the province of Quebec thought that the Naval Act ought to be repealed. I understand that many of them came here under pledge that they would repeal that Act. That was an absurd kind of pledge because the Naval Act deals with a number of other things in addition to the navy; it regulates the protection of fisheries on our coasts. We have always had a Naval Act in this country. Prior to Confederation, in the little province from which I come, seventy-five years ago, we had a Naval Act; we had regulations that are to-day in the Naval Act and if the Naval Service Act had been repealed by these gentlemen they would have had to enact immediately another one or else there would have been a great deal of confusion in the affairs on the coasts of this country. But you will remember that after the opening of the first session in the fall of 1911 my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) put a question on the order paper: Does this Government intend to repeal the Naval Service Act? He did that very early in the session. This question was called over again and again for several months. I well remember the scene that used to happen every week when the Speaker called this question. A cloud came over the manly brow of my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) and an extra wrinkle came into the face of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). The Prime Minister himself looked anxious, and the question was allowed to stand week after week, and it was only towards the end of the session that they mustered up courage to say: 'Yes, we will repeal the Naval Service Act.' But the Naval Service Act still stands, and there has been no further word from the Government so far as I know that it is to be repealed. That strikes me as one of the vagaries in regard to this question. A great deal of amusement was created amongst several members of the House at the position taken by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in his speech on naval defence. He was speaking about rivets and riveters. He said he had information that when a ship was approaching shore the rivets fell out in buckets' full, and as there were no riveters in this country capable of putting them in again, it would therefore be unsafe to have ships on the coast until we could get riveters. That seemed a very amazing statement to hon. members on this side of the House, and especially to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) and myself, who live in a town where there are hundreds of as good riveters as you can find anywhere in the world. And New Glasgow is not the only place in Canada where you can find riveters. The latest phase of these vagaries on the part of the Conservative party is in regard to a proposal to establish a shop on the banks of the St. Lawrence somewhere about opposite the city of Montreal. It is stated in the newspapers that the British engineering firm of Armstrong, Whitworth & Co. have organized a company to start a shop at Montreal. Sir Percy Girouard, I understand, is president of the company, and there are a number of able financial men on the board. But the curious thing about it is that while this company is stated in the newspapers to be building a shop for the purpose of making high grade steel tools and articles of that kind—and it is hoped later on to build ships—yet considerable alarm has been created in the Conservative press over this matter. The Ottawa Citizen has almost gone into hysterics over it. It thinks these people are going to come up here on the Hill and put the German bogey in front of the members, and we shall have to build ships whether we want to or not. That appears to be the idea of the Citizen on this matter. And I understand there are a number of old women in the Tory party who are losing their sleep at nights over the proposed shipyard in Montreal. I think we should be very much pleased to see a new industry coming to Canada. In the discussion of last winter, the argument that our hon. friends opposite used was that we could not build ships. And now they are afraid that we can build ships.

Reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to changes in the Civil Service Act. We are not aware of the nature of these amendments, but you will not blame us on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, if we are somewhat skeptical about what this Government will do on the question of Civil Service. My hon. friend the Prime Minister, when he was on this side of the House, was a Civil Service reformer himself. He laid down the principle that no man should be dismissed for partisan reasons, that all appointments should be made on merit and not as a reward for party service, that civil servants should be permitted to go on a political platform and make speeches in opposition to the government that was paying them their salaries, provided they did it in a decent and manly way. These are high sounding principles, but how have they been carried out? Will any one pretend that A. B. Morine was appointed on his merits as the best man in Canada for the high position to which he was appointed? Or that Captain Landry, that jailbird down in the county of Richmond, was appointed on his merits? These are only examples. Eighty officials were dismissed in my own constituency, and not one of the appointments made to fill the vacancies was on merit. The appointments were all made as a reward for party services. I do not know how many cases there are like this throughout the country, but there must be thousands of them. There have been so many of them that the Government have not been able to count them themselves. More than year ago a motion was made in this House asking for a list of these dismissed officials, and while no doubt officials have been working hard at it for a whole year they have not yet been able to give us the list of men turned out of office by this Government.

There are other questions, such as the road question, which is a very interesting one to the people I represent. I take the ground that the Government never intended to make a genuine road Bill. If they had intended to do so, they had an opportunity. There are only six clauses in that Bill, and five of them were passed by the Senate without any amendment. The sixth clause was the one giving the Government power to spend the money just as they pleased and in whatever province they pleased. We had the assurance of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways that this would not be done, but Prime Ministers do not last forever, and Ministers of Railways come and go, too. Changes may take place, and when we pass a Bill we expect it to be permanent. We expect a Bill that will be workable when we have another Prime Minister and another Minister of Railways. The Government refused to accept the amendment that was made by the Senate in regard to that matter—an amendment that made the Bill a perfect one.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the sixth clause? He says all the others were passed without amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I refer to the amendment the Senate proposed to make in regard to the way the money should be spent. I will read the amendment:—

> The sum of money voted in any year to be expended under this Act shall be apportioned among and paid to the several provinces of the Dominion in proportion to the population of such provinces respectively as shown by the then next preceding census.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What clause is that in amendment to?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The sixth clause.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN: My hon. friend said a moment ago—and the statement has been repeatedly made—that five clauses were passed without amendment. Does he adhere to that statement?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is that not correct? I think I am correct in saying that in the end five clauses were passed. There might have been slight amendments but the battle was over the sixth clause. It is no use quibbling over the exact number of clauses.

The Senate proposed that the money should be distributed among the provinces according to population, and that amendment the Government rejected. If the Government had really intended to give a genuine Road Bill to the people of this country that was their opportunity, but they did not want a road Bill. What they wanted was a Bill for the outdoor relief of the Tory party.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At six o'clock I was referring to the Highways Bill, and I had pointed out that the issue between the parties was in regard to section 6 of that Bill. The Senate insisted upon a distribution of the money among the provinces in proportion to population; the Government refused to accept that proposal and the Bill was dropped. It has been often said that the Senate was to blame because the Highways Bill failed, but I place the blame at the door of the Government. If the Government had accepted the Senate amendments they would have had a working Act under which the money would have been expended to the advantage of all the provinces, but the Government absolutely refused to accept the principle of a fair division among the provinces according to population. Perhaps the best way for me to place this matter before he House is to read the reasons given by the Senate as to why they referred the Bill back to this House with their amendments attached. The Senate gives these reasons:

1. Because section 6 of the Bill empowers the minister to undertake the construction or improvement of highways in any province, which would be a contravention of the letter and spirit of the British North America Act, 1867, and of the uniform practice under that Act, for which contravention no sufficient cause has been shown.

2. Because the said amendment affirms in effect that it is undesirable that the minister or the Dominion Government should usurp the functions of the provincial administration in the building and maintenance of highways and bridges.

3. Because the said amendment will not hamper the Administration in carrying out its policy and in applying the funds placed in the Estimates for that object under conditions and regulations it may deem just and proper to make, sufficient provision being made in earlier clauses of the Bill for co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

4. Because section 6 of the Bill is a violation of the principle of responsible government, inasmuch as the Dominion in expending provincial subsidy would not be responsible to either the provincial or Dominion legislature.

I invite the Solicitor General to take up these reasons one by one and to deal with them, and if he is able to answer them he will do more than has been done by any gentleman on his side of the House during all the discussions that have taken place on the Highways Bill. Is there any good reason why this money should not be divided among the provinces according to population? The reason why it should be so divided is obvious, and the Prime Minister pledged himself to the principle. But the whole question became a question of this Government wishing to hold on to the patronage of the road money and that is the reason the Government refused to agree to the Senate amendments. What they wanted was to have an opportunity of using this money in whatever way might seem best to them for election purposes or for any other purposes. And, Mr. Speaker, we have very ample reasons for making that statement. Everybody remembers the history of this transaction; everybody remembers that the Bill was introduced into this House at the first session of the present Parliament and that the ink was scarcely dry on the Bill when the by-election in South Renfrew took place. We all remember that four or five ministers of the Crown went up to South Renfrew to take a hand in the election and amongst others the Minister of Customs. I was not in South Renfrew at the time but there is a leading Conservative newspaper published in South Renfrew called the Renfrew Journal, in which an account of the several meetings is given. I wish to read to the House an extract from this Conservative newspaper setting forth the conduct of the Minister of Customs on the Highways Bill. The Journal says:

Dr. Reid then turned his attention to the good roads' movement advocated by the Conservative Government at Ottawa, and the bald way in which he handled this topic disgusted all decent men, who look for something higher than this kind of talk from a Cabinet minister. The burden of this part of Dr. Reid's speech was that South Renfrew should vote for Dr. Maloney and the Borden Government would then spend money in this district for good roads.

Mr. BRADBURY: What are you reading from?

Mr. SINCLAIR: From the Renfrew Journal. The inference was that if they did not vote for Dr. Maloney they would not get the money. That was the use the Government intended to make of this money and that was the reason why the Government took issue with the Senate and refused to agree to the Senate amendment, which was to the effect that the money should be divided equitably among the provinces according to population. What a spectacle it was to have a Minister of the Crown in a Government that professed to be a decent Government; that came into power on a cry of purity, when the very first by-election took place rushing up to South Renfrew and peddling out road money to the people of that riding for their votes; and road money that he did not have. I am not surprised that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took the ground that that Bill would not be a satisfactory Bill to the people of this country unless it contained a provision which would prevent this or any future government from using the money in that improper way. Again, we must not forget the fact that this question came up at the last session of this Parliament, and it came up in rather a peculiar way. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes) referred to the extraordinary way in which the Government dealt with this matter at the last session of Parliament, namely, that in the Estimates, after the Bill had been defeated, and when everybody knew there would not be any Road Bill, the Government laid before the House an item in the Estimates for $1,500,000 to be expended on roads under the Highways Bill. The Government was well aware then that there was no Highways Bill and that there could not be any Highways Bill. When that vote came before the House, my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) pointed out that this House could not vote the money to be expended according to the provisions of the Highways Bill when there was no Highways Bill, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) said: 'For this year let us vote to give this to the different provinces of Canada so that they may have the benefit of the one and a half million dollars on their roads'; and he moved an amendment to that effect. But every Conservative member of the House, including the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways, voted against the principle of thus distributing that one and a half million dollars amongst the provinces last year. This proved beyond doubt that with the Government it was not a question of expending money on the roads at all, but a question of having the patronage of spending the money themselves. If they had any desire to give that money for roads, the amendment of the hon. member for Carleton gave them an opportunity to do so and show their good faith.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman read that amendment?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have not the amendment before me, but I remember very distinctly that the amendment was to strike out the words: 'to be expended according to the provisions of the Highways Bill.' That would give the Government $1,500,000 to be distributed amongst the provinces for road money, but the Government rejected that amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What provision would there be by which the Government could see that the money was so expended? That is the point I want to get at. As to the effect of the amendment, what provision would there be by which this Government could see how it would be expended?

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would simply have the effect of turning over that much money to the provinces for the year, to be expended on the roads of the province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could this Government see to the expenditure? Suppose the provincial Government did not so expend it, how could we enforce that expenditure?

Mr. SINCLAIR: They would have to trust the local governments if the money was voted by Parliament for the purpose of building roads in the different provinces, and distributed according to population, as it was put in the Estimates on that occasion, I see no difficulty in the Government's handing this money over to the various provinces to be used in that way. The provinces would see to its expenditure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Neither do I, but I see a difficulty in enforcing it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I cannot make it any plainer than I have endeavoured to do. There is a very marked difference in the way in which the Government have dealt with this question of road money as compared with the way with which they have dealt with the agricultural grant. I think it will be remembered that when the agricultural grant was introduced the same criticism arose. The Government agreed that the agricultural grant should be turned over to the various provinces according to population. That was done, and there has been no difficulty about it. Wherein is the difference between the agricultural grant and the road grant that justifies the Government in taking a different position in regard to the road grant? We are back to the same old reason which I gave you before, the Government insist on retaining the patronage. There is no other reason. I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) to deal with that when he speaks in regard to this matter.

My hon. friend from Kings county, Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes), in speaking of the extravagant expenditures of the Government, referred to the fact that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) had given an order for 350,000 unnecessary padlocks. Perhaps the best way for me, in case there should be any misunderstanding, is to read what the Postmaster General said and what the hon. member for Kings said. The hon. member for Kings said:

> The Postmaster General last year gave a contract for 350,000 padlocks for $350,000—
> Hon. L. P. Pelletier: Never.
> Mr. Hughes: Well, perhaps he did not give the contract for them, but he ordered padlocks for the mail bags sufficient to last forty or fifty years, I am told.
> Mr. Pelletier: That is not a fact.
> Mr. Hughes: More padlocks than have been used in this country since Confederation.
> Mr. Pelletier: I have told the hon. gentleman that that is not a fact.
> Mr. Hughes: What are the facts in connection with the matter?
> Mr. Pelletier: My hon. friend should know the facts himself, since he is speaking about the matter.
> Mr. Hughes: The Postmaster General will not tell me the facts; I know that statement was made repeatedly in this House.
> Mr. Pelletier: It was denied repeatedly.
> Mr. Hughes: How many were ordered?
> Mr. Pelletier: There were 10,000 ordered, and not one delivered.

I had the curiosity to look up the record as to what was said by the Postmaster General on the 19th day of March, 1913, when he was asking for his post office estimates for the outside service. I find, on page 6294, the following conversation between the present Postmaster General and the late Postmaster General:

> Mr. Lemieux: How many new locks have been bought for the mail bags?
> Mr. Pelletier: 350,000.
> Mr. Lemieux: From whom?
> Mr. Pelletier: A firm in Ottawa of which Mr. Carling is the manager; they were the lowest tenderers.
> Mr. Lemieux: What is the price?
> Mr. Pelletier: One dollar per lock.
> Mr. Lemieux: Is it a great improvement?
> Mr. Pelletier: Oh, yes, first-class.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the hon. member permit me now as a matter of fairness? Surely I think everybody should be good natured about this matter, as I have been. It has been mentioned repeatedly before this House; and I am sure the hon. member for Guysborough knew that this information was asked me at a moment when I had the assistance of the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General here, and he gave me the information. A few days after, a statement was read by me in the House from the gentleman who had given me that information, stating that he had made a mistake; that he had misinformed me about the matter. All this was put before Parliament. Does the hon. member for Guysborough think it fair to read that part of it and not read the following statement correcting that?

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the hon. Postmaster General if the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General is still in the service of the Government?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Assistant Deputy Postmaster General is still in the service of the Government; but, if my hon. friend thinks he should be dismissed, I should like to have his opinion about it.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend does me the honour to ask my opinion—

Mr. PELLETIER: I do.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that any minister who receives such information from a responsible official is not doing himself justice in retaining him in his service and in the service of the Government, and is attempting to shield himself behind that official.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is not a fact. It is not true.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think it is quite true that my hon. friend made several explanations in regard to this matter after he was severely criticised by the ex-Postmaster General. I quite agree that he withdrew and made a different arrangement. That is the way I understood it, that he abandoned the first arrangement and made a different arrangement altogether, but that took place after he was attacked by the ex-Postmaster General. These statements made by my hon. friend from Kings (Mr. Hughes) were justified. The answer that my hon. friend the Postmaster General gave to my hon. friend from Kings was not as polite and courteous as it might have been under the circumstances, and I am glad to have my hon. friend's explanation. I knew the explanation would be forthcoming and I was not going to speak about it unless he was in his seat, but I wish to give him the opportunity to explain if he could, the attitude he took in this matter last night.

There are a number of other things that I had intended to deal with on this occasion, such questions as the branch railways which were promised by the present Administration and which have not been built, the question of high cost of living and some other questions which I may have an opportunity of dealing with at some later stage in the session.

I wish to say, however, before I sit down, that we on this side of the House are not hoisting any signals of distress. We are not asking for any quarter. We are in the best of good cheer, and we are quite willing to bide our time and take what the future has in store for us as a party. We are confident of one thing, and that is that the Conservative party were never less formidable as a fighting force than they are today. They need settled beliefs and a moral issue of some kind just about as badly as any party ever did. 'Canadians cannot build ships.' 'Canadians are not big enough to trade with their nearest neighbour on equal terms.' 'Hard times is the only cure for high prices.' 'Soup kitchens must needs come.' 'Let bad enough alone.' These are not inspiring battle cries, Mr. Speaker. The truth of the matter is, the leaders of the Conservative party at the present time have no convictions on any of the great questions that are now before the country. No man can tell what their permanent naval policy is to be. No man can tell what their policy is on so important a question as the British preference. No man can state what their policy is on the reduction of the duties on agricultural implements or the abolition of the duty on wheat. They agree on one thing, and one thing alone, and that is reckless expenditure—put the screws on the consumer—wring all you can out of the people and hand it over to the great Shogun to spend it where he can get most votes for the Conservative party—let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die. An end to all this must come sooner or later, and the sooner it comes the better for the people of Canada.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in rising is to devote some time—I hope usefully—to the discussion of one special feature of the topics which have been referred to in the present debate. I do not believe it would serve any useful purpose for me to wander over all imaginary topics —giving a sentence or so to each—that, while interesting in themselves, are undoubtedly of very little value in making any substantial advance in our present discussion. As to the address to which we have just listened, I have only this to say, that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) travelled so discursively over so many topics, and spent so little time—or at all events so little thought—on each, that he has said nothing that demands a very exhaustive reply. A great part of his address was devoted to certain regulations which he complains of as being in force as regards fishing in the province of British Columbia. It must be a matter of congratulation to the people of British Columbia that they have always in this House the hon. member for Guysborough to look after their interests as to fishing in the waters of the Coast. He then proceeded to make inquiries, and to invite myself to give them an answer, as to the position of this Government on the subject of certain items of the tariff. His request in that regard was implemented by a similar one from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). There seems to be a general desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that I should anticipate the duties of the Minister of Finance and announce the Government's position in regard to all items of the tariff. I am not surprised that the hon. gentlemen I have referred to should evince some interest in that regard. It may add interest to their speeches—and if so it is to be forgiven. But I was surprised to hear the request made by the hon. member for Guysborough, implemented by a 'hear, hear', from the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself.

The hon. member for Guysborough invited me to say, and apparently thought it was my duty to say, what the policy of the present Government was to be specifically as to the duty on wheat and the products of wheat. He also invited me to say here and now, anticipating that I was to follow him, what was to be the position of the present Government as to the duties on farm implements. Well, hon. gentlemen must know, and if they do not, certainly no member of this House knows better than the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, that I should be giving incontestable evidence of my incompetency for my present post, that I should be showing once and for all that I had no sense of the responsibility of office, if I were, in a debate on the Address, to state what the duty on any article would be in the revision of the tariff. It would be interesting indeed if the right hon. leader of the Opposition—than whom no one knows better the duties of a minister or of a Solicitor General, who is not a minister, in regard to anticipating the Budget Speech—would inform the House what was in the back of his head when he said, 'Hear, hear,' in response to the request of the hon. member for Guysborough that I should announce the Government's position as to the duty on wheat and on agricultural implements. The time will come when both subjects will be fit subjects for discussion in this House. The revision of the tariff will be made in due course. When it is made, I, as associated with the Government, will do one of two things—I will accept full responsibility for the tariff as promulgated in that revision, or if I cannot do so I will sever my present association with the Government. When the tariff is revised, free wheat, agricultural implements and all other such matters will be fit and proper subjects for discussion. And I will be right in at the death; the hon. gentlemen's curiosity shall be satisfied to the limit.

I have heard considerable discussion of a topic on which I purpose specially to treat, a subject that now is first brought before the Canadian people and one which in its present form at all events has never yet before been the subject of discussion in this House—free food. Apparently many hon. gentlemen opposite see value in the free food cry. On the other hand, judging from the vagaries of hon. gentlemen opposite, there is a very powerful section of their party who see very little value in free food as a political issue. There is little to be gained, perhaps, in discussing the merits of the question, because we are not sure yet where the Opposition stands with regard to it. We are not sure whether this policy of free food is to be inscribed upon their banner or not. It was put there on the 26th of November, 1913, but it is notably absent from the amendment submitted in this debate by the leader of the Opposition. Therefore, in doubt as we are as to the adhesion of the Opposition to this cry, very little can be gained by extended discussion. But, as to those on both sides of the House who see at present in Canada nothing to be gained by the free food policy, those who would regret, and regret exceedingly, its adoption as a part of the tariff policy of the Dominion, I can give them this consolation,—that there is little to fear in that regard. In the speech that the leader of the Opposition delivered in the city of Hamilton when he threw out the gospel of free food to the people, he took care to warn them that he was a very cautious politician. He took care to tell them as regards his last cry, reciprocity, there was not much more to be said. He had no recriminations to make in regard to it, and the sentence with which he closed his reference to it was that it was his prayer that the dead past would bury its dead. He went on then to propound the new gospel of free food, but he added this very suggestive sentence, as quoted from his speech as reported in the Toronto 'Globe':

> During the fifteen years that we were in office we had been very chary in making any alteration in the tariff. The reason is that when we place a tariff of customs duties we create an atmosphere in which our manufactures and industries are developed and if you were to cut out or remove that tariff all of a sudden, the result would be very injurious.

Following out the principle of action that he there expounded, he admits that the Government retained virtually the National Policy with microscopic modifications, to use the very excellent vocabulary of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark); and the reason he did not put his changes into force sooner was that it would be too sudden and that it would cause a shock to the commercial mechanism of Canada. So to those who feel in their hearts that free trade, if it became a matter of practice instead of a matter of preaching and theory in Canada, would be something to be feared, for them there is this word of consolation, that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has all the years to think about it between now and the time when he gets into office, and many may be the variations that he may decide upon in that time; and then, after he gets in, he will have fifteen years for deliberation, because if he should enforce it and so radically modify the tariff all of a sudden, it would mean disaster to the industries of Canada. So, at all events for this generation now living, we have little to fear from the new doctrine of free food.

What I purpose to deal with most is the question of the Highways Bill. It has been alluded to, I believe by all, or almost all of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken part in this debate, and a vigorous attempt has been made to throw the onus of the rejection of that Bill upon the Government of the day. It has been said by the hon. member for Red Deer, and repeated or echoed by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that all of the unfavourable impression that was made upon the country by its rejection by the Senate was entirely dissipated since they had an opportunity of thoroughly explaining it to the people. I wondered, as they talked, what explanation they gave the people. I wondered if they gave the innocent people the explanation they ventured to give this House. Was not the House struck by the careful study apparently that had been made of this Bill by the hon. member for Guysborough, who stood in his place and stated that five clauses of the Bill had been passed by the Senate and that because they rejected the last clause was no reason for blaming them for rejecting the Bill, or the statement made by the hon. member for Red Deer, usually a little more careful, that five clauses of the Bill had been passed by the Senate and only the sixth clause had been touched when, as a matter of fact, everybody knows that five clauses were never passed by the Senate either in 1912 or in 1913 and that the sixth clause was never passed at all, that the fourth clause was amended in both years and the sixth rejected in both years. The question before the House is whether or not this Government were justified in rejecting the altered Bill as it was brought down by the Senate or whether they should have accepted it. If this Government should have accepted it, all things considered, the onus is on this Government. If they should not have accepted it the onus is on the Senate and to that point I purpose directing my discussion.

What was the Highways Bill? The Highways Bill, as brought down in both years in the same form each time, was a Bill containing five clauses the effect of all of which was to empower the Government of the day to expend such money as might be voted in the Supply Bill through the agencies of the provincial governments upon a comprehensive system of highway improvement. The preamble of the Bill set out that it was desirable in Canada to enter upon a comprehensive and useful system of improvement of the highways in order that the general transportation facilities of the country might be made what they ought to be. The Bill then went on to say that the Government might divide among the provincial governments, upon such terms as might be mutually agreed upon between the two governments, a sum of money to be voted in the ordinary way in the Supply Bill. It further stated in clause six that in addition to that power the Government of the day should have the right, with the consent both of the legislature and of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of the province in question, to expend the money directly upon highways if they conceived such was the better course. That is to say, that such share or part of such share as might afterwards be voted in the Supply Bill to a province might, with the consent and approval of the Government of that province and of the legislature as well, be expended through the direct agency of this Government upon this general scheme of highway improvement. That was the sum and substance of the Bill. It was sought to be amended in this House. It was stated by hon. gentlemen opposite and argued most vigorously that a clause should be inserted binding the Government to divide that money proportionately between the provinces and further stated that clause six should be eliminated and whether or not both the provincial and the Dominion governments conceived it to be in the interests of the country that the money should be expended through the direct agency of this Government, they should be stripped of power to do so. These two were the contentions advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite. I would be the last to argue that this House should not have the say now and at all times as to the distribution of this money, as to the principle of its distribution and I should likewise be the last to argue that the general principle of that distribution should not be on the basis of population, proportionate to the population of each province. I propose to argue first of all that the Government was not only justified but was bound to reject the Senate amendment on the ground that these amendments were not in the interests of the Bill and were vitally antagonistic to the principle and purpose of the Bill and I shall argue that, aside entirely from the merits of the amendments a greater principle was in question, that of the power of the Senate to interfere by amendment in such a Bill and that, aside from the merits altogether, this Government would not have been justified; would have been truant to its trust and to the people of this country, had they accepted these amendments. Now, on the first point, I have acceded that this House must always maintain as part of its prerogative and part of its duty the control of expenditures and its division among the provinces and that furthermore the general principle of that division should be under ordinary circumstances, a principle of proportion to the population of each province. Then why reject the amendment to clause four proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, which provided that the Government should be disabled from expending that money in any other method than by the hard and fast rule of expenditure in proportion to population. It must be remembered, first of all, and I cannot impress this too strongly upon hon. gentlemen here, that the Bill known as the Highways Bill did not set aside any specific sum of money from the treasury of Canada. It simply provided machinery by which, when the money was set aside or voted by this House, it should be used through the agencies of the provincial governments for the benefits of our common highways. That was the purpose and end of the Bill. It was essential because ordinarily the control of highways is not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament under the British North America Act, and if we chose to use the agencies of provincial governments, the Bill was essential that we might do so. This House might have undoubtedly, by simply declaring the improvement of this highway or that highway was necessary for the general advantage of Canada, (with the sanction of Parliament), expended the money when and where it liked without the agency of any Bill at all; but in order to secure the benefit of the machinery of the provincial governments and to avoid duplication and the frittering away of money on worthless machinery, the Government decided to put through a Bill to utilize the machinery already provided. Having shown that no money was specifically appropriated or set aside out of the treasury of Canada by that Bill, it will be apparent to all that the Bill did not require to be first of all premised by an introductory resolution, that it did not need to be anticipated by the sanction of the Governor General himself. By section 54 of the British North America Act that is essential in one circumstance and one only, that is when the Bill itself sets aside a specific amount of money for a specific purpose. When that is done, the sanction of the Governor General must be secured. That was not done by this Bill, but none the less the Bill, ordinarily speaking, was a money Bill, in that it designated the purpose for which money afterwards voted should be spent. It will be seen, therefore, that for the reason, and the very clear reason, that no money was voted by the Bill, a subsequent Bill would be necessary in order to vote the money, and that subsequent Bill would have to be introduced by resolution sanctioned by the Governor General of Canada; and in that subsequent Bill it would have to be provided how and on what principle the money should be distributed through the provinces. Now, it will be clear to the hon. member for Red Deer that the House of Commons of Canada, in refusing to specify in advance in the enabling Bill—the Highways Bill—that this money should for all time be distributed pro rata according to population, did not in any way alienate from itself the right to say that that should be the basis of distribution. This House still had the right to say in the Supply Bill which was to follow, and which alone was to vote the money, how that money should be divided, and upon what principle it should be distributed, and this House not only had the right, but was bound to say so in that Supply Bill which was to follow. Why then was it necessary, why then was it of value that the clause should be inserted in the Highway Bill itself? By what right do hon. gentlemen opposite argue that this House in the year 1913 or 1914 should bind the hands of the Commons for years and years to come in regard to the distribution of this money? So long as the right and the power is vested in this House to determine the distribution, then this House has reserved to itself every right it has or ought to have, and that right was reserved and was reserved to be exercised in the way it always has been and always should be exercised. Does anybody deny that?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: In the light of the explanation which the hon. gentleman has given, what is the use of the sixth clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am coming to the sixth clause and I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman should desire to get past his argument on the fourth clause. This House had the power and always has had the power to decide as to the distribution of the money of the people of Canada and this House never can, at all events never should, divest itself of that right and power. I ask again what right is there in the Commons of Canada of 1913 to tie the hands of the Commons of Canada of 1917 as to the method of distribution? Is it not the Commons of that day that should decide as to how the money of that day should be divided? Does my hon. friend from Red Deer think that a superior wisdom is resident in the members of this House to-day over what is likely to reside in them five years from now? Why should we abbreviate now the power that we claim to be so valuable for the Commons of years to come? So that not only was no good object to be served but a very bad object would have been served and a bad principle would have been adopted if we had attempted to put in a general Bill that hard and fast restriction. I have admitted that ordinarily the principle of distribution should be that of pro rata according to population. Is that disputed by any one in this House? But does any hon. gentleman say that circumstances might not arise when he himself would vote for a different principle of distribution? Does any hon. gentleman say that he cannot imagine those circumstances? If so, then why does he vote to tie the hands of Parliament in this regard? Nobody rises to say he cannot imagine such circumstances. Why? Because every hon. gentleman opposite voted for a different system of distribution in a very similar Bill. That is why they do not rise. The hon. member for Guysborough says:—

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: You are not teaching school to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member says we are not teaching school. It might be of advantage to him if some one would.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: That is very, very smart.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say they know they have voted for a different principle of distribution and they voted for it in the same session. I may inform, though I am not teaching school, the hon. member for Guysborough that the principle of distribution according to population was not followed in the agricultural instruction Bill at all. A different principle was followed approximating to it, but not that principle itself. In the Agricultural Instruction Bill the principle was to distribute the first $20,000 of money to the provinces, and there was also to be distributed a certain fixed sum —$20,000 I think it was—to veterinary colleges—two inroads upon the principle of proportionate distribution; and all the hon. gentlemen opposite voted and voted without question for that distribution. Why then should they tie the hands of future parliaments from adopting a principle which they themselves have already adopted in the distribution of money? There are circumstances that one might easily imagine when it would not only be not the best but would be positively bad legislation to distribute the money according to population. In the year 1913 no such circumstances existed, and the Supply Bill, which was brought down as evidence of the good faith of the Government, did vote the money and did divide it on a population basis. But if that were followed as an inexorable law, if it were known to the various provinces that it was going to be followed, come what may, then it would be quite within the power of the province to say: 'We are going to get our money from the Dominion Government for highway improvements and we will restrict our own expenditure on highway improvements and let the Dominion Government do it. The result would be that, instead of this policy resulting in the improvement of the highways, it would simply result in the money being spent in some other way by the provinces and Canada paying for the highways of the provinces instead of the provinces themselves. I do not think that the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) will compliment me by saying that that is a very great stretch of imagination or of ingenuity. I think it will be plain to him that it is not only a possible but a quite probable result.

Mr. CARVELL: As far as I know, the several provinces in Canada will want to spend all the money they can get from this Government, or all the money they can get from any other source whatever, in order to make the highways what they ought to be. But my hon. friend is drawing on his imagination to the full extent if he thinks that if the Dominion Government and Parliament pay the money, and if they trust these provinces, they will refuse to do their proper share in connection with the improvements of the highways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt that they will be willing to spend what money they can get, but they might save their own money for other purposes. That being the case it will be seen that there would have been no object at all, and that a very bad principle would have been imbedded in our methods, if we had adopted the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite and put this hard and fast rule into the Bill. We reserve for this House of Commons all its powers and rights in this regard, we strip it of no part of its prerogative at all. We held for 1913, and all the years there are to follow, the right to determine once and for all how the highway money was to be spent.

Now, for fear I might forget it, the hon. member for Guysborough referred to an amendment which he mentioned, but which he did not read, by the hon. member for Carleton to the effect that the Senate having stripped the Bill of clause 6 and having so amended clause 4 by this cumbersome method, we should have accepted the Bill, or that the Bill being dropped, we should simply have come forward in our Supply Bill and voted money into the treasuries of the provinces. I ask what power would have been retained by this Government to see that the money so voted into the provincial treasuries was expended for the purpose for which it was voted? No conditions could have been attached to the Supply Bill. The conditions in the Highway Bill were swept away. The money would have been simply spilled into the treasuries of the provinces and the provinces would have been depended upon to spend the money for highways. Is that fulfilling our duties as the Government of Canada? The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will not say so, I know. The hon. member for Edmonton will not stand up in his place in this debate and say that this Government is relieved of its obligations to the people by voting money into the provincial treasuries.

We know that there is a part of the moneys of the Dominion Government in respect to which we do relieve ourselves of all obligations of trusteeship by voting it into the provincial treasuries and that part is represented by the annual subsidies because that is a part of the framework of our constitution. But the words of the constitution apply to no other moneys whatever. As for all other moneys that are not so designated by the British North America Act and amending Acts we are the trustees, we can never divest ourselves of that responsibility, and we have no right whatever to vote that money into the treasuries of the provinces and not to follow it and see that it reaches its proper destination. We must, if we are true to our trust as guardians and custodians of the money of the people, see that the money gets to its ultimate destination and see that it is spent for the purpose for which it is intended and we must trust to the responsibility of no other Government but our own in that regard.

If I were to quote an authority in opposition to the contention of the hon. member for Guysborough, I would quote the hon. member for Edmonton himself, because he said in his place in the House just last session, and argued at some length, with great force and with correctness, that this Government would not be justified in so voting money into the treasuries of the provinces but that this Government was bound to follow this money and see that the money was spent for the purpose for which it was intended.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: My hon. friend has been good enough to mention my name and to ask for my opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have stated the opinion the hon. gentleman has given.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to say that my hon. friend has not stated the opinion I gave in regard to the Highways Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have quoted the hon. gentleman, and quoted him with approval, on the question of the responsibility of Parliament for the money entrusted to us and as to whether we can relieve ourselves of our trust by voting money into the provincial treasuries as suggested by the hon. member for Guysborough. I have quoted him against the contention of the hon. member for Guysborough, and I have quoted him with absolute correctness.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I followed his argument very closely. What objection is there to increasing the subsidies of the provinces in order to help the provinces to get better roads?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid my hon. friend has not followed me very closely.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, I have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because I have stated that if it were done by the methods advised by the hon. member for Guysborough there would be no machinery and no method by which this Government could see that the money was spent to the best advantage of the people and that it was spent for the purpose for which it was intended. The responsibility to see to that would be shifted from the shoulders of the Government to the shoulders of the several provinces and we have no right to so divest ourselves of our responsibilities.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might you not do that by amending the British North America Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps so, but that is not the suggestion of the hon. member for Guysborough.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, but on general principles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The British North America Act is not amended yet, but the hon. member for Guysborough comes forward and says we ought to do it without an amendment and that we are truant to our principles because we do not.

Mr. OLIVER: Under what authority has the constitution and practice of the Dominion of Canada placed the roads up to date?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated that in the early part of my address but I will repeat it more fully if the hon. member desires it; that is, I will give my own opinion for what it is worth. The highways of Canada are within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, in so far as they are local. At the same time, the Dominion Parliament would have jurisdiction over a highway that had become of a national character say by reason of its passing from one province to another and we could exercise our jurisdiction over any highway if we adopted the method so often utilized of declaring that the improvements, or any special works upon a highway, were for the general advantage of Canada. But by reason of the general principle that highways are within the provincial jurisdiction, then, in order to enable us properly to act and at the same time properly to conserve the rights of the Canadian people and discharge our own duties to the full, we require an Act by which the machinery of the provinces may be used for the purpose of spending this money, but all the same, we are able, by virtue of the conditions imposed and plans devised and accepted, to follow that money to its destination in order to see that it is spent on a general, and uniform and useful system and that it does the greatest good to the greatest number of our people.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to state to the House what he considers to be the reason why the provincial governments cannot fully and properly be trusted with the expenditure of any money that is necessary and available for the improvement of the highways?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the question at all. Whether they can be trusted or whether they cannot be trusted we have no right to lay upon them a responsibility that the constitution fixes upon us.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand my hon. friend to admit that the constitution places the responsibility regarding roads upon the provinces and not upon the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well, but so far as the expenditure of the money of the Canadian people in the Dominion treasury is concerned, be that expenditure upon highways or upon anything else, that trusteeship is vested here, and the hon. member for Edmonton is himself a most vociferous authority that we can never strip ourselves of that responsibility.

Mr. OLIVER: I see a very vast difference between expenditure by this Government on purposes for which this Parliament is responsible, and expenditure on purposes for which the provincial governments and legislatures are responsible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman believe that expenditure for educational purposes differs constitutionally speaking from expenditure for highway purposes?

Mr. OLIVER: I certainly do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the hon. gentleman must be informed and informed very quickly that education also is within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know that it is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, or otherwise, this Parliament has gone out of its way to vote money for technical education.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And we have voted money for highways, and education is just as exclusively within provincial jurisdiction as the highways are within provincial jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the House to keep in mind that the discussion so far has entirely centered upon the merits of the amendments themselves. The argument, so far as I have been able to advance it, is, that on the merits, the amendment to clause 6 should have been rejected and must have been rejected by any government that remembered its duty to the Canadian people. As to clause 6: It will be recalled that the Senate not only amended clause 4 by fastening upon it this hard and fast system of distribution, but also entirely struck out clause 6 which provided:

> The minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by order in council, may undertake the construction of any highway or the improvement of any highway in any existing province and may expend in such improvement or construction the whole or any part of the sums voted by Parliament for such subsidy to that province.

Provided, further, that the minister shall first obtain the necessary authority from the legislature of such province and the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

That is to say, if, as a result of the joint wisdom of the Government of Canada and of the legislature and government of the province with which we may be dealing for the time being, it is decided that better results could be obtained by expending the money through the direct machinery of this Government, this Government should have the power to do so. It must be remembered that before that could be done provision must be made by the legislature of the province in question as well as the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of that province obtained before the Government of Canada itself could exercise that right. That clause was reviewed in very alarming terms by the hon. member for Red Deer; he said it was meant to catch votes, and he proclaimed that it should never be allowed in this country, that this Government should be able to go and spend money here and there, because if they had that right they could make promises and catch votes. But his concern for the result of this clause was tame even, compared with the concern of the leader of the majority in the Senate. In order that the full import of this may be clear to the House, the name of the leader of the majority in the Senate should be mentioned, Sir George Ross, ex-Prime Minister of the province of Ontario. He feared the pressure that we would be able to exercise over the legislature; he said we would be able to put our hands upon the legislature and say, 'Do as we say or we will not give you money,' and the legislature in terror would submit. And that pressure, the leader of the Senate held to be a very great invasion of the constitutional rights of Canada. He said:

That means that the Dominion Government is putting its hand upon the legislature of a whole province to swing that legislature to its own ends.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Hear, hear.

Hon Sir GEORGE ROSS (Middlesex): Now did you ever hear of anything of greater enormity than that? Suppose the Imperial Government put its hand upon the whole representation of Scotland, or on the one hundred and three members for Ireland, by some financial consideration, in order to swing them around to some policy of the government. I believe Lord Castlereagh did that in 1800. Ireland was brought into the union with England and Scotland.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And he committed suicide afterwards.

So that the vocabulary of the hon. member for Red Deer is quite outdone by the vividly expressed fears of the leader of the majority in the Senate. He describes the Highways Bill as the greatest enormity he thinks he ever heard perpetrated since one hundred and thirteen years ago when, he says, Ireland was brought into the Union by a wholesale system of oppression and constraint.

One would think in the first place that hon. gentlemen opposite had never heard of any such pressure having been brought to bear before; that they never heard of the insertion in any Bill of a clause such as this. And it may be a matter of surprise to the hon. member for Guysborough—because I do not think he has spent a very great deal of time considering this subject—it may be a matter of surprise to him to be told that he himself and the other side of the House in general allowed to go through this House, without a division and I believe without debate, a clause on exactly the same lines in another Bill of similar purport. I refer to the Agricultural Instruction Bill of 1913. The Agricultural Instruction Bill of 1913 set by a specific sum of money, $10,000,000; $700,000 for 1913; $800,000 for the following year, and so on, until $10,000,000 should be appropriated for the purpose of agricultural education. The Bill went on to provide means by which this money should be spent through the agencies of the provincial governments along a system to be outlined by this Dominion Government, and by which the machinery of the provincial governments should be utilized for the purpose of the expenditure of this money and of getting the greatest results therefrom. And the Bill went on to provide a clause similar in terms, though not exact in terms,—and I shall point out the difference later,—it went on to provide a clause similar in terms to clause 6 of the Highways Bill, and that clause was passed by this House with the assent of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it passed the Senate as well. The Agricultural Instruction Bill, clause 7, voted money for education in agriculture in these terms:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable for giving effect to the object and purpose of this Act. And notwithstanding anything in this Act, the minister with the approval of the Governor in Council and with the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province—

Hon. members opposite will remember that that is all the consent that has to be obtained.

—and upon such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Governor in Council, may expend in any such province in any year the whole or any part of the grant provided by the province under this Act for the purpose set forth in the preamble to this Act.

If any hon. gentleman opposite can explain upon what principle he votes for that clause of the Agricultural Bill and denies his vote for a similar clause in the Highways Bill, I would like to hear that explanation. The only difference between the two clauses is this, that whereas in the Highways Bill this Government, in order to expend the money directly on agricultural education, must first obtain the consent not only of the Government of the province but of the Legislature as well; on the contrary, in the Agricultural Instruction Bill, this Government may spend the money directly without the agency of the province, but only upon the consent of the Government, and not of the Legislature at all. This Bill was voted upon and put through, after the similar clause in the Highways Bill was denied in 1912 by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the Senate at their dictation. So the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) should have explained upon what principle he believes this clause 7 not only innocuous but valuable and denies to the Government clause 6 of the Highways Bill. Why should clause 6 be in? Can hon. members opposite not conceive of circumstances under which it would be advisable and expeditious and economical to spend the money directly under the Dominion Government, in a special case, rather than through the agency of a provincial government? Presuming, for example, that it is a road that runs between the provinces, presuming that the machinery for improvement is more convenient, would it not be advisable so to spend the money without utilizing the machinery of the two provinces? The spirit of the Bill was to utilize the two provinces, but it was only right and proper that means should be provided in special cases, and if both parties should consider it advisable, the money should be spent directly. In the case of money voted for agricultural instruction it might be used, and the power might be used if a government saw fit in order to invite votes in special localities. They might go to a special locality and say: Here, we will establish an agricultural college here; we will establish an experimental station.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Not nearly so handy as roads.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member came from the province of Saskatchewan I could understand his familiarity with the use of such clauses in respect of roads. At all events the hon. member's mind must admit that the principle is exactly the same; and if there is vice in one there is vice in the other; and that if he votes against one, to be at all consistent, he must vote against the other, but he did not do it. Now, I have pointed out that circumstances might easily be foreseen, under which it would be advisable and in the interests of Canada that the money should be expended directly under the agency of the Government of Canada. Consequently no purpose could possibly be served by the elimination of clause six. Why? If we are to act on the fears of hon. gentlemen opposite; if that principle is to govern our legislation in this House, what are we going to pass? We shall have to repeal the Public Works Act. The Public Works Act provides that the Government of this country, through the Public Works Department may spend money here, there and anywhere thoroughout the country, and presumably that money can be used for political purposes. If the principle is right that that power should be denied the Government, then I say we should repeal the main provisions of the Public Works Act. If this power should be denied the Dominion Government, it should be denied the provincial governments; it should be denied to all governments. Then I ask: How are we going to have our institutions built or controlled at all? We have to entrust such power to our governments but a principle of our constitution is that our governments are held directly responsible for the use of that power, and we would not protect the people by abridging their power. We protect the people by holding the Government alone accountable for the exercise of the power reposed in them. The Government has never in any way endeavoured to evade that responsibility, and I trust it never will. So much for the merits of the two amendments as they stand themselves.

I come now to a more powerful objection, an objection that to my mind appears insuperable, and that I venture to think will appear utterly insuperable to hon. gentlemen opposite if they will only give their minds fair play. I make the argument, that I now propose to make, with special confidence to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), because I believe that if he fully apprehended the significance of the Senate's action in this regard, he would be the last to approve of their interference. The hon. member for Red Deer apparently has not read in the records of the Commons both of 1912 and 1913 the real reasons placed upon 'Hansard' for the rejection of the Senate's amendments. I have not heard them quoted, I have scarcely heard the main reasons referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am at a loss to understand the educating influences of those speeches that have been delivered by which they have switched the population of this country against the Government of the day and behind the matured wisdom of the Senate, because they have utterly ignored the main reasons stated by the Government for the rejection of the Senate's amendments. It is a matter which should be, at least in general terms, within the knowledge of all that the Senate of this country has no power either to initiate or to amend or to interfere with Bills appropriating money; nor have they power in any way, by methods direct or by methods indirect, to circumvent or in any way at all to affect the distribution of the public money. That is a principle of the constitution, not only of this country, but of the mother country, from which we derived it. It is not a new one; it has been in force there with growing strength since 1628. It has been affirmed and reaffirmed time without number, and violated in any important instance, yes in any material instance, never since that time. It is true the Lords of England, who are in a position analogous to the Senate of Canada, have ventured in certain instances to interfere with such Bills by methods sometimes indirect, sometimes direct, to affect the expenditure of money, to affect the conditions under which it should be expended; but they have done it by a direct negative of the Bill in question, and it is generally argued, and, I believe, generally accepted, that the Lords and the Senate of this country, while they have not the power to amend or interfere in that way, have the power of rejection. But I can point out even this in that regard, that the Prime Minister of Great Britain on the 2nd of December, 1909, argued with very great force, if not with resistless force, that the power of rejection as well as the power of amendment was dormant, moribund and for all practical purposes dead. It may be questioned even now if the power of rejection is as intact as it was years ago; and as to the power of the Lords in England or the Senate in Canada, it is generally accepted that, whether by methods direct or by methods indirect, they are without power to interfere by amendment and if they have the power to interfere at all they must take the full responsibility of rejection. I do not think that I shall be asked by hon. gentlemen in this House to support what I have said by quotation. Back as far as 1628, the Commons of England, on the advice of the law Lords, omitted from all such Bills reference to the Lords and made such Bills the Acts of the Commons alone. And in 1771, by a standing order of the House, the following was reaffirmed as the law of England:

> That all aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons, as it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit and appoint any and all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.

This is as far back as 1671, or, to make it more easy to remember for the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), about one hundred years before Adam Smith was born, at all events before he wrote his 'Wealth of Nations.'

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to correct him? Adam Smith published his 'Wealth of Nations' in 1776, and so the hon. gentleman has proven that Adam Smith wrote his book two years before he was born.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said, at all events before he wrote the 'Wealth of Nations.' I did not pretend to be exact, but I think I may pay myself a compliment, because, though I had not looked up the date, I guessed it within two years. It is the law of England as set forth in the words I have quoted that taxes and the appropriation of taxes, are the sole prerogative of the Commons and that the consent of the Crown and of the peers is necessary only to clothe it with the form of law. We in this country, by a standing order passed in 1873, reaffirmed the same as the prerogative of the Commons of Canada and as entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate of Canada. That will be found in the Rules of this House, and, so far as I recollect, the rule is word for word with the standing order of the British House of 1671. So, not only have the Senate no power to initiate, but they have no power to 'direct, limit or appoint' the 'ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications' of such grants. These are the words, taken from the standing orders of this House, always affirmed to be the law of Canada, and until this Bill was put through, never materially invaded by the Senate of Canada. Now, it may be said that inasmuch as this Bill does not specifically appropriate money from the treasury, it is not a money Bill, and the Senate therefore has a right to interfere. It is not a money Bill in the sense that it does not appropriate specific money, but it is a money Bill in that it directs, limits, makes conditions and qualifications under which money afterwards to be voted is to be expended; and the Senate of Canada have no power under the constitution in any way to limit or affect the qualifications under which money to be voted shall be expended. So, it is a money Bill so far as the power of the Senate to amend it is concerned. What purpose could it serve to say that they have no power to interfere with the provision of a Supply Bill and alter the purposes to which money voted in the Supply Bill shall be directed, if they have power, in the case of this Bill, to make alterations and in that way divert money to be voted under a Supply Bill? It is only a roundabout way of getting at the same thing; they are interfering with the conditions and qualifications of the appropriation of the money of the people of Canada voted by the people's representatives. It is clear that for three hundred years this has been beyond the prerogative of the Lords, and it has always been beyond the prerogative of the Senate of Canada. It would be an anomaly, an absurdity, if this House were to quietly accept amendments so made by the Senate in derogation of our rights, no matter what may be the merits of the proposed change. The greater principle is superimposed, for it is the duty, and one of the first duties of the Commons of Canada, representing the people of this country, to preserve to ourselves the prerogative that has been ours for generations, and that has been the protection of the British people for centuries, and not meekly to abrogate our powers in favour of any irresponsible body, or of any body whatever. That is the great duty imposed upon us, a duty from which this Government will not shrink. We are the custodians of that right, and we do not propose to have it robbed from us by any body of men. What would be the result, if we meekly sat down under this Senate amendment?

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not follow the hon. gentleman's arguments very closely. As a matter of the history of this Bill, will he please tell me whether it was dealt with as a money Bill when it was introduced in this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have already dealt fully with that. When the Bill was brought forward for the second reading, the right hon. leader of the Opposition objected on the ground that there had been no recommendation or sanction of the Bill by His Royal Highness the Governor General, and that the Bill had not been introduced by resolution, and the right hon. gentleman argued that it was a money Bill. The leader of the Government objected, not that it was not a money Bill, but that it did not appropriate specific money and therefore did not come under the rule which requires the preliminary sanction of the Governor General. The Bills that require to be so introduced are Bills appropriating part of the public revenue for a specific purpose, which this Bill did not do. Now, that must be clear. Whether the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) calls that a 'money bill' does not matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then it was not dealt with as a money Bill in this House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: 'Money bill' is only a name. This Bill did not appropriate any specific part of the public revenue, and for that reason it did not require to be introduced by resolution. The hon. member can call it a money Bill, or a silver Bill, or anything else he pleases. It did not possess that element of a money Bill, but it did possess another element. Let me get this into the mind of the hon. member for North Cape Breton, and then I am sure that every other member of this House will understand it clearly. I say it did possess another characteristic of a money Bill, as it proposed a purpose to which money afterwards to be appropriated should be put. It provided the conditions and qualifications under which money afterwards to be voted should be spent. That is a characteristic and element of the Bill, and the Senate cannot interfere with that Bill because if they do it they are running contrary to the standing order of 1678, one of the elemental principles of our Constitution. Surely that must be clear. The hon. member from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie)— perhaps I do not do justice to his mind, it may be that he refuses to have this made clear to his mind. He is trying to follow the example of his elder brothers in the Senate and he is endeavouring to shelter himself behind the phrase 'a money Bill,' which has one of two characteristics, if it is to provide money it must be preceded by a resolution and if, secondly, it is to provide the manner and the limitations under which it is to be expended it comes under the second classification and in either case the Senate cannot interfere.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am learning fast. Does my hon. friend say that the authorities of this House made a mistake in allowing the Bill to go through without being preceded by a resolution or did they gloss it over and allow it to go through as a money Bill when it really is not a money Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the slightest question to make of the rectitude of the Speaker's decision when he decided that this Bill was not such a Bill as required a resolution, that it did not come within the clause of the rules of this House that describes when and under what conditions a Bill must be so introduced.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that it underwent a process of evolution in going to the other House and became a money Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I can address myself with confidence to the task of overcoming the clouds in the brain of my hon. friend, but I cannot, with confidence, address myself to the task of overcoming his prejudices. It went through no evolution between here and the Senate, it was the same Bill there as here, he can call it a money Bill or anything he likes; it is not a Bill that came within the clause of our rules, a special clause providing for the introduction by resolution of a money Bill; but it was a Bill that, as plainly as the nose on his face, came within the rules that prevented it being interfered with by the Senate. The hon. gentleman will perhaps admit that it is not the same clause at all that describes a Bill so to be introduced and the clause that describes such a Bill as is without the pale of the Senate of Canada. They are altogether different, and the hon. member does not deceive anybody, I do not think he even deceives himself by harping on the expression 'money bill.'

Mr. McKENZIE: That is unkind, the word 'harping' is not a nice one.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I invite my hon. friend to get away from the phrase 'a money bill.' The Senate appeared to think that no Bill should be allowed to pass through appropriating money to the provinces, unless they themselves see to it that the money is properly distributed. In the first place, they have no right so to interfere. What right have they to tie the hands of this House? What right have they to attempt to tie the hands of future Houses of Commons? If they can do this what is the position? After we have passed the Highways Bill we come to the Supply Bill, we go to vote this money to be spent under the provisions and subject to the qualifications set out in the Highways Bill. We have accepted the Senate amendment. We have allowed the Senate to dictate to this House how such money shall be distributed. We have allowed them to invade our prerogative to that extent. Then when the Highways Bill is under debate some hon. gentleman proposes: let us distribute this money according to the method followed in the Agricultural Instruction Act, let us divide so much money among all the provinces and let us distribute the rest according to population. Oh, some gentleman gets up and says, no, we cannot do that, we are forbidden to do that by the Senate amendment to the Highways Act. The hands of this House are tied by an amendment in the matter of the distribution of our money. Is such a course not an interference with the prerogative of this House to guide solely the distribution of our funds and the purposes to which the money of this country is to be put? The Senate has completely desecrated and has lifted entirely out of the Constitution the sole control of this House over the money of this country, if we permit the Senate to interpose as they proposed to interpose in the Highways Bill.

As I said before, one would imagine that it had been an immemorial principle of the Upper House never to permit a Bill of this kind to go through, appropriating money to provinces, unless it first of all dictated to this House the principle on which it was to be distributed. It will be a matter of surprise perhaps to hon. gentlemen opposite that just one year before the Senate fastened on this notion of inserting this amendment to clause 4, they allowed a similar Bill to go through with very little criticism and only twelve votes against it, which permitted money to be distributed among the provinces and did not stipulate any principle on which it was to be distributed, that was the Agricultural Aid Bill of 1912. That bill provided in very terms that the Government of Canada might give the various provinces sums to be voted afterwards in the Supply Bill to be used to aid agriculture and no clause was inserted in the Senate tying the hands of this House or of future Houses in the distribution of such money. Consequently the Senate itself is on record as acceding to the principle that this House and this House alone has the control of the distribution of money, whether that distribution is effected by one Bill or by two.

Furthermore, it was argued in the Senate of Canada that the whole Bill was unconstitutional, that inasmuch as highways were within the jurisdiction of the provinces we had no power to interfere at all, whether we employed the agencies of the provincial Government or not, that the whole Bill was in direct conflict with the constitution of Canada; and the leader of the Senate majority argued for that principle and argued lengthily if not strongly. But he did not take the responsibility of negativing the Bill. The Senate had the power if it had any power to interfere at all, to reject the Bill. If the Bill was unconstitutional or if he so believed, it was his duty, if he had the courage of his convictions, to negative the Highways Bill altogether. Why did he not do it? Why did he not ask his followers to give a direct negative to that Bill, and not ask them to take the roundabout method, which is only an excuse, of making the Bill impossible legislation by encumbering it with vicious amendments? The reason is apparent to every member in this House. The leader of the Liberal party in that House knew that no matter for what excuse he negatived that Bill it would be clear to the humblest intelligence in Canada that they had killed the Bill and he preferred to do it by a more ingenious method, by attaching to it amendments which he knew could not be accepted by this House or any other that had in its conscience the duty of preserving the prerogative of the people's representatives. He took the roundabout and indirect method rather of fastening an amendment to clause four and eliminating clause six, knowing, as he must have known, that by doing that they were accomplishing their aim perhaps in a manner that would provide an excuse, plausible to those who did not fully understand the question; but he refused to go about it in the direct and manly way of negativing the Bill as was in his power. So it resolves itself into this, that the Senate fastened on the Bill amendments that they knew were not in their power to pass, they knew that in doing so they were flying in the face of one of the elemental principles of our constitution, they knew in doing it that no Government could possibly accept such an amendment, and they knew that the result would be to destroy the Highways Bill once and for all. Consequently it must be clear to anyone who does justice to his intelligence that their purpose from the beginning was to destroy the Highways Bill just as the result was to destroy the Highways Bill. There the responsibility lies. They took that responsibility knowing full well the result, and the responsibility being there we intend it shall remain there; and we do not propose that in the Highways Bill or in any other Bill the rights that have been the rights of the people's representatives throughout the history of this country and the mother country shall be invaded in any degree by the Senate of this country. If they attempt to invade those rights whatever may be their purpose, whether manfully stated or whether concealed, we propose to resist that usurpation and to maintain for ourselves the control over the expenditure, the control over the conditions, limitations, and qualifications of expenditure, which has been implanted in our Constitution and which has been there for many years gone by. For these reasons I say it must be clear to all that this House was not only well advised but this House was bound not only on the merits of the two amendments themselves but for a higher reason, for the reason that these amendments were brought down in violation of a principle of the Constitution which it is our duty to preserve—this House was bound I say for these two reasons to reject those amendments. It must be clear the Senate knew this House was so bound and the responsibility then is plain to all, and I believe it is plain to the hon. member for Red Deer. The responsibility for killing the Highways Bill is upon the Senate, and whether in a future Highways Bill or otherwise they attempt to invade the prerogative of the Commons of this country the Bill which they so attempt to mutilate will be rejected by this House for such has always been the practice of this House whether under Liberal or Conservative Government. But the Senate cannot by rejecting the Bill in this roundabout method get rid of the responsibility that we fix upon them now, and that will sit upon them for all time to come.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks will be directed to you: I say I am satisfied and happy to see you back in good health ready to take up once more the labours of the session. I beg of you to accept my heartiest New Year's greetings for yourself and family.

I listened with pleasure to the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), who has just taken his seat. As usual he has shown ability. He is a good lawyer, with a great deal of experience, but at the same time a hair splitter. He was well deserving of promotion.

I have not forgotten that during the session of last year, he succeeded in putting through the House a closure rule. He satisfied his friends that the members of the Opposition should be gagged, and thus attained his object. He was paid spot cash. He is now entrusted with the position of Solicitor General. He is doing well, let him keep on.

To-night he spoke for almost an hour and a half in an endeavour to make us believe that the Dominion Parliament has jurisdiction over our public highways. That is quite a feat. That is a money bill, he says. No, it is not a money bill, but it is a silver bill we passed. Those Senators are ignorant people. The leader of the majority in the Senate, Sir George Ross, who has spent his life in various legislative assemblies and was for a long time the prime minister of his province, does not know anything. The hon. member for Portage-la-Prairie (Mr. Meighen) is the only one who knows anything. He is the learned one. No one else is acquainted with the constitutional law of this country; as regards any others, it is absurd, farcical, a proof of ignorance to say so. You know nothing, he says, and I know all.

What a killer, what a smotherer of the members of the loyal Opposition. He got what he was after, a post of honour, and he chuckles over it. He used to brand us as patronage seekers; now he has slipped into our boots; he is there and we are here.

The hon. member for Red-Deer (Mr. Clark) is also an ignoramus. There are here grey-haired men who have spent their lives in this Parliament, but they are not any the wiser on that account. They are deaf, blind, ignorant, without any acquaintance with the laws of the country. I alone am acquainted with them, I am the only professor, a second Napoleon forsooth.

If we are to believe the hon. Solicitor General, the Dominion Parliament has the right to do anything it pleases. Now, who will believe it? According to his contention, the Dominion Parliament has control over the highways. Now that is rather startling.

The Solicitor General has set himself to the task of teaching a lesson to everybody. However, we also have studied the law of the land, we grasped its purport before he did, before he became a professor. And we know perfectly well that the Dominion Parliament exercises those powers only which have been conceded by the various provinces of Canada. It does not possess any other than those which were delegated to it. The Dominion Parliament has no control whatever over highways. According to the Solicitor General they would be under that Parliament's control, while at the same time it could not be compelled to say how much money was going to be spent on those highways, in what districts they were to be built, or under whose supervision. No one has any information as to that.

But the hon. Solicitor General finally sought salvation in the direct agency argument. We have heard of that before. The Senate who are better posted than you in respect to the constitution, have decided that there is no direct agency governing this country.

Mr. Chairman, it is getting late, and in accordance with arrangements made, I understand, I shall now move the adjournment of the debate, in case there should actually be, as I believe an agreement to that effect.

Motion agreed to, and debate ajourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

Monday, January 26, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL WATERWAY.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN: In the absence of the right hon. the Prime Minister, I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, whom we are very glad to see again in his seat, if the Government has had any communication with the Government of the United States in respect to the substance of an article which appears in a Government organ, the Ottawa Citizen, of this date, entitled: 'Joint Waterway from Duluth to Atlantic Ocean; International Commission discusses plans at Washington and will bring project to attention of the Canadian Government.' I am not reading the whole article, but just a portion of it:

Washington, Jan. 25.—A project for the joint construction by the governments of the United States and Canada of a deep waterway for ocean-going steamers from Montreal to Duluth, Minn., has been inaugurated through the International Joint Commission, which has jurisdiction over the boundary waters of the two countries.

The discussions instituted through the International Joint Commission are the result of a recent conference in Washington, in which Secretary Bryan, Chairman James A. Tawney of the American section of the International Commission, and Senator Charles E. Townsend, of Michigan, participated.

It was arranged that the matter should be taken up first with the Canadian Government through the commission. Chairman Tawney will confer soon with T. Chase Casgrain, K.C., chairman of Canadian section.

The project for an ocean waterway from the head of navigation on lake Superior to the Atlantic has been agitated for many years. It was considered seriously at the time when President Taft entered into reciprocity negotiations with Canada.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not been in as close communication with the Government lately as I could have wished, and in the absence of the Prime Minister I shall have to ask my hon. friend to repeat his question later when the Prime Minister comes in. I myself am not aware of any communication having been had.

FUNERAL OF LORD STRATHCONA.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sure that the House would like to hear the following cablegram from Mr. Griffith to the right hon. the leader of the Government:

London, Jan. 26, 1914.

Rt. Hon. R. L. Borden,
Ottawa, Ont.

The funeral service for the late High Commissioner held in Westminster Abbey to-day was attended by representatives of Their Majesties the King and Queen, Queen Alexandra, the Duke of Connaught, Prince Arthur of Connaught, the Duchess of Albany, Princess Louise, and many members of His Majesty's Government. There were also represented a great number of the leading scientific, educational and other bodies, as well as the Royal Academies of Art and Music. Public sympathy was most marked. The event was a great tribute to Lord Strathcona's outstanding personality, and unmistakably betokened great good-will toward the Dominion of Canada which he so long and so well represented.

(Sgd.) Griffith.

BAY OF FUNDY NAVIGATION.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) to an article that has appeared in a number of papers. I am reading from the Ottawa Free Press of Friday, January 16, which contains a statement alleged to have come from one Captain R. F. Clift, a member of the Dominion Wreck Commission. This article says:

Captain Clift narrowly escaped being a passenger himself on the ill-fated Cobequid, and in recalling with some satisfaction the trouble he had escaped by his last-minute change of plans, denounced with outspoken bitterness the folly of compelling vessels of the type of the Cobequid to travel by the St. John route through the Bay of Fundy in winter.

'It is nothing short of manslaughter, no, it is worse, it is murder,' he said, 'to compel vessels to traverse the Bay of Fundy at a season when such terrifying hurricanes are likely to crop up and when fogs make it almost impossible to be certain of a successful battle with the dangerous racing currents.

'The Bay of Fundy has a rise and fall of tide of thirty feet, the greatest in the world, and the waters swirl through it at a perilous speed, so that when lashed into fury by storm, and obscured by fog, a shipmaster has not a fighting chance.'

The people of St. John, the captain continued, had used every kind of political pull to get the Royal liners to call, and had tried to coerce Sir Thomas Shaughnessy into allowing the Canadian Pacific railway vessels to come to St. John, but Sir Thomas had replied: 'No, I absolutely refuse to imperil my ocean liners by allowing them to go into the Bay of Fundy, with its dangerous cross currents.'

'It is absolutely jeopardizing the lives of captain, passengers and crew to send them across the Bay of Fundy in winter,' concluded the commissioner, 'and the captains only do so under protest and agains their judgment. Halifax is the safer winter port.'

I should like to know if this man, Captain R. F. Clift, is a member of the public service of the Dominion and an official of the Department of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If so, I desire to ask if this matter has been called to his attention, and if he proposes to investigate it, and, I would say, bring this officer to account for making such libelous statements as are contained in this article.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Captain Clift, whose opinions have been quoted by my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) is not an official of the Marine and Fisheries Department. He is a retired sailing master, as I understand, residing in Montreal. From time to time, for a good many years past, the Wreck Commissioner, in investigating wrecks on the St. Lawrence route, is assisted by two nautical assessors familiar with the conditions of navigation. The Wreck Commissioner has on several occasions called Captain Clift in for such purpose and he has acted in the capacity of a nautical assessor. But he is not an official of the department; he is not in the pay of the department. The impression, which, it would seem, he himself tries to create, that he is an official is entirely without foundation in fact. I had read the unfair and unjust statement to which the hon. gentleman refers, and, knowing what a slander it was against the Bay of Fundy, at once called the attention of the Board of Trade of St. John to the matter and suggested that it would be desirable that steps should be taken to place the facts fairly before the public. Inquiry has been made into the wreck of the Cobequid by the Wreck Commissioner, Captain Lindsay, assisted by two nautical assessors. I understand that the report and judgment of that court has been prepared and in a few days will be given to the public through the press. While I have no right to forestall the conclusions which the court has reached, yet, having followed the evidence given at the inquiry with a considerable degree of care, I venture to express the belief that it will be found that the Wreck Commissioners are not of opinion that the wreck was due to any inherent danger existing in the Bay of Fundy, but to other causes altogether.

I think it unfortunate, that, in connection with a disaster of this sort, any one should attempt to make capital against any special locality or any special waters over which navigation into Canada has to take place. Charges from time to time have been made with regard to the navigation of the Bay of Fundy. While there are dangers in the Bay of Fundy, as there are dangers to be found in all waters which ships navigate, yet I think it has been demonstrated in the past, time and again, that the dangers which exist in the Bay of Fundy are no greater than those which exist in many other navigable waters of the world. A good many years ago, when the late Senator Ellis was a member of this House, some charges of this character were made on the floor of Parliament when the question was being discussed of subsidizing steamers from Ports in Great Britain to Canada. This was in 1887 or 1888. Senator Ellis put upon the record of 'Hansard,' where it can be found by any one who is interested, a statement carefully prepared by the Board of Trade of St. John, showing the ships coming to and going from the Bay of Fundy and going in and out of the Port of St. John, and specifying the number of casualties occurring over a long period of years. The facts demonstrated beyond question that the Bay of Fundy was not a particularly dangerous water to mariners, and that the casualties during a number of seasons occurring in the Bay of Fundy are less than the casualties in many other ports of the world, upon which no such attack was made. It would be improper for me to reflect on the dangers of navigation of the St. Lawrence; these also have been much exaggerated. Of late years, with the aids to navigation provided and the means taken so far as possible to develop the means of protection to the mariner, a very great improvement has been made. It will be found, I believe, if a comparison be made—and no one attacks the record of the St. Lawrence—that the record of the Bay of Fundy is quite equal, if not superior, as far as casualties are concerned, to the great St. Lawrence route from the sea to Quebec and on to Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this is going rather beyond what is allowed.

Mr. CARVELL: It is very important, Mr. Speaker. Let the hon. gentleman go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it would be a rather dangerous precedent to allow this debate to proceed at this stage.

Hon. Mr. HAZEN. I must bow at once to your decision, Mr. Speaker. But perhaps I may take a more fitting occasion to refer to the question raised by my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., which was a most proper one to ask. I must content myself now with saying that the casualty under discussion did not occur in the Bay of Fundy. I think that the inquiry by the Wreck Commissioner into the causes of the wreck of the Cobequid will be found to have been of the fullest possible character, and the result will be given to the public as soon as it is possible to do so.

MARITIME MAIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): I invite the attention of the Postmaster

General to the condition of the mail service between Sackville, in Westmorland county, and the eastern portions of the county over the line of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway. I have just received a telegram from the eastern part of Westmorland, stating:

No train over this route since 19th. No mail 19th to 23rd. Mails now coming by team. Road could easily have been opened 23rd or 24th. Inquiries at railway office meet with no information given no remedy.

The railway referred to runs from Sackville to Cape Tormentine. It connects at certain seasons with a mail service to Prince Edward Island at Summerside. I would ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General if his attention has been called to the fact that the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway is snowbound, that the mails have been interrupted since the 19th of this month. This is a very important section of the country, and naturally the people are very much interested in having a mail service. They have a daily mail service when the trains are in operation, but, apparently, they have no such mail service now.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): These things very often come to the notice of the department. The unfortunate part of the matter is that although the Post Office Department has a contract with the railway companies to carry the mail, it has no means of forcing them to do what they ought to do under certain circumstances. In this case there is a standing order from the department at once to get out teams or employ other means of transportation for the purpose of taking proper care of the mails. The particular point to which my hon. friend refers has not been called to my attention, because, I suppose, the officers of the department have instructions to do at once the next best thing in order to ensure a proper delivery of the mails to the public and it will be done in this case.

THE OCEAN LIMITED.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. EMMERSON: On Friday last the general manager of the Intercolonial railway sent notices to the newspapers of the Maritime provinces to the effect that the operation of twenty-three trains of the Intercolonial railway system, including the Ocean Limited, would be discontinued on Monday of this week, that is to-day. Has this matter come to the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and, if so, have instructions been sent out cancelling any such order, and providing that the operation of the Ocean Limited be continued as heretofore? Has the hon. minister any knowledge as to the other trains in question, and if so, what trains running over the Intercolonial railway are to be discontinued?

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE: I have no knowledge of any twenty-three trains being taken off. The Ocean Limited is to continue to run, and I shall be able to inform the House to-morrow or the next day as to whether that train will continue to run during the next two months.

Mr. EMMERSON: Do I understand the hon. minister to say he has no knowledge of the discontinuing of the twenty-three trains mentioned?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. EMMERSON: Such an order went out.

Mr. COCHRANE: I never heard of it.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, resumed from Friday, January 23.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the adjournment, on Friday night, I was referring to the remarks the hon. Solicitor General had just made in regard to the policy adopted by the Senate in connection with the proposal of a grant towards the improvement of highways. The hon. Solicitor General contended, in good faith, no doubt, that the Senate had no right to amend the Bill which the House had passed, because, he said, in respect to a money Bill, to a Bill providing for the expenditure of a certain amount of money, the Senate cannot effect any amendments, additions, curtailments, or alter the nature and object of this Bill. He contended, moreover, that this Bill, though not intituled 'money Bill,' actually was a money Bill, and that the Senate should have kept their hands off it.

I said the other night, and I repeat it, there are dozens and dozens of eminent men in this House, and even in the Senate, who certainly are as learned and as wise as the Solicitor General. The latter has, of course, the right to give his opinion; he is entitled to put almost absolute faith in the truth of his contentions; but he should leave the same freedom to others.

The leader of the Opposition in the Senate (Sir George Ross) is a man not to be trifled with. He has spent his life in parliaments, having long been the Prime Minister of his province, and to-day he has at his side to lend him a hand, men of long experience, men who are just as well acquainted as the Solicitor General with the laws and constitution of the country. I deny to the learned Solicitor General the right to deal in such high-handed fashion with whoever is of a different opinion, and to say: It is childish, it is laughable, it is preposterous! We have in this House large numbers of hon. gentlemen who have devoted their lives to study, who are perfectly in touch with our constitutional law and parliamentary usage, men who were members of this House long before the Solicitor General ever set his foot here, and who have disagreed with him. When I had an opportunity of addressing the House, the other night, I did so knowing where I stood, after looking up the points of law raised by him. and I was satisfied that he had no grounds justifying such sweeping conclusions as he arrived at. The learned Solicitor General should know one thing, and it is this: Whereas it is possible to make a nice little book with the things he knows, a very large one could be made out of what he ignores.

I have looked carefully into the Speech from the Throne. It appeared to me well prepared, well made, perfect in form, but terribly deficient in ideas. It contains nothing worth mentioning, save some expressions of sympathy to the Royal Family. Apart from that there is very little.

I smiled on reading the paragraph which heralded an increase in the number of senators. Why should the number of senators be increased previous to any increase in the membership of this House? As a rule, new senators are appointed only after the matter has been passed upon by the representatives of the people. In this instance, the first step is towards increasing the number of the senators. That is the way this Government goes about it. We style that putting the cart before the horse. Common sense would require that the number of members who express the will of the people should be first increased. In any case, I am anxious to see that Bill before the House.

I was surprised to find that the Speech from the Throne does not make any reference whatever to the navy, or to the thirty-five millions voted in spite of us during the last session. However, that legislation, according to hon. gentlemen opposite was the most important of all. It was so urgent that everything else had to be set aside to allow of its being passed. The hon. Solicitor General, as I stated a moment ago, is particularly well informed, and he endeavoured to make us believe that two and two make five. He it was who undertook to get a closure rule passed without submitting it previously to a committee for its overhauling and subsequent consideration by the House. Nothing of the kind was done. Nevertheless, that closure rule had been imagined for the purpose of getting the Navy Bill passed through the House. There is not a word in reference to it in the Speech from the Throne. I was greatly surprised to find that the members of the new Government had given up the navy which has caused so much trouble, and done so much harm. That navy, though, was a very desirable thing, since it was destined to save the British Empire. Now, there is not one word about it in the Speech from the Throne, not one.

The presence here of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), whom I greet with pleasure, suggests to me the idea that possibly he may have been recalled purposely to answer me. Where has he been? No one answers. Was he in China, in Japan, in Australia, in Asia? No one has informed us of the fact. I am beginning to think that I am a very important man, considering that the most experienced, the most wary, the best informed man in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite has been recalled to answer me. Besides, it is stated by the big guns and in the Government organs, that the right hon. Prime Minister may go to London to represent us in Great Britain as High Commissioner. It is announced at the same time that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) may proceed to London as our High Commissioner there. If all the big guns depart, it is not surprising that others should be recalled to take their places. As for me, I would be glad to keep the Hon. Mr. Rogers here; it is so amusing when he tries to gag us, that I am intent on retaining him in our midst.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has become of the navy? What has become of that pressing necessity of a thirty-five million grant to avoid an impending war with Germany? According to these hon. gentlemen, it was of absolute necessity to forward those thirty-five millions, otherwise bankruptcy was staring England in the face. We were told that the Laurier navy was only tin-pot and no good. We could easily afford to grant those thirty-five millions, because the country was prosperous, they said. We have surpluses every year; it is an easy matter to forward thirty-five millions, to make a wedding present, without the country being any the worse for it. In spite of the Opposition, in spite of its most determined efforts, the House voted those millions. The Bill was forwarded to the Senate. The hon. gentlemen in the other House were suppose to swallow that pill without much protest, provided it was slightly sugar-coated. But it is not such an easy matter to have the veterans of the Senate to swallow those pills. The man entrusted with the interests of Canada was no tyro; he said to the ministers: You have cried high and low, you have contended and repeated in the House, and a number of your friends who are representatives of the people have stated in every quarter: No navy without a previous consultation of the people; no expenditure for that object previous to the holding of a plebiscite which the people have to be called upon to vote. These members of the Cabinet hailing from the province of Quebec, all of them, were especially outspoken in their denunciations of the navy, that confounded navy, we will not have anything to do with it, they would exclaim. We would rather cut off a hand first, start a revolution, if necessary, rather than have a navy previous to consulting the people.

By the time they get into Parliament, it is a grant for the navy that must be voted, and in quick time. But the hon. leader of the Senate (Sir George Ross) is not easily fooled. He stated to the hon. Prime Minister and his friends: You stated that there would be no Navy Bill passed previous to consulting the people; you are bound to stick to your word. What a pity, Mr. Speaker, that men who are entrusted with the affairs of a country as important as ours should thus change their minds from one day to the other. Is it not painful to have to acknowledge to the people that those who are in power are not keeping faith, make light of their promises as soon as they reach power, passed from one side of the House to the other, and accepted portfolios? Should a poor man act so, he would be dealt with pretty harshly. The man who does not keep his word is not of much use. A public man has no right to do on the next day the opposite of what he promised to do the day previous.

I am glad to see that there is to be passed through the House a Bill in respect to the navy which is of a kind to secure my approval, I must admit, especially if its promoter is acting in good faith, as I presume he is. I mean the Bill introduced by Mr. Lesperance, of Montmagny, repealing the Navy Bill. If that hon. gentleman is acting in good faith, and is, as I believe, an honourable man, for he occupies a very high social position, I think I shall vote for the repeal of that Navy Bill. But, it may be objected, are you not stultifying yourself, after voting in support of that Navy Bill? Quite right, I voted in support of that measure, but at the time the country was prosperous, and we had millions galore, and besides we were told that it was necessary to pass such a measure and that the revenue was sufficient to meet any expenditure it would entail, without having any detrimental effect on the nation's credit.

But, in the meantime, matters have taken quite a different turn. The Minister of Finance has been forced to admit that we are facing a serious crisis, that our finances are greatly embarrassed, that commerce is no longer prospering, and that we must not think of changing the tariff because trade might suffer in consequence. I am wondering whether we are still in a position to undergo the expenditure entailed by the upkeep of a war navy. Thus in supporting a Bill providing for the repeal of that Act, I would not be going against my past record. The financial conditions of the country having changed in the meantime, the German peril having vanished, order and peace being restored, why should we have a navy? Since we have no one to fear in any quarter, why should we uselessly spend so many millions?

I may decide to build for myself a mansion at a time when I have the means of doing so. But supposing I undergo heavy losses on my stocks, or supposing I am under the necessity of making some unforeseen expenditure, have I not the right to say to my architect: Pray discontinue; I am short of funds, my financial position is not what it was when I made up my mind to build that mansion; I am no longer in a position to make such an outlay. Am I not just as justified to-day in voting for the repeal of that Navy Bill, which the Government was not willing to carry out when the country's finances were still in their past state of buoyancy and we were in a position to do things such as those?

I am at a loss to say what the leader of my party is going to decide, what position he will advise us to take; but if I am free, as I usually am, if I am at liberty to act in accordance with my views and decision, I say to the hon. member for Montmagny that he may rely on my support. However, I must add: Be candid about it, and let not that Bill be mere trumpery.

The hon. member is usually straightforward in everything he does. If I have the assurance that this Bill is introduced in good faith and in the best interest of the country, I shall very likely support it.

The navy was a necessity in days gone by; all were agreed as to that. I just now see in his place the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). Assuredly he is not the first comer. He as well as all his friends in 1909 joined hands with the Liberals to say to the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) it is necessary that we should build a navy. The Hon. Mr. Monk was the only one not to give his approval to that expression of policy. But I was pleased later on to hear that gentleman say: I was not in the House in 1909 at the time that resolution was voted, but had I been present I would have voted in its favour.

So it is certain, indisputable, that both political parties agreed at the time in approving what the Laurier Government did later on. I mean the purchase of two ships as models, and the carrying on of those naval building operations as fast as the financial conditions of the country allowed it.

But later on hon. gentlemen on the other side changed their minds. They said: If we let that Navy Bill pass, Mr. Laurier will remain in power so long as he wishes. There is a fine opportunity to embarrass him, to impede his progress; let us change our policy and try something else. So these gentlemen went to the people with altered views; as a result we were beaten on that issue, mixed up with another of as great importance, that of reciprocity.

So I have the right to-day, in the presence of those facts, to say that hon. gentlemen on the other side have not been sincere in the stand they have taken; they have not kept their word; but when they have to appear once more before the people for a renewal of their mandate, they will be called upon to render a strict account of their stewardship. The people will exact a true and faithful account, with vouchers attached. They will say. What have you done in connection with the navy? You had agreed never to spend a cent on that acount before submitting the matter to the electors, a promise which you have broken in voting those 35 millions.

I now pass on to another viewpoint. The hon. Solicitor General stated the other night that the Senate had not the right to effect that amendment to the Highways Bill. I have previously discussed that question, and I do not wish to cover once more the same ground. But I say that this House had no right to provide any expenditure for that purpose without specifying what highways were to be improved and where, what amounts were to be expended in the various provinces, in what manner and under whose authority. The majority of this House having refused to point out the particulars which I have just given, I say unhesitatingly that the Senate had undoubtedly the right to vote the amendment it did vote. And while listening to some hon. members during the last by-elections, who contended that if we had not the highways proposed by the House, it was the fault of the Liberal Senators, I could not help thinking that these gentlemen were in bad faith.

When it is stated to farmers: You did not get the highways promised you, or the money voted for those highways, but that is owing to the Senate, that is owing to the Liberals who refused to accede to the wish of the House of Commons, you did not get the protection you were entitled to because the Senate killed the Bill, I say such language is grossly insulting to the members of the Senate, for it is attributing to them motives and intentions which they did not have.

Then there is the appeal to the people. That famous plebiscite, not a word is said in reference to it in the Speech from the Throne, and the Nationalists themselves did not dare introduce a Bill providing for an appeal to the people However, they stated time and again, and on every husting, that what they wanted was an appeal to the people. Not a single meeting was held in the course of the last election without the Nationalists exclaiming: We want an appeal to the people, we want a plebiscite, and we shall oppose every demand made by the new Government if that demand is not preceded by an appeal to the people.

Those gentlemen are in power since 1911; this is the year 1914, and it is the first time an effort is being made to redeem the pledges given in 1911.

Then as regards reciprocity, it was stated at the time: 'Let well enough alone.' The country was prosperous and as a result it was not necessary to make any changes, these gentlemen would say. To-day they are unable to say: 'Let well enough alone'; they must be content with saying: 'Let bad enough alone.' Public confidence is impaired, the cost of living is higher than formerly, and when the Government is called upon to apply a remedy, they answer: 'Let bad enough alone.' Hands off. That is a sign of a change in the times. Another sign is the fact that business is at a standstill and that the old-time prosperity has disappeared. I see that the hon. Minister of Finance stated, according to the Star of Saturday evening, that public opinion was not asking for a change in the tariff. To be able to express such a view, the minister must have sought that expression of public opinion among interested people, among manufacturers who are intent on continuing to draw those large dividends for themselves. But let the Minister of Finance come down to the people, let him inquire as to their views, and he will acknowledge that public opinion requires a change in the tariff. Let him inquire from the workingmen, from the farming class, he will soon find out that those two classes require more protection. But if he is content with gathering opinions among his own people, I dare say the result will be slightly different. I say that an enlightened public opinion requires a change in the tariff, in order to ensure greater protection to those who are entitled to it.

Mr. Speaker, at Montreal, the chambers of commerce, the most important business corporations are clamoring for the immediate building of the Georgian Bay canal, and I am surprised not to see any reference to it in the Speech from the Throne. How is it that so little deference is shown to the wishes of such an important community as that of the metropolis of Canada? There is not even an answer forthcoming to the numerous petitions which have been forwarded to the Government. Not a word, not even a refusal. Not a single reason given why the Government should not start at once the building of that canal. Reference is made to the appointment of a commission. But for fifty years commissions have succeeded one another. For fifty years past, engineers and other experts have been at work investigating the possibility of building that canal, and in every instance favourable reports were made stating that such undertaking could not be dispensed with.

If there is no intention of carrying out the Laurier Act in regard to the building of ships, if it is not intended to continue spending 35 millions, which amount the House granted against our will, to be spent on the British navy, then let us build that canal; the funds which these gentlemen proposed to apply to the development of the navy, let us apply them to the building of that canal. No, these gentlemen are unwilling to do anything, except folding their arms and managing the Government.

When it comes to spending money on the militia, though, to have them drill and exercise, expenditure follows expenditure, trip follows trip, millions follow millions; there is no cheese-paring about it. The people are not consulted, and funds are spent lavishly. I say the Government is not accomplishing its duty in not listening to the appeal of the great corporations for the immediate construction of this canal.

Mr. Speaker, the other day I read in the papers that the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) had been under the necessity of negotiating a loan of 20 millions in London. The amount was large, and he had not succeeded. England advanced only ten millions. Just think of a country like Canada making to England a gift of 35 millions just before applying for a loan of 20 millions for the carrying out of urgent and necessary work within the Dominion. That is an odd situation. Is it not an humiliation for our country to have to beg for a loan of millions from Great Britain, while at the same time making her a gift of an equal amount, simply to show our generosity. Previous to buying a piano or a silk dress for one's wife, the baker, the grocer, the cobbler and all other suppliers of primary necessities should have been settled with.

I regret that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) should not be in his place; I would have something of interest to him to give out. I suppose he was appointed Minister of Agriculture because he knew something about agriculture, because he was conversant with the needs of the farming community. If he was here, I would enquire how it is that there is no reference whatever in the Speech from the Throne indicating the least concern for the welfare of the farming community. It is nevertheless an important industry, and in this connection, I may refer to a crop on which the people in my county largely depend, I mean tobacco. Why should not the Government increase the rates on foreign tobaccos in order to further protect our Canadian growers. Our tobacco growers have to stand the competition of the foreign leaf. In days gone by the Government went to a large expenditure for the purpose of encouraging and developing the growing of Canadian tobacco, but the time has come to go a step further. A duty of five cents per pound should be imposed on the foreign leaf in order to help the farmers improve their methods as well as the soil itself. Those who are the least conversant with agriculture are aware that a depleted soil must be enriched. Our farmers might easily enough stand the competition of foreign imports, if they were in a position to restore to the land its original fertility. It is necessary to restore to the soil those elements of which continuous cropping has deprived it, and accordingly to buy potash which costs fifty dollars per ton. How do you expect farmers to go to such an expenditure without the Government coming to their assistance? Put on a further duty on foreign tobaccos imported from Havana, Kentucky, and other parts, in a word, on all tobaccos competing with our home grown leaf.

That would enable our growers to maintain the soil in the proper state of fertility; instead of obtaining a thousand pounds an acre, they would possibly get fifteen hundred.

I was discussing the question with a Government official, a man of great ability and experience, of French origin, Mr. Charland, chief of that section of the Department of Agriculture. He stated that if tobacco were properly grown in Canada, on well prepared land, it should yield 2,000 lbs. per acre, while it barely yields half that quantity. That is, he says, on account of the deficiency in potash. Too much has been taken out of the soil by tobacco growing; it has to be enriched in that particular.

Now, the Minister of Agriculture has not a single word in the Speech from the Throne to show that he takes an interest in the farmer's welfare. Under the previous Administration, I had called the attention of the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), to the necessity of encouraging agriculture. I had requested the establishment of experimental stations in the principal districts of the province. He had given me his word that he would promptly see to it. But to-day there is no reference whatever to the subject. What would be the effect of the establishment of these stations from the point of view of the farmer? We have at Ottawa an experimental farm which has cost millions. I am not finding fault with that expenditure; but I do not say that there should be a dismemberment of the experimental farm. Farmers from the neighbouring districts in Ontario and Quebec come yearly to the central farm to collect new information. They reach Ottawa about noon, take lunch, and proceed to visit the farm. That takes two or three hours time and they return home practically not knowing any more than if they had never visited the farm. I say that the best departure would be to decentralize the experimental farm by establishing experimental stations in the various rural districts of the province. A station might be established at Three Rivers to begin with, then at St. Hyacinthe in the districts of Richelieu, Joliette, Terrebonne, St. Francis and elsewhere. These stations would be illustration stations, for the purpose of putting object lessons under the eyes of the farmers, and imparting to them the information they are in need of. I was disappointed to learn some time ago that the farmers of the province of Ontario had obtained 53,000 samples of seed grain last year, while the province of Quebec had applied for 9,000 only.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that there were numerous stations for the distribution of that seed grain. Let the samples be handed out at the church door on Sundays; let them be taken from house to house, if required, so that our farmers of the province of Quebec may be in a position to compete with those in the other provinces. We have strong arms, endurance and a fertile soil; we have industrious and temperate men; they are not sufficiently protected in that respect. We are taking good care of the industrial classes of the manufacturers, but the farmers are not looked after, they are a negligible quantity.

As regards by-elections, I shall say a word concerning them presently. I would like the Government to take proper measures to enable our farmers to secure large profits. Experts should be appointed to visit the various counties, examine the soil, find out what are its deficiencies, teach the proper methods of cultivation, the way to cut, dry and cure tobacco and so forth. Is that not what the Government did for butter and cheese factories? Why could we not do the same to help on tobacco growing? There is a complaint about people leaving the country and the cost of living increasing all the time; but apparently nobody suspects that all that is because farmers do not get the encouragement they are entitled to. Farmers abandon their farms, give up farming and come to the cities to take up trades. That is all very well, but what remedy is there for it? The remedy is to give a greater measure of protection. If we had an experienced Minister of Agriculture, anxious to get posted concerning the requirements of the situation by obtaining information from those who apply to him for protection, he would soon realize the truth of what I say.

The intention, it seems, is to increase the representation of cities and correspondingly diminish that of the country districts. Is that a proper means of encouraging farmers to remain on the land? It is contended that cities have not a sufficient number of representatives, and it is proposed to grant them larger representation at the detriment of the rural constituencies. Whether a member from Montreal represents 100,000 or 20,000 people, it does not make much difference, because the territory covered is the same; a city member may in five minutes call a meeting at a given place, and he may be sure that there will be thousands of electors to go and listen to him. But that is not my case, far from it, and in order to meet my constituents I must travel for weeks, or even a whole month, through rough roads, cross the Laurentian mountains, to inform them of what I have done or applied for in their interest.

It is not so much a question of population as a question of territory to be covered. Though my constituency has not a very large population, it is more difficult for me to get in touch with my electors than it is for the representative in a large city to communicate with his constituents. In the cities there are newspapers, there are public bodies, there are large corporations to keep the electors posted. It takes them five minutes every morning to read the report of the world's progress; while my constituents, who are settled in the mountains, where it is difficult to have access, are ignorant half the time of what is going on elsewhere. A part of the world might disappear without their knowing it; the pope may die and they will find out only long after. There is no longer any talk about the Laurier navy, but they have not heard of it.

So I say that instead of increasing the representation of large cities, it should be left as it is, and the representation of rural districts remain where it is. But it is objected that the population of cities is increasing enormously. Take for instance the division of Maisonneuve, the population of which exceeds 100,000 souls. Well, my acquaintance with the hon. member for Maisonneuve is such as to permit me to state that he is not worrying over that. He is free to call meetings any day at some point or other of his constituency, and even two or three every day, and thus come in contact with his electors in very short time. In cities, an auto is summoned, committee rooms are visited in no time, and everybody is interviewed. But just go in the Laurentides with an auto, and keep me posted as to your progress. If you are anxious that the population of rural districts should diminish further, ill-use it as you are threatening to do by depriving it of its representation in Parliament. You will find that farms will be deserted, and that it will be difficult to get your supply of cabbages and radishes, for which even to-day you have to pay pretty high prices.

To my regret, I do not find anything in the Speech from the Throne in reference to a very opportune move which the Government should make. The hon. Mr. Foster, who has travelled over Europe, should have seen to that while he was in London; I mean the doing away with the embargo on Canadian cattle. The Speech from the Throne is silent on that point. It is all very fine to trade with the empire, but our cattle, after being shipped across the pond, are looked over and slaughtered on the wharves, under pretence of tuberculosis; people eat them all the same. In that way our best animals are sold at a sacrifice, under pretence of safeguarding the public health, but it sells cheaper per pound than if it was classed No. 1 when still on foot.

Have any steps been taken by the hon. Minister of Commerce (Mr. Foster) to do away with that state of things, with that embargo on Canadian cattle? Supposing we are told that the Laurier Government has not done anything to relieve the situation, do you think the people will be satisfied with such an answer? Do you think the people have put in a new set of men without expecting an improvement in the condition of things? The people will soon realize that matters are not so well managed as they used to be. I shall charge the Government with sluggishness, with gross negligence in their dealings with the interests of the farming community, and for having neglected so far to take steps towards doing away with that embargo regulation affecting Canadian cattle. You propose granting 35 millions for the benefit of Great Britain, when your cattle are being slaughtered on the wharves in such fashion.

I am a farmer, I go in for the breeding of animals, and I say it is a crime to thus neglect taking steps towards putting an end to this state of things. You are aggrieved at seeing the people quit the land; protect us, help us, to begin with, and then we shall advise our children to stick to the homespun in preference to the silk hat of the city swell. But, in the first place, grant us the protection we are entitled to. We constitute 70 per cent of the population of the country, and that class which is so numerous is the very one which is ill-protected or not protected at all. We shall remain in the country, but under condition that you fulfil yourself your duty.

I charge with neglect the French-speaking members representing in the Cabinet the province of Quebec, for not making a better fight to obtain for us the measure of protection to which we are entitled. Not a line, not a word, absolutely nothing to show that they take some interest in the welfare of the farming class. For instance, petition after petition is forwarded, the newspapers in all the provinces are filled with expressions of opinion in regard to a world's fair to be held in Montreal. Resolutions passed by boards of trade, banks, insurance companies, large trans-Atlantic companies, etc., all go to state that, as a foregone conclusion, a world's fair should take place in Montreal. And there is not a word forthcoming from the ministers representing the province of Quebec; not a word showing that the Government are disposed to assist; they remain silent. It would seem that they hold portfolios with the firm resolve of avoiding all exertion, and that they are successful in attaining that object. Why do they not express their views as to the appropriateness of doing something in connection with the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation? One might think they have nothing to do with such matters. Well, I live on the island of Montreal. We have there some highly valuable property. We have the right to know what will be the stand taken by the Government, what will be their position in regard to the fair.

Recently I read something in a newspaper which caused me much surprise; I could hardly believe my senses. It was stated that the right hon. Prime Minister, while in New York, had represented that he was not opposed to reciprocity. To read in a newspaper that the Prime Minister stated in New York, as being his ipse dixit, that he was not opposed to reciprocity, that comes rather as a surprise. And the right hon. Prime Minister has allowed that report to be circulated throughout the Dominion!

There is no one but knows that the Prime Minister has been the instigator of the movement against reciprocity. Good Heavens, what is this country we are living in! Who are the deceivers, and who are the deceived? The Prime Minister leaving uncontradicted the statement made in a newspaper that he was not opposed to reciprocity! Well, Mr. Speaker, it is time for the sake of the dignity of this House that there should be a question put challenging these gentlemen to give an account of the views attributed to them by newspapers.

There is still another question that puzzles me. I mean the famous Ne Temere Bill. Poor Mr. Laurier, many capital sins have been charged to you, when it was stated in Ontario: 'If the Ne Temere exists, it is Laurier's fault; he is unwilling that Canadian women of the Catholic faith shall marry Protestants. Put us in power, and I, Mr. Borden, will see to it that Protestants and Catholic intermarry.

How is it that nothing more is heard of it? Has it been forwarded to Jerusalem? During the last election the abolition of that Ne Temere decree had been promised. The intention was to legislate so as to do away with the enactments of the Ne Temere. The former Minister of Justice, Sir Allan Aylesworth, an eminent man, the most distinguished lawyer which I have ever met, gave his opinion concurrently with his leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He stated that the constitution did not allow us to deal with that question, that it was not within the purview of the Dominion Parliament, but remained within the jurisdiction of the Provincial legislatures. Subsequently, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), a former judge, an eminent jurist, was called upon to express an opinion, and he agreed with the views of Sir Allan Aylesworth and Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Those gentlemen were not satisfied with that. The matter had to be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, in order to ascertain whether the stand taken by such eminent authorities was well grounded. So the question was submitted to the Supreme Court, and it was decided once again that this House has no jurisdiction. But the matter was not allowed to drop and was carried before the Privy Council in England. Here again the opinion expressed by the former Minister of Justice and Sir Wilfrid Laurier was upheld. All that resulted in an expenditure of fifty thousand dollars for the country, while Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Allan Aylesworth did not charge anything. In that way they succeeded in throwing away fifty thousand dollars, and the question is dead and buried.

There still remains the school question. that famous question. The Speech from the Throne does not say a single word about it, does not that make the least bit of reference to it, after all the talk on the matter we have had from the mouth of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I would like to enquire from him, if I saw him in his place, whether he is still of a humour to call Sir Wilfrid Laurier a renegade, a perjurer, an unworthy French Canadian, a coward, as he did on the hustings, taunting him for not having settled that question. He had not enough insults to hurl at the head of the former Prime Minister, branding him as a renegade, a knave. Later on, being questioned as to the intentions of the Government regarding that school question, he answered from his seat that this school question had been settled by the Greenway-Laurier agreement, an agreement which I concurred in. Was he sincere when he was slinging mud at the former Prime Minister, or was he sincere when he had succeeded in getting in the manger himself? The member for Jacques Cartier condemned the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, adding that the policy propounded by Mr. Borden was even worse. That did not prevent him from accepting a portfolio in that same Government headed by Mr. Borden. True, he did not stay there very long after saying that he was bolted, riveted and padlocked to his ministerial seat. However, there was no padlock strong enough to retain him, and he unbolted, unriveted and unpadlocked himself; he broke loose and ran away, and since has not been seen.

That is a well fettered man who runs away on the day following only. Since his resignation a very odd thing has been going on to my surprise; he has not in the meantime set foot in this House, and at the close of the year his friends passed a piece of legislation granting him his parliamentary indemnity. A man whom we meet every day in Montreal, on the street! He delivers lectures, but does not show up in the House. However, at the close of the session he gets his sessional indemnity all the same. We of the common fry, when we are absent one day, we are docked fifteen dollars; but as for this gentleman, he has the right to take it easy at the expense of the State, and at the close of the year small items will be inserted in the estimates for the benefit of those who have absented themselves. Well, I take exception to that way of managing things. You have sworn to protect the country's interests, to fulfil your duty as members of this House, to render your accounts and to give to Caesar whatever to Caesar is due. I deny you the right of pilfering the public monies and throwing them to the winds.

During our tenure of office, when we asked for subsidies amounting to $140,000,000, to meet the requirements of the country, we were branded as dishonest or incompetent administrators. But when hon. gentlemen opposite reach power, $140,000,000 are no longer sufficient. Last year it ran up to $250,000,000. What have you done with those millions? You have not a single word in the Speech from the Throne indicating the use they were put to. It may be objected that it is a little early to call for the estimates. That may be so; but should I wait a little longer, all will be dissipated, wasted.

I say that those men are not worthy of the confidence of the country, the confidence reposed in them by the people in 1911; they are not worthy of occupying seats on the Treasury benches. The Minister of Finance did not even state that he proposed taking steps towards voiding the sale of that $300,000 property situated in Winnipeg, which has been given away for ten dollars.

Such are the deeds perpetrated in this twentieth century, in the capital of the Dominion. Have these hon. gentlemen lost their heads? One might come to that conclusion. No steps whatever have been taken towards voiding that scandalous bargain. I shall charge the Government with sluggishness and deceit, if they do not take action in the matter. The poor man is summoned before a jury and sent to the penitentiary for having committed some petty theft. I have had the honour to represent the Crown in my district for the last eight years, and I have had convicted several people for petty larcenies. Are we to let go scott free thieves and sharpers, when thousands of dollars are at stake? I say that is a scandal which is leading the country to bankruptcy in short order, and when we are in debt to the extent of millions, the people will be taxed to pay off those millions. All of which show that these hon. gentlemen were not sincere.

In my constituency, dismissals have been effected right and left. There was a poor man who could not make a living for himself, having but one arm left, through an accident in operating a threshing machine. Well, he has been dismissed as postmaster, a position which I had succeeded in obtaining for him. He was deprived of his post office, because he had dared to say: I voted for Mr. Lafortune. He was thrown out of employment, though no complaint had been lodged against him. But he was guilty of having voted for me. The post office which bore my name was abolished. My constituents requested me to give my name to that post office. I answered in the affirmative, thinking it might be the only testimonial which my children might eventually be able to point to. But that testimonial was short-lived; to-day the post office is called 'Marion,' the name of the candidate I have defeated. At the same time, that poor man who had been appointed postmaster was thrown out. And that is what people term justice in a civilized country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the same thing has occurred in hundreds of cases; deceased people have been dismissed, and deceased people have also been appointed. Some have even been taken out of jail to occupy positions. Will it be contended that this is good management, that this is fair play? Such are the misdeeds of the Government. 'Oh, justice, what crimes are committed in thy name.'

You are right, Mr. Speaker, in finding that the advisors of the Crown are in no hurry to meet the electors. However, while the same man may be deceived several times, and all men be deceived occasionally, all men cannot be deceived all the time, and when the tenure of office of hon. gentlemen opposite has expired, they will have to render their accounts. And then will the cripple, such as the one-armed man I have referred to, rise in condemnation, and when the people kick, it is a mighty kick.

I am sorry, as well, to find no mention in the Speech from the Throne of any proposed change in the Bankruptcy Act, though boards of trade, banks, great corporations have passed resolutions in that sense.

In concluding, I shall refer to the election in Chateauguay. The Prime Minister chuckled over the result of that election. I took a hand in the fight, and I saw with my own eyes and heard with my own ears what went on in that election. The Government, to secure that election, promised bridges, a bridge between Montreal and Caughnawaga which was to cost nearly a half million. Elect our candidate, they would say, and you will get that bridge. The river will be deepened and broadened, so as to facilitate navigation. You will get a post office at St. Jean Chrysostome, an electric railway between the latter place and St. Antoine Abbé; you will have a driveway, but vote for the Government candidate. Fine wharves will be constructed, etc.

They would enter farm houses and inquire: Have you any sheep?—Yes. How many?—Five. How much do you want for them?—Five hundred dollars for them all. Well, that is rather high, but we will give you twenty-five dollars cash and the rest when we come for them. A collie dog was paid $50, $10 down, the balance to be paid on taking possession. Cattle were bought in that way in the county of Chateauguay, either to prevent the electors from voting, or inducing them to vote in favour of the Government candidate.

No wonder we lost Chateauguay, but that election is controverted, and the facts I have just mentioned, as well as many others, will be proven. Then we will have the chance of getting back at them, and you may be sure the old trick will not work this time. Chateauguay was won over through fraud, corruption, the open breaking of the law, in the same way that the general elections of 1911 have been won. But these things will not be tolerated a second time, and the people will hand justice to whom justice is due.

Before resuming my seat and concluding my remarks, I must say that I have barely skimmed over the various questions which these hon. gentlemen have omitted to mention in the Speech from the Throne. We shall, nevertheless, bring them up in this House. By omitting to refer to them in the Speech from the Throne, it was hoped possibly that the session would be shortened. But we are going to make the programme for the session with the help of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; for he is still, as always, the master of the House; he still leads the country which he has governed so long. While he was in office there was no depression, and there was work for all. There was nothing too dear, as there was lots of money in every home. Until he is carried back to power, we shall fight those who are so grossly mismanaging the affairs of the country; and I for one shall not be afraid to appear before my constituents and to tell them what I have done, what I wished to do, and I shall be returned once more to this House, for I have always done my duty heretofore, and I have to deal with honest and intelligent electors.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas): I am sorry I was not able to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lafortune) as fully as I would have liked. Perhaps in some respects I may be considered somewhat lucky. I do not wish to detain the House long, but there are a few things with which I wish to deal. In the first place, we have heard a great deal about emergency; whether there is an emergency or no emergency. It is all very well to argue about the relative positions of Germany and England, but whenever Great Britain has a serious rival on the sea we have an emergency, no matter who that rival may be. That being so, our responsibility must be apparent. Furthermore, I think that before we attempt to build a navy in this country we had better decide whether we are going to swim or fly. We all know that the question of an aerial fleet is a very prominent one in Europe to-day, and until we have decided whether we are going to swim or fly why not let Canada use Great Britain's plant, costing hundreds of millions of dollars, for building her warships. There is another consideration which every right-minded Canadian should think of. If we lay out this enormous amount of money on a plant to build vessels in Canada, there will be a large bill to pay annually to keep that plant up to date; otherwise it will become obsolete.

Another matter which has been brought up quite frequently is the Highways Bill. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and his friends have been very eager to tell us that they do not want to hurt the Highways Bill. In other words, they want the child to cry but they are afraid to whip it. That is the position they are in. The Senate, whether at the instigation of the right hon. leader of the Opposition or not, saw fit to change that Bill so that the Government could not accept it, and whether they so amended it for party reasons or otherwise, the fact remains that the Senate stands between the people and this great enterprise. The people do not wish to be deprived of this great benefit because of some technical opinion that some hon. gentlemen in this House may have. If we are to keep the people on the land in this country we must improve rural conditions, and any one who considers what the Highways Bill or a similar outlay properly expended as it has been in other countries would do for Canada, must admit that it would be a very great factor in keeping the people on the land. So long as they get good roads, it is a very small matter to the country what the opinions of any public man may be in reference to the effect of the Bill; and, while this proposal of the federal Government to assist the farmers of our country and the people who are interested in building roads is a new deparure, it is one which is justified by the conditions in this country. Up to now the farmer has had to bear this great burden himself. But the burden has become too heavy for him, and hence the necessity of help from somewhere. One objection urged by hon. gentlemen opposite was: You would make political use of this Bill. I say that the federal Government, unless it declared these roads to be interprovincial roads, or in the general interests of Canada, could not go into any municipality or province and lay out one dollar of that money without an agreement on the part of the province and municipality as to how the money should be expended. The real trouble is that the measure is popular among the people, and hon. gentlemen opposite do not want us to get the credit. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has told the country that his body politic is very sick or that it is seriously ailing. Let us see what kind of a prescription he suggests for a patient so seriously ill. It seems to me a very mild one, it is not heroic treatment anyway; in fact, he does not propose to prescribe anything at all. He says:

> We regret to have to represent to Your Royal Highness that in the gracious speech with which you have met Parliament, whilst it is admitted that business is in a depressed condition, yet there is no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps towards relieving such a situation.

He then called in the consultation the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), and he has he same prescription whether the patient is sick or well—free trade. That is all he can recommend. If that is the kind of treatment this patient is going to receive at the hands of the leader of the Opposition and the prominent doctor whom he has called in, in consultation, I think the patient will have to get along without the help of these gentlemen. They tell us that there is a stringency in this country, but I say this: outside of the large cities and towns—where undoubtedly there are unemployed, perhaps because the towns have been overspeculating in building—the people, and I am speaking now for the farmers of Ontario, were never better off. Some years ago when our Liberal friends were in power hard times commenced in the country and stayed in the country—not only in the rural districts, but in the cities and towns; but the conditions to-day are entirely different. And these hard times cannot last for long when the rural districts are prosperous and making money as they are to-day. I am not able to give a correct statement as to the unemployed. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition estimated the number at 100,000; but his figures have been criticised by those who seem to know, who say they are away beyond the mark. What would it amount to if the figures were correct? It would simply mean that 100,000 people from England, Ireland, Scotland and other European countries came into Canada in three months in the year 1912-13, that is, at the rate of 1,200 a day or 400,000 a year. Everybody knows that these people cannot get employment the day they land here. They have to wait for positions. So this calamity of which we have heard so much does not really exist.

We have heard a great deal about the high cost of living. I know a man can live cheap because I have had to do so all my life. There is this to be said about the high cost; it is largely in the mode of people's living. I met a man the other day who said, 'Look what my bread costs me, it is terrible.' I said: 'You are a young man, about 35 years old, are you not? Well, when you were a boy wheat was $1.50 a bushel, and your mother used to make her own bread. But now wheat is $1 a bushel. Your wife makes you go out and buy your bread, and I will bet you the wife does not know where the clothes line and the scrubbing brush are in your own house.' Let us look these things squarely in the face. I will give you another instance. A man goes down town and pays 50 cents for a bushel of potatoes, and then pays $1 carriage to get them home, so that they are costing him $1.50 a bushel. As long as the people have money to spend they will continue to raise the standard of living and increase their expenditures. There is only one remedy for that condition. My right hon. friend and the Government, if they wish, may pass all the resolutions they like in this House; but they cannot make that hen running around the barnyard lay one egg more; they cannot add a pound to the bullock in the stall or the pig in the sty. The man who feeds these animals is the only one who can do that, the producer must do it, and if we get down to the producer we will remedy this trouble if the common sense of the people comes into play. My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, speaking in Hamilton on the 29th November last, said that he was going to put the farmer on the free list. That is free food. The farmer has been working for hundreds of years and feeding the world cheaply but now that his pork and beef, his mutton, his poultry, his dairy produce, his tub of butter and his grain are getting up a little in price my right hon. friend says: We must stop this, we must put him on the free list. I noticed that when he got down to Montreal he modified his attitude; he was not so strong upon this question down there. He met a very cautious gentleman down there, one who had made a bad bargain, the ex-Minister of Finance, and he told my right hon. friend that he must be very careful on this question. So he was, and he was also careful in the resolution which he introduced here the other day.

The right hon. gentleman must realize that Canada is not producing the quantity of dairy produce that we might expect from it, an agricultural country. How can we justify this? Just last winter a gentleman sat down to his breakfast in the city of Ottawa and he had for his breakfast eggs from Russia, potatoes from Ireland, bacon from Denmark and butter from New Zealand. That should not happen in this country. There is only one remedy and that is to get the people on the land. I do not say that you must restrict the liberty of a boy and say that he must stay on the farm, but the people who are coming to this country should be induced to go on the land. The farmer may be a sinner in some respects; he must give his hired man a home and if the hired man wants to marry and raise a family he should be allowed to do so. If this principle is carried out we will solve the question of agricultural production and of the high cost of living all over the country. There is no other legitimate way to do it. If we get down to the common sense of these things we must let the man who comes in from Europe or anywhere else feel that he is a part and parcel of the state, he should enter into our social conditions, be associated with our churches and schools and in this way become a living factor and a useful citizen in the neighbourhood in which he lives.

Then, we had a speech from our hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). They had him at school but he has not improved any. They sent him down to Nova Scotia and they put him up against those big industries to see if they could break up that Cobden platform of his, but he came back as bad as ever. The hon. gentleman who took him down there is not in his seat just now, but I would say: Do not give up hope; there is hope as long as there is life. Take him down again. I was very much pleased to see and to hear that there was some possibility of amendment. The hon. member for Red Deer never seriously moved against the tariff while his own friends were in power although he is finding fault with that tariff to-day. I do not know that he has ever moved a resolution upon the subject. It is a strange thing that hon. gentlemen opposite now want profane hands to be laid upon that sacred edifice that they built. It was the greatest thing that ever happened in this country, it gave us all this enormous prosperity and now they want the thing torn down. They want profane hands to be laid upon it. The only thing that has been done with it so far is that it has been cut down a little but they are finding fault with it still. They thought it was a blessing five years ago, three years ago, eight years ago; it is a question whether it should not still be considered a blessing. That it may be improved we all know, but the last people who should find fault with it are the men who designed it and put it upon the statute book. But I suppose they must say something to the people and in a few years they will say it is a Tory tariff, that the Tories made it. That is what is going to happen. I will tell hon. gentlemen opposite that there is no doubt it will be improved and improved in the interests of this country. It is quite right that any tariff should have a certain degree of permanence about it, but conditions change and the tariff must change to suit the conditions. I am willing to go that far and to tell my right hon. friend that I have not the slightest doubt that it will be properly dealt with when the proper time comes.

There has been a good deal said about free wheat. I am not going to say much about that question because I cannot discuss it from the viewpoint of the western man, but I desire to say that the future of our western country is largely bound up in the fact that they must enter upon mixed farming. If they enter upon mixed farming they will get the bi-product of the wheat and the bi-product of the wheat is a very important factor in mixed farming. It is the life-blood of the dairy industry of Ontario and Quebec to-day. It is of the utmost importance that we should see to it that we have our wheat ground within this country and the flour exported to England or to any other country, because if the bi-product of the wheat is transferred to England or to some other country the dairy industry suffers very materially as a result. This bi-product can be shipped on the wheat at a less freight cost than it can after it is ground; hence the necessity of grinding the wheat in this country. Instead of being able to grind wheat into flour for about 14,000,000 people we should be able to grind for 50,000,000 people. How is it that with wheat shipped from Manitoba to Ontario, the millers can sell the flour cheaper to the Ontario man than to the man in Manitoba—simply because the bi-product has to be shipped out of Manitoba at a very heavy freight rate. This bi-product is virtually the profit of the miller and it is cheaper to ship the wheat down here, grind and sell the bran and shorts than to grind the wheat into flour in Manitoba and to ship the bi-products down here in bulk.

The men who look upon this question from the mere advantage of a few months hence are not perhaps looking at it from the proper standpoint of the future of this country. Every Canadian must feel that what I say is a fact who reads the statement made by Mr. Ruddick, the Dairy Commissioner, only the other day in addressing the Eastern Dairy Association at the town of Cornwall. I happened to be present and heard the statement and he was good enough to give me a copy of it. I wish, through the House, to present it to the consideration of the country. Before reading it I would like to explain that there is a great difference between cows and milch cows; there are a great many non-milkers. In the county of Dundas, within a radius of 20 miles, we had four years ago 30,000 milch cows and 13,000 non-milkers; to-day we have 26,000 milch cows and 19,000 non-milkers. What is the explanation of that?—the difficulty of getting competent hired help to do the dairy work. The statement is as follows:

Milch Cows in Canada.

	1901.	1911.	Decrease.	Increase.
Ontario	1,065,763	1,032,979	33,784
Quebec	767,825	753,134	14,691
New Brunswick	111,084	108,532	2,552
Nova Scotia	138,817	129,302	9,515
Prince Edward Island	56,437	52,109	2,484
Manitoba	141,481	155,337	.....	13,856
British Columbia	24,535	33,953	.....	9,420
Saskatchewan	56,634	181,146	.....	124,512
Alberta	46,101	147,687	.....	101,586
Totals for Canada	2,408,677	2,594,179	.....

Total increase in 10 years, 185,502.

In the older provinces, as will be seen, we have a decrease in the number of milch cows. We should not be going backward in this respect, in Ontario and Quebec especially; we should be going forward. I call the attention of the House to the increase in the number of milch cows in the western provinces as shown by the above table, and I am sure every honest Canadian will be glad to know these facts. The number in the western provinces has increased very materially which is very welcome news indeed. These figures show a decrease in the number of milch cows in eastern Canada and an increase in the western provinces, which gives a net increase in the whole Dominion of 185,502. We lost in the old provinces 62,026 milch cows, and we gained in the new provinces, 249,374. It is a good thing to see our western provinces taking up the question of raising milch cows and going into dairy products. We should have enough of these products to satisfy our own people. While the number of our milch cows has fallen in the older provinces, Mr. Ruddick shows that we have not decreased our output. That looks inconsistent, but the fact is that the improvement of the stock, the culling out of the poor animals, and the better system of feeding, have increased the product per cow. The average product per cow in 1901, was 2,850 lbs. of milk, and in 1910 it was 3,805 lbs. of milk, or nearly 1,000 lbs. per cow more than it was ten years previously. But that does not justify the falling off in the number of our cattle, because if we had the same number of cows in the older provinces in 1911 as we had in 1901, our product would be equal to the domestic consumption, and we would be exporting as well. The serious thing is that we are exporting no butter and we have lost our place altogether in the British market for that commodity. A few years ago I was bold enough to make the statement in this House that in the near future Russian Siberia would be a serious rival to us in many of the important products of our farm, and at the time my Liberal friends ridiculed the idea of Russia interfering with our market in England. But what is the fact to-day? Russian Siberia is second of all the countries of the world in the quantity of butter she ships to the English markets; Denmark is first. We have lost our butter trade there, and it is taken by others, and it will not be an easy matter to regain our position. Now there is another important consideration that I wish to point out, and that is that if the other counties in Ontario equalled in the number of cattle and the dairy output a few counties in Ontario, some in eastern Ontario and one or two in western Ontario, we would have double the number of cattle we have in the entire province at the present time. This shows the possibilities before the people of this country if they conscientiously enter upon the problem of knowing what an acre of land is worth. If it be possible, the Government should endeavour to show the people of Canada the possibilities of 100 acres of land. The boy or the man who goes into a corn field and sees but the weeds and the corn, is living far short of his privilege; he should see nature unfolding her designs to feed the world. That is his business. He should feel he is a factor in doing so, and if he does not realize it, he is falling far short of his duty. Supposing this country were a finished country as some countries of Europe are, what would it mean to the world? Canada would be standing in the gateways of the world, holding out food to the hungry, so to speak; taking her great share in supplying the food of the world and doing her duty as an agricultural country. We are this year exporting enormously over what we were exporting last year. I have a little clipping here from the Star, and it quotes from the report of the United States Department of Agriculture Report, and it says this:

Canada is the largest purchaser of American automobiles according to figures compiled by the United States Department of Commerce. The Dominion took 5,824 automobiles from the United States in the first eleven months of 1913, valued at $7,870,000.

We can not be very hard up when we can do that; we bought nearly $8,000,000 worth of automobiles from the United States in the eleven months, to say nothing about those made in Canada. I believe the farmer should have an automobile; no man in the world deserves it better than he if he can afford it, but when he is able to buy automobiles at this rate, he cannot be so terribly straitened in circumstances. I read further:

During the month of December, according to figures issued by the Department of Customs, the exports of Canada underwent a remarkable increase. The export of domestic produce during December 1913 amounted to $55,803,642, as against $38,658,625 in December 1912, the increase thus being $17,145,017 or 44%. By far the largest item in the total was the export of agricultural products which stood at $35,367,942 as against $22,859,325—

This would seem to back up my statement that the farmers are well off, at least in Ontario.

—which stood at $35,367,942 as against $22,859,325 in the corresponding month of 1912, the increase being a trifle over $12,800,000 or nearly 55%. There also was a heavy proportionate increase in the export of manufactures, the figures being $5,599,086 as against $3,800,805, the increase being within a few dollars of $1,800,000 or more than 47%.

This does not prove there are so many unemployed.

There was also a heavy increase in export of animals and their products, the figures standing at $4,744,056 as against $2,791,550, the increase being $1,952,506 or nearly 70 per cent.

That no doubt is accounted for to a large extent by the shipments of cattle from this country to the United States. Taking the nine months, however, in which these shipments did not occur, there is still a large increase.

During the nine months' period ending December 31, 1913, the exports coming under the head of agriculture showed an increase of about 50 per cent over those of the corresponding period of 1912. They stood at $177,706,169 as against $119,209,170 in the earlier period, the increase being $58,696,999 in the nine months.

That does not look as if there were very hard times.

Animals and their produce also showed a substantial increase, from $36,740,883 to $43,568,859.

That shows an increase during the nine months when there were no shipments of cattle from Canada to the United States, owing to the fact that such shipments could not be made until the tariff was changed.

In regard to the products of the fisheries, the imports alone have fallen off to some extent during that period, no doubt because merchants were cautious as to buying owing to the talk of stringent times throughout the country.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be permissible for me to tell a story that was told the other day in the American Senate, because our friends here, who are so fond of reciprocity, would surely let me reciprocate in this respect. Our friends on the opposite side of the House are looking all the time for calamities, financial crises and financial panics. The leader of the Republican party in the American Senate is like my right hon. friend, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in that respect. The leader of the Democratic side of the House told this story. He said that a man with an eye out came along one day to the doctor. The man said, 'Doctor, I want an eye put in. I don't want no glass eye; I want a flesh eye, one I can see with.' The doctor said, 'All right, I can put in a cat's eye.' The man said, 'All right, go ahead;' so the doctor fixed the man up. Some time later when the doctor saw the man again, he said, 'How are you getting along?' 'Oh,' the man says, 'all right, but that eternal thing is looking for rats and mice all the time. Our friends are looking for rats and mice all the time. Of course, they are not going to find them, but I shall leave them in that position when I take my seat.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I have followed with great interest and great pleasure indeed the very witty speech which has just been delivered by my genial friend the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder). After having listened to him last summer in his own good constituency, where I noticed that he was friendly with Tories and Grits alike, and that he could tell a good story to both and thus be elected by large majorities, I can only repeat what I then said, namely, that the hon. gentleman should be transferred to another chamber. He has deserved that from his party for the many services which he has rendered the cause in the many townships and back concessions of Ontario, where he has been able to roll up the Tory majorities by his witty stories. There is a vacancy at present, and, speaking in all frankness, I am quite sure that the farmers of the province of Ontario, the farmers of Canada generally, would be proud to see my genial friend in the Senate.

In regard to the Speech from the Throne, I can only re-echo what has been said on all sides of this House, that the people in Canada, and I might say in particular the people of the province of Quebec, whose reverence for the Royal Family is well known, were most happy to learn that Her Royal Highness had so speedily recovered.

I have listened with great pleasure to the speech delivered by the new member for the county of York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod), and I must compliment him upon the very good impression he has made on the members of this House. He succeeds a member who for many years sat with us, and played quite a part in the debates of Parliament; I refer to Mr. Crocket, now Mr. Justice Crocket. By the way, I see that my good friend the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) is in his seat. Would he explain to the House how it is that under his benevolent eye appointments to the judiciary are made from the House of Commons, when some years ago the voice of my hon. friend rang in tones of indignation against the appointments made by the right hon. the leader of the late Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because, forsooth, he appointed members of the House to the judiciary? My hon. friend from York has been elected to this House by acclamation, and I congratulate him upon this; but he has come through one of the broken pledges of the right hon. the leader of the Government and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, namely, that no appointments should be made from members of the House of Commons. The hon. member for York, his countenance beaming with optimism, told us that this country was but slightly touched by a wave of adversity. In New Brunswick, he said, money had never been so easy as it was last year. I wonder what is the opinion of my good friend from Carleton, N.B., about the easy money in New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: Not so easy now as it was two years ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was surprised when my hon. friend from York made that statement. Oh, blessed Arcadia! Who owns the magic wand by which money is made so easy in New Brunswick and so stringent in poor Quebec and poor Ontario?

I have listened also with interest to the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallée). He spoke with eloquence, and I hope that some day he will repeat in the English language what he said so well in his own mother tongue. Evidently the hon. member for Bellechasse has seen the light. I have known his parentage in the province of Quebec. He comes from good old Liberal stock, and I noticed that when he spoke the other day there was quite a tremor in his voice. He had evidently filled a gap, because, if I mistake not, at the last general election in the county of Bellechasse he ran, not as a Conservative, but as a Nationalist. Evidently, as we say in French 'Il y a fagots et fagots'—there are Nationalists and Nationalists. Listening to the speeches of my hon. friend I find it departs from the red hot Nationalism to deep azure blue Toryism. 'Il y a fagots et fagots'—there are Nationalists and Nationalists. He may claim to be still a Nationalist; but I say that he belongs to the insincere school of Nationalists. For there are a few sincere Nationalists in this country to-day—oh, very, very few indeed! I would like to know what his leader of yesterday, Mr. Bourassa, thinks of his opinions to-day. I am sure that if Mr. Bourassa were to write to the hon. member for Bellechasse he could not sign his letter as of yore with the subscription 'Yours sincerely.' But then, my hon. friend in his new Tory venture, has outrun himself, it seems to me. He has evidently delivered himself to my hon. friend the Postmaster General, who listened, yes, listened attentively to his enlogy. In his new zeal, the member for Bellechasse went so far as to compare the present Postmaster General with Sir George Etienne Cartier. Yes, he said that the present Postmaster General is the political heir of the great Conservative chieftain. If it were mine to give advice to my hon. friend from Bellechasse, I would give him the advice given by Talleyrand, the master of cynics and diplomats, to a young undersecretary who intended to enter the career of diplomacy. He came to Talleyrand for counsel and Talleyrand said to him 'Et surtout pas de zèle!'—above all, no zeal! This is the advice I would give to my hon. friend when he compares his new leader, the Nationalist of yesterday and the Tory of to-day with Sir George Etienne Cartier.

Now, coming to the Speech from the Throne, if I consider it in the constitutional light, I see it as a lever to put the parliamentary machinery in motion. The Speech from the Throne has to be delivered annually, just as a certain Chinese daily gazette which was published under the Ming dynasty had to be issued, with or without news. One day the newspaper appeared blank. The editor was asked: 'But why do you publish your paper—there is no news in it, there are no articles in it?' He answered: 'But it has to be issued; it is a daily gazette.' So with the Speech from the Throne: it has to be delivered, it is the lever which puts the parliamentary machinery in motion. But, Sir, that speech is a blank; it is barren of any legislative proposals; it bears the evidence of hard times, notwithstanding my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder). It is as meagre as Canada's last Christmas dinner; it is as empty as the workingman's pail; it is as bare as a church plate at times; it is as nude as the spite wall on Elgin street. Its nudity borders on indecency.

But, before going into the few announcements which the speech contains, let me, for a moment, take a glance at it. First of all, I see that there is general satisfaction expressed at the fact that there has been a great expansion of trade. Indeed, we all know that, since 1897, there has been a tremendous expansion of trade. And my hon. friend the leader of the Government stated the other day that the expansion of trade which began in 1897 was not due to the fiscal policy of the leader of the Opposition, but that it was due to the old National Policy, and that the Liberal party on assuming office, had not altered that policy by one jot or tittle—that it had remained unchanged and that indeed the country had prospered notwithstanding the Liberal party. May I read the speech, or part of it, which was delivered by the old stalwart, the veteran of the Conservative party, Sir Charles Tupper—and we rejoice to know that he still enjoys perfect health—on the morrow of the introduction in this House in 1897 of the British preference, a policy coupled with the tariff resolutions introduced by the then Minister of Finance, Hon. Mr. Fielding? We all remember that Sir Charles Tupper, speaking from the seat now adorned by the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), prophesied that the manufacturers in the various industries of this country would suffer, and suffer lamentably, if the Liberal policy propounded by Mr. Fielding were maintained. He said:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of these industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.
> I feel that so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon its great industries. Still, I unhesitatingly say that, from a party point of view, the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at a cost of sacrifice of the industries of Canada.

I am glad to say that the sad predictions of this great veteran were not fulfilled. Under the fiscal policy of the Hon. Mr. Fielding, coupled with the British preference, with the abolition of all the specific duties and the altering the duties on two hundred and fifty-five items of the Budget, I am glad to say, the country has prospered and expanded.

But we were told something else in 1911. We were warned that our trade should not be fostered with our big neighbour, the United States, that we should instead cultivate an interprovincial trade, and that we should maintain our connection with the mother country by still increasing our trade with Great Britain. Mr. Speaker, not later than the month of May last, I had the privilege of being present at a dinner given by the Government of Canada to the American bankers then visiting the city of Ottawa. Will you listen to the language of Mr. James J. Hill, a gentleman born in Canada, who has become in the United States a great railway magnate, as we know. Speaking about the trade relations between Canada and the United States, Mr. Hill made the following statement in the presence of the Minister of Finance and of the Prime Minister of Canada:

Most countries have been accustomed to value their relations with one another by the total money value of the commerce between them; and, rightly or wrongly, they have laid special stress upon that difference between imports and exports which is known as the balance of trade. Without asserting any theory as to its value as an indicator of prosperity or the contrary, both of which views have ardent champions, both sides will agree upon the fact that it is an important measure of commercial intercourse. In spite of all obstructions the commercial relations between Canada and the United States have grown to proportions that astonish even those familiar with the official figures. According to the report of the United States consul in this city, the foreign trade of Canada reached a total of over a billion dollars for the calendar year 1912. The increase over 1911 was 23.5 per cent. Of the total, 56 per cent was business done with the United States. For that same calendar year the balance of trade for the whole United States was $581,000,000; and of this $255,000,000 was due to our commerce with Canada. It supplied 44 per cent of the balance rolled up by our commerce with the whole world.

It is usual to speak and think of Europe as the best customer of the United States; and in so far as this refers to the United Kingdom, it is true. But the Dominion of Canada is far and away the second-best customer we have. The statistics have been brought down to cover the first ten months of the current fiscal year, which began on the first day of last July. During that time our exports to the United Kingdom were $524,000,000; to Germany, $291,000,000; to France, $131,000,000; to Canada, $338,000,000, and to all Europe combined, $1,294,000,000. No other country except Great Britain and Germany even approaches Canada as a buyer in the markets of the United States.

Mr. Hill talks common sense; he does not mix up loyalty with business.

This business has been done not by reason of any sentiment whatever about it on the part of either country, or of any artificial favouring conditions, but simply because it is more profitable for both to deal with each other than for either to deal anywhere else in a large percentage of its commercial transactions. And nothing can reverse or annul that condition which nature herself has established.

Further on, Mr. Hill compares the trade of Canada with the total trade between the United States and South America. He concludes thus:

Swing the net still wider, and take in both American continents, from the Arctic Circle on the north to Cape Horn on the south, add Cuba and all the West Indies by whomsoever controlled, that nothing between the two oceans may escape. We did, in these ten months, a total export business of $630,000,000 with this western hemisphere; and of the whole Canada furnished fifty-four per cent. It seems to me that a connection so immense and so valuable to both parties is the central and controlling fact of every occasion like the present, when business men from both sides of the line get together to take stock of their present and their future.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just before recess, Mr. Speaker, I was quoting a few sentences from a very elaborate address delivered in the city of Ottawa by that great Canadian, James J. Hill. This speech of Mr. Hill's, telling of the immense expansion of trade between Canada, our country, and the great republic to the south of us—and especially during the two years of the present Administration—only shows this cold fact: that you cannot legislate against geography, and it furnishes the best rejoinder to that nonsensical slogan of the last general election, 'No truck and no trade with the United States of America.' As I stated a moment ago, there are many things which should appear in the Speech from the Throne but which are not to be found in it. I have been reared in a school which, for many years, taught that there was no possibility of establishing a mutual preference between the mother country and Canada, but during the fifteen years that our hon. friends opposite were sitting on this side of the House, we were repeatedly told that as soon as the Conservatives came into office, steps would be taken to have that famous mutual preference established between Canada and Great Britain. I did not expect that the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government would implement the promises of his party at the first session of this Parliament. We gave him time. The second session came, but not a word about mutual preference. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I have a vague suspicion that the centralization policy advocated last year so earnestly by Mr. Bonar Law on the one hand, and by Mr. Churchill on the other, was perhaps the first step towards mutual preference. At all events nothing came out of it. But now in this third session of the Conservative Administration, when things have found their level and when the Conservative party is in a position to accomplish something, we find nothing in the Speech from the Throne to indicate that steps will be taken at the earliest opportunity to establish mutual preference in trade matters between the mother country and Canada. I for one, do not believe in that policy. I think that if mutual preference were established, far from uniting the Dominions to the mother country, it would estrange them. And further, in my humble judgment, it would estrange Great Britain on fiscal lines from the other countries of the world. But it is the policy of the Tory party in England, or at least the policy of one section of it, and it has been the policy preached by one large section of the Imperialist party of Canada. I do not argue that the Government should implement its promise in that regard. In my humble judgment such a policy would not be advantageous. I believe in the close relations of the mother country with Canada, but not on such a basis. 'History,' to quote Webster, 'is not only the record of events; it is also the record of human experience.' In days of yore there was a preference between the mother country and the colonies. Every student of Canadian history will remember that before the repeal of the Corn Laws there was a British preference for colonial products, for Canadian products. But when, under the leadership of the two greatest men of the last century, Richard Cobden and John Bright, England espoused the cause of free trade, and when Sir Robert Peel, the Conservative Premier, repealed the Corn Laws, the British preference was abolished. What was the result as regards Canada? As soon as that preference was repealed there was discontent, there was rancour, there was bitterness and soreness of heart, and the first thing our political ancestors heard of was the famous annexation manifesto. The repeal of the British preference in favour of Canadian products was the cause of the issuance of the annexation manifesto of 1849. At the last general election I heard some of my hon. friends opposite repeating again that old story, that the reciprocity programme of the Liberal party would bring about the annexation of Canada to the United States. Some people had enough brass to repeat such a fairy tale. What was the cure of the annexation spirit which manifested itself in 1849? What were the words of wisdom spoken by that great Governor General Lord Elgin (the scion of a great Tory family) in 1849, after the repeal of the British preference and the announcement of the annexation proclivities of Canada? Listen to this language. Surely it is applicable to-day. On November 8, 1849, in a letter to Earl Grey, the ancestor of our late Governor General, Lord Elgin wrote as follows:

> So long as this state of things continues there will be discontent in this country; deep growing discontent. You will not, I trust, accuse me of having deceived you on this point. I have always said that I am prepared to assume the responsibility of keeping Canada quiet, with a much smaller garrison than we have now, and without any tax on the British consumer in the shape of protection to Canadian products, if you put our trade on as good a footing as that of our American neighbours; but if things remain on their present footing in this respect, there is nothing before us but violent agitation, ending in convulsion or annexation.

History repeating itself! Oh, certainly, Mr. Speaker, we do not expect to hear of any annexation movement in Canada just now. We are not now in the midst of a general election, so we may all proclaim our faith in British citizenship and in Canadian citizenship. There will never be any question as regards the deep and intense loyalty of every Canadian, whatever may be his faith on fiscal matters, but there will be agitation in this country, and very serious agitation, particularly on the western prairies, as long as the present serious discontent exists.

Sir, the Government takes credit in the fact that the moving of the crops from the western prairies to the seaboard has been made easy and smooth. The Government thinks that our transportation facilities are adequate. Sir, I take that as the greatest compliment to the policy of the Liberal party during the last sixteen years in which they held office. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) know that ten years ago, eight years ago, seven years ago, at the fall of every year, there was the fear that there would be a car shortage at the head of the Great Lakes. There is no more dread of a car shortage and I wish to pay here my compliments to the three great transcontinental railways of Canada. The Liberal party are not responsible for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway system, but as my hon. friend from Edmonton pointed out the other evening, the double tracking of the Canadian Pacific railway was the direct consequence of the transportation policy of the Liberal party whilst in office. They are responsible for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway without the degrading of the same line. The statement was made, by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) that the Liberal party was primarily responsible for the construction of the Canadian Northern system. We know, and I am in the judgment of my friends who represent the Great Lakes districts in this House, that the harbours of the Great Lakes have been improved by the immediate predecessors of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. The St. Lawrence channel system was rushed to completion from 1896 until 1910. It was made free from tolls by the Liberal party which was a bold policy, but the Liberal party did it. The ship channel between Montreal and Quebec was deepened; the port of Montreal was equipped as no other on the North American continent; and the port of Quebec was also equipped. I am glad to hear that the Government are going to complete that equipment. I hope that my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) is in earnest in the promises he has made to his Quebec supporters that the equipment of the port of Montreal will be completed.

Speaking of transportation, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised, after the many speeches that have been delivered especially around Montreal by hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party, some of whom I see before me now, to find nothing in the Speech from the Throne about the Georgian Bay canal. I am in favour of the Georgian bay canal, but if I mistake not, the moneys which were voted last year will be spent for just one link of that great international route. I believe that the Georgian Bay canal will be completed as soon as the improvement reaches a certain point on lake Nipissing. I hope I may be wrong, but, Sir, I am told by many that it is not the intention of the Government, in view of the intense rivalry existing between southern Ontario and northern Ontario, to proceed any further than lake Nipissing with the Georgian Bay canal.

While speaking about transportation, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) was taken to task after prorogation, because, forsooth, he had not found it possible to settle the vexed question of ocean rates. Articles were published in the Tory press, and a statement was delivered even by the talented young man who is now Chairman of the Railway Commission, that with regard to this question of ocean freight rates the guilty man was my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. Well, the Chairman of the Railway Commission has gone to England. He has interviewed the mighties in England, the heads of the great navigation companies, and he has returned to Canada. What success has he obtained? What work has he accomplished? If he had accomplished something, if he had achieved any success, surely mention would be made of it in the Speech from the Throne.

We are informed that there will be a Civil Service Bill. I am told—I may be mistaken—perhaps my hon. friend may correct me—that it has already been distributed; but, if so, it has not been my good fortune to read it. At all events, it is the beginning, I suppose, of that much desired and much talked of civil service reform. Is it, Mr. Speaker, to be based on Sir George Murray's report? Are we going to have an army of under-secretaries? I know that many of the young talented bloods of the Conservative party have been promised under-secretaryships. Perhaps it explains why some amongst my hon. friends of the Nationalist party have become rabid zealots of the Tory party. Are we going to have under-secretaries, or is the Conservative party going to improve, if it can be improved, the Civil Service Act introduced by the ex-Minister of Agriculture—I refer to the Hon. Sydney Fisher? We may differ as to Mr. Fisher's politics. I regard him as one of the ablest men who ever sat in this Parliament, and, with all due respect to my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Morris), the new member whom I am pleased to see seated here this evening, I think that the loss of Chateauguay was Canada's loss, that the defeat of Mr. Fisher was the defeat of the House of Commons and of Canada. Mr. Fisher was the first one to introduce a real Civil Service Bill based on the competitive system; that is to say, the British system.

It is universally admitted, that whether he serves at home, or in the Crown colonies, or in the Indian Empire, the British civil servant is the most efficient in the world. And, Sir, that is because the spoils system is unknown in England and because the man who enters the British civil service knows that he has a career in that service. But the great Conservative party in this country, always so ready to speak ill of American politics, has since it came to power applied to the Canadian Civil Service the worst feature of American politics, namely, the spoils system. The Liberal party, following the lead of the Hon. Mr. Fisher, adopted the first Civil Service Bill based on competitive examinations for the inside service, and although I have asked the Postmaster General for the last two years if he intended to apply that beneficent system to the thousands of employees in the outside service of the post office, I have been able to elicit from him only smiles and vague answers. I trust that the Civil Service Bill which is promised in the Speech from the Throne, will extend to the outside civil service of Canada, the protection and benefits now conferred on the inside service.

We are informed in the speech that at last a Redistribution Bill will be introduced this session. There are not many members in this House to-day—there are none with the exception of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and yourself, Mr. Speaker—who were present in 1882 when the first Redistribution Bill was introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald's Government. But, though we were not present we all know what scars the gerrymander of 1882 left on the hearts of the Liberal electors of Ontario. We know that in 1882 and again in 1892 an attempt was made, to use an old Tory expression: to dish the Grits, and we know that by picking out a township here and a township there, the Tory gerrymander created a few Grit hives to serve the purposes of the Tory party. But, Sir, what was done in 1882, and what was perpetrated in spite of Liberal protests in 1892, is no longer possible in this year of 1914. Let us not forget what the Hon. Edward Blake suggested to Sir John A. Macdonald. He told him that although he could not successfully prevail against the advantage he had to carve the constituencies as it suited him, yet he should at least respect the historic boundaries of Ontario and Quebec. In 1902, when in turn it fell to the lot of the Liberal party to introduce a Redistribution Bill, what was the policy pursued by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister? Some young Liberals of that day, animated with an undue party spirit, expected that the Conservatives then sitting in opposition would get a dose of the same medicine they had served out to the Liberals in 1882 and 1892. But, the great leader of the Liberal party, always fair, then gave a lesson not only to his opponents but to the too fervid partisans of his own party, and he introduced a Bill with a schedule in blank, leaving it to a joint committee of the House to delimit the constituencies. And, on the report of that joint committee the Bill was introduced, which, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, was never criticised and was adopted unanimously. That was the Liberal method in 1902 as contrasted with the Tory method in 1882 and 1892.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Was the report submitted by the committee concurred in by all its members?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The question is a fair one and I shall answer it. As I remember, when the Bill, based on the report of the Committee, was introduced, it was suggested that the two ridings of Hastings had been improperly dealt with and that they should be divided differently, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier acceded to that request and the Bill was amended in that respect and made unanimous.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The hon. member is mistaken.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I shall be glad to hear the hon. gentleman correct me if he can, but I appeal to his spirit of fair play, and I ask if it is not a fact that the Redistribution Bill of 1902 was considered, even by the opponents of the Liberal party, as a fair measure giving justice to Liberals and to Conservatives alike. With my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), I do trust in the spirit of fair play and the sense of honour of the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada. Why should we not rely on the honour of the Prime Minister of Canada, and who will believe for a moment that he would descend to mean tactics to dish a political opponent? I do not believe that the Prime Minister of Canada would descend to dishing the Grits, and neither do I believe that public opinion would stand for it in this year of grace 1914. I am told, I may be wrong, and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong, that there are sinister influences behind the Prime Minister of Canada. I am told, for instance, that my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), whom I regret not to see in his seat and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) have been consulting their friends around the country in the province of Quebec, to know whether this or that parish, this or that ward on the island of Montreal, should not be better annexed to this or that county. I am not positive about it. It is rumoured, and if it is not true I would be only too glad that it is not.

A Bill will also be introduced to increase the representation in the Upper House. The notice is already on the notice paper. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that in this connection there is an undue haste to pour new blood into the august chamber? Where is my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster)? Why, to increase the representation in the Senate Chamber, to think of reforming the Senate by deforming it! Where is the hon. member for Lincoln? Mr. Speaker, do you remember his speeches against the Senate? His silence at the present time, to say the least. is very ominous. I was reading the other day the memoirs of a woman of genius, Madame de Staël. In the preface of that work, I came across a sentence. Madame de Staël had been expelled from France by orders of the Emperor Napoleon; she was sojourning in Germany and was writing to a friend. She said, 'Since Bonaparte has been crowned Emperor of France, a great silence has been heard in Europe.' I found the expression 'to hear a silence' rather strange. It must indeed be a very ominous silence. Sir, I hear the silence of my hon. friend from Lincoln when mention is made of an increase in the number of the Senators. Is he dreaming, peradventure, of a Senatorship or is he sleeping on the woolsack expectations?

This is briefly the bill of fare for this year. There are several courses of platitudes for the party heelers, but there is a diet of negations for the Canadian people. There is nothing about the economic conditions of the country. What is the chief topic to-day in the cities, in the rural parts of Canada, in the homes of Canada? The high cost of living, the fiscal revolution created by the unemployment of the labouring masses and the agitation in the West for free wheat. The Government answers with words to the clamours of the people. My hon. friend the Minister of Play—he describes himself as the Minister of Play, and I hope I am not libelling him when referring in this way to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers)—was asked the other day his opinion about the present high cost of living. What was his answer given at Halifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, represented by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Borden) and by that able gentleman the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean)? Oh, he offered a cure to the ills of the high cost of living. Here is what he said:

> To my mind the high cost of living is an indication of the prosperity and expansion of the country. If you want cheap living, give us a few years of hard times.

This is what fell from the lips of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. There are more than words in this answer. It is adding insult to irony. It reminds me of what happened three or four years ago when the Clemenceau Government was defeated in the French Parliament. It was after a speech delivered by the Prime Minister, by that old tiger, Mr. Clemenceau, who had made quite a witty speech; but his speech was in a way rather unfortunate, and as a result a vote was taken and the Government was defeated. Some one went to that caustic journalist, Henri Rochefort, to get his opinion about the fall of the Government. Mr. Rochefort's quick retort was, 'The Government has committed suicide by firing words into its brain.' When I read the answer given by the hon. Minister of Labour, that hard times are a good thing for the country, I say that the Government is committing suicide by firing words into its brain.

Sir, what is the situation to-day after two years of Conservative rule in Canada? It is admitted that when the Liberal party left office three years ago we had enjoyed fifteen years of abundant prosperity, so much so that, when the elections of 1911 took place, our friends on the other side traversed the country and preached to the people of Canada the wholesome gospel of 'let well enough alone.' The trade of Canada was buoyant and our credit in the financial world was excellent. Canada's loans were at that time considered as the leading and best securities on the London financial market. What is the situation to-day? Is it not a fact that we are facing a most terrible industrial unrest in this country in spite of the high protection which the manufacturers of Canada are enjoying? Who on the other side of the House speaks of the strike at Nanaimo where Canadians were ordered to shoot on Canadians? Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) two years ago when he said: 'What is the best form of patriotism for young Canadians? Learn to shoot, learn to shoot.' Well, Sir, the British Columbia soldiery are very patriotic. They were ordered to fire on the strikers of Nanaimo. Many of the strikers are in jail to-day. Let us come now to Vancouver. I am informed that in Vancouver there are 17,000 people out of employment. Let us come to Regina. There the mounted police are obliged at this moment to put down bread riots. Think of it; in the great wheat-growing district of Regina we actually have bread riots and the mounted police are obliged to protect citizens against the rioters.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Will he kindly inform the House the authority for his statement that there are 17,000 out of work in Vancouver? And will he permit me to make a very brief statement?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend will make his statement later on, but I would like to put to him a question at once. How many men are out of employment in Vancouver?

Mr. STEVENS: I can give that exactly. We had a very careful investigation of the matter by the best authorities in that city, including the Trades and Labour Council, the Mayor, the Relief Organization, the Board of Trade and every other prominent organization of that type, and also the employers; and the outside total of those unemployed is 2,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So much the better for Vancouver. My information is to the contrary. That, however, is a matter that can be ascertained. The Board of Trade and the Relief Organization, the Mayor and councillors—the powers that be in Vancouver—are investigating the question. Two thousand five hundred—it is not difficult to investigate that number. I suspect there is a little more than that. At all events, I take the word of my hon. friend. We shall get the facts, I am quite sure, after the investigation by the Relief Committee, the Mayor and other authorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman tell us when the bread riot occurred in Regina?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I read it in the press only a few days ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was only a joke.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No joke in that. It has not been contradicted in the press. We have the members from the West on this side of the House, and I am assured that the mounted police have been ordered to patrol the streets of Regina in order to prevent a riot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was in Regina myself on the night to which the press refers, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there was no bread riot or any other riot.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In Winnipeg we have, according to the Mayor, three thousand men unemployed. In Toronto, I suppose, everybody is working? But I happened to be in the city of Toronto on the 12th of the present month. It was the day of the inaugural address delivered by Mayor Hocken. If my hon. friend will take the trouble—for me it is always a pleasure—to read the Toronto News of the 12th instant, he will see a big headline, something like the great 'scare heads' that we had in the last election, showing that Mayor Hocken said: Before proceeding to business, gentlemen who have been newly elected, we must proceed to the relief of the 15,000 people who are out of employment in the city of Toronto. Now, in Montreal, whither I go occasionally—Montreal, which is represented by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville)—there are 40,000 people out of employment. I know as a matter of fact that the hours of labour have been reduced in the Angus shops, in the Grand Trunk shops, in the Canada Car shops. I will not name other shops where the people are simply put out of employment for the whole winter. In Quebec—I appeal to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) as to this—were it not for the Government works this winter there would be serious trouble in that city. Is it not a fact that the principal trade of Quebec, the shoe trade, is now locked up? Is it not a fact that we have had strikes and lockouts all along the Intercolonial railway from the city of Lévis to the city of Halifax? Last year the Government boasted of the prosperity of the country. This year, unfortunately, we are the sad witnesses of a declining trade, a shrinking revenue, and unemployment. And the excuse given by the Minister of Finance for this sad condition of things is: Oh, well, in 1907-08 there was also a temporary check. Yes, it is true, in 1907-08 there was a temporary check in the prosperity of the country. But concurrently with that temporary check there was a cut in the expenditure of the Dominion. Under the Liberal Government, in the last year that Government was in office, the expenditure amounted to $120,000,000. This year, in the day of adversity, the national expenditure amounts to $250,000,000 in round figures.

The credit of Canada in the financial world has been impaired, I do not wish to be unduly severe with the Minister of Finance; I have a good deal of sympathy for him. If he were now in his seat I would ask him permission to say that he may well raise his standard and his ideals to the height of the standard and ideals of Hon. W. S. Fielding, his predecessor as Minister of Finance. With Mr. Fielding, statesmanship was more than empty words; it was character, it was conviction; it was sincerity of purpose; it was service and fitness. I say again, the Minister of Finance may well look up to his predecessor as an exemplar.

The Minister of Finance complains that the Liberal London press has been inspired—as if the London Tory press last year during our debate on the $35,000,000 tribute had not been daily inspired from this country representing the Liberal party as a party of disloyal men. Leaving aside the London Chronicle, which, according to its standard of ethics does not publish anything except the truth about our financial condition, let us take the Pall Mall Gazette, a Tory paper in London which shrieks its jingoism daily. What did the Pall Mall Gazette say about the last loan venture of the Minister of Finance? It said that it was the greatest fiasco which ever took place in England in the case of a Canadian loan. What about the Daily Mail, a paper with a large circulation, devoted to the jingo party in London? The Daily Mail on December 16 used the following language:

> Canadians, until recently, stood easily highest amongst the Colonial securities and not many months ago the Dominion of Canada's 3½ per cents (there was no 4 per cent then) stood some half a dozen points higher than corresponding western Australian stock, whereas now, the western Australian 4 per cents recently issued at 97 stand at 2 premium, while Canadian 4 per cents issued at the same price stand at one-half discount.

Sir, the financial stringency of 1907 affected the whole financial world, but during that period Canada, under the financial leadership of Mr. Fielding, the ex-Minister of Finance, was never branded as it was of late by the jingo Tory press of London, England. Sir, Mr. Fielding preserved the credit of Canada not only at home but abroad during the stress of 1911.

I now come to that vexed question of the high cost of living. In Canada, a young country rich in resources, it is abnormal that during the last ten years the percentage of increase in the cost of living has reached the figure of 57 per cent, as against 15 per cent in Great Britain and 17 per cent in the United States. I know that the causes of the high cost of living are many and diverse. I know that we can attribute this condition partly to depreciation in the value of gold, partly to the desertion of land, to the increased urban population, to uneconomic methods of marketing, to a wrong system of cold storage, and to the trusts and mergers. Speaking about cold storage, I observe that my genial friend across the way (Mr. Bradbury) has a Bill on the Order Paper to regulate the cold storage trusts. I hope this Bill will be taken into consideration as soon as possible, and, for my part, I intend to give the hon. gentleman the best support I can. But, apart from those causes which are well known, and which are not objected to because they are clearly self-evident, is it not a fact that the drainage of our Canadian products southward is also a cause of the high cost of living? At present milk, cream, fish, beef and potatoes are drained out of Canada by United States consumers. We were told, it is true, that the United States market was of no consequence to Canada, but if we look at the exports to the United States during the last three or four months, we can see what are the effects of the jug-handled reciprocity which we are enjoying at present. I grant, Mr. Speaker, all the other causes of the high cost of living, but I say there is another, and that is the tariff—the food taxes. That cause is apparent; we can deal with it, and we can deal with it at the present session. Here are a few of the taxes which the Canadian consumer has to pay every time he sits down to a meal: Canned meats, 27½ per cent; bread stuffs, 17½ per cent; flour, 60 cents a barrel; fresh meats, 3 cents a pound; rice, 75 cents a quintal; sugar, $1.08 a quintal; oatmeal, 60 cents a quintal; eggs, 3 cents a dozen; butter, 4 cents a pound; cheese, 3 cents a pound; condensed milk, 3½ cents a tin. This tariff on the food products appearing on the table of the workingman is a direct cause of the inflation of prices. Besides, the customs revenue tells the tale. We import foodstuffs from at least fifty countries. During the year ended last March, Canada imported from the United States foodstuffs to the value of $23,072,100, on which duties amounting to $4,816,000, in round figures, were collected. From Great Britain foodstuffs to the value of $5,355,000 were imported, even with the British preference, the duties upon which amounted to $1,075,000. With respect to France and Germany the same applies, with a lower percentage of duty. So we are face to face with the fact that we pay duties on foodstuffs to the amount of more than $11,000,000 yearly, and this is one of the self-evident causes of the high cost of living. Speaking for myself only, and committing no one with whom I have the honour to be associated, I say that I am ready to stand for the wiping out of all duties on the foodstuffs consumed in Canada. What has been good for the mother country; what is good for the American consumer at the present time, is good enough for me, a Canadian.

But we are asked: Are you going to deprive the farmer, who is, after all, perhaps the greatest producer in our country, of the little protection which he now enjoys? But is he not also a consumer? The articles of which I have given a list, and on which duties are paid, are consumed as well by the farmer as by the workingman, and if the duties on these articles are wiped out, the farmer will benefit by it. But, Mr. Speaker, when protection is concerned, you can always make an argument if you wish to fasten and tighten around the neck of the farmer the collar of serfdom. In this conflict of opinion as to the removal of food taxes, who is the best judge, after all? Canada, thank Heaven, is a great farming community; Canada and the Canadian West is one of Nature's greatest farms and the Canadian grain growers and grangers fairly represent, I think, those classes of industry. What did the grain growers advocate, the farmers of the great prairie provinces west of Lake Superior, and even the farmers of the province of Ontario? First and foremost, larger markets for western wheat. Next, free interchange of foodstuffs and agricultural implements, free cement, free lumber, increase of the British preference to fifty per cent, and free trade with Great Britain within five years. I, for one, do not say that all this can be granted at one fell swoop, but I do say that free wheat, at least, which is being sought by both the political parties in Western Canada, should be granted by the Government. We were told this afternoon by the genial member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) that, like that American with the eye of a cat, we see nothing but rats and mice around us. Let us see what rats and mice the grain growers saw, the men whom you are so anxious to protect? Let me quote a few crisp sentences from the memorial presented by the grain growers when last they came to Ottawa.

Expansion in farming operations has ceased. Less than 100,000 acres has been broken in 1913, as against an estimate of 4,000,000 two years previous; and this in the face of the fact that upwards of half a million immigrants have been brought into that western country within the last three years.

The last two years have demonstrated that western farmers are not going to continue to grow crops at a loss. They cannot grow grain at a profit in larger quantities without other markets and alternate route for shipment. So long as our grain is forced to go for export through one channel that lends itself so readily to the manipulation of grain speculation, and the imposing of excessive freight charges by combinations of transportation companies, we need look for no great increase in production.

In the four years, 1908 to 1911, when the growth of the West was at its height, the crop area increased from 8,312,956 acres in 1908 to 17,488,117, in 1911. The next two years showed a decrease of 1,259,617, and it remains with this Government to say whether we revert to this rapid growth of the decade ending 1911, or remain as we have since.

We submit that the wider market afforded us by accepting the offer of the United States for free interchange of natural products would have the same effect in stimulating the raising of wheat, oats, barley and flax as free access to the United States market for cattle has already done for that line of farm enterprise. Not only because it would provide another market for grain, but also because it would provide a competitive route for transporting grain to Europe.

We ask that all food stuffs be placed on the free list as we believe that the taxing of food is a crime against humanity.

The sensible thing for the Canadian people to do is to stop borrowing money, pay for what we buy and produce for export to meet our obligations.

Wherein should we tax the benefit of money invested in agriculture for the benefit of capital invested in manufacturing?

A few men become millionaires, while the masses become poorer; a few live in mansions, while many are forced into slums.

Manufacturing is unduly expanding, while the farming industry languishes because of being drained of its life blood.

Farmers do not object to pay their share of the cost of Government. They are willing to submit to any system that will be of equitable taxation, levied for revenue purposes only.

That is the situation as described by the very farmers whom the Government is so anxious to protect. I was reading the other day a Life of John Bright, written by a nephew of Macaulay, Mr. Trevelyan. It is the latest biography of John Bright, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a short passage from that work, describing the condition of the people in England at the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws. It seems to me that there is a close analogy between the condition he describes and the one described in the memorial left in the hands of the Government by the grain growers and the grangers of the West. It reads as follows:—

We your petitioners, dwell in a land whose merchants are noted for their enterprise, whose manufacturers are very skilful, and whose workmen are proverbial for their industry. The land itself is goodly, the soil rich, and the temperature wholesome. It is abundantly furnished with materials of commerce and trade; it has numerous and convenient harbours; in facility of internal communication it exceeds all others. For three and twenty years we have enjoyed a profound peace. Yet, with all these elements of national prosperity, and with every disposition and capacity to take advantage of them, we find ourselves overwhelmed with public and private suffering. We are bowed down under a load of taxes; our traders are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy; our workmen are starving; capital brings no profit and labour no remuneration; the home of the artificer is desolate, and the warehouse of the pawnbroker is full; the workhouse is crowded and the manufactory is deserted. We have looked on every side, we have searched diligently in order to find out the causes of a distress so sore and so long continued. We can discover none in nature or in Providence. Heaven has dealt graciously by the people; but the foolishness of our rulers has made the goodness of God of none effect.

As I said, the description of the conditions of life among the farmers and workers of England prior to 1846 bears a striking resemblance to that description of the present conditions among the farmers of Canada, so vividly depicted by the grain growers at the beginning of December last. Sir, how can we protect the farmer? By giving him wider markets—he is not afraid of the world's competition—and by decreasing the burden of taxation on the things he consumes. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said the other day, and with reason, that we might well take an object-lesson from the great country to the south of us. Conditions in the United States two years ago were about the same as in Canada to-day, and their experience is also ours. When Mr. Wilson, that great and simple statesman, perhaps the greatest the United States have had since Abraham Lincoln, took office on the 4th of March a year ago, he delivered on that occasion one of the most impressive speeches I have ever read. What pledge did he take on that occasion, Mr. Speaker? He said that he would convene Congress and that Congress would not be prorogued until the tariff should be so adjusted as to bring relief to the farmers and consumers of the United States. He said further that he would regulate the currency of the United States, and that he would deal with the trusts, the combines and the mergers. Mr. Speaker, let us review for one moment the action taken by the great President of the United States. As regards the tariff, let us see if we cannot take an object lesson from what he did during the strenuous year which has just elapsed in American politics. Let us come to cold facts, let us take, for instance, the case of housing. You wish to protect the farmer, you wish to protect the consumer; let us see what Mr. Wilson has done. The rates under the Underwood tariff and under the Canadian tariff on a number of important articles entering into building and structural work are as follows:

Article.	Canada.	U. S
Bricks	12½ to 20%	10%
Cement	8 to 12½c. per 100 lbs.	Free.
Structural Iron-steel	$2 to $7 per ton.	10%
Manufactures of wood for furnishing houses and furniture itself	20 to 30%	15%
Paints and varnishes	30% to $1 per gal.	10 to 15 p. c.
Nails	30 to 50 cents per 100 lbs.	Free.
Earthenware	20 to 30%	15%

All this means for the American farmer, for the American consumer, cheaper houses and cheaper rents.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Let us take now the necessities of the table. Meat and eggs are on the free list in the United States. In Canada we pay duty and we have to import these articles from England, Australia and New Zealand. In the United States bread, biscuits and wafers are on the free list, while in Canada there is a duty of from 50 to 20 per cent. In the United States the duty on sugar will be gradually reduced until sugar is made free in 1916; in Canada we pay $1.08 per 100 pounds. Let us now take clothing. I will freely admit that the reduction here is not very striking, but still there is a marked contrast. In the United States boots and shoes are free, while boots and shoes coming into Canada pay a duty of 17½ to 25 per cent. Some years ago the Americans were invading the boot and shoe market of Great Britain. But the British shoe manufacturers got at last the better of the American manufacturers and to-day English made boots and shoes are exported to the United States. It may seem strange but the boots and shoes manufactured in Great Britain are successfully competing to-day with American shoes in the American market. That is a lesson from a free trade country.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman—?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not for the present. I am quoting figures, but after I am done my hon. friend may put his question. Now, let us take the figures in connection with the great fundamental industry of agriculture. In the United States agricultural implements are free, whereas in Canada the farmer, whom the Conservative party is so anxious to protect, has to pay from 12½ to 25 per cent duty for his machinery. The table of figures is as follows:

Article.	Canada.	U. S.
Agricultural implements	12½ to 25%	Free.
Shoe machinery	15 to 27½%	Free.
Sewing machines	20 to 30%	Free.
Type-setting machines	12½ to 20%	Free.
Typewriters	17½ to 25%	Free.
Steel manufactures	20 to 35%	5 to 15
Bituminous coal	35 to 53% per 100 lbs.	p.c. Free.
Leather belting	10 to 15%	Free.
Patent leather	15 to 25%	Free.
Harness	20 to 30%	Free.

Having dealt with the tariff, and successfully, we will see the result before long in the United States. Mr. Wilson also dealt with the currency. I have nothing to say on this subject as I feel, and I know, that in Canada we have probably the best currency system to be found anywhere.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend, the radical, does not seem to be a great believer in what I am expressing now. He may have occasion to speak later on in the debate, but, this, at least is my opinion. Having dealt with the currency system President Wilson is now dealing with the trusts and mergers, one of the causes of the high cost of living. It is useless to mince matters, it is just as well to speak plainly and honestly to the privileged class, who, since 1879, have been enjoying their privileges. Contrast the attitude of the President of the United States as regards trusts and mergers with that of the Canadian Government. The President presented the case, he said 'as it lies in the thought of the country,' reiterating 'that private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable,' and declaring that conscientious men throughout the nation would not be satisfied until practices now deprecated by public opinion as restraints of trade and commerce were corrected. 'We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace', said the President. 'The peace that is honour and freedom and prosperity.' Besides suggesting the scope of legislation, the President made a personal appeal for an atmosphere of friendliness and co-operation in Congress while handling the problem. Then the points of the new legislation are given, but I need not recite them, because they appear in the public prints. Contrast, Sir, the attitude of the President of the United States as regards the trusts, combines and mergers with the attitude of the present hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). We have in the memorial of the Grain-growers' Association a direct attack on the combines, the mergers, and the monopolies existing in Canada; we heard last year authoritative statements with reference to them from the hon. the Labour member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville); we heard the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day unveiling the famous lake steamship merger, and we all remember the case of the United Shoe Machinery Company. Some years ago the Liberal Government passed a Combines Investigation Act and the first combine to come under the operation of that legislation was the United Shoe Machinery Company. In May, 1910, the Hon. Mackenzie King, then Minister of Labour, introduced the legislation, and some time afterwards various complaints were made by the manufacturers of boots and shoes in Canada, that their business was hampered and made unduly costly by the trade methods of the United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada. It was alleged that the company, which was an adjunct of the United Shoe Machinery Company of the United States, was a perfect sample of a combine in restraint of trade. A board was appointed over which Mr. Justice Laurendeau (now the city attorney for Montreal) presided, and on October 20, 1912, that board reported:

> The United Shoe Machinery Company is a combine, and by the operation of the clauses of the lease quoted in the foregoing, which restricts the use of the leased machinery in the way therein set forth; competition in the manufacture, production, sale, and supply of shoe machinery in Canada has been and is unduly restricted and prevented.

To make a long story short, the board reported against the United Shoe Machinery Company, and the company was liable, according to the law passed in 1910, to a fine of $1,000 per day. In the month of November last, I find in the Labour Gazette, the report of the Deputy Minister of Labour dated July 15, 1913. After citing facts it concludes with the following significant statement:

> The Board's report having been published in the Canada Gazette of October 26, 1912, the date on which the company would be subject to the operation of section 23 was advanced to May 6, 1913 and thereafter. At the date of writing the department has not been made aware of any action taken as a result of the board's report.

I do not see the Minister of Labour in his seat but I am quite sure the United Shoe Machinery Company is still at liberty to uphold its combine, and to restrict trade and supply in Canada according to its sweet will. Again, I say: contrast the attitude of the President of the United States with the attitude of the Canadian Minister of Labour—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman state that the United Shoe Machinery Company has done nothing in pursuance of the finding of the board?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I take it from the report published by the Deputy Minister of Labour that they have not. That is the authority I have, and I will read it again:

> The board's report having been published in the Canada Gazette of October 26, 1912, the date on which the company would be subject to the operation of section 23 was advanced to May 6, 1913 and thereafter. At the date of writing the department have not been made aware of any action taken as a result of the board's report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That date is prior to the date up to which the board had extended the time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The limit is fixed by the legislation; it is automatic. Then, after that date had been reached, it gave the United Shoe Machinery Company another delay, and after that nothing was done. The United Shoe Machinery Company did not pay the fine of $1,000 a day. If it has paid since I would like to know from the Solicitor General.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand me. The time was extended by the Board, and the article he quoted from was written before the expiration of that time. The company is not under obligation to pay. A prosecution in the criminal courts would be necessary, and the finding under the Act, to which my hon. friend has referred, would be of no value whatever in the prosecution. The criminal courts would have to assess the fine after proof of the facts having been given. The hon. gentleman can scarcely state that the company has done nothing, up to the expiration of the time stated, namely the 5th of May, to comply with the finding of the Board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Solicitor-General can supply me with the information. The Deputy Minister of Labour says the company has done nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But that was before the time had expired.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have given the date of the report published in the Canada Gazette. What have they done since, anyway? I am told that they have done nothing, and that the combine still exists. If the legislation passed by the ex-Minister of Labour, Mr. Mackenzie King, is not elastic enough, and the Solicitor General—representing the West as he does and representing it very creditably—is anxious that this combine should be destroyed, why does he not employ his legal acumen to implement that legislation? I am sure that when the Solicitor General has a little conversation with the Minister of Labour he will find that there are influences at work in the Department of Labour, and that the United Shoe Machinery Company has some friends in office, and, that nothing will be done. But, if the legislation is not perfect, I hope the Solicitor General will see that it will be made perfect.

The Minister of Finance, after surveying the whole situation, gave rather drastic advice to the farmers of this country. He said to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald): Do not be a bear on Canadian conditions, and he told the farmers to be possessed of rational optimism. The Minister of Finance told us: We are going to educate the farmers; we will make the farmers increase their production, and everything after that will go on smoothly. Sir, I can anticipate the answer of the farmers to the candid advice given by such a candid friend as the Minister of Finance; I know that the answer of the farmers will be: Give us wider markets; give us free food, free wheat, free agricultural implements, and make war on the trusts and the combines and the monopolies. The Minister of Finance spoke with sarcasm about the famous Cobden metal, but I would point out to him that Cobden and Bright captured England some sixty years ago by appealing to the common sense of the people, and not to prejudices. I for one do not care to catechise in this House, but it is not bad, perhaps it is even quite opportune that we should retain the fundamentals on this question of the producer and the consumer. In reading the diary of John Bright on the existence of monopolies in England, I find the following wholesome truisms. He says:

> Monopoly presupposes some advantage to those who possess it. It gives to them the protection of the market and excludes foreign grown corn in order that in a market insufficiently supplied they may obtain a higher price than their corn is really worth. This higher price can only be obtained by preventing the food market being as abundantly supplied as it would be if the regular laws of commerce were not interfered with. This higher price therefore exists and is procurable only from the existence of scarcity intentionally created by law.

This is a wholesome truth propounded by John Bright, quite an authority on the matter and quite a friend of the common people who, to use the words of Abraham Lincoln, must be really loved by the Almighty as they are so numerous. Mr. Bright goes on to say:

> This increased value places the food out of the reach of those whose means are most limited, whilst the most wealthy classes are still able to procure as much as they require. The pressure of scarcity comes then upon the poorest portion of the people. In a besieged city the rich and powerful can hold out longest—

For instance, the noble eighteen could hold longest against the fifteen thousand asking Mayor Hocken for free bread and free soup.

> —the poor and defenceless feel famine soonest This law-made famine is unequal, sparing the rich and crushing the poor.

That is the story of the bread rioters in Regina.

> Famine on board a ship at sea would be equally borne by all. Admiral and cabin-boy would share the biscuits, but as the Corn Law scarcity is created for the special benefit of one class, it is but likely that all the suffering should be averted from that class. The scarcity affects various portions of the community, in the inverse ratio of their power to endure it. The labourers probably are the only class that feel it in a positive insufficiency of food, and of these the weakest and poorest, whose labour is least valuable and least skilled, bear the greatest intensity of suffering.

Perhaps this may appear a little out of date, and I hear sneers from some of my hon. friends on the other side. But who will dare deny that in this young country of ours we are face to face, in Winnipeg, in Vancouver, in Toronto, in Montreal with slums and with people underfed? If you read the morning press, you will find that clergymen from nearly all the great cities are clamouring to-day in favour of the underfed and against the slums. Though the fundamentals may be a little out of date, though I may appear a little archaic in my economic notions, yet I believe that it is well for Canada that someone should rise in the House of Commons and speak the language of truth, commonsense and justice to the monopolists who have enjoyed their privileges during thirty or forty years. Oh! but we are told, that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has changed his policy. He was first of all for free trade as we have it in England. Then he was for a continental union. Then he was for unrestricted reciprocity. Then he was for readjustment of the tariff; finally he became in favour of restricted reciprocity, and now he is a free fooder for the moment, as said with smile the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White). Say what you like, take the whole course of the right hon. gentleman's career, whether he advocated continental union—and it is not proven—whether he fought for unrestricted reciprocity—and unrestricted reciprocity found favour even in Ontario in 1891—though he was for free trade as we have it in England, for restricted reciprocity, though he is to-day in favour of free food, there is something of consistency in his stand—he is for the reduction of taxation. He is not for the increase of taxation and the consolidation of monopolies, combines and mergers. Permit me to quote one phrase of Sir Robert Peel's letter to a friend of his. He, too was considered as a great apostate, because he stood for the people against the big interests. Some of the masses even were against him as they were against Cobden and Bright. In a letter, which a friend of mine read in the British Museum and which he copied three or four years ago, because it was in his own handwriting, I found the following phrase which applies very well to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier):

> I have many difficulties to contend with: much misrepresentation and obloquy to encounter on the part of those whom I verily believe I am protecting from evils and dangers of which they seem little aware.

When the right hon. gentleman disappears from public life—and I trust that this is a far-off contingency—he may well say, with Sir Robert Peel:

> I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist who maintains perfection for his own individual benefit, but it may be, I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good will, in those places that are the abodes of men whose lot it is to labour and to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

Nothing has been said about the naval question, and possibly this is the cause of the nervousness of the Postmaster General. The naval question, much to your surprise, Mr. Speaker, perhaps much to your comfort, is now amongst the departed. The hearse that took the Naval Bill from this House to the Upper Chamber left the corpse where it should remain. The naval question has been shelved by the Government. I will not recite the various phases of the naval question, although I am tempted to do so by the presence in this Chamber to-day of the author of the far-famed resolution of 1909. We know, first, that this motion was introduced in 1909 in favour of a Canadian navy. We know, further, that it was made unanimous. We know, also, that the right hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Borden) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) in their speeches in the House of Commons, in England, at Halifax and in Ontario, favoured a Canadian navy as per the resolution of 1909. We know that the Drummond and Arthabaska election took place in 1910. It was found out, perhaps by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), that the Liberals' difficulties were the Tories' opportunity. We know that it was through the election in Drummond and Arthabaska that the Tories had their first vision of a victory. We know the contradictory attitudes taken by the ex-Minister of Public Works in the province of Quebec, and by the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Borden) in the English-speaking provinces of the Dominion. We know that in the campaign of 1911 the Tory jingoes were paying —yes, I have it on the authority of Mr. Bourassa over his own signature—the Tory jingoes of Montreal and Toronto were paying for the sowing of the Nationalist seed in Canada. We know what happened; we were defeated, of course. The first session took place. My hon. friend the Prime Minister was feeling his ground. Would he repeal the Naval Bill? Would he introduce a new naval policy?—the Tory jingo policy of centralization as against the policy of my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition? The Prime Minister went to England, accompanied by his fervent home ruler, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and by that fervent Nationalist—of that time—the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). When they came back a banquet took place in Montreal at the Windsor hotel, and we are familiar with the declarations made by the Prime Minister. He told his hearers: I have my information from the proper sources, I have consulted the Admiralty; the House will convene in a few weeks; I shall submit my naval policy to the faithful Commons of Canada, and if Parliament prove unfaithful, I will appeal to the people of Canada. The emergency appeared on the 5th of December, 1913. We remember the heroic resistance of the Reform party against the tyranny and the stampede of the jingo party. We are aware of the effect, the damaging effect, of Mr. Churchill's letter. We had closure—a good French word misused for a very bad thing; closure was introduced under the master hand of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). We know what was the answer of the Senate to the action of the majority in the House of Commons. While not referring at all to the little incident before our Easter duties of last year, now that the atmosphere of the House of Commons is serene and peaceful —is it not a fact, Sir, that events which took place since last session have vindicated the course of the Canadian Liberal party? I listened to the lecture at the Canadian Club in this city on Saturday by Mr. J. S. Ewart. We may differ as regards Mr. Ewart. He is an independent; he is above party politics. But as regards his perfect knowledge of the affairs of the British Empire, I think we can all take Mr. Ewart's word. Read that lecture of Mr. Ewart's, and read it again. He tells us that since last session the Australian navy is an accomplished fact, the Australian navy with the Australian flag at its mastheads. Since last session New Zealand has started a navy. Since last session—when my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) on his return from Europe declared that war was actually in existence between England and Germany—there has been a rapprochement between England and Germany. And if you look at the Annual Register for last year, you will find that the best customer that John Bull has is Germany. So far, then, our course has been vindicated since last session. More than that, the policy propounded by the Conservative party in this House—I should say the policy re-echoed by the Conservative party in this House, for that policy was imposed on the Prime Minister of Canada by Mr. Churchill, by the clerks of the Admiralty and by the party of centralization in England—the best authorities amongst the Imperialists in England, Imperialists of the sanest kind, men like Mr. Richard Jebb, Admiral Henderson and Admiral Fremantle, have declared that the policy propounded by the right hon. leader of the Opposition was the only good policy for Canada and for the empire. I shall not weary the House with quotations, but I repeat—Sir Richard Jebb, one of the best known apostles of the Imperial gospel, a disciple of Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Milner, Admiral Henderson and Admiral Fremantle have declared that the time has come to accept the policy of the leader of the Canadian Opposition. More than that, the London Times, the Thunderer—inspired at times—has approved of the Australian navy and the New Zealand navy. By that admission it has approved of the Canadian navy. But it had approved of the Canadian navy before. As I say, I do not care to weary the House with old extracts, but after the Conference of 1911, the Times shouted with joy at the announcement that at last there was to be a great Imperial policy based on the declaration made by the one who had been singled out in that Conference by Mr. Asquith as the Nestor of the Conference—namely Imperial unity based on local autonomy. Sir, the naval question has been shelved; the emergency has disappeared, and the time is now ripe for a permanent policy. As a Liberal, and as a loyal Canadian, I say to the Government, now that the emergency has disappeared, bring down a permanent policy; let it be along the lines of the Australian policy, and you will find the Canadian Liberal party with the Government, and supporting that policy. The emergency has disappeared but the Gioconda has also disappeared from Paris. I suspect that some fine Italian hand will some day sooner or later bring back the Mona Lisa of the Tory party, the emergency. When will it be restored and adorn the walls of this Parliament? Mr. Speaker, you need not guess it; we all know it. The emergency invented last year and shelved this year will be restored as soon as there are any rumours of a general election. It is needed for the flag-waving campaign. The 'no truck, no trade' cry is now too old a song; the cry of 'Canada as an adjunct of the United States' is dead and buried, and a new patented flag-waving campaign is needed to return the Tory party to office. But the 'wolf, wolf' cry will not succeed a second time. I know that certain jingo papers are trying to make themselves believe that there is an emergency. It must not die, it must not disappear. I read in the Montreal Star of Saturday the following lines:

> The airy manner in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier dismissed all question of a naval 'emergency' —past, present or future—the other day in Parliament, passed the comprehension of those who take an intelligent interest in foreign politics. The proofs of an 'emergency' are so plain, so plentiful, so painfully omnipresent, that it is incomprehensible to men who bother with anything outside their own bailliwick how a statesman of Sir Wilfrid's stature could possibly blind his eyes to what is written in massed bayonets across the continent of Europe.

I wonder if the gentleman who in his sound sober sense wrote the above lines is one of that organization of crooks described by Lord Welby, who uses the following language:

> We are in the hands of an organization of crooks. They are politicans, generals, manufacturers of armaments, and journalists, all of them anxious for unlimited expenditure and given to inventing scares which terrify the public and terrify ministers of the Crown.

I am quite positive, Mr. Speaker—and I am sincere in this—that the gentleman who said that the emergency was written in massed bayonets intended to terrify my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Lord Welby continues that he could remember six war scares, each one made to order, and in each case of which the public had been gulled. Each time the scare had been exposed later on, but each new scare took, and resulted in enormous expenditure on armaments. These are the utterances of Lord Welby, a member of that august assembly, the House of Lords, which was reformed by Lloyd George, the much-talked of minister who has himself advocated a reduction in armament. I would not for one moment leave the House with the impression that Lord Welby is a crank, and that he did not know what he was talking about. I hold in my hand a little blue book—not the blue book which the Government intends to give as bread to the consumers of Canada, the report of the investigation of the high cost of living commission, but a little book bearing the suggestive tittle: 'The Six Panics and Other Essays,' by F. W. Hirst. Mr. Hirst, as we all know is the financial authority of the British Empire. He is the editor of the London Economist, a paper which is eagerly read every time it reaches his office by the Minister of Finance in Canada. Mr. Hirst is no crank; he is a good Britisher. Of course he has a little failing: he is a Radical. I commend the reading of his book to every member of the House of Commons. There were six panics in England during the last century. The first lasted from 1847 to 1848, and it originated by a letter of the Duke of Wellington. It was addressed to a British officer, and afforded painful evidence of enfeebled naval power. The iron duke, speaking about the painful evidence of enfeebled power of the naval forces of Great Britain, naturally excited public opinion, and the people were led to believe that the French were going to invade England. Mr. Hirst explained how the panic ended:

> This panic ended dramatically. Lord Russell was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Budget produced on February 18, 1848, raised the income tax from sevenpence to a shilling in the pound, in order to increase armaments and to reorganize the militia in accordance with the Duke of Wellington's advice. When this addition to taxation came into view, in association with preparations against the danger of invasion, the danger seemed to diminish and the panic abated.

And strange to say, a few weeks afterwards the invader entered England, but it was the aged French King Louis Philippe who went to England not as an invader but as a refugee. He had lost the crown of France. The second panic—again a French panic—lasted from 1851 to 1853. Lord John Russell, speaking in the House of Commons, said:

> Really, to hear or read some of the letters, some of the language used by some portion of the press, one would imagine that these two great nations, so wealthy, so similar in enlightenment, were going to butcher one another, merely to try what would be the effect of percussion caps and needle guns.

Mr. Joseph Hume, the veteran economist, describes the condition in England in one of the debates as follows:

Our present panics are not due as in times past to the old women, but to our having too many clubs about London, containing so many half pay officers, who have nothing to do but to look about for themselves and their friends. These are the people who write to the newspapers anxious to bring grist to the mill somehow or other.

And you know how the panic ended.

The alarm was constantly stimulated by startling paragraphs in the newspapers. One day the French army at Rome was reported to be chafing and dissatisfied, because it could not share in the invasion of England and the sack of London; the next there were whispered revelations of a secret plan, divulged by General Changarnier, for invading England and seizing the metropolis (which he publicly contradicted) then we were told of a plot for securing a naval station in the West Indies: next, the French Government had sent an order for steam frigates to Messrs. Napier of Glasgow.

Admirals on half pay were every morning surveying the channel and seeing on the horizon the French frigates coming with the invaders. How did the panic end? Mr. Hirst tells us that a little arrangement took place between the War Office in London and the War Office in Paris and the panic ended by the union of the French and English armies for aggression in the Crimea. The third panic lasted from 1859 to 1861. It was again a French invasion scare but Richard Cobden published at that time a little book entitled, The Three Panics, That ended the scare. There was another panic in 1884. Mr. Hirst tells us how it started.

According to an old official of the Admiralty this first success of 'the advanced school of naval thought' was one 'most unexpected' and owed its origin to the merest accident. Lord Salisbury the Conservative leader on a visit to Portsmouth in the summer of 1884 had heard discontent expressed about the state of the navy by some of the officials there and referred to the matter in a speech, which seemed to express a doubt as to whether the navy was strong enough to ensure the national safety.

A few days afterwards the question was taken up by Mr. Stead, the journalist. The Annual Register, alluding to him, remarked:

In nearly all quarters the Government's answer to the popular demand was pronounced inadequate. Nevertheless there arose a few anti-alarmists or skeptics who declared that the outcry in the newspapers was chiefly, if not wholly, the work of the professional advisers of the Admiralty, assisted in a great measure by the large ship builders, whose yards were empty and whose trade was temporarily at a standstill.

And the fifth panic was called the dreadnought scare. I need not worry the House with that. We all know that when Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman became Prime Minister he reduced the expenditure on the Navy Bill by many million pounds. Immediately the shipbuilders and armour platers raised a row and a campaign was started in the press to get England to build dreadnoughts. England had already one at the time, but as Germany was contemplating the building of many dreadnoughts, England was urged to start building them too. We all remember, too, the Blatchford scare and the articles written by that famous Socialist. We remember too that farce, humiliating for England, which was played all over England and even in the city of Ottawa—an Englishman's Home. You remember the lines, Mr. Speaker.

We want eight—
We won't wait—

dreadnoughts. Thanks to Mr. Hirst, we all know now the source of the dreadnought scare. It was started and paid for by the armour platers and we know how ultimately it failed. But we had another panic not so very long ago. We can have no more panics about dreadnoughts and superdreadnoughts, but not many weeks ago we were terrified by an air-ship panic. Officers on half pay I suppose, had seen lights in the firmament that were neither stars nor meteors; surely they must be the lights of the Zeppelins. And the press immediately started a campaign for supplying the home Government with airships. They succeeded. This is what Mr. Hirst says:

Previously, on February 20, this business side of the agitation came to the surface in a news column (headed 'Aeroplane Purchases—Machines for the British Army and Navy') which runs as follows:

And he then gives the number of machines bought by the English Government at the instigation of a few comedians writing in the press for the airship firms. Mr. Speaker, I have said enough on this subject. We in Canada have been for the last few years the laughing stock of the armour platers and of the insincere jingoes. I admit that many, in fact the majority of the jingoes, act in good faith but there is too much jingoism in Canada; too many people believe that they are born to save the empire. Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of England, can be depended upon in matters Imperial. In 1911 he served us with a notice in his answer to Sir Joseph Ward. He said that never so long as he was Prime Minister of England would the foreign policies of Great Britain be controlled by the overseas dominions. That was a notice very courteously and very firmly served on the empire savers. Mr. Asquith will not abdicate even for the prime ministers of Canada, Australia and New Zealand. He with Sir Edward Grey, is the inspirer responsible for the foreign policy of Great Britain and he does not intend to abdicate his functions. We have besides, it seems to me, our own problems, we have our own difficulties; we have the tariff to deal with, the labour question to deal with, we have the Hindu agitation in British Columbia to look after, and we have the yellow immigration to cope with. These are problems, these are difficulties, which can well occupy the time of the ministers of the Crown in Canada. Let us therefore turn our attention to Canadian affairs. We should not be ashamed to deal with Canadian affairs. We are building up our country. The mandate of the Prime Minister of Canada is the Dominion's mandate, not the empire's mandate. Serving Canada is serving the Empire.

Too much militarism in this country! Militarism is not a healthy condition. I believe in a moderate military expenditure. I believe that the common people of this country are ready to bear their share of military expenditure, but, Mr. Speaker—the rides—the joy rides—of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) in Europe with his gold-plated staff, his antics, his hiring of automobiles at $25 a day, is indeed a very poor advertisement abroad for our young country. The expenditure is out of all proportion. If I may be allowed I will again quote John Bright:

I do not care for military greatness or military renown. I care for the condition of the people among whom I live. Palaces, baronial castles, great halls, stately mansions, do not make a nation. The nation in every country dwells in a cottage and unless the light of your constitution can shine there, unless the beauty of your legislation and the excellence of your statesmanship are impressed there on the feeling and condition of the people, rely upon it you have yet to learn the duties of government.

The hon. Minister of Finance is shrugging his shoulders: Well, we won the by-elections anyway; we won six out of seven. I have here the circulars which were distributed in the county of Chateauguay, where, as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said, a double appeal was made. I know that the farmers were told to vote for the Government because the Government would give them road money and the French-Canadians in the county of Chateauguay were told what, by the Deputy Speaker? Mr. Speaker, I might inform you, en passant, that your deputy was in that election contrary to all precedent, and he was there holding public meetings. The great constitutional party respecting old usages and customs! Well, Sir, he was there distributing circulars telling what?

Mr. Borden is the friend of the province of Quebec. Never have we been so well treated as since he has been Prime Minister. Contrast that with the Laurier regime.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, you remember what the Mail said about Laurier being so lavish with the province of Quebec and so stingy with Ontario?

Contrast with the Laurier regime the attitude of Mr. Rogers. He is more generous with the province in the distribution of public works than was Mr. Pugsley, the Liberal minister. thirteen million dollars of public money comes in one year. There are public works for all over the province. Twenty-five million dollars will be expended by the Borden Government in the province of Quebec this year.

Then follows the words, 'eloquent figures.' We have here the figures for wharfs and rivers and the Quebec harbour. My hon. friend the Postmaster General thinks a little of Quebec. Here are the appropriations in the Main and Supplementary Estimates for harbours and river improvements. Here we find in high headlines: Quebec, principal items; Main Estimates, and Supplementary Estimates; page after page of them; divers public works and it says that this money will be expended in 1913-14. At the end there is a resumé as follows:

Public works, main estimates ..	$2,443,000 00
Public works, supplementary estimates..	974,000 00
Harbours and rivers, main estimates..	1,016,075 00
Harbours and rivers, supplementary estimates..	703,956 54
Public works, chargeable to capital..	1,514,000 00
Divers public works	4,700,095 00
Total..	$11,351,126 54

Then there is this appeal:

Electors of Chateauguay, will you return to the Brodeur-Lemieux regime, or do you prefer the regime of Mr. Rogers and prosperity for the province of Quebec?

Then we find also the following:

Mr. Borden is fair with the French-Canadians. We have rather a large portion of patronage.

I am afraid that is an appeal to the appetites of the people. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of the action of your Deputy Speaker? Let us now read another leaflet:

Since Mr. Borden has been made Premier, the province of Quebec is much better treated than under the Liberal regime.

I hope the Mail will publish that.

Mr. Laurier used to neglect his countrymen because he used to say that on account of his nationality he could not do as much for them, but under the Conservatives we have two judges on the Supreme Court. Mr. Laurier has left us with one, Mr. Brodeur, who is the weaker of the two. Sir Elzear Taschereau has been succeeded by Mr. Fitzpatrick. When Mr. Gobeil, Deputy Minister of Public Works, took his pension, Mr. Laurier replaced him by Mr. J. B. Hunter, an Englishman. And when Mr. Gourdeau left his office as Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Laurier appointed Mr. Johnston, of Cape Breton, another Englishman. From 1896 to 1911 the Laurier Government did nothing for the harbour of Quebec, but it spent millions for the harbours of Ontario and the Northwest.

Much better to have an English-Canadian as a prime minister than a French-Canadian as Laurier was. Since Mr. Borden has been in office he has shown the greatest sympathy for the French-Canadian; he loves our race.

Then there is quoted a few phrases from a speech delivered in the House of Commons on the 22nd of March, 1905; it is too long to translate, but it is no doubt very eloquent and it does justice to Mr. Borden's broadmindedness. The article goes on to say:

The Borden Government has shown by acts that it respects our race. Is it not true—

Oh, Mr. Speaker, I come to you now; this is for your benefit:

Is it not true that 15 French-Canadian translators for the blue books have been appointed this year after having passed examinations? Even Liberals have been appointed. It is because Mr. Borden wants to be just to our language that he ordered these appointments.

In spite of you, Mr. Speaker.

Under Mr. Laurier it was impossible to have blue books in French until two years after their publication in the English version. Why should we not be just towards Mr. Borden when he is such a good fellow, especially when he gives us what Mr. Laurier has so often refused? Under the Liberals there was but one judge at the Exchequer Court, the Hon. Mr. Justice Cassels. Is it not true that Mr. Borden has appointed another one, the Hon. Mr. Audette, a French-Canadian? Why should we not recognize such acts of justice? Since Mr. Doherty has been Minister of Justice he has appointed in his department two French-Canadian lawyers, Messrs. Beauchesne and De-Salabery. All the lawyers in the province of Quebec who have done business with Mr. Doherty for the past two years know that there is very serious amelioration in that direction. Mr. Borden has appointed a Senator from Nova Scotia, Mr. Girroir, a French-Acadian from Antigonish who had been mentioned to Mr. Borden by the Acadian leaders themselves. Mr. Borden has appointed as Chairman of the Joint Waterways Commission the Hon. T. C. Casgrain, a French-Canadian, and that appointment is really quite creditable. Thus is it with all important posts in the civil service; we have our large share of patronage. We receive much more since the last two years than we have over received during the whole tenure of office of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

The Minister of Finance said: 'We won the election in Chateauguay.' Yes, Mr. Speaker, they won the election, but I give you the means by which they won that election in Chateauguay. The Minister of Finance, I know, is a bookworm, and he is fond of Napoleonic literature. Not very long ago I read new memoirs describing the campaign of Napoleon in Russia, and I saw related there that as the army of Napoleon, made up of soldiers and adventurers from all the countries of Europe—French, Spaniards, Prussians, Italians, Austrians—as that army entered the great solitudes of Russia some of Napoleon's staff of generals met an old Russian pope and conversation ensued between the humble Russian and the several invading generals arrayed in uniforms glittering in gold. They told the poor old man that they were sure of reaching Moscow, that they were confident to defeat the Russians, and that the army of Napoleon would triump after a brief campaign. And the old Russian said to one of the staff; general, you will cross with your magnificent army of adventurers the Beresina and you may cross the Niemen, and you will possibily reach Moscow, but count your troops and your eagles as you advance, and count them again as you come back.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is also on his way to Moscow with his gorgeously uniformed general, the Minister of Militia. In the ranks of the Tory party are to be found men of all stripes; we find some of the eighteen insurgent capitalists represented by the Minister of Finance; here are the loyal Orangemen and there, the pious Ultramontane—look at him just facing me now. I see in that army stalwart Tories, plenty of them, jingoes and Nationalist musketeers. They have passed two sessions and we are entering on a third. We may have a fourth session, but some day, the general elections will come. Napoleon with his generals and his adventurers went into the solitudes of Russia after Ulm, Friedland and Jena, and they crossed the Beresina and they crossed the Niemen, but his ragged remnants of a once grand army had to recross these rivers in their retreat, and they had to meet Wellington at Waterloo.

The Tory army may cross their Beresina and their Niemen, but the elections will come, sooner or later, and they will soon have to face their Wellington, and, at the same time, meet their Waterloo.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): I suppose I will not disappoint the House if I say that I have no intention of speaking at such length as my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The hon. gentleman has spoken for three and a half hours. I shall not judge the matter of his speech, because it might be thought by some who know that we have not been very intimate friends in the past, that my judgment is prejudiced. However, I venture to say that I do not think it will take me one-quarter of the time to travel over the same ground and to place the facts as they really are, not as he imagines them to be. It is not expected that the House should sit very late to-night, and consequently I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Tuesday, January 27, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: The present Dominion Lands Act approves of the principle and the policy of the complete alienation of water-powers, lands connected with water-powers, coal lands, coal, oil, quarry lands and gas lands from the people, and, I submit, to the detriment of the people. The purpose of this Bill is to prevent such alienation. I understand that it has been the general practice of the department in recent times not to alienate these lands, but to lease such lands under certain regulations made by the Governor in Council. But the regulations concerning the water-powers appear to me to be of such great importance that they ought to be first approved by Parliament before going into operation, and amended only at the will of Parliament. Moreover, the statute as it now stands authorizes the homesteading and pre-emption of such lands, so that when the homestead conditions have been complied with and the rights of pre-emption arise, the surface rights become severed from the sub-surface rights, to the detriment of the owners of the sub-surface rights, and will prevent the profitable working of these rights. The purpose of this Bill is to remedy these defects.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONEY LENDERS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HENRY H. STEVENS (Vancouver) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the Money Lenders Act. He said: The present Money Lenders Act applies a limitation to the rate of interest to be charged on loans the principal of which is under $500. The intention of this Bill is to extend this limitation to all loans. Another proposal is to reduce the rate of interest from 12 per cent to 10 per cent. Another feature is an amendment to the interpretation clause describing what a money lender is and making the clause clear.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. He said: This is to extend the time for the completion of the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, respecting the National Transcontinental Railway. He said: The other Bill was for the extension of the time by Order in Council. This is to authorize the Governor in Council to extend it from time to time by Order in Council.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT REPEAL BILL.

Mr. DAVID O. LESPERANCE (Montmagny) moved for leave to introduce Bill

No. 32, to repeal the Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LESPERANCE: This is a Bill to repeal the Naval Service Act passed by the late Administration in 1910.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MARITIME MAIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON: I wish to ask the Postmaster General if some improvement can not be made in the method of transmission of mails to the eastern provinces. At present, if a letter directed to any point between Montreal and Moncton, or beyond Moncton, inclusive of Halifax and Sydney, is mailed in this city after three o'clock in the afternoon, it goes to Montreal by the afternoon or night train, remains there all the next day and then goes over the Intercolonial railway or the Canadian Pacific railway by the night train which leaves Montreal for points east. This mail matter should not be held twelve hours in Montreal. Letters mailed here in the evening should connect with the Maritime mail which leaves Montreal at 8.30 the next morning, thus reaching their destination in the eastern provinces fully twelve hours earlier than under the present arrangement. I have repeatedly brought this matter to the attention of my hon. friend and of his predecessor in office. This has been going on for a number of years, and it seems to me that it is time a remedy was applied. The mails are held in Montreal in order to be sent over the Canadian Pacific railway to the eastern provinces; they should go over the Intercolonial railway by the morning train, thus avoiding delay.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): The hon. member for Westmorland called my attention to this matter the other day, and I thought he was right. I brought the matter to the attention of my deputy. At first sight he thought that the hon. gentleman was wrong in his statement of facts, but I told him that my hon. friend was sure of his facts. I asked him to look into the matter so that I might be able to give the hon. member for Westmorland a proper answer. Since then Dr. Coulter has been unwell, and that is the reason why my hon. friend has not yet received an answer.

[Mr. Lespérance.]

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, resumed from Monday, January 26.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Rouville (Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux) for the marked difference which I observe between his speech of yesterday and some of his former speeches during the last two sessions of Parliament. Every one will remember that my hon. friend was very angry at times during the last session and the session before; that gentlemen outside of this House of the highest respectability were traduced by him on the floor of this House without their having an opportunity to reply, and that ministers and members of the Government were very severely attacked. Evidently my hon. friend has adopted a new course of procedure. He discussed public questions yesterday from a public point of view, quoting at length from economists and Blue Books, and making an argument which was in no way a personal one. If he will not refuse them, I think that congratulations are in order. Perhaps my hon. friend has become wiser, but I have no doubt that the recent election in Chateauguay has had a quieting effect upon him. I shall endeavour to follow my hon. friend's course, and try to discuss public questions from a public point of view.

The hon. member for Rouville, in the beginning of his speech, expressed the hope that the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) having made such a witty speech, would be promoted to the Senate; he wished him God speed in that respect, and hoped that the day might soon arrive. In the next breath, however, my hon. friend, with remarkable lack of logic, told us that we should not appoint any more members of the House to the Senate, thus invalidating the wish to which he had just given expression in regard to the hon. member for Dundas.

I am going to pass very quickly over the preliminary remarks of the hon. member, because, as I said last night when I moved the adjournment of the debate, I do not intend to speak for three or three and a half hours. The hon. gentleman next referred to the spoils system, meaning the dismissals made by the present Government. In that respect I desire to say that before the Government of my right hon. friend came into power in 1896, the dismissal of public officials had not amounted to very much. The Mackenzie Government and the Sir John A. Macdonald Government had not indulged in the dismissal of officials to any considerable extent. But in 1896 there was a debauchery of dismissals in all the branches of the public service and the example then set by the preceding Government was such that our own friends thought it was only fair that the people who had been thus unfairly and unjustly dismissed should be reinstated in their places and that the policy which had been followed in that respect by the preceding Government should be followed by our Government. Human nature is human nature, and when our friends all over this country witnessed the dismissals en bloc which had been made on the Intercolonial, in the post office, almost everywhere in the public service, it was only fair and natural that these people should ask us to follow that policy. After these dismissals had taken place and while they were still taking place at the hands of the late Government, the House of Commons passed a resolution, moved by Mr. Lake, who was then a member of this House, defining the conditions under which these dismissals should take place and saying when they should take place. This motion, after debate, was accepted by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister, and it was agreed to unanimously in this House. I say that this having been accepted by both parties as the policy to be followed in that respect, the present Government were quite right in acting along the lines of that policy as outlined in this motion by Mr. Lake. That is what we have done and when our hon. friends say that we have made dismissals, I say that we have made them under those conditions and on those lines; and so long as the public service is improved in that respect, so long as new governments come in and are in the position in which we are ourselves, I think that, with the example set in 1896 and the following years, it is unfair for our friends on the other side of the House to tell us now that we should not have done what they themselves have done as being the right thing under the circumstances. Whilst in the one sentence we are told that we are making too many dismissals, we are in the next told that we do not make enough. I was told on the floor of the House by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day that I should have dismissed one of the most important officials in my department. I was told last year that my Deputy Minister, even, had so exercised his duties that he ought properly to have been dismissed. On the one hand we are told that we have dismissed too many and on the other hand we are told that we should dismiss more. The middle course is the right one. I do not think we should dismiss people simply because they have been appointed by a preceding Government; but if these officials come within the four corners of the resolution moved by Mr. Lake and adopted by my hon. friends I do not think that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) or any other member of the House has a right to tell us that we have adopted the spoils system.

The next argument made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) was that the Finance Minister was wrong in stating that money had become easier, that the banks were lending money very freely. He said that if this was true in Ontario and the other provinces, money was not as easy in Quebec as elsewhere. En passant, I might say that if we are to believe certain reports which are published in a certain newspaper now, money is pretty easy in Quebec. But then, joking apart, I know as a fact that in the province of Quebec, as elsewhere, money is much easier than it was and we are certainly on the eve of the day when we shall see the business of this country restored to the place where it was several months ago.

We were told by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday that there were some very bad things which might be expected in the Redistribution Bill and he insinuated or rather said that the hon. member for St. Antoine division of Montreal (Mr. Ames) and myself had been conspiring about this and had been preparing some kind of a redistribution which would not be fair. Let me tell my hon. friend that he is mistaken in his facts. We were told that Sir John A. Macdonald brought in a Bill which my hon. friends called a Gerrymander Bill; that it was all wrong, that Ontario was carved in a certain way in order to gain political advantage; but that, on the other hand, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) adopted an entirely different method and came before Parliament with an absolutely fair proposition. That was to present the Bill, leaving the schedules in blank, refer the Bill to a committee of the House and then adopt what my hon. friend said was the unanimous opinion of the House about the redistribution which should take place. I want to inform my hon. friend that what he said about that was not exactly right. I looked up the debate and I find that the report of the committee was not a unanimous report; without going very far it will suffice to quote what the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), himself said and which I find in the debates of 1903, September 9, at page 10852. He said:

So far as I have read it, I will approve of the disposition of the representation as made by the report of the majority until I am shown by the discussion that I am wrong.

Now, those are the facts. My hon. friend from Rouville said that the principle of district boundaries was a sacred principle which should be kept in all cases, and he told us that under the Bill of 1903 that principle was respected in all cases. I have before me the Bill of 1903, and I find that in no less than twelve cases in the province of Quebec alone, parishes and townships were taken from one county and placed in an adjoining county. It is useless for my right hon. friend to say no, because I have the Statute right here in my hand.

The parish of Lavaltrie shall be transferred from the electoral district of L'Assomption to the electoral district of Berthier.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not a transfer from one county to another.

Mr. PELLETIER: The parish of Lavaltrie was taken from one county and put in another one.

The Indian village and reserve of Caughnawaga is transferred from the electoral district of Chateauguay to the electoral district of La Prairie and Napierville.

The parish of Lacolle shall be transferred from the electoral district of Missisquoi to St. Johns and Iberville. The parishes of Notre Dame de Stanbridge and Notre Dame des Anges de Stanbridge shall be transferred from St. Johns and Iberville to Missisquoi.

That is another one. There is a case in point and my right hon. friend will remember that this was done in order to try and defeat the Conservative candidate in Bagot.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

The parish of St. Pie which gives a majority of 200, was taken from the county of Rouville, where the Liberal majority was supposed to be all right, and transferred to Bagot in order to make sure of electing one of the supporters of my right hon. friend. The parish of St. Marcel was transferred from Bagot to Richelieu. The parish of Ste. Hélène was transferred from Bagot to the district of Drummond and Arthabaska. Everybody knows why that was done. The parishes of St. Guillaume d'Upton and St. Bonaventure d'Upton were transferred from Drummond and Arthabaska to Yamaska. The parish of la Visitation de la Bienheureuse Vierge Marie was transferred from Drummond and Arthabaska to Yamaska. The parish of Ste. Flore was transferred from the district of Champlain to the district of Three Rivers and St. Maurice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I affirm here that all these parishes, with possibly the exception of Ste. Flore and St. Guillaume were transferred back to their proper places according to their county limits. Lavaltrie, which had been from 1854 part of Berthier was, by the Act of 1892, made a part of l'Assomption. St. Pie, which had been a part of Bagot was in 1892 put into the county of Rouville. All the changes of 1892 were put back to the counties to which they belonged with the possibly exception of Ste. Flore and St. Guillaume. In 1873 St. Guillaume was placed for judicial and also for local electoral purposes in the county of Yamaska. So that in mentioning all these changes, my hon. friend only affirms the principle which we stand for and which is the principle of adhering to municipal and county boundaries.

Mr. PELLETIER: The municipal boundaries had been fixed by anterior legislation in so far as this Parliament is concerned. My right hon. friend found these parishes in certain counties and he took them from those counties in order to put them into other counties.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They were put there by the Redistribution Act of 1892, and we objected to that.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, and we shall see with what result. I am not on my feet at this moment to tell my right hon. friend, or this House, that we intend to proceed in this or the other way; that is a matter which will be decided later on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am speaking of the past only.

Mr. PELLETIER: But I am going to speak of the future for a minute. Nobody has said that I know of that we shall not refer this Bill to a committee of the House. Nobody has said that it will not be done, and I only ask my hon. friends to wait until the Government has moved in this matter and not bring in their reproaches before that method which the Government may adopt has been adopted. We have been told that the method of presenting a Bill with blank schedules is the proper way. I do not say that it is or is not, but let us not condemn the Government in this respect before the Government has moved at all. The reproaches will fall flat if perchance the Government were to move on the same lines as my right hon. friend himself did when he was Prime Minister.

I would like to call the attention of the House to a very important fact in so far as my province is concerned. I have just stated that certain parishes were taken from the counties to which they belonged and put into other counties. I would like to put before the House a few facts in this respect as far as the province of Quebec is concerned. For the last ten years, before the election of 1911, every one knows that the representation in the House of Commons of the province of Quebec was, as far as the Conservative party was concerned, reduced to a very small number. In 1904 the Conservative party had in this House eleven members and the Liberal party had fifty-four; in 1908 it was practically the same thing. In 1911 it was twenty-eight to thirty-seven. Let us see how that works out. The total Liberal vote in Quebec in 1904 was 147,239. The total Conservative vote was 109,821. In 1908 the total Liberal vote was 153,393. The Conservative vote was 129,364. In 1911 the total Liberal vote was 164,274, and the total Conservative vote was 159,292. If the redistribution of the province had been arranged in order to give fair play to both political parties there, instead of having eleven members for the Conservative party in 1904 and in 1908, the Conservative party would have had twenty-seven members and the Liberal party would have had thirty-eight. In 1908 the Conservative party would have had twenty-nine members and the Liberal party thirty-six, and in 1911 the Conservative party would have had thirty-two members and the Liberal party thirty-three.

Mr. PROULX: What about the Nationalists in 1911?

An hon. MEMBER: Where is Bourassa?

Mr. PELLETIER: We will come to Bourassa by and by, but we will stick to this for a moment. I am not going to be taken away from my subject because somebody may speak of Bourassa. I am making a point and I think it is fair that I should be allowed to continue it.

Mr. PROULX: But you forget one party in 1911; there were three parties in 1911.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think I have forgotten more than the hon. gentleman ever knew. If you take the vote of 1904 and add up the Liberal vote with the Conservative vote it will give you 257,060. Then, if you divide that by the number of counties —sixty-five—you have a unit of 3,955, and as a result, if you take that unit and multiply it by the number of members which we should have had you have the test. To-day, in the province of Quebec, the counties are arranged in such a way that where we should legitimately have had twenty-seven members we had eleven, and where we should have had twenty-nine we had twelve.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the hon. gentleman the figures for Ontario?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have not, but I have looked for my own province because we have felt the pinch in Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have felt the other pinch in Ontario.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not know how well-founded may be the complaint of the hon. member, but at all events, if there is a bad case in Ontario that does not help to cure our bad case in Quebec. In view of these facts, I ask: Is it fair that one of the political parties in the province of Quebec should only have one-third of the representation it is legitimately entitled to? I may say, and I think I can speak for the whole Government, that we do not want to and do not intend to place such a Redistribution Bill before this House as will deserve to be called a gerrymander, but, on the other hand, our desire is to have a fair redistribution measure which will do justice to all parties. The facts I have given have been known for years in the province of Quebec and I am sure that both political parties will agree that the existing state of things should not continue. There may be complaints in regard to Ontario, as the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says, but when you remember that out of 73 members from that province, 60 were elected to support the Government, there cannot be much necessity for a gerrymander in face of such clear proof of the political sentiment of the whole province.

I join issue with my hon. friend from Rouville in his remarks with reference to transportation. He stated that under the Liberal Administration the crops of the western farmers were removed promptly to market, but I can tell him that one of the very first things the Conservative Government had to do when it assumed power in 1911 was to attempt to remove the congestion in freight traffic for which the Liberal Government was responsible. There were millions of bushels of wheat on the prairies which could not be moved to the head of navigation, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) devoted much time and care and attention to remedy the evil conditions which we inherited from the preceding Government. Then in 1912, the hon. gentleman, with his well known ability to take care of such problems, succeeded in having the transportation of produce from the West handled with such promptness as to elicit the commendation of every member of the community. With reference to the question of unemployment in the country, I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to desire to make as much political capital out of the existing situation as they can. It is unfortunate for the country that this should be made a political question, and that instead of all joining hands to provide a proper remedy, men of standing in the House of Commons, should on the public platform, seem to take delight in telling the people of the world that we have 100,000 unemployed in Canada. With all due respect, I say that such a statement has not a particle of truth to support it. When this assertion was first made, a newspaper in Montreal took the trouble to get into telegraphic communication with all the important centres in Canada, with the result that the total unemployed in the whole Dominion was found to be 17,000 or 18,000 instead of 100,000. We all know that the unemployment is not due to any question of tariff or of free food or anything like that; we know that 5,000 men were laid off by the Canadian Northern Railway Company when its line was completed between Sudbury and Port Arthur. We know that when the work on the Canadian Pacific railway between Toronto and Ottawa was completed a large number of men were laid off; and we know that when certain construction was finished on the Canadian Northern between Toronto and Ontario and on the Transcontinental as well, men were thrown out of employment. But that is an ordinary and natural condition, and it is not a thing out of which any party should seek to make political capital.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the hon. gentleman the number of unemployed from any government source?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, but we have in this Montreal newspaper the statement of the mayors of cities and of the presidents of boards of trade throughout Canada, and I should think they know much more about that matter than we do. I accept their word as representing the true facts. Then, the hon. member for Rouville has referred to the number of unemployed in the city of Quebec, and he has stated that if the Government works were not going on there, there would be a great many people without work. In the first place, I direct the attention of the House to the fact that if we have succeeded to a certain extent in affording employment on Government works in Quebec to so many people during this rigorous winter, that would not have happened under the late Government by whom Quebec was entirely ignored. I regretted to hear the hon. member speak of people being out of work in Quebec on account of what he called a lockout in the shoe trade. Surely the hon. gentleman must see that it is absolutely unfair to accuse the Government for what has occurred in that respect. There is an unfortunate condition in the shoe trade in Quebec, a condition which every citizen of Quebec and every Canadian regrets. There are about 3,000 men and 3,000 girls employed in the shoe factories out of employment, and that is a matter of deep regret to me as it is to every true Quebecker, and as it should be to every true Canadian.

But when we come to examine the reason for that, it seems unfair and unjust to bring before the House this fact as one showing a lack of good administration on the part of the Government. The unemployed shoemakers in Quebec are not idle, the factories are not closed, because of political conditions. Every one knows that a serious conflict has been going on for years in Quebec between the shoe manufacturers and their workmen. There has been strike after strike, and it has now come to a point where one of the contending parties has resolved that this matter shall end, and forever. The men quit work because one of their number was dismissed, or because his job was taken away from him and given to somebody else. The men left the factories in a body. Later they desired to come back, but when they did so the manufacturers told them: We have had so much trouble in the past that we are determined to settle this question here and now. If you want to resume your positions in our factories, you must sign an agreement binding yourselves to obey the rules and the bylaws which are established for the proper working of the factories. One and all the men refused to sign that agreement and went home.

I am not entering into any controversy as to who is right or who is wrong in this matter. In this case, as in many other cases, they might try to come to terms. It is out of my province, however, to discuss that phase of the question; but I say that these men are not out of work in Quebec because they are forced out of it by political or any other conditions, except that they are at war with their employers, and they want to win that fight for their union, whereas on the other hand the manufacturers want to win the fight for their union. These are the facts, and I hope and trust that the hon. member for Rouville will not have it spread broadcast throughout this country that this local trouble between manufacturers and workmen is one attributable to the way in which Canada is governed at the present moment.

Mr. BELAND: How many men are out of employment now?

Mr. PELLETIER: Between 2,500 and 3,000 in the shoe trade alone.

Mr. BELAND: How many factories are closed?

Mr. PELLETIER: Fifteen to seventeen.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Can the hon. minister explain why the manager of the Intercolonial railway at Rivière du Loup, some days ago, dismissed 23 employees in the winter time without even a day's notice?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am sure my hon. friend will admit that it is hardly fair to ask a Postmaster General what has been done in the Department of Railways a few days ago, without giving any notice of his question.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You are the minister of the district. You must know what is going on there.

Mr. PELLETIER: If my hon. friend will give the usual notice of his question, it will be answered.

The hon. member for Rouville referred to the dispute in connection with the United Shoe Company. He went so far as to say that the United Shoe Company was a combine; that it had been declared a combine by a board of arbitration, and that because these people had friends in the Government, had friends at court, nothing had been done in the matter. This is a most unfair statement of the case. I do not intend to enter into the particulars. At a later period my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) will do so. Suffice it for the moment to say that there is not one tittle of foundation or evidence for the statements made by the hon. member for Rouville in that respect. A board was appointed and found that the United Shoe Company was a combine, and that company was given six months in order to change the conditions of the leases which they had with the shoe manufacturers. The law says that, when a sentence has been passed by the board, if the manufacturers continue so to operate, they are liable to have an indictment brought against them before the court. The hon. member for Rouville said to us yesterday: How is it that these men are not paying a penalty of $1,000 a day? I desire to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the United Shoe Company, after the board's decision, as a matter of fact changed the conditions of their leases; and that when the leases were changed they either obeyed the order of the board or disobeyed it. If they have disobeyed the order of the board, that is a matter for further adjustment and adjudication; but, as a matter of fact, the leases were changed within the time allowed by the board. Consequently, I think the hon. member for Rouville will have to withdraw his statement that the United Shoe Company were not condemned to pay $1,000 damage a day because they had friends in the Government and friends at court.

The hon. member for Rouville said: True enough, we had bad times and unemployment in 1907-8, but we then did a great thing; the Minister of Finance of that time, seeing the bad times, came before Parliament and made a big cut in the Estimates of the current year. My hon.

friend believes that to be the act of a big man. I do not. If, without impairing the credit of the country, in view of the good administration of the affairs of the country at a time when there is tight money, at a time when there is uneasiness in business, you can see your way, not to cut down public expenditure, but to leave it as it is, so as to give money to the people and to give employment to the people, I think you are a bigger man than if you cut down public expenditure.

We have been told by the hon. member for Rouville that he had heard the hon. Minister of Finance, one of the noble eighteen, say that he was not going to do the same thing as his predecessor had done in that respect. Whether the hon. Minister of Finance is one of the noble eighteen or not, I am prepared to say that we feel pretty safe under his direction and management of the finances of this country. I think the hon. Minister of Finance has been a safe pilot. He has been able, with his big mind and farsightedness, to tell us all that is happening now; and when he tells us that at the present moment we are practically out of our difficulties, I for one trust him and think he will be right for the next few months as he was when he foretold us what is happening to-day.

We have been told by the hon. member for Rouville that we are not taking care of the port of Montreal as we should do. If my hon. friend will look at the statutes of last session and the statutes of the year before, he will find there that we have given the Harbour Board of Montreal everything they asked for, and that the money has been spent under the direction and control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in a most proper and efficient manner. Now, I am from Quebec, but I make the humble claim that I am not a small Quebecer. Montreal is the metropolis of Canada. As such, her port and her facilities should be improved; and, moreover, they are being improved, with public money if you like, but money that is advanced by the Government and on which they pay interest, and pay that interest faithfully and well. We heard the right hon. leader of the Opposition say at a meeting—I think it was in Joliette—that the city of Montreal had not been properly treated so far as its connection with the Transcontinental railway was concerned. This argument has not been repeated in this House, and I have not heard from any representative of Montreal any complaint in that respect. Every one knows that the Transcontinental railway was begun in 1903 or 1904, and in the ten years since that time there has been no connection to link the commercial metropolis of Canada with the Transcontinental railway. Apparently the city of Montreal, at least a great part of the city of Montreal, thought that no reproaches should be made to the late Government on that subject, for if you will look at the election returns you will find that the majority of seats in the city of Montreal were carried by our friends of the Liberal party. Now, I wish to say here—because I have read something in the newspapers which calls for the remark from me—that if this Government and the commercial metropolis of Canada think that metropolis ought to have some connection with the Transcontinental, I for one will not stand in the way, but will cordially approve of anything that can be done in that respect, not as a Quebecer, but as a Canadian who desires to further the interests of Canada at large.

Now, Sir, about what my hon. friend said for the port of Quebec. Whilst I say let us do what is right for the port of Montreal, I say, at the same time, Providence has given us in Quebec one of the finest ports to be found in the world. But this port has not been equipped so far. Though the city of Quebec has been represented for years by members of the Liberal party in this House, there is not to-day—there was not before we came into power—accommodation of berths for more than three ships in the great port of Quebec. I have asked my colleagues, the members of this progressive Government, to have both ports equipped. There is no reason for rivalry or jealousy on the part of either Montreal or Quebec; for, if we are not disappointed in the clause which the late Government put in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway contract, and which may be interpreted to mean that the Grand Trunk Pacific may carry our trade to the United States—I say if that clause does not have that bad effect, there will be enough to make trade for the two great ports of the St. Lawrence during the summer navigation. And I hope that when these ports are equipped as they ought to be, we shall be able to attain the result we have in view and have it as the policy of all Canadians, Conservatives and Liberals alike, to have our trade carried to Canadian ports in Canadian bottoms and handled by Canadian labour.

Mr. BELAND: Will the Minister kindly state how many more ships will find accommodation after the works in Quebec are completed?

Mr. PELLETIER: At least seven or eight as against three for the last twenty years.

Mr. BELAND: Did any company complain of lack of accommodation under the late Government?

Mr. PELLETIER: When we came into power one of the first things I was asked was to try and have some accommodation in Quebec, because as was said by those who dealt with the matter, our company would like to send our ships there, but we cannot find any berths or accommodation.

Mr. BELAND: What company was that?

Mr. PELLETIER: I would not like to give names; but the hon. gentleman will learn these names when the accommodation is created. And as he is a good Quebecer, when he sees the ships there he will know their names.

I would like to say a few words in passing about the Georgian Bay canal. Our friends on the other side have begun all of a sudden to be very strong on the Georgian Bay canal, they are enthusiastic about the Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Bullish.

Mr. PELLETIER: They were rather bearish when in power, but now they are not bears but have become bulls. The hon. member for Rouville told us that the Georgian Bay canal was not started at once because, forsooth, the southern part of Ontario was opposed to the wishes of the northern part of Ontario, and also to the wishes of part of the province of Quebec in this respect. Well, Sir, this should not stand in the way. If this work is a good work, one which is in the general interest of Canada, the fact that one section of the country would not like it would not stop this Government from completing it. The question whether this is a work in the general interest of Canada is the only one that would be considered. Sir, this is a work of great magnitude. We are told by men who know something about it that this enterprise, which has been looked into from an engineering point of view, ought to be looked into now from a commercial and a financial point of view before we embark upon any such large expenditure. Some people say that in a commercial and business way the canal cannot be made a success; others say it will be a success. Under the circumstances, the Government have come to the conclusion to adopt the only logical and practical course that it could adopt, and that is to have this question carefully looked into and a report made by thoroughly qualified men.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are so many commissions already.

Mr. PELLETIER: But I can tell the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the men whom we have in mind for appointment to that commission are men who will act for Canada and without salary in that respect. Their only object will be to help this Government in coming to a wise conclusion on this subject. I cannot give names now, but I think it is but a matter of days before we shall be able to tell the House the personnel of that commission.

It may be taken for granted that the people of the West—the people of Winnipeg, for instance, because Winnipeg is the great distributing centre of western Canada—should have some interest in this matter, and that this portion of the country, as well as Montreal and other important Canadian centres, will be represented on that commission. At all events, the Government, as the hon. Minister of Public Works has said, have been looking into the matter, and will try to find the best men, being guided by whatever will be in the best interests of Canada at large.

The hon. member for Rouville has said that certain things which took place in the county of Chateauguay were very bad. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, during the Debate on the Address, I think, said that the county of Chateauguay had been robbed from hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think that we should accept with a great deal of anxiety the declaration made by my right hon. friend in this respect. Last year, during the debate on the Address, reference was made to another election robbery, and it was a matter of such public shame that the right hon. leader of the Opposition thought fit to move an amendment to the Address, which read as follows:

> We beg to represent to Your Royal Highness that in the elections of Macdonald and Richelieu there were practices calculated to terrorize and corrupt the electorate, which were connived at by your ministers and which deserve the censure of the House.

Now, some things have happened since then. When the trial took place, what became of the awful charges made in connection with the election in Macdonald? In that election, as in the Richelieu election of 1911, the sitting member admitted that certain errors had been made by some of his friends, the election was annulled, and that was all. Where was the terrorizing? Where was the proof of the operations of election thugs and of the other alleged irregularities in connection with the Macdonald election? No proofs came to light. The election was annulled without any scandal, and the same good man was re-elected by a majority of over nine hundred, his majority at the preceding election having been seven hundred and fifty. If the robbery which hon. gentlemen allege to have taken place in Chateauguay is of the same nature, I am sure my right hon. friend will be compelled to acknowledge that in his motion last year he went too far; that he made certain accusations against members of the Government without having the facts before him, and that he failed to substantiate them. I fully realize that the result of the Chateauguay election was not very agreeable to our friends on the other side of the House.

Mr. LANCTOT: What about South Bruce?

Mr. PELLETIER: I will come to South Bruce in a moment. When my right hon. friend told us that he had been robbed, I said to myself: Evidently some awful things have taken place in the constituency of Chateauguay. It may be that stuffed ballot boxes had been used, as they have been used in the past under a Government which was not a Conservative Government. When I heard this loud complaint, I could not help remembering Hastings, Brockville, West Huron and the Minnie M. But when the facts in connection with this matter are brought out in the courts, I am afraid that my right hon. friend will be somewhat disappointed, and that the persons against whom proof of irregularities is offered will not be those to whom my right hon. friend referred the other day.

We are told that a pamphlet was distributed in Chateauguay county, and that in that pamphlet the people of the constituency were told that another judge, Mr. Audette, a French-Canadian, had been appointed to the Exchequer Court. That was true; what harm do hon. gentlemen find in that? Does the hon. member for Rouville criticise that appointment? He does not, and will not. Since this Government came into power, Liberal speakers and the Liberal press day after day have said: 'What is the Borden Government going to do for the province of Quebec?' When we had the great leader of the Opposition as our Prime Minister, the province of Quebec was all right, but now with these awful men, Borden and Rogers, in power, what is going to become of our poor province? The newspapers throughout the province of Quebec have been saying: Just look at that; we had a Minister of Public Works from Quebec, but now the present minister is not a French-Canadian; our compatriots and their rights have been trampled upon. What do hon. gentlemen see in that circular which was read by the hon. member for Rouville yesterday? They see a copy of the Estimates voted by Parliament, showing that the province of Quebec received a fair appropriation of public money. Was it a crime to place this before the people of Chateauguay? If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had never committed any greater political crime than this, we should have little complaint to make. It has been said also that we told the people of Chateauguay that the Prime Minister of this country was a friend of all races and nationalities. Is that not true? Has not the Prime Minister of this country risen mightily in the estimation of the people of Canada? Has he not made good? Having been in power only two years, is his name not written in golden letters in the history of this country? Has he not endeared himself to every Canadian? Yes, Sir, he has, and we have the right to say so to the English-speaking as well as to the French-speaking people of this country. This is the crime we have committed in Chateauguay—that of telling the truth.

One of my friends on the other side asked me to speak of South Bruce; let me see what kind of literature was circulated in that constituency and what kind of appeals were made to the electors. Some were funny; some were anti-Canadian, and some, as usual, appealed to the prejudices of race and religion.

You will permit me to read the funny part in the first place. The hon. gentleman who now sits as member for South Bruce (Mr. Truax) made a speech during that election at Pinkerton, and a shorthand reporter was sent down to take notes of what he said. I shall not quote his speech at length, but shall content myself by placing a few sentences before the House. This is the way the campaign started:

I went down to a German wedding in Carrick and enjoyed myself. A few days after I was told I was drunk, I had a girl sitting on my knee. Well, you know, I am fond of females all right at any time, but for the last ten years I have not enjoyed their company as I used to.

This was on the public platform. (Reading):

I played cards and such as that and had a dance, and as long as I like I will do so.

I think every one will admit that this was not quite enough to elect the hon. gentleman, and so something else had to be found. My hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Truax) was complaining that Conservatives were going in great numbers into the constituency and that he was fighting them alone, single-handed; but we read in another column of the paper reporting his speech that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), and many others of the stalwarts of the other side were advertised to speak at different meetings in the county, and then my hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Truax) took some courage and thought he would leave the question of the dance and the girls alone and would speak on other subjects. What do we see? Let me read to you here a circular which was distributed all over the county of Bruce and find what the hon. member himself did as a candidate in a Canadian constituency and a part of the British Empire:

Walkerton, Oct. 13, 1913.

Dear Sir,—Accompanying this letter you will find an exact copy, in part, of a speech delivered in Vancouver on August 17, 1912, by the Hon. Sam. Hughes, Minister of Militia and Defence in the Borden Government. Premier Borden has never repudiated that speech or any part of it, so we must conclude that the Hon. Mr. Hughes spoke that way on behalf of the whole Borden Government. Read the speech carefully.

The report is taken from the Globe, of course, and was annexed to that circular.

Read the speech carefully; note particularly the parts in larger type referring to Germany and also remember that shortly after this speech was made the Borden Government tried to force a vote of $35,000,000 through Parliament to send to England. The Hon. Mr. Hughes said the peril is very direct and Germany must be taught a lesson. Was this vote of $35,000,000 for the purpose of teaching Germany a lesson?

That is a question put by the hon. member.

Mr. Cargill is the candidate of the Borden Government, and therefore a supporter of this naval policy. If you think the Fatherland—

That is Germany—

—is a peril to Canada that must be taught a lesson, vote for Cargill; if, however, you would prefer to continue the present cordial relations existing between the Fatherland and Canada and to have a national and industrial peace and tranquility and the spending of Canadian money in Canada, give me your vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is only one member who applauds; I am surprised that the whole bunch do not. It is a direct appeal to the German vote as against helping our own mother country. The hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Truax) had not invented that process and he had no right to have it patented; it was started long before he was elected in South Bruce. We all know that this kind of appeal was started in the election of 1911 by no less a person than the Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, a member of the late Administration, when he ran in Waterloo.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) went into that county of South Bruce and repeated this same appeal. I want to read to this House not only what a member of the late Government said on the platform—he was defeated, and properly defeated—but I want to let this House and this country know that another member of the late Government who has a seat in this House went to South Bruce and repeated the same appeal. The Mildmay Gazette gives a report of what took place at a meeting at Walkerton, and there we find that the Hon. Chas. Murphy was one of the speakers. And what did he say on this point?

His strongest contention on the naval issue was that the Borden policy was a direct insult to Germany and therefore a check to the peace conditions between that country and Great Britain which we are all so anxious to maintain.

Now, Sir, have we come to this in this country that because, forsooth, Canada is trying in a friendly way—a way which may be disapproved of by political opponents, but at all events it must be granted that this measure which was brought before Parliament last year was one which the majority in this House and I venture to say the majority of the people of this country approved of—to help the mother country, we have members of this House and would-be members of this House, candidates, who will go before the people of this country and tell them that this measure is one which will have the effect of destroying the rights, as the circular calls it, of the fatherland? We have had appeals in this country on sectional lines, and I thought they had gone to the bottom; but evidently they have not reached the bottom yet when we find that for political ends, to attain a political object, they will stir up the German people of this country in a certain direction in order to win a by-election in this country of ours. Well, Sir, we have come to that. And we hear the hon. member complaining because we have told the truth to the electors of Chateauguay about certain facts, and there he is, with his friends, convicted to-day of taking on the public platform a stand which I do not hesitate to say any true Canadian ought not to approve, and, if it was Parliamentary, I would say any true Canadian ought to be ashamed of.

But that is not all. We have heard a good deal about this victory in South Bruce, but let me tell you that in that fight our friends thought fit to appeal to the German voters. In presenting that Bill to the House this Government had absolutely no intention of hurting the feelings of the German people who live in Canada. We thought we had a duty to perform towards the mother country, and I do hope that the German people of this country, though they were led astray by this appeal in the last by-election, will understand that whilst in Canada we form part of the great British Empire, at the same time we have for the German people the respect which that great nation is entitled to, and that our action was not in the direction of offering any insult to them but was simply a manifestation of our desire to do our duty to the great empire of which we form a part. Germans have been coming into this country, and they are coming all the time. I know a part of our western country right now where over 12,000 acres are being colonized and broken by people coming from Germany. I say, as one of the members of this Government: Welcome to these good people; let them come here, make homes for themselves and become citizens. If the French-Canadian people in my province and other parts of Canada have played a not inconsiderable part in bringing about the entente cordiale, the understanding between England and France, I hope that the German people in this country may be numerous enough at a given moment to exert such an influence as not only to prevent strife, but to do their utmost in order to bring about lasting peace between England and Germany.

But that is not all. Appeals to prejudices were made in South Bruce. We know that there are a great number of Irish Roman Catholics in South Bruce. The hon. the member for Russell (Hon. Charles Murphy) went to South Bruce and told the Irish Catholics that there was no reciprocity in the last election, but that the election was carried by the Conservative party on the Ne Temere question.

Mr. CARVELL: So say we all.

Mr. PELLETIER: Ah, these gentlemen will never acknowledge their defeat. Then we had this good Irish Roman Catholic, the hon. member for Russell, going to his co-religionists in South Bruce and telling them that the Conservative party had promised to bring in a Bill to render the marriage law uniform in this country. Who has made that promise? He says these things for what purpose and with what object? These are the facts. They sent broadcast a certain newspaper published in the city of Toronto, in which there happened to be printed an attack on the Roman Catholics, and they said: This is a Conservative paper, look at the awful headlines which are here directed against the Roman Catholics! That was sent not amongst the English Protestants, but it was sent amongst the Irish Catholics. I think this is striking below the belt. Both elections might well be compared, and if they are I think all the advantages of the comparison will be on one side.

Now, I would like to ask: What has become of free food? This was a fine baby which was born in Hamilton and came into this world amidst a big blare of trumpets. The gentlemen who offered that baby to the public made me think of the great Napoleon when a son was born to him; he showed it to all Europe and said: This is my son. This thing took place at Hamilton. The next time we heard of the baby was in Montreal at the Fielding banquet. Half of the poor, little tiny thing had become impaired to such an extent that it was practically out of sight, and the hopes for its full recovery were not strong. As a matter of fact, Sir, the baby died during the trip from Montreal to Ottawa. The right hon. leader of the Opposition forgot to throw a few well-deserved flowers, when he spoke on the debate, on the premature little corpse. He did not even refer to it. That was most unkind. It might have been made the subject-matter of an amendment to the Address, after the great flourish of trumpets with which this free food baby was introduced to our notice. If it was not a catch-word, if it was a serious policy, we had a right to expect that it would be embodied in an amendment to the Address. But none of that; it was buried somewhere in a snow-bank.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who believes in miracles, tried to galvanize the little corpse last night, but he said he was only speaking for himself and that he was not committing anybody else to his views. I am sure of that, but then he still believes in it. The hon. member for Rouville has an abundant faith. Even if the father of the newly-born policy has discarded it, the hon. member for Rouville, who was so enthusiastic when he saw the baby come into this world, still thought that there was something in it. But surely the hon. member for Rouville ought to have consulted his friends, because the people in the province of Quebec will now say: Look at the hon. member for Rouville; he believes in free food. I should think that it would be better for my hon. friend to put himself in accord with his leader in that respect, and if we do not hear of free food now from the right hon. leader of the Opposition perhaps the hon. member for Rouville may drop it also. At all events, that is only a suggestion, and I have no doubt it will be taken into my hon. friend's serious consideration.

Now, I just want to say this one word further: Free food means a reduction in the price of produce paid to the farmer. If you want to have free food you may go and tell them that in the cities, but I would invite you to say so before the producers, the farmers of this country. That is where the test comes; that is why the child did not live. My right hon. friend found that the baby had horns. a most unusual thing for a child. And then he dropped it like a hot potato. My hon. friend did well; he saw there was no use humbugging the people by telling the consumers in the cities that reciprocity would lessen the prices of the articles they consume, and at the same time telling the farmers in the country that they would get a higher price for their produce. That story lasted until the evening of the 21st of September at five o'clock and then it burst. I wonder why hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to revive it now. I represent a farming community and on behalf of the farmers in my county who till the soil, I say that they have just as good right to be protected in their industry as have the manufacturer and the artisan. If gentlemen opposite are going to reduce the cost of living to the consumers in the cities, will they please tell me how they can do that without redu ing the prices at which the farmer sells his products, leaving aside for the moment the question of the middleman. We were told last night by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), that our country was being drained by the people of the United States who came here to buy all our farm products; but if the people of the United States come to Canada to buy farm products and pay the freight on them to get them to their country, is not that proof that the price of these articles is higher in the United States than it is in Canada. Who can gainsay that principle? In the back townships of the province of Quebec for the last 15 years the farmers have been told when they had a fine crop of potatoes or anything else, that it was all done by Laurier, and the right hon. gentleman did not deny it very much; he simply suggested he was in partnership with Providence. The great trouble in this country is that our farmers' sons are leaving the farms for the cities, and, are they now going to be told that they must sell their farm products at a lower price than hitherto, thus encouraging them further to leave their occupation as tillers of the soil. For my part, I do not believe that to be sound doctrine. Of course, we all understand that this idea was thrown out as a 'ballon d essai,' to see how it would catch on with the people, but our friends opposite realize now that it would not float, and so they are looking for some other cry. Just imagine the incongruity of what we recently saw when we had our hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), a good protectionist to a certain extent, making a joint tour in his county with my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who is the apostle of free trade. That joint tour was a good sample of the contrast there is between the diverse policies enunciated by members of the Opposition in this House.

On the question of the navy, I shall not speak at great length, nor do I think it necessary to do so at the present time. I was much impressed by the statement made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in this House a short time ago, to the effect that what was going on now with regard to the navy was inspired in the interest of the armour plate makers of the world, meaning, of course, that the Conservative party was acting in the interest of the armour trust. But I would like to point out with some emphasis, that the right hon. gentleman, when he spoke in Chateauguay and elsewhere, and complained so much of our naval policy, forgot to repeat the speech he made in this House last year, setting forth his naval policy. I went to Ormstown in the county of Chateauguay and before I spoke I was told by some respectable electors that the Conservatives had a very bad naval policy and they desired me to explain it. I asked them if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had told them about his policy and the answer was, as the fact is, that he did not speak very much about it. Well, perhaps that is one of the things, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, as to which the past should bury its dead. But I would point out to the people of Canada that if there are any in this country who can be accused of a desire to help the armour plate trust, it is surely the men who want to build two fleet units, and not the men who want to build simply three ships. I want my right hon. friend to think over that situation, and to tell the people of Canada, as the fact really is, that the men who would give most work to the armour platers are the men who want to build the biggest navy. With these few considerations as to the navy I shall pass on.

The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has ceased to be a protectionist, and he seems to be very much concerned about the duty on agricultural implements, but it comes with very bad grace from him and his friends to talk about what reciprocity would have done for the farmer in the matter of agricultural implements, when we all know, as a matter of fact, that reciprocity did not purport to do very much in that respect. The hon. gentleman from Rouville has a way of his own in grappling with the tariff question, and in order to explain his attitude I shall quote these words from his speech of last night:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when protection is concerned, you can always make an argument when you wish to fasten and tighten around the neck of the farmer the collar of serfdom.

These are big words. Later he said:

> It is useless to mince matters. It is just as well to speak plainly and honestly to the privileged classes who since 1879 have been enjoying their privileges.

Now, what does that language mean? Here we have the hon. member for Rouville stating that since 1879 the collar of serfdom has been around the necks of the farmers, and that privileged classes have been protected during these many years. But the hon. gentleman was 15 years in power, and he is to-day the self-confessed perpetrator for 15 years of this crime, if crime there is. That is the sort of argument we have from hon. gentlemen opposite about protection. They pretend to say now that protection is a bad thing, but they know right well that they would not have attained power in 1896, and they would not have retained power for a year, if they had touched the principle of protection, which is a sacred principle in this country. And how did they get to power? As was pointed out by the right hon. Prime Minister the other day, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was denouncing protection as bondage and slavery in Winnipeg, when at the same time he was writing a letter to Mr. Bertram, a manufacturer, in which he pronounced himself a protectionist. Is that the way to deal with a great question in a country such as Canada? I do not think it is. I do not think so. When the hon. members of the late Government adopted protection, they continued the system of protection, not because they liked it, but because, that great broad-minded man who inaugurated protection in this country in 1879 forced them, even from his grave, to follow that policy themselves.

After the elections of 1908, I heard a remark made which I thought was a very apt one. A good old Conservative was putting the question: 'Well, we have been defeated again; do you expect that we shall ever get back into power?' A man who heard him ask this question said: "Now, boy, you wait and you will see this Government fall to pieces when Canada is in danger.' That man was a prophet. When the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) departed from protectionist principles, which had been adopted in this country, and tried to fasten on this country the reciprocity pact, Canada was in danger, and then occurred the predicted fall.

If we are to judge by the hon. member for Rouville, our good friends have now evidently become free traders—free traders in opposition, protectionists in power! They dance the tango free trade when in opposition and the turkey-trot protection when in power. We do not believe in doing that. We have been protectionists in opposition and we are protectionists in power, because we want this country to have a stable fiscal and financial policy, so that the people may know where they are and where they stand with the Government of their own country.

5 p.m. We have been asked what we intend to do in order to solve the temporary difficulties which exist in this country. I have taken up too much of the time of the House already, but I will discuss the matter very briefly. We have appointed a commission which is looking into the matter. In this respect we are not very far from one of the propositions laid down by the right hon. gentleman himself when he said in Montreal that his free food policy, which was born in Hamilton, had to be taken care of in some other way, and that if he had been in power he would have appointed three of his ministers to traverse the country as a commission to look into the matter. Well, we have appointed a commission. So far it is not so bad; but while the commissioners are working on this, we believe that the great evil in this country is that, in the past, agriculture has not been taken care of as it ought to have been. The other day I heard one of the members of this House make a very apt remark. He said that before this Government was in power, the people of this country were not very sure whether they had a Minister of Agriculture or not. Our friend and colleague (Mr. Burrell), with the consent of the Government, has started a new policy of educational instruction for the farmers, and this will go far towards relieving present conditions.

There is another thing that this Government has done. Our policy as to highways would also have been of great service to the farmers of this country. Of course, we know what has happened. I shall not discuss that at any length. Another thing we have done, is to give a post office to every farmer at his door; that is, to make rural mail delivery which was only under contemplation when we took office, an accomplished fact.

There is one thing more which, if it is properly understood, will accomplish a great deal towards bringing the consumer and the farmer together; that is, parcel post. I am glad to say that parcel post will be an accomplished fact in Canada on the 10th of February next. We have been working at it in the department for months. We have the problem pretty well in hand now, and whilst we are working so hard in order to give to the public this boon which I think will bring together the consumer and the farmer. I hope in a couple of days, if not to-morrow, to lay before this House the regulations which have been adopted, and which will be distributed in order to inaugurate that policy. I think this is one of the things which should have been acknowledged on the other side of the House as one of the means which this Government is taking to meet present conditions. This Government has been thinking of the people, of doing something for the people. This is one of the things to which we have devoted a great deal of time and attention, and I think we owe it to our people as a mark of gratitude for the token of confidence which they gave to us on the 21st of September, 1911.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton N.): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the House has listened with a great deal of attention to the address of the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). The conditions of the country to-day from the Atlantic to the Pacific are such that the people, not only in this House but outside of it, will listen with interest to any speeches made by any members of the Government. I am sorry to say that, so far as any remedy or any hope of a remedy for the distressing conditions which exist in the country to-day is concerned, we have listened in vain to the hon. member of the Government who has addressed this House this afternoon.

His manner of dealing with big questions reminds me of the story of a doctor who was called in to treat a man who had pneumonia. The extraordinary course was taken by the doctor of throwing this man into a tub of freezing water, and when friends of the patient asked him in alarm: 'What do you mean by throwing that man into a tub of cold water?' the doctor said: 'Well, I understand it is pneumonia that he has got; I do not know how to treat pneumonia, but after he is thrown into the tub he will take fits, and I am a devil on fits.' It seems that the only position in which the hon. Postmaster General excels is in dismissals, and he will get away as quickly as possible from discussing public questions in order to get back to his den and his dismissals. The hon. Minister touched lightly on the question of dismissals. No doubt he had a right to touch lightly on that subject, and to pass away from it as quickly as possible. I understand that a return was brought down yesterday, which has not yet reached the members, in which the department of the hon. Minister is given credit for having, within the last two years, aye, in less than two years, dismissed 650 postmasters and 450 other employees of his department. That, Sir, is the record of the department which is presided over by the hon. gentleman who just addressed you. And, while he has no money for the payment of postmasters, while he has no money to increase the salaries of postmasters, as he has been promising for the last two years, it appears from this return, or from one that is closely connected with it, that between the 10th of October, 1911, and the 26th day of May, 1913, he found money enough to spend on his beheadings, $18,268.46. That, Sir, is the laudable course taken by this exponent of Government policy who addressed us this afternoon. And, so far as actualities are concerned, nothing else has been done in that department that tends in the slightest degree to the advancement of the general condition of the people of this country. We are told that the course taken by the late Government led to the course taken by the Government of which the hon. Postmaster General is a distinguished member. I submit that the resolution which he quoted this afternoon is no basis at all for that course, and, properly construed, never was intended to cover the dismissal of such officials as have been dismissed since this Government came into power. I submit that that resolution, the Lake resolution, so called, properly construed, could not justify one-tenth of the eleven hundred dismissals which have been made by the Postmaster General. That resolution, moved by Mr. Lake, who was then a member of the House, was explained in a speech made by the mover at the time. He complained of the fact that officers of the Government in the northwest who were paid high salaries and who ought to give all their time and attention to Government business, were giving their time and attention in fact to political matters, and this, he said, ought to be stopped. To that line of action the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave consent, they agreed that men of this class, men paid high salaries, should devote their whole time to the business for which they were paid and not to politics. But does the Postmaster General say that he has confined himself to the class of people referred to in that resolution? He has gone further with his axeman business and his beheadings than any other minister in this country has ever gone before. It has never been known before in this country that mail contractors, poor, honest men, who have put in tenders for carrying the mail and have honestly obtained their contracts, and, obtaining their contracts, have spent their money to provide vehicles and other equipment for the purpose of carrying those contracts into effect, have been beheaded, their contracts cancelled and given to others. That is a line of action for which the Postmaster General can find no precedent in this country, or any other country in the world. That is the charge I lay at his door a charge which he cannot and will not answer, so far as I can see, and which, certainly, he cannot deny.

He passed on from talking about dismissals and talked very glibly and very fluently indeed about these wonderful election scandals that he seeks to bring before this country. He passed very lightly over Chateauguay and came to the county of Bruce. He read some nice descriptions of certain convivial meetings which, he said, the hon. member who represents South Bruce (Mr. Truax) had attended in certain parts of that county. We are not aware whether the Postmaster General has any tendency or any regard for these convivialities with the fair sex—we have no evidence of it so far as the census of this country is concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, we, in this country, are now confronted with great questions, with questions involving the interests of the hundreds and thousands of men out of employment, as admitted by the hon. gentleman himself. I submit that that all-important matter was treated altogether too lightly by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed us, and from whom we had a right to expect a statement of some line of policy to be inaugurated by the Government of which he is a member. He spoke flippantly, as I said before, of the free food question. Will the hon. gentleman say that the farmers of this country are down to the point where 60 cents a dozen is the best they can do in eggs, 40 cents a lb. the best that they can do in butter, 25 cents or 30 cents a lb. the best that they can do in beef? Does the hon. gentleman say, or does this Government say, that we must not touch this holy structure which he calls Protection, and that no remedy whatever is to be afforded for the people? The theory of protection has always been that local competition would prevent high prices. I ask the Government if they stand now by that theory and determine to afford the people no remedy notwithstanding such prices as those I have just quoted. I submit that when it comes to prices of that kind the evidence is overwhelming that competition is not there; and I submit that if we can bring in supplies from outside it is the duty of this Government, it is the duty of whatever party is in power, to apply that remedy. I feel sure that those people in this country who are not able to furnish sufficient food for their children and for the proper maintenance of their families are looking for a remedy, and it is not encouraging for them to listen to the speech of the Postmaster General who, we have a right to believe, represents the Government, and who tells us that this sacred structure of Protection must not be touched, that wherever the remedy may come from, it is not to come through any change of this structure. We listened a few days ago to a speech from the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). He rather hinted that the revision of the tariff would come, that something would be done in the interests of the people who to-day are paying too high prices by reason of protection, and that he would be a party to doing something for the alleviation of the condition of the people. But if the speech of the Postmaster General is to be taken as an indication of what hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do, the Solicitor General has not very much to hope for, so far as any action on the part of the Government is concerned.

Passing on from the food question, the Postmaster General told us that he would not dwell at any length upon the matter of the navy. He was pleased to talk about dead bodies and dead babies, and probably thought that he was painting a very clever picture for the members of this House; but let me remind him that if he wants to engage in body-snatching or grave digging, he will find a very suitable corpse, so far as this Government is concerned, in the naval question. I would remind him of an incident of ancient or sacred history, wherein a certain great and noble personage suggested that he should go to a certain grave, whereupon he was told not to go, because 'by this time what is in the grave stinketh.' I wish to remind the Postmaster General not only that the naval question is dead, but that it is in its grave, and has been there so long that it stinketh. I am not at all surprised that he wishes to get away from it as quickly as possible.

The Postmaster General grew eloquent in telling the members of this House and the people of this country how much we should admire the actions of the Prime Minister of Canada. Let me ask him, or any member of the Government to show me any act of constructive legislation brought forward by the Prime Minister from the time that he took office down to the present, except the Naval Bill? Has he as Prime Minister produced anything else since he took office? I advise the Postmaster General, and every other member of the Government, to look upon the only fruit of his labour, this dead body to which I have alluded, and which will never again be resurrected to appear in the political life of the Dominion of Canada.

It is not necessary for me to deal at any greater length with the speech of the Postmaster General, who has simply reiterated an old, old story. He has simply gone over the same old ground; he has told us nothing new. Of course it is delightful to an old Scotchman like myself to observe the striking and radical changes which appear to have come over the hon. gentleman, and to witness his advocacy of true patriotism and of true loyalty to the King, the old flag, and the old land. I deem it no credit to myself to be loyal; I have no reason to be anything else. I am willing to concede to any man whose parents were born in another country the right to love his native land, but in his doing so there is no reason why he should be less patriotic to the flag under which he lives. There are conditions which make it ridiculous for a man to put forward his great pride and patriotism. It is only a few years since the Postmaster General took upon himself the duties of the position which he now occupies. This he did not because he was an out and out patriot; not because he was an advocate of a British navy, British protection and British advancement throughout the world, but because he had the negative qualifications; because he advocated 'not a man, not a dollar, nothing for the British flag; we are tired of it; it is not the symbol of liberty in this country—we had to put holes through it a few years ago to breathe the air of liberty.' That, Sir, is an indication of the company in which the hon. gentleman was found when the present Government came into office, and that is the company in which he may be found to-day. He came into this House under the leadership of a gentleman who made no bones of what his position was; a gentleman who occupied a leading position in the Cabinet.

That hon. gentleman, who represents the county of Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in the province of Quebec, was brought in here as one who was qualified for the position of Nationalist leader in this House. But when hon. gentlemen opposite did not get everything they expected, that leader left the Cabinet, and his going was an evidence of the fact that his policy was not a man, not a dollar, no navy—nothing whatever for the advancement of British institutions in this country. The hon. Postmaster General should have submissively and quietly walked out after the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, because if he had not walked ahead of him coming in, he would never have occupied the position he holds to-day. We are told that the hon. Postmaster General is a great loyalist and patriot, and that we have but to inquire into his past history to find out how much justification there is for his holding his present position. The hon. gentleman spoke about how much he forgot; it is perhaps pleasing for him to realize that people will forget, for if his political record is not forgotten it is doubtful if he will ever again grace the benches of this House. At the last local election in the province of Quebec he pledged his political life to the people there, and asked them to support a candidate of his choice. But he was practically drowned out of existence; there was a ten to one vote—against his man—and then he was going to resign. But of course he did not do so. As long as there is any salary attached to his position, there is no danger of the Postmaster General resigning. The hon. gentleman was pleased to give us a dissertation upon good manners and parlimentary etiquette, but I think that his reply to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) was not what I would regard as a proper answer for a big man, occupying such a responsible position, to make a respectable member of this House. The hon. member for Prescott simply said: 'You have forgotten a certain condition of affairs;' whereupon the bar-room answer was given; the police court cleverness was employed, and the Postmaster General said: 'I have forgotten more than the hon. gentleman ever knew.' That, Sir, is an example of the good manners of a Minister of the Government. I submit that it is anything but good manners, and it shows the peanut-political methods of the hon. Postmaster General. I had no intention of devoting so much attention to the speech delivered by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), as I had a few observations of my own to make on these questions.

Speaking in this House a few years ago, since this Government came into power, I made the remark that I had hoped and believed that notwithstanding the fact that we had bad times and bad conditions when the Conservative Government was in power before, conditions had risen to such a high state during the fifteen years of the Laurier Government that the new Government could not, by any mismanagement on their part, bring the country back to the old conditions. I am sorry to say that I gave them more credit than they were entitled to in one way, or perhaps I did not give them credit enough. I did not give them sufficient credit for their ability to wreck the ship of state and bring it to the disastrous condition in which it is to-day, as compared with the happy conditions in which matters were found in 1911 when the Administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier handed over the reins of power. We handed over the reins of power after fifteen years of the most magnificent development that has ever taken place in any country. We found this country, Sir, when the right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Opposition assumed office, in financial distress and storm. We found the same stagnation and standstill in financial and commercial matters extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific that we have to-day. We found that the Minister of Finance at that day was struggling to make one hand wash the other, struggling and in distress, getting every dollar he could from every source, legitimate and otherwise—I suppose legitimate—that could be gathered into the treasury; and with all that, and with the public service of the country depleted and starved, the only condition he could present, even in an election year, was a deficit approaching one million dollars. That was the condition that existed in 1896 when the Laurier Administration took charge. What has followed, Sir? The sun that set in adversity rose in prosperity. The moment the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier took charge of the affairs of this country and his Government assumed office—and that must be admitted to have been one of the ablest, if not the ablest, Administration that was ever constituted or formed in this country—everything budded forth and everything went forward with a bound to the prosperity which has continued for the fifteen years we were in power. We were told that although we had been saying we had surpluses, we had not had any; we were told that the moneys which appeared upon our books from year to year as a magnificent surplus were simply a paper surplus and that we did not have the money. We were told we were preventing proper investigation into the affairs of the country and that we were concealing something and that things were far from what they ought to be, that we had a dark lantern brigade and other institutions preventing inquiry. But the time came when, according to the rules of government we have in this country, a change took place. It is well, perhaps even if disaster should follow, that the people should have a right to rule. I am not complaining about the change of government, but I am submitting that when the change did come, when the Government of the day had power to inquire into every condition which prevailed during the fifteen years we were in power, they had the opportunity of making good the statements which they had made that our surpluses were simply paper surpluses, they had a right to make good the statement that we were hiding behind dark lantern brigades the doings and actions of the Government. What did they do ? They had the right to inquire. They never did inquire, or if they did they found nothing. When it came to delivering over a statement of the surplus, we handed them over $39,000,000 of clean cash; everything was squared up and a clean Administration gave up its books in a most magnificent manner. The Finance Minister himself after making the most thorough search—and we may be sure he would have been glad to find any fault—had to come down and say that the conditions of the country were splendid and that the book-keeping, as handed over to him, was most magnificent and that he had nothing to say, that the money was there, he had counted it and found some $39,000,000 was there. That, Sir, is the condition in which we handed over the finances of this country to the incoming Government and that is the condition which, after two years, they have been able to bring to the state of financial crisis through which we are going to-day. I submit that when I made the statement that I thought they could not bring the country to this condition in such a short time, I am sorry that I miscalculated the capacity of the present Administration in bringing these matters to the very state and conditions in which they are to-day.

I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to the speech of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). I have had the honour of sitting in this House with the Solicitor General for some years. I have always watched his career with considerable interest and have looked upon him as a clever young lawyer; I have certainly no fault to find with his promotion to the position which he occupies to-day. I have just one fault to find; I think that we in the great province of Nova Scotia should have got this position, we in that province have always been accustomed to be represented in the Cabinet by at least two ministers. I submit that to-day we are not, as a province, represented in the Cabinet at all. The Prime Minister is representing every province; not this Prime Minister but every Prime Minister is supposed to be the representative of each province in the Cabinet, regardless of the province from which he may come or for which he is elected. For that reason I submit that the great province of Nova Scotia is not, as such, represented in the Cabinet. We have about the same population as the province of Manitoba and I think we have reason to complain when they have practically three ministers from the province of Manitoba and we should at least have one from the great province of Nova Scotia. It is not because we did not use to have talented men from that province. We have given this country three premiers and two distinguished ministers of justice. We have given this country in the early days as a minister of justice, the late Hon. James Macdonald, a man of great fame as a lawyer and as a jurist in his own country. We have given you as minister of justice the late revered Hon. Sir John Thompson. As prime ministers we have given you Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Thompson, and the present distinguished head of the Government (Mr. Borden). Therefore it cannot be said that we were used to be without talent in the province of Nova Scotia. But I am sorry that we have fallen on evil days and on evil times, that to-day while it is true that we have nine members representing the province of Nova Scotia supporting the Government, it is reported, whether it is true or not I do not know, that the Prime Minister stated to his friends that he would like to give the position of Solicitor General to somebody from that province of Nova Scotia, we were entitled to it, but he was sorry to say that, while we sent here considerable raw material, there was nothing really from which he could venture to make a solicitor general.

If we go over the list we find that we have from Cumberland a lawyer, from Hants a lawyer and from Annapolis a lawyer. We have this semi-ready from Kings. Out of this outfit it appears that the Prime Minister found it impossible to make a selection, and he decided not to give us a Nova Scotian for a solicitor general. Mr. Speaker, upon that ground I am sorry that I must give way and say that after all it was well that the boss of the Administration should have his way, and that the third man should come from Manitoba and no one at all from the great province of Nova Scotia, except the Prime Minister, who is participated in by the other nine provinces just as well as by the province of Nova Scotia.

I pass on to say something on the speech of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in connection with the Roads Bill. There is such a thing as a man getting too big, there is such a thing as a man thinking beyond his powers. The legerdemain artist, the juggler is too big and too strong. I use the word 'juggler' without any disrespect for the capacity and power of the Solicitor General. There are men who go on the stage and make their living as jugglers. They throw their hat on the table and take rabbits, cats, rats and all sorts of things out of the hat. They are not in the hat, but it appears to the onlookers that they are. The Solicitor General has developed great strength along these lines of jugglery, but he went a little too far the other night. He went on to say that this is a Bill that anybody could deal with, having nothing to do with money at all. That was one of the rabbits he took out of his own hat. Then he gave it a twist, and it became the liveliest kind of a money Bill you ever saw, and nobody could dare touch it. It was too sacred, just like the policy of protection in the opinion of my hon. friend the Postmaster General. Nobody can put unconsecrated hands upon it because it is a money Bill. But I think that the Solicitor General has gone a little too far. He has tried to convince honest men and men of some experience of things which are really not true. He has attempted something which is really far beyond his powers. This Bill, which he wants the Senate to steer clear of, not to touch and to leave alone for the reason that it is a money Bill, is not a money Bill, and when the question was put to him he had to acknowledge that it was not. I can remember distinctly when the discussion was on that the right hon. Prime Minister stood up in his place and advised the members of this House, on the authority of the Prime Minister, that a resolution was not necessary. The Bill passed this House on the distinct understanding that it was not a money Bill. Therefore, if that was the case, and I believe it was, what right had the Solicitor General to say that when it got to the other branch of Parliament it was a money Bill or a Bill which required to receive the attention of this House only and could not be qualified or touched in any way by the hon. gentlemen in the other Chamber?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Another strong reason given by the hon. Solicitor General why they should not touch this Bill was that legislation would have to be passed by this House following every step of the money from the time the expenditure was suggested until it got to its ultimate destination, and that the power of this House had to be exercised over it until that was done. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very sound principle, but I might remind the Government and the hon. Solicitor General that we have had, within the last two years, several large votes of money made by this House and not for public works as the term is understood. No legislation passed this House enabling the Government to follow these moneys to their final destination. I want to ask the Government and my hon. friend the Solicitor General what about the $15,000,000 that passed this House last year to be paid over as a bonus and a gratuity to a certain corporation in this country known as Mackenzie and Mann? They paid that $15,000,000 out of the moneys of this country. We voted against this, we wanted to have it done in a business way and as a business transaction, but we were outvoted by the majority on the other side of the House, that money passed out of sight, and we know not where it went, we know not what was done with it, and there is nobody under the sun that can be called to account to tell this House where the money has gone. Where is the high-sounding principle laid down by the hon. Solicitor General that we must follow this money to its destination? The Ontario Government came to us with a proposition which was the most absurd that I ever heard of, asking for a subsidy for a railway that had been built for years, that was making money, that was putting $500,000 or $600,000 a year into the treasury of the province of Ontario. They asked for $2,000,000 of money to be paid over to that Government. That $2,000,000 of money was paid to the Ontario Government and it went out of sight. We do not know where it went. Where is the principle of the Solicitor General that we must have legislation to follow these moneys to their destination and know what becomes of them? There is nothing of the kind. The same thing happened in the case of the province of Manitoba. Four million dollars was voted by this House and passed over to the treasury of the province of Manitoba in 1912, and there is not a line of legislation to enable us to follow that money and see what has become of it. What becomes of the idea that the Senate should not touch this Bill, because, forsooth, this provision was not in it and it was necessary to follow this money that was to go on the roads of this country if it ever went. According to the Solicitor General, because this legislation was necessary, this Bill was not to be touched by the Senate except by the consent and goodwill of hon. members of this House. I submit that that is not the reason, that it cannot be the reason, for, if that were the reason the same principle would have been applied in the cases that I have mentioned in which $2,000,000 was paid to the Ontario Government, $15,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann, and $4,000,000 to the province of Manitoba. That principle would have applied if the statement of the hon. Solicitor General represented the true reason. The reason was, of course, that the Government wanted to have a string on this money, wanted to control it, for the very good reason that has been made plain by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). My hon. friend from Guysborough, speaking in this House the other night, made reference to one of the reasons which has been controlling or moving the Government in placing this money within their own reach. The hon. member said on that occasion that he was not in South Renfrew at the time of the election, being the first by-election after this Government came into power, but he quoted from a Conservative newspaper, published in the riding and called the Renfrew Journal, the report of a speech made by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), on the occasion of that by-election. The report of that speech is as follows:

> Dr. Reid turned his attention to the good roads movement advocated by the Conservative Government at Ottawa, and the bald way in which he handled his topic disgusted all decent men who looked for something higher than this kind of talk from a Cabinet minister. The burden of this part of Dr. Reid's speech was that South Renfrew should vote for Dr. Maloney and the Borden Government would then spend money in this district for good roads.

I submit that when we come to the last analysis of the purpose of this Roads Bill, we have to take the view of it, given by this spokesman of the Government, a few days after the Bill was introduced. I remember well when the Minister of Railways brought in the Bill it was in the midst of the South Renfrew election. It would be unkind to say the measure was launched for the purpose of influencing that election, but there was at all events, as the Minister of Finance would say, a synchronism. However the moment the Bill was introduced the Minister of Customs declared to the people of South Renfrew what they would get if they did one thing and what they would not get if they did the other thing. The Government have dropped the great navy question; it is not only buried but it is malodorous and they fear to go near it, but this Roads Bill seems to be the darling of their hearts, and they take it to bed with them and they cuddle it and fondle it. They are making the people believe from Vancouver to Scutari that this money will be applied to roads running along the lines of the different settlements and concessions, and that it is a mortal sin that the Liberal party are standing in the way.

Mr. CARVELL: They are only trying to make the people believe that.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, the Government are trying to make the people of Canada believe that these roads will go all over the country. It reminds me of the story of an old farmer who bought a pig in Amherst and was driving him to Truro, and he was met by another farmer who said: You are taking the pig to Truro, but the owner of the pig replied: For goodness' sake don't let the pig hear you, because he thinks he is going back to Amherst, and if he hears he is going to Truro I'll have an awful time with him. And so, as the old farmer was trying to deceive the pig, the Government are trying to deceive the people of Canada by making them believe that this money will be spent on every foot of road in every county in Canada. But that is not the case, as I can prove from statements made by the spokesmen of the Government. That is a bold charge for me to make and I would not make it if I did not have the evidence. This Government is represented in the Senate by a Minister of the Crown, and what the Government leader in the Senate says is equally binding on the Government as if it were said in this House by the Prime Minister himself. If I can prove that the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, the leader of the Conservative party in the Senate, has declared that this money is not to be expended in the general way that road moneys are expended, then I suppose you will believe it. The constitutional argument was made by some gentleman in the Senate that this money, if voted at all, would be voted in contravention of the terms of the British North America Act, and in support of their contention they pointed to subsection 10 of section 92 of that Act. That section enumerates the many things over which the provincial governments and legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction, and, amongst others, it mentions:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following class.

One of the gentlemen who took this constitutional objection was contending that this subject being exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, it could not be dealt with by this Parliament. The Hon. Mr. Lougheed is a lawyer of many years experience and a gentleman of good standing in his profession, so that he was not to be taken by surprise on a question of this kind, and he made the answer of a constitutional lawyer to the objection which had been taken. He said: You are mistaken entirely; this does not come at all within the class of works you speak of; you say this should not be done because it is 'local works and undertakings in the province'; it is not that at all and your point is not well taken. Now, if these roads are to be built from A to B and from B to C all along the different concessions, as roads are usually built, then nothing could more fully come within that definition of local works appertaining to local matters. But the leader of the Senate got over that, and said that was not the intention at all.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: When the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to show, from the argument of the hon. leader of the Government in the Senate, that the Roads Bill, so-called, was not a matter calculated for the general improvement of the roads of the different provinces, but was a Bill that was intended for interprovincial roads. I was pointing out, following the argument of the hon. leader of the Government in the Senate, (Hon. Mr. Lougheed), when he was answering the contentions made by Senators made in the same Chamber, that this Bill was a trespass upon provincial rights. The hon. Senator, representing his own views and the views of the Government of the day, was setting forth that this was not in any sense a trespass upon the prerogatives and rights of provincial governments, but was absolutely and fully within the powers of this Parliament. He was arguing that the Bill, which he was then supporting as a Government Bill in the Senate, came not within subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act, but within subsections 'A,' 'B' and 'C' of subsection 10. Subsection 10 itself gives to the provinces, absolutely and exclusively, local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:
> (b) Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country:
> (c) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

The hon. Senator was contending that this Roads Bill came within the scope and purview of subsection 'A,' 'B' and 'C' or some one of them, and was within the powers of this Parliament and not subject to the criticisms set forth by the hon. gentlemen who were contending that this was a trespass or an imposition upon the rights and prerogatives of provincial legislatures. In support of his contention the hon. Senator spoke as follows:

> If hon. gentlemen will look at the preamble of the Bill they should come to a different conclusion than that which they apparently have arrived at as the object of this Bill. If they will observe the language of the preamble of the Bill they will find that this is not a local undertaking. This has not for its object the improvement of the roads in a particular municipality, or group of municipalities. It is not intended for a moment that this assistance should be given to the ordinary highway in a local sense.
> Then I direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the first clause of the Bill in which this is entitled the Canadian Highways Improvement Act. A proper distinction should be drawn between the Bill and the meaning which hon. gentlemen are disposed to attach to it. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that the Government of the day in its generosity has suddenly come to the conclusion that municipalities should be helped and that the provinces should be helped only so far as the development of local highways is concerned. But there is a larger object than that in view. The Government has the object in view set out in the preamble of the Bill. I maintain that while highways in their local sense are peculiarly provincial undertakings, that this is more than a provincial undertaking. This is an interprovincial and national undertaking and does not come within that class of cases referred to by my hon. friends, and particularly the hon. gentleman from DeLorimier, who cited to us last night section 92 of the British North America Act, in which he sought to bring this undertaking under subsection 10 of section 92, and within the language 'local works and undertakings.'

That is the clean-cut argument of the hon. the leader of the Government of the Senate.

If we are to understand the English language at all and to understand the application which the hon. gentleman makes of the provisions of subsection 10 of subsection 92 of the British North America Act, he makes it very clear and distinct, and shows it in a manner that cannot be controverted, that he puts himself within subsections 'A,' 'B' and 'C' of subsection 10 of section 92, which give this House power to deal with interprovincial matters, such as steamship lines, roads between provinces and railways and canals which extend beyond the limits of any one particular province. He says that this Bill has for its purpose a work of that character. I want to point this out to hon. gentlemen in this House, who are arguing that the Government in its generosity came down with a Bill in order to assist the different sections of roads in different counties in the whole Dominion of Canada, and that if any obstacle is thrown in the way of this Bill it is an obstacle thrown in the way of the different roads up and down the different constituencies in the Dominion. If I should on my own authority tell hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, that this was not the purpose of the Bill, they would sneer and laugh at my statement; but I am not obliged to rely upon my own statement. I have here in black and white, and in such a way that they cannot escape from it, the authoritative statement of the Government. That being the case, I submit to the House and to the country that, when any hon. gentleman tries to make out that this is a Bill that enables the Government to borrow money for the purpose of improving the highways generally, the people do not understand it so, and anybody who says that it is, is endeavouring, intentionally or otherwise, to deceive the people, for such is not the purpose and object of the Bill. I venture to think there is not a responsible member of the Government who, in view of the speech of the leader of the Senate, will undertake to say to the contrary. If so, they must revise these statements, revise their policy and acknowledge at once that what the leader of the Government in the Senate says is not to be relied upon as a true indication of what the real purpose of the Government is. This is another evidence of the fact that the trusts, combines and millionaires have such a hold upon this Government that they not only provide the ways and means by which they become millionaires, but they must also provide for their junketings, great white way from the Foothills to Halifax and possibly from Halifax to Sydney. No one road from the Foothills to Halifax could by any possibility be of any great use to the ordinary farmers along the thousands of miles of it on either side. That is said to be the purpose of this Bill, and, in that case, whether it went through or not it could not be of great importance to the farmers of this country. It is not only fair but it is most eminently desirable that the people of this country should understand what the purpose of this Bill is and should not be deceived by the Government in regard to it.

However, it is far from being the desire of any hon. member on this side of the House to throw obstacles in the way of money being provided in a legitimate and proper manner for the purpose of improving the highways of this country. But I am sure that you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, and so will other hon. gentlemen in this House who properly understand the conditions, that it is better for us to have even bad roads than to have in our country a legislation and a Government that will absolutely disregard the rules of the constitution under which we live. If it is necessary in order to improve the highways of this country, or to give more money to the local governments for any good purpose, I hope there is plenty of scope within the constitution for us to do so. It has been admitted by the Solicitor General that we could not pass this money over to the provinces without legislation being enacted for that purpose. He admitted that it was in contravention of the constitution to do otherwise—that roads were a subject particularly within the constitutional powers and rights of the provinces, and that we could not pass money over to the provinces without getting an Act of Parliament enabling us to do so. That being the case, I submit it cannot be done at all under the constitution. It means that you are endeavouring to pass a law in this Parliament which this Parliament has no authority to pass. The constitution provides that there are certain laws that can be passed by this Parliament and certain laws that can be passed by the legislatures of the different provinces. If legislation with regard to roads does not come within our constitutional powers whence do we get the powers to pass such a law? And if we are able to pass legislation with respect to roads, this being one of the things under the jurisdiction of the provinces, what subject can be said to be safe within the powers of the provinces? Is there any subject allocated to the provinces exclusively by section 92 of the British North America Act that can be left undisturbed, if by an Act of this Parliament it can be taken away and all obstacles dealing with it removed? According to Senator Lougheed, the leader of the Government, this does not come within subsection 10, and he admits that if it did we could not deal with it. He says it comes within clauses (a) (b) and (c) of subsection 10 of section 92, and therefore we have power to deal with it. The Solicitor General did not agree that it came under clauses (a) (b) and (c) but says that we remove all doubts by passing this legislation which he thinks should be sanctioned by the Senate. Under section 92 of the British North America Act sixteen or seventeen different subjects, each one of importance to the people who live in the various provinces, come exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. But the Solicitor General comes to this House with a constitutional heresy and tells us that all that is necessary in order to give us the power exclusively to deal with this subject of roads is to pass legislation in this Parliament. I submit that if that be the case, the British North America Act, so far as it giving protection to any particular province is concerned, is mere waste paper. And I submit to those who think that under section 93 of the British North America Act they have some protection in respect of questions of education in this country, who think that the provinces have exclusive rights to deal with education, that in order to keep these rights secure they will have to do away with the constitutional learning of the Solicitor General, for he says that in order to get over that difficulty all we have to do is to pass some legislation and then deal with any of these subjects just as we think proper. Without labouring with that point further, I submit that when the Government of the day comes down with a policy stating in a proper way that at the time of Confederation sufficient moneys were not allowed the provinces for the different public works, one of them being the roads and bridges of the provinces, and when they ask us on this side to vote moneys for the subjects which come exclusively within the powers of the province, we certainly will gladly give our assistance for that purpose and will vote the moneys to be properly allocated in that regard. The proper machinery provided by the constitution of this country will deal with these moneys, and there will be no trouble about it. This is nothing more or less than an increase of public moneys to be given to the provinces for this particular purpose. At different times and on several occasions large amounts of money additional to the amounts first provided have been granted to the provinces, and there has been no string attached to them, as the Government of the day wants to do in the case of this money; but each one of the provinces dealt with that money with its own machinery and in its own way. If it is necessary that more money should be given to improve the roads, and if we have the money to give, there is no reason why a properly thought-out plan should not be carried into effect. This is the money of the people. Do not let any one think for a moment that it is like the manna in the wilderness. This money is not provided by the Government exclusively. The people themselves provide it—there is no other source from which it can come.

If it is to be sent back to the people of the provinces, let it be sent to the proper authorities and handled through the proper channels. If this is done—and I have no doubt that some day it will be done—then there will be no opposition from this side of the House, because the people who spend the money will be answerable to the provinces, and the letter of the constitution will be properly adhered to. The action taken by the Government in the South Renfrew election is the chief objection we have to the appropriation of this money in the way proposed by the Government, and this objection we shall continue to have; we do not want to see the money of the people—the money of the people, I say, not of the Government—taken and used by the Government for purposes of political advantage. I am sure that the people of Canada are not so lacking of a sense of propriety or so devoid of a realization of what is meant by constitutional government as to condemn the Opposition for contending that this improvement to roads, if improvement it is to be, shall be carried out in a proper and constitutional way.

It was argued by the Solicitor General that we were stultifying ourselves in voting for the Agricultural Bill and refusing to vote for the 'Improvement to Highways Bill,' and that we were flying in the face of any constitutional argument we might make against voting for the latter. I submit that the two measures are absolutely separate and distinct, and that there is a great difference between voting for a measure for agricultural purposes and voting for a bill which provides for the improvement of roads. Section 95 of the British North America Act reads:

> In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the provinces, and to immigration into all or any of the provinces; and any law of the legislature of a province, relative to agriculture or to immigration, shall have effect in and for the province, as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

There is a clear-cut authority, full and ample, giving this House the constitutional right to pass laws in reference to agriculture, and the voting for the Agricultural Bill does not in the slightest degree interfere with our opposition to unconstitutional legislation. The use of such an argument is vain, and scarcely worthy of the acute mind and careful reasoning of the Solicitor General.

One great point which is urged against us is that we are depriving the farmers of the country of the benefit of expenditure for the purpose of improving their roads, and that the roads used by the farmers who travel from their homes to adjacent towns or elsewhere were to be improved by the appropriation of this money. I think I have proved clearly and satisfactorily out of the mouth of the Government that such was not the intention of the Bill, and if the money were voted a thousand times, not one dollar of it would be expended in that way. That is the point I particularly wish to make; I desire to show the people of the country that they are being fooled or deceived by the Government and its supporters when such arguments are made.

Following the speech of my hon. friend the Solicitor General a little further, I wish to deal with that part of it in which he touched upon the tariff. Evidently the tariff is a subject which is not receiving harmonious treatment at the hands of the Government. I am quite aware that the Solicitor General has not the rank of a Cabinet Minister, but at the same time, if I have been capable of observing what has been going on during the last two years, he is in close touch with the present Administration, and knows well what is going on in the inner circles of Government. In his speech he gave us to understand that tariff revision is in prospect. For my part, I do not know whether or not there is any tariff revision in prospect. The present Government came into power under particular and peculiar circumstances. They came into power by preaching the doctrine, so far as the trade of this country was concerned, of 'leave well enough alone; do not touch the trade conditions of the country, for they could not be better.' But we never heard that the leader of the Government ever went back upon his old theory of adequate protection. Dear only knows what 'adequate protection' means. I understand that there is a new dictionary in process of compilation which will contain something like 450,000 words, and possibly in that new dictionary we may get a definition of 'adequate protection.' However, the Prime Minister promised the trusts and combines and mergers that if he and his party got into power, this policy of adequate protection would be carried out, and their interest protected. It is said, and I believe on very good authority, that the present Minister of Finance was admitted into the Cabinet because he was in a position to act as the trustee, representative, apostle and disciple of that doctrine as far as the trusts, mergers and combines were concerned. There is no other good reason why the capable Minister of Finance of former years should have been passed over and the position given to a gentleman who had not even won his spurs, and who knew nothing about politics. There must have been some underlying scheme by which he was to represent those who put up big money in order to bring the party back into power. Certainly I do not wish it to be hinted that I have had a desire to make any personal remarks about the Minister of Finance, but in carrying out this contract of putting up the tariff sky-high, and continuing the policy of ample or adequate protection, he has, to use a vulgar expression, taken cold feet. He is afraid to do it, and it is likely he will not do it—I am afraid he will fall down on the job. But he is holding on to the only cry that is left to him of leaving well enough alone. Nobody knows whether the Government will touch the tariff or not. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to complain that the Fielding tariff was not satisfactory. It was satisfactory to us, it has brought prosperity to the country from end to end, and for the present we have no evidence why it should be interfered with. It would seem to me that it will remain as it is until the affairs of the country are once more given into the master hand of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who will make any changes that will be needed in it. I am sure that as things are going to-day there is no evidence that anything will be done by the present Administration. They are afraid to touch the tariff, they do not seem to understand it and therefore they will let it remain as it is. I must say, speaking for myself and the part of the country from which I come, that the Fielding tariff, the Fielding Administration has brought magnificent results in our part of the country. Magnificent steel, iron and coal industries grew up and were fostered under the administration of my right hon. friend and I would be loath indeed to tamper in any way with the trade policy in any way that would directly or indirectly interfere with these magnificent industries that have grown up and prospered under the administration of my right hon. friend. I am sure that such a departure would be far from any idea that he has of administration to-day, that he would do nothing that in any way would hamper or retard the advancement of these great industries.

I wish to call to the attention of the House the Mosaic vision of the Solicitor General in his speech the other night when he was dealing with the tariff. I do not know whether he understands this, but I believe he did. He said:

> When it is made—
>
> That is, the change in the tariff.
> —I, as associated with the Government, will do one of two things—I will accept full responsibility for the tariff as promulgated in that revision, or if I cannot do so I will sever my present association with the Government. When the tariff is revised, free wheat, agricultural implements and all other such matters will be fit and proper subjects for discussion. And I will be right in at the death; the hon. gentlemen's curiosity shall be satisfied to the limit.

I submit to you that if the people of this country are watching for light upon the probable or prospective course of the Government from this declaration of the Solicitor General they will find it rather vague. The coal interests, the steel interests, the wheat interests, the lumber interests, the fishermen and the farmers of this country are watching the trade policy of this Government. There is one consolation, that whenever the day comes that this present Government will deal with the question, when the clammy sweat of death has come over the question, when it is making its last kick, the Solicitor General will be there, he will be there at the death. I want the great interests of this country to try and figure out for themselves what consolation they can gather from this.

> When the tariff is revised free wheat, agricultural implements and all other such matters will be fit and proper subjects for discussion and I will be right there at the death.

I have heard a great many proclamations, I have watched politicians for the last thirty years and I never in my life saw any proposition so vague, so indefinite as this. The Solicitor General evidently knew what the attitude the Postmaster General was because the Postmaster General says that the tariff is a sacred temple, that it is a holy of holies into which even he could not enter at all and he takes care to say nothing about it except that it is a holy thing, that is all he will tell us about it, it is a sacred thing. His profession and calling and training does not enable him to go near it. He has heard of a certain mount in olden days which if a man put his hand to it fire issued forth and he was destroyed; he has heard of a certain ark which if a man touched he fell dead; and he regards sacred things as matters which he had better keep clear of. He tells us that the Solicitor General himself understood it in that way because if he touched it he would only be there at the death. So this idea seems to run through them all that it is a question of death the moment they touch this tariff. So, therefore, the people of this country may die without food, die without whatever is necessary for them, but this Cabinet, this Solicitor General at all events and the Postmaster General, have understood that this is a sacred structure, a sacred thing, and life is dear to them and they will not put unholy hands upon it. I suppose it would be dangerous for me to think of putting any interpretation on the speech of the Solicitor General because I have rather the reputation of being a Bible student and I find in the Bible that cursed is he that addeth to it or taketh from it. I will not add to it or take from it, but I will endeavour to make it clear to the people that there is going to be a sacrifice, blood is going to be shed and at that death the Solicitor General will be there and the Postmaster General will be looking on, at a safe distance.

Passing from that question I come to the passage that I read from the Address of His Royal Highness:

> It gives me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you upon the remarkable expansion of Canada's trade with other countries in the past fiscal year, during which our total trade far exceeded that of any preceding year.

No doubt that is the contribution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) to the Speech from the Throne. He has no doubt done much to extend the trade of this country. The local Tory press in the part of the country I come from told us about the wonderful travelling of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They told us that he travelled thirty-five thousand miles. That may be quite true, but I am sorry to relate that we have been given no result whatever from the travelling of these thirty-five thousand miles. If the hon. gentleman was only paid the ordinary constable fees of ten cents a mile it would cost this country considerable to meet his expenses. But, I am sorry to say that if we only paid him constable's fees there is no return whatever that would justify the venture of having sent him on those trips. It seems to me extraordinary that an old and trained veteran like the Minister of Trade and Commerce should go up and down this land, as he did in 1911, telling the people to have no truck or trade with the people across the line, that it was going to upset everything that was established in this country if any article whatever should pass over the border. Over the border, within sight of some of our towns and villages, is a population approaching closely to 100,000,000 people, a people of our own race, largely speaking our own tongue, observing our habits and customs, living much like ourselves and having that which could be traded satisfactorily and profitably with us. We are told that we should not have any trade with them, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce is sent by the present aggregation, which calls itself the Government of this country, on a fool's errand, 35,000 miles away to find trade. We have heard of men being sent upon a fool's errand. I will not say that the hon. gentleman would be on a fool's errand, but it is as much like it as one herring is like to another.

The hon. gentleman himself used to tell us in the discussion on reciprocity that the Hon. Mr. Fielding could never forget his barrel of fish and his coal hod. We have fish in abundance in the beautiful province of Nova Scotia, we have unlimited supplies of good coal, and if Mr. Fielding was always watchful as to the interests of the fishermen and watchful of the coal interests of the province of Nova Scotia, I am sure that no fault could be found with him. We have in the whole Dominion, exports in abundance of coal, fish, lumber, wheat and manufactured products. Let me ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce: Did you find any place where you could sell coal at the end of anywhere along the 35,000 miles? The answer must be no. Did you sell any lumber? No, not a foot. Did you sell any fish? No, they do not take fish at all; the Chinamen do not eat fish—cats, dogs, rats, and that sort of thing, and there would not be any great demand that I could promise to supply. Did you sell lumber? No. Potatoes? No. Any manufactured articles? No, because they do not wear any manufactured goods out there. That is the report that must be brought back to us here.

I shall wind up my reference to the condition of the hon. gentleman's report on his trade mission by the story of a coloured man who was a boss at a certain steel works. He had three furnaces to look after; he had furnace No. 1, furnace No. 2, and a locomotive to take care of. Each morning he had to report to his boss what had gone on during the night. One morning he came back and reported that furnace No. 2 was making white iron, which is worse than doing nothing. He said: We burned the bars out of No. 1 at four o'clock this morning, and at twelve o'clock at night we put the locomotive off the track; everything else is all right. That is the situation. This poor coloured gentleman had only three things to look after. In one furnace they burned the bars out, the other was making white iron, and the locomotive went off the track, but everything else, he said, was all right.

We have a certain number of things to export from this country—coal, lumber, fish, manufactured articles and wheat. We ask the hon. gentleman: Did you find any trade or any place where we can sell these things? The hon. gentleman must say: No, but everything else is all right. That, Sir, is the condition of trade in so far as its expansion has been brought about by any effort of this Government.

Now I come to another point. There is a paragraph in the Address which reads as follows:

This is the question that comes close to home, and I want to touch briefly upon the situation in my own province and county in so far as the policy of the last Administration is concerned as compared with the policy of the present Administration. We are told that much is being done for the development of terminal facilities at ocean ports. We have on the Atlantic coast in Canada some very excellent ports. We have the port of St. John, the port of Halifax, and the port of Sydney and North Sydney. We have three good harbours particularly. We have many others. I am not a Halifax man, and therefore I think that I can say that they have a good port at St. John, although perhaps a Halifax man might say differently. The port of St. John is good enough, at all events, for our good friends, Mackenzie and Mann, to take their steamers away from Halifax and send them to St. John, not because the port is better but because of a political end to be served. In the port of Halifax large expenditures of money are being made. We do not begrudge them at all. At the port of Sydney, at North Sydney, and the great port of the steel works, on the other side of the water, not a dollar has been expended. We had a promise from the outgoing Administration to build a magnificent terminus at North Sydney. We had the Intercolonial railway changed from its old route and brought around to the port of North Sydney for the purpose of making it a magnificent terminus for the Intercolonial, as we thought. But what do I find? I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is not in his seat. We find that, although I myself and others had been able to induce the preceding Government to make this change and to bring this road from the wrong place to the right place in order to get the harbour at the proper angle and at the proper depth of water, the present Minister of Railways and Canals has ignored our protest, and that, after all the expenditure we have gone to to change this road, he is advising doing the trade of this port without touching this magnificent harbour at all except by means of the old, inadequate terminus constructed a number of years ago, and which is quite unequal to the present necessities. If the statement is true that the Government is making a large expenditure at the terminal port, why is it that the expenditure of a few hundred dollars is going to stand in the way of making one of the big outstanding ports on the whole Atlantic coast of Canada a fit and proper place for the handling of the business of this great country? I protest against it, I will protest against it always, and I say to this House and the Government that as I have fought the change before, when the day comes I will fight it again, and will never give this question a rest until the right thing is done. I will stand by the principle that nothing is settled until it is settled right, and the terminals of North Sydney will never be settled right until they are put into the proper place, and that magnificent port comes to its own in so far as Government improvement is concerned. Under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we were given not only the promise but the actuality of a railway in the county of Victoria, extending to the capital of that county and through the heart of the county down to the placid waters of the harbour. When the Liberal Government went out of power we had the money voted for that project and we had the contract let. But then, this chilling blight came on; the Conservative Government came into power; the contract was cancelled, and, so long as this Government remains in power farewell and forever to any improvements in that county. The Laurier Government were to build railways through the counties of Halifax, Guysborough, Pictou, and Victoria, but with the exception of that part of the railway which traversed the county of Halifax, the Conservative Government discontinued the scheme and left us helpless. I submit that was not a fair deal; it was not what you would expect of a man of the proportions and ability of the Prime Minister in dealing with a big question of this kind; it was not fair for him to build the railway through his own constituency and leave the other constituencies, equally important, without railway communication. I appeal to the Government now, and it is not yet too late, to place in the proper location the railway they are now building. This is not a local question; it is a national question. It is not contended that the public works undertaken at Halifax are of local importance, nor should works undertaken in the great port of Sydney and North Sydney be considered as anything but national works. The trade with Newfoundland, which is all landed at Sydney, is one of the largest assets of the Intercolonial railway, and why should not the Government of Canada provide proper facilities for handling that trade? I venture the prediction that whoever is living twenty-five or thirty years hence, if that road is left where they propose to leave it to-day, will regard it as an act of madness that it was not continued to the great port of Sydney. These questions are not receiving the attention they deserve from this Government. I trust the day is not far distant when the men now in office will be hurled from power, and when we shall again see an intelligent Government with a policy which will develop the counties of eastern Nova Scotia and every other section of Canada which is not receiving fair treatment to-day, and which will take measures to bring in touch with the pulsation of the commercial centres of the Dominion and the outside world, the fertile and productive regions in my province now neglected and held back. I fail to see any of the great things which gentlemen opposite tell us this Government is doing. If the people of this country had servants who were stupid they might put up with them, but when incapacity is added to stupidity I do not think the people will long stand for it. We have evidence of the incapacity, the stupid blundering, in many cases the insincerity and possibly dishonesty of this Government, whether that be known to the heads of the departments or not. I have no doubt the day is not far distant when the Government, Solicitor General and Postmaster General, and everybody else who has anything to do with it, will, to use a poetic but perhaps not elegant expression: turn their toes up to the roots of the daisies; and then, the people of Canada will have done with them. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity of presenting my views on these questions to the House and to the country.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (Simcoe East): I can congratulate the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), in this, that he has dispelled some of the gloom caused amongst his friends when they read the Montreal Daily Mail this morning. His merry quips and his ancient stories have been somewhat refreshing, and even the fine old crust on them does not much detract from their interest and their amusement. If the hon. gentleman had delivered his somewhat lengthy speech in his own riding, I have no doubt little importance would be attached to it, because of the fact that there is to-day in that part of the country as elsewhere, a certain amount of depression which all of us would like to see disappear. I am not going to say that Canada is as prosperous to-day as it has been for the past two or three years, for no man can expect enormous expansion to continue, year in and year out, without a check. In recent years railway building in Canada has proceeded with unexampled rapidity, and an enormous number of men have been employed in construction work on the Canadian Northern railway, the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Transcontinental railway. Many of these enormous undertakings of the railway companies have now been brought to a conclusion, and hence it is that a number of workingmen have been thrown out of employment, with the result that every industry in the country has been more or less affected. An hon. gentleman opposite the other day, speaking of the high cost of living, said that canned goods were higher in price than ever before, but if that hon. gentleman had only known what the real facts are, he would have had to admit that canned goods are cheaper to-day in Canada than they have been at any period during the last five years. That fact cannot be gainsaid, because there are hon gentlemen on this side of the House who are engaged in that industry and can vouch for it. Follow the line of construction of any railway in this country, and you will find the route marked with empty tin cans, which contained the food supplied to the men in the construction camps, and due to the completion of these railways, the men are out of employment and there is not the demand for canned goods there once was. But these hon. gentlemen, instead of coming to Parliament as representatives of the people and endeavouring to ameliorate conditions, are doing what? Endeavouring to black-eye Canada in every part of the world, and the greatest sinner of them all is the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. That right hon. gentleman should have made sure of his facts before he started out to black-eye Canada, as he did the other night. He wishes to have it heralded from one end of Europe to the other that poverty and destitution are stalking throughout Canada, and never has the right hon. gentleman turned over on his tongue a more delicious morsel than when he said the other night: 'Well, hard times are here.' The right hon. gentleman has been in power in this country, and at that time what had his policy to do with the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway between the city of Toronto and Ottawa, or the Canadian Northern railway except in this, that his Government with the most lavish hand was handing out bonuses at all times and at all seasons? Yet these gentlemen are complaining to-day when this Government is doing what any government should do in a time of stress, when it can well afford to discount the future and endeavour to meet the requirements of the people by placing before them for construction public works that are absolutely necessary with the future prospects of the country.

My hon. friend who has just resumed his seat, in a very small portion of his speech, appealed to the Government not to interfere with the duty on iron. There is no portion of the hon. gentleman's speech which will be appreciated where he lives more than the small reference which he made to the duty on iron in this country. I regret that the hon. gentleman did not devote all his time to discussing the iron question in Canada to-day, one of the greatest questions before the people of Canada, not only for the present but for the future. The other day Senator Colonel Mason moved the adoption of the Address. Colonel Mason is a well known figure in the commercial life of Canada. He is president of one of the leading banks, and it was a worthy comment made by him that despite the fact that our imports are about $700,000,000, nearly one-fifth of all our imports are made up of iron and iron products. What has this country been doing for the last ten years? Endeavouring to develop the iron industry. Go in what direction you will and you will find that attempts have been made in towns, in cities, to build up what should be the greatest industry in any country, the iron industry, because it enters into so many manufactured goods.

What has Germany done in that respect? I read in a handbook to-day that whereas in 1888 only 2,750,000 tons of pig-iron were produced in Germany, by a beneficent, by a proper and by a wholesome policy of protection, in 1912 the production had increased to the enormous extent of 17,852,000 tons. Where is Canada to-day? What has she been doing on this iron question? When our friends were in power, they assured the town of Port Arthur that they would be in a position to develop the iron industry in this country. They paid out of the public coffers of Canada a bonus to the extent of $200,000 for a railway to lead up to the iron mines. $2,000,000 was then invested in an iron plant. The city of Port Arthur, depending on their assurance that a fair protection would be accorded to the iron industry, bonused the concern to the extent of $200,000. The town of Midland a few years ago gave a bonus of $50,000 to an industry in that town. Why? Because they believed that the policy of the country would be one of protection to the iron industry. The same thing has gone on in other parts of Canada as well as in Ontario. I go down to Gloucester, N.B., The Government bonused in that county to the extent of $200,000, a railway to lead up to what is probably one of the richest iron mines in the Dominion of Canada. Surely when they have invested their money in a mine, when they built their railway, and when the Government granted the bonus that was granted, they expected that in due time there would be such a policy of protection to the iron industry that not only would the mine be developed, but that a large industry would be placed there for the production of pig iron. What has happened? There is this mine in New Brunswick with its enormous wealth of pig iron lying idle, and five or six hundred men who would be engaged in mining it are out of employment and no smelters have been built.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that the Canadian Iron Company's property?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: That is one of theirs. I can go into the province of Nova Scotia, rich in ore and coal. How is the iron industry in that country to-day? I read the following in The Weekly Sun:

> In Nova Scotia too, blast furnaces are likely to close down for some weeks and collieries in that province will almost certainly follow suit. The United States iron trade is suffering as well. Across the line it is reported that a million iron workers are idle.

What is the result of the stagnation of the iron trade in the United States? The result is that the American people engaged in this line of industry are to-day dumping into Canada what available pig iron they may have, trying to find a market for it here, because they have heard that most of our local smelters are shut down.

What is the condition of the iron industry in Canada? Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House the other day made it plain that this Government should, before there was any change or any abatement in the trade of the country, take time by the forelock and make provision for it. If that is a charge at the door of this Government, how much more so was it a charge at the door of the late Government, because under their policy there was a scheme or plan by which the bounties to iron were given, on a sliding scale it is true; but it is well known that under legislative enactment the time would come when they would be ended and that measure of protection or bounty would be taken off iron, and it was the duty of the Government to increase their tariff duty on iron so as to protect it for the the future.

The duty on iron is $2.50 per ton, that is under the general tariff. Under the British preferential tariff it is $1.50 per ton. Last year we imported from the United States $3,000,000 worth of pig iron at the uniform price of only $13 per ton. Let me call the attention of the House to this fact, that the lower the price in the States of pig iron imported into this country, the higher the duty. For instance, suppose the price were $20 per ton. The duty being $2.50 per ton would be nearly 12½ per cent; by reason of the fact that the price ruled so low, namely, $13 per ton, the duty would be nearly 19 per cent. I am free to admit that here in Canada we have conditions which make it more difficult for us to cope with the people of the United States in the production of iron. In the first place, the climate is against us. The rigours of our winters are against the employer who hopes to get out of his employees as much as they could give under different conditions. Ore cannot be handled, coke cannot be handled, nor can any of the articles that go into the composition of iron, with the inclement weather we have in this country as compared with the United States. In the next place, we have not the field of labour to draw upon that they have. With the huge coloured population the United States have, how cheap labour is in that country. And, worse than that, so far as Ontario is concerned, every pound of coke that we use, we must draw from the United States, thereby incurring a large cost for railway carriage. For these reasons, and with the knowledge of these facts, it is easy to understand the odds we must face. And neither this Government nor the last Government can deny that these facts have been from time to time brought to their attention and they have been urged to take action before the crisis was reached that has been reached in our iron industry.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. gentleman tell us why this Government has done nothing for this industry for the last two sessions?

Mr. BENNETT: The question is a fair one. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that I believe that had there been unanimity in this House and no effort to make political capital out of the question, something might have been done for the iron industry, to the benefit of Canada as a whole.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman speaks of it as being one of our disadvantages in iron manufacture that we have not the coloured labour. Would he say where the United States Steel Corporation, the Pittsburgh people, use coloured labour?

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman does not imagine that the Pittsburgh labour is coloured labour. But I did think that he knew that in Birmingham, Alabama, and other points hundreds of thousands of tons of pig iron are made by coloured labour and that iron comes into competition with the Pittsburgh iron.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to tell the hon gentleman that the United States Steel Corporation are the largest makers of pig-iron in the United States, and they do not use coloured labour.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not the only manufacturers of iron.

Mr. NESBITT: No, but they are the largest.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not contradict that. But the Pittsburg people have the advantage of having coal close at hand, and that, no doubt, to some extent, offsets the advantage of the coloured labour in the South. Now, the pig-iron output of this country in 1912 was 917,925 tons, of a value of $12,307,000. At that time we had employed in the blast furnaces 1,778 men. I do not know how many there are to-day. But I must say I think these figures that I have taken are in error, because if I am correctly informed, the blast furnaces at Sydney employ probably 3,000 men, and even more. I am not here to complain only of what the prior Government did, I am here to complain of what the present Government is doing and what hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are doing, or rather not doing, when they fail to come to the rescue of this, the biggest industry in Canada, an industry which might be made greater than it has ever been simply by correcting the mistakes made by the past Government, which mistakes are being continued by the Government of to-day. On this subject I speak feelingly, on this subject I speak in earnestness. For I know what the iron industry means to a town. I live in the town of Midland. I saw it first a struggling lumber village. I saw two iron furnaces come to that place and employ from 400 to 600 men. I saw splendid streets opened and houses filled with the families of men who drew their $2 and $3 and $4 a day. And at one fell swoop I saw these industries closed and the men scattered to the four winds of heaven. And I come here to find a Parliament that occupies its time with resurrecting bygone issues that have been controversial for twenty years instead of coming to the rescue of one of the greatest industries of the country, when that rescue could be effected by the two parties being united in the work.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why has not the Government moved in the matter? They have the responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: If I can move them, I certainly will do so. I am sorry if I have not shown the hon. gentleman that that is what I am trying to do. And I hope he will speak from his place on this question and that he will implore the Government, as I am imploring it, to take action.

Now, I come to another matter in which Canada stands at a disadvantage with respect to the iron question. Not only on the question of pig iron are we handicapped, but on the question of what is known as scrap iron as well. Scrap iron is used in conjunction with the ore in all the smelters; I have seen it used in Midland, and it is used elsewhere. Last year we imported from the United States no less than 54,000 tons of scrap iron. The duty is only $1 per ton, and as the price is about $14 a ton, the duty is about 7 per cent. I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not in his place tonight, because I should wish to address myself to him particularly in regard to one matter in relation to which the iron duties are of the greatest importance. A few years ago, before the change of Government, in answer to the request and demand of the agricultural implement manufacturers, and at an evil moment for the iron industry in this country, Hon. Mr. Fielding made the concession of reducing the duty on agricultural implements. The duty was reduced on mowers, reapers, harvesters, binders and attachments from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent. At the same time, the raw material was admitted free of duty. That was a greater concession to the manufacturer than he had enjoyed before in having 20 per cent duty on the manufactured goods. For, while his duty was only decreased 2½ per cent, he was given permission to import his materials duty free. This concession, it was claimed by the iron people, was manifestly to their disadvantage. I am not here to say to what rate these duties should be increased, but I am here to call the attention of the House to the certain important facts. We are bringing into this country the enormous amount of $140,000,000 worth of iron and iron products, as I have stated, and as was shown by Senator Mason. We have iron in our mines; we have coal in our country; we have subsidized railways to all these different mines; and towns and cities have expended thousands upon thousands of dollars in bonuses. It is high time the Government should awaken to the emergency, and high time that both sides joined in backing up the Government in making such changes in the tariff that the smoke may again issue from these smelters, that other smelters may be built in the country, and that all the other advantages may be gained that follow in the wake of this great industry. In Ontario we talk much about the advantages of cheap power. It has been demonstrated in Germany, where they have the coal, and have used that coal to make coke, that the by-products of the coke amount to enormous sums. Why could not we have this industry with its by-products and all the wealth which would thereby be created? And from gas issuing from the coke ovens power would be produced at cheaper prices than those at which electrical energy can be sold.

I know it will be argued by some persons that if you increase the duties on iron a monopoly will be created. In answer to that, I have only this to say: We have here in Canada laws against combines. If a combine is made in restraint of trade or to unduly enhance prices, let that law be enforced, and that will have the effect of bringing prices down. After all has been said and done, the amount of iron that enters into the manufacture of one of these implements is but a mere bagatelle; I am assured that in the ordinary reaper or mower only about $3.50 worth of iron is used, so that no very great excess of price would be engendered. Take the case of malleable iron. We imported from the United States last year upwards of $2,000,000 worth of malleable iron, paying duty at the rate of 27½ per cent. We have malleable iron industries in this country, and they too might manufacture what is necessary for the requirements of Canada. I do hope the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, and that such changes may be made in the tariff as will result in the opening up of the iron industry, thus developing the mines, creating traffic for the railways and giving employment to thousands of men who cannot be employed in this country and who must be driven out of Canada altogether unless aid is given to this industry at once.

During the debate more or less has been said in regard to the matter of transportation. My hon. friend the member for West Huron (Mr. Lewis) addressed himself to the House the other afternoon on the question of the losses on the Great Lakes during the past few months. Every hon. gentleman within the sound of my voice knows what happened on the occasions referred to. Two hundred and fifty valuable lives were lost. Insurance companies can compensate the owners of the vessels which were lost, but no power can compensate the families which have been blighted with sorrow and which have had their breadwinners taken from them. I want to say here that a great deal can be done in Canada by the Government of the day in the way of preventing the occurrence in future of such catastrophies. The Government has to-day announced the policy of expending a large sum of money on what is known as the French River section of the Georgian Bay canal. A glance at the map will point out to any hon. gentleman that the mouth of the French river is at the north end of Georgian bay, near Manitoulin island. A large amount of money—I shall not charge my memory with recalling how many millions—has been expended on enlarging channels north of Manitoulin island, and it would need the expenditure of but a few additional millions to provide a channel from Port Arthur and Fort William through the Sault canal and north of Manitoulin to all Georgian bay ports. When I tell the House that last year, out of 80,000,000 bushels of grain—I am referring to wheat alone—which were shipped from Fort William, over one-half that quantity was delivered at points on the Georgian bay, it is fair to argue that by a better system of routing, not only 40,000,000, but 80,000,000 bushels might be taken that way. The Georgian bay ports serve a number of routes. While 80,000,000 bushels of grain may come from our Canadian Northwest and be delivered from Fort William at different points, the bulk of that amount does not by any means go by way of export either through New York or Montreal. A large proportion, I should say fully 50 per cent of it, is consumed in Canada, and therefore, through the different ports on the Georgian bay which are reached by the Canadian Pacific railway and by the Grand Trunk railway, this grain could be distributed throughout the different provinces of Canada. In addition to that a large portion of the grain from the north western states goes to the eastern and northeastern states via this route. This grain can be delivered from Montreal to eastern and northeastern states as cheaply as it can be delivered from the port of Buffalo, therefore it should be the object of the Government, by all possible means, to endeavour to divert that trade into the channels to which I have referred, and prevent its going to Buffalo. We are building up in Canada a large marine trade. Hon. gentlemen who do not live near the Grand Lakes have no conception of the immensity of the trade that is done to-day on these lakes; less have they any idea of the size of the vessels engaged in that trade. When I tell hon. gentlemen that in these Georgian Bay ports during the season of navigation they can see vessels carrying half a million bushels of grain of the value of half a million dollars, involving a total investment, including cargo, of $1,000,000, it will be at once apparent to them that a large and increasing trade is being done. If we are to carry that trade through Canadian channels, then the result will be the building up of a Canadian fleet, the giving of employment to Canadians on the vessels, and the grain in turn will be carried over Canadian railways. What avail is it to Canada if forty million bushels of grain are placed in American bottoms at Fort William, carried to Buffalo on American railways, and transported to the city of New York? That is no benefit to Canada at all; it does not leave one cent in the country. But if by the means I have indicated you can transfer that forty million bushels of grain to ports on the Georgian bay, hand it over then to the Canadian Pacific railway and to the Grand Trunk railway, and to their many branch lines and direct connections to New York and other United States ports, you would give to the Canadian railway companies a large amount of trade. We are handicapped in Canada in respect of this carrying trade. There is no doubt about it that when the port of Montreal is closed we are under the disadvantage of a severe handicap. I believe, as I was informed very credibly a short time ago, that the Canadian Pacific railway recently made this arrangement: they carried to the Suspension bridge ten million bushels of grain, which was then handed over to the New York Central railway to be carried down to New York for export to England and other European countries. What did that mean? It meant that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were better satisfied to have the profit that would enure to them by the carrying of the grain from Fort William to the Suspension bridge than to carry it to Halifax or St. John, N.B. What is to be done to better these conditions? In the first place, the great handicap exists at Montreal, because the grain trade is not in full force and in full volume until the port of Montreal is on the point of closing up for the winter. The port of Montreal is invariably closed on November 26 or 27, and it is just about that time of the year that the grain is being pushed forward in the greatest volume. The result is that these large United States freighters, capable of carrying half a million bushels, come to Fort William, load up there—because it is no contravention of the coasting laws to ply between a Canadian port and a United States port—go down to Buffalo, tax the elevator accommodation there to its uttermost and those that cannot be accommodated become floating storehouses, until the grain can be unloaded later. Canada thereby lost last year the carrying by Canadian vessels and Canadian railways of the immense amount of 40,000,000 bushels of grain. This Government has now embarked on what to my mind is going to be a damaging project: the deepening of the Welland canal, but that is a matter of Government policy. No word of mine can stay it now, and I only hope and trust that it will not be a mistake. But if the vessels of the United States were able last year to come to our Canadian ports at Fort William and Port Arthur and take 40,000,000 bushels of grain from there to Buffalo, when the Welland canal is deepened to 25 or 30 feet, and will accommodate these large lake freighters, will they not be able then to take another 40,000,000 bushels of grain to Oswego, which is a shorter rail haul than to New York from Buffalo? Are we going to build up a merchant marine fleet in Canada? We are trying to do it. My hon. friend the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) is one of the owners of a large line of freighters on the lakes. To-day they are building—and I am glad they are doing so, because it gives that much more employment to Canada, and increases Canadian tonnage to that extent—an immense barge capable of carrying 10,000 tons. In the shipyards at Port Arthur the company commonly known as the Richelieu Amalgamated Company is building a huge barge capable of carrying some 10,000 tons.

And to-day in the town of Sarnia there is a vessel receiving her finishing touches, one of the finest vessels on the lakes, I suppose she will be the Empress of the Great Lakes, outstripping in stability and grandeur anything on the American side as a passenger steamer. While capital in this country is being invested along these lines to build up the trade of the country, why should not Canada, through its Parliament and its Government, take steps to prevent the trade from slipping from Canadian channels and being diverted into American? I believe it can be done but it can only be done by closing the doors before the horse is stolen. I am not addressing myself to this matter from a local point of view at all. I live in a section of the country which has risen to what was prophesied years ago that an enormous quantity of grain would be carried through that point. Twenty years ago when the late Mr. Hays paid his first visit to Midland, when I went with the mayor to call on him as an act of courtesy, he said that when the Grand Trunk had their line completed through to Montreal with better grades they hoped to be able to carry not only Canadian grain to Montreal but also to carry a large portion of the American grain. And what has the foresight of the Canadian Pacific railway done? Grades were against them, distances were against them from Owen Sound to Montreal. At a cost of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 they, without any government subvention, built a line from their own town of Port McNichol across to a point near Peterborough, eliminating grades, making a perfect roadbed, and to-day you can see a train moving out loaded with 60,000 bushels of grain. In consultation with a leading official of the Canadian Pacific railway I was told that they hoped not only to carry through the Canadian channel, by Canadian vessels and by Canadian railways, the grain of the Canadian northwest to an immense extent, but to go right into Duluth and take the grain away from the American vessels and railroads, grain intended for distribution to the eastern States and also all through Canada. What is the handicap at Montreal? I do not live in Montreal so I do not know the facts, but if I am correctly informed, and I think I am well within the mark, ocean vessels were lying in Montreal for twenty days at a time and Great Lake barges lay there from ten to twenty days at a time. Why? Because there was not sufficient elevator accommodation. I do not believe it is the business of the Government or of the country or that it will ever be the business of private capital to build such elevators simply for the purpose of storing grain but if they could keep a perpetual stream of grain passing through they could make money but they cannot keep them there perpetually or for a great length of time simply for the storage of grain. What to my mind must be done is to secure better ocean rates from Canada to the Old Country. That matter has been placed before the Government. It has had a sympathetic hearing and that is all. Why cannot this Government engage in the institution and forming of an insurance business for lake freight and ocean freight in this country? If our vessel interests on the Great Lakes and on the ocean are unjustly discriminated against by the American and British companies let this Government form itself into a business proposition and give to the vessel interests of this country such rates of insurance that they will be able to compete with the out-going freight on vessels from New York. This matter should commend itself to the Government at the very earliest day. We have great advantages in this country to develop that trade to go by the north shore of Manitoulin island and by these two great railway systems and ports on the Georgian bay. When I speak of these two great railways let hon. gentlemen consider that the Grand Trunk have not only one line of railway from the Georgian bay but two because they own the railway from Depot Harbour, so the Grand Trunk have two lines by which they can carry the grain to the northeastern States as well as to our own Canadian ports or even to New York itself. If there is danger of accident and catastrophe on the Great Lakes, if they occur on the four lakes, Ontario, Erie, Superior and Huron, surely they will be minimized if the trade only has to run the length of one lake and if the danger is minimized surely the insurance can be kept down. If you discuss this matter with a vessel man he will say there is a uniform rate of insurance whether to Buffalo or Georgian bay ports. In the first place Canada has a great advantage or should have over the United States in the matter of insurance in this that, while I have never seen a compilation of figures, I think I am well within the mark in saying that insurance companies, prior to last year when the catastrophies occurred on lake Huron, paid more insurance losses for collisions between Sarnia and Detroit than on all the lakes put together. Why is that? Because there are narrow places and you see the huge vessels going up and down—and I think I am within the mark when I say every five minutes a vessel passes up or down—in the fall of the year when there may be snowstorms or heavy fog there are a great many collisions and as a result a great deal of money has been lost by the insurance companies. More than that every vessel that goes to a point on the Georgian bay will make three trips there as against one trip to Buffalo. Surely that is a manifest advantage when you consider the size of a boat carrying 500,000 bushels of grain where the rate may be as high as 3 cents a bushel. There is a saving of two trips. Then there is another question of importance and that is that by our route there is no detention. Reading the vessel reports you will often see a whole fleet delayed at lake St. Clair or some other narrow point by reason of a heavy fog when there is no possibility of moving forward and they all come to a halt for fear of accident. I believe that this country and this Parliament could well address themselves to the task of discussing a matter of this kind. It is not a purely local matter, it is not even a provincial matter, it is a matter of great importance to the whole country. Surely it is a matter of importance to the farmer of the West if he can lessen his freight rates and to the manufacturer in the East if he can carry back his manufactured goods at a lower rate. I wish that hon. gentlemen in this Chamber would visit some of these ports on the Great Lakes and see the possibilities there are there for the development of the carrying trade of the country. The Canadian Pacific railway alone employ over 75,000 men and, taking four per family, that means the up-keeping by that company of a population of 300,000. The Grand Trunk railway must have almost a similar number and therefore it is to our manifest advantage that the railway interests of this country should be advanced so that the Canadian Pacific railway will employ not 75,000 men, but double 75,000 and every other company may be increased proportionately. I am addressing myself to these two matters because they affect the part of the community to which I belong and from which I come, and the people of my constituency are deeply interested in this whole question. They are vitally interested in the two questions. I think I can fairly say that the iron industry, affecting as it does every province of this Dominion, has made the province of Nova Scotia, and I ask hon. gentlemen where would the province of Nova Scotia have been to-day had it not been for the development of the iron industry? Where would the thousands of young men in this province have been? Certainly not in that province where they have passed into the ranks of mechanics and artisans of a high grade. This industry has affected the development of the whole country. Why, therefore, not develop in New Brunswick, where they have those splendid areas of iron ore, a large iron and steel business? Why not develop these industries in the province of Ontario, where we have large iron deposits? Go into the county of Hastings, and you will find that they have them there, go to Port Arthur and Fort William, and you will find that they have them adjoining those cities. Let us spend our energies and bring our arguments to bear upon the Government in order that this iron industry may be developed. The coming into the Chamber of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) reminds me of the fact that within the past year a smelter has been established at Port Colborne. This should be backed up. The duty on pig iron should be raised to such an extent, in my opinion, whether it should be $5 a ton or $6 a ton, that the Canadian market would be guaranteed to the Canadian producer of pig iron, with the result that this great industry would give employment to thousands of men in this country. Open up and develop the mines and keep within our own borders the wealth that is now going to the neighbouring republic.

I am not going into many of the other questions that have been discussed. They will be discussed, no doubt, on the Budget. I am a believer in this, that we here in Canada have been galloping at too fast a gait. We have had too much gambling in the Northwest in lands. Go to any town in the province of Ontario, and what is the statement that will be made to you? Men here are hard up by reason of the fact that they have been making payments on land in the Northwest. With all my friends who have come down from the Northwest, it is all one and the same story—they have been indiscreet, they have got property rich, they have been buying lands very freely, and as a consequence they have not been able to pay their agricultural implement and store bills. But these things are all going to level themselves up. This country is only on the edge of its development. I saw it stated the other day by Mr. Michener, the leader of the Opposition in the Alberta Legislature, that in Alberta only two per cent of the arable land is under cultivation. I have heard the statement made, and I believe it is within the mark, that the province of Saskatchewan has less than ten per cent of its arable land cultivated, and the old province of Manitoba still has large areas of land that have not been taken up. What does it mean to Canada, to us here in Eastern Canada, who have felt the throb of development in the building up of our industries and factories as a result of the settlement in the West of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of farmers? When there comes a production from that western country, not of 200,000,000 bushels, but of ten times 200,000,000 bushels of grain, and when Canada has three great Transcontinental railways in full operation, it will mean everything not only for Eastern Canada but for Western Canada. Let hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House look before them and see what is going on in this country. Look at the railway construction that is being commenced to-day, the branch lines in the Northwest. True, in old Ontario we are not having new lines of railway constructed such as we had in years past. We are having dry docks built at Vancouver and at Sault Ste. Marie, and there is an expectation of others being built at different points. We are having grain elevators constructed; a new one is being built for the Canadian Pacific railway at Port McNichol. In the West we see indications that flour mills are to be erected in anticipation of the flour traffic westward by way of the Panama canal. We have the ship-building industry that I have referred to before. On all sides we see the prospect of the coming to Canada of thousands of people. Not only from Great Britain and from Europe, but from the United States the tide of immigration has set in for Canada. We are the only country in the world to-day that has unbounded areas of land to give free to the man who wishes to come in and become a citizen of this great country. Let the beacon lights of Canada for years to come be hope in Canadians and faith in Canada.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I must compliment the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. W. H. Bennett) on the excellent speech he has made. I have heard him speak in this House quite a number of times when he was formerly a member, and since he became a member recently, and I must say, after listening to the speech he made to-night, at the same time not wishing to cast any reflection upon the speeches of hon. gentlemen who preceded him, that we should have more of these speeches in this debate and in the House.

With the example before me I am going to try and deal with one or two questions that should be of practical interest to the country, and I propose to do it in a very short time. I was attracted and much pleased with the announcement made by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) this afternoon that we are at last to have parcel post in this country. There is a saying in the Bible that bread cast upon the waters will return after many days. Some of us have cast bread on the waters of this Parliament in favour of parcel post, and we see a realization of our hopes in the coming back of the bread on these waters now. While it may be said that progress is slow in this country, still we are always making some progress, and I congratulate the hon. Postmaster General on the announcement this afternoon that at last we are to have parcel post. I hope he will make his experiment on the largest possible lines, that he will take heart from the splendid success of parcel post in the United States, and that when he introduces the system next month the terms will be liberal, the service will be wide, and that the benefits will be appreciated in every portion of the country.

It is our privilege in the debate on the Address to bring up general topics, or topics of interest to various sections of the country, and I hope that privilege will long continue. I propose to-night to refer to two or three things, but before doing so I would just like to lay down two underlying principles that I think are now recognized more or less by all Canadians. The two things that strike one most in a review of the history of Canada are, first, the long struggle to obtain self-government in this country as against the mother land. That took years and years. It required over a century of effort to obtain anything like self-government in this country, but we have it to-day, and we look upon it as the most valuable thing we have under our system of government—namely, the right to manage our own affairs absolutely independent of the mother country. That, to my mind, comes up perhaps in connection with the question of naval defence, and I may be permitted to refer to that a little later on. There is another great underlying principle in connection with our country which is perhaps not recognized by all of us, but which must be recognized virtually by most of us, and that is that if we have achieved our political independence in this country as against the mother country, and if we have self-government, we have also achieved another great principle, and that is complete independence for Canada to control her fiscal policy independently of the United States. That took a long while to achieve, and the right hon. gentleman in a way was perhaps not opposed to it, but he did try to develop in this country the idea of commercial union, and later on reciprocity, and his experience must now demonstrate to him that while, as I think, he has the interest of this country at heart, the thing he thought to achieve in the way he thought to achieve it was against the wishes of the majority of the people in Canada who are determined above all, not only to have political independence and to uphold self-government as against the mother country, but determined to uphold the principles of being absolutely independent of the United States in the matter of their fiscal tariff. I do not cast any reflection on the right hon. gentleman for maintaining that position because we know that, Ephraim came down to history because he was wedded to his idols, and the right hon. gentleman may go down to history for his fidelity to his views.

My conception of Canadian history is that it teaches the two great principles of the right of self-government and the right to form our commercial and fiscal policy independent of the United States, and that Canadians are going to assert those principles under every circumstance. In connection with the debate on the Naval Aid Bill, it was a matter of regret to me that suggestions were made in this House which looked to the abandonment of the idea of absolute self-government and of Canada being mistress of her own destinies.

I come now to matters of direct and present concern. We have had a great deal of what we call national policy in this country; we have had national policy in the interest of the manufacturers and for the encouragement of home industries of all kinds; we have had national policy in the matter of railroad building and we have spent immense sums of money and incurred enormous liabilities in that respect;

10 p.m. and last session we had what perhaps might be called national policy with regard to banking, because we passed a law which was thought to be in the interests of the banking institutions of the country, and with which they are satisfied. But, Sir, the day has come when we must have a national policy for the farmers of Canada, and I now demand a national policy for the farmers of the Canadian Northwest in the direction of the abolition of the duty on wheat, so that these farmers may get what they want in their own interest. The farmers of the Canadian West want free wheat for two reasons: first, because they say they can get a better price for their wheat in the United States, and, secondly, because they contend they get better freight rates for the wheat they export to Europe if they send it by the American railroads. I believe it has been established that the price of wheat is better on the average in the American market, and that the railroad rates in the United States to-day are more favourable to the producer than are the Canadian railroad rates. These two things having been established, it is our duty in the interest of the farmer of the great west to withdraw the duty on wheat and thereby secure the entrance of Canadian wheat into the United States. It may be charged that in this I am abandoning my views with regard to protection. I do not know that I am, but if my views or if anybody's views on the subject of protection happen to be wrong or happen not to suit the requirements of to-day, then it is well that these views should be modified. But I think I will be able to show that I will have to abandon very little of my protectionist views to secure a great benefit for the farmers of the West. It has been said that free wheat would be detrimental to the Canadian railways and detrimental to the Canadian millers. I purpose answering that later, but in the meantime I say that I do not wish it to be thought that the Canadian millers are dependent on the legislation of the United States to keep their milling industry in this country. If it is necessary to keep the milling industry in Canada, I say now that we will have to find some method of our own to do so. If the Canadian farmer in the West—and he is now up against it, and we all admit he is up against it, and he has had a hard time with stringent money and discouragement of one kind and another—if the Canadian farmer in the West is suffering, then it is our duty to come to his relief and to give him the benefit of this American market where the prices are better, and to give him also the benefit of cheaper transportation over the American railways.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us how much was the price of wheat in the United States higher than the price in Canada during each month of the past year? The hon. gentleman might also tell us to what extent freight rates are lower in the United States than they are in Canada?

Mr. MACLEAN: If the hon. gentleman wants to have that question answered, let him go to the farmers of the Canadian West.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: That is not an answer.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is quite a sufficient answer. I have watched the progress of the agitation; I have seen it discussed in the newspapers; and I think the farmers of the West know what is good for them. Am I to understand from the hon. gentleman that the price of wheat is less in the United States than it is in Canada?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: During a large portion of this year it was.

Mr. MACLEAN: How is it then that shipments of wheat are going from Canada to the United States now and paying the duty? It may be that at times the price was higher in Canada, but what I say is that on the average the price is higher in the United States. We have the resolutions passed by the farmers themselves, and my hon. friend will not dispute that the farmers who have the experience know what they are talking about. Anybody who has read the long and careful investigation made by the Winnipeg Free Press in regard to freight rates in the West, must admit that a case has been made out that rates are lower on American railways, and that the price of wheat on the average is better in the Canadian market. It is our duty to do something for the farmer. Other hon. members have made speeches to that effect.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do you mean farmers or wheat growers?

Mr. MACLEAN: I will say wheat growers. The man who grows wheat is a citizen of this country and requires our protection. Of course, I would like to see him a mixed farmer, and the way to make him a mixed farmer is to show him that he is getting the best price for his wheat. Mixed farming is coming in the West, and a better system of farming is coming in Ontario. But to-day the farmers of the West are more or less discouraged. If I can believe the letters which I get, and all that I read and hear, and the resolutions that are passed, I know that the people who are asking for relief are the farmers of the West, and they are asking for relief in regard to railway freight rates and the price of wheat.

I come now to the question as to whether the railways will be injured or not and whether the millers of western wheat will be injured or not. A great cry has gone forth that they will be. It is also put forward that the eastern wheat grower will be more or less injured if we have free wheat. After analysing most of these statements, and I have got some capacity for getting at the truth of a statement, I find that this cry of free wheat is almost altogether from the railways of this country and partly from the milling interests of this country. Canadian railways can carry that wheat for less, and the moment they have the competition of the American railways they will come down to American rates, and they can keep their freight if they wish to.

The same is the case with the millers. Do you mean to tell me that Canadian millers, with their mills almost at the seat of production of the wheat, cannot compete with the American millers? I say that they can; I say that they are ready for the business. Of course they would like to keep the monopoly they have to-day in regard to wheat milling in this country, and they have got a great monopoly. They are well linked up together and are in a position, by reason of their monopoly and the association of the railways, to keep down the price of wheat. Thus in two ways the Canadian farmer will benefit. They will benefit by the competition of American railways and they will benefit by the fact that the millers will have to come up to the mark and give them more for their Canadian wheat if they want to grind it in their mills. If I thought for one moment that the Canadian mills would be in danger, I as a life-long protectionist might be inclined to listen to their views, but I have made a full investigation of the matter and, to the best of my mind, the Canadian railways can stand a reduction in the freight rates, and the Canadian mills can stand the competition and can give more for the Canadian wheat and can still keep the business.

In connection with that, there is also the question of the offal from grinding grain, for the purpose of feeding stock. The farmers of the West ought to go more into mixed farming. They ought to abandon that business of being merely wheat growers and become out-and-out farmers. They ought to feed the offal of that wheat, ground in Canadian mills, to Canadian cattle. In that new national policy for the benefit of the farmers, which I think we ought to have in this country, we cannot too soon come to the idea that we must stop slaughtering our young cattle, and that we ought to use all the offal of the wheat ground in Canadian mills for feeding live stock on Canadian farms. There is a good national policy for the farmers, and I am for it, and it is because I am for it that I am making this statement to-night.

My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) says: Oh, we may lose this cattle-feeding business in this country; our cattle will all go over to the States, and our bran and shorts will go over there, and the Americans will feed it to our cattle. Then so much the worse for Canada. If it has that tendency, then under that principle, which I asserted here previously this evening, that we have the right to make our own fiscal policy and be independent of the United States, it is for us to do it here. If it is found that the millers of this country cannot grind our wheat under the competition of the American railways for the freight, then it is up to this Parliament and to the Conservative party now in power and to the party which opposed reciprocity two years ago, to make a national policy in this country such that it will keep this business here. We should not depend for the retaining of that business upon fiscal legislation passed by the United States. That is my idea of a national policy and that is my idea of what Canada ought to stand for.

Mr. EDWARDS: How?

Mr. MACLEAN: I can keep the milling industry here by a bounty on milling. I can frame up a policy that will encourage the growing of live stock in this country.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would you have a bounty for that too?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not know whether I would or not. I am not against giving bounties; I was born that way. I hope the hon. gentleman is not taking the position that the national policy for the encouragement of home industry in this country ought to be based upon the legislation of the United States. That is what it comes down to. If it goes abroad that this Canadian Parliament is looking to the United States duty on wheat to keep their industries at home and to encourage their home industries, President Wilson will be down to-morrow with a Bill taking off the duty on wheat, whether we care to do anything or not. That is what we are up against. Most likely he will do it, but in the meantime, do not let the Canadian farmer of the West suffer from present conditions. Take the Canadian farmer out of bondage, and he is in bondage to-day to the railways and to the mills. When I say that the railways can stand a reduction in their freight rates, let me give you the instance of the enormous wealth of the great Canadian Pacific railway in this country. Can any Conservative member stand up in this House and say that he justifies our present railway policy, which is a discrimination in Canadian freight rates as against the Canadian West. The whole country paid for these railways or for the most of them. We passed the legislation and we are here to pass legislation, the result of which will be fair treatment throughout Canada. And, though we have been passing legislation dealing with railways for twenty-two years since I first came here, and long before that, I have never yet heard the voice of the man I would like to hear declaring on behalf of the West: We refuse to let any legislation go through this House until the principle of equality of freight rates in this country is inscribed in the Statute Book and not left to the Railway Commission. Who is there, who claims to be a Canadian and says he believes in fair railway rates and equality of treatment, who could justify the discrimination that has been put upon the West, that stigma that has been put upon them that although they pay their share of the customs duties and of everything else in this country, for some reason they, for all time, are to pay railway rates that discriminate against them. I contend that the Canadian Pacific railway has in its charter to-day a condition under which it ought to give lower rates to the people of the West. If you tell me that the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern railway, who are coming into the field, could not stand the reduction in rates that the Canadian Pacific railway would stand; I would reply that some kind of national policy should be devised that would help them out for the time, and that the people of the West should not be allowed to continue under this unjust and unfair condition of railway rates. Nobody has ever justified it yet. The Railway Commission may be trying to justify it, or may be trying to wipe it out. My contention is—and I will stand by it every day in the week—that the time has come for equality of railway rates as between the East and the West. I contend that the farmer of the West is entitled to the best market for his wheat and to the lowest possible freight rate. I know just what the people of the West want, I have no doubt about it; and I am here to-night to urge the Government when considering their tariff, and in any changes they may have to announce in connection with the Budget speech — especially in view of their statement in this debate that the interests of the farmers of this country is to be their first concern — to give consideration to the prayer of the farmers of of the West that they may be given free wheat in order that they may get better prices, and also given equal freight rates with the East. I may have to discuss this question at a greater length on a subsequent occasion during the present session. But I think I am doing a very practical service to the country by bringing the subject forward and giving what I think are sufficient reasons for the position I have taken.

Now, I wish to deal briefly with another question that I have raised pretty often in this House, and that is the capitalization of railways. That question has been brought to our attention again by the action of the Canadian Pacific railway in its last issue of capital. I have heard very prominent men in this House, especially lawyers, and more especially ministers of justice, say that the question of capitalization is of no interest to the people, that it does not matter to the people what capital the railways issue. Will anybody look at the United States to-day and see what has taken place there in regard to the over-capitalization of railways, see how the New York and New Haven and Boston and Maine roads have been wrecked and reduced to absolutely non-paying propositions by reason of over capitalization, and repeat here again the statements I have heard made in this House by men in high positions supposed to be authorities on this question? Over capitalization is a curse; it is against the public, against the State, against the railway itself. But the air is clearing in the United States. A statement was made there the other day by the President of the United States which, I think, settles the question for good. I heard the other day that our Minister of Finance was considering the question and would perhaps issue a commission to ascertain the facts in regard to the capitalization of railways. I do not know whether I am correct in saying that, I merely heard it incidentally. But we do not want any commission after the lucid deliverance that was made by Mr. Wilson when he addressed Congress the other day. I will read his words:

> In the second place, business men as well as those who direct public affairs now recognize, and recognize with painful clearness, the great harm and injustice which has been done to many if not all of the great railroad systems of the country by the way in which they have been financed and their own distinctive interests subordinated to the interests of the men who financed them and of other business enterprises which those men wished to promote.
>
> The country is ready, therefore, to accept, and accept with relief as well as approval, a law which will confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to superintend and regulate the financial operations by which the railroads are henceforth to be supplied with the money they need for their proper development to meet the rapidly-growing requirements of the country for increased and improved facilities for transportation.
> We cannot postpone action in this matter without leaving the railroads exposed to many serious handicaps and hazards; and the prosperity of the railroads and the prosperity of the country are inseparably connected.

The time has come when we must regulate the capitalization of the railroads and other corporations of this country. Overcapitalization has been a curse. I say, it has wrecked railroad after railroad in the United States. Attempts have been made under State laws to regulate the capitalization there. Wherever this has been done the benefits have been substantial and the results have been greatly appreciated by the public. But the time has come in regard to railroad corporations when the federal authority must control the issue of capital. And the wise thing for us in this country as I have often contended in this House—and both parties are to blame that it was so, and the worst thing ever done in that thing in this country, I have often contended in this House and both parties are to blame for it—was the way we allowed the Canadian Pacific railway to issue stock on which a high dividend had to be paid, against an issue of bonds which would have been sufficient for all their purposes. I hope and trust that in the new Railway Bill which is to come down, I do not know whether it is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but I have seen it stated in the newspapers that such a Bill was to be introduced—there will be a section vesting the control of capitalization of railways in the Railway Commission. I hope the Minister of Railways will also put on the statute book a principle of equality of freight rates in this country. It is a principle that Parliament must settle. It is absurd to say that such a principle must be left to the Railway Commission. If the assertion of the principle means that freight rates may have to go up a little, if we put the principle on the staute books, it will be the duty of the Railway Commission to adjust the rates all over the country so that there may be equality. I want to see the man rise in this House who will say that, notwithstanding that railways cost no more to build and to run in the West than in the East, there should be higher prices in the West than in the East. If the feeling in this House is, as I believe it to be, in favour of equality of freight rates, then that should be put on the Statute book and not left to the unsafe action of a Railway Commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am largely disposed to agree with what my hon. friend says about over-capitalization, but he said that it was over-capitalization that had brought the Boston and Maine railroad to its present condition. Can he explain that?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes. A man died recently in the United States, having first made a confession of faith and of his belief in the Christian religion. If any hon. gentleman will refer to recent issues of the New York World he will see it plainly set out that the late Mr. Morgan and Mr. J. D. Rockfeller were at the bottom of a scheme for buying up all kinds of trolley, steamship, or subsidiary lines at the rate of say $8,000,000 each, and the next minute selling them to the New York, New Haven and Hartford railway or the Boston and Maine railroad for $25,000,000. The shareholders of the big road, many of whom are poor people of New England, can ill afford to be looted by schemers unloading such worthless propositions and getting four times what they pay for them in paid-up stock of the great company. That is the way it is done, and it can be done here. The President of the United States now says, in the presence of Congress, which will carry out his wishes, that within a very few weeks no railway shall issue any securities without first receiving the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And we want that here. It is provided by Act of Parliament in some way that the Canadian Pacific railway shall consult the Governor in Council in regard to some of their issues, but they have not done so, and they have gone round the corner and put out this note issue. I do not believe they wanted the money, but they wanted to do some melon cutting for the benefit of their shareholders. I do not think it has been a very successful issue; something has happened since these melons were cut by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and it is this: The net shrinkage in Canadian Pacific securities since this melon cutting began,—having regard to all the issues that have been made since—is $150,000,000. It has been ascertained by the investors in these securities that this cutting of melons and unnecessary enlargement of stock is not a good business transaction for that railway. I want to see legislation in this country providing that all our railroads, large and small, must subject the issue of their securities to the control of some responsible body. It is in the public interest that they should be so controlled, because the increasing of the issues is done with a view to imposing greater burdens on the people. That has been established and admitted on all sides, and you will see legislation in the United States this year in that direction.

We have entered upon a policy of great expenditure in the way of ports and terminals in this country. We are to make Montreal a great terminal port, and the same may be said of Quebec, St. John, Halifax, and I think I heard an hon. gentleman say this afternoon that he hoped Sydney would be included also.

Mr. ROGERS: What about Vancouver?

Mr. MACLEAN: I hope my hon. friend will make Vancouver a terminal port also. It is the duty of the Government to implement that policy by taking control of the terminals in the great inland cities of Canada, and my proposition here to-night is that the Government ought to take over the terminals in the city of Ottawa and Toronto. I have been coming to Ottawa for over twenty years, always landing a mile from the station, in spite of the fact that there is a splendid terminal in the centre, and all the railways ought to come in at that one terminal. Public ownership of railways is coming gradually in this country, and we are perhaps beginning right by taking over the terminals at the seaports, but we should take over the terminals in the inland cities also. The Minister of Railways ought to call together representatives of all the railways that come into this city and say to them: you must get together, join all your sidings and put them under an independent company, or in the hands of the Government—I would prefer the latter. Then if we were to bring the Intercolonial into this city to-morrow, we could bring it into a terminal owned by the people. In Toronto, where we are spending millions at the present time on harbour improvements, I would like to see the Government take over the terminals there, and build a great terminal station, perhaps in the upper portion of the city, bringing all the railways together, and taking over all the sidings, of which there are an immense number, making the terminal and the sidings national, and providing that their use shall be open to everybody. Let there be no preference in it; and some day, when we want to bring the Intercolonial to Toronto, we will have a proper terminal for it to come to. We ought to place these terminals at Halifax, St. John, Montreal and Quebec absolutely in the hands of the state, and I hope that is the intention. We ought to do it in Ottawa, in Toronto, in Winnipeg, and in some of the other western cities, thus getting ready for public ownership of railways in Canada. I believe the opportunity is rapidly coming of nationalizing one or more of the railroads of this country in the public interest. I believe a good step in this country towards the improvement of transportation would be to connect the Intercolonial railway with one or two transcontinental railways and to own the terminals in all the cities. We would then be in a stronger position, and be better able to regulate the railway rates. Transportation is an ever-present issue with every progressive country today. With Bismarck railways was the great issue; Lord Salisbury when Prime Minister of England said that railway transportation was the greatest political question in the world. It is coming to be the greatest question in the United States. Public ownership, to my mind, is coming fast in the United States. The railways have been exploited by adventurers to such an extent that they are almost stranded, and if they are not allowed to raise the rates according to the request they are now making, they will say to the Government: well then, you take over the railways and run them as best you can. That feeling is in the air in the United States; it is more than in the air here, and the way to prepare for it, according to my judgment, is, if we are to provide for terminals at the ports, that we should own and control the terminals in all the great cities. This will be a step nearer to public ownership of our railways.

I wish to make one or two remarks with regard to the Banking Bill that was passed last session, and the effect of it. We have a money stringency in this country to-day; everybody admits that. They have had panics in the United States, and for a long while they have been trying to correct them. Only a few weeks ago a new currency and banking bill was passed in the United States Congress. I devoted some attention to this question when the Banking Act was before the House last session, and when the Bill was first introduced I said that I was more interested in questions of currency, savings banks and the national note issue, than in the mere organization of a bank. A bank is only an organization like a wholesale grocery so far as that is concerned, but we sat weeks and weeks considering and all the Banking Acts we have had in this country have dealt with the question of the organization of the banks. The greatest issue in the matter of banking is not the organization of a bank but the organization of the currency of the country and the creation of a great credit for the business interests of the country. I tried to have some attention given to the question of currency and how to increase the available money in this country for the benefit of the business of the country, but I could not make any headway. Hon. gentlemen will probably recall a speech I made in the House on that very question. I was put down up in the committee as a kind of a numbskull who did not know what I was talking about when I talked of currency, but the things I said there, in a very surprising way have come true in the United States. The question there was absolutely one of currency and the money available for the credit of the business of the country, and what have they done? They have first of all declared that the concentration of all the available money of the country in New York was against the public interest and they have substituted for that a system of regional banks which may be twelve in number scattered over the country where there will be great reserve stations. They have also adopted another principle for the first time in America and we want it here in Canada badly. It is a prinicple that has been admitted in Europe for one hundred years and that is the principle of re-discounting. They adopted this principle of re-discounting, which simply is that any bank in the United States that is a member of a regional bank and has good securities to offer can take its securities to this bank and get national notes therefor and the national notes are as good as gold. They get these national notes and relieve the money stringency. The condition of affairs in Canada is that if any bank in this country finds that it has lent out too much money to its customers and that its depositors are asking for their money back, if it should go out in the street and offer to re-discount any of its paper its standing would be immediately questioned and it would be said that the bank was hard up. The Bank of England any day it finds that it wants more money actually sends its men out into the street and calls in brokers and other banks and says: we want £1,000,000; here is the paper we have discounted, A 1 commercial paper. We discounted it at 4½ per cent. We want the money, we will let you have it at 4§ per cent, we will lose money but we are glad to lose it, we need the money and they thus get it for their business. That great principle of re-discounting in connection with banks has been made the law in the United States, and it absolutely provides flexibility of currency. It is backed up by what? Not by the issue of bank notes, but by the issue of national notes secured by a proper gold reserve in Washington.

What is the difference between the Canadian banks and the United States banks under that system? The Canadian banks are engaged every morning in two things. The first thing the smaller banks have got to take care of is their own circulation, and if they have paid out a lot of notes they know they have to take care of them in the clearing house that day. But that is not the only thing they have to take care of. They do not know what depositors of theirs the day before may have more or less lost confidence in them and perhaps written out cheques for the whole of their deposits in the bank. Such cheques would be put in the clearing house by another bank and would come to them at 11 o'clock in the morning and they would have to provide for them. To-day the Canadian banks are themselves afraid of the country, afraid of one another, and they have immense reserves ready. Some of them say they have 62 per cent of all their money in liquid assets, and yet they will not let it out because they are afraid of these two things; they cannot rediscount, and they have to take care of their own issue and he ready to pay depositors who call for their money

The day has come when bank notes must be withdrawn in this country and national notes must take their place, and we can give these banks a better currency and give it to them on deposit at 2 per cent, and they will make more money out of that than from their own issues. If they can re-discount there will not be a bank that will be afraid to extend its credit to its customers; it will know that we have the system of one great national bank in this country doing the business of the country in the way of re-discounts and issuing of national notes. They can get relief immediately there. The other thing is that the Government of the United States to-day is a partner in the banking business of that country, and the profits over a certain point are to be shared with the country; and the banks in the United States, and the President of the United States and the Government of the United States will hereafter have a say, as the Government of France has a say, and the Government of Germany and the Government of every country in Europe, with the exception of Great Britain, has a say in the rate of discount that prevails in the country. It would be a good thing for the farmers of the West if somebody here in actual authority had something to say about the rate of interest which the banks have been charging out there. There is another discrimination put on the people of the West; 10 per cent interest is the rule out there because we have permitted higher freight rates to be charged the farmer in the West than are charged in the East, and the farmer of the West, I am afraid, will have to put up with it until he rises and says it has got to stop. We must have in this country the improved system of banking which they have in the United States and in all Europe, and we cannot have it too soon. If there is a money stringency here now there will be another stringency subsequently and this will often occur. The way to head off a money stringency is to have a means of credit, a flexibility in the currency of the country by the system of rediscounts controlled by the state and the use of national notes, sufficiently secured by gold and other reserves of the nation; and when you have that there cannot be a money stringency such as we have had in this country, and such as they have had in the United States. The proof of it is this: A short time ago when the banks of the United States were prepared to take advantage of the American people by reason of the stringency, the present Secretary of the Treasury, a very progressive man, Mr. McAdoo, said: 'I have $500,000,000 of the nation's money, and I will lend it to any bank.' The rate of interest that was threatened was never put into force, money got plentiful and money will be enormously plentiful in the United States by reason of that improved banking system. When we dealt with the organization of banks last session we did not deal with the question of currency. We absolutely neglected it and if we want to bring the country back to prosperity we have to revise our currency laws. The nation must have a lot to say in regard to banking and must make provision for rediscount, for a plentiful supply of national notes properly secured by gold reserves. If we do that we will do something to help and benefit this country. The banks to-day, under the present system, cannot find the currency necessary for this country and that was the reason for the subterfuge that was adopted last year of creating a gold reserve in Montreal. Any one who wishes to see that it was only a subterfuge and has not increased the currency should read an editorial in the Montreal Telegraph of a few months ago written, I imagine, by the late Minister of Finance. I read that article with great interest. It confirms my views and I wish to say that the currency question is another question that has been absolutely neglected in this country for years and years. We have been working under an old system, so have the people in the United States; but they have instituted reforms in this respect, they have shown the way as they are showing the way to us now in a great many things. If you wish to see progressive legislation here you have to look for it in the United States and in England. The greatest progressive legislation is going on in the United States. The people there were awakened some years ago. They had been brought up to believe that they had the greatest government and the greatest constitution in all the world.

The fathers of their constitution were treated as fathers of the church are now treated by good churchmen. When you come to an actual investigation, their constitution amounts to very little and great monopolies and very unfair things were permitted under it. There was child labour in that new country and there were slums all over the United States. Nearly everything was found to be bad, the Government was bad, the constitution was archaic.

But the people started to read books on political economy, and the magazines started to discuss these questions in a way that the public press had neglected. The attitude of the public press towards a great many of these questions has been surprising. I have been identified with the press for quite a while and I still say this, that a newspaper has no right to assert that it is possessed of the gospel unless it is the true gospel that it preaches. Newspapers think they have a divine right and, but if you investigate the history of the United States for the past thirty years you will find that the newspapers have been gradually going against the people and that the magazines have come to the relief of the people. The people began to read these books on political economy and as a result to-day there is a wave of political reform in the United States. They are making a degree of progress in that direction that may well attract our attention. They are older than we are and they have had more experience than we have. They have reformed their laws in regard to banking and they are reforming their laws in regard to the capitalization of railways. The Railway Commission has come to the relief of shippers and farmers from one end of the United States to the other. I see the right hon. leader of the Opposition laughing; perhaps he thinks this is a new doctrine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, I quite agree.

Mr. MACLEAN: Perhaps he thinks that I am a disciple of his. I hope he will be a disciple of mine and follow me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We will exchange views.

Mr. MACLEAN: Having dealt with the banking law, I come now to the question of the cost of living. This is a great question in this country. It is true that the cost of living has greatly increased and it is true that, in a large measure, that cost of living is due to the methods by which we distribute the necessities of life. I know districts in many cities where there are rows and rows of stores that seem to be distributing the necessities of life. It seems to me that some system of co-operation could be devised whereby that distribution, instead of costing, as it often does, forty and fifty per cent of what the producer gets for his goods, and in some cases double that amount, could be more satisfactorily and economically taken care of. It is true that the middleman, the cold storageman, the combine and one organization and another, are taking an unfair advantage of the people. We have got to remove these things and deal with this question in this House and in the local legislatures in such a way as to reduce the cost of living.

It is also true that our farmers are not producing enough on the land. I have watched the Canadian farmer in various places for quite a number of years, and the opinion I have come to is that he is more or less attracted by the lure of the cities and he wishes to go to the city. It is also peculiar to farming on this continent, or at least on portions of this continent, and especially so in Canada, that farmers are trying to get through by raising as little as possible. It seems to be the idea of a great many farmers to raise as little as possible. If we are to have a National Policy for the farmers of this country, we must try and encourage them to raise much more than they raise now, and in some way to offer them a better price by making an immediate connection between them and the consumer and at the same time giving the consumer a lower rate. If my right hon. friend, in his anxiety to give us free food, will devise a scheme on that line, he has a good cry and he will get lots of men to join the army. But he has to put it on the basis of some system of co-operation and control, in order to get our people to raise more produce on the land, and he has to devise some means by which to get this produce into the hands of the consumer at a price less than that which he pays now but at a better price for the farmer, cutting out this middleman business and benefiting both parties to the bargain in that respect.

What is the policy which we require in connection with farming in Canada to-day? We have to have a great big farming policy because we must deal, not only in the Dominion, but in the various provinces, and in the West especially, with this farming problem. It takes a big National Policy to cope with the weed pest in the Northwest, and it takes a great big policy to deal with the draining proposition in my own province of Ontario. With a system of drainage and a system of good roads in the province of Ontario you can take three weeks off the winter in the fall and you can take two weeks off the winter in the spring in so far as the farmer is concerned. I have seen farm after farm in the province of Ontario where work stopped largely because of bad roads and lack of drainage. There has never been such an open fall as there was last year in Ontario, with the result that a great deal of fall ploughing was done there, and I am glad to hear that the situation in the West is to a large extent similar. What the farmer is up against more than anything else in this country is the struggle against nature. The struggle against nature is so severe in the way of weather, or in the way of water on the land, not drained off, especially in the spring, that the farmer cannot get upon the fields to begin operations. That is the discouraging thing in farming taken in connection with the lack of good roads. I may be a poor observer, and I may not have been bred a farmer, but I have lived among farmers, I am trying to farm myself, I know all the farmers in my constituency intimately, and I know the troubles that they are up against. If you ask me what the Ontario farmer is up against I will tell you: he is up against the lack of drainage, he is up against the trouble that bad roads give him by his not being in constant touch with the base of supplies, and I am sorry to say that in Ontario the struggle is so severe that of the race of farmers who settled there three generations ago some have been lured to the West, some have gone into other businesses and some have degenerated so that they are not equal to farming under these conditions. If that is the case, we have to approach this problem. We must see that there is better farming, we must have better education in regard to farming, but in order to do this we must give the farmer the facilities that he requires in order to carry on his business profitably. The province of Ontario has embarked upon the hydro-electric policy which will provide cheap transportation and power on the farm and light for the houses and stables, and in this way help to make living on the farm more comfortable. Things of that kind that can be done by Government must be done if we want to keep our Canadian people on the farm. Farmers would not be lured away to cities and to other occupations and they would not go to the West if the struggle were not such a severe one, the consequence of which is that they are now trying to do as little as they can. The whole idea of the man on the land in Europe is intensive farming and big production. In our country the idea is little production, only enough to get along with. The State must do something in order to encourage farming. Look at the record of Denmark in regard to the national encouragement of farming. It is surprising what things the Danish farmers do in the British market. They have the finest national policy for the encouragement of the farmer that is to be found in the world. Italy is coming to it; France is magnificently cultivated; Frederick the Great showed the Germans how to drain their lands, and he first drained the townships he owned himself. Improved farming under government encouragement is characteristic of Europe and it will have to be characteristic of Canada. Smaller farms and holdings will have to be cultivated; changes in the present system will have to be brought about, and the Dominion Government and the provincial governments of Canada will have to frame their policies with that end in view. In the beautiful fruit district of Niagara and along the whole of the north shore of lake Erie, is taking place great improvement in the system of farming. But that improvement is to some extent brought about by large interests, and for my part I do not want to see the organization of large farms and the systematic cultivation of large districts under corporate control. Rather, I am in favour of the small farmer owning his own land and doing a great deal of the work himself. I am in favour of the intelligent direction of that farmer by the government and the co-operation of the Dominion and provincial governments with the farmer in teaching him the essentials necessary for production. What we want in Canada is large production and good farming on comparatively small areas of land. The more I study the question, and the more I move around among the farmers of my own province the more I am convinced that there is not too big a man in all Ontario or in all the world to put at the head of the supervision of farming in the province of Ontario. There is immense opportunity there, and my advice to all the provinces is to take up the encouragement of farming; to take advantage of everything they can get from the federal authority, and to formulate and to carry out vigorously well matured plans. In this Parliament there were introduced two good measures, one the Highways Bill and the other the aid to agricultural education, and although constitutional objections may be raised to such measures, that is not the point at the present time. In connection with the solution of the problem of the increased cost of living in this country, what we want is increased production on the farm, and the providing of means to bring in direct touch the farmer who farms and the consumer who consumes. That I believe will result in higher prices to the farmer and lower prices for the consumer. It is not impossible to attain that end, but it wants prevision, and organization, and the co-operation of the farmers and the consumers. The most we can get from this commission that is now to travel around the country is that they will tell us the difference between what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays, and there is something in that. I was pleased to hear my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) speak in regard to the encouragement of farming, and I believe that both parties in this House, and all the parties in all the provincial legislatures, should co-operate and throw aside this wretched thing of partyism for the time being in their efforts to make this the great producing agricultural country, nature destined her to be. Let it be the object of this Parliament and this Government, and of the legislatures and governments of all the provinces, to put their shoulders to the wheel and to improve farming in Canada on the lines I have indicated to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the hon. gentleman consider the eight-hour day a factor militating against the farmer?

Mr. MACLEAN: It may militate against him a good deal, but he will have to deal with it. One of the troubles of our farmers is that they have to be educated to understand that it pays to employ a competent labourer, and to pay him good wages, and to give him a house on the farm to live in. I know farm after farm in this country where there is no accommodation for the so-called hired man.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would you consider the eight-hour day a disability on the farmer?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not know whether it is or not. I believe it will be some time before it becomes a real factor, and then it will have to take care of itself.

Mr. CARVELL: When that does come about the consumer will have to pay more for the product.

Mr. MACLEAN: No doubt it means, that in the end it will come on the public in some way. And, if the people believe in an eight-hour day for the mechanic, the people will have to believe in an eight-hour day for the farmer, unless of course the farmer cultivates his own land, and that is one reason why I want to see the farmer and his family till the soil themselves and engage in somewhat intensive farming of a small area rather than waste energy in cultivating large farms.

I will only say one or two words on the navy and then I am finished. I am sorry that Canada occupies the position she does to-day on this question. It has been a sore question for our people. We do not stand as well as we ought to stand in the eyes of the world because we failed to deal with that question. I am not going to cast any reflection on any one, but I will come back to my hero worship and I will read what Woodrow Wilson said a few days ago in regard to public questions:

> Legislation has its atmosphere, like everything else, and the atmosphere of accommodation and mutual understanding which we now breathe with so much refreshment is matter of sincere congratulation. It ought to make our task very much less difficult and embarrassing than it would have been had we been obliged to continue to act amidst the atmosphere of suspicion and antagonism which has so long made it impossible to approach such questions with dispassionate fairness. Constructive legislation, when successful, is always the embodiment of convincing experience and of the mature public opinion which finally springs out of that experience.

An air of suspicion and distrust was created in this country with regard to Canada's action in the matter of naval aid to the mother country. I am not going to say who was responsible for that, but I do regret it. Every Canadian outside this House regrets that that question was approached in an atmosphere where distrust and suspicion prevailed. Why did it get into that state; why did that miserable atmosphere surround that question? I know it was not due to anything that occurred in our province, because if there is anything that we in Ontario think well of it is of our duty to the empire, and if there is any place where public opinion prevails in this country, it is in the neighbourhood of what used to be called the head of lake Ontario. We who live up there—and who sometimes have so little to say in regard to the government of this country—we try to think well of the great public questions and we have in the past in some measure furnished some of the best political thought for Canada; we have not brought in that atmosphere of suspicion and distrust about this question. We have not got there that atmosphere of suspicion about this question. I do not for one moment say that that atmosphere originated in another quarter in this country. If I was to say that some of it came from Montreal, the last thing that I would say would be that it in any way came from my compatriots the French people of the province of Quebec. I am not saying that, because if I can trace that unfair atmosphere and that atmosphere of suspicion, I would trace it to certain influences that speak the English language, that speak through the newspapers and that have had a double-faced policy in regard to this question. Now we have had that atmosphere of suspicion, that atmosphere of distrust, surrounding this question. Is it not possible for this Parliament and for this country to get together, and with a clear, pure atmosphere of patriotism and a recognition of our duty to the mother country to do something in the direction of a money grant that will show where our heart is with the old land?

I am not going to pass any reflections upon the past. If we can get the atmosphere cleared up, insignificant as I am, I will be prepared to-morrow to undertake the responsibility of securing a standing vote in the House of Commons and in the Senate of Canada for a large and substantial grant from the Parliament of Canada to our mother country, as a recognition of our duty to stand by her in the matter of imperial defence.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House very long, but I think I am in duty bound to say a few words in regard to omissions from the Speech from the Throne. Last year I had occasion to say before the House that for the second session the labour cause had been omitted from the Speech from the Throne. I thought, from the remarks made last year, that this session some announcement would be made that would carry to the labouring people of this country some hope of legislation of some nature to better their conditions. There is, however, not a word in the Speech this year in regard to this matter. As I stated last year, I am convinced that the present Government is absolutely hostile to the labouring classes. Last year I said that I thought the Government was hostile, but from this year's Speech from the Throne, I have finally come to that conclusion, and many others with whom I have come in contact have come to the same conclusion.

The high cost of living has been a subject of debate during the last few days. I intend to deal with that question for a few minutes. When the Government saw that throughout the country a condition of unrest was existing, they made up their minds to appoint a commission to investigate the real causes of the increased cost of living. I would not blame the Government for having appointed a commission, if they had taken immediate action to alleviate that condition. I do not believe that when a man's home is on fire he sends for the fire brigade by mail. He generally rings in the alarm, as he needs immediate action. The fire of hunger is in a good many workingmen's homes in the country, and it seems to me that immediate action should be taken.

I may be asked as to what are the reasons for the increased cost of living. There are many reasons, and of course we may differ as to the causes. In my judgment there are three main reasons: the tariff, the over-capitalization of trusts and mergers, of which my hon. friend spoke, but of course he kept in mind mostly over-capitalization of railroads. Over-capitalization of all industries, trusts and mergers is a cause. The third cause is the operation of the cold storage plants in the country. These are the three main reasons, although there are many others which it seems to me the Legislature of this country should study immediately, and should have studied long ago.

Last session I gave figures as to the operation of the cold storage plants, and last session and the session before I gave figures in regard to trusts and mergers. During the present debate I heard the Prime Minister ask the hon. leader of the Opposition what he had done during the fourteen or fifteen years he was in power to prevent the operations of these trusts and mergers. Any one who has studied economic conditions, especially the financial aspect of them, knows that 56 of these trusts and mergers have been formed in the last five years. It is only about four years ago that these trusts and mergers started in serious operation. In 1910, the reciprocity pact which was before the House—by the way, if they believe it to be dead, I believe it is still alive—was intended to intervene in the operations of trusts and mergers which were becoming strong. In 1912 I believe 19 of them were formed; and, as I say, in five years 56 of them.

I have figured out the amount which each workingman will have to pay in regard to paying interest on the watered stock of the trusts and mergers, and I will give figures to the House later on. First of all I want to deal with the question of the tariff. How much has the workingman to pay on the tariff? In the first place he has to pay for clothing a little over forty dollars a year on tariff alone. I have taken the preferential tariff on clothing because we have that benefit from the mother land. Then he has to pay on food stuffs alone a little over sixty dollars a year on the tariff, and the farmers derive no benefit from this whatever. And, when you take into consideration this $100 in round figures and also about $183 that he has to pay on the watered stock of the trusts and mergers, and figure against all this the amount he is likely to earn in the year, you may well ask how it is possible for him to keep up his family in a proper way. Since the American tariff has been changed the cost of living—I speak of the city of Montreal, because I am more familiar with conditions there than elsewhere—has increased nineteen per cent. Let me give the facts on which that statement is based. I will give figures of market quotations, the latest of them taken on the 24th instant and the others in September last:

	Increase per cent.
Roast beef	30
Steaks	30
Kidneys	46
Roast veal	11
Veal chops	11
Corned beef	32
Lamb	42
Roast pork	18
Pork chops	10
Sausages	27
Beef, second quality	26
Bacon	02
Salt pork	05
Second quality sausages	20

This makes an average of nineteen per cent since the Wilson tariff came into force. I stated last session that the Government would probably be forced by economic conditions to give us reciprocity. I am now convinced that this must result from the increased cost of living and the change in the United States tariff. It has been the custom to talk of the tariff as a weapon against an enemy or at least a dangerous neighbour. I do not know that there is any such danger. It is not my intention to go into details about the farmers and how they would be affected, for there will be opportunity to do so on the Budget. But I desire to say a word upon the subject of cold storage. I have read that it was a man named Charles Tellier who discovered the process of cold storage. He died recently in Paris. I have read some of his works, and it is evident that it was from the humanitarian standpoint he wrote, and he was pleased that he had made a discovery which he thought to be for the benefit of the common people. Until recently, we thought that ourselves. But now that system is being operated against the masses of the consumers and against the mass of the farmers as well. I am glad to see on the Order Paper the name of a Bill relating to this question of cold storage. I do not know what the Bill is to contain, but I suppose it will have the effect of regulating the operations of these establishments.

Now, I desire to say a word or two on the subject of the unemployed problem, which makes the high cost of living so hard at the present time. It was stated in this House by the leader of the Opposition that 100,000 people were out of employment in Canada. Well, I am in contact with enough labour societies in this Dominion to know that that is not an exaggeration. Last night the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) intimated that a large number were unemployed in Vancouver. Of course his statements were challenged. And, according to 'Hansard' the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) stated that there were only 2,500 men idle in Vancouver. I make the statement here that there are in the city of Vancouver today 4,500 men idle in the building trades alone. In the last four months 10,000 people have left British Columbia for American ports because of the lack of work. Furthermore, if you take the city of greater Vancouver, a very conservative estimate is 10,000 out of work at the present time. I may be asked what authority I have for making this statement. When I heard last night that there were 2,500 only out of work in Vancouver, I was so astonished that I took the trouble to telegraph to that city, and I will read to the House the telegram I received this afternoon. The hon. member for Vancouver is just entering the Chamber, and I do not think he will question the authority of the man whose name is appended to this telegram:

> According to United States immigration officers ten thousand people left British Columbia during the past four months for United States points. Forty-five hundred still out of work in building trades alone according to statement furnished the mayor by Labour Council. Conservative estimate unemployed in greater Vancouver would reach over ten thousand. Civic and other charitable bodies overtaxed in caring for jobless. Situation acute unless public works are opened up soon.
> R. P. Pettipiece.

I was astonished when I heard the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver, but of course, it was not for me to intervene at that time. However, in view of some of the statements I had seen in the press, I took it upon myself to get an official report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that a forged telegram?

Mr. VERVILLE: It belongs to the House. What has happened in Vancouver seems to have happened in other cities. Every one now is crying for work—they are not crying for bread but for work. This situation seems to prevail in every part of Canada. It has been the privilege of our Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) to travel through this country during the summer. Of course he was in British Columbia, and probably later on we may hear his report of the immense amount of good he did during his trip to the coast. Also we may have his report as to the real conditions existing in the Maritime provinces. I see by the papers that he was in Sydney, and is quoted to have said that conditions there are all right, everything harmonious. I do not quite agree with the hon. gentleman. I have been there myself. But I happened to be with the other crowd—with the crowd that were in need. Probably that is why I have not the same information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many are unemployed in Montreal?

Mr. VERVILLE: Is is very hard to state the exact number, and I will tell you why. At one time of the week the number is very large and another it is less, because they are working short time in places. Only last week one large engine works in Longue Pointe, because of lack of orders laid off, I do not know for how long, about 1,700 men. The laying off of 1,700 men means that the purchasing ability of these people diminishes at once by seventy-five per cent. When it is said that there is over-production of manufactured goods, we must bear in mind the fact that there must of course be overproduction when there is no demand. It is said that conditions are very good in the country at the present time, and that the farmers are prosperous. They are, but the reckoning will come, and perhaps in a couple of months. We must not expect that when the demand in the cities suddenly ceases the farmer will be immediately affected; in a few months he will be unable to sell because the people have not the money with which to buy his goods. The farmers will feel it the more keenly because they have to purchase a great many things which they do not produce themselves. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) said the other day: Why don't you leave things in the old way? Yes, why should we not use candles instead of electric lights? We must not be against progress. It is impossible to expect the farmer to build his own carts and wagons, make his own harness and shoes; he has to buy all these things, and they amount to a great deal. The farmer is heavily taxed on the goods which he is obliged to purchase. I observe from the memorial of the grain growers of the West that the farmers are learning that it is imposssible that this condition should continue very long. I know that the present Government are bound to a policy of high protection. I do not blame them, because the people, when they put them where they are, said: you are to increase the tariff, if possible, instead of lowering it. It was said during the last election campaign that if reciprocity passed the doors of the manufacturers of the country would be closed to the workingman. Reciprocity did not pass, and the doors are closed, and this shows, that, if reciprocity had passed, the doors of the manufacturers would be open at the present time.

Some hon. gentlemen have said that the mode of living has a great deal to do with the increase in the cost of living. Sometimes workingmen live in luxury; they buy too many things which they could get along without, and they forget the amount of money they have to pay for these things. Let us see, however, whether the use of these luxuries is against the interests of trade. The hon. member for Dundas spoke the other day about automobiles. I hope and trust that none of the members of this House believe that the workingmen buy automobiles. I would not begrudge a businessman the possession of an automobile, because the raw material that enters into its construction amounts to very little; it is all labour; and if it is all labour, it is not what you would call a luxury. But if I happened to see a diamond in the same house, I would say that that is a luxury, because there is no labour attached to it. It had been said also that the working people do not need to dress so well. Probably it would be better for them if they did not, because they would be enabled to save more money. Why is it that I have to pay $10 more for a suit of clothes in Canada than in England? I have no objection to the proprietor of a woollen industry getting rich, but I do not want him to get rich at my expense. It is a fact that on the other side of the water you can buy for $15 a suit of clothes for which you would have to pay in Canada $25 or more. But, it is said, labour is cheaper over there. The labour on a suit of clothes amounts to $1, and that is the difference as far as a suit of clothes is concerned, between the cost of labour in Canada and the cost of labour in England. I claim that this is wrong, and that some kind of a readjustment should be made. I claim also that, as regards the necessities of life, the Government should take steps to furnish cheaper food to the masses of the people of Canada. The people are not asking for bread, they are asking for work, but if they do not get work, of course they must have bread. Last year I made a prophecy with regard to conditions this year which has been fully realized, and no one who studies these great questions from an economic standpoint can fail to know what is going to happen. I do not claim to have any professional knowledge of the matter, or to speak from the standpoint of a student of political economy; I speak merely from a practical point of view. There are many people in the country to-day who do not know how much they can buy for a dollar, and that is one of the great questions in the country at the present time. That condition should be alleviated, and I submit that as legislators we shall be responsible for whatever may happen in the cities, towns or villages wherever there is a working population.

It has been said by some hon. gentlemen that the cities were attracting the rural population, and of course this is due to the fact that there are too few hands on the farm to do the work. The people in the country urge that there are too many attractions in the cities for the men, but have you ever seen a municipality that had anything in the line of water-power that was not willing to pay a large amount to a big industry to induce it to locate in their district, and thus take the people off the land? The people of the country are anxious in many cases to pay a bonus, whether there is water-power or not, for the purpose of having near them an industry which may employ perhaps one hundred hands, male or female. In this way the sons and daughters of the farmers are induced to leave the farm and work right there in little town or village, as the case may be. It may be that the municipality is willing to pay $25,000 or $30,000 to an industry that is not worth $10,000. I claim that the people of the country are just as responsible for the influx of population to the city as the people of the city are. Those who are responsible are the large manufacturers who are so anxious to have a large number of men whenever they have a call for employment. They sometimes want to have, if possible, three or four men for each job. The people who come from the country to the city and get out of employment are at the mercy of the civic authorities, as has been shown by a telegram produced to-night with regard to Vancouver. The same may be said with regard to Toronto, Montreal and other cities. That is the real situation, and my last word is to ask the Government to do something effective immediately, not to wait for the report of the commission, for we really know now what the report of that commission will be, as we know what the economic conditions throughout the country are. But that report will not relieve the sorrows now existing in large cities and towns, and I ask the Government to do something immediately, either in the form of large public works in different cities or in the immediate reformation of the tariff, so that the working men throughout the country may receive some benefit and be able to support the cold weather of the present winter.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. PARDEE: I was paired with the right hon. the Prime Minister; otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was paired with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster); otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CARROLL: I was paired with the hon. member for Kings, N.S. (Mr. Foster); otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm); otherwise I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CARRICK: I was paired with the hon. member for St. James division, Montreal (Mr. Lapointe); otherwise I would have voted against the amendment.

On the question: shall the main motion be adopted.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, as the hour is somewhat late and I did wish to make some remarks on the Address, concluding with an amendment which may provoke more or less discussion, I would beg the consent of the leader of the House to my moving the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER: I had understood that there was some arrangement between the whips, agreed to by both sides of the House, that the Address would be disposed of to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. FOSTER: That certainly was the impression we had on this side of the House and I had heard nothing to the contrary until the hon. gentleman rose to his feet. Of course, it means that if it is to proceed now the arrangement which was made falls to the ground. That is a bad thing for this one arrangement but it is a much worse thing for the possibility of arrangements in the future. I should like to invite my right hon. friend's attention to what was the understanding on this side and see what can be done about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am surprised to hear that there was an arrangement of that nature. I never heard of it. I do not think that any such arrangement has been made. I do not know but that an arrangement had been made to finish the debate on the present amendment, but I know of nothing beyond that.

Mr. STANFIELD: To clear up this matter I would say that possibly there has been a little mistake. My understanding was that the vote was to be taken to-night. Perhaps I took too much out of that in accepting it to mean that the Address was to be settled.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Neely moves, seconded by Mr. MacNutt, that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER: While I have been disappointed, and I am sure gentlemen on this side have been disappointed, at the statement which has been made, I presume that the motion which was made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Neely) means that there will be a more or less extended debate on the amendment which he proposes to move. Under these circumstances I do not think it is best for us to beat our heads against a stone wall and remain for the small hours of the morning, but I would like my right hon. friend to give some intimation as to what time he thinks this discussion upon the Address may come to an end.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have no desire on this side of the House to prolong the discussion, but some of our friends want to speak on the question. I do not think the debate will be very much prolonged but I will not bind myself to any time. I would observe that there should be no misunderstanding between the two sides of the House especially in regard to anything that is agreed to by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield). I would take his word under any circumstances and I would be very glad myself to give him every opportunity in the same way. If my hon. friend from Colchester tells us that he understood that the debate was to be closed to-day I would agree at once, but surely there must be a misunderstanding.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. George E. Foster, the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday, January 28, 1914.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the course of his speech yesterday afternoon and during the short time that I happened to be absent from the Chamber, my hon. friend the Postmaster General made reference to a recent by-election in the constituency of South Bruce, and in that connection made certain observations with respect to myself which are both misleading and untrue.* For the sake of brevity and accuracy let me refer to 'Hansard.' The hon. gentleman is reported as having said:

> The Mildmay Gazette gives a report of what took place at a meeting at Walkerton, and there we find that the Hon. Chas. Murphy was one of the speakers. And what did he say on this point?
> His strongest contention on the naval issue was that the Borden policy was a direct insult to Germany and therefore a check to the peace conditions between that country and Great Britain which we are all so anxious to maintain.

In the first place, I did not happen to have the pleasure of speaking at Walkerton in that election; but if this extract from the Mildmay Gazette purports to give what I said at other places, then I characterize it as misleading and untrue. My reference to the insult offered to Germany was directed, not to the policy of this Government, but to the report of a speech mentioned in this House last session, delivered by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) on the Pacific coast, in which it was stated that the hon. gentleman said that Germany would have to be taught a lesson. My further reference to the naval policy was that when the naval holiday of a year was proposed last fall by the hon. Mr. Churchill, the despatches which came from Germany, and which were published in the Canadian press of October 21, 1913, showed that the three ships which had been under discussion in this House were the ships that stood in the way of Mr. Churchill's offer being accepted by Germany, and in proof of my statement I read this despatch from the Ottawa Citizen, dated Berlin, October 20, 1913:

> The naval authorities here consider the proposal that Germany should not build any warships while England is constructing or acquiring at least three cannot be discussed.

So much for that. Further on in his speech the hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

> Appeals to prejudices were made in South Bruce. We know that there are a great number of Irish Roman Catholics in South Bruce. The hon. member for Russell (Hon. Charles Murphy) went to South Bruce and told the Irish Catholics that there was no reciprocity in the last election, but that the election was carried by the Conservative party on the Ne Temere question.
> Mr. CARVELL: So say we all.

Mr. PELLETIER: Ah, these gentlemen will never acknowledge their defeat. Then we had this good Irish Roman Catholic, the hon. member for Russell, going to his co-religionists in South Bruce and telling them the Conservative party had promised to bring in a Bill to render the marriage law uniform in this country. Who has made that promise?

With respect to these observations, I have only to say that I did not make any appeal to the prejudices of any class of the community in the county of South Bruce. I made the same statements at each of the meetings I attended. I spoke as a Canadian to Canadians, and I merely said what I have said over and over again in this House. As to the hon. gentleman's question who made the promise, my answer to it at this time and place will be the answer that was suggested to be given to him who would inquire as to the monument of Sir Christopher Wren, 'Circumspice.' I have only to add that I know nothing about the leaflets or pamphlets that may have been distributed in that election.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER: Could the hon. gentleman give us a running interpretation of that foreign phrase?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. the Postmaster General will do that.

Mr. PELLETIER: Speaking to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member, I hold here the newspaper from which I took that report, the Mildmay Gazette, which, as I am told, is an independent newspaper. As a matter of fact I made a very slight mistake, which has no bearing on the point. The heading reads:

R. E. Truax holds meetings in his interest all through county—R. E. Truax at Walkerton.

I took it for granted that the speech was made in Walkerton, but on reading it over I find it was made at Mildmay.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: It was a mild speech.

Mr. PELLETIER: What my hon. friend has just quoted is an exact reproduction of what the papers have said. Whether it was well reported or not well reported of course is another question, but I want to let the House know that I have reported the fact as I have found it in the paper.

Mr. MURPHY: That may be, but I have pointed out that the statement in the paper is both misleading and untrue.

[Mr. Murphy.]

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY TRAIN CHANGES.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON: Perhaps the Minister of Railways and Canals is in a position to answer my question with respect to the discontinuance of the Ocean Limited and of other trains, if any, on the Intercolonial.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): In reference to the Ocean Limited, we have come to the conclusion to discontinue it through February and March. Last year we ran it for the first time in history throughout the winter and met with a considerable loss, a very great loss, by doing so. The traffic is much less this year than last, and therefore we have come to the conclusion that it is not in the interest of the road to run the train. Another thing is that we are short of rolling stock on the Intercolonial, and if we continue the Ocean Limited we would not have an opportunity to clean and paint the cars and put them in good condition for next year's traffic. In reference to the other lines, I may say that we propose taking off the Southern Express between Windsor Junction and Halifax—a distance of thirteen miles—leaving ten trains running; the Express between Halifax and Bedford—eight miles—leaving ten trains running, the train between St. John and Hampton—twenty-two miles—leaving eight remaining; one train between Point Deschenes and Painsec—twelve miles—leaving four trains; one train between Campbellton and St. Flavie, leaving two trains; one train between Fredericton and Marysville—three miles—leaving three trains each way per day; one train between Windsor Junction and Dartmouth—twelve miles—one train remaining each way per day.

Mr. EMMERSON: Perhaps the hon. minister would tell us whether there will be any change in the running of the Maritime Express. If it continues to run as now, leaving Montreal at 8.30 in the morning, it will be impossible for Ottawa passengers to catch that train without remaining in Montreal all night. I may say that, formerly, when the Ocean Limited was not running, the Maritime Express left Montreal at 12 noon, making it possible for Ottawa passengers to catch the Express by leaving here on the 8.30 morning train.

Mr. COCHRANE: In reference to that, I can only say that I have no doubt that the Maritime Express will be run in the best interests of the public.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend cannot give me the information?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, January 27.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): It is not my purpose to take up the time of the House with many general observations in reference to the gracious speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General at the opening of the session. There are, however, one or two remarks I would like to make before I come to the reason for my rising. In my judgment, the Speech from the Throne is remarkable, not for the legislation it foreshadows this session, but for the number of its omissions.

It has been charged again and again on the floor of this House that this Opposition and their political friends in the Upper Chamber are responsible for depriving the farmers of Canada of the aid proposed by this Government on two successive occasions for the improvement of the highways of this country. In my constituency, which is largely a farming one, the road question is one of the most important with which we have to deal. There are districts in that constituency where farmers are 35 and 40 miles away from a railroad station, and road-making in some parts of that constituency is a very difficult proposition. So far as I am concerned, nothing would give me greater pleasure than to assist the Government in voting almost any sum for the improvement of our highways, if the proposal were put in such a form that it would leave the power of spending the money in the hands where it properly belongs, namely, the provincial legislatures of the various provinces. I wish the Prime Minister were in his seat to-day, because I would like to ask him a direct question in reference to this Highways Bill. In his absence, I would like to ask his special pleader in the House, the newly appointed Solicitor General, whether any single amendment made by the Senate to the Highways Bill was in opposition to the expressed intention of the Prime Minister himself with regard to the expenditure under that Bill. I maintain that the Prime Minister expressed on the floor of this House his intention of using the money identically in the same way as the Senate proposed in their amendment. All the Senate did in their amendment was to incorporate therein the expressed intention of the leader of this Government. And yet I, a representative of a farming constituency, and many others in the same position, are to be charged with opposing the passage of this Bill. There is an hon. gentleman in the Government who holds the important portfolio of Minister of Railways. He wished to add to that portfolio the portfolio of Minister of Highways. I for one have no objection to his being Minister of Highways, but I had very serious objection to his becoming Minister of By-ways, and that, in my mind, was the ulterior object of the legislation proposed by the Government in respect to highways.

Remark has already been made of the absence of any reference in the Speech from the Throne to the question which occupied the attention of this House for the greater part of last session. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), expressing, I suppose, the farmers' views—and I might also say the view of the Government, because we know that but for geographical reasons the hon. gentleman would have been a member of the Government—tells us that he thinks it would be very inopportune for Canada to undertake the building of ships in this country at this moment, because experts in the old land have not yet decided whether the wars of the future are to be fought by aerial or naval fleets. Is that a hint from the hon. member for Dundas that the position of the Government in regard to naval affairs is still the position in which they found themselves last year—that is to say, very much up in the air? They are so high up in the air that they cannot see any way of getting down again without great damage to themselves.

The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) told us last night that in his view the people of Canada should take this question out of politics, and get together and grant a contribution in recognition of our duty to the mother country. Of course, we recognize our duty to the mother country, and, to ourselves, but the hon. gentleman knows that the contribution policy pressed by his Government last session was passed purely on the existence of an emergency, and to-day the right hon. the leader of the Government cannot get any of his followers to believe, nor does he believe it himself, that an emergency exists. Now that the emergency has disappeared, surely the hon. member for South York does not want us to get together on a proposition based on an emergency. Let me tell the Government, whether they like to believe it or not, that they have already a permanent naval policy on the statute books of Canada. The anomalous position in which Canada finds herself to-day is, that notwithstanding that the present Government undertook to pass an emergency contribution last year, they had not the courage to repeal the Laurier Naval Service Act passed in 1909-1910. Therefore, whether they like it or not, this country is now committed by legislation to a permanent naval policy of a Canadian naval service, in harmony with the unanimous resolution of this House passed in 1909. That is the situation to-day, and are the Government going to continue that anomaly? In my judgment, if this Government are going to be true to themselves, and to the position they have taken on this question for the last two sessions, they must support the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance), and they must this session wipe off our statute books the Laurier Naval Service Act which is the permanent naval policy of Canada at the present moment. I say further, this Government has got to deal with the question of the defence of the commerce and of the coasts of this country, whether they like it or not. Whatever may be the internal situation as to the complex constitution of the Conservative party in this House, they have to face the question sooner or later of the defence of our coasts and commerce. So much with regard to the navy.

I especially rose, Sir, to address the House on the particular paragraph in the speech which refers to the bountiful crops with which the Dominion was abundantly blessed during the past season; to these crops having been harvested under unusually favourable conditions; and to the successful transportation of these crops to the markets. Judging from any reference made by any member of the Government to the occurrences of the past year with reference to the great fiscal and trade changes that have taken place on this continent, you would think they had all passed the intervening months since last session in some place absolutely devoid of newspapers, or of any other means of obtaining up-to-date information. Since last session of Parliament, that great protectionist country to the south of us has experienced a change in the governmental control of its affairs, which change has brought about a revolution in the fiscal and commercial situation on this North American continent. The new Administration in the United States, by lowering the tariff and placing a number of natural products on the free list, has compelled our friends opposite, who voted so nobly against giving away the natural products of Canada to the United States in 1911, to look on at the export of hundreds of thousands of live stock from this country to the markets of the United States. Unfortunately a number of the articles placed on the free list by the Congress of the United States are not placed there unreservedly, and while we have been glad in the West—as I have no doubt gentlemen in the East who represent rural constituencies are also glad—to see our farmers getting so much better prices for their hogs and their cattle since the inauguration of the Wilson-Underwood tariff in the beginning of October last, it has been our great regret that the wheat-growing farmers of the West have not received any benefit up to the present moment. I have no quarrel with the statement in the Speech from the Throne, that our harvest last year has been a bounteous one; I agree that the statement is absolutely correct. I believe that this year produced the finest crop of wheat ever grown in the Canadian West without any question of doubt, the finest in quality and the finest in yield; but I do regret that the string in the Wilson-Underwood tariff attached to the putting of wheat on the free list has prevented the farmers of western Canada this year from taking advantage of the market for wheat in the United States, as they have been able to take advantage of it for the sale of their cattle and other live animals. The Wilson-Underwood tariff has reduced the duty on wheat from 25 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel, but to all countries which permit United States wheat and wheat products to come in free, the United States allows the wheat and wheat products of these countries to their markets free of duty. I do not purpose, Mr. Speaker, to treat this question in any partisan way.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. NEELY: My hon. friend cannot understand that attitude on my part, and I quite appreciate that it is because he is not capable of taking such a non-partisan position. I wish, as I have said, to discuss this question in a non-partisan way, because it is one affecting not merely the welfare of western Canada, but every province in this great Dominion of Canada. I would like to ask my hon. friend the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) if the prosperity of the people of western Canada is not just as vital to him and his friends as it is to the people of western Canada themselves. The prosperity of the people of the West undoubtedly means the prosperity of every province in this Dominion. If our farmers are not reaping a proper reward for their toil, then they have not the money to spend for the necessities of life and for those tools and implements by which they dig the wealth out of the soil.

Here is the situation so far as the wheat crop of this year is concerned. Up to the close of navigation over 92,000,000 bushels of wheat and over 25,000,000 bushels of oats were forwarded from the ports of Fort William and Port Arthur. That, of course, is not by any means the total wheat crop of the West. In this connection it may surprise the House to learn that while in former years under Liberal administration —I am not prepared to go the length of saying that the Liberal administration was responsible for this condition, but this condition actually existed then and this dissimilar condition exists at the present time —the port of Montreal received and handled the larger portion of our export wheat. Would you believe, Mr. Speaker, that in the year 1913, with this bumper wheat crop, nearly 100,000,000 bushels of which were forwarded from Port Arthur and Fort William before the close of navigation, the greater portion was forwarded to American and not to Canadian ports, and that American ships and American railways to-day are actually handling the bulk of the western trade? Where is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), that he has not observed this alarming state of affairs, and that our Canadian shippers, our ships and our railways are to-day handling only a small percentage of the Canadian wheat crop that is exported from this country? Of course, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot be omniscient and omnipresent. He tries to be omnipresent, but that of course prevents him from being omniscient. When he tries to be present everywhere, he cannot know everything. Travelling as he has been doing during the last twelve months in all parts of the habitable globe looking for markets, although he and his friends were returned to power in 1911 on the question of refusing the greatest market in the world, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot be expected to be aware of all these facts. As I do not intend, however, to discuss this question in a partisan manner, I am going to leave my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce at this point.

I have the figures, month by month, in regard to these shipments of wheat. I am giving you round figures. In the month of December, up to the close of navigation, there were shipped to Canadian ports just a little over 2,000,000 bushels, and to American ports over 6,000,000 bushels. In the month of November, the whole month there were shipped to Canadian ports 12,000,000 bushels and to American ports 22,000,000 bushels, and in the month of October, there were shipped to Canadian ports 15,000,000 bushels and to American ports 18,000,000 bushels. These are the figures for the handling of the greatest wheat crop that western Canada has ever produced, and practically the same proportion holds good with regard to the handling of oats and other cereals grown in the west.

It surely ought not to be necessary for me to undertake to demonstrate that the great need of the wheat grower in the West is a market for his surplus grain. Here are the figures as to the crop of 1913. These figures show that Western Canada produced something over 209,000,000 bushels of wheat. If we take the population of Canada at 8,000,000 in round figures, 50,000,000 bushels or at the outside 60,000,000 bushels of wheat would provide for the home market. Of course, we do not use western wheat alone because some wheat is grown in the East. Great Britain can take from sixty to eighty-five or ninety million bushels of wheat. That is our export market for wheat. If we take the maximum figures, 60,000,000 bushels for Canada and 90,000,000 bushels for Great Britain, that makes 150,000,000 bushels. Will any member of the Government, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce or any gentleman representing a western province be good enough to tell this House what the Canadian farmer is going to do with that wheat surplus, which is increasing every year?

Mr. BURNHAM: Tell us about the rebate.

Mr. NEELY: The hon. gentleman must be thinking of some other subject.

It may startle the House when I say that, while this year we have had the best wheat crop in the West so far, it has not been by any means one of the most profitable ones.

What is the situation? As I said, the wheat ripened early; it was harvested early. We have had one of the finest fall seasons that has been seen in the West for many years, with the result that the farmers have been able to get their wheat forwarded rapidly to the market and the railroads have been able to handle it with much greater ease than in any previous fall for many years. The farmers have only one export market. Therefore, they were forced to throw their wheat upon the market before the close of navigation; that is what it means to have only one export market the reaching of which depends upon navigation. As the farmers were compelled to throw their wheat upon the market before the close of navigation, the price was materially affected. Therefore, in the province of Saskatchewan, the farmers received a lower price for their wheat, I think, than in any season for the last ten or twelve years. There was a somewhat unfavourable season in the year 1912, and in 1913 the prices were unfavourable. Therefore, I am not able to report to the House that improvement in the material condition of our western farmers that I had hoped to report when I saw this year the splendid harvest which we had throughout the length and breadth of the three prairie provinces.

Is there any member of this House who will deny that it would be an advantage to the western wheat growers to have access to the mills and markets of the United States of America ? I know we heard that argument a couple of years ago; we heard it about cattle, about swine, about all sorts of agricultural products. But, the experience of the East and of the West in Canada has disabused the minds of thousands of the farmers of this notion, including many who in 1911 were of the opinion that it would be of no advantage to them to have the United States market for natural products. Some may say that the result will be that we would deplete our own farms of the live stock which we need. We would do nothing of the kind. We may do temporarily; but as a permanent proposition we establish so much larger—and consequently so much steadier —a market for these natural products that the ultimate result must inevitably be to greatly stimulate mixed farming throughout the length and breadth of Canada. The hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) in his speech last evening was interrupted by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) with the suggestion that for some months last summer wheat was lower on the United States side than on the Canadian side. That is a condition which, I believe, actually existed for a brief period, a very brief period indeed. But it was at a time when there was practically no surplus wheat in the granaries of either the American or Canadian farmers. But if my hon. friend from East Lambton will look up the prices for that period of the year when the farmers are compelled to put their wheat on the market, he will discover a totally different state of affairs. Under the tariff of 25 cents a bushel which existed until the first of last October, for years the price of same qualities of wheat on the Canadian side was from 8 cents to 10 cents a bushel less than the price on the American side. At the present time, with the reduction of duty from 25 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel, there is not so marked a difference in price, but I notice that recent quotations show that there is a difference of from 4½ cents to 5 cents a bushel. Take a crop of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, and, even cutting the advance of price in two and counting it at only 3 cents a bushel extra profit through access of our wheat to the United States market, what is the net result to the farmers of our western country? At least the net result would enable them to pay their bills for agricultural machinery and other eastern manufactured products very much more promptly, and had the farmers made that profit, many of our eastern manufacturers would probably be in a much happier state than they are at the present moment.

Now, there was objection, when the reciprocity agreement was under consideration, that reciprocity was an arrangement entered into by the two countries and was not independent legislation on the part of each country. No one can find any objection on that ground with the proposal with which I intend to close my address this afternoon, the proposal that this Government shall take immediate action to enable the Canadian wheat growers to have free entry for their products to the markets of the United States. The American Government has taken action, and all that is necessary is for any other country in the world to take similar action in order that they may gain a free exchange in natural products. Now, Sir, not only have the United States put wheat on the free list but they have also put wheat products, including flour and all the by-products, upon the free list. I remember very well what the millers said in 1911 in opposition to reciprocity; they said that reciprocity was not a square deal, because they would have to compete with the American miller in paying the price for the wheat, but were limited in their market on the by-products. I am free to say that from their point of view there was some truth in that contention. I am proud to recognize assistance from any quarter in a great cause which I think affects the welfare of our country, and particularly that part of our country which I represent, and so I was delighted to hear the hon. member for South York make the statement he made last evening with reference to the millers of Canada being able to take care of their own industry. I could not possibly use more emphatic words, more wisely chosen words, than the hon. member for South York used in his reference to this point. Speaking of the railways being able to take care of themselves in case wheat was put on the free list he went on to speak of the milling industry in words which, with his permission, I will quote:

The same is the case with the millers. Do you mean to tell me that Canadian millers, with their mills almost at the seat of production of the wheat, cannot compete with the American millers? I say they can; I say that they are ready for the business. Of course they would like to keep the monoply they have to-day in regard to wheat milling in this country, and they have got a great monoply. They are well linked up together and are in a position, by reason of their monoply and the association of the railways, to keep down the price. Thus in two ways the Canadian farmer will benefit.

That is, by putting wheat on the free list.

They will benefit by the competition of American railways and they will benefit by the fact that the millers will have to come up to the scratch and give them more for their Canadian wheat if they want to grind it in their mills.

To use an ordinary expression, that is the case in a nut-shell, as presented by the hon. member for South York. Granted that under reciprocity the miller of Canada would have to compete in the purchase of wheat with the United States miller, and have a limited home market for the by-products of his mill, if we accept the olive branch held out in the form of the Wilson-Underwood tariff, and take the duty off wheat and wheat products, what shall we find? We shall find that there will result a great advantage to the millers of Canada in that they will be given free entry into a market of ninety millions of people, not only for the flour which they manufacture, but for the by-products of the wheat which they have to sell. If any one entertains any doubt as to whether the Canadian miller can compete with the miller of the United States, I think I can very speedily disabuse his mind of that idea by referring to a short article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Monday of this week. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House would have the temerity to say that so far as the quality of Canadian wheat is concerned, it cannot compete with any wheat in the world if the millers are given the benefit of free entry for their products into United States markets. This is the article:

Canadian flour drives American flour out of the Orient. Hon. G. E. Foster's Trade Arrangement produces great results for the millers of this country and alarms United States Representatives.

The weekly trade report contains an item that is of exceeding significance in connection with Canadian trade with the Orient.

The American Consul-General at Hong Kong, reporting to his home government, states that Canadian flour is practically driving the American product out of the market, and that unless there is some change the American producers will lose this trade. He attributes the popularity of the Canadian flour in China to its high percentage of gluten, and says that no mere drought can explain the American falling-off, which was more marked in November than in any previous month.

It will be necessary, he declares, for the American wheat growers to get new seed and produce a different kind of wheat before they can compete with the Canadian product.

That is, in the market of China. The article then goes on to say:

It will be remembered that Hon. G. E. Foster, after his trip to China last year, predicted that this country would yet take leading place in the flour market of China, and his predictions are being made good.

This is delightful information to receive from such an authority as the United States Consul-General at Hong Kong, and we are delighted with the compliment paid to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to know that his trip to China was not, after all, in vain. But the point of the article is that Canadian flour is actually driving United States flour out of the neutral markets of the world. We know that our Canadian flour is holding its own not only in China but in the other neutral markets of the world, the British market included. In what position would the taking advantage of the Underwood tariff in reference to wheat and wheat products leave the millers of this country? It would open up to them a market of ninety millions of people, from which they have been up to the present rigidly excluded by a high tariff wall. Not only the grain growers, but the millers of Canada as well, should be sending deputations to this Government to ask for the right to sell their wheat where they are to-day selling their cattle to such advantage. We quite agree with the hon. member for South York that the putting of wheat products on the free list would have some effect on our Canadian railways, but the evidence which I have produced so far goes to show that the high railway rates charged in this country are already driving the export trade of Western Canada to United States routes, and if the Canadian roads are determined to keep their freight rates at the high-water mark it is for the stockholders of these railroads to deal with the matter; the Canadian farmer should not be obliged to suffer because the railways refuse to bring their rates down to a proper level.

Some reference has been made in this House to the remarkable labour conditions that exist throughout the length and breadth of this country. When I happened to notice in a recent issue of the Labour Gazette a statement showing that in the city of Vancouver the building permits for the month of November amounted to only $300,000, as compared with about $1,500,000 for the same month of the preceding year, I was quite prepared for the information given by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) that there were 10,000 unemployed in greater Vancouver. But, on the authority of a recognized leader of the farmers' movement in the province of Alberta, Mr. George Lane, I can tell the House that the exodus that has taken place from the province of British Columbia in the last four months is actually taking place off the farms in the province of Alberta. More than that, I have information in a less pronounced form that the same condition of affairs is being brought about in every one of the prairie provinces. Sir, what does this Government mean? Do they want the farmers to export their wheat or do they want them to export themselves? That is the issue on this question at the present time, that unless the farmers of western Canada are given free access for their greatest product, which is wheat, into the markets of the United States, we are going to see, not an increased tide of immigration into our country, but an exodus out of the country, which, Sir, has actually begun. That is surely not the object or the desire of the members of this House of either political party. We want to see our country grow, we want to see the population increase; we want to see the people increase in prosperity. But if we are going to say to the western wheat grower who to-day is face to face with a surplus of 50,000,000 bushels of wheat that he does not know what to do with: we, the Government of Canada, will prevent you from getting free access to the markets of the United States, there is only one thing for the western Canadian farmer and that is to pick up his kit and belongings and get out of the country to some place where conditions are more favourable.

Mr. BURNHAM: What about the countervailing duty and rebates and things like that? You have omitted all these points.

Mr. NEELY: I thought I had been discussing the countervailing duty for the last half hour.

Mr. BURNHAM: You have not.

Mr. NEELY: Does my hon. friend understand the meaning of the term? If he wants a definition so that he will understand it I shall give it. All he requires is a definition of the term and then he will know that I have been discussing the countervailing duty during the last half hour. I may say, if my hon. friend does not understand the proposition, it is this, that the United States Government has put wheat and wheat products on the free list for all countries that similarly put the United States wheat on the free list.

Mr. BURNHAM: Why do they not admit it free if they want to?

Mr. NEELY: It is not so much a question as to whether they want it or not, but they want similar courtesies from the country to which they grant the privilege of their market. But, after all, it is not a question of what the United States wants that I am discussing; it is a question of what the Canadian farmer wants. My hon. friend, after he gets through discussing the subject of titles, can go over and reform the United States ideas of what they want if he prefers it, but for the present let us confine our attention to the requirements of the Canadian people.

I was referring to the fact that this condition actually exists and I am glad that the opinion I am giving is an unbiassed one, because it has been echoed in other quarters that I am sure will appeal to every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. During the present session of the Manitoba Legislature, my hon. friends from that province will bear me out, a Mr. Malcolm, Liberal member from Birtle, placed on the Order Paper a resolution asking this Government of Canada to place wheat and wheat products on the free list so that ours might have free access to the American market. What was the treatment accorded by the Government of Sir Rodmond Roblin to that resolution? The Government of Sir Rodmond Roblin took up the resolution of the Liberal member for Birtle and it passed the Legislature of Manitoba unanimously, so that when my friend says 'Oh!' when I say this is an unbiassed opinion, I leave it to him to say whether that is not so. I am proud to think that I am able to deal with this subject, a subject that is very near to my heart, in a way that I trust will appeal not only to members on this side of the House, but to every member of the House. Surely the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) a late member of the Roblin Administration and representing in this House the people of western Canada; surely my hon. friend the newly appointed Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) whom I congratulate on his appointment and his fitness for that appointment, and the possible fitness of the reward which it means, surely my hon. friend the Solicitor General, also representing the West in this Government; surely the Minister of the Interior who is not in his seat at the moment—surely every one of these gentlemen will agree with me that the necessity of the moment, so far as the western wheat grower is concerned, is that the resolution passed by the Manitoba Legislature at its present session should be adopted and acted upon by the Government at the present time. I say I am looking with confidence to the support of all these hon. gentlemen, not to them alone but to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. W. H. Sharpe), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), and I see no reason why I should not have the support of every member of the House. Hon. gentlemen surely do not want to tell me that it is going to be a disadvantage to the western wheat producer to permit United States wheat to come over into this country. Who should be the best judge of that question? Again and again has this Parliament been apprised of the desire of the grain growers of the West and the wheat growers of the West; they were apprised of that desire only a few weeks ago, but, notwithstanding some hon. gentlemen have said in the past that it would be a great detriment to the wheat grower to have this change brought about, the western farmers are still persisting, obstinately persisting, in saying that they ought to be the best judges as to whether or not it is to their advantage to get free access into the United States market. I ask, who ought to be the best judges? and is there an hon. gentleman from western Canada who is prepared to contradict that position? If they are prepared to contradict the position taken by the Grain Growers Association are they prepared to contradict the resolution passed unaminously by the Manitoba legislature this session. The particular fault I have to find with the Government at the present moment is this: instead of calling a special session of this Parliament when the Wilson-Underwood tariff came into effect in the first week of October last, they continued their peregrinations over the four quarters of the globe and left our western Canadian farmers to sell their crop in a restricted market which meant a loss to them of millions and millions of dollars. Instead of calling Parliament, the time was extended for another couple of months and the farmers received practically no benefit this year from the repeal of the duty on wheat. It is not too late, however to get this result so far as future crops are concerned. The situation that existed this year will exist more markedly year after year as time goes on.

Mr. BURNHAM: What did the Americans do?

Mr. NEELY: My hon. friend is still interested in the Americans; perhaps he is thinking of moving over there.

Mr. BURNHAM: Oh, no.

Mr. NEELY: In view of all the facts, and the desire of the grain growers for the market across the line, I must express my regret that the Government have not seen fit to take any notice of this situation in the Speech from the Throne and that they did not call a special session of Parliament to deal with the question. Whilst I agree that nothing can be done to remedy what has occurred this year, yet I hope the Government will remedy the conditions so far as the future loss is concerned. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move in amendment the following:

The House regrets that, in the gracious speech with which your Royal Highness has met Parliament, the said speech gives no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps to secure free access to the markets of the United States for the wheat and wheat products of Canada, by removing the duty on wheat and wheat products coming into Canada from the United States.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to venture into any extended discussion in respect to the Address in reply to the speech of His Royal Highness at the opening of this Parliament, for the simple reason that, in the first place, I do not deem any extended discussion necessary at the present time, especially in view of the fact that I was satisfied, as I believe every hon. gentleman upon this side of the House was satisfied, that when the vote was taken last night it meant the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have seen fit to think differently, and perhaps under the circumstances there may be some little excuse for the action which they have taken. When you consider, Mr. Speaker—as hon. gentlemen opposite have had an opportunity of considering, and of reconsidering, during the past ten days or two weeks—the very simple, very harmless and indeed very childish twaddle that was reduced to the form of a motion of want of confidence in this Government, and presented in the House by the right. hon. the leader of the Opposition, I say that I can well understand hon. members opposite feeling that it was necessary to supplement their weak position in some regard in order that they could recover the position they had lost, not alone before this House, but before the people of the country, in attempting to present such a simple motion of want of confidence as that which was defeated by such a large majority in this House last night. So much for the motion of yesterday.

Now we have the motion of to-day, and let me say that if we were surprised at the simple motion of want of confidence of yesterday, what must we say of the motion presented by my hon. friend the member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) this afternoon? And I am more surprised at my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition, for I am sure that no man in this House knows better than he that in allowing one of his followers to present such a motion as this, he was undertaking to break every rule and every practice that has obtained in this House since Confederation. Never in one single instance have there been two amendments from the Opposition upon the motion for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, least of all a motion dealing with the tariff. If for no other reason than this, I say that the Government and the members in the majority in this House would fail in their duty if they did not reject the motion of want of confidence in this Government of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. If my hon. friend from Humboldt is as jealous of the interests of the people of western Canada as he would wish this House and country to understand, he has not taken the course best calculated to advance those interests. The hon. gentleman well knows, as does every hon. gentleman in this House, that the day is not far distant when the Minister of Finance will bring down his Budget Speech, and he knows, as we all know, that tariff changes have never been discussed on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The hon. gentleman knows that the proper time and place for the Government to announce and for the House to discuss tariff changes is when the Minister of Finance makes his annual financial statement. It will then be the proper time for us to deal with all the fiscal questions which may present themselves. As a government, we do not propose to make any statement of the intentions of the Government in respect to any tariff matter in advance of the Budget Speech. Then we will be free to discuss this question or any other cognate question, and the Government will then submit its decision with respect to this and other matters to the judgment of the members of this House and of the people of Canada. I do not know that there is anything else for me to say, except to add that even when the discussion of such an important matter as this does take place on the Budget Speech, we shall need to have the very best and soundest reasons—reasons more sound than those which the hon. member for Humboldt has been able to present to the House—before it would be wise for this Government to deal with any tariff changes which would affect important industries. If for no other reason than that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) has undertaken by a motion of want of confidence in the Government to bring to the attention of the House at this juncture a matter which has never been introduced during the lifetime of this Parliament, other than on the Budget Speech, I ask the House to reject his amendment.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I am sure we have been all greatly impressed by the constitutional and parliamentary reasons given by the Minister of Public Works for deferring or preventing discussion on a matter of urgent public importance. In order that he may be relieved from any misapprehension, and so that he may not be grieved, as he professes to be, at the action or inaction of the leader of the Opposition, let me quote to him a motion presented to the Parliament of Great Britain—I am sure the Minister of Public Works will not deny the validity of such a precedent—when on the 6th of February, 1893, an amendment to the reply to the Speech from the Throne was moved in the following words:

> At the end of the question to add the following words:
> That this House humbly expresses its regret that no measures are announced by Your Majesty for the present relief of those who are affected by the existing wide-spread depression in agriculture, either by means of readjustment of local burdens, or otherwise.

This motion was debated in the English House of Commons for two days. If such a motion was in order in the British Parliament under the conditions prevailing in Great Britain at that time, surely an almost absolutely parallel motion is just as much in order in this country under the conditions prevailing now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not see the difference between a general resolution referring generally to the tariff, and a specific resolution calling for action on a specific item of the tariff ?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If hon. gentlemen do not see the distinction, I could easily show it to them.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry that we on this side of the House are not able to please our friends on the other side.

Mr. FOSTER: You do not try.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I can show the hon. minister that we do try. We have already debated at some length a resolution to which the Minister of Public Works takes objection because it is not specific, and now when we bring forward a specific resolution the Solicitor General takes objection. If we do not succeed on this side in pleasing the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his friends, I am afraid it is that these gentlemen opposite will not be satisfied with anything we may do, no matter what it be. The reference of the Minister of Public Works to lack of precedent was fortunate in that it afforded us an opportunity in the discussion of this question, which is undoubtedly of greatest and most pressing importance in Canada at the moment; to call upon such a precedent, in such a case, on such authority.

Is there a question of importance before the country? Is it necessary or is it desirable that a condition such as exists to-day should be considered by this Parliament without loss of time? Is it not a fact, as the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has stated to the House, that because the members of this Government during the later months of last year, were paying attention to anything and everything except the business they are there to attend to; Parliament was not called at the usual time, to deal with this question, which would have saved millions of dollars to this country; millions of dollars that admittedly this country needs very much now. We have the attitude of the Government as expressed by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that the Government has no duty to perform except to levy taxes, to make expenditures, and incidentally to draw their salaries. We have his statement that there is no responsibility resting upon the Government to meet the conditions that exist throughout the country. Why, he says, leave things alone and they will get better of themselves. I believe that things will get better, if not by themselves, at any rate without the assistance of this Government. But if and when they do get better, it will be not because of this Government, its policy and its practice, but in spite of this Government, its policy and its practice.

A great deal has been made of the fact that the late Government did not do thus and so. Let me point out that the country is to-day face to face with a condition that did not exist during the term of office of the late Government. It is the fact of the existence of an abnormal condition, abnormal so far as the recent experience of Canada is concerned, that calls for action by this Government, and is our reason, not our excuse, for taking this opportunity of bringing before this House and the country not only the necessity for action but the possibility and the duty of action.

It is true that during the administration of the late Government there was a rise in prices. But it is also true that parallel with the rise in prices, there was a rise in prosperity. So long as I have the means to pay in proportion to the prices that I am asked, what difference does it make to me whether prices are high or low? But when the condition is that prices are higher than they were before and I have not the money to pay those prices, then a condition exists that calls for action, for consideration. The fact that such action was not taken in previous years is no evidence that action is not necessary now. It was not needed then; it is needed now.

This is a question that is very much greater than a question of the West, as I understood one of my hon. friends on the other side to suggest. It is much greater than a party question. It is a question that touches the very foundation of the welfare and success of this great country of Canada. It is well for us to consider just how the present conditions came about. It will be remembered that some years ago, in fact in the winter of 1910-11, after a considerable amount of agitation had taken place amongst the farmers of the prairie west, a large delegation came to Ottawa to impress upon the Government of that day the desirability, or as they expressed it, the necessity, of the opening of a market south of the boundary line for our wheat and other western products. I am sure there are a great many of our friends, now on the other side of the House, who looked upon this delegation as an aggregation of cranks, as men who wanted something simply because they wanted it and did not know why. Let me point out what was the reason of that delegation and what is the reason of this resolution that is now before the House. We have had in the prairie west a stupendous development in wheat growing. I am confining my arguments to wheat for the moment. In a matter of some ten years our wheat area and production increased something like six or seven fold, from two and a half million acres of cultivation to over seventeen million acres of cultivation. At the same time, there was development in other wheat growing countries. With the increased production throughout the world, throwing that increased production on to the world's markets centering at Liverpool, there had been a continual depression of world prices of wheat, which was within the knowledge of the men who grew it and who, taking notice of that continued and enormous increase of production, taking notice of that continued decrease in world prices, saw that they were heading straight for the position that they are in to-day of attempting to produce wheat at a price that would not yield a fair margin of profit.

I see in the newspapers, and I hear from many of our friends in Parliament and out of it, talk about the farmer as though he were some sort of an altruistic individual who farmed for the sake of being near to nature's heart, and who should be satisfied to enjoy the morning sunrise, the singing birds and the pleasant scenery; and that when he undertook to discuss economic questions he was out of his proper field, and in fact had come into the class of cranks and nuisances. Of course our hon. friends are going to educate him. Let me say, what ought not to be necessary to say, that the farmer's business is just like any other man's business. If it is not done at a profit, he cannot stay in business. It is not a question of whether he wants to stay, it is a question of his being able to stay. What enables the merchant or manufacturer to stay in business? It is the little margin of profit that he makes. Let him have an output of $100,000,000, if his return is only $99,000,000, he goes out of business. If it is $101,000,000, he stays in business. It is the difference of a trifle between success and bankruptcy. As long as the farmer is getting for his products a price that gives him a fair and reasonable margin of profit, he stays in business. If his margin is only 5 cents a bushel on his wheat, it enables him to stay in business, but if he makes 5 cents a bushel less than the wheat cost him to produce, he goes out of business. This is the condition that the farmers of the West saw facing them in 1911. They had seen it years before. They came down and made representations to the late Government on the subject, and that Government acting on these representations, took measures to make it possible for more favourable marketing of the farmers' principal product, thereby assuring him, so far as it could be assured, a margin of profit on that product.

I have figures here which I will place before the House as to what the differences in the world's prices have been. I have acquired this information from a leading grain house in Montreal, and I have every reason to believe that it is reliable. I am informed that in the year 1907, a year of bad crops and hard times—it was as to that year I asked information for the purpose of making a comparison—in December, the average price of No. 1 Northern wheat in Liverpool was $1.23 per bushel. In 1911, the average of the same article in the same market for December was $1.18⅛ per bushel; in 1912, the average was $1.07 per bushel; and I am further credibly informed that in the year 1913 the average price in December for No. 1 Northern wheat was 98 cents. This is a difference as between 1907 and 1913 of twenty-five cents a bushel, or twenty per cent, if I am correct in my calculation, in the return to the farmer.

Now, I do not know how many classes of business there are that can stand a reduction of twenty per cent in the value of the out-turn and still remain going concerns. And I am here to say, Mr. Speaker, that the fact of that reduction having come to the wheat producers of the Northwest has had the absolutely necessary effect of restricting production and decreasing financial resources, producing a condition that is reflected throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion in the cry of hard times that now prevails. I do not know how far the financial condition will be denied, but I will say that not in twenty years has there been a condition in this Dominion of Canada such as exists to-day. A despatch from Toronto of January 26 says that the total registration of unemployed in the Toronto Civic Registration Bureau up to date had almost reached 7,000 men. I read that in Ottawa, Messrs. Fripp and Chabot are approaching the Minister of Public Works to impress upon him the desirability of pushing work for which money has been voted, as a means of giving employment to two or three hundred men. I find a despatch from Toronto appearing in the London Times and dated 8th of January, stating that it is admitted there are from 10,000 to 15,000 unemployed in Toronto. I read in the Montreal Telegraph of January 26 that at the Protestant House of Refuge the number of night lodgings given last week was 895 and the number of meals 1,331. I give these figures to put it beyond all question that there is a condition in this country to-day that has not existed for twenty years. It is a condition of shortage of money. And I am pointing out where, in one direction, that shortage of money could have been measurably prevented by action of this Government. I maintain that the condition is not only such as to justify the Opposition in moving the resolution they have moved but such as to call upon the Government, if they have any proposals to make, if they have any remedy to offer—as it must be offered in the Budget Speech—to bring down their Budget at once so that such remedy as they may see fit to apply may be applied without delay.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER: We cannot do it until the Address is passed.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend will agree that the Budget shall be brought down to-morrow, the Address will be passed this afternoon.

Mr. FOSTER: You are nearly exhausted already, and of course you are taking advantage.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend need not fancy that this subject is exhausted. It is too important a question, it touches the vital interests of every man in Canada too closely, to be exhausted by anything I could say, or by anything that even he himself could say.

Now, I do not wish to delay the House, but I desire to draw attention to a special feature of this matter that has been alluded to but is perhaps not as thoroughly understood as it should be. The argument has been made that because the United States produces wheat in large amount, and exports wheat in large amount, therefore there is not and cannot be a market for Canadian wheat in the United States. On this point I asked a question of this grain house in Montreal of which I have spoken. I asked if it was a fact that in the Liverpool market American wheat was sold at a higher price than Canadian wheat of equal quality. And here is the answer I get:

> With reference to your last question, I presume that statement has reference to American winter wheat. As regards Australian wheat, as you are aware, that is a white wheat. It is quite true that at times all these classes of wheat will sell at a higher price than your No. 1 Northern Manitoba. That is merely a matter of supply and demand.

That is to say, in the markets of the United Kingdom there is a demand for certain classes of wheat to make flour for pastry purposes. When these classes of wheat are in short supply naturally the price is higher, and when they are in abundant supply naturally the price is lower. Now, what is the case in regard to certain soft wheat in the Liverpool markets is the case in regard to the hard wheat of Canada in the United States markets. In the United States they are producing and milling for a population of ninety or a hundred million and of that product only a small proportion is hard wheat. That which comes from the Red River valley is, I understand, the only hard wheat grown in the United States. For purposes of mixing, I understand that there is a special demand in the United States for hard wheat, and when they have not enough hard wheat to meet their requirements, they import from us and pay a higher price. As a matter of fact, they never have enough hard wheat for mixing purposes to supply the home market, and for that reason there is a continual demand in the United States for the hard wheat of our prairie provinces at an advanced price. It is because the farmers are entitled to it, and can be given that advantage, that we bring this matter very strongly to the attention of the Government.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What about the wheat of North Dakota; that is hard, is it not?

Mr. OLIVER: I said the Red River valley.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: The Red River valley must extend over a very wide area.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not mean only the lands immediately adjoining the river; I mean the area known as the Red River valley, the black-soil country of Northern Minnesota and the two Dakotas. That is the hard wheat district of the United States, and although it produces very largely, it does not produce anything like as much as the mills of the United States require for mixing purposes. If there is anything further to be said in that regard, the clipping read by my hon. friend the member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), a quotation from the report of the United States Consul in Hong Kong, published with the authority of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, would perfectly establish the fact. It is specifically stated that flour manufactured from United States wheat cannot compete with Canadian flour in a neutral market. No other evidence is necessary to establish the fact that Canadian wheat can command a premium price in the United States if it is but allowed to reach that market. The Government of the United States is willing that it should come in, and it only remains for the Government of Canada, without entering into any entangling alliances or agreements with the United States, to take such action as will allow that wheat to be marketed in the United States, and to give the Canadian farmers the benefit of the higher price they would thereby obtain.

There are many conditions that enter into the price of wheat. There is production there is consumption, there is transportation, and there are the arrangements that are connected with handling and storing. I am informed on authority that I do not think will be questioned, that for certain special reasons which concerned Canada only, the price of Canadian wheat was lower in Liverpool last year by several cents than the market of Liverpool warranted. Let me read the statement:

> With reference to the last crop in the Northwest which we are now handling, during the months of October and November, the prices for No. 1 Northern almost continually declined, which was due to the great pressure to sell, owing no doubt to the financial situation. We had letters from the other side—

That is, from England.

> —stating that it was the finest wheat and the cheapest in the world, and they could not understand why it should be sacrificed in the way it was. There was no other country selling in competition with us at the time; it simply went down under its own weight.

Mr. BURNHAM: If the United States wants our wheat, and if they have no cogent reason for wanting to send theirs into this country, why on earth do they persist in keeping the balance of trade against themselves year after year as they are doing, and in waiting for this House to give them permission to take our wheat in?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not commissioned to answer for the Government of the United States. The ex-President will be in this city on Saturday, and I would suggest that my hon. friend consult him in the matter.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE: Will the hon. gentleman tell us who made the statement which he has been reading?

Mr. OLIVER: No, I will not tell my hon. friend who made the statement, although I am quite at liberty to do so; because I do not think he has any right to inquire. If he is interested in the matter, he can easily verify the assertion made as a statement of fact. It is open for any gentleman to show that it is not a fact, if it is not. There is no question about the fact that wheat was at a lower point in the Liverpool market last fall than it has been for many years. There is no doubt, as is affirmed elsewhere in this letter, that Canadian wheat was selling below the price of United States wheat of equal value; the reason given for that condition was that our Canadian wheat was forced on the market and naturally the price went down, as the article says, under its own weight. Why, it may be asked, was the wheat sent forward in such large quantities? Partly because of the pressure which was exerted upon the farmer compelling him to sell, and partly the feeling on the part of the farmer that it would be better for him to sell early than to sell late, after a grain blockade had occurred and the price had been still further hammered down. If we had the right to sell to the United States all the year round, we would have the advantage of the double market; we would have the advantage of winter transportation to one of those markets, and our farmers would not be compelled to force all their grain out before the close of navigation. Free access to the markets of the United States last year would, aside from the advance in the price from the United States market, by making it a business proposition for our farmers to hold back their wheat, have helped the Liverpool price to a very material extent. It is beyond question that, having regard to world products, the wider the markets, the greater their number, and the more easily accessible they are, the better for the producer. That is an elementary proposition that cannot be denied. If our prairie west is to increase in production, our farmers must be able to make a profit. Under circumstances as they are, it is necessary for the Government of Canada, instead of shutting their eyes, instead of asking people to wait until things right themselves, without loss of time to take every means that can be taken to secure to the producer the best price that the world's markets will give him, by decreasing the burden of taxation, by facilitating his means of production, by decreasing the cost of transportation, by improving the conditions under which trade is carried on; and if to attain this end it is necessary for these gentlemen to forswear their settled policy, if it is necessary for them to reverse the position that they took in 1911, I say the needs of the country are such as to demand that action at their hands; and, whatever they may conceive to be their duty according to their belief, we consider it to be our duty to bring to the attention of the House and of the country, in the most emphatic manner that we are able to, the condition as it exists, the need of a remedy and a suggestion as to what the remedy should be.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I am very sorry that the Government supporters appear to have dropped out of this discussion; it seems to me it is of sufficient importance to justify the Government in putting up men to continue it. In the minds of the farmers of Saskatchewan, at least the question of the removal of the Canadian duty on wheat is one of vast importance. We are told by members and supporters of the present Government that the Government has done great things for the farmers. I am willing to give all reasonable credit to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) for what he has done in the matter of agricultural grants. I believe the estimate for agricultural purposes for the years 1913-14 is something more than $1,000,000 over the estimate prepared by the late Government for the years 1911-12. It seems to me that the boasting we have heard about this great increase is very extravagant, to say the least of it, when we remember that the increase in the general estimates of the years 1913-14 over 1911-12 amounts to $50,000,000, it does not seem to me at least that the increase in the agricultural grant is surprising, except on account of its meagreness. A little over 2 per cent of the increase is given to agriculture. As the people of Canada are generally waking up to the fact that agricultural education has been neglected in our country, that agricultural progress is necessary in order to have progress of any kind, and that it is in the interest of the country generally that agriculture should receive more attention and assistance, it seems to me that the percentage of increase in the Estimates voted to agriculture is small instead of large, and that the minister might very well have made the vote much greater and still have had the general support of all classes of the community. I think his failure to provide for a greater proportion of the general increase being given to the work of his department indicates a want of courage on his part. The amount the farmers of the prairie provinces will gain by the action of the United States in throwing the duty off cattle and decreasing the duty on oats is very much more than they will gain by the Agricultural Instruction Act. The Minister of Agriculture should not allow himself to be outdone in the matter of assisting the farmers of Canada by the President of the United States. We have a right to expect more from our Minister of Agriculture than from the President of the United States; but I do not think that any one will suggest that we get anything like as much. The greatest assistance we have got since the present Government came into power, in fact the only assistance, has come from the other side of the line. We hear suggestions that it would be a bad thing to encourage anything that would create a desire to be annexed to the United States. I do not know what possible condition would make that more likely than the present state of affairs, when we are getting all our help from the United States and nothing from our own Government. I do not wish to refer to the reciprocity question particularly, but I want to say that this Government deprived us of the tremendous advantage we would have gained under the reciprocity arrangement of 1911. I believe that the action of the Government in that case worked a great injury, not only to the farmers of Canada, but also to the whole of Canada. However, I do not propose to discuss that at this particular time.

In view of the great loss sustained by us through their action on this question, it is only reasonable that they should endeavour to make up a portion of that loss in some other way; and when the Underwood tariff became law in the United States, I for one fully believed that the Government of Canada would have taken immediate action to remove the duties on our wheat and wheat products, in order to allow us an opportunity of having the benefit of the American market in marketing our crops of 1913. I must say that I was seriously disappointed when time slipped by and nothing was done by the Government, and I think we have a right to be disappointed. I think it only reasonable that every farmer in the West should feel disappointed, and I believe that every farmer in the West, Liberal or Conservative, was seriously disappointed—the Conservatives perhaps more than the Liberals, although they may not care to admit it.

We are sometimes told that we cannot gain anything by having access to the American market. The falseness of this is amply proved by the great gains we have made by the removal of the duty on live stock and the reducing of the American duty on oats. I am well aware that the Fort William and Minneapolis reports for the crop year, starting the 1st of September, 1912, and ending with the 31st of August, 1913, can be juggled, and have been juggled in such a manner as to make it appear, to the uninitiated at least, that the western Canadian farmer would not have been a gainer by having had access to the United States, provided, of course, the United States had access to his market as well.

I am well aware that these market reports may appear to casual observers to have that meaning; but even if that were true, I fail to see that it is a good reason why the present request of the western farmers should be refused. We must remember that the crop in the United States in 1912 was handled under exceptional circumstances. There was a bumper crop in the north-western states, greater, I suppose by a long way than they ever had before. That naturally affected Minneapolis and other markets. Our opponents find it very convenient to ignore the vast difference in grade between No. 1 Canadian Northern and No. 1 Northern American wheat. I think most gentlemen in this House who have a knowledge of these things will agree with me that there is a difference of at least three cents a bushel in favour of Canadian wheat. I have made some careful comparisons of the prices in Fort William and Minneapolis for the year during which the 1912 crop was marketed. I took my figures as far as possible from the Winnipeg Telegram. Sometimes when I could not find the reports in that paper I applied to other sources, but only on such occasions. I find that for the month of September, 1912, the average price at Fort William was 96 cents; in Minneapolis 89¾ cents, a considerable difference in favour of the Fort William market. In October they were practically the same, 90 cents each; Fort William was actually a very small fraction of a cent higher than Minneapolis. In November things changed slightly. Fort William averaged 83 cents and Minneapolis 84⅝ cents. December, Fort William 80⅝ cents Minneapolis, 82⅝ cents; January 1913, Fort William 82¼, Minneapolis 86⅝; February, Fort William 84, Minneapolis 87½; March, Fort William 85½, Minneapolis, 86. You will notice that in September the Fort William price was considerably higher, but gradually the Minneapolis price rose. In March we see the Fort William price gaining. In April it makes a further gain. In that month the price at Fort William was 90¼ and in Minneapolis 89⅛; May, Fort William 93, Minneapolis 91¼; June, Fort William 97⅛, and Minneapolis 92⅝; July, Fort William 96¾, and Minneapolis, 90⅝; August, Fort William 94½, and Minneapolis 89½. You will notice that during seven months the Fort William price was the higher. That is why I say it might appear to the casual observer that the Canadian farmer would not be gaining anything by such an arrangement as we are now suggesting. Only during five months was the American price, apparently, higher than the Canadian. I say apparently because it is only a matter of appearances. But even if we ignore the difference in value of grades, it does not necessarily follow that even during that exceptional year the western farmer would on the whole have done worse in the American market than in the Canadian, provided he had free access to both. It is true that during the twelve months in question there were a majority of the days of the year during which the Fort William prices were apparently higher than the Minneapolis prices, but it is far from true that the western farmers sold more grain while the Fort William prices were apparently the higher. As a matter of fact very little of the farmers' grain was sold by them at that time. Nearly all their grain was sold by them during the months of November, December, January and February, during which, if we allow for the three cents difference in value, the Canadian farmer got 4⅝ cents less in November, 5 cents less in December, 7⅝ cents less in January and 6½ cents less in February, in Fort William than his neighbour got in Minneapolis, and even in March he got 3½ cents less, so that even in that exceptional year, I think I am within the mark in claiming that the farmer who had access only to the Canadian market got on an average 4 cents or 5 cents a bushel less for his wheat than the farmer who had access to the American market got for wheat of equal quality. I am sure the farmers of this House, and especially those from Saskatchewan and Alberta, will fully bear me out in what I say. I think the Manitoba farmers are in much the same position. Besides this, it has been frequently proved by market reports that during five years from 1906 to 1911 the average difference was nine cents in favour of the American market.

While I am quite willing to deal particularly with the year, to which I have referred, which is the most favourable year our opponents can select, we must not forget that in other years the gain by the farmer would have been very much greater. If you look up the inspection reports in the Winnipeg papers, you will see that the number of cars inspected was very, very small during the time that the Fort William price was higher than Minneapolis, and even that does not show the small quantity of wheat sold by the farmers at that time. We must remember that a great many of these cars are filled in the slack months with grain that has been lying in the elevators or stored by the dealers. I do not claim that the opening of the American market would necessarily mean that we would gain the full amount of the difference.

The effect of opening up to us a market in which the price is on the average better than the price in our own markets, would necessarily mean that we would get a better price. I will assume that the opening up of the Minneapolis market to our grain would tend to somewhat decrease the price in Minneapolis. But if we take even one-half of the difference in price, I think the farmers of the West are well justified in being anxious to receive that one-half and I think the western farmers are entitled to it and would be satisfied with it. It will, I think, be generally admitted by all fair-minded men, that it is reasonable to suppose that we would gain at least one-half of the difference in the price between Minneapolis and Fort William.

We are sometimes told that if the price which the farmer gets for his wheat is increased, the price of wheat products to the consumer would be increased to an equal extent; but the fact that during many months of the year the price of wheat at Fort William is higher than the price at Minneapolis will show that such is not the case. In some cases—even after allowing the three cents difference in the value of the grades—the difference in favour of Fort William amounted to ten or twelve cents. Certainly in times like that the Canadian miller could have purchased American wheat more cheaply than he could have purchased the Canadian wheat, and the farmer would have lost nothing by that because the wheat was then out of his hands. The speculator would have received just so much less from the Canadian consumer, and of course the speculator would be a little bit out, but I do not think any one will deny that so far as the general benefit to the country is concerned, the consumer should have the margin instead of the speculator. In discussing the position of the consumer it must also be remembered that the consumer does not consume the raw wheat; he consumes it only when it is turned into flour.

Dealing with the question of flour, we are met with the argument that we would do injury to the millers of Canada; that we would ruin their trade; that we would drive them out of business and cause the wheat to be manufactured into flour in the United States, and that we would have to ship the wheat there and ship the flour back again. I cannot imagine there is any one, in this House at all events, who has so little knowledge of the actual facts as to believe anything of that kind. I had some difficulty in obtaining late reports of the prices of flour at Winnipeg, and the latest quotation I have is in the Winnipeg Telegram of Monday, January 19, reporting the Winnipeg flour prices of Saturday, the 17th of this month.

The highest quotation for flour at Winnipeg on that date was $5.40 per barrel and the lowest $3.00 per barrel. I give only two quotations, the lowest and the highest, but there were a number of other quotations given for grades of flour in between and dividing the total by the number of quotations given, I find that the average price was $4.47. I arrived at the average price in Chicago by the same process. The Chicago Tribune gives the price of flour for the same date, the highest price quoted being $5.30 and the lowest $2.65, and applying the same process, the average of the quotations is $3.70 a barrel. On the same day No. 1 Northern wheat was 85⅛ cents at Fort William while the Chicago price for American No. 2 Northern was 90¼ cents. I find no Chicago quotation for No. 1 on that date and so I was obliged to take the quotation for No. 2. I think most of us have heard enough of the difference in the prices of these grades to have an idea as to what that difference would be. In other words, the best Chicago flour on that date was quoted ten cents lower than at Winnipeg; the worst 35 cents lower, and the average 77 cents lower, while No. 2 wheat was five and a half cents per bushel higher in Chicago than No. 1 in Fort William. This shows plainly how the Canadian consumer, as well as the Canadian grain grower, will gain by the action we propose. There is no question but that, while the Canadian grain grower will get more for his wheat, the Canadian consumer will buy his flour at a lower price and the millers will not be driven out of business even then. It is safe to say that there is no possibility of the millers being driven out of business by any proposal such as this. I assert that the statement to that effect is not supported by evidence. We are not shown how it costs Canadian millers more than American millers to mill their wheat, but the statement that the Canadian millers cannot compete with the American millers is very easily disproved by the evidence at hand. I take from the Canadian trade reports the exports of flour produced in Canada for the year ending March 31, 1908, to the year ending March 31, 1913, inclusive, and the following is the result:

[Mr. Thomson.]

Exports of Canadian Flour.

	Barrels.	Value.
1908	1,962,740	$ 8,454,954
1909	1,738,038	7,991,413
1910	3,064,028	14,859,854
1911	3,049,046	13,854,790
1912	3,738,836	16,034,064
1913	4,478,043	19,970,689

It will be seen that nearly $20,000,000 worth of flour was exported out of Canada by the millers of Canada, for the year ending March 31, 1913, and in that same year there was exported by the millers of Canada 1,662,338 cwts. of bran valued at $1,603,003. So that in the year ending March 31, 1913, there was exported milled products from Canada to the value of $21,573,692. It is impossible, of course, to give the exact amount that will be exported during the current year which will end on the last day of next month, but judging by the increase that has taken place from year to year in the past, we may safely say that over $26,000,000 worth of mill products will be exported this year by the Canadian millers. It must be remembered that when a miller exports mill products from this country to some other country, he is in open competition with the world; he has to face the Minneapolis millers and millers from many other places. He has no advantage whatever. Unless he produces his flour as cheaply as other millers, he cannot export his flour. Looking over the speech which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) delivered the other day, I find he says that the output of the mills of Canada is now $82,000,000 or thereabouts. If that is correct, as I presume it is, then if the output exported increases during the present year, as it has done in past years, about one-third of the mill products of Canada will be exported to other countries and will come into direct competition with the mill products of every other country, with no advantage, no protection. If the mills can compete with other millers on one-third of their products, there is no reason why they should not compete for our benefit with other millers on the other two-thirds.

I think that makes the matter clear; but to make it a little clearer, even at the risk of repetition, I desire to quote from a news item in the morning Citizen of Ottawa of the 26th of this month. It is headed 'Canadian flour drives American out of Orient.' That is very pleasant reading. It must be remembered that these Canadian millers are frightened out of their lives of American millers. We are told that they must be protected or our wheat will go to the United States, be milled there and the flour will come back to us to be consumed. On the other hand, however, they are able to go to the Orient, to compete freely with these American millers and beat them out of the market. The news item contains the following:

> The weekly trade report contains an item that is of exceeding significance in connection with Canadian grain in the Orient. The American Consul General at Hong Kong, reporting to his home Government states that Canadian flour is practically driving the American product out of the market.

We have no reason to suppose that this statement is not correct. If it is correct, it proves plainly and conclusively that the Canadian miller does not require any protection from the American miller, from whomever else he may require it.

I wish to say a word in regard to the exporting of bran. We are told it would be a serious thing for our wheat to be allowed to go free into the United States, because it would go there to be milled and the bran would be consumed there, while the flour would be shipped back to us. If the bran exports of this year exceed the exports of last year in the same proportion that the exports have been increasing from year to year, we may expect that in the neighbourhood of 2,000,000 cwt. of bran will be exported by the millers of this country during the present year. If that is so, it is quite plain that we are not likely to be in any great trouble on the bran question.

Our friends on the other side of the House often twit the western farmers on the fact that they are not going into mixed farming, and tell them that they should adopt a system of mixed farming. I am a farmer in the West, and I am fully aware of the fact that it will be to our benefit to adopt a system of mixed farming. I am endeavouring to adopt it on my farm. I am gradually getting into that system. A large proportion of the farmers of the West, so far as they are able, are doing the same. It is all very well to lecture us in this respect. I do not think, however, that lectures will do any good. The western farmer has sufficient confidence in himself that there is no one in this House able to lecture him successfully. There is no one in this House from whom he is willing to take lectures. Perhaps that is wrong of us, but it is a fact.

There are other things which the present Government might do to encourage mixed farming. I do not know what has been done by this Government. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce used to give us periodic lectures on the necessity of adopting mixed farming, but I do not know that he has done anything to encourage us. As a matter of fact the encouragement that we are getting is like other agricultural encouragement, all from the other side of the line. The same unfortunate condition exists that when we look for help, encouragement, assistance, the Government says: You must get all your assistance from the Yankees. They say: We do not want any truck or trade with the Yankees, but if you want any help, you must go to them. I think I am right in saying that all the official encouragement that we have received during the last couple of years has been from the American Government.

When the American Government removed the duty from live stock, they gave us the greatest encouragement we have ever had or are likely to have for some time. The western farmers are not killing their calves now, as they formerly did. Formerly they preferred steers, as the steers brought a little better price than the heifers. Things have changed now. The farmers are looking for heifers. They are saving their calves. In a few years, if the price continues as it is now, you will see lots of cattle in Saskatchewan and other western provinces.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: And no thanks to the present Government.

Mr. THOMSON: Ii is unfortunate that we are not able to give thanks to our own Government, because as good citizens we would like to be in a position to give thanks to our own Government instead of to a government of a foreign country.

We are very often told that it is a dangerous thing to open the markets of Canada to our American competitors; that the farmers of Canada must be very careful; that they want to look out for their own interest; that they do not want competition; that they must protect their home market and keep it for themselves. If I know anything about the farmers of Saskatchewan, that is not their idea of the matter at all. I am satisfied that in considering any policy we must consider its effect on the consumers as well as on the producers.

On these subjects, especially where the farmer is the producer, I feel that it is my duty to look carefully to the effect which the policy will have upon the Canadian consumer, and especially upon the labouring classes. And let me say this: If I were appearing before the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan and made such a statement as that, it would be cheered to the echo, I am satisfied; but if I made any remark which would show that I did not care a straw what effect this had upon the labouring class, I should be howled down. That is the spirit of the western farmer.

We have heard a great deal about the heads of the Grain Growers' Association. I want to say that there is no class of men in Canada who show better spirit in dealing with other classes of the community than the leaders of the Grain Growers' Association of the West, and I challenge contradiction. There is no class of people in Canada that are more likely to consider fairly the effect of any policy upon the consumers, especially upon the labouring class, than are the farmers of the West. I believe that to be the spirit of the farmers of Qu'Appelle; and I should not wish to represent the farmers of Qu'Appelle were it otherwise.

Now, let me say in conclusion, speaking for the farmers of the West, that all they want is a fair field and no favour. They are prepared to compete with the world. And let me say to the people of Ontario, who sometimes talk about their farmers not producing very much and about protection being of some use to them, that the farmers of Ontario would do well to keep their eyes on that western country. At present we are growing grain, especially wheat. We are exporting wheat, and the price of our product is fixed, almost invariably fixed, by the foreign markets. Some of our friends say that we should adopt mixed farming. We shall adopt mixed farming. But let it be understood that whatever we undertake to produce we shall produce in such large quantities that the home market will not be able to fix the price, but the price will be fixed by the export market. This is a point that should not be lost sight of by our friends in Ontario. I call them our friends. I am an Ontario man myself, born and brought up on an Ontario farm, and I am not ashamed of it. I am the son of an honest Ontario farmer and ask no prouder pedigree. I do not admit that one can have a better pedigree. I say our friends the Ontario farmers should keep in view the point to which I have referred. If we start to produce beef, in a very short time the price of beef will be fixed entirely by the export price; if we undertake to produce butter, the same will be true, or if eggs and poultry, the same will be true. All we ask is a fair field and no favours. We believe we have a country, a soil and a people that are the equal of any in the world. We believe that we have a better country than our friends to the south of us. We believe we have a better soil. And we believe, with all due respect to our neighbours to the south, that we have better men. If we are not prepared to face the world, we cannot say that; for the very fact of our being unwilling to face the world's competition is to say that either our country is not so good or our soil is not so good, or our people are not so good as those with whom we are to be brought into competition, and that we are not prepared for a moment to admit.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I would not take part in this debate, especially at this stage of it, but for a few observations of a rather personal character, made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) last Monday evening in my absence. Amongst other things the hon. gentleman said that I had said that hard times were a good thing for the country. Now, he had not one tittle of evidence to warrant any such statement. And in my judgment, there is not very much difference between making a statement that you do not know to be true and making one that you know to be untrue. The address to which he referred, a report of which he read to the extent of one or two sentences, occupied about forty-five minutes. I was speaking of the high cost of living. Among other things I stated that we had enjoyed here in this country for many years a period of unprecedented prosperity, that our people during that period had had more money to spend than usual, that they had spent it freely and that such conditions were accompanied by a rise of prices. I also stated that hard times were generally accompanied by low prices. And I cited, for instance, the period in the early 90's, when we suffered a very severe depression in Canada. There are many gentlemen within the sound of my voice who remember that in those years we sold wheat at 40 cents a bushel. A friend of mine lost a large sum of money buying wheat at 40 cents a bushel. I remember that in those days we used to sell a horse for $60 that would bring $300 now. Prices continued to go down from 1890 until about 1897. Prosperity began then to reappear and prices proceeded to rise, and continued steadily to rise until the years 1907 and 1908. We then had a temporary setback financially, hard times for a couple of years. What was the result upon prices? They went down. I think that if you will look at the record of prices you will find that when we have had financial depression, prices have been low, and that when we have enjoyed prosperity and expansion prices have risen. These were the observations that I was making when I had the honour of addressing the Board of Trade in the city of Halifax. The hon. member for Rouville jumped to the conclusion that I had said hard times were a good thing for the country. Now, if the hon. member for Rouville will permit me, I would suggest that if he would rely less upon his imagination, fertile though perverted by political partisanship, and exercise his faculties for the acquisition of facts, he would spare himself much well-merited odium and save this House and the country a great deal of time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The extract which I quoted during the remarks which I had the honour to make to the House was taken from the Montreal Gazette issued the day after the hon. gentleman delivered the speech at Halifax. Besides the Montreal Gazette two days afterwards published a letter from a prominent Conservative in Montreal complaining about the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Labour at Halifax. That was my source of information.

Mr. CROTHERS: The information which the hon. member for Rouville says he received from the Montreal Gazette and from a letter appearing in the same paper did not warrant what he said on Monday night. At the bottom of page 197 of 'Hansard' the hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

> When I read the answer given by the hon. Minister of Labour, that hard times are a good thing for the country, I say that the Government is committing suicide by firing words into its brain.

There was absolutely nothing in the Montreal Gazette or in the letter to which my hon. friend referred which would justify these words.

The hon. gentleman then took up considerable time in referring to the United Shoe Machinery Company and the Combines Investigation Act. He thought great credit was due to the Government of which he was then a member for having passed the Combines Investigation Act, but before he sat down he proved that he had never read the Act, and did not know what it contained. He referred to a statement said to be contained in the annual report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 31 last, to the effect that after the board made its report, no action had been taken. I will give hon. gentlemen a little of the history of this investigation. The United Shoe Machinery Company some years ago, before the Combines Investigation Act was passed, sued some of the manufacturers of boots and shoes, in Quebec city, if I remember rightly, on some of the leases. The defendants set up as a defence to the action the contention that the leases constituted a restraint of trade, that they were therefore illegal, and that the defendants were not liable. The various courts in the province of Quebec held that the defence was well taken; I think the matter passed through the highest courts in the province. The United Shoe Machinery Company appealed from the highest courts in Quebec to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in England, which reversed the judgment which had been given by the courts in Quebec, held that these leases were not in restraint of trade and, the contention that the leases were a restraint of trade being the only defence that had been set up, that the defendants were therefore liable. The defendants had a large bill of costs to pay, as must be realized by every one who has had the luxury of carrying an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. They were the people who started the proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act, the only proceedings of the kind that have ever been so instituted under this Act. A board was constituted under the Combines Investigation Act to inquire into the charge as to whether or not the United Shoe Machinery was a combine within the meaning of the Act, and had violated the provisions thereof. A majority of the board made a report during the latter part of October, finding that the leases, especially those portions of them designated as the tying clauses, constituted a restraint of trade and a violation of the Combines Investigation Act. The hon. member for Rouville inferred from the report of that board that the United Shoe Machinery Company at once became liable to a penalty of $1,000 a day. On page 202 of 'Hansard,' he is reported as saying:

> To make a long story short, the board reported against the United Shoe Machinery Company, and the company was liable, according to the law passed in 1910, to a fine of $1,000 per day. In the month of November last, I find in the Labour Gazette, the report of the Deputy Minister of Labour dated July 15, 1913. After citing facts it concludes with the following significant statement:

The board's report having been published in the Canada Gazette of October 26, 1912, the date on which the company would be subject to the operation of section 23 was advanced to May 1st 1913 [illegible] date of writing the department has not been made aware of any action taken as a result of the board's report.

These remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville show that he has not the faintest idea of what the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act are. The United Shoe Machinery Company, under the 23rd section of that Act, did not become liable, as the hon. member for Rouville has said, to a penalty of $1,000 a day simply because the board reported that they were a combine. The 23rd section of the Act, which is the one imposing the penalty, provides that where a board reports that a combine exists, the penalty shall be enforced unless the people against whom the report has been made cease 'so to offend' within ten days, or within any further time granted by the board. So that if any further time were granted by the board, the company would have ten days within which to cease 'so to offend,' and if within that period of time they did cease 'so to offend', they would not be liable to a penalty of $1,000 a day or any other sum. My hon. friend attempted to convey the impression that immediately upon the making of the report by the board that a combine existed, those against whom the report was made became liable to a penalty of $1,000 a day. As a matter of fact, the board, under the authority of the 23rd section of the Combines Investigation Act, extended to six months the time within which the company must cease 'so to offend,' and within that period the United Shoe Machinery Company did cease 'so to offend.' Having done so, they were not liable to any penalty, so that the charge made by my hon. friend that I have been derelict in my duty has no foundation whatever in fact.

Then, by reading a sentence or two from the report of the department dealing only with the year expiring on the 31st of March last, my hon. friend attempted to make this House believe that on the 15th of July no action had been taken. As a matter of fact, the report was not dealing with any period later than the 31st of March, the expiration of the last fiscal year, and even if you were to take it that it were dealing with a later period the interpretation put upon it by my hon. friend was utterly unwarranted. The deputy minister says:

On the day of writing the department has not been made aware of any action taken as a result of the board's report.

Any one who will read the context will see that by the word 'action' there he is referring to taking proceedings against the board. That is all he is referring to. He was not dealing at all with anything subsequent to the 31st of March; the six months extension did not expire until May, so that the period of time he was dealing with had nothing whatever to do with the question of whether or not the board had ceased to offend within the extended time allowed the United Shoe Machinery Company to cease so to offend. I understand that the objections made by the board to the provisions in these leases were altered by the United Shoe Machinery Company. We have had no complaint, except one, from any one in Canada since the alterations were made in these leases. Of the 145 manufacturers of shoes in Canada 138 use these machines. They are very much pleased with them, they are much pleased with the manner in which they are permitted to use them; they think it encourages the manufacture of boots and shoes. Of course if a man were obliged to buy all the machinery necessary in a boot and shoe factory he would require a very large amount of money. There are some boots and shoes that pass through two hundred hands in the making, so I was told, in factories in Quebec. This company provides all the machines, scores and scores of them, I do not know how many, between one and two hundred. These machines are leased to the manufacturer, who pays a royalty. In some boots and shoes the royalty is one cent a pair, in others half a cent a pair; the highest, I believe, is five cents for a pair of boots. In the aggregate I have no doubt that this company makes a large amount of money, but you will see that an addition of from two to five cents on a pair of boots is not very material. The manufacturers like this way of doing it, they can have all this machinery put in their factories without paying out a dollar, and they proceed to use them. The United Shoe Machinery Company examines them every few days and sees that they are in perfect order. If any new machine is invented the old one is taken out and the new one put in. I do not pretend to know enough about the manufacture of boots and shoes to say whether this is a good system or not, but I do know that there has been only one complaint to the Department of Labour since the finding of this board.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What was the complaint?

Mr. CROTHERS: The complaint in substance was that there were some additional provisions put in the leases that were objectionable. My right hon. friend will know from the provisions of the Act that it will be necessary to have another board go over the whole thing again to determine that. The Combines Investigation Act is a comparatively new enactment. Like almost all other legislative enactments, it has its defects. Time and experience will disclose these defects, and I have no doubt that while this Government is in power and some defects appear provision will be made and the Act amended so as to have more satisfactory provisions. My right hon. friend understands as a lawyer that hardly any statute proves very satisfactory in the condition in which it is first enacted. The operation of the Act very often brings out some defect that was not perceived. We are none of us perfect in drafting statutes, defects appear with experience and the wise legislator, when he is satisfied that the defects are material will make the necessary amendments to meet the objections that have arisen out of the Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood the minister to say that the United Shoe Machinery Company had complied with the award of the board by altering the one condition which was complained of by the plaintiff in the case. Am I right in this?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think my right hon. friend is rather confining the words I used. What I said was that the board, in making its award, pointed out the objectionable features of these leases, I did not say only one; and I understand that within the six months the objectionable features were removed and new forms made. I may be perfectly frank with my right hon. friend and tell him that the one complaint that was made was, in substance, that the new leases were worse than the old ones; but only one complaint has come to the department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry to say that the answer is not quite satisfactory. However, this discussion is rather foreign to the present debate. There is a motion on the Order Paper on which the matter will have to come up.

Mr. CROTHERS: My right hon. friend says there is a motion on the Order Paper calling for copies of all correspondence and everything of that kind, which will be prepared as expeditiously as possible. This just inspires the thought that in all these cases it will be very much better, before referring to a matter of this kind, to wait until we get the documents and facts. I have suffered before now in cases where, in making a motion for the production of papers a long speech is made, founded on rumour or founded completely on fabrication, and when the papers are brought down it is discovered that there was no foundation whatever for the charges that were made. I think that in this respect we are putting the cart before the horse and it would be very much better to get some facts, as my right hon. friend is proposing to do in his motion, get the facts first and discuss them afterwards, not discuss it first on rumour and fabrication for which, when the papers are brought down, it is found there is no foundation at all.

Mr. GEORGE McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Since the defeat of reciprocity in 1911 no question has excited so much interest in western Canada and attained such large support as the question of free wheat. I am free to say that not only is the question of free wheat supported by those who were in favour of reciprocity, but it is also supported by many influential men and journals who were opposed to the larger measure. Among those who are now supporters of the agitation in favour of free wheat are such newspapers as the Winnipeg Telegram, which is the chief Conservative organ in western Canada; and I know that the organ of the Conservative party in my own city of Saskatoon has also come out in favour of the same measure. The fact that these journals have come to such a conclusion is not the reason why I am supporting this amendment. But it may be a reason why many others will support it and see good reasons why this Parliament should revise the tariff to allow free wheat to come into Canada. In the Legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, on the 26th of November last, a resolution was moved in the following terms by Mr. Scott, seconded by Mr. Finlayson:

> That in the opinion of this House the Parliament of Canada should remove the duty at present imposed on wheat and on flour in order that Canadian wheat and flour may be exported to the United States free of duty.

Thirty-five voted in support of that resolution, and three against it. Those who voted 'Nay' were Mr. Willoughby, the leader of the Conservative party in the Legislature; Mr. Bradshaw, of Prince Albert, and Mr. Wylie, of Maple Creek. I may add that both Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Wylie had voted in the same Legislature in favour of a resolution in support of reciprocity in 1911. But as they found that the leaders of the Conservative party at Ottawa did not support that measure, they repented, and evidently concluded that they would not be caught again. The other members of the Conservative party in the Legislature are not accounted for in the division list. They must have shirked the vote or voted for the motion. In the province of Manitoba, however, there was no such division. On the 12th January last the Legislature passed a resolution unanimously which I would like to put on 'Hansard.' The motion was introduced by Mr. Simpson, a Conservative member, seconded by Mr. Taylor, and reads as follows:

> Whereas the Congress of the United States of America have by recent legislation reduced the duty on wheat and wheat products entering the said the United States of America.
>
> And whereas provision has been made in the said legislation for the total removal of such duty on wheat entering the United States of America from any foreign country who would likewise remove such duty.
>
> And whereas it is the opinion of this House that the removal of such duty by the Government of the Dominion of Canada from the United States of America would be beneficial to the agriculturists of Manitoba.
> Therefore let it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the Parliament of Canada should enact such legislation as would give the farmers of Manitoba the benefit of the countervailing duty on wheat and wheat products as provided in the Underwood tariff.

As I said, that resolution was carried unanimously, Sir Rodmond Roblin, the members of the Conservative Cabinet and the Conservative members all supporting it. If one reads over the resolution, it would appear that the members of the Legislature who voted for it had in mind that it would be very proper for an Order in Council to bring this result about, because they referred to 'the duty of the Government of the Dominion of Canada to remove this duty.' In the main part of the resolution they referred to the 'Parliament of Canada,' because at that time this House was within three days of meeting.

Throughout western Canada there has been a discussion as to whether it would be a good thing for the wheat growers of the country to have American wheat admitted duty free into this country with the right to Canadian wheat growers of free entry into the United States market. Many Conservative speakers throughout the West have attempted to show that it would bring disaster to the western grain growers. Conservative journals throughout the West have also taken this view, and have given figures showing that at certain times during the year wheat was bringing a higher price in Canada than in the United States. This argument has been made not only in the newspapers but on political platforms throughout the country; and I think as late as last summer the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) made such a point.

I shall not go into details to prove that the Canadian wheat grower is better off by having access to the American market, even with the liability of having to meet the American wheat grower in his own market; but I am going to take it for granted, in view of the changed attitude of the Conservative leaders, especially in the province of Manitoba, and of the changed front of Conservative newspapers, that this is an accepted fact; that it is to the advantage of the Canadian wheat grower to have access to the American market. To arrive at such a conclusion indicates that there has been a tremendous change of heart on the part of those of the Manitoba Legislature who are now supporting free wheat, and in those journals which were opposed to it formerly.

Let me remind you of some of the arguments used in western Canada against free wheat. One was that the American market was not as good as the Canadian market, and that the Canadian farmer would suffer in competition with American wheat in Canada. Another argument was that our raw products would be shipped into another country to be manufactured, thus making our staunch Canadian farmers 'hewers of wood' and 'drawers of water.' A third argument was that it would give Washington control of our tariff. A fourth that it would spoil the reputation now held by our grain, as the Americans would mix it with their own baser grades. A fifth argument was that our grain would be deflected to United States channels, to the injury of our Transcontinental system. Another reason was that it would give the United States millers a supply of hard wheat, and enable them to drive Canadian flour out of the markets of the world. Another reason was that it would destroy the Canadian flour-milling industry. A further reason was that it would encourage wheat mining, that is to say our people would be so devoted to the growing of wheat that the soil would give out. Another reason was that it would prevent Canadian farmers from getting preferential treatment from Great Britain in any scheme that might be propounded under the Chamberlain proposals; and when one bears in mind that Sir Rodmond Roblin and all the Conservative members of the Manitoba Government had all used these arguments, one must conclude that the argument to-day in favour of free wheat must be overwhelming to make these gentlemen swallow themselves in this way.

It is said in the press that the resolution of the Manitoba Legislature was brought about at the instance of the Minister of Public Works of Canada. If so, it is altogether to his credit. But I am very much afraid, judging from the tone of the questions which have been addressed to speakers on this side of the House, that free wheat will not be the result of that resolution, and it was no doubt in the knowledge of the Minister of Public Works what was likely to happen when we came to discuss the matter in this House.

If, in the face of the attitude of the Conservative party in the Manitoba Legislature, and the attitude of the Conservative party newspapers in that province, this Parliament does not extend sympathetic relief to the farmers in western Canada, by giving them free wheat, there are some conclusions which might fairly be drawn. One conclusion we have the right to draw is that the resolution of the Manitoba Legislature is a piece of political humbug; another conclusion we might fairly draw is that the men who instigated it are political tricksters, and I would also say that it was put up for the temporary purpose of assisting the Conservative party in the coming provincial elections and in an endeavour to stave off defeat. If we do not get free wheat after such a strong resolution, it will show how completely tied up this Government is in the hands of the combines which gave it such support last election.

The wheat of western Canada is hard wheat; it is required in all markets where flour of high quality is made, and the endeavour of our farmers in the West is to make it a still harder and still better wheat. There have been three occasions on which the superiority of the wheat of Canada has been demonstrated over all other wheat in the world, and especially over the wheat grown in the United States. I refer first to the Land Show held at New York in 1911, when Seager Wheeler of Rosthern, in my own riding, took the prize given by Sir Thomas Shaugnessy of $1,000 for the best wheat produced in the world. In the next year, 1912, at the Dry Farming Congress held at Lethbridge, and which was more largely an American congress than a Canadian congress, Mr. Henry Holmes, of Raymond, Alberta, took the first prize for the best wheat grown in the world, and exhibited at that show. Only last year, at the Dry Farming Congress held at Tusla, Oklahoma, Paul Gerlach, of Allan, in my own riding, took the first prize for the world's best wheat, and to show how the cultivation of wheat has progressed and what high quality it has attained, I may mention that this wheat ran 71 pounds to the bushel, whereas the standard is 60 pounds to the bushel. That improvement in the quality of wheat is going on all the time in western Canada, and the example of those Canadians who have given such effort to the cultivation of wheat is doing a great deal, not only to encourage wheat growing, but the growing of wheat of the very best quality. I am not familiar with the land on which Mr. Henry Holmes of Raymond grew his wheat, but I think I may fairly assume that it is land somewhat similar in character to the land in the neighbourhood of Lethbridge, and that the same results could be obtained from any of the neighbouring lands into which the farmer puts his industry and skill. I have some familiarity with the farms owned by Mr. Seager Wheeler of Rosthern and Mr. Gerlach of Allan, both in my own riding, and they are not farms which are in any way exceptional to lands in that part of the country; they are what might be described as average land. I would say, however, that Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Gerlach are exceptional men in that they are experimental farmers, and they have shown great care and great industry and are doing great credit to Canada. The same results can be obtained by farmers of equal experience and knowledge and industry, and I have no doubt the same results will be obtained by others. I am told that the results in wheat growing obtained by these gentlemen in Alberta and Saskatchewan will do a great deal of good to western Canada in the way of inducing immigration. The Dry Farming Congress which was held at Tusla, Oklahoma, was attended by very many who lived in the more southern parts of the United States, and I am informed that there is going to be a large immigration of persons from that portion of the United States to a country where such grand wheat can be produced. I would like to see the Government of Canada make more suitable acknowledgment in the future than they have in the past of those whose industry, enterprise and scientific knowledge are putting our wheat in the forefront of all the wheat of the world.

Sometimes our western people are told that they are doing too much wheat farming. In view of the fact that, notwithstanding the large crop, the price of wheat is going down, the growers are told by bank presidents and sometimes by daily newspaper editors that they should work harder and go into mixed farming. This question of mixed farming is having the attention of our western people. Stock farming has been taken up by the people in my part of the province and they are making progress in it as they are able to build barns and take care of the stock, and the results are most encouraging. Western Canada has obtained almost as good a record for its live stock as it has for its wheat, because at the International Live Stock Show held at Chicago only last month, Mr. J. D. McGregor, of Brandon, for the second time won the grand challenge cup with one of his animals, as against the animals from all over the United States which competed at that show. It was the first time that stock from the province of Saskatchewan had been exhibited there. The item in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 4, 1913, dated at Chicago, in regard to the Saskatchewan exhibits, is as follows:

> Judging of all horse-classes in which Saskatchewan was interested is complete and the western horses have a phenomenal record of wins to their credit. Twenty prizes to carry home. In only one class did they show and not get in the money. The exact number and character of the wins is as follows: 3 first prizes, 6 second prizes, 2 fourth prizes, 3 fifth prizes, 2 sixth prizes, 1 seventh prize.

I am mentioning these matters to relieve the minds of any persons who may think that we are doing too much wheat farming and too little stock raising. I want to show them that not only do we excel in wheat farming, but we are doing all we can to excel in live stock raising.

I wish to give very briefly my reasons for desiring to see free wheat in this country. In the first place we have a better market by having two markets, and we do not fear competition from the United States. Secondly, we have an opportunity to secure this market without disturbing other schedules of the tariff. Thirdly, the cost of farm labour has doubled in the past few years, thus reducing the margin of profit. Fourthly, the price of wheat has gone down. Another reason is that the effect of the imposition of the United States tariff of 10 cents a bushel is the same as an export duty on our own wheat, except that the duty does not go into our treasury, but into the treasury of a foreign state.

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two upon the question of free wheat, largely on account of the position taken by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) today. If my memory serves me, shortly after the reciprocity pact was brought before the people, the first and most pronounced opposition that we received came from the Legislature of Manitoba, of which the hon. Minister of Public Works was then a member. I understand that a friend of his made the statement that it was thought that the hon. Minister of Public Works was responsible for the action taken by the Manitoba Government, and its leader Sir Rodmond Roblin. How true that is I do not know except that the Manitoba Government, headed by Sir Rodmond Roblin, was the first to begin the opposition to reciprocity. Now, he and his entire party without one exception, supported by the Liberal following in the House, voted the other day for free wheat. What is the reason? Why the change? Why do these two men, who worked in harmony for so many years leading the Conservative party to victory election after election, disagree now? We are told to wait until the Budget is brought down. Every hon. member on the Liberal side of the House, who has given the question any thought has no hope that, when the Budget is brought down, there will be free wheat. We believe that the thing has been a bluff from start to finish, a bluff for the provincial elections which will come on within the next five or six months. As a result of the action which will be taken by the Government, the hon. Minister of Public Works will simply ask his supporters to vote against free wheat and they will support him without fail, because they will do anything he tells them to do and do it quickly and mildly. They are going to vote against free wheat. They may offer any excuse they like to the farmers of Manitoba, but it will not be accepted by the people who are not earning a living after working earnestly for it. This is the position in the province of Manitoba to-day and in the province of Saskatchewan also, that the people, who are raising wheat and selling it upon the markets of Manitoba and Saskatchewan to be shipped to the markets of the world, are losing money.

I heard an hon. member on the other side of the House say that the farmers of the West were clearing from ten to fifteen thousand dollars a year by raising wheat. I make the statement and I can prove it, that the farmers are not making fifteen per cent on their money, nor yet five per cent on their money. More than that the majority are not in a position to pay interest on what they owe, let alone making ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year.

It will be interesting to wait and see what will become of the action which will be taken by the Government. The Winnipeg Telegram, the organ of the Conservative party in the province of Manitoba said: 'Give the people free wheat.' We do not believe it will have the effect that a great many people think it will have, but let us try it anyway. The people in the West, Conservative or Liberal, Grit or Tory, say: Let us try it anyway. After reciprocity was defeated, a great many people said: Well, if we had known that reciprocity would have been defeated, we would have voted for it. But when they have another chance, the hon. Minister of Public Works will find out if he consults the farmers of western Canada that at least ninety-five per cent of the Conservatives of the West desire free wheat. They desire an entrance to the American market. It cannot possibly do any harm; and if it does any harm, it can be revoked. It is bound to do good and nothing else will satisfy us.

The raising of wheat in the West is not paying. The majority of No. 1 Northern wheat sold in my district this year was sold for seventy cents a bushel. What has the farmer got left? Ten cents a bushel for the threshers. Labourers get $3.00 a day and teams are worth $6.00 a day, and there are all the other costs of operation, to say nothing about the capital invested.

It is all very well for people to go into mixed farming. What is the situation regarding mixed farming in the West? Farmers will not go into mixed farming so long as there is so much virgin soil. That must be admitted. Those who are able to do so will go into mixed farming, but men who are bound down with debts which they owe on their land with banks refusing to lend a dollar, with the interest going up year after year, are in no position to go into mixed farming. If a man owes ten thousand dollars on a section of land, where is he to get $5,000 to go into mixed farming? If his land is mortgaged for all it is worth how is he going to get $5,000 to go into live stock raising? Stock may not always bring the same price that it brings now. Stock raising of course is safe; it is surer. That is quite true, but people are not going to labour from the first day of January to the last day of December if they can possibly make a living by working less. Mixed farming is the last resort, where the farmer, his wife and his family have to get up every morning at daybreak, and do not get to bed until ten o'clock at night. They will not do that if they can possibly get out of it. Free wheat is the position the western farmers are taking; that is the demand they are making, and they are going to see, as far as they can, that it is carried through.

The farmer in the West is hampered by the banks increasing the rate of interest. Interest on land is now nine per cent. The manufacturer gets his toll out of the farmer. The railway gets his toll out of every bushel of wheat. The farmer is in a position in which he is despondent and losing heart.

My reason for voting for free wheat, as I said, is that the farmers as a body demand it, and as I represent a farming community it is my duty to vote with the people I represent. The position of the Government is entirely different. They are afraid to grant free wheat, and they are afraid to oppose it. But they must do one or the other. If they turn to the right they will get punched; if they turn to the left they will get punched. But they cannot get away from it. The talk about this not being the proper time and this not being the proper way to do it will not be accepted by the ordinary farmers like myself. So far as the railways and the millers are concerned, it has been demonstrated time and again in the history of Canada that the railways and the millers will take care of themselves. They will have to face competition, as the farmers of Canada have always said they were prepared to do. The farmers ask for no protection, they are willing to go into the markets of the world and compete with others who are in the same industry as themselves. So far as mixed farming is concerned, I have explained that. I know dozens, yes, hundreds, of farmers in Provencher and Lisgar and Macdonald who would gladly go into mixed farming if they had the money. It is all very well to tell people what they ought to do, but I notice that the advice is generally given by those who toast their shins at coal fires paid for by the Government. It is near to six o'clock, and I will close with the quotation of a few paragraphs from a statement by Mr. E. A. Partridge. I understand that the Prime Minister the other evening quoted from statements made by Hon. Walter Scott, Premier of Saskatchewan, and Hon. A. L. Sifton, Premier of Alberta. But on the very same page is this statement by Mr. Partridge of Sintaluta, one of the most prominent farmers of Saskatchewan, a man who understands what he is talking about as he has demonstrated time and again. He said:

> They pay the highest prices for clothing, furniture, building material, such as cement, lumber, lime and hardware, and for all farm equipment, hand tools, harness, implements, power machinery, power fuel and fencing materials, of any agricultural population in the world. They pay the highest rate of interest on bank loans and mortgages and the highest freight and express rates, coupled with the longest haul for outgoing produce and incoming supplies, of any people of the white race with the possible exception of the Russians.

And further on:

> In spite of the fact that the yield was large and the marketing quickly accomplished the position of the average Saskatchewan producer cannot be said to be satisfactory. The best that Saskatchewan people can hope for is that the returns from the harvest of the year will be sufficient to pay the interest on outstanding obligations. The probability is that even this cannot be done, and that additional money will be borrowed to pay a portion of the interest charges.

One more paragraph only I will read:

> No Saskatchewan farmer can borrow money to-day under 9 per cent.

No wonder he is asking for free wheat.

> To secure this rate he must be able to give a first mortgage on his improved land. If he requires additional money he must pay from 10 per cent per annum to one or two per cent per month. It is no exaggeration to say that there are thousands of Saskatchewan farmers whose entire output for the future time will be completely absorbed by the payment of interest charges and who will inevitably in the course of time lose their holdings.

This reflects the state of affairs in my own neighbourhood. A short time before I came here a man in a position to know told me that unless there was a most miraculous change within a short time, what Mr. Partridge said is likely to take place in Saskatchewan, is likely to take place in the portion of Manitaba in which I live.

[Mr. Molloy.]

On motion of Mr. MacNutt the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, January 29, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Statistics of Railways and Canals for the year 1913.—Mr. Cochrane.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, part 2, for the year ended March 31, 1913.—Mr. Foster.

FENIAN RAID BOUNTIES.

On the Orders of Day being called:

Mr. EMMERSON: In the absence of the Minister of Militia, I would ask the Prime Minister if the time for filing applications in the matter of the Fenian raid bounties has expired?

Mr. BORDEN: I will bring the hon. gentleman's question to the attention of the Minister of Militia.

Mr. LAW: In the absence of the Minister of Militia I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to a letter written by the Department of Militia, which reads as follows:

Ottawa, Jan. 15, 1914.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of 23rd instant, I am instructed by Colonel Hughes to inform you that your application for Fenian raid bounty, 1866-1870, has been approved by the Board of Officers examining claims.

I would state, however, for your information that the county of Yarmouth was one of the last visited by the Fenian Raid Commission, and as the Department of Finance have stopped the issue of cheques since the 31st December, 1913, pending requisite legislation by Parliament, it cannot be stated just when the approved claims from the county of Yarmouth will be settled. Nothing, however, can be done until Parliament passes additional legislation.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) Charles F. Winter, Lt.-Col.,
Military Secretary.

Nathaniel Currier, Esq.,
Yarmouth, N.S.

When is this legislation likely to be brought down and when will the veterans of the county of Yarmouth likely be paid? None of them up to the present time have received any payment whatever.

Mr. BORDEN: As far as I am familiar with this matter, a board was constituted in Nova Scotia for the purpose of looking into the claims in the various counties of that province. The number of these claims is somewhat larger than in other parts by reason of the entire population of the province having been called out at the time of one or both of the raids in question. Information as to the legislation as to which the hon. gentleman has asked will be given by the Minister of Militia and Defence in due course.

IRREGULAR QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER: In reference to the practice which seems to be growing of reading articles in the House and basing upon them questions which cannot properly be answered by a minister without his having time and opportunity to consult the officers of his department and secure the necessary information, it would, in my judgment, be much more appropriate if the questions were put on the Order Paper so that they could be answered after a minister has had time to secure the necessary information.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. H. F. McLeod for an Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Neely, resumed from Wednesday, January 28.

Mr. THOS. MACNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking up very much of the time of the House, but I believe that at least all western members should place their views on record in regard to this very important matter. About two and a half years ago a long debate took place in this House on a similar principle. At that time we had before us an offer of reciprocity with the United States in wheat and wheat products, made especially to Canada—not, as the Wilson Bill does, to the food products of the world; but that offer was rejected. I believe that to-day that question is just as important as it was two and a half years ago and there has been ample evidence since that time that the southern market would have benefited this country to a large extent. I only wish that we had before us to-day the same offer as the previous one and that this Government could be induced to accept it. There has been a change of views in the West. Although the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta decided almost unanimously in favour of accepting that offer, the province of Manitoba did not do so. But evidently they have changed their opinion in that province or are prepared for political reasons to swallow themselves, and are ready now to have some truck and trade with the Yankees. We know the attitude of the Roblin Government when a few days ago—a resolution originating with that Government, was unanimously adopted by the legislature of Manitoba in favour of accepting this offer. In the province of Saskatchewan Mr. Haultain was defeated in the provincial election of 1912 largely because of the strong feeling in favour of reciprocity. Although the provincial Government has nothing to do directly with reciprocity, still the people considered that this was an issue, and they preferred a local government friendly to a policy of that kind to one which was not friendly to such a policy. The successor of Mr. Haultain, who is now on the bench, agreed to this resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Parliament of Canada should remove the duty at present imposed on wheat and on flour in order that Canadian wheat and flour may be exported to the United States free of duty.

A strong delegation, composed of Conservatives from Alberta, led by the leader of the Conservative Opposition in Alberta, came to Ottawa a week or so ago, and it was understood that one of their objects was to ask this Government to accept the offer of free wheat. They did not make this request, it being rumoured that they were headed off; but we know perfectly well that the province of Alberta is strongly in favour of free wheat. What reason can this Government have for refusing this offer? Surely the men who raise the wheat are the persons to be considered. I do not say that they should have protection; they have some now, but they do not want it, and any obstacles in the way of their getting the true value for their product should be removed, no matter what other interests may lose a small portion of their profit in the handling of it or its conversion into flour or in its conveyance to the different markets. There is a decided difference, although it is not so great now as it was previous to 1911, between the American and Canadian prices for wheat. I remember preparing some figures covering ten years, week by week, showing that the average difference for that period was in favour of the American market by about ten cents a bushel.

The difference is not so great at present; but if the price goes lower on the American side, that is a good time not to sell. At all events this would mean a wider market and that is a very important consideration in itself, regardless of the difference in price. At the present time the English market is the only one that Canada has outside of her own, and our home market could only take care of about 40,000,000 bushels last year. That means that our farmers have to send their wheat to England, often causing a glut on that market. The English market was flooded last fall as the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) read to us the other day. At the time the wheat was going on the market there was no competition from other countries, but the price was far lower than the quality of the grain demanded. I have a table here showing that the prices on the Liverpool market have been going down continually since 1907. In December, 1907, No. 1 wheat was worth $1.23; in December, 1911, $1.18½; in December, 1912, $1.07 and in December, 1913, 98 cents, notwithstanding the wheat was of the highest quality. That means that the Liverpool market is not sufficient to take care of the wheat that is being grown even now in the West. It seems to me that the farmers are realizing the necessity for a larger market because they are not producing relatively what they should produce. I have some figures here—and I think they are authoritative—showing that the West produced 209,262,000 bushels of wheat this year and in 1912, 204,280,000 bushels, an increase of only 4,982,000 bushels, and that can be accounted for to a large extent by a better yield per acre, and the better quality of the crop. The land does not appear to have been occupied by other crops to make up for this, because there was practically no increase in the oats grown in 1913. In that year, 242,413,000 bushels were raised, and in 1912, 242,321,000 bushels, only an increase of 92,,000 bushels. This increase can only be accounted for by the better yield per acre, as I remember well that in 1912 a large portion of the crop of oats in Saskatchewan and part of Manitoba was shed by a hurricane and the yield that year was consequently not so good as usual. As to barley, there were 31,060,000 bushels grown in 1913, and in 1912, 31,600,000 bushels. That is a decrease in 1913 of 540,000 bushels. I have not the figures for flax but there was much less flax grown in 1913 than in 1912. For some reason or other, then there does not seem to be a proportionate increase in the growth of all grains. Why is this? To some extent, I believe it is because the farmers are not anxious to increase their acreage. When you take into consideration the freight rates, the cost of labour and of implements, there is very little margin left for the farmer at the present price of wheat, and the people of the West are unanimous almost, in demanding another market. It is their right and they should get it. It has already been mentioned in this House that for some little time last summer the Minneapolis figures were lower than those on the Canadian side. That is easily accounted for because at that time there was very little wheat on the market. As soon as the threshing was over, however, and the wheat came pouring in there was a decided difference in price. Let us look at these figures, taken from the Grain Growers' Guide. On January 3, No. 1 Northern was 4½ cents higher in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg; No. 2, 4⅝ cents higher and No. 3, 5⅝ cents higher. But you have to add about two cents a bushel on account of the difference in the quality of grades. A week afterwards, No. 1 Northern was 3¼ cents higher in Minneapolis; No. 2, 2⅞ cents higher, and No. 3, 3¾ cents higher. What effect would this have upon the West? About 150,000,000 bushels of the 209,000,000 bushels that Canada raises, would be exported. Apply, say three cents a bushel to that and it would make a difference of $4,500,000. If we apply 5 cents, there would be a difference of $7,500,000. Outside of the great benefit this would be to the farmers, it would make a great difference to the eastern part of Canada. Factories are closed to-day in Ontario for lack of orders; people have not got the money to buy; and there are many unemployed throughout the east. I do not mean to say that this larger market would lower the cost of living to any great extent, but it would give some men who are now unemployed money to buy the necessaries of life. I have an article here clipped from a Toronto paper showing that during the past two weeks ten thousand men have been fed by charity. The article reads as follows:

> Ten Thousand Fed within Two Weeks—Salvation Army Headquarters has Welcomed Many of the Destitute—Soup, Coffee, Bread —Simple Food and Space on the Floor to Sleep not Despised.
> During the past two weeks nearly 10,000

meals, consisting of soup, coffee and bread, have been served to unemployed men at the Salvation Army headquarters. Officers responsible for assisting the unemployed men without homes and food have thrown open one of their halls where 250 men sleep on the floor every night. The class of men who avail themselves of the temporary provision made by the Army are generally those out of employment, and, having spent their last cent, are compelled to accept the bowl of soup, the cup of coffee, and enough floor space to give them warmth and shelter for the night. The Army winter relief fund is also being used to assist this huge family of the unemployed.

Several hon. gentlemen have given figures showing that something like 100,000 men are out of employment in Canada to-day. I do not say for a moment that the opening of the American market is going to give employment to all these men, but it would help very materially along that line, and it would also help the farmers very much. To-day if you go into any little town in the West you will find notices posted up of sheriff's sales. That is a very serious matter, and it is not because the farmers are lazy or idle; they are doing the best they can, but it goes to show that the farmers, not altogether on account of the price of wheat and the high cost of implements—although that has a considerable bearing upon it—are not able to pay their way. Relief is going to be given, I understand, not of a charitable nature, but in a businesslike way by the province of Saskatchewan in various ways. It is not that the country is going to degenerate, or is not capable of giving a good living to industrious men, but it is that the conditions are such that they should be improved in order that many of our people in the West may get a better return for their labour. This would assist very materially. It would be an easy matter for this Government to open up that market. It would help not only the farmers of the West, but it would help, I think, the unemployed and factories of the East.

Who are opposed to this? There must be a mandate issued by the milling and railway interests to the Government. They are the only ones that are interested the other way —certainly not the farmer, certainly not the manufacturer nor the consumer. It must be the railway companies and the millers. This is a strong indication that the price must be better to the south and the market more inviting or they need not fear this proposal. It means that in order to retain the carrying trade the railway freight rates would have to be reduced, and in order that the millers should be able to maintain their control over the wheat and get a supply at their own figures they would have to raise the price to the farmer, very frequently, at all events, and they do not like to do this. In the last two years the millers have been making enormous dividends and the railway companies have been doing very well indeed. But I think that the Railway Commission will probably discover that they are well able to get along with smaller freight charges. I remember very well that in 1911 there was a reason given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) why this request of the western farmers should be refused. It was that if the wheat went to the south the Americans would get the benefit of the bran and shorts for feeding purposes which should be retained in this country. When a man raises wheat he raises it to sell, gluten, bran, shorts and all, wherever he can sell it and get the best price for it. He could easily take care of the feed question; he could grow other feed as far as that goes. I have often known good wheat to sell at sixty cents a bushel—that is a cent a pound—although sometimes it sells at less. It is very seldom that you can buy bran and shorts for less than $20 a ton or a cent a pound. It is not considered good business to sell wheat for a cent a pound and buy back wheat offal for a cent a pound. The millers do not give it for nothing; you have to buy it back. That cannot be a good reason for refusing a better price for the wheat.

But after all is said and done, I think there is only one interest to be considered in this matter. When the farmer raises a bushel of wheat it is his, it could not be in existence if he did not raise it, and, therefore, I repeat, it is his. He should not have any obstacle thrown in his way in marketing his product, and the country is bound to benefit if the farmer benefits. I do not think that I need take up very much more time because there have been so many reasons given in favour of this proposition and after all it is a simple affair. It seems to me that if, in any kindergarten school, you put the whole thing on the blackboard any child would give the answer, and that is that there is no reason or excuse for the Government to put this off.

It has been said that this amendment is brought in at an inopportune time, that it is practically a motion of want of confidence in the Government. Well, if the Government will not accept it, I do not see why we should have any confidence in them. I would be perfectly willing to vote along those lines. I think the principal reason why the Government refuse this is that they dare not offend the great milling industries and railway corporations. Possibly they think that the farmers, many of whom are not very well informed, and many of whom are sometimes emotional, can be deceived the same as they were in 1911. The Government know very well that they cannot fool the railway people or the millers in connection with matters of dollars and cents. I am not saying this at all in disparagement of the farmers who, I believe, are the most intelligent people there are to be found in this country, but they have not the opportunity to follow the questions of the day. They are too busy trying to make a living, working from daylight to dark and after with the members of their families, and they often believe what they hear without investigation. But I think that the farmers know a good deal more about this question now than they ever did before. They look upon a matter of this kind pretty much as belonging to their everyday life, which previously they have not done. They are now looking upon politics as something which belongs to them, and they are now prepared to give a more intelligent vote upon questions of this kind. It is recognized in the West by the Conservative Government of Manitoba and by the Conservative Opposition in Saskatchewan that these people have wakened up and that they know what this kind of thing means. They have put themselves on record to the effect that they are not opposed to giving the farmers what they want. It is an admission also that the price must be better to the south than it is on this side of the line. I do not think I need take up any more time. It would not be difficult to speak at some length, but it is not necessary, and all I wish to do is to place my views in a general way before the House on this very important question.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have to take part in this debate, as it seems to be rather a western issue; but I feel it my duty, as an eastern man, to say what I think on the question which has been brought before this House largely by our western friends opposite, and to express my views with regard to the proposals which they have placed before us. We know that nature has separated the West from the East by the Great Lakes and by a stretch of rocky country where no farmers will ever be able to establish themselves. I wonder if our friends from the West realize the great sacrifices that we were called upon to make on this side of lake Superior in order to develop the western prairies. I wonder if they know that the Canadian Pacific railway was built with the money of this country at a time when the largest population was on this side of lake Superior. I wonder if they know that the Transcontinental railway has been built, that the Canadian Northern railway has been built and that we are now building the Hudson Bay railway to help the western country. I would like to know if they appreciate the importance of the building of the terminal elevators at Fort William and interior elevators at Moosejaw, and if they are aware that this Government intends to build another interior elevator very soon near Calgary. These elevators, as well as the one that is being built at the port of Montreal and those that are being built in the big cities of the far East, are all for the benefit of the citizens of the West. I do not know if the intention of the late Government, when they undertook to build these great works, was to direct the freight and the wheat and other products of the West to the United States. Speaking on my own behalf, I would consider it very dangerous if that were the case, and I am not ready to stand for it, because, seeing that we have been building such big works in our country, our duty to-day is to keep our trade and all our trade for our own railroads, for our own ports, for our own workmen, for our own people, in order by that means to unite the West with the East once for all, and to use our money to make this country a great one.

Our western friends are complaining that the price of wheat at certain seasons of the year is higher at Minneapolis than it is at Winnipeg. If the people of the United States want our wheat, why should that be? I am sure that all western members will agree with me that it is because they know the reputation of Canadian No. 1 Northern wheat. The farmers of the West have been complaining that even in our own elevators we have been mixing the wheat in such a way that the trade of the West is being spoiled. The Grain Commission interfered and settled that evil. But I want to ask my hon. friends on the other side of the House, if we have a little difficulty in keeping our wheat, by inspection and other means, in the way it should be kept in our country, how are we going to control the quality of our wheat if we let it go on to the American market where it may be mixed up with American wheat and shipped to England as Canadian wheat? Of course, I am not an expert on this subject. I am not a farmer. I have no land in the West; but it seems to me that we have built our railroads for some purpose; that we have our ports for some purpose, and that is for the benefit of the Canadian people. If we in the East have been making little sacrifices or big sacrifices—and we were willing to do so and we are willing to do so again—it has never been for the purpose of directing our trade into United States channels. We want to keep our trade here.

At the time that reciprocity was being discussed throughout the country in 1911, in my own county, where I had the pleasure of running and where I had the pleasure of winning, there was a man buying hay. He covered my county and all the surrounding counties with pamphlets stating that, if reciprocity went through, he would pay $2 a ton more on all the hay that he might buy. What has happened now? The only side of reciprocity for which that gentleman was looking is now in existence. There has been a reduction of $2 per ton on hay. Do you think for a moment that that gentleman would come this year and pay $2 a ton more for hay? Not at all.

Mr. PROULX: What is the price paid to-day to the farmer?

Mr. RAINVILLE: I do not know what it is, but I know that it is not $2 a ton higher than it would be if reciprocity were here—

Mr. PROULX: Is the price $2 higher than it was last year?

Mr. RAINVILLE:—because it is not reciprocity that will fix the price of hay. It is the supply and the demand that fixes the price.

Mr. CARVELL: Down in New Brunswick you will find out whether reciprocity means anything or not.

Mr. RAINVILLE: The farmers were very much interested over that $2. Are we going to say that, if the price of wheat at Winnipeg were four, five or six cents lower than at Minneapolis at certain seasons, Americans would come on to the Winnipeg market and pay five, six, seven or more cents for wheat? I do not think they would do so, because they are better business men than that. They want our No. 1 wheat. On account of the splendid reputation that our Canadian wheat has obtained on the markets of the world, we would prefer to keep it here for the good reputation of the Canadian market.

What about our milling industry? Would free wheat hurt our milling industry? I heard some one discussing the question of giving bounties to the milling industry if it would be hurt by free wheat. If it is true that the West is hurt by not being able to send its wheat into the United States, I would rather see this Government pay bounties to our Canadian railroads, in order to enable them to keep their freight, to keep our freight, because it belongs to us just as much as to the people of the West.

Mr. PROULX: Was not the hon. gentleman in favour of reciprocity in his county during the last election?

Mr. RAINVILLE: No. At the very first meeting I held at St. Lambert in the county of Chambly, I took up the stand against reciprocity; but when we saw that man going around and canvassing door by door with that $2 a ton more for hay, we were obliged to discuss it more fully.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You took the wrong track.

Mr. RAINVILLE: I took the right one, and my hon. friend will find, if he runs in the next election, that he is on the wrong track.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You will be in the lake when I am re-elected.

Mr. RAINVILLE: Sir, I am surprised. Our friends the Liberals were in power for fifteen years. And now, only two years after the end of their administration, all these big questions arise at once. It must be that the Liberal members had not opportunity to bring these questions forward on the floor of the House when they were in power. If the questions had been settled that arose in their time, so many great questions could not have arisen all in a moment now. Or, if these questions are really important to-day, then some of them must have existed three, four or five years ago. Why then, did not our friends opposite try to settle these questions, and not propose reciprocity which was not wanted by the people and will not be accepted by the people? We hear of the case of the farmer to-day; we have heard also a little of the case of the people of the towns. Which of these classes needs more help, and more immediate help? I say, that the people of the towns. Why? Complaint is made to-day, and we admit justly made, of the high cost of living.

But on whom does the burden rest mainly —upon the farmer? No; the burden is on the shoulders of the man of the city more than on those of any one else; and no one will make me believe that either in the West or in the East farmers are suffering in a very serious way from what has come to pass in our country. But, how are the people of the cities suffering? Is it because of not having enough work to enable them to earn big wages? That is not the case. The difficulty lies in this, that our population is not ready to produce enough food to feed the towns. That is the case in the West and it is the case in the East. How many of our provinces are able, if left to themselves, to feed their own population? I give credit to the great province of Ontario and its good Government that they can do it. I give the same credit to British Columbia—they can do it. But I will not give that credit to Quebec, for Quebec cannot do it; I will not give it to Alberta nor to Saskatchewan, nor to the Maritime provinces. We do not grow sufficient food. We heard the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other day make his argument against the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). I say the hon. gentleman never read the speech of the Minister of Labour, otherwise he would not have missed the real foundation of that speech and the only argument in it. The Minister of Labour gave this advice to the people of Canada: Grow food. The Minister of Labour was right; to grow more food is the solution of the problem rather than free food, or free trade, or free wheat.

Some speakers in this debate have spoken about the tariff, others about trusts, others about the need of more protection, others about the lack of communication for our farmers. All these things are partly true. As to the matter of tariffs, I am not enough of an expert to say anything on the subject. But I can say this: that if we had to-day the tariff commission that was proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and his colleagues two years ago, that commission would probably be ready by this time to size up the situation of our country and throw more light on the subject that we are discussing. For this would have been a commission of experts, outside of politics, looking at the big problems of our country in an impartial way. The tariff commission was killed, because the Opposition wanted it such a way, and we wanted it another way. Who should govern—the Opposition or the Government elected by the people? I think we should have our say, and I think we should have our say even more than our scrupulous senators. The tariff revision which could be made from day to day by this Government would have but a very limited effect on the high cost of living. And later on I will try to give a solution of that problem which we have to face to-day.

We have talked of trusts. It is all very well to talk about trusts, but to get rid of the trusts is quite a different matter. The United States has been fighting trusts for many years, and the United States is still to day the worst country in the world for trusts. And when I think of the Liberal party as one man wanting reciprocity with the United States, I wonder what they could have been thinking about. Sir, to my mind it would have been giving to the United States a free hand in relation to our railroads, our ports, our trade, our cattle, our wheat; and I am not ready to say that it could have been good for us, a young people, a growing people, needing all our energy to grow independent in an economic way, to mix up with the United States in regard to our trade in general. What does Le Canada of Montreal, a Liberal organ, say about the high cost of living? Does it say that it is due to the tariff, or due to trusts, or due to something else? I have this newspaper Le Canada in my hands and I find that it gives just two reasons for the high cost of living. One is that 18,000,000 pounds of beef were imported into the United States in the month of October and November last, one half of which came from Canada; and the second is that 200,000 head of cattle were imported into the United States in the same two months from Canada and Mexico, half of them from Canada. Le Canada is right to a certain extent. It is hard to imagine the evil that is done to us by this sending away of our cattle to benefit the United States. Bulls, milch cows, sheep, poultry —everything is taken from us. And in order to replenish our cattle in eastern Canada as well as in the West, our farmers will have to begin anew as the world began anew after the flood. Not only will meat be selling at a ridiculous price on account of the condition of the markets, but the land, deprived of its natural fertilizer, will suffer for years to come. It is almost a national calamity, and any action taken to relieve Canada of the effects of this situation will be welcomed by the people of Canada. And this condition has been brought about through what? Through half of what the Liberals were preaching in 1911—half of reciprocity. What would it be if we had all of reciprocity, when one-half of it can do so much harm in the country? But to my mind these are not the principal causes of the high cost of living. The three causes of that condition lie, first, in immigration; second, in the need of greater production, and third, in the need of a better system of distribution and co-operation. These three causes are immediately connected with agriculture. Rousseau has said somewhere: 'Agriculture is like a slide or calculating rule which allows us to measure the prosperity or decline of empires. Whenever it wanes or succumbs, they sink into the same grave.' Firmly convinced of the truth of these words, I will try to deal with these three causes from an economic point of view, and try to suggest the best remedy for the situation.

So far as immigration is concerned, I think I am right in saying that the immigration policy carried out in Canada in the past has not always tended towards the welfare of our country. Of some kinds of immigration we have had too much, and we have paid too much for some of it. But it is not my intention to talk about that phase of the question to-day. I will let the past be the past; I want to talk about the conditions of to-day in order to try and improve the conditions of to-morrow. The problem of to-day is the need of farm hands on the farm, and the need of to-morrow is to settle the high cost of living. The people of the country have paid out an immense amount of money in aid of immigration to our country, and this immigration, or at least a large part of it, has been directed to the West. We do not regret having paid so much money, and I would not wish to stop immigration to the West. We know we have great prairies that have to be occupied, and we are ready to stand by a good and a sound immigration policy. What did the Liberals do in all their sixteen years of office for immigration, so far as the country between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic is concerned? Practically nothing. All we can say is that they left some immigrants in Montreal, Toronto and other cities of eastern Canada. The fact that the people of our towns and cities find it so difficult to provide themselves with the necessities of life is largely due to an immigration policy which kept the workingmen to the cities instead of sending them to the farms in order to help the farmers to change their methods and enter into intensive farming. We want good immigrants who will stay in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. Our farmers are discouraged over the situation. Having no help on their farms, nobody to work with them, they raise hay only, especially in Quebec, knowing themselves that they are wrong. Any action to relieve that situation would be welcomed by the farmers of my province.

I want to ask the hon. Minister of Interior to organize immediately, in six or eight big cities in the eastern part of our country, a staff of good officers having special instructions to secure real farm hands for the provinces already named. If I say that this staff should be organized in six or eight big cities, it is because a common action should be taken at different points in order to help the farmers in the immediate neighbourhood of those centres where the people are most suffering from the high cost of living. Would that be sufficient to relieve the situation? No. To a certain extent it would help, but we need more than that. The farmers need to grow more food, as the Minister of Labour has said. So long as the cities are congested and the farms deserted, as is the case to-day in many parts of eastern Canada; so long as consumption exceeds production, we will not be able to escape the disparity which exists between the supply and the demand, and the prices of foodstuffs will go still higher. The best solution of the whole matter is to get at the root of the whole evil, and increase production as much as possible by intensive farming; that cannot be done by money alone. If it had not been for the enormous crop of last year in the West, I think we would have had to face a serious crisis.

Last year we were saved to a great extent by our immense crops in the West; but the atmosphere is not so clear to-day as to allow us to say it is all over, and we must take care of ourselves, take care of our markets, take care of our farmers, and get ready for to-morrow, because we do not know the time or the day that another crisis may fall on our country.

Last year, in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I asked this Government to appoint demonstrators all over the country to teach our farmers how to farm. I come again this year and ask the Minister of Agriculture, whose devotion to the farming interests of the country we all know, to come into the province of Quebec and perhaps into the Maritime provinces and ascertain for himself in what way the farmers need his help and his immediate help. I would not be satisfied with the establishment of one, two, three or four experimental farms in the province of Quebec. I do not believe in these big farms, they cost too much and they do not reach the people closely enough. I would prefer, from the point of view of practical utility, a system of agricultural stations, school-farms and, even better, demonstration farms to be established not only in each electoral division but, I think, in each parish. I am going to tell the House how this can be done, and I think we will all conclude it can be done without an expense of one cent to the Government. There is a very simple way of establishing these demonstration farms very economically, which was suggested to me by a farmer of my county, and I think it only fair that I should give out his name. I am sure the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows him, he is Mr. L. A. Massue of Varennes, in the county of Verchères, a member of a great French family which has always been attached to the land. He says: Pick out a particular farm in a particular parish; ask the farmer what profit he gets out of his farm on an average and suppose, for the sake of the argument that it gives $800. Let us leave that farm under the administration of the owner; leave him free on that farm to a certain extent. We will guarantee or we may not guarantee him, but say we guarantee him $800 profit if he wants to follow the instruction of a demonstrator appointed by the Government. The demonstrator would tell him what kind of farming he was to do, in what way he was to do it, and the farmer would follow all instructions so received. The farmer would pay all farm hands, he would pay for any expense that would be incurred on the farm; he would keep books so that his neighbours could come in and look in the books and find out right in their own parish the cost and profit of different kinds of farming. This will be education by demonstration, education by seeing, education by example—and that is what our farmers need most in our province. If the farm yields more than the $800 profit, the farmer keeps it and if it is under that amount for the first year I think we could well afford to reimburse him; but I am sure we could get people who would put their farms at the disposal of such an organization without having any guarantee at all, having confidence that what is going on here on the experimental farm in Ottawa, would, if applied to a small farm, be not experiments but would be results taken from the farm in Ottawa and applied to the small farm. The farmer would run no risk by letting his farm be used for demonstration purposes in such a scheme. Some people may think that this would be an extravagant system to organize and that it would be a dangerous thing for the Agricultural Department to undertake. I am sure that one officer connected with the experimental farm in Ottawa, under the guidance of the Minister of Agriculture, could take charge of twenty or thirty or maybe forty farms so organized and none of them, I believe sincerely, would cost more than the expense of maintaining a special demonstrator. I think it is time we had some kind of action for the farmers and even if it would involve some expense.

I have been here many a time with farmers from Quebec visiting the Experimental Farm. I have enjoyed what I have seen every time I have come. So did the farmers who came with me, so do the farmers who are coming every summer. But what is the result after a day's visit to the Experimental Farm at Ottawa? We return happy, having come, but what is left? The farmer is not encouraged to imitate what he has seen on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa. He rightly thinks that what is going on there costs too much money for him to undertake on this own farm. On every experimental farm a great deal of money is spent in experiments; some of them are a failure and some succeed. But the ordinary farmer has no time to read the literature published and inquire into the details of these experiments, and very often he comes to the conclusion that it is impossible for him to do anything on the lines suggested by the experimental farm. The big centres are the ones that suffer most to-day, and I think that some of these farms should be stationed near all the big centres and in a very short time, if that were done, we would be able to relieve the distress in our towns and supply them with the necessaries of life. I would suggest that at first five or six towns be taken, and I invite the Minister of Agriculture to come to Montreal. The county of L'Assomption lies next to Montreal, and I could name other counties pretty near: Chambly, Vercheres, Laprairie. Let him take three or five parishes and try the system on the nearest farm to the city of Montreal. Let us see what can be done. If it does not cost much to the Government—and I do not believe it would—we could extend the system, and thereby do a great deal to relieve the situation of which we have heard so much to-day.

The hon. Minister of Finance mentioned the other day that our country has, by the action of our senators, lost $2,500,000, which was to have been expended on roads. He also mentioned the Agricultural Aid Bill. I wish to give credit to the Minister of Agriculture for sending me a pamphlet last year about the distribution of pure bred animals. I talked to the farmers in my parish about it. I have talked to the farmers in Chateauguay. Every time I met a farmer I would tell him about this proposal of the Minister of Agriculture in regard to pure bred animals, but there is one thing I would like to say to the minister. In his pamphlet he states that these animals will only go to the newly organized districts, but in Quebec we have no newly organized districts, but our cattle have gone over to the other side in such a way that I say that we should be considered as new districts by the Agricultural Department. We need to be considered as new districts otherwise we shall not be able to build up our cattle trade again; and I pray the Minister of Agriculture in the name of my people in Quebec, and in the name of my two counties to consider us as new districts, and to give us a chance to rebuild our cattle trade, which 'the-half-of-reciprocity' has taken from us. When the Minister of Finance spoke of the $10,000,000 grant in aid of agriculture I heard an interruption from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). He asked 'With what result?'. Speaking on behalf of Quebec, I admit that we have had very poor results, and if the hon. member for Red Deer has as good reason for complaining as we have in Quebec, I would not, if I were him, attempt to blame this Government; he should go, as we in Quebec should go, to the provincial legislature and lay the blame where it belongs. I am not going to deal with this question further to-day, but I want to tell my hon. friends from the province of Quebec that I intend to deal with it when the Estimates come down or when the Budget Speech is delivered, and on that occasion I am going to tell what has been done with the money given the provincial Government of Quebec by this Parliament, and how it was used for political purposes in Quebec.

The third point I wish to make is the need of a better system of distribution and co-operation. We should cut out the middleman who gets rich too quickly.

The Solicitor General the other day dealt with the Highways Bill very fully, and I am not going to say much about that; but I hope to see again this year a measure to help the roads in our country. I hope to see provision made in the Estimates or by a Bill similar to that of last year and I am willing to stand by such a law because I believe it is the best law this country can expect from us. I am not going to discuss whether hon. gentlemen opposite were right in getting their friends, the senators, to kill the Bill, or whether we were right in not accepting their amendments. I know that the people of our country will not have patience for any great length of time with this discussion, because what they want is good roads, and they expect us to give them help in that direction. They will not stand for any technical objections or any surgical operations like the one that was mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). Whether the Bill was killed by the Senate, as I am convinced it was, or whether it was killed by the refusal of this Government to concur in the wonderful surgical operation that was performed, the people of the country know and feel that they got nothing out of the fight, and they know and feel that they never had any hope of getting anything of that kind from the Liberal regime. It was never before attempted to give the people any assistance of that kind. It is a good thing, says the hon. member for Red Deer with which to get votes. I am glad to find that the hon. member for Red Deer begins to realize that the liberal policy of the Borden Government will be more popular and will give more votes than their free food and free trade.

The first and second points which I have made in my remarks this afternoon may not be sufficient to induce the Minister of Public Works to contribute his share towards the solution of this problem. The Liberal party, and the Conservative party before them, have expended an immense amount of money for the construction of railways, the development of ports and the building of elevators for carrying export grain from the West to the eastern seaboard of our country. But what has been done for the farmers of the East? I know that the answer can be given that large public works have been constructed in the East, and I admit that they have. I shall not enumerate these public works, we know they have been constructed, but what I want to know is what has been done for the farmers of the East? I asked that question of Mr. Fisher, the ex-Minister of Agriculture, during the fight in Chateauguay. He never dared to answer it, he had nothing to say. If the minister in charge of the immigration work of our Government would help the farmers of Canada, and especially those from Lake Superior to the Atlantic, to secure good farm hands, and if the Minister of Agriculture would establish demonstration farms right at the doors of the farmers in order to show the results which have been obtained at the Central Experimental Farm and demonstrate to them the economical side of advanced methods, they would be doing something big for the farmers of this country. Our one crop a year matures at about the same season each year, and the farmers have to sell their products all at one time, because of the fact that a large proportion of them are of a perishable nature, and they have no place to keep them. They are obliged to sell, and they have to take the price they can get. This is where the middleman comes in. He has a refrigerator and a housing system of his own. This is the trust that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) has talked about, and he is right. The middlemen go out through the country and they buy up all the produce, much more than is necessary for the immediate needs of the people. They store this produce in order to husband it for the winter season. Then, what happens? They sell it at any price they want and they make the people in the cities pay for it. The people in the cities are at the mercy of the middlemen.

This is where the intervention of the Minister of Public Works would be useful in solving the problem of the high cost of living and relieving the farmers as well as the people of the towns and cities from this situation. How can he do this? By adopting the same policy with regard to the farmers of the East as that which the Government have adopted in regard to the farmers of the West. The Government have at the public expense built grain elevators for the housing of the farmers' grain in the West. Let the Minister of Public Works build at Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, St. John and other centres, a housing system with cold storage attached where the farmers could get together upon a co-operative basis and could husband and store their goods and food stuffs until there was a market available for them. All they would have to do would be to appoint one man who would sell everything belonging to all the members of this co-operative movement, and that one individual could deal with them in the same way as the representative of the fruit growers organization in California represents the members of that body. They would have one man to represent them who would tell them what they should do and what they should not do. He would be able to advise the members of the association as to what things were needed at a particular time and at a particular place. It seems to me that this would be a practical solution. I know that there may be some one who may criticise my suggestion; I do not pretend that it is perfect, I am only a new member of this House, but I am suggesting what I think is best for my country. I think that it will be found that this system of co-operation would be the most economical and satisfactory system that could be devised and we would get rid of what is so much deplored by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition: the wide margin between the price that is paid to the producers and the price that is paid by the consumer, this is my programme; I am giving it out to-day. I am going to fight for it with all my power, because I think it is most necessary for our country. If we would take the trouble to study the question, we would find that it is applicable to the West just as much as to the East, because in the West we have towns that are growing in a wonderful manner, and anything that would help the cities of the West would help the cities of the East, would help the people, would help the farmer who is the producer and would help the consumer to get rid of the middleman who gets rich too quick.

That state of affairs did not come into existence to-day; it has existed for the last ten years. I remember the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) once saying that they saw the crisis coming and were trying to relieve it by reciprocity. If they saw the crisis coming, in my judgment reciprocity was not a good remedy, no better remedy than the surgical operation that the hon. member for Red Deer mentioned the other day. The Liberal party were in power. Did they lift up a finger to relieve the situation, except by reciprocity? They call themselves 'Liberals.' They are proud of their name. What is there except the name? I remember the old programme of the Liberal party. While they were in power, did they carry out all their promises? During the last two years they have been criticising the programme of the right hon. the Prime Minister. If I should take up the Liberal programme of 1896 and make a little criticism on it after the Liberals had been fifteen years in power, would I not find more to say against them than they can find to say against the Administration of to-day? What did they do about the North Atlantic Trading Company and immigration? Is the Sunday Observance Bill that they passed very Liberal? Is what they did in giving the money for the Quebec bridge to political friends very Liberal? Did they cease for a single moment giving, what we used to call tin-pot titles? Did they cease appointing members of Parliament to official positions? What about their programme of 1893—free trade? Did they try once to put that into effect in the country? Never.

But there is something more. Did they reform the Senate in any way? The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) said the other day that my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallée) came from pure Liberal blood. I was once a pure-blooded Liberal too, and when we used to talk about the Senate my blood boiled. We were ready to fight for the abolition of the Senate. Have the Liberals abolished it? Look at the Senate to-day; it is worse than ever it was.

Did they curtail the expenditures? No, they increased them all the time. Did they stop election corruption during the time they were in power? Never. That was a portion of their programme. But we have seen that while they were in a position to carry out their programme, they did not do so.

We had an example not very long ago of an ex-minister of agriculture, whom I do not intend to name, running in Chateauguay and then hiding himself in order to avoid the service of a counter petition, contesting the election. We shall see what will come out of the case. Maybe we on this side of the House shall have more fun than our hon. friends opposite.

During the fifteen years the Liberals were in power what did they do in regard to agriculture? I think I can prove that they did nothing. They failed in 1911 with the reciprocity cry, because the people were against reciprocity. They have failed with their free food policy and they would not dare to bring it about. If they ever come along with free trade, they are going to fail in a worse way than they ever have failed, and they will die over it if they endeavour to bring it in.

Mr. ROBERT CRUISE (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency composed mostly of farmers; and, as this amendment is for free wheat, for which the farmers of the West are asking, I think it is my duty to say a few words on the question.

In the first place, I would like to refer to a few remarks that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) made yesterday. He said:

> When the discussion of such an important matter as this does take place on the Budget Speech, we shall need to have the very best and soundest reasons—reasons more sound than those which the hon. member for Humboldt has been able to present to the House—before it would be wise for this Government to deal with any tariff changes which would affect important industries.

I presume these industries are the milling industry and the farming industry. I would just like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works what better reason does he require? The organized farmers from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta met the organized farmers of Ontario and discussed these questions before they brought them before the Government. The organized farmers are not the only people who are in favour of free wheat. We have also the Conservative Government of Manitoba, the leader of which is Sir Rodmond Palen Roblin, a man who, with his followers, opposed reciprocity to the bitter end. We have these men converted—if you will allow the expression, Mr. Speaker—to the belief that free wheat is in the interest of the western farmers. I do not know what stronger reason the Minister of Public Works requires than to have the Prime Minister of his own province, a province he represents in this House, requesting the Government to give the farmers free wheat. The Conservatives of Manitoba are holding conventions to nominate their provincial candidates, and in some of these conventions resolutions have been passed endorsing the Manitoba Government for taking up the question of free wheat. This is a farmer's question; free wheat has been asked for by the farmers; and we have a Government here that pretends to be the friend of the farmer. They told the farmers in the West, before the last election, that if they were given power they would do all kinds of things for the farmers. It is a very small concession that is asked of the Government, and I hope they will grant this small measure of relief to the western farmers.

The Minister of Public Works objected to this amendment being introduced at this particular time. I am not very well versed in parliamentary procedure, but it seems to me that had this question not been taken up at this time the result might have been very undesirable. When the Minister of Finance has brought down his Budget and settles the tariff for this year, what good would it do for the Opposition to bring in a resolution for free wheat? They would say: Why did you not bring that in before? There is nothing like being on time; we want to put our vote on record in favour of free wheat for the western farmer. And in asking for free wheat for the western farmer we ask something which will not hurt the eastern farmer; if it were otherwise, we would not ask for it.

Another question that members on the Government side talk a great deal about is the education of the farmers. I do not know how that appeals to other farmers, but I know how it appeals to me. I have been a practical farmer in Manitoba for twenty years and I do not need any education to enable me to raise more beef and more pork, and more wheat than I do. Give me the market, and I will raise the goods. These hon. gentlemen are on the wrong track; they are trying to educate the wrong people. It is not the farmers who need to be educated, but the manufacturers. Educate the millers and manufacturers so that they will be able to compete with their rivals on the other side of the line. I am quite satisfied that the farmers will be quite willing to have the Minister of Agriculture —whom I am sorry not to see in his seat— appropriate money to educate the manufacturers to be men, to get off the farmer's back and to compete with the American manufacturers. Compare the Canadian farmer on our side with the American farmer on the other side;—would any man in this House like to go to the Canadian farmer and tell him that he could not raise hogs as cheap as the American farmer,— or beef, or wheat? If you told that to the farmer he would hit you. No Canadian will admit that he cannot raise food as cheaply as the American farmer can. Why, then, cannot the Canadian miller produce flour as cheaply as the American miller? Is there any reason? There is no reason. We have good millers in Canada, and they are willing to compete with the Americans if we take the duty off wheat. They are not opposing this change.

But one reason why this is opposed is that some people say: If you give the farmers free wheat they will never stop until they get everything else free. That is the argument that was used in the last elections. The most prominent Conservatives said: We do not object to this reciprocity arrangement, for it will not hurt the manufacturers; but if we give the farmers reciprocity, they will never stop until they get free agricultural machinery and everything else? This is the thin edge of the wedge. But I venture to prophesy that the day is coming, and before long, when, if our governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, do not study the wishes of the farmers, you will have a farmers' government in Canada. For they are educating men in western Canada who study economic questions more than most members of Parliament do, and these are the men who will legislate in the future if our governments do not wake up to the fact that they have to legislate in the interest of the farmers. I am sorry this resolution does not include also free oats, free barley and free flax. But, as I said before, we will be satisfied with a small concession for the present and see how it works. I am going to ask the Manitoba members, —a number of whom I see before me— I am going to appeal to them as representing the western farmers, to support this resolution, and not only to support this resolution but to try to convince the Government that we have got to have free wheat, barley, oats and flax. If that concession is given us, we in the western country, will produce the goods for you —lots of them.

A great deal has been said about the high cost of living and about the many unemployed in the cities and towns. Where do the bulk of the unemployed come from? When your farmers are not prosperous and not able to keep hired help, where do the hired men go? They go to your cities and towns, and the cities and towns have to support them. Put the farmer in a position to be able to keep his hired help winter and summer, and you will not have the congestion in your towns and cities, you will not have hard times.

Mr. BRADBURY: Wheat growers do not need much help in the winter time.

Mr. CRUISE: My hon. friend butts in just at this time, and I am glad he does.

Gentlemen on his side talk a great deal about mixed farming. If the farmer goes into mixed farming, he will need help in the winter-time as well as in the summer. And the western farmer is going into mixed farming, and he will produce all the wheat and beef and pork you want. The high cost of living, everybody knows, is due to lack of production. How are you going to regulate supply and demand? If the farmers of the West go into mixed farming too strongly, what will happen? They will flood the home market, the prices will go down, and then they will have to go out of mixed farming and into something else. Give the farmer the market so that he may be sure of finding a sale for what he raises every year, and he will keep on year after year producing the goods, and that will certainly reduce the cost of living to a great extent.

Now, let me say a word in regard to reciprocity. During my election, it was laughable to hear the arguments that were used in opposition to reciprocity, mainly by men from the towns and cities—we know that it was the towns and cities in Manitoba that defeated reciprocity, not the farmers; the farmers gave a majority of over 900 in its favour. These people told the farmers: You must not support reciprocity; it would be disloyal to do so, if you trade with the United States, you will be annexed to the United States. I do not know how a more foolish argument could be thought of. You might as well tell an Englishman that if he trades horses with a nigger he will become a nigger as to tell us that we could not trade with the United States without becoming Americans.

Another thing I want to refer to is the farmers' delegations that have come to Ottawa time after time. They have waited on the late Government, as well as on the members of the present Administration. I am not here to defend the late Government, as I was not sitting in the House when the late Government was in power. But we have been told that the late Government did nothing to relieve the situation for the farmers. There is no getting away from the fact that the late Government went to the country on a measure to relieve the farmers, and they were defeated, so that they risked their political lives in trying to give the farmers relief. They were put out of business by whom? By the railway companies, by the manufacturers, by the gentlemen that own the present Government. The present Government cannot do anything; they cannot bring down any measure providing for a change in the tariff without first submitting it to the Manufacturers' Association. It is a fine situation in an agricultural country like Canada to have a Government owned, controlled, and operated by the manufacturers. But I was going to speak about organized farmers waiting on the Government, and the treatment they received. They were told: Oh, yes, we will consider your case—but how far were their cases considered? I am sorry to say that the farmers of western Canada are not making money to-day, and it is not a good advertisement for any country to preach that its farmers are not prosperous. But you have to face the facts, and it is a fact that in Manitoba to-day the farmers are not prosperous; many of them are leaving the farms because they cannot make money. When those men come down here and pay their expenses to Ottawa out of their own pockets, it must be admitted that they are sincere. They do not come here for the fun of it; they are sincere in the demands they make. Has the Government conceded anything to them? Has the Government promised them anything? Here is a chance for the present Government to show the farmers of western Canada that they are in sympathy with them, and if they do so I believe they will have good results when the next election comes on. If the Government could only see its way clear to give the farmers the benefit of free oats, free barley, free flax and free wheat, I am sure the people would appreciate it. The farmers of western Canada are waiting patiently for this concession, which has been promised by hon. members from Manitoba. The hon. Solicitor-General has in the past spoken about free implements. I hope and trust that he will never let the present Government alone till we do get free implements and I almost feel satisfied that we will have them probably before this session is over.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I want the attention of the House only for two or three minutes to refer to this matter and to explain, if I can, why I intend to vote for the amendment now before the House. I have always been in favour of relieving the western farmer in the matter of freight rates almost before doing anything else, and it is because I see that free wheat will at least give the farmer of the West the benefit of competition in railway rates that I feel justified in the action I propose to take. I have spoken in this House year after year in favour of lower freight rates. I have suggested publicly to this Government that the first thing they ought to have done when they came into office was to give the farmers of the West some kind of relief in regard to freight rates. I am more confident to-day than I ever was that if there is free access of wheat, the greatest product of the West, to the United States markets, the western farmer will have the benefit of lower freight rates, and I think no injury will result ultimately to the railroads. So far as I can see, there has been no opposition to this proposal in the House up to the present time. Probably the greater number of the members on this side, as well as the members from the West, irrespective of politics, are in favour of the motion. The people of the West have asked for this concession, and, considering the fact that it will have an important effect on the railways, I hope the motion will carry. The only opposition I find to the motion comes from the railways and the mill-owners, and I do not think their argument is a good one, nor do I think it should prevail against the desire of the people of western Canada. The people of the West have unmistakably declared what they want. The Conservatives of Manitoba, and the members of the Legislature of Manitoba, irrespective of party, have declared what they want. The members of the Grain Growers' Association have declared what they want. The members from the West are almost unanimous in the support of this proposal, and there is nobody from the East, so far as I can gather, who has any serious objection to it, other than the railroads and the mill-owners. This being the case, I hope the Government will take this matter into consideration and give relief to the farmers of the West. There is nothing like the relief that goes direct to the point, and this direct relief would widen the market of the farmers, would give them a better price, and would, I believe, give them better freight rates. The arguments I listened to yesterday in regard to this matter were largely arguments that commended themselves to my mind. Now that we have established what I consider one of the greatest things ever established in this country, the right to make our own tariff laws, independent of any outside action, and now that the people of the United States have made concessions on their own account, we should certainly take advantage of the wider market when it comes our way. The people of the United States have taken down many of their tariff walls. Our National Policy was largely based on the United States tariff; there has been a modification of that tariff in one direction, and we ought to be governed by it.

I want to tell the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce where this matter comes home to him. He has put up what I consider to be a very good proposition for better trade relations with the West Indies, and the matter of sugar figures largely in that proposal. Any deal we make with the Caribbean people in the matter of trade would depend largely on sugar. In the meantime the United States comes along and proposes that sugar shall enter that country free—not just now, but in a short time—and that policy that we entered into in regard to the West Indies will be greatly affected by this action on the part of the United States, so far as sugar is concerned. As protectionists, as National Policy people, we must adjust the fiscal policy of our country to these new conditions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has just stated that the National Policy was based on the American tariff. Does he refer to the permanent offer of reciprocity which was in the Canadian tariff?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not want to go into details on that; I want to deal with the issue as it presents itself to me. The Americans are a great nation, our near neighbours, our greatest consuming market, and we are their best customers for manufactured goods. When great changes take place in reference to particular articles we must adjust. Let me give an illustration. It has been said of Shakespeare by another great Englishman that he wrote for all time. You know that very charming love scene between Henry V and the French Princess Katherine where Henry says; nice customs curtsey to great Kings. That exactly describes this situation, the customs must curtsey to great Kings in this case and the great King happens to be the United States who have shown a disposition to come our way and to take more of our products. They have offered to take our wheat and a lot of other things, and they are taking them, and we will do no harm to the National Policy by adjusting it to meet that condition. If this is the case and if the Government have not yet made up their minds that the farmers of our Canadian West to-day are feeling stringent conditions, we will hearten them up if we tell them that they have this wider market. If we can hearten them up so that they will prove to be more successful wheat farmers they will become better mixed farmers and they will produce more; our railways and millers will have more to do even if rates have to be reduced to some extent by reason of this result. Most of all the people of Ontario see a larger market for their products in the great West if the West improves in population and in production and if the people there are contented. We have got to make our Canadian West contented and Ontario to-day, if she is proud of anything, is proud of the fact that the great Canadian West has sprung from the loins of Ontario very largely. We are proud of these three great provinces that have been established on the prairies and the people of Ontario, and I think I speak for the people of Ontario and for a large number of the Conservatives of Ontario, who wish prosperity to come again to the West and they wish to see it peopled more. They wish to see more ground broken in the West and more people going in there. There has been a let up more or less pronounced in regard to settlement in the West and there is more or less of a let up in the immigration going to the West.

A friend of mine, a constituent, sent me yesterday a Wisconsin paper containing a statement in regard to immigration which I hope will command the attention of the House and the Government. This statement is signed by B. G. Packer, Wisconsin Immigration Commissioner. In the statement he tells the farmers of Wisconsin, as they are being told all over the Western States, that Canada is not quite such a good country as it was to go to, and he gives the figures as to the movement of population. These figures are somewhat surprising as showing the number who have come into Canada and the number who have gone back to the United States. I shall read the concluding paragraph signed by this Commissioner of Immigration for Wisconsin—and similar statements are being published in all the Western States, upon which we draw largely for that fine population of men ready to take up land and who know how to farm it. That paragraph reads:

> High freight rates and interest charges, increased cost of protected implements, food, clothing, lumber and other necessaries coupled with frequent low prices for grain apparently convinced many that farming pays best 'back home.'

That is, these Americans who are said to be leaving our Western country and going back to the United States. I do not want to see immigration disturbed or checked in regard to the West; I do not wish to see production disturbed in that country. I want to see our railroads get an immense freight to move out of that country, and to see that freight moved, as has been said here this afternoon, by Canadian channels instead of American channels. But if we do wish to see that, we have got to try and give our own people in the West what they are asking for, to make them contented, and to encourage them in these times of stringency. We must show them that we are willing to co-operate with them in the great work which they have at hand, and on the line of conciliation and of encouragement of that country I think it would be wise on the part of the Government, when they bring down their Budget speech, to have in that very prominently the recognition of the cry of the people of the West for free wheat and for admission to the United States market. It shall not change the National Policy, it will not hurt the people here in the East; but it will be an illustration of what ought to be the inspiring principle of governments, and that is to readjust their course by the compass to new conditions as they arise.

Mr. JAMES M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal said during this debate as to the reason why production of food stuffs in Canada has fallen short of the market demand. To my mind the only thing that can induce the people of Canada, which is essentially an agricultural country, to produce the required food products for this country is to give to the farmer every facility in the power of the Government in the matter of market. To my mind the question of markets is one of the most important questions with which this present Government or any other has to deal in connection with the farming industry in this great country. The late Government went down to defeat in an endeavour to ameliorate the conditions in Canada in regard to the production of food products. We had it admitted to us on all sides that the reciprocity pact would not interfere with the manufacturing industry any more than that it was a step in the direction of opening the markets and a step in the direction, possibly, of free trade. We have also had a great deal of advice as to the style of farming which should be followed, particularly in Western Canada.

The section from which I come is essentially a mixed farming district. We were a mixed farming district even before the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave his famous advice to western Canada; and we are so, because conditions there lend themselves particularly to that kind of farming. We also produce a certain amount of grain, but the transportation problem is such a serious one that we do not pretend to ship a great deal of grain. We use it as feed and ship it in the shape of cattle, swine and other live stock. We have had some figures both during the regime of the late Government and of this Government, showing the magnificent proportions of immigration into Canada. I have taken pains to analyse these figures and I have found that notwithstanding the tremendous immigration into Canada from the United States, the net gain to Canada for the past five years is only something like 20,000 people. I would like to place these figures on 'Hansard' showing how this loss has been suffered.

	Canada to U.S.	U.S. to Canada.
1908-9..	84,564	59,832

Gain in Canada in six years..		21,193

You will notice that there is an increase every year, both coming into Canada and returning to the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the hon. gentleman give his authority for these figures?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The figures of the immigration into Canada from the United States were taken from a hand book published by the Minister of the Interior of this Government. The figures showing the number of people going into the United States were published by the Commissioner of Immigration of the United States. There is certainly a reason for this condition of affairs, and to my mind it is this: The farmers have not been receiving a commensurate return for their products. Farming should have been exceedingly attractive to the producers of agricultural products owing to the extremely high prices which farmers have been receiving during the past four or five years. Every condition has been favourable such as free land, homesteads and all that sort of thing. The farmers have been well treated by the Government, they have had every facility granted them, and yet in spite of that we find an enormous number of people returning yearly to their own country. This does not apply to European immigrants, simply because conditions in European countries are not as favourable as in the United States. To my mind the market of the United States is the best market in the world for farm products. The effect of the tariff reduction undertaken by President Wilson has been to make that market of inestimable value to the people of Canada, in so far as they trade there. The hon. member for Dundas quoted figures in his speech the other night showing that in the last nine months of 1913, our exports to the United States had increased enormously. He might have simplified that by giving us a concrete case. He might have told us that in the month of December the exports of animal products and foodstuffs into the United States increased by nearly $13,000,000 and all that occurred in one month's operation of the new tariff. What would it mean, Mr. Speaker, if we had the advantage of that market for all our farm products? As has been very aptly stated, no one is more qualified to speak for the farmers than the farmers themselves. My experience with farmers—and I have had a long experience—has been that in the main the farmer thoroughly understands his business. We have heard a lot said about wheat mining in western Canada, but I venture to say that a great deal of that talk is largely ignorance. Conditions in the particular section where wheat mining is going on are not conducive to the raising of live stock, and it is absolutely impossible for those farmers to go into mixed farming. There are, of course, many sections in which mixed farming can be very profitably carried on, but without a market it is of little use for the western farmer to go into mixed farming. At the United Farmers' Convention held recently in Lethbridge, the Commissioner of Live Stock for Alberta made the remarkable statement that if it had not been for the Wilson tariff the province of Alberta would have raised more hogs this year than she could sell in her home market, and the result of that would have been that the old price of six years ago would have prevailed this year in Alberta. The only thing that saved the situation was the throwing open of the American market. The statement has also been made by the Swift Packing Company—the largest of its kind in Alberta—that last year was the first in the history of Alberta in which the people were able to produce sufficient poultry for their needs. I heard the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Rainville) state this afternoon that the province of Alberta did not raise enough foodstuffs for her own people. That is absolutely incorrect. The province of Alberta is an exporting province, and is admirably adapted for the raising and exporting of all sorts of agricultural products. He also stated that British Columbia was one of the provinces which raised sufficient foodstuffs to feed her own people. I have not the figures, but I very much doubt that statement. We have heard a great deal about what this Government is doing to further agriculture. I am willing to give them all credit for what they have done for agriculture. We cannot get away from the fact that agriculture is the basic industry of the country, and I am radical enough to believe that if there were no manufacturing industries whatever and the people devoted the energy to the raising of foodstuffs that they do to the manufacture of a great many articles that they cannot produce profitably, the country would be more prosperous than it is to-day.

We in the province of Alberta have a progressive Minister of Agriculture and I venture to say that he has done more to further the science of agriculture in that province than the whole Dominion Government put together for many years back. They have established schools of instruction in a great many districts in Alberta and more will be established as time progresses. These schools have the effect of giving the farmer and the farmer's sons instruction without giving them the idea that they are becoming professors of agriculture. The boy goes to one of these schools and he is taught practical methods of running a gasolene engine, of running a steam-engine and of raising, breeding and feeding cattle. The result of this short course of instruction is that the boy goes back to the farm with an incentive to do more and to do it more scientifically than his father did before him. I claim that the province of Alberta stands in the forefront to-day in the matter of agricultural education. If this Government would do more of that style of thing the people would appreciate it.

I wish to say a word upon this subject of unemployment. I would not like to accuse the present Government of being to blame for this particularly, but it is a peculiar coincidence that hard times began to come after the late Government was defeated. In Edmonton a most remarkable condition of affairs exists to-day. One of the most prosperious cities in the Dominion of Canada is the city of Edmonton. We have expended a large amount of money on public improvements, our expenditures run into the millions, and yet, in spite of that, we have to-day on our hands unemployed who are being fed by the tax-payers of the city to keep them from starvation. We have expended within the last four weeks no less than $25,000 to feed people who had no means of producing a livelihood. I was through the so-called panic of 1907 but I never saw such a condition as this in my lifetime. The only thing that prevents us from feeding 2,000 or 3,000 people is that the people have risen in arms and have said: We will not feed you any longer; you will have to get work and do the same as we do.

That the country as a whole is prosperous I will admit. We have been growing very rapidly but we must not pursue the ostrich policy of not recognizing that something must be done to relieve the people. A prominent wholesale man told me this summer that the wholesale people selling in the province of Saskatchewan particularly, in a great number of cases had only been able to collect of their bills ten per cent, leaving renewals to the extent of ninety per cent. This is a most remarkable thing to say and I would be very loath to think that such a condition could long continue. In view of facts of that kind it is up to the Government to recognize the conditions as they exist. We are not living in a fool's paradise, we know that our prosperity is not such as we have had it depicted by some hon. members on the other side but we likewise feel that it is no disgrace to Canada that in a widely and sparsely settled country we are in this condition. It is absolutely necessary for the Government to do something to relieve the situation. I am pleased to see the hon.member for South York (Mr. Maclean) taking the stand that he has in regard to this matter. If he will vote right he will accept our proposition and I trust that he will give us his support in the vote which he gave us in his speech here to-day.

Mr. DAVID WARNOCK (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to take up as little time as possible, as I understand it has been arranged between the whips that the vote shall be taken before six o'clock. But this question of free wheat is of so much importance to the West that I desire to put myself on record as being strongly in favour of the request made by the western farmers. I do not propose to enter into a comparison of the prices in the United States and Canadian markets. The opponents of reciprocity, in the late reciprocity campaign, always assured us that the United States market would be absolutely valueless to the live stock producers of Canada. But since the Underwood tariff has come into operation we have had ample proof that the United States market is a most valuable market for our live stock producers, and the western wheat growers ask our Government to remove these duties so that the countervailing duty may be taken off and thus give them an opportunity of getting into the United States market just in the same way as our live stock growers have got into it and with the expectation of equal benefit. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), speaking the other evening, informed the House that the farmers of Ontario were more prosperous than they had ever been. Why? Is it not the case that they have the United States market for their live stock, milk and cream? Certainly the Ontario farmers never would have been as prosperous had that market not been thrown open to them. The western farmers ask that they be permitted to share in this prosperity. Our live stock growers in western Canada are getting better prices for their live stock, their hogs and cattle, than they have ever done in the history of live stock raising in the West.

About six weeks ago there were hundreds of cattle on the hands of feeders in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, a constituency lying south of Calgary. These cattle could not be sold at a profitable figure, but when the Underwood tariff came into effect buyers from big packing plants at Tacoma and Seattle came into Calgary, purchased these cattle at a very profitable price to the producer and shipped the cattle to the large packing plants in the Pacific Coast cities.

Let me deal shortly with conditions as they exist in southern Alberta to-day. We have heard a great deal in the East about the bumper crops that the western farmers have had during the past season; in fact, I remember reading some interviews given by Cabinet Ministers on their return to the East from the West, and some of them were so optimistic that they said that there was a large enough crop in the western country this year to relieve the whole of the financial stringency all over Canada. But in the winter wheat district we found that conditions were not quite so good. I know that in my own part of the country the yield of winter wheat was a great disappointment. Many crops only threshed out about an average of twelve bushels to the acre, and the farmer being compelled to sell at the prices prevailing in the West, had to sell at a loss of from $1 to $5 per acre on the cost of production. No farmer can continue to farm under these conditions. Even the farmers who had good crops realized very little more than what it cost them to produce their crop. In past years our farmers have tested the United States markets by paying the duty and shipping a portion of their grain across the line, and I have never yet met a farmer who was not thoroughly satisfied with his experiments in this direction. For that reason, I am strongly in favour of free wheat, and I hope that the Government will see fit to grant the request of the western farmers. As the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) pointed out this afternoon, it is not the request of a few agitators of the West. I believe that 90 per cent. of the farmers, no matter what their political persuasion may be, are in favour of free wheat, and the bulk of the Conservative press in the West is advocating free wheat.

I should like to put on record an article which appeared in the Calgary Herald, a paper which is friendly to the Borden Government, and which is looked upon as one of the staunchest party papers in the West. This article was written in regard to a letter received from Mr. Kelly, president of the Western Canada Flour Mills Company, with important interest in Calgary. The article, which is dated January 13, 1914, says:

> What the president says, in effect, is that if the Dominion Government removes the duties against United States wheat and flour there will be an end to milling development in the West.
> Perhaps Mr. Kelly didn't mean it exactly that way, but what he says sounds very much like a threat, and if there is one thing more particularly objectionable than another to the average westerner it is the threat, no matter from whence it comes or by whom given.
>
> Mr. Kelly will forgive us if we suggest that the issue concerned in the matter of free or taxed wheat is something of far greater importance to the people of the West than the development or stagnation of any single industrial enterprise, even though that enterprise is of such magnitude as the milling industry. Involved in it is an economic question affecting practically the whole population of the West. And if the Borden Government decides that it will be for the general financial betterment of the people of the West to remove wheat and flour duties, it is not at all likely those duties will be retained in order to meet the desires of the Association of Millers.

Originally designed to foster home industry and develop the Dominion industrially and agriculturally, the policy of protection has not always been operated in accordance with its original design. Various industrial interests have, with more or less success, persuaded governments to manipulate the tariff in such manner as made it the servant of special rather than general interests. It would be better for the protective policy if this sort of thing ceased entirely.

We may be excused if we refuse to believe everything in the way of calamity Mr. Kelly in his letter assures us will follow to milling interests of the West if wheat and flour duties are removed. It would be an insult to the intelligence and business ability of the managers of this business in western Canada to suggest that, located as they are in the heart of the finest wheat growing country on the continent, and having as cheap and ready access to Pacific coast and other markets as their western American competitors, they would fall down if forced to meet their rivals in open competition. Possibly their dividends might not figure so largely in financial statements, but that they would fail or cease to progress! Well, we simply cannot believe it; that's all.

Viewing the free wheat and flour proposal as it applies economically to the people of Canada to-day The Herald is quite well satisfied to see the experiment tried out. We do not believe that in operation it can work any great injury to even a section of the people, and there is the possibility it may work benefit to a great majority, in which event the removal of duties would be justified. And if, as has been contended, Canadian millers are at a disadvantage in meeting their American competitors because of duties on mill machinery and equipment, why not remove these duties also? The Government of R. L. Borden in giving justice to the majority has no desire to work any injustice to the minority, if it can be avoided. If the people are given free wheat and flour the millers should also be given free access to markets from which they obtain their equipment and other supplies.

Therefore even the Conservatives of western Canada are not afraid of free wheat.

It looks very much as if the farmers of western Canada were going to be driven out of business unless they are given an opportunity to sell in a wider market at better prices. It would appear, as pointed out by the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) that considerable emigration is taking place to the south. In fact, I believe the statistics show that there has been a greater migration from Canada to the United States during the past twelve months than from the United States into Canada. If an exodus should set in from our western provinces, what would happen to our eastern industries and our great transportation companies? They would face bankruptcy, and instead of opposing the giving of free wheat, the removal of the duty, they ought to do everything in their power to encourage the Government to grant the request of the western farmers.

With regard to the education of the farmers, we have been told by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) that this Government has been doing a great deal in that way. Scientific education in agriculture is a good thing, but it will not enable any farmer to make money when he is compelled to sell his agricultural produce at a loss. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I have a number of graduates of Guelph Agricultural College and also of the Manitoba Agricultural College, and I think I may safely say that, although these men are farming along scientific lines, farming according to the most advanced methods, not one of these men is making more than a bare living out of his farm to-day. The only men who are making money are the men who have live stock to dispose of.

As regards the advice of the hon. member from Dundas (Mr. Broder), re going into mixed farming, the farmers have had a great deal of that advice from governments, from presidents of transportation companies and from presidents of our banking institutions. It requires, however, capital to go into mixed farming, and very few of our western farmers at the present time have the capital to embark on mixed farming. It is to be regretted, partly for that reason, that there has been so much delay in putting into effect the recommendations of the Ranching Commission appointed some time ago to look into the ranching and grazing question. In 1911 or 1912 the commission was appointed; the report was handed in, and so far the Government has not put its recommendations into effect. The hon. member for Chambly and Verchéres (Mr. Rainville) was speaking of the large number of cattle that had gone out of eastern Canada into the United States. If the farmers and stock-men of western Canada had been assured of a grazing area, they would have bought a large number of these young cattle and breeding stock that were for sale in eastern Canada, would have shipped them west and so done something to stimulate mixed farming. A great deal of that stock would have been taken out there, held over the winter and sold to small farmers who could afford to buy cattle in the spring. I trust that before very long the recommendations of the Ranching Commission will be put into operation.

Recently the Government was visited by the Conservative members of the Alberta Legislature; and before these gentlemen left the West they gave the people to understand that they were coming here for the purpose of impressing upon the Government the importance of granting free wheat and many other requests of the western farmer. I learn from the High River Times—a paper friendly to the present Government—of Thursday, January 21, that the provincial delegation were much more interested in redistribution and questions of patronage than they were in free wheat. This newspaper states:

> The delegation went fully into redistribution and cutting up of the province in order that the larger centres of population would be distributed so as to offset the farmers' vote on reciprocity as much as possible.
> The grievances over the grazing leases and the delay of the Government in changing regulations was discussed, and it is likely that some action in the matter will soon take place. The delegation is reported not to have been in unison on the question of free wheat, but the Government was strongly advised that something ought to be done in order to offset the growing sentiment of antagonism throughout the West.

Evidently, the editor of this paper thinks there is some antagonism developing to the present Government in the West, and perhaps from a political point of view I should not be anxious to see that antagonism removed. But let me say, if there is antagonism in the rural districts, there must be antagonism amongst the people of the towns and cities of the West as well, because the very existence of these towns and cities depends upon the prosperity of the farmers. But I am quite prepared to risk defeat in the next general election by the removal of some of that antagonism to the Government; and if the Government will only grant the request for free wheat, I can assure them that they will rise very appreciably in the estimation of the western farmers. I have tried to deal with this question from a non-partisan point of view. I am actuated by a sincere desire to see a betterment in the conditions of the West, and therefore I shall be very pleased to see this Government grant free wheat, thereby acceding to the demand of the western farmers.

Mr. WILLIAM A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my observations on this amendment will be very brief. I desire to summarize the argument put up by the members from western Canada on behalf of this measure, which we believe will be an inestimable advantage to the farmers of the western provinces. The demand is general; it does not represent one political party only, but represents, I can safely say, the unanimous sentiment of the people of western Canada. In my own community I have come in contact with men who are leaders in the Conservative party, and they declare themselves in favour of free wheat, realizing that it is in the interest of the farmers of the West. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) yesterday was looking for reasons, and I think enough have been offered him to induce the Government to provide, in the Budget, for free wheat. Now, I believe every man in this House is anxious for the development of the western provinces; and I will be candid enough to say that western Canada is not developing at the present time. I am speaking from experience. I have travelled through my constituency, and have met the people, and they are discouraged and dissatisfied; and the result is that some of them are leaving Canada. Now when our Cabinet ministers come to the West they come on a special train or on a special car. They visit the members of the party in the chief centres; but I will guarantee this, that not one of them who came to the West last year came into contact with the farmers themselves or went out and met them on their farms and tried to find out the conditions existing there. If they had done so, they would realize that every word that the western Canada members have said in this debate is absolutely true, and that free wheat is one of the necessities for the western Canadian farmer. I am an optimist in regard to the West, I believe in the West, it is a country with untold riches. But we must have our people there living under conditions satisfactory to them; conditions must be such that as a result of their labours the people may be able to make a profitable living, and that they cannot do under present tariff conditions. If I were to outline the needs of the West at the present time as presented by the farmers and others, I would speak also of a general reduction in the tariff, more transportation facilities and lower freight rates. Most members of this House think the West has been afforded a large mileage of railway transportation. That is true, but still in my own district, which is 180 miles square, there are points that are fifty and sixty miles away from a railroad, where farmers are endeavouring to farm and where they have been farming for the last three or four years. I will quote one instance. On the 1st of July last, I had occasion to attend a demonstration in a district known as the Altorado district. At that demonstration, at a place fifty miles from a railroad, there were a thousand people in attendance, among them some farmers whose places were sixty and seventy miles from railroad connections. These people cannot help but be discouraged in their efforts. What is the cause of these people going to live in such places? Homestead lands were opened, railroads promised to build and the people went in. And let me say, one of the most unpopular measures passed last year was the subsidy to the Canadian Northern railway—unpopular in a district which is looking for a branch line of the Canadian Northern railway. That company had made promises, time and time again, to those people, and yet in all this time they have not laid a mile of track in that district. That is one reason why the people are discouraged; they want more transportation facilities, a general reduction in the tariff and lower freight rates. Let me say for the western people that, while they are free traders in sentiment and belief, yet they are not asking for something that is going to injure eastern Canada. While desiring a general reduction of the tariff, they will be prepared to stand for protection for the eastern Canadian industries. But they feel that when their own industry, the great agricultural industry, asks for free entrance into other markets and is prepared to compete on a free trade basis with other countries, their request should be granted. And they are looking to this Government, which has promised so much for the benefit of this country and especially for western Canada, to grant that request.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Neely:

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

INTERPRETATION OF RULE 17.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that with the consent of the House no motion is necessary. If the House does not consent, the motion will have to be made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We are for the first time applying the rule which was adopted last session in regard to going into Committee of Supply, and which is a departure from the rule formerly in existence. Before we proceed, I would like to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for his understanding of the rule, so that we may know in the future exactly the position we are in. The rule reads as follows:

> On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker will leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that . . . the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

My understanding of the rule is that if the House is moved into Committee of Supply on a day other than Thursday or Friday, and if at the conclusion of the day the subject matter of the department under consideration has not been exhausted, then when the House goes into Committee of Supply on Thursday or Friday, Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair without any motion. My understanding is that when you commence the consideration of the Estimates of a department, it must be done by the making of a motion. To-day we have no department whose estimates we have commenced, and therefore my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has moved the House into Committee of Supply. If we had commenced on a department on a day previous to to-day, Mr. Speaker would have left the Chair without any motion.

Mr. BORDEN: For the purpose of the estimates of that department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: For the purpose of the department. In other words, I take this to mean that the consideration of the Estimates of any department must be first commenced by a motion, and, if not finished within the day, it goes on automatically, Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair, and it is taken up again on Thursday or Friday.

Mr. BORDEN: That seems to be the understanding.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then, as that seems to be the understanding, what are we to understand by the word 'department' which is used in this rule:

> On Thursdays and Fridays, when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker will leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

To-day I understand we are taking up Civil Government, and taking it up as one department. On page 8 of the Estimates we have these words, 'Civil Government, amount to be voted, $6,413,378.75.' That is what is required for Civil Government. In this amount is included the expenditures of the various departments for the Civil Service at Ottawa; for instance, there is for the Customs Department $615,987, and again on page 96 we have another vote, item 342, amounting to $4,210,000, for the Customs Department. If we take up to-day all the departments and exhaust them, I suppose this will not be considered as having gone into the Interior or Customs or Excise or any other department, but that when the time comes for us to consider these appropriations, the House will have to be moved again into Committee of Supply?

Mr. BORDEN: I understand it very much in the way that my right hon. friend understands it, except that I think he has perhaps construed the rule a little too favourably to the Government, if I apprehend him correctly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am too generous to the Government; it is a fault of mine.

Mr. BORDEN: Only unintentionally. I would think that every one of the departments which are enumerated, commencing at page 8, would be regarded as a separate department, and not as one department, as the right hon. gentleman suggests. In so far as I understand the construction of the rule, I think there is no difference of opinion between himself and myself. I would further say that we are taking this up practically by consent to-day, as the Government could not reasonably ask hon gentlemen to go on except by consent, and I would not regard any commencement that we may make to-day as bringing the case within the operation of the rule. We must bring each one of these departments before the House on some other day before we can make use of the rule in regard to Thursday and Friday.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Other than Thursday or Friday?

Mr. BORDEN: Other than Thursday or Friday. I think that is quite fair and reasonable, and I assent to it at once.

THE STEAMER ALERT.

On the motion of Mr. Borden for Committee of Supply:

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to read the following article dated North Sydney, January 27, 1914, which appeared in the Sydney Record:

> The Government revenue steam tug Alert, which is owned by a Sydney real estate broker and incidentally receives the princely sum of $18,000 per year of the people's money, was pressed into service yesterday to convey Tory organizer Hayes and Tory candidate Philip McLeod from North Sydney to the northern parts of Victoria county. The primary object of establishing this branch of the preventive service was to put a stop to the traffic of contraband liquor into Cape Breton seaports. Prohibition is one of the planks of the Tory platform. It is also an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment to carry intoxicating liquor from one part of the province to another. Notwithstanding all this some of the barrels placed on board of the Government boat on its northward journey looked uncommonly like vessels containing ordinary booze. But although taken from a bonded warehouse and conveyed on board the ship by a teamster employed by a wholesale liquor dealer, they might have contained nothing more harmful than tomatoes of the Colchester county brand. In any event it is safe to say that the Government never intended to furnish Mr. Philip McLeod with a private yacht for electioneering purposes, even if he is the Tory candidate for Victoria county.

For the information of the House I may say than an election for a member for the local legislature of the province of Nova Scotia is taking place in that county and the election will be held on the 12th day of February. My only intention in reading this article is to bring it to the attention of the Government, or I suppose, more particularly of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). He is not in his place at the present time, but I would be glad if he would tell this House whether or not the tug Alert, which is in the Government service, has gone to either one of the ports of Victoria county on an electioneering service and whether or not she has been ordered there by the department. If the hon. gentleman does not know these facts, I would ask him to have an investigation made and to give an answer to the House later.

Mr. BORDEN: I know nothing of the matter to which the hon. gentleman has referred beyond what he has stated. I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to it. I would say to my hon. friend that this is not the first occasion I have heard such complaints raised in the House. Before the advent of the present Government to power, similar questions were frequently raised about the use of Government steamships.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And there has been no change whatever since the change of Government.

Mr. BORDEN: I think there has been a change; at least I hope there has been. I am free to admit there ought to be a change.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

On the motion of Mr. Borden for Committee of Supply:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): I call the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Railways to the very large increase which has taken place recently in the freight rates on the Prince Edward Island railway. I understand that the matter has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways by the supporters of the Government, and by deleations from my province, but so far no redress has been obtained. I also understand, there is very little hope that there will be any relief given. The increase in the rates on the Prince Edward Island railway is twenty-five to thirty per cent over the former rates, which were in themselves quite onerous. In the judgment of the people of my province the existing railway rates are not in the best interest of the railway, and they certainly are not in the interest of the people. On some commodities the rates have been increased to such an extent that they are actually prohibitory, the increase ranging from sixty to one hundred per cent.

Mr. COCHRANE: Keep on, you are doing well.

Mr. HUGHES: I can give you an instance of that. From my own personal knowledge, the rate on firewood or cordwood, hauled from New Zealand station, Harmony station, and New Harmony station to Souris, was formerly $3 and $3.50 and it is now $7. That rate is prohibitory.

Mr. COCHRANE: That means $7 a car.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. COCHRANE: How many miles.

Mr. HUGHES: Between five and ten miles.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I wish we could get it hauled in Ontario for that.

Mr. HUGHES: The people engaged in that traffic are hauling by team rather than by railway.

Mr. BRADBURY: It would cost double that in the West.

Mr. HUGHES: I am addressing my remarks to the Minister of Railways. I have letters from the most reputable and largest business men in the province asking me to bring this matter to the attention of the Government. Carvell Brothers, the largest wholesale business men in Charlottetown, and who I think are supporters of the present Administration communicated with me on this matter, as have also Messrs. Poole and Thompson of Montague who do a large produce business. I quote a paragraph from a letter received from this firm:

> In addition to the above we are informed that all freight rates on the Prince Edward Island railway have been advanced, except on Mussle mud, and the rates on cordwood, lumber, coal, hay and straw, lime, limestone, cement, brick, sand, gravel, stone, live stock, fertilizer, &c., are practically prohibitive, and will certainly result in loss of business for the railway as well as tying up the commerce of the country.

That is a condition of affairs that ought to be looked into. I am surprised that the Government did not take more heed of the representations made by their supporters in this House and by the delegations that have come from Prince Edward Island to interview them on this subject. The Prime Minister will remember that he visited Prince Edward Island shortly before the last Dominion election, and he held meetings there which were largely attended. There was a meeting held at Souris, the town in which I live, and the day being fine the meeting was held in a field, and it was largely attended by farmers and others. The Prime Minister referred to the grievances under which the people of the province were labouring in the matter of transporting their products. The right hon. gentleman stated that if he should come into power, one of the first things to which his Government would address its attention would be to redress these grievances. Well, there has been no redress in the line of reduction of rates, but on the contrary the rates have been increased. That is why I make a special appeal to the Prime Minister. I am quite sure he made that statement and that promise in good faith, and I am also sure the people who listened to him thought it was in good faith. And yet we see the result. I do not think the Prime Minister would wish to have a result of that kind. I would ask him whether we may expect these grievances to be remedied and what action the Government will take.

I want further to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that last autumn, in Christmas week I think, about one-third of the trackmen were discharged, temporarily, as I understand it. At all events, one of the permanent men from each section of the road was discharged. That was a cruel thing to do right at the beginning of winter. The wages received by these men is barely sufficient to support themselves and their families, and yet right in the beginning of winter, in Christmas week, the Government dismissed them for the winter season. The men could not get any other work at that season of the year. From what I know of the Minister of Railways, I do not think that personally he would approve of conduct of that kind, but, nevertheless, his department did it. Possibly the man responsible for that is the General Manager, who is receiving a princely salary, I understand $20,000 a year. That man is in a position in which he is not obliged to feel the necessities of men who are earning a bare living wage of from $1.50 to $1.70 per day. Why, if you had a horse which had served you faithfully during the summer season, you would not turn him out at the beginning of winter to starve; if you did you would be put in prison at the instance of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to animals. I repeat that I do not think the Minister of Railways would personally do a thing like that, but being the head of the department he must be held responsible. I would now ask the Minister what redress these poor men are going to get. So serious was the matter that the trackmen held a meeting amongst themselves, and the men who had not been discharged agreed to work only alternate weeks so that they would thus share their wages with the men who were thrown out of employment. They knew thier comrades could not support their families during the winter months. That is a condition of things that is quite serious. Now, will the Minister of Railways take steps to reinstate these men, and to prevent the issuing of an order of that kind in future? I believe that personally his better nature would prompt him to take action of that kind.

I also wish to ask whether we may expect any redress so far as decrease in rates—which are excessive and which were certainly not contemplated—on the Prince Edward Island Railway. I am satisfied that if the present Prime Minister, when he went before the people of Prince Edward Island previous to the last general election, had told the people that if he were placed in office he would raise the rates on the Prince Edward Island railway to the extent they have been raised, he would have received very few votes indeed in that province.

I wish that the minister would give me an answer on these points.

Mr. COCHRANE: As to the raising of the rates, the increase has taken place just as on the main line of the Intercolonial railway. I may say, however, that before I came into office, and continuously for a long time, there has been a deficit on the Prince Edward Island railway, and that deficit is still about $100,000 a year.

Mr. EMMERSON: And it always will be so.

Mr. COCHRANE: I suppose it will.

Mr. EMMERSON: The very necessities of the case make it inevitable.

Mr. COCHRANE: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) did not say that we had raised the men's wages about 25 per cent since we came into power. It is to be remembered also that all kinds of materials have increased in price, and consequently it costs a great deal more to run now than it did a few years ago. Instructions were given to the officials at Moncton six months ago that if hardship arose in regard to any item they must inquire into the matter. According to the statement the hon. gentleman quoted he could haul wood five miles, as I understand him for $7 a car. I can only say that that rate is cheaper than it can be done in any other place in Canada that I know of. I am confident it is not the usual rate. With reference to the laying off of section men, I know that has been a hardship. But all other railways do it, and I do not know why a government railway should not be run like other railways, in a business way. If we are to continue to support government ownership and operation, we must have the ordinary business course of management.

Mr. HUGHES: Then no redress need be expected?

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply (Mr. Blondin in the Chair).

Civil Government—Governor General's Secretary's Office—Salaries, including A. F. Sladen, $3,300—$24,725.

Mr. CRUISE—What is this special provision for?

Mr. BORDEN: This is according to the practice that has been followed for a good many years in the case of the Governor General's Secretary's office.

Mr. EMMERSON: How does it arise?

Mr. BORDEN: I could not inform the hon. gentleman at present as to the origin of it.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is it the usual vote, or exceptional?

Mr. BORDEN: It is usual—in this way, that it has been voted in this manner for a number of years.

Civil Government—Privy Council Office—Contingencies. $8,400.

Mr. MURPHY: There is an increase of $1,000 here.

Mr. BORDEN: There has been an unusual number of appeals from the Board of Railway Commissioners to the Privy Council, and in connection with some of these, I think, stenographers have been employed to take a note of the arguments. So far as I recollect, that is the purpose of this increase.

Civil Government—Royal Northwest Mounted Police, $19,675.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To what position has Mr. Hamilton been appointed?

Mr. BORDEN: To the position of Assistant Comptroller.

Mr. MACLEAN: Does the business of that office require all Mr. Hamilton's time?

Mr. BORDEN: So far as I know.

Mr. OLIVER: Is that a new position?

Mr. BORDEN: No.

Mr. PROULX: Does Mr. Hamilton come under subdivision A of the First Division?

Mr. BORDEN: Yes, the First Division.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is he appointed under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. BORDEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has this appointment been made by promotion?

Mr. BORDEN: No, Mr. Hamilton was not in the Civil Service before.

Mr. McCRANEY: Who was the former occupant of this position?

Mr. BORDEN: During the period when Colonel White was comptroller of the Northwest Mounted Police, Mr. Fortescue, the present comptroller, was assistant comptroller. Upon the superannuation of Mr. White, Mr. Fortescue became comptroller, and Mr. Hamilton has been appointed assistant comptroller.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has Mr. Hamilton entered upon his duties?

Mr. BORDEN: I understand that he has about entered upon them; I think that the Order in Council has been passed, but I am not absolutely sure of it.

Mr. NEELY: Having been appointed under the Civil Service Act, I presume that he has passed the usual necessary examination?

Mr. BORDEN: He has complied with the provisions of the Civil Service Act as they have been understood for many years and as they have been interpreted by the Department of Justice under the late Administration as well as under the present Administration.

Mr. MURPHY: That is to say, he was appointed under section 21, under which no examination is held?

Mr. BORDEN: He has been appointed as an assistant deputy minister. I think it has been ruled, if I remember correctly, that the assistant to a deputy minister may be appointed in the same way as a deputy minister. I think several illustrations can be given of that procedure.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is Mr. Hamilton's salary?

Mr. BORDEN: $2,800.

Mr. PROULX: Is it a fact that the Government cannot obtain a sufficient number of men in Canada as recruits for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and that they have to obtain them in England?

Mr. BORDEN: I will have full particulars of that when we come to the main Estimates of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. The recruiting has been almost altogether carried on in the British Islands; I am speaking from recollection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Recruiting is always easy when there is a will.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think that recruiting for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police has been easy in Canada during recent years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We always got a full supply in Canada. I am glad that so many of those who came from the British Islands were good men.

Mr. BORDEN: Did not my right hon. friend obtain recruits in the British Islands?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Perhaps so, I did not say no.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not say yes, but that is my impression.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It seems that we can get good officers, however, without going outside of Canada.

Civil Government — High Commissioner's Office, London, $45,955.

Mr. GRAHAM: Many prognostications are being made in the newspapers as to who is to fill the office of High Commissioner, and we are unsettled as to who is to be the successor of the late High Commissioner. Can the right hon. Prime Minister give us any information?

Mr. BORDEN: Except in so far as my hon. friend can get relief from the newspapers, I am afraid he will have to remain unsettled at present.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who has charge of the office now?

Mr. BORDEN: The secretary.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the intention of the Government to permit the office to remain vacant for any considerable length of time?

Mr. BORDEN: Naturally the Government is disposed to fill an important office of this kind as soon as it can reasonably be done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the Prime Minister had any applications for the position?

Mr. BORDEN: Up to the present time, not one.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there any intention on the part of the Government to change the location of the office in London? Has the Government given any attention to the purchase of a site somewhere in the Strand, to the acquisition of which it is understood that the late Lord Strathcona was very much opposed?

Mr. BORDEN: Does my hon. friend refer to the Aldwych site proposal?

Mr. MURPHY: I think that is the name, yes.

Mr. BORDEN: The Government has not come to any conclusion in regard to securing a site in London beyond this: that for the time being at least we do not intend to take any steps in the matter without very careful consideration. Certain negotiations were had in regard to what is known as the Westminster Hospital site, but these negotiations have been discontinued, and no arrangements are pending with regard to any other site.

Mr. GRAHAM: The ex-Governor General has taken quite an interest in one of the projects, and I am not prepared to say that I am not somewhat impressed with his arguments in reference thereto. Has the Government any correspondence in regard to the matter which might be fairly placed on the table?

Mr. BORDEN: I will consider my hon. friend's suggestion, and see if there is at the present time any correspondence which it might be desirable to lay upon the table of the House. In any event, whether or not it is desirable to lay correspondence on the table at this juncture, I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend, or any other hon. gentleman on the other side of the House access to any correspondence that has taken place.

Mr. EMMERSON: I understand that the former Governor General, Earl Grey, is in favour of one central overseas Dominion building, to be occupied by representatives of the dominions. Has that question to be determined before anything can be done?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not know that that question has absolutely to be determined excepting in so far as it might be determined by the selection of some other site, than the one suggested. As I have said, the Government has discontinued negotiations with regard to the acquisition of any site. While representations have been made to the Government, as well as to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, setting forth the advantages of the scheme to which reference has been made, the Government has taken no action whatever with reference to that scheme. If any action is taken in that regard, we will, of course, communicate our position to the House during the session, at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. OLIVER: I may be out of order in bringing this matter up, but it is well known that the late High Commissioner discharged the duties of his office with very great credit to himself and to Canada, and was able to do so only because of having large private means. Now that the Government is faced with the necessity of selecting a successor, the question of the financial circumstances of the possible successor may come under consideration. I do not know that I will be warranted in asking the Government if they have decided upon any change of policy as to the amount of remuneration granted to the High Commissioner—that is if they have felt that the remuneration should be on a basis that would enable a man without fortune to occupy the position or if they have decided to leave it as at present so that the post can be filled only by a person having large private means.

Mr. BORDEN: I think my hon. friend's question is a very proper one, and the subject which he mentions is one proper for the consideration of the Government. Up to the present time it never has been formally considered by the Government, although doubtless in the minds of the members of the Government as well as in the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House generally there has been the knowledge that some addition would require to be made to the salary, unless we are to be restricted to the appointment of persons possessed of very great private means. The subject will have to receive consideration by reason of the vacancy which has taken place through the lamented death of Lord Strathcona, and it will receive consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: I noticed a despatch the other day in nearly all the Government organs saying that Lord Strathcona, near the close of his life, had made a suggestion that the Hon. Adam Beck should be his successor. Have the Government heard anything of that?

Mr. BORDEN: I am not aware that Lord Strathcona made any suggestion to 4 p.m. the Government with regard to the subject.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Government, of course, would not take my advice.

Mr. BORDEN: Do not be too sure.

Mr. GRAHAM: But it might be good nevertheless. There is no question but that the late High Commissioner was a credit to himself and to all concerned, and it would be very difficult, practically impossible, to fill his position in every respect. We in Canada are advancing now to a higher status than we have ever had before; our business interests are greater than they have ever been, and are rapidly developing. My own view is—and I have no particular individual in mind—that the Government would be well advised to select an active man for that position who knows Canada and Canadian affairs generally. It would be a great mistake to select a man who is not in close touch with Canadian affairs, merely as a recognition of past services or anything else. The interests are too great to be trifled with, and I think it would be wise for the Government to consider carefully the selection of such a man as I have spoken of; but at all events they should not consider the appointment of any man who is not in close touch with Canadian affairs. Such a man could be of great assistance both to the empire and to this Dominion in that position.

Mr. BORDEN: At pages 30 and 31 there are the details of several votes for the Commission of Conservation and the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Could my right hon. friend give us the names of the officers of the Conservation Commission ?

Mr. BORDEN: If my hon. friend desires that information I shall ask that the item be not taken up.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the Government satisfied that there is justification for the rapid increase in the cost of administering this commission ? I think there is room for doubting the wisdom of the wide latitude given this commission in the many matters in which they are supposed to take an interest. For instance, a publication was issued the other day in reference to oyster culture. Their investigations and the publication of that book alone would mean the expenditure of a considerable sum of money. At the same time the Department of Marine and Fisheries are naturally specially charged with the administration of all fisheries, and I know they have devoted considerable time and made considerable expenditure of money of late years particularly in connection with oyster culture. This is one instance of overlapping of work between the Conservation Commission and one of the departments of government, and I think there are other illustrations of this. I have not given very much consideration to the matter, but I think it is worthy of a little consideration and investigation by the Government whether or not the Conservation Commission are infringing upon the duties of some of the departments of government. I think further that it is worth while considering whether, after all, the services done to the country by the commission are worth its cost or whether the same services could not be as well administered by some other department of government. I recognize the fact that the commission have performed some service to the State, and the crusading work having been completed, it may be that the work can be better performed by other departments of government.

Mr. BORDEN: I would not care to enter upon the discussion without better preparation than I have at the moment. Some question was raised about this item, either last session or the session before. On that occasion I procured the very fullest information as to the work which the Commission had performed, and placed it upon 'Hansard.' On that occasion also, the Committee listened to a very instructive speech from the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), who is a member of the Conservation Commission and thoroughly familiar with his work. I supported the appointment of a Conservation Commission and the legislation by which it was constituted, believing it would be of great service to the country, and I have no reason to change the views I then entertained. It is quite possible there may be some overlapping of work; that is to be avoided as far as possible, and I would like to remind my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that overlapping of work sometimes occurs even between different departments of the Government. Therefore, the mere transference of the work of this Commission to a department of the Government would not remedy the overlapping of which he complains. If my hon. friend would let the item stand, I will give him full information as to the work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Commission was appointed some four years ago on the model of the Commission appointed in the United States, and so far we have every reason for believing that the work done by the Commission has been extremely useful. They have gone very far in many directions and particularly in one direction. I say the work which is being done by the Conservation Commission in regard to forestry is beyond praise. Last year there were less fires, at all events in the southern part of Ontario and in parts of Quebec, than in any previous year, and this is largely attributable to the efforts of the Commission. If the Commission had done nothing more than that, it would have more than justified its existence. The Chairman of the Commission, Hon. Clifford Sifton, is a very able man, and I do not think a more competent man could be found for the work. I do not know what the Commission have achieved in other directions, such as tuberculosis, but with regard to the conservation of forests I cannot for my part sufficiently emphasize my appreciation of what they have done. There is no subject of greater importance at the present time, especially in the southern parts of Ontario and Quebec, and if the Commission were to do nothing more than to teach the people the importance of this matter, I repeat they would more than justify their existence. I have taken but a cursory view of the Estimates, but I have not found any appropriation this year for a Forestry Congress. From time to time forestry associations have met in British Columbia and in Quebec, and in bringing to the attention of the people the great necessity of forest preservation have largely justified the small expenditure they involved, and I would suggest to my right hon. friend to put in an appropriation in the forthcoming Estimates for a forestry congress.

Mr. BORDEN: I entirely concur in the appreciation which my right hon. friend has expressed of the work of the Conservation Commission, in the prevention of forest fires. In one way and another, I have been brought into touch with their work in that regard, and it is not too much to say that the saving which they have effected to the material wealth of the country in that regard would pay all the expenses of the Commission, not only ten but a hundred times over. So far as the proposal to hold the forestry congress is concerned, I should be very glad indeed to take into consideration the suggestion which the right hon. gentleman has made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If I remember correctly there was one held about two years ago, in British Columbia, I think.

Mr. BORDEN: But not here.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was an association, not a Government affair.

Mr. BORDEN: At all events I shall look into the matter and give consideration to what my right hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I be allowed to give a concrete case of the good work done by this commission—a case where they were useful to at least one department of the Government. It is true they may overlap but I am not sure that that is to the detriment of the public. When the question of protecting forests along the lines of railway came up, there was very strong objection on the part of railways to legislation that was being discussed at that time by private members in the House. As it was a very serious grievance, I called together on one occasion, one or two men who are deeply interested in the protection of forests, as individuals, two representatives of the railways and two of the representatives of the Conservation Commission including the Chairman, I think, and one other, and before they separated they handed me a draft section for the amendment to the Railway Act. It was acceptable to the railways and to the lumbermen and is now part of the Railway Act, and of great benefit I am told. Had it not been for the Conservation Commission, I am afraid we should not have been able to come to such a satisfactory conclusion. Although I would like to know the names of the officers for one or two reasons that I may discuss later on, I am strongly in favour of the work of the commission and if they do occasionally make mistakes, I have known even Governments to do that.

Mr. BORDEN: Former Governments.

Item stands.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask my right hon. friend, before we leave this item, whether in connection with the representations that are made from time to time to his Government with regard to a supply of pure water for the city of Ottawa, he has had the benefit of the advice or co-operation of the Conservation Commission? I ask that because the commission carried out an inquiry with reference to the typhoid epidemic and perhaps other epidemics. They made extensive inquiries and published one or two reports and it occurs to me that the officers of the commission would be in possession of valuable information which the Government ought to have before entering into any arrangement in regard to our water supply.

Mr. BORDEN: The answer which the Government made to the application of the city of Ottawa involved as its first condition, an abundant supply of pure water. Up to the present time, the city has never been able to come to us and say they are ready to proceed with a certain proposal. When they do come to us with the assurance that they will be able to carry out a certain proposal, we will avail ourselves of the technical assistance of the officers of the Conservation Commission as well as all other necessary technical assistance, in order that we may be sure the country is not spending its money on an imperfect or poor supply. Up to the present day I have not had occasion to ask the assistance of the officers of the commission in that regard.

Civil Service Commission—Commissioners' salaries, $15,000.

Mr. MURPHY: This is a department which comes, I think, under the administration of my hon. friend the Secretary of State. I do not see him present, and we require some information which perhaps my right hon. friend would not have in his possession.

Mr. BORDEN: No.

Item stands.

Civil Government—Department of Trade and Commerce, $103,237.50.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the occasion of the increase over last year?

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Speaking generally, there is nothing but the statutory increases. Then, specially, there is an increase of one in the first division, subdivision A and of two in the first division, subdivision B, making the number of increases three in the whole. That is for the Department of Trade and Commerce proper. In the Census and Statistics branch there is provision made for three at the minimum in the third division, subdivision A, because in the arrangement for the statistical work of the department for next year we shall need to have some more help in the way of stenographers and clerks.

Going back to the Department of Trade and Commerce, we are making provision for the establishment of the grain laboratory in connection with the grain work of the department. In the United States they have of late been paying a great deal of attention to the more scientific investigation of grain as regards the qualities of grain, the moisture contents and problems that arise in storage and transportation, with the idea of getting at a scientific basis for coming to better conclusions as to the management of the grain itself and also as to the value of grain distributed under the different standards. It seemed to me that some such work as that ought to be undertaken as soon as possible in Canada where we have so large an output of grain at present with almost illimitable possibilities for the increase of the output. Our grain production is going to be one of the great productions of the future, and we need as good scientific knowledge as we can get in reference to it, as well as good distributive and administrative knowledge in the practical working out of the Grain Act. The Grain Commissioners took up the matter, and after a pretty thorough investigation they made a report recommending the establishment of a laboratory. We propose to start it with two chemists, one an over chemist who is the real grain chemist, and the other whose duty shall be more in reference to arriving at the values of grain as regards milling, baking and bread-making properties. It is proposed to establish this at Winnipeg, and to conduct tests there mainly. We shall have to get accommodation, which is now being arranged for, and a certain amount of laboratory material will be necessary to enable the chemists to carry on their investigations and make their experiments. In connection with that, as the work goes on, there will be a deeper and more thorough experimentation and analysis required which will necessitate larger means at the disposal of the chemist in the shape of laboratory facilities to enable him to thoroughly carry these investigations out. It is proposed to accomplish that part of the work in affiliation and co-operation with the laboratories either in Montreal or in Toronto in connection with the universities. That will be for taking certain matters up and submitting them to laboratory tests of a rather delicate and thorough nature. It would be too costly for us to equip the laboratory at Winnipeg to enable the chemist to carry on that work.

The board were instructed to make inquiries and to get information as to the proper officials for this and as a result they recommended the appointment of Dr. Birchard, who had a distinguished course in the University at Toronto and who since then has been employed in Washington in the prosecution of this kind of work under the Government there.

and in the Government laboratories of the United States there. He has, as I have said, had a distinguished career and his qualifications seem to be of a very high character and such as would indicate him to be a man thoroughly qualified to carry on that work. Then, in regard to the other side of the work, which, in one sense, is the more practical, or at least has the more practical side to it, we had to arrange and after a good deal of search we hoped to be able to get a man from the University at Minneapolis who has been engaged in that kind of work for the State authorities there, but we were not able to do that. In the end we have been able to get a man who has been connected with the same kind of work under the Government of the United States at Washington and he was recommended to us by the authorities as being as good a man as can be obtained in the United States for this work.

These two will form the staff as far as the scientific part of it is concerned. A stenographer and a clerk, the two combined in one, will do the rest of the work that is necessary and a moderate supply of laboratory equipment will furnish them with what is necessary for carrying on their work. The head chemist is already at work and naturally his duties fell in with the general work of the administration of the Act, but after considering the matter it seemed to me that the staff equipment of the laboratory for carrying on this investigation might well be provided by the Government from the general fund and that we might thus relieve the fund which arises from the imposition of fees upon the grain that passes inspection and leave that free from this part of the work. Therefore, I introduce it here, and I would like the committee to give the necessary authority for the employment of these chemists, and vote the necessary sum so that at the beginning of the fiscal year these officials shall be a charge upon the general consolidated fund.

Mr. DEVLIN: Was it impossible to get competent officials in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: We have had practically no experimental work of that kind in Canada, and in the inception of the work you can only get your expert men from places where they have had training and experience. We could not find these men in Canada just at this time. But our chemist is a Canadian by birth and education, and his family live in Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: But the other one?

[Mr. G. E. Foster.]

Mr. FOSTER: I do not think it is best, at the inception of this, to take men without experience and without training, because we want to start in the very best possible way.

Mr. DEVLIN: I agree with that.

Mr. McCRANEY: Have not experiments been carried on at the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, in reference to the milling qualities of wheat?

Mr. FOSTER: Such experiments may have been carried on in a very casual way. What the experimental farms are chiefly after, is, to get a variety of grain which as a seed will have good qualities and will ripen as early as possible.

Mr. DEVLIN: Are the duties of the Commissioner of Commerce superior to those of the Deputy Minister of the Department; I see he is paid a higher salary than the deputy minister.

Mr. FOSTER: It sometimes happens that a salary is paid to a man in the service which may be higher than the salary paid to another man, who, in certain respects, has wider duties and greater responsibilities. The deputy minister is the sole deputy minister of the department. The Commissioner of Commerce is an official with special qualifications and special experience, and I was able to get his services from the British Government for the special purpose for which I desired them, and I paid him exactly the same salary as he was being paid by the Colonial Office for the work he was carrying on as British Trade Commissioner in Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: What is he supposed to do?

Mr. FOSTER: The Commissioner of Commerce, under the direction of the minister, has to pay special attention to the commercial exchanges, their source, their destination, and the process of interchange. I placed under his personal supervision our trade commissionerships in different parts of the world, and all our transactions with the British consular service in so far as they relate to trade and commerce. I am not saying anything as to the previous work done in the department, but any minister who has had charge of a department knows that the work of a deputy minister must extend over every part of the department. He has to be general supervisor of everything, and it is not possible for a deputy minister who has a large department to spend too much time on any one service. This service was, in my belief, of sufficient importance to have direct supervision, and a directing officer, in order to get from the expenditure of a large amount of money, something like the return we ought to have. I am not at all satisfied we are getting all the return we ought to get from the trade commissionerships at the present time, but we are improving that service. One of the most effective ways of improving it is to have that service understand that there is some man who is especially charged with seeing that the work is being carried on properly. I have had the Commissioner of Commerce visit all the trade commissionerships in Europe, and China and Japan. I was fortunate enough to be able to look in upon them in Australia and New Zealand, so that during the past year we did, what was never done before, and which I am sure every one will admit ought to be done. The change has resulted in the very best influence, and I purpose that every year in some way or other an officer from the head department shall get into communication in the locality with the trade commissioners, and in that way come to a better appreciation of the work that is being done and that is to be done.

Another very important part of the work, and which I think has been neglected in the past, is, that after we had been successful in getting valuable information from the outside, a great deal of that information has not been able to penetrate to the points in Canada where it might come into contact with those whom it would benefit. It is one thing to gather good information; it is another thing to see that information properly and widely distributed. It is the design of the department to make that information thoroughly available and to distribute it more widely than in the past. Then the man who is outside, in order to do good work on the outside, must occasionally refresh himself at the fountain-head, and I am not sure but what, taking year in and year out, three months or so spent by one of our trade commissioners from abroad in Canada interviewing the men with whom he has had a good deal of correspondence in the course of the year, would be a good thing for the service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is not going to be one of these commissions whose reports are shelved?

Mr. FOSTER: It is very unkind to make that remark at the present time when I am serious.

Mr. NESBITT: In my judgment the appointment of the trade commissioner is a good idea, as is also the bringing of the commissioners home to interview those in Canada who have trade with foreign countries. I do not understand yet, however, how the deputy minister, who is over the whole department, should get less salary than the man who is in charge only of a branch of the department. I would like to know how the producer in the West can be benefited by the work of the grain chemist?

Mr. FOSTER: As a general proposition, the producer will get the most benefit in proportion as he has larger knowledge with reference to the article he produces.

Mr. NESBITT: I refer to the ordinary farmer.

Mr. FOSTER: If these officers can come to correct and scientific conclusions as, for example, to the moisture in grain and how it affects storage and transport and get it down to the point where it will be made as safe as it possibly can be made, that will have the effect of standardizing conditions under which grain may be marketed, and stored and transported, and the producer, of course, will benefit from that.

Mr. NESBITT: How does the minister propose to distribute that knowledge?

Mr. FOSTER: That will be distributed broadcast through our bulletins and the newspapers. One looking at the number of bulletins distributed every week would be apt to say that it bore a very small proportion to the number of people who ought to be reached. But I have had that matter particularly followed, and I find the bulletin is multiplied a thousand, perhaps ten thousand, times by reproduction in the newspapers of pertinent information contained in these bulletins. I am trying to get the trade commissioners to appreciate what it is the most important for our people here to know and to put that into pithy and luminous reports. These reports are given in the bulletins, and when you get such matter into the bulletins, the newspapers do not have to be solicited to put it into their columns. It is very gratifying to see the number of extracts made from our bulletins and given wide circulation in the newspapers throughout the Dominion. The processes discovered by these chemists will be published in bulletin form and distributed as widely as possible.

Mr. DEVLIN: Speaking of trade agents, has Mr. Poindron of the Paris office been replaced? He has been removed, I do not know whether by death or resignation, and I believe there is no trade agent there now. Am I correct in that?

Mr. FOSTER: No, my hon. friend is not correct, if he says there is no trade commissioner there. When I came into the department, I found a double-headed arrangement in Paris. At the head of one part was a commissioner, and at the head of another, Mr. Poindon. It became possible to do away with one section of it, and the trade commissioner in Paris now is Mr. Roy. Mr. Roy is not in any sense one who represents Canada in a diplomatic or financial way. He is charged with the trade commissioner's work and is doing that work. It would not be fair, and it would not be correct, to say that we have no trade commissioner in Paris. The business of the trade commissionership is being done by Mr. Roy and very much more effectively than when I took charge of the department.

Mr. DEVLIN: I know Mr. Roy to be highly competent in his work, and I know he has given Canada great satisfaction. But I did not think it possible in France to have the commissioner general act as trade agent when in other countries there are several trade agents. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. FOSTER: There is not in any sense a separate form of agency in France any more than in other countries. Mr. Roy does in Paris what the trade commissioner does in Australia. He is the commissioner and represents Canada. All questions regarding trade are directed to him, and the answers so far as he can give them are sent from his office. He also carries on communications with inquirers, and for any information that he has not, he applies to us. The whole modus operandi, so far as the trade commissionership is concerned, is in full operation between this department, Mr. Roy and inquirers in France.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: And the minister may fairly claim that he has made a necessary economy?

Mr. FOSTER: I did not see that it was necessary to have two separate establishments doing the same business and quarrelling with each other while doing it.

Mr. McCRANEY: The minister has spoken about the distribution of information obtained by his department. He deals first with the bulletins. Can he tell us through what means and to what persons and bodies these bulletins are sent? In my own city of Saskatoon I have never seen the bulletin except as I receive it as a member of Parliament. It may be that the board of trade receives it, also the university library, and the public library, and others. If they do not, I would suggest that these are very popular bodies to be in receipt of the bulletin. Perhaps the hon. minister could tell us what rule is followed in regard to that.

Mr. FOSTER: What we have to guard against is the sending of bulletins to persons where they simply become material for feeding wastepaper baskets. We want to get the bulletin into the hands of those who will really appreciate it. So, there has been a good deal of sifting in that respect. All boards of trade get the bulletin, and all boards of trade are notified that if any member of the board or any person in the trade would like to have the bulletin sent regularly, he has only to send in his name. We have advertised also quite widely in that direction to get people to tell us who would like to receive the bulletin. When we send to such people we have the best ground possible for believing that they are utilizing it and getting some good from it. Not only boards of trade, but associations and public bodies of all kinds connected with trade are being made aware that we are trying to get the bulletin into the hands of those who would like to read it and file it as a means of information. Perhaps I ought not to pass an opinion on it, but I think I am right in saying that any one who will read the bulletin from week to week will find it very useful and well worth filing and keeping for reference. Last year, Mr. Poussette, our trade commissioner in South America, who is a very efficient man, acting under my instructions, made a tour of South America, visiting every one of the constituted governmental divisions, making inquiries and examinations into trade conditions, products, resources and the possibilities of interchange of goods with Canada. Mr. Poussette embodied his investigations in reports which have been published in the bulletin, and I think that any person who has had the pleasure of reading them appreciates the information given.

Mr. MURPHY: Early last year it was announced that my hon. friend was extending the work of his department by opening up an agency or agencies in South Africa. Is that work under the supervision of the Commissioner of Commerce, and how has it resulted?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, it is in charge of the Commissioner of Commerce. Our former trade commissioner in South Africa is no longer in the work, and I transferred to that office one of the most efficient trade commissioners in Great Britain, Mr. Egan, who, I think, came originally from Montreal. Mr. Egan has taken charge of our interests in South Africa, and, I must say, is conducting a most energetic canvas of the country. His principal office is in Cape Town. I have had him make a tour of South Africa, and we are establishing in five or six different places a correspondent, in each case a resident, who will work under the instructions of the Commissioner, answering all inquiries, and keeping the Commissioner generally posted with reference to trade requirements at these points. These officials are contributories to the information that Mr. Egan must himself gather, and which he reports to the Department. The system is, I think, a good one, and is working well. Once or twice a year Mr. Egan makes a tour of the country and consults with the correspondents. The correspondents work at a smaller salary, not devoting all their time to the work, but, by means of a judicious selection of men at each point, an official is generally obtained who is capable of doing the work, first because he has a tendency and a liking for the work; secondly, because it is a somewhat honorary position, and thirdly because he is doing a good service for both countries. The enlargement of trade with South Africa during the last year, so far as our exports are concerned, has been very satisfactory.

Mr. OLIVER: What will be the total cost of the chemistry office in Winnipeg?

Mr. FOSTER: The fittings of the laboratory office will not be expensive or palatial. We have a couple of rooms which have to be fitted up with special plumbing and the necessary laboratory material. There will be the cost of installation and the rental, services of a clerk and stenographer—one official will be necessary to do this work—and other expenses will run up to somewhere about $6,000 or $7,000 a year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are the trade representatives doing any practical work in the way of putting the people in touch with business men in this country? I understand that the commercial agents of the United States in foreign countries very often succeed in bringing orders to the business men of the United States by letting them know what is required in the places where they happen to be. For example, if a railroad were being built in Australia, would your commercial agent, if he discovered that 2,000 tons of steel rails were required in the construction of that railway, endeavour to put the contractors in touch with the steel people of Canada? Do they do practical work of that kind, or do they simply collect information and submit it to the department in the form of a bulletin?

Mr. FOSTER: They are supposed so to keep their eyes open that not a single transaction of that kind will escape their notice. Their duties do not consist of merely sitting in their offices and gathering statistical information. The official statistical information is good, but it is the smallest part of the information that a trade commissioner ought to be able to furnish the department. We have trade commissioners and trade commissioners; of course you have to have a man who is wide-awake, and who likes to work rather than sit in his office. I could name a good many of these commissioners who are doing invaluable work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Referring to the example I cited to the hon. minister, how would the necessary information reach the manufacturer of steel rails in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: In the first place, the trade commissioner keeps himself alive to what is going on, say in New Zealand. He sees the New Zealand papers; he has access to Government and official information, and if he is alive to his work he knows in a general way, what is going on in every department of the Government. He knows also what is going on so far as general expansion, improvement and development of the country is concerned; he knows what is going on in the way of railway and power development. When machinery, for instance, is required, he presents to those concerned the possibilities of satisfying their wants in this or any other respect in Canada. He puts them in direct connection with the department here, and so with the manufacturers or producers of the articles which they may require. That is the general modus operandi.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the information which the hon. minister was good enough to give the committee with regard to the new grain department at Winnipeg, may I ask him if it is open to the general public to avail themselves of the services of these experts, or will these gentlemen perform only such services as they are directed by the department to perform? Would they make tests at the request of the grain growers, for instance, the same as would be done at the experimental farm?

Mr. FOSTER: Their main object will be to take up, analyse and experiment upon grain, and the result arrived at will be published and become the property of everybody. In so far as that is concerned, they are doing a general service, and the results will be for general use. For instance, suppose some new kind of grain, thought to be of good quality, has been raised in some part of the West, it would be the duty of that department to look into that, to analyse it, find out its qualities and in that way they would be able to advertise to the producing public the different kinds of grain of largest value and therefore the best to be raised by the producer in order to get better value and better results. We have to take care to guard against making it a dribbling office which will fritter away its time on requests, here, there and everywhere. It must keep in view the main object. If any result should come from it it must be a practical result in the end because that is the whole design of the formation of the commission.

Mr. NESBITT: If an individual farmer had a new kind of grain he would be allowed to send it to this commission to be analysed and then the result would be made public.

[Mr. G. E. Foster.]

Mr. FOSTER: That is one of the ideas.

Mr. PARDEE: Is it the practice to bring the agents once a year from their stations to this country and then have them get in actual touch with the manufacturers to explain personally just what can be done in trade with the various places at which they are stationed?

Mr. FOSTER: That is the idea. There has been no fixed rule but my view is that every year, as nearly as possible, the agents should renew their youth and help us here by coming to Canada. Mr. Poussette has come back after that long trip and he finds openings, for instance, for large lumber trade in some parts of South America. He has been in communication with the lumbermen in Canada and letters at long range have passed. He went through the country as far as British Columbia and got in contact with the lumbermen who can especially provide that side of the South American continent with lumber. His expedition has been very successful. Not only have the lumbermen at first hand got information from a man who has been there but they have rather got the spirit of the thing as well by actual conversation with him. He has had letters from every part of the Dominion of Canada during the course of his incumbency of office. He goes to these people, sees them and talks over the matter with them. Then he places himself at the disposal of the board of trade and merchants and producers of the different places he visits and he has conferences with them.

Mr. PARDEE: It seems to me that that is the most feasible and important thing the agents can do, to show what trade can be done between this and other countries by getting in actual personal contact with the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the increase in the Census Branch, what is the particular occasion for the extension next year?

5 p.m.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend will recollect that we appointed a departmental commission on statistics and that commission reported last year. Gradually we are strengthening in my department the statistical side. Since I took office I have gone along very slowly, I have made no additions to the working staff particularly, and I find it is necessary, in order to carry out the work of the department, that we should have more of what might be called secondary help, and we must have the money to pay them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the hon. gentleman endeavouring to secure statistical data respecting interprovincial trade? I remember that when in opposition he always urged the necessity of this and quite properly so.

Mr. FOSTER: I have given this matter a great deal of consideration. As a principle it is a very fine idea, if we could only know just exactly the currents of trade between the different sections of our own country in different products according to sectional and seasonal differences it would give us a great insight into the trade and producing activities of our country. When you come to work out a plan by which that information can be secured you encounter difficulties on every side.

Mr. MACLEAN: Did the minister ever try to make any arrangement with the provincial governments to secure this?

Mr. FOSTER: When the report was published I sent it to all the provincial governments and also a letter calling attention to the overlapping of statistics between the Dominion and the provinces and asking their attention and that of their statistical officers to the matter to see whether we could not amongst us devise a system which would co-relate the work better, provide against overlapping and produce accuracy. All of the provincial governments took the matter up in a friendly and kindly spirit and after that I had the Commissioner of Commerce visit all the provincial capitals and get into personal communication with the statistical officers. That has been done, and while nothing has yet eventuated in a plan, yet we have made substantial progress in the general improvement of our statistics in these two ways, by a co-relation of effort, preventing overlapping and in consequence securing greater accuracy. If we could only get fresher statistics of production in this country it would be of great benefit and I hope there is a way by which we can do this.

Mr. McCRANEY: How long is it since the statistical work was taken over by the Department of Trade and Commerce from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. FOSTER: About a year.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It seems to me to be a time when the hands of the minister should be held up in connection with the trade agencies in these various countries. I have not heard him say whether it is the policy of the department to extend this system to other countries not yet covered. In Brantford we have several firms doing business with twelve or fifteen foreign countries at the present time. In some of these countries we have no trade agents. I think there is not one in Russia.

Mr. FOSTER: No.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: A very large trade is being done from Brantford with Russia. A large trade is being done with some South American republics and with South Africa. I think we have an agent appointed there. I have been a frequenter of some of the offices, having visited Australia not long ago. I then had an opportunity of seeing what is going on there and I must say that the agent in charge, Mr. Ross, was doing very fine work. They have a good office but not too good and I think this House might well be liberal with any appointments the minister might ask with a view to increasing our trade with foreign countries. At the present time, trade is sought very keenly by all the great countries in the world. Canada is comparatively small but has great possibilities, and I think the Minister is doing excellent work and should be encouraged to establish trade agencies in countries where there are none already. It will be easier to get a footing now in those countries than later on, and I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister that if we can establish in the coming year say two or three agencies in the different countries with which we have a large trade, we should do a still larger business with them if our case was presented to the people of those countries. I am speaking of Canadian products, generally, not manufactured articles only. I think it would be of great advantage to open up trade with some of these countries in such goods as we have a surplus of. I wish to speak a word of encouragement to the Minister in this respect. I think he is making his department a real live business affair which is appreciated by business men all over the country. I think an agency should be established at London. An agency there would be an advertisement to the whole world, because people who never come to Canada do visit London, and they could see our products there. With this and a real live trade Commissioner in the heart of the empire, I believe the overseas trade of the Dominions could be vastly increased in the next few years. It is a trade that is well worth looking after, and now that Canada is beginning to do business in foreign countries I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should be liberally dealt with in anything he may ask for, either with regard to agencies already established, or proposed agencies. With regard to the dissemination of information I, myself, receive the bulletins regularly. I do not know whether they reach the hands of some people who want them, but I think that any firm sending a request to Ottawa for these bulletins should be obliged in that respect. I do not think it would be wise that the Minister should become, or that his agent should become, the agent of any individual firm, that would lead to confusion. The aim should be to bring together those who have goods for sale and those who want to buy. As has been mentioned by one gentleman opposite, the United States make a very great effort in the direction of having their agents act for one particular firm. They have very live consular agents, who act as trade agents as well, and the spread of United States trade over the world has been largely brought about by the men they have sent out, and who are always ready to draw attention to the trade that may be developed in foreign countries. I think we can take a leaf out of their book, although I am not favourable to copying the United States in a great many things. I just rose to say these few words in appreciation. The strengthening and information we get through these trade agencies is very helpful to the spread of trade, at least so far as our district is concerned.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know that anybody on this side of the House has been criticising the Minister. We were asking for information.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I did not speak in that sense at all.

Mr. NESBITT: We were asking for information, and I suppose we have a right to that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: So far as I was concerned I had no fault to find with anything that has been asked for or said.

Mr. OLIVER: It is so seldom the opportunity occurs on which I can agree with my hon. friend, that I take this opportunity of agreeing with him as to the entire desirability of pushing Canadian trade in all her products, whether of the field, the forest, the mine or the factory; and so far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is minded to direct the efforts of the Government to that end, I am sure he has had evidence here to-day, that although it is our business on this side to criticise, we are also willing to commend where commendation is possible.

Mr. FOSTER: If I am not boring the Committee, I would like to say one or two things. In the first place, with reference to commercial agents and trade commissioners working for special firms, they do not do that at all. They cannot be allowed to do it. Trade commissioners are not supposed, and ought never to be supposed, to be the agents of any particular or special firms. I want to mention another thing, especially to my hon. friend here and such men as he, that no matter how much trade agencies and commissionerships may be perfected, there is nothing in the wide world will do what a manufacturer or producer fails to do for himself outside of all this which is merely helpful. The man who wants to push his trade in a foreign country has to go there himself or send his representative to put his wares before the faces of the people, and talk with them. One of the faults that we have to overcome in our country to-day is this; we do not find our commercial and manufacturing concerns and our producing concerns, in comparison with some other very live countries, pushing their trade in the world. We have not the capable, persistent, uniform representation of goods that we ought to have. Our commissioners, who work some of them very hard and after a length of time get into communication with a man who wants something in another country and the man who can provide it here, and perhaps actually get the orders find that the man here when he receives the order is lax about even answering the correspondence; or having accepted the order he delays in filling it. Or, still further, having accepted an order, after a length of time he writes to his correspondent that he is too full of business here and that he cannot fill the order.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. minister does not find that generally?

Mr. FOSTER: More generally than I would like to find it. And it does two things: it takes the vim out of the commissioner himself, who has spent a great deal of valuable time in order to make the connection, and it leads the prospective customer to say: 'Well, I cannot do business with that man; I have given him an order, and now he writes me that he is too full of business, and cannot fill it?' I wanted to speak about that, not in the way of fault-finding, but as something we should make progress in. Another point I might mention is this: My friend here spoke about trade commissioners in foreign countries with which we do more or less business. We have always had a friendly feeling towards Canada and Canadian trade amongst the commercial intelligence officers of Great Britain in their different consulates in different parts of the world. Most of them have been favourably disposed towards Canada and willing to answer questions and to assist us in our trade. But it never was on a basis before where each consulate felt that they were carrying out what the foreign and colonial offices wanted them to carry out in that respect. An arrangement was made, without any great difficulty and very satisfactorily, with the Colonial Office and Foreign Office by which instructions have been given to the British consuls in foreign countries that they are to adopt a certain course in any case where the Canadian department feels that there is some possibility of developing trade for Canada. Instructions have been issued by the Foreign Office to British consuls in these countries, and they may include any country where an application is made by Canada to have such done, that they are to do certain things; in the first place, to forward copies of their general reports to the Department of Trade and Commerce here; secondly, to answer any inquiries from Canadian merchants or traders that are made to them in reference to the possibilities of trade or any question that might come up between a person here and a possible trade opportunity in another country. Under these instructions they will feel that they have a warrant for doing what they did in many cases before of their own good will and of their own good will only. We have made further arrangement and it is this: Go into a country like Russia, which is surrounded by some difficulties in pushing trade from another country, official or otherwise, or go to China and you have established there old and experienced British consulates with intelligent and experienced commercial men attached to them. I am thinking of one now in the far East where I met some of the brightest commercial men whom I have ever met, who have had from fifteen to twenty years of experience in these countries, who know all the ins and outs and customs of the trade, and particularly the things that have to be done in order to get trade and how to approach people. They have had all that experience.

We have made arrangement whereby it is possible that a room shall be provided under the roof of the consulate in which the Canadian commissioner may be placed, for which room, the Canadian Government although the British Foreign Office did not wish it at all, will pay the expenses and charges. I thought it better to do that in order that we should be perfectly independent in that respect than to ask the British consulate to take upon themselves the expense of the rental. Our own trade commissioner will be absolutely under the control of the department. He will take his instructions from here and do his work under these instructions, but at the same time he will have as ready friends and helpers men of wide and large experience right at his elbow from whom he can ask advice and counsel and from whom he can get what is so invaluable—knowledge which has been gained by many years of experience. In some cases I am arranging to place men under these conditions and the British Foreign Office have gone so far as to say that they are willing to open up the consular service to young men from Canada just the same as to young men from the British Islands. In this way we get two things; we get first the value of the co-operation, experience and advice of experienced men and in the other case we are able to look forward to the time not far distant when the Canadian trade commissioner system shall be somewhat of a career which shall approve itself to men and which shall induce young men to fit themselves by a proper course of study to undertake this work. If they do that they have not only this position in the Canadian trade commissionership system to look forward to but, if they wish it, they have also a chance for entrance into the wider British commercial system as well. I talked that matter over in China and Japan with the British Ambassadors and both of them are absolutely enthusiastic in joining in an endeavour of that kind. They say that a capable representative of Canada at their side is of as much use to them in one way as would be a member of their own consulate because he is able to give them just the information that they require in reference to a country with which in China, Japan and other countries the British Consul has a great deal to do in other matters.

Allusion was made to the consular system of the United States. It is not so many years ago, that, I think I may say without saying anything that is not right, the trade consular system of the United States was not a thing that United States people were proud of. From every quarter there were comments and criticisms and very sharp ones of that service. At that time it was absolutely a matter of patronage. To-day the United States consular system is placed on a stated civil service basis. Men must be approved before they enter it and then when they go into service it has its status, its permanency and also its wider horizon. To-day the United States consular service is a service that the people of the United States may very well be proud of.

Mr. PARDEE: Is the trade service of Canada on a permanent civil service basis?

Mr. FOSTER: It is not on a civil service basis theoretically but I intend before long to ask the House to put it upon a permanent basis. My views, when I came into office, of the possibilities and mechanism of that work were somewhat different from what they are now. The two years in which I have had experience of it has been a period in which I have been trying to find out what is the best system.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the young men that the minister speaks of be required to speak and understand the language of these foreign countries before they receive their appointments?

Mr. FOSTER: That depends. Of course in reference to British countries they have the language already.

Mr. DEVLIN: But in foreign countries?

Mr. FOSTER: In reference to foreign countries, I should like to have, for instance in Japan, a man sufficiently young and sufficiently well trained as a basis and with sufficient vim in him to say to himself. I will acquire the Japanese language before I am long in this country and I will learn to speak the language that the people speak, try to think what the people think and try to enter into the true spirit and genius of the people. You have to carry that out as best you can; in some cases it can be done and in others it cannot. There is where we get the benefit of having a commissioner in the office of the British consulate where there are men who understand Japanese, and Chinese, and Russian, and our man gets the benefit of that to some extent.

[Mr. G. E. Foster.]

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to put my opinion against that of the minister, on the matter of doing work jointly with the British consular service, but I venture the opinion that it is possibly not the best way to advance the trade interests of Canada. Is the increase of help required in any particular branch of the statistical work or is it due generally to the expansion of trade?

Mr. FOSTER: It is due to the expansion of the work generally.

Civil Government—Department of Marine and Fisheries, $309,650.

Mr. HAZEN: In the second division, subdivision A, there is a decrease caused by dropping two clerkships in the naval architect's office.

Mr. DEVLIN: What does the naval architect do?

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Duguid is the naval architect, and he was employed on the recommendation of Lord Strathcona, before the present Government came into power. The department at that date wrote to Lord Strathcona asking him to recommend a suitable officer, and he recommended Mr. Duguid. The naval architect designs all the ships that are required for the service of the different departments of the Government. The designs and plans and specifications of these vessels are prepared by Mr. Duguid and the officers of his department.

The vote for contingencies is increased by $20,000, due to the fact that the travelling expenses of officers at Ottawa were formerly charged to the different votes, and it is now proposed to charge all the travelling expenses to civil government contingencies. The increase is merely a matter of book-keeping. Formerly, for example, if the engineer of lights travelled, his travelling expenses were charged to the general vote for aids to navigation, but these expenses will now be charged to the item of contingencies.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is the general vote reduced correspondingly?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think the vote for aids to navigation has been reduced. Parliament makes generous appropriations for that work, and there is generally a surplus at the end of the year. Of course, this whole $20,000 would not be charged to aids to navigation but would be spread over the different appropriations, and we thought it hardly worth while to reduce the votes by the amount that would be chargeable to each on this account.

Mr. DEVLIN: None of these appropriations have to do with the naval service?

Mr. HAZEN: No, these are all Marine and Fisheries estimates..

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there provision made for the appointment of a law clerk in the Marine and Fisheries Department?

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Bourgault has been the law clerk for a number of years past.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there more than one law clerk.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to fill the position made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Martel?

Mr. HAZEN: That is a different position. Mr. Martel was appointed, I think, about four years ago, at $1,600, and has had his annual increases since, to $1,750 or $1,800. He is retiring from the department to engage in the practice of his profession, and it is necessary to appoint a gentleman to take his place, and that appointment will be made at a similar salary.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Were any increases made in the case of Mr. Martel since the change of Government ?

Hr. HAZEN: He got his statutory increases.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What was his salary on leaving ?

Mr. HAZEN: It was $1,750 or $1,800.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is to be given his successor ?

Mr. HAZEN: The same salary—$1,800.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then his successor goes in at the same salary as that which Mr. Martel was receiving on retiring.

Mr. HAZEN: It is thought that a man should be engaged who has a knowledge of law. Mr. Martel when appointed was a very young man—I think he is only twenty-six years of age now. I doubt if we could find as young a man to take the position. Then there is the fact that during the last few years there has been somewhat of an increase in the expenses here, because of the cost of living and so on. So, it is not unfair to appoint him at $1,800 a year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Were other increases made in the branch of which he was a member ?

Mr. HAZEN: None but the statutory increases.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have been informed, I do not know whether correctly or not, that the Department of Marine and Fisheries in making appointments of technical officers has not observed the Civil Service Act with regard to the qualifications required. Possibly I am not well enough informed to put the question now in a form which will entitle me to an answer from the minister.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know to what my hon. friend refers. So far as I know there has been nothing of that kind.

Mr. MACLEAN: I will have to instruct myself more fully and ask the question later.

Mr. HAZEN: When technical officers are required, we apply to the Civil Service Commission under the Act. They advertise and get applications from gentlemen who state their qualifications. As a rule, they submit to us the number whom they think qualified for the position, those to whom they are ready to grant a certificate of qualification, and from that number we make our appointments. That is the way it has been done ever since I took charge of the department.

I wonder if I may be permitted, as the Marine Estimates are still under consideration, to refer to a statement made by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) this afternoon. I was not in the House at the time, and I have obtained a copy of the report. The hon. gentleman read an extract from the paper to which he said he wished to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which was to the effect that the steamer Alert had been pressed into the service ' to convey Tory organizer Hayes and Tory candidate McLeod from North Sydney to the northern part of Victoria county,' and further that, ' the primary object in establishing this branch of the preventive service was to put a stop to the traffic of contraband liquor into Cape Breton seaports. . . . . Notwithstanding this, some of the barrels placed on board the Government boat on its northward journey looked uncommonly like vessels containing ordinary booze.' I do not know why the hon. gentleman called my attention to this matter, as the Alert is is no way controlled by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. CARROLL: What did the department pay for the Alert?

Mr. HAZEN: We did not pay anything.

Mr. CARROLL: Who did pay?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know. The article refers to the 'preventive service.' If the steamer is under the Government control at all, I should infer that it is under the Department of Customs.

Mr. CARROLL: That makes it no better.

Mr. HAZEN: No, but surely the hon. gentleman does not accept every newspaper paragraph as being true.

Mr. CARROLL: I think the hon. Minister will do me the credit of believing that I was asking for information. As this statement has been made broadcast in the press of the Maritime provinces, it should be investigated. If I made a mistake in calling it to the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is only because I thought all these boats were under his jurisdiction. Perhaps the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) will explain the matter?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the Minister of Customs promise to look into this matter tomorrow?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): I had not heard of it before, and I think the article—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may be a case of smuggling liquor from St. Pierre Miquelon into Cape Breton. That has been done before. I think the hon. Minister should inquire into it. Will he let us know the result of his inquiry on Monday?

Mr. REID: I will. I do not know whether this steamer belongs to the Customs Department or not. But I will make inquiry and shall be glad to give the hon. member a reply on Monday.

Mr. CARROLL: I desire to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if the Gladiator is under his Department?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not recollect that name as that of one of our vessels.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like the Minister of Customs to know exactly the information we desire with regard to the Alert. We would like to know if the Alert is at present in the employ of any department of the Government. If so, did she sail from North Sydney towards the coast of North Cape Breton recently, and if so did she have Dr. Hayes, the organizer of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia aboard? And did she carry any freight on that occasion? These are the questions we would like answered.

Mr. REID: If the steamer is under the control of the Customs Department, I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman the information on Monday next.

Mr. EMMERSON: I think we should know also whether the Tory candidate was on board or not.

Civil Government—Department of Naval Service—Salaries, $107,300; contingencies, $37,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Last year this salary vote was $100,500. The increase is chiefly made up of statutory increases. The contingencies also show an increase in this branch, just as in the Marine and Fisheries, and for the same reason, that is that all travelling expenses are charged under the head of contingencies. Now they are divided between what is the Navy, the Hydrographic Survey, the Fishery Protection Service, the Tidal Service and the Wireless Department, all of which come under the control of the Naval Department. It is proposed to have this vote under the head of Contingencies, so that it will be seen what the travelling expenses of the department as a whole are during the year.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is any of this money expended under the operation of the Naval Service Act of 1910?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, I fancy the bulk of it is expended under that Act. Provision is made for the appointment of an inspector in the radio-telegraphic branch, to meet the increasing work in that office. Hon. gentlemen know that during the last year a number of wireless stations were erected, and it has been found necessary to appoint an additional inspector in order that the work may be carried out with efficiency; the appointment being under subdivision A of the second division, at a minimum salary of $1,600. The other changes shown are to provide for the promotion of certain members of the staff and for statutory increases in salary. I have explained the increase in connection with contingencies; it is merely an apparent increase, as the charges for travelling will be no more than they were last year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The vote asked for by the minister under the heading of the Naval Service is one, I think, in respect of which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House may very well request more detailed information, and if very good reasons are not given we should refuse our assent to the voting of these moneys. There is no attempt on the part of the Government of the day to administer the Naval Service Act; on the contrary, so far as we can gather, it is their public policy to allow it to remain in abeyance. There is not a ship of the Canadian navy now in service. The Rainbow, which was stationed on the Pacific coast, has, I think, been sold.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. MACLEAN: At least, the Rainbow is not in active service. The Niobe has during the whole summer been tied to a wharf in Halifax harbour—a condition of affairs most humiliating, I am sure, to every respectable Canadian. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government were a party to forcing men to leave the ship Niobe, and I am sure I am correct in saying that they have never yet made an effort to complete the enlistment of that ship. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government refuses to administer the Canadian Naval Service Act and does everything it can to discourage the enlistment of men under that Act, we find that the cost of administering the naval service increases. There should be some greater justification for the request which the minister makes to Parliament for the passing of the items now before the committee. Personally I do not think that this House should give its assent to the passing of these items, which are particularly referable to the Canadian Naval Service Act. The officials of the Canadian Naval Service, for whose salaries the minister now asks the voting of money, cannot be rendering any service to Canada. It may be necessary to have in the Civil Service men to administer the fisheries protection service, the wireless telegraphy service, and the like, but I submit that there is no justification whatever for the minister's asking Parliament to vote money for the administration of a service which the Government have been taking great pains to inform the Canadian people that they do not intend to maintain, for the present at least. I was told by the minister last year that the department was not encouraging the departure of men from the ship Niobe, and that the Government were not averse to securing, if possible, further enlistments to fill the vacancies that were occurring from time to time. I was also specifically told last year, in answer to a question I put to the minister, that a programme of service was contemplated for the Niobe during the summer in the way of cruises, manoeuvres, and the like, but judging by the actions of the department since then I am bound to say that I question the bona fides of the minister and his department in the answer that they gave to me last session in reference to this matter. I think that Parliament is entitled to a reason from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Government before a single dollar of money is granted for the Naval Service as now requested. The minister must clearly see that to ask for a vote of practically $100,000 when there is no service to administer, is simply fooling and trifling with the Canadian public and wasting the money of the people.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is, by his remarks, unintentionally giving the House a wrong impression of this matter. The hon. gentleman speaks as if he were under the impression that the money we are asking for the Naval Department of the Civil Government is all for the purpose of carrying out what may be called the work in connection with the navy.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The larger part of it, you said a moment ago.

Mr. HAZEN: I said the smaller portion of it. The Naval Department, as I have pointed out, administers the fisheries protection service, the hydrographic survey, the wireless service, the tidal service, and certain other branches of the public service. Of these Estimates, $31,060 is for the naval portion of the service, and $76,490 is for the other branches.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where do you put the deputy minister?

Mr. HAZEN: One-half of the deputy minister's salary is charged up to the naval branch and one-half to the others; this, I think, is as fair a division as may be made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the cost of the marine and fisheries branch of the service decreased in the last year, or is it just as it was when the department administered the fisheries protection service and the other branches which have been mentioned?

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot answer my hon. friend, because in order to do so I would have to go back to a time before I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The classification of the branches of the service took place before the present Government came into power, and I am not familiar with the figures. The Estimates for 1911 were made by friends of the hon. gentleman; since 1911 there has been very little increase in the cost of the service, and any increases have been due to the provision for statutory increases and the appointment of new officials.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend knows that when the late Government determined to have a Naval Service Act and a naval service, a naval department was established, and to this was attached certain of the branches of the service which were formerly attached to the Marine and Fisheries Department. We created, amongst other offices, a Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs, and, of course, in connection with this office there were secretaries and so on. If it be the intention of my hon. friend to vote for the Bill which is now before the House to repeal the Naval Service Act, what is the use of these estimates? The matter has only to be referred back to where it was. The hydrographic survey, the wireless service, and other branches referred to, have only to be restored to their original positions. But my hon. friend will apparently do neither the one nor the other. He will not carry on the Naval Act. As I understand it, he has discouraged the training of officers for the naval service and the enlistment of men. I do not know if he has maintained the Naval College, I think he has. So far so good, that is under the Naval Act. Has he sold the Rainbow or the Niobe?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He has kept them without doing anything at all. They are there but have no men on them. He has made no effort to recruit men; I do not think he has even made an effort to punish men who desert the service. I do not think there has been a single prosecution for desertion; I think he has rather encouraged desertion.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He has not made any very strong effort to prevent it. Has he ever prosecuted a man for desertion? I know that in our little army and in the Mounted Police if a man deserts his engagement he is prosecuted as a warning to the others, but my hon. friend has closed his eyes, has done nothing; but he still maintains the service. What answer has he therefore to the criticisms of my friends behind me? Why does he ask this appropriation if he does not want to have a naval service? If you do not want to have a naval service, just go back to the condition we were in in 1911. Then the Hydrographic Survey, the Fisheries Protection Service, the Wireless Telegraph Service, the Tidal Survey, the Patrol of Northern Waters in Canada were under the Department of Marine and Fisheries. All these matters have been transferred to the Naval Service, and I think very properly transferred; but my hon. friend takes the consequences, he repudiates the principle. I do not know that he can justify himself or has answered successfully the criticisms of my friends behind me.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply.

Civil Government—Department of Naval Service, $107,300.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is it the intention of the department to order the Canadian cadets, now on board the Berwick stationed at Bermuda, back to the Naval College at Halifax for a new course of one year? They are under examination at the present time. I am told that when their examinations are over they will be sent back for a new course at the Naval College at Halifax for one year. Is that the intention of the department?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, the candidates who are now on the Berwick passing their examination will be sent back to the Naval College at Halifax for a one year's supplementary course.

Mr. PROULX: Assuming that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lesperance) passes, what will become of the Naval College?

Mr. HAZEN: I have been taught that it is time enough to bid the devil good morning when you meet him. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might ask that question when the Bill passes.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a somewhat serious question. A certain number of young men of Canada have been induced, we might almost say, to enter upon a presumably naval career, and they did that in the first place believing that the Government intended to carry out a certain policy that had been laid down. These young men have sacrificed their time, they have sacrificed the prospects of their life in many cases, and I think it is reasonable to ask what is the prospect for them now? It is really a very serious matter to the young men themselves and to their families, if they are not to have the advantage of a career after they have trained for it.

Mr. HAZEN: I may say that an arrangement has been made under which those who have attained the rank of sub-lieutenant are serving now upon the British ships. The Naval College at Halifax is being continued, the course there is being carried on, and as the young men graduate from there we hope that there will be an arrangement made by which we shall be able to place them in the Hydrographic Survey. One or two have been placed at their own request on the Hydrographic Survey, where practically we require men who have a knowledge of seamanship, which is very essential for hydrographic survey work. We propose to look after these young men and to see that no injustice is done to them.

Mr. OLIVER: Everybody will be glad to know that the Government is going to make arrangements that will be measurably satisfactory to these young men, but if the Government is going to maintain the Naval College at Halifax, it will mean the continuance of existing conditions. Is it intended to maintain that college with a view of furnishing a supply of Canadian officers to the British navy?

Mr. HAZEN: That matter is being taken up at the present time, but it is hoped that the Naval College will serve not only as a training college for men who want to follow the naval career, but also as a training school for men who want to follow other callings, such as the work in connection with the Hydrographic Survey and other work of that sort, just as the Military College at Kingston turns out men who follow other than military careers. Only a comparatively few of the graduates of the Military College embark on a military career, but the training that they get there fits them for other walks in life. Many become engineers and engage in other professions, and it is expected that the Naval College at Halifax will serve that purpose as well, so that the men will not only become naval officers and pursue a naval career but will be able to follow other lines of work with the education that they get there.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not think there will be a disposition to urge the Government too strongly upon this question. It will take a little time to wean them from the contribution policy in order that they may devote themselves to the development of Canada. They have been running in company with Mr. Churchill, and he is a pretty active man in getting around from one place to another. I see that the Canadian Naval Annual for this year says in so many words that the German scare was a thing that the people had to be weaned from, that it was all nonsense. It is the organ of the people who were making a great deal of the German scare just twelve months ago. Personally I feel that we should be sympathetic to the Government in this matter. It will take a little time for them to wean themselves from the false line of policy they embarked in, but I hope they will become good Canadians and follow the example of New Zealand and Australia, without feeling they are very disloyal in being in such excellent company. I am perfectly sure they will come around to the idea of Canada being a good country within the empire, like the others. This hydrographic survey will no doubt work out very nicely; the country does not want the Government to go too fast with it, and if the hydrographic survey means an easy transition from the contribution policy, to the old policy they never should have abandoned, we should be patient with them. I would appeal to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) to take my point of view and allow the minister to get these Estimates, on this kind of provisional understanding.

Mr. HAZEN: I am glad that what the Government is doing in this direction has such a valiant defender in the person of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark).

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. GAUVREAU: I am not an expert in this matter, but I am quite interested in it because my son has the honour to be in the navy, studying the best way to defend his country and the empire if need be. Am I to understand that he will have to go back to the naval college? The expense to me has been quite heavy for the past two years, and I would like to know from the minister if I shall have to pay my son's expenses for another year.

Mr. HAZEN: On the contrary, I do not think the son of my hon. friend will have any expense at all. If he becomes an officer he will receive a salary.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is satisfactory.

Mr. SINCLAIR: To-night, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) referred to the fact that the Niobe had been tied up to a wharf at Halifax during the whole season, and for aught we know the Rainbow may have been similarly tied up to some wharf on the Pacific coast. I would like to know how many men are on the Niobe and Rainbow and what these ships are really supposed to be doing? It would seem, from what the minister has said to-night that the Government does not intend to go any further with the Canadian Naval Service, for he told us that the cadets were to find places in the British navy when their period of study was over. If the Government has abandoned the idea of a Canadian navy, it is difficult for me to understand why we should vote this money at all. What necessity is there for keeping up a staff of officers and voting $30,000 or $40,000 to pay their salaries, if these officers are to have nothing to do? The minister should give us some information as to that.

Mr. HAZEN: More than two-thirds of this vote is for fishery protection, hydrographic survey, and other services which come under the Naval Department. We have to take care of the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt, under the arrangement entered into with the British Government when these dockyards were handed over to Canada. There is a staff in each of these dockyards, and the vessels of the fishery protection fleet and other Government vessels are repaired there. Then we are continuing the Naval Service at Halifax, and that involves certain clerical aid at headquarters and elsewhere, and there is certain work to do in connection with the Niobe and Rainbow. There are about 150 men on the Niobe and a lesser number on the Rainbow, and they having been engaged for a certain number of years we have to keep faith with them. In reply to the contention that there is no need for a naval service department under certain conditions, I may say that if the Naval Service were abolished altogether there would be no saving as far as Civil Government Estimates are concerned, because there are not now enough employees in the Marine and Fisheries Department to take over the work in connection with the naval college, the dockyards, the hydrographic survey, fisheries protection and other similar services. The only thing that possibly might be saved would be the salary of a deputy minister, but I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that the Marine and Fisheries Department deals with a greater variety of subjects than perhaps any other department of Government. While there are other departments of Government that are responsible for the expenditure of a larger sum of money during the year, still the Department of Marine, including the Naval Service, has a greater variety of subjects to deal with than any other. It is very doubtful if, in view of the large increase in work in that department of late years, it would be possible to get along as one department, and my experience is that it would be necessary under any circumstances to have a division of the department with two deputy heads. Years ago when the work of the department was very much less than it is to-day, there was a deputy minister of marine and a deputy minister of fisheries. That system was abolished, but since then there have been added to the department a great many services that were unthought of years ago. Even if the Naval Service Department were abolished, it is doubtful if all the work of the department could be carried on with one deputy head.

Mr. OLIVER: While the explanation of the minister is very full and lucid, he will, I think, admit that from the viewpoint of the Opposition a naval service department without a navy is fairly and reasonably a subject of question. The hon. gentleman drew a parallel between the conditions of naval education and the conditions of military education, both of which are given by the Government. There is a vast difference. In the case of military education we have a permanent military force, and besides we have a very large volunteer force.

Mr. HAZEN: I think comparatively few of our graduates at Kingston go into the permanent service.

Mr. OLIVER: Possibly. But at least we have the field for their abilities when they have secured the education they seek. But much the larger field, no doubt, is in connection with the volunteer force. There is a vast field of usefulness for the young men who have gone through the Kingston Military College in the line of life for which that education specially fits them. They know, before they enter the college, what the conditions are in regard to employment in that line of life for which they are educating themselves. But in the case of the naval cadets they entered upon their course of instruction in the full belief that there was for them a Canadian Naval career; now, as my hon. friend has explained, we have everything in connection with the service except a navy, and the young men who have been prepared to sarcifice their time and talents in the interests of the Naval Service are left in a position that is unfortunate for them and not creditable to the Government. I think that we are fairly entitled to know what is the Government's intention in regard to the two vessels they have on their hands. Are they going to keep them in commission, or are they going to put them out of commission? Are these vessels to be tied up to the wharf, one in Halifax and the other in Esquimalt, with a partial complement of men, and neither fit for one thing nor fit for another? If that is the intention of the Government I think we are entitled to know it, and to know it now on this vote. We are voting $30,000 for the Civil Government expenses of the Canadian Navy. Now, if there is not going to be a navy, their ought not to be this vote. My hon. friend has explained, as he best of all men can explain, that we will need the money anyway, and that we have work to be done in other lines. That does not answer the question. We have this Naval Service, we have these two vessels; they are either fit for service or not fit for service. Is the Government keeping them fit for service, does it intend to keep them fit for service, does it intend to carry out the policy that was the reason for the establishment of the Naval College and for the purchase of these two vessels, namely, to carry out the policy of fitting young Canadians to take positions of responsibility in a navy owned, controlled and manned by Canada? I think that on this vote we are entitled to get a definite statement from the minister as to the intentions of the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: The Niobe and the Rainbow have both been kept in a good state of repair, they have not been allowed to deteriorate; they are in quite as good a condition, if not better, than they were at the time they were acquired by the Government of Canada. As to what disposition will be made of these vessels, that matter is under consideration at this time. It is doubtful whether the Rainbow could be disposed of at any price, if it were thought desirable to sell her, either to the British naval authorities or to any other such a body, for such a vessel would not be required in connection with a modern navy. It is doubtful also if anything could be obtained for the Niobe. It may be that the British Government would allow us to hand them back and take them off our hands, but whether we could sell them is a matter of some doubt, and it is receiving attention at the present time. The hon. gentleman asks me to state what the policy of the Government is to be in relation to naval affairs. He knows that the Prime Minister of Canada, who is the one, in circumstances of this sort, to enunciate the policy of the Government, has told this House on several occasions that before the country embarks upon a naval policy, that policy will be stated to the House and the people will be asked whether they approve or disapprove. In view of that statement made by the Prime Minister on several occasions, I think the hon. gentleman will admit that it is not altogether right or proper to suggest that I should state to-night what the naval policy of the Government is to be, and no one more than the hon. gentleman would recognize the impropriety of my making such a statement.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not see that there can be any question as to the propriety of the inquiry made by my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver). That hon. gentleman probably had in mind the answers given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a series of questions asked two years ago with respect to the appeal of the Naval Service Act. In those replies the minister stated that the Naval Service Act would be repealed. He further stated that after consulting the Admiralty this Government would announce its permanent naval policy and would appeal to the people upon it. Now, this Government did consult the Admiralty, but it did not announce its naval policy to the country, and it has taken no steps, so far, to consult the people about it. So, in view of the replies given to the questions by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think it was quite natural for my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) to ask these questions to-night. And the minister, if he were to look round him, would see that there is a great interest taken in this question by his friends and supporters from the province of Quebec. In fact the new member for Chateauguay (Mr. Morris) has moved several seats nearer to the minister to hear what is going on—no doubt with a view to enlightening the electors to whom he is alleged to have made some statements on this subject.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister has stated that there are over one hundred men on the Niobe in Halifax. These men, I suppose, are undergoing some kind of naval training. But what kind of naval training do these men get aboard a ship tied to a wharf? Would not an essential part of their naval training be the efficient management of the ship and other matters which could only be learned at sea? These men are kept there at considerable expense to the country, and I doubt very much their obtaining any training that will be of any advantage to the country, or possibly to themselves. If it is the intention of the Government to repeal the Naval Service Act, could not some arrangement be made with these men whereby they could go into other walks of life and obtain a training that would be of some use to them? It seems to me that the keeping of a large body of men under these circumstances, at very great expense to the country, is a useless waste. If these men must be kept there comparatively speaking in idleness, and it may be under conditions that may be disadvantageous, the whole thing appears to be a most peculiar arrangement.

Mr. HAZEN: The men who are now on these ships enlisted in Great Britain at the time the ships came out here. In war vessels of this nature there is a large amount of machinery of the most complicated character. Some of these men are ablebodied seamen, but a great many of them possess qualifications for taking care of that complicated machinery. These men were enlisted for a certain period of time which has not yet expired, and we are bound to retain them until that term expires. In any case it is necessary that they should be retained in the ship for the purpose of taking care of it, seeing that it does not deteriorate and that the machinery is kept in proper order. A large number of the men on the ships are doing that work at the present time.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What did it cost last year to maintain the Niobe and the Rainbow?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not that information at hand, because I did not anticipate questions of that nature coming up on the Civil Government Estimates.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I should like to reiterate the hope that the Government will not be rushed in this matter. We were somewhat put out to hear that the Rainbow is in such a very bad condition, because it is a serious thing to lose money on account of the armaments business. I read an assertion made by Sir Herbert Lyon in London the other day that the British Admiralty, without the consent of Parliament, had used a boat called the Empress of India, which could have been sold for £45,000, as a target. It occurs to me that that fact is worth bringing to the attention of this committee, and I would like to draw the minister's attention to it, by way of impressing upon him the view which I have already expressed: that the Government should go slowly in this matter, because I am perfectly certain that the majority of the people of this country, especially in these hard times, do not want to spend too much money on naval targets. It occurs to me that the fact is worth mentioning for a second reason. If the Rainbow is no good where she is, perhaps it would be possible to sell her back to the British Government to be used as a target. I should think that almost any ship is good enough to be blown to pieces, and being a man of an economic turn of mind, and anxious to do my duty by the people of this country, looking after their money as well as one member of Parliament can do, I suggest in all seriousness that the minister should ascertain what kind of targets they are using in the British navy, and whether he could not get something for the Rainbow on that ground.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman's suggestion will have every consideration, I can assure him.

Mr. CARROLL: I must confess that there are a few things about the Niobe and the Rainbow that I do not quite understand. The minister tells us that it would be quite impossible at the present time either to give away these ships or to get anything for them. That means that the ships are no good for anything, and if they are no good for anything, it is impossible for them to deteriorate. Why, therefore, should we spend our good money in keeping one hundred men on board the Niobe at Halifax if the ship is good for nothing, and if the Government find it impossible to obtain one cent for it? Why should we pay one hundred men, out of the revenues of this country, to keep this worthless piece of machinery from deteriorating? It does not sound to me like good business. I think that what the minister had in view in saying that we could not get rid of these ships was to show that the Laurier Administration had made a mistake, and had bought these ships when they were no good. They were certainly no good as instruments of war when they were taken over to this country. That was not the intention. The intention was that they should be used as training ships; that on these ships our young Canadians should learn something about the running of a cruiser, its machinery, and the processes of navigating it. I am in the very same position as the hon. member for Red Deer. If the ships are not worth a cent, why spend $20,000 to keep worthless articles from deteriorating? It is bad business.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I may justify the question I asked the minister by the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton. I did not intend to ask for a declaration of the Government's naval policy; I did intend to ask what the intentions of the Government were in regard to the Niobe and the Rainbow. As the hon. member for Cape Breton has said, these vessels were bought to be used for the education of the young men who wished to enter upon a naval career; to give them an opportunity of being instructed in practical seamanship and the practical working of a man-of-war. The minister has informed us to-night that the young men who have enlisted are to be given positions, some in the British navy, and some in the hydrographic survey, and the inference is that there is to be no naval career for Canadians. We are asked to vote money for clerical assistance to carry on the Naval Service, when we have no navy, and so far as we can judge, no intention on the part of the Government to have one. We have two vessels which are an enormous bill of expense to the country, serving no purpose, so far as I can see. If the Government were making a large expenditure of any other kind every year for absolutely no purpose, certainly their action would be called into question. I am sure my hon. friend the minister must be prepared to make a statement in the matter.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation) : Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the country should go on expending money on the navy, why the committee should pass this item.

I would have been pleased to hear from the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) and from the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) two former members of the Nationalist party; I would like to know their opinion on the question.

On this side of the House, we speak freely on the naval policy, but our hon. friends opposite, are dumb. The hon. minister of Marine and Fisheries is the only one who dares answer our questions.

What are the sentiments of Mr. Lespérance, concerning this vote?

Would you be surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear what the hon. member for Dorchester had to say during the last by-election, in Chateauguay, in October last? He was saying that the Niobe and the Rainbow were two old tubs, that they were good for nothing.

And now, the Government is asking the Committee to vote money for the maintenance of those old tubs. That is not fair.

The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lespérance) wants the repeal of the Naval service Act. I will support his Bill with both hands. What is the use of voting this money, just now? Let us wait till after the Bill asking the repeal of the naval service Act is passed, and then the Niobe and the Rainbow can be sent back to England and be disposed of as scrap iron.

For my part, I strongly and formally oppose this expenditure. If the boats are nothing but old tubs, let them go to pieces.

Mr. H. BOULAY: (Translation). Mr. Speaker, one might have supposed that the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune) had said enough when he spoke for four hours or five hours on that question, last year, to dispense with the remarks he has just made.

I am surprised at the stand he now takes after having voted in 1910 for the Naval Service Act, at the bidding of the Laurier government—a law authorizing the construction of a navy which comprised twelve or fifteen boats.

If it happened to be the intention of the present government to continue the policy introduced by the Administration of which my honorable friend was a supporter, he should exhibit to-day the same courage as in 1910, instead of going back on what he did and said at that time. The hon. member should at least wait till the Government dispose of these two boats which they have inherited from their predecessors.

Last summer I had the occasion to pay a visit to Halifax and to have a look at the now famous Niobe. The hon member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) wanted to know from the hon. minister of Marine and Fisheries why this boat has been kept in idleness, tied up to the wharf, in the port of Halifax. The Niobe has been kept in idleness for the simple reason that there was nothing for her to do, and that is the best proof that Canada does not want a single battleship, and much less a dozen of them.

If the naval policy of the Liberal Government had gone through, we would have, by now, twelve or fifteen boats tied up at wharfs and the situation would be much worst than it is.

All that goes to show that Canada has no use for a navy and that if we are bound to do something, the policy of the present Government, the policy of a substantial contribution, is the wisest of the two.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the Government say if the hon. gentleman has correctly expressed the policy of the Government, that they will do nothing?

9 p.m.

Mr. HAZEN: Will my hon. friend translate what was said?

Mr. OLIVER: The purport of it was that he approved of the policy of the Government in doing nothing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Nothing has been said in answer to the remarks of hon. gentlemen on this side as to the question of the repeal of the Naval Service Act. Two years ago a question was asked by the hon. member for Dorchester and after a long period of deliberation the Government replied that they would repeal the Naval Service Act. There is a Bill now before the House standing for its second reading to that effect and if the Government intends to adopt that Bill, introduced by one of its prominent supporters, it seems to me that we should not pass this item until we know whether they have made up their minds in regard to that matter. If this Bill should pass I think it will involve a reorganization of the whole question and will dispense with the employment of some of the officers for whom we are providing by this vote. The minister has not given any light on that question. I think we ought to have an answer as to whether the Government really intend to support the measure before the House or repeal the Naval Service Act.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think my hon. friend or any other hon. member would seriously suggest that the Government should say what its policy is going to be on a certain Bill introduced by a private member before the Bill comes up for consideration. I cannot believe that my hon. friend is serious in asking that question. When the Bill comes down for consideration at the proper time, the policy of the Government will undoubtedly be stated by the First Minister or some other minister on behalf of the Government. For me to state now what the policy of the Government would be would be not only improper but not a course that any hon. member would approve.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would not have ventured to ask this question had it not been that the policy of the Government was announced two years ago. I presume the Government are prepared to carry out the promise they then made to repeal the Naval Service Act. If the Government have changed their policy in that matter, of course I am out of order in asking the question. Is the policy of the Government the same to-day as when a reply was given in Parliament a couple of years ago that the Naval Service Act was to be repealed?

Mr. McCRANEY: The Government has stated that the men who are engaged on the Niobe and Rainbow have been engaged in the old country for a term of years. How much longer are they to remain in the employ of Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: The Deputy Minister tells me that these men were engaged for different periods, the longest period would be for five years beginning three years ago.

Mr. McCRANEY: If I understand the situation it is that the Niobe and the Rainbow are tied up at wharfs.

Mr. HAZEN: They are in the harbours.

Mr. McCRANEY: They are not cruising they are not being used for the purpose for which they were originally intended. The reason that they are kept in commission at all is to provide a place of employment for some men, the balance of whose term of employment is two or three years and whose present occupation is looking after the delicate instruments which are used on these vessels. I would suggest to the minister that these men who are so employed are at the very best time in their lives, the time when they ought not only to be in the best kind of employment but when they should be doing the best service for themselves or for Canada or for Britain or for somebody and that they must be in a condition, if not of idleness at least of useless employment in keeping instruments in repair. The instruments must be kept in repair, but there is surely no reason why those instruments should be kept on the Niobe or Rainbow if the only purpose is to keep them in repair. If those ships are not to be used for their original purpose, they had better be dismantled and the men paid off.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend, I think, must to some extent have misunderstood me. I did not say that we were keeping instruments on board the boat, but the machinery which could not be removed. The men, the Deputy Minister informs me, are kept busy. The great bulk of them are Englishmen who have been in the English navy, and the Deputy Minister says they are kept employed. We are responsible for carrying out our contract with the men and if we dismiss them at an earlier date than the contract calls for some arrangement would have to be made to compensate the men.

Mr. OLIVER: Can the minister tell me what was the cost of the Niobe and the Rainbow?

Mr. HAZEN: I have not the figures here and the Deputy Minister tells me he does not remember, but perhaps some of my hon. friends who were members of the Govment at the time those ships were bought, have some recollection.

Mr. OLIVER: The point I wanted to establish is this: a very large amount of the country's money is tied up in these vessels, their maintenance is costing a large amount of money, and the purpose for which the money was voted is not being carried out. And so far as we can learn from the minister, it is not the intention of the Government to carry it out. The country, meanwhile, is burdened with that expense, capital and current, without any reason whatever. We have asked, we have almost badgered, the minister for an answer as to what the Government intends to do in the matter. I think we have been strictly within our rights in asking these questions, and I am very much disappointed that the Government is not able or willing to give us a clear and straightforward answer. The matter is one that I think is seriously contentious, and I think that what has passed across the floor to-night is sufficient evidence on that point. I think my hon. friend will remember that when the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition spoke last night as to the business that was to be taken up to-day, it was understood that any of the Estimates that were contentious would not be proceeded with. This certainly has developed into a contentious matter and in view of the understanding between the leaders I would respectfully ask my hon. friend to allow it to stand over.

Mr. HAZEN: I hope my hon. friend did not gather from any remark of mine that I wished to imply that the Opposition were asking questions that were improper from the standpoint of an opposition. I fully realize what the rights and duties of an opposition are, and make no complaint whatever about any inquiries made of me when my Estimates are before the House. I have endeavoured to give such answers as I thought would be satisfactory to my hon. friends opposite. Having been in opposition myself in a legislature for nine years, I know it is sometimes difficult to satisfy an opposition with information, and very frequently if the Government gives information it is not considered satisfactory by those opposed to the Government. My hon. friend surely does not expect me to state what the naval policy is. That is a matter for the Prime Minister when the proper time comes. I have given my hon. friend all the information I can with regard to these vessels and the number of men employed on them, and with regard to the work these men are doing, I have also told my hon. friend that so far as the question of disposing of these vessels is concerned, no conclusion has been reached. The matter is being carefully considered by the department and will be considered by the Government when the department is in a position, after consideration with its officials, to make a report to the Government on that matter. I do not know what further information I can give my hon. friend. I would have no hesitation in allowing the item to stand, but I think my hon. friend should have asked that it stand over when the question first came up. I would have agreed to that without a moment's hesitation. But here we have been discussing for an hour, almost, every phase of the question and I have answered all questions as far as I am able except the one asking the cost of the Niobe and Rainbow. Under these circumstances I ask my hon. friend if he thinks the item ought to stand? If my hon. friend and his friends want the item to stand and say so, I am not going to insist upon its being passed to-night. I would point out, however, that when the main Naval Estimates come before the House at a later day, there will be the fullest possible opportunity for discussion of this question, and I will be delighted to give hon. gentlemen all the information possible if they desire to go on with the matter at that time.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sure my hon. friend is courteous and considerate in every respect, and I do not wish him to think I have any fault to find with his attitude on this matter. But my hon. friend the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) before he went away this evening, asked that the item should stand and in view of the fact that it has developed into a contentious item and in view of the arrangements which I understand existed between the two leaders last night, I would ask that the item stand for the present, and in making that request I do not want the minister to understand that I am making any criticism whatever of him or of the way in which he has dealt with this matter.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I understand the attitude of the hon. member for Edmonton, and if it is his desire that the item should stand, I will at once agree; but if we are to go over all this again on some future occasion, I think it is unfortunate that the matter did not develop as contentious before dinner. However, if that is the hon. gentleman's request I will bow to it.

Civil Government—Department of Militia and Defence—Salaries and contingencies, $186,900.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Will the hon. minister explain?

Hon. SAM. HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): There are no increases except the statutory increases.

Mr. PROULX: What is included in that item of sundries, $11,000? Is that another trip to England?

Mr. HUGHES: No trip to England. When the main Estimates come up, I shall be delighted to give my hon. friend the particulars about that trip to England, and I am sure he will regret that he was not along and that he had not become a soldier earlier in life.

Mr. PARDEE: What are the sundries for?

Mr. HUGHES: They are for general odds and ends and for travelling expenses.

Mr. PARDEE: What are some of the items?

Mr. HUGHES: The travelling expenses of civil officers of the Department come out of that.

Mr. PARDEE: I do not want to be persistent at all, but it seems to me the Minister's explanations are rather vague—odds and ends.

Mr. HUGHES: These are travelling expenses.

Mr. PARDEE: Is that $11,000 made up of small items?

Mr. HUGHES: All small items—the expenses of officers travelling to Toronto, Quebec or anywhere. These are civil officers, not the military department.

Mr. MURPHY: It was explained by the hon. Minister's colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), in connection with an item for sundries under the head of contingencies, that the item of travelling expenses which used to be voted in connection with a special appropriation had been transferred to this item of sundries under the head of contingencies, and that his Estimates were thereby increased by that amount. The estimates of the hon. Minister of Militia, under the head of sundries, apparently remain the same as they were last year. The Minister of Militia is not following in his department the custom as explained by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. HUGHES: I presume my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is following our custom.

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. HUGHES: We have always had our expenses for travel under this head. I do not know what the Naval Service is doing at all. I am not running that show; I am running this show.

Mr. NEELY: I would like to ask the minister if this item of sundries would cover, for instance, the travelling and other incidental expenses of entertaining the visiting officers, say, from England, whom the Minister of Militia might see fit to entertain as properly he should. Would it also cover the expense of a visiting officer if the minister takes him to a political picnic, for instance, wearing a badge 'Britain and the Empire,' where a visiting British officer would hardly be expected to feel particularly at home in a country where all classes of the people are supposed to be loyal to the empire to which we are all so proud to belong. I would like to know if that is the case.

Mr. HUGHES: If the Minister of Militia entertains an officer, he entertains him himself. He does not charge him up to the public expense. If the Minister of Militia takes a gentleman to any party—Queenston Heights I presume my hon. friend refers to—he does so at his own expense and assumes the full responsibility for it. If he wears a badge, the Minister of Militia and Defence is responsible for the wearing of his badge. He asks no person what badge he shall wear on such an occasion.

Mr. NEELY: I am not worried about what badge the minister wears; we all know the badge he wears. That is not a matter of any particular concern. I am asking whether this $11,000 for sundries would cover such an occasion as where the minister takes a foreign officer, or an officer from the old country, or any other country, to a picnic. Does the minister mean to tell us that the minister pays the expenses of the visitors, because I have no fault to find with that proposition; but, in connection with the particular incident that he referred to, did the minister actually pay out of his own pocket the expenses of this visiting officer, and does he pay the expenses of visiting officers while travelling through the country?

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. gentleman referred to an incident that occurred at a picnic at Queenston Heights. I take the responsibility of everything that occurred on that occasion. When General Ian Hamilton travelled through this country as Inspector General, all his expenses were paid out of the general vote, but that has nothing to do with Civil Government, nor had the incident to which my hon. friend refers anything to do with this item.

Mr. NEELY: If this incident does not come under this item, that is all I want from the minister. But the minister will understand, of course, that when we do come to the point we hope the matter may be properly discussed.

Mr. HUGHES: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the opportunity.

Mr. NEELY: We would like to have a little information about that particular trip to Queenston Heights.

Mr. PARDEE: The Minister's explanation is that this $11,000 would simply cover the travelling expenses of officers of the department?

Mr. HUGHES: The civil officers.

Mr. PARDEE: The civil officers; that is the only explanation of the expenditure of this $11,000?

Mr. HUGHES: That is the great bulk of it.

Mr. PARDEE: Would $9,000 be a fair estimate of the travelling expenses?

Mr. HUGHES: I think it would be more than that.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry that my military experience is not very large, but it would appear to me as a rank outsider that the amount of $11,000 for the travelling expenses of the civil staff of the department is too large. I do not appreciate how the civil end of the military department has to do so much travelling. I understand that the travelling was generally done by the military officers, not by the civil officers.

Mr. HUGHES: If that question had been asked by some hon. gentleman on the other side who had never sat within the sacred precincts of the Privy Council, we would not have wondered at it; but the item is the same item that the hon. gentleman passed himself whilst he was a minister sitting with his colleagues around the Council Board. I do not think that it has been increased at all from the time that he passed it himself. It is the same item that has been passed for years.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister compliments the Government too much.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In looking at the Auditor General's Report I find that the contingencies under the Civil Government item for the Department of Militia and Defence last year amounted to $22,028. I do not know whether this represents the same expenditure or not, but the amount is more than twice as much as the item we are discussing.

[Mr. Neely.]

Mr. HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman looks at the Estimates he will see that the vote includes contingencies, clerical assistance, printing and stationery and sundries.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it the same expenditure that we are discussing now?

Mr. HUGHES: We are discussing one of the three items which go to make up the whole of the contingencies. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 13 of his Estimates he will see that the vote includes these three items.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the Minister of Militia intend shortly to make provision for the payment of the Fenian bounty claims? I, and others, have had numerous inquiries with regard to this matter. A great many have put in their claims, and the statement having gone abroad that the Act expired on the 31st December, the claimants are uneasy as to whether or not their claims will be paid.

Mr. HUGHES: It is the intention of the Government to taken any legislation that may be necessary to continue the right of any claimant who may have presented his claim. There are a number of questions on the Order Paper with reference to this matter, and they will be answered in due course. I may say now that every claim that has been allowed will be paid. The Militia Department has nothing to do with paying the claims; it merely issues a warrant and the Finance Department pays.

Civil Government—Department of the Interior—Salaries and contingencies, $1,258,255.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): The statutory increases amount to $33,357, and the other increases, caused by increased clerkships, to $83,700, being a total of $116,957. There have been decreases through the filling of vacancies occasioned by promotion, resignations, &c. In all cases, the new clerks came in at the minimum of the salary of the division to which they were promoted.

Mr. CARROLL: There seems to be a large increase in the contingencies for travelling expenses?

Mr. ROCHE: That is occasioned by the fact that the travelling expenses, which formerly were paid out of the votes for the different services, will in future be paid out of this vote.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the total represent any actual increase over last year?

Mr. ROCHE: These Estimates are based on the Estimates of last year.

Mr. OLIVER: Apparently, there is an increase of about 88 officials.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman, who was formerly minister of this department, will appreciate the explanation of that. The department has over 800 employees, and during the course of the year there have been employed from 70 to 145 temporary clerks at different periods. Under the present practice, temporary employees are only allowed to remain in the department for six months. Formerly, when they were in a department for six months and did not pass the examination they were transferred to another department in which they remained for the next six months, and so on. That practice has been abolished, and now, unless they have passed their examination within the first six months they are compelled to leave the service, and usually just at the time when they are becoming proficient in their work. I consulted the heads of the different branches, and in order to avoid the employment of so many temporary employees, it was considered it would be very much better in the interests of the service and in the interests of economy, that we should have a larger number of permanent employees. Of course we must continue to take some vote for temporary clerical assistance, but it will be materially reduced.

Mr. OLIVER: This is really only an apparent increase ?

Mr. ROCHE: That is all.

Mr. OLIVER: I took objection a short time ago to the passing of the Estimates for the Naval Department, but in order to facilitate business it may be well to withdraw the objection and let the item go through.

Mr. HAZEN: Thank you.

Mr. OLIVER: On the understanding that discussion may be had when the other naval Estimates come up.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Civil Government—Department of Labour—Salaries, $52,412.50; contingencies, $15,000.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Hon. members will notice that there is an increase of one in the staff of the department, and of $700 in the amount devoted to salaries. The new appointee is a messenger. This appointment and the statutory increases explain the increase of $700. The contingencies are the same as last year.

Mr. CARROLL: I have received communications to the effect that a statement appears in our papers that a new Bill is being introduced to extend the Industrial Disputes Act so as to cover all classes of employment. I have a question on the Order Paper for Monday on that subject, but I should be glad if the minister could give me the information now.

Mr. CROTHERS: There will be an item later on for the administration of the Industrial Disputes Act, and perhaps my hon. friend will wait until that time. It would be more in order to discuss such a matter then.

Mr. CARROLL: Will that be reached this evening?

Mr. CROTHERS: I suppose not; we are only taking up Civil Government now.

Civil Government—Department of Inland Revenue—Salaries, $182,087.50; contingencies, $10,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the Minister of Inland Revenue be good enough to explain the increase of size in the membership of the staff?

Hon. W. B. NANTEL (Minister of Inland Revenue): We have an Assistant Deputy Minister, Mr. J. U. Vincent at a salary of $3,350. Then, in the branch of Dr. McGill, Chief Analyst, we have two analysts employed, Mr. Dawson and Mr. Papineau Couture.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the increase in the Weights and Measures branch?

Mr. NANTEL: We have a chief inspector, Mr. Way, who last year was assistant chief and has now been promoted. His salary is $2,800.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is the present deputy minister?

Mr. NANTEL: Mr. W. Himsworth.

Mr. MURPHY: Is he retiring?

Mr. NANTEL: He will retire soon, but is still in office.

Mr. MURPHY: When does he retire?

Mr. NANTEL: Probably next spring.

Mr. MURPHY: About what date?

Mr. NANTEL: About April, I suppose.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is to succeed him?

Mr. NANTEL: That is not decided yet, but there is the assistant deputy minister, Mr. Vincent, who has been appointed cum futura successione.

Mr. NESBITT: Under 'Sundries' there is an increase of $1,000. What is that for?

Mr. NANTEL: 'Sundries' covers unforseen expenditure, such as subscriptions to newspapers, telephones, telegrams, etc.

Mr. NESBITT: Subscriptions to newspapers?

Mr. NANTEL: Yes, there are many in my department.

Mr. NESBITT: I know that people subscribe to newspapers that they do not want, but I did not know that the departments did.

Mr. NANTEL: They always have. It was so when I took office.

Mr. ROBB: Would the minister mind telling us if he intends to introduce legislation to govern the manufacture, sale and use of explosives?

Mr. NANTEL: That is not in my department.

Mr. ROBB: It was in the minister's department last session.

Mr. NANTEL: It belongs to the Mines Department.

Mr. CARROLL: May I ask if the revenue cutters that were referred to this afternoon are in this department?

Mr. NANTEL: No, they are in the Customs Department.

Mr. CARROLL: I wanted to find that out because I have had some difficulty in locating them.

Mr. NANTEL: I have nothing to do with them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many inspectors of weights and measures are there in the province of Nova Scotia, and what are their names and salaries?

Mr. NANTEL: That is in the outside service, and I have not the notes on that subject with me. But I am informed that there are three inspectors in Nova Scotia.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the question will be in order now: Some of the retail merchants are complaining of inspection of their weights and measures being made oftener than is necessary, and the inspectors compel them to pay a fee for this inspection. There is a certain amount of trouble and friction about it, and I desired to ask the minister whether he proposes to change the law so as to relieve the retail men of the charge now made upon them for inspection of weights and measures.

Mr. NANTEL: I have received no complaint as to that.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: These inspectors of weights and measures are paid by the Government, and they also exact a pretty large fee.

Mr. NANTEL: The fee is not large; it has not been changed since I took office.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Where do the fees go?

Mr. NANTEL: The fees go to the department.

Mr. CARROLL: I desire to take this opportunity of thanking the minister for giving heed to a request which I made of him last year. I made many requests of the Government for various small things, but the Minister of Inland Revenue was the only member of the Government who heeded my requests. Last year I brought to his attention the matter of an employee of his department at Halifax, Mr. Patrick Tompkins, who had been in the employ of the department for twenty years, and was getting a very small salary. I wish to thank the Minister of Inland Revenue very kindly for having granted this gentleman the increase of pay which he so well deserved.

Mr. NEELY: I understand that the Deputy Minister of the Department is leaving some time in the spring, and that another gentleman, Mr. Vincent, is taking his place. How long has this gentleman been in the service of the department, and what qualifications has he for the office?

Mr. NANTEL: Mr. Vincent has been in the department since last October. He has been recognized by Mr. Shortt, of the Civil Service Commission, as being capable of filling the position; I consider he is well qualified for the office. Probably he will be appointed deputy minister.

Mr. NEELY: What was his occupation before he entered the service of the department?

Mr. NANTEL: He was a lawyer in Ottawa. A lawyer should make a good deputy minister for the Department of Inland Revenue.

Civil Government—Department of Agriculture—Salaries and contingencies, $509,637.50.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. minister explain the increase in the staff and the increase in the salaries?

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): There will be two vacancies created by promotion of two officers into the first division. The four patent examiners in that division, who have practically reached the maximum of $2,100 in the second division, are going up from the $2,100 to $2,800 class. Two men have been brought in from the outside service and appointed field husbandman and seed analyst respectively. In the next division the four vacancies are created by promotions, and four of the patent office who have been in the $1,200 to $1,600 class will be promoted to the $1,600 and $2,100 class. Most of these patent examiners come in on probation at $1,200, on the stipulation that they shall go up to $1,600 after the first year, if their services are satisfactory. In addition to that we are providing for an assistant Dominion botanist, a horticulturist, another clerk in the copyrights branch, an assistant editor in the publications branch, and an assistant Dominion entomologist. In subdivision B we have a number of vacancies and are providing for the appointment of an assistant to the Dominion botanist, to the Dominion field husbandman, the transfer to the inside service of an outside officer, an additional clerk in the minister's office, an assistant to the Dominion chemist, a filing clerk in the publications office. In the third division some clerks who have reached their maximum in the $500 to $800 class are going up to the $900 to $1,200 class. The changes are simply the result of the natural expansion of departmental work, with the addition of the officers I have just mentioned.

Mr. MURPHY: Are the two positions at $5,000 new?

Mr. BURRELL: No. These are Dr. Montizambert and Dr. Torrance.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Why are the travelling expenses so large this year?

Mr. BURRELL: Hitherto we have paid all our expenses from the votes apportioned to the different branches. It has been suggested that we should do away with that practice, and put these expenses into a general travelling expense fund for all branches. Many of the officers of the inside service of the department are travelling a good deal of the time, particularly those in the experimental farm, dairy and cold storage and live stock branches. This change was suggested by the Auditor General. Last year the amount was, I think, between $45,000 and $50,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Have all the positions in subdivision 'A' of the first division been filled?

Mr. BURRELL: No. This will provide for two promotions and a possible new appointment.

Mr. MURPHY: Are the vacancies in this subdivision to be filled by promotion?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, some of them. I have spoken of the four in the patent examiners' branch. Four patent senior examiners who have reached their maximum of $2,100 will go into the $2,100 to $2,800 class.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the explanation of the doubling of the vote for clerical and other assistance?

Mr. BURRELL: Last year we had a great deal of trouble because we 10 p. m. could not get permanent clerks from the Civil Service Commission to fill a lot of appointments, and we had to put on a number of temporary employees. We ran much behind our vote last year for temporary employees. If we had had permanent appointments for this, much of the vote would have lapsed. We had to increase our temporary vote, and we are providing enough so that if we do not get the permanent clerks we shall have enough to pay for temporary assistance.

Civil Government—Post Office Deaprtment—Salaries and contingencies, $867,810.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): The number of officers is the same, and the increase is due to statutory increases.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the increase in contingencies?

Mr. PELLETIER: To a large extent it is due to the same reason given by other departments.

Mr. CARROLL: I notice an item for provisional allowances in the Northwest. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is a special allowance that we give in Western Canada, which existed before my time. The explanation is, and I do not hesitate to say this, that the law does not permit us to pay sufficient salaries to get good men in the West We get men and they leave the service because we are not allowed by law to pay them sufficient salary. The late Government provided for this to a certain extent by making what they called a living allowance to the employees in the West, that is from Winnipeg to the Coast. In a general way the allowance is $180, but it varies according to salary.

Mr. OLIVER: What class of employees get the benefit of that allowance?

Mr. PELLETIER: For officers receiving $1,600 and under, $15 a month, that is $180 a year. In the case of salaries over $1,600 and under $1,780, the allowance is the amount required to make up a total of $1,780, this being the amount that would be received by a clerk whose salary is $1,600.

Mr. OLIVER: The dead letter office employees of the West are part of the Inside Service?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Civil Government—Public Works—Salaries and contingencies, $628,547.50.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): I might say, in a general way, that there are no increases except the ordinary statutory increases, as far as I know, and a few promotions. The total amount asked this year is $543,000 as against $527,000, or a difference of $16,000 for the general increase incident to the expansion of the department made up entirely of the natural increase and statutory increases.

Mr. OLIVER: In the second division, subdivision 'A,' I see two more have been appointed, and in the second division, subdivision 'B' five more.

Mr. ROGERS: These are the increases incident to the development and extra work of the department.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the meaning of that item in the second division subdivision 'A' where it says 'remainder of salary in Estimates of Railways and Canals'?

Mr. ROGERS: That refers to D. A. McLaughlin, the photographer. He gets part of his salary from my department, and the rest from the Railway Department.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Travelling expenses have increased by $46,000.

Mr. ROGERS: The same answer applies to that as was given by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. Heretofore, if we sent out an inspector, an engineer or purchasing agent his expenses were chargeable to the particular work on which he was engaged, but for some reason or other on the recommendation of the Auditor General or Treasury Board, that has been changed and all travelling expenses are charged to a contingency account. That accounts for the increase over last year.

Mr. CARROLL: How would the various items compare with this year?

Mr. ROGERS: About the same I think.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a considerable increase in the printing and stationery. Is there any explanation of that?

Mr. ROGERS: Printing and stationery last year was $12,500 and this year $17,000. The increase is due to books, publications and so on.

Mr. OLIVER: Has it anything to do with newspaper advertising?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Where is the printing being done?

Mr. ROGERS: In the Printing Bureau.

Mr. CARROLL: Have many new clerks been appointed by the department during the last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Very few; about four or five additional ones in the different offices.

Civil Government—Department of Justice—Salaries, including legal officer at $4,500, and assistant legal adviser at $4,000, $135,773.75.

Mr. PROULX: Has any new officer been appointed?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): No. One officer has been dropped. Moreover, the officer who last year combined the duties of secretary and assistant deputy minister was paid $5,000. This year we are paying the gentleman who replaces him only $4,000. We have diminished, not increased, the number of officers.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand some new appointments have been made in the legal department. Was Mr. Bill of Truro not appointed?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. Mr. Gisborne was appointed parliamentary counsel, and we appointed the gentleman next in order to the position of secretary. Mr. Gisborne's transference naturally created a vacancy that we had to fill by promotion, and Mr. Bill was appointed to the position rendered vacant by such promotions.

Mr. CARROLL: At what salary?

Mr. DOHERTY: $3,300.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

Monday, February 2, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Commissioners of Internal Economy for the year ended March 31, 1913.—The Honourable the Speaker.

Report of Department of Marine and Fisheries, Marine branch, for the year ended March 31, 1913.—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. H. S. CLEMENTS moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. He said: The Bill has a special reference to the tidal waters of the Pacific coast. If a boom of logs breaks loose, there is no provision made in the present Act whereby anybody may pick up and save the logs. The large concerns say that it does not pay to pick them up, but in the interest of navigation and for the protection of life it is necessary that these logs should be taken care of.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. B. B. LAW (Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise to a question of privilege. I call your attention to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on Friday, January 30, 1914, and which reads as follows:

> It is current gossip on Parliament Hill to-day that Hon. W. S. Fielding, who resigned the editorship of the Montreal Herald-Telegraph yesterday, intends to re-enter the House of Commons at an early day. It is said that Mr. B. B. Law, of Yarmouth, N.S., will resign his seat in his favour. Yarmouth is regarded as a safe Liberal constituency, and there is no doubt that the former Finance Minister would be an immense help to the Opposition, which is none too effective at present.

I think it is due to my constituents, who have on four different occasions elected me to a seat in this House, and by handsome majorities, to say, in the first place, that there is absolutely no truth in this statement in so far as it refers to myself. I have never been asked to resign my seat, nor have I any intention of doing so. I propose to stay here and oppose bad legislation whenever it is introduced.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is scarcely to be regarded as a question of privilege, because it does not refer to the hon. gentleman's conduct, nor to his rights and privileges in the House.

THE STEAMER ALERT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): The hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) on Friday last asked for certain information with regard to the steamer Alert. This information I have obtained from the responsible officer:

The steamer Alert is employed in the Customs Preventive Service on the Cape Breton coast, and does the work formerly carried on by the steamer Gladiator. The Alert is under the command of Captain Voutier, subject to the general orders of the Chief Preventive Officer of Customs. No instructions were given by the minister, commissioner, or the chief preventive officer regarding the conveyance of Messrs. McLeod and Hayes, as stated in the newspaper clipping read by the member for South Cape Breton. On inquiry I find it has been the practice to carry travellers occasionally on the Gladiator and the Alert going to remote points where other conveyance was not available, and when not interfering with the regular cruise of the vessel. In order to ascertain the facts regarding the statement read by the member for South Cape Breton, I instructed the chief preventive officer to telegraph to North Sydney. The chief preventive officer informs me he received a reply stating that the Alert recently on a trip to Neil's Harbour, took on board as travellers, Joseph McNeill, Phillip McLeod and Dr. Hayes. The member for South Cape Breton is aware that certain parts of the coast are inaccessible except by boat, and if on the occasion in question the Alert was not interfering with her regular cruise, I, personally do not see any reason why any one, even the member for South Cape Breton himself, should not go on board, and proceed to their destination, should the vessel be going in that direction.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

MAGDALEN ISLANDS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has the mail contract between Bryan and Leslie, Magdalen Islands, been cancelled? If so, for what reasons?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

LOBSTER FISHING.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Have the lobster fishing regulations been changed as regards Magdalen Islands?
2. Why has the month of September been withdrawn from the lobster fishing season?
3. Was not that month fixed after an investigation?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. In the interest of preserving the lobster fishery. Fishing could be carried on only on a limited portion of the coast in September; it interfered with the mackerel and cod fishery, and it made it much more difficult to prevent illegal fishing during the summer.
3. Yes.

NEW TELESCOPE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the contract been let by the Government to the Warner and Swasey Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, in connection with the building of a telescope?
2. Have any tenders been asked for same? If so, in what papers?
3. How many tenders were received, and from whom?

Mr. ROCHE:

GREAT LAKES NAVIGATION.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a commission to investigate the conditions of lake navigation?

Mr. HAZEN: Soon after the disaster which occurred on the Great Lakes in the month of November last, steps were taken to ascertain if it was the intention of the United States, whose shipping had sustained greater loss and damage than Canada's, to appoint any commission of investigation and inquiry, and it was learned that there was no such intention. The Department of Marine believed that any inquiry, to be effective, should be international in its character; and in view of this, and of the further fact that it was informed that it was the intention of a member of the House at the present session to move for a parliamentary committee of inquiry, it was not decided that the appointment of a commission was desirable or necessary.

The following Canadian vessels, which were stranded during the storm on the Great Lakes during the month of November, were the subject of investigation by the Wreck Commissioner:

SS. Turret Chief, owned by the Canadian Lake and Ocean Navigation Co., Ltd., of Montreal; stranded on Keweenaw Point, U.S.A., in lake Superior, at 4 a.m., 8th November, 1913, and still remains there. Crew all saved. Formal investigation held November 21 at Kingston. Master censured by court.

SS. Acadian, owned by the Canadian Interlake Line, Limited, Toronto; stranded on shoals near Sulphur island, Thunder bay, U.S.A., in lake Huron, at 4.20 p.m., November 9, 1913. Crew all saved. Towed off November 19, and is now undergoing repairs. Formal investigation held in Toronto, January 30, 1914. Finding not yet rendered.

These two appear to be the only Canadian vessels whose crews were saved, and direct evidence as to casualty obtainable.

PARCEL POST.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What progress has been made towards the establishment of parcel post?
2. Have the rates been fixed? If so, what are they?
3. What additional compensation, if any, is to be paid to the railway companies?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. The progress made is such that parcel post will be an accomplished fact on February 10.

2. The rates have been fixed and are contained in the regulations of which they form a part. The Postmaster General laid these regulations on the table of the House a few days ago.

3. The department at the same time has succeeded in settling the question of the transportation of parcel post with the railway companies, and the other long outstanding and difficult question of the general increase, over which the railway companies have been so keen and insistent for a number of years. The demand of the railway companies in this respect was for an increase of about $4,000,000, and moreover, for compensation in connection with parcel post, but the whole matter has been settled by the adoption of a car mile instead of a track mile basis, and the Accounting branch of the Post Office Departpartment estimates that this increase will be about $786,000 for 1914-15. No special or additional compensation will be paid to the railway companies on account of parcel post.

ORIENTAL IMMIGRATION.

Mr. OLIVER:

Is the order in prohibiting the entry of skilled or unskilled labourers at certain British Columbia ports so administered as to prevent the entry of Chinese and Japanese labourers?

Mr. ROCHE:

The regulation contained in P. C. 2642 was made under the authority of subsection 3, of section 38, of the Immigration Act, 9-10 Edward VII, and applies to Chinese immigration only in so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions of Chapter 95, R.S.C., 1906, as amended by Chapter 14, 7-8 Edward VII. In view of the existing agreement with Japan, and in order to give the Japanese authorities an opportunity to advise their subjects of the change in regulations, immigration officials at Vancouver and Victoria were notified not to enforce provisions against Japanese sailing before December 27, 1913.

Mr. OLIVER:

Why were certain Hindus recently admitted to Canada on an order of Chief Justice Hunter, instead of being excluded under the authority vested in the Minister of the Interior by section 23, of the Immigration Act?

Mr. ROCHE:

The Hindus referred to were not admitted by order of Chief Justice Hunter, but the proceedings taken to exclude them failed, because, upon a writ of Habeas Corpus, the Honourable Chief Justice held that Orders in Council 920 and 926, under which it was sought to exclude such Hindus, were not authorized by the Immigration Act, and consequently that the provisions of section 23 of said Act did not apply to proceedings under said Orders in Council, the same not being proceedings under the authority and in accordance with the provisions of said Act. In view of this decision, new Orders in Council have been passed to overcome the objections.

Mr. OLIVER:

2. For what period was such suspension or relaxation continued?

3. In what terms was notice of such suspension or relaxation conveyed to the officers of the department?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Between the first day of April and the last day of September, 1913.

2. The concession was withdrawn on the 3rd of May, 1913, so far as it concerned railroad and general labourers going to the province of British Columbia. It was also withdrawn on the 28th of May, as touching all labour going to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and on the 6th of June the relaxation of P. C. 924 was entirely withdrawn as touching immigrants arriving on and after the 30th of that month.

3. In two circular letters, dated the 12th of March, 1913, reading:

(a) The Superintendent of Immigration hereby gives notice that the money qualification will be waived this year, between the 1st April and last day of September, in favour of persons coming from Great Britain or Ireland, to assured permanent employment in Canada, who have in their possession a card of consent signed by any of the regular Departmental Agents in Great Britain or Ireland, and who pass the medical examination and have the means of reaching their employment.

This concession will be construed strictly by port agents as applying exclusively to natives or citizens of Great Britain and Ireland.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has the Government received a copy of the following resolution passed on Friday, December 26, 1913, at 8 p.m., by the Executive Board of the Chambre de Commerce, of Montreal?

Your commission has apprised itself of all that has been said, written and made since twenty years by the Chamber and outside of it on the Georgian Bay canal question, since fifty years, that this question has been before the public, and, after deliberation, it recommends the adoption of the following resolution. It also recommends that copies of this resolution be forwarded to all public bodies, commercial and municipal, in order to obtain their help and adherence, and, thereby, assume the success of energetical, powerful and decisive pressure on the Government.

Whereas, the necessity of the construction of Georgian Bay canal is now so well acknowledged by all, that further arguments in its favour are now useless.

2. Whereas, the federal Government has already obtained all the necessary information as regards its possibility, its cost and the results which would be brought by the fulfilling of this great national enterprise.

3. Whereas, the leaders of the different governments at Ottawa have declared themselves in favour of the project.

4. Whereas, at its last session, the Government announced that the canal would not be built until a new commission be appointed to ascertain the commercial results of the scheme, which commission was to make a report at the next session of Parliament

Whereas, the session is now at hand, and this commission has not yet been appointed;

Be it resolved, that the Chambre de Commerce du district de Montreal reiterates with energy its demand on the federal Government for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal within the shortest delay, and assurances of its building at the impending session.

6. That the Chambre de Commerce du district de Montreal protests with all its might against all measures which would entail delay in the realization of this great national project.

Humbly submitted,

President of Special Commission.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. The last report from Mr. V. Stefansson was dated from Point Barrow, October 30. He stated that the Karaluk which had been supposed to be frozen in for the winter, had drifted out with the ice pack on September 23. The ship was then in good condition. Mr. Stefansson intended to proceed east and explore the MacKenzie delta, Banks land and possibly Prince Patrick island.

8. Before recommending the purchase of this vessel, Mr. Stefansson had her inspected by Captain Pedersen, a whaling captain of experience, and by shipping inspectors, and stated that she was the best vessel available for the expedition.

On leaving Victoria Mr. Stefansson stated that the vessel had been extremely well repaired and outfitted, and that in the opinion of Captain Bartlett, who was familiar with Peary's equipment, and of Mr. Murray, who was familiar with Shackleton's, the expedition was equipped in more detail than either of the above. Mr. COCHRANE: The following information was supplied by the Transcontinental Railway Commission:

1. Yes.
2. December 11, 1912.
3. (Par. 1). What is a fair rental for the use of that portion of the eastern division between Winnipeg and Lake Superior Junction, exclusive of the shops hereinafter mentioned, until the eastern division is completed sufficient for operation, within the intent and meaning of the Agreement and Acts hereinafter mentioned, with a ferry at Quebec? (Par. 2). Are the shops at Transcona and repair shops at divisional points, or any of them, to be regarded as a portion of the eastern division, within the intent and meaning of the Agreements of July 29, 1903, and of February 18, 1904, and Acts confirming same? (Par. 3). If not, what is the proper rental for the use of such shops, or any of them, by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for any railway purposes they may desire, until the eastern division is completed sufficient for operation. (Par. 4). Or, if the arbitrator determines that the said shops, or any of them, are to be regarded as a portion of the said eastern division under said Acts, what is a fair rental for the use of that portion of the said railway between Winnipeg and Lake Superior Junction, inclusive of the said shops, or such of them as he finds are a portion the eastern division and inclusive of the right to the said company to use such shops for the purposes of the said eastern and western divisions of the said railway.

4. (a). February 28, 1913—date of award. Terms are as follows: (b) Par. 1. Keeping in view the advantage that will accrue to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in acquiring business for its line of railway from Lake Superior Junction to Fort William and for its system west of Winnipeg from the use of the line between Winnipeg and Lake Superior Junction until the completion of the eastern division, and the advantages that will accrue to the said company in handling its construction material by that channel, and also keeping in view the amount of lake and rail business as compared to all rail business, I award, order and determine that a fair rental for the use of that portion of the eastern division between Winnipeg and Lake Superior Junction, exclusive of the shops at Transcona and repair shops at divisional points until the said eastern division is completed, sufficient for operation within the intent and meaning of the agreements of July 29, 1903, and February 18, 1904, and Acts confirming them which are referred to in the said memorandum of agreement of December 20, 1912, with a ferry at Quebec, is a sum equal to two per cent per annum upon the cost of construction of said portion of the eastern division; the said cost to be ascertained in the manner defined in paragraphs 15 and 16 of said agreement of July 29, 1903, and to include the cost of the items referred to in said paragraphs, but excluding and excepting the cost of construction in like manner of the said shops at Transcona and repair shops at divisional points and of the lands required or used for said shops. In addition to the said two per cent, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company until the said eastern division is completed as aforesaid, will at its own expense maintain and operate said portion of the eastern division and pay all charges for working expenditure as defined by paragraph 14 of the said agreement of July 29, 1903. Par. 2. With respect to the shops at Transcona, considering their location and the circumstances under which they were produced and furnished, and the specifications and interpreting the said agreements and Acts, in the light of modern railway practice, and considering the contemplated use of the said eastern division by other railways, I award, order and determine that the said shops are to be regarded as and are a portion of the said eastern division within the intent and meaning of the said agreements of July 29, 1903, and February 18, 1904, and Acts confirming the same. I further award, order and determine that all repair shops at divisional points are to be regarded as and are a portion of said eastern division within the intent and meaning of said agreements of July 29, 1903, and February 18, 1904, of the Acts confirming the same. I consider these are a material part of the railway and necessary for its proper and efficient operation. (Par. 3). In view of my award upon the second question submitted, the third question does not require a finding. (Par. 4.) The capacity and appointment of the Transcona shops are much beyond the needs of the line from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction, and no doubt in the interval before completion of the eastern division, and it may be for some time thereafter, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company will avail itself for economic reasons of the use of these shops and outworks to take care of its power, rolling stock, tools and other equipment and materials used upon the line from Lake Superior Junction to Fort William and upon the western division, and upon such other lines or branches as it may construct from the eastern division. I award, order and determine that a fair rental for the use of that portion of the said railway between Winnipeg and Lake Superior Junction, inclusive of the shops at Transcona and repair shops at divisional points, and inclusive of the right of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to use such shops for the purposes of said eastern and western divisions of said railway, is a sum equal to two per centum per annum upon the cost of construction of said portion of the said eastern division, to be ascertained in the manner defined in said paragraphs 15 and 16, including therein such cost of construction of the repair shops at divisional points on said portion, and excluding therefrom such cost of construction of the shops at Transcona, and in addition to the said two per cent, a sum equivalent to ten per cent of the actual cost of all work done at said Transcona shops upon locomotives, cars, rolling stock supplied for the operation of the said eastern division, and upon the plant, tools and materials entering into or used in the operation or maintenance of the said eastern division, and a further sum equivalent to twelve and one-half per cent of the actual cost of the total work done at or of the output of the said Transcona shops, other than for said eastern division. Such cost of work is to include the cost of all labour and service, the wages of the shops' superintendent, and all the staff supervising the Transcona shops and its outworks, and also of all material and supplies used in said shops. In addition to the said percentages, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, until the said eastern division is completed as aforesaid, will, at its own expense, maintain and operate said portion of the eastern division, including said shops at Transcona and at divisional points, and pay all charges for working expenditure, as defined by paragraph 14 of the said agreement of the 29th of July, 1903.

2. Has the Government or any of its members, as herein stated, promised to appoint a second senator of French Canadian race for province of Ontario?

MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to an extract in Les Cloches de Saint Boniface, the organ of His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, Manitoba, in its last issue, headed 'The last word of the School Commission of Winnipeg,' of which the following is an extract:—

'We said in our edition of November last, that the letter addressed on the 14th of October last, by the Winnipeg School Board to Dr. McKenty, chairman of the committee entrusted with the interests of the Catholics of the city, was nothing but a means of palliating a refusal. Such was the case. When the question came up of stating precisely the principal points of the litigation, the chairman of the committee appointed by the Catholics gave, on the 5th of December, the following answer:

"To the chairman and members of the School Board of Winnipeg.

"Gentlemen:

"The committee representing the petitioners acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th of October, which was carefully examined. In our petition, we said that 'Your petitioners are in the same position as to incompetency as they were during several years, in conditions similar to those existing in Winnipeg, their co-religionists of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but, a few years past, the Public School Commissions of both these provinces did, what your petitioners are anxious should be done by you here, and that since twenty years such arrangement has given satisfaction to both sides.

"That quotation is the principal part of our petition. It is equivalent to a demand of having our schools rented and administered in the same way as public schools for our Catholic children are conducted, and of having for those schools, Catholic professors, bearing diplomas, without paying attention to their costume.

"Yours truly,

"James McKenty.'"

"On the 29th, the School Board, through the secretary answered as follows, and this was to be the last word:

"'I received your letter of the 5th inst., and submitted it to the board. In answer to your communication I was instructed to thank you, in the name of the board, about your plain and explicit statement re the petition of the Roman Catholic taxpayers and to bring to your knowledge the decision of said board, which acting as a public body entrusted with the administration of the schools, according to the law governing the public schools, and in conformity of its legal adviser, to the effect that it cannot agree with the requests contained in the petition as interpreted by you, as your actual confirmation proves it.'"

'As it can be seen, such refusal, indefinitely allowing of a crying injustice, which has lasted since 1890, to continue, was not justified. The board hides itself behind the law, as its legal adviser, Mr. J. H. Munson, thought fit to understand it, when it does not even allude to a contrary interpretation made by a no less eminent lawyer, Mr. A. J. Andrews, at the request of the Minister of Education, interpretation which was the very basis of the new step entered into by the Catholic committee.'

(Les Cloches, 15th September, P. 403.)

The School Board will, as in the past, and what we say about Winnipeg applies to all mixed centres where the Protestants are masters of the school boards, to collect the regular taxes from the Catholics and even the tax established for their school houses intended for the instruction of the children of the majority. What would the same men say, should the Catholic majority try to oppress the minority of the province of Quebec? Would they not be the first in denouncing such an injustice? Why two different weights and measures? It has besides to be noticed that the Catholics of Winnipeg were only asking a minimum of their rights. They were ready to facilitate an agreement, to accept the general management of the Public School Board, its inspection, its programme and books, provided the Catholic pupils were educated together by Catholic schoolmasters, either belonging to the clergy or not, bearing due diplomas, and that their schools were only rented, in view of the future. Everything is refused, even such minimum.'

2. Are the facts alleged in said article true, to the knowledge of the Government?

3. If so, does the Government intend taking any action, or has any action been taken by it or by any of its members, towards obtaining remedy for such state of affairs, by conference, conciliation, concession, or otherwise, with the Manitoba Government, or any of its members? If so, what has been such action and what has been the result?

4. If no action has been taken, why not?

5. If there is any correspondence in the matter, will the Government lay it on the table of the House if it is moved for?

TRANSPORTATION OF FISH.

Mr. SINCLAIR moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the question of improved means of transportation for fresh fish between the Maritime provinces and the United States should receive the early attention of the Government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my purpose in moving this resolution is to interest the Government, if I can, and to induce them to take steps to improve the facilities for the transportation of fresh fish between the Maritime provinces and the markets of the United States. The part of the Maritime provinces in which I am specially interested is possibly the part that most needs those facilities at present, I refer to eastern Nova Scotia. The fishermen are not here asking for any favours. The fishermen, so far as I know, never get any favours, and they do not expect any. The fisherman is accustomed to hard work; he gets up early, he has long hours, and he is exposed to all kinds of weather. If hon. gentlemen, sitting in their cushioned seats in this comfortable Chamber, could see a fisherman in my constituency on one of these January mornings when the thermometer is hovering about zero, ten or twenty miles from land, tossed in his dory on the white caps, attending to his trawls, the spray freezing on his boat and clothing, liable at any minute to encounter a blizzard and be driven out to sea, if hon. gentlemen understood the risk the fisherman endures and the hardships he undergoes in making a living for himself and his family, they would be willing to support any reasonable proposal that would give him a better price for his products and make his lot somewhat easier.

I need not refer to the importance of our great fishing industry; that will be conceded. By reference to the report laid on the table a few days ago by the Minister of Marine, we find that this industry last year employed 88,308 persons. Of this number, 65,081 were engaged in fishing and 23,327 were workers in canneries and other subsidiary employments connected with fishing. The vessels employed numbered 1,669. The boats engaged numbered 34,501. The market value of the catch last year amounted, according to the report, to $33,389,464. In Nova Scotia the industry has not been expanding of late years. For several years it has simply been marking time and making little or no progress. Last year it actually went back. As a matter of fact, the fishing industry in the Maritime provinces has never had a fair chance. It has been carried on under very great disadvantages, the chief of these being the distance from the market and the lack of transportation facilities. Up to a few months ago we were shut out of the market of the United States by a heavy tariff, and for many years we were practically shut out of the markets of Montreal, Toronto and the Canadian cities by the distance we were from them and the heavy express charges. Of late years this has been partly overcome. The Department of Marine and Fisheries is assisting in the transportation of fish in Canada, and doing so with excellent results. This assistance commenced under the late Administration in the year 1909, and it has been continued by the present Administration. Prior to this, the express rate from Mulgrave and Halifax to Montreal was $1.50 per hundred pounds. At the same time the rate from Portland and Boston to Montreal was about 80 cents. You can see that this was a very heavy handicap on the fishermen of the Maritime provinces. In 1909, under the Administration of the late Government, an agreement was made with the railways and the express companies that has been of immense advantage to the trade in the Maritime provinces. The terms of this agreement between the Government and the express companies were: The department arranged to have the railway place at the disposal of the shippers a cold storage car on two days each week, which car would be hauled by fast freight to Montreal. To enable this to be done, the department guaranteed that the earnings on these cars would be at least two-thirds those on a minimum carload of 20,000 pounds, at carload lot rates from the point of starting to destination, plus $4 per car for icing. The department arranged with the express companies to accept responsibility for one-third of the ordinary express rates on all shipments of fresh and mildly cured fish, including shell fish, from the Atlantic coast as far west as the eastern boundary of Manitoba, and from the Pacific coast as far east as the said boundary. This service has proved a great boon to the trade. While it cost the department a considerable amount annually for the first few years, it is now being taken advantage of to such an extent that it is practically self-sustaining. In this way we have developed a good home market for fresh fish caught in the Maritime provinces. But a new situation has arisen owing to the Wilson tariff, which has opened up to the people of the Maritime provinces the great market of the United States. We have only to look at the map of the Maritime provinces to see the proximity to the New England States, with their teeming population, and cheap water carriage and open navigation the whole year round. If our fisheries are ever to become a great industry, we must exploit this market in the United States. The Boston market, in addition to its proximity to the Maritime provinces, has the advantage of being a much larger market than anything we have in Canada. I am told by dealers who have experience in the fishing business that if two or three carloads were sent to Montreal for sale on the same day it would practically break the market, but you could put three or four times that amount on the Boston market and it would have no such effect, because Boston is such a large distributing centre. The ruling prices in Boston are also much higher than the prices in the Maritime provinces. This is shown very clearly by comparing the prices quoted from day to day on the Boston market with the prices that the fishermen are receiving on the coast of my own constituency.

Mr. BRADBURY: How do the Boston prices compare with Montreal prices?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am discussing the price the fisherman receives for his fish at the place where it is caught. The retail prices in Montreal, Ottawa and other Canadian cities, have always been a puzzle to me; they are so much higher than we should expect them to be. For instance a fisherman in the town of Canso gets one and a half cents a pound for the haddock he catches at this season of the year, but you cannot buy the same pound of haddock in Ottawa for less than ten cents. That is a matter I am not able to explain. I am talking in the interests of the producer and am pointing out that the prices paid in Boston to the man who catches the fish are very much higher than the prices paid to the man who catches the fish in the province of Nova Scotia. If you look at the trade papers of the first of January, you will find that the price in Boston was $5.50 per 100 pounds of haddock while the price at Canso was only $1.50. I have a report before me—not a very recent one—taken from the Gloucester Daily Times of February 6, 1913, nearly a year ago, which illustrates the point I am making. At that time haddock was selling wholesale in Boston for $6 per 100 pounds and on certain days the price was higher, from $8 to $10 per 100 pounds. On the 7th February—quoting from the same paper—the fisherman got for his haddock landed at the wharf in Boston from $4 to $8 per 100 pounds, and for large cod from $8 to $9 per 100 pounds. Although the price varies very much in Boston it is as a rule very much higher than the price ruling in Nova Scotia. I have a third quotation from the same paper—which is the best authority we have on this question—dated the 18th of February, which shows that Boston dealers were paying $4 to $5.50 per 100 lbs. for haddock and $6 for large cod. During all this period the fisherman at Canso was getting $1.50 for the same class of fish. As I have pointed out, this Boston market with its higher prices is open to us and the question is: have we the enterprise and the pluck to take advantage of our opportunity? Whatever views some of our people may have held about this matter during the hysterical period of 1911, there are, to-day, very few business men in the province of Nova Scotia who do not recognize that it would be a great advantage to the fishing industry of that province to have the United States market open to us. I do not think there are two opinions about that among the business men of our province to-day. I will give you the opinion of Mr. S. Y. Wilson, a prominent fish dealer who has spent all his life in the trade, and who should know as much as anybody in the constituency of Halifax, about this matter. He is also a prominent supporter of the Prime Minister. He says:

> Clear-cut evidence of what 'free fish' is doing for the Nova Scotia fisherman is seen in the preparations taking place aboard schooners at the ports of La Havre and Lunenburg. These preparations mean that Nova Scotians are going to cut out the Gloucester men in the operation of the winter herring industry at Newfoundland. Right now even have they begun to elbow the Gloucester fleet from a fishery it has controlled for years, several craft having set out to secure cargoes.
>
> All this has been made possible by the recent enactment of the Underwood tariff schedule, abolishing the import tax on sea food irrespective of the transportating ship's nationality.

Another prominent man, Mr. A. Handfield Whitman of Halifax, in discussing this question in the New Year's issue of the Morning Chronicle, newspaper, says:

> The outstanding incident in 1913 in regard to the fishing industry was the removal of the duty by the United States Government. Free entry of fish into the United States must bring a tremendous development in Canada's fishing industry.

Everybody who has read the reciprocity agreement knows that it would have given us much greater benefits than we enjoy under the Wilson tariff. The reciprocity agreement would have given us practically a monopoly of the United States market, while the fisherman from abroad who shipped his salt mackerel to the United States from England, Ireland or Holland, would have to pay $2 a barrel, Canadian mackerel, under the reciprocity agreement, would have entered the United States market free of duty. The Wilson tariff does not give us that advantage because we have to compete with other nations in the American market.

The chief difficulty in taking advantage of the United States market is the want of transportation facilities. Our needs in Eastern Nova Scotia, and I am speaking now largely for my own constitutency, are twofold; in the first place, we require a branch railway in order to reach our home market, and our home market of course is not to be despised. At present we look upon it as the best market we have, and it will continue to develop as the population of the country increases. But in the constituency that I have the honour to represent we are not able to get into touch with the home market owing to the lack of railway facilities. Apart from my own constituency, and speaking for the southern coast of Nova Scotia generally, I am of opinion that a fast line of boats connecting our chief ports with the city of Boston would be of immense advantage to the fishing industry and would help to develop a very large trade with the United States. I have brought this question of branch lines to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals several times. He has given me various answers and does not seem to be in any great hurry to deal with this question. At all events he cannot be charged with any indecent haste in regard to it. But he has been talking about it for several years. In 1912, when I asked him if he was prepared to go forward with the proposition which was inaugurated by the late Government, he informed me that he would require to have a survey made before he could say that. In 1913 he informed me that he would require to send a traffic expert down to see that country in order to find out whether the Government would be justified in spending any money on that branch line. To-day he tells me that the matter is under consideration. I do not know what has happened or what is going to be done, but it is always something in the future; it is like the little boy's complaint about his mother; it is jam to-morrow, jam the day after to-morrow, but it is never jam to-day. I would like to have this question brought to a head and have the minister deal with it. Any one who has followed the discussion in the House will remember that the late Government undertook to build certain branch lines in the province of Nova Scotia and one through this territory, and that a contract was let for the building of this line prior to the defeat of the late Government. A deposit of $50,000 was put up by the contractor, and the Sunnybrae branch was purchased from the Nova Scotia Steel Company at a cost of $100,000 to form part of the line. All of these things were done at the time this Government came into power. The same situation existed with regard to the branch line in the county of Halifax. The branch line in the county of Halifax went on and I am told that it will be completed next summer. But, the contract was cancelled in the county of Guysborough, the $50,000 deposit was paid back to the contractor and ever since that day we have been having evasive answers from the Government as to what they intend to do in reference to this branch line.

I pointed out to the minister last year that if he did undertake to build this branch line he would find sufficient traffic to justify the expenditure; that a large tourist traffic could be developed, and that along the proposed line there are large quantities of spruce and hardwood and also quantities of pulp and pitwood for which there is a good market in the coal mines of Cape Breton. The railway would also pass through a good agricultural country, but perhaps the greatest development would take place in connection with our fishing industry. That is what I am dealing with chiefly to-night. As a proof of the position I take in connection with the fishing industry, I would like to place before the House some statistics as to what has been done at Canso, Queensport, Half Island Cove, and places around Chedabucto bay that are now brought into connection with the railway at Port Mulgrave by a steamboat service. These places would not be able to carry on a fresh fish business at all were it not that they have a daily connection with the Intercolonial railway at Mulgrave, and the progress that has been made by these places indicates to my mind what could be done at other points in the same part of Nova Scotia if they had the facilities to ship out the fish they catch. I have before me here the results of the traffic carried by these boats to Port Mulgrave for the past ten years. The figures are:

Year.	Tons fish Shipped.	Value.	Railway and express charges paid.
		$	$
1903	1600	112,000	16,840 00
1904	1700	127,500	17,680 00
1905	2201	116,070	23,032 06
1906	3154	220,780	29,063 01
1907	3156	220,920	27,417 70
1908	3372	235,900	31,644 03
1909	2371	191,170	26,685 55
1910	3431	240,100	36,022 58
1911	4110	308,250	45,179 11
1912	4238	317,850	45,730 69
1913	5314	398,550	60,442 21

I am giving you, Mr. Speaker, these details, to show the growth of the fishing industry at Canso, and these other two points that are served by the boats that carry traffic to the railway at Mulgrave. In addition there are certain shipments of fish and fish products from Canso by water. The figures for 1913 are as follows:

		Value.	Freights.
250	tons fish oil.. ..	$ 12,000	$1,200
75	tons fish glue ..	9,000	360
350	tons fish fertilizer..	12,250	1,750
1,100	tons fish	77,000	5,500
1,775	tons.	$110,250	$8,810

This table shows the steady growth of the fresh fish business from these points. To sum up: in the year 1903, the quantity of fresh fish shipped was 1,600 tons while in 1913, the year just passed, the quantity was 5,314 tons; in 1903 the value of the fish shipped from these three points was $112,000, in 1913 it was $398,550; in 1903 the express and freight charges paid to the Intercolonial railway at Mulgrave on this fish was $16,840 and in 1913 it was $60,442.41.

I submit that this is a splendid showing, and it has been made possible only by the traffic facilities that are afforded; it could be enormously increased if there were railway facilities given to Canso. To sum that up: the fresh fish shipped in 1913 from these points amounted to 5,314 tons; the fish products to 1,775 tons, making in all 7,089 tons. Allowing twenty tons to the carload, that gives us 354 carloads or one carload a day for every working day in the year 1913. The winter fishing, which is chiefly carried on in the months of November, December and January is the most profitable on that coast. The winter fishing is not prosecuted at very many points along the coast of Nova Scotia because there are no facilities for getting the fish to the market. I shall give the result of two weeks' work at Canso in the month of January of the present year, and the figures I shall now quote are for the week ending January 3, 1914. I want to give these facts in detail so that the Minister of Railways can send his traffic expert to Canso to check the statements I make and find out whether they are correct or not. The following table gives the landings of haddock by some of the larger boats of the Canso fleet for the week ending January 3, 1914; I give the names of the captains, the number of dories, and the number of pounds caught:

Landings of Haddock by some of the Larger Boats of the Canso Fleet, Week ending January 3, 1914.

S. Hurst	1	8,000
John Carter	1	11,000
		612,000
Dories and other boats		300,000
		912,000

Other boats and dores caught 300,000 lbs., making a total of 912,000 lbs. of fish caught in that week. This is 456 tons or 23 carloads, representing four carloads per day of possible traffic from that one point alone in one week. The following week, the week ending on the 10th of January, owing to storms the catch was not so large, but with the same fleet it amounted to about 700,000 lbs., or 350 tons, or 17 carloads making three carloads per day for that week. This will give the Minister of Railways and the House an idea of the traffic that can be developed from the fishing industry, provided proper transportation facilities are afforded. What has been done at Canso can be done on a smaller scale at Whitehead, Country Harbour, Liscombe, and I have no doubt at many other points on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia. Give us transportation facilities, with an open market in the United States, and no man can set a limit to the possible extension of the fishing business. You may ask, Mr. Speaker, what I propose, and I will give you a clear-cut proposition as to what I think ought to be done. As far as my own constituency is concerned, I have already pointed out that our great need is a branch railway. That would give us direct communication with the home market, and it would also, to some extent, put us in touch with the markets of the United States. The second proposal I have I address chiefly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat now, but perhaps the leader of the House would be kind enough to point this matter out to him. My proposal is that the Government should offer a substantial subsidy to assist a fast line of boats, adapted to the fish trade and equipped with cold storage, to call at various points on the coast of Nova Scotia between Cape Breton and Yarmouth, and to make at least three trips a week between the Maritime provinces and Boston. This would involve, no doubt, the expenditure of a considerable sum of money.

Mr. HAZEN: Does my hon. friend mean three trips a week between the Maritime provinces and Boston, or does he mean three trips a week between Yarmouth and Boston?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not speaking just now for Yarmouth, because Yarmouth has pretty good facilities. I presume the hon. member for Yarmouth will tell us what is being done at that point. I am chiefly concerned now with eastern Nova Scotia.

Mr. HAZEN: I wanted to understand if my hon. friend is advocating that a direct line of steamers should be put on between Canso and the ports to which he refers, and Boston; or, that there should be a line of steamers from these ports to Yarmouth to connect with the steamers from Yarmouth to Boston.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would have no objection to the system being combined with the present line of steamers. I am not undertaking to say how it ought to be done. If I can persuade the Government to give us steamboat communication between these ports and Boston, the Government will have to work out the details as to how it is best to do it. I do not want to duplicate the boats from Yarmouth to Boston, but I presume the Government would not do that unless they thought it absolutely necessary to do so. My own view is that a successful business can best be done by freight boats. The boats from Boston to Yarmouth are passenger boats. I would like to see a fast fish line in the business that would be devoted specially to carrying fish, and I do not know whether it would be wise that passengers should be included. As I have stated, this will involve the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, but in my judgment it would be justified. It would bring much better results than some of the expenditures we are now making. For instance, we are asked to vote the large sum of $340,666 to assist steam service between Canada and the West Indies and South America, and we are also asked to vote $146,000 for steam service with South Africa. I am not objecting to these subsidies, but I do say that if you could give us one-half of these sums to equip a fish-carrying service between our Atlantic ports and the American market, you will get far better results than you will ever get out of the South American trade or out of the South African trade. I regard this as the chance of a lifetime for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He does not need to travel like Gulliver all over the world to find this trade; it is right at his very door staring him in the face. Look at it; we have teeming millions of people across the boundary, and they are a fish-consuming people. They must get their chief supply from Canada, either from the Pacific coast or from the Atlantic coast. We have in eastern Canada five thousand miles of coast line comprising perhaps the most valuable fisheries in the world. We have the men. There are no better men on the seven seas than there are in eastern Canada. We have the harbours; we control the bait and we control the base of supplies. In addition to all this, the richest, the biggest and the best market in the world is thrown open to us. What we have not got and never have had is proper transportation facilities. That is what we are asking for.

I regard this as a real emergency. The question will arise: will this Government take advantage of the splendid opening for which the people of Nova Scotia have been waiting and looking for the last fifty years? It is quite true that by taking advantage of this opening, there will be more truck and trade with the Yankees, but we have that now on a very large scale and it is growing larger year by year. On this question of trade with the Yankees we have an extraordinary situation in this country. If we are to adopt the Tory philosophy of 1911, that it would endanger British connection, we have at the present time our Canadian patriotism flowing across the boundary line at the rate of $2,000,000 a day for every day of ten hours during the whole of 1913. That is $200,000 an hour or $3,333.33 every minute. This is an alarming state of affairs. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) however does not appear to be taking any steps to stop it. He just sits in his cozy seat, shuts one eye and winks at the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), and both gentlemen are laughing in their sleeves at the poor deluded devils who left our party and voted Tory in 1911, for the purpose of stopping this trade with the Yankees.

I hope that no considerations of consistency will deter the Government from taking steps in regard to the matter that I am proposing. A great American philosopher once said that consistency was the hobgoblin of little minds. Speak what you think to-day in words as hard as cannon balls, and to-morrow speak again what you think in words as hard again, although you should contradict every word that you said to-day. That is the philosophy I would commend to my hon. friends on the other side, owing to the circumstances in which they find themselves.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) would have to turn a sharp corner in order to do this, but he turned a sharp corner not long ago on the naval question and I think he is quite capable of doing so again. I hope that he will deal with the situation promptly and vigorously, and that he will do whatever is necessary to put the project on its feet. I venture to say that it will be the greatest stroke of business that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will ever have an opportunity of doing for the Maritime provinces. Let him do this and great results will follow. Towns will grow up all along our coasts. Our deserted shipyards will spring into life again. Thousands of our best seamen, who are now the hirelings of the nabobs of Boston and Gloucester, will return home to develop our own country; the Maritime provinces will win back their old prestige on the sea and Canada will take her rightful place as a great Maritime power. Is not that an achievement worthy of a statesman, even if he has to turn a sharp corner in order to carry it out? I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will measure up to the opportunity and that, when the Supplementary Estimates are tabled, he will be able to find a favourable solution.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): I desire to say a word or two in support of the resolution introduced by my hon. friend the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). The Estimates that were tabled a few days ago contained various sums by way of steamship subventions for the purpose of encouraging traffic in various parts of the world. On reading over those Estimates I find that the following sums are provided for:

Steamship service between:
Annapolis and London	$ 5,000
Canadian Atlantic ports and Australia and New Zealand	140,000
Canada and Great Britain	1,000,000
Canada and Cuba	25,000
Canada and Newfoundland	70,000
Canada and West Indies and South America	340,666
Canada and South Africa	146,000
Halifax, St. John and Liverpool	20,000
Montreal, Quebec and Manchester; St. John, Halifax and Manchester	35,000
St. John and Dublin and Belfast	7,500
St. John and Glasgow	15,000
St. John, Halifax and London	40,000
Canada and Australia and New Zealand, Pacific Ocean	180,500
Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte Island	16,000
Victoria and San Francisco	3,000

This last item appears for the first time, I think, in the Estimates of a federal Government. Whatever may have been in the past, the record of the party now in power, at all events they have taken a new departure, inasmuch as they have provided a subsidy to encourage traffic between British Columbia and United States cities on the Pacific coast. We in the province of Nova Scotia are asking that the Government shall pursue a similar course in respect to the development of trade between the province of Nova Scotia and the New England states. My hon. friend from Guysborough, in the course of his observations, laid upon the table figures showing the splendid development of the fishing industry in the port of Canso, which is situated in the county which he represents. Nine miles from the town of Canso are situated the fishing centres of Arichat and Petit du Grat, in the county of Richmond, which I have the honour to represent. Their record in the development of the fishing industry is equal to the record given to this House by my hon. friend from Guysborough.

The traffic which has been developed along the lines for which the steamship subventions, which I have just quoted, have been provided, is as follows:

Canadian trade for the eight months ending November 30, 1914:
Australia and New Zealand	$ 6,253,431
Cuba	4,479,100
Newfoundland	4,966,928
West Indies (Br. and foreign)	7,027,436
South America	2,792,654
South Africa	2,952,612
United States	416,696,316

Therefore, no matter what may be the disposition of the hon. gentlemen who now form the Government of this country, with respect to their desire to curtail or curb traffic with the United States, that traffic is increasing enormously, as my hon. friend from Guysborough has pointed out.

The people of the Maritime provinces have already benefited very considerably by the action of the United States Government in putting fish upon the free list. What my hon. friend from Guysborough suggests is quite within the means and power of the present Government. We have a line of steamships running between the town of Port Hawkesbury and the city of Boston which are already operated during the summer months. Unfortunately, the owners of these boats, not being in the enjoyment of any subvention from the federal Government, do not feel any special obligation to develop the business except that which comes to them in the ordinary way. While these steamships take their departure from Port Hawkesbury, in Inverness county, they make no call along the coast of Nova Scotia until they come to Halifax, and from Halifax they sail direct to Boston. It would be a very desirable and commendable object if the Government would adopt a system which would induce, if not the present steamship company plying from Port Hawkesbury and Halifax to Boston, then some other steamship company, to place steamers on that route that would call not only at Port Hawkesbury but also call at Arichat and take the fish week by week that would offer for transportation along that route. The county I have the honour to represent is about in the same position as Guysborough as regards the incompleteness of its railway accommodation. We have a railway from Point Tupper to St. Peters. But it is a privately-owned road, and so, unfortunately, a shipment of fish sent over it by express must pay a double rate before reaching its destination. The acquisition of the Cape Breton railway by the Government, the extending of it to Arichat and Sydney and Louisburg, and its operation as a branch of the Intercolonial railway, would be a boon that I have endeavoured to urge upon the Government in the past. I reiterate the desirability of this project, and I hope that the plan for the acquiring of these branch lines as feeders for the Intercolonial railway has not been abandoned, notwithstanding the fact that no intimation has been given by His Royal Highness at the opening of Parliament that would lead us to believe that the present Government intends taking up that question in the very near future. The present transportation is entirely inadequate for the people of the province of Nova Scotia as respects the important industry to which I refer. I desire to impress upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as well the absolute necessity of accepting the principle embodied in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Guysborough and voting at an early day a sum of money to assist the transportation problems of Nova Scotia in the shipment of fresh and salt fish to Boston in the same manner as that in which they have dealt with the transportation between Victoria and the city of San Francisco.

Mr. B. B. LAW (Yarmouth): The resolution brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), to my mind, embodies one of the most important questions that this House has been called on to consider. Representing as I do the county of Yarmouth, which is the gateway between Nova Scotia and the United States, I should not be doing my duty if I did not say a word in connection with this subject. The hon. member for Guysborough has dealt with the matter in a very large and broad manner; I propose, in the few minutes which I intend to occupy, to deal with it more from a local standpoint. We have had from the port of Yarmouth for sixty years, owing to the energy and enterprise of the people of Yarmouth, a steamboat service
9 p.m. between Yarmouth and Boston. For many years these boats were owned by the people of Yarmouth, down to the time when the Dominion Atlantic railway absorbed the old Yarmouth Steamship Company. Afterwards this was taken over by the Canadian Pacific railway, and lately the Canadian Pacific railway has transferred the boats and steamboat service to the Boston and Yarmouth Steamboat Company. Twenty or twenty-five years ago we had two ships per week from Yarmouth to Boston. We have the same to-day. But I am happy to say that the steamboat service is, at the present time, and since the coming into effect of the Wilson tariff in October last, has been inadequate to carry the fresh fish and other goods that are offered for transportation from Yarmouth to Boston. As I have said, Yarmouth is the gateway to and from the western part of Nova Scotia. There is no steamboat communication between the Maritime provinces and Boston short of St. John on the north and Halifax on the east. And in many instances fish has been sent direct from Halifax by train to connect with the boats from Yarmouth to Boston. The people of Yarmouth realized the truth of what we said when we told them, weeks and weeks before September, 1911, that to give the fishermen of the Maritime provinces entry for their fresh fish into the United States market would bring about an era of development such as they had never seen before. And the present state of affairs proves the truth of what we said at that time. I am glad to say that the people of Yarmouth were not hoodwinked by the excuses and arguments used by our friends on the opposite side when they said that we did not want the United States market, that the United States were composed of ninety millions of hogs and we wanted no dealings with them. I can only say that if the people of the United States are hogs, we like to deal with them. The money we get from them is clean, and it is about the only money we do get. I do not wish to speak in an offensive manner, but every dollar we get from the sale of fish to the United States we have to spend to pay for flour, feed, harness and almost everything else we use. There is nothing we can ship to Ontario, but our trade is naturally with the United States. Since the Wilson tariff came into effect there has not been a trip of these steamers when they have not been obliged to leave freight behind. I desire to read a letter which appeared in the Yarmouth Herald of the 27th of January last, which deals with the question of transportation:

Dear Sir,—Kindly allow us a short space in your valuable columns for a few remarks concerning our transportation facilities. It comes to this: Something must be done in order to make provision to have more accommodation for carrying the freight from Yarmouth to Boston.

There has not been a single trip this season that all the freight has been taken to Boston, and in a few instances there has been almost a load for the boat left on the wharf and at other stations.

Now there is one sure remedy for this, and that is to get a line of boats in opposition. Already there is a petition afloat, and is being freely signed by the shippers of all kinds of fresh and salt fish in the different localities.

Hoping that this will meet with the approval of all concerned, and thanking you, Mr. Editor, for your valuable space, we are,

Yours truly,

Shippers.

I must say I do not quite agree with the third paragraph of that letter, that the only sure remedy is in an opposition boat. I am afraid that if another boat were put on that route, we should have a very poor service indeed. I think that the proposals which I intend to make to the Government before I conclude would be very much better. In order to give you an idea of the amount of traffic carried on in fresh fish between Yarmouth and Boston I wish to read the list of cargo of the steamer Boston, from Yarmouth, on January 24 last:

Steamer Boston had as part of her outward cargo: 232 crates live lobsters, 821 boxes boneless cod, 300 drums dry salt cod, 8 barrels salt herring, 2 barrels salt mackerel, 20 cases pickled fish, 65 packages fish waste, 161 packages fresh fish, 130 boxes smelts, 1 box halibut, 11 barrels eels, 13 boxes finnan haddies, 80 cases canned lobsters, 10 bags hake sounds, 54 barrels clams, 2 barrels apples, 1 crate moose horns, value $18,316.

On her next trip on January 28 she carried the following cargo:

513 crates live lobsters, 129 boxes boneless cod, 550 drums dry fish, 151 cases fresh do, 139 packages smelts, 20 barrels herring, 7 cases pickled fish, 2 barrels salt mackerel, 3 boxes finnan haddies, 24 barrels clams, 100 cases lobsters, 2 cases eggs, 85 packages junk, 12 packages hides, 5 barrels fish waste, 3 barrels turnips, 5 boxes scrap iron, value $39,651.

On the two trips she carried fish and fish products to the value of $59,000 and she left behind on the wharf at Yarmouth quite a quantity of fish which she could not carry. Something, of course, must be done. The fishermen of the province of Nova Scotia and of Canada have had very little done for them. I do not know of any means of helping them except the proposals I intend to make. They are engaged in one of the most hazardous occupations I know of. They are exposed to danger and storm and hardly a week passes without the loss by drowning of one, two, three or more of these fishermen. The boats which they use to prosecute their business are small gasoline boats and they are anxious, of course, to get off to their lobster traps in the winter; and on that coast it is no pleasure trip to go on the sea at any time during the winter season. These fishermen have not had very much done for them. I was in hopes that the people of Canada, when they had an opportunity of voting in September last, would have voted for reciprocity which would have given the greatest era of prosperity that Canada has ever seen. We are getting some of the benefits of it to-day, but of course only to a small extent. Where the Boston is making two trips a week to-day, I am positive that inside of two months they will have to make four trips a week. The Board of Trade have taken this matter up with the Steamship Company, and I understand that they have promised four trips before the first of March. I think that under the circumstances this Government should do something for the fishermen. They were promised many things in the campaign of 1911, and I am sure that the member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr.

McCurdy) will remember many of these promises. The argument was used that a lot was to be done for the fishermen if this Government came into power. They went so far as to say that the fishermen of Nova Scotia would be provided with medicine free. If they wanted a box of pills or a dose of salts or anything this Government was prepared to furnish it to them; but I am sorry to say that up to the present these fishermen have suffered, I presume, untold miseries from the lack of these medicines which were promised them. I desire to say that my idea of assisting the fishermen of the western part of Nova Scotia is by the installation of cold storage on board the steamers plying between Yarmouth and Boston. The lobster, as many of you know, has to be marketed alive and is different from most any other fish. A lobster arriving in Boston dead or, as they call it, sleeping, is immediately thrown away as unfit for use. On the boats between Yarmouth and Boston there are not proper facilities for handling this fish or landing them without much loss. By the installation of cold storage a large amount of money would be saved for the fishermen, and I believe the Government should assist the steamboat company in providing cold storage on board these steamers for the better facility of handling not only lobsters but other fish which is sent to Boston.

The second point I would urge upon the Government to-day to assist the fishermen in marketing their fish would be to improve the harbour accommodation. The managers of the Boston and Yarmouth Steamship Company tell me that to put another boat on the route between Yarmouth and Boston involves a very large amount of money, and, having handled ships for some years, I am quite confident that they are right in this statement. Larger boats could be built and run between these two ports and the service could be increased. My own opinion is that with free entry of fish into the United States market it will not be long before two boats are required.

The third suggestion I have to make to the Government is that in order to improve the facilities between Yarmouth and Boston dredging should be done and our harbour should be improved. The boats which are running there to-day, making two trips per week in winter and six trips in summer, are as large as the port of Yarmouth will accommodate, and I sincerely hope that the Government may see fit, instead of putting a large amount of money in the Estimates, as they have done during the time they have been in power, and not spending it, will put a large amount in the Estimates and spend it. Our port at Yarmouth is one of the most important on the coast. It serves the counties of Digby and Annapolis, and it serves the whole south shore, all the way to Halifax. It is the port for the transportation, not only of fish, but of all other articles of produce, and I trust that the Government will see its way clear to give a large appropriation for improving and dredging the harbour of Yarmouth so that larger boats can be put on the route and that transportation companies will not have the excuse that there is not water enough in Yarmouth harbour to put on large boats. Let us put the horse before the cart and not the cart before the horse, let us not wait until the boats are ready to come and then find that there is not enough water for them to enter the harbour. Let us do the dredging first and invite the transportation companies to put on larger boats and give our fishermen and farmers proper transportation facilities, which they must have between the western part of Nova Scotia and Boston. The western part of Nova Scotia has dealt with Boston for many, many years. To-day, with the duty off fish and with the duty off our produce to a certain extent, although nothing like the same extent as it would have been under the reciprocity agreement, a trade will spring up between those ports which the boats at present on the route will be quite unable to handle.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.): I would like to make a suggestion to the Government in regard to this matter, which I think would be of advantage to the people of the western part of Canada and of Ontario. Instead of subsidizing steamers to carry this beautiful fish from the Maritime provinces to the United States, I would suggest that the Government provide transportation facilities in connection with the Intercolonial railway so that the people of Ontario, Manitoba and the West can get the benefit of the fish taken from the eastern waters of Canada. A great number of people are engaged in the Maritime provinces to-day in fishing. The cost of transporting this fish to Ontario is very great and I think the Government instead of subsidizing steamers as suggested by the hon. gentlemen opposite, should reduce freight rates between the Maritime provinces and the West, thereby giving western people the benefit of this fish. To-day if the people of Ontario want fish they have to get it from Portland. The United States provides facilities for shipping this fish from Portland, and why should not our own railways be utilized for distributing this fish throughout Canada? In the province from which I come, a great quantity of fish is caught, especially on the north side, but unfortunately we have no railway facilities to take that fish from the north side to the main line of the Prince Edward Island railway, but I think that within a very short time the Government will see fit to provide such facilities. I have no doubt that when the car ferry from Prince Edward Island to the mainland is built a great impetus will be given to the fish industry, and then the people of western Canada, and especially Ontario —we in the East call Ontario West—will receive the benefit of this fish. I know the Minister of Railways is inclined if a sufficient inducement is held out, to put on fish trains from Hawkesbury and Halifax to Montreal, and I should think that these men who have been shouting for a subsidy for steamers from Yarmouth and Hawkesbury would see that it would be in their interests to work up a trade within their own country.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM (Inverness): I desire to place myself on record as supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). I have listened with considerable interest to what my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. McLean) has said. He would intimate that the late Government did not do very much for the fish trade upon the Atlantic coast. I am of the opinion that the late Government did a great deal in that direction. My hon. friend must not forget that the late Government made certain arrangements by which cold storage cars from Atlantic ports to Montreal were placed at the disposal of eastern shippers on two days in the week and were to be hauled by fast freight. Not only that, but the late Government guaranteed the payment of one-third of the express rates from Mulgrave and Halifax to the eastern boundary of Manitoba. I think similar concessions were given to the western part of the country. My hon. friend should not forget these facts. I am quite in agreement with him that anything that can be done to help along the trade between the East and the centre and West of Canada, is an excellent idea, and I would always be in favour of that. But we in the East are ambitious; we are not satisfied with one market. If there is another market offering—and a good market we know it is—have we not a perfect right to look for it? If there are a dozen markets offering I think we should try to get them. In my opinion, that is what constitutes a great nation. However, my hon. friend will not forget after this, to give credit where credit is due. I must thank my hon. friend from Guysborough for bringing up this matter in the House. I must also congratulate him and other hon. gentlemen for having given us so much information. I cannot hope in the short time at my disposal to contribute very much to this discussion. I wish, however, to refer to the fish trade as it affects my own county. The fish trade in eastern Canada previous to 1907 was at a low ebb and in anything but a satisfactory condition, and remained so until the concessions I referred to were made by the late Government. Ever since then, the trade of Montreal, Toronto and western Canada has been increasing in a very satisfactory way. That trade was formerly in the hands of our American neighbours, but we succeeded in capturing it from them, and it is now a great boon to our eastern shippers.

I desire to refer to a return I received this afternoon with regard to the Fishery Advisory Board, which to my mind is an institution calculated to greatly benefit the industry. I am sorry however, and I want to call the attention of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. A. A. McLean) to this, that there is not a man on that Advisory Board east of the city of Halifax. That is unfortunate, because our best fishing grounds are around the Island of Cape Breton and off the coast of Guysborough County and our biggest fish shipping ports are around the coast of the county of Guysborough and in Cape Breton Island particularly Port Hawkesbury, Port Hood and Margaree, Grand Etang and Cheticamp. There is another defect in this board—a very serious defect to my mind—and that is the absence of real fishermen. There are eighteen members on the board and with the exception of one, I think, they are all business men. I regard that as a great mistake. I consider that one-half of the members of that board should be men engaged in the fishing industry. I take it that the duty of the board is to inform the Government as to what the fishing industry and trade really requires, and I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to that. Possibly he may revise the list. This Advisory Board could be of great help to the fishing industry, but I fear that industry will not receive the attention from the board that it would receive if we had, at least, a sprinkling of fishermen on it.

Just a word or two with regard to the American market which has been thrown open to us by the Underwood tariff. Some hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that the Underwood tariff has opened up the markets of the United States to us and that we will get the same measure of benefit from it as we would have from reciprocity.

I do not believe that it would do this at all. The fact is we had the exclusive trade privileges under reciprocity whereas under the present American tariff we must share that privilege with all the nations of the world. I took the trouble to look up the shipments from other countries to the United States. We have competitors today in the American market with some of the mist aggressive traders in the world in fish and fish products. We must compete particularly with three countries—Norway, Newfoundland and the United Kingdom. Of the very articles of fish that are shipped from our country into the United States, I might say that the United Kingdom sends nearly $2,000,000 worth to that country. We are in competition with Newfoundland which sends in a million dollars worth of the very same class of article of fish. We are in competition with Norway which sends a million and a half dollars worth of the same kind of fish to the United States. Under the reciprocity agreement we had an exclusive right, which we cannot hope to enjoy under the Underwood tariff. That is one reason why I believe we should get as much aid from the Government as we possibly can to enable us to cope successfully with those countries. I trust that the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Guysborough will fall upon fertile soil. I trust that it will be productive of some good result and that our means of transportation to that country will receive honest and careful consideration from this Governement.

I am particularly anxious for the reason, I suppose, that I represent here a constituency that is more in need of the improved transportation facilities for fish than any other constituency in Canada. We have one of the finest fishing counties in Canada, we have a hundred miles of coast along the county of Inverness, fronted by the finest fishing grounds in the world, but unfortunately. we are deprived of good harbours. They are all bar harbours along that coast. We are also bound up for four or five months of the year with ice. This makes it very difficult to carry on the fishing industry as we would like to carry it on because the industry can be carried on along this particular coast to a marvelously greater degree that it has been in the past if we can only get improved facilities for transporting our fish to the American market. I may say, as my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Law) has already said, that it is an unfortunate thing that our harbours have been neglected so very much for the last two and a half years. I am not going to refer to this particularly now as I hope to have another opportunity later on to discuss several cases in detail.

When the late Government went out of office there was at least $200,000 of public grants to be spent along that coast. Not one dollar of that money has been spent, but the saddest thing of all is that our harbours, wharfs and breakwaters along the coast are in a deplorable condition. I can say without the slightest exaggeration that at least $100,000 worth of public property along the coast of Inverness was destroyed within the last two years when an expenditure of not more than $3,000 would have save this property. The money was granted but it was never spent there. It is most unfortunate, but it is true. That is the situation we are in. We have no proper harbours and we are tied up by ice for a large section of the year.

There is only one way by which we can hope to develop our fisheries along that coast and that is by the construction of a line of railway from Orangedale on the Intercolonial to Cheticamp. I have advocated the construction of this road since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. Before the late Government went out of office I had the assurance—and I make the statement in the presence of hon. gentlemen who were members of that Government— that this line would be constructed and I am convinced had the late Government been returned to power this road would be nearing completion now. Further than that, I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) to it. I intend to go more into detail in connection with the construction of this proposed road later on.

However, I may say that this proposed road from Orangedale to Cheticamp was surveyed. I called the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to it two years ago. A delegation came from my county, we saw the minister, and I suggested to him that he send an engineer down to find out the traffic prospects of this line. This the minister agreed to do regarding this suggestion as a good one. An engineer was sent down, I think a competent man, at least who was selected by the minister from his own staff. The report of that engineer I have seen and I am proud to say that it advocated strongly the construction of the road from an economical standpoint. He, the engineer, said in his report that this was a line that would justify its construction. We know the doctrine propounded by the Minister of Railways in regard to the construction of branch lines to the I.C.R. He said that if any line could be shown as likely to be a feeder rather than a milker of the Intercolonial Railway, he would agree to its construction. Here was a case where his own engineer stated in his report that the road would be a paying road and that it should be constructed. With these facts before us I was very much disappointed indeed that nothing was shown in the Estimates brought down the other day in respect to this road. However, as a delegation is coming up from my county in a short time, I will refrain from saying anything more about that road at present.

I may say again that the only way in which I hope to see our important fishing industry developed in the north end of the county of Inverness is through the construction of this road. In a certain section in the south the industry could be helped along very materially by placing along the coast a daily boat that would carry the product of the fishermen's industry from this southern portion of the county to the Intercolonial railway at Mulgrave. This of course would have reference to that part of the county not served by the proposed Orangedale-Cheticamp line. I am in hopes that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) will see his way clear to placing from year to year in the Estimates an amount by way of subsidy to induce a company to send daily boats along that part of the coast of Inverness County not served by the proposed branch railway after that road is constructed, but until that time such daily service to go along the coast as far as Pleasant Bay.

With these two things, I am satisfied that the county of Inverness is destined to come to its own. Considering the number of men engaged in the industry and the quantity of fish caught daily along that coast, even with antiquated methods of exportation, I am sure that with the adoption of modern methods great results can be expected. There are 1,500 men engaged in the industry now. My hon. friend from Guysboro has shown the results of the industry as carried on at Canso, and I am sure that if we had similar facilities to those enjoyed by the people at that port, at least 5,000 men would be engaged in this industry alone. I trust, Sir, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will see his way clear to give us a subsidy for a boat to ply along the coast of Inverness, and that the Minister of Railways and Canals will take into consideration the report of his own engineer and that he will see his way clear to the construction of a line from Orangedale to Cheticamp. This will solve the question of transportation as far as the county of Inverness is concerned.

Just another word and I am through, and that is in regard to this advisory board again. Let me suggest to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he place upon this advisory board at least one member from the county of Inverness, and that one a fisherman. I will allow other hon. gentlemen to speak for other parts of eastern Nova Scotia, but I speak for this part of it, and if the minister would only take into consideration how important it is to have a fisherman on this board, he would realize that it would be a step in the right direction to name a man from the county of Inverness. He has a number of friends there; too many I am sorry to say. It will be my pleasure to recommend to him a man of whose staunch Conservative faith I can assure him, and he need not have any hesitation in taking my word for it. There are a number of fishermen there who are well fitted to act as members of this board. I took the trouble of looking over the names of the men on the Fisheries Advisory Board, and I have nothing to say against any of them except that they are not fishermen; they are fish buyers mostly. I state most emphatically that the fishermen should be represented on this board. The allowance of $10 a day given to the members of the board while they are on duty, together with their travelling and other expenses, is quite sufficient to ensure that the minister will get good men. I conclude by saying that if the minister has not a larger sprinkling of fishermen on this advisory board, it is going to prove a failure, and I would be very sorry to think that it should.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Shelburne-Queens): I was very much pleased to hear the statement of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Law) that the steamship company which operates between Yarmouth and Boston, had given an assurance to the Yarmouth Board of Trade that they would, on March 1, put extra boats on that service to give the much desired four trips a week. It has always been somewhat of a puzzle to me why, with such a large quantity of freight—and valuable freight at that—offering at Yarmouth, the steamship company which undertakes to look after that business should not of their own volition supply sufficient boats to take care of the traffic which is pressing on them.

It goes without saying that every one interested in the development of the fishing industry along the southern shore of Nova Scotia, and I am keenly concerned in this matter, is interested in any proposition which makes for better transportation facilities for our fish to all points on which we depend for our market.

I would be the last to fail to appreciate the assistance given by the late Government towards improving transportation facilities and the safe and rapid despatch of fish and fish products to the markets. I believe that the assistance given by way of a rebate on express charges on fresh fish shipments did much towards facilitating the movement of fresh fish to the western market, but I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the present Government has already taken another and very important step in advance in that direction. We must all know that in order to land fish fresh on the market, we require not iced express shipments or a refrigerator freight car service, but an express refrigerator car service .

The efforts of the late Government were devoted towards shipments by express which embraced ordinary package shipment and iced shipment; the latter was not effective, because the ice often melted before the fish had travelled 100 miles on their journey, and the fish being placed on the market in poor condition made a poor advertisement for the Canadian fishing industry.

To afford further facilities and to place the trade on a better footing, the present Government has made arrangements by which regular express refrigerator service is available, and that is a most decided advantage to the industry.

It was with surprise that I heard such an astute gentleman as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) refer to what he described as the 'hysterical campaign' against reciprocity.

I may say that when the reciprocity campaign was launched, I had no hesitation in leaving a quiet business life and most pleasant surroundings to do what I regarded was my duty, in opposing what I then considered a 'bad bargain', and I claim that subsequent developments in connection with the fishing industry and the changes which the Americans have voluntarily made in their tariff on fish, amongst other of our natural products which they purely in their own interests made, have vindicated the stand taken by the Conservative party on the reciprocity question.

The hon. member for Guysborough has admitted the value of the home market. He probably knows, as well as any of us, that prior to the time when a duty was placed on finnan haddies, bloaters, kippers and other mild-cured or cured fish, our supply for consumption in Canada came from Gloucester, Portland and Boston. He knows well that the placing of a duty on such fish, and the assistance given by way of a rebate on express charges, built up in western Canada a valuable market for Canadian fish of that class. He knows that that market is now supplied, not from Boston, Gloucester, and Portland, but from Lockeport, Digby, Halifax, Canso and other places in eastern Canada. The hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) has to-night admitted the value of that market, and he has even gone so far as to say that he considers it our best market. When the reciprocity pact was put forward, we were in effect asked insofar as the Canadian market was concerned, to revert to conditions which existed in the old days when the Canadian market for this fish was supplied from Boston, Portland and Gloucester. We were asked to admit the American fish free into the Canadian market, which, as the hon. member for Guysborough says, is our best market, and we in turn were to have our fish admitted into the Boston market, which altho a broad, is an erratic market. I repeat that the policy of the Conservative party with regard to reciprocity has been vindicated because we have got without cost to us as valuable concessions from the United States as we would have obtained had the reciprocity pact been confirmed by the electors and our home markets sacrificed.

Our fish is now being admitted free into the American market, whatever that is worth, and it is worth something, I admit, and we have, at the same time, retained our home market. I cannot but think that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), in his heart of hearts, knows that we are better off to-day than if his fiscal theories had been approved of in 1911 by the Canadian electors. The hon. gentleman is a man of shrewdness who can appreciate a good bargain when he sees it, and I am quite sure that the view which I have put forward will appeal to his good business judgment.

Of course, every hon. member of the House approves of the idea contained in the resolution: that so far as legitimate assistance can be given to encourage the fishing industry it should be given. But when we come down to ways and means hon. gentlemen opposite are as diverse in their recommendations and differ as much in their ideas as to how actually the industry can be assisted, as they differ in regard to their selection of a new trade policy. They talk of subsidizing numerous and diverse steamship routes. There is one thing that occurs to me in connection with this discussion, and it is, that although these gentlemen opposite were in power for fifteen years, if I am correctly informed, they never initiated a precedent by subsidizing one single steamship line to develop trade between Canada and the United States. Fifteen years was surely long enough for them to decide upon some action, and be it remembered that their inaction was during a period when owing to more unfavourable conditions in the fishing industry, assistance was more required than under the conditions which exist to-day.

Being in somewhat constant touch with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, I am very pleased to note the great interest which the minister at the head of the department takes in the improvement of the administration of his department and the improvement of the many services connected with it.

In that regard, reference has been made to-night to the appointment of the Fisheries Advisory Board. A Shell-fish Commission has also been appointed. Accurate knowledge must precede action, and the hon. minister has been active in order to get the best suggestions possible as to what should be done in regard to the improvement of this industry. Those who are as closely in touch with the fishing industry as I have had the good fortune of being, cannot have failed to note the improvement in the enforcement of the fishery regulations under the administration of the present minister; also to the clearing out of streams, the abolition of the saw-dust nuisance and other things which tend to improve the fishing industry in its basic principles. Other phases of action will doubtless be personally touched upon by the hon. minister before this discussion closes.

One other point that I should like to emphasize is in connection with the statistics which have been placed on 'Hansard' to-night. I wish to point out that the administration of the Marine and Fisheries service under the present minister is apparently bearing abundant fruit, because the returns for the year 1913 given by the hon. member for Guysborough to-night show that in that year there has been the largest increase in the output of fish for any period during the last ten years.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I desire to say a few words in regard to the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Guysborough with reference to increased facilities for the transportation of fish to the United States. So far as I personally am concerned, I am much indebted to the hon. member for Guysborough, firstly for bringing this resolution before the House, secondly for the vast amount of information which he has given us. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy), while he taunted members on this side of the House, who had spoken of this subject, on being bad indicators as to the way in which it should be done, resumed his seat without giving us very much light as to how it should be done. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens should be as much interested as any member on this side of the House in getting wide markets for the Maritime provinces for the products of the sea; and if he is in a position to criticise hon. members who have spoken on their inability or incapacity to show how a better market and increased facilities could be obtained for the transportation of our fish, then he should be in a position to tell us exactly how the whole matter should be carried out. I wish to be fair with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, as I believe he is as much interested in this particular subject as any hon. member from the province of Nova Scotia. I do not think, however, that he did himself justice in the way in which he approached this subject. He said that a great benefit was given to the fishing industry of the province of Nova Scotia by the killing of reciprocity, but in the same breath he told us that the free market with the United States is worth something to the fishing industry of the province of Nova Scotia. If the United States fish market is to-day worth something to the people of Nova Scotia, it would have been worth a great deal more under reciprocity, because whereas to-day, under the Underwood tariff, we have to compete in that market with the whole world, under the reciprocity agreement we were the sole people of this world who would be allowed to send our fish into the United States market free of duty. In Newfoundland we have to compete with the greatest fishermen in the world. As a matter of fact the people of Nova Scotia are to-day unable to compete with them. We have not got the same facilities.

We are not, however, discussing reciprocity; we are discussing a proposition which will enable the fishermen of eastern Nova Scotia to get their fish to the best market in the easiest way. So far as the county of Cape Breton is concerned, the southern portions of that county, which I have the honour to represent, is practically without railways. The fishermen along the southern shore are not in a position to send their fish to market. The hon. member for Queens P.E.I. (Mr. A. A. McLean) and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens said that we have a great market in Canada. Undoubtedly we have a great market for fish in Canada, but what we in the eastern part of Nova Scotia are concerned with is the facilities for getting our fish to market. We do not care where the market is, whether it is in the United States, in Ontario, in Quebec, or in the West.

For the past two years resolutions have been introduced for the building of branch lines in the eastern section of Nova Scotia as feeders for the Intercolonial railway. I supported those resolutions on the ground that they would give the southern section of my constituency the opportunity of getting our farm products and the products of the sea to market. The Government have not given these resolutions much consideration. If they have given them any consideration, they have not told us so, and there is nothing in the Estimates to show that they are going to assist us in this respect.

The hon. member for Guysborough has put two propositions before the Government. The first is the building of branch lines as feeders of the Intercolonial railway. That would lessen the difficulties that the fishermen in his constituency have in getting their fish to market. It would also lessen the difficulties which the fishermen in southern Cape Breton have in getting their fish to market. It will take some time however, to build railways, and the Government have not started doing so yet. They have nothing in the Estimates for that purpose, and I must say that the first proposition of the hon. member for Guysborough seems to be a dead letter at the present time. Now, so far as the product of our fisheries is concerned we have only one way of getting them to market, and that is by a line of steamboats. Although I believe that at the present time the Boston market is the very best market the Nova Scotia fishermen have, yet I am not very particular where these subsidized boats carry the fish so long as they carry them to a good market.

We have in the southern section of the island of Cape Breton very good harbours. We have Louisburg, one of the very best harbours in the world, open the year round. We have a fairly good harbour at Gabarouse, which is one of the most important fishing stations on the north Atlantic, and another very important fishing station at Main-a-dieu. Unfortunately the harbour there is not good; but in the summer, with a line of steamers running along that shore, they could easily take their fish out and put them aboard these steamers. With reference to the question of whether we should or should not have a direct line from the eastern section of Nova Scotia—and I would call attention to the fact that my own constituency is most easterly—to the city of Boston or the New England states, that is a matter which the Government should consider. It was suggested, I think, by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that perhaps a line of steamers might be subsidized along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia which would connect with the Yarmouth line. From the statement of my hon. friend from Yarmouth I should think that the Yarmouth line as it at present exists, is over taxed, for he tells us that freight is being left on the wharfs at Yarmouth that these steamers cannot carry. It is sometimes considered very peculiar that we should be losing population in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, and especially in the fishing and farming districts of Cape Breton. We are sometimes told that it is the people's own fault, that they flock to the mine and steel works and industrial centres. That is not the case. The people of the district I represent, especially around Louisburg, Gabarouse and Main-a-dieu would never have to go into the mining industry or into the steel works if they had proper facilities for shipping their fish from their homes. The lack of such facilities has been a grievance with them for many years. They have the very best fishing grounds in the world along that shore. And the prices are good, both in Canada and the United States. The only difficulty is in getting the fish to market. What is the good of taking fish from the sea if you are going to let them rot on the shore? As a result of the inadequacy, or I may say the absolute want, of facilities for transportation in that part of the country, the people are forced to leave their homes and go into the industrial centres. I desire to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and also the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) who is in his seat, that, in my humble estimation that is the reason why the districts along the shore of southern Nova Scotia are becoming depopulated. And I think the hon. minister could not do a better thing for the province of Nova Scotia, especially the southern districts, than to subsidize, this session, a line of steamboats which would either connect with the boats at Yarmouth or run direct from the eastern sections of Nova Scotia to New England. Now, we are thankful to both Governments, the present and the late Government, for anything they have done to make the transportation of our province easier. But I say they have not done enough. The port of Yarmouth, at least, has not very much to complain of. In the first place, they have a railway running into that district, and then they have a direct line of steamers to Boston. As to our part of the country—and I say this in all seriousness, I never was more serious in my life—if something is not done to help the fishermen get the products of their labour to the market, the district from Port Hawkesbury to Glace Bay will be depopulated in a short time, and I hold that the Government—any government, either this or any other—would not wish to see that; every government wishes to do the best it can. But if they wish to do the best they can for that section of the country, it is their bounden duty, at this session—not letting it be further postponed—to do something to subsidize a line of steamboats to that section of the country that will give an outlet to the product of the fisheries of eastern Nova Scotia.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The resolution which my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has moved in favour of providing better transport for fresh fish between the Maritime provinces and the United States is one that, I am sure, is worthy of very careful attention on the part of the House and of the Government. It refers more particularly to matters which come within the control of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), because the means of transportation which the hon. gentleman suggests are, first the construction of branch railways in the county of Guysborough and, second, the providing of steamers for the purpose of carrying the products of the fisheries to market. The hon. Minister of Railways has not been in his place this evening, but I will call his attention to the matter,—though, perhaps it is hardly necessary to do so, for on several previous occasions I have heard the hon. member for Guysborough, when the Minister of Railways and Canals was present, pointing out what a great advantage the construction of these branch lines would be, and, among the advantages he claimed was that they would afford facilities for the shipment of the products of the fisheries. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is in his place, and it will not be necessary to call his attention to the matter further. I was sorry that the hon. member for Guysborough did not formulate some plan or tell us in what way he would suggest that his ideas could be carried into effect. And when I interposed and asked him if he suggested that there should be a direct line of steamers from Canso or other ports along the eastern coast of Nova Scotia to the markets, or whether he would favour a line of steamers along the coast connecting with the steamers from Yarmouth to Boston, he had not his mind thoroughly made up and would not give an opinion on the subject.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would be in favour of a direct line from Nova Scotia to Boston, if it be possible to get it.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman did not give me that information before. He rather sidestepped the question when I asked it. We have now his opinion with regard to it. While the subject for discussion to-night was the importance of affording better transportation for the fishermen in the Maritime provinces, at the same time, it seems to me that my hon. friends opposite who have discussed the question, with scarcely an exception, while I do not in any way dispute their bona fides and desire to advance the interests of the fishermen in their constituencies, seemed even more desirous of making political capital against the Government than of advancing the interests of the fishermen who are their constituents. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Law) have harked back to the reciprocity question of September, 1911. The hon. gentlemen are very fond of telling that they accept public opinion and how desirous they are that the public should be consulted on questions, and yet, when the public are consulted on a great question like reciprocity and give an emphatic verdict on it, the hon. gentlemen are not willing to accept the verdict of the public and come here and complain about the verdict having been given against them.

Mr. LAW: I accept the verdict given in the county of Yarmouth.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friends, both of whom represent counties where there are large fishing industries, are entirely oblivious of the fact that in the county of Lunenburg, the greatest fishing county in Nova Scotia, and the county of Queens-Shelburne, a great fishing county with great fishing interests, the reciprocity pact was discussed from the business and trade standpoint as thoroughly as possible, because the Liberal candidate in Queens-Shelburne was a gentleman able to discuss the question probably as well as any man in Canada, he himself had been one of the originators of the pact—they entirely forget that those two great fishing counties of the province of Nova Scotia, in no uncertain term pronounced against the reciprocity pact and in favour of the policy advocated by the Conservative party in 1911. It seems to me that in view of that it is rather absurd for the hon. gentlemen to come to this House now and say that the fishermen of Nova Scotia were in favour of reciprocity and that the reciprocity pact was in the interests of the fishermen of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Yarmouth who has tried to introduce some politics into the discussion by referring to the condition of Yarmouth harbour, asked why are large appropriations not made for the purpose of dredging? A very substantial appropriation is being made this year. We know the condition of Yarmouth harbour, we know that when, a few years ago, the Niobe was brought from Halifax to Yarmouth at the request of the hon. gentleman and against the wishes of the responsible official of the Naval Department in order that the officers might take part in a ball given in connection with an old home week, it was unable to enter the harbour and a storm coming up when she was in the roadstead she put to sea, the result being of a character which cost this country $300,000 of the people's money. Let me ask my hon. friend who drags this in now simply for political purposes, where he was during the fifteen years the Liberal party were in power that he allowed Yarmouth harbour to remain in that condition? Why did not my hon. friend, who is a very influential supporter of the Liberal Government, try during those fifteen years to see that Yarmouth was put in the condition in which he thinks the Conservatives should put it in the two and a half years they have been in power? My hon. friend from Inverness suggests that the harbours in Inverness county were in a deplorable condition. They have not got into a deplorable condition in two and a half years. If they were in good condition when the Conservative party came into power they would not be in a deplorable condition now, even if they were neglected. Then let me ask my hon. friend why it was that during the fifteen years the Liberal party were in power he permitted the harbours of Inverness to get into this condition, why he did not get his friends to put them into good condition in that time.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM (Inverness): The breakwaters along our harbours at Port Hood and Margaree were destroyed owing to the storms of last year and the year before, with the knowledge of the Department of Public Works and of the engineers of the Government; and notwithstanding the fact that $200,000 had been appropriated for use in the county of Inverness, and would have been spent in that county if the late Government had remained in power, all these wharfs were destroyed. The wharf at Port Hood, which cost $50,000, was absolutely destroyed. An appendix to a wharf was started last year under the supervision of my hon. friend. That new structure has been carried away, with the knowledge of the Government, and they never spent even a dollar to preserve the property of the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: As I understand storms came last year which carried away wharfs and breakwaters.

Mr. CHISHOLM: And the year before.

Mr. HAZEN: One would almost imagine that the hon. gentleman held the Government responsible for having brought these storms and that the damage which resulted from the storms last year and the year before should have been repaired by this time. A moment's reflection will show the hon. gentleman how weak his argument is in that respect.

I was referring to the fact that hon. gentlemen, in discussing this question, were unable to get away from political considerations, and were dealing with it in a way to make political capital. I come down, however, to a consideration of the facts. My hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) said he would like to give credit to the late Government for what they have done in the way of developing trade in fish between Nova Scotia and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I would not for one moment detract in the slightest possible degree from any credit that might be due the Government which my hon. friend supports or anything they did in connection with the development of that industry. They arranged that fish should be taken by fast freight in fast freight cars. That was good as far as it went, and the present Government has taken a step far more in the public interest and a great step in advance by arranging for the fish to be taken from the Maritime provinces, in the last twelve months, in refrigerator express cars, with results most beneficial to the fishermen of the Maritime provinces in enabling them to get fish on the markets of Ontario and the West in a very much better condition.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to understand exactly the difference between the plan adopted by the present Government and that put in force by the late Government for the carrying of these fish.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the arrangement made by the late Administration the fish went forward by fast freight. That was continued, but there was an arrangement made by which fish now goes forward by express cars.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the minister will find that it went forward by express before—

Mr. HAZEN:—going more rapidly, going under better circumstances and delivered on the market in better condition than previously.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How do trains go more rapidly than under the old system? The arrangement made by the late Government provided not only for fish going forward by express cars, but for payment of one-third of the express charges, which the present Government is also doing. I want the minister to point out the difference between the plan of the former Government and the present Government in regard to express cars.

Mr. HAZEN: There is not the slightest trouble in showing the difference. Now a cold storage express refrigerator car is sent forward every Saturday attached to an express train and the Government guarantees that that car will contain a certain number of pounds of fish; if it does not contain that much the Government will pay for the deficiency, and that has proved such a very great success that in many cases there is no deficiency to be paid for at all, and we believe it will be practically self-supporting and will be no burden on the country.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did not the late Government provide express cars?

Mr. HAZEN: The guarantee under the former Government was for fast freight cars not attached to express trains, and cars, not running every day, but only two or three times a week. We have provided for this car, attached to an express train, to run every Saturday.

My hon. friend from Guysborough referred to the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department this year and made some quotations. The hon. gentleman approved of what was being done by the department in regard to having fish placed on the markets of the upper provinces. I may say that the movement inaugurated by my predecessor in office, and carried on with extensions and improvements since, has proved a great success. There has been an increasing amount of fish going forward, and at one-third of the charges prevailing under the arrangement made by the late Government. I do not want to take up the time of this House or bore it in any way, but my hon. friend from Guysborough has referred very properly to the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department, and I think it is only proper that I should place on 'Hansard' an extract from that report covering the part of the extract referred to by my hon. friend. On page 15, hon. gentlemen will find under the heading, transportation of fresh and mildly cured fish, the following statement:

The department's policy in aiding in the stimulation and development of the trade in fresh and mildly cured fish in the interior portions of the country, by placing at the disposal of the shippers cheap rates and additional facilities and equipment, is having most gratifying results.

Prior to the time that the department undertook to assist, such markets as those in Montreal and Toronto were being very largely supplied from United States sources. The Canadian business was so small that the railways did not find it feasible to place cold storage cars, which would be hauled by fast freight, at the disposal of the shippers and the express rates were so high that successful competition with United States shippers was not found possible. This will be realized from the following: The express rate on fish from Halifax and Mulgrave is $1.50 per 100 pounds, while from Portland the rate is but 80 cents. As, however, there is an import duty of 1 cent per pound the gross rate is $1.80. The advantage of 30 cents per 100 pounds to the Canadian shipper was more than offset by the fact that at United States ports, owing to the very large number of vessels operating therefrom, a supply of fish could always be relied upon, and as the haul is short, orders could be sent up to within a few hours before the consignments were needed. Along the Canadian coast the demand for fresh fish was comparatively small and uncertain. Hence no great effort was being made by the fishermen to land fish during unfavourable weather, so that dealers could not rely on having their orders filled exactly when required, which is an absolute necessity in the carrying on of a successful business in the sale of fish.

To overcome these disadvantages and to assure, not only the Canadian market being supplied from Canadian sources, but a rapid expansion of such markets as well, the department took up the question of procuring better rates and shipping facilities. The railway and express companies did not, however, see their way clear to do more than they were doing, keeping in view the volume of the business that seemed available. The department, therefore, arranged to have the railway place at the disposal of the shippers a cold storage car on two days each week, which car would be hauled by fast freight to Montreal. To enable this to be done the department guaranteed that the earnings on these cars would be at least two-thirds those on a minimum carload lot of 20,000 pounds, at carload lot rates from the point of starting to destination, plus $4 per car for icing.

This service has proved a great boon to the trade. While it cost the department a considerable amount annually for the first few years, it is now being taken advantage of to such an extent that it is practically self-sustaining.

While a cold storage freight service is efficient for the supplying of a substantial market, such as that of Fridays, it soon became apparent that if a considerable demand for fish on other days were to be worked up, express facilities at reasonable rates must be available to the shippers.

This was done about a year ago, if my recollection is correct.

The department consequently arranged with the express companies to accept responsibility for one-third of the ordinary express rates on all shipments of fresh and mildly cured fish including shell-fish, from the Atlantic coast as far west as the eastern boundary of Manitoba, and from the Pacific coast as far east as the said boundary. This gave the shippers from Halifax or Mulgrave a rate of $1 per 100 lbs. to Montreal, and proportionately from intervening points, or an advantage to the Canadian coast dealers of at least 80 cents per 100 lbs. over the United States shipper.

With such facilities and rates the Canadian dealers did not take long to demonstrate that they could control the situation. Not only has the importation of fresh fish along the Canadian Atlantic coast been stopped from the United States, but the demand in the Canadian markets is being very rapidly expanded.

While the dealers on the Pacific coast have for several years been sending fish through to Toronto and Montreal in carload lots, on which they are given a rate of $3 per 100 lbs., the express charges in less than carload lots to the prairie provinces were so high that the working up of any large trade there seemed out of the question. The rate from Vancouver or New Westminster to Calgary is $3.50 per 100 lbs., and to Edmonton, Qu'Appelle or Winnipeg $4.50 per 100 lbs.

With the cheaper rate given owing to the departmental assistance the trade has increased wonderfully and now shipments are being sent in carload lots to quite an extent making departmental assistance unnecessary.

Then follow the figures showing how the business from the East and West by express alone has been expanding. It is evident from the facts as they present themselves, that the department has not been at all lacking in its desire to develop the fish trade between Nova Scotia points and points in Ontario and Quebec. A further arrangement was entered into last year with the express companies and the Intercolonial railway, whereby a cold storage express car for the transportation of fish leaves Mulgrave for Montreal on Saturday of each week. Shipments for Halifax are consolidated in this car at Truro. It arrives in Montreal on Sunday night in time to connect with the Toronto train, so that the shipments for Toronto reach there by ordinary express cars Monday morning —leaving Mulgrave on Saturday, the fish are ready for delivery in Toronto on Monday morning. In addition to that, I may say that the Fisheries Department during the year had an exhibit at the Toronto Exhibition—the first exhibit of our fisheries that was ever made there which attracted a great deal of attention, and which, in the belief of many dealers, has done a great deal to develop the business in the markets of Ontario and of the lower provinces, and has been the cause of larger orders being given in the Maritime provinces. There has been some controversy here to-night over the Advisory Board, and I am glad to find that the general opinion of hon. gentlemen is in favour of the constitution of that Board, and that their belief is that it will be of benefit so far as the development of the fisheries of Canada is concerned. The only criticism that has been made is in regard to its personnel. My hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) has suggested that some member from that county should be appointed to the Board. I am sorry I cannot comply with his request, much as I would like to. There are four members on the Board from Nova Scotia at present, and while no doubt there is not a part of Nova Scotia interested in fishing that would not like to have a representative on the Board, I am quite sure my hon. friend will see how impossible it is to have every county represented. The four representatives from Nova Scotia, I believe, are gentlemen well qualified to deal with the question. There is a gentleman from Lunenburg, Mr. Smith, who thoroughly understands deep-sea fishing; Mr. Gideon A. Hemeon, of Queens and Sheldon, a practical fisherman; Mr. Short from Digby, who is thoroughly au fait with this question. Then there is a gentleman from Halifax, appointed on the recommendation of the Board of Trade of that city, who has a special knowledge of the salt fish and dried fish industry, which centre very largely in the city of Halifax.

From St. Andrews, New Brunswick, on Passamaquoddy Bay, we have Mr. Russell, a gentleman who is a practical fisherman himself and a fish dealer. We have a gentleman from Kent county, and we have Mr. Young from Gloucester county. Mr. Young has been in the fish business all his life, is in touch with the fishermen and he was appointed to the Advisory Board at the request of the fishermen and those interested in the fishing industry. We have a gentleman from the Gaspé coast and these gentlemen I have named, four from Nova Scotia, four from New Brunswick, one from the Gaspé coast and one from Prince Edward Island, Mr. Longworth, constitute the eastern section of the Advisory Fisheries Board. I think it would be a very difficult matter to find any number of gentlemen with a more thorough or intimate knowledge of the fisheries of the Maritime provinces than that possessed by these gentlemen. I am glad to be able to assure this House that the permanent officers of the Fisheries Department are of the opinion that this board as constituted is of most valuable assistance in the development of the fisheries of this country and one which can give sound advice as to the line along which we should proceed and the methods which should be adopted in the development of the fisheries and of the fishing trade.

One word more about some remarks made by the hon. member for Guysborough. He referred to the subsidy granted to the West Indian line of steamships and the subsidy granted by the country to the line of steamships sailing to South Africa. It seems to me that the subsidy granted to the West Indian line of steamships is one that is very much in the interest of the fishing industry of the lower provinces, because a great deal of the freight that is carried by the West Indian line of steamships is fish exported from Halifax to the West Indies who are large consumers of fish caught in Nova Scotia waters, cured and dried there and sent to the consumers of the West Indies. I am sure that the hon. member for Guysborough and other hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia, knowing the importance of that service, would be among the last to suggest that the money is not properly expended or that the service is not a proper one in the public interest.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did not make any such suggestions.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not say you did.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I simply referred to the fact.

Mr. HAZEN: I referred to the fact and I said that I believed that my hon. friend would be the last one to suggest the stopping of this service altogether.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did not suggest anything of the kind.

Mr. HAZEN: What was the purpose of my hon. friend in referring to it at all?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I made the statement that if the Government would give half of the amount that it was giving for the expansion of trade in South Africa and in South America, we would get better results from the trade between the Maritime provinces and the United States in connection with the fresh fish trade.

Mr. HAZEN: Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman suggests a reduction of one-half of the subsidy given by the Government to this West Indian service?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Not at all.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman referred to it for one purpose only, and that was that he wanted to create the impression in Nova Scotia that the Government had plenty of money to give to a service which was not very useful to the country, not nearly so useful as the one he advocated, and the subsidy which he tried to make it appear was not very useful was the subsidy granted to the West Indian steamship line. I am pointing out that this subsidy is of very great value to the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, because I think that I am correct in saying that the bulk of the freight that is carried by the West Indian steamships down to the West Indies is composed of fish caught and cured in Nova Scotia and sent down to the market of the West Indies.

As far as the South African service is concerned, perhaps I might point out that, whereas a few years ago we were sending comparatively small quantities of products to South Africa, owing to the steamship service, I find by the Trade and Navigation returns that last year we sent to South Africa $3,340,513 worth of Canadian products. They went, I think, practically altogether by this subsidized line of steamers, managed by the Elder Dempster Company, and sailing from Montreal in summer and from a Maritime province port in winter to South Africa. The business has been a growing one, and it will continue to grow. This export is made up largely of flour, agricultural implements, newspaper print and other products of Canadian workshops and farms, and that this subsidy is having good results is shown in the development of the trade of Canada and in the opening up of such markets for our manufacturers and producers of other sorts.

The Department of Marine and Fisheries has not been idle in regard to improvement in the matter of the transportation of fresh fish between the Maritime provinces and the United States. The question has been receiving the consideration of myself and the permanent officers of the department during the past two seasons. By my direction and at my request last year an officer of the department interviewed the officers of the company operating the steamship service between Yarmouth and Boston and arrangements were then made by which the steamship company undertook the more careful and expeditious handling of fresh fish in transit between the Maritime provinces and Boston. Complaints reached the department similar to those made by one hon. gentleman here to-night, complaints that I think were well founded, that lobsters especially were being very carelessly handled, with the result that they reached the Boston market sometimes in a condition which seriously impaired their value. We had the matter investigated. We had an official of the department go down to Boston and be present at the landing of these boats and see the condition in which the fish were, and I am advised by the Deputy Minister and other officers in the department that the improvements that have been made have to a very considerable extent been carried out by the steamship companies, that a great deal more care in the handling of fish has been exercised, with the result that fresh lobsters are now in a much more marketable condition when they arrive in the Boston market than they were previously to these inquiries and investigations being made. I am advised by the officials of the department that as a result of the representations made arrangements have been made for more prompt deliveries at Boston on the arrival of the various steamers from Maritime province ports and that better transportation facilities are being provided. At the opening of the present fishing season I directed attention to the matter and requested that the officers of the department should give their consideration to it with the view of bringing about some further improvements. The Superintendent of Fisheries went carefully into the subject, and he has submitted a memorandum pointing out the different steps which should be taken in order to bring about the desired improvements. These improvements involve negotiations with the Department of Trade and Commerce and these are in progress at the present time. The steamship line which has been referred to as running between Yarmouth and Boston operates one boat from the first of October to the first of June, making two trips a week. After that two boats are put on, which make four trips a week up to the end of July. Then a third boat is put on to the end of October. So that from the first of June to the end of October the service out of Yarmouth is a daily service. There have been recent negotiations with the company and we hope that a second boat will be placed on the route from October to June instead of one boat as at present. There has been a very large expansion of the shipping business from Yarmouth during recent months and it is to be hoped that with that large expansion of business the steamship company will find that it will be possible to put on a daily service during the months that I have mentioned in order to carry this trade to Boston, and which, as I understand, has been fairly profitable to the company looking at it from a purely business standpoint. The other suggestion, that these boats run along the coast, connecting with the Yarmouth boats, does not find special favour with my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair), who thinks a direct service would be better. But all these questions will have to be considered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I think I am absolutely correct in saying that for a period of 15 years, no subsidy has been voted by the Parliament of Canada for a line of steamers running from a Canadian port to a port in the United States, and that is a matter which is worth remembering in connection with this whole question. No subsidy has been given to the line of steamers running from St. John to Portland and Boston, or to the line running from Yarmouth to Boston and return, or from Halifax to Boston and return. However, with the extensive business consequent on the increased development of our fisheries, it would seem to me that the company itself might find it in its own interest, without any subsidy from the Dominion Parliament to put on a line of steamers running daily during the fishing season or during the season when business is most active, between Yarmouth and ports in the United States, as steamers run daily during a great part of the season between St. John and Boston.

I agree with the hon. member for Guysborough as to the possibility of developing the fishing industry of Canada. Up to a few years ago Nova Scotia was the premier fish-producing province of Canada. To-day, British Columbia is enormously productive. The northern waters of that province are teeming with fish, and although up to the present the industry has been largely developed in only two varieties, the halibut and the salmon, the waters of British Columbia are filled with herring, and sole, and crabs, and other fish, the trade in which can be developed to enormous proportions. With the opening of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Prince Rupert to the East, I believe, from my own personal knowledge and observation in northern British Columbia this year, that in a few years Prince Rupert will not only be the greatest fish port on the continent of America, but probably the greatest fish port in the world. In addition to our fisheries on the eastern and western coasts, we have splendid fisheries in the immense inland lakes, where the industry is capable of great development, with resultant increase in the wealth of the country, and an added source of food supply for the people of the prairie provinces. Owing to the wanton destruction of fish in the past, we will have to take measures to repair the mischief that has been done, by providing for the artificial production of the fish. To a very considerable extent, measures in that direction are being taken to-day. This Parliament annually votes a large sum of money for the erection of fish hatcheries and for the maintenance of those already in existence. The Superintendent of Fisheries informs me that for the first time since we have established fish hatcheries in Canada, they are to-day filled with eggs and are being more successfully operated now than at any time in the past. It has been demonstrated that the salmon hatcheries have done most useful work. The fishermen along the coast of St. John county, who drift out almost across to the Nova Scotia shore night after night in the prosecution of their calling, tell me that there now is no such thing as a year when they are not getting a good supply of salmon. These salmon come up the bay of Fundy, and along the coast making for the spawning grounds on the St. John and Tobique rivers, and they are being caught at points along that river where they were not caught at 15 or 20 years ago, and they are being caught in great numbers. That is a very desirable state of things, and it is due to the more perfect enforcement of the fishery laws, and due most of all to the work of the salmon hatcheries. The same thing is true as to the whitefish hatcheries on the Great Lakes, and although the results obtained from the lobster hatcheries may at the present time be a matter of some doubt, I trust that in a few years the utility of these hatcheries will be fully demonstrated and that they may in time to come make up for the past depletion of the lobsters fisheries. I entirely agree with one hon. gentleman opposite who said that there has not been as much done for the fisheries of Canada by the Department of Marine and Fisheries as should have been done, but I can assure my hon. friend that the officials of the department to-day are doing their very utmost to promote and develop the fishing industry, and for my part I am giving them the very best assistance and support that it is within my power to give. I trust that in years to come good results will flow from the efforts now being made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Now that my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has brought this matter before the House, and has had a full discussion of it, which will no doubt be of benefit, as is every discussion concerning the development of our great national ressources, I presume he will consent to the usual course of adjourning the debate.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

G. Troop and the appointments of Messrs. Godwin and Smith to begin as of the first day of the present session of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS POST OFFICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have a question to direct to the Postmaster General with reference to the post office in the House of Commons, although perhaps the matter does not come directly under his control. The hon. gentleman must have received within the last few days complaints from some hon. members that obscene literature is being distributed in the boxes of the members, and that without any stamp and without any frank. I know the Postmaster General is not responsible, but I point out to him that the distribution of obscene literature in such a manner is very objectionable. I do not know how it is introduced into the post office boxes, but I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that if you saw some of the leaflets which have been distributed recently, you would consider them very objectionable.

Mr. PELLETIER: The post office in the House of Commons is under the direction of Mr. Speaker, and not under the control of my department. In the Post Office Department, even when obscene literature is stamped, we always stop it passing through the mails. So far as the post office in the House of Commons is concerned, we may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that you will attend to this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is the first I have heard of this matter, and I shall take a very early opportunity of instructing the postmaster of the House of Commons with regard to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

On the motion of Mr. Borden for Committee of Supply:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I wish again to call the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Railways to the grievance of which I complained on Friday last. From the remarks of the Minister of Railways I would gather that he is not quite familiar with the increased rates and the local conditions on the Prince Edward Island railway. Of course I am not surprised at that. When I mentioned that the rate of freight on cordwood for a short distance was $7 a car, he seemed to think it was not very large. The fact is that the capacity of the cars on the Prince Edward Island railway is only about half as great as the capacity of the cars on the Intercolonial railway. Taking that fact into consideration the hon. minister will see that the charges on the main line of the Intercolonial would be about $12 to $14 per car. The rate in my province is prohibitive and is not in the interest of the railway. There are similar rates on lumber of all kinds. From the letter which I read on Friday last, it will be seen that the rates on many other articles are prohibitive.

I have been informed by gentlemen supporting the Government that apparently it is of little use bringing matters of this kind to the notice of the management at Moncton; that they do not seem to take seriously suggestions from business men. So far as the management in Prince Edward Island is concerned, it does not seem to have any power at all.

The Prime Minister will remember that before the last election, in the discharge of his duty as leader of the Opposition, he came to our province and sympathized with the people there with reference to the very great difficulties they had in matters of transportation. He certainly made statements to the effect that if he came into power he would have some remedy applied, and no one understood him to say that if he came into power the rates would be increased. I am sure that the Prime Minister appreciates the responsibility of any statement that he might have made under such circumstances and that he would not wish to mislead the people. This matter is more serious than the Minister of Railways or the Prime Minister appears to think. I am surprised that the members for Prince Edward Island supporting the Government are not pressing this matter more strenuously.

Most of the articles transported over the Prince Edward Island railway are not handled by the railway officials at all; they are loaded and unloaded by the people. Mixed freight and passenger trains run anyhow, whether freight is offered or not, and it would be very little extra expense to the railway to haul these cars which are loaded and unloaded by others. If the railway is to be of any service to the people, this matter should receive some consideration from the Government. It may seem a small matter among the many subjects that come before the Prime Minister, but I would again ask him at least to look into it.

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

Mr. COCHRANE: I think the hon. gentleman is trying to mislead the people when he makes the statement that the cars on the Prince Edward Island railway do not carry over half what the cars on the main line do. This, I say, is not true. more than that, the hon. gentleman has never told the House and the country that we have cut out the third rate for the ferry across. This has never been done before, and is more in the interest of the people of Prince Edward Island than anything else we can do, until we get the ferry established. He has brought forward only one instance in which he says there is a hardship. In my opinion, he has not made out his case, because I know that the cars on the Prince Edward Island railway carry more than half what the cars on the main line do. If he has any other instances to give, I shall be glad to instruct the management to look into them.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Will the minister tell me the capacity of the cars on the Prince Edward Island railway and the capacity of the cars on the Intercolonial railway? Then we shall know whether my statement is true or not.

Mr. COCHRANE: You made the statement.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr Blondin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Customs, $330,987.50.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the item 'salaries' cover the outside service?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): No, this is civil government, inside service. There has been no change as compared with last year except that there will be two promotions, one man from second division, subdivision 'A' to first division, subdivision 'B,' and one from second division, subdivision 'B' to second division subdivision 'A.' In addition to this, the commissioner advises that it will be necessary to take on twenty-two new employees during the next fiscal year. In engaging these employees he applies to the Civil Service Commission and accepts the recommendation of that commission.

Mr. EMMERSON: Will the hon. minister state who are to be promoted?

Mr. REID: The details show that there will be two promotions. The Commissioner generally recommends certain gentlemen for promotion. It is not decided yet who will be promoted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that in the appointment of these additional clerks the minister based his action upon the report of the Commissioner of Customs, he himself taking the responsibility as to whether or not he should accept the advice of the commissioner. Under the circumstances, I think that my hon. friend ought to lay before the House the report of the commisioner, so that we may know the reasons which prompted him to come to the conclusion that such an extraordinary increase in the number of clerks is necessary —because twenty-two is a very extraordinary increase. We will then be in a position to discuss whether or not the reasons given are sound or unsound, adequate or inadequate.

Mr. REID: I have no objection whatever to bringing down the report as requested by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MURPHY: When the hon. gentleman brings down his information, I should like to know what that position is in subdivision 'B' of the first division. There is an increase there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A friend of mine in Montreal, a wine importer, wrote me the other day complaining about the blank forms used in the custom house at Montreal. He said that certain blank forms which have to be sent back to France are printed in English only, and, as in many cases the exporters do not understand English, much inconvenience results to both exporter and importer. I am quite sure that this is only an oversight on the part of my hon. friend, and that he will remedy the matter by giving the proper instructions to the customs authorities to have the blanks in question printed in both languages.

Mr. REID: It has always been the practice, so far as I can learn, to print the blanks in English. If we were to print them in French, we would probably have to have them printed in other languages, say German or Italian, and if this were done we would be unable to keep our files in proper shape.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend misunderstands me. I am not asking that the forms be printed in German, Russian or any other foreign language. My hon. friend knows that, generally speaking, all blank departmental forms are printed in both French and English. This is a matter not of favour, but of right, and I would ask my hon. friend to see that it is attended to.

Item stands.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps I might be pardoned for asking permission to correct a statement I made last night in regard to the transportation of fish from the Maritime provinces to Montreal. I am reported in the unrevised 'Hansard' as having said:

> Now, a car is sent forward every day attached to an express train.

And further down I am reported to have said:

> We have provided for this car attached to an express train every day.

Apparently I must have made the statement, because I am reported in this way and my friends say that they so understood me. If I did make that statement, I did not intend to make it, and it was not correct. The statement I meant to make was that a cold storage express car was sent forward every Saturday. It is clear that this is the statement I intended to make from a subsequent passage in the report of my speech, in which I said:

> A further arrangement was entered into last year with the express companies and the Intercolonial whereby a cold storage express car for the transportation of fish leaves Mulgrave for Montreal on Saturday of each week. Shipments from Halifax are taken on at Truro.

That was the statement I intended to make, but apparently, through inadvertence, I did not make that statement. I am not complaining of an incorrect report, as my friends say I did say what I am reported to have said, but I intended to say Saturday. At the time I was speaking from a report of the Superintendent of Fisheries in which the word Saturday was used. I desire to correct the mis-statement at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We are to understand, then, that there is really no change in the arrangement for the transportation of fish?

Mr. HAZEN: The change is that an arrangement was made for an express car having cold storage facilities attached to an express train to leave Mulgrave every Saturday night so that the fish would arrive in Toronto every Monday morning.

Mr. SINCLAIR: On every express train that leaves Halifax on Saturday night?

Mr. HAZEN: It leaves Mulgrave every Saturday night.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There seems to be a misunderstanding about it among the fishing people.

Mr. HAZEN: The arrangement is described in this memorandum:

The department felt that as it had shown the railways and express companies that the business can be made a big one, they should do their part in offering further facilities. It, consequently, took up with the express companies and the Intercolonial railway, the question of placing refrigerator express cars at the disposal of the shippers. After much negotiation an agreement was entered into with the express companies and the railway, whereby a cold storage express car is placed at the disposal of the shippers from Mulgrave and Halifax one day each week. The car leaves Mulgrave on Saturdays, and at Truro, shipments from Halifax and other points along the Halifax and Southwestern railway are placed in it. It then proceeds to Montreal by the Maritime Express. The companies agreed to accept as a minimum carload for this car ten thousand pounds, instead of twenty thousand pounds. The department guarantees that the earnings will be at least those ten thousand pounds. Only on a few occasions since it was inaugurated in August last, have the shipments been below the minimum.

This car reaches Montreal Sunday night in time to connect with the Grand Trunk for Toronto, so that shipments can be removed from it and sent in ordinary express cars to Toronto which will reach the latter point Monday morning. Negotiations are being continued and it is anticipated that during the coming summer the arrangement will be extended so as to run through cold storage express cars from the Atlantic coast to Toronto, as well as to Montreal.

Mr. MARTIN (Translation): I want to know if the Estimates are printed in French, as I could not obtain a copy.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that the Estimates are printed in French.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what they said to me—that they are not printed in French.

Mr. HAZEN: The Clerk informs me that he has sent a boy up to make inquiries about the matter, and I shall have the information for my hon. friend directly.

Maintenance and repairs to Dominion steamers and ice-breakers, $1,000,000.

Mr. CARROLL: I notice by the Nova Scotia press that yesterday the ice-breaker Stanley was proceeding to Sydney harbour to keep the lower part of Sydney harbour which would give access to the coal company's and steel company's wharfs open. I would ask if this is correct and whether the boat is to be stationed there all winter.

Mr. HAZEN: She could not be stationed there all winter as she has other work to do. She was sent there, as was done in previous seasons, and the report received at the department this morning was that the Stanley had done the work she was sent to do and that the harbour is now open. As far as possible we keep the harbour open because we realize the great advantage of doing so in the case of a harbour doing such a large business as Sydney does.

Mr. CARROLL: I would point out to the minister that while it is very well to have a steamer go there and open the harbour still, unless she is in the immediate vicinity of the harbour all the time, the work done may not be of much value because the harbour might freeze up again and unless the boat is very near she could not re-open it.

Mr. HAZEN: We do the best we can. The steamer's headquarters are at Halifax. They were at one time at St. John, but an arrangement was made having regard to this ice breaking to have her at Halifax so that she would be nearer the ports.

Mr. CARROLL: Both Mr. McKenzie and myself have in our humble way been ininsisting upon the department having a permanent boat there. This is a harbour in which an immense business is carried on, and we would like to have an icebreaker there all the time during the winter season. The Stanley is not required in Halifax harbour as an icebreaker in the winter time, and I hope my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) will correct me if I am wrong in that, but I think I am right. Why should not the Stanley be stationed at Louisburg which is open the year around and then she would be in a position to get into Sydney harbour whenever required. It is incumbent upon the department to give us an icebreaker in that part of the country.

Mr. HAZEN: I know my hon. friend and his colleague discussed this matter before, and I am in sympathy with him. I think I pointed out to the House before that a new icebreaker will be available in a short time on the St. Lawrence which may release some of the icebreakers there; and when the car ferry from Prince Edward Island to the mainland is running the icebreakers there will be able to give a more satisfactory service than at present.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it under this item, that my hon. friend provides the funds for the experiments that are to be carried out under the direction of Professor Barnes of McGill University?

Mr. HAZEN: No, that is under the vote of Aids to Navigation which we will reach later.

Mr. MURPHY: When it is reached will my hon. friend be good enough to give the committee information as to the success of those experiments?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I would like to ask the minister whether the Stanley or some other boat will make any trips to the Magdalen Islands this winter. I may say that before leaving home to attend the session, I received letters from cerain parties in the Magdalen Islands asking me to bring this matter to the notice of the department and to get the information. For some years past, occasional trips have been made by the Stanley or some other boat to the great advantage of the people living there, and I think if a trip or two could be made in the winter season and then again in March or April before navigation really opens it would be a great benefit to those people.

Mr. HAZEN: I may say that the Stanley has already made one trip this season to the Magdalen Islands, and we hope it may be possible to make another.

M. MARTIN (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order, I move that the vote stands, seeing that the estimates have not yet been distributed in French.

Mr. HAZEN: The clerk informs me that the printing in French is just about completed, and will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. M. MARTIN: We have not got it yet. We must have it.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know what the rule of the House is. I understand that my hon. friend objects to proceeding until the estimates are printed in French. That will cause considerable delay, but if my hon. friend still objects—

Mr. M. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: We shall have to look up the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot see anything in the rules and regulation providing for the special case that is now raised, and I am informed by the Clerk of the House that this objection has never been raised in committee before. That is probably the reason why there is nothing in the rules concerning the point.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Deux-Montagnes) (Translation): You are short of translators then.

The CHAIRMAN: In this particular instance, it is the death of the King's Printer that has somewhat disorganized the work in the printing bureau.

M. MARTIN: For the benefit of the members of this House that do not understand English I think that we should postpone the discussion of these estimates.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot maintain the point of order raised by my hon. friend, considering that there is nothing in the rules to maintain the objection.

Mr. HAZEN: What is your ruling, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that there is no rule providing for the special case that is now raised.

M. MARTIN: I appeal from your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that the appeal is not going to be pressed.

Mr. LAW: I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the custom that has prevailed in his department, and under the late Government, of having the headquarters of the steamers at St. John, N.B. That has always seemed to me a very great mistake. I think some of the steamers should have their headquarters at Yarmouth or on the bay of Fundy. In the case of the recent wreck of the Cobequid, had one of the Government steamers been stationed at Yarmouth instead of at St. John, there is no doubt that the people could have been rescued without having to wait 36 hours. I cannot see that the expense would be heavier at Yarmouth than at St. John, I am sure there are many occasions during the winter time when a ship at Yarmouth would be very useful. Buoys are continually going adrift on the coast of Nova Scotia and it would be very convenient to have a boat there to locate them. I think it would be in the interests of the department and of the public to have one of those boats stationed at Yarmouth and the other stationed at St. John and I would recommend the minister to take this into consideration.

Will the minister say whether he will take it into consideration?

Mr. HAZEN: I did not know that my hon. friend expected an answer. Any suggestion made in good faith will of course be considered. I may say the reason why these steamers have been kept at St. John and Halifax is that one agency is at Halifax and the other at St. John and the steamers are naturally kept as far as possible at the points where the agencies are. But I may say to my hon. friend, that if there had been a steamer at Yarmouth I do not think the people on the Cobequid would have been rescued any earlier. I think some statement to that effect is made in the report of the Wreck Commissioner, filed yesterday afternoon. He stated that in view of the heavy seas running it is doubtful whether the people could have been taken off at an earlier time, even if the rescue boats had been there. They had to wait till the waves calmed down before they could proceed with the rescue work.

Mr. LAW: If one of the Government boats had been able to lay by the Cobequid all night, it would certainly have been a great relief to the passengers knowing that some vessel was at hand. I still think it reasonable to ask that one of these steamers stationed at St. John or Halifax should be kept at Yarmouth.

There are many times, I know myself, when buoys go adrift, and word has to be sent to St. John and this boat brought away down to Yarmouth or down in the bay of Fundy before these buoys can be rescued, whereas if a steamer were lying at Yarmouth, if buoys got adrift or a vessel were wrecked, it would be right on the spot. This is a question that should receive the due consideration of the minister.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is a very large item, and it would be interesting to the members of the committee to get some information from the minister. How many steamers are we supporting, and what proportion of this million is expended in repairs, and what proportion upon maintenance? A few years ago, when hon. gentlemen were on this side of the House, they laid down the rule that repairs to steamboats should be done by open contract and tender. It would be interesting to know whether they are carrying out that policy in practice. I would like the minister to give us some details in regard to this vote.

[Mr. Law.]

Mr. HAZEN: The amount asked for is the same as last year. Of the steamers whose operating expenses are paid out of this vote twelve are in commission during the whole year, as follows: Aberdeen, Champlain, Earl Grey, Estevan, Lady Grey, Lady Laurier, Lansdowne, Minto, Montcalm, Montmagny, Newington and Stanley. The others are in commission during a part of the year. I will give the name of each steamer, with the expenditure upon each for all purposes during the year. It is as follows:

Steamer, Service and Expenditure.
Aberdeen, lighthouse and buoy service, St. John	$53,500
Bellechasse, ship channel, lighthouse and buoy, Prince Edward Island	12,200
Champlain, ferry Rivière Ouelle and Murray Bay	45,500
Dollard, lighthouse and buoy, Montreal.	39,500
Druid, lighthouse and buoy, Quebec	36,500
Earl Grey, Prince Edward Island and mainland, winter	94,600
Estevan, lighthouse and buoy, British Columbia	42,000
Frontenac, ship channel	16,700
Lady Grey, ship channel	40,000
Lady Laurier, lighthouse and buoy, N.S.	57,600
Lambton, construction, Great Lakes	15,500
Lansdowne, lighthouse and buoy, St. John	43,500
Minto, winter mail service, Prince Edward Island	63,500
Montcalm, lighthouse and buoy, Quebec, and ice-breaking	97,000
Montmagny, lighthouse and buoy, Quebec and Nova Scotia	50,500
Newington, lighthouse and buoy, British Columbia	22,500
Reserve, lighthouse and buoy, Prescott.	11,000
Rouville, construction, Quebec	14,500
Scout, lighthouse and buoy, Prescott	13,400
Shamrock, lighthouse and buoy, Montreal district	16,500
Simcoe, lighthouse and buoy, Great Lakes	34,500
Stanley, lighthouse and buoy, Nova Scotia	52,800
Verchères, construction, Montreal district	8,700
Quadra, lighthouse and buoy, British Columbia	40,600
Total	$940,600

It would be somewhat lengthy to give it, but I have a statement showing in detail the expenditure on each vessel for salaries and wages, fuel, board, supplies for the deck and engine, repairs to hull, machinery and miscellaneous expenses, including uniforms.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How much was spent on repairs?

Mr. HAZEN: I will give the expenditure for repairs on each vessel. It is as follows:

Aberdeen	$ 7,000
Champlain	4,000
Dollard	4,000
Druid	2,500
Earl Grey	10,000
Lady Grey	4,000
Lady Laurier	5,000
Lansdowne	5,000
Minto	5,000
Montcalm	19,500
Montmagny	5,500
Newington	1,500
Quadra	5,000
Stanley	8,000

In some cases where it is possible to do so tenders are asked for these repairs and in cases where the repairs are of such a character that the officials of the department are unable to make proper specifications on which tenders are to be based, tenders are not called for.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Were tenders asked for the repairs to the Aberdeen which amounted to over $7,000?

Mr. HAZEN: Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? I am a little in error. These are the sums that we are estimating this year for repairs and so on. The hon. gentleman asked for the figures for last year. The present year does not conclude until the 31st March, so that I have not the details.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I mean for 1913.

Mr. HAZEN: I presume that they would appear in the Report of the Department. I will find them for my hon. friend. There should be no trouble in getting those, but the present year being uncompleted, I cannot give them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am speaking of the year ended March 31, 1913.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister mentioned a number of cases in which repairs had been made. Can he tell us in how many cases tenders were asked for?

Mr. HAZEN: These are only the Estimates for the coming year. They are based on what it has cost for repairs in previous years. The officials of the department make an estimate having regard to the condition of the ships and to what the repairs have cost in previous years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are there public notices inviting tenders?

Mr. HAZEN: There are in some cases and in other cases there are no public notices.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How is that done?

Mr. HAZEN: It is done by circulars sent by the department to different people who are known to be in this line of work asking what they will undertake the work for.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is that confined to one side of politics?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you the tender list?

Mr. HAZEN: I will be very glad to let the hon. gentleman see the list.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can we get the list of parties to whom the circulars are sent?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, there is no trouble in getting information of that sort.

Mr. EMMERSON: Did the hon. gentleman mention the steamer Hudson?

Mr. HAZEN: No; these are the items of the Marine Department, but later we will come to the Fisheries Department. The Hudson is a fisheries patrol boat and any appropriation for a fisheries patrol boat would be under the fisheries items.

Mr. EMMERSON: It says 'Dominion steamers.'

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, but this is under the heading 'Ocean and River Service,' and this has reference to the Marine branch of the Department and not to Fisheries.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did I understand the minister to say that the Rouville was being built in Quebec?

Mr. HAZEN: No, the Rouville is a boat that was built some time ago. It is in the service now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That it was undergoing repairs then? 4 p.m.

Mr. HAZEN: The Rouville is one of those boats the repairs and maintenance of which are included in the item under consideration and the estimated amount required for the Rouville next year is $14,500 made up as follows: Salaries and wages, $7,200; fuel, $3,200; board, $2,600; miscellaneous, including uniforms, $2,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has there been any increase in the numbers of late? I understand that some time during November, or about the end of October last, a yacht was purchased either by the Department of Marine and Fisheries or by the Department of Customs. The yacht is now at Prescott. I would like to know the name of the yacht and the object for which it was bought.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot tell my hon. friend because it was not purchased by my department. I do not know anything about it. My hon. friend asked if there were any new boats. There is one, the Estevan, and another, the Bellechasse. The Bellechasse was built at Kingston and the Estevan was built at Collingwood and delivered on the seacoast of British Columbia. It is used there now in the lighthouse and buoy service. The Bellechasse is used on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that the Estevan was built at Collingwood. It is a sea-going vessel. What was the cost of the vessel, what firm constructed it and what is its draught?

Mr. HAZEN: It was built by the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company. I think the cost was something like $230,000 or $260,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were tenders confined to Canadian builders?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Or was it open to the world?

Mr. HAZEN: It was open.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And my hon. friend chose a Canadian firm?

Mr. HAZEN: I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And he found all the rivets in Collingwood?

Mr. HAZEN: I did not examine the rivets. I think that the contract was let before the change of government took place.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So much the better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister please inform us as to the repairs for which tenders are asked and for which tenders are not asked? How is it settled--according to the amount of the repairs to be made?

Mr. HAZEN: It depends upon the nature of the repairs. When a vessel is new it is an easier matter for the officials of the department, like Mr. Ferguson and other technical officers who have charge of this work, to prepare a specification on which tenders can be asked, but when a vessel is old and a lot of work has to be removed and torn down and it is impossible to tell what has to be done until you commence tearing down, it is very frequently thought that it is not desirable to ask for tenders because it is impossible for any one to know before hand what the work will amount to.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is hardly an answer to the question I asked. Surely the department must have some rule about this. Certainly the proper rule would be that the department should ask for tenders, perhaps not in all cases, but in the majority of cases and the cases in which it was not done should not reach any substantial figure.

If a boat were to be repaired in Halifax at a cost of $500, what course would be pursued? Whether the boat was old or new should not make any difference. Are tenders asked publicly, or are they quietly solicited from friends of the Government and those whose names are on the patronage list?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is there a patronage list now?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In Halifax there is not only a patronage list but a patronage committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Surely not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Prime Minister, who represents that constituency, apparently does not undertake to discharge the duties which ordinarily devolve upon a supporter of the Government in respect to patronage, and so they have a patronage committee. In Halifax the policy which would guide the department would be largely determined by that committee.

Mr. HAZEN: The manner of doing the repairs would largely depend upon the report of Mr. Ferguson, inspector of Government steamers, and Mr. McConkey, inspector of repairs to Government vessels. These gentlemen would be guided by the condition of the vessel and the nature of work to be done as to whether they would recommend day's work or contract. The great bulk of these tenders are asked, not by public advertisement in the newspapers, but by asking certain persons and firms, whose names are upon a list for that purpose.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In 1910 the Nova Scotia Iron Works of Dartmouth were paid apparently $5,363 under contract. Were tenders invited in that case before the contract was made?

Mr. HAZEN: I will have to look that up.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the meaning of the charges set out in the Auditor General's Report by the Naval Service Department against the Marine Department?

Mr. HAZEN: I suppose that is work done for the Marine Department in the dockyards at Halifax and Nanaimo, which are under the control of the Naval Service Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that the cutters of the Customs Department are under the joint supervision of the Department of Marine and the Department of Customs.

Mr. HAZEN: The Marine Department has no control over the Customs cutters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The practice used to be to have joint control.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Marine Department supplies the officers and crews and pays them, and that amount is refunded by the Department of Customs, but the steamers are absolutely under the control of the Department of Customs.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is exactly as I understood it. I wish to ask the minister if in October or November last a yacht was purchased for the use of the Customs Department, and which yacht now is said to be in winter quarters at Prescott. From whom was the yacht purchased, for what purpose, and what price was paid?

Mr. J. D. REID: The only yacht I have any knowledge of is a yacht seized by the Department of Customs at Prescott some time last spring, I think. It was hauled up at Prescott and repaired and the owners abandoned it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who was the owner of the yacht?

Mr. J. D. REID: We could not find the owner. I think he left the country a year or two ago. Two men in Brockville, the captain and the engineer, had claims against the yacht. Their claims were paid by the Department of Customs, and the yacht, after being refitted, was sent on to St. John, N.B.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend can find all the details in the Register, because every boat is registered. This yacht was towed from Montreal up the river as far as Prescott or Kingston about the end of October or the beginning of November last, and quartered there for the winter. Names have been given to me, which I do not care to produce, but I should like to know from the hon. minister if it is not true that his department purchased such a yacht.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have no record in the Customs Department of the purchase of such a yacht. The yacht I refer to was purchased in the month of July and was sent down to St. John.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did the department purchase any yacht as late as October or November last?

Mr. J. D. REID: Not that I know of.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. minister find out if within the last five months any yacht has been purchased by the Department of Customs and quartered for the winter either at Prescott or at Kingston, and give his answer this evening?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will give the hon. member an answer within half an hour.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I saw in the papers lately that the Department of Marine and Fisheries had given a contract for the building of a vessel to Vickers Sons and Maxim, of Montreal, and that the construction of the vessel had been commenced in Montreal. What truth is there in that statement?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no truth in it. No contract has been awarded. Tenders have been asked for and are coming in for the construction of a dredge and also for the construction of an ice-breaker. The time for receiving these tenders is not up yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If tenders are received from Great Britain and from Canada, will the hon. minister give the preference to Canadian builders or to British builders, and is there any condition as to where the vessels are to be constructed?

Mr. HAZEN: We are asking for tenders for a vessel to be constructed in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then the statement that the vessel has to be built in Canada is true?

Mr. HAZEN: That statement is true.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course it is not known where in Canada the vessel will be built?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When were the tenders to be in?

Mr. HAZEN: I think they were to be in on the 31st day of January. We had a communication from certain builders stating that they desired to tender, but could not get in their tenders in time. They asked us to extend the time for receiving tenders, and we extended it until the 5th day of this month.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the estimated cost of the ice-breaker?

Mr. HAZEN: Half a million dollars for an ice-breaker of the most modern construction for the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have seen in the press that the two ice-breakers, the Montcalm and the Lady Grey, have been removed from Quebec to the Maritime provinces.

Mr. HAZEN: No. They are at work on the St. Lawrence, and their special business is to keep the ice broken on the St. Lawrence river. This has two results: it avoids floods in the spring of the year, and it causes the river to open much sooner, so that navigation will open earlier.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When I saw that statement in the press, I wondered whether my hon. friend had listened to the complaints of certain people from Quebec in regard to ice floes blocking the harbour of Quebec during the winter. I do not think they have any serious ground for complaint, and, as my hon. friend states, the work performed by the two steamers is most valuable, not only to navigation proper, but to prevent a repetition of the devastating floods from which we suffered some years ago. I am glad that the hon. gentleman will not listen to any such complaints.

Mr. HAZEN: We listened to them, but we were not convinced by the representations that were made.

Mr. MURPHY: In the list of steamers which my hon. friend read a little earlier in the afternoon, how many of the vessels are ice-breakers? Where do they operate? Do they operate in the same place each season?

Mr. HAZEN: The Champlain is an ice-breaker and is used in the ferry running from Rivière Ouelle to Murray bay. The Earl Grey is an ice-breaker in the Prince Edward Island service. The Lady Grey is an ice-breaker, used on the St. Lawrence river and on the ship channel during the summer. The Minto is an ice-breaker in the Prince Edward Island service. The Montcalm is an ice-breaker, used on the St. Lawrence river and in the lighthouse and buoy service in Quebec during the summer months. The Stanley is an ice-breaker, used in the light-house and buoy service in Nova Scotia, in breaking ice in different harbours where it is possible to do so, and also in making trips across to the Magdalen islands.

Mr. MURPHY: Are they kept on the same routes each season?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Stanley make occasional trips to the Magdalen islands during the winter for mail purposes?

Mr. HAZEN: The Stanley has made one trip to the Magdalen islands. We hope she will be able to make others.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have received a letter from the Rev. Father Turbide, one of the most prominent clergymen on the islands, who states that the service is badly needed. He informs me that there is a lack of coal on the islands this winter. I do not know for what reason, but the islanders were deprived of their usual supply of coal last fall. I shall be pleased to know that my hon. friend will see that the Stanley makes one or two additional trips before the month of March. Does my hon. friend know if the service between Rivière Ouelle on the south shore and Murray bay on the north shore has been interrupted, and the cause of the interruption of the trips made by the Champlain?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that the service this year from Rivière Ouelle to Murray bay has not been satisfactory. A new wharf is in course of construction at Murray bay, and at present proper protection is not afforded to steamers at that place. We have had a great deal of correspondence about it, and have done the best we could. Circumstances which were not under the control of our department have made it almost impossible for us to give as satisfactory a service as should be given.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the service is not re-established this winter, there will be very great hardship, because that is the only line of communication for the whole of the north shore with Quebec and Montreal. It is true that a new and very much needed wharf is being built at Murray bay. If my honourable friend will look into the matter he will find that although the landing facilities at Murray bay are not as good as they should be, better facilities may be be obtained elsewhere, for instance at Cap à l'Aigle, Les Eboulements, St. Irénée or Baie St. Paul. Any of these places are a little out of the way, but the people on the north shore would have at least communication with the south shore and with Quebec and Montreal if landings were established at any of these points. I would ask my hon. friend to look into this matter and see that the people are given proper communication, as they are now as much isolated as the people of the Magdalen Islands.

Mr. HAZEN: Efforts are now being made to effect arrangements by which the Lady Grey, when she can be spared, will be put on the route from Quebec to Murray bay. At present the trouble is that she cannot remain at Murray bay for any length of time, but efforts are being made to give a more satisfactory service than at present exists.

Mr. BUREAU: I read in the papers last night that the steamer Montcalm was leaving in the morning on a cruise to the gulf, the vicinity of the Seven islands and the north shore. On a previous occasion I read that it was the intention of the department to keep these steamers this winter on the St. Lawrence, with a view to keeping the river open up to Three Rivers or lake St. Peter. Representing the county of Champlain, you are familiar, Mr. Chairman, with the conditions in that district, but perhaps you have not suffered as much from the results of ice jams on the St. Lawrence river below Three Rivers as we have further up. When the ice jams in this part of the river the counties of St. Maurice, Champlain and Maskinonge are flooded and a great deal of damage is done. In the years 1906, 1907, 1908 and 1909 the Montcalm and the Lady Grey came regularly to this part of the river and kept the channel open, and in the spring there were no floods and no damage was done. On one occasion the Montcalm ran short of coal at Three Rivers and was caught in the ice, and, no tugs or other boats being available, she could not work her way out and had to winter at Three Rivers. The consequence was that the boat could not do any work at Cap a la Roche, the ice jammed, and there was a flood on both sides of the St. Lawrence. Barns and houses were torn down, wharfs were broken away, and considerable damage was done on the shores of the river. If it be the intention of the Government to charter boats as ice-breakers and keep them at that work, I do not see any necessity of their breaking ice except where the ice takes, for that is where there is liable to be great damage to property. If it is not the intention of the department to recall the Montcalm and have her perform the services for which she was intended, I would urge the Government to take such steps as will give a measure of protection to the people along the shores of the St. Lawrence river between Cap a la Roche and lake St. Peter.

Mr. HAZEN: As far as the breaking of ice in the St. Lawrence is concerned, these boats are under the direction of Mr. Forneret, who is in charge of the dredging operations on the river St. Lawrence. What my hon. friend has said about the desirability of keeping the ice broken so as to prevent these floods is absolutely correct. When certain conditions of tide and weather prevail, the boats are not required for the purpose of breaking ice, and under such circumstances it has been customary to send the boats to the Seven Islands and other places with which there is no communication, in order that the people in those districts may be able to get supplies and have communication with the outside world. That policy has been pursued for the last ten years and, I understand, satisfactorily so. The boats are there for the purpose of breaking ice in the ship channel during the winter season, and no good purpose would be served in keeping them there when they are not necessary for the purpose of breaking ice. Under such circumstances it is much better to have them render service to the people of Seven Islands and other points. They only go under such conditions as I have referred to, and when, in the opinion of the superintendent of the St. Lawrence channel, they can do so without in any way impairing their efficiency as ice-breakers.

Mr. BUREAU: I have every confidence in Mr. Forneret; against him I have nothing whatever to say. I would call attention to the fact that the ice has taken—I have crossed the river on the ice between the counties of Champlain and Nicolet. The year the boat was caught in the ice at Three Rivers—1912; they called it the Borden flood, I think— much damage was done, and if these boats are sent down the river this year, and the work is not started at once, I am satisfiied that the result will be the same. Is it the policy of the Government to try to keep the channel open during the winter, as was stated in the Conservative press last fall?

Mr. HAZEN: It is, certainly—to keep the ice broken so that there shall be no floods, and so that navigation will be open early in the spring.

Mr. BUREAU: I may tell the minister that the ice has frozen over the river and is thickening all the time, just at the places where the boat ought to be to-day.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall certainly call the attention of Mr. Forneret to what my hon. friend says. As evidence of the fact that we are desirous of doing all that is possible in the matter, I may say that we have asked for tenders for a foreign ice-breaker to be used on the St. Lawrence river as an ice-breaker, and for no other purpose. It has been found that the practice of having boats constructed to be used not only as ice-breakers, but for other purposes during the summer, is one which has not been very much in the public interest. These boats built as ice-breakers are tremendous consumers of coal, and their operation for ordinary purposes during the summer is very expensive. The new boat is being constructed for use as an ice-breaker only. It will be of the most modern construction, and I am told by the naval architect of the department that it will be equal to any ice-breaker in any part of the world. When that boat is ready and in operation I do not think that there will be any further complaints. Because of the fact that the people living at Seven Islands are entirely without means of communication with outside districts, a tremendous pressure is brought to bear on the department—and the same is true of the Magdalen Islands—to have boats sent there from time to time to make conditions of living a little more pleasant than they are when the people are absolutely shut out from the outside world. But if by doing so we are imperilling the work upon the St. Lawrence, then the very greatest care ought to be exercised.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want to be understood as trying to discriminate against the people of the Seven islands or any other place, but they have the Druid that I know of and the Montmagny.

Mr. HAZEN: They are not ice-breakers, they cannot do that service in winter.

Mr. BUREAU: These boats could go down to the Seven islands, they are strong boats and go down there in the spring and late fall.

Mr. HAZEN: They are not built for that purpose, they could not do it in the winter season.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At page N-22 of the Auditor General's Report, there is an account for $5,353 paid to the Nova Scotia Iron Works at Dartmouth. Were tenders asked for that work?

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me that those repairs were done by tender.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On page N-22 there is a payment to Stewart, Bruce & Co., Charlottetown, of nearly $3,000 for repairs to the steamer Montcalm. There was also a sum of over $4,500 paid to the same firm for repairs to the Earl Grey. These two accounts are made up of small amounts, but in the aggregate the amount is quite substantial for the year. Was this done after tenders?

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me that the first item is made up of different small items. It was not done by tender. Practically this is the only firm in Charlottetown with a shop of the kind necessary to do the work of that character and this is the firm who for many years past, no matter what Government has been in power, have been doing work for the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this the only firm in Charlottetown capable of doing this class of work?

Mr. HAZEN: That is what I am told by the purchasing agent of the department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When supplies of the value of over $100 are purchased what is the practice of the department? Are tenders solicited from friends of the Government or from the public?

Mr. HAZEN: In many cases tenders are asked from friends of the Government. There are cases when they are asked from people on both sides of politics, when people who are not friends of the Government are asked to submit figures.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What amount determines the policy of the Government as to whether friends of the Government or the public are asked to submit tenders?

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me that the same policy prevails as has prevailed for many years past. The local agent of the department asks for figures and the people who are leaders in different lines of commerce supply the different lines of goods wanted. Figures are submitted and the lowest prices are accepted and all goods are obtained on a competitive basis.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But sometimes the competition is confined to well known friends of the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that would be correct.

Mr. MACLEAN: Regardless of the amount purchased during a season.

Mr. HAZEN: I think that where the amounts are very large, for large quantities of iron, &c., tenders are asked.

Mr. MACLEAN: What course does the minister direct to be taken by purchasing agents in St. John, for instance.

Mr. HAZEN: In St. John four or five different firms are asked to figure.

Mr. MACLEAN: Friends of the Government?

Mr. HAZEN: I think they are in all cases friends of the Government.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then surely there will come a time when the amount would be so large that the hon. gentlemen would be mindful of the public interest and not so regardful of his own party friends.

Mr. HAZEN: I think you have competition enough amongst them to bring them down to the lowest price.

Mr. MACLEAN: What is the amount?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no hard and fast rule.

Mr. MACLEAN: In St. John must the agent inquire of the minister what he shall do?

Mr. HAZEN: Before the agent enters into any contract he submits figures to the purchasing agent of the department in Ottawa, who has been in that position for a number of years; the purchasing agent of the department examines the figures and satisfies himself that the amounts charged are only fair and reasonable charges for the work to be done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does he consult the member for the city and county of St. John?

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all; in matters of that sort he practically consults no one. He has large responsibilities on his shoulders as purchasing agent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there a patronage list for St. John in the Marine Department?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. MACLEAN: For Halifax?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. MACLEAN: Where is this list kept?

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me that he has no patronage list but has a knowledge in every community in Canada of people engaged in different lines of business and he is guided by that.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not think this was the practice under the late Government. If it was, it never had the concurrence of hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. HAZEN: The purchasing agent tells me the practice is exactly the same as that which prevailed under my predecessors in office.

Mr. MACLEAN: The Minister of Marine did not approve of this practice.

Mr. HAZEN: I was not in the House.

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman was out of the House, but he took very good care to let the public in New Brunswick know that he did not approve of this departmental practice. I remember the hon. gentleman making a speech in the election of 1911 in St. John in which he condemned this practice in the most severe fashion.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend is entirely mistaken; I do not think I ever made a speech in my life in which I condemned the system of purchase being carried on in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It may be that I should have done so, but I did not.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The minister spoke against reciprocity.

Mr. HAZEN: On many occasions.

Mr. GERMAN: There is a practice in the Railways and Canals Department, and I think in the Public Works Department, that all amounts over $5,000 must be advertised.

Mr. HAZEN: Anything over $5,000 in our department is purchased by tender, and on many occasions for less amounts.

Mr. GERMAN: Open to the public?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would like to ask about a number of items, found at page No. 13 of the Auditor General's Report, amounting to $20,431.50 paid to George T. Davie & Son, of Lévis, for repairs to some steamer. I do not think it is stated in the item what steamer it is. I would like to know if tenders were asked for in this case, and in the other cases where this firm has made repairs to steamers at Lévis; and if so, whether these tenders were open to the public or were the contracts awarded simply by private letters written to the firm.

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot give my hon. friend exact information, as the payment he refers to occurred before I was minister. I believe the circumstances were something like this: The Earl Grey was taking the Governor General down the river and ran ashore. She was very badly damaged, and was repaired by the Davie firm, who were the lessees of the Government dry dock at Quebec. There was no other place where the Earl Grey could have been repaired. Of course I am speaking of something for which I have no responsibility at all. But I am told an estimate was made of the cost of repairs by the inspector, Mr. Ferguson, and, based on that, the minister of that day entered into a contract with the Davie firm.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is another item in which the name of the Davie firm appears. On page N-10 it says:

Geo. T. Davie & Son, Levis, replacing propeller blade, &c., $3,094.

That is in connection with the steamer Champlain. Were tenders asked for, and if so, in what manner?

Mr. HAZEN: I am informed that the Davie firm is the only company in the city of Quebec that is able to make repairs to a ship beneath its water line. It is the only firm in Quebec that has the facilities and the docking appliances for doing that, and therefore any vessel requiring such work has to go to the Davie firm. The custom is to have a careful report and estimate made by the technical officers of the department, and upon that report a contract is entered into.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend can sleep on both ears every evening so long as he has as honest and straightforward a purchasing agent as the one now in the employ of his department. I can testify to his ability and to his honesty. But at the same time I am surprised at the offhand way in which my hon. friend speaks of the system whereby tenders are given to a select few—a select few Tories of course. My hon. friend was not in the House prior to 1911. Of course he had some experience of the House in 1891, but several hon. gentlemen who were sitting on this side of the House prior to 1911, simply roasted to death my predecessor in office, Hon. L. P. Brodeur, because, forsooth, he followed the practice which has been accepted and gladly followed by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This is the best possible vindication of the policy of the Hon. Mr. Brodeur. Day in and day out he was taunted by the Conservative Opposition because he accepted tenders from Grit firms, at very reasonable prices, for repairs to some steamers.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: He was being roasted about his trip to England.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend could take a trip to England and learn many things there, but this is not a case of trips to England or trips to Zululand. The question is whether my hon. friend who now interrupts me did not attack Mr. Brodeur, the predecessor of the present incumbent, because he awarded contracts to a few Grit tenderers at a very reasonable price when he was in office? To-day the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries furnishes us with the most complete vindication of Mr. Brodeur. He says: I followed the system of my predecessor. That is about all we can expect from a Tory Government. Each time this Government is taken to task they reproach us with having done a similar thing while we were in office. They admit now that what we did then was honest and fair, but at that time they criticised it. Hon. gentlemen were simply making political capital in order to prejudice the mind of the electors. I am glad to see the minister following the policy adopted by his predecessor, Mr. Brodeur, and taking the advice of this much abused yet able and active purchasing agent appointed by the Laurier Government, Mr. Doutre.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand that all purchases made by the department must first receive the approval of the purchasing agent?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, for every dollar.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would that apply to repairs on a ship as well?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes, to everything.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then before repairs are commenced on a ship the rates pertaining to the different items have to be approved by the purchasing agent. Is that correct?

Mr. HAZEN: No work is undertaken in the way of repairs to ships or anything of that sort, until the purchasing agent has issued a warrant for such work and no money is paid until he examines the bills and has certified that the charges are correct.

Mr. MACLEAN: Does not the minister think he should lay down a rule for the guidance of his officer, as to when he should ask for public tenders, and when the contract should be given to friends of the Government?

Mr. HAZEN: In cases where there is no question about asking for public tenders, the purchasing agent would go to the deputy head or to myself and discuss the matter. I want to say to my hon. friend that it has not been my practice to interfere with the judgment of the purchasing agent in matters of that sort.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How does the purchasing agent know who are the friends of the Government?

Mr. HAZEN: I suppose the purchasing agent, being a man of affairs, has a pretty fair knowledge of that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Take the case of a government ship buying supplies from a merchant on the coast of my constituency. Who advises them where to buy their supplies?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not know what goods are purchased in the constituency of my hon. friend except goods purchased by the steward. The stewards are free agents and can purchase where they see fit.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: That is for provisions?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. I do not know what else they could purchase along the coast of Guysborough.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Supplies for ships?

Mr. HAZEN: That sort of thing would be purchased, I should say, at the agencies through the agents of the department and not by the officers of the ships. They would have to go to the agents of the department except there might be an occasion when something would have to be purchased when there was not time to consult with the agent. But I cannot imagine that anything of importance would be purchased except through the agents of the department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Coal?

Mr. HAZEN: Coal is supplied by contract, and of course coal is a thing that has a well established market price.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where was the coal purchased last year in the county of Gaspé for the Government steamers?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that it was purchased from a gentleman named Carter.

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I be permitted to give the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemiuex) an answer to the question he asked me a few minutes ago? The hon. member for Rouville asked if a yacht had been purchased by the Customs Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A yacht or a boat.

Mr. REID: I have a memorandum from the Assistant Commissioner of Customs in which he tells me that no yacht has been purchased by the Customs Department during the last six months and quartered for the winter at Prescott or Kingston. As far as I am personally concerned if a steamer had been purchased for the Customs Department and it had been at any place on the St. Lawrence west of Montreal I would have known something about it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the yacht said to have been seized and quartered at Prescott?

Mr. REID: I say that a yacht was seized at Prescott or Brockville and that only the parties that had any claim against it were paid. It was hauled up immediately on the marine works and repaired and the Department of Customs paid the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the repairs. The boat was then towed to Kingston, brought down the Rideau canal to Ottawa and taken from Ottawa to St. John direct; it was not used in any way on the St. Lawrence river after it came off the ways at Prescott.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman tell us who was the owner of the yacht and how it was registered?

Mr. REID: It was an American yacht.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The yacht was the property of some one; it would have been easy to find out.

Mr. REID: There was no way of finding it out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it the Phantom?

Mr. REID: No, the name of the yacht was the Albatross. The boat
5 p.m. had been used on the St. Lawrence for a year before it was found out by the preventive staff that it was an American yacht.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much was paid for the repairs and what was devoted to the people who had a claim against it?
