The OECD report to which I referred stated that an immediate recovery in the economy would best be promoted by giving priority to residential housing and to business fixed investment. Hon. members no doubt want to hear from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is preparing new policies and programs which will do exactly what is recommended by the various reports just referred to.

To sum up, the government's anti-inflation program may be regarded as regrettable, but conditions which make necessary this kind of policy are there. The conditions of overreach, of overkill, have made necessary such a farreaching policy and new intrusion of government into the free market economy of Canada. But the policy is demanded by the circumstances, circumstances which speak for themselves. The transition period will be tricky, and a satisfactory way must be found to resolve any serious inequities. My confidence in the government and in the people who will serve on the review board is great enough to lead me to think that these inequities will be dealt with.

On Wednesday afternoon my colleagues and I will meet with pulp and paper workers of northwestern Ontario to talk about the situation in which they find themselves in this transition period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hope they share the hon. member's confidence.

Mr. Penner: I hope so, too. I think there is every reason for them to share that confidence. The government's program must succeed. Its success will be assured if the rate of increase in food prices is moderated, if there is a good supply of adequate housing and if we pass through the transition period without causing inequities which would otherwise be perpetuated well into 1976 and during the remaining period in which the controls program will be in existence.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, last Tuesday when I spoke on behalf of the NDP on the white paper I said that in our view the government's proposals for controlling prices and wages were unfair and unworkable. In the last week I have listened carefully to the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) explaining and justifying the program, and I must say that my conclusion will not surprise my political opponents: I think my original position was right and my party was right in saying that the controls are unfair and unworkable.

In the last 72 hours the minister has made himself readily available to the media, so much so that he has been willing to talk almost at the drop of any microphone, so to speak. For that reason alone, I am suspicious about the government's confidence in their own program. I saw the minister on television, on "W-5". He was on the CBC radio program "Cross-Canada Check-up". He wrote an article in the Toronto Star and appeared last night, on behalf of the Liberal party, on the television program "The Nation's Business". Yet in none of these programs or articles has the minister really dealt with the crucial questions raised about the controls program. He has not made his case for their need. Neither during the debate so far nor during the weekend has he dealt with the alleged cost-push factor and why we need such controls.

As I say, he did not deal with that at all. There is a two-paragraph reference only to this subject. He did not deal with the issue in terms of increasing labour costs on the one hand, or in terms of our supposed trade problems on the other. He made passing references only to both of these subjects. They surely are a precondition for this kind of program. Nor did he allay fears expressed not exclusively by my party but by a good number of Canadians across this country about the unfairness and unworkable nature of his own proposals.

This afternoon I will not travel over ground I travelled over last Tuesday. Nor will I repeat what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said on behalf of the NDP. Instead, I shall deal with the principle arguments the minister continues to put forward to justify his program. First, the minister emphasized in his article in the Toronto Star, in his television performance following the national news last night and on the television program "W-5" the same evening, that the program is intended primarily to benefit people on low and fixed incomes. Clearly, that is the message he wanted to convey to the people of Canada. I begin by saying that if the program achieves this, the minister will have done something remarkable; he will have done something to justify the hon. member who just spoke. In other words, the Liberal party will have taken a 180-degree turn and changed its direction of one year ago. I remind the hon. member and the minister that, speaking about this program during the past year, the Prime Minister has said that the group which would be most seriously negatively—not positively—affected in Canada by these kinds of controls would be the weak and the poor. In 1974 the Prime Minister said that these people would be most hurt under such a program.

This specific kind of program was dealt with in general statements made by the Prime Minister. I suggest that the program will most seriously affect negatively, contrary to what the minister has said during the past 48 hours, that same group. About whom are we talking? We are talking about the poor or, to use the words the minister used last night on television, the small people or little people. I do not particularly care about the term, but we know what it means: it means low income people. They are either working poor people or pensioners. Consider how this specific program is to affect such people. First, what is the government doing for workers in the labour market but living at the poverty level? I remind you that the federal minimum wage provides a worker in Canada with only $5,400 annually. Madam Speaker, $5,400 a year is paid for those earning the minimum wage set this government. That, by the way, is $2,400 less than the poverty level for a family of four: the current estimate for the poverty level for a family of four in Canada is $7,871. We now have a federal minimum wage for workers in Canada that is $2,400 below the poverty level for a family of four. If the government had wanted to do something about this category of worker, they would have done something directly. They would have at least increased their own minimum wage. However, there is not a thing in the program about increasing the federal minimum wage.

There is no suggestion that the provinces, which are part of the package, should increase their minimum wage. Many of the provinces, which in terms of resources are much poorer than the federal government, have even lower wages. The federal government did not do anything about increasing the minimum wage at the federal level. Nor did they suggest to the provinces that was the least they could do for workers under their jurisdiction.

The proposed guideline of $600 at the bottom level is not mandatory. There is no requirement that all workers will get it. It is only if the workers are lucky. If, for example, they have an employer who is benevolent after the controls in a way that he was not before, and gives the workers the $600 increase, they will get it. However, there is no reason to believe they will get the $600 today if a week ago the employer would not have thought of passing it on to them.

Because the minister has put controls on the trade union sector, the effective following up of wage gains in the non-trade union sector that has traditionally taken place simply will not happen now. The organized workers, whether they be in Atlantic Canada, central Canada or the west, have set patterns for the unorganized workers. By indirect effect, they have caused increases to be passed on to them that they otherwise would not have got. This is because of the initiative taken in the collective bargaining sector.

Precisely because the minister has now put effective controls on the bargaining sector to ensure they do not go above 8 or 10 per cent, there is an even greater likelihood that all those men and women outside the trade union movement will have lower increases than would otherwise have been the case. I repeat, they have no one to bargain for them. With the controls being put on the trade union movement, the example-setting precedent in terms of wage demands has been taken away. The government has indirectly done more harm to unorganized workers because they have not made mandatory increases in the minimum wage at either the federal or provincial level which would have been some kind of compensation.

The second point I would like to make is in terms of the guideline for those firms employing 500 people or less. Everywhere east of the province of Quebec I would guess that between 80 and 90 per cent of firms employ fewer than 500 people. The government has given the moral and legal authority to companies in the whole of Atlantic Canada to keep their wages even lower because most of those companies employ 500 or fewer people. Most of those companies do not have trade unions. The working people have no effective representation in arguing for improvements in their working conditions, including wages. This program will give employers in Atlantic Canada a very effective weapon to keep wages down.

The government should be more concerned about the non-unionized worker in Canada. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is addressing trade union meetings in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada, urging compliance with the program. I am not in any way suggesting that they should defy the law. However, instead of his concentrating on urging them to comply with the guidelines, it would make much more sense if he would travel around Ontario and other parts of the country urging the formation of trade unions. He should be doing this in Atlantic Canada and in other places where the trade union movement is not strong or is non-existent. Urging the formation of trade unions would do far more good for the ordinary workers than a thousand speeches to existing trade unions urging compliance with the guidelines.

If the government had been really concerned about the work force, they would have made specific proposals to raise minimum wages at the federal and the provincial levels. They would have ensured that the suggested minimums were at least passed on to those workers at the bottom of the scale. There is no such requirement. The government should do something about promoting the organization of unorganized workers. There is nothing in this program that will positively affect unorganized workers in Canada.

What about pensioners, another group that presumably is included in the minister's description of lower income people? I point out that a single pensioner in Canada receiving the regular pension plus the supplement receives only $219.96 a month, or just over $2,400 a year. That is all we give a pensioner in Canada in October, 1975. The poverty level for a single individual in Canada is $3,372, about $1,000 more than we give to a single pensioner. Is there anything in this program that is of direct benefit to a pensioner? Is there any suggestion that the rest of us, including individuals and corporations, will have a substantial tax increase in order to make it easier for the pensioner? There is nothing in the program that will alter the circumstances of a pensioner.

It is ironic, with sad overtones, that the maximum pension a person in Canada can get, if he does not have a private pension, is about what the salary increase will be for an MP and, in fact, the increase permitted to all people in all upper income groups—$2,400. Many of us will get an increase this year which is permitted within the guidelines of this program that is equivalent to the total paid to Canada's pensioners. Something is profoundly wrong when we have that kind of maldistribution of income.

Also, something is obviously wrong when we find the minister justifying his program and saying that the people with the lowest incomes are those who will be the prime beneficiaries. We reject that contention. We rejected it last Tuesday as being unfair, and the minister has said nothing since then which alters that judgment.

Let me deal with one argument I suspect he might make; he did refer to it earlier today. He said that if the government is effective in bringing down the cost of living through his program, then those at the bottom end of the scale would benefit. Of course they would benefit if we reduced the cost of living, but the point is they would not benefit any more than anyone else; in fact, since most of those with higher incomes spend more in dollar terms than they do, the people with higher incomes would benefit more.

So I think it is a specious argument to assert that the prime beneficiaries of this program would be the poor. If there is to be any benefit at all—and I think the benefit will be negligible—we will all get it. The government has done nothing on the positive side to benefit the poorer sections of the community, as any kind of incomes policy would have to do in order to get the support of the NDP. I refer to the minister's speech on Friday when, addressing himself to this question of fairness, he stated, "It is one thing to acknowledge this goal; it is another thing to observe it in practice." I agree entirely. The point I am making is that the Liberals have historically acknowledged such a goal; where they have been short is in the practice, and we find this well illustrated in the program they are urging us to accept.

Not only on the ground of equity should there be some redistributing element in this program, though that, of course, is important in itself. I say to the minister that in terms of making the program workable in the community, its provisions should be fair and equitable, because the people will not agree to accept some kind of sacrifice unless they are convinced that a sense of national fairness is built into the whole program.

What about the price control aspect? As was evident from the criticisms which I and others expressed last week, we do not believe the approach taken by the government in dealing with prices is effective. I do not intend to repeat all the arguments I made last week. We do believe that no government which set up a scheme to control prices indirectly through the control of profits could avoid a number of loopholes of which clever accountants or corporation lawyers could take advantage. We do not contend that because of such a possibility no attempt should be made to use this kind of mechanism. Indeed, as the minister pointed out, the NDP has commended this approach as one we would use. Nevertheless, I repeat it is extremely difficult to ensure its effectiveness since we are dealing here with an indirect control over prices. Corporations can hide their profits in all kinds of ways, hiring the best accountants and lawyers money can buy to enable them to make use of legitimate loopholes.

Aside from these considerations, there is in the white paper itself—and the effect will be apparent in the operations of the Anti-Inflation Board—a loophole to end all loopholes. It is expressed at page 19 of the white paper and I will read it because it undermines everything else which has been said about controlling prices through profit control. The last paragraph on page 19 provides for exceptions in the program. Let me read it:

> A firm will be regarded as having acted in accordance with the program if its profit per unit of output or percentage net profit margin exceeded the guidelines as a result of unusual productivity gains resulting from the efforts of the firm, or of favourable cost developments which could not reasonably have been anticipated.

In other words, if there are gains through unusual productivity, a firm does not have to obey the profit guidelines. The same applies if there have been favourable cost developments which could not reasonably have been anticipated. The government has been telling us that it has established profit guidelines applicable to most of the corporations which would indirectly benefit the consumer since the corporations will be able to work only within a limited profit mark-up range. What they are saying here is that any firm which increases its productivity, or discovers some favourable cost development which could not have been reasonably anticipated, will be exempt from the guidelines.

I will say nothing now about the range of questions which could come before the courts, the disputes which would take months or years to resolve. I ask the minister simply: Will General Motors, will Weston's, will any large corporation in Canada find itself unable to take advantage of these loopholes? Surely, any corporate executive will argue, when any kind of cost benefit has been received, that it had not been anticipated. Who will prove the contrary? Will psychoanalysts be travelling about the country in an attempt to read the minds of directors of these various companies to see if cost benefits had been anticipated? As though the other loopholes were not big enough, they have added this catch-all which I suggest will let every corporation in Canada off the hook.

For these reasons, I repeat that there is no prospect in this legislation of effective price control, and any program of control which limits salaries and wages in the absence of price control is a totally deficient program and one which is unworthy of support by the House of Commons.

I wish to reply briefly to the criticism made of myself and the New Democratic Party in the House on Friday. The minister said there was no one who could speak with less credibility than the NDP in criticizing the government's approach to dealing with inflation. The reason, he said, was that the NDP had itself proposed the establishment of a prices review board. The hon. gentleman quoted some of my speeches as well as speeches made by the former leader of this party, Mr. David Lewis, and he stated, accurately, that in the 1974 election we had advocated the setting up of a prices review board as a major instrument for dealing with inflation. So he says, in a classical non sequitur—quite normal for a Liberal cabinet minister—that because we came up with the original idea, it is rather absurd, or perhaps hypocritical, of us now to criticize what the dear old Liberals are doing with it.

● (1650)

I should like to cite a few more examples of NDP ideas that have been taken over and bastardized by the Liberals—and this gem that they have come up with is a perfect historical example of what they normally do. You may recall, Madam Speaker, that it was the New Democratic Party who originally proposed the Canada Development Corporation. We proposed that it be publicly-owned and controlled, one that would operate independently of the marketplace. I would remind the hon. member that in our founding convention back in 1961, before even dear old Walter Gordon heard of this idea, this corporation was advocated by the New Democratic Party. Then the Liberals took it up and it was made an instrument for selling off at least the successful Crown corporations to the private sector. We do not support that. As originally proposed by us, the idea was a good one. As implemented by the Liberals, it was not.

Then during the minority government days, when the Liberals were under pressure, they set up a national petroleum corporation advocated by us. The NDP saw that as the first step in a series that would lead to a total public ownership and control of Canada's petroleum resources. How do the Liberals see this national petroleum corporation? They have already cut back on last year's budget. They took the guts out of the corporation by significantly reducing its budget, and it will play a very minor role in the petroleum sector. It will amount to nothing.

The point I am making, Madam Speaker, is that just because the New Democratic Party comes up with an idea and a name, it does not mean that the Liberals, when they take over the name, also take over the idea. In fact, they are pastmasters of doing the very opposite: they retain the name and the propaganda, but take the guts out of the idea. I suggest that this is what they have done with the Anti-Inflation Board. We proposed such an idea and said that one aspect of the powers of the board could be to order rollbacks in certain sectors of the economy. When the minister attacked us for neglecting our own policy, what he failed to mention in his speech was that we also said that for such a board to be operative, both in terms of holding down prices and minimizing the extent of the bureaucracy required, there should be a number of price freezes, that would come in automatically when the board was set up, in a number of key sectors of the economy. These were spelled out to the minister in speeches by David Lewis and by myself in the past. I do not know why the minister neglected to mention that. He may have neglected to mention it precisely because this government has not ordered any price freeze in any sector. Dealing with price increases is left entirely to the so-called profit control mechanism.

Once again the Liberals have taken a New Democratic Party idea that made some sense in regard to controlling price increases, an idea that said that in key sectors of the economy a freeze should be applied, with the corporations having to justify increases. But this idea has been turned upside down. In true historical fashion, the Liberals have turned the idea on its head. They have selected a number of sectors and let the corporations increase prices, making the people, via a government agency, justify any order for a rollback. We put the onus on the corporations. They put it on the people. It is this kind of approach that will require many more bureaucrats than would have been the case with our proposal. The way we see the board function is to put the onus on the corporations, as is the case now, for example, with Bell Canada, to justify any price increase. If they cannot be justified, then the increases would not be permitted.

Having talked about the prices proposal and why we think this board will be ineffective and the wage proposal unfair, I now want to say that one of the preconditions that the minister and the Prime Minister have talked about in the past in terms of such a program being effective—quite apart from its technical details—is that a board cross-section of the community would have to find it acceptable.

In his speech on Friday the minister said he welcomed the "generally strong support" that the program had received in Canada. Well, I do not know where he got that, whether he was talking to the members of his own family, or maybe talking to the converts in the Liberal party caucus who are suddenly committed to the idea. I listened to "Cross Canada Check-up" and I have been reading the press and taking part in open-line radio programs, but I do not find widespread acceptance of this program. I do not find it for the reasons that have already been alluded to: it is full of inequities; it is full of conditions that will make it not only unfair but unworkable. Therefore, I say to the minister that one of the preconditions that he has set for a workable program, namely, that it will have widespread public acceptance, simply does not exist. If anything, I judge right now that there are more people in Canada opposed to the program than in support of it.

This means that in the days ahead the minister is going to have a lot of trouble. There is no feeling at all in Canada, in our view, that this program will gain acceptance, and the reason is that it is a program that does not deserve to gain acceptance.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Anti-Inflation Act

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Madam Speaker, it is quite praiseworthy for the Canadian government to tackle immediately and vigorously the serious problem of inflation. It is essential that all Canadians not only realize the grave danger threatening our economy but that they voluntarily and consciously join the government in its efforts to control the inflation cycle.

During the past few years and especially in recent months we have witnessed frantic competition to obtain the highest profits, prices and salaries without any noticeable improvement in living conditions and the general quality of life in Canada.

One result of those unchecked increases was to make the cost of living rise considerably and another, to allow some fortunate people get profit margins or raises in salary that were appropriate and often more than enough to face the same cost of living, most of the time at the expense of small and medium-size businesses, small businessmen and low-wage earners, less able to defend themselves against rampant inflation.

Moreover there is not doubt that higher production costs and unrestrained price hikes are destroying the country's capacity for effectively competing on the international market. I say all that to point out that inflation is a present and growing evil in our society and that its ill-effects have repercussions on each individual's life. If, therefore, it is true that the fight against inflation has become the "business" and requires the co-operation of each Canadian, I think the present Bill C-73 has all necessary elements to recruit... successfully the majority of Canadians, without necessarily resorting to a true freeze of all wages and prices for a short period between 60 and 90 days, as previously suggested by the Progressive Conservative Party, the massive issuing of dollars by the Bank of Canada for a so-called compensated discount—which by the way means absolutely nothing and is apparently understood only by the misunderstood—as suggested by the Social Credit Party of Canada, or the killing of the private sector and the remuneration by the state without regard for competence and initiative, as suggested by the New Democratic Party.

This is a policy which is more adaptable and respectful of rights and reality: a selective control of benefit margins, prices, dividends and wages in Canada, which permits on the one hand the industry to spur production and, on the other hand, workers to keep their jobs, earn sufficiently more to meet the cost of living increase and, as consumers, to see a gradual softening of the substantial price hikes we have known.

Many Canadians are prepared to give up more substantial salary increases provided their purchasing power becomes larger and larger; indeed what is the use of getting a 25 per cent salary boost when at the same time you have to meet a 40 or 50 per cent consumer price rise and even more? If we can prove with the good administration of this anti-inflation legislation along those next three years that salary increases limited to 8, 10 or 12 per cent, as the case may be, do spell better purchasing power—taking into account simultaneous controls over profits and prices—and therefore improved quality of life for Canadians as a whole, the Trudeau government will be said to have taken the lead at the right moment and in an efficient way to straighten the economy of this country, for is it necessary to add that this government, as it should, is showing itself ready to curb substantially its own expenses.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

However, this vast attack on inflation should not be made at the expense of small earners who were not lucky enough to get a new labour contract or a reasonable salary raise before the critical date of October 14, 1975. It may be difficult to put into the legislation or its regulations special provisions and variable standards to provide for regional disparities. It is nonetheless essential not to condemn those with really low salaries to near poverty for three years.

It would be unfair for those underprivileged to retain for another three years that unenviable status, when this government, through its various departments and specially that of Regional Economic Expansion, has made so many efforts, and still does, to fight against regional disparities. To my mind, the low-wage earner, the small and average businesses in the areas of slow economic growth, should be granted the same protection as farmers to whom the provisions of the anti-inflation act do not apply.

Though it be true that consumer price and rent controls protect the less fortunate, people who live on a fixed income such as pensioners, we must continue to improve the lot of the poor; the fight against inflation must be waged above all "on the backs" of those who encouraged it most, that is, big business with its excessive profits, and those who managed to inflate their incomes beyond reason.

The bill and its regulations can and do give in fact considerable latitude and discretion to the Anti-Inflation Board, chaired by my distinguished predecessor as hon. member for the constituency of Drummond in this House, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, who by the way resigned from all the positions he had up to now to be able to devote himself to the Anti-Inflation Board without conflict of interest. In the white paper "Attack on Inflation" which was tabled in the House of Commons last Tuesday, it is said on page 22, and I quote:

> Future increases provided for in contracts and agreements in force as of October 14, 1975 including cost-of-living adjustments, will be exempt from the guidelines. Where agreement has been reached by October 14, 1975 on compensation increases to be incorporated in new contracts, such increases will also be exempt from the guidelines. Special consideration will be given to those cases where contracts have expired and negotiations are underway, where the expired contract was signed prior to the beginning of 1974.

In the same white paper, on page 26, we can read, and I quote:

> There will, therefore, be exceptions to the above guidelines. If an employer can demonstrate that he cannot attract or hold workers at existing wages and that an increase above the guidelines is necessary, the employer will not be regarded as having breached the guidelines.
> There may also be other grounds for exceptions, such as increases necessary to maintain long-established historical relationships between wages in closely related groups and other special cases of equity. Employers may also grant increases in compensation above the guidelines if such increases result from taking measures to improve the health or safety of the employees while at work, to eliminate restrictive work practices, to offset experience deficiencies in pension funds, or to eliminate sex discrimination in pay practices.

Thus I wish all the regulations and all the powers of the Anti-Inflation Board will indeed allow those in regions of low economic growth to catch up where wages are, by far, under the national average; at the same time, of course, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion must not be the one affected by cuts in government expenditures, in order to give employers in disadvantaged regions the means to close the gap.

I have no reason for not voicing full confidence in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who, in his speech last Friday in this House, clearly indicated that he really intended to protect those I just defended.

The important point is to convince the obstinate circles that the war against inflation will not be waged on the backs of the low-income earners and to be prepared to amend the wording of the act or of its regulations, if need be, in order that there remain no doubt about it.

If this confidence can be won, everything will be all right and the fight against inflation will prove effective as people will not hesitate to unite and cooperate, in spite of the sacrifices this means within the framework of an act which is fair byt has teeth. Surely there will always be protesters, be they reactionaries, party followers or frustated people but their negative, selfish and antisocial response will not deter sensible Canadians, namely the majority of the people who expect their government to take a decisive and fair action in the present circumstances, thereby providing genuine and timely leadership.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to follow at this point the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) who just sounded the alarm with barely obscured words and just indicated to the government the dangers facing the Canadian society with that program put forward by the Liberal administration. I am quite pleased that the hon. member for Drummond pointed out its gaps and expressed wishes. He even suggested the possibility of amendments.

Madam Speaker, we are in full economic crisis. We have been in it for already too long. And I assure you that I do not intend to treat you with a dissertation.

I imagine that those who are used to looking at the debates of this House, specially those gentlemen of the press, have seen all sorts of them. We witnessed sometimes dramatic sometimes absolutely ridiculous performances. I imagine that today we might have surpassed everything seen before. Observers are looking at a government team which from the first to the back benches must feel extremely embarrassed to bring in today a program they condemned so much not too long ago, to embrace today what they disowned not too long ago. And the color appearing on their faces, Madam Speaker, is simply not the color of their political party—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He dreams in pink.

Mr. Wagner: It is an indication of what they feel down deep inside.

It is certain that we are determined to overcome the scourge of inflation that is eating at the very heart of society. We who have been in the official opposition for already a long time are fighting to bring this government to introduce steps that can lick inflation. We know what impact the cost of living can have on small businesses, the weak, underprivileged workers, contractors left to fend for themselves, people who are not unionized, particularly families.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He speaks like a bishop. I would ask the hon. member not to forget Cardinal Léger.

Mr. Wagner: I hear the whip of the party opposite saying, do not forget Cardinal Léger. Not even Cardinal Léger! I am not forgetting particularly families which are affected by the high cost of living, and I point out, Madam Speaker, that at no time during his palaver of some 20 minutes on television the other night did the Prime Minister dare mention the word "family". Nevertheless it is the very cell of our economic community.

Therefore, we also want to fight. We hope that Canadians in all provinces will co-operate so that the proposed measures will somewhat control the excessive cost of living. On the other hand, we have no right to remain silent. We have to expose the ridiculous contrast between the Prime Minister's performance who for a year and a half has allowed the economy of the country to drift as a result of his spinelessness, his helplessness to tackle the real causes. And suddenly at the last minute, perhaps as the result of some divine inspiration, he comes forth with what he believes to be a proof of leadership.

Madam Speaker, it is rather difficult to excuse the government policy of inaction in recent years. It is rather difficult to tell them today: You have done very well at the last moment and you were quite outstanding before! I know that before such a performance, such a cynical, Machiavellian and hypocritical reversal of policy, Canadians in every region of the country will be disgusted, and if they are prepared to follow suit and comply with the proposed guidelines, it is not through affection for the government. It is not because they have any faith in this government. On the contrary, its credibility is deteriorating from day to day. One cannot help it if people are sometimes cynical when they are faced with public men and governments such as they have today who take such an attitude.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, that I still recall statements made in this House at the time of the May 1974 budget when the Prime Minister spoke on the famous Turner budget, and I quote:

> This budget does not take the easy way. We want, not the easy way that the doctrinaire NDP or the controllers of wages on the Tory side want, but one which will keep the economy operating as the number one economy in the world.

The same Prime Minister on the same date, May 7, 1974, stated in this House and I quote:

> It is true that our attack on inflation is not a simple one. It is a complex one. It is a complex solution to a complex problem. We certainly reject the simple, and perhaps simple-minded, approach that has been brought to bear by the opposition on this question. These Tory controls would control the wages of the workingman. Prices have already risen very high, and controls will not bring them down. If you freeze high prices, there are still high prices; but if you freeze wages, there are still low wages.

And during the electoral campaign that followed, Madam Speaker, this Prime Minister's colleagues repeated the series of statements that will now pass on the political history of our country as being the most irresponsible and the most hypocritical statements ever formulated in Canada.

● (1720)

On June 11, 1974, there was a big meeting in the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe. It was held in Marieville and 60 people were assembled in the yard, in the hall of the Marieville school to listen to the former Minister of Communications. Most of them were election organizers and returning officers in Marieville. They heard the Minister of Communications say:

Inflation is essentially an international problem and—

His words must still echo in their minds—

—and nothing can be done about the price of oranges and bananas.

Madam Speaker, there was a banana peel waiting for the minister's successor in the riding of Hochelaga. That was realized last Tuesday. I cannot resist pointing out the grand statement from the godfather of federal Liberals in Quebec, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), because he also has been slapped in the face in Hochelaga, and I am not referring to the scolding he received from his colleagues in the caucus. His colleagues were quite surprised to realize that the leader of the Liberal members from Quebec had spent all his time in New Brunswick and forgotten the Hochelaga riding. But that is a different story.

Well, he was saying: "The Progressive Conservative Party which wants to hurt the weak, the wage-earners, the farmers, the small businessmen is irresponsible when it suggests limiting government expenses. Yes, these are huge expenses, but they are necessary, and limiting them is out of the question."

Madam Speaker, if I am saying these thing to you, it is because men have short memories. Women's memories are not so short. And because men's memories are short, we must remind our hon. friends opposite about these previous statements. What is more, they must explain to us how they came to this complete about-face which is absolutely unique in political history.

Something is clear. In 1974, Liberal parti candidates sought a mandate from the Canadian people. They asked them for their votes to form a majority government, on the assurance that they were against any form of control.

Subsequently, here in this House, those same backers were quick to tell the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and my colleagues that the people of Canada had rejected our party and had rejected controls.

Well, Madam Speaker, today I am telling the government that prior to undertaking a promotional campaign which will cost millions of dollars to convince Canadians that they should accept the measures that are now advocated and had been rejected earlier, that before doing that, the government should in all fairness and honesty confess to the people that they were wrong, that they made a mistake, that they lied to them, that they sought from them a mandate under false representations, and that today they feel the obligation of returning before them.

The government has no other alternative, and I challenge them to return before the people of this country whom they have misled. They should go and ask the population for a true mandate; they should tell them the truth once and for all instead of behaving like cynical and machiavellian politicians. Let them have the courage to call an election and in less than a month they will either come back with an explicit mandate to impose such controls or not come back at all because voters will have put them in their place.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he certainly knows that he must address himself to the Chair and not to government members.

Mr. Wagner: Thank you, Madam Speaker, I even wonder how I could have forgotten you—

An hon. Member: I apologize!

Mr. Wagner: I apologize. So, since an election may be called tonight, I ought perhaps to shorten my speech, but, Madam Speaker, I hear them laugh. They will cling to power for another three years. They will continue to deceive Canadians, and stay in power under false representations. They will wallow in that ridiculous performance which the people have recognized as such; under the circumstances, as there is no hope for them, I shall continue to speak to them anyway. Madam Speaker, I should like—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hon. member has alluded to power under false representations. I am sure the hon. member used words which exceed his thoughts, that he did not mean what he said.

Mr. Wagner: No, Madam Speaker. I merely wished to point out that when a political party seeks a mandate from the people it should do so honestly. If it changes its mind along the way, it should also have enough integrity to go again to the people.

[English]

Madam Speaker, it becomes increasingly clear that as time progresses, this government has made ad hockery into a veritable philosophy of government. These economic measures which have now found their way into Bill C-73 indicate, as I was mentioning a few moments ago, that what was unacceptable last year, last month and last week, is the only answer today, at least if one is to take the present policy of this government seriously. I think that much of the effectiveness of this program depends upon the will of Canadians to make it work, and that in turn depends upon the credibility of the program and the credibility of the government that brought it forward.

I was referring a few moments ago to the fantastic about-turn that this government has made in its economic policies. I am looking now at the seat occupied by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) and asking myself whether he declined to maintain his ministerial rank through a respect for principle or as a result of his inability to admit a fundamental error. Either way, the government is worse off for not having him as part of their economic pain.

The question is, are the people of Canada prepared to be part of this government's economic pain? In many respects, there are so many injustices and so many inequities in the program that this government has now put forward that many Canadians might not be blamed if they were to prefer sitting on the bench for a while before joining the team. These inequities are now becoming very clear. While it is possible for business enterprises to seek increases in prices through cost justification, it appears somehow impossible for the average citizen to do the same. The average citizen's increases are fixed, frozen and immovable. The hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) was alluding to these things a few moments ago.

Surely, one would not be too specious to ask why it would not be in some way more just if this program had some place in its operation for recognition in rising individual costs. Surely, if business enterprises can make their case within the context of this program, it will appear unjust if citizens cannot do the same. My leader has said that this program will involve rough justice if it is to survive. I say that there are so many weaknesses in this program that to suggest it will bring about any form of justice is simply to do so on the basis of faith rather than fact.

There is no question that my colleagues and I—who had the courage, by the way, to level with the country a year ago—will seek to support the principle and purposes of this legislation, but it is fair for us to warn the government this afternoon that if they are not prepared to seek meaningful amendment and modification so as to more properly assure just legislation and implementation of this program, this party will be prepared to clearly state its opposition when the opportunity arises.

The open handed nature of this bill which, by the way, runs beyond the normal traditional mandate of the government surely leads to some serious speculation. Has the government lost all faith in the ability of the market and the economy to respond to certain restraints and secure its own levels? Is there justification for those in the business community who fear that the price justification mechanisms in the bill are not even three years temporary, but are really a new permanent fixture of the government's economic management?

● (1730)

There is very little in these measures for the working men and women of Canada. I recall a campaign commercial in 1974, which ended with the following line:

The working men and women of Canada don't want their wages frozen. Vote Liberal!

In 1974 this party put forward a program that would have kept the cost of the working man down temporarily, restrained income increases, but a program that would have only asked the working man to carry the burden for 90 days. We asked the working men and women of Canada to accept the responsibility that we were prepared to enforce for all sectors of the economy, including the government. But we told the working men and women of this country that within 90 days they could seek increases within moderation, and that they could continue building security.

To limit the working men and women of Canada at the bottom of the wage earning scale to a $600 increase in income is absolutely heartless. It is not a situation that men and women of good conscience can be party to in this House for very long.

The scope of this bill, the length of its provisions, and the cynicism and misrepresentation by the government can no longer be viewed with equanimity. The future of this bill and its effectiveness are not threatened by its own provisions but by the insincerity of the government that has brought it forward. That insincerity re-commenced on July 9, 1974, and cannot be expected to evaporate from the mind of the average citizen. Indeed, I think it was that very insincerity that was very much on the minds of the working men and women of the riding of Hochelaga in my own province of Quebec.

A year ago a political party in this country said, "The working men and women of Canada don't want their wages frozen". Madam Speaker, with this government in power and with this party in power, the same party in power, the working men and women of Canada face the possibility of having their futures frozen. That, Madam Speaker, my colleagues and I will never accept.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in the debate on Bill C-73, at the second reading stage. Before starting to talk about the bill, I believe there are a few observations made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) which perhaps deserve being answered. I think that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe preaches in French a theory which, in my opinion, is entirely false. He said the government had initiated a price freeze policy, which is entirely false. The government has not established any price freeze policy.

An hon. Member: He does not know the difference!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): During the last electoral campaign his party proposed a price freeze for 90 days, with nothing after that period of time. It is the "nothing after", as the hon. member knows quite well, that has contributed most to the defeat of this party. Canadians were rightly skeptical about the policy hap hazardly set forth by his party. Above all, they were skeptical. They were afraid of the 90-day freeze with nothing afterwards.

This bill, Madam Speaker, does not provide a freeze policy, but restrictive measures which will be extended on a three-year period. Canadians will know—they already know today—what this program is all about. The official opposition and the one on my right, the New Democrats, advocated a selective freeze, they being socialists, with a possibility of justification, of increase, under a procedure badly explained.

And here again we hear hon. members on the other side saying on the one hand "Freeze" and on the other "Not entirely". We cannot even tell what the opposition wants from the government and the Canadian people understand even less what the hon. members opposite are trying to say. Because since... If the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) wishes to speak, let him walk in, otherwise he should keep quiet.

I have trouble understanding the New Democrats who claim: "We are going to freeze but selectively" and the Progressive-Conservatives who declare: "We are going to freeze everything" But for how long? For 90 days? Our aim is not to freeze anything but to cut down some profits, to curb the expectations which for over a year have made the situation in this country more and more difficult.

To come back to the hon. member from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), he is credited with saying; "What's new?". He knows fully well what is new. What is new is the kind of inflation we have today which is very much unlike last year's. Today's inflation, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe knows full well, today's inflation is home grown.

Mr. Wagner: You don't say.

[English]

Mr. Muir: It is 100 per cent worse.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): It is not 100 per cent worse and you know it. Last year's inflation was for the most part imported, because oil prices increased 400 per cent, because of world wide and global problems, bad crops in some countries, as hon. members know very well. Whether you admit it or not, Canadians know it. They found that out in their constituencies—

An hon. Member: In Hochelaga!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): —they found that out everywhere. And, as you just said, they may have found that out in Hochelaga too.

The Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that he too must address the Chair and not members directly.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I apologize, madam Speaker. I followed the example set by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner).

An hon. Member: A bad example indeed.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I agree, that was a bad example to follow. In any case, Madam Speaker, I feel that of all the problems that now besiege Canadians, inflation is no doubt the most intolerable and perhaps the most insidious. It is intolerable because it affects us all, because it compounds social and economic problems, and especially because it undermines the purchasing power of our Canadian dollar. It can easily be seen that if the value of our dollar declines constantly, so does our purchasing power, and the small wage earners as people in higher income brackets will be facing an unacceptable and indeed very disquieting situation if it is not controlled, as the minister told us the other day. That is why this government came forward with Bill C-73, which proposes measures to deal with runaway inflation.

All Canadians in all walks of life must ask questions about this policy and how it will affect their lives and work. The benefits of restraint are long term, and the economic effects of non-restraint complicated. Therefore all members of parliament, government supporters and opposition members, must tell the people in their ridings that they must join together in fighting the present most disquieting inflationary trend.

This afternoon I heard an NDP member say that he told people in his riding to defy the government and not support the program. I find his position difficult to understand. Surely it is not acceptable for a member of parliament to encourage open defiance of the government. I will say no more, except that he ought to have twisted his tongue before saying what he did.

Inflation is created by many converging forces, some at home and some originating outside this country. We are manipulated by forces which are sometimes beyond our control. No government can manipulate people by decree. Personally, I do not think any government can succeed in winning support for an anti-inflation program, or any other program, unless it manages to educate people about the forces which confront us and what the solutions are to our problems. We need comprehension. Sometimes these proposed solutions are hard to understand.

Economics is not an easy subject to understand and I do not pretend to be well versed in the field. Perhaps my weakest subject is economics. For that reason I thank the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) for what he pointed out to me. This past summer he read much the same material as I read. The hon. member referred to the question of housing. That is an important issue. Also, like the hon. member, I had occasion during the summer to read the C.D. Howe Research Institute publication on housing. It was interesting and enlightening.

As parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, I hope to take an active role in reorienting or restructuring programs, so that we may deal more aggressively with our existing problems. If any mistake has been made, it has been made in the area of demand. There is no demand problem in Canada, at least not in my area. There is a supply problem, to which the government will address itself. The government deals with the problem of housing in its pamphlet "Attack on Inflation." The problem deserves our attention. I hope, confidently, that the government will come forward soon with measures to encourage supply.

I hope that land for construction can be made available to our people and that contractors and entrepreneurs will support the government's programs so that we can surmount the crisis which has been developing in the housing field. Bearing that in mind, I am most pleased to be able to participate with the minister in this work.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I do not want to take up too much time. I believe that the matter of a freeze—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): —not of a freeze but of the anti-inflation program, the word inflation comes back to me now—It was a slip of the tongue—I was thinking about you.

The anti-inflation program of the government is a program which must be sold, which must be understood and which may require a lot of energy on the part of the hon.

members and perhaps even a lot of hot air. Anyway, we shall see. National problems are of such magnitude that I believe that we can count on the good will of everyone to try to get out of this hole, if I may use this expression, to get out of this very critical situation. If both sides would show a bit of good will—I know that the hon. member for St-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) will show a lot of good will and that his party particularly might help us—to sell the program, to make the people realize that it is not a freeze program but a voluntary control program directed mainly and particularly at those the government has been trying for a year to convince to restrain their demands. You will recall that the minister of Finance often said: Yes, I am in consultation with business people, large companies, corporations, trade unions, bigwigs. However, since they did not react positively during the last year, this may be partly why the government had to introduce legislation to finaly apply income and prices policies which might save us from the inevitable disaster which is a regressive, inflationary and unproductive economy.

The same "big guns", the same big corporations which said no are now compelled by law to follow certain guidelines. This is not everybody, I admit it. I think we will win the fight if we have the guts to tell them we are serious, that we want to implement positive measures, and then we will soon have far better conditions to live in.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, on October 16, 1975, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) tabled in this House Bill C-73 to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada. That was indeed the purpose of the bill.

Offhand, Madam Speaker, we conclude that it is simply the price and wage freeze contained in the 1974 Tory election platform but the minister hastens to say that it is not the price and wage freeze but that the bill has aimed at restraining profit margins, prices and salaries. Either I do not understand English, or the minister is dancing on the tight rope. He says, it is not a freeze but something that looks like a freeze, not a concrete step but a phychological manoeuver. I do not think it is a freeze according to his explanations but a gel. It is indeed representatives of this government.

What is in the end the attack on inflation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance? All are asking the same questions in this House while the minister seems to rely on the board headed by two illustrous political figures with fat salaries to give the population the explanations they dare give now.

And to prove that we are not the only ones, Madam Speaker, trying to discover what is hidden, under this troubling headline in today's Le Devoir of Montreal we read:

ATTACK ON INFLATION—EVEN EXPERTS ARE LOST

Imagine! And we were just told that the bill is clear. I quote:

EVEN EXPERTS ARE LOST

The least one can say about the anti-inflation program proposed a week ago by Prime Minister Trudeau is that it brought out the seriousness of the economic situation in Canada and polarized the attention of people on the problem.

The program is not very well understood even by those experts who elaborated it.

Imagine! It is not understood even by those experts who put the program together.

—On the general terms there is agreement, and that is to say that wage earners cannot expect an increase of over 10 per cent during the 12 next months and companies cannot raise their prices beyond the increase in their basic costs.

It is broader; what is the basic cost? The question must be asked.

But where specific points are concerned, it is not that clear, since even the ministers do not agree as to the impact of the measures they ask Parliament to pass.

The Postmaster General, Mr. Bryce Mackasey, said that the postal workers who are demanding a 71 per cent wage increase, will not be subjected to the controls. But Mr. Donald Macdonald, the Minister of Finance, said that the decision would be left to the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Richard O'Hagan, who is in charge of the promotional campaign in connection with the anti-inflation measures, says that it will not be possible to give anything but broad answers to people asking for explanations until all the details of the program are set out in black and white.

As concerns the details of the program, apparently it will be up to the anti-inflation board to lay them down. The article reads on:

"We cannot foresee how the text of the legislation will be interpreted . . ."

The lawyers have worked on the legislation, but in the final analysis, it is the Board that will decide upon the text of the legislation. And it reads further:

Inquiries are pouring into his office. "There is a tremendous interest in this program . . ."

It is obvious that many people are looking for loopholes. The controls apply to the 9.6 million people who make up the working force. But all the other workers are presumed to be good citizens who are willing to comply with the guidelines.

There are many exceptions. Wage increases that come with promotions are not subject to control. An employer can also grant increases above the prescribed limits if he can prove that he cannot attract or keep personnel for less.

The guidelines apply to all kinds of income: social benefits, bonuses, shares, etc.

Anti-Inflation Board Chairman Jean-Luc Pepin said: "If people want that bill to be a failure, they will find 111 means of evading it".

Last night, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), said on TV that the situation of Canada would become critical if unions refused to abide by the guidelines.

He mentioned that economic prospects for the winter are dull and it will take Canada longer than expected to recover.

In Toronto, Mr. Stephen Lewis, the leader of the NDP, accused the government of Ontario of ignoring its responsibilities—

And so on and so forth; I shall quote no further. Madam Speaker, I think opposition parties are not the only ones that do not understand this bill. I think most serious people who are not tied by the leg wonder where it will take us. How do you expect workers not to be apprehensive after such statements! Yesterday, before I was off on my way back, I met a very important group of workers now on strike because they did not manage to come to a reasonable agreement after months of bargaining. They have been at it since spring, but to no avail. Sometimes you are almost tempted to believe companies had been forewarned about this bill, Madam Speaker.

Besides being denied their vested rights, such as marginal benefits which, according to the answer of the minister to a question of mine during the question period, will be included in the famous 8 per cent determined in the bill, workers will shortly be the first really affected by that bill. In fact, this is what the minister tells them, as reported on page 8307 of Hansard. Anyone who is not convinced about the intentions of the minister will find them displayed in his statement on page 8307 of Hansard. Although he does it with all possible caution to lessen the shock, he is bluntly saying to workers that in a short delay it must "control wages".

Madam Speaker, I want to point out that it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before the recess I was stating that the minister had cautiously tried to lessen the shock when introducing Bill C-73. I merely read this evening the interview he gave at the CTV station when he said that it would be much more difficult in Canada for the workers to accept the bill as they did in Britain, because the British unions are much closer to the government that the Canadian unions. I think that the real reason, Mr. Speaker, has nothing to do with unions, but that it is rather a matter of priority.

In this bill, we note that the minister gives priority to a wage freeze, to unions and workers, while priorities should above all be given to incomes. I referred to the workers before the recess. Let us now turn to income. The minister seems to side with large companies and he simply says to the workers: The percentage will be established by law. To the companies, he says, and I quote:

—there will need to be adjustments as time goes on.

—On the income side. These are his own words as reported on page 8307 of Hansard, third paragraph. "It is not a freeze" . . . said the minister", but a control". However, this control is very hard on the workers. The minister should stop turning around in a circle and tell the truth to the people, namely that from October 14, there will be a freeze on wages but not on prices and incomes, as everyone wants. All the workers want is merely to be put on the same footing as the large producing or financial companies. If one is freezed, the other should be also. If one is tolerated, let the other one be also.

What, in my opinion, is more fantastic yet, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that all through his long speech, the minister did not refer to today's inadmissibly high rates of interest. The true inflation spiralling started when this government removed the chartered banks interest ceiling.

I said so the day after that decision and I said here that Canada would experience its worst years of inflation ever. The first serious step should have been to freeze the Bank of Canada's discount rate at 4 per cent. Thus, commercial banks would not have had the high cost of money as a false excuse if the prime rate had been frozen at 4 per cent, and I think that would have been more successful. The Bank of Canada belongs to us, the government is its master. Why is the government not interfering? What keeps it from freezing those interests first? We shall see after. We shall see the effect on commercial banks. In fact, we all remember that when the prime rates of the Bank of Canada fluctuated between 3 and 3.5 per cent,—over a period of 40 years, the commercial banks' rates barely exceeded 6 or 7 per cent. But when the Bank of Canada had to raise its prime rate as high as 8¾%, how could commercial banks lend at 9 per cent? That was impossible. The problem exists. Besides, the government is well aware that the problem does exist, but it cannot talk about it because high finance is watching. I do not understand yet how a people-elected government, although financed by higher finance, dare take away all control over interests and ask workers not to demand wage increases. I wonder whether now our people will finally understand.

Following this voluntary and maybe imposed oversight, the minister states that he intends in the long run to come to grip with the incomes of the larger companies and ask them to kindly explain the reason for their increased benefits. The minister stated: "We shall have in the long run to consider also a readjustment". What a nice way to deal with larger companies, when we know that they have the best lawyers, the most capable accountants and the most clever concealment artists! Multinationals and other financial institutions have nothing to fear from the government. The same cannot be said of small businesses, particularly those which are not into favour with the party, or with an authorized representative.

Every day, Mr. Speaker, we can see what is going on with regard to income tax, for example, as well as to every other area. Home investigators are breaking at any time into small dealers, small businessmen's place, getting at people who are too weak to defend themselves against that horde of government's sharks. And after that, the minister even dare speak again about justice and equity.

What is of concern to us, in the Social Credit Party of Canada, is the fact that the small wage earners' rights are still encroached upon with regard to salary increase claims, since those who get only the minimum salary will be entitled to an authorized maximum increase of $600 only, that is $1,800 after three years, whereas those who get $24,000 or more will be entitled to an increase of $2,400, that is $7,200 after three years.

Except for the guidelines, the minister does not seem to have any specific answer as to the interpretation of this bill. He keeps referring to the famous board of which as yet we only know the chairman and the vice-chairman, and an administrator who is supposed to be responsible for overseeing the agency. It will probably be as usual a board among others in charge of overseeing the whole thing in order to create as many jobs as possible.

I wonder if the Prime Minister will find enough defeated political candidates among his friends to fill the gaps. Of course, this bill will be referred to the standing committee of the House for further study. We want it to be amended according to the priorities which we, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, have mentioned in the House. For if the bill is sent back to the House for third reading without amendment, be assured that I for one will vote against it. I shall not take part in such discrimination against the low income groups in our province and our country.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, of all the ills afflicting our Canadian society, inflation is doubtless at the present time the most intolerable, the most insidious. The most intolerable because, more so than any other, it exacerbates social injustices because it strikes first and foremost the weakest and most helpless citizens. The most insidious, because we tend to consider inflation as a fatality against which we can do nothing but save our skin at the expense of the neighbour. Until very recently, that feeling of helplessness and fatality was all the more stronger as inflation came from foreign countries over which we had but little control.

That holds true of the OPEC countries which, in 1973, increased fourfold within a few months the price of their oil, totally disrupting the western economy. It also holds true of our trade partners who were more severely affected by the energy crisis than we were and who had no qualms about exporting their inflation to us with their cars, their television sets and their good products.

Carried away by the tide which engulfed the whole western economy, we could do nothing but cushion the impact of too sharp an increase in prices and do our best to protect our more helpless fellow-citizens against an inflation which came mainly from abroad.

It is in this light that the steps taken by the federal government in recent years should be seen. But the time when inflation came almost exclusively from abroad is over. For some months, through our own lack of discipline, our problems have considerably worsened. And now the fires of inflation are being blithely stoked up from within.

Nobody wants to acknowledge the fact that the oil crisis has really brought about a redistribution of wealth in the world and that we cannot live as if the OPEC countries had not wrenched some $112 billion from industrialized countries like ours in the year 1973-74 only.

While the Canadian economy has registered in 1974 a growth rate of 2.8 per cent and is likely to be lower in 1975, labour agreements gave wage increases of about 18 per cent. Many companies took the advantage not only to unload on their customers the rise in their production cost but also to unduly increase profit margins.

All that has strongly contributed to make us less competitive on the international market. Hence a decline in our economic activity and the chance to see our unemployment rate rise once again.

Before this situation, the federal government attempted, in a first move, to bring all partners of the Canadian economy to set for themselves, on a voluntary basis, certain restrictions necessary for the recovery of the economic health of the country.

Our efforts, one has to admit, have been unsuccessful. That is why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) decided to be much more directive today.

Having learned from last year's experience, the government has just put forward a certain number of rules and guidelines which are intended to check rising prices and salaries.

Starting Monday night, October 13, at midnight, these guidelines have the force of law for the federal government and all its civil servants, Crown corporations, private firms employing over 500 personnel and all companies in the building industry with over 20 staff. All other businesses and workers will have to follow suit voluntarily if we wish to draw the maximum benefit from this anti-inflation program.

[English]

We are living in a country where we take freedom for granted, one of the richest countries in the world with resources to solve every problem but one, namely, inflation; and inflation really is not one problem but a complex of problems summed up in one: how to control the energy of freedom before there is no freedom left to control.

A free society functions on a belief in equality and justice, on support of law and order, and on a willingness to put the public interest first. Last, but far from least, it functions on the faith that it will function. Today the system is being wracked by extremes of violence and apathy, spawning cynicism, illegality, disorder, self-interest, and doubt.

The causes are rooted deep in society's material goals, in the consequent decline of values and the decay of social disciplines now turning the long-term trend to equality into a drive for short-term rights. We sold our way of life with rhetoric about equality, and today the young, and the not so young, want everything going and want it now. Equality is replacing religion as the opiate of the people at a time when the trend to bigness, big business, big labour, and big government, is alienating the leaders and the led.

Society is in ferment. Everyone wants more rights. This translates in almost every case into demands on governments, demands by students to decide how they should be educated; demands by consumer groups to restrict the power of corporations; demands by environmentalists, minorities, and women's groups; demands for subsidies, loans, tax concessions, and welfare of all kinds; legitimate demands, but they all add up to more money at a time when the economy is giving us less. Everyone knows this; every group knows that to take more means less for others, yet everyone acts as though restraint should be practised by someone else.

Our freedom depends on restraint; its energy needs to be checked, as all machines have limits and when they are exceeded they self-destruct. Freedom and restraint are opposite sides of the same coin, but lately freedom seems like a coin with one badly worn side. Bit by bit our restraints are wearing away.

Inflation is a symptom of the lack of restraint, a symptom of the underlying illness. But it is more than a symptom, it is like a cancer where the cells flout the rules that govern the health of the organism. It begins as a symptom but it ends as a cause.

Inflation has always been with us; a mild infection accompanying growth. I am sure that few of us can remember a time when some prices have not been rising. Inflation embitters and corrupts. It embitters some by unfairly taking away the wealth they have earned. It corrupts some by giving them wealth they have not earned. The ethic of giving to society is destroyed by the action of taking, and we think less of society and ourselves.

The worst demoralization is among the middle-class, the silent salaried majority who make our institutions work. They see their savings melting away and their stocks and bonds losing value. They fear a collapse of currency that will shrink the worth of their property. They are worried about depression, unemployment, and their pensions. Inflation makes us all self-concerned.

Inflation spreads resentment. People see a steady transfer of wealth from the weak to the strong with no regard for merit, effort, or economic contribution. It makes them see the economic system as unfair, and it makes the political system seem inept. All leadership is discredited. We begin to think there is no answer. We lose faith in the system and then we lose faith in its currency. Money grows cheaper by the month, the week and, finally, by the day, as it did before the collapse of Egypt, the fall of Rome, and the rise of Hitler.

This is not going to be the scenario for Canada. It is the job of the government to see that justice is done, to provide law and order, and to free citizens of fear; we cannot do this unless we can stabilize prices and unless we restore public confidence in money. We live in the shadow of a world wide currency breakdown. We live with the spectre of depression.

Last fall we held recession off with tax cuts and deficits, but now we are paying for it with higher prices. Indeed, already production is falling while the cost of living is going up. Indeed, it is clear that falling production is due in large measure to rising prices and to the inability of many people to pay them.

There is no longer any question of where we should place our priority. Inflation is now public enemy No. 1. It threatens not only the economy but democracy and our freedom. It must be brought under control; it must be restrained.

No government wants to interfere with the cherished rights and privileges of its most powerful constituents; its only certain reward is unpopularity. We knew that some power blocs would say restraint will not work because it limits their power. We knew that some would say it will not work because it limits their personal gain. We knew that others are sincere in their doubt and that many, too many, still want to believe that things will work out by themselves.

We also knew that the nation was crying for leadership on a course that will pull us together, and that, although business and labour would not give us a consensus, the nation as a whole is now demanding it. We do not pretend that this course will be smooth. We know there are plenty of potholes and we do not pretend to have the perfect solution.

The sacrifices we are called on to make are slight compared to the gains. All we are really being asked to do is live within our income and to give up some short-term loot for our long-term benefit. We are just being asked to consent to our own survival.

For the businessman this means reassessing his operating creed. Is he responsible solely to his shareholders or is he also responsible to his customers and to society? The question has been around for a while, and most businessmen have answered it, in principle at least, with a clear cut yes.

For the labour leader it means cooling the adversary system, with less need for fiery speeches condemning management and less need for extravagant posturing at the bargaining table. It means lessened use of the power that trades more pay for layoff notices, that strains the movement's unity, devalues the money gained, shrinks pension funds, and ends with the power to win nothing.

The fundamental fact is that we are all in the same boat. Our identity of interest is even stronger than our conflicts. No one has more to gain if we end inflation than the businessman, and no one has more to lose if we do not than the unionist. I am betting on them both. I am betting on us all. I still have faith in human adaptability.

If only yesterday inflation was beyond our control because it came for a large part from abroad, today we are more able to overcome it. We only have to stop feeding it through our indiscipline. And the government will set the example by putting a ceiling for all practical purposes on the number of employees and compressing its own expenditures as much as possible.

If we refuse to yield to the inflation psychosis, if we accept to submit willingly to the rules set out by the government without playing the game of cynicals who suggest that the small always end up paying for the big, in short, if we all decide individually and collectively to stop living beyond our means, then we will have made an enormous step in the right direction. And Canada will be back on the road to economic health and social peace both based on a fairer participation of all in the national wealth of this country.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to state the position of the Progressive Conservative Party on Bill C-73 this evening. I also wish to point out that it was the Progressive Conservative Party, and especially its national leader who consistently showed leadership in drawing attention to the serious even fundamental damage to our country's national fabric by continuing double digit inflation, and in calling for strong and direct government action to deal with the problem.

Our position on that score has not changed. Right off the bat may I say that is a major difference between the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal government which now has had to swallow the cynical and misleading position it kept putting before the Canadian people, not only during the 1974 election campaign but ever since, up to and including the budget of the former finance minister on June 23. I should like to make further comments on the cynical misleading information he gave the Canadian people.

I can recall during a Liberal broadcast on the radio station in Winnipeg when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came on in a mysterious and dramatic voice, stating that the Conservatives "would freeze your wages." This did not fool the people of Manitoba because they know that inflation cannot be cured by the freezing of someone's wages. They knew it was a combination of wage and price controls. I will never forget the words of the radio announcer who, following the Liberal broadcast and the Prime Minister's voice, came on and said, "That is a bloody lie". Even the radio station people did not fall for the phony Liberal ads.

We remain convinced of the urgent necessity for strong and effective national action and leadership on this issue. Indeed, if anything the 15 months of ineffective action and non-leadership shown by the Liberal government since the 1974 election make the need for effective action all that more necessary, as they have made the problem just that much more difficult to deal with now.

It is for this reason, as expressed by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) last Tuesday, we are prepared to support the intent of the government's program and, therefore, not to oppose the bill on second reading. At the same time, however, we wish to make it abundantly clear that Bill C-73 with its accompanying policies, as announced by the Prime Minister and his ministers, is not our program. We advocated an incomes policy during the 1974 campaign. There are important, if not fundamental differences between the program we advocated and that which the Liberals now have announced, both in terms of the broader context and the details of the legislation itself.

A very basic difference is that the Progressive Conservatives never presented their proposals for an incomes policy as any answer by itself to the inflationary problem. Fundamental to our approach—and the record makes this abundantly clear—was the need to accompany a short-term controls program, designed essentially to break inflationary expectations, with other, equally important measures to deal with the more root causes of the problem.

In that context we placed and continue to place major emphasis on the need for more appropriate fiscal and monetary policies to be introduced by the federal government. Leadership by example—and that is the only kind of leadership people will understand and accept in the long run—is not simply holding federal civil servants within wage guidelines, or postponing new furniture purchases. If the call is for the nation to live within its means, so must the government abide by the same edict.

The record of the Liberal government in this respect is virtually the opposite of what is required. On the monetary front the Bank of Canada, with the government's approval, has consistently permitted increases in the money supply well in excess of any increase in real or even inflated economic growth. During the past 12 months that increase has amounted to more than 15 per cent. Indeed, if one wants to look for sources of fuel for this year's inflation, it is difficult to find a better starting place than the more than $3 billion which the bank pumped into circulation during the last quarter of 1974 alone, in a rather cynical exercise to ensure the success of the former finance minister's massive Canada Savings Bond program of that period.

We do not advocate a so-called tight money policy, and never have. But we have said time and time again that, if inflation is to be brought under any meaningful control, increases in the money supply must bear closer resemblance to rates of growth of the economy itself. Similarly, the Liberal government's own spending record has been a model of living beyond one's means and making unrealistic demands upon the economy. Under this government spending has increased by 192.8 per cent in seven years. This year alone, according to the June 23 budget, expenditures are forecast to rise on a year-to-year basis by 11.2 per cent.

According to spending patterns during the first four months of the current fiscal year, the former minister of finance's June forecast of a $3.1 billion budgetary deficit appears to be low by 50 per cent or more. In short, the government's appetite for spending has been boundless, an appetite fed both by ever-rising tax takes from Canadians and by continually heavy demands upon capital markets of the country.

Again our position on government fiscal responsibility has been both clear and consistent. We realize that, given the relatively high degree of inflexibility in government spending patterns resulting from statutory and other commitments, it is not feasible to talk of reducing government spending in absolute terms. But we have continually urged the need for government to show restraint in its own demands upon the economy and, more specifically, to limit increases in its spending to rates of real growth in the economy itself. One might compare that with the weasel-worded undertaking of the government white paper that "the trend of total spending by all governments in Canada should not rise more quickly than the trend of the gross national product", whatever that means, if anything.

There are a number of other basic differences between our approach, as set forth during the 1974 campaign, and the government's program, at least two of which stand out. First is the time period during which any controls program could hope to function without setting off serious new distortions within the economy. Because we realized that an incomes policy was designed essentially to break inflationary expectations and create a breathing space for other more fundamental anti-inflation policies to be brought to bear, our undertaking was for a program of no more than 18 to 24 months. The Liberal government, in Bill C-73, seeks approval for a program of more than three years' duration, until December 31, 1978, with further provision for extensions even beyond that. That simply is not acceptable to us in the Progressive Conservative Party.

As already noted, controls can have a distorting effect on the economy, and the longer the regimen is in effect, the sharper and deeper the distortions are likely to become. But even beyond that our party is not prepared to grant on an open ended basis to the federal government, particularly this federal government, with the kind of sweeping centralized powers represented by Bill C-73. The exercise of these kinds of powers over such a long period of time raises questions well beyond that of economic distortion, reaching to the issue of fundamental changes in the balance of the decision making power within our free market system.

A second significant difference between the two approaches lies in the way in which one could and should lead into such a program. As you will recall, the Conservative Party advocated as an initial step an across the board freeze period of up to 90 days in order to have a pause period during which our government could sit down with the major interest groups involved and work out the host of questions which will inevitably arise with regard to any incomes policy.

Without the freeze, government is left to try to sort out the ground rules, while groups and individuals scamper to assert their special interests within the program. In less than a week we already have seen ample evidence of the kind of confusion and exaggerated inequities that result from the government's lack of any orderly introductory period.

Here are some basic concerns about Bill C-73. Beyond these over-all differences of approach, and with even the limited amount of detailed information available to us from the government to this point, we can identify several important aspects of Bill C-73 which concern us and on which we probably will be seeking amendments as the legislation progresses through committee.

Mention already has been made of the time period during which such sweeping powers should be in effect. We cannot support those clauses of the bill, especially clause 46, in their present form. At the very least we shall be demanding that the government return to parliament after a much shorter time period, justify its need for any extension, and obtain formal parliamentary approval to carry on the program for a further period.

Beyond this question of an effective time period there is also the issue of parliamentary accountability during the period the program is in effect. While Bill C-73 requires that certain, but not all, of the actions taken by the established agencies such as the Anti-Inflation Review Board and the administrator be tabled in parliament, there is no provision for any kind of comprehensive reporting to parliament on the over-all record of the program and no built in opportunity for parliament, through one of its committees, to receive and scrutinize regular reports from the agencies established by the bill. Given the massive powers involved, we believe some process of accountability is essential.

The bill empowers, indeed requires, the Anti-Inflation Review Board to keep confidential virtually all of the information it collects in making a judgment on issues coming before it. The bill does not require the board to offer publicly any detailed reasons or explanations for its decisions.

While we recognize and respect the need to keep confidential any information of a personal nature or which could jeopardize a company's competitive position, we feel strongly, as we have said continually, that an incomes policy can only function if people see that justice is being done and understand clearly how and why decisions are being made. The bill should seek to foster the fullest possible public understanding by ensuring that agencies administering this program provide Canadians with the maximum possible information on the basis for their decisions and actions.

Any process such as this, placing in the hands of administrative agencies massive discretionary power, obviously requires comprehensive appeals procedures in order to guard against the abuse of such powers. But in Bill C-73, clauses 30 through 38 propose such an elaborate and complicated procedure, such as carrying actions of the board and of the administrator through an appeals tribunal, the cabinet, and eventually the courts, that decisions may well be tied up for months in one appeal procedure after another. Justice delayed is indeed justice denied.

There are many other points in the bill, for example the penalty provisions and powers for police raids, that undoubtedly we will want to question in the days ahead. And, of course, there is the whole question of the guidelines themselves which are not in the bill but are to be regulated by the government.

We are making no promises beyond second reading. As already noted, we have agreed not to oppose the bill on second reading because we accept the broad intent of an incomes program and because, for now at least, we are taking the government at its word in terms of being willing seriously to consider amendments to this legislation. Beyond that, however, we make no promises or commitments of support for Bill C-73. Indeed, our view at this point is that, without important changes being made in some of the areas identified above, we cannot give our approval to this legislation on third reading.

We are also concerned about how the bill is to be handled following second reading. Given its tremendous importance to the people of Canada, it seems fundamental to us that at least the major interest groups be given an opportunity to express their views on the legislation itself before a Commons committee. The white paper at several points promises "extensive consultation" with the major groups involved, including the provinces, industry, and organized labour, and it strikes us that there being little indication at this point of any meaningful consultation with any one, a proper place for such consultation is before parliament itself so that members on all sides of the House can have the fullest possible understanding of the attitudes and concerns of Canadians before making any final judgment on Bill C-73.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to join the debate on Bill C-73. More than that, it is an honour to put forward specific proposals in two areas to ensure that Bill C-73 will work to the benefit of all Canadians.

I believe that members of all parties agree that the results of increased inflation have caused, and will cause if unchecked, a rent in our national fabric that will be a long time in the mending. On the one hand we have inflation, and with the consensus program a failure we, as the government, looked at the alternative of mandatory price and wage guidelines. I would like to emphasize "guidelines" to make sure that in no one's mind is there confusion with the guidelines in a certain program of freezes proposed in 1974 by the Conservative Party. Those people who equate guidelines with price and wage freezes are suffering from self-induced hallucinations because one has no relationship to the other, either by blood line or by name.

Although personally I believe in a free market operating on the supply and demand principle, I would like to agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) that, faced with the prospect of either self-generating inflation or guidelines, guidelines are the lesser of two evils. There is no perfect system and it is recognized by all on our side that guidelines are a rough form of justice, but justice, rough or not, is preferable to economic anarchy. Imperfect though these guidelines are, so is this House and so are the members of whom this House is composed, but surely no one would suggest that the House should be abolished because of its imperfections, nor should Bill C-73 be abolished.

Initially in my opening remarks I stated that I would propose two concrete suggestions to assist in the chances of survival of Bill C-73 in the months to come in order that it may be implemented to benefit all Canadians. The first proposal deals with the obvious bureaucratic nightmare of policing retail prices in the market place.

As a member of parliament I sought a method of assisting the Anti-Inflation Board in my area. If I may I should like to read a release circulated to my riding of Comox-Alberni, dated October 20, 1975, which is as follows:

> The guidelines set down in parliament regarding price control are very specific. Prices may not increase unless there is a corresponding increase to the producer or manufacturers' cost. Fishermen and farmers are exempt. In other words, unless the cost of production increases there can be no increase to the consumer. There is, however, one fly in the ointment and that is monitoring the literally millions of products available to the Canadian consumer. For this reason I am proposing the setting up of a constituency review board composed of volunteers who will be unpaid and who will monitor prices in the Comox-Alberni federal riding. Since I have already established two constituency offices the headquarters will be in these offices located at Port Alberni and Campbell River. I would ask all interested parties who would like to participate on a constituency review board to contact either office and leave your name, address and telephone number—
> The purpose of the constituency review board will be to monitor retail prices in all sectors of the retail economy in order to ensure that price guidelines are being followed. I envisage that price lists will be scrutinized by the constituency review board and their findings passed on through my office to the appropriate minister and anti-inflation board. Also if it is deemed appropriate findings will be made available to the public through the media. In this way both the general public and the anti-inflation board will be kept up to date on the price changes in the Comox-Alberni federal riding.

The first proposal deals with the obvious. If I may, I should like to list the advantages of such a system.

First, there would be a reduction in the amount of government moneys needed to monitor retail prices in the Comox-Alberni riding.

Second, outlets will become aware of a price monitoring review and this will create a further restraint.

Third, price lists will be public knowledge, thus keeping the consumer informed of price changes.

Fourth, by being plugged into the constituency price review board I will be able to alert the anti-inflation board of abrupt increases.

Fifth, through community participation the individual fight against inflation will become meaningful and not merely a slogan to be abandoned in the political trash can.

I would request that all members of the House consider this proposal and how it can be implemented in his or her own constituency so that they may contribute personally to the fight against inflation at no cost to the public. The public deserves leadership not only from the government but from each individual member of parliament. Let us provide that leadership in the war against inflation. If we do so, I believe the people of Canada will not begrudge us the recent increase in pay but will realize that their hard-earned money is being well spent. I trust that members on the other side who have commented on this will take a closer look at it, because this is the way they can play a meaningul role in the fight against inflation rather than merely discussing it in the House, which will not help the fight at all.

I would also propose to the House that in the area of housing all mortgage interest in excess of 6 per cent be classified as an income tax exemption for an amount not in excess of $1,800 a year, the mortgage maximum to be computed on mortgages up to but not exceeding $30,000. For those renting accommodation, whether it be an apartment or a house, I would recommend a maximum exemption of $900 if married, and $450 per year if single.

The benefits would be twofold. First, new housing starts would be encouraged, and the plan would make housing a reality not only for those with high incomes but for those who only dream of a house with no chance of turning their dream into reality. Secondly, it would free funds for those already carrying a mortgage. These funds could be put into an economy that is going through recession pangs, as are all countries in the world today.

Housing must have a new infusion of imaginative proposals. Tax exemptions do not spend public funds—exemptions cause governments to rely on less public funds because taxation revenue is decreased. With the annual revenue reduced by $1 billion the government would have to adjust its budget. This can be done by this government—this has been done by this government. I submit these two proposals to the House tonight, Mr. Speaker, and hope that they will find favour on all sides.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member who just returned to his seat make me think that with the ascension of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) to the portfolio of finance, anyone thinks he can give a budget speech and introduce a budget policy here. I assume that is the significance of the address to the electors of Comox-Alberni that we have just heard.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, there are two immediate features about the legislation presented for debate today, both of which are alarming and familiar. The first feature is that this legislation, like so much that has come from the government, reflects a cynicism and an attempt to fool Canadians about the seriousness of the response of the government to major and disquieting economic problems. The second feature is that there is here, as there has been in so much of the legislation introduced by members of the government, a determination to gather excessive power to the bosom of the government without an opportunity for controls by parliament over the exercise of this power.

I want to deal now with the question of timing, Mr. Speaker. The Government of Canada which won its last election by caricaturing this proposal is now swallowing what it said, and is introducing a program that only 14 months ago it vigorously condemned from coast to coast.

The Minister defends the timing of this turnabout by saying that public support now exists for some kind of program of controls. What he means is that the Liberal party and their Liberal flacks have stopped their campaign, have stopped their deliberate attempt to create fears about the way governments might deal with the serious problems of inflation. They have stopped trying to alarm Canadians about actions that must be taken. Consequently, because they have stopped inciting fear, there is now in the minister's view some greater measure of public support for programs which in essence they condemned 14 months ago.

There are arguments about the kinds of controls that were proposed then and are proposed now, and of course there are differences in the programs. We on this side of the House are pleased to have these differences recognized. The proposal which was introduced by my leader, and supported by members of this party in the election campaign, was less lasting than this, which means by implication it was less dangerous than the matter we are considering tonight.

The fact remains, and it is testimony to the cynicism of the Liberal party, that in the election campaign of 14 months ago—the election campaign which gave the government its mandate—the Liberal party opposed with all the energy it could muster, the essence of the program announced the other night on television. It opposed it in a way which was not only simplistic but which was as near to dishonest as one can remember in any national election campaign. We see the spectre of this cynical government embracing what it condemned on the way to victory in an election. But ministers are still not open enough with the people of Canada to admit that last time they were engaging in election tactics, and that the problems of inflation are so serious that they require now, as they required then, some approach of this nature.

The other matter to which I referred earlier is the extraordinary nature of the powers which the government seeks to gather unto itself by these proposals. There is to be a capacity here to step in and seize records, a capacity which reminds me and other of my colleagues of some powers which were included in the petroleum administration bill which, coincidentally or otherwise, was guided through this parliament earlier by the minister who is now Minister of Finance. There is the explicit provision, explicitly referred to with pride by the minister in his remarks, to the effect that the guidelines for implementing this legislation are to be established by order in council, are to be set down by the cabinet without reference to parliament. In other words, as it now stands, the teeth, the nature of this legislation, will be established in Cabinet regardless, perhaps, of the impact on Canadians.

[Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain).]

There is written into the bill the power for the cabinet to reverse the administrator, to say that his decision is wrong. That may be necessary, but it certainly creates the capacity for abuse. It tends to concentrate all power with regard to this measure in the hands of cabinet. Most alarming of all, there is in this bill the capacity to prolong the life of the system of controls beyond the time that is already longer than many Canadians are comfortable with now.

Clearly, when a bill of that kind is presented to the House, a bill which includes provisions for excessive power to be gathered into the centre, there is an obligation upon members of this House to examine the legislation in detail, to scrutinize each specific proposal and to take the time that is necessary in the standing committee not only to seek information, which we must do, but also to introduce amendments which will make the bill a less dangerous example of power concentrated at the centre, a power which might be exercised arbitrarily in a way which would seriously and permanently distort the economy of the country. That is particularly important with regard to this bill, because it was introduced by a government which has been in the habit, since its first election, of gathering control to the centre, of aggrandizing its own power, of weakening the power and capacity to create of other elements of Canadian society and the Canadian economy.

This government has a dangerous record of centralizing power. That is why we must be particularly concerned about what it is to do with this bill which allows it, as it stands, so much latitude. It must be emphasized that we are not dealing here with a temporary measure. This measure will last for three years at least, and may last longer than that.

Many of us, since the early boom in the publication of Maclean's magazine as a news magazine, have received in our offices free copies of Maclean's magazine. The most recent edition which arrived in most of our offices the other day contained an interview by the editor of Maclean's, Mr. Peter Newman, with the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). That interview assumes some association with the legislation which has been introduced in this House. The interview, according to the preface, took place on September 30, which is 20 days ago. I want to quote what the Prime Minister said 20 days ago about the measure before us tonight, a measure which can have serious and permanent effects on the Canadian economy.

Here is how Maclean's reports what the Prime Minister said 20 days ago about controls. Replying to a question, the Prime Minister said:

> But I think every experience I know of—most recently the United States and the British experiences—is to the effect that when you take controls off you begin more or less where you were before.

Maclean's asked, "The economy just catches up," and the Prime Minister replied:

> Exactly. People say, "Okay, we've been held down, or we've been controlled for a year. Now let's hurry up and get those wage increases, those salary increases and those price increases that we've been prevented from getting by the intervention of the state."

That was the philosophy of the Prime Minister 20 days ago. Twenty days ago he said that when you impose a system of controls you are only building up problems. One would deduce from that statement, made before the emergency announcement on television on the eve of two by-elections, that the Prime Minister opposed controls because he was worried about what happens when they come off.

Those who are worried about the timetable set out in the bill and who know that this government has introduced this legislation, must ask themselves when the controls are going to come off if the Prime Minister of Canada says that the program is not effective if the controls come off. In other words, you must consider what he has been saying in the light of events which have occurred since the publication of the interview. The logic of what he is saying is this: the controls program does not work if it ever comes off.

We do not know how long this period of controls will be. We are told that it will last between three and three and a half years. That, in the view of many on my side, is an alarmingly long time. We know it is all too simple for the majority party in this parliament simply, by its own vote, to extend that period, to extend the capacity of this overly powerful centralist government to continue the program of controls for a longer period. That matter will need to be changed at the committee stage.

Of course the Maclean's article raises other questions about the long-range planning of the Government of Canada. Perhaps on September 30 there was no intention at all to bring in this kind of program. Perhaps something occurred between September 30, when the Maclean's interview was given, and the night when it was felt necessary to influence voters in Hochelaga and Restigouche by going on national television and announcing an emergency program. Perhaps something happened to change the government's mind.

It is singularly curious that on September 30, 13 days before the Prime Minister's announcement and 20 days before today, the Prime Minister was expressing severe reservations about any program of controls. Yet, 13 days later, he introduced those controls. I shall return to this theme later, because I think there is a serious reason to believe that what we have here is a jerry-built program which was put together overnight without adequate consideration of the consequences, distortions, and disruptions it can cause in the Canadian economy.

My point is that a bill which provides this kind of latitude for a government is dangerous in the hands of any sponsor, but particularly dangerous in the hands of a government which has spent its successive mandates in adding powers unto itself and in limiting the power and creative capacity of other sectors of the Canadian economy. It would be useful, particularly in light of the Prime Minister's statements of September 30, to trace the genesis of these measures, of this legislation.

The Prime Minister, in some unusually eloquent language at a press conference announcing his new ministry, made reference to what he called the law and order kick. That was by way of introducing the nature of the measures that he and his government intended to bring before the session of parliament which re-commenced last week. He said, and I quote:

—the rate of growth of the Canadian economy is no longer as great as it used to be and therefore people are realizing that something is changing. And this uncertainty they have translates itself in socially neurotic behavior. ... This will mean government approach to the whole problem of peace and security, by looking at the criminal code, by looking at such things as gun control, capital punishment, the whole works.

My interpretation of what the Prime Minister was doing at that time is that he was caught between two events. On the one hand, he and his colleagues had planned to bring in no economic legislation to the parliament that began meeting again last week. They intended again a mélange of domestic legislation aimed at social problems; gun control and that kind of thing.

Suddenly the former minister of finance resigned. There was an outcry responding to that resignation. It brought focus to the great Canadian anger and concern about economic conditions. The Prime Minister is at least alert enough to recognize an issue when it stares him in the face. He knew that inflation was the issue. His program was prepared to deal with other problems. His solution was, as he said at the press conference, and I confess to putting words in his mouth, to fight inflation with gun controls. That was the plan. It was undone by the resignation of the former minister of finance, which was apparently unexpected. By the emphasis of the response, the Prime Minister knew the public was angered about inflation.

I do not believe the reason this legislation was brought in was because there has been a profound change in the recognition by the Government of Canada of the seriousness of our economic matters. Instead, I think it was brought in because it had suddenly become an issue at a time when a divisive issue was dangerous to the government.

The most effective and prominent English Canadian minister of the government walked out for reasons he still has not been frank enough to tell us. He had nonetheless quit. He raised concern about the economic situation in Canada. The Prime Minister knew the Liberal party would have a convention later this fall which involves a mechanism for a leadership review. What he did was whomp up an economic program, not designed to meet the economic needs of the country, but to meet the immediate pressing political requirements of the Liberal party.

If I am correct and what we are dealing with tonight and in the days to come is a jerry-built program, a program thrown together at the last minute for reasons generally unrelated to the economic problems of the country, we are in a very serious situation.

This program was thrown together so quickly that the government did not even have time to find a third commissioner. If there had been any planning, surely it would have been able to find the third wheel of the troika.

An hon. Member: They didn't find the second.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): My colleague suggests they did not find the second. There was some question as to whether they are sure they have found any. Clearly they were so rushed in their planning that they were not even able to find a third person prepared to sit on a board with Mrs. Plumptre and Mr. Pepin. Perhaps that is understandable. It is at least remarkable. It is an indication of the rush with which they proceeded on this front.

It is probably inappropriate to suggest that the results in Hochelaga have left the government with a gentleman to whom a certain debt is owed, a man who has had some experience on national commissions involved with controls. Perhaps they were anticipating that result when they left open the third chair on the tribunal.

If this is a program put together at the last minute, it involves two very real dangers. First, we have before us legislation with a very substantial capacity for abuse. This legislation could cause serious harm to individuals, and serious distortions in the economy. It may not have been well thought out. It is one thing to have arbitrary powers that were deliberately planned; it is another to have arbitrary powers that are open ended simply because you have not taken time to stake them out or nail them down.

If this program is jerry-built, thrown together at the last minute, and there is evidence to suggest it has been, we are in a situation where the government is asking the parliament of Canada to approve powers that are open ended, not because they need be, but because the Government of Canada did not take time to close them or tighten them up. It would be absolutely irresponsible of this parliament to allow that kind of proposal, if that was its genesis, to move unscathed and unamended through committee and be approved at final reading in this House.

The second danger with proceeding flippantly and without seriousness with the measures announced on commandeered national television the other night is that the government cannot again fail in dealing with inflation. The problems of inflation in Canada, and the effects it has on individual citizens from one coast to another, are simply too severe to go unresolved and unattended.

If the government is engaged in another public relations gesture and it fails, it will undermine not only its capacity to mobilize Canadians to try to deal with problems, it will undermine the capacities of parliament and governments to come. That can be particularly serious in a country like Canada.

I, like many of us, have watched with considerable interest, and one could use other language, the progress of the Prime Minister in office. I think the reality is clear to all of us that during his time of leadership in the country he has not given much priority to economic problems. We know he came to federal politics for reasons that were, by and large unrelated to economic problems. They were legitimate reasons in their own right. They had to do with the nature of participation in the federal public service and federal government by Francophones. That was an important motive to bring a man or men to Ottawa. There may be disagreement from time to time about other programs which that motive has led him to introduce, but I think it is recognized that that is why he came. I think it is also recognized that because of his preoccupation with that question other important questions, notably economic, have suffered from inattention.

We have not seen under his guidance a national economic policy designed to integrate the various components which together make up the economic fabric of Canada. This fault was compounded by the fact that until not long ago economic matters were presided over by a minister of finance whose only interest in his portfolio was to survive it. He was concerned that if he did his job as minister of finance it would prevent him having any chance of doing a job as prime minister. And he preferred his ambition to his responsibilities. Whatever the causes, we were left for seven years without any co-ordinated economic policy.

I have to say to the present Minister of Finance that there was some hope when he was given the portfolio. Few of us on this side of the House, least of all myself, coming as I do from Alberta, have much reason to be endeared to the Minister of Finance. But all of us, I think, have recognized his ability. All of us have recognized his strength. I, personally, was impressed by the report that he apparently wished to leave politics and had to be persuaded to come back to take on his present portfolio.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I wonder whether the hon. member is not straying from the subject. Bill C-73 is an act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada. Perhaps the hon. member would direct his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I apologize if I appeared to be straying. I was seeking to indicate that we are dealing here with a piece of legislation which has a particular origin, and that it is important for us to understand why it has been brought forward and what its consequences might be. The point I was making is this: there has never been throughout the history of the government a commitment on economic issues such as would lead naturally to the kind of program we are considering here tonight. If any praise of the present Minister of Finance will result in my being accused of straying from the topic, I shall not praise him again. But I still say there had been some hope that his ability and his acknowledged strength would bring a change, and would at least pull together the strands of national economic policy. However, we must say, further in that regard that his performance in the debate on this bill has been disappointing because it confirmed some of our worst suspicions about him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I feel a lot better now!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): No program of controls will work in the absence of some degree of consensus, and it is certainly the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to seek such a consensus. Instead, the minister in his remarks engaged in personal attacks on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and others in the House. Once again he revealed his penchant to divide. He is, unfortunately, a divider by nature. But, by duty, he must be a unifier, and what causes concern to those of us who want to see this program work is the early evidence that his nature is appearing to triumph over this duty.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Come on, you are laughing yourself, Joe!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): No, it is not a laughing matter. It is a serious matter, because legislation of this kind can only become effective if there is a feeling of respect among the various elements in the economy, and it is a primary responsibility of the Minister of Finance to seek to achieve such a consensus and not to attack and divide, as the minister did in his opening address.

I suggest that two elements are essential if this program is to be taken seriously. First, the government must demonstrate leadership. It must try to unite people, including political parties, on this question. The Prime Minister must be involved, not on some television circuit arranged by Dick O'Hagan, but here in the House of Commons, bringing his own capacity for leadership into the issue. Second, there has to be a firm demonstration that further action is to follow—that the measure before us is not presented in a vacuum. An assurance must be forthcoming that this program of controls, which some of us suspect were thrown together at the last moment, will be accompanied by other serious measures. We expect the government to show much more determination about cutting down its own expenditures, thus giving the kind of leadership which is so important if a program of control and restraint is to be effective.

Unfortunately, the government has been playing a con game, concealing the real growth in its expenditures and in the role of the administration. Before the last election ministers claimed there had been an increase of only 11 per cent in the growth of government expenditures during the past fiscal year. Then, after election day, they brought in supplementary estimates which boosted that increase to 30 per cent. That is an indication of the attitude with which the government approaches its responsibility in the area of economic leadership. It is the kind of hocus pocus we must steer away from.

What is required if this program is to be effective is early and firm evidence that it is part of a package, that it is not the only hard piece in a set designed by Dick O'Hagan; there has to be an indication that the government is serious about moving on other economic fronts and that it is serious about cutting back some of its expenditures.

There has been too much ad hocery on the part of the government. Ministers have been making gestures toward the important problems of the day, but it is not enough in a time of industrial unrest to say simply that a committee is looking into the situation and that hopefully something will emerge, as the minister did the other day. It is not enough, when confronting the issue of the effect of power groups on the economy, for instance, simply to order an investigation—not because it is a continuing problem but because an embarrassing particular problem has been raised by the aspirations of Power Corporation; the government was looking for a way to avoid it, and that is how we got into the Bryce Commission. As I say, too much use is made of the ad hoc approach. This is very much in the nature of the former minister of finance who is very big on cosmetics but who did not undertake to provide Canada with the leadership it needed in dealing with various economic issues.

All of us who have talked to Canadians during the recess have become aware of the seriousness with which individual Canadians are viewing inflation. Small businessmen are wondering about their capacity to keep their businesses going. The problem is very deep, and the sense of despair about the government's recognition of the problem is very deep.

Somebody asked me the other day: "Do any of you guys in Ottawa realize how serious things are?" I think that question is being posed at one level or another, in one way or another, by people all across the country, because people believe the problem is a serious one, one that requires response.

We on this side have indicated for a long time now that we are prepared to support any serious initiative that is taken, provided that there is a demonstration that the situation is crucial, providing there is a demonstration that, along with the controls and the excessive power which is given to the Minister of Finance, there will be action on other fronts and leadership of some other kind. I repeat what others on this side of the House have said. We are prepared to support in principle the measure that has been introduced so long as we receive demonstrations that the government is serious about this program, so long as we receive the kind of information that we will require in the standing committee and the government is responsive to some of the amendments we will be introducing to limit excessive powers which appear, on the face of the bill, to be granted this government.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I have been very interested in the debate today and in the fact that on occasion the Chair has had to call members to order for not talking about the bill. I think the comments which have been made show how difficult it is to follow this piece of legislation.

The backbenchers in the Conservative party have been defending the idea of controls so long as they are removed after a short period of time. Somebody says after 90 days. We have just heard the backbenchers in the Liberal party make a great about-switch; I get the impression that this bill does not really matter to them at all. The principle is not involved. There has been little discussion of the principle of this bill.

The Conservatives have developed their policy over a period of time, but it is a policy with which I disagree. They know what their policy is and so do I, and I disagree with it. On the other hand the backbenchers in the Liberal party do not know what this is all about. They do not understand it. They are for the bill now because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has had to come up with a program in a very short period of time. So the members on that side are now for the bill. They were against it before, but perhaps they were mistaken. In any event, the climate has now changed, and as we are a long way from an election they say perhaps it is a good idea since the minister says it is just that.

That raises another interesting question. I should like to know why the former minister of finance quit his portfolio. Did he want stronger controls or less controls? Did he learn something in the international arena about the finances of Canada in relation to the finances of other countries that we know nothing about? Or did he just happen to decide to leave the ship? The new Minister of Finance was about to leave the ship as well and go back to greener pastures, but he decided to stay on and put through this piece of legislation. A large number of senior civil servants also left during the last year. Were they in favour of these controls while the government was not, or were they not in favour and some government members were in favour of them?

Members are being called to order for not talking about the bill, but let me tell you, Madam Speaker, that I have been here for a long time and I have read a lot of bills. I have not understood all of them but I did at least have a pretty good idea of what would be their effect. I was absent when the white paper was published and I had about the same opportunity that the general public had; I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) address the public on television, like Churchill but not nearly as well or as effectively. I do not think he put the message across in a way that is going to get much support, because the public have less faith in him and his ability to solve this problem these days. I listened to his pitch on television and I did not understand it. I talked to my constituents, and they said that they could not understand it either.

I have now read the bill but have not been able to get anything from it. If you are able to tell hon. members, Madam Speaker, that they are out of order because their remarks do not relate to the bill, then congratulations. There is really nothing in the bill that is definitive in any way, shape or form. The only date in the bill is the date it comes into effect, which is the date of the television program. The bill has no proclamation period, and there are no regulations or guidelines. The bill merely indicates that there will be wage and salary controls.

If hon. members want to know anything about this legislation they will have to read the white paper, which I presume is the guidelines. However, it really depends which publication you have. The last one I received was considered to be the minister's speech, the "Program for National Action". The first publication was the highlights, and the "Program for National Action" is the same information but under a different cover.

If this legislation is going to be effective it must have the support of the Canadian public. The Canadian public must recognize that there is a problem to be faced and they must be willing to make sacrifices. They must be sure that the situation is the same for all and that that is the way the problem will be solved. If that is the program the government is trying to sell, I suggest it scrap the program outlined in its "Attack on Inflation". Anyone reading that will be aware that this legislation has absolutely nothing to do with prices as they affect the individual. There is no indication of legislation there.

The board that is going to be set up will involve the employment of between 200 to 500 people. What is a woman to do if the price of baby food, or a package of cereal, or a piece of meat, or a can of vegetables goes up 10, 15 or 20 per cent? Her husband's wages are frozen. Is she to write to her member of parliament or to all members of parliament? I suggest she would have to mimeograph her letter and run off 700 to 800 copies, which she would send to all members of parliament, Senators, and members of the Anti-Inflation Board; she will be wasting her time but it will probably make her feel better.

There is no machinery in this bill to control prices. If the housewife, the worker, or indeed anybody is to believe in this program, it must work fairly and equally for everyone. Wages are very easy to control. If I had been asked to come up with a program and I had been told by senior civil servants that this legislation is what I require I should have left out the part of the bill dealing with wage and salary controls, and instead controlled prices, because if you control prices, wages do not need to go up.

Many people forget that the figures being bandied around in relation to wage increases are 45 per cent and 50 per cent, but are related to long-term contracts, probably over three years, covering the year that has gone by and two years in the future. Everyone knows the cost of living has gone up 12 per cent, so you project the 12 per cent over the three-year contract and you arrive at 36 per cent. The workers want an increase over that of perhaps only 5 per cent, and that does not seem to be unreasonable, but it gives you another 15 per cent over the three year period and you wind up with the 50 per cent increase. All they are asking for is enough to stay even and maintain the standard of living to which they have become accustomed. This obviously is not an inflationary factor.

There are many things which are inflationary that are not mentioned. It is easy to control wages and salaries. That is relatively simple because there is usually a third party involved who is only too happy to control them. When you attempt to control the price of commodities then you run into great difficulties. Except during the war we in this country have never been able to control commodity prices in any way, shape, or form. During the war we accomplished this at the expense of one very large segment of our economy, namely, the agricultural segment. We appealed to those in the agricultural industry more than to anyone else to hold the line and keep down prices as their war effort. They did an admirable job, but they have been paying for it over the years since, as they have never really been able to get their prices up to the necessary level. It is easy to control wages, but it is impossible to control prices under our system.

I have looked at these proposals as they relate to the people in my area, and people in all parts of Canada, who belong to unions and who have been out on strike for some period of time. They now want to make a settlement but they do not intend to accept 8 per cent plus 2 per cent.

There are to be some exceptions, but how one obtains an exception no one seems to know. Maybe Jean-Luc can make an exception if he wants, or maybe Mrs. Plumptre can exempt someone.

An hon. Member: How about the minister?

Mr. Peters: I am not sure that we would want to ask the minister, nor am I sure that that should be his job. I am sure it is not going to be the little guy in National Revenue in Sudbury who will make that decision. When I asked him about the subject he said he had sent all that information to me yesterday by telex. I think he assumed I was in the department for which he was working. This was not an inquiry as far as he was concerned. He thought I wanted his name again, and he had already sent that in by telex the day before. These people are not going to be in a position to make exceptions.

Many exceptions will be made and, as soon as one is made, then as far as the average individual is concerned there is no equality. It is a little bit like 50-50; that is, one horse and one rabbit, and most of the workers I know are going to fall in the rabbit category. This procedure of allowing exemptions will, in my opinion, create a nightmare that will be impossible to handle.

Inflation is a very complex thing. I was never too worried about inflation, and I guess most Liberals were not worried about it until very recently. They believed they could handle inflation in a relatively simple way. Many of us have not been particularly concerned as long as our productivity kept up with the inflationary rate. There did not seem to be anything too much wrong as long as that was the case, except you had to have a bigger wallet and carry more money, and the bills got bigger, but then again the amount you were receiving was larger so nothing really had changed. Instead of paying $1 for something you pay $2. But as long as you are getting twice as much it does not make any difference.

The difficulty results from the fact that inflation is now running at about 12 per cent per year. It is interesting to note the predictions which are being made as a result of this anti-inflationary legislation on which the government is going to stake its very existence.

What is this legislation going to mean as far as the financial institutions are concerned? They gave an indication in a survey carried out by about 10 of their corporations. They predict that the growth in national product will continue in 1976 at a rate between a low of 1 or 2 per cent to 5.8 per cent. This group of ten includes the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia; in other words, all our banks.

These corporations indicate that the consumer price index is going to increase next year with fully implemented controls in the range of about 9.5 per cent to 12 per cent. There is a low of 8 per cent predicted by the Dominion Securities Corporation.

What do these corporations consider the unemployment rate will be with full controls? The Royal Bank says the unemployment rate for next year will be between 7 per cent and 7½ per cent. The Toronto-Dominion Bank says the unemployment rate will be 7.3 per cent. Wood Gundy says the unemployment rate will be 7.9 per cent. The Bank of Montreal says it will be 7.6 per cent and, the Bank of Nova Scotia predicts 7.8 per cent. So most of these financial institutions feel the unemployment rate is not going to change, because these predictions fall within the range of unemployment at this time.

What do these institutions say about the growth of corporate profits? They indicate the growth will continue in 1976 in the range of from 8 per cent to 15 per cent. It is interesting to note that the Royal Bank considers the growth rate will be 12 per cent, the Toronto-Dominion Bank says 8 per cent, the Bank of Montreal says 13 per cent, the Canadian National Bank says 8 per cent, and the Imperial Bank of Commerce predicts it will be 10 per cent.

It does not appear to me that the government has accepted the advice or the predictions of the heads of some of these financial institutions, yet the minister must discuss the situation with some of these experts on the economy.

Let me refer to predictions in respect of housing starts with these full controls. It is in this field that you can influence the social climate because there is a great need for housing in Canada. You can also influence the unemployment rate by building more houses. The Royal Bank predicts 200,000 housing starts for next year. The Toronto-Dominion Bank predicts 225,000. The Bank of Montreal says we can expect 210,000 and the Bank of Nova Scotia says there will be 215,000 housing starts.

The prime interest rate with controls in 1976 is projected to run from a high of 12 per cent to a low of 9.5 per cent. Most of the banks are predicting interest rates of 10¼ per cent to 10½ per cent. Let me just read several comments made by the banks regarding the effects of controls.

Greenshields Inc. says in respect of the effects of the control program in 1976 that the government has to create credibility and acceptance, but there will be slow progress toward price improvement. The Royal Bank of Canada says that controls mean little since prior anticipation has reduced their effects on forecasts. The Toronto-Dominion Bank predicts a slightly lower rate of growth with increased unemployment as the price of controls.

An hon. Member: We are going to roll back prices.

Mr. Peters: You are going to roll them back, but that is not going to be done by this piece of legislation. I am not saying this myself, but rather I am quoting what some of the banks have indicated will be the effect of controls. The Bank of Montreal expects little impact during 1976 but some possible negative effect on growth in 1977 and 1978. The Bank of Nova Scotia says that controls may lower the growth rate to about 4 per cent in 1976 but may be beneficial in the long term. The Banque Canadienne Nationale predicts that the controls will have little effect on inflation but will have a more retarding effect on growth, and will lower consumption and savings.

If one looks at all the predictions made by our financial institutions it will be seen that they really do not say this program will have any beneficial effect on the economy, but rather, according to most of the predictions, that it will have a detrimental effect on employment. In my opinion there is no machinery that will have any effect on the cost of consumer goods.

It is very easy to do what most people do; they blame labour for their problems. It is a very interesting psychology. I had an opportunity to speak to some workers on a picket line. They had been on strike for a matter of seven or eight weeks. They were interested in talking to me, but rather than speak about their problems or their strike they were interested in talking to me about the terrible state of affairs that would develop if the postal workers went on strike.

One can see that it all depends on where one is sitting, and whether one is having some difficulty. Most of these people who were on strike were not in difficulty but were assuming there would be a difficulty if someone else went on strike. So, it is easy to focus attention on the labour movement and say that everything will be solved if there are cut-backs. It would be very difficult for most uinons to get any benefits out of the COLA clauses, which are the cost of living clauses contained in some contracts, if the cost of living were not increasing so rapidly.

This reminds me of the time when the national director of the steel workers' union spoke at a conference which I attended. He raised the roof about the COLA-type clauses in the contracts because he found that the workers ran down to the post office and got the increase from the post office rather than through union negotiations. The higher the cost of living went the more money these people received, and they seemed to believe this was an acceptable situation. The national director of the union at that time said that the two things should stand on their own. He said that the workers should bargain for their increases and that any increase in the cost of living should be handled in a separate way rather than through a COLA contract. We are and have been for some time faced with the problem of workers trying to catch up.

I should like to ask the backbenchers of the Liberal Party, particularly the members from British Columbia, a question about the situation in that province. In the province of British Columbia there have been many strikes, and the cost of living and the cost of welfare are very high. The myth has been built up concerning the beautiful weather on the west coast, a land of milk and honey. The young people who are growing up do not celebrate by getting drunk but rather by going to British Columbia, where they end up spending six or seven months enjoying British Columbia hospitality. They have added to the problems of British Columbia.

The cost of living there is exceedingly high. Labour demands are exceedingly high, and there have been a large number of strikes. I should like to ask the members on the government side from British Columbia how they justify what I imagine they would consider to be a reasonable situation if, when after a period of time the labour disputes had not been settled in that province, the province of British Columbia took rather strong measures and said that everybody had to go back to work, that the contracts had to be settled, and then the federal government came along with this kind of control program which has no relationship to the negotiations which had taken place and which has no relationship really to the proposals of either the companies or the workers.

A number of things are different in that province. Much of the difficulty in the lumber and pulp and paper industry was caused by the desire of the industry to unload inventory and to obtain an increase in the price of its products on the international market, both of which would provide more money for a company. Of course the company was not unrealistic in its belief that this probably would mean an increase for the workers in that industry as well. However, I should like to know what the answer will be to this problem now. Will the British Columbia government go to the people in the case of British Columbia versus the federal government again, as has been the case in respect of the provinces? Is that really what this is set up for Madam Speaker? If this is the situation, then it would seem to me that the program is rather divisive and in the long run really will not produce the desired results.

[Mr. Peters.]

I believe that if this program is to be realistic, and we just set about doing something inside Canada without taking into consideration international markets, international sales and international exports, we will have to develop a very strong national purpose. It seems to me that that national purpose should be spelled out very clearly, and that equality under that national purpose must be guaranteed. From my reading of this bill I suggest there is anything but a guarantee that it will have the effect of equality between the amount of money the workers and the salary earners in this country need and the amount of money that is necessary for the other segments of the economy. It is wage control; it is not, in any shape or form, price control. May I call it ten o'clock, Madam Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL REVENUE—PROPOSAL TO OBTAIN BUILDING FROM AIR CANADA FOR COMPUTER CENTRE IN WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I wish to discuss the placing of a new national revenue tax data centre in a CAE aircraft building at 570 Ferry Road in Winnipeg. The official announcement was made in Winnipeg in September.

I placed a question on the order paper in regard to the costs of renting and renovations which would be required to this CAE building. In the answer I received, the federal government stated that it would be renting the building for three years and the federal Department of Public Works would be spending $1,760,000 on renovations. Why is the government paying for the renovations? I understand that the government is paying CAE approximately $4 per square foot for rent when the going rate for this type of building is approximately $2.50 per square foot.

It appears to me that we have the makings of a monstrous blunder and one that will cost the Canadian taxpayer untold millions. Why didn't the Department of Public Works call for tenders for a new building to be built which could handle the department's needs for years to come? As the government has stated, a permanent home for the tax data centre will be built at an established cost of $15 million within four years. It is quite apparent that there has been no long range planning.

When you take into consideration the interest to be paid on the $1,700,000 for renovations, the moving costs that are involved, and the added inconvenience of moving, an entire new building could be erected for the amount that will have to be spent.

In my research into this transaction I contacted experts in the construction industry who informed me that if you were to add up the interest charges on $1,700,000, the rent at approximately $4 per square foot, and the operating costs—in a leased building the owner pays all the operating costs—for the three years it will cost the government approximately $15 per square foot. However, if the government were to erect a new building, the cost would be approximately $8 a square foot, or $611,000 less in rent and interest charges per year.

In short, it is costing the government double in rent and interest charges to take the CAE building rather than leasing a new building in which case allowances could have been made for future expansion, saving millions of dollars over the years. Four other tax data centres are being planned for across Canada, and all I can hope is that the building negotiations are not being handled in the same way.

I would like to raise another two points. The construction of a new building would have been completed in a shorter period of time than it is taking to renovate the CAE building. The renovations are nowhere near completion, and I cannot foresee the government meeting its deadline of January 1, 1976, to start its decentralization program.

Is this another costly blunder similar to the move made by the federal government and Air Canada in having CAE overhaul the obsolete Viscounts which are still not airworthy, in an effort to appease Manitobans at a cost of millions? These Viscounts are now just rotting at the Winnipeg airport.

Perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) can throw some light on this tax data centre deal with the CAE. Did he by any chance pressure the government to place the data centre in the CAE building so that he could say that he had obtained another contract for CAE and western Canada? If he did do this, this is not the type of under the table deals that Canadians want.

In an answer to my question on the order paper it was stated that the Metropolitan Estates Properties Corporation had submitted a tender to construct a new building but the government had turned down their offer. I hope that tonight the parliamentary secretary can inform the House what was in the Metropolitan Estates Properties Corporation submission, and also provide the Canadian public with a complete explanation of this whole transaction.

In closing, I would say that at least $4 million to $5 million of taxpayers' money could have been saved if a new leased building had been obtained in place of the temporary renting of the CAE building.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I carefully listened to the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) and I congratulate him as well as the hon. member for St. Boniface for their interest in the government project for greater Winnipeg. The Parliamentary Secrtary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) has already replied to the hon. member and I am advised that the Department of Public Works has no further information to give at the present time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EFFECT OF ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM ON CHOICE OF LONG RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise because of the unsatisfactory answer given to a question of mine last week, on October 16, when I inquired once again about the government's plans for purchasing long range patrol aircraft. At that time the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) said:

> Mr. Speaker, major decisions on procurement are before the cabinet at present in the form of the forces structure review and when the decisions have been reached they will be announced in the usual way.

This is the same kind of answer we have been getting for several years.

If one does not buy any clothes for years, then one's entire wardrobe needs replacing. This is the situation with Canada's armed forces. Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power, no equipment replacement program has been initiated and brought to fruition. Now everything needs to be replaced—tanks, planes, and ships. The false economy of postponing expenditures is exemplified in the long range patrol aircraft replacement fiasco.

On March 17, 1969, Mr. Cadieux, then minister of national defence, said that a replacement for the Argus was "under active consideration". In the six years plus since then the pages of Hansard and the minutes of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence are dotted with promises and assurances that progress was being made. This glacier-like progress eventually resulted in the present Minister of National Defence announcing that the choice was down to four companies, then in 1973 down to two.

This led to a "contract definition phase" in which, curiously enough, Canada was to pay Boeing and Lockheed something over $11 million to make sales pitches to us for their product. The proposals were to include performance capabilities, technical specifications, production schedules, and costs of the aircraft, as well as the employment opportunities and industrial benefits which would accrue to Canada. In November of 1974 the minister stated unequivocally that the decision would be taken in April, May, or June 1975. The prices in the submissions would hold, provided the contract was signed by August 2, 1975.

It looked as if the government had finally been backed into a corner where a decision would have to be made, but one should never underestimate this government's ability to procrastinate, particularly in defence purchases. The questioning continued through the winter, and last spring we were assured that everything was going according to plan. Then, on July 25, the Department of National Defence issued a very short press release which repeated that the proposals had been narrowed down to two, and then stated that "as the decision cannot be made separately from the government's plan to restructure the Canadian air frame industry, the decision on the long range patrol aircraft has been deferred until later this year."

This is how $11 million was wasted—to give the government two years to procrastinate. If any further evidence were needed to testify to the extinction of the contract definition plan, it was supplied by the minister's statement last week that Canada was now considering purchase of the Orion P-3C "off the shelf". Gone was the necessity for a Canadian involvement in construction. Gone was the necessity for Canadian manufacture of the necessary electronic and surveillance systems. And gone also was $11 million.

Last month I attended the North Atlantic Assembly meeting as leader of the Canadian delegation to the military committee of that august body. On the first morning of the meeting the rapporteur of the military committee, whose job it is to prepare a general report on the security of the alliance, came to see me about what I agreed was a matter of some urgency. It had been suggested to him that the following statement should be included in his general report on the security of the alliance as a new paragraph 9(a). It reads as follows:

> The situation regarding Canadian military forces is far from satisfactory; the strength of their active forces has been reduced and no decisions have been made to replace major items of equipment for the land and air forces which have now become obsolete. A review of Canadian forces this year is likely to substantiate even more strongly the picture of Canada as a country determined to participate actively in, and influence the political councils of NATO, anxious to maintain her economic links with Europe, but unwilling to make a contribution to alliance defence which is commensurate either with these aspirations or her economic strength.

I was able to convince the rapporteur not to include that as it was too embarrassing for an all-party delegation to NATO, as it was the fault of only one party in this parliament—mainly a very selective group of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence.

When we tracked back to see where the idea to include this paragraph originated we discovered it came from a person holding rank at the assistant secretary-general level in NATO, one can only assume this is the true opinion that NATO has of Canada as an ally.

I regret to say that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence frequently return from NATO and tell us that all is well, when such is not the case. When I receive an answer such as I did the other day to a legitimate question about the LRPA replacement, that is not good enough for this parliament, not good enough for the people of Canada and most particularly not good enough for the men and women of our armed forces who have been so misled, misinformed, and deceived by the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, from the language used by the hon. member it seems rather obvious that he is more interested in debate than an answer.

With regard to the question, it is pretty much a reiteration of the question he posed to the minister last week. As he himself has stated tonight, in response to his question on the procurement of new aircraft, specifically long range patrol aircraft, I can only repeat what the minister has said. The program is currently before cabinet in the form of the forces structure review, and when decisions on the matter have been taken, they will be announced.

The hon. member is also aware, although his words tonight did not indicate his awareness, that Canada has every intention of maintaining its level of contribution to the NATO alliance. The form in which this contribution will be made is also being considered as part of the defence structure review.

I, personally, spent a week at NATO headquarters last spring and certainly did not note the kind of atmosphere to which the hon. member referred this evening. I found the morale of the people there very high and all our allies, including the Secretary General of NATO, showed a high appreciation for the part Canada plays in NATO.

PENITENTIARIES—PROPOSED INSTITUTION AT MORNA, NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION IN VIEW OF OBJECTIONS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, under date of May 23 the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) advised me by letter of plans to construct a new medium security institution in that part of the city of Saint John which is part of the constituency of Carleton-Charlotte.

Upon receipt of the letter on May 29 I phoned the minister's office and requested a map to show the exact location proposed for the institution. Despite repeated requests by telephone to the minister's office and in person to the minister, no map was supplied. On July 9 I wrote to the minister, repeating my request for the map. It was my intention to send a letter to all boxholders in the area concerned, to determine what their wishes might be in respect of the location of a penal institution in their neighbourhood. Without such information I would not be a reliable source of information for the minister. It would be meaningless to submit a questionnaire without knowing the exact location of the proposed site.

On July 28 I eventually mailed the questionnaires to the residents of the west Saint John area of the Carleton-Charlotte constituency. On the same day we learned that there might be another possible location for the institution and additional questionnaires were sent to the Lepreau-Maces Bay area of the constituency.

Under date of July 29 the map arrived at my office. Although the questionnaires had been mailed, the map was forwarded to the Saint John daily paper and published. This was helpful for those who answered the questionnaire.

In response to the 1,600 questionnaires, 450 people expressed their wishes. In the result, 94 per cent said they did not want the institution built in the area, 1 per cent were undecided, and 5 per cent favoured the west Saint John location. Such a number of replies and the resounding no makes it absolutely binding upon me to ask the minister to choose another location.

Since the first suggestion that a medium security institution should be built in the Saint John area, the public has protested bitterly. A petition against its location bore 1,400 names and was presented to the Common Council of the city of Saint John. This was supported by letters to the editor and an editorial in the Saint John Telegraph Journal of August 6, 1975. I quote the editorial in part, to reflect the feeling of the editor, as he, in turn, reflected the sentiments of the residents concerned. Referring to the map, the editor said:

It shows, with somewhat shocking clarity, just how close the proposed new federal prison would be to built-up residential areas of Saint John.

I made the first appeal, on behalf of my constituents, in question form to the minister; on July 9, 1975, I asked him to change the location, as recorded in Hansard, page 7390. On September 19, in response to the overwhelming opposition expressed in answer to my questionnaire, I wrote to the minister, saying that, "You may adjust your plans in accordance with the citizens' wishes." On September 30 I had a phone call from a reliable source—I am sure the minister agrees that the source is reliable—saying that the minister never received any letter of protest from me. This took place 11 days after the letter was sent by hand to the minister's office. The letter was acknowledged by a member of his staff on September 24, 1975. The minister is reputed to have said that since he did not read the Saint John papers, he was not aware of the protests. The message had been delivered, but the mail did not reach his desk apparently.

Again on Thursday last I asked the minister if he would reconsider, as reported in Hansard at page 8260, and again the answer was no.

On behalf of those who live near the proposed site, I say the minister must build elsewhere. Dorchester needs and wants increased employment. I ask the minister to read the Globe and Mail of August 25, 1975, and to ask the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc), the representative of that area.

The Blue Mountain minimum security site is still in the hands of the government. Some of the facilities at least are in place. I believe that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) has invited the minister to build there. In view of these options, one writer said "This seems completely absurd."

The minister asked for my opinion and my support. I cannot give my support for the location in the west Saint John area. I must ask in the firmest manner that he not authorize the construction in west Saint John, Mace's Bay or Lepreau, unless of course he would be as politically unwise as the advice of Mr. Therien, the federal penitentiary commissioner, would have him be. I ask the minister to look at the October 14, 1975, issue of the Telegraph-Journal.

The institutions are wanted and needed in some areas. Accept the invitations. Do not thrust your unwanted presence onto the people of west Saint John.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, may I first assure the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) that it is the intention of the minister and the department to give every consideration to public opinion in that area. In fact there has been ongoing consultation between all levels of government with respect to this matter.

This matter was raised in the House of Commons during the oral question period on Thursday, October 16. In answer, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) indicated that he had not abandoned plans for the construction of a penal institution in the Morna neighbourhood in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, at this point because the government had received approval in principle from the New Brunswick provincial government and from certain persons associated with the government of the city of Saint John. He also indicated that a further meeting of the council of the city of Saint John was to be held shortly and that he would await the decision that would follow that meeting. In fact a meeting of the council of the city of Saint John is to be held in the near future at which our application to purchase property in the Saint John area will be presented.

The five year construction plan of the penitentiary service in the Atlantic provinces provides for the construction of a new maximum security institution in Dorchester, New Brunswick, some medical facilities in Nova Scotia, and the construction of a medium security institution in close proximity to the city of Saint John, New Brunswick.

The penitentiary service believes that there is a need for an institution at close proximity to the city of Saint John as a number of inmates are native to the area and would like to re-establish themselves there upon release. As a result, it is planned to construct a small institution to house approximately 180 inmates in a medium security setting. The inmates who will be incarcerated there will be classified as not dangerous, and with the improved security perimeter system and dynamic security program, the risk of escape will be appreciably reduced. The penitentiary service's experience shows that such an institution does not have a depressing effect on the morale of a community and does not inhibit the normal pursuits and activities of its citizens. The site at present under consideration appears to be suitable for that purpose.

The City of Saint John is being consulted on all aspects of the location and development of the proposed institution. I wish to assure the hon. member that any decision on whether or not to proceed will take into full consideration the outcome of the consultations between the penitentiary service, the federal Department of Public Works, and the Council of the City of Saint John, as well as the outcome of surveys of community opinion. As stated by the Solicitor General in his answer to the question I referred to earlier, if there is overwhelming objection to the site, consideration will be given to abandoning this plan.

I, as a member for this area, the city of Ottawa, have no trouble whatever in obtaining from the council any plans that I need with respect to specific locations, and I suggest to the hon. member that he could obtain the information he needs through a similar channel. I realize that throughout the summer months it is not as easy to obtain information as when the House is in full swing—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has now expired.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADA-UNITED STATES POSITION ON EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recent moves by Mexico, Iceland and other countries, including the United States, toward declaring unilaterally 200 mile fishing zones indicates a growing dissatisfaction with the pace at which the Law of the Sea negotiations are progressing. In addition, there appears to be a consensus amongst learned participants at the conference that in spite of statements by Canada, real progress was not made. Further, as declared yesterday at the APEC meetings, any action by Canada in the declarations of action depends on the initiative of the United States.

In view of the fact that the United States has declared its intention in Congress to impose a 200 mile fisheries zone, and in view of the fact that this contradicts a statement by the foreign secretary of state that his country agreed with the position of Canada to continue to negotiate internationally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House orders that the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity to disclose all factors arising out of recent Canada-U.S. meetings on fisheries held in Ottawa on their relative positions vis-à-vis the declaration of fisheries zones.

Mr. Speaker: Rule 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF RETAIL DISCOUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a vital issue.

Since the core of the inflation problem resides in prices, taking into consideration the fact that most price controls throughout the world have failed and since also such controls have induced imbalances throughout the world generally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House consider immediately the opportunity of subsidizing the consumption of food products through a retail discount whose main effect would be to lower the price of those products to make them more readily available to the entire Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF REASONS FOR REDUCTION OF SURVEILLANCE BY PATROL VESSELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of dramatically urgent and pressing necessity, particularly in view of our pretensions to make jurisdictional claims out to the 200-mile limit and beyond. The necessity arises from the fact that fisheries patrol vessels on our two coasts are in imminent danger of having to cut back drastically, perhaps even cease, temporariiy, their surveillance and patrol operations through lack of resources, and this only halfway through the fiscal year. For that reason, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House approve immediately an appropriate reference permitting the Standing Committee on the Environment to meet without delay to examine the rootcauses of this deplorable situation and make recommendations as to how it can be remedied.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF LEASE FOR BUILDING FOR TAX DATA CENTRE AT WINNIPEG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

My motion arises out of a matter I raised in the adjournment debate last evening and the complete non-answer I received from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cyr). Perhaps those on the other side of the House do not consider the waste of millions of taxpayers' dollars on a totally inadequate building for the new tax data centre in Winnipeg a matter of importance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion perhaps he could put it.

Mr. McKenzie: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the government's blunder in entering into a costly lease for the CAE building to house the tax data centre in Winnipeg be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Works, that the committee be empowered to call for all documents concerning this matter, and that the Ministers of National Defence, Public Works, Justice and National Revenue be called before the committee to explain their role in this misapplication of public funds.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF PROVISION PERMITTING DEDUCTION OF LOSSES FROM INVESTMENTS IN RENTAL APARTMENT PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. In view of escalating rents and severe shortages in rental apartment accommodation, in view of a seriously insufficient number of new apartment starts and in observance of the successful stimulation in the past of new apartment building projects provided by the ability of persons to deduct losses resulting from investment in such projects from their taxable income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House recommend to the government and the Minister of Finance that the period enabling individuals to deduct losses resulting from investment in new rental apartment projects from their taxable income as provided for in the budget of November 18, 1974, be extended beyond its December 31, 1975, deadline.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion as required by Standing Order 43?

PROPOSED COMMISSION TO STUDY DIFFERENTIAL IN GASOLINE PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion of pressing public necessity and importance.

Since there can be a difference of as much as 10 cents a gallon between the cost of gasoline bought in Montreal and Abitibi or Gaspesia, for example, and since this difference is not proportionate to the cost of transport, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That a standing committee of this House be requested to examine the reasons for this tremendous difference between the price of gasoline from one area to the other and to make recommendation to the House to take necessary steps to prevent that areas such as Abitibi and Gaspesia, among others, suffer from disproportionate gas prices as compared with other areas of the country.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF FEDERAL COMMITMENTS ON COST AND ADEQUACY OF CONTROL MECHANISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion arises out of recent reports from Montreal indicating that the cost of the 1976 Olympics is likely to exceed $1 billion, a cost estimate which, I gather, does not take into account the added costs certain to result from labour disruptions of the kind we now have at the Olympic site. I well realize that this government takes the position that these soaring costs are someone's else's problem. But the fact is, as we all know, that the federal government itself has heavy direct—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion, will he put it forthwith?

Mr. Jelinek: In order that we in parliament as well as the people of Canada might have a more up to date and complete accounting of the federal position on this matter, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates be ordered forthwith to inquire into the current and projected cost commitments, both direct and indirect, of the federal government to the 1976 Olympic Games and to report to the House both as to the level of those commitments and the adequacy of existing cost control mechanisms over them.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising from the statement made recently by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in which he denied there was any morale problem in his department. POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON LEGALITY OF STRIKE—CONTINGENCY PLAN IN EVENT OF PROLONGED STRIKE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Postmaster General. I understand that the executive of the Postal Workers Union has called for a national strike. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the view of the government that the union is in a position to call a legal strike and that the Government of Canada is now seized with a legal national strike by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): That is my understanding. I made inquiries this morning and I understand there has been a call for a strike which is being observed.

Mr. Stanfield: In the light of the statement made recently by the Postmaster General concerning the possible necessity of a long strike—perhaps three months—to resolve this issue, has the government decided, in the event of rotating strikes by the union, to shut down all postal services across the country in keeping with the remarks made by the Postmaster General for as long as it takes to reach a collective agreement?

Mr. Sharp: I hope an agreement can be reached without any prolonged delay in the operation of the Post Office. As to the particular question which the Leader of the Opposition has directed to me, I believe it should be directed, rather, to the Postmaster General.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Sharp: The Postmaster General is in Windsor today; I expect he will be in the House either tomorrow or the next day. I know he has no desire to avoid answering questions raised by the hon. gentleman. The cabinet has not yet considered what action will be taken if the employees indulge in rotating strikes.

Mr. Stanfield: The Postmaster General has also told us that the government has contingency plans for the distribution of essential government mail and social security cheques. Has the government prepared a contingency plan designed to help small businessmen and other Canadians who face severe, perhaps unendurable hardship as a result of a strike? Has the government such a plan and, if so, when will the public hear about it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be misleading to suggest that the public is not going to suffer if there is a post office strike. This is one of the penalties of collective bargaining, and I think it is one that is accepted by members on both sides of this House. They would not want to deprive any particular group of the right to strike. So I would not hold out the hope that a post office strike would not harm many individuals, big and small.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE LEGALITY OF STRIKE—ALLEGED TAPPING OF POSTMASTER GENERAL'S TELEPHONE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will direct to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the Postmaster General that the vote conducted recently by the CUPW union does not necessarily constitute a mandate to call a strike—and it is to be regretted that the Postmaster General is not in the House today on this most significant occasion to deal with this problem—and in view of the further announcement that I believe was made this morning by the postal unions that the negotiations broke down on the wage packet rather than the fringe benefits which have been in public focus during recent days, what action is the government taking to ensure that the strike that the unions have now embarked upon is a legal strike?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not addressed a question of that kind to the Minister of Justice or to any official who might have a legal opinion. All I know is that the right to strike has not been officially questioned, and I think we should accept it that the union has the right to call a legal strike. I think this is the question that has been put to me directly and it is the one I have attempted to answer.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will direct to the Solicitor General. In view of numerous charges made in the press about irregularities in the voting procedure, and in view of the statement made in Windsor today, which should have been made in the House, to the effect that the Postmaster General has asked the Solicitor General, or has asked the RCMP through the Solicitor General, to investigate wiretapping on his telephone, what action is the Solicitor General taking in this regard?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is possible that the Postmaster General approached the RCMP directly, but I have not been advised of that. I will check into it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DECISION OF QUEBEC TO REDUCE AMOUNT OF INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's express concern that the package of economic proposals that the government has presented to the House will benefit the average and low income people, notwithstanding the fact that there is nothing in it directly for them, I should like to ask the minister whether a decision by the Quebec government yesterday not to proceed with an increase in the minimum wage, which in that province was scheduled to go up next month to $2.92, but instead to increase it next January simply to $2.86 instead of $2.92, is in the minister's view in the spirit of the guidelines to which the minister has referred a number of times?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would just correct the statement of the hon. gentleman. Any measure that protects the position of those not in a position by economic power to continue to get their fair share of the growth of Canada's economy is obviously one that is in their favour, and this applies directly to those of low income. I have not had an opportunity to speak to provincial officials generally since our meeting of a week ago Monday. I will have the opportunity tomorrow and the next day, and undoubtedly this is among other questions that will arise. I would not comment before I have had an opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since more than 1,700,000 Canadians living in the province of Quebec are directly affected by this negative decision by the premier of Quebec, I should like to ask the minister, when he meets with the finance ministers of all the provinces and particularly with the minister of the province of Quebec, whether he would make it clear that it is not the government's intention that this approach should be taken to minimum wages at the provincial level. In fact, would he positively encourage the provincial premiers to increase the minimum wages in their provinces?

● (1420)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think we would want to talk particularly about the situation of those in lower income groups, not only in Quebec but across Canada.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question in an area that is the direct responsibility of the government. Given the fact that the federal wage in 1970 was 55 per cent of the average manufacturing wage in Canada and that for 1975 this has dropped to a mere 51 per cent of the average manufacturing wage in this country, which means that low-income federal employees or people under federal jurisdiction have been getting a declining share of the economic pie, would the minister take direct action to the benefit of such low-income Canadians, within the government's responsibility, by raising the federal minimum wage?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the hon. gentleman who has given a very good example of the way in which those on low incomes suffer when those with economic power can force up their own compensation. I would certainly be prepared to look at the level of compensation within the federal public service area to see whether people have suffered because of the exercise of economic power by others.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN LUMBERMEN WORKING IN MAINE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As lumbermen, Canadian and American, have been confronting each other for several days now at the boundary between the state of Maine and the province of Quebec, right across from the riding of Bellechasse, on matters concerning wage and working conditions of the Canadians working in the States, as the situation seems to be deteriorating from day to day, and as I have been requested to ask the Minister of Manpower whether he has been advised of the situation, can he tell us what steps he intends to take to ensure that Canadian workers are protected as they should be, and that they can continue to work for the American lumber industry?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the question properly, and there may have been some difficulty in the translation, this is really a question of Canadian workers operating in the State of Maine and is certainly beyond my own jurisdiction. It is not a matter that would fall within the ambit of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Having said that, I will certainly be interested in more details to see if this is matter for discussion with either the authorities of the State of Maine or the United States, and which might lend itself to some negotiation. It is not within my responsibility.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the reply of the minister, and considering ministerial solidarity, may I ask the minister to kindly acquaint one of his colleagues, possibly the Minister of Labour, with this problem, with a view to ensuring some measure of justice to the Canadian workers who rely on the government of Canada to make sure that their rights are respected?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly discuss this with the appropriate minister and my colleague in Cabinet, but I am not sure in this case whether it would be the Minister of Labour who could take action with regard to practices in another sovereign state. However, we will look into it.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF DAMAGE CAUSED BY PROLONGED STRIKE OF POSTAL WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF CLOSING POST OFFICE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Postmaster General said:

> In a democracy such as ours some segments of the economy must be severely, sometimes unjustifiably, inconvenienced, but that is the price of our particular system.

Would the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the government has made any estimate of the damage to the Canadian economy of a prolonged postal strike and, if so, has the government calculated that the Canadian economy can withstand a long strike?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether it would be possible to make a calculation of that kind. What I do suggest to my hon. friend is I think there is a great deal at stake in this particular issue especially in relation to the program of restraint which I hope he supports.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, is the minister advising the House that the government is drifting into a prolonged strike without any idea of the consequences?

Mr. Sharp: No. We understand very well the serious consequences of a postal strike. We also understand, as I hope he appreciates, the serious consequences of breaking the government's own guidelines.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it was several months ago that the Postmaster General threatened to close down the post office for three months if necessary, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether that was then and is still government policy.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General I think has made an offer that is very fair and just. He has offered the inside postal workers the same deal accepted by the letter carriers. That is the government's position and that is within the terms of the guidelines. On other matters, the government is ready to negotiate and stands ready to negotiate at any time.

FINANCE

INTENTION OF CHARTERED BANKS TO INCREASE CHARGE FOR HANDLING CHEQUES—POSSIBLE BREACH OF ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister whether he has been advised of the fact that one of the chartered banks intends to raise its rates for handling cheques by 12½ per cent and whether this constitutes a breach of the guidelines and the intent of the white paper.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the hon. gentleman. I will be pleased to pass this on to the Anti-Inflation Board.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF BUDGETARY DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESTRAIN GROWTH OF MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Finance. As a review of federal government financial operations during the first four months of the current fiscal year indicates that revenues are below and spending is considerably above, the levels required to achieve the revenue and expenditure forecasts of the June 23 budget, would the minister tell the House if he has revised the June 23 forecast of a budgetary deficit of $3.2 billion, and if so what is his new estimate of the federal budgetary deficit for this year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Not as yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary again is directed to the Minister of Finance. As we have had much rhetoric concerning restraint and the assurances of the minister that the money supply in this country will be in restraint in future, would the minister indicate when we will see some actual and concrete evidence of restraint with regard to the growth of our money system, it having grown 16 per cent in the last 12 months alone.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman the increase of the bank rate of three-quarters of one per cent early in September which has as a direct consequence the moderating of the rate of increase in the money supply.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary, again addressed to the Minister of Finance. With regard to the minister's observation that a rising prime rate will ensure restraint in respect of the growth of the money system, would he indicate to the House why that has not taken place over the last three years when our money supply has jumped by over 60 per cent?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could suggest to the hon. gentleman to his benefit that he study the very eloquent remarks of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in this respect.

AGRICULTURE

BROILER INDUSTRY—CHARGES RETURNS TO PRODUCERS THROUGH MARKETING BOARD VERY HIGH—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and is prompted by his statement that Canadians have nothing to fear from well-run marketing agencies. In view of the statement contained in the report of the Food Prices Review Board on the broiler industry in Canada that the average return on equity to many producers in the broiler industry is extremely high by normal business standards, and further in view of the charge of the board that the federal government will take more vigorous action to combat and eliminate constraints to interprovincial trade by the broiler industry which is contrary to the BNA Act, I ask the minister will he respond to the very serious charges and does he intend to investigate them?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to study the new report the Food Prices Review Board has submitted. But I would just remind the hon. member that broiler prices in Canada went up 14 per cent last year while they went up 23 per cent in the United States, and there is no control on imports into Canada. Imports went up from 3,209,000, pounds to 10,373,000, pounds. So there is really no control; we have no control on supply-management. Each of the provinces has its own individual broiler program and before a national agency for broiler marketing is put into force, public hearings would have to be held in accordance with the legislation which this parliament passed some time ago.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO ANTI-INFLATION BOARD OF CHARGES MADE AGAINST PRODUCERS OF BROILERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister refer to the Anti-Inflation Board the charge made by the Food Prices Review Board that the return on equity to producers in the broiler industry is extremely high by normal business standards?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I have reason to believe that the facts in this respect may already be well known to at least one member of the anti-inflation review board, but I will make a point of reminding her of it.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST BY BEEF PRODUCERS FOR DELAY OF INCREASE IN RATES

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Ontario Beef Improvement Association has expressed grave concern with both CNR and CPR about increased freight rates over the last year—three very substantial increases totalling 49 per cent have been imposed and last week the association was informed that another increase of 15 per cent would be imposed on November 15, making it the fourth increase in less than a year, which would indeed be a hardship on the beef producers of Ontario—would the minister urge both CNR and CPR to withhold any increase until a later date in the interest of combatting inflation, and will he also arrange a meeting with the Ontario Beef Improvement Association in the near future to discuss all aspects of freight rate increases and the alarming decrease in rail service over the past year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly share the hon. member's concern and that of associations in both the east and the west in relation to higher freight rates on beef and other meat. I hope that at the very least the railways may be reviewing their proposed increases in the light of the guidelines. I think it would also be appropriate for the proposals to be brought to the attention of the anti-inflation review board. I would of course be delighted to meet with the beef associations.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTION MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL FINANCE MINISTERS BE HELD IN PUBLIC

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the government received representations from any of the provinces suggesting that meetings of the finance ministers which will be held Wednesday and Thursday be held in public?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if there have been such representations, they have not come to my attention. I do hope to receive a briefing from my officials later this afternoon following their meetings this morning with provincial officials. I will be in a better position later today to respond to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the need of the Canadian people to know as much as possible about the anti-inflation program proposed by the government, and how it will affect them, if they are to co-operate to make the program work, will the minister give serious consideration to the suggestions which I think will be made that the discussions tomorrow and on Thursday be open to the media and the public?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will be glad to consider that.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN LUMBERMEN WORKING IN MAINE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question which is supplementary to that of my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse. It is directed to the President of the Privy Council, a former Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he advise the House whether the problem Canadian forest workers are faced with in connection with the United States has been discussed by the cabinet and what action, if any, the government will take to correct this situation which I suggest is covered by the provision of the Immigration Act governing seasonal workers under contract who are staying in a foreign country?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, when I was secretary of state for external affairs problems of this kind were discussed in the department. I find myself in general agreement with my colleagues, however, that these are the laws of the United States. However, I will get in touch with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns and will ask him to see if there is anything useful that the Canadian government might do.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council.

On behalf of the government, could he advise the House whether forest workers under long and medium term contracts will be able to work till the end of their contracts, so that these petty quarrels may be settled as soon as possible?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether our authority would extend in that direction. But I understand that there is some problem there and I can assure the hon. member we will inquire into it to see if there is anything useful that could be done.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—EFFECT OF GUIDELINES ON DIVIDEND PAYMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Under Bill C-73 while wages are not frozen, dividends are, shall we say, limited to the pay-out during the preceding fiscal year. Will the minister advise the House whether this is a roll-back or whether this includes dividends declared in 1974 but payable in 1975, and if it is a total freeze will he advise how he expects Canadian investors to maintain their investments and not invest in U.S. stocks that are freely available to them and on which there is no roll-back or freeze?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to check again to see whether this is on a cash or accrual basis. In general terms, however, the intention would be that absolute dividend levels not be increased over the last completed fiscal year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In actual fact is it the 1974 level of dividends that is frozen, or is it to include dividend levels of 1975 which may be higher having been declared and payable in 1975, because if it is a freeze then the minister knows what the consequences are?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to seek precision on that.

ENERGY

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister say whether or not the Sarnia-Montreal oil pipeline is being constructed according to schedule, and is he satisfied that it is proceeding properly? If so, when might we expect to find some oil actually travelling by pipeline between Sarnia and Montreal?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the last word I had on that was that there should be oil flowing through that pipeline early next year.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED REDUCTION IN SURVEILLANCE BY PATROL VESSELS ON WEST COAST—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). In view of the alarming reports that 29 of the 30 fishing patrol vessels on the west coast are to be immobilized for lack of operating funds, and as 20 Japanese and Polish trawlers are at present in the vicinity of the 12 mile line, can the minister detail what steps he is taking to ensure that our 12 mile fishing zones are adequately patrolled?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where these reports come from, but there has been no decision to reduce the level of surveillance on either coast at present.

Oral Questions

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the budget for fisheries patrolling was reduced this year, despite the rising costs of fuel, and this would automatically reduce the amount of patrolling that can be done. Does the minister deny there will be a curtailment of patrolling on the west coast?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I neither deny nor confirm it. I simply say that no decision has been made. The salmon season is ending and we are reviewing all our expenditures because of obvious pressures in relation to inflation and the costs of contracts with crews as well as the cost of fuel. But no decision has been made. We are reviewing this matter and patrolling is continuing on both coasts.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF BUDGET REQUIRED TO ADMINISTER PROGRAM AND NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who said during his speech on the introduction of the white paper and the bill dealing with inflation that he, his department and the anti-inflation review board expect to be confronted with perplexing questions. I wonder if it has been possible for his department to deal with the perplexing question of how many employees will be required to administer the program and what kind of budget has been established for carrying out the duties of the board.

● (1440)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are currently looking at the prospect of approximately 200 employees with direct responsibility here. The level of the budget is not final since is not yet clear as to whether some of the employees will be seconded and therefore referred from other departments or brought into the public service. Obviously, the preference would be not to increase the budget by any substantial degree.

ENERGY

OIL—SALE PRICE OF OIL DISCOVERED ON CAMERON ISLAND—ACTION TO ENSURE NORTHERN OIL REACHES CANADIAN MARKET

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the government contemplating allowing the oil discovered on Cameron Island to be sold at world prices, as requested by the president of Panarctic?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government has made it quite clear in the past that the policy of the government would be that oil prices would move up towards world prices.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Gillies: Given the fact that the president of Panarctic has said that there is no way in which this oil could be brought into the Canadian market unless it is at world prices, what alternative position will the government offer in order that this oil may be available to Canadian consumers?

Mr. Gillespie: One can only hope that the Panarctic discovery will lead to many more, and that there will be a sufficient reserve of oil to exploit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Hon. members opposite do not take this very seriously. I do; I think it is very important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: I would indicate to the minister that we take this terribly seriously, and we are concerned that there has been no conservation of Canadian oil and nothing done to increase the supply of oil. Again I ask the minister, what he will do to ensure that this oil does in fact reach the Canadian market, and I hope that he will refrain from frivolous statements.

Mr. Gillespie: We have made it very clear in the past that there are many measures we are taking. One of the more important measures is to find ways of moving that oil and gas out of the Arctic. My department has taken this position with regard to the Polar gas project with a view to determining the feasibility of moving petroleum products out of the north.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO RELEASE OF MR. AND MRS. JOHNSON, PRISONERS OF WAR IN VIET NAM

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not in the House, I would like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary.

Could the parliamentary secretary reassure the House on the fate of the Canadian missionnaries, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, from Hamilton? Are the reports that those two missionnaries would be released true?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member who just asked this question that the representations made by the Canadian authorities seem to have got a very positive ending. I am told that Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, according to an official communication addressed to our Peking embassy by the Provisional Revolutionary Government, will be released. Furthermore, I would like to add that we have already been in touch with the High Commission for Refugees in Geneva and that there is no new development yet regarding the release date.

TRANSPORT

INTERCITY RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—NATURE OF REPLY TO PROPOSAL BY RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that his predecessor requested the two major railroads in Canada to submit proposals to the government for an integrated intercity rail passenger service, and that the presidents of those railroads wrote to the former minister of transport on December 20 of last year submitting a proposal, I ask the minister if there was a reply to that letter? If so, when, and what was the nature of that reply?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will check the correspondence.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sorry the minister said that he will look into this matter. I gave him notice of this question this morning.

An hon. Member: He's worse than Marchand.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the fact that the two major railroads requested that this matter be resolved and agreed to by March 1 so that they could commence this new intercity rail service by this October, if it is the intention of the government to reply, will the minister table the letter which the railroads sent to the former minister last year, and does the government intend to agree to their proposals?

Mr. Lang: Of course, the issue is very important and requires due consideration. Whether I should or will table the correspondence is something I will determine after I have looked at it.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT LEGISLATING END TO STRIKE IN VIEW OF EFFECT ON ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. I hope all my questions are greeted with such pleasure by the government of the day and I hope the pleasure of hon. members is demonstrated by their willingness to answer my questions.

Because of the concern of the people of Canada as to whether the government really intends to proceed with the intent of the anti-inflationary legislation in Bill C-73, has the cabinet considered back to work legislation for the postal workers if the strike persists?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this first question from the hon. member, and I am very glad to know that he is still associated with Crowfoot. After viewing the television interview last night, I wondered whether he was from Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! .

Mr. Sharp: The program which the government has put forward in its attack on inflation may produce some strikes. We hope it will not. The government, of course, does not preclude the possibility that parliament may want to take action to send workers back to work. That is something only parliament can decide, and the government may or may not make such recommendations. I hope, however, that the postal workers will accept the same deal as was offered to the letter carriers, so that ordinary postal service can be resumed quickly.

Mr. Horner: I might say to the Acting Prime Minister that I would welcome his sons to contest the constituency of Crowfoot. I am sure they would well remember my presence there for a long time in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the people of Canada can take the legislation of the government seriously if the government is not prepared to act on the very first strike which occurs after its announcement. If the government allows this strike to go on, is it not setting a precedent for all other union leaders and workers across Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: As the government has indicated, it is our hope that this program of restraint, which will apply and be enforced against certain elements in the community, will be supported on all sides. I would have thought that the kind of action being suggested by the hon. member, although I understand his motivation, would not contribute to the policy which is the result of a consensus with regard to restraint.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—DATE OF SIGNING AND DURATION OF AGREEMENT ON SECOND PHASE OF RURAL DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and ask him if it is his intention in the near future to sign an agreement with the province of Prince Edward Island regarding the second phase of the so-called comprehensive development plan. Would he also indicate for what period such an agreement will be in effect?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I can inform the hon. member that our department will ratify the second phase of the agreement on the development of Prince Edward Island. I will be in that province as early as tomorrow and will probably sign the agreement with the premier of P.E.I. on Thursday. As understood during our negotiations, the agreement will cover a five-year period.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

As the President of the Treasury Board said last week that no additional funds would be given for LIP projects and since 75 per cent of those projects will be turned down because of lack of funds, I would like to ask the minister, in the circumstances, in view of the disappointment of hundreds of promoters, whether he is considering recommending additional supplies to the Cabinet, in order to accept a more reasonable number of projects?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered this question the other day. I do not intend, in the face of the current restraint program, to make such a recommendation. The budget of June 23 provided $450 million for this kind of stimulation involving local initiatives programs, federal labour intensive programs, training and others to be spread over the next 18 months. That is as far as we can go now.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH DR. KISSINGER

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence I shall direct it to the Minister of Fisheries. According to reports emanating from 200 delegates at the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland, the Canadian government on its own does not intend to declare a 200-mile limit within the next three years. As President Ford indicated he would be prepared to sign a unilateral declaration establishing the limit, effective January 1, 1977, will the government make available to this House the basis of the discussions recently held on this matter with Dr. Kissinger. We have learned just about everything else which took place at that meeting. Perhaps we could learn what was said about the fisheries.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State, Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question escapes me completely. We said clearly that unilateral action is still very much an option. I may say to the hon. member that I am surprised that delegates to the meeting in St. John's have not read what the former minister of fisheries for Newfoundland said in a letter to me, that his province, because of our success at ICNAF, is not pressing for action before the next Law of the Sea Conference. The Fisheries Council of Canada has also expressed this view. So, I will take the word of these gentlemen, instead of the word of some academics.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGATION TAPE RECORDING OF NEGOTIATIONS DISCLOSES GOVERNMENT MIGHT LOCK OUT EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TAPE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? It arises from the breaking off of negotiations last night and the indication that a tape was made of that conversation which indicates that the chief negotiator for the government had taken the position that the government was locking out postal employees—whatever that position may mean. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware of the existence of that tape? Would he be prepared to table it in the House, if he is aware of it, and can he tell us if the tape contains a record of the government's position vis-à-vis the postal unions.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand—and this is only based on reports I have received—that the tape was made without the authorization of the people who were present. In other words, it was a surreptitious taping. I would think it is the kind of report which should not be published, in the interests of preservation of privacy. May I make this point: So far as the government is concerned, the only point on which the government is absolutely adamant is the question of wages. The same deal has been offered to the inside postal workers as has been offered to the letter carriers and accepted by them. Other matters are open for negotiation and we stand ready to resume negotiations at any time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand the Acting Prime Minister's position, that he is not personally aware of the tape, but is only aware of it through reports. Can he undertake to the House to investigate the existence of that tape. If he can, will he listen to it? Will he undertake to table that tape in the House, so that members of parliament can listen to it and understand the purport of the recorded conversations?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I would not undertake that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: If the negotiator had authorized the taping and it were part of the official record, I should certainly consider the request. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should make such a suggestion.

AGRICULTURE

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF AID TO COW-CALF OPERATORS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. Last Friday, speaking to the Fort St. John and district chamber of commerce in British Columbia, the minister went to great lengths in praising the provisions of the agricultural stabilization legislation. He was so bold as to suggest, and I quote, that:

> Farmers will not be left out in the cold when rapidly rising costs push the cost of production past returns.

I am sure the minister realizes that the cow-calf producers of this country are not only left out in the cold but are being practically frozen out of existence. Can the minister tell the House and the cow-calf operators of Canada when a program will be implemented and announced in this House for the aid of this important industry which, at present, is severely distressed? I ask this as many cow-calf operators are presently selling their animals for distress prices. The fall rush will soon be on us. I ask the minister to acknowledge the admonition of his own department, which indicates that there will be a cattle shortage in the near future, a shortage which may have the effect of raising consumer prices.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that I met representatives of the cow-calf producers in the Peace River area, both from Alberta and from British Columbia. They attended the breakfast meeting in Fort St. John. They expressed deep concern. They told me they had better forage, better supplies and better grain crops than they had ever had in that area. The crops are all harvested but the producers are deeply concerned. They have made submissions and will make further submissions to provincial ministers. Some of them will be presented this week in Ottawa.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister, once again, has evaded my question. I was not asking for a detailed explanation as to what he was doing. Nor did I ask him for a bunch of rhetorical fluff. I ask him, as the producers of Canada ask him, either to put up or shut up.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should know that the producers of Canada, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the Saskatchewan stock producers are asking that practically nothing be done and that some provinces have programs of their own. So, I am listening to what the producers of Canada are saying.

PRIVILEGE

MR. O'CONNELL—PRESS PUBLICATION OF CONFIDENTIAL DRAFT REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION POLICY

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 20, and Tuesday, October 21, the newspapers Le Devoir and the Globe and Mail, respectively, published, without authorization, excerpts from the confidential draft of a report of the Special Joint Committee of Parliament on Immigration Policy. This preliminary draft, and each and every page of it, is clearly stamped "Confidential until presented in the House" and is the result of proceedings conducted with closed doors. The unauthorized publication of documents such as this, prepared in this manner, is expressly prohibited by the rules of this House and constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House, in support of which I cite Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, chapter IX, section (5) of citation 320, page 250. I quote section (5):

> No act done at any committee should be divulged before the same be reported to the House. Upon this principle the Commons, on April 21, 1837, resolved "That the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and the documents presented to such committee and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee or by any other person." Where the public is admitted this rule is usually not enforced. The publication of proceedings of committees conducted with closed doors or of reports of committees before they are available to members will, however, constitute a breach of privilege.

A special committee of parliament has been mandated to consider and report upon this sensitive and complex area of public policy. The unauthorized publication of this preliminary and confidential draft, which does not reflect the final conclusions of the committee and in fact has not yet been discussed as such by the committee, reduces the ability of this special committee of parliament to deal effectively with its mandate and can only be misleading to the public.

The circumstances of the unauthorized publications seem to be within the four corners of the breach of privilege as described in the citation I have given Your Honour. It is for this reason that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin):

> That the unauthorized publication of the confidential draft of a report of the Special Joint Committee of Parliament on Immigration Policy be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in support of the motion moved by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), one of the chairmen of the special joint committee. The publication of this report as the view of the committee was false and misleading. As the hon. member made clear, there are many points which we have not discussed. There are many points which we have discussed and not yet agreed on. I and other members of the committee disagree with some of the points mentioned in the report.

I am in the process of trying to persuade my colleagues, and I have some hope of doing so, to change some of the items in this particular report. In any event, the whole context of the committee system can be broken down if confidential documents are leaked and then printed in the press. It was clearly marked, as the hon. member said, as confidential until released in this House. The publication of this report means that hearings in camera and documents held in confidence by any committee of this House are no longer subject to any security whatever.

It is sometimes said that a charge has to be made. I consider that within the terms of this motion a charge is made because the citation from Beauchesne's clearly states that disclosure "ought not to be published by any member of such committee or by any other person." However, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and at least two leading newspapers published in detail, and to some extent even inaccurately, some of the details of the report.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the motion of privilege that the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) has placed before this House, I would like to state that the members of the committee from this side of the House support the position he has taken on behalf of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I believe members of the committee from all sides of the House have appreciated the manner in which the co-chairmen have conducted the affairs of the committee. They have been eminently fair in their approach to all members and to discussions in a very sensitive area of public policy.

The fact that the report had obviously been leaked through the media has been discussed by members. I think all of us feel that the work we have done up to this point must be kept in clear perspective and that we are not deterred from our purpose, namely, to present to parliament what we believe are findings in the best interests of Canada's future.

It is our hope that despite the fact the report has been leaked and published in the media, the committee's work will not be compromised but, rather, when the report is tabled in this House—which was the mandate given us by the House—it will be considered at that time having in mind the importance which I believe it has.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the question of privilege. I am not a member of the joint committee, but I ask: Is it within the purview of the House of Commons Privileges and Elections Committee to deal with this kind of question of privilege without someone being named? This raises a very interesting question. We may find it was a member of the other place who was guilty of leaking this report. I therefore raise the point as to whether it is within our competence to deal with this matter through the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections without someone being named, when it may affect other than members of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I support the motion of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) who is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration Policy. I think he is right in part, Mr. Speaker, but there is one thing I wonder about: As 400, 500 or perhaps 600 copies were distributed almost everywhere, namely to hon. members, in secretarial offices and so on, I think, Mr. Speaker, that this inquiry is almost useless. Also the fact that the report is only one side of a final report which must be introduced later takes off much of the importance of this motion. In particular, I would not like to see a witch hunt here to determine whether such or such thing was produced in relation to a draft report. It is not at all a report but draft report. I would like it to be considered only as such.

[Mr. Brewin.]

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the merits of the question which has been raised. The point directed to your attention by one of the co-chairmen of the special joint committee was well made. I understand, though, that the other co-chairman, who is a member of the other place, will be submitting an identical question of privilege in the Senate in order to deflate the argument—and I say it was a good argument—put forward by the hon. member for Timiscamingue (Mr. Peters). So we should all be apprized of the seriousness of this matter; it is being raised not only in this House but it is being raised in the other place with a view to ascertaining what type of direction shall be given in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, as an ad hoc member of the immigration committee, I would like first to set things in their context and say that the committee and the secretaries of the committee have distributed only about forty copies of the report and that it is very easy to trace back those copies. It was not a matter of 400 or 500 copies: it was a working paper and only members of the committee and those of the immediate staff had access to it. So I think there is indeed a matter of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to make one brief comment. I believe it is the view of members in all quarters of the House that the principle of the freedom of the press, and the right of the press to publish information which is received, must be protected. The function of the press in any democratic country is to seek out and publish news. When this sort of thing happens, as illustrated by one of the joint chairmen in his motion, it would seem to me that the fault does not lie with the press but, rather, with whoever connected with the committee leaked this information to the press.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: It seems to me that the press has no alternative to publishing information it receives, when that information is believed to be accurate and legitimate. Therefore, I do not believe this motion can be deemed as one chastising the press; rather, it is one calling for an investigation of how this happened in the committee itself.

Mr. Speaker: As there does not appear to be any other member wishing to continue this discussion, let me say at the outset that there can be no question about its seriousness. There was some difficulty put forward based on the fact that this is a joint committee, and some comment on the fact that a similar motion or a similar application is expected to be made later this day in the other place. It might be interesting to speculate on what would happen if different results ensue in both places. Let me say at the outset that I propose to reserve my ruling and examine the arguments and reconsider the precedents.

The question is not without difficulty. In the first place, there is precedent that the leak of confidential documents or their publication does in fact constitute a question of privilege. But does that mean a question of privilege in the abstract, or a question of privilege involving a specific member of the House of Commons who may be accused of having given out information which is confidential? The Chair will need to examine the precedents in detail, not simply the citations, to see what were the facts of those previous cases.

There is also a long-standing practice that it is unusual, perhaps even without precedent, for one committee of the House of Commons to examine the operations or the transgressions, as it were, of another committee. That question is particularly complicated when a joint committee of the two Houses is involved. This touches the point which was raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). If we are to embrace the principle that an investigation can be carried out, as a result of this question of privilege, to find out whether in fact a question of privilege exists, then we shall have extended considerably the premises of a question of privilege.

It is suggested that the fact of the publication of a confidential draft report becomes in itself a prima facie question of privilege, the details to be filled in when it gets to the committee. On the face of it, that seems to me to be an extension of the question of privilege as we have known it, and if there is not a specific allegation of a transgression by someone it is most difficult to rule that there is a prima facie question of privilege. On the other hand, there is an obvious disposition in the House that some investigation of this matter should take place.

It may be that it does not qualify as a question of privilege as we know it, and certainly there is no desire to extend the definition of a question of privilege. It may be that a substantive motion to investigate this matter would be acceptable and might receive the unanimous support of members of the House without its being treated as a question of privilege. In any case, in a day or two the answers to some of these questions may be a little clearer than they are at the present time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed, from Monday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Last night, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that the bill before us is a unique piece of legislation. It contains very little detail, though its implications are far reaching. All the operative portions of the measure will be carried out by regulations through a board which is yet to be established. The result will be a number of actions which have not been carried out before except under extraordinary legislation such as the War Measures Act or the wartime prices and trade legislation implemented under the provisions covering peace, order and good government.

As to the constitutional aspects of the measure, we know that a meeting was called between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers of the provinces, though I doubt any attempt was made at that time to go into any detail. Indeed, it is not likely that any details were available; there were obviously none when the bill was drafted. We shall all have to await the regulations. The bill allows for the investigation of individual tax returns of corporations and individuals, something which is altogether abnormal in our society. It also provides for a number of exemptions, though the particulars are not spelled out in the bill.

Today we are faced with a postal strike, partly as a result of this legislation although it is not yet in effect.

Postal workers are concerned whether or not the result of negotiations between themselves and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) will be effective. Both are negotiating, as far as wages are concerned, on the basis that they will be exempt from the terms of this legislation. Of course, this indicates that there will be a large number of exemptions, and exemption may be the rule rather than the regulations being the rule.

This raises a fundamental problem for the minister and the country. I think it is safe to say that most Canadians have been of the opinion for a number of months, in fact for several years, that the federal government should take some action to eliminate many of the perils ordinary Canadians fare due to inflation. All Canadians agree something must be done about inflation. But if anything is to be done on a national basis, the various segments that will be affected must be dealt with equally.

It is very easy for the minister to legislate against labour. Most people feel that big labour is in the same position as big corporations; they can make decisions which are not necessarily in the national interest and in some cases are not even in the interests of their own industry. However, when the ordinary people of this country are asked to restrain voluntarily their desire for a wage increase, for an increase in fees for services or their salaries, they should be assured that this restraint is applied equally across the board.

During the last war some people were of the opinion that if you had enough money, you did not have to go to war; you could get out of being conscripted or of having to volunteer your services. If you were well enough off, you could buy your way out. Great objection was taken to this. I will not mention some of the famous people involved, but I am sure there is still resentment among those who served because everybody was not treated in exactly the same way.

There will be inequality under this legislation, and in the main it will be two classes of people who will suffer. The first is those who have entered into negotiations, which might have gone on for a considerable period of time, and who are not able to convince the Anti-Inflation Board that they should be exempt and allowed to get the full benefit of any wage increase for which they are bargaining. The other class of people is those who are not able to bargain effectively for an increase in their wage structure—the unorganized.

Less than 25 per cent of the labour force in Canada is organized or in a position to bargain in some manner. The other 75 per cent is not in a position to bargain. Will they be assured the minimum $600 or maximum $2,400 increase? In no way will they. There is no equality or fairness in that case. Those at the low end of the income scale are likely to stay there; those at the top end, such as members of parliament and others, will get the full $2,400. I hope they will not get any more, but they will get the $2,400. Old age pensioners, those on assistance, war veterans, those who receive the minimum wage, have no way of bargaining for their minimum $600 increase, and I can see no way that the minister will give these people their equal right to the minimum $600 for which other people can negotiate.

In days to come when people find there are no controls over commodities they have to buy and when they know that the large food chains will be able to justify every quarter the income from their total operations, the seven or eight commodities which are the necessities of life for the people of this country who are living at the old age pension level, on assistance or who receive the minimum wage in the provinces, are going to increase in price.

Without equality, it seems to me that this legislation is going to fail. It is going to fail because it will not have the support of those who know that their incomes are being controlled because it is easy to control them—mainly wage earners who negotiate their own wages. The corporations will remain uncontrolled because they will be able to publish their profits and distribute them in such a way that they appear to be limited. The small, independent people of the nation will find themselves the victims of increased prices. The indication is that the price of basic commodities will rise from 9 per cent to 12 per cent in the coming year, and these people will find no corresponding increase in their incomes to enable them to buy these commodities.

This is not good legislation. It is not the sort of legislation that we should ask the ordinary Canadian to put up with. No action has been taken to control the financial institutions, and are they not partly responsible for the trouble we are in? Is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) not surprised to find, when he deposits $10 in the bank, that the bank can lend that money and get 10 per cent interest on it? The bank can make almost as much money by way of interest as the amount that is deposited in their bank.

Is it not time that we examined some of the segments of the economy that we can do something about? One is housing. We can do a lot about housing if only we are smart enough to control the banks to the extent that they have to make available mortgage money at 6 per cent. At the moment they are making a killing. I suggest that nobody buy the stocks of mining or oil companies any more; let them buy the stock of a bank where they will make more money. I suggest there must be something wrong with a system that means a person has paid $125,000 for a $35,000 house when the mortgage is paid off. This one aspect the minister has not looked at at all.

Another facet that has not been referred to to any extent is the indication given by all financial institutions that these restrictions will mean that unemployment in Canada will increase. Companies in a given industry will be unable to compete with their competitors because they will be unable to get an exemption. As a result, it seems to me we will have more unemployment. This, in turn, will mean that agencies responsible for providing at least some sustenance for those unable to work over a long period of time will require additional funds, which will add to the burden of the municipalities, the provincial governments and should add to the burden of the federal government.

When I asked the other day if the minister had any intention with respect to programs he was going to institute to compensate the unemployed in the country because of the effects of this legislation, he said the government had not considered this matter. He said there were no public works or enterprises to be undertaken that would provide basic sustenance other than that obtained through the normal channels of welfare, unemployment insurance and the other schemes we have devised to help those who are unable to look after themselves.

I predict that in six or eight months it will be obvious to all Canadians that we are not accomplishing what we want to accomplish by this anti-inflation measure. Canadians want to see the beginning of a decrease in the cost of living so that organized labour does not have to chase after increases to cover the increasing cost of living. Canadians want to see a beginning, through normal restraint, in our attempt to live within our means. This legislation is not going to accomplish that because it is not going to control the prices the housewife will be looking at when she goes to the grocery store.

This legislation will not accomplish what we desire, because it will not help workers and people on low or fixed incomes to pay the increases in rent, the cost of cars or the many other increasing expenditures necessary in our day-to-day existence. Unless we can assure the workers, those on fixed incomes and those unable to look after themselves that there is to be a decrease in the cost of living, any talk about anti-inflationary legislation will only be talk and will not accomplish anything and, therefore, will not deserve the support of the people of this nation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Rocky Mountain.

An hon. Member: The rocky member for Hamilton!

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am not running for the leadership.

An hon. Member: With your record, you shouldn't.

Mr. MacFarlane: I think the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) has a good maritime background, so I think that he and I would have some things in common, and we both have great respect for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). That actually gives me a good lead into my remarks, in that I want to say that I, for one, have said in all sincerity, even during a recent election campaign, that I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. member for Halifax even though I may disagree with his timing and some of the substance of his suggestions. We have reached the stage now when I do not find it difficult to accept fully the premise put forward by this government. In saying that, I know I will have to answer to my constituents who heard me talk about prices and wages in a derogatory way at the time, and I have no embarrassment at all about this.

An hon. Member: Yes, but I do.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is your problem; it is certainly not mine. It is important to remember that some adjustments always have to be made, and if we truly look at this proposal for what it is—

Mr. Stanfield: When the wind shifts, you have to shift your sails.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. MacFarlane: Yes, sometimes we do. At this time we have to remember that when we are talking about a war—and some people have referred to this as a war—you do not always win the war just because you have won certain individual battles. I think that is the situation we are facing. We now have to look at the long-haul situation. We have, again, to make the efforts we made in the past. We must really consider the situation that existed in the past.

When we are considering our youth at this time, we must realize that those of us who served in the Second World War, and our fathers before us who served in the First World War, did indeed believe we were serving for reasons that were ultimately important to all of Canada. Those of us here who did not serve during a wartime period did not have that particular challenge, but whether they like it or not, we all served in that regard and now hope that today's youth will not be called upon to meet a similar challenge.

The challenge before us today, if properly put to our young people, may well be a challenge to which they will respond. It is likely that we will have to call upon the "one dollar a year men". If we were justified in calling upon people to come out of business activity and work for a dollar a year ferrying aircraft overseas during the last war, then surely we should be able to call on senior business personnel to work for a dollar a year during this war on avarice. Why can't we call on our leaders in very senior positions to serve in capacities in which they would not be a drain on the government but could help us in this war on avarice?

We should have no doubt about the situation, because this is a war on avarice. We should not say that the situation we are faced with today is the fault of one government, the fault of a series of governments, the fault of a group of workers, or the fault of a group of people who are trying to take too much out of the economy. This is a war on avarice. Let me give hon members the example of an advertisement that appeared in a newspaper yesterday. Can you imagine someone advertising that they will cash post-dated old age pension cheques for a charge of 10 per cent? Imagine someone at this point in time wanting to make 10 per cent from an old age pension cheque because the cheques were mailed out early in the event of a postal strike! This would seem to indicate that there is a tremendous problem facing the country at this time.

We all have to get into the fray. We all have to be ready to stand strong in this economic fight. There is just no doubt in my mind about whether we can get the proper response from the youth of the country as well as from the aged. Many of these pensioners are the poeple we could call upon to assist us. There are many of us here who would be willing to perform extra tasks without looking for extra benefits and still withstand the criticism we are receiving for taking the raise which was voted in this House. We do not feel that the situation at this time makes us any better or any worse than anyone else. We feel that the public of Canada is ready to respond to the clear clarion call to come forward to fight in the battle in this war on avarice.

We suggest that this measure should be in existence for a long-term period in order to avoid some of the pitfalls that have occurred in other countries and on other continents. It does seem that when a definite and short period of time is set out, there is a feeling among the people that they will put up with things, but as soon as the time expires they will increase prices again in order to recover the money they did not obtain.

It seems that the proposed period of time should be considered in the same way as the last war, when people thought it might last for only three or four years but once they realized it was going to be longer they made an all-out effort in the direction of winning. They then made an all-out effort against what they considered the common enemy. Let me use that small island's symbol again: I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is saving his blood, sweat and tears speech to convince the people, if it becomes necessary, that we have to fight the battle over the long haul to the end.

I think we underestimate the Canadian public if we do not ask the people to put forward their best effort at this time. I think we underestimate ourselves if we think we are not ready to stand and take the barbs, the kicks, the hits and the jabs, whether they come from the media or from the public. I think the media is about ready for a lesson. I suspect that soon they will be hearing the public say that we want to hear something positive about this war and something positive about our future, and we are not going to accept anything less. I believe there are members in this House from all parties who are prepared to go ahead in that fashion. I have no doubt that all parties will be represented in this before it is over. I welcome the fact that in the heat of conflict the spark of truth is blown. I welcome the criticisms which come in this direction, whether they come from the NDP, the Conservatives, the Social Crediters or from within the Liberal ranks. I believe it is important to have this criticism.

I think the bill of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) will come forward as a bill which we will stand for and support. We will not only go forward as a government, but will go forward as a parliament which took this decision at this time.

An hon. Member: A backward one.

Mr. MacFarlane: No. Some people may go backward, but I prefer to go forward because I like to see where I am going. I might fall over, otherwise. I am not really interested in rhetoric now. I am trying to say honestly how I and the people in my riding feel. It is not easy to speak for a riding one end of which possibly resembles an area like Westmount in Montreal and another area that is sort of like an Outremont or another area which is possibly like Verdun on the Island of Montreal, or Point St. Charles. We have a mix of people which includes union people, people who run their own businesses and people who have academic and professional careers. It is difficult for all of them to see things the same way, but hon. members may rest assured that they are united behind the kind of leadership they will receive.

It is a matter of whether we are willing to go forward at this point. We cannot always go the way we want. I do not say there is one correct answer, nor do I say there could be one answer. However, there is an answer for the Canadian public. The answer is that every time the government proposes, instead of parliament disposing we just have a game of chess. We have no time for a game of chess now. There is no point in checkmating or in deciding to move our rook in one direction, just for a little game, to delay bills. This is a time when we have no desire in a crude way to shove anything down the throat of the opposition.

We say that many people have asked for leadership. Whether hon. members opposite think we on this side of the House are the leaders, or whether our government is the leader, really is unimportant. This is where the responsibility rests, and that is why the bill is coming forward from here. In coming forward, it gives all of us the opportunity to have something to say about how we should proceed in these dreadful days. These are the best and the worst times. We should remember that. We should not for one instant fall weak to the very thing that has caused it. The fact is, we are living quite well; things are going well for some of us. We must think of those people at the lower end of the scale and those people who have no real power to express themselves.

This is where I find, in my riding, I can turn to the labour unions and to the workers with great confidence. I receive phone calls from them every day, in which they express concern and a spirit of willingness to co-operate because they, more than others, recognize that in their unions they work together and have the power to achieve for themselves. Yet they realize there are other people who cannot achieve for themselves. Those people are at the mercy of what is happening to those of us who are more fortunate.

I really believe we can expect from every decent Canadian the kind of support that will make this control system work. It is not supposed to be easy. It never was easy to take a bitter pill or bad medicine. In fact, when one takes an aspirin it does not get rid of the disease or the germ, but sometimes the aspirin lets one get on a little further with life and do something important. Then sometimes one can treat the germ.

So we must remember at this moment that this is the bad, tough medicine that has been offered to the country by this government, without fear, with responsibility and with willingness to face the full consequences of that responsibility. We are asking only one thing. We are not asking for complete agreement on the part of people on the other side. We are not asking the media to roll over and play dead. But we sure as hell are asking that they treat it as seriously as we do, and that they come forward and say we are in serious times. In these serious times we should be thinking seriously about the matter, and not playing chess or moving back and forth to see who can gain a moment of political opportunity. These are important things. There are very few new things in the world that I have seen.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the hon. member would honour a question.

Mr. MacFarlane: No, I would not honour a question at this moment. With due respect—although I am sorry—I think I would rather conclude what I have to say.

An hon. Member: You like making speeches.

Mr. MacFarlane: I think I should answer that comment. I tell you, without any embarrassment whatsoever, that my voice sounded very good when I said wage and price controls would not work. I had no embarrassment in saying that. The timing was wrong. The short period was wrong and the freeze was wrong so far as I was concerned. Like many others I have no great priority on what is absolutely right. If hon. members have listened they will know that I said pretty strongly what I did say. I referred to this problem as a war. I believe that if we do not get that through to the Canadian public we will not achieve what we want to achieve.

I think you will remember there was a man called Chamberlain who was criticized roundly for what he did, but he did give a reprieve while people prepared for the onslaught. We might very well have had a reprieve in this case. That may have been the wrong time, and this may be exactly the right time. The historians who write about this will not be in this House; we will all be gone then. But the people may read it.

An hon. Member: You say it with a smile.

Mr. MacFarlane: I did not intend to smile much in this speech. I want to conclude by saying we would be extremely wrong, on all sides of the House, if we did not recognize that the Canadian public can really be aroused and brought to their feet, working together in a way that would be a war-like attitude in peacetime days. I think we must accept and say over and over again a thousand times that the policy really is to try to make things better for those who are not in the power groups, because if we do in some way improve the situation their lot will be better. This must be said over and over again.

Finally, it must be said that this is indeed a war on avarice. I am very much afraid there are many people who are far better economists than I who want to place it all in the business realm or in the wages realm, but I would say at this time that we had better be prepared for the fact that this is not easy. I do not expect in the next few months to find any cheers. I expect to be going to every shopping centre in my riding. I expect to be going to every legion hall, I expect, particularly, to be visiting union halls. I hope to be visiting those who happen to be Conservatives, members of the NDP and members of the Social Credit party in my area. I will give them special attention because they will have some things they will want to say to me. I expect to do that, but I expect to be doing it six months and one year from now. If three years from now, or at any time, we can stand up and say the battle is 10 per cent won, you will find me cheering the loudest. Remember, it is that serious.

I do not believe any war in which we have been involved has ever been won on any other basis. I do not believe we knew that Vimy Ridge would occur, that Ypres would occur or that the Battle of Britain would occur in the way it did. We had to go into these things with the desire of placing ourselves on the line and placing ourselves before people to take the criticisms, the barbs and make the decisions. I think if people over there are talking about history, they may very well find that out of this so-called war on avarice people will be written up in history, none the least of whom will be the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago when I heard that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), who was then minister of energy, mines and resources, was to be the new minister of finance, the first thought that came to my mind was, "Oh, oh; watch out. Canada will get clobbered." That came to my mind because over the past seven years since I have been in the House the minister has created the impression of being a tough guy with the spiked club for the government. It seems that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) uses him as a clobbering tool or a tool for confrontations.

We can review the history which shows that. In 1969 there were the rule changes when the present Minister of Finance, who was then House leader, clobbered the House of Commons. He took away our right to examine government spending and brought in closure to muzzle the opposition. Then he was appointed the minister of energy, mines and resources and acted in the same style at a crucial period in the life of the country when the spectre of energy shortages first appeared on the horizon. The same minister was used to clobber the provinces over the constitution, and indeed to really clobber the oil industry. Now, in his position as finance minister, he can clobber with this bill everybody who had not been clobbered before. With the power that he is seeking in this bill, he will certainly be able to do it at will.

When the former minister of finance resigned, there was speculation that he did so because he wanted to bring in a prices and incomes policy but could not do it because he could not get cabinet to support the idea. Now it is obvious that the opposite was the case. It is more likely that he was asked by the Prime Minister to step aside because what was needed was a man with a spiked club, not one with a silver tongue, the silver tongue having failed to obtain consensus following his consultations.

Before I speak on Bill C-73 and the principle behind it, let me note some comments that have been made by the Prime Minister and the former minister of finance on income and price controls which were proposed during the course of the past 1½ to two years. During the course of my remarks I would not like to appear to be serving up for the Prime Minister or members on his side a delectable dish of crow, since I did not prescribe this diet for the Prime Minister—he has his own counsellors to thank for that—but by the end of the debate on the measure I suppose someone will see that he eats it. Eating crow, perhaps because of the bitter flavour of the meat, is an excellent remedy for overwhelming pride, or possibly for lack of honesty with the people of Canada.

Let me start with this tidbit trimmed out of a question and answer session starring the Prime Minister, held at the Lindsay Collegiate and Vocational School at Lindsay, Ontario, on May 23 of this year. Someone in the audience, troubled by the way the government seemed to be saying one thing and doing another, very reasonably asked:

Mr. Trudeau, why does your proposed policy regarding wage and price freezing closely resemble that of the Conservatives last year?

It was not recorded out of which side of his mouth the Prime Minister made his reply, but his words have been reported as follows:

Well, the point is that it doesn't resemble it at all. You will recall that they were in favour of compulsory, statutory price and wage controls, they wanted a law which would freeze everything and control everything. We have taken exactly the opposite approach.

That was in May of 1975, only five or six months ago. The Liberals did take the opposite approach at that time, the Prime Minister might have added in his statement, wasting the eleven months since he had bamboozled the Canadian people into electing him one more time. On June 8, 1974, he said "hocus-pocus" when describing the same Conservative prices and incomes policy. In a speech delivered in Oakville, Ontario, he sneered at what he said was a price and wages policy and went on to ask, "Why doesn't Davis control the price of houses?"—little guessing that not much more than one year later he would proclaim his own government's prices and wages policy and not foreseeing that control of the price of housing would not be one of its strong points. "I am told that labour leaders in Canada won't accept price and wage controls", he went on, arguing so persuasively that possibly even he believed it at that time. He also asserted that people in managerial positions could easily be reclassified so that they could obtain increases despite controls.

Speaking in Vancouver on July 3, 1974, less than a week before the election, the Prime Minister laughed at the program of controls advanced by my party. "Food is out," he cried, "imports are out . . . housing is out". These words must have sounded like something black and cawing even at the time, for a woman answered from the audience "And you're out". Unfortunately, he was not turned out; he stayed in. The Prime Minister was ingenuous in finding excuses for sidestepping wage and price controls. Apart from the difficulties already mentioned, he cited the unhappy experience of controls which our country had during the Second World War, controls which, as he said:

—even with the motivation of a national emergency . . . meant thousands of bureaucrats running the economic decisions of millions of Canadian . . . blackmarketeering and the court cases that went with that . . . and illegal strikes and government intervention into even the smallest sectors of the economy.

That little bit of sophistry went winging into the annals of Canadian politics as recently as May 23, 1975. But the Prime Minister's strongest argument against anti-inflation controls—and no doubt the only one he relies on now—was that the inflation experienced in Canada was a "good" sort of inflation, not like that nasty kind that simultaneously affected the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan and dozens of other nations around the world. According to La Presse of June 13, 1974, he believed, and he still professes to believe that in Canada—

Part of the increase is due to the rise in the prices of imported products and another part to the rising food prices following an increase in demand. Inflation is a worldwide problem and the situation in Canada is better than in some other countries, like England or the United States.

[English]

Well, evidently it is not "meilleur" any more, although there is probably not one economist in the country who can say how changes in the international scene have suddenly altered the tune of the times. As the Prime Minister himself said, with that knack he has for uttering the right words in the wrong context, "Let's not get obsessed with inflation". He is not a man easily obsessed, except perhaps with holding on to power. That is probably why, when he found that he would have to bring in mandatory price and wage controls, he decided to cashier that clever talking-bird, formerly known as the minister of finance, whom he had trained to utter phony arguments against just such controls. It was the former minister of finance, it will be remembered, who said:

The problem is worldwide in origin, with the major source of upward pressure between the sharp increase in prices of agricultural and industrial commodities caused by the unprecedented upsurge simultaneously in the economies of all the industrial nations at a time when a number of these commodities were already in short supply.

I am not sure what that means, but that is what the minister of finance said that time as an excuse for the reason prices and incomes controls would not work. However, it is not clear whether it was the Prime Minister who could not stomach the bird, or the bird that could not stomach what he was saying. We are still awaiting an explanation from him as to what has changed in Canada or in the world to transform good inflation to bad inflation. Will the Prime Minister, the former minister of finance or, indeed, the current Minister of Finance, tell us, for it was not possible for me to see why the government did not bring these prices and incomes controls in a year ago, and it is certainly not easy for me to understand why at this particular time the government seems to have changed its mind?

Perhaps I am not being altogether candid in saying that it is not clear to me. I think I do know what has changed. The winds of political circumstance, have changed. Most of the citizens of Canada were opposed to prices and incomes controls, not having been sure of the true picture of the economy on which to base their judgment, so the governing party drifted to election victory on the warm breeze of overconfidence. Now that the government feels the chilly draft of public unease on its neck, it smoothly alters course like tumbleweed on the prairies, unprincipled and shifting with the wind. Indeed, this government could become known as the tumbleweed government. The policies of this government are like a mature dandelion; they could suddenly blow away with the smallest puff of wind.

The economic picture is no different now than it was a year ago. Nothing much has changed except that perhaps things are now a little better. I have some statistics here which were provided by Information Canada, which Information Canada obtained in turn from Statistics Canada, showing that in June of 1974 the unadjusted consumer price index had increased by 1.3. In September of 1975, which is just a month ago, the last month for which we have figures, it rose by 0.2, so that increase was certainly much less than it was a year ago when we suggested these controls. Looking at the current annual rate of change in the seasonally adjusted consumer price index, in June of 1974 it was 14.3. In September of 1975, the last month for which we have figures, it was 10.2, substantially better than 1½ years ago.

I wonder why things are suddenly so much worse, when the figures show that things are somewhat better? Looking at the unadjusted consumer price index figures for all of Canada, the average for 1974 was 11.4; the average for 1975 was 10.6. So, again, it leads one to wonder very seriously how convincing an argument can be made that things are suddenly worse now, in terms of inflation, price increases, and so on, than they were a year and a half ago. Indeed, we can make a much more plausible argument for saying that things are better now, as shown by the statistics which I have just quoted. So basically nothing has changed except for the better. We know it, the people of Canada know it, and the government knows it. Neither inflation nor unemployment is worse than it was 15 months ago. They have simply continued at the same high levels or slightly better, putting the country on a collision course until, as if in some colossal game of "chicken", the government's nerve finally broke. Whatever the reasons, the government is now for controls. Little wonder the people of Canada are asking, which is the real Pierre?

I wonder which of his own statements the Prime Minister believes. He has been strangely silent in this debate. He spoke on television a week ago, on Thanksgiving Day, announcing the program; but in the House he has been totally passive. The question is, why? Could it be that he, himself, does not believe in this program? Perhaps he finds it too repulsive to defend. He may simply be going along with it because, in typical Liberal fashion, he feels that the wind is blowing right for the program at this time, or perhaps he realizes the danger for him and for his job as Prime Minister of bringing in a program which could well lead to the downfall of his government. He must be aware of the fact that he may come out of this as Peter the Great, or Ivan the Terrible. To ensure that he is not the latter, or possibly to save his own hide, he has chosen to remain silent, at least for the time being.

Let us look at some of the ways which the new Minister of Finance has defined this sudden, momentous change. In his white paper entitled "Attack on Inflation" the minister approaches this matter from several angles, all of them oblique. He says:

In a speech he made to this House on October 14 the minister encountered further difficulties, like an aesthete trying to point out some beauty in a painting so subtle that perhaps it does not exist. He said:

—the powerful and deeply entrenched inflationary forces racking our economy now imperil our prospects for the future. We have reached the point where there is a very real danger that if inflation is not halted and reversed, it will grow to even larger proportions—

When inflation reaches a certain point . . . Inflation ultimately inflicts grievous damage . . . We in Canada are already beginning to live some of these experiences . . . The risk has mounted—

It must be admitted that the minister's speech also alluded to some vague deterioration in our economic stance vis-à-vis the other major trading nations of the world. No doubt this sudden knowledge appeared in the first week of October. It is still very difficult to accept the explanations for the sudden change. While we are in the midst of admissions, the minister has made one or two of his own. In both the white paper and his speech he admitted that the real reason he and his government are at last taking action is that the Canadian people have finally pushed them into it. In the white paper he says that the evidence of widespread and deep-seated concern in the country shows that rising inflation and unemployment is unacceptable to all Canadians. We told him that a long time ago, at least two years ago. In his speech he said the following:

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

—I think the vast majority of Canadians are convinced that the time has come when we must all pull back.

In other words, when finally the majority of the Canadian people, with all their limited access to economic information and expertise, can themselves see the intolerable nature of continued double-digit inflation, then the government decides to move—and this is the party which campaigned during the last election on a platform of leadership! It reminds me of a person watching the way in which a group of people is going, and then running in front to lead them in that direction.

This is the wrong time to begin a fight against inflation in Canada. It should have begun over a year ago. The government's proposals for the fight are the wrong proposals. They are weak where they should be strong, harsh where they should be mild, ramified where they should be fundamental, and insufficiently worked out where they should be rigorous and thoroughgoing. For example, with regard to housing, how can any one deduce from the legislation being put forward how the cost of housing will be reduced? How will the construction industry be controlled? We have not seen anything at all suggesting certain monetary policy changes which must accompany this kind of legislation, if indeed in the long term anything useful will come from an attempt to fight inflation.

Right from the start, before this legislation even exists, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has been campaigning to have marketing boards excepted from the anti-inflation program, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) has made it clear that postal workers whose contract is now being negotiated will also have a free hand. It leads one to wonder how much cabinet solidarity there is on this matter when as soon as this program is announced two ministers struggle and fight for exceptions within the areas of their own jurisdiction.

The proposed legislation comes down hard on wages and salaries but offers no machinery to match the labyrinth of possibilities for thwarting the intent of the law through unjustified increases in prices. There are already indications that this is happening, that profits and prices will increase rapidly before the machinery for monitoring them is in place. The anti-inflation board which the government is in the process of establishing will, under the proposed terms of this bill, be far too independent of parliament—except in the opinion of the government which seeks to create it. Moreover, it will be more liberally endowed with power than is necessary for it to accomplish its task.

Monetary and fiscal measures which were part of the anti-inflation plan my party put forward in 1974 have received scant attention. There is evidence to suggest the government assembled this program hastily during a weekend. We know that controls by themselves cannot succeed; that is, they can succeed only to a limited degree. We know that other long-term policies must be introduced if there is to be long-term success. As to the government's self-restraint, how likely is that to happen, considering the attitude of the party in power? There will be virtually no new cutbacks in government spending in the current fiscal year. The civil service is to grow. More than 200 employees are to be added for the proposed anti-inflation review board. The program we proposed comtemplated the employment of the existing civil service; we did not intend to enlarge the civil service in order to achieve our goal.

Government members have said in so many words that if this program does not work we shall soon see complete price and salary controls. If the government carries on as it has been doing, they will not be long in coming. I say that because the program as now envisaged surely cannot succeed.

But what concerns me most of all is that this government has no mandate for this program. Its mandate does not include the imposition of income and price controls. It was elected to do the opposite of that which it is doing. Although in many ways the program the government is proposing is different from the one we proposed, in many ways there are great similarities in principle. Therefore, the government cannot hide behind the excuse that this is a different program. No wonder citizens of this country frequently express cynical attitudes about the morality and honesty of politicians. In any event, the government's program is unclear and fuzzy and is doomed to failure, I suggest, as it will not accomplish its aims for the economy.

Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? Our economic problems do not merely involve inflation; they also involve massive unemployment. Also, as the program is selective it appears to be unfair to labour. If such a program is to succeed, it must not only be fair but it must appear to be fair. Only then will all in this country support it. At best, this is a stopgap measure. We shall need to introduce other measures to complement the program, as it alone will not bring about the long-term solutions we need.

Let us examine the long-term implications of this program. In the short-term, the proposed solution may be compared to people fighting for the best chair on the deck of the Titanic. One could compare the prospects of the Titanic to the prospects of our economy. Inflation is fed by growing expectations; greed, if you like. That word may be more easily understood. These expectations are in no small part the result of this government's past policies, policies which were designed to buy votes and which involved during the past seven years huge government extravagance. The total federal budget in 1968, when I was first elected, was just under $11 billion. Seven years later the budget has tripled, the reason being grossly extravagant government policies designed to buy votes. Some of these policies are hand-outs. I am thinking of the Local Initiatives program which is a good example: It creates dependence on government and the feeling among Canadians that you should look to the government for the solution to all your problems. It makes people tend to look too much to the government for programs which directly create employment.

The LIP program was a stopgap measure. The intention was to complement it with long-term programs, which would make LIP unnecessary, but we have seen no such long-term programs introduced. Instead, we have seen repeatedly stopgap measures introduced. One could refer, as well, to widespread abuses of welfare in this country. I do not say everybody abuses the system, yet many Canadians agree that there is widespread abuse of our welfare system and widespread abuse of unemployment insurance. The latter program is not really an insurance program at all, but another sort of welfare program. We know from as far back as the days of Robin Hood that you cannot eliminate poverty and solve economic difficulties simply by taking from the rich and giving to the poor. We need much more fundamental changes in government policy before we can reach the target of full employment and the elimination of poverty in our country. Clearly, the programs of this government have fed the growing expectations of Canadians. Government policies have created too many takers and too few doers and givers, meaning taxpayers.

Government policies have encouraged too much dependence on government. Growing expectations are due in no small part to the government's own attitude. The Prime Minister and other government members have run around the country scoffing at the idea of work, scoffing at the work ethic and scoffing at the idea that people must have the initiative to look after themselves and their own. The government has created the idea that every citizen has the right to something for nothing. We must change that. Deep in our hearts we know that what is happening cannot go on forever. If it goes on much longer we know that our civilization will eventually go the way of the Roman empire and other empires which did not pay heed to their economic affairs.

We ought to realize that we cannot solve our economic difficulties by depending on the government to do it. They will be solved only by the sweat of our brow; by contributing to our country and society at least as much as, or more than, we take from it; by increasing our productivity individually and as a nation; by increasing our self-reliance and reducing our dependence on the government to do everything for us; by increasing our individual independence and initiative. Unless we do this we are lost, as there is no way that price and income controls alone will solve the economic problems facing this country.

No stopgap measure designed to put the lid on the economy will lead to economic well-being. No such policy will make us go in the right direction. If we are to solve our economic difficulties and beat inflation, we must ask every citizen to do what is necessary. Our people must reduce their expectations. We need a government which will not increase expectations by the introduction of programs designed to buy votes, as such programs lead only downhill and we do not want to go downhill.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon and to give my wholehearted support to the program which has been put forward by my colleague, the very dedicated and able new Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) appointed a month ago.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the government's decision in this matter was not an easy one. I heard the hon. member who has just resumed his seat blame us for having fought the last election on the issue of the inadvisability of imposing controls within the economy, of freezing wages and prices.

We did make that point indeed and do not deny it, since we had found that in 1973, 1972 and early in 1974, before the opposition signed its death warrant by forcing an election, the two preceding years had been extremely buoyant with regard to corporation profits, while most Canadian workers who are governed by collective bargaining had been outdistanced by the runaway inflation which was then prevailing. At that time, we had deliberately turned down the suggestion of freezing wages and prices, especially wages, because those workers who had been instrumental in increasing production in this country and who had to hear the brunt of an uncontrolled inflation, had not had the opportunity to catch up with it by 1974, which was election year.

That is why even at that time, in 1974, on several occasions when I was in the House, the Opposition asked us whether we were considering that problem. I remember quite well that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), who was then Minister of Finance, said:

We are considering that possibility, we are drawing up plans which could be carried out if necessary at a given time.

At no time did we say in 1974 that this solution would never be chosen. We always maintained that such a program would have been disastrous for labour in 1974. That is why we did not act then, because we were aware that a great number of people would be unable to catch up. Thus, in the legislation introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) we paid attention to a very important date in the history of inflation in our country: we said that all collective agreements would be covered by the new policy, but that in cases where labour contracts were negotiated before 1974 the guidelines of the finance minister's policy would apply but since those contracts were prior to 1974, the anti-inflation board would be authorized to allow special considerations.

And it is in accordance with that principle about contracts not reopened since 1973 that in the present negotiations with the Post Office workers, which unfortunately failed today, that the Treasury Board had knowingly authorized the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) to offer the employees, commonly designated as the postmen, the equivalent of what they might have obtained in June. It is a question of basic justice, because over the past 2 years, they had no opportunity to catch up with inflation.

Of course, there are people who blame us for having introduced some flexibility, though controled, with the board chaired by hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, because we want to establish as much social justice between our various social groups as it is possible. Unfortunately, we shall be at fault. And I must commend the Leader of the Opposition for stating a few days ago in similar circumstances that all situations cannot be covered, that there will always be what he called "rough justice", an expression which I cannot translate in French. And I feel that in circumstances such as these, some people will certainly be a little more favoured than others. But, in my opinion, for society as a whole, the Minister of Finance's program shows enough flexibility to allow us to say that there will really not be any glaring injustice.

But what I now deplore, Mr. Speaker, is that public opinion is giving far too much importance to the salary item only. I was glad to hear today the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) asking what effect the guidelines set up by the Minister of Finance would have on profits. I think that this aspect has been completely overlooked and perhaps voluntarily by many—I do not mean members of the House—particularly by the press in general, because they have emphasized a little more the salary aspect.

The other facet of the program is that we are not freezing salaries only. We have also decided to freeze the profits by our guidelines which, in my opinion, are extremely hard on businesses. It is prescribed in the Minister of Finance's guidelines that businesses would not be authorized to raise their prices unless they could prove that the increase is due to higher costs, and this without including any provision for profits. Profits will not be allowed to exceed 95 per cent of the average profits in the last four or five years. That, Mr. Speaker, in view of the current situation, constitute an extremely important element of the program, and too many people would have us believe that it applies only to the workers while in fact we want businesses as well to be governed by the guidelines of the minister.

As President of the Treasury Board, I should like to point out an important element of the program. Some people would have liked it to apply to everyone, but I believed that because of present circumstances it would be wiser to aim at the leaders in our economy, the powerful groups, that is big business or big unions, which exerted considerable influence on the economic growth of our society. We therefore decided to aim at all businesses with more than 500 employees. We are convinced that by dealing with those people, in whom we see the leaders, the market forces are going to intervene so that the smaller firms follow the guidelines; if they fail to do so, they will be put outside the normal competition process in a market economy.

If we want this exercise to be a success, I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is extremely important at this time to explain this aspect of the program to the people to assure them, and I quote the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), that there will be rough justice for all Canadians, but a justice which applies to all groups of society.

[English]

As I have said, it is not very easy for the government to put this program into place. I have been involved in collective bargaining on behalf of the government for 14 or 15 months. I could see the pressure on the economy. The policies of this government have been that we wanted, in our collective negotiations, not to become the leader in society but to give comparable compensation to our civil servants. I think that is only fair.

Of course, in the past year I have been confronted with five strikes because I stuck to the policy of the government. I was not too happy about that; nobody is very happy when he has to take a strike, especially in circumstances like ours, because it would have been easy for us to solve all our problems. The people should know that only 1.4 per cent of the budget of the federal government goes to provide for the salaries of our civil servants. So even if we had acted, during the last year, a bit irresponsibly and had given the civil servants a bit more than we had allocated for, it would have been only 1.4 per cent more in our budget and it would not have been a disaster for us. But it would have meant passing the problem to the other sector of the economy.

Because of this position of responsibility by the federal government, we have taken five strikes. We are entering a sixth one today, because we do not want to become the leaders in the society. I think the offer made to the postal workers is a very fair one, comparable to that accepted by the groups which signed a contract in the spring while the guidelines were not in force. Of course, it was normal for us to make that offer. It was not, as the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) said, because ministers are fighting about it. It is written in the guidelines. Their contract had expired before 1974. This applies to any other contract in the same position across the land. So it was not due to internal fights. We are not Tories; we are Liberals. We stick together when times are difficult. It is not a question of one trying to protect the other. It is written in the white paper which we have tabled in the House.

In my view, contrary to what the hon. member for Athabasca was saying, the situation is deteriorating every day. I hope it will stop. With this psychology of inflation, everyone went ahead in trying to get what was being given to other employees, and so on, and the employees were making all sorts of excessive demands and trying to forecast far enough ahead that they would be completely protected against inflation. In the last year we have tried very seriously to bring about a program in consultation with all the elements in society, but unfortunately—

Mr. Stanfield: That has destroyed your credibility altogether.

Mr. Chrétien: We will see in three years time, sir, what it is all about, and I am confident that we have not. As I am explaining, this policy is a different one. We never close the door. Perhaps some got the impression it was completely closed, but when members opposite were asking questions before 1974—I refer particularly to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies)—the minister of finance of the day told him many times we were working on contingency plans to deal with the situation. I think it will be recalled it was always a possible option for the government but, as I explained earlier, the timing was off in 1974.

I would say that what happened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was not that he was completely wrong. When he came forward with his policy the first time his timing was better, but by the time we were into the election his timing was completely off, because it was a time when we had to give labour a chance to catch up because the corporations had made very great profits in the previous year. It was pure bad luck for him. I respect his intelligence. He stuck with his policy, but it came off badly because of the timing. I think that now the timing is good. It is why we are here today and it is why we are getting the support of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad do hear the hon. member for Athabasca agreeing with me as usual.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am not agreeing with you.

Mr. Chrétien: I am just referring to the hon. member because he is here and we dealt together when I was minister of Indian affairs and northern development. I listened to his speech. For example, I was amazed when he said we should look at local initiatives; it was an awful program and we should not touch it. But members over there should try to reach a little bit of understanding among themselves this afternoon.

The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) rose in his place and asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) a question. He said, "The President of the Treasury Board doesn't want to give more money to the Local Initiatives Program. Will you put a little pressure on him to put more money into the Local Initiatives Program?" He asked that question during the question period, and a short while later the hon. member for Athabasca rises and says the program is no good.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I think the Leader of the Opposition should get his members together so that his party might present some kind of consistency in policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Chrétien: I am asking hon. gentlemen opposite to make up their minds, that is all. We have made up our minds. We decided in the budget of last June that we would put more money into the Local Initiatives Program this year. But we cannot put in enough money to satisfy all the demand; that is the problem. It is not that the program is not good; it is that the demands are too great. But that is past, now. I was just making the point in passing. It was not my intention to offend anybody; I am too nice for that, as everyone knows. Perhaps I should revert to my role as President of Treasury Board for a few minutes.

There are some critics who say we have not accompanied this policy with a program of restraint. I do think hon. members need be reminded that on June 21, 1975, I explained to the House that very substantial cuts had been made in our spending program. The cuts were to affect every department of government. I was supported at that time by the then minister of finance. I reported to the House that the total expenditures which would not be proceeded with this year because of the necessity to restrain the actual programs which had been approved by the government, amounting to $967 million in one year. For people to say that there was no cut at all is, I think, a shame. But I cannot take this kind of action twice in the same year.

Mr. Stanfield: How big is the deficit going to be?

Mr. Chrétien: It is going to be big. I do not know exactly, but it is going to be in the billions of dollars. Everyone speaks about the amount of money the government is spending. Perhaps the hon. member would like me to table these three sheets. I do not want to go through them, but I have details of all the factors. The statutory payments of the government account for $17.8 billion; 56.4 per cent of the expenditures of the government are controlled by the laws of this parliament. There is no possibility that I can touch them, because all parties have voted for them. Very seldom have measures like OIS and GIS been voted against by hon. members. How many hon. members have voted against fiscal transfers to the provinces? How many have voted, for example, against family allowances, which cost $2 billion?

How many hon. members voted against hospital care? How many would like us to cut those services? How many would like to put an end to the unemployment insurance scheme which today is costing the government a lot of money? I could go on and recite a long list, but I will not go into details. However, the majority of the government's budget is controlled by these kinds of programs.

Let me take, as another example, national defence. This year we are spending $2.7 billion. The number of requests received by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) from all parts of Canada today to increase this budget is unbelievable. I think there are good arguments for doing this, but in the present context it is difficult to do so. Then there are payments which are very important to the economy today and which we did not have to make a few years ago. There is the scheme to compensate people east of the Ottawa Valley for the increase in the price of imported oil.

Mr. Stanfield: You get a little tax from the exports, don't you, Jean?

Mr. Chrétien: I am dealing with expenditures. When hon. members refer to the expenditures of the government, they do not mention the tax revenue we receive from the Americans. This is why I am explaining the situation. When hon. members appear to be frustrated and shattered by the expenditures of the government, these aspects deserve mention.

The point I am trying to make is this. I should like hon. members to make suggestions. We had a debate on this matter in July; it was a lot of fun, not at all dull. I remember that my good friend from Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) referred in that debate to Information Canada; it was the only organization he identified. We have a budget of $35 billion, and if we were to cut Information Canada tomorrow our maximum saving would be something like $4 million to $5 million. So it would make no sense. My professor of mathematics used to tell me that although five million is big, there are a thousand million in a billion. In other words, there must be a relationship between the two. I should like hon. members to make suggestions.

Mr. Stanfield: You are the government. How big is this deficit to be?

Mr. Chrétien: We are defending the policy of the government. We are not running away from our responsibilities. What annoys me is the people who vote for all these programs I have mentioned and who do not have the guts now to admit they made a mistake. There is no shame in that admission. I am not in a comfortable position in talking about expenditures, because I am caught between one party which says I am not spending enough, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who says I am. The Leader of the Opposition himself has sometimes called me Dr. Scrooge, but I am doing my best. It is difficult, but fun.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not think the government's deficit is fun at all. How big will it be?

Mr. Chrétien: If the deficit is big, we will borrow the money to pay for it. We have done this in the past. We operate the business of government in a very Liberal way; we do not go to the extremes of the NDP or to the extremes of the far right. We are trying to develop a policy that is acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

I think this program is a well balanced one. We have decided not to have too much bureaucracy. During the two years before I became President of the Treasury Board there was—I have to recognize this—an increase in the bureaucracy of almost 7 per cent a year. Then I started to reduce it, the first year to 4.1 per cent and then in June by another point to 3.1 per cent. Next year's program calls for an increase in the civil service of only 1.5 per cent. When this policy is put into place, the majority of government departments will have to live with the same number of people that they have this year. Many vacant jobs will remain unfilled so as to achieve that goal. This will not be easy.

Some departments are calling for the provision of more services. In the present context it will be very difficult not to permit the RCMP to have less men than they want, which is more than last year. In addition, we need more penitentiary guards, and the Department of National Revenue requires more staff. Our population is growing and the people are asking for additional services. There will be a few hundred additional civil servants employed to run the anti-inflation program, but relatively speaking the situation will be much tighter than it has been for a long time.

Mr. Stanfield: It is out of control, Jean.

Mr. Chrétien: It is not. If the hon. gentleman says it is out of control at 1.5 per cent, then I do not know what is in control.

Mr. Stanfield: I mean your deficit is out of control.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think so. If it was, then I think we would have problems which, happily, we do not have at the present time. The hon. member knows that as well as I do. We have decided to try to control the expenditures of every department; that is apparent in the white paper of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Coates: A whitewash paper.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know what the hon. members means by "whitewash", but if we were to whitewash inflation, then things would be all right. Because nous pourrions laver l'inflation, et nous serions heureux. We will try to control expenditures even more, but I know it will not be easy. We have given an indication in the white paper of what we are trying to do.

I cannot say there will be no increase in expenditure next year; that is impossible. This parliament has made it impossible by indexing family allowances and old age pensions and by establishing the oil compensation program. Oil prices abroad are going up. I read this afternoon in the newspaper that Venezuela is about to raise its price, so the people in eastern Canada will have to pay more for oil and it will cost the government more to compensate them. Although that is seen as an expenditure, in fact it is a transfer of payments, partly coming from the tax the United States pays on oil exported from Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I think this program will work and I am hoping that the people of Canada will accept it. Of course they are not happy about it and will want to be sure that everyone will be caught in the net. Following second reading debate the bill will go to committee, and if hon. members have some good suggestions to make, I am sure the minister will consider them.

I would like the people to understand that this program is in the best interests of our country. Inflation is probably a disease that hurts most the people in our society who can protect themselves the least. There are big groups both on the business and union sides who really have abused the situation lately at the expense of the rest of society. The Canadian economic pie has not grown in the last year, so when someone takes an extra piece of that pie—

An hon. Member: But it has grown.

Mr. Chrétien: It has not grown, if you compare the economic situation in Canada with that of our friends to the south who have been in a recession for 22 months. At least in Canada we have been able to maintain a much better performance than the United States.

An hon. Member: Not so.

Mr. Chrétien: For the first time in the history of relations between Canada and the United States, in terms of economic comparability, there was less unemployment last winter in Canada than there was in the United States. That was the first time ever.

An hon. Member: And 4 per cent more now.

Mr. Chrétien: Of course there is unemployment; I do not deny that. What I want to convey is that our performance has not been perfect, by far; but it has been quite good compared to that of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad you applaud both statements. Don't take one; take the two of them. I think we have to work together to make sure this program is a success, and if we succeed in making the program a reality, particularly in the minds of those people who set the trends in our society, I am confident that the economic growth in our society will accelerate and that our competitive position with other countries will be ameliorated so that the future of Canada will be even brighter than it is right now.

I am very glad to be here today to join in the invitation of my colleagues to hon. members across the aisle to do their part. We are a long way from the next election. We are not trying to win an election now, and will not be for three years. Right now, what we have to do is all pull in one direction to make sure the future of this country will be greater than it is today.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit one question? In his speech, which I listened to very carefully, he asked for the immediate suggestions of hon. members. My question relates to the 1975-76 booklet on how our tax dollar is spent. There is an indication in this booklet that almost $1 billion is available for consultants' fees. Would the minister consider cutting back on that tremendous amount being spent on consultants' fees, particularly in view of the large number of people presently employed in various departments of government?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer the question of the hon. member. There is a provision in the white paper through which I have asked every department to cut by 10 per cent the hiring of outside consultants. I should like to point out that although this is shown in those terms in the booklet, if you break down this $1 billion you will find that the majority of it—I am speaking from memory—is for adult training programs in the provinces. We make the money available to the provinces to train the unemployed or those who want to upgrade their skills. It is spent in that sense of consultants' fees, rather than in the terms which the hon. gentleman has in mind. It is for those programs and for the teachers who give courses to the unemployed. I am happy to respond to the hon. member in that regard, and I think I am quite right.

An hon. Member: Most of it is under the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chrétien: I have ordered, in respect of the consultants' fees that the hon. member has in mind, a reduction of 10 per cent in dollar terms for next year.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Veterans Affairs—Proposed Camp Hill complex at Halifax—Date of tender call; the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Health—Possible revision of maximum levels for mercury chloride and PCB; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Fisheries—Possible discussion of extension of control over resources with United States.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, it is a rare opportunity for one to follow the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) who has come before us in an endeavour to explain some of the reasons he feels hon. members of this House should support the government's proposed wage and price controls which we are now debating. I am pleased he took the time to come before us, as this does not appear to have been the policy of government members up to now. Perhaps he will have set an example that will encourage other ministers to participate in this debate.

I have in mind the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who seems to have some pretty strong views about how this legislation should be applied to the rural aspects of Canadian society and our economy, as well as the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), who is spending a great deal of the taxpayers' dollars on various things. I am looking forward to his participation in this debate in the hope that he will explain how he is going to cut many millions of dollars from his spending so that Canadians will be given the kind of example necessary if we hope to make this policy work. I am pleased, also, to see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in the House. Canadians are desperately anxious to have him indicate how we are going to do away with the runaway deficits we are facing in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

In my opinion, there is no way this policy can work, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) out on a pilgrimage across this country when he should be here in the House of Commons attempting to put before the elected representatives of the people the ways in which the policy can be made to work, in order that we in Ottawa, who are the ones to whom the people will be listening, can explain those ways to the people. From all I have read and heard up to now, I would suggest the program that has been presented is unworkable because it is geared heavily against the workingman, the poor and the underprivileged of this nation. It will not work because it will not receive the kind of support required from the people of this nation; and whether the government realizes it or not, the majority of the people of this nation are the poor, the underprivileged and the working. They are the people who will be hit the hardest as they are ground into the earth by this program.

It would be most helpful and useful—and we expect this—if all the ministers of the government came forward before this bill is voted on at second reading to explain how they intend to do some of the things the people in Canada want and expect to be done in so far as government cutbacks are concerned. If we are asking everybody in this country to tighten their belts, the first place to start is right here, and right now. That will not happen with this legislation. As usual, it is the wage earner who will be clipped, while big business and the multinationals will be the fat cats because they have the ways and means of getting around the legislation. Those ways and means are not available to the average man in this country.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)).]

One of the things the President of the Treasury Board said which interested me very much was that we always come here and talk about government cutbacks, but the only real suggestion we ever make is that we should get rid of Information Canada. That would certainly be a good sign for the people of Canada: it would indicate that the government intended to do something about cutting back, even though getting rid of Information Canada, so far as I am concerned, would be merely a drop in the bucket.

As the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) said in questioning the minister, there are many consultants among those who are a bunch of leeches on the government, and a bunch of Grits as well, who are getting hand-outs from this government. It is time for them to go, if this government is serious about cutting back expenditures. I realize that included among these people are consultants whose services may be justifiable, but the amount of $875 million is involved and so far as I am concerned there is a great deal of room for extensive cutting back.

We should not stop there. The President of the Treasury Board explained how good he is at cutting back the growth of the public service of Canada. Well, my peers tell me that the public service of Canada stands at 347,357 employees. The minister indicates he is willing to reduce the amount of hiring to 1.5 per cent a year, or 5,210 people. That represents half the people in my home town. If we place this in its proper perspective, it means that this year the government will hire a number equal to half the population of Amherst, yet the government says it is cutting back.

I say there should be no increase in the public service. As a matter of fact, there should and can be a decrease in the public service merely by allowing attrition to take its course. That would be another example to the taxpayers of this nation that this government is really serious about doing something about the high cost of government in Canada. This should happen right away. One of the ministers should be telling us that rather than reducing the amount of hiring from 7 per cent over a period of time to 1.5 per cent, this is what will be done.

Another thing that should and can take place is a reduction in the tremendous deficit in the unemployment insurance fund. There is no way we can continue with this program in its present form. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration should face up to this fact and do something about it. The cost of operating the unemployment insurance plan is becoming prohibitive. In 1974-75, the total benefit payments amounted to $2.3 billion, with the government picking up $700 million. Benefit payments in 1975-76 are expected to exceed $3.75 billion, placing a total cost on the government of approximately $1.75 billion, an increase of approximately 150 per cent over the previous year.

This total increase reflects in part the increase in unemployment. Unemployment in 1974 averaged 5.4 per cent and has been running this year at an annual rate of 7.2 per cent, an increase of 31 per cent; and there are indications it will rise to at least 8 per cent by the end of the year. However, unemployment statistics as such do not account for all the increase in pay-outs. While unemployment rose by 31 per cent, the total cost of UIC from April, 1974, to April, 1975, rose by 69 per cent. More important is the fact that the length of benefit period for recipients increased by 51 per cent over the same period.

Since I have been a Member of Parliament it has been my understanding that the unemployment insurance plan is a stopgap scheme to assist the person who becomes unemployed. It is to assist him to get over the period until he is again employed. The way the scheme works now, with the amount of benefits being provided, it has become almost a way of life to may Canadians. A great many Canadians misuse the unemployment insurance fund, and this misuse must be stopped. Further, a great many people pay into the fund who never receive any benefit from it. In effect, they subsidize those who rightfully and wrongfully secure benefits. The people to whom I refer receive no benefit whatsoever during a lifetime of work, although they contribute a tremendous amount of money to the fund. As Members of Parliament, we must see that the unemployment insurance fund gets back on the right track again. We must see that it gets back on the road to reality, because some of the things that happen now are unreal.

If one is looking for ways to save money, there are a number of ways this can be done. One way would be to combine the Unemployment Insurance Commission with the Manpower operation in this country. We made a major mistake in separating them. The sooner government accepts that this is the time to bring the two together, the sooner the problems associated with the fund will be eliminated. I see that the minister nods his head and I assume he agrees the two operations should be combined.

I believe we could save money by packaging the two operations together. In this way the service could be improved and the public would be given the assurance that the man in the unemployment insurance office was aware of the jobs that were availabe. Also, in this way, I believe, a service could be provided to business people and others who require employees, because they would be able to go to the same office and determine from the manager which people were unemployed and available for work in the required categories. This would do much to streamline the operation and to save money.

We must also have a more basic realistic benefit qualification period. Too short a time is involved when in a period of eight weeks one can qualify for unemployment insurance for a period of 40 weeks. This is just not realistic. There may be many things we should do in order to get the fund in more realistic balance, but one thing we must do is extend the period of qualification from eight weeks to at least 12 weeks as we suggested when the legislation was first before the House. If it should be found that a period of 12 weeks would not bring the fund into a realistic balance, then we would have to consider a period of 16 weeks, which is the period which existed under the old legislation.

So far as the amounts available are concerned, I say we should go step by step in an effort to extend the period of time for qualification and see what the result is before we attempt anything further. I believe we should also determine whether the amounts to be paid are too high in comparison with what is available on the street if a person is employed. There is not much fun working if one can receive as much money while not working.

The problem that exists in many parts of Canada is that business operations have a competitor in the form of the unemployment insurance plan. This situation exists in my area. At the same time, unemployment insurance is a godsend to most people in my part of Canada. It is crucial to the livelihood of many people in the Atlantic provinces, because most of the people who look for jobs, especially at this time of the year, are unable to find them no matter how hard they look. At the same time, however, there are employers who have difficulty finding people to work for them. While people are in receipt of unemployment insurance there are many jobs for which they are not available. I am sure each of us is aware of cases where employers are looking for people to do a job and cannot find them.

There has to be realism, but there is no realism when you have the Prime Minister telling people they do not have to work if they do not want to. That is the kind of philosophy we must overcome, the kind of philosophy that has done a great deal to produce some of the problems we are facing.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: I do not know what the hon. gentleman across the way is saying.

Mr. Muir: It doesn't matter what he said, because he never says anything worth while.

Mr. Coates: I would suggest to you, my friend, that I will come into the House without a text any time at all, as I am doing right now. Try to emulate me, that is all. Sit around here a while, learn a little, and perhaps you will get to be a bright boy. But now you are a long way from that. Talk to the fellow beside you who has brains and knows what he is doing.

I want to make a suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture. I was very concerned about the near accident in which he and his family were involved, as I am sure all hon. members were. But I suggest to him seriously—not because he almost happened to be in an accident—that one of the examples he could set for the taxpayers of this nation is to convince the government to put the fleet of executive jets at their disposal in cold storage, and say to the cabinet ministers and everyone else that this nation has airlines which most people have to use, and there is no reason why government members should not use them except in circumstances of great urgency where the use of a government jet is required.

In most instances there is no real reason to use the fleet of government aircraft used by cabinet ministers today. I think the Canadian people would be really impressed if the government would put the fleet of aircraft in mothballs and in this way set an example in paring government expenditures. I can give an example. One day I was at the airport in Ottawa, on my way to the maritimes, with a stopover in Montreal, and I was talking to a cabinet minister who was also going to Montreal. I interrupted the conversation to stand in line to board the plane, and when I looked around the minister had disappeared. The first thing I knew, I saw an executive jet with "Government of Canada" on it taking off. The minister was going to Montreal on that jet when an Air Canada flight was leaving at the same time, a flight which he could have taken. Instead, we paid for the gasoline which we are supposed to be saving.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: Someone says "Oh". I tell you, if people in this nation are cynical about politicians, it is because of the extravagances in which they indulge with the taxpayers' money, such as flying around in government aircraft when there is no need for it. That is the kind of thing that will destroy any chance of making this program work, because people believe we want them to take on all the things that are required to make the program work, while we do not want to do that ourselves. We must show, first of all, that we will do the job and set an example. When we set the example, they will follow. Mr. Speaker, there are many ways in which we can set examples.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: One is to tell the people of Canada that we will set the example, not follow their example; that we will carry out the cutbacks first and show them we can produce. Then we can expect them to produce. We will have to show the wage earner, the little guy, that he will be as well protected as the big guy. I am not at all sure that he is convinced or will be convinced until he hears the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) make a speech in the House outlining the ways in which we will do it. When that is done, maybe he will get the kind of support which the Prime Minister is asking the people of Canada to give him in producing the policy that he has outlined to us piece by piece.

I would like to put on the record, for the attention of the President of the Treasury Board and in repetition, a statement made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on October 14 which is a realistic assessment of the reason the government has to set the example. This is what the hon. member said, as recorded at page 8213 of Hansard:

> Since the Prime Minister took power in April, 1968, the money supply in this country has risen by an astounding 111 per cent, a 15 per cent increase in the last 12 months alone. In the same period we find that inflation has gone up 58 per cent. This is the inflation that the Prime Minister spoke of breaking back in 1969.
> Perhaps most significantly during this period, the government's own spending has jumped by 192 per cent, it has almost doubled, yet in 1969 we had a prime minister who had the nerve to suggest that his government in future years was going to be a government of restraint with respect to monetary growth and government spending.

The 192 per cent increase in government spending is the reason most Canadians will not believe the Prime Minister and will not believe us when we are talking about restraint. What we must do very soon is show the Canadian public that there is real restraint in the minds of the Government of Canada and members of parliament, and then perhaps we will get them to support us and make this program work.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, the steps advocated by the government are no doubt essential under the circumstances. It is obvious that Canada is facing a serious inflation problem, but we must also admit that if our country continues to suffer from the excessive rate of inflation, it is merely ascribable to the various ineffective measures advocated by the government for years to eradicate the said evil.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it is more than ever essential to find some solutions in the shortest possible time to thwart that serious problem, but if the malaise persists or continues to worsen at this rate, it will surely compromise the already precarious economic balance consequently increasing the rate of inflation throughout the country.

Of course, I agree that in our present system there is no easy way to solve the infaltion problem. But I doubt that the proposed government measures to control inflation will produce the expected results. Furthermore, the battle undertaken by the Prime Minister on October 13 is puzzling a great many people and is causing more apprehension than satisfaction.

Again I feel almost sure that the proposed austerity measures and the efforts of the government and its economists in the next three years will not cope with this problem. There is no doubt whatever we are living in a very critical period, we are in fact on the threshold of a depression that may take catastrophic proportions and perturb our society.

Mr. Speaker, the measures the government intends to take are unclear, but at least one thing seems very clear to me; it is that the anti-inflation program emphasized the seriousness of the economic situation in Canada and at the same time focussed the attention of the whole population on the problem about which we are most concerned.

We notice, Mr. Speaker, that all governments have been invited to cut their expenditure but not to freeze them. Moreover, businesses will be able to boost their prices only by as much as their production costs have increased, but ordinary people do not know how to figure out the cost of production. I sincerely believe there is plenty of room for acrobatics in that area.

It is very easy to show once and for all we want to do is to control wages and bring the unions down to heel to save our country from the disaster that awaits us if we are not careful. There is no doubt either that to succeed we must control prices.

As a matter of fact, I was just reading an article containing the comments of the Quebec Food Council and the Quebec Producers Union. The government should at least have prevented grain prices from being determined on the open market by the Winnipeg or Chicago grain exchanges.

I understand that the government is unwilling or afraid to set a price for the producers of western grain on the international market. But it could bring part of the production under a quota system for the domestic market and set the price for this grain.

In this way, the cost of feed grain would remain firm and thus ensure a better price to the consumers. As to the prices of fertilizers, carbohydrates and gas, since they are imported goods, the government has hardly any control over them.

If I may, I should like to quote part of the article dealing with the control of grain prices. The government could intervene at the border by limiting meat imports and exports, because hog prices are going up in the United States and, consequently, in Canada as well. But to close our border would create such delicate international problems that Ottawa seems unwilling to face them. Finally, it remains that on the great majority of basic commodities such as vegetables, fruit, sugar, coffee, cocoa, spices, etc., the government cannot exert any control, for they are imported for the most part.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that under the present circumstances it is very easy for the government to increase prices, but whatever the government may do, it remains that when it comes to control food stuffs products things become more difficult.

It seems to me that the government has taken no measure to overcome such difficulties. That is why, in the long run, it will be forced to pay citizens' organisations to succeed in controlling prices set by businesses. However, some special squads will have to be set up. They will be responsible for watching big food chain stores, or to rely on federal public servants which will be appointed for that purpose.

With regard to penalties for lack of compliance, will the government have to determine prices, instead of the companies? In case of monopolies, will there be some flexibility with regard to corporations which have to face a harsh domestic or foreign competition? Those are the questions that come to my mind.

Finally, Madam Speaker, everybody knows that the root of inflation is in prices, and moreover, until now experience has shown that the majority of controls that have been imposed in different countries have failed to curb prices because it has been shown that such controls cause economic disorders that have to be cured later anyway.

Therefore, I think that if the real cause of inflation is prices, the government should first make a serious study of the structure of prices in relation to the monetary system. In any case, since the process of determining prices is itself a part of the monetary system, such a study should necessarily include a comprehensive review of the way the system works. It would then be easier to wonder why in certain respects that process is inadequate.

Because of today's pricing system, the public in general has to shoulder the total production costs over a given period whereas, in normal times, it should only pay for the total consumption in that same period. In other words, if I buy $5's worth of goods and have to pay $10 for them, obviously the cost of living is inflated.

It is common knowledge that the rigidity of traditions has proved to be one of the main obstacles to progress in man's discoveries and that, most of the time, it takes but a flash to realize that we are on the verge of a crisis. We of the Social Credit Party have often warned this government of the impending danger of inflation which is now hitting us head-on, but our warnings fell on deaf ears. Madam Speaker, we are now facing such a problem. This is, in the main, the result of errors made in the past by our monetary and fiscal authorities.

In my view, it is extremely urgent for us to get out of this financial system which is not really consistent with the realities of production and consumption, since in the face of spiralling prices we need an increase in the purchasing power too. Finally, if the purchasing power is allowed to increase without a reduction in prices, it is necessary, of course, to distribute more money among consumers.

Now, Madam Speaker, under the present system, it is realized that money is only distributed according to a participation in production. It is then that all the costs are reflected in prices. It is essential to provide the goods to meet adequately the normal needs of the people. Then inflation would no longer exist.

Madam Speaker, since the purpose of production of goods and services is to meet the needs of the individuals who make up the nation, everything else, both labour and capital, are only instruments, means of achieving an end. In other words, the sole purpose of the product itself is to make life easier for adult citizens, but that same profit should not become all-important in society as a whole.

All our economic ills stern from that. Profit which is good in itself becomes bad and harmful when it becomes excessive. That is why in our great country both rich and prosperous, the rich become richer and the poor more numerous. As a result, the unbalance in our economy is borne by our children, the low wage earners, the unemployed, those without an adequate income to enjoy our wealth because of the prices being charged.

Madam Speaker, we, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, seriously believe that the monetary system accounting is truly wrong, because if the financial system were realistic, inflation would surely not exist and prices would not rise. On the contrary, the people would witness a gradual decline in prices technological progress and production methods would improve.

There is no doubt that if the federal government really intends to combat the steady and deep-rooted inflation, which I do not question, it must consider more seriously, the concret proposals put forward by our party, for I am sure they are the solution to inflation and unjustified price increases.

Madam Speaker, among the measures annouced by the federal government on October 13th, I think they should have included provisions for protecting low income people by raising, for instance, $6,000 to $10,000 the low income ceiling, that is the salaries of workers who will not be entitled to an increase of over 10 per cent. It is essential that the fight be not waged at the expense of the low-income class. Besides, would it not have been more sensible for the federal government to provide that advertising, the primary purpose of which is to induce people to buy more, be somehow restricted as well? As they stand now, the measures will penalize the little guy, the low-income worker. But what about the media television, radio and press alike, that are trying by all means thinkable to urge people to ignore those measures, instead of tightening their belts, as the government is advocating?

Actually, Madam Speaker, governments are in the final analysis responsible for inflation, first of all because they are the biggest employers in the country and also because they do not produce genuine wealth.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): They produce debts!

Mr. Allard: Mainly taxes and debts, as my colleague from Bellechasse has so aptly put it.

Once again, Madam Speaker, I want to repeat it, the time is ripe for new measures that will guarantee fairness in dealing with producers and consumers, in a word the entire nation. I therefore appeal to the government once and for all to assume its responsibilities and give full satisfaction to all Canadians. And to do it, the present majority government should take the necessary arrangements to propose an intelligent, serious and efficient solution to the present situation.

However, Madam Speaker, I doubt very much that within the present system we have the oppotunity to act as I think we should. On the contrary, we, from the Social Credit Party of Canada, have been for many years looking for every possible way to bring the government to study our sensible and practical solutions to fight inflation. And my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) raised last week one of these solutions, the compensated discount allowing producers to make a just and reasonable profit and at the same time giving to the consumer a chance to pay a reasonable price to meet his vital needs.

Furthermore, Madam Speaker, the government should have taken action to reduce excessive interest rates and bring them back at the same level as at the time when our economic situation was satisfying. Let us not forget that these interest rates have been in force for twenty years, if my memory serves me well from 1944 to 1960 and during that time, our economy was stable and everybody seemed to be happy. If we look around us, we see that, in the residential construction field particularly, everything is not alright. Why? It is only because of the excessive interest rates we now have. Are there many people able to buy a house when interest rates reach 12 per cent? Really, I do not know many of them.

If you cast a glance at the cost for building single family dwellings in Montreal since the seventies, you realize that it cost $13.42 a square foot in 1970. In 1973, the same square foot cost $17.22 and today in 1975 it costs about $27: what a shame!

We can therefore infer that within five years, prices have doubled. As you may see, Madam Speaker, it has become urgent for the government to take measures and I therefore seriously think that before anything else interest rates should be lowered in order to give a new impetus to housing construction, to increase output capacity and thus check unemployment and meet the needs of all Canadians.

I also think it is time for the government to try by all means to have the Bank of Canada,—the bank of Canadians, an institution which derives its policies from the government and from ourselves here in Parliament—to have the Bank of Canada assume its real responsibilities, namely control credit in the interest of our economy and people. It has undoubtedly become a matter of urgent necessity that the Bank of Canada should aim its credit lending policy at ensuring a smooth growth of our whole economy.

Madam Speaker, if the aim of the central government is to find means of checking inflation, I wish with all my heart that they would take the necessary measures to review more seriously the concrete suggestions of our party, for I am convinced that therein lies the solution to inflation and the unjustified soaring of prices.

● (1740)

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, in a debate involving a policy as important and as novel to Canadians as this one, it is essential in my view that every member in this House keep in mind the consequences of the proposals now before us.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) indicated the government wants these measures to be fair to all.

May I remind you, Madam Speaker, of a principle of social policy that should be reflected in every measure under discussion. That principle is that any fiscal or financial action that does not aim at narrowing the income range is socially backward, and can have adverse social repercussions in an economy of free circulating capital and labour as ours. If we look at the social groups affected by these measures, it is easily seen that this legislation will create in a very short time an unacceptable imbalance.

Before I speak of three groups of workers I feel are more severely affected than others, I would recall briefly two causes of inflation whose effects deserve to be mentioned. The first of these causes is the government spending policy followed by the governments of Canada in the course of the last few years. Evidently, in a federal structure as ours, the power to spend is inherent in every level of jurisdiction. It so happens that the federal government controls some 40 per cent of the overall government expenditures, and that the remaining 60 per cent are shared by provincial and municipal governments.

We have seen during the last few years, for example, that in the construction industry governments were unable to do the kind of coordination that would have prevented the current rate of inflation, the rate experienced last year for instance and which is in the order of 28 per cent in the building industry. Provincial governments including the Quebec government, municipal governments as the city of Montreal for instance, the federal government, introduced big programs without really considering the effects that they would have on wages, on materials and, in general, on the normal relationships among the main agents in the field of construction.

During the last two years, the building industry has known an inflation rate which has no equivalent in any other field in Canada. Today, the government realizes the importance of coordinating these programs and initiatives.

I therefore hope, Madam Speaker, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) will have enough leadership to force Canadian municipalities to meet around the same coordinating table, which would enable us to prevent expenses which could cause or continue to cause galloping inflation within this industry.

I have to add, Madam Speaker, that labour relations, mostly in other manufacturing sectors, have been a direct cause of inflation in Canada. We set records last year. According to the statistics published by the OECD, Canada is one of the countries which has lost the greatest number of man-weeks of work, which is certainly unprecedented in the history of Canada. I do not want to blame these strikes on the workers who decided to stop work for all the reasons that can be judged good and acceptable in an economy such as ours. However, Madam Speaker, social problems and the problems caused by these many strikes and the losses of man-weeks in Canadian economy have also been a very important inflationary factor. We must not think that legislation such as that which we are now discussing will bring a solution, a remedy to all these problems which are, in my view, inherent in the federal structure of our country and the economic structure in which we live.

There is also, Madam Speaker, another cause of inflation which, in my opinion, is given too little attention in the bill which we are now discussing. I want to speak about the wild prices policy practised by certain Canadian industries. I shall only mention the case of the sugar industry, which is a basic element in the manufacture of all the food that we eat in Canada. It is unacceptable that we experienced a rise in the price of sugar of more than 200 per cent whereas, within the same industry, the supply, the rate of supply remained at a normal and acceptable level.

Of course, legal procedures were launched and resulted in slowing down and even reducing increases, but obvisouly the manufacturing industry is largely responsible for the tremendous increase in costs in some sectors of supply.

It must also be pointed out, Madam Speaker, that some distribution agents practiced a disastrous supply policy. Suffice to recall that last summer we witnessed helplessly the destruction of hundreds of tons of turnips, cabbage and other vegetables because the other food chains would not buy the products the Canadian economy could supply on the pretense that they now had annual food contracts and the seasonal policy that used to be practiced was no longer adequate in our economy. How can one think, Madam Speaker, that in such an economy which is somewhat off course the causes of inflation are only the responsibility of wage earners.

I think, Madam Speaker, that it is time to draw the line and that the bill we are now discussing will not be enough to ensure balanced income, salary and price growth if we do not launch an overall attack on all fronts and not only through Bill C-73 but through the combines bill we passed last week and an unprecedented coordination of public expenditures in the political history of this country.

I pointed out at the outset, Madam Speaker, that the measures contained in Bill C-73 must be fair to everyone. I think after reading this bill that unfortunately it will not be fair to everyone. The first group of wage earners to be affected in an unbearable way by this bill is those wage earners whose incomes are below the average minimum income or the poverty line as defined by the Economic Council of Canada.

In a report published by a Senate task force in 1971, income brackets were set for families of three, four and five children. In 1972, for example, Madam Speaker, the minimum average income for a family of five children had to be $6,850. If we add the 10 per cent inflation for the years 1973-74, we arrive at an average minimum income of $8,200.

However, if we look at the incomes of those groups of wage earners within the classes of the minimum wage scale, we find a total income of $6,850; in other words a family whose only income would be the minimum wage or the minimum wage scale would be below the poverty line as defined by the Economic Council of Canada and the Senate report on poverty.

Madam Speaker, we learned in the press during the weekend that at least one provincial government refused to follow a recommendation to increase the minimum wage on November 1. The Province of Quebec had a minimum wage of $2.60 an hour and it was to be increased to $2.90 an hour on November 1, 1975, that is within about 10 days. That 32 cents increment was made up of 15 cents for catching up and 17 cents for indexation. Therefore, the 15 cents constitute about a 6 per cent increment. Madam Speaker, in the wage scale which has been made public by the Minister of Finance, we see that an 8 per cent rate would be acceptable.

Consequently, all workers, particularly the 500,000 workers in Quebec who come under that minimum wage decree, will have to suffer the burden of the fight against inflation in coming months without even being allowed the 8 per cent indexation which seems generally observed everywhere.

Madam Speaker, I think we cannot accept a legislation whose effect would be to have wage earners who have no defence except a government decree carry the burden of the fight against inflation. It is essential that the burden of this attack on inflation be shared fairly across Canada and supported equitably by every Canadian.

I do not think, Madam Speaker, that we would improve the social climate if we were to force 500,000 workers in a province to provide for their needs with an income whose purchasing power is perpetually eroding. One has to have net people subject to the decree on minimum wages to understand how those people are directly affected by every parliamentary measures.

Madam Speaker, the worker earning the minimum wage rate for 40 hours' work gets $6,800 a year. Because of the inflation which continually erodes the family budget, this worker has to work overtime to be able to maintain his income at or slightly above the poverty line.

I think, Madam Speaker, that the object of Bill C-73 is not to place the excessive burden of our attack on inflation on the backs of the small wage earners. The reasons put forward by the president of the Minimum Wage Commission in Quebec seem unjustifiable to me in the present economic situation.

The first of these reasons is that only the Minimum Wage Commission or the Minister of Labour has the authority to proclaim such an increase and that the government has taken no decision as yet. That is not a sufficient reason, Madam Speaker. If the government has the authority to enact a minimum wage, it does not have to beat around the bush and consult everybody. It can determine the minimum wage on the basis of current economic indexes supported by statistics.

The second reason put forward is that since the Commission was not formally authorized to enact such an increase, nobody could do it after the necessary consultations with the industry and the unions.

Madam Speaker, it is the same as saying that someone is responsible for the minimum wage without knowing who he is. So, let us try to find out who it is, and then we can do the proper consulting. Can a responsible government behave this way in an economy in which the wage earner's purchasing power governed by a decree is constantly gnawed away by inflation?

To my mind, Madam Speaker, such a statement is proof of irresponsibility. A third reason was given, namely that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) intervened pretexting that a 32-cent increase would have a bad effect on the industries governed by the decree.

Now, Madam Speaker, what industries fall within the jurisdiction of the minimum salary decree? They are mainly the sewing, clothing and shoe industries. They are also the food, confectionery industries, and those which transform food products in one way or the other. And generally it concerns all the employees, all the smaller industries with a market which is restricted to a given province or a given territory.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, if we are to help more these industries thrive in competitive markets, it is not by making the wage earners of these industries bear the burden that we will succeed in reinforcing the structure of the Canadian economy.

Rather we will succeed in improving their output by turning directly to the structure or to the components of these industries, to their competitive position, to their competitiveness, to their productivity. We will not succeed directly in improving their competitiveness by freezing the salaries of the wage earners in these industries.

Of course, Madam Speaker, one could allege that by increasing immediately the wage scale of the workers in this group we could add to inflation. Madam Speaker, for a family of five, with three children and two spouses earning $6,850 a year, even if you add to this $500 a year it is hardly enough to meet the bare necessities. There is no inflationary effect as a result of the demand, when one family is simply allowed to meet its basic needs, such as lodging, food and clothing.

Instead one should look for the inflationary effect in higher categories with annual incomes of $24,000 or more. Now what do we find out in these categories? We find out that the authorized increase will be about $2,400. Obviously, the Minister of Finance has remarked that the tax measures will allow the treasury to recoup a substantial amount of that $2,400 rise.

[Mr. Joyal.]

Madam Speaker, let us look at the tax tables to see the amounts allocated to public funds. In 1974, the Quebec provincial income tax was putting only 42 per cent of that $2,400 increase back into the coffers of the province, which means that a salaried man or a professional with an income of $24,000 would still be in a better position than the wage earner whose salary is below the poverty line.

And, Madam Speaker, I agree fully with the Minister of Finance that it is not by overtaxing salary increases per se that we can get to the root of inflation.

The Minister of Finance was right in making the proposals he did, but the recommendation which seems to me essential at this point is the one which aims at limiting those increases in the comparative scale to the salary level of workers whose earnings are below the poverty line.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I hope that the minister who, tomorrow or the day after, will have the opportunity to meet the provincial ministers, will ask them to reconsider their whole attitude towards those workers who are governed by the ruling on minimum wage, so that those wage earners may at least benefit from the increases which the legislation provides.

Moreover, Madam Speaker, I think that even if those raises could be granted to wage earners, they would clearly remain below the average minimum income for those families.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has already advised the House in previous months that he is working on the development of a guaranteed annual income scheme and to my knowledge, every member in this House is deeply interested in the implementation of such schemes. How could we now be satisfied when the wages of those under the poverty level will be definitely frozen, while union members who can resort to the usual bargaining powers will still obtain the raises allowed under that bill?

I think that during the next few days, we should make a special effort to make every member realize that the consequences of that bill should be equitable for all. Unfortunately, during the past years, we have noted that the forces exercised on the market have not always given the anticipated results.

There are several pieces of legislation which the House is willing to consider and adopt. They must be applied without delay. I feel it is necessary for the Minister of Finance to contact his colleagues as soon as possible and realize that the co-ordination of public expenses has become an imperative of our political structure. He must also realize that all wage earners covered by the minimum wage provision cannot be satisfied with the wage freeze as it now exists. They are even worse off than our public service employees.

It is recognized within the salary scales which appear in the bill that public service employees will be at least entitled to this increase, even if it is greatly below what they were asking for. On the other hand, when the time comes to deal with wage earners, with the 500,000 Quebec workers covered by the minimum wage provision, they say: "You will not get more than $2.60 an hour." In my opinion, this demonstrates a serious lack of social justice and I truly doubt that this policy is clearly reformist.

Madam Speaker, I do not think that pieces of legislation such as those we adopted over the previous months to increase by 10 cents the price of the gallon of gas for wage earners, for workers who commute, shorten the gap between those who earn less and those who earn more. In the present economic conditions, a government must essentially propose as the aim of its fiscal, monetary and economic policy to shorten the gap between those at the very bottom of the wage scale and those at the very top.

Madam Speaker, I ask for the support of my colleagues so that we can all put pressure, not only on the federal Minister of Finance, but also on our respective provincial finance ministers so that employees subject to those minimum wage decrees can at least obtain increases equal to those provided for in the legislation. I think that is the least we can do if, as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) suggested, we want to see to it that the legislation applies to everyone and that the burden of the fight against inflation is justly borne by all Canadians whatever their income level.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, before we broke for the supper hour the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) said that the whole matter of fighting inflation and being responsible for bringing inflation under control rested with the example we set and gave to others. He was, of course, referring to ministers of the government in the way they conducted their departments. I think the way we conduct ourselves in this House is an example to the Canadian people.

The hon. member forgot some other very important aspects of how we conduct ourselves in the House of Commons. For example, we ought to be prepared to eliminate the subsidized meals served in this building. We ought to be able to say that the prices in the cafeteria and restaurant of the House of Commons are the same as working class Canadians pay when they buy their lunch.

We ought to be able to say that members of parliament who want to fly to Europe should not use Canadian armed forces planes to go on holidays. One of the arguments made in this House for increased indemnities for members was that they should be permitted a wage that they can live on and do things other Canadians do. It seems to me no private Canadian citizen can climb on to what is called euphemistically "Richardson's airline" and fly on holiday to Europe. This kind of belt tightening must be demonstrated to the public.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), a government member, made a good speech. He criticized the bill presented to the House in a way that New Democrats on this side of the House would describe it. I suspect that, when amendments are brought forward and the time comes to vote, that member will stand up and be counted with the members of this party who intend to oppose this legislation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) certainly has a flair for the theatre. This is very apropos. It does not surprise me that on the fifth anniversary of the invocation of the War Measures Act, which was last Thursday, the Prime Minister introduced Bill C-73 to control wages and prices in Canada. For the past year, including during the last federal election campaign, the government has been saying that wage and price controls were not workable.

Since the federal campaign of 1974 the former finance minister and an assortment of other ministers have been going around the country laying the blame for inflation on the backs of the workers. They have been saying that it was the workers of Canada, in their exorbitant demands, who have caused inflation in Canada. In addition, their productivity has been criticized. It is said that our workers are not as productive as workers in the United States or in other industrialized countries. The claim was made that the expectations of Canadian workers were out of line, that they wanted the highest wages but were not prepared to work hard to satisfy their expectations.

What was in fact happening was that Canadian workers were responding to spiralling inflation, much of which was precipitated by the government. For example, in the housing field, it was fairly obvious to the most casual observer that land costs were escalating beyond the means of Canadian workers. As far as mortgage interest rates were concerned, they were completely out of whack with what the workers of Canada could afford. The aspiration of a Canadian worker to own a home or a single family dwelling is certainly not out of whack, but lo and behold when he goes to purchase a home the mortgage rate and the payments per month are completely beyond his ability to pay.

Another area of concern for Canada and the Canadian workman is increased food prices. The government, as a result of rocketing food prices which had no relation to what farmers were getting, established the Food Prices Review Board, and Mrs. Plumptre was named as its chairperson. Many predatory price practices were identified by her posse, including double ticketing and products artificially enhanced by the use of such things as red lights over meat counters, etc., etc. She, apparently, gave the green light to monopoly pricing by large corporations such as the Weston empire, and she also began to attack labour in Canada, completely disregarding the structure of the so-called free enterprise system. With this monopoly pricing the effect of the present anti-combines legislation is as useless as horns on a cow. This is not the first time we in Canada have seen an all-out attack on inflation by the Liberal government.

An hon. Member: That shows how much you know about cows.

Mr. Rodriguez: I don't know much about bulls either. You will remember that the year was 1971, which was not so long ago, when this government was full of the attack on inflation. We all remember that; it was the first war on inflation. The unemployment rate in Canada at that time was 4.8 per cent and the inflation rate was 3.3 per cent. At that time that was a rate the government could not tolerate, and during that famous war unemployment was increased to 6 per cent. The Prime Minister and the country ought to be reminded of his statement. Then he called his policy "strong medicine", and he said at a press conference:

There are a lot of people in this country who are bargaining that, oh well, the government can't hang tough for too long because the government will only get frightened when it sees unemployment go up to six per cent. But if people think we are going to lose our nerve now, they should think again; we're not.

No wonder the Prime Minister does not like the press, because it sometimes reports what he says. The government did not win that battle against inflation. As a matter of fact, now we not only have high unemployment we also have high inflation. Who were the fall out victims of that war? They were the unemployed, some 700,000 of them. Let us not forget who were the ones really hurt by that high unemployment. Those who were hurt the worst in that war on inflation were those workers under the age of 25. The youngest workers in Canada were hurt by that war on inflation. The unemployment rate among the under 25 age group became the highest among all groups unemployed in Canada, and inflation hit double digit figures. That was the battle the government fought then.

Now the Liberals have decided that once again inflation is their enemy No. 1, and once again we are to be treated with another dose of strong medicine. This time they will not admit that they are starting out deliberately to increase unemployment. But thousands and thousands of Canadians will be out of work, which will perhaps be somewhat of an embarrassment to the government.

This time the government is controlling the wages of Canadian workers in spite of the fact that many of them have not even started to catch up with inflation and corporate profits over the last few years. Fortunately in the United States and in most of the rest of the world there are some indications that inflation has already started to come down. This time, unlike the last time, the Liberals may not be able to double our rate of unemployment through their mismanagement. The government is now proposing wage and price controls, which makes it obvious that the Liberals are willing to steal a policy from anyone who happens to have one.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And they are not very good thieves.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, they are not. This reminds me very much of a story printed in primary readers about the jackdaw and the peacock. The jackdaw was such a dreary looking creature that he wanted to enhance his looks. He saw a peacock strutting around the farm yard, and when feathers fell from the peacock he took those feathers and stuck them into his body and strutted around the barnyard. The jackdaws rejected him because he was obviously not a jackdaw and they could see that, and of course he was not a peacock because he had stolen the feathers. As a result he was lonely and out in the cold.

What have the Liberals done this time? They have picked up a Conservative policy, an incredibly cynical move considering they fought an election and won on opposition to price controls. In that campaign the Prime Minister called the controls "a proven disaster looking for a place to happen".

In his budget speech in May of last year the former finance minister said:

In our fight against inflation, I have rejected two possible approaches . . . the second approach, urged upon us by the official opposition, is to impose a general system of price and wage controls. This would be totally ineffective in overcoming the kind of inflationary problem we have been and still are facing. What we need, still, is not controls, but an increase in supply.

Just this month in an interview with Peter Newman of Maclean's magazine the Prime Minister admitted that controls were useless. This is what the Prime Minister said:

Controls themselves, whether it be a full freeze or control of prices and incomes, do not solve the underlying malaise of people generally trying to get more out of the economy than they put into it. If controls were a proper and effective device to change that psychology, we'd say, "Well, it's easy. Let's put on controls and one year down the road we'll take them off, and there'll be no more inflation." But I think every experience I know of—most recently the United States and the British experiences—is to the effect that when you take controls off you begin more or less where you were before.

Obviously the Prime Minister as late as within the last few weeks was admitting that wage and price controls are not the answer to the underlying malaise affecting the economy.

The entire anti-inflation program presented to us is in four parts, and it is worth while examining those parts.

The white paper lists the first part as being:

—fiscal and monetary policy aimed at increasing total demand and production at a rate consistent with the climbing inflation.

For years the government has tried to treat inflation as a simple problem of demand management. Using high interest rates and other deterrents the government has not only managed to decrease seriously the use of our industrial capacity, but it has almost destroyed the chances for average Canadians to own their own homes. It is doubtful that the government's use of monetary and fiscal controls will be any more effective or sensitive to the needs of the Canadian people than it has ever been.

The second plank in the government's platform is:

Government expenditure policies aimed at limiting the growth of public expenditures and the rate of increase in Public Service employment.

How coincidental it is that just a couple of weeks ago the mandarins in the federal civil service received very handsome increases indeed, and all before midnight of Thanksgiving! How convenient that this policy did not come down until after the Bank of Canada's glass tower was up a few blocks from here, at a cost of $35 million!

Under what rationale or logic did the government spend $250,000 in taxpayers' money for a party for 3,000 honoured guests at Mirabel? The government spent $250,000 for a meal for 3,000 people, most of whom are probably well-heeled enough to afford their own. This is $250,000 of taxpayers' money down the drain for a party. I do not understand how the government can turn to the Canadian people, pointing a finger at them and saying that those people out there have to start tightening their belts, when the place to start tightening the belt is right here. I think it is phony, false, and hypocritical of it to say in effect, "don't do what I do, do what I say".

I think the people are quite right in saying to the government: "Up your noses. Until you start doing the kind of things you ought to do, giving the example you ought to give as parliamentarians, we will not follow."

It seems to me there are certainly large areas of public expense which could be cut, or even eliminated. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) asked for suggestions. Since I have been here I have heard the opposition consistently calling for the abolition of Information Canada. That is a splendid example of something that could be cut and would not be missed at all. But there are better examples yet.

I understand the estimated advertising budget for the federal government is over $35 million, by far the highest advertising budget of any marketing organization in the country. It has been suggested that the public relations function of the government may add as much as another $50 million to this bill. What are they trying to sell us for all these millions upon millions of dollars? The latest example we will be paying for is the scandalous wage and control monstrosity entitled Bill C-73, where members of the board who have already been named will be earning in the vicinity of $50,000 to $60,000. If that is the kind of restraint being urged upon the Canadian people then I cannot blame the Canadian people for being cynical about the kind of legislation being brought forward in this bill.

It would indeed be interesting to tally up the full amount the government finally spends on advertising and the p.r. work to sell this wage and price package to a skeptical public which is in no mood to accept the glib solutions the government would like to put before it.

When the government starts swinging its axe to cut expenditures, however, it will not be advertising or Information Canada which feels the blade. Instead it will be such areas as unemployment insurance and medicare, in respect of which the government has already indicated its desire to reduce spending.

It is rather interesting to note that the government will be coming forward in a couple of weeks with Bill C-69 which will change the financing of unemployment insurance, and which will say to the Canadian people that the government is no longer prepared to accept 4 per cent as a normal unemployment rate and will pick up any deficit in the account over that. The government wants to raise that figure to about 6 per cent. So in effect those who are working and those who are employers who employ workers will be picking up whatever deficits there are. In other words, when the government embarks upon programs which create unemployment it is the unemployed who pay, and it is the workers who work and those who are earning who will carry the burden of the mistakes of the government.

Of course it is those who are unemployed who are blamed. They are called lazy, they are called non-productive; and we have the advertisements about those who go to ski in Alberta and collect unemployment insurance. Those are the headlines that are used to beat them over the head. Benefits are reduced to the people who then are out of work. Indeed this must be some kind of very rough justice. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) talks about rough justice. Maybe that is what he means by rough justice. It is pretty tough on those who do not have jobs.

The third area where the government tells us it is planning to take action involves structural policies to deal with the special problems of energy, food, and housing, to ensure a more efficient and competitive economy and to improve labour-management relations. Since I have been here the first back-to-work legislation I experienced in this House was in 1973.

In the summer of 1973 we put the railway workers back to work. In the debate on that piece of legislation the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the other speakers on the government side got up and said that we must have another look at the collective bargaining process. There has been no look taken at it. Nothing ever gets done. When they are into this particular crisis now they whip out these little glib solutions of wage and price controls, which end up being wage controls, and talk in grandiose terms about improved labour-management relations. That is all I ever hear about around here. They will probably set up a committee to study it. Part of this area, we are told, relates to the need for substantial upward adjustment in particular areas of the price structure if adequate new supplies are to be forthcoming.

The second problem relates to the need for more competition and flexibility in the economy. The government is obviously referring to energy when it speaks of the need for prices to rise, in spite of the fact that oil company profits have risen despite the freeze on oil prices in several provinces. But it would at least be very interesting to know to what other particular areas it is referring. And it would also be interesting to know if this need for upward prices refers only to a chance for other industries to increase their profits with the government's blessing.

Discussion of the need for increased competition perhaps best reveals exactly how cynical the government is about this new legislation. It is the large, powerful, and concentrated corporations that have been the cause of much, and certainly reaped the benefit of most, of the inflation. This point was recognized by the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), when he spoke to a Rotary club recently in Windsor. In his talk he quoted an American economist, Gardner C. Means, who had found that in the 12 months of economic decline starting at December, 1973, companies with a high degree of market power increased their wholesale prices by 27 per cent, while wholesale prices in firms in competitive industries rose by less than 5 per cent.

The former minister went on further to say that while the economist's research presumably deals with companies located in the United States, the similar organization of our economy made it likely that such research in Canada would show similar results. He also suggested that while the ability of companies to impose administered prices on the market place was not the only cause of inflation, it is an area of concern that should not be overlooked. But overlooked this problem has been for the last ten years since the government referred the whole question of competition to the Economic Council of Canada.

The Economic Council had some harsh things to say about our free enterprise system. In its report on competition policy in 1969 the Economic Council of Canada said that in many areas of activity monopolistic tendencies have all but eliminated competitive market responses. The council also pointed out that in 1964 in more than one third of Canadian manufacturing industries as few as eight firms accounted for over 80 per cent of shipments in the industry. Oligopoly, or a market characterized by a few sellers rather than one or many, is probably the most common form of market structure in the Canadian economy, the report said. And they went on to say that many studies have proven that there exists, on the average a positive relationship between high levels of concentration and high profit levels.

The Economic Council of Canada pointed all this out, plus the fact that our economy was already more concentrated than the American economy and plus the fact that there tended to be a positive relationship between concentration in an industry and foreign domination of that industry.

The government's reaction to all this, to pressures even the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs seems to feel are inflationary, was to do nothing. Instead it decided the Canadian people should bear the full brunt of inflation. Instead it piddled around for nine years while concentrated industries made fatter and fatter profits and then, finally this year, it presented a piece of legislation which had been nine years in the making, the Competition Bill, called C-2, which is useless to stop the monopolistic excesses of the large corporations.

It took nine years for that bill to see the House of Commons. As a matter of fact that is the same period of time for the gestation of an elephant and many, myself included, would consider that Bill C-2 is nothing but a white elephant. We are told that Phase II of the competition bill, which will come down some day, will deal with monopolies, takeovers, all sorts of interlocking directorships and so on. I understand that before this can happen the minister intends to present the bill again for discussion. I thought the friends of the government who had already got to go over the bill had said enough, but apparently they feel they have not. So, while nothing is being done about oligopolies and their contribution to inflation, we have Phase IV of the government's program, wage controls. I say wage controls because it is obvious that in many cases prices are already out of control. The controls are described in this way:

A prices and incomes policy which establishes guidelines for responsible social behaviour in determining prices and incomes of groups, together with machinery for administering these guidelines and ensure compliance where necessary.

Almost everything about this bill is unacceptable to myself, my party and, I am sure, to the majority of the Canadian people. Wage controls, for example, are childishly simple to use, and it is obvious the government is itching to use them. But ministers have designed a bill whereby they will not even find it necessary to dirty their hands by dealing directly with the unions. Instead they can simply order an employer not to go outside of the guidelines by paying wages that might have been negotiated. And we are sure it will break the heart of many of those 1,500 so called large employers to say, "Sorry boys, but we cannot give you that wage increase because the government says we cannot give you any more than 10 per cent, and if we do we are liable to a fine, imprisonment, or both".

If the large employers will find it easy to tell their unions that, then how much easier will it be for the smaller, non-unionized firms to tell their employees they cannot give them an increase. I am sure the Prime Minister will get all the co-operation he wants from employers when it comes to voluntary restraints. They will refuse wage hikes under the smoke screen of patriotism. I am sure we will hear the word "patriotism" bandied about. It is patriotic not to give more than 10 per cent. That reminds me of the saying that patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel.

The government has repeatedly said that these controls are designed to help the little guy. The Minister of Finance said on television that if these controls are not followed "it is the people at the bottom of the scale who will be worse off". Yet what this legislation does is to maintain and increase the inequities that are already built into our society.

Lower wages in different parts of the country will be frozen at their present differentials. Perhaps most important, the people at the bottom end of the scale will be frozen at a position that has grown relatively worse over the last five years. In July of 1970, when the federal minimum wage was set at $1.65, it represented 55 per cent of the hourly wage in the manufacturing industry. By July, 1975, the federal minimum wage was raised to $2.60, but a level that then represented only 51 per cent of hourly manufacturing earnings.

In the five year period from July, 1970, to July, 1975, the federal minimum wage increased by 58 per cent, while during the same period, hourly earnings in manufacturing increased by 70 per cent. Now the federal government is suggesting a 10 per cent increase for these people. Even if they get this increase—and there is no reason to suspect that all of them will—they would only catch up to the position they enjoyed in 1970 in relation to the manufacturing industry.

In unionized companies labour will now face a double control. It seems to me that what has happened here is the introduction of another level in the collective bargaining process. When you have a group of workers who are organized, they negotiate with their employer under the collective bargaining laws of this country, and they either come to an agreement or they do not. They might order a strike, and then matters sort themselves out through the collective bargaining process. What we have done now is to introduce another level of bargaining for those who are in the collective situation.

Right now companies are saying to those who represent the unions in the bargaining process, "Go to the anti-inflation tribunal and get an approval beyond the 10 per cent". The union representatives go to the tribunal, which says to them, "We cannot deal with the hypothetical case. Make a mutual representation from the employer and the employees, and we will consider it". It seems to me that that is not the way the manufacturers are treated.

It is interesting to note that on page 18 of the white paper there is a discrepancy between the way workers are treated and the way manufacturers are treated. The process is outlined thus:

> If, however, a firm can demonstrate to the Anti-Inflation Board that it would be impractical or harmful to the national interest for it to price in the domestic market differently than the international market, the firm will not be regarded as having failed to follow the guidelines if it prices all its products at international prices, but would be subject to the special levy on all its profits. Once firms have received permission to be treated in a particular way, they will continue to be treated that way for the whole of the program.

So here we are going to have manufacturers and producers going to the Anti-Inflation Board and asking, "Will you approve this price increase, this pricing system?". In effect it has been the practice in Canada that when such tribunals give such advice to corporations which come before them they advise them in the letter of the law rather than the spirit of the law.

However, the union cannot go to the Anti-Inflation Board and ask to be advised whether its demand, which is in line with that of the international union in the United States, such as would be the case with the UAW, will be all right in the domestic market when dealing with the company. Surely the Anti-Inflation Board will say it cannot deal with a hypothetical situation in a unilateral way, and will advise them to make a representation with the company so that both of them come together before the board for approval. There is a discrepancy here, and an injustice in the way in which workers are treated as opposed to the treatment of those who manufacture products for sale.

The companies will have a great deal else to be happy about. Even the Minister of Finance admitted that it was arguable that "there is no way of preventing an army of company accountants circumventing the guidelines by padding costs and manipulating profits". His argument, however, was that the NDP had wanted a board which would also watch and possibly roll back some of the oligopoly prices. It is the government's legislation which is under debate, not this party's. There is a large difference between a board proposed by the NDP and the one proposed under this legislation. The difference is one of attitude at least, and in a will to use the legislation it handles.

It is impossible to believe that the odd couple now running the Anti-Inflation Board are serious about controlling company profits.

Who is this chap, Jean-Luc Pepin? He is the scion of some of the greatest corporations in Canada, namely, the Power Corporation, Canada Celanese, Canadian Steamship, Sidbec Corporation, etc. It is he who will decide what is an acceptable wage for the working class people, this man who is on the board of directors of several large corporations, and earns a salary of $50,000 to $60,000 a year. He will say to the workers making $4.10 a hour and who want $1.50 more, "You are too greedy, tighten your belt." I tell you, it is quite a pair you have there. This man's experiences are such that he represents the privileged class in this country, and this is the kind of discrepancy at which the working people will be looking. They will be saying, "Who is this fellow making $60,000 a year and telling us that $5 an hour is greedy?" All I can say is that this government has a lot of gall.

And who is Beryl Plumptre? She has made it clear where her sympathies lie. One of the members of my party made the point the other day that when it came to reasons for food cost increases Plumptre could see only two things—producers and marketing boards. He was right as far as he went, but he forgot that she can also see labour and blame them, as she did recently during a grocery clerks' strike in British Columbia.

When she looked at corporate profits, in spite of the fact that some industries had increased their profits dramatically, she concluded that because other companies had increased their profits dramatically also, this was all right.

When it came to marketing boards, she was even worse. When chicken producers increased their return by 3 cents a pound, she howled, in spite of the fact that their percentage of the retail price had declined and despite the fact that the price of chicken had risen by 20 cents. Where did the other 17 cents go, and why was she not concerned about that?

Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) noticed that she was visibly upset by every gain to producers through marketing boards, yet when pork, which is not controlled, increased in price by 100 per cent, she made no comment; suddenly she was silent.

The Minister of Finance has told us repeatedly that profits can be controlled anyway because "for a long time we've had an effective income tax system to catch profits". If that is the case, then for a long time my party has been arguing that we need a new catcher. Every week papers such as the Financial Post publish a new loophole in which profits can be hidden, not to mention the obvious loophole which the government has deliberately created. This bill says nothing about capital gains, and surely this is one way in which companies, by retaining earnings and driving up stock values, will be able to return money to their investors.

Company profits will rise under this bill. First, as has already been pointed out, because profit levels are based on the previous five years, profits will rise over the next two years as the five year base moves. Second, productivity is bound to rise in this country as a natural recovery occurs in the world economy. Government policies of the last few years have ensured that the capacity of the manufacturing industry was underutilized. So, if natural improvements in the world economy take place and the present excess capacity begins to be used, it will be impossible for the corporations not to make large gains in productivity, and with them large gains in profit. These controls admit quite openly that large gains in productivity "resulting from the efforts of the firm, or of favourable cost developments which could not reasonably have been anticipated" will be allowed to the firm. Working people, on the other hand, have been strictly limited to a 2 per cent share in the increased productivity. I presume that this is more rough justice.

I noted before that when it comes to concentrated industries and their inflationary profits, the Economic Council of Canada has made clear that many of these firms were foreign dominated. They will have no difficulty dreaming up new expenses for their Canadian subsidiaries to pass through the economy and home to head office in New York. Even Northern Electric is setting up its international office in the United States, so Canadian companies too will be able to avoid these provisions.

Even some of Canada's business leaders, while giving cautious support to the bill, have had some reservations. Both the president of the Bank of Montreal and representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have indicated that while the bill might do some good, it would have been a great deal more useful 18 months ago. My party does not agree with this, of course, but it is an interesting comment on the ability of the government to make its timing and programs useless to everyone.

Soon we will be stuck with a bill which gives unprecedented power to government bureaucrats and hacks of various kinds, without any review by parliament. The government wants the right to change the guidelines at will without having to suffer the indignity of going before parliament and justifying its actions.

It is at least reasonable that the government will not want to discuss this bill again, for it can have only one of two effects—either its restraints will be successful in stopping any economic recovery, thereby throwing thousands more Canadians out of work, or the economy will recover in spite of it. The Minister of Finance has admitted that much of our inflation is imported, so just perhaps, Madam Speaker, we can import our recovery in spite of this bill.

I read recently that there has been a downturn in inflation throughout the world. The United States has just enjoyed the largest percentage gain in its GNP in 20 years. Inflation in the world, particularly in our closest trading partner, is in a downward spiral, and I tend to be very cynical about this kind of measure. The wage and price controls are to come off in three years, and it is also very significant that in three years there will be a federal election. I wonder if because inflation is on a downward spiral the government throws up this sham, Bill C-73; then of course in spite of the bill inflation will come down, and the government in 1978 will lift its wage and price controls and claim that its policy worked, at the same time claiming good government as a reason for re-election. That is the kind of scenario I see, and it is a cynical one on the part of the government.

It seems to me that common sense would make government members see the inequities in this wage control bill. Surely they can see that those who are unorganized and poor will not even receive the benefit of the 10 per cent on an average wages of $6,000 per year, or $600. They will not necessarily receive that. The fact is that they will probably receive much less. Surely hon. members opposite can see the inadequacies and the injustice of this bill.

The minister on television the other night said that this bill would go through second reading tomorrow or in a couple of days. I do not know what he was reading, but because of the need to amend this bill in a very effective way and to give it some kind of justice—it ought to be comprehensive and just, which it is not—it seems to me that hon. members should not permit this bill to become law until many of the inequities are corrected, so that we can pass legislation which is fair to all, whether they be high income earners or poor people in Canada.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Leader!

Mr. Grafftey: As we address ourselves to this bill, we cannot debate it in particular without a brief economic review of Canada over the past four years, and of what has brought about the necessity of imposing this kind of harsh legislation.

After seven and a half years of Trudeau socialism, and that is what we must call it—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. All hon. members who wish to participate will be allowed to do so later. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) now has the floor.

Mr. Grafftey: As I go across the country and people ask me what I mean by Trudeau socialism, I say that it is a very easy story to tell.

An hon. Member: Speak on the bill.

Mr. Grafftey: I can understand the frustration of the hon. member, but she will just have to sit there and bear it.

Between 1958 and 1962 when there were mostly Liberals and Conservatives in this House I remember going back to my province, the province of Quebec, and very often around the island of Montreal there would be various forums in which people wanted the Liberal Party, the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party to be represented. It was easy to find members from the Liberal side and the Progressive Conservative side, but in a noblesse oblige fashion the various institutions invariably invited the NDP to send a representative to these many meetings. The same person always turned up, and he gave the extreme socialist line—the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who at that time was a part time professor at the university of Montreal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: This may be difficult to listen to, but sit back and listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I know that hon. members opposite do not like this story, but it is going to be told, and told again and again.

In the 1963 elections the Prime Minister voted for, worked for, and contributed to the New Democratic Party—caught the political bug, if you will—but he knew one thing we do not do in Quebec; that we do not send socialists to Ottawa. Instead of working with such honourable Canadians as Charles Taylor to build up the NDP, the Prime Minister took on the Liberal Party and, whether we like it or not, what we have in Canada today is Trudeau socialism.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Grafftey: It is because of Trudeau socialism, purely and simply, that we have this kind of legislation before us today. After seven and a half years of Trudeau socialism, what do we have? We have something which is almost impossible to attain in any country in the modern western world—record inflation, record unemployment, record regional disparities, and what is even worse, a record balance of payments deficit.

Spokesmen for the government keep prattling the same propaganda that, compared to the other countries in the western world, we are not doing too badly. I say that we are doing very badly compared to most countries in the western world. If you consider our potential, consider what we could do if the government would direct the economy of Canada decently, we are doing very badly indeed.

I hear government spokesmen justifying the government's abominable economic record. When I hear such spokesmen comparing our country with other countries of the western world, they remind me of the boy who has not done one bit of studying in school and who, when facing his exams, says, "I don't care if I flunk, because everybody else is flunking with me." Is that not a grand attitude? Hearing comparisons between our country and other countries of the western world is no solace for those who have suffered because of the government's mismanagement of the economy.

Compare our present situation with that of 15 years ago. Who, today, can purchase his own home in this country?

Mr. Hees: Hardly anyone.

Mr. Grafftey: How much encouragement is given for the small businessman to buy his own business?

Mr. Hees: None at all.

Mr. Grafftey: How much encouragement are you giving the farmer either to stay on or to buy his own farm?

Mr. Hees: None at all.

Mr. Grafftey: And, compared with other countries of the western world, how much legislation is there on our statute books to encourage Canadian investment in Canadian enterprise?

Mr. Hees: Precious little.

Mr. Grafftey: Madam Speaker, that is the background we must consider when debating the present negative legislation. After seven and a half years of Trudeau socialism—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: —we have lost much of our economic freedom.

An hon. Member: Say that outside the House.

Mr. Grafftey: We said it in Hochelaga.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: And we shall keep on saying it in the next election, when we shall win many seats in Quebec.

After seven and a half years of Trudeau socialism we, in this country, have lost much of our economic freedom. If you do not think so just cross this country and ask individual Canadians. I think—and on this I agree with the NDP—that there are many aspects of freedom other than economic freedom; yet I firmly believe that when we lose much of our economic freedom, we lose much of our political freedom. Future historians will say that never in the history of Canada was this country directed by such a bunch of economic illiterates as we have today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: What else has happened to the Canadian economy since it came under the dictates of Trudeau socialism seven and a half years ago? When the Prime Minister took over the direction of this government seven and half short years ago—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: —only 30 per cent of our Gross National Product was taken up by the public sector. Now the share taken by the public sector has risen from 30 per cent to practically 40 per cent. Yet Sweden, a country calling itself the jewel of socialism in the western world, directs only 32 per cent of its gross national product to its public sector, proportionately a full 8 percentage points less than Canada directs to the public sector.

Perhaps one should not make these kinds of comparisons with other countries. Nonetheless, whatever you may think about the Swedish system, you must concede that Sweden has introduced many dynamic programs in the fields of environment, housing, and medicare. Those programs are in place in Sweden only because they are well run and because on the statute books of that country, but not of this country, there are many positive laws which provide tax incentives and encourage the private sector to generate taxes which pay for these programs. And what has happened in this country? The government is always compromising with the NDP—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It's the truth, and it hurts.

Mr. Grafftey: I know it hurts, and this is only the beginning. If you think it hurts now wait until we get really tough.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are losing votes right now.

Mr. Grafftey: What sort of programs have governments introduced in this country since the end of the second world war? This government, for short-term political gain, has been compromising with the NDP. Why, many of our programs are half socialist, half free enterprise. They bilk the taxpayer and they are just not working.

Mr. Nystrom: You sound like a frustrated Social Crediter.

Mr. Grafftey: Madam Speaker, I am not sure if the Prime Minister wanted to fire the previous minister of finance, or whether the minister quit. Perhaps it was a combination of both. Perhaps, after introducing four of the worst budgets ever presented in the history of this House, the former minister tried to blame the Prime Minister, or perhaps the Prime Minister blamed the minister. I can imagine the scenario. The minister was backed into a corner. He had listened to the conventional wisdom advice proffered by the Bank of Canada and his officials, advice which was based on Keynesian economics. The point is that under the Keynesian concept, the deficit or surplus, as the case may be, was meant to be budgeted for when only 30 per cent, or at most 33 per cent, of the Gross National Product is absolved by the public sector. At present 40 per cent goes to the public sector. Hence there is no leeway in which for the government or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to manoeuvre. That is why we are in our present mess, a mess which the present Minister of Finance will not be able to correct without the leadership and support of the Prime Minister.

The ball game for Canada and Canadians is almost over, largely because the government has budgeted and dealt recklessly with the short-term windfalls accruing to us from our non-renewable natural resources.

As I consider the background to our plight and as I consider the mess our country is in because of the government's doctrinaire approach, I am proud to call myself a Progressive Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: In essence this means that we support humane, decent, and civilized social legislation but, compared to the Trudeau socialistic policies of today, conservative economic fiscal and monetary policies.

This country has suffered from the economic lunacy of the government. I am sure that ministers of the Crown would love to present a list of programs we should embark on in the field of social welfare. But, because of the negative economic policies of the government, we have not generated in this country the kind of growth in the private sector which will support dynamic programs. I say most emphatically that the truth of my remarks will be borne out by any member who wishes to cross this country, who puts his ear to the ground and listens to the grassroots. Never before in my 14 years as a member of this House have I heard the Canadian people calling more definitely and clearly for an alternative to this government, for a constructive conservative alternative to the Trudeau socialism we are getting today.

● (2100)

Mr. Grafftey: Speaking in more detail in relation to the specific legislation we are discussing, in concert with my leader—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: We have a leader of the Progressive Conservative Party who is universally respected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I will not split hairs and get into the details as to whether the legislation proposed by the government is exactly like the legislation proposed by us in the last election. I will not get into the specific details as to whether our approach was different than theirs. With the government, we recognize that inflation is a problem to be licked, and with the government, putting Canada before party, we hope it will be licked, not only in Canada, but in the whole western world. However, I would like to serve notice on the government that we firmly believe this legislation cannot and should not pass through this House of Commons unless there is a little bit of give and take on third reading vis-à-vis the constructive, not partisan, amendments we will be putting forward for the good of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: That is not to say that I am not a little suspicious. I know the government with all its good intentions. The first thing it will make sure happens is that there will be a sprawling bureaucracy. It is more than passing strange that the greatest detailed attention they gave to putting this program in effect, even before they explained to the cabinet what the program was all about, was slowly but surely to get an army of bureaucrats into the 28 regions. I am a little suspicious about the government's good intentions in terms of not wanting, demanding, or having an army of bureaucrats to implement this kind of legislation.

Speakers from this side of the House who preceded me alluded to the fact that the government must lead by example. Although we get pretty partisan on the floor of this House, members of the opposition also suffer when governments lose their credibility, as this government is losing its credibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Having presided over a budget increase of $10 billion to $36 billion in seven and a half years, all of a sudden the Prime Minister on the eve of a by-election by some unknown stroke, and I would like to do a little investigating about that, got on prime time television. Having spent and spent, and spent some more, he went before the Canadian people and said, "Do as I say, not as I do."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Having spent this country into the worst economic mess it has been in since the last depression, he had the nerve to go on public television and say, "Forget about it all. We did not do it. You, Mr. Laborer, and you, Mr. Management, buckle your belts." It reminded me of a drunk preaching temperance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Let us make no mistake about it. Economists rarely agree on anything, but one thing on which they do agree is that the number one reason for domestic inflation in Canada today has been the reckless regard of this government in terms of spending. When you compare it with any country in the western world, we come out the worst.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I will underline, for the second and the third time, that each and every member of this House, putting country before party, hopes that this legislation—amended, mind you—will do something to better the situation for all Canadians in terms of the fight against inflation. However, I want to underline again and again that this program cannot work in a vacuum.

I am not going to get into the ballgame of quoting percentages. I know that a fixed rate of increasing the money supply by the Bank of Canada in relation to the monetary policy could, as our leader has said time and time again, create unnecessary tight money situations in many parts of this country. However, surely the time has come with an anti-inflation program of this nature to co-ordinate it with deep and profound monetary and fiscal reform.

I hope the government and its minions have learned their lesson, that you just cannot let the printing presses roll ad infinitum. There must be some co-ordinated, constructive and organized policy vis-à-vis monetary reform in the printing of money, fiscal reform, and this present program. Suffice it to say that this program will not work in a vacuum without meaningful and profound fiscal and monetary reform, and it must be indicated to Canadians, not tomorrow, but right away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Stop treating the Canadian people like a bunch of imbeciles. I hope not too many people read the white paper given to members on this side of the House, and which it is intended will bring restraint and leadership to restore the government's lost credibility. I read it time and again. It was plagued with loopholes and euphemisms, saying we don't really mean it. Leadership and restoring credibility are the only way this program can work.

If we do not have fiscal reform sooner than later, do not for one minute expect this ad hoc program to work in a vacuum, because it won't. Within six weeks time from this present moment, the Minister of Finance should bring down a new budget. I know that his bureaucrats will tell him it cannot be done. Having served a very great minister of finance as his parliamentary secretary over ten years ago, I know it can be done. Where there's a will, there's a way.

The government must bring down a budget within six weeks, not white papers full of loopholes but a budget indicating its real and meaningful intentions. That budget should indicate at least a $1½ billion tax cut across the board coupled with a $1½ billion cut in current government expenditures. I am not going to fall into the old question and answer game of what specific programs should be cut.

An hon. Member: Information Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: Information Canada, right out the window, $15 million. I know the old game. It might have been relevant ten years ago. The member from the New Democratic Party who spoke just a few minutes ago, as well as the other economic illiterates, should pay some attention to better management of programs. I can suggest better management of the UIC without changing one iota of the substance of the law. In other words, there should be better co-ordination between UIC offices, in Sherbrooke and everywhere else, and Manpower offices. Better administration of this fund alone would save the taxpayer about $1 billion a year. There should be better management of medicare. This would save money. Therefore, don't ask me what programs should be cut.

If they only thought this was important, then along with the $1.5 billion tax cut which should come with a new budget within six weeks, we could secure a saving of at least $1.5 billion in current expenditure, not by eliminating programs but by increasing efficiency, and the gain in credibility would be enormous. The only way in which the government could demonstrate to the Canadian people that it was really serious about a program of restraint would be to adopt such a program as I have described. Do not expect to build up in the private sector the good will which will be needed in order to make this program effective in the absence of a positive commitment from government itself.

I should like the government to indicate that the growth in fiscal expenditures for the next budget year is to be frozen at 8 per cent and that there will be an immediate freeze in the expansion of the bureaucracy—this includes the army of minions to be set up across the country to enforce this legislation.

What is even more important, this new budget must be one designed primarily to get the economy moving again. The government must stop bad-mouthing the private sector. All the businessmen I have talked to—businessmen who are every bit as good Canadians as we are, working hand in hand with labour and making this country go—say that when they come to Ottawa they have a feeling that the Prime Minister and his cabinet think they are a bunch of criminals.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I have spoken to businessmen from one end of the country to the other, some of them well into their sixties. And they tell me that never in all their working years have they come to Ottawa and met with such a lousy and unsympathetic hearing from a government, which one day is anti-labour and another day is anti-business, depending on which minister is speaking.

An hon. Member: And what are you?

Mr. Grafftey: I am in favour of government, labour, and business working together in co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Apart from the freezing of the bureaucracy, the freezing of expenditures, and the cuts in taxation which should be a part of this budget to be brought down in six weeks, the package must inaugurate a whole area of incentives, tax and otherwise, to get the economy moving again. This means more Canadians being able to own their own homes, or own small businesses; it means more Canadians being able to buy farms or stay on their farms.

Not least important, the new budget must make room for certain provisions to encourage Canadians to invest in Canadian enterprises, be it in equities or in any other way. As a Progressive Conservative I believe that democracy is well served when an individual citizen is encouraged to have an ownership stake in his country. Under doctrinaire Trudeau socialism, conventional wisdom is that the government should own and control everything. That is one of the reasons why we are in the mess in which we find ourselves today and are obliged to resort to this kind of negative legislation.

I have tried to articulate in general outline a constructive conservative economic philosophy as opposed to the Trudeau socialism we are getting. But in the social field this budget should have many positive things to say about housing. For instance, it should provide for the complete elimination of the sales tax on building materials and for tax exemptions, if you will, in respect of mortgage interest payments and local property tax payments. And, I would add, in co-operation with the private sector, especially in large metropolitan areas, there should be provision for setting up land banks.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would say we hope this legislation, be it ever so late, will do something to alleviate a situation which is largely of the government's own making.

An hon. Member: Rubbish!

Mr. Grafftey: An hon. member says "rubbish". I am not sure he can spell it, but he says it. We shall be offering amendments and we hope for the good of Canada that members opposite, especially those on the treasury benches, will view those amendments in a bipartisan spirit, because we would not want it to fail two years from now and then have the dubious honour of saying "We told you so." I say once again that the program cannot work in a vacuum in the absence of a clear indication to the Canadian people that the government is serious about co-ordinating a fiscal and monetary policy to go along with it. If we all work together in a spirit of harmony across this House I am sure much can be done to confront the grave economic problems which are facing the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that on entering this debate I should make some comment about certain of the things which have been said by other participants in it. The comments of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat were somewhat confusing to me. If I understood him rightly he said we were interfering with the economy too much. Then he went on to say we should be directing the economy to a greater extent than we are. He talked about private enterprise, and I could not help thinking of that great private enterprise province called Alberta, one which has more socialist ownership than any other region in Canada and which is daily extending this ownership under the present government out there.

One or two members made comments about cabinet ministers using the executive jet fleet we have. I think I should put it on record just how many aircraft we have in this great executive jet fleet. We have three Jet Stars, of which two were bought at the time the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister of this country in 1962; I am told they were kept in the hangars all through that year for some unknown reason—I do not know whether it was to curtail inflation or whether they were scared to use them. The third was bought second hand by the right hon. gentleman's successor, the late Mr. Pearson, when he was prime minister. That is the jet executive fleet that we have. All of these aircraft are older than 12 years.

Then I come to the other great executive fleet. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) knows some of these planes very well. He traded in his old King Aire on a new plane, and it is available for cabinet ministers to fly in when it is not broken down. Then there are two other aircraft. They are Viscounts; one is 23 years of age and the other 24. They are kept, I am told, in top flying shape at all times but you can use them only for short trips, and so on, within the immediate area of Ottawa. Then there are the small Falcons owned by the military and which military pilots use to get in their flying hours. So they might as well fly us, as fly around just to get in their hours.

In protection of all the people who use these planes let me say this. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) was at the meeting the other night when I mentioned the fact that the wind nearly blew us off the runway when we came in to land at the airport at Medicine Hat. The expert pilot immediately gunned the motor and we came round again with a little more force and landed. No one on the plane knew that he was having any difficulty at all. I do not believe he was because he had the aircraft under full control. The aircraft blew out a tire, but we did not even know about this until we pulled up in front of the little terminal at Medicine Hat. The pilots who fly both the military planes and the old Jet Stars make sure they are in as good a shape as possible, and they are pretty darned careful with them.

I used a little Falcon when I went on official government business to the Balkan countries just recently. Do you know what the common comment was when we pulled up in front of the terminal, Mr. Speaker? It was: "How come you come from such a big country and you have such a little airplane?" I said that we had a problem in Canada called inflation and that we would not be buying any new airplanes until we were in a position to say that we had cured inflation. Even these planes have to be constantly under surveillance to make sure they are in proper flying condition. The military crews do as excellent a job as the DOT crews as far as I am concerned, and I feel perfectly safe in their hands. Actually I feel safer there in these old planes that we use, which people call the jet fleet, than I do in a car on the highways.

When the former minister of finance was holding one of his anti-inflation meetings here I happened to be at the airport that day—I think I was flying Air Canada on that occasion—and I could not help but notice that each of five chief executives from the Toronto area arrived in a big jet. There were Gulfstream II's all lined up and so on. One fellow I used to know well from a mining company arrived in a big Gulfstream II, and he is one of the people the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) talked about. There are four of or five of them in the hangar which never seem to be used. I considered asking them to give us a ride now and then when ours had broken down. I remember one time when one of our old Viscounts broke down in Toronto and all of these planes were idle, and I know why the hon. Member for Calgary South traded in his old King Aire—it was not very dependable. I just wanted to put the record straight on the jet fleet that we use.

I am not ashamed to use this fleet at any time to take government to the people of this country. We could never, in this big country of ours, do this by commercial airline. We could never have the meetings we have, with all our staff and so on, in a commercial airliner. You could never get sufficient privacy for that kind of meeting. Anyone who says that a cabinet minister can use a commercial aircraft the same as anyone else just does not know the facts. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), or any other member, will tell you the same thing, Mr. Speaker.

I think we should be realistic when we listen to speeches about leadership, inflation, and government spending. Everyone asks for leadership. Why? Because the state of the economy is the most topical subject in Canada today. Everybody is talking about it. I ask hon. members to read the speeches in Hansard; they are all directed to what the federal government is doing about inflation.

We have taken some very bold steps in our fight to break inflation and the inflation syndrome. We had reached the point where inflation was feeding itself. People had come to expect inflation and were making excessive wage demands and marking up prices in the expectation that it would continue, and continue to get worse. We must bring inflation to its knees. We must change the attitude that we can take more out of the system than we put into it. If we do not change that attitude, inflation is bound to continue.

Inflation has hit the agricultural sector of our economy especially hard. Every time oil prices go up, farmers feel the pinch through increased operating costs for trucks, cars, tractors, machinery, fertilizers, feed, protein, labour and other inputs. Farmers have felt oil price rises as hard as, if not harder than, anyone in society.

Farmers have also been hit hard by wage inflation. Many farmers cannot hire farm labour because they cannot compete with the wage rates offered by industry. Land costs have gone out of sight in many parts of the country because of inflation. In many parts of Canada, land costs bear no relationship to productive agricultural value. It is a simple case of too much money being offered by people who want land—not necessarily to produce food, but as a speculation and a hedge against inflation. Canada must stop inflation in its tracks. To do this, all of us must stop asking for more from the economy than we are putting in. If people want to receive more, they should produce more.

I repeat that farmers have been especially hard hit by inflation. Farmers in all parts of Canada have been caught in the squeeze. The whole problem with inflation and farmers' costs can be illustrated by an experience one of my neighbours had last summer. Near a town called Leamington a farmer had a 14-acre field of yellow beans this summer, and the crop was a good one. That was the root of his problems. For one thing, he could not get sufficient pickers. He had to pay the minimum wage, and he could not pay more or he would have been selling his beans at a loss. The bottom had dropped out of the market for his crop; it was down to 13 cents a pound.

Although the bottom dropped out of the price this farmer could get for his beans, it did not fall out of the labour market. Nor did the bottom fall out of the cost of producing these beans, the cost of machinery, gas, fertilizer or seed. None of these commodities went down in price.

Inflation is deadly to the farm community. That is why I am sure this anti-inflation program will be in the best interests of all, the farmers included. It will also benefit consumers. This government does not want the value of the dollar to drop, and this is the core of the program. We want Canadians to get value for their dollar. However, to get value for their dollar they will have to give value for their dollar. That boils down to productivity.

No farmer is going to be afraid of any program based on productivity. After all, in the last ten years farmers more than doubled their productivity performance. Non-farm sectors only increased their productivity by an average of 40 per cent, and that includes lawyers.

Some hon. members have been critical of the program. They ask, how can farmers and fishermen be exempt from the guidelines when the operations of marketing boards must obey the guidelines? I have heard people say that that is inconsistent. I have heard others say that the anti-inflation board is out to get marketing boards. Neither is true. There is a simple explanation for having marketing boards under the guidelines and not the farmers. Most farmers and fishermen in this country are unorganized, and therefore they have little power to influence the prices they receive. If they do not have a lot of clout in the marketplace, then they cannot command an inflated price. So there is really no need for controls.

Some marketing boards do have more clout in the market place, and that is why they live by the guidelines. Now I wish to deal with the important difference—the difference between unions, professional groups and so on, and the marketing boards.

● (2130)

Marketing boards, even with this clout, cannot gouge. They cannot inflate prices beyond a fair level. Why is that so? It is so because the National Farm Products Marketing Council is the watchdog over national marketing boards. Who is on this council? There are representatives of labour, representatives of the consumers, representatives of producers, and representatives of business on the present council which demands that prices paid to producers be based on the cost of production and a reasonable return for their investment. This is scrutinized each and every week, and that is the consumer protection.

I announced this early in July, and I did so to prevent any agency under federal legislation from gouging consumers or raising prices indiscriminately.

What I am saying is that national marketing agencies are already living under the guidelines of this legislation and, in fact, they have been for months. Members of the opposition should be aware that any individual group could have appealed egg prices set by CEMA, or turkey prices set by the turkey marketing agency, the two boards that are under my jurisdiction. However, nobody did. Not one of the headline grabbers and not one of the members of the opposition who so constantly ridiculed those agencies made an appeal.

I think it is time to be honest with the farmers. They deserve to know that this government and this anti-inflation program are not making them the target of abuse. The only abuse comes from the unfounded allegations that stem from press-hungry members of the opposition and other people who have made no real investigation of how a marketing board works.

I heard one of these statements on CBC this morning in relation to a report made by the Food Prices Review Board yesterday. All I can say is that if egg farmers got paid at the same rate as that individual does for his five-minute contribution on CBC, which is about $600 an hour, you could not afford to buy an egg. Eggs at the present time are selling at the same price they were selling in 1951. I would ask anybody in this House, or any economist anywhere, to tell me what in the world you could buy for the same price today that you paid in 1951. The cheapest and best source of protein in all of Canada today is high quality eggs being produced by some of the most efficient producers of any commodity in this whole country.

Let us go one step further. Any new commodity group wishing to set up a national agency will be forced to justify its prices in the same way. It cannot set up a new agency unless it holds public hearings, and anyone can appear before that forum and state his feelings. The board then considers them and advises the Minister of Agriculture, who in turn advises the government whether there should be a new marketing board.

Strangely enough, producers across Canada are eager to justify the prices of their products and to justify them publicly through marketing boards. I remind you as well that the formula used to set prices for the national egg and turkey agencies was developed by independent experts, the best that could be found in Canada. There is nothing suspicious or inflationary built into the cost structure that presently exists in respect of these commodities, and that cost structure is made public.

The Prices Review Board's biased report on broilers refers to recent years after the provincial marketing boards saved the chicken farmers from oblivion. Why did they not go back to the 1960's when farmers borrowed heavily and invested in buildings and equipment to start in broiler production and were wiped out when the bottom dropped out of that market? You can find broiler houses all over Ontario and other parts of Canada that are as empty as can be because that happened in the 1960's, and these producers have never been able to recoup their losses. Who do members of the opposition think paid for those losses if it was not the producers?

Why did they not investigate and relate the mortgage foreclosures and the desperate measures that broiler farmers had to take until they organized provincial broiler marketing boards in order to stay alive?

There is one statement often repeated by the Prices Review Board that is not founded on fact. Producer marketing boards, it is suggested, restrict production. The fact is that they do not restrict production at all. This is one statement that is completely unfounded on fact. It has been said that they restrict production in order to raise prices. They plan production for plenty of supply, and stabilize prices, and that is the principle of a good marketing board. I have not had time to study the report thoroughly, but the abbreviated report I received from my officials does not point out that the imports of broilers from the United States for this year have experienced a 75 per cent increase in total live and eviscerated birds. There is no border control on them whatsoever. So you can see they do not have a closed market or a monopoly. That is the most farfetched statement I have ever read at any time.

As I have said, these are provincial boards and have not become national marketing boards. They did go through the procedure of holding public hearings but I refused to let them go any further until I was satisfied with the suggestion that their boards should operate under what would really be a national concept. At no time and in no way would I become involved in that.

At no time has there been a shortage of products. In all instances products controlled by marketing boards have more than equalled consumer demand. They have actually produced for a surplus.

The report on broilers from the Prices Review Board states that "it should be possible surely to develop an alternative to supply management." Producers have been seeking methods for 50 years and I challenge the board to come up with another system which they can guarantee to work, instead of dodging their responsibilities.

While they are at it why do they not tell the manufacturers and the processors to ignore supply management? Why do they not tell the bakers to keep producing bread after the market is supplied? Perhaps they should tell the lumber mills not to close, tell the food manufacturers to continue producing, and tell the paper mills and automobile factories not to shut down when supply management warns them to curtail production. Why not have warehouses full of corn flakes? Think how wonderful it would be if newspapers would keep their presses running and sell newspapers at half price to those who cannot afford to pay full price, and here I think of those senior citizens in nursing homes, hospitals, etc. Think of the many places where they could supply these products to the people. This is all food for thought.

We met auto parts manufacturing people last night in this very building. I asked them if they produced parts without an order from some auto manufacturing company. They said: "Of course not. Do you think we are crazy? We do not turn a wheel unless we have an order because we supply the orders and we do not speculate in respect of production in our plants."

Many people think this way in respect of food. Some economists philosophize that you should build up huge quantities of commodities and then disburse them at whatever price you can get. They call this the law of supply and demand.

One member earlier referred to some comments made by the chairman of the old Food Prices Review Board. He said the board did not mention a thing about pork. I agree that very few words are said about pork, but I can tell you that right today there are farmers signing contracts with Japan to supply pork at a price much below the speculative market price which is set from day to day in Canada. They have a clause in their contracts which states that if the cost accelerates they get more for their pork, and if costs go down they agree to sell to Japan for less.

This is a total program with signed contracts which gives them a decent and reasonable return for their investment and their productivity. They will do this for anyone in Canada if anyone wants them to do so, but many people say no, we should leave it up to the old hurly-burly, tumble type of thing involved to get what you can for the net product. This involves the livelihood of families, and they are not going to jeopardize that livelihood in that way. If they can get decent contracts they will produce.

We have lost 25 per cent of our production in one year because these producers depend on the North American market and they were selling below cost so they went out of production. No stabilization board can guarantee them a decent return unless it is done under a supply management program. They will sign contracts with Japan or any group in Canada that wants to take so many tons or thousands of tons of pork, and they will gladly supply it.

When we talk about food costs in Canada I think we should remind ourselves that it is not what some people make it out to be. Inflation in Canada has raised the cost of some foods to higher levels than in the United States. The main reason for the differences is higher wage settlements in Canada than in the United States. For example, average hourly earnings of workers in United States food processing and distribution areas increased by 10 per cent during 1974. In Canada, on the other hand, they went up by 20 per cent. The average hourly earnings in all retailing in Canada increased around 14 per cent.

Other reasons for higher food prices in Canada can be illustrated through profit margins. In many industries in the United States, such as egg production or milk production, farmers are losing money. In Canada, farmers are recovering their cost of production plus a profit in relation to size and investment. They have locked in their prices in respect of dairy production in Canada and cannot get an increase unless the review board goes over their costs, and so on.

There are plenty of examples of where Canadian food cost increases have lagged behind United States increases. Meat costs went up 8.6 per cent in Canada last year; 17 per cent in the United States. Poultry went up 14 per cent in Canada while United States prices jumped 23.8 per cent. Fish went up a little over 1 per cent in Canada while United States prices jumped 9.4 per cent.

Some people in the news media say that Canada lacks a national food policy. This kind of criticism crops up every so often. We have a food policy. I have spoken to farm leaders about this program and they do not think this program locks them into any system. It allows incentive for production. It allows a reasonable increase for extra costs to which they may be subjected. It is something which I think most of them are living with at the present time and have no objection to this program, which I call a program of reason for reasonable people.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, this bill in respect of Canada's economic position today is one which gives me a heavy heart indeed. I entered Canadian politics because I was concerned about Canada. I ran in the last election because I was deeply concerned about Canada. I fully believe that the economic plight in which we find ourselves today is a direct responsibility of the federal government.

It is interesting to note that in 1974 when the Leader of the Conservative Party (Mr. Stanfield) advocated wage and price controls, or an incomes policy, the minister of finance at that time and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advocated up and down across this country that we were in no such dire need of the economic rigidity that would be entailed in such a policy.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who just finished a nonsensical kind of speech which is not even worthy of comment in the limited time available to me tonight, during the last election campaign said that we could not have wage and price controls or freezes on foodstuffs without those prices going right through the farm gate. He campaigned throughout Ontario and stated that food prices would be controlled. He said that control would go right through the farm gate to the manure pile. That was a popular statement during the last campaign. But now he stands up and says these things are necessary and that no farm groups and no established market boards, under the legislation or under the marketing council, will have a word of complaint to say about this legislation particularly after he gets done talking to them because he is such a persuasive speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It depends on whose manure pile you are talking about.

Mr. Horner: Yes, I guess it depends on whose manure pile you are talking about. It is widely believed and widely accepted that in 1974 I was not exactly fussy about wage and price controls. I was not fussy because I could foresee some of the rigidities that would be built into our society. I could foresee some of the difficulties that might come about through loss of productivity because of it. I could also foresee in 1974 that the inflationary cycle, which started in what might be called the western world, was started because of a rapid devaluation of the United States dollar. Our dollar was devalued at about the same rate right along with it, prior to December of 1973.

We have a little different situation now, and certainly we have quite a different program to answer the different problem today. One might say the first cycle in inflation was caused by the rapid devaluation of the dollar, and that the second round of inflation was caused by what might be called excessive demand through labour or collective bargaining by unions in our society. Today we see a government come forward with wage and price controls in a very sloppy and haphazard manner.

I think it is important to recognize that in 1974 the Conservative Party advocated a 90-day freeze and then a regular flow from that freeze. Today we see the sloppy application of a freeze, and a tightening over a 3½ year period. If there is rough justice to begin with it will be a lot rougher, and rigidity will be a lot firmer after 3½ years. To me this policy brings about a much deeper concern within me for this country of ours than I ever thought possible some 17 or 18 years ago when I first entered politics.

At page 8192 of Hansard for October 14 the minister is reported as having put forward this argument:

> The hard fact is that the Canadian economy today is being subjected to underlying, domestically—generated inflationary forces that are far more severe than those being experienced by most of our major trading partners.

I do not accept that philosophy. The severe conditions which exist here today exist among our major trading partners. I admit that our major trading partners are handling those severe conditions much better than this government. President Ford has advocated a severe cut-back of $28 billion in federal government expenditures in the United States. What do we see in this white paper, this glorified document? What do we see about government cut-backs in spending? Is there any comparable figure? Is there an amount of $2.8 billion, one tenth of the figure for the United States?

An hon. Member: There was an amount of $1 billion on June 3.

Mr. Horner: That was nonsensical. That was a wishful dream. We see the establishment of a board. The one critic who was really making hay with the consumers around here, whom I call the consumer advocate, is Mrs. Plumptre. She has been gobbled up by this new board and relegated to second position. No more will we hear from her, although she parted with dire warnings about the present situation.

At page 8193 of Hansard we see the following:

> We are suggesting that some members of this panel be nominated by provincial governments.

This is in reference to the Anti-Inflation Board.

> One of the functions of the board will be to carry out discussions with all parties involved in an effort to bring about compliance with the guidelines. If the issue cannot be resolved satisfactorily, the board may refer it to the enforcement authority—

I say to the minister and to the country that in many cases the provincial governments welcome this because it gets them off the hook. If the minister wants to subject that board to some kind of checking balance, let him place some members of the opposition parties on that panel. Never mind the provincial governments, they are glad to see Ottawa take the blame and they can say it is Ottawa's fault, their guidelines did not work. Let the government place some members of the opposition parties in the federal House on that panel. It is the federal House that governs all of Canada. It is from this place that Canada is governed, and that is the way it should be conceived and operated.

It is interesting to follow the defence by the Minister of Agriculture of the great marketing boards. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) referred to agriculture twice. The first time, as recorded at 8193 of Hansard, he spoke about farm prices received by farmers and fishermen for their products which, he said, will be exempt from the guidelines. Then he said, as recorded on page 8194 of Hansard, talking about farm prices, that the government must ensure that its price and marketing system is not structured to maintain inefficient agricultural production and distribution.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of the House that there is not one member of CEMA, and of the National Marketing Council governing CEMA, who does not know that distribution of eggs under CEMA is a catastrophe. It does not follow any natural, normal lines whatsoever. Evidently eggs are moving as they were a few years ago when they shipped eggs from Newfoundland to British Columbia and it was costing them 19 cents a dozen to ship them over that distance. Is there economic sense in moving eggs from Newfoundland to B.C.? When they got to B.C. they were rotten and had to be thrown out. The same system is being followed today. The only difference is that CEMA is doing a better job of covering it up.

If they want to study the distribution methods of agricultural products under the marketing boards, then they should be studied and they are there to be studied. I hope that Madam Plumptre and Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin can examine this very fully because I believe the inefficiencies are there in large doses.

Let us take a look at what they are doing. As I said earlier, this is a sloppy freeze doomed to failure. What is the consumer concerned about? First of all he is concerned about food. These controls do not control food prices at all. The board will look into the distribution of food and will look at the inefficiencies, but will they concern themselves with the prices? Not at all. Will there be a freeze on freight rates? No; this legislation will not control transportation freight rates, nor will it control the second most needed commodity in this country, namely, housing. New houses can fetch any price; this will not be controlled. They had a great scare in this country brought about by the inefficiencies of the Minister of Finance.

Will this piece of legislation control energy costs? Not at all. What three things does the average consumer need in this country? Food, housing and heat. This legislation does not control any one of these three things. Let us suppose you want to do something else besides eating and keeping warm. Let us suppose you want to venture out into society. For that you want to borrow money. Before we can go anywhere, we must become productive.

This bill does not control interest rates. The cost of money is rising. Money has become very necessary in doing business. What else does this legislation not control? The Prime Minister went up and down the country during the 1974 campaign stating clearly that wage and price controls or an incomes policy would not control the price of imported goods and therefore would not work. The government admits it will not even attempt to control the price of imported goods. How many component parts going into goods manufactured in Canada are imported? Quite a few.

I do not see how this legislation can work. What will it control? There is some suggestion that it might control the prices of manufactured goods. Let us take a look at how this can be done. Let us look at page 17 of the white paper where it is stated under the heading "Firms which are unable to allocate costs to individual products":

> If a firm finds it impossible to allocate costs to individual products, it should price its products in such a way as to leave its percentage pre-tax net profit margin no higher than 95 per cent of its average percentage pre-tax net profit margin—

You can see the foolishness of this. If you cannot allocate costs, how can you say it will be 95 per cent of the previous year's costs? Anybody who has taken grade 12 math could fix the books so that the allocation is only 95 per cent of last year's costs. The next paragraph, under the heading of "Definition of costs" reads:

> The regulations will include a detailed list of items which should be excluded from allowable costs. Included in this list will be such items as losses resulting from occurrences which are not typical of the normal business activities of the supplier—

So you can exclude a lot of things.

Then we come to the next paragraph headed "Frequency of price changes". It reads:

> Firms are expected to refrain from increasing the price of any individual product more frequently than once every three months—

I have heard about inflation being calculated yearly, semi-annually and quarterly, but I did not know it was permissible to increase the price of goods under this freeze every three months. What will this do? It will clearly apply a freeze on wages.

I know it is popular today to condemn the workers, but the way to control inflation is to increase productivity. If you freeze workers' wages, do you think they will produce more? This party believes in increasing workers' wages to obtain greater productivity. If you allow a businessman to make a profit, he can plough that profit back into his business. A labourer with proper tools can produce more goods, and only through the production of more goods can we bring about a cure to inflation.

Then we have the grave matter of Canadian ownership and investment. If we freeze dividends, where will we find any money that is free in Canada? It will all go to the United States to make money for the companies down there, and the dividends will not be frozen.

In my view this bill is a shocking admission of the ineptitude of the government, and I think it should be and will be rejected by all Canadians as soon as they learn the truth about what this white paper encompasses.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PROPOSED CAMP HILL COMPLEX AT HALIFAX—DATE OF TENDER CALL

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, before I raise the topic which brings us here this evening, may I announce the baseball World Series present score for those who stayed here assiduously and did not go to the lobbies. It is: Boston 4, Cincinnati nothing; and Mr. Luis Tiant is still chewing his original wad of tobacco.

I hope I and the veterans of Nova Scotia will find out the future of the proposed rebuilding of the Camp Hill veterans' complex. This prompted my question the other day to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), and brings me here this evening to find out what, if anything, is to be done to this building.

● (2200)

The Minister of Veterans Affairs in a speech to the 1975 convention of the Royal Canadian Legion held in Halifax on May 18 of this year noted:

> There are about two million potential clients of the Department of Veterans Affairs—veterans and the dependants of veterans—in Canada today.
> The department's responsibility to them, far from decreasing, has probably not yet reached its peak. As the average world war two veteran is still below normal retirement age, the number of DVA clients is growing larger, and will continue to do so for at least a short period of time before it starts to decline.

A few moments later in that same speech the minister said, "The department has 17,000 such clients in Nova Scotia".

It might be noted that Halifax is the metropolitan centre for Nova Scotia, indeed for Atlantic Canada, and attracts patients from many parts of the province to its hospital, so I think the problem of what to do about this aging hospital, built sometime around the second world war or immediately after—and of wooden buildings at that—is an appropriate one to raise here this evening.

On October 22 of last year I joined the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs briefly to ask about Camp Hill, and one of the replies given to me by Dr. A. F. Jones, Director General, treatment services, Department of Veterans Affairs on that occasion is found in the minutes, issue No. 2 of that committee, as follows:

> The target dates for the planning are one year from September, and hopefully the tenders will be let a year from September. This was the target frame proposed at the time the announcement was made.

I said: "A year from last September," and Dr. Jones said: "That is right."

September has come and gone, but the hospital tenders have not been called. I gather that the hold up may be some negotiation with the provincial government which might deal with a widening of the use of the hospital, beyond the purely curative treatment of veterans, into other aspects of hospital care. That might be the problem, or there may be some other reason. I hope we do find the answer.

The assistant deputy minister of the Department of Veterans Affairs, W. B. Brittain of Ottawa, is quoted in the Chronicle-Herald of last Saturday as saying that "financial restraints"—that is, the current program with which we are now dealing in our business here—"have not been an issue yet in the matter." It is also noted in the same article by Miss Barbara Hinds, that the armed forces have declared themselves out; that is, they do not want to form a part of that particular complex. But this was known by myself, and I am sure by many other people, at least a year ago, so that the decision of the armed forces could not have been the reason for the delay in going ahead with the plans for Camp Hill.

The province is probably being consulted. I do not know why it is not making a decision as to whether it would have an interest in the long term future of the hospital, but the minister of health for the province, Mr. William MacEachern, at one time known very well and favourably here in the press gallery, said:

> The DVA has always said they would be proceeding with the project whether the province took part in it or not.

Quoting him again from Miss Hinds' article, he said: "It is unclear if Ottawa is going ahead or not". Finally, to quote the Dean of Medicine at Dalhousie University, Dr. Lloyd B. MacPherson:

> The metro area has a far lower ratio of beds to population than any other part of Nova Scotia—
> And remember, we also have a lot of referrals from all other parts of the province.

In short, given the fact that there does not appear to be an austerity reason for the delay in building this hospital, there must be other reasons, but I am damned if I know what they are. I hope that when the parliamentary secretary replies he will be able to give me and the people in Nova Scotia the assurance that that hospital will get going very shortly.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has covered the historic questions and negotiations concerning this matter extremely thoroughly. For a long time there have been under way long range plans for the rebuilding and rehabilitation of Camp Hill hospital and eventual negotiations with the University of Dalhousie. In view of, shall we say, my inexperience with veterans affairs procedures, I ought not to make any statement which I have not discussed with the minister. I therefore hope that the prepared statement in my hand will satisfy the hon. member. If not I will take the hon. member's remarks as notice and discuss them with the minister.

I am happy and pleased to be able to speak on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants on the subject of the proposed Camp Hill hospital complex in Halifax.

Planning by the Department of Veterans Affairs, in conjunction with the consultants who were appointed some months ago and with planners from Dalhousie University, has been proceeding in the usual way. Within the next month the minister hopes to have preliminary proposals as to the nature of the new active treatment part of the hospital. That, I think, is fairly clear.

The proposal which we made was that we would develop plans for a 400-bed active treatment unit based on the premise that the government of Nova Scotia would ultimately accept that Camp Hill hospital should be transferred from the department, for the benefit of the community, subject to our reserving adequate numbers of priority beds for veterans and the transfer of our staff. In fact the Minister of Veterans Affairs was speaking today with the provincial minister of health for Nova Scotia and I can assure you, indeed, that discussions are moving forward on this matter.

If the hon. member wishes to raise further questions, I shall be pleased to bring them to the minister's attention.

Mr. McCleave: I shall write.

HEALTH—POSSIBLE REVISION OF MAXIMUM LEVELS FOR MERCURY CHLORIDE AND PCB

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly evident that we are living in a period of environmental disease. Increasing unbanization and industrialization, especially expanding technology, have altered our environment to such an extent that humans, animals, and plants are being exposed to an ever-growing number of harmful pollutants.

Recently a medical scientist at the National Cancer Institute stated that cancer in the last quarter of this century can be considered as a disease whose cause and control are rooted in the technology and economy of our society. Last week a biochemist and research worker at McMaster University in Hamilton was quoted in a newspaper article as saying that environmental effects cause up to 90 per cent of cancers and that current efforts are directed to a cure rather than elimination of causes.

In view of these remarks and mounting evidence of new toxic substances poisoning the environment, a comprehensive investigation of environmental pollutants should be undertaken by our governments in co-operation with university and industrial scientists without further delay. The eradication of present harmful pollutants and the prevention of toxic substances in future will not only contribute to the improvement to health but also reduce the cost of our hospital and medical programs and save many man hours and years in our industries.

The alarming statistics and new revelations of the harmful effect caused by environmental pollutants prompted me on October 14 to inquire of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) whether any revised maximum permissible levels for mercury chloride and poly-chlorinated-biphenyls have been decided upon by officials of his department. In his answer the minister revealed that results of recent studies in the U.S.A. on the harmful effects of PCBs are causing serious concern for his department, and that his officials are examining the advisability of introducing standards which may be even more strict than those in force in the United States.

It is now widely accepted that vinyl chloride, a colourless gas that is the basic ingredient in the poly-chloride-vinyl industry, is the cause of an increasing number of cases of angio-sarcoma of the liver. There is also great concern expressed that poly-chloride-vinyl present in containers and plastic wraps for food and drinks can leach into these food products and could cause cancer, birth defects, and diseases of the liver and kidneys.

What should be more alarming is the failure in the past of adequate screening and testing of toxic substances on the market and detecting them before they reach the air we breathe and the food we eat. It appears that most of the Canadian decisions relating to environmental pollutants and their maximum permissible levels are based upon work done by American scientists and regulations made by the health authorities in Washington.

I believe Canadian health authorities should take greater initiatives in starting investigations and making regulations by using more Canadian expertise instead of waiting and sometimes blindly following foreign sources. It is high time that we in Canada re-examine the present approach to public health, the present state of toxicology, the present anti-pollution laws. We must do better to prevent new toxic substances from entering the environment, as well as examining present pollutants, food additives, and drugs. Further delay in taking appropriate action will only compound our problems and cause irreparable damage. We cannot wait much longer before other disasters strike an unprepared public.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has identified an area which is right in the front of concern in Canada today. Before I turn to it, I know the hon. member will agree with me that in general, Canada does not ignore problems of pollution. In fact, in establishing legal frameworks and technological advances, Canada is a world leader.

The Department of National Health and Welfare, as the hon. member will certainly recall, is moving in its new perspectives on health to an ever greater concern for environment as a cause of illness. We look forward to even greater concerns from the department for advancing Canadian health through activities directed at the environment.

To deal with the matter of PCBs, I am glad to have the opportunity to bring new and important information to the attention of hon. members.

On October 3, 1975, the Ontario ministry of health recommended that Coho salmon caught in the Credit River should not be eaten more than once a week and that pregnant women should not eat the fish. This action was taken because residue levels of up to 20 ppm were being found in edible portions of Coho salmon. There is no commercial fishing that we know of there, but some are caught and eaten by sportsmen.

Surveys by the Fisheries Inspection Branch, Environment Canada, indicate that saltwater fish and most freshwater fish contain residues of PCBs well below 5 ppm. Surveys by the Health Protection Branch show that contamination of other foods with PCBs such as dairy products, eggs, and poultry is consistently low and often not detectable.

The U.S. food and drug administration set a tolerance for PCB's in fish of 5 ppm in 1972 based on the limited toxicological data available at that time. But it must be pointed out that much more information bearing on the safety of PCBs is now becoming available. Departmental officials did not recommend tolerance levels at that time because there was insufficient monitoring and toxicological data then available to make meaningful recommendations based on sound science. They have been working hard to acquire such data and have expanded their contacts with scientists around the world who are concerned about PCBs.

It is important that Canada should undertake its own research, as the hon. member has suggested, and as he knows we do, but at the same time we should not ignore international research activity.

Two major international meetings, one sponsored by the World Health Organization and the other by the U.S. Environmental Agency, are being held within the next two months to assess the PCB problem. It had been hoped we could await the outcome of these meetings before setting legal tolerances for PCBs in fish, in order to collate world knowledge in this area. In the light of our examination of the unpublished U.S. data, however, the matter appears to be too urgent to wait for the outcome of these meetings. Consequently, officers of the department are meeting with officers of the Fisheries and Marine Services, Environment Canada, to discuss immediate action. These discussions are now in progress and it is hoped the minister will be able to propose tolerances for PCBs in Canadian foods within the next few days.

FISHERIES—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION OF EXTENSION OF CONTROL OVER RESOURCES WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) on her appointment as Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I find it difficult to reconcile the position of Canada in its relationship with the United States as it applies to a unilateral declaration of a 200 mile fisheries zone—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, a fisheries zone, not a 200-mile economic zone or an extension to our continental shelf which we all agree will hopefully come about as a result of further negotiations.

As a result of recent discussions between the minister and his colleagues with the United States foreign affairs secretary, certain matters were discussed relating to fisheries and subsequently, according to press reports, Mr. Kissinger stated that the U.S. agrees with Canada's position regarding further negotiations to achieve its ultimate goals. But what was left unsaid—and still remains unanswered—is what discussions took place with regard to the bill which stands before the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States—Bill HR 200 entitled "The Establishment of United States Fisheries Conservation and Management Zone extending to the 200-mile limit." I therefore wish to ask the parliamentary secretary whether Mr. Kissinger was asked about his or the U.S. President's position in regard to this bill.

It is also difficult for me to reconcile; the growing numbers of nations that are declaring 200-mile fishing limits unilaterally, nations like Mexico, Iceland, Norway and, indeed, the United States, and I understand that this action is being taken because of their growing dissatisfaction with the pace at which the Law of the Sea negotiations are progressing. If all is well, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) keeps assuring us, then why have these nations declared their intentions since the last Law of the Sea Conference?

It is worth while noting the concern expressed at the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council deliberations on the Law of the Sea when the frightening revelation came forth from Mr. Cabot Martin, a dedicated student of ocean law, that any action by Canada would depend on United States initiatives. It was even more alarming to note that Mr. Martin, who has taken part in Law of the Sea Conferences, was informed by his American counterparts that the President of the United States supports the bill as presented to the House and Senate, as long as it did not take effect until January, 1977, which means that Canada would not declare if she was so disposed until after that date.

On a recent visit to the United States with a parliamentary delegation, discussions revealed that indeed such was the case, and I think that members opposite who attended will confirm that this was so. Let's look also at some of the statements made by international experts, Mr. Speaker. First, I quote from Mr. Jean Angrand, a specialist in international law, taken from an issue of International Perspective:

> The recent conferences at Geneva and Caracas have produced no new solutions; in fact, the situation has become more complicated for several reasons, the main ones arising from the dissimilar positions taken by the participants and from the interaction of political claims and economic demands.

And I quote from a paper by Barry Duzan in the same publication, a gentleman who is preparing a book-length study on the Law of the Sea negotiations. One comment he made on one of the committees, committee II, is as follows:

● (2220)

> In committee II dealing with nearly all the traditional law of the sea terms, developments bordered on the disastrous. Because of its extensive, complex and controversial agenda, this committee needed a significant move forward, a move which did not occur and indeed scarcely any progress was made. The committee spent two fruitless weeks reviewing the work of the Caracas session and did not even begin to meet until the last two weeks of the session.

Finally, this comment by the same expert:

> The single negotiating texts did not commit anybody to anything, but it is hoped that they would attract sufficient support to act as a focus for subsequent negotiations, and thereby release delegates from the ruts of their oft repeated preferences as expressed in the numerous alternative articles in existing texts.

These were not made public until the last few minutes of the session, the idea being to avoid controversy, to give delegates time to reflect on the single texts outside the pressure of the conference and to prepare their responses as a basis for the next session. A welcome side effect was their value as a visible product to justify the Geneva session. So I find it very difficult to believe the minister of external affairs, who all during the summer recess kept proclaiming across the country, and particularly in the maritimes, that all was well, that progress was being made, and that Canada was leading the conference toward victory.

I have more faith in what the fisheries minister is doing in his bilateral negotiations with those countries that are willing to co-operate on surveillance and quotas. But I deplore that I am expected to believe that solutions are just around the corner and that by continuing negotiating we will achieve our aims. It is obvious that this is going to take many more conferences. There is only one answer to the problem until international agreement is reached, and I repeat that is that Canada must take unilateral action immediately to protect our fish stocks by declaring a 200 mile fisheries zone before we are negotiated right out of the fishing industry. If the United States deems it important enough, why do we continue to procrastinate? Surely, then, we can continue to negotiate on offshore resources, sea passage, and the other main objectives to proclaim management and control out to our continental shelf, and I ask the minister to address himself to such action as I suggest.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank my hon. colleague opposite for his very kind words regarding my recent appointment to this new responsibility. I also take it for granted that he will excuse my deficient knowledge of the English language, my lack of mastery of the law of the sea and the technical language that goes with such an important issue, one that is highly specialized. Since I have been in this House I have come to realize very deeply his concern, and that of his colleagues and my colleagues who represent fishing communities and fishing interests—in other words, Canadian interests—for this very acute problem. I have had the opportunity of being able to observe some of the lengthy deliberations that took place at the deliberations in New York during the penultimate session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

To relate my remarks more directly to the hon. member's present question, I might say that the question of the extension of fisheries jurisdiction to 200 miles was discussed on the occasion of Dr. Kissinger's visit to Ottawa. I am here referring to the discussions that took place between the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and other Canadian ministers and the United States Secretary of State, Dr. Kissinger. I cannot speak here about the conversations that took place between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and Dr. Kissinger; I should like to make that quite clear.

The hon. member will understand that I wish my minister had the occasion to answer this question for himself in the House, both because he would be far more aware of the exact tone of the deliberations and because I feel it would have been courteous on my part to let him do so. Unfortunately, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as my colleague knows, is now in England and Scotland opening the Institute for Canadian Studies. However, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) can be assured that I will carry to him the exact meaning and concern of his question.

Both Canada and the United States attach great importance to early extension of their respective areas of fisheries jurisdiction. This matter has been the subject of consultation between the two countries for some time now, as the hon. member knows very well. I understand that the meeting with Dr. Kissinger was most useful. I am not in a position to explain, since I was not present, exactly what that "most useful" means. I do hope the question will be directed to the minister in that regard.

I think it has been made quite clear on more than one occasion that the Government of Canada is determined to extend Canada's jurisdiction out to 200 miles. It has also been made quite clear that although we would wish to do that through an international treaty we are not waiting for the conclusion of that treaty to take action. Has my time expired, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ALLEGED USE OF CANADIAN TERRITORY BY REVOLUTIONARIES AND EXPULSION OF CHINESE DIPLOMAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Cossitt: Yes! It arises from the frequent use of Canadian territory in conjunction with groups from the United States for activities of a serious nature directed against third countries and, also, from the failure of the government to disclose full details surrounding the expulsion of the Chinese diplomat Kuo Ching An earlier this year. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre:

That the Solicitor General give the House full details concerning frequent use of Canadian territory in recent years by persons acting or co-operating with certain revolutionary-minded persons in the United States and elsewhere dedicated to action against the legal governments of third countries, and the House requests the full disclosure of all available information concerning the expulsion from Canada this year of diplomat Kuo Ching An of the People's Republic of China, confirming that this was as a direct result of his attempting to convey a sizeable sum of money to a Philippine revolutionary group in the United States as payment for an attempt to assassinate President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL TO FIX PRICE OF PRODUCTS FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As food plays an important part in Canada and as the prices of 80 per cent of food products are likely to spiral according to the market forces, and given the fact that no serious measure has been taken in this area, that the amount of money spent on food varies from 20 per cent of the budget for well-to-do consumers to 50 per cent for those in the lower income brackets and also that the cost of grains is decisive for farm products like beef, bread and so on, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That the House take immediately all necessary steps to be able to put a quota on a portion of production which is equal to national consumption and set arbitrary prices for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the social and economic dislocation occasioned by the current cessation of postal services, and in view of the continued insensitivity of the Postmaster General toward the need for equitable completion of contract negotiations with the postal workers, an insensitivity vividly demonstrated by the numerous derogatory statements concerning the leadership of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and his sabotaging of the collective bargaining processes by issuing an ultimatum commanding agreement to the government wage offer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant:

That this House instruct the Postmaster General to cease these irresponsible tactics and that the President of the Treasury Board take his rightful place in the current negotiations with the postal workers in the hope that contract talks may be expeditiously resumed and a just settlement swiftly negotiated.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RETURN TO KETTLE POINT BAND OF LAND EXPROPRIATED BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion arising from an urgent matter. In view of the fact that the Department of National Defence has refused to return certain lands expropriated under the terms of the War Measures Act from the Kettle Point Indian Band because of the presence of accumulated live artillery shells on that land, and in view of the fact that in less than two hours' time the department will start firing more artillery on the land, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House order the Department of National Defence to stop these planned manoeuvres, and further that this House direct the department to remove all unexploded ammunition from the land and return it to its original owners.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EXISTENCE OF EMERGENCY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. I should like to ask him a fundamental question that must be answered in light of the government's white paper and the postal strike. I do not think there can be any real doubt about the government's position but I should like to make absolutely certain. At the first ministers' conference in April of this year the former Minister of Finance stated that "the imposition of direct controls by the government over prices and incomes . . . would not be acceptable to the people . . . except in conditions of real emergency". I assume there is no question about this, but is it the government's position that conditions of real emergency do exist now?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, the legislation now before the House rests, in part at least, upon the peace, order and good government clause in the constitution, and therefore in that sense there is an emergency.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the Acting Prime Minister's position that there is a real emergency? So there is no doubt about it, is that the position of the government? Secondly, is it the position of the government, in considering the postal strike, that this also constitutes an emergency situation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the particular emergency that underlies, at least in part, the legislation now before the House relates to the situation that has arisen out of inflation. There can, of course, be serious problems arising out of a postal strike, but it is not in that sense that there is an emergency.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—EFFECT OF WAGE GUIDELINES ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If there is an emergency with regard to inflation but there is no emergency with regard to the post office, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question arising out of the position that he took yesterday. The minister said that he could not hold out any hope that a post office strike would not harm many individuals, but he said that this is one of the penalties of collective bargaining. Is it the government's position that collective bargaining has not already been very narrowly circumscribed, at least in dollars and cents terms, as of midnight, October 13?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is this, that collective bargaining can proceed. If, however, after a reference to the Anti-Inflation Board it is found that the settlement exceeds the guidelines, then, of course, various actions may take place. But this does not in itself interfere with collective bargaining.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You cannot suck and blow at the same time.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I can explain the situation in this way. My colleague the Postmaster General has offered to the inside workers the proposal that was accepted by a very high proportion of the letter carriers. That, we hope, will be within the guidelines as administered by the Anti-Inflation Board. My colleague does not feel at all inhibited in carrying on his negotiations by reasons of these guidelines. We believe the offer is well within them; but this is not a judgment that politicians will make, it is a judgment that will be made by an independent board.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—WILLINGNESS OF GOVERNMENT TO NEGOTIATE FRINGE BENEFITS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. We are pleased to see the hon. gentleman back in the House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: There is an obvious fuzziness appearing at the fringe in getting to the root of this post office problem as the bargaining goes on through the media rather than through the established procedures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that the leaders of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have indicated, again through the media, that they are willing to continue negotiations based on the fringe issues rather than the wage packet, and in view of the same statement by the minister and other government spokesmen that they are willing to return to the bargaining process to consider these fringe issues, will the Postmaster General now clarify the matter by stating that this is the government's position so that we might get the postal workers back to work to continue this vitally important service?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, one party in the House that did refuse to help the postal workers was the NDP. I think that was the statement of the C.U.P.W. leader out in Winnipeg the other evening. The last time we were in direct consultation with the postal workers—I am not sure which spokesman it was, but one of them—it was clearly understood we were prepared to continue bargaining and we had not considered at any time breaking off bargaining. We invited them to come back to the bargaining table when they had finalized their own position in so far as the wage packet was concerned, and then we would see to the fringe benefits which are also monetary items.

I might point out to the hon. gentleman that if there were no anti-inflation board or anti-inflation campaign, the money we would offer CUPW would be precisely the same as is being offered now because of the fact that the letter carriers have this settlement, and because of the recommendation of the chairman of the conciliation board, who is certainly a very neutral gentleman and a judge of the superior court whose advice we gladly accepted. So the offer to CUPW is based first on the relationship to the settlement with the letter carriers, with whom they must work side by side, and secondly on the report of the conciliation board chairman. The effect of the Anti-Inflation Board simply means that the settlement, when and if it is arrived at, will have to go to the board for ratification or rejection, one or the other.

As far as resuming negotiations, my offer is open and there would be no better gesture of goodwill that would be appreciated by the Canadian people, and an indication of their willingness and sincerity, than for the union to invite the workers to go back to work while the negotiations are going on, because the strike they called was useless and futile, and does not in the slightest add any pressure on the minister who runs the post office.

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTION FOOD CHAINS SUBMIT TO BOARD PRICES CHARGED BEFORE AND AFTER ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government or perhaps the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board would ask the major food distribution chains, Safeway, Loblaws, Steinberg and Dominion stores to submit to the board their price lists for the two weeks prior and the two weeks following the announcement of the government's anti-inflation policy in order that the board can ascertain whether in fact prices are being raised, particularly in view of reports from all parts of Canada that these companies seem to have at least anticipated the government's policies and raised many prices over the Thanksgiving weekend?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion of the hon. member is a very sensible one. I do hope we can get this bill into committee so this kind of suggestion can be made to the board. The board can be summoned and suggestions can be made directly. Moreover, this would finally give the teeth that is now lacking in the present law.

● (1420)

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF BOARD PUBLISHING INFORMATION ON PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, surely the board does not need to wait for the legislation to make such inquiries. In view of the thoughts expressed by many people to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour yesterday that the wage and salary restraints will be easy for the Board to monitor, but that increases in prices will be difficult if not impossible to police, will the government impress on the Anti-Inflation Board the necessity to make as much information as possible on price increases which the board will be looking into available to the public so that Canadians can be informed concerning the effect of the government's policy as the weeks and months go by.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in general agreement. It is our view, as I think it is his, that the board should be as diligent as possible in checking both wages and prices, and I only hope he agrees with me that we should get this legislation through so that there will be something the board can do to implement our policies.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the Acting Prime Minister that the inferences in respect of the legislation drawn by at least one if not more of the provincial governments, which are being made known to the Prime Minister today, are that the investigation which the board will make in respect of companies will be made in private and based on confidential information the board receives and that the board is not likely to identify the companies which are alleged to have raised prices, that in fact the board will not be giving the kind of information which I am suggesting to the Acting Prime Minister it should be giving on a very regular basis to the public.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman should be in favour of what I am in favour of which is to get an independent board established which has the power to roll back price increases where necessary. We are now talking about something that is rather theoretical. What we have provided is the investigation. I agree with him that the investigation should proceed, but I hope he agrees with me the board should have some power to roll back prices.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO RETURN OF FLQ EXILES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In accordance with the reports that the FLQ members now in Paris are asking for a permit of political refugees in France and considering their recent statement, could the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the Canadian government has received an official request for their return in the country and could he, on behalf of the Canadian government, assure the House and the Canadian people that we will have nothing more to do with those revolutionary FLQ members and that we will deny them the right to return to Canada, in spite of their application?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the situation at the present time, as has been the case ever since these serious incidents of five years ago, is that these particular individuals if they return to Canada will be prosecuted for the crimes they committed.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REASON FOR OMISSION FROM LEGISLATION OF WORDS "NATIONAL EMERGENCY"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the earlier question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. That is a question which I think must be cleared up once and for all in any discussion regarding this bill, or the labour situation so far as the Post Office Department is concerned will be simply problematical. The question has to do with the constitutionality of this legislation dealing with price and wage control. When it was first produced I questioned the constitutionality of certain elements in the white paper and the reply I received from the government was that the government was assured it is within the legislative competence of Parliament. Now in the last 48 hours outstanding constitutional authorities across Canada have pointed out—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member may very well have an interesting debating point, but it appears to me he is about to develop an argument in favour of his position on constitutionality. If the right hon. member has a question to put perhaps he would do that now.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought this House would like to have the constitutional opinion of experts rather than novices sitting opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In order to make it constitutional, the Supreme Court of Canada has made it clear on several occasions that it is necessary to state there is a national emergency. Now, we have the minister saying that there is an emergency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not understand that and I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to be denied—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I feel that in the circumstances I have extended every leniency to the right hon. member to put his question. Since he continues to argue the point, I prefer to go to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not arguing the point, I am asserting the right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have always bowed with deference to Mr. Speaker, but when I have a question on the constitutionality of this matter—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I say I have the right to speak, despite what Your Honour understands that I am endeavouring to ask.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the provisional rules under which we have been operating since last Easter recess, I would be prepared to hear the right hon. member's argument at three o'clock. I ask the right hon. member once more, if he has a question to put, that he put it forthwith without further argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there are many hon. members who have not even read the law yet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is it that the words "national emergency" are not included in the preamble of this bill?

Peace, order and good government is not enough. Is it because the government realizes that if it placed those words in the bill it would cover all the provinces in Canada and no province would be able to set up a board of its own?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was being drafted the government had the advice of the law officers of the Crown who advised us that it could be defended under the peace, order and good government provisions of the British North America Act and perhaps under other provisions as well. A decision was made to draft it in this form on the best advice the government could receive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a complete hoax.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister yet decided whom he intends to appoint to the vacant position of minister of communications? If so, when will the name of the new minister be announced, and has the government decided to reserve its new policy of going outside of parliament for its new ministers and decided to take a chance on one of its own backbenchers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister has a name in mind, he has not yet conveyed it to his colleagues. He may do so shortly. I can assure the hon. member that the new minister, if he is from one of these backbenches, will be a most competent one.

An hon. Member: Why did he not think of that before?

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON LEGISLATING EMPLOYEES BACK TO WORK

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious cost to the country of a prolonged postal strike, is the government prepared to consider a 90 day back to work order during which time the Postmaster General could pursue some settlement with the union membership, or has the government decided that it will not act but rather let the strike run its course even if it lasts for many months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, part of this is a hypothetical question which I will not attempt to answer, but the government has no intention at present to propose to parliament an order to return these men to work. That may be necessary, I really do not know; but our hope is that there will be an agreement entered into voluntarily. That is the purpose of the negotiations that we are ready to resume at any time on the basis of the letter carriers' wage settlement. I hope that my hon. friend is not recommending that we should go beyond that.

● (1430)

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's comment yesterday that it could be a long strike, in view of the comment of the Postmaster General that he is prepared to shut the Post Office down for three months or until Easter and in view of public concern as to what the position of the government really is in this regard—whether it will allow the strike to go on indefinitely—can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether it is government policy to ride this strike out no matter how long it takes, or is the government prepared to consider back to work legislation after a period of time?

Mr. Sharp: The government is not contemplating any legislation at the present time to return the Post Office workers to work.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON WHETHER SERVICE IS ESSENTIAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have two short supplementaries in order to clear the fuzziness resulting from the answers of the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government reached a conclusion as to whether postal service is essential? May we have the answer?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we certainly think it is important. We would like to see it resumed as quickly as possible; however, I am sure that my hon. friend is enough of a supporter of the principles of collective bargaining that he would not want to interfere with that process just whenever it suits the convenience of some members of the public.

Mr. Hees: Is it essential or not?

Mr. Alexander: Will the Acting Prime Minister answer my question? Has the government reached a conclusion as to whether postal service is essential? That is just a repetition of the first question, so I still have my second supplementary to come.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ALL THOSE PURCHASING NEW HOMES WILL RECEIVE $500 GRANT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Considering that many home owners currently purchasing new houses are finding that they cannot receive their $500 new home ownership grant because the purchases cannot be processed quickly enough, will the government ensure that all individuals purchasing homes before the end of the month will receive the $500 grant?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am an optimist; I am signing my mail. In answer to the question of the hon. member, certainly those applications which are being processed will be honoured. I will be making further announcements within the next day or so regarding the future of the program itself.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF $500 GRANT PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): In view of the fact that the new home ownership grant has eased the entry into the housing market for consumers, and considering that the availability of this grant will terminate on October 31, 1975, does the government have any intention of extending this deadline so that those who wish to purchase homes in the future can have the same benefit as those who have purchased homes under this program, and would the minister give further consideration to extending the program to existing homes rather than just new homes as at present?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): If I could answer the latter part of the question first, the answer is no. With regard to the first part of the question, I will be making an announcement within the next day or two, when a decision will be made. Certainly we recognize the value of this program, but as hon. members know, I will be bringing to parliament shortly a far more comprehensive program which I am sure will be welcomed by both sides of the House.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO CONFISCATE INCOME IN EXCESS OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister outside the House yesterday threatening to tax away any pay increases in excess of the guidelines of the government, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister to inform the House whether it is the intention of the government to bring in legislation amending the Income Tax Act to permit the use of the taxation system to confiscate income in excess of the guidelines.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we hope that will not be necessary.

AVAILABILITY OF TAX RETURNS TO ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Since the Prime Minister is suggesting one or two alternatives, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to allow the administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board to have access to the income tax returns of Canadians or groups of Canadians in view of the confidentiality of such returns.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would not have thought this likely. I would have thought that this would require legislation. If legislation is required, then it would come before the House. I have not heard of any suggestion of that kind.

Mr. Nystrom: How will the government enact the suggestion made outside the House by the Prime Minister yesterday if it does not do it in this manner?

Mr. Sharp: Any idea of taxing back excess of earnings which are over the guidelines, or any other procedure like this, would require legislation by the House of Commons.

REASON FOR ABSENCE OF MINISTERS—POSSIBLE USE OF ROTATION SYSTEM

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping for the second day in a row to be able to put a question. I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in view of the fact that only four of the ten ministers who adorn the front treasury benches are present in the House, I shall put my question to the Acting Prime Minister as government House leader. Is it now the position of this government that it is putting its ministers back on a rotation system, in view of the fact that few of them are ever here?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reason there are quite a number of absences today, which I regret as much as anyone else in the House of Commons, is the fact that quite a number of ministers are out explaining the government's anti-inflation program in various parts of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: Why not do it in the House then?

Mr. Sharp: I think it is desirable that some of the rather less accurate information which has been spread about by those who may not agree with the program should be answered, so that the public is not confused about the intentions of the government. The other reason some ministers are absent is that they are attending a federal-provincial conference on the very subject upon which this House is now engaged in debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR STAY OF EXECUTIONS OF THREE PERSONS—POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether it is correct that the executions of three persons convicted or murder by due process of law have been stayed until July 15? Was the reason for that stay, which is not commutation, that the government intends to bring in a bill to completely abolish capital punishment?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Governor in Council has granted stays of execution on the sentences of death pronounced upon Messrs. Connearey, Vaillancourt and Chartrand. This request was made because the government intends to present a bill to parliament on the matter of capital punishment and other measures relating to law reform and to crime prevention.

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to have this matter clarified in one important area because I know the Solicitor General has been dancing with this subject. Is it his intention to bring in an omnibus bill in which part will be gun control, to give the public the appearance of getting tough on crime, and in the same bill to put in a measure to abolish capital punishment? Is that the game the Solicitor General is playing with the Canadian public?

Mr. Allmand: The package of measures on this subject will be announced by the Minister of Justice and myself, but no decision has been made as to whether it will be one, two or three bills.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO ENFORCEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. One of the more amazing exceptions the Prime Minister made in his statement ten days ago was his commitment to permit growth within police forces. Given the belief of the Prime Minister that all we have to do is groove on goodness, is this exception an indication that he plans to embark on a program of greater general law enforcement without enforcing the law with regard to capital punishment?

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In the minister's tradition of bold inventive housing programs—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: —can the minister advise the House if consideration is being given to tax exemptions for mortgate rates in excess of 6 per cent for new and existing home owners and if not, would he view such a proposal favourably?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly we do not discount any new approaches but I would not want to indicate a preference until I bring my proposals before parliament.

VANCOUVER CONFERENCE ON HUMAN SETTLEMENTS—FUNDING OF NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATION PARTICIPATING IN CONFERENCE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and I have given him notice of this matter. In view of the fact that the government has failed thus far to promise funding for the Association in Canada Serving Organization on Human Settlements (ACSOH), the agency responsible for the non-governmental organizations participating in the Habitat conference in Vancouver next year, can the minister now indicate whether the government is prepared to fund this international conference on a proper basis so that all taxpayers of Canada will share the load that will otherwise be an unjust burden on the residents of Vancouver?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for mentioning that subject to me the other day. I have been looking into this matter and there will be adequate funding for ACSOH and other non-government organizations. I cannot answer specifically what portion of that will be funded by LIP grants or employment grants but there will be some very beneficial residual benefits from the conference for Vancouver and Vancouver-Quadra. I will report more completely when I have details of this, but there will be sufficient funding for the non-governmental organizations to do their job well and for the provision of facilities in Vancouver.

FISHERIES

INCOME SUPPORT PROGRAM FOR FISHERMEN—POSSIBLE MODIFICATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PROVISIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State

(Fisheries). In view of the fact that the incomes of the fishermen are deteriorating as a result of the depletion of our fish stocks, can the minister indicate to the House what is happening with the proposed income support program that was supposed to be implemented in July, 1975?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, on the latter part of the question, I do not think I ever undertook to implement a program by July, 1975. We are working on this program hand in hand with one for stabilization of prices to fishermen. We hoped to bring them before the House in the coming months.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that there might be continuing delays, I wonder if the minister would indicate if he has had discussion with his colleagues on modifications of the unemployment insurance provisions relating to fishermen in order to overcome many of the inequities that are hindering collection of payments?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, we had accepted that UIC for fishermen would continue until a program was brought in to replace it.

Mr. Alexander: We heard that four years ago.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I was not here four years ago. At the present time, I would hope we can move more quickly than on amendments to the UIC.

POISONING OF FISH IN CAPILANO HATCHERY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of State for Fisheries. Can he advise if the RCMP have been called in to investigate the chlorine poisoning of 1½ million fish in the Capilano hatchery?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, my information is that pathology tests done in the last 48 hours have not revealed in a precise manner the reason for this tragic accident or sabotage—we do not know which is involved yet. The police have been asked to co-operate with us.

Mr. Huntington: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to advise the minister that the cause of death of the fish is known and that it is chlorine. I should like to ask if it is possible for the minister to advise how chlorine could get into the water system of the Capilano hatchery as it is a carefully controlled component of hatchery environment?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that traces of chlorine have been found, but I have no report yet from the scientists that this is the final and firm cause of the death of fish. On the question of how this might have been introduced into the system, that is precisely what we are trying to find out now. I find it rather difficult to believe it could have been accidental but we are checking every point.

REASON FOR MINISTER'S ULTIMATUM ON WAGES WHILE OTHER NEGOTIABLE ITEMS NOT SETTLED

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Considering the fact that while negotiations were going on between Treasury Board and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, over 100 clauses had been initialled and that the union had agreed not to strike while negotiations were continuing, why did the minister lay a wage ultimatum on the table which forced a strike when so many other negotiable issues remained unsettled, bearing in mind that without the leverage of the wage packet they could not negotiate on the non-monetary issues?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a fair and honest question. There were many clauses and articles initialled on Friday and Saturday. They let it be well understood that there would be no strike while negotiations were going on. Unfortunately, while negotiations were taking place on Monday night, orders had already gone out to strike at midnight, which is hardly evidence that they acted in good faith. I have the evidence any time the hon. member would like to see it.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON NEGOTIATING TOTAL PACKAGE OF BENEFITS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I think all members of the House would like to see if that evidence is valid or not, Mr. Speaker. I should like to put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board. Is the government prepared to follow standard collective bargaining procedures and negotiate a total package of benefits with the postal unions rather than trying to force the unions leadership to go to the general membership with exclusively a wage proposal?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because this is a very delicate matter and although I hesitate to say I will take it as notice, it is one of the questions I think I should take as notice so that I will not make any misstatement that might interfere in any way with the bargaining.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIANS AGAINST INCREASES IN FOOD PRICES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since grain prices are not included in the measures announced on October 13, and that as a consequence, they are exposed to changes on the free market of the Winnipeg and Chicago exchanges, has the minister considered taking the necessary steps to protect Canadian consumers from a possible rise in food prices?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all the materials used in bread making are fixed for five more years and they cannot change.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—REQUEST FOR DEBATE PRIOR TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. On Friday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said an agreement with the Republic of Korea concerning the sale of a Canadian nuclear reactor would be tabled in the House. Since we will then be faced with a fait accompli on an extremely serious matter that a host of experts, including General E. L. M. Burns, have warned the government against, what steps will the government take to bring a provisional agreement before the House for debate so that the full scope of the reasons Canada should not take this action can be aired before a militaristic repressive regime is helped by Canada to get nuclear technology?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member's point of view and I will convey it to the minister. It would not be in accordance with the responsibilities that are laid upon the government to bring international treaties before parliament before they have been signed.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if the government has studied the representations made on this subject by the International Commission of Jurists and the International League for the Rights of Man which document the repression now being carried out by the Republic of Korea against its own people and which suggests that the signature of that country on a nuclear safeguard agreement would be worthless.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, these views are familiar to the Department of External Affairs and I would assume that the minister has been advised.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF OIL AND GAS REGULATIONS FOR NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the minister's comments, made as long ago as May of this year after four years procrastination, that new oil and gas regulations would be introduced without delay, and in view of the fact that there has been a drastic cutback in oil and gas exploration particularly in the Mackenzie Delta area, can the minister indicate when he intends to bring forward these oil and gas regulations?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is our hope that we will bring them forward this fall.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—LEGAL RIGHT OF BUSINESSMEN TO OBTAIN DAMAGES

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Could the minister indicate to the House whether he believes that those whose mail is tied up—particularly small businessmen—have any rights to obtain damages through the courts as a result of the current strike?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I could not give legal advice. The men are on strike legally. In all legal strikes, some segment of society unfortunately gets hurt. We tend to forget that sometimes the workers themselves get hurt. I have checked out the impact of the strike with the 20 per cent of the industries and Canadians who account for 80 per cent of the volume of the mail. There will be some people hurt in the strike. Unfortunately, some are small businessmen. On the other hand, there are many benefiting by providing a substitute service. It is hard to tell the impact. Any mail that is in the post office at the moment and has been sorted by CUPW members will be handled by the letter carriers' union. We have this assurance. However, in a day or two it will be unrealistic to presume there will be any more such mail available. I hope for the sake of small businessmen the negotiations resume fairly soon and that the strike is brought to an end. In the meantime, we are prepared to allow it to run.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—IMPACT ON ISOLATED NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General. The isolated communities of northern Canada, as I am sure the minister is aware, depend entirely on the mail as their only means of communication. Can the minister guarantee that people living in these isolated areas will not suffer from loss of livelihood due to this national emergency? I want to assure the Postmaster General that my offer to carry the mail to the Churchill constituency still stands.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that might be considered as some sort of strike breaking. I cannot guarantee that there will be no harm done as a result of the strike. I think we are forgetting that I did not call the strike and the union did not have to go on strike, even if they were in a strike position and did not necessarily agree with my particular tactics. It is important to remember that the strike was called by the union, not by the post office. There was no lockout. The responsibility for the effects must be placed exactly where it should be, on those who called the strike.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED USE OF CANADIAN TERRITORY BY FOREIGN DIPLOMATS TO AID REVOLUTIONARIES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I hope I may be permitted to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister, with a short supplementary. First, how recently has the government been advised by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police concerning whether Canadian territory has been used frequently by certain foreign diplomats for co-operation with persons in the United States dedicated to revolutionary activities against legal governments in third countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to answer that question. I think the hon. member should be more specific.

REASON FOR EXPULSION OF CHINESE DIPLOMAT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Will the minister confirm that Chinese diplomat Kuo Ching An was expelled from Canada because he delivered to representatives of Philippine revolutionaries in the United States, one of whose leaders has been Sergio Osmena, Jr., a sizeable sum of money to promote trouble in the Philippines, particularly to promote the assassination of Ferdinand Marcos, the president of that nation. Also, will the Acting Prime Minister make public all government files in this regard to prove the accuracy of the answer he will now give the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer I will now give the House is that security matters are never discussed in this House if I can help it.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN PROGRAM IN VIEW OF CHANGES IN ECONOMY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the changed economic climate and rules, will the minister be proposing policy variations to the DREE programs to adapt to these changes? Also, will he be speaking, either during the course of the debate on Bill 73 on these matters or on motions in the near future?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that of course all government departments are required to help enforce the measures the government announced last week. As for my department, I am happy to inform him that our programs will keep on developing and I am hopeful that in the next few months, we shall even be able to experience further expansion of the department's activities, since our work is particularly aimed at the areas in need of government assistance and I shall make it a point to bring the representations of the hon. member and many others to the attention of the cabinet.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer. It is reassuring. I bring to his attention that at the time DREE was conceived, there were in this country clearly defined areas of economic stress. Under the present climate, the whole country is in that category. Will the minister again reiterate that he does have some specific initiatives to take so that DREE will continue to have some priority in the scheme of things?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I must again assure the hon. member that my department has a very specific role to play in that it deals specially with the areas in need of greater help than others. Canada as a whole may be in difficulty but some areas, and particularly the one he represents, need special attention from the government and the department that I head. Its activity will be directed towards those regions. I can again assure the hon. member that we will not lose interest in the underdeveloped areas of Canada. If it is deemed that new programs are needed in co-operation with provincial governments, similar to the one now being implemented, we will doubtless undertake them as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of answers given to members of this House today in response to questions about the present postal strike. It is the feeling of many innocent Canadians that they are entitled to a postal service, that it is an essential service and that with the present arrangement, we are only giving lip service to the bargaining process and then legislating various groups back to work through various pieces of legislation. Is the government now seriously considering that the right to strike in essential services is not workable and that an alternative to the present practice will be brought forward for debate in this House in the near future?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. We have no intention of bringing forward such legislation of a general character. Whether at some time in the future it will be necessary with regard to particular groups, that is a matter to be determined in the future. At the moment, we have no such general legislation in mind.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PERMITTING COMPETITIVE SERVICES TO BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary both to the last and the previous one, but I direct it to the Postmaster General. Since the government is prepared to break the postal monopoly given to it by law to secure the interests of pensioners and family allowance recipients during the mail strike, will it also allow other competitive service similar to the post office to operate, bearing in mind the needs of businesses and others dependent on first class mail?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the last few words, first class mail. The only monopoly we have is in that area. I can assure the hon. member that we have a lot of competition in all other areas such as parcel post and second class mail. Fortunately, all family allowance cheques and all senior citizen cheques have been delivered. None are due until late November. Arrangements will be finalized by that time and delivery of November, December, January, February, and possibly March will all be made at the same time.

With regard to the question of whether we will entertain competition in first class mail, it will depend on whether that competition is prepared to handle the less profitable routes such as, shall we say, from Ottawa to the constituency of the hon. member in which case we would be glad to give them that particular area. Finally, I think it is equally important, and I notified the House of this before, that the main issue in the strike was a question of automation and that particular problem was solved some time Saturday.

TABLING OF EXTRADITION TREATY WITH UNITED STATES, AND INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the following documents in accordance with Standing Order 41(2): (1) Prior to ratification, the new extradition treaty with the United States of America which was signed at Washington on December 3, 1971, and the text of which was subsequently amended by an exchange of notes on June 28 and July 9, 1974. The treaty is basically a consolidation in one text of the present network of some half-dozen treaties dating back to 1842; (2) the texts of 32 international agreements.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE DRIVE-IN POLLING STATIONS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-413, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (drive-in polling stations).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide, in every electoral district in which there is at least one incorporated city or town having a population of 15,000 or more, that the returning officer establish a drive-in advance polling station for the use of electors who are aged, infirm or approaching termination of pregnancy. This bill would enable such electors to cast their votes in secret, without the aid of a proxy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GRANTS—GENERAL DYNAMICS CORPORATION

Question No. 1,231—Mr. Hogan:

1. Is it the intention of the government to consider the repurchase of Canadair from the General Dynamics Corporation Ltd. (USA)?

2. (a) What were the terms of the contract of sale of Canadair by the government to General Dynamics Corporation Ltd. immediately after the Second World War (b) what were the names of those who negotiated the sale (c) what were the details, such as the sale price, assets, etc.?

3. What was (a) the value of government grants of all types (b) the programme under which grants were given to General Dynamics Corporation Ltd. since the date of sale of Canadair until the present day and the value of these grants specifically marked for Canadair Ltd.?

4. (a) What is the actual price at which the government intends to buy back Canadair and the legislation under which it is to be repurchased (b) what are the assets of Canadair and its sales potential in light of the deteriorating market for new aircraft of all types?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and National Defence as follows: 1. The signing of an Option Agreement on January 15, 1975, indicated the Government's intent to consider the purchase of Canadair from General Dynamics.

2. Early in 1947, the Electric Boat Company of New Jersey was authorized to acquire the bulk of the Canadair Limited stock subject to the following terms: (1) Electric Boat to provide Canadair Limited with $2,000,000 working capital. (2) The War Assets Corporation to grant Canadair Limited a lease with option to purchase with respect to the plant, equipment and aircraft tooling for $3,500,000. In 1949, Canadair Limited purchased additional land, buildings and equipment from the Crown for $3,800,000. In 1955, Canadair Limited purchased the balance of the Crown assets for $11,500,000. All these transactions were on the basis of a lease with option to purchase and in each case the option was exercised. Among the principals in these transactions were: C. D. Howe, Minister, Munitions and Supply; J. H. Berry, President, War Assets Corporation; E. F. Hutton, Representing Electric Boat and the founder of General Dynamics, J. J. Hopkins; D. A. Golden, Deputy Minister, Department of Defence Production; H. O. West, President Canadair. Limited; J. G. Notman, President, Canadair Limited.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

3. (a) General Dynamics Corporation Ltd., nil; Canadair, $68,447,953.

(b)	General Dynamics Corporation Ltd.	Canadair
DIP Contribution	Nil	$63,140,050.
PEMD Contribution	Nil	$ 57,903.
PAIT Contribution	Nil	$ 5,250,000.

In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned:

3. (a) The value of all types of DND grants is contained in the annual DND estimates and Public Accounts of Canada. (b) Under the terms and conditions of the Defence Industrial Research Program the value of the grants for each fiscal year in question was as follows:

Year	Amount	Number of Projects
1963-64	71,00	6
1964-65	118,000	7
1965-66	43,000	7
1974-75 (estimated)	216,000	7

4. (a) As announced at the time the option was signed, the maximum budgetary outlay required for the purchase of Canadair is not expected to exceed $38,150,000. An allowance was made for the purchase of Canadair under Vote L-20 which was approved in the 1975-76 Main Estimates for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. (b) The assets of Canadair covered by the option agreement are all the assets except Canadair's investment in the Asbestos Corporation Limited. They include land, buildings, machinery, equipment, designs, copyrights, patents and so forth. One firm of appraisers estimated the total value of all such assets would amount to $103 million after deducting outstanding liabilities. The Government is currently examining Canadair's sales potential together with new initiatives designed to help this company achieve long run viability.

MR. RICHARD ARNOLD IRWIN—DIRECTOR OF WARNOCK HERSEY INTERNATIONAL

Question No. 3,039—Mr. Huntington:

Since 1968, has Mr. Richard Arnold Irwin, Director of Warnock Hersey International been or is he a member, officer, director or in any way whatsoever associated with (a) a Crown corporation (b) the government (c) a department, agency, advisory board, council or committee and, if so (i) what position did he or does he hold (ii) with what corporation, department, agency, advisory board, council or committee (iii) between what dates (iv) was the position attained by appointment, contest, promotion or through a personnel agency (v) if by appointment, by whom or by what authority was he appointed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): No.

MEETING OF MINISTERS AT MEACH LAKE

Question No. 3,116—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

Did Mr. Michael Pitfield or any other individual who was not a Member of the House of Commons or the Senate participate in the meeting of Ministers at the National Capital Commission property on Meach Lake, Quebec on September 17, 1975 and, if so, what was their (a) name (b) position (c) reason for attending?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): The inner workings of cabinet, cabinet committees (including membership therein), and the services rendered by support staff are traditionally considered confidential matters. Canadian precedents in this regard flowed from British practice over many years. In response to a question in the House the Canadian Prime Minister of the day on February 4, 1960 in part replied: "The means by which the cabinet conducts its business are traditionally regarded as its own domestic affair, and questions on the subject are normally neither asked nor answered." A detailed answer to the question would be a departure from the traditional position that has always been taken that meetings of the cabinet are private and no information is given concerning attendance.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I realize that hon. members opposite would feel very badly if I were to let a day go by without calling attention to the fact that question No. 1,232, asking for comprehensive details in connection with the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive, has never been answered. It is a very basic question and asks for the names of the donors, if indeed such donors do exist, and the amounts of money they have given. It further asks for the names of the designers of the pool and for various other technical details having to do with this somewhat peculiar enterprise which has been hidden, and which continues to be hidden, from the Canadian people.

I feel that parliament has a right to know about anything that goes on on public property, and 24 Sussex Drive is public property: it is the Prime Minister's official residence, but it belongs to the people of Canada. I fail to see, therefore, how the government can continue to abstain from answering legitimate questions about an enterprise which has been conducted on public property. Persons unconnected with the government have gone on to that property and dug a hole in the ground and taken part in a sizeable enterprise, apparently without permission from anyone, according to the Prime Minister, and I think it is about time the government put up or shut up about this smelly matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order of the day.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, before we embark upon a continuation of the debate on Bill C-73, I would respectuflly draw to your attention a major deficiency in the bill. The bill was distributed to hon. members without bearing a number; in other words, at the time authorization was given for first reading it did not carry a royal recommendation. It was only by delving into Votes and Proceedings that I was able to examine the recommendation which was made and compare it with the provisions in the bill. This work having been completed, I wish to draw to Your Honour's attention something which goes to the root of the bill and which is out of keeping with the royal recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I might interrupt the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I had intended to deal with the question of privilege raised yesterday by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is fine, Mr. Speaker, but orders of the day were called, and that is this bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is perfectly correct, I did call orders of the day; but before the bill was announced I had intended to deal with the question of privilege raised yesterday by the hon. member for Scarborough East.

PRIVILEGE

MR. O'CONNELL—PRESS PUBLICATION OF CONFIDENTIAL DRAFT REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION POLICY—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) raised a question of privilege concerning the publication of the draft report of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy. I wish to reiterate at the beginning of my observations today the point I made yesterday which was referred to by all who took part in the discussion, namely, that the House guards the confidentiality of draft reports of this nature at this stage of a committee's proceedings, and the publication of such a report would raise the strongest suggestion that some act had taken place which offended the privileges of the House.

The difficulty about the motion before us is not that it fails to deal with what appears to be a well accepted question of privilege in general terms but, rather, that it fails to be sufficiently specific. I refer to the absence from the motion of any allegation of misconduct which is specifically complained of in terms of a breach of the privileges of the House. Has there been an action by the publishers of the newspapers involved, or by the radio or television station, which constitutes a breach? The motion does not say. Has there been an action by a member of the House of Commons or by a member of the other place? The motion does not suggest it. Has there been an action by a staff member, perhaps, here or in the other place? Again, the motion does not suggest it. In other words, it seems to me that what the motion seeks is not an investigation of a prima facie case of privilege but, rather, an investigation to determine whether a prima facie question of privilege exists or whether a substantive motion would be in order.

There is a second difficulty: it is that the motion, if allowed, would lead to one committee of the House of Commons investigating the work or the operations of another committee, and that is a situation which has been carefully avoided in the past, and for good reason. Moreover, the fact that in this case a committee of the House of Commons would be investigating the work or operations of a joint committee makes it even more difficult and, from a jurisdictional point of view, more awkward.

The question may be asked: If this does not constitute a question of privilege, is the House without a remedy in these circumstances? I think all hon. members would be quick to agree that such is not the case. In the first place, a substantive motion can be put forward for an investigation, presumably by joint action in this and the other place. Since it would not, in those circumstances, be under the restriction of privilege, it would likely have more freedom from a procedural point of view.

Furthermore, it seems to me that there might not be great difficulty in the committee itself, because since it is a joint committee of both places it can, if it wishes, investigate further into this mishap and may proceed to do so. Of course, I am referring to hypothetical circumstances now. If there were a difficulty posed by the terms of reference in connection with this special joint committee, it seems to me, from the attitude expressed from all sides of the House yesterday, that there would be little difficulty in having those terms of reference expanded if, indeed, that were necessary. I would think there would be considerable question as to whether it would be necessary for the committee to obtain extended terms of reference if it wished to inquire into the circumstances surrounding the leak of a confidential report. However, I put that forward only as a suggestion which hon. members may wish to consider.

As I say, because the motion lacks precision and specific detail alleging conduct which constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House, from a procedural point of view—while it deals with a point which in the abstract or in general terms certainly touches upon the privileges of the House—I feel the motion is not sufficiently specific to enable the Chair to grant a question of privilege at this time.

● (1510)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I go to another point of order which does not touch upon the privileges of the House and perhaps will not present Your Honour with quite so much difficulty. The point I wish to make is that the royal recommendation appearing in Bill C-73 and in Votes and Proceedings of October 16 reads:

> His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons a measure to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada and to provide for the measure to expire on December 31, 1978.

I would draw to your attention clauses 26(2) and 46(2). Clause 26(2) provides for four-year appointments, which are far beyond the termination date of the bill as set out in clause 46(2). May I put clause 26(2) on the record:

> The chairman of the appeal tribunal shall be appointed to hold office during good behaviour for a term not exceeding four years but may be removed by the governor in council for cause, and each other member shall be appointed to hold office during pleasure for a term not exceeding four years.

The termination date of the bill, under clause 46(2), clearly being December 31, 1978, this House has no authority to make any appointment beyond December 31, 1978, of any member of the tribunal. The limitation of expenditure, as set out in the recommendation of the governor in council, is very clearly and flatly that the measure shall expire on December 31, 1978. Incidentally, clause 46(2) authorizes this House, by regulation prior to the expiry of the bill in 1978, to continue the measure in force as specified in an order of the House. But that provision is not in the recommendation.

I grant you, Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical point, but again I bring to your attention, as I have with budget bills, that the government must follow, in presenting its legislation, the limitations of the authority it seeks. I would therefore ask Your Honour to take this point under advisement and, if you are persuaded by my argument, to direct that the offending clauses be amended to conform with the recommendation or that a new recommendation be brought in in accordance with the intent of the bill as presented. It is either one thing or the other; we cannot have this bastard arrangement that exists in the present bill along with the recommendation that is on the order paper and which is also part of the bill.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has raised another technical question I agree with him that the point should be clarified, and I think the suggestion he has made that it be clarified by action other than withdrawal of the bill is the kind of action that I hope you will take if you find there is substance to the point he has raised.

May I draw Your Honour's attention to clause 46(2) and (5) of the bill. Subclause (2) provides:

> This act expires on December 31, 1978, or on such earlier date as may be fixed by proclamation unless, before December 31, 1978, or any earlier date fixed by proclamation, an order in council is made to the effect that this act shall continue in force for such period of time as may be set out in the order in council.

Subclause (5) provides:

> Failure of either House or both Houses of Parliament to resolve that an order in council referred to in subsection (2) be approved does not affect the validity of any action taken or not taken in reliance on the Order in Council prior to the conclusion of consideration thereof pursuant to subsection (3).

Clause 26(2) provides for a term of office not exceeding four years. I would submit that if in fact the governor in council were to make an appointment for four years and then later it was found desirable not to extend the act, then at least that appointment would continue to be valid.

As to the other point, whether it exceeds the royal recommendation, I suggest that is a very technical point. Indeed, if I were to follow the line of the hon. member for Edmonton West, I might argue that the final words, which provide for the measure to expire on December 31, 1978, are insufficient because there is in fact provision in the bill for an extension of the time by an order in council that shall be considered in this House and approved or disapproved. So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very technical point. I would argue that the bill is within the general ambit of the royal recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: As usual, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has raised a very interesting point. Use of the words "not exceeding four years" in clause

26(2) may be the key to this question. In any case, I propose to take it under consideration. It would seem to me that if what appears to be a power in clause 26(2) is in conflict with the clause bringing the act into expiry on December 31, 1978, then since the power given under clause 26(2) is not a power to appoint for four years, but for a term "not exceeding four years" it may well be, upon reflection, that clause 26(2) is circumscribed by the later clause 46, the provision regarding expiry of the act. However, I will take the matter under advisement.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this piece of legislation is certainly one of the most momentous in which I have had the opportunity to participate since coming to parliament. The actual and potential implications of this legislation are great indeed. It is probably the most momentous legislation that has come before this House since the Second World War.

I was rather interested to hear the government House leader today indicate, in response to a question from the floor of the House during the question period, that there is some hope this legislation will, as he termed it, be speeded through. It seems to me that when we are involved in legislation that does have this type of implication for all the people of Canada, there should be the fullest opportunity possible for debate in the House of Commons and parliament. That is what parliament is for, to look through the legislation presented by the government, especially important legislation of this kind, and to consider the ramifications so that we may in fact put through the best possible type of laws.

Let me suggest to the government House leader that if he is in fact sincere and earnest about getting this bill through quickly, he might consider giving some direction to his party whip. I notice that as many members on the government side as on the other side, if not more, have spoken on this piece of legislation. What they have contributed to it, I will leave to the judgment of those who are listening. Nonetheless, many people on the government side have taken part; I think certainly more than from our side. We are not in the process of delaying this legislation. We are trying with all the sincerity and earnestness at our command to bring to the attention of the government some of the pitfalls and shortcomings we see in respect of this particular bill.

The other aspect I think I should mention at the outset is that the bill contains provision for the measure to be effective retroactively. That is to say, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his speech on Thanksgiving Day made it quite clear that this bill was to come into effect on that particular date. I suggest that Thanksgiving Day will have the same sort of infamy, possibly, as Valentine's Day had in another context. I can only say that the Prime Minister affected my digestion at the time he appeared on nationwide television.

The fact is that the Prime Minister should look at this particular legislation with great care and concern. The potential implications of this bill mean the imposition of a system of guidelines that will have application to all Canadians. The Prime Minister in his Thanksgiving Day address made this point very clearly when he stated:

> And I am telling you tonight that this program must work, because if it does not, the government may be forced to impose mandatory, comprehensive, all-embracing price and income controls upon every man and woman in Canada.

He reiterated this in the course of remarks he made in western Canada, in Winnipeg and Assiniboia, just yesterday when he used words to the effect that it was his intention and the intention of his government to make sure that these particular guidelines would have universal application to the people of Canada. I suggest this rather thinly-veiled threat states clearly this government's intention in due course to take all steps within its power to intercede in the affairs of everyone in this country in its so-called program of guidelines. The Prime Minister and other government spokesmen continue to refer to guidelines, but I think there can be little doubt that we are entering into a period during which the government will be doing everything possible to impose mandatory controls.

Reference was made again during the question period today to the constitutionality of this legislation. It remains to be brought forward, on the part of the government, precisely how it envisages the introduction of these guidelines so they will have application to every man and woman, according to the Prime Minister, in this country. I think it is particularly incumbent upon the Prime Minister to indicate in clear, unequivocal terms that there is a national emergency and as a consequence we can look to this bill as being absolutely necessary. There has not been, in my estimation—and I hope to develop this—the type of candour that one might have expected from the leader of this country in relation to economic matters and, in particular, in relation to the imposition of controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I do not purport to be any sort of authority on constitutional matters, but I would find it most difficult, if I were in the government's position, to rely upon the advice of constitutional authority in this particular instance. One has to rely on peace, order and good government under our constitution. The government must look very carefully at its future steps and the threat the Prime Minister has made about the imposition of these controls and the other provisions of this bill. The government must look at its constitutional position in this regard.

It seems to me that aside from that—and the government is now embarking upon negotiations, commencing today, with the provinces—there are substantial obstacles that will have to be overcome no matter whether the government decides it is constitutional. The very least it will have to do—for a change, I would suggest—is deal with the provincial authorities in a frank and candid manner. I think that is the government's intention, quite frankly. I believe the government is going to try that particular approach to see if it is possible to come down with some type of agreement with the provinces which will have the effect of a penetration of the provisions and principles outlined in this legislation to all people, whether they are under provincial jurisdiction or otherwise.

The potential of this bill for government intervention into the activities of every man, woman and child in our country is, as I have stated, very great. I say this having regard to the background of the growth of substantial intervention by the government in the affairs of its citizens which has taken place so rapidly over the past few years. The legislation before us is rather typical of the kind of legislation we see presented by governments these days, under which some wide-ranging, general principles are stated in the bill with rule-making, enforcement and administration of the legislation being left to order in council.

To summarize this bill in very brief form, the government asks for the right to fight inflation, and concurrently asks for the right to legislate by order in council in respect of areas and matters which the government—I underline the word "government"—deems appropriate for this purpose. We have a tendency these days to accept this kind of legislation, not only in respect of items of minor consequence but in areas of general application across our country. The argument, on the one hand, is that in these modern, complex and difficult times governments must rely more and more on the delegation of power to administrative tribunals and bodies, but at the same time we are involved in an era of participatory democracy under which, apparently, the will of the people will be clearly enunciated in parliamentary terms.

The problem with this tendency which we have experienced, that of government by regulation, is that it appears to be irreversible and—most tragically, in my view—it runs in direct contradiction to the concept of individual rights and meaningful participatory democracy by the average citizen, through parliament. Therefore, when we have legislation such as the bill before us, involving as it does the potential for such long-term, arbitrary regulation and control essentially through an administrative tribunal, one wonders whether when the people of Canada collectively raise their heads to question government control they will discover that the road back to meaningful control by the people over the government will be most difficult if not impossible.

This government, in my view, is not inclined to take stock of its approach to government by delegation. I have the distinct impression that it finds this method of operation convenient and easy. The government appears to adopt the attitude that it is politically expedient to neutralize major problems by establishing an administrative body and turning the problem over to that body for solution. The political result of such action is to dissipate pressure on the government to take difficult and meaningful legislative action to deal with the problems of our day. As Members of Parliament, we have often heard our constituents who seek redress of administrative decisions make statements of utter exasperation when it becomes clear to them that their rights are governed by arbitrary, bureaucratic decision with no right of appeal.

By this legislation, this government is therefore introducing its most massive delegation of authority for what I consider to be a prolonged and unnecessary period of time. If there was ever a situation where there should be the right of parliament to review a program or specific legislation, this is the time. As I have stated, this legislation represents the type of philosophic approach that the government takes to any problem. The legislation seems to be the sum and substance of the government's meaningful intentions, and it seems to me that there are serious omissions in the over-all program.

While we are now getting details of the negative side of the government's policy consisting of controls on wages and prices for an undue period of time, there is the absence of any statement by the government as to the positive fiscal and monetary policies it will be adopting immediately and over the long term, which in my view are the really important parts of any meaningful attack on inflation.

What are the monetary policies of this government, and are they to be clearly stated and put into effect? What priority of spending will be proposed so that parliament can assess how much money will be available to various sectors of the economy? What projects will be given priority, and what projects will be removed or relegated to a secondary priority? What clear statement have we had with respect to the government's policy concerning interest rates, government bond issues and regulations governing banking?

Fiscally, do we have any idea at all what the government has in mind in the field of taxation to deal with its attack on the inflationary problem? What has been said by the government to give anyone any confidence with respect to meaningful efficiencies and reductions in government spending? The proposals on prices and income control put forward by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in the last election were only a small part of the total program announced to increase productivity, restore economic responsibility in government and fight inflation. This part of the program was, hon. as members will recall, strongly criticized by the Prime Minister and the Liberal party even though the proposed controls would be put in place for only a minimal period of time, primarily to attempt to break the inflationary psychology we are experiencing in Canada.

Leadership is sorely needed in this country with respect to our economic situation. I feel that we in the opposition have the responsibility to stand up against inequity in the program, to obtain reasonable fiscal and monetary policies from the government, and to bring unrelenting pressure on the government to re-examine fundamentally its own spending program. People in Canada, by and large, are receptive to a reasonable attempt by the government to give economic leadership. I suspect that if it were possible to take a full survey of public sentiment at this time, the government would find the majority of Canadians responsive to a reasonable program to attack inflation. They are in fact looking at this particular legislation with a good deal of hope and expectation.

I suggest that the bill before us today contains some very serious shortcomings. I have enunciated some of the thoughts which I have. I do not think the bill itself will be sufficient to give us any type of meaningful attack on the problem of inflation. Therefore, it is my view that there will have to be fundamental amendments to the legislation if there is to be any hope of public acceptance of the concept of controls, including a review of the whole program of controls outlined in this bill. This legislation in its present form causes me the greatest concern in terms of the prospect of the restriction of freedom of the individual.

Another aspect of the circumstances leading to the introduction of this bill causes me some concern. The Prime Minister, for reasons known only to himself, chose to make the announcement of his government's program to attack inflation on Thanksgiving Day. Why the Prime Minister made this assault on our digestion on that particular evening is difficult to understand. The program announced by the Prime Minister is a complete turn-about from the position the government took with respect to controls almost up to the time the program was announced. I think it is pretty generally agreed by most authorities on the subject that in order to have an effective system of controls there must be a high degree of public acceptance.

This principle is enunciated by people who were attached to the wartime prices and trade board during the Second World War. They state that their job was difficult even though there was at that time a compelling reason and high motivation. No less an authority than the husband of Beryl Plumptre, vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, was interviewed on television recently, and he confirmed that there must be something in the nature of general public co-operation. This point of view, no doubt, will be well made by Mrs. Plumptre, whose role, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), will be to go out and sell the program with missionary zeal. I am sure that Mrs. Plumptre, having a direct relationship to the wartime prices and trade board, will have some thoughts on the difficulties of enforcing such a program as this even during wartime.

The performance of this government in connection with obtaining credibility for the program, up to this point in time in any event, has been less than satisfactory. The apparently sudden and instantaneous reversal by the Prime Minister on the question of controls will certainly have an effect on the credibility of the government's position with respect to its program. Accordingly, it seems to me that since the Prime Minister and his colleagues in cabinet have been speaking out so strongly against the program of controls up to very recently, there has not been the desired explanation by the government as to why it now expects Canadians to live up to its so-called guidelines.

This apparent lack of candour displayed by the government toward the Canadian people is even more surprising, in my view, when one considers the material filed by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on October 14, 1975, outlining the government's program with respect to inflation, including price and wage controls. This document was not a series of hastily drafted mimeographed sheets, but a slick publication, in both official languages, reminiscent of annual reports of large corporations or government departments and agencies. This makes one think that the document had been in preparation over a period of months as opposed to weeks.

In order that any program of controls can be successful, it is absolutely essential that the government be frank and candid with the people of Canada concerning our economic circumstances. Notwithstanding the position of the Minister of Finance—and I am sorry he is not in the House today because, as I understand, he is with the representatives of the provinces; I wanted to address these comments to him in view of some of the statements he made to the House with respect to the program—I trust he will show restraint in his approach to parliament during the debate on this program and will not indulge in a provocative and argumentative debate. This type of debate will do little good in convincing Canadians of the necessity for any program of controls and, in the long run, will tend to defeat the kind of national acceptance required for the implementation of such a program.

Quite frankly, the performance of the government up to this point has made me somewhat nervous. The public perception of the program appears to be that it has been hastily put together—although I am not certain that this is necessarily the case, in view of the material being put out by the minister and the government—and this view has been confirmed by the unfortunate press conference held by the nominees for the two top jobs on the Anti-Inflation Board. Let us, by all means, have openness of information as to what the Anti-Inflation Board is doing, but I hope the first directive by the cabinet to the board will instruct the chairman not to say or do anything further until he is adequately prepared.

I also have the belief that in the months ahead the government must periodically, through parliament, keep the Canadian people fully advised, with all the candour it has at its disposal, of the economic circumstances from here on in. If our economy is in as bad a shape as the government now says it is, this information must be forthcoming so that the general public can, in fact, pass judgment on the necessity of instituting and then continuing a program of wage and price controls.

I am not altogether hopeful that we can expect candour from this government in view of the performance we have seen over the past year, including that displayed in the period during the last election. Hon. members on the government side have not in the past few days been giving a good example to the cabinet. They have been standing up one by one, in an aura of innocence that can only be described as cherubic, to state that they have now come to the realization that inflation is the number one problem in the country. There is no trace of embarrassment in their speeches, yet this problem has been plain and clear for anyone to see, and has been with us over the past few years rather than the past few days.

It may be a partisan thought on my part, but I wonder how that scantily clad girl who was depicted in Liberal ads during the last election campaign, sitting on large blocks of ice and shivering over the prospect of short-term controls is going to survive the government's announced long-term controls. This government has a big job to do in selling its program. I hope that the government and members supporting it will come to realize that unless they are prepared to deal honestly and fairly with the public, including the immediate presentation of fiscal and monetary policies to deal with the fundamental or root causes of inflation, they will have a very difficult time sustaining a program of controls—and will do a disservice to our country.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise with mixed feelings to take part in this debate which is one of the most important debates we have had in the House of Commons for a good many years. It is interesting to see, after all the talk of price and wage controls and price guidelines which took place in the 1974 election, Liberal after Liberal literally reversing himself in the debate which we have had in the past week.

An example of that was the speech given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) last night in the House in which he contradicted himself completely. Basically, what he said was that the Conservative and Liberal programs are very different and cannot really be compared. It seems to me that the object of the game, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, is to stay in power. So far as their policy is concerned, their principles are very few and far between. They use everybody else's ideas, or they try to ignore the problem in the hope it will go away or solve itself. If it does not, they often act in a half-hearted manner.

I think we are all indebted to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who had the courage and foresight to conduct his campaign in the 1974 election on the platform of price and wage restraints. What has happened since 1974? The government's inability to act has made the problem of inflation in Canada even more urgent.

There are several aspects of the bill which the Conservative party will want to consider when it goes to committee. But first I should like to point out that the length of time during which these controls are to be in effect under the legislation is too long in the view of this party. Although there is necessity at present for controls so as to produce the psychological impact of dampening the inflationary spiral, if controls are left on for too long they will have a distorting influence on the marketplace. The longer controls are left on in an economy such as Canada's, the greater the distortions may become. There is that inherent danger in imposing them for a three-year period.

We on this side of the House urge the establishment of a full parliamentary review after one year. We feel that it is necessary to keep the public and parliament informed and, most important, to retain the confidence of the Canadian people, because this is what will be needed for an effective program of controls. So far as this legislation is concerned, it contains no provision for comprehensive reporting to parliament during the life of the program. Consequently, we call for a review not later than one year after the coming into force of the legislation.

We believe that the program set out by the government in the bill before us is fuzzy both in principle and in detail. A good many people in Canada believe that for a program of controls to be effective in this country, it must be decisive and clearcut and it must include all segments of the economy in the initial period. This program allows for exemptions, and certainly in the initial stages it does not apply equally to all interested groups and all segments of Canadian society. Because of that, there is the chance the program may become distorted or ignored by certain sectors of our society. We all know that the people of Canada must be persuaded to accept the controls and must realize that any kind of control or restraint program is not only good for them in the long run but is vital for the survival of our economy.

Clause 14 of the bill requires the Anti-Inflation Board to keep its findings secret. We realize that a program of this kind will only work if some confidentiality is observed, and we feel that the program will ultimately be successful if the public has confidence that the measures are being carried out in their best interests. Returning to what the public perceives in this legislation and whether it can feel the kind of confidence which is needed to carry out this kind of legislation, clause 14 certainly will not instil any great amount of confidence in the Canadian people. The government must do more than simply carry out an elaborate public relations program. This is really all that is being done.

The other day, in Winnipeg, the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to a group of businessmen was another shambles. It was a lecture in very basic economics. This approach will not be sufficient if this program is to be sold to the Canadian people and if they are to have confidence in it. If all they see is a high profile public relations kind of program, the public will become more and more skeptical of this program because they will not feel that the federal government, its ministers and the Prime Minister are completely behind the legislation.

Another area of concern in this legislation for the Conservative Party is the aspect of price controls applied domestically but not on imported goods. This could cause Canadian-produced goods to be sent out of the country and hence, if the program is not carried out properly, we could see shortages developing in certain segments of the economy. There will be a greater amount of record-keeping and this can certainly be expected to be time-consuming and costly. This will be so for small business which will ultimately have to bear more of the burden because of the way the legislation is drawn up.

It will certainly prove to be an unfair burden on companies of various sizes engaged in the same industry and in competition with each other, because of the nature of the legislation. In addition, in some respects it will be unfair, for the same basic reason, to various segments of labour. This is because, once again, the legislation does not lump everyone together and impose on the economy the same kind of control for a short period of time in order to move into this aspect of breaking the psychological expectation with regard to inflation. If the government is not very careful, because of its long term of three years, this legislation could lead to something much more serious than double-digit inflation. If a program such as this is not very carefully monitored, explained and laid before the Canadian people on a continuing basis, it could move into the aspect of partial control of certain segments of the economy after the three-year period has elapsed.

Given its past performance, it is not easy to see how the Trudeau government can operate this plan without creating an enormous bureaucratic machine, populated by mini-czars with huge discretionary powers and faceless mandarins behind the scenes operating the program. Conversely, how will the government be able to dismantle this apparatus after three years in which, as is normal in the federal civil service, it will largely be occupied with expanding and perpetuating itself? We have seen enough of that taking place over the last 10 to 12 years.

I submit that the quickest way to stop inflation is for the government to stop redistributing national income faster than the economy is able to generate it. When we look at the books of the government, we see that two-thirds to three-quarters of government expenditures are for redistribution. Increased spending by the government in this area reflects the rising costs of provincially-administered medicare programs, hospitalization programs, unemployment insurance programs and regional development programs.

It is my contention that the government's plan will ultimately fail unless regulations that people live within their means are also carried forward by the federal government. I think that programs such as Information Canada must go. Flag-waving trips around the world certainly can be curtailed. Programs in the $100,000, $500,000 and $1 million range, which are not considered so by most Canadians but are considered by the government to be small programs, must be cut or curtailed. This must be done because the government must demonstrate that it is willing to combat inflation. Unless measures like these are taken, the program ultimately will not work.

Further, capital expenditures which can be cancelled or deferred, must be cancelled or deferred. As I mentioned before, re-examination, is necessary with regard to unemployment insurance and all forms of welfare programs. They must be reviewed very carefully and the government must begin curtailing these kinds of programs. For example, in the period 1971-72 we spent $750 million on the unemployment insurance program. In 1972-73 it increased to $1.1 billion. In 1973-74 it increased to $2 billion, and from March 31 to July 31, 1975, it was up an additional 43 per cent from 1974, to $2.1 billion. These social programs and redistribution programs must be looked at in the long term with a view to curtailing them.

I think it could be said, as a general, blanket statement that if the inflationary program of the government is ultimately to bring inflation in Canada anywhere near the rate the government is talking about, it will have to rearrange spending programs unless they are of top priority. This must be one of the central themes in the government's restraint program. If the government does not move on that basis, I think there is no doubt that the exercise we are going through now will only lead to worse inflation, possibly more unemployment and a kind of social unrest Canada has never seen.

The Prime Minister said that the wage guidelines will be applied to all employees in the federal service. He went on to say that growth in the size of the federal work force would be limited to that required to administer the guidelines, and some increases in law enforcement personnel. Finally, he said, and I quote:

—we'll eliminate or reduce spending in many smaller but separate areas that all add up. For example, strict economies will be imposed on the administrative housekeeping aspects of the government's business—

That is all well and good if the government carries this program through. The Prime Minister also said that in spite of these measures, government expenditures must be expected to further rise—

—if we are to continue to provide essential services such as cushioning Canadians against part of the increase in the cost of imported oil, protecting the aged and others living on fixed incomes against some of the effects of inflation and continuing to provide assistance to the unemployed. Programs such as these ... are the cornerstone of the economic and social policy of the government—

That is precisely the problem. These programs were pursued to such an extreme that the only way their cost could be covered was by expanding the money supply at an inflation-inducing rate. It is no coincidence that the purchasing power of the dollar has been halved over the ten-year period during which the growth in the money supply was twice the rate of real growth in the economy. It is my contention that we will continue to have inflation until those programs which are "the cornerstone of the government's economic and social policy" are also brought within our means.

In the initial period controls will, hopefully, cut back on the excesses in both prices and the wages for which people are asking. Certainly, that is the whole purpose of the program. In the interim period they will, hopefully, exercise some general moderation in regard to expectations. All this is necessary to the abatement or slowdown of inflation. What remains in doubt, however, is the extent to which the mainspring of inflation—which is government demands on the economy to support programs in excess of the economy's ability to pay, without resorting to inflationary monetary supply increases—is unwound or scaled down within the next one to three years.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the announcement of controls came on the thirteenth day of the thirteenth month after parliament met for the first time following the 1974 election. One need not be superstitious to see the significance of this move. We can only hope that the government will put some teeth into this anti-inflationary program. We in this party are ready to support the legislation on second reading and refer it to committee, where we hope to see some amendments which will enable us to bring inflation in Canada down to an acceptable level.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on December 24, 1970, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated:

There is no more inflation in Canada.

Now in October 1975, that is five years later, inflation is worse than ever which means that the Prime Minister was entirely mistaken and time will also show that he was entirely mistaken when he announced the steps giving rise to Bill C-73.

In 1974, the price of bread increased by 26 per cent, the price of sugar by 126 per cent, that of apples by 32.6 per cent, that of margarine by 26.9 per cent, that of flour by 35.7 per cent and that of potatoes by 23.1 per cent and those are only a few essential foodstuffs.

In all other production areas, Mr. Speaker, the conditions were the same. The same Prime Minister today who does not seem to remember what he said in 1970 or who believes that everyone has forgotten has announced extraordinary measures to control inflation.

These alleged anti-inflation measures announced by the Prime Minister are nothing more than window dressing and in 18 months from now the government will introduce new measures according to the Prime Minister's wishes as well as the wishes of every good socialist, setting up in Canada a socialist state in the manner of Mao, in which all individual economic activity, be it from producers or consumers, will be subject to the direct control of a giant bureaucracy that is being already structured and will be built.

Moreover, this so-called anti-inflation board will establish itself in all areas and its tentacles will spread everywhere. These first measures, Mr. Speaker, will not solve anything. They are nothing but window dressing. When a house is not level on its foundations, it is useless to try to disguise shoddy construction by attempting to repair the roof. The bases of our economic system are not well balanced. It is the root cause of inflation in the "roof of prices". The Prime Minister wants to attack the consequences of inflation without tackling the causes; he has steered the wrong course ever since he came to power and he will continue to do so. However, I must concede something to the Prime Minister. He is in perfect agreement with the views and principles he held before he was Prime Minister, at the time he was writing in Cité libre. We could refer to numerous passages where, after his many travels around the world, he expresses his admiration for existing socialist and communist dictatorships.

He would like to introduce the same system in Canada. That is why it was easier for him to find his way into the Liberal party than to defeat the Liberal party by remaining in the New Democratic Party of which he was a partisan. He applied the old principle: If you can't beat them, join them. That is what he did.

Inflation suits him. Without it, things would not have reached their present state which forces him to enact measures that are window dressing at the start but within the next three years other measures will follow that will lead Canada to essentially socialist structures.

When the Prime Minister established an objective of a 10 per cent maximum annual price increase, he confirmed this. First of all, he can do nothing to stop inflation. Then, inflation will jump by at least 10 per cent a year and, finally, he will fail to come up with concrete proposals to reduce production costs.

The December 14, 1974 issue of the Quebec City daily Le Soleil featured an article by Mr. Jean-Paul Gagné entitled: "The catastrophic consequences of inflation" which reads:

In order for you to better appreciate the scope of the phenomenon, here is a small table which indicates the future costs of various commodities, based on the assumption that the rate of inflation will go up by 10 per cent annually through 1980, 1985 and until 2,000.

The bus ticket which cost 40 cents in 1974 now sells for 50 cents in Montreal in 1975; assuming a continued inflation rate of 10 per cent annually from 1975 through 1985, and 1995, this bus ticket will cost $1.15 in 1985 and $2.95 in 1995. The same ticket which cost 40 cents in 1974 will set you back $4.70 in the year 2,000. A package of cigarettes which cost 80 cents in 1974 will go for $2.30 in 1985, $6.00 in 1995 and $9.65 in the year 2,000. The movie ticket which cost $2.50 in 1974 will sell for $7.15 in 1985, $18.50 in 1995 and $29.85 in the year 2,000. With the same inflation rate of 10 per cent annually, the dress which cost $35 in 1974 will be yours for $99.85 in 1985, $259.05 in 1995, and $417.20 in the year 2,000. A food basket which cost $50.00 in 1974 will be worth $142 in 1985, $370 in 1995, and $595.95 in the year 2,000. A man's suit which sold for $125 in 1974 will cost $356.65 in 1985, $925 in 1995 and $1,490 in the year 2,000. A car valued at $4,500 in 1974 will cost $12,839 in 1885, $33,301 in 1995 and $53,631 in the year 2,000. A house advertised for $30,000 in 1974, taking into account the government's proposals and a 10 per cent increase every year, will cost $85,593 in 1885, not including the interest costs, $222,007 in 1995 and finally $357,000 in the year 2,000.

Mr. Speaker, with such a stupid, upside down and ridiculous economy, an $8,000 annual salary will have, to maintain the so-called constant dollar value confronting this sickness, the cancer of inflation, an $8,000 annual salary in 1974 dollars will have to reach $22,825 in 1885, $59,202 in 1995 and $95,345 in the year 2,000. Anyone who got $12,000 in salary for 1974 will command $34,237 in 1985, $88,803 in 1995 and $143,018 in the year 2,000.

Those figures, Mr. Speaker, show where we are heading to with a maximum inflationary growing rate of 10 per cent a year as was proposed by the Prime Minister when he announced his so-called anti-inflationary new policy. Mr. Speaker, Bill C-73 now before us will lead the country directly to economic disaster, destruction of free enterprise, scarcity of goods and to a bureaucratic state where workers will serve the state.

Mr. Speaker, I will now quote an excerpt form Inflation et Société, 1960, by professor Graham Hutton:

In England, socialist economists publicly proposed that inflation is an economic means to expropriate owners . . . Socialist thinkers have such an aversion against private property and personal savings that, in the late 50's, some of them advocated expropriation by deliberately provoking inflation, after falsely reassuring savers and investors by intermittent periods of stable prices.

May I quote an excerpt from an economist, professor Graham Hutton, in the publication Inflation et Société, 1960:

Inflation is an indirect attack against justice and the rights of people. Because it deprives individuals of the value of their savings, it is immoral . . . inflation is burglary. When those who call themselves economists . . .

—those who in effect guided the government into the present inflationary chaos and are unable to lead the government out of it, these same economists—.

> . . . debate whether the inflation rate is controlled within one or two per cent 2 year, they recognize in effect they are only interested in controlling the rate of that burglary rather than stopping it . . .
> Inflation has always been a revolutionary policy leading ultimately to a totalitarian state.

What are the causes of inflation, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister did not discuss that.

When the gross national product stands at $100 billion and at the sometime the money supply is $60 billion, there is an automatic cry by consumers for higher wages or higher revenue from $60 to $100 billion in order that with such increased revenues the $100 billion price tag of goods may be bought.

The purchasing power deficiency relative to production is a consequence of inflation, and price inflation relative to cost increases is clear proof that there is inadequate purchasing power relative to prices.

As every production cost is included in prices, it is totally stupid and useless to raise wage revenues without increasing costs, because wage revenues are a part of costs. Boosting wages to adjust to cost increases is absolutely no solution. Proof evident is that inflation absorbs wage increases.

If for instance with the use of some devices we hold a prey five feet before any animal, whatever the latter's speed it will always be five feet behind the prey.

Whatever the rate at which salaries are increased to catch up with prices, because wages are a part of costs included in prices, prices will always be ahead of the consumers, whatever the rate of inflation, whether controlled or not.

Wage rises are no remedy to inflation. However, the revenue increase generated by a guaranteed annual income given to all and financed by new credits from the Bank of Canada which would not be included in prices would expand the money supply at the price level and prevent inflation by supplementing incomes without raising prices.

Only the government can take social measures to fight inflation. Neither industry nor labour can do anything about it. Only the federal government, which has all the economic and financial power, can add to incomes the difference between the total of incomes and the total of marked prices.

Social Crediters have two solutions to balance the economy. The first one is to balance the total of incomes with the total of prices and the second one is to lower prices through a retail discount which would allow consumers to pay prices to producers at no loss for them. I regret, Mr. Speaker, not to have more time at my disposal to deal with all the other causes of inflation.

The first cause I have just dealt with is that our production system, total salaries and revenues distributed in the course of production, is always inferior to the total prices attached to the goods produced over a given production cycle, whence the constant difference between total prices and total purchasing power; that, as I explained earlier, leads to useless runs on higher salaries.

Another cause of inflation, Mr. Speaker, is the expansion of credit by the private monopolies that banks are in their own interest: they manipulate credit in the country, for their own benefit, without taking into account overall needs or the economic priorities of the country.

At any time, banking institutions can alter the course of the social economy of a country. Still another cause of inflation is the disappearance of competition in the various sectors of production. Multinational companies have, individually, total sales that exceed in value of the national gross product (NGP) of many countries throughout the world. They have plants, branch offices everywhere in the world. They transfer huge amounts of money, exert considerable influence on the rate of exchange and the balance of payments of countries. They can alter to quite an extent the rate of growth of a country either through exports or imports to or from another country. They can trigger off financial crises of worldwide magnitude. Here is an excerpt from an article published in La Presse on March 28, 1974. I quote:

> OIL COMPANIES GANG UP TO INCREASE PRICES AND PROFITS?

—and in La Voix de l'Est, dated May 13, 1974, one could read this:

> In 1980, 200 multinational companies will control the economy of the capitalist countries.

And, Mr. Speaker, when one discovers what is behind all those multinational companies, one comes to the same conclusions as those reached by some American companies or inquiry commissions some years ago. I refer here to the United States News & World Report of 25 March, 1974, which says on page 20, I quote:

[English]

> A study of stock concentrations prepared by the Metcalf-Muskie subcommittees showed, for example, that the top 30 stockholders of Mobil Oil Company had 29 per cent of its stock and that 17 per cent was held by the trust departments of seven big New York banks—First National City, Chase Manhattan, Morgan Guaranty, Bankers Trust, Manufacturers Hanover, Bank of New York and U.S. Trust Company.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a little further, it says this:

● (1620)

[English]

> A House Banking Committee survey of 49 banks in 10 major cities found more than 8,000 cases, involving 6,500 firms, in which officials of banks served as directors of other companies and vice versa.
> Of the Penn Central's 23 directors, 16 were also directors of 19 banks; 17 bank trust departments were among the 30 top Penn Central stockholders, with an aggregate 22 per cent of its stock.
> The most controversial part of the Metcalf-Muskie study was a charge that banks were engaged in a massive cover-up, using nominees or "street names" to hide their holdings.

[Translation]

And this brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the same conclusion I reached a few years ago. An American Senate investigation committee, presided over by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Brandies, stated two years later, after the investigation of this committee on trusts and monopolies in the U.S.A. while summarizing his investigation:

> There is but one monopoly: the creation of credit.

And he was right. I have in hand, Mr. Speaker, another American magazine, The Business Week, dated March 16, 1974. It lists all the American banks two years before the increase in oil and gas prices throughout the world. American banks moved to Saudi Arabia, in the Middle East. They took over the banks and we have the evidence on page 40 of The Business Week of March 16, 1974, which depicts the increase in oil and gas prices all over the world. American banks settled down in the Middle East, opened up new branches and took over the control of Middle East banks. Now, two years later, the price of gasoline and oil went up, all over the world. Billions of dollars found their way to the Middle East, were deposited in American banks, and returned to the United States or elsewhere in the world under the form of investments called "Arab investments".

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a legislation which is supposed to be anti-inflation, and we know the economic foundation of monopolies and of the banks which control international interests. This legislation will automatically lead Canada to a totalitarian dictatorship and the government will be unable to control the multinational corporations. Why? Because our legislation cannot apply to monopolies whose headquarters is not in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the solution advocated by the right hon. Prime Minister because I know it will lead the country toward figures which now seem stupid. For instance, it seems that if a worker wants to keep pace with an inflation of 10 per cent a year from 1974 to the year 2,000, he will have to earn an average income of about $200,000 around the year 2,000 because of the eccentricities of the present economic structure and its upward trend. The economists who support the government have no alternative solution except to continue with this system which works in reverse and is ruining the country and the savings and which will ruin private enterprise and personal initiative and create a board which will have to be more powerful than the government to intrude in private and corporate fields because the government failed to take its responsibilities. Only the government has the economic and financial power to reverse inflation. The government should have announced an economic policy which would allow it to roll back prices by at least 10 per cent a year instead of increasing them by 10 per cent.

It would have been to the advantage of consumers and producers for the government to introduce fiscal and monetary legislation allowing a reversal of the Canadian economy within 5 years through a price reduction of 10 per cent a year.

Instead, the government is placing itself above producers and this will certainly not protect the consumers who will have to suffer one way or another for this so-called price freeze. The government will perhaps freeze wages, but it will not be able to freeze prices because the Canadian economy is monopolistic. Monopolies control the Canadian economy. One only has to refer to the number of books available here at the parliamentary library and containing the information about the structures of monopolies existing in Canada. In this way you will understand the link that exists between them. That is why the price and wage control policy is an absolutely disastrous policy, a negative policy. It is not a progressive policy, it is not a policy to encourage the farmer, the individual or the worker to produce more because with 10 per cent a year, the result will be, based on the figures I quoted earlier, that a salary of $8,000 in 1974 will correspond to a salary of $164,000 in the year 2,000.

Perhaps the figures I just gave are not taken seriously. One only has to figure it out. Take an adding machine, figure out a progression of 10 per cent a year, and see the figure you can come up with. That might allow you to realize that the savings, the goods, the work being done now, as those of other producers and consumers of this country, are going directly to ruin because this government did not come up with the policy it should have to halt inflation.

The government listened once again to the economists who created inflation in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to announce that when it will be time to vote on this bill in this House, I will be voting with both hands, and if I could vote more than once against this bill, I would.

[English]

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, a former Liberal prime minister once said that in politics one must do as one does at sea in a sailing ship—not steer a straight course to one's destination, but pay regard to prevailing winds. I suspect that our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did pay regard to prevailing winds when he suggested to his cabinet colleagues and to the people of Canada that a program of price and income controls should be imposed as a solution to the ailing economic difficulties of our country.

I confess I do not share the degree of enthusiasm my colleagues have expressed—particularly my colleagues on the other side of the House—about this program. As a matter of fact, I would have hoped it would never have been necessary to impose measures of this kind upon the Canadian people; I would have hoped that someone would eventually have been able to manage our economy in a statesmanlike fashion, capable of the kind of fiscal and monetary performance which would have ruled out the type of measures we are now discussing. I am also concerned about the despicable performance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) when he first introduced the white paper on the guidelines and, later, the bill now before us. It is nothing new. It should have been no surprise to us who have become accustomed to that kind of procedure on the part of a minister who sold us an energy package a couple of months ago and used cheap political tricks in an attempt to discredit an opposition which had serious reservations about some of the propositions he was putting forward.

I might add that some of the reservations we expressed at that time have proved to be fully justified. As the House will recall, we were talking about energy conservation, Petro-Can and Syncrude. There are probably not many members in the House today who know there have been developments in the process used to gain oil from the tar sands of Alberta, and that oil can now be extracted at a fraction of the cost envisaged under the plan the present Minister of Finance bought on behalf of the Canadian people. It would be fair to speculate that the minister fell victim to a con game on the part of international oil companies who knew there was better technology in the offing and who had to bail out before this knowledge was shared by a broader segment of the industry.

If the government intends to see this package through, it will need a better sales manager than it has employed up till now. How do people know that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are telling them the truth this time? After having been told that price and wage controls will never work because they have never worked anywhere else, how can they believe the government now? The Conservatives' price and income controls of 1974 were said to be a cruel joke on the Canadian people. The performance of my colleagues from across the aisle reminds me of the young fellow at school who was a notorious liar. Every time he had something really serious to say, he had to say, "I am telling you the truth this time". This is what the Prime Minister is saying, that this time he is telling us the truth. But how do we know?

The truth is that inflation cannot be cured with price and income controls. Any member across the way who says that the Conservative party has stated that price and income controls are a cure to inflation is simply being dishonest. What is inflation, anyway? It is the main ingredient of the program that we are discussing today. Inflation is an international and domestic con game. The international con game works in this way. Countries like the United States embark upon schemes of extravagance that they cannot sell to their own taxpayers. They water down their currency and buy products on international markets with those watered down dollars. Of course, in the case of the United States it was the Viet Nam war that made that kind of approach necessary.

In Canada we also indulge in schemes of extravagance in the field of welfare—programs such as unemployment insurance, DREE, LIP, LEAP and a long list of others which do not make sense to a lot of Canadians or have their support. It is for this reason that we have to water down our domestic currency and cheat recipients under these schemes by paying them with dollars that are really not worth what they are supposed to be worth.

The program the government is trying to introduce is very much different from that which we proclaimed in the 1974 election. In my opinion, it is very important that we tell Canadians where the program differs. Firstly, the government intends to regulate the economy with price and income controls. It intends to fight inflation in this way. We feel that inflation can only be controlled and disciplined through monetary and fiscal management. Wage and price controls should only be used as a tool to break inflationary expectations.

It is for this reason we feel that a three-year period is much too long. Serious shortages of consumer goods will occur and there will be an imbalance between imported and domestically-produced goods. I had a telephone call from a constituent yesterday, a contractor, who told me that the day following the announcement of the guidelines he was informed by suppliers of a very important commodity, namely, furnaces, that there will be no supply of furnaces this year until the company can determine to what extent the guidelines will affect its operations.

More serious than that is the fact that the program is selective in nature and, therefore, unfair to a very large segment of our people. It effectively controls wages—or at least we think it will, provided the government has the guts to carry it out. But it still allows prices to fluctuate and be regulated by input costs. The large corporations which deal in the export markets will be under no price restriction at all. It is interesting to speculate how unions subject to the 10 per cent ceiling on incomes will respond to that. Some companies will be monitored, others not. What about the lumber industry, the pulp mills and the wood fibre commodity groups that sell 75 per cent of their production offshore? What will the unions say when these companies' profits and prices continue to escalate and rise at the same time as the work force producing the goods is tied to strict guidelines?

Then there is the bureaucracy that needs to be set up, and the prospect of an administrative nightmare. Yesterday I asked the minister in the House whether the government has dealt with the perplexing question of how many people will be required to administer the program, and he said he thought it would take 200. Another minister on the treasury benches said they were speculating it might take 500 people. I suggest to Your Honour that it will take more like 5,000 people, if not 50,000, to administer the program that we have in front of us.

For example, the Anti-Inflation Board reports to the administrator, who is checked by the appeal tribunal, which can be overruled by the governor in council. All are expected to apply a degree of discretion as they monitor, regulate and administer the guidelines which may be changed from time to time. Most important of all is the ingredient that is missing, and that is the faith and trust of the Canadian people in their government which has shown lack of leadership. The program we proposed was watered down because, as the Prime Minister said, he wanted it to be equitable.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was deformed.

Mr. Oberle: It was deformed, my colleague says. To whom is it supposed to be equitable? Is it to be equitable to the unemployed, the sick, the disabled, the senior citizen? Is it to be equitable to the unions and big corporations; or is it simply to be equitable to the Simards and William Terons of this country?

As my colleagues on this side know, we would have imposed a 90-day freeze on all prices and incomes. We would have made the program equitable to all Canadians. We would have used the time during this solid 90-day freeze to work out monetary and fiscal strategy. One must remember that this proposal was made during an election campaign and we were expecting to take over from a bungling government, which is why we needed time after the election to sit down together and discuss the situation and to tell Canadians that they would be dealing with a group of people who would always speak the truth. It would have taken 90 days to sit down and discuss the situation and to tell the people that this was a government that would always tell the truth and was backing up its convictions by bringing in legislation to keep everybody honest.

Then there would be a period of adjustment to correct imbalances and inequities and to promote a climate of mutual trust. Unions and businessmen would have been invited to sit down with us. We have heard about the consensus program. This would have come after the freeze. But what my colleagues across the aisle do not understand is that a consensus program in an area of mutual distrust will never work. The former minister of finance learned that in his attempt to carry out such a program.

Because there is no trust among unions and businessmen and no leadership in our country, I fear this program is doomed to failure. Leadership is not something you can announce in the House of Commons or during an election; it is something you have to demonstrate and something you have to practice by example. You cannot announce leadership and ask the people to engage in blind trust.

We know all about blind trust. When it comes to conflict of interest, blind trust, in the eyes of our colleagues from across the aisle, simply means that if you are in a leading government position, a position of power in the cabinet or in the civil service, you pass your shares in private corporations which may benefit from any decision you make in your position of power to a good friend, who will hold the shares in his name. Of course, you still dictate the policy and you still decide when to sell and when to buy. That is blind trust.

An hon. Member: And urbanetics.

Mr. Oberle: Urbanetics is one example, yes. The people of Canada will not engage in that kind of blind trust. One of the concerns I have results from a comparison of the guidelines which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has proposed to the House, with the rent controls a socialist government has introduced in the province of British Columbia. I fear that they will assure, for the next four years, a 10 per cent rate of inflation.

The government of British Columbia has imposed rental guidelines over the last two years, and rents have risen higher than they have in the city of Toronto which has a problem equal to that of the city of Vancouver. The reason is that there were guidelines, and everyone who rented to anyone felt compelled to increase rents in accordance with those guidelines. There is no provision in the guidelines to the effect that anyone who might not need a 10 per cent increase can ask for less. In fact, no one will bargain for less than 10 per cent.

An hon. Member: This is built-in inflation.

Mr. Oberle: Businesses will have to increase their prices three times a year, because that is what the guidelines tell them to do. They would need their heads examined if they did not do that, because the guidelines say they need their profits and need an increase of 10 per cent. What this program does is guarantee that there will be a 10 per cent inflation factor for the next four years. This bill totally ignores the fact that the United States will have half the rate of inflation next year and that industrial countries such as Germany and European Common Market countries will have a much lower degree of inflation, with fewer problems.

[Mr. Oberle.]

This program will depend for its success on whether the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance can again fool most of the people of Canada. The success of the guidelines will depend upon whether the government will listen to what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) will have to say, and will listen to what members of the committee suggest during the committee proceedings. There will be some very significant amendments made to these guidelines and to the bill. They will have to be accepted before Canadians and members on this side of the House will accept and support this kind of program.

I should have thought it was important, and in the interest of the survival of our economy, for the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to display some statesmanship as did the leader of the New Democratic Party when he said the Leader of the Official Opposition had paid the political price for offering to co-operate in every way possible in respect of wage and price controls. I would have expected the Prime Minister to give the Leader of the Opposition credit for having paid that price by stating the government wants to co-operate with the opposition because it needs the opposition and its support in order to sell this program to Canadians.

We do not want to be entirely negative about this program, even though it addresses itself to the wrong area entirely. The program has to be backed up with strict monetary and fiscal policies. Let me say, on behalf of my colleagues, that we are prepared to allow this bill to go to the committee, but if the type of cheap political trickery is displayed in the committee that has been displayed by the Minister of Finance in this House, I fear for the success of the program because it seems doomed to failure. Canadians will not put up with this kind of thing any longer. It is important that more people than the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues look at the interests of their country first, and the interests of their party and their political future second.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on page 21 of the white paper which the government tabled on October 14 as a prelude to Bill C-73, I find these two sentences:

> Some groups have fallen behind in the last two or three years because of the time at which their contracts were negotiated or for other reasons. It is essential that they should be provided with an opportunity to catch up.

I suggest that I am not wrenching anything out of its context or doing any damage to those two sentences if I leave out some of the words in the middle and make the statement more direct by putting it in these words, "Some groups have fallen behind in the last two or three years. They should be provided with an opportunity to catch up."

My remarks this afternoon is this debate on second reading of Bill C-73 will be concerned entirely with certain groups that have fallen behind and which in my view should be given the opportunity to catch up, and I call for action to make that possible right away. Whatever we on the opposition side may think about Bill C-73 or the orders and regulations that are to be made under it, it is obvious that the government is determined to use its power and its majority to put this legislation through and to put this program of economic controls into effect. That being the case, I think there is a place for some of us to stand and plead as strongly as we can for the practice of fairness.

Economic controls are difficult to take. They have been referred to as "rough justice" by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and they have been referred to as "unpleasant medicine" by spokesmen on the government side. I suggest that because these controls are difficult it becomes terribly important that fairness be practised. Indeed, I suggest that if gross unfairness is allowed and if gross unfairness increases, the whole program will fail.

The people of Canada are prepared to face up to a crisis. They are prepared to face a challenge, but they are not prepared to take lying down a program that has in it basic elements of unfairness. I call on the government to correct some of these instances of unfairness without further delay.

I said I would address my remarks almost exclusively to the groups which I think should be enabled to catch up. They, of course, are the groups at the lower end of the scale. I want to say as strongly as I can that it is not good enough for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to give us the idea that if somehow the big people, those at the top, are called upon to practice restraint, this automatically will improve the situation of those at the bottom. It just does not work that way any more than the theories of Adam Smith worked successfully. He tried to tell the people of his time in his work "The Wealth of Nations" that if the wealthy were allowed to get wealthier, some of that wealth would trickle down and cause those down at the bottom to be better off.

We have learned that is not the way to achieve social justice. That doctrine will not hold any society together. I submit, in the same way, that if the government imagines that simply by imposing restraints on some of those who are labelled as big people, nothing needs be done to improve the lot of those at the bottom and that those at the bottom will simply enjoy a better life, this is completely wrong. I want to say to the government that at least one member on that side of the House seems to me to share that view. I thought he expressed it very well in the able speech he made yesterday. I refer to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). According to the English translation which appears at page 8416 of yesterday's Hansard, he said about this legislation that a basic principle of social policy should be reflected in every measure under discussion, namely, that any fiscal or financial action that does not aim at narrowing the income range is socially backward and can have adverse social repercussions in our economy. A little further down he said:

> If we look at the social groups affected by these measures, it is easily seen that this legislation will create in a very short time an unacceptable imbalance.

That is not a member of the New Democratic Party speaking; it is a member of the Liberal party. He is saying that the danger in this legislation is it will heighten the differences between those at the top and those at the bottom and will create an unacceptable balance. He said that again two or three times, but I like it as it appears at page 8419 of Hansard, when he said:

> In the present economic conditions, a government must essentially propose as the aim of its fiscal, monetary and economic policy to shorten the gap between those at the very bottom of the wage scale and those at the very top.

The hon. member during a good deal of his speech dealt very effectively, I thought, with those who come under the minimum wage legislation. He had in mind such persons in all parts of Canada, but he referred particularly to those in his own province of Quebec where the minimum wage apparently is not to be increased as much as the law calls for because of the imposition of these guidelines.

I commend to the Minister of Finance that he read the speech of his colleague the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who made very clearly the point that this legislation will create an imbalance and will not meet the needs of our people unless it does something to narrow the gap between those at the top and those at the bottom. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are trying to tell us that their proposed restraints on big business and big labour, and so on, will leave a little more of the pie for those at the bottom and that those in the lower income brackets therefore will be better off.

They also try to make out that the extent to which prices will be kept from rising will protect the position of those at the bottom without, of course, admitting that there is nothing in this legislation that calls for any direct control over prices. So, what we have is a bill that will provide fairly effective wage control over those in the lower and middle brackets, but will provide nothing for those at the bottom, while at the same time prices for them will continue to rise so that their position will get worse and the unacceptable balance referred to by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont will be their lot in this country.

I said I wanted to deal particularly with some of the groups which in my view are covered by the sentence in the white paper which states that those who have fallen behind in the last two or three years should be provided an opportunity to catch up. I begin, as hon. members would expect, by referring to our old age pensioners. I am sure some members are ready to say—I have heard them say it when others have been speaking on this subject—that pensions are indexed and rise with increases in the cost of living.

That may be true in a legalistic sense. It is true in terms of the percentage of the rise in the cost of living as computed by Statistics Canada, but the fact of the matter is that for older people who have to live on the pension, particularly those who live on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, the increase that they get every three months puts them in the position of always falling behind. The increase they get in January, April, July or in October is always based on an increase that took place over a period of six or eight months before that increase came into effect. In other words, they do not get the extra money when they need it to meet their rising costs, and when they do get it still further rising costs face them.

It is also a fact that the index is not related to the goods and services that senior citizens actually have to buy. I say the result is that those who live on old age security, and especially those who have to live on both the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, are always falling behind. I throw to the government the words in its own white paper, "they need the opportunity to catch up". They do not get any opportunity just by the high-flung rhetoric of the Minister of Finance that there will be more of the pie for them. They will only get it if there is a positive step taken by the government to increase the amount of the old age security. The time for that to be done is right now in the context of the economic control program.

Some members on the government side may say that this seems to be a case of asking for exceptions in the restraint program. It is the government in its white paper which has already provided for scores of exceptions to the guidelines laid down, but it says to the old age pensioners that there will be nothing for them; that they are not in a group that bargains, and therefore they do not get any increase in money to enable them to catch up, and that they just have to hope that somehow, because of the rhetoric, they will get a little more of the pie.

It will not work that way, and I submit that if this program is to succeed, and if I am right in saying that it can succeed only if we are determined to be fair, then one of the things to do right now is to provide for a substantial boost in the basic amount of old age security so that it will apply to those who receive that pension only and also to those who receive old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. This kind of action would be an evidence of good faith on the part of the government and would enable the government to say that they are asking all Canadians to share in this campaign against inflation.

I suggest the same thing for our veterans, those on the war veterans allowance and those on war disability pensions. Again it can be said that there is indexing or escalation of these pensions. In the case of the war veterans allowances, there is indexing every quarter; in the case of war disability pensions, there is indexing once a year, but the same story applies—the extra money that comes because of escalation leaves the recipients of that money always behind and it does not relate to things they actually have to buy.

I contend, therefore, that another evidence of good faith, another carrying out of the position taken by the government that those who are behind should have the chance to catch up, would be demonstrated if there was an increase right now in the basic amount of the 100 per cent disability pension under the pension act for veterans and if there was an increase in the basic amount of the war veterans allowance.

In the same vein, I mention that there is before parliament a report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which was presented some weeks before we rose for the summer break and which is supposed to be under consideration by the government itself. It is a report that recommends an increase in the pensions of Canadians who were prisoners at Hong Kong and which also recommends that there be a scale of pensions for Canadians who were prisoners of war in Europe during World War II. This report came about because of the earnest and thorough study by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and because of representations that were made to us.

I say, again, here are persons to whom Canada owes a great deal, persons who are in need, persons who are in that category of having fallen behind in the last two or three years and for whom there should be provided an opportunity to catch up. It is not good enough just to let the bringing in of that legislation drag on and on while some of these veterans die off. If there is a desire to be fair—and I put it again in the context of whether or not these controls will work—let us be fair to those who are in the kind of need that the report of our committee seeks to meet.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has told us that this matter is under consideration. We have been getting that answer for a long time, and I have no doubt that it is. I think that perhaps there are other recommendations in that report that the government finds hard to swallow, such as a provision having to do with the widows of veterans in the cases where the veteran's disability pension was less than 50 per cent. But here, again, we are talking about people who will fit the category that I have referred to as the theme of my speech, people who have not had a chance to keep up with rising costs and who should now be provided with an opportunity to catch up. I call upon the government to bring in that legislation without delay. The minister has had it for weeks and for months. There is no reason why it should not be on our order paper not later than next week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another thing that comes in the same category has to do with Canadian government annuities. When the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), made his budget speech on June 23, four months ago tomorrow, he promised that there would be legislation to amend the Government Annuities Act so that people drawing benefits under that legislation would not have to continue to draw benefits based only on a 4 per cent formula.

We have asked about this several times, and other members in the House have done so. We are told that it is being considered and that it will be along soon. But why the delay? Here is something that is geared to the needs of people who are retired, who are not in the position of being able to bargain for increases as others can. These are people who have the right to catch up, and the government has it in its power to assist these people by bringing in the legislation without further delay.

I come again to the question of other groups about whom I have spoken hundreds, if not thousands of times in the years that I have been here, groups such as retired public servants, retired railway employees, both CNR and CPR. These are all persons who, because they are retired, are out of the category of those who can bargain for increases. I say they are all in the category of those for whom an opportunity to catch up should be provided.

I say, again, that if the government wants this program to succeed, it must convince the Canadian people that it is being fair. It is not fair to leave all these groups of people nothing to make life better for them other than the rhetoric of the Minister of Finance who says that because some people will get a little less of the pie, therefore there ought to be more for them.

Then there is the pressing question of the minimum wage. I realize that this is both a federal and a provincial matter, and I refer again to the excellent speech made yesterday by a Liberal, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who was quite upset about the action of the Liberal government in his own province. I say that to talk about the right to catch up is meaningless unless you extend that right to those who really need it.

What should be taking place now is not just a flood of oratory by these public relations cabinet ministers who are running around the country but, rather, the bringing in of necessary legislation to increase the minimum wage at the federal level, with a plea to the provinces that they do the same. I suspect that some of the provinces will want to increase their minimum wages and may even want to do so to an extent that will break that $600 ceiling which applies to those in the lower brackets, and I hope the government will soon say to the provinces that such a ceiling will certainly not apply to those on the minimum wage. As a matter of fact, I think that the $600 ceiling, which is not in the bill but in the guidelines, should go altogether.

These are the various groups of people. As I say, all of them are at the bottom; for all of them the heart of the Minister of Finance bleeds because he has told us so in the speeches he has made. But it is not good enough just to hope that in an indirect way things will be better for them. Things will be better for them only if positive steps are taken, and that is why I urge that there be positive action to increase the various pensions to which I have referred—old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, war veterans allowance, war disability pension, and so on.

That is why I think legislation regarding Canadians who were prisoners of war at Hong Kong or in Europe should be brought in, and that is why the promise to improve Canadian government annuities should be implemented without delay. That is why I feel things should be done for railway pensioners and for retired public servants, and that is why I believe definite action should be taken with regard to the minimum wage legislation right now, both in Ottawa and in the provinces.

As I have already said, this may sound to some like a speech calling for exceptions to the practice of restraint which is the heart and core of Bill C-73, but I have seldom seen a bill that was so severe and yet so full of exceptions. All over the place there are ways and means by which the ceilings can be pierced, not only in terms of wages but certainly in terms of prices and profits, and many of those exceptions will permit persons in the upper brackets to have increases which are beyond what the guidelines dictate.

I think in particular of professional people and of lawyers who can handle ten cases a day instead of eight. They may not raise their fees, but they can make more money. Doctors who can handle ten cases a day instead of eight, or 20 instead of 15—whatever the ratio may be—may not increase their fees, but they can handle more patients and make more money.

Then there is the excuse that if a person is promoted, he is entitled to an increase in pay regardless of the amount involved. So if there are these exceptions built into this legislation for those at the top, exceptions which I think are unfair, and yet nothing is being done for those at the bottom, in my view the legislation will fail for the simple reason that it lacks the essential of being fair. I urge, therefore, that this be corrected by positive steps right now.

Others on both sides of the House who have spoken in this debate have said that this bill by itself is not enough; there have to be fiscal and monetary policies; there have to be other changes. The whole question of housing has been well put forward by my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and by others, and I suggest that it is terribly true when hon. members say that these direct things need to be done if this legislation is to succeed.

The theme of the Minister of Finance throughout his speeches seems to be against the big people. I know this has a very strong appeal from the public platform: that the government is out to get the big people, big business, big labour, and so on, and that if these things are done despite the exceptions there are, life will be better for those at the bottom. In my experience over the last number of months, or perhaps even longer than that the group of people which has been hoping the most that there would be some kind of control has been the pensioners, the older people.

There was not much mail today because of the strike, but the mail I have been receiving in the last week or so from older people expresses concern that here is a program which talks about controls but which has no price control in it at all. They see prices continuing to go up and no increase in their basic income. So as far as they are concerned, they will not receive the benefit they thought would come from a program of economic controls. In their name, I plead, not for rhetoric from the Minister of Finance but for positive steps on behalf of these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I began my remarks by referring to a sentence on page 21 of the white paper about groups which have fallen behind, and their right to catch up. At the risk of being unpopular in some quarters in this House, I wish to make passing reference to Bill C-44 which was passed some months ago.

An hon. Member: What was that?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend asks what it was. It was a bill brought in because there were those in this House who thought that Members of Parliament had the right to catch up. It was argued that we had fallen behind financially and that a massive, catch-up increase was justified. What I thought of that bill was pretty well known. My attempt to oppose it and defeat it at every turn is on the record. But I say that this House of Commons, which by a majority supported a measure aimed at enabling us to catch up, cannot keep silent when there is before us legislation and economic controls which do not include an opportunity for those in the lower income brackets, for those on fixed incomes, for pensioners and others, to catch up. I plead that we practice consistency and that hon. members in all parts of the House, especially those who supported the principle of enabling members to catch up—I did not think we needed it, and it certainly added to inflation, but it was passed by this House—do the same for those down at the bottom of the income scale.

Mr. Peters: That was a welfare bill, a MacGuigan welfare bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says that was a welfare bill, a MacGuigan welfare bill. That is understandable.

Mr. Speaker, I am about to conclude. I was interested yesterday when the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) made his pitch for this legislation and said that we are faced with a war on avarice and that that is what we must deal with. Somehow, as Canadians, we must join and make sure that avarice does not get the better of us. In my remarks today I am not talking about persons who are displaying any avarice at all. I am talking about those on the minimum wage, those at lower income levels, war veterans, old age pensioners and persons who are trying to live on annuities based on the 4 per cent factor of many years ago.

Surely these people, when they ask for the chance to catch up which the government has proclaimed in this white paper, are not being avaricious; they are simply asking for fairness. I urge that not only do they have the right to be treated fairly, but that this whole proposal for economic controls and the whole attempt to get our economy back on the rails will have a much better chance of success if it is done fairly.

My complaint about the guidelines, which are apparently to be passed under Bill C-73 if and when it passes, is that they are not fair to the needy, to pensioners and to those on lower incomes, and therefore they are not fair to Canadians as a whole or to the good name of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take about 10 or 15 minutes, to deal with one point only and to make a suggestion in the last sentence of my speech. I would ask the ministers present not to leave, but to convey my suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I will ask, on behalf of the opposition, for a certain step which I think might make the awesome powers we are being asked to give the government perhaps a little more palatable. I will only deal with one point, though it is tempting to point out that when one considers this whole matter, certain gentlemen in the party opposite, the government party, have called for a spirit of Dunkirk when they might be better advised to remain silent. After all, the spirit of Dunkirk comes better from a Winston Churchill than it does from a Neville Chamberlain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: I will try again. The other brief point I wish to make is a valid one. The difference between the Conservative philosophy in the last election and that of the present government is that we would have imposed a hair shirt on Canadians for three months, not put them in an iron maiden for three years.

The burden of my remarks must start from seven or eight years ago in the House of Commons. This is an important argument; it has not been raised in this debate before. I will try to tackle it as succinctly as I can, but it has to be properly presented. Some seven or eight years ago the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was chairman of a special committee on statutory instruments. One of the recommendations in its report which was presented to the House dealt with the regulations made in the exercise of the powers of the governor in council in so far as those regulations were of a legislative character. It was felt by the committee then that these should be subject to the same procedures and requirements as other regulations of a legislative character, and then, except in the interests of national security, there should be no exemptions from the requirements of the Regulations Act other than as to publication. I have dealt with two of the principal points in the report. Another one reads:

● (1720)

> Section 9 of the Regulations Act, which allows exemptions from the provisions of that act, should be amended to provide for exemptions from publication and time of publication only.

Finally, recommendation No. 14 of that report:

> All regulations, regardless of the regulation-making authority, should be available for public inspection.

The generosity that was suggested in the report by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville some seven years ago was not met in the law that was passed, the Statutory Instruments Act. The regulations that came before the committee established by the changes in those rules of the House of Commons—that is, the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments—covered a wide variety of the regulations made by the government, but the regulations did not go before that committee in totality. In other words, there is an important area of regulations passed by government departments and agencies that are exempt from scrutiny by any public body whatsoever. There is no recourse against them in the House of Commons or the other place; there is no recourse against them in the statutory instruments committee.

Because I happen to be the House chairman of that committee, and because I think this point is important, I am going to hammer away at it in the next few minutes. It may be asked how this can possibly affect debate on Bill C-73, but I say it is a very important matter and I draw my analogy from section 58 of the Immigration Act which reads in part as follows:

> The minister may make regulations, not inconsistent with this act, respecting the. . . duties and obligations of immigration officers and the methods and procedure for carrying out duties and obligations whether in Canada or elsewhere.

I can report to the House and the country, through you, Mr. Speaker, that no regulations from the Department of Immigration have ever appeared before the statutory instruments committee because of the definitions set out in the Statutory Instruments Act. No regulations whatsoever. Yet immigration officers are armed with manuals that no one is permitted to see outside of the Immigration Department but which have a life and death effect on people who wish to become citizens, or a sad effect on the relatives of prospective immigrants who want to bring their loved ones to join them.

I say that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is hiding behind a definition of parliament that parliament should not have passed when the Statutory Instruments Act was passed. None of us saw the evil at that time, however. The fact is that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and his department can hide behind a practice that is as undemocratic as anything that you or I could think of, Mr. Speaker. I mention this because I do not want to see the same thing happen with the powers that the government is asking us to give in Bill C-73.

There are five places within Bill C-73 where powers of regulation are given, and one of them I think is unacceptable. The procedure of the appeal tribunal is set forth in clause 26(5). It has the power to make rules and regulations governing its own procedure that any court or quasi-court must have, and I do not think that is something that need concern the government. There are other powers, however.

In clause 3(1), the governor in council can publish guidelines, and in clause 3(2) he can issue guidelines regarding prices and profit margins. I think that puts the governor in council, as the cabinet or minister bringing in these proposals, within a pretty large field of human endeavour and one which can affect almost everybody in Canada. I am curious about what is going to happen when clause 4(5) comes up for debate and what effect the government's agreement with the provinces will have on professional fees. Is it possible that a fee structure can be imposed upon professional people in certain provinces that would never be subject to scrutiny in this House, or in the statutory instruments committee or any other place? This clause provides for dealings between the provincial government and the federal government. Apparently there is no right of recourse to the professional group in provincial legislatures, and this is a very serious matter.

I continue the catalogue of possible powers with two other points, Mr. Speaker. According to clause 13(2), the Anti-Inflation Board may give notice of types of disclosure and the setting up of notices which presumably are directed to individuals or whole industries. This is also a matter of very serious moment. What sort of information would be required, for example? Would it be within the spirit of the act, or would it be possible to stretch the content to contain something not within the spirit of the act—although the act seems so broad that everything would be included in the spirit of what hon. gentlemen opposite propose doing.

I have said that the provisions of clause 26(5) appear quite normal to me. Undoubtedly, this matter would come before the statutory instruments committee as do other boards, tribunals and the like. They are generally of a pattern. I do not raise any cry of "star chamber" or the like, because I think by and large Canadian tribunals tend to govern themselves in a pretty civilized way. You will notice I said "tribunals", Mr. Speaker, but nothing about government departments, boards, agencies or corporations given the power to pass regulations.

Finally, I come to clause 39. The three others I mentioned, Nos. 3, 4 and 13, were not broad enough. The governor in council is given the power, all over again, to make regulations in a pretty general way, not even being tied down to the powers suggested in the preceding clauses. I do not think the House of Commons or the other place would be doing their duty if they allowed the bill to go through without one of two things happening, so I put it up to the two ministers now present, the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) and the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé), to pass on to their colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). His absence this afternoon is understandable; I know he is meeting with his provincial counterparts, so I make no criticism about that. I say that the Minister of Finance must stand in his place, or somebody on the government side must, and before second reading is over indicate that the guidelines, the regulations, the directions—anything done under this act that is directed toward the people it governs—ought to contain a clear guarantee that this matter will go to the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for consideration. That committee has some power, which it has never abused, and it could examine and bring to the limelight the things that bother us.

I hope that the Minister of Finance or some other minister on behalf of the government can make it very clear that there is going to be the utmost co-operation in parliament in seeing that all of these directives, guidelines, and what-not, go before the scrutiny committee of the two Houses of parliament for study. I put the government on notice that at report stage there will be an amendment moved, that notwithstanding the very restrictive definitions in the Statutory Instruments Act, all guidelines, documents, directives, and so on, under Bill C-73 be referred to that committee of the two Houses of parliament. I put it very simply: we want a guarantee or there will be a flaming debate in this House about what should be done to guarantee the rights of parliament for scrutiny.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-73 I wish to place before the House some of my concerns as I see Canada's economic future developing. In the past few days we have seen the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has always prided himself on being the best example of Canadian public life and being able to use the public media for his purposes, possibly having had that media turn against him to some degree.

Yesterday the Prime Minister took his road show to the fair city of Winnipeg. He presented to the people of that city his views on how the prices and incomes policy of the government will work. Apparently the Prime Minister had a prepared speech, but he scrapped that. While the speech might have been prepared, the program he was going to describe was not. Instead of giving his prepared speech, he spent a fair bit of time lecturing his listeners on the basic fundamentals of democracy and how democracy had to work. He, of course, was the expert on how the democratic system was going to work once he had Bill C-73 in place. To say the least, the speech was not accepted graciously. The press today is—

An hon. Member: Less than complimentary.

Mr. Epp: —less than complimentary. Thank you. It is about on a parallel with the abject performance the Prime Minister gave at Red River community college. When asked very serious questions by students, in a very flippant manner he put aside the questions in a way that was not becoming the leader of this country. We have seen another minister of the front benches on television. In order to see ministers today, you have to watch television, because they are not in the House. We watch television at eleven o'clock to see whether the ministers are still alive and well.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And it is worse in colour.

Mr. Epp: That is right. In fact, their colour is draining rather badly, and quickly. Yesterday we saw the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) on television. He was appearing before the Canadian Union of Public Employees. He obviously used the premise that was used by a minister in a small community: when the minister was not able to be present to deliver his message one Sunday morning, he asked an elder deacon to deliver it. The minister had the sermon written out. At the appointed time on Sunday morning, the elder started reading the sermon. It was a very fine and stirring message. In true homiletics, there were three points. When he came to the third point, the elder deacon stopped. It stated, "Weak point. You can fill in the rest of the words". Possibly that is what the Minister of Labour was doing yesterday; he was simply labouring in an area he feels rather unqualified to talk about.

Government members today are also rather embarrassed about trying to explain this policy, particularly when they do not have their heart in it. They have been asked by the Prime Minister and other members of the caucus to get out, beat the bushes and tell Canadians that a prices and incomes policy is now necessary even though it was not 10 or 15 months ago. I feel that the performance will have to improve considerably if Canadians are to believe one minuscule part of what they are trying to say.

At least the former minister of transport had one saving quality or grace: when he thought there was a mess, he said so. He admitted there was a mess in his department. If the Prime Minister has a mess, he does not recognize it. The Prime Minister is now trying to reverse himself, do a 180 degree turn and say to the Canadian people, "Look, I was not wrong in July, 1974. I am still not wrong in October, 1975. Circumstances have just changed. All I want to do is be elected. This was my prime aim in July, 1974, and again in 1975 I will lead you through the wilderness." Well, the wilderness has been created by this government.

The bill now before us is to combat inflation. It is entitled "An act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada". Our rate of inflation is double-digit, roughly twice that of the United States. We decried them; this government criticized the United States and its investment in this country. They have used good principles. I think it is often a knee-jerk reaction because it is from the United States. They say we are still better off because we have twice what they have in the United States. Also, we are much ahead in our inflation rate compared to the European Common Market.

Our rate of unemployment stands at 7.2 per cent. The only saving factor is that in some areas such as the prairies, commodity sales have been very strong internationally and prices have been holding. If that were not the case, unemployment in this country would be higher, certainly in the prairie region. We must recall the history which has brought us into this current economic crisis, this mess I have mentioned. We all remember 1968 when a then unknown man was elected as Prime Minister. At that time, he declared that inflation was public enemy number one. Of course, he is now public enemy number one. However, in 1968 it was inflation.

The government embarked on various policies. This resulted in increased unemployment and the fight against inflation was quickly abandoned. Less than two years after the pronouncement that inflation had been singled out for defeat, the Prime Minister clearly stated that inflation had been wrestled to the ground. To my mind, it was just another con operation of a master artist. He has been doing this from 1968 on, trying to show the Canadian people the side of the coin he thinks is most acceptable for his purposes at any given time.

In 1972 we saw evidence of a backlash on the part of many Canadians. They rapped the government's knuckles. Then a curious thing happened. From 1972 to 1974 another picture was painted by the chief architect of this mess, the Prime Minister. He said we could do nothing about inflation because inflation was imported from beyond our shores. We have always conceded that a certain amount of inflation has been imported, but we were also contending that as a sovereign people there were certain things we could do to reduce the domestic component of inflation. But to suit his short-term political purposes, the Prime Minister sought to convince Canadians we could do nothing about inflation. In the meantime, I suppose, the backroom boys were wringing their hands, hoping that the terrible Americans, the ugly Americans as many in the government think they are, would bounce back and that the economic picture generally would brighten.

We come to 1974. That also is history. As a party, we did not receive the support of the people for our economic policy. We accept this. But at least in 1974 the people in Canada had a choice between the party now in power and the official opposition. We have no regrets for having placed before the Canadian people what we thought was needed by the economy at that time. Sometimes it is important to take a position which is honest, one which you know in your heart to be right and one which does not compromise your integrity, rather than adopt a short-term political solution as the Prime Minister did.

In taking the position he did, the Prime Minister had in mind short-term political advantage in the election in 1974. I might say in passing that the Premier of Manitoba became an embarrassment to his friends in the House, the members of the New Democratic Party, because he, too, said, after examining the situation, being a man of honesty and integrity, that we were going down the road of inflation so quickly that a policy of price and income restraint ought to be imposed. He was faced at the time with meeting a level of payment to public servants in Manitoba which he said the province could not afford. While members of the NDP think highly of the Premier of Manitoba on some issues, they have been crawling all over trying to hide from the fact that he took the position he did on the issue of price and income controls. At least he is one member of the NDP who did not try to foster the idea that he alone was a friend of labour and that nobody else was.

As I say, 1974 is history. Today, roughly 15 months later, we are witnessing a 180 degree turn in government policy, and members on the government side are strangely silent. I believe that people can change their minds. After being apprized of new conditions, people can change their minds, and that is fair. But to this day, even though he is trying to put a prices and incomes policy in place, the Prime Minister has lacked the decency to get up and acknowledge that many of the things he said in 1974 were for short-term political party purposes only. He has not had the integrity to say to the Canadian people, "The government is largely responsible for the present rate of inflation. We must get together to improve the situation. We were wrong as a government, and now we must reverse our position."

Instead, he wishes to claim that the government is always right; that the government always knows best. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough. Canadians today are angry and they are confused. They are angry with the government for not telling them the truth, and they are confused because they see the government embracing a prices and incomes policy when only 15 months ago it said such a policy would not work.

What are Canadians supposed to believe next? It is the role of government to lead, but in order to lead it is necessary to gain respect. I put this question to members opposite: What are Canadians to believe, when they find the government asking them to accept a policy which only 15 months ago it completely rejected? Are they to believe that the government is willing, finally, to take action of a kind it sincerely believes is for the good of the nation, or are they supposed to retain the cynicisms many of them have acquired and say it is just another Liberal ploy to reduce the pressure and produce political gains? This is a serious question, and it is one which affects not only members of the government but every elected representative in Canada.

For too long Canadians, as a result of experience, have been saying that what politicians promise during elections and what they do afterward are entirely different things. The Prime Minister's performance on economic matters is one of the principle obstacles upon which Canadians stumble. It is this which has made them so confused.

What has been the government's response to the situation today? It has presented Bill C-73, a far reaching measure and one which I personally would like to support because I feel it is indeed necessary to exert control over the economy. But I simply cannot trust the Prime Minister with the powers this legislation would give him. I simply do not respect him sufficiently to assume he will exercise integrity, a quality which to my mind has been sadly deficient. I believe many Canadians today believe in their heart of hearts that the right hon. gentleman was less than honest in his presentation back in June of 1974.

I want to make this point clear: in the hands of a leader with integrity, the bill could be effective. What has happened? In the white paper that the government brought forward it was clearly stated that food and fish products would be exempted from the guidelines. No sooner was the white paper handed to us than the crew of expatriate Liberals who have become heads of the Anti-Inflation Board appeared on television. I do not know whether we should call them the "Jean and Beryl show", but unfortunately they are guaranteed a much longer run than most poor television shows have the right to run. I am afraid that this particular show will be going on for at least three years.

One of the first things that they said would be examined was marketing boards. When I was back home last weekend the farmers were asking me, what are we to believe? On one hand the farmers know they will be affected by these controls, yet it was clearly stated in print that food products would be exempt from controls. Nevertheless, the two principal members of the board have stated that one of the first things that will be examined is marketing boards.

I should like to read into the record part of an article that appeared in today's Ottawa Journal in which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture took on some of the statements that the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board has made respecting marketing boards. Mr. Gordon Hill, president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, is quoted at length. He feels already that the chairman of the board has been influenced by the bias that his vice-chairman, Beryl Plumptre, has against farmers and their products and the position that they have in Canadian life. In the article, Mr. Hill is quoted as follows:

> Farmers received 10 cents or 12 per cent of the 84-cents retail price for cottage cheese this year. They received between 8.3 and 12 per cent of the retail price of processed fruit, pears, peaches and prunes; 30 cents or 55 per cent of the price of retail milk; between 3.2 and 12 per cent of the cost of processed vegetables, peas, tomatoes, corn and carrots.
> They received about 74 per cent of the retail price of eggs last January, and 76 per cent of the retail price of top-grade steers.

Those are not my figures, Mr. Speaker; they are the figures of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture which today, along with many farmers across the country, is deeply concerned whether we can believe what the Prime Minister says. Further, Mr. Hill is reported as saying that farmers have had to face baler twine prices that went up by 400 per cent between 1972 and 1974, and ammonium nitrate fertilizer price increases of 152 per cent from February, 1973, to the same period of 1975. This litany could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, once again I ask whether we can believe what the government says about agricultural products.

With regard to CEMA, all of us in the House know that the board has had serious difficulties. I do not want to get involved today in a philosophical argument as to whether marketing boards are good or bad, but I do want to point out to hon. members on both sides of the House that the farmers have the right to get together as processors and to organize, if they feel that this is the best way to protect their interests, every bit as much as any other group in society.

For example, we have trade associations, labour unions and associations of every colour and creed, one might almost say, in this country. Yet when farmers protect themselves in order to get some return on their investment and keep the family farm going, we get to our feet and scream that the price of food is too high. I suggest that when the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board says that eggs have gone up too much in price during the last year because they have increased 20 per cent—20 per cent of a loss position—she should be enough of an economist to know that the farmers cannot produce on that basis.

Further, I seriously question what is going to happen regarding investment and maintaining business confidence. As we know, profits are to be frozen at last year's level. While business in a sense has been granted a COLA clause which labour has fought for for some time, so that business can pass on direct added costs, I am very concerned over the long term about what is going to happen to business investment if dividends are to be frozen. Let me give the House one example. Credit unions hand out dividends at the end of the year. If the dividend this year is higher than last year, does this mean that this is an excess profit to be entirely taxed away by the government? That is a question to which I have no answer.

On one hand, Canadians today are angry; on the other hand, they are saying to themselves, "We must go along with a policy and program that at least has a chance of working." I think it can work if certain conditions are met. These conditions are, first of all, that the government takes a major step away from its previous performance; we must convince the people of Canada that the government is worthy of leading, and Canadians must follow the government.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POST OFFICE

● (1410)

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of pressing necessity under S.O. 43. Judging from the massive protest that is building up in the country following the closing down of Canada's postal service, it is clear that the resolution of the postal confrontation is essential to the success of the government's restraint program, and in view of the fact that the union officials have publicly stated their desire to resume negotiations across the bargaining table rather than continue the exchange of insults through the media, a viewpoint that was supported by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) in the House yesterday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the President of the Treasury Board assume his responsibility in getting the parties back together at the bargaining table so that everybody's face can be saved, the postal workers returned to their jobs and Canadians provided with vitally essential mail service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS AND DATES OF APPROVAL OF SALARY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the concern expressed by many Canadians that the government's controls program is not fair, and in view of the government's obvious desire to allay that concern, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to make a statement on Motions outlining in detail the circumstances surrounding recent salary increases for deputy ministers and senior executives in the public service, including the dates on which the Cabinet gave formal approval for these increases, the dates they were signed, the magnitude of the increases and whether they conform with the spirit of the government's guidelines.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House on this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RESTRICTION OF IMPORTATION OF BEEF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the increasingly serious conditions which are now facing Quebec beef producers as regards ridiculously low prices and marketing problems, due to an excess of that product on the Quebec market and in view of the fact that the federal government tolerates and even promotes massive beef imports especially beef cuts and that on the other hand, the Department of Agriculture allows, as a result of its inaction, ever rising production costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House may now discuss that matter to clear the situation and take immediate concrete steps to improve those shocking conditions which could lead many other producers on the verge of bankruptcy and create a severe shortage of beef followed by a staggering rise in consumer prices before the 80's.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REACTION OF PUBLIC TO PROGRAM AND POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement that widespread public acceptance and co-operation is necessary to the success of his restraint program, and taking into account the observation made in the media by at least some journalists who have been travelling with the Prime Minister during the last couple of days that the program is off to a shaky start, would the Prime Minister give the House his own brief assessment of the public reaction he encountered in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If this can be done under the rules I would gladly report briefly on my travels to Saskatchewan and Manitoba over the past two days, and gladly report from time to time. I am going to spend some time in Toronto tomorrow and next weekend in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Particularly at this stage of the question period I am reluctant to interrupt this process, but it seems to me that the question asks for an opinion and reaction in respect of the Prime Minister's visit. This is a question between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister. I hesitate to interfere, but with reluctance I think I have to ask the Leader of the Opposition to be a little more specific.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I shall not argue the point. I thought it would be very useful to the House to have the Prime Minister's very brief reaction to what he encountered. On the eve of the legislation probably being referred to the committee, can the Prime Minister tell the House if he has any initial impression of changes which may be necessary to make the program more acceptable to the country?

Mr. Trudeau: I can answer that briefly, Mr. Speaker. Certainly at many of the meetings I had as part of the consultation on the guidelines and regulations to be applied, I had reactions which could be classified under two groups. The first group, which roughly concerns businessmen, professional groups, people in financial areas and people in the trades, asked brief questions concerning how the guidelines would apply to them in their particular businesses. If I can judge and reflect fairly on this opinion, they were well prepared to support the government on the principle. They wanted to make sure that in detail it would be workable and practical.

The second type of reaction is one I had in meeting with one labour group in Regina, the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour. They indicated quite clearly in a written brief that they submitted to me, which I am sure can be submitted to the Leader of the Opposition, that they were in favour of price controls but not wage controls. They thought wage controls, as they appeared in our program, would be effective but that price controls would not. I discussed this with them for some time and indicated that we wanted the price controls to be effective, as well as controls on other incomes than on wages, and that we would be happy to implement that intention by modification if necessary of the guidelines and by strengthening the regulations. I urged them to be constructive in their suggestions. Since they started with the suggestion that price controls were necessary, I pointed out to them that price controls indeed were a part of the guidelines. If they could not be implemented in the present form I urged them to make constructive suggestions to me.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister indicate if he has reached any conclusion concerning whether any changes are necessary to make the program more widely acceptable, and would he indicate in a very brief way what the nature of those changes might be?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The meeting took place yesterday. I indicated to them that of course in meetings such as this we were looking for concrete ways to make the guidelines more workable, that we knew there were some difficulties which had to be solved, that it would be some weeks before the regulations would be published and that we would want to hear from members from both sides of the House at the committee stage and that therefore they had a little while to make their suggestions. We, of course, are working all the time to implement better guidelines. I would just add that so far as I was able to judge, the farming communities of Saskatchewan were four-square behind these guidelines.

DATE OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL APPROVING SALARY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the maximum $2,400 guideline ceiling on salary increases, would the Prime Minister indicate on what date orders in council or a Treasury Board decision were recorded establishing up to $6,500 per annum increases for top public servants, an increase ten times the amount of the minimum $600 guideline figure for low income workers and an increase higher than the annual personal earnings for 40 per cent of the taxpayers in this country?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the recommendations concerning the executive group of the public service were accepted in cabinet, with modifications, last July—to be precise on July 24. We had received in April the report of the Lambert committee indicating certain new ranges. We studied these new ranges and modified them somewhat, and then on July 24 we accepted these new ranges with the proviso that the increases as a total would not be beyond 10 per cent. We were, in a sense, anticipating the guidelines at that time. I am told that when the calculations and the slotting were made within those ranges they arrived at an average of 9.3 per cent as the total increase as the result of the decision we took last July. The present period extends from last April to next April, and in so far as any further slotting is concerned I can assure the House that it will be well under not only the 8 per cent or 10 per cent guidelines, but that the ceiling of $2,400 will apply.

DATE OF TREASURY BOARD APPROVAL OF SALARY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TREASURY BOARD MINUTE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether in fact the finalization of this increase was assigned to the Treasury Board and, if so, would he indicate on what date the Treasury Board finalized the increase and when was the minute signed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is important for members of the House to understand that when we made the decision in July, it was a decision as to the ranges which would be applied to every civil servant at a senior executive level. The actual slotting is done by way of a rather lengthy process in a cabinet committee, assisted by senior officials, which looks at the performance of each individual and decides how that individual performs and whether he should be slotted high, medium or low in the range. This process began after the July authorization by cabinet and it went on for a period of several weeks. I think that probably in August not a great deal of work was done, but the whole matter was carried out between August and two weeks ago.

Mr. Stevens: I have a final supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Treasury Board minute covering this increase has not been delivered to the order in council office, would the Prime Minister table the Treasury Board minute in which these increases were finalized?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not have this minute. If it is customary to table such minutes, I will do so. I believe that in the normal course of events they appear in the Canada Gazette with the date. I believe that the appendices to these minutes are confidential and that they give the exact point in the slotting, but the general range is given in the order in council. I would have to verify whether the order in council is published in the Canada Gazette.

SUGGESTION SALARY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY APPROVED AT SAME CABINET MEETING AS CONTROL PROGRAM ADOPTED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister of which I have given him notice which follows on the previous questions. Can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the salary increases for deputy ministers to which reference was made were given final and formal approval, not just accepted, at the last cabinet meeting before the Prime Minister's Thanksgiving announcement of the control program, the same cabinet meeting at which the control program was finally adopted, as I have heard from some one close to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nystrom: My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, as I have touched a sensitive spot—

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member is the lead off questioner, I do not want to interfere unduly with his right to ask a supplementary question, but a supplementary question really must arise, or ought to arise, out of an answer given. If a question meets with no answer, it is very difficult to imagine how a supplementary question could be allowed. However, perhaps the hon. member might try one more question.

Mr. Nystrom: I shall rephrase the question. In view of a statement today by a spokesman in the Prime Minister's office suggesting that orders in council have been signed in the last two weeks increasing the salaries of 250 senior public servants, as well as a statement by someone close to the Prime Minister that the final and formal decision was made at the same cabinet meeting which finally approved the guidelines, would the Prime Minister be in a position to indicate to the House on motions or to table in the House all of the agreements and documents which we are asking about as to when final and formal agreement was given for these salary increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the final and formal agreement was given on July 24. I repeat that following July 24 the process of slotting goes on, which takes place every year, and this follows the recommendations of the advisory council on executive salaries. It goes on every year to judge the performance of the various civil servants. This sometimes takes weeks; sometimes it takes months.

I repeat my earlier answer: if this type of order in council is published in the Canada Gazette, the hon. member will know the date or dates. It may have been something which Treasury Board decided at one or several meetings; I do not know. It is even possible that the cheques themselves have not gone out, or they may have gone out. I do not know the answer to that either. I have not received any thank you letters yet. I do know that, as in every year, we look at the report of the advisory committee, and at some point in the year the cabinet decides to accept it, reject it or modify it. This was done last July.

Mr. Nystrom: Were those orders in council finally agreed to at the last cabinet meeting prior to the announcement of the Prime Minister on television implementing controls for other Canadians? Is that when they were finally agreed to?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not usually give the precise agenda of each cabinet meeting, but since the hon. member is so insistent, I can tell him no, the last cabinet meeting before the speech I made on that Monday night did not adopt any order in council attributing or slotting civil servants to any particular places in the range. This was delegated by cabinet to some committee of cabinet, and it was instructed to follow the ranges as we adopted them last July, July 24, to be precise. This year, because we were so late and because the salaries were supposed to be changed last April, I did not myself chair the committee, which considers this individual slotting which I usually do. I referred it to another committee.

REASON FOR DIFFERENTIAL IN GASOLINE PRICES IN VARIOUS PARTS OF QUEBEC

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could he inform the House whether he is aware that gasoline costs as much as 10 cents more a gallon in northwest Quebec, Gaspesia and the north shore as compared with the south of the province and, if so, could he tell the House what he intends to do about it so that people in the northwest areas and Gaspesia are not forced to pay gasoline at a higher price than elsewhere, while taking into account the cost of transport which is obviously lower than 10 cents a gallon?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman should address that question to his provincial ministers. The federal government does not have the responsibility of setting retail prices, but we have introduced guidelines which affect the flow through of costs, that is to say, the wellhead price of $8 per barrel through to the final user. At that point the federal government comes into play, and we apply those particular guidelines.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO DURATION OF STRIKE BEFORE LEGISLATING EMPLOYEES BACK TO WORK

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, and it relates to the postal strike. Can the Prime Minister tell the House how long back-to-work legislation will be postponed? If it is to be a long strike as the Prime Minister said, how long will this House wait before asserting the public interest?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we consider that freedom of association is also in the public interest. It seems to me that the question as asked by the hon. member is assuming the contrary. That is not our view.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister tell the House just what the government's policy is with respect to the postal strike? Specifically, does the Postmaster General have the support of the government when he talks about a three months strike or, as he said two days ago, a strike until Easter?

An hon. Member: Or a year?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General has the support of the government.

Mr. Fraser: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to starve out the union at the expense of Canadians who depend on the postal service? Has the government adopted Joe Davidson's war cry—"To Hell with the public."

SUGGESTION PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD ASSUME RESPONSIBILITY FOR RESUMING NEGOTIATIONS WITH STRIKING WORKERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board and it relates to the motion under Standing Order 43 that I moved at the beginning of this sitting today. The minister has not been with us for the past two days, but I think he will agree that the resolution of the present confrontation between the union and the Post Office Department is essential to the success of the government's restraint program. Now that union officials have publicly indicated their desire to resume negotiations across the bargaining table rather than by an exchange of insults in the media—this viewpoint was supported by the Postmaster General in the House yesterday—will the President of the Treasury Board assume his responsibility and get the parties together so that this matter can be resolved and the public interest protected? The solution is in the government's hands.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Firstly, Mr. Speaker, I was here Tuesday. Yesterday I was at the federal-provincial conference. I think in this situation the Treasury Board has assumed all its responsibilities. We have been at the negotiating table and have worked in close collaboration with the Postmaster General and his officials. We are anxious to resume negotiations and find a solution to the problem, but I think this has to work on both sides. If they want to meet us, I am sure the Postmaster General will agree with me that we are willing to sit down and negotiate with them. I think we were doing very well over the weekend and if we can resume the talks we would be willing to make progress.

WILLINGNESS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS WITH STRIKING WORKERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister indicated his willingness to resume negotiations as he indicated in the House yesterday? If he has given that indication to the postal union what has been their response?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful for so many helpers and volunteers after ten months of continuous bargaining.

An hon. Member: You need all the help you can get.

Mr. Mackasey: It is very helpful to know I have the support of so many members. I made it clear yesterday—I think we should make it very clear that we did not issue an ultimatum. We did not—

An hon. Member: What do you call it?

An hon. Member: Come on, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: We did not break off talks. We simply made it very clear that when the union felt that our wage package and terms were satisfactory—we felt the talks had been going so well we should get up to that level immediately and not wait days to get up to that level—we were prepared to sit down and start negotiating other outstanding items that have monetary implications as well. We simply suggested that rather than have four or five meetings, as we did on Sunday, the union take the time and come back when they arrive at that conclusion. The union broke off talks at eight o'clock Sunday night in order to find out if this package was acceptable or not. We are still waiting for their reply. Talks have broken off only in the opinion of members opposite.

I might make another point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I am going to restrict members of the opposition in making arguments I should do the same in respect of the government.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Postmaster General would answer the specific question because I think it is vitally important to the success of the government's program. It is my information that the union wants to get back to the bargaining table. Have they been invited back to the bargaining table and if so, what has been their response?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I have said—

An hon. Member: Don't do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Mackasey: We never broke off negotiations. I am surprised that the opposition takes the matter so frivolously that they do not want an answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member, for whom I have great respect, that he be careful of his sources of information. If we acted on his advice, if we are to de-escalate the public debate, it would be made much easier if questions did not tend to create that public debate and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS RETIRING AT AGE 65 TO FURTHER BENEFITS

● (1440)

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, before asking my very first question in the House, may I assure you as well as all my colleagues from both sides of the House, of my full co-operation.

I should like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister to whom I respectfully convey the salutations of Montreal-Hochelaga. Can the Prime Minister, who in his message to the nation the day before October 14 expressed concern for senior citizens within his anti-inflation program and a just society philosophy, assure the House that his government will amend Bill C-69 so as to guarantee Canadians 65 years old or more that as in the past, they will be entitled to full payment when they leave a job?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his promised co-operation. I am sure that if he shows much perseverance, he will continue to ask questions in the interest of his Hochelaga constituents rather than partisanship. Although this is an approach which requires great courage, I am sure he will not spare his efforts. The hon. member is certainly aware that the government has increased the pensions paid to the aged. Indeed we apply the escalation provision to the Old Age Security pensions, so that these pensions are geared to the cost of living index. There is no limit to this escalation. Therefore, it is not so much at this time a question of deciding how we can help them more. We are concerned now with a program which will hopefully put an end to inflation, and it is the purpose of the bill before the House. The hon. member certainly understands that it is not in the interest of this war which we all together want to wage against inflation to include in this bill other objectives, however desirable they may be, which might delay its adoption.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—EFFECT OF GUIDELINES ON DIVIDEND PAYMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday I asked the Minister of Finance a question about the application of the guidelines to dividend payments. I wanted to know if there was to be an actual freeze or a rollback to levels actually paid in 1974. The minister indicated he would look into this. Is he now in a position to tell the House just what the government's policy is in this regard?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The concept was that it should be on a cash rather than an accrual basis. This is the sense in which it was considered in the white paper. I should say, as I am sure the hon. member has noted since then, that there have been some representations suggesting that a basis other than the cash basis would be equitable. I have not had an opportunity to discuss this further, because of the federal-provincial meeting, but will give early attention to it and consider the relative merits of the two proposals.

TRANSPORT

INTERCITY RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—NATURE OF REPLY TO PROPOSAL BY RAILWAYS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Last Tuesday I asked him a question concerning the submission in the letter of December 20, 1974, by the presidents of the two national railroads for an integrated, intercity rail passenger service. The proposal was for the entire nation. Has the minister considered the correspondence; can he advise the House if the letter was replied to, or even acknowledged and, if so, can he tell us what was the nature of the reply?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the letter was replied to and, basically, was followed up with further discussions with our railways. Obviously, there will need to be intensive discussions about any possible proposal and, indeed, consideration of a variety of legislative and other changes in our law and policy before a particular program can be put forward.

INTERCITY RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—SUGGESTED HIGHER PRIORITY FOR PROGRAM AND ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO REPLACE EQUIPMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Actually, may I incorporate two questions in one supplementary question? May I ask the minister if the proposal of the railways means that there is to be an improvement in the low priority which the government in its policy paper proposals and the Ministry of Transport has given to rail transportation. Is there to be higher priority for rail transportation? Also, in view of the cancellation of Pickering airport, will the minister allocate funds which would otherwise have been spent on Pickering airport to the purchase and refurbishing of passenger train equipment, as two years lead time is required and in view of the amount of existing railway equipment which must be scrapped?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course, I do not agree with the hon. member's view of the priority this government puts on rail passenger traffic. Indeed, that has formed an important part of our policy. It is, however, a complex matter and should not be related to whether or not a particular airport is to be constructed, as the hon. member suggests. But it is a complex matter, requiring a sound foundation for restructuring. We are treating it seriously in that light and will come forward in due course with proposals.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

POSSIBILITY OF PRICE INCREASE RESULTING FROM ADOPTION OF METRIC SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Today's Globe and Mail cites an example of how the consumer can face a hidden price increase of 20 per cent as a result of new metric packaging. Can the minister tell the House what steps his department is taking to avoid such errors, be they "human" or otherwise?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I made inquiries about this particular matter before the question period today and was advised that Dominion stores, the company concerned in this case I believe, has taken steps to ensure that adequate information is provided. We are also looking for techniques by which either the Metric Commission or some emanation of it would be empowered to deal with this kind of situation on an ongoing basis, if it should occur again.

AUDITOR GENERAL

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT WILSON REPORT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board—if he would kindly divert his attention from what he is doing. He may be getting the answer now, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Following the Prime Minister's suggestion to be persistent, may I ask the minister the following question? Now that the report on the Auditor General has existed for some months and in light of the over-riding need for this government to demonstrate its determination to eliminate the waste and extravagance which have persisted in its spending for some time, will the hon. gentleman now indicate if he is going to implement the undertaking he made to me and to this House last summer and immediately bring in a bill to carry out the provisions suggested in the Wilson report regarding the powers of the Auditor General?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I said a few months ago, I intend to proceed, and the government agrees on most of the recommendations in the Wilson report. As regards the format the legislation will take, we are not ready yet to make it public but we will do so the moment we can.

[English]

SUGGESTED REFERRAL OF WILSON REPORT TO COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND DRAFT BILL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council? If it is beyond the capacity or desire of this government to bring in such a bill, would the government consider referring the matter to the Public Accounts Committee, so that it may, in view of the government's default, bring in recommendations for such a bill?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not hear the question which was directed to my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board and am afraid I cannot answer the hon. member. But I always take under consideration any suggestion made by my hon. friend, the House leader of the official opposition, and assure him that I will give his question my sympathetic consideration, if not my agreement.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUPPORT PRICES FOR CALVES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the lateness of the season and the desperation of many cow-calf producers across Canada, and as Her Majesty's official opposition supports the agricultural price stabilization legislation, will the minister not declare immediately that the government will provide support prices for calves under the terms of that legislation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have decided to provide support prices for beef, which will run from August 12 to the end of December, and a new program will begin on January 1, for the beef industry for the next year.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF ELIGIBILITY PERIOD FOR $500 GRANT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and is supplementary to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. As many Canadians have committed themselves to the purchase of new houses on the basis of the government's promise of a grant to first time home owners—indeed, many such people have committeed the grant itself as part of the down payment—and as they may be prevented from collecting these grants because of strikes or by delays caused by labour difficulties, and so on, has the minister given special consideration to the plight of these Canadians in order to ensure that they may receive the first time home owners grant and are not denied the grant because of circumstances beyond their control?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, I have given thorough consideration to that problem. As grants are to be cut back, as announced, after the occupancy date of October 31, there is an obvious problem for those people who have entered into purchase agreements and have bona fide documentation. For those people who have entered into agreements in good faith and who, because of strikes or others reasons, are not able to move in before that date, I have extended the eligibility period until December 31.

PROPOSAL TO ALLOW PRIVATE CARRIERS TO DELIVER MAIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Can the Postmaster General inform the House if he has any plans to allow private carriers to deliver first class mail, any other sort of mail or parcels during the Post Office strike, and would he consider initiating discussions with the Air Industries Association and the Canadian Truckers Association, to assure that the fullest possible use is made of alternative delivery services in the absence of regular postal service?

● (1450)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Other than first class mail, there is no limitation on competition. As the hon. member knows, many private couriers are delivering mail at this very moment. The only limitation is the statutory one on first class mail and its removal would require legislation.

Mr. McKenzie: The minister did not answer my question. Would he consider meeting with these associations? I spoke with them this morning. They would be willing to sit down with the hon. gentleman and discuss alternate ways of delivering mail.

Mr. Mackasey: I am aware of the representations but I think it is a little premature to be encouraging our competition. I appreciate the hon. member's representation but I would point out once again that under the law we did not lock anybody out; they walked out on their own. There may be a moment when we shall have to do just that very thing, but I hope not.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

I apologize for taking his time. My question is complementary to that of the hon. member for Hochelaga, and deals with a proposed amendment to Bill C-69 concerning unemployment insurance. At the present time, 65-year-old persons who retire are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits for a number of weeks prescribed by the act. Now, the amendment proposed in the bill would limit that number of weeks to three.

May I therefore ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, considering the many representations made in that regard, he would accept that the bill be amended in such a way that 65-year olds continue to receive those benefits for at least a year so that those who will be 65 in the future may become familiar with the new policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member is anticipating the debate which will be held as early as next Monday, if I understand correctly what the House leader said. We must discuss that bill. The hon. member's question as well as that of the hon. member for Hochelaga are arguments. Hon. members will have the opportunity to express them during the debate. The minister will be present to answer them, and they can also be discussed in committee.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR THE INDEXATION OF MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he tell the House whether he had the opportunity, yesterday, of making representations to his provincial counterparts asking that the salaries of workers governed by the minimum wage not be frozen but that instead the minimum wage be indexed upon the standards proposed in Bill C-73?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we discussed the matter of the minimum wage with the provincial representatives and suggested that the increase in the minimum wage be discussed this afternoon with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). We were made aware, however, as in the past, that some provinces are opposed to an unduly high increase in the minimum salary. On the other hand we are quite concerned about that group of wage earners in our society, and are willing to discuss, with the provinces, the concept of a general increase in the minimum wage.

POST OFFICE

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General and is related to previous questions. Would the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General be prepared to contact the postal union's negotiating committee today in an effort to resume bona fide bargaining and get the Post Office back into operation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I gave earlier, the assurance that the Postmaster General had not only the support but the enthusiastic support of the government. His door is always open to any resumption of negotiations. If any assurance is needed, I can assure hon. members opposite and the members of the postal union that if they want to talk to the Postmaster General he will be happy to talk to them.

An hon. Member: But will he listen?

PUBLISHING

DATE OF DECISION ON CANADIAN CONTENT REGULATION FOR PUBLICATIONS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Has the cabinet yet accepted recommendations about Canadian publication content rules and the meaning of the term "substantially different" and, if so, when will regulations be announced? Does the government contemplate having to amend Bill C-58?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the House for its generous applause—perhaps the last time Canada's tax collector will be so treated.

I should like to say, first that the meaning of the words "not substantially the same" as far as the bill is concerned will be interpreted by my department as being at least 80 per cent different. The information is being made public at this time so that the parties concerned will have it. This, of course, is contingent upon the passage of Bill C-58, but as a courtesy to the parties concerned I felt it appropriate we should indicate what our position was.

WILLINGNESS OF GOVERNMENT TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS WITH STRIKING WORKERS UNCONDITIONALLY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In the light of the minister's statement that Treasury Board is prepared to resume negotiations with the postal workers I should like to ask whether the government negotiators are prepared to resume negotiations unconditionally in the true spirit of collective bargaining?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, one would think a member of that particular party would understand something about collective bargaining. If he did, he would not do it in the House of Commons and he would have more intelligence than to ask stupid questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I think we see why there is such a problem in the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: I have been informed by the postal workers that they are prepared at two hours notice to sit down and negotiate on unconditional terms as is customary in negotiations. The minister has issued an ultimatum that they cannot negotiate a total package but must accept the wage offer.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member and about 250 other people have conveyed that message to me. When the union conveys it to me we shall resume negotiations, and not before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBILITY OF FREE VOTE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT MEASURE

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. It arises out of the government's announced intention to stay the commutations of those persons now in jail awaiting a decision on their commutations. The government has announced its intention of bringing in legislation. It is the government's intention to follow the practice which has been followed on numerous occasions of allowing a free vote on the question of capital punishment in the legislation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): We did not stay the commutations of those three gentlemen; we stayed their dates of execution until next summer. With respect to the substance of the question, I can only tell the hon. member that no decision has yet been made.

Mr. Horner: Am I to assume from the minister's answer that the cabinet is seriously considering allowing a free vote on this subject in the House?

● (1500)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there are many proposals which have been suggested to the cabinet, not only by people inside the cabinet but outside.

Business of the House

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader the usual Thursday afternoon question: What are his intentions with regard to legislation in the House over the next week or ten days?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a reasonable expectation, if not a certainty, that the bill now under discussion will be disposed of at second reading this evening. If so, the government will call tomorrow the following bills: S-27, C-23, C-28 and C-25. After consultation with the House leaders, I am led to believe that there will be little or no debate on the first two items, that is to say, second reading of S-27 and the report stage and third reading of Bill C-23. I say this because if this hope is not realized I should like to ensure that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is called early tomorrow to deal with the second reading of Bill C-28. He has an engagement later in the day and I think we would all like to meet his convenience. But I do not think it will be necessary to vary that order.

May I also say, for the information of hon. members, that the House leaders have discussed the possibility of the House not sitting on Monday, November 10. I say this now so that members who may be thinking about their arrangements for that weekend might be able to arrange to do other things than attend the sittings of this House. However, everything is premised on the understanding that the time that is lost by being absent that day will be made up by an extension of hours on other days.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, just in case the minister's expectation as to completing C-73 is not fulfilled—and I am one who hopes it will be—is it the intention of the government to proceed next Monday with the resumption of second reading of Bill C-73?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would think that it would be undesirable to take Bill C-73 out of the House. If our expectations, which I hope are reasonable ones—I think everyone has an interest in getting the bill into committee—are not realized, then tomorrow we will continue with this debate. However, I hope there will be agreement, if any member wants a vote, to postpone the vote until Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the business that the government is bringing before the House, in view of questions I have asked on two or three occasions, can the government House leader now tell us when the bill to amend the Government Annuities Act and the bill respecting veterans who were prisoners of war will be introduced?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can speak with authority only in the first of those bills. This was discussed in cabinet today and my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is bringing the bill before us for approval immediately.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

MEASURE FOR PAROLE OF DR. HENRY MORGENTALER—SPEAKER'S RULING

On the order:

Mr. Leggatt—Bill intituled: An act for the parole of Dr. Henry Morgentaler.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I understand you have certain reservations about whether this bill can be classified as a public bill or should be a private bill. I wanted to direct a few remarks to Your Honour on that subject so that you might be able to rule on the matter.

This bill is not presented in any partisan spirit. In fact, the co-sponsors of the bill, with myself, are the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) of the Conservative party, and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) of the Liberal party. The reason it has cross-party sponsorship—and I emphasize this—is due to the public importance of the bill. My remarks are directed to this key issue that Your Honour will have to examine in terms of whether you rule it to be a private or a public bill.

The bill provides for the immediate parole of Dr. Henry Morgentaler. It would also permit parliamentary intervention in the parole system to provide him with parole. There is before the House at the present time a government bill, Bill C-71, to amend the Criminal Code to allow juries to be the final arbiter on questions of fact. In other words, it would prevent the kind of situation that occurred in the Morgentaler case, of a jury verdict of acquittal being overturned by a court of appeal, with the accused not then having access again to a jury of his peers.

Obviously, this is a matter of great public importance. The bill concerns only one man, but it concerns only one man because there is no other person in the Dominion of Canada residing in jail in the same circumstances. The bill does not deal with the subject of abortion, which is a matter entirely different and about which many members have different opinions.

On the procedural question whether this is a private or a public bill, I ask Your Honour to consider the precedent that a bill of public importance which applied to one individual is, in essence, a public rather than a private bill. This House has been run for a very long time on precedents that have been introduced in the past. Your Honour may be familiar with Bill C-107 which dealt with the case of Steven Truscott. In the Truscott case, the situation was almost identical to the one in the bill now before the House. Incidentally, that bill was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who is acknowledged as one of the masters of the rules of the House. It was admitted as a public bill by the Speaker of that day, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, who is also acknowledged throughout the House as a great expert on the rules of the House. Therefore, if one were to look at the precedents, one would have to say that two very great procedural minds have attacked this problem in the past.

To say that the bill came in inadvertently would do a disservice, I suggest, to both those hon. gentlemen. Obviously, the Speaker at that time believed that the Truscott case was of such public importance that it overruled the general principles in Beauchesne which would identify this as a private bill. At that time the conclusion was that it was a matter of public importance that should be dealt with. It was a single individual who had received so much publicity and there was so much concern across the country regarding his being in jail that the bill was introduced as a public bill although, as I say, the bill dealt only with the case of Steven Truscott and did not deal in any general way with any class of persons.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, there is no other individual in Canada who resides in jail in these circumstances. Therefore, if it is Your Honour's view that I should present a different bill which does not name Dr. Henry Morgentaler, I suggest that would be a redundant procedure. In examining the Morgentaler case, the Supreme Court of Canada found no single precedent like it where a jury verdict had been overturned by a court of appeal and the individual in question not given the opportunity again to face a jury of his peers regarding the charge.

On the question of public importance, I contend that what may on the surface appear to be a private bill can also apply to a class of persons, simply because (a) we have a precedent of the House in the Truscott case, and (b) the situation is very similar in terms of the subject of the bill being a single individual. There is only one individual in this country who comes within this class, and that is a person residing in jail in these special circumstances. Bill C-71, a government bill before the House, attempts to correct that anomaly and to allow no longer courts of appeal to superimpose guilty verdicts on acquittals by a jury. That being the case, and since we will no doubt be dealing specifically with the subject, I submit this bill is appropriate as a public bill in order to release this class of persons who remain in jail as a direct result of the anomaly in the Morgentaler case.

Dr. Morgentaler has served more than one-third of his sentence. We have released people like Harold Ballard and we have released rapists and murderers and all sorts of strange people in the country, but for some reason or other the Parole Board has not seen fit to move in the case of Dr. Morgentaler. I realize that it sounds as though I am arguing the merits. I am not really arguing the merits except to the extent that I submit we are dealing with the key point in the matter of this bill, and that is, is it of sufficient public importance to merit introduction in the way the Truscott bill was introduced 1957?

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my intervention is not going to be long in the event that Your Honour would wish to rule against the hon. member who has proposed this particular bill. I would simply point out to Your Honour that on Friday when the bill was initially introduced, you suggested that perhaps the matter could be the subject of debate if the hon. gentleman would approach the House leader at the time. There was no indication that he wished to debate the motion, and therefore I am caught a little by surprise. I would simply indicate that citations 459 and 460 of Beauchesne refer directly to the point.

If Your Honour is influenced by the second argument, namely that the bill—a private bill, in my estimation—being presented has some public interest because it deals with a matter of public concern, and if Your Honour is inclined to find that there is some merit in this argument, I would ask Your Honour to put this matter over in order that perhaps better argument may be prepared.

Mr. Speaker: I thank both hon. members for their intervention. The reference to the citation by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) has saved me the trouble of making the reference. It seems to me to be a very clear citation. The reference by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) to the Steven Truscott case indeed challenges the imagination of students of parliamentary procedure. Fortunately, perhaps, some of these miracles are possible without full explanation of exactly how the arguments were achieved. Again, I can only say that it is another indication of the mastery of the proponent of this particular bill that seems, in the humble opinion of the Chair, to run totally counter to the procedures in the way they are set out so clearly in the citation referred to by the hon. parliamentary secretary.

The fact of the matter is that the bill before us at the present time is a proposal to exempt or to except from the operation of the general law one person, namely, Dr. Henry Morgentaler. I cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be persuaded that this is the subject matter of a public bill or that it is in any way an alteration of the general law. It is an alteration or exception, for one person, of the application of the law, and it seems crystal clear to me to be the subject matter of a private member's private bill and not a public bill.

The hon. member put forward some very eloquent arguments about the urgency and the importance of the matter, which would certainly go to the merits of the bill and would be part of the entreaty to other members to support it. Procedurally, I feel that despite every careful consideration of the hon. member's very interesting arguments, we are left with no other choice than to decide that the matter is really a proper subject matter not of a public bill but of a private bill.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 28, 1,332, 2,404, 3,130.

Order Paper Questions

[Text]

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Question No. 28—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Part 3 of Question No. 88 of the Second Session of the 29th Parliament to the effect that all but one of the architects, designers, interior decorators or consultants performing work at 24 Sussex Drive were not selected by the Department of Public Works, what is the complete identity of the individual or individuals who selected (a) Herbert-Lalonde, Designers of Montreal (b) Professor E. Arthur, Designer of Toronto (c) Francisco Ltd., Interior Decorators of Montreal (d) Mrs. Louis V. Beveridge, Interior Decorator of Toronto?

2. What are the names of any persons whatsoever who in any way recommended the services of these people?

3. Have any of those named in the answer to Question No. 88 of the Second Session of the 29th Parliament done any other work whatsoever for the government in the past ten years and, if so, on what dates, what was the work and what was the fee paid?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1 and 2. It has always been government practice that occupants of official residences should have final say in their family environment and who best can provide it.

3. (a) In 1968, the firm of Julien Hebert, 430 Bonsecours Ave., Montreal, Quebec provided the design, fabrication and installation of the fountain in the National Arts Centre for the amount of $25,000. (b) The firm of Hebert-Lalonde, Architects and Designers, prepared plans and specifications for the Department of Public Works in the following places, on the dates indicated and for the amounts listed: Chicoutimi, June 3, 1974, $750; Pointe Claire, June 3, 1974, $750; Ste-Foy, June 3, 1974, $750; Ville d'Anjou, June 3, 1974, $750.

TOXIC BILGE CLEANING

Question No. 1,332—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) What is the position of the government on the use by non-government vessels of toxic bilge cleaning substances (b) what regulations exist governing the use of toxic bilge cleaners (c) on what date and where were these proclaimed?

2. Is this in accord with the statements on the ocean environment contained in the "New Oceans Policy" announced July 12, 1973 by the Minister of State for Science and Technology?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of the Environment is concerned: 1. (a) The government does not have a position on the use per se of toxic bilge cleaning substances by non-government vessels. It does have a position relevant to the disposal of bilge cleaning substances and bilge wastes, viz.—No substance which is, or contains, oil of any kind in any form shall be released into Canadian waters (including fishing zones). For bilge cleaning substances which are not oil or do not contain oil of any kind or in any form, the position of the government is that wastes containing such substances can be deposited into Canadian waters only if it can be shown that they are not toxic to aquatic life (i.e. deleterious substances as defined in the Fisheries Act). The Department of the Environment, on request from the Ministry of Transport (which has the responsibility for pollution from vessels), would assess the substance and, on the basis of bioassay tests and existing information, determine whether the substance should be released into the aquatic environment. (b) There are no regulations on the use of bilge cleaners. However, the disposal of this class of substances is regulated by the Oil Pollution Prevention Regulations under Section 20 of the Canada Shipping Act. The enforcement of these regulations is the responsibility of the Ministry of Transport. (c) The regulations cited in 1. (b) are contained in S.O.R. 71-495 of September 21, 1971.

2. The position of the government of Canada on the disposal of bilge cleaning substances is consistent with the "New Oceans Policy" announced July 12, 1973, by the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

In so far as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is concerned:

1. (a) There are no regulations with regard to the use of toxic bilge cleaners by non-government vessels; however, the disposal of these substances is regulated by the Canada Shipping Act. (b) The discharge of bilge cleaning substances which are oil or which contain oil is governed by the Oil Pollution Prevention Regulations of the Canada Shipping Act; the discharge of bilge cleaning substances which are not oil or which do not contain oil is governed by the Pollutant Substances Regulations of the Canada Shipping Act. (c) The Oil Pollution Prevention Regulations of the Canada Shipping Act were contained in S.O.R. 71-495 of September 21, 1971, published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, Volume 105, No. 19. The Pollutant Substances Regulations of the Canada Shipping Act were contained in S.O.R. 73-113 of February 28, 1973, published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, Volume 107, No. 5.

2. Yes.

In so far as the Ministry of Transport is concerned:

1. (a) Toxic bilge cleaning substances may be used by non-government vessels for the normal purpose of good housekeeping. However, the resulting mixture, an oily substance, is prohibited from being discharged into the water under the Oil Pollution Prevention Regulations. (b) There are no regulations that specifically refer to toxic bilge cleaners. However, should the cleaner contain a toxic substance which is included in the list of substances in the Pollutant Substances Regulations, its discharge into the water would be prohibited. (c) The date of proclamation of the Pollutant Substances Regulations was February 27, 1973, and notice of this appeared in the Canada Gazette, Part II, Volume 107, No. 5.

2. Yes.

LONG DISTANCE POWER TRANSMISSION CONTRACTS

Question No. 2,404—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did the Government of Manitoba approve the award of the contract to expand the capacity of a direct current long distance transmission line from Northern Manitoba to Winnipeg?

2. Did the federal government withhold its approval of the contract and, if so, for what reason?

3. Which level of government has the final say in awarding contracts under the Nelson River Power Agreement signed in 1962, where substantial funding is provided by Ottawa?

4. Is there a clause in the Agreement providing for flexibility in assessing bids on the basis of Canadian content and, if so, what flexibility is allowed?

[Mr. Sharp.]

5. Was the contract awarded to Brown-Boveri (Canada) Ltd. and, if so (a) what was the amount of the bid (b) was a change made in the original contract to upgrade the Canadian content in the Swiss bid (c) how much was added to the contract price as a result of such change?

6. (a) What other bids were received on this project (b) what was the amount of each such bid and the percentage of Canadian content?

7. (a) Has the Canadian General Electric Company of Peterborough been negotiating with DREE and the Manitoba Government for assistance in establishing a plant in Brandon, Manitoba (b) was the plant related to the awarding of the long distance power transmission contract (c) are negotiations still proceeding and, if not, for what reason?

8. (a) What has been the total cost of the Nelson River Power Project to date (b) what proportion of such cost has been provided by the federal government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Regional Economic Expansion as follows: 1. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources understands that the government of Manitoba has approved the award of the contract.

2. Yes. The government of Canada could not accept the techonological and industrial development evaluation for the award of the contract to a foreign supplier.

3. There is no 1962 agreement, nor is there as yet any agreement relating to the expansion of the Nelson River Transmission Facility. Guidelines for the proposed new agreement included provision for Manitoba to make an independent selection but without benefit of federal financing.

4. The guidelines relating to the proposed agreement provide for flexibility in the assessment of Canadian content; no specific limits are given.

5. See reply to question 1. (a), (b) and (c) Information on bids received by Manitoba Hydro would have to come from Manitoba Hydro.

6. (a) It is understood Manitoba Hydro announced that bids were requested and received from the following companies: Brown-Boveri (Canada) Ltd.; Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd.; Canadian ASEA Ltd. and General Electric Co. of England.

7. (a), (b) and (c) When a firm accepts an offer of development assistance under the Regional Incentives Act, this information appears in the report on Regional Development Incentives, which is submitted to parliament every month. Department policy is to treat as confidential any information concerning an application for assistance until the application has been approved, and an offer of assistance has been made and accepted.

8. (a) Since the federal government is not involved in the development of Hydro Power sites on the Nelson River, the total cost of the Nelson River Power Project is not known. (b) Under a 1966 agreement between Canada and the government of Manitoba the federal government has expended approximately $240 million in constructing the first stage of a high voltage direct current transmission system from the Nelson River area to a terminal station near Winnipeg.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised a very interesting point of order about an irregularity in a provision of the bill, particularly, as I recall, the provision in clause 26 which would propose to leave to the governor in council the power to make appointments to staff positions created by the bill for a four-year period, when in fact the recommendation of the bill contains a specific statement and a reference to the expiry date, which is also contained in clause 46 of the bill, which would be in conflict. The bill, both in the recommendation and in clause 46, provides for expiry on December 31, 1978. The power to make four-year appointments would, of course, give the power to the governor in council to extend expenses and expenditures beyond the term limit contained in the bill.

There can be no doubt that the hon. member's point is valid. It is a technically sound point, and the hon. member is quite accurate in his reasoning. The fact is that clause 26 is in conflict with clause 46 regarding the expiry date of the bill, and in turn is in conflict with the specific provision and recommendation. I take it the hon. member has given an indication of his approach, and I suppose that of his other colleagues in the House, in his remarks as follows:

I would therefore ask Your Honour to take this point under advisement and, if you are persuaded by my argument, to direct that the offending clauses be amended to conform with the recommendation—

I understand that the House may be disposed to vote on this matter later in the day, so whatever disposition is to be made is somewhat urgent. I have caused an inquiry to be made and I am given to understand that the government is prepared to indicate its willingness at this moment, or will later, to bring forward at the first available opportunity an amendment which would remove the conflict that appears to exist between the two clauses. Presumably, that would be done by making it absolutely certain that whatever power is granted in clause 26 is circumscribed by the expiry date in the bill and the expiry date contained in the recommendation. If that is done to the satisfaction of the hon. member and other hon. members of the House, perhaps we may set the point aside. If before the vote takes place that has not been done to their satisfaction, then I would be disposed to make a formal ruling on it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would regard the hon. member's point as well taken, and I can indicate that at the committee stage it would be my intention to propose an amendment to make the provision in clause 26(2) conform to the terms of the royal recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking yesterday on Bill C-73 I was primarily concerned with convincing the government that if its anti-inflation program is to work or is to be accepted by the Canadian population at large, the government will have to take a new position or another look at its present state of credibility and integrity. It has been my contention, as I brought forward yesterday, that you can only yell "wolf" for so long and so many times, because finally the people do not believe you anymore and they stop listening.

● (1520)

I think this government will have to look very seriously at whether or not it is able to convince the Canadian people that the program brought forward, even if it has a chance to work, can work in the light of what has gone on before. In the remaining minutes I have today I wish to present one or two views which I hope may be beneficial in the sense that they are positive and, hopefully, will be considered by the government.

Price and income controls, as the government has presented them to the House, represent a stopgap measure by which the government can help dampen the inflation psychology and expectations and thus get us straightened around in respect of what we think we can take from the economy. I think at some time or other we have all said that we will try to get out of the economy as much as we can, in order to protect ourselves. Frankly, some of us have been more successful than others. I shall have more to say about this later.

I believe the government will have to reverse its general attitude toward government. I believe this government going back to 1965—as well as the provincial governments—has accepted the philosophy that government can actually create happiness, and if governments spend more and more tax money, then all will benefit and have a better quality of life. I seriously question whether it is the role of government to go beyond the economic climate. It should help those who need help directly, but after that point is reached I seriously question whether we should get into all the hand-out gimmicks this government and others used in the last year, for instance.

For example, ten years ago various levels of government were taking approximately 29 per cent of our gross national product, call it redistribution of wealth or whatever you like. Today we are approaching the 40 per cent figure at all levels of government. I say to the government that this has to be counterproductive, in the sense that we have taken so much out of private hands that the private individual seriously questions whether he is ahead after taxes and is getting a benefit for the work he has done or the investment he has made over and above the hand-outs which many people in society seem to be getting.

I think this is the fundamental point the government in its long-term philosophy will have to look at very seriously. I suggest that the proposal requires a complete redirection in attitude and policy. As a follow-up of that, I believe the government must practice restraint. We are often accused of repeating this and not being specific enough. Therefore, I propose that the government should place a freeze on its expenditures and a freeze on its hiring practices. I say this because that 40 per cent figure, to my mind, must be reduced.

In years past, this House passed various bills in the hope that they would help many Canadians. I refer specifically to the unemployment insurance bill. Many of the principles which are found in the white paper in respect of that bill are based on premises which might have existed at one time. One of those principles was that many Canadians avoided unemployment insurance; even if it was the last thing they could do, they would not go on unemployment insurance. Today, I think that attitude has changed in respect of a certain proportion of our population. Consequently, we are spending twice as many dollars on unemployment insurance than is the case in the United States. I wonder when this will stop.

Yesterday a colleague of mine referred to Information Canada. That has been mentioned a number of times. There is also the whole question of a guaranteed annual income. In Manitoba, we have an experiment called a mini-income, whereby an attempt is being made to find out whether people would continue to work if there were a guaranteed annual income. I might say that the results are such that many of us seriously question whether a sufficient number of people in Canada say to themselves, "Granted, we are getting less than we would if we were working, but it is not a bad way of living if you do not have to work." The Canadian worker today is simply saying that he is becoming tired of supporting people who think being on the public dole is honourable or might even be their right.

Then there is the matter of government buildings. Everywhere in Ottawa one sees one project after another which bears a beautiful white and green sign stating that the project is under the supervision of the Department of Public Works. I wish to mention what happened in Winnipeg. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras)—I am glad he is in the House today—might take note of this. We had office space in Winnipeg and it was good space. Recently, however, in connection with the Winnipeg convention centre a new development has taken place right beside it, called Lakeshore Development, which is the most expensive real estate footage in Winnipeg. What happened? The first to move into this building were, of course, government departments. Governments seem to be in the forefront in getting the very best at the highest cost, and this has a psychological impact, I believe, on the Canadian people.

I think, also, the government should move toward a balanced budget. I believe our deficit is too high. The cost of servicing the national debt has become a major part of our yearly expenditures. I believe the government should look at that matter. Then there is the matter of the Foreign Investment Review Act. Representatives of the Quebec government are in West Germany these days trying to attract more investment funds for the province of Quebec. They are running into difficulty. The investors say that they want to invest in Canada but that the implementation of the Foreign Investment Review Act is starting to dry up some of the money supply.

I could go on to talk about consultants and the number of massive projects we have under construction in respect of the Olympics, James Bay, Churchill, and so on, and ask to what extent these massive projects are a strain on our money supply. All these projects are being carried out at the same time. To what extent have they contributed to inflation and the higher costs of construction during this period? Another point we could raise concerns the metric system. At this point in time, should there be a priority for spending in respect of metric conversion, or would it be advisable for us to defer metrification and lock our approach in with that of the United States so that the expenditures could be deferred for three or five years, as the case may be?

Lastly, if we are to get this problem turned around, we must go back to a basic fundamental of the free enterprise system.

An hon. Member: It is a mess.

Mr. Epp: If the hon. member wants to talk about messes, let us look at some countries in Europe—and if you want them, you can have them. Or we could go to British Columbia. Madam Speaker, I want to point out a fundamental principle. I refer to the question of productivity. When is the last time any of us stressed that we must produce more if we want to take more out of the Canadian economy? When is the last time we heard either labour or management bring forward the concept that if we are to turn around, we must strengthen our economic position? How many of us have heard that stressed positively? Where has the concept gone that a person who produces more is entitled to a return on that extra production? If we continue to tax production at the 40 per cent level, I can see why people do not want to produce more; they do not because the government simply taxes it away.

● (1530)

In conclusion, I believe this country, with all its wealth and potential, can come out of this crisis if we, as Canadians, adopt some of these principles. I also hope—and this may not be very popular with some members—that because we have been able to keep up with inflation more than adequately, hon. members will join me in agreeing that as of January 1, 1976, we should not go forward with the 7 per cent escalation in our stipends; that it be a symbol that we also are part and parcel of this problem and we want to contribute our share to combating inflation. I stress again that we believe a person is deserving in accordance with his rate of production, and that this government would govern much better if it governed less.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, in taking part in the debate on this legislation, I want to say at the outset that the NDP has suggested for many years that in a planned economy, which we feel our country should have, there should be policies and programs which call for full production and full employment. There should be, also, a system of collective controls and price reviews so as to contain inflation, or at least to alleviate the rate of inflation that we experience from time to time. I can recall that in the elections of 1963, 1965, 1968, 1972 and 1974 we said that very thing and were ridiculed for it. We opposed the proposals of the Progressive Conservative Party in the last campaign for a freeze and price and wage controls as being unfair and unworkable unless such a program was accompanied by other programs. Today, however, we see the conversion of the government to a program similar to the one the Conservatives were proposing, unless I badly misunderstood them. I repeat what we said a year ago, that this conversion to a program of controls will be unfair, inequitable and in many instances unworkable.

I have noted with interest in the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of other members of the government in the last couple of days a seeming willingness to make certain changes, additions or deletions in their proposed program to take out some of the obvious unfairness in the legislation. If the program is to have a remote chance of success, it must not only be fair in its application but it must be seen to be fair.

Of course we must fight inflation; there is no argument about that from anyone in the House. The argument is about how to go about it. I submit that in the process of fighting inflation, or attempting to alleviate the rate of inflation, equal, if not greater, importance must be given to other problems in our economy, specifically unemployment. To ignore that problem and solely to battle inflation will only result in greater unemployment which, I submit, is a far worse problem in our society than inflation.

I and the NDP will not support a program that perpetuates unfair treatment of Canadians who cannot defend themselves, such as the unorganized workers, the old age pensioners and those on low and fixed incomes, people who have no way of defending themselves. That means a great majority of wage and salary earners in the country, and it certainly includes most of those who are on pension. The legislation proposes a 10 per cent limit on wage increases, which means a maximum of $2,400 and a minimum of $600 in applying the guidelines. I want to repeat what my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) had to say when he spoke in this debate last Friday, that it would make much more sense and we would obtain much more acceptance from the people of Canada in fighting inflation if we reversed that guideline and provided the $2,400 to the people at the low end of the scale and the $600 to the people at the top end of the scale, including members of parliament. The program would then be much more credible and much more fair.

If we are to do anything to help those who are on fixed and low incomes to live decently and not see their standard of living falling as the result of the high rate of inflation, then surely they are the ones who should be getting the $2,400 maximum increase, and those at the high end of the scale can do quite well with nothing at all or, at the most, $600. Surely that would be decent, sensible, civilized and fair. But no, this government keeps on with the old free enterprise nonsense which means that him that has gets, and him that hasn't gets it in the neck. It means, continue striving for all you can get and to heck with the other guy; those who have power will get more, and those who have no power will get less, or nothing.

Surely, if you are going to bring in a restriction on incomes, these restrictions should not apply to those on low incomes. In fact, I submit that any family on an income of less than $10,000 a year right now should be totally exempt from the guidelines. A family consisting of husband, wife and three, four or five children trying to live in an urban centre in Canada is not able to get by on $10,000. They cannot make it if they have to pay for their shelter, pay their food bills, pay for educating their children, pay their taxes, mortgage payments, and so forth.

I saw a survey which was made in Toronto a year and a half ago by the welfare council in co-operation with other groups in the city. It showed that a family of five in an average home, with one car, and assuming they put the three children through high school and into university, will not make it on less than $15,000. To apply guidelines to incomes as low as $6,000 a year, I submit, is unconscionable. The people on low incomes are not the ones who cause inflation; they are the first victims of inflation and the ones who are hit the hardest.

Surely it is not right to apply these restrictions to old age pensioners and to people who work at the minimum wage who have no union to bargain for them. Those people make up two-thirds of the work force of this country. They would receive smaller increases from their employers than they presently do, were it not for the precedents set by organized workers who are able to obtain higher increases through the bargaining of their unions. There should be total exemption for people on low incomes. If the government thought that anything below $10,000 was too generous, surely there should be a total exemption for anyone earning less than $6,000 or $7,000 per year, no matter how the income is arrived at, whether it be pension, wage or salary.

For the minister to suggest that hitting big wage and salary earners, big companies and big labour will somehow help the little people because it will reduce inflation is some kind of sophistry. Economists whose comments I have heard in the last few days have said that there is no doubt this program will have an effect on the rate of inflation, but the effect will be to cause the rate to reduce by no more than 1 per cent or 2 per cent. That kind of insignificant effect on inflation will not be of much value to the little people; it will be of greater value to those on high incomes and to those corporations which make nice profits. It will be of little consequence to old age pensioners or to people working at the minimum wage. Inflation will be only 10 per cent instead of 12 per cent.

In regard to people living on pensions, I have listened to hon. members on the government side telling us not to forget that there is an escalation clause for old age pensioners, people on income supplements, veterans pensions, and so on. That is quite true, but the escalator clause was applied to basic pensions which at that time were already too low. Since it was implemented, all the escalator clause has done is alleviate the situation of the old age pensioner in the sense that he is not as badly off as he would otherwise have been. Regardless of the escalator clause, the old age pensioner has still become worse off, although perhaps not to as great a degree.

If the government will not change its mind about who can receive the $2,400 and who can receive the $600, it should at least indicate that those who are on incomes such as the minimum wage, old age pensioners and those on guaranteed income supplement, shall be guaranteed a minimum of a $600 increase in the first year. That means an increase of $50 a month in the old age pension, immediately. Let us make sure they receive that $600; let us not just leave it in the guidelines as a piece of fantasy. How will these people receive an additional $600? The province of Quebec has already lowered its projected rate of increase in the minimum wage. Let us request, or require the provinces to raise the minimum wage, and let the federal government give the lead by increasing the present minimum wage so that those who work at the minimum wage will receive at least $600 more in the first year of this program.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

If we want co-operation, support and even some element of enthusiasm for a fight against inflation, these are the kinds of measures we must take, and we must incorporate them into our program of restraints. I said earlier that it is not good enough just to fight inflation in isolation. Unemployment is a more serious problem than inflation, and in conjunction with the battle against inflation we should be carrying on a battle against unemployment.

The question of housing has been raised repeatedly in the question period since we returned after the recess. If we want to do something about a social right and need, the right and need for a decent home and employment, and to control inflation in conjunction with the program of restraints on wages, incomes and prices, there should be an injection of an additional $1 billion or $2 billion into housing. The creation of employment and the forcing down of the cost of housing could be accomplished in one move.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) announce today that those who had signed the agreement would come under the Assisted Home Ownership Plan and would qualify for the $500 grant. In many of the provinces these people will also receive a provincial grant toward their down payment. The provision was that construction had to be 65 per cent completed by October 31. There are two housing developments in Regina of which I am aware where some of the houses will not be 65 per cent completed until the end of March. The basements are dug and the foundations might be poured. It is not the fault of the homeowner nor that of the government. In many cases it is not the fault of contractors; they are having difficulty obtaining sufficient supplies. I was pleased the minister said that the program is now extended to December 31, but I submit that is not good enough. Tens of thousands of low income families in this country will lose that grant if the government does not agree that all the houses which were under construction, no matter at what stage of completion, will be included in the program.

A family which was eligible for the $500 grant from the federal government and $1,000 from the provincial government called me last week. They borrowed another $250 to enable them to raise the $1,750 required for their down payment. Their house is only about 10 per cent completed. The builder and the realtor, with great apologies, said they would not have it 65 per cent completed until the end of April. I would hate to see this low income family have to take out a second mortgage to cover the down payment, because we all know what that means in terms of interest rates and what it will cost them for that small amount of money. This is only one small example, but it is important and meaningful to thousands of people in this country.

I wish to say something about agriculture and agricultural products. The government's guidelines indicate that farmers and fishermen will be exempt, applying the farm gate principle. However, within hours of the guidelines being made known, the newly appointed chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, and his vice-chairman, Mrs. Plumptre, in their first press conference indicated they intended to investigate marketing boards. I submit that they cast aspersions and suspicions on farm marketing boards which were entirely unjustified and unnecessary. If we are to control marketing boards, then the policy of the government with regard to exempting farmers and fishermen is just a sham. We should not forget that the farm marketing board is right beside the farm gate, and we should not forget that a fish marketing board is on the dock right beside the fisherman's boat. If you try to control marketing boards, you are in effect attacking the incomes of our primary producers, the farmers and fishermen.

Farmers and fishermen in many parts of the country have fought for decades for a system of orderly marketing, for marketing boards in which they could have some input and membership. It has been the dream of farmers in my constituency and province, and they have fought and persuaded successive governments of differing political persuasions to implement them. If Mr. Pepin and Mrs. Plumptre think that the price of wheat is too high, and start messing around with the Canadian Wheat Board or the Hog Marketing Commission in Saskatchewan, we will have news for them. In the decades of fighting to get orderly marketing and marketing boards, farmers have been victimized by successive governments and have been treated unfairly through a cheap food policy. One of the contributing factors to the demise of 400,000 family farms since World War II is the cheap food policy.

When farmers were getting $1 or $1.50 per bushel for wheat two or three years ago, we all knew it was not meeting the cost of production, let alone providing a return on labour or investment. Now that the price of grain bears some relation to the cost of production for the first time, the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board is screaming about marketing boards. If he comes to Saskatchewan, he had better keep his back to the wall and his guns loose in the holster, because a lot of farmers will want to talk to him very severely.

The Food Prices Review Board has not been able to find anything wrong at the packaging, wholesaling or retailing level, nor at the supermarkets of Garfield-Weston; therefore, they think there is something wrong with the marketing boards. But marketing boards are about the only protection the farmer has, and any fair-minded citizen is prepared to pay the price required to meet the cost of production and labour and something to live on.

The cost of production continues to increase. According to Statistics Canada, farm input rose by 9 per cent from the second quarter of 1974 to the second quarter of 1975, the latest figures available. Cost of production rose 29 per cent in the last two years. Just ask the cow-calf operator or the farmer who has a feed lot about his prices in light of that 29 per cent increase in the cost of production. There are many important components in the cost of production—mortgage credit, for instance. The credit required for land and buildings increased by 13 per cent from the second quarter of 1974 to the second quarter of 1975, and in the two-year period it increased by 32 per cent. The cost of farm machinery increased by 19 per cent in one year and 29 per cent over two years. Petroleum products increased 16 per cent in one year and 28 per cent in two years. Fertilizer shows a 39 per cent increase in one year and an 83 per cent increase in the two years. I submit that many of these increases were neither necessary nor justified, but the government is not interested in checking them.

In the face of those increases in the cost of farm production, Massey-Ferguson Limited recently reported record profits of $53 million in the nine-month period ending July 31—an increase of 37 per cent over the same period in the previous year. That tells us something about the increase in the cost of farm implements and parts.

Let us look at banks. In the nine months until July 31, both the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Toronto-Dominion Bank reported an increase of 23 per cent in profit over the previous year—$92 million and $65 million respectively. The Royal Bank of Canada did even better; their profit for the nine-month period was $113 million, a 26 per cent increase over the same period in the previous year.

The cost of petroleum products has increased. Imperial Oil Limited is reaping a profit approaching $1 million a day. If we are to do anything about prices, profits and incomes, if we are going to fight inflation, I submit we should start at the top. People at the top cause inflation, not those on low incomes. The old age pensioner is not the one to attack: start at the top and work down. High profits, unjustified price increases and high incomes should be attacked. That is where you start, whether it be with the president of a corporation, a trade union or a member of parliament: it is they who take more out of society than they put in.

Mr. Paproski: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Benjamin: For the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to suggest that those on low incomes should quit trying to take more out of the economy than they are putting into it is the worst kind of insult to those people. I should like to see him work on the sewer and water system in the city of Regina, on a casual basis at the minimum wage. We would see whether he is putting more into the economy than he is taking out. That is an insult to the majority of people in this country. If this program entails attacking and undermining the marketing boards, I will campaign for its failure. I know thousands of others who will do the same and make no apologies for it.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): A great Canadian.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member calls me a great Canadian and I accept that as a compliment. I am sure the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith) will do the same thing if he sees farmers being hurt by an attack on marketing boards through an income and prices program. I know he will join me if this program is not changed to provide more income for pensioners and people on low wages, and unorganized workers. If this program is unfair to them, together with thousands and thousands of other people I will do all I can to see that it fails. If it is implemented in such a manner as to be fair to those people, it will have my support and co-operation and that of the people of this country. From what we know of the program to date, it appears to be grossly unfair to most of the ordinary people in the country who are on low and fixed incomes and it cannot help but be harmful to primary producers. I submit the program is a failure.

As I said at the outset, we agree that we must do all we can to fight inflation or to reduce the rate of inflation. Every country in the world, even the totalitarian countries, is affected by inflation of 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 6 per cent. There is no such thing as doing away with inflation unless you bring on a major depression: that is the only way to halt inflation. For years my party has said that we can lessen, if not eliminate, the effects of inflation on those receiving low and fixed incomes and pensions. We can contain the rate of inflation to a much better degree if we introduce programs which are fair to people.

I have heard government spokesmen use the term "an element of rough justice." If it is said to be rough justice for the poor and those on fixed incomes, I suggest it is not rough justice but injustice. To control inflation properly, you must bring in a series of policies. You must introduce over-all plans which deal with several problems at the same time. You must attack inflation, put greater emphasis on combatting unemployment, and meet the social and human needs of the people of this country. You must do this through providing, in a massive way, housing which our people can afford. That will do much to cure both inflation and unemployment at the same time.

We have contended for years that we can ameliorate the rate of inflation if we introduce a system of selective price controls and establish a prices review board which would require those who wish to raise prices to appear before the board and justify the increase. If they can justify the increase by proving an actual cost increase, we would be fair and say, "All right; you are allowed that much increase." If General Motors wants to increase the price of its trucks by $300 but can prove only increased costs of $100, then a price increase of $100 would be allowed. Surely that is fair. Surely that is the more honest way to control the cost of living and inflation. It is better to do this than to take it out on our low income people.

If we were to control the prices of areas of our economy involved with steel, farm machinery, fertilizer, and products of that nature, we would effectively control not only the price of steel and of the other commodities mentioned but we would make sure that steel manufacturers and other manufacturers do not create artificial shortages and then persuade the government to grant increases. You cannot have one without the other, as the song says. If you control price, you must have some say in production. If you control the price of steel, you also control the input costs of a host of other items, such as automobiles, farm machinery, refrigerators, stoves, structural steel—you name it. You would not need to go snooping into the books of every storekeeper and contractor to see what he is charged, because you would know what his steel is costing.

Our proposed prices review board would work exactly the opposite to the way the proposed Anti-Inflation Board will work. If somebody complains to the government board, the board will look into it. We think it should be done the other way. We think that anyone who wants to increase price should first appear before the board to justify the price increase, before the increase is allowed. Do it that way, I say. If the government insists on setting up the Anti-Inflation Board as proposed, then at least I and one other member of parliament will tell the people in our constituencies to send to the board notification of each and every price increase, wherever it may take place.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

That reminds me of something. Has the government considered doing as fast investigation of the wholesale and retail grocery chains and department stores of this country? I was on the telephone to people in Regina and Vancouver and learned something which I suppose is common knowledge. Because this dummy government tipped its hand in advance on the holiday weekend, management in many stores the other day went galloping up and down the aisles, putting up the price of thousands of commodities. I am told they started doing this even before the Prime Minister came on television to announce the program. I think the government should order a thorough investigation to compare the price of thousands of commodities in the week before October 14 with the price of the same commodities immediately after October 14. This would be an interesting exercise. The government ought to do this if it is serious about restraint and wants to be fair.

In addition to imposing selective controls and establishing the prices review board, we should make sure that our tax system is fair. I notice that the Prime Minister talked about taxing away the excess income of those who break the guidelines. Fine—but I will believe it when I see it, because so much of our tax system is unfair. It discriminates between the poor and the rich, between the corporation and the individual, and the entire system needs to be revamped.

If the government does the things I have suggested, if it introduces programs which are fair and equitable, it will gain the support and co-operation of the people of this country. But it must do some of those things I have suggested. It must attack unemployment and provide housing if it wants the co-operation which it needs in order to succeed.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, it is with some concern that I rise to speak on Bill C-73, the government's announced mandatory guidelines as a cure for inflation. My concern over this bill started with the Prime Minister's presentation on national television on Thanksgiving Day. Although Canadians have much about which to be thankful, the spirit of thanksgiving was not improved by our watching our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mouthing policies he has consistently ridiculed and which he obviously does not intend to support by example.

The fact is that the Prime Minister and his colleagues duped the voters in 1974 just to win an election. At that time, all the members of the cabinet hid the economic facts from Canadians, just as they hid them with regard to our oil reserves. But now some of the truth is becoming evident. Having ignited the inferno, the Prime Minister now asks voters to dampen the fires of inflation.

The request of the Prime Minister for personal restraint was almost nauseating, coming as it did from the mouth of a man who has proved to be the most profligate spendthrift in Canada's history. His personal lifestyle, at public expense, would put an Indian prince to shame. It includes swimming pools, massive staffs, Cadillacs and travel.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Crouse: I hear an hon. member say "shame." Let him stand and refute what I have said. These are the facts, and they are shameful. Perhaps the hon. member can stand on his feet after I have finished.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: It is a shame. And after emptying the public purse, the Prime Minister has the gall to call for personal restraint on the part of the average Canadian.

● (1610)

Following the Prime Minister's questionable performance on television we were given a detailed statement on this measure by the new Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), whom I congratulate on his appointment. According to him, the real danger to our economy lies ahead. These were his words:

> As countries like the United States, Germany and Japan pull out of their present deep recession they can expect to enjoy very much higher productivity gains than Canada and the effect would be to widen substantially the differential between our unit costs and those of our major competitors.

I believe I have quoted the hon. gentleman correctly. We must ask ourselves why this is so. Do these countries have more natural resources or more ability than Canda? The answer is no. The situation in Canada is due entirely to mismanagement of our economy by the present government. Our new Finance Minister said the program which he placed before us needs the support of all governments in Canada and of all Canadians in order to break the vicious spiral of costs and prices which endangers the stability of our economy and, indeed, of our whole society.

To my mind, such a statement implies that the government has been living in a dream world ever since the beginning of the 1970s. The Prime Minister and his cabinet remind me of a man who had difficulty providing for the wants—not the needs—of his family; his income took care of his family's needs. Though he lived within his budget, he could never seem to get far enough ahead to take care of the many things they wanted.

Then one day he received a notice from his bank that he was eligible for a credit card. They sent him one and encouraged him to use it in every possible way. He began buying everything his family wanted. The card was like manna from heaven. However, he eventually received a statement of indebtedness and was asked to pay up. It was then that his house of cards collapsed. He became irresponsible, irrational and unpredictable, blaming everyone but himself for his own foolishness. That story applies to the Prime Minister; he need only look in a mirror to see the man responsible for Canada's economic problems.

It was the Conservative party, especially our national leader, which consistently exercised leadership in drawing public attention to the serious, even fundamental damage being done to our national fabric by continuing double-digit inflation. We led the way in calling for strong and direct government action to deal with the problem. Just as consistently, the Prime Minister and his colleagues ridiculed and criticized our proposals, calling them unworkable and unnecessary.

Our position on the evils of inflation has not changed. That, of course, is the major difference between ourselves and the government, members of which have now been obliged to reverse the cynical and misleading position they persisted in putting before the Canadian people not only during the 1974 election campaign but since, up to and including the budget of June 23 presented by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner). We remain convinced of the urgent need for strong and effective national action and leadership on this issue. If anything, the 15 months of ineffective action and non-leadership since the 1974 election makes the need for effective action even more necessary, as it has made inflation itself just so much more difficult to manage.

The main problem facing the government at present is that of its credibility. Speaking in Trois-Rivières, for example, if we look back to June 21, 1974, we find a headline which reads: "Trudeau Continues Attack on PC Policies on Quebec Tour". I shall not burden the record with all he said, but there was one line he repeated over and over again: he continued to criticize Conservatives for their prices and incomes policy, suggesting it would shackle the Canadian economy. Today, the Prime Minister is going around the country saying his policy is the only solution. I ask you, Mr. Speaker: which Trudeau will the Canadian people believe? Will it be the one whose words were reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 21, 1974, or will it be the one who is running around the country today?

While, as I say, the main problem facing the government today has to do with credibility, I should like to make it abundantly clear at the same time that Bill C-73 and the accompanying policies announced by the Prime Minister and his colleagues do not constitute our program as we advocated an incomes policy during the 1974 campaign. There are important, if not fundamental, differences between the program we advocated then and the program which the Liberals have announced. These differences extend to policy as well as to detail.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are perfectly right.

Mr. Crouse: One basic difference is that we never presented our proposals as an answer in itself to the inflationary threat. Fundamental to our approach—and the record makes this abundantly clear—was the need to accompany a short-term controls program designed essentially to break inflationary expectations with other, and equally important measures to deal with deep-rooted causes of inflation. In that context we placed, and continue to place, major emphasis on the need for more appropriate fiscal and monetary policies on the part of the federal government. Leadership by example, which is the only kind of leadership people will understand and accept in the long run, does not simply mean holding the salaries of federal civil servants within wage guidelines or postponing the purchase of new carpets or furniture. If the call is for the nation to live within its means, the government, in order to set an example, must abide by the same injunction.

The record of the government in this respect is virtually the opposite of what is required. On the monetary front, for example, the Bank of Canada, with the government's approval, has consistently permitted increases in the money supply well in excess of any increase in real or even inflated economic growth. During the past 12 months alone, that increase has amounted to more than 15 per cent. Indeed, if one wished to look for sources of fuel for this year's degree of inflation, it would be hard to find a better starting place than the $3 billion or more which the bank pumped into circulation during the last quarter of 1974 alone in a cynical exercise to ensure the success of the massive Canada Savings Bond program launched by the former minister of finance during that period.

If inflation is to be brought under control, increases in the money supply must, in my opinion, bear a closer resemblance to rates of growth in the economy. I would also remind the House that the government of the right hon. member for Mount Royal has set a record for living beyond its means while making unrealistic demands upon the economy. Under his administration, government spending increased from $10 billion to service 20 million people in 1968—when the right hon. gentleman came to power—to more than $35 billion to service some 22½ million Canadians in 1975-76. And the end is nowhere in sight.

According to the budget of June 23, expenditures are forecast to rise on a year to year basis by at least 11 per cent. The June forecast by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton of a $3 billion budgetary deficit appears, now, to be too low, and off the record—we certainly cannot find out what the deficit will be from conversations on the record—it is being predicted as likely to be $6 billion rather than $3 billion as stated by the former minister of finance. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that this was the real reason for his resigning from the cabinet: he could no longer face himself in the mirror in the morning and live the lie he had presented to the House of Commons.

In short, the government's appetite for spending has been boundless. It has been fed by ever-increasing tax returns from Canadian pockets and by continual heavy demands upon the capital markets of the country. As Conservatives, we have continually urged the government to show restraint in its own demands upon the economy and, more specifically, to limit increases in its spending to rates of real growth in the economy, all to no avail.

There are at least two other basic differences between our approach as set forth in the 1974 campaign and the government's present program. First, there is the time period during which any controls program could hope to function without setting off serious new distortions within our economy. Because we realized that an incomes policy was designed essentially to break inflationary expectations and create a breathing space for other, more fundamental anti-inflation policies to be brought to bear, our undertaking was for a program of no more than 18 to 24 months. The present government bill C-73 seeks a program of three years' duration.

Mr. Stanfield: Or more.

Mr. Crouse: As my leader says, or more. There is a further provision in the bill for extensions even beyond that period. In other words, this is an open-ended bill. As I have already noted, controls can have a distorting effect upon the economy, and the longer the economy is in a strait-jacket the sharper and deeper the distortions are likely to become. But even beyond that, I seriously question whether Canadians generally are prepared to grant the federal government, especially this federal government, on an open-ended basis the kind of sweeping, centralized powers represented in Bill C-73. The exercise of this kind of power over such a long period of time raises questions well beyond that of economic distortion. In fact, it raises the issue of a very fundamental change in the balance of decision-making power within our free market system.

A second difference between the two approaches lies with the way in which one could and should lead into such a program. We advocated, as an initial step, an across the board freeze period of up to 90 days so that the government could sit down with the major interest groups involved and work out answers to the host of questions which arise in any incomes policy. Without the freeze, the present government is left to sort out the ground rules while groups and individuals scamper to assert their special interests within the program.

Within the last few days we have already seen ample evidence of the kind of confusion and exaggerated inequities that result from this government's lack of any orderly introductory period. I predict this situation will develop and grow worse in the months ahead. I make this unfortunate prediction, but I submit this might well happen. At the very least, the bill should be amended in a way that requires the government to return to parliament for renewed powers after a much shorter time period. It should then justify its need for any extension and then obtain formal parliamentary approval to carry on the program for a further period if this action is warranted at that time. We must be very careful about giving away all of our freedom through legislation such as this. It is for this reason that I make this suggestion.

Beyond the question of an effective time period there is also the question of parliamentary accountability during the period that the program is in effect. At the present time, as I read the bill—and I have read it very carefully a number of times—there is no provision for any kind of comprehensive reporting to parliament on the over-all record of the program, and no built-in opportunity for parliament, through one of its committees, to receive and scrutinize regular reports from the agencies established in the bill.

Considering the massive powers involved—and they are massive—I, personally, believe that some process of accountability is not only essential but mandatory. Any process such as this which places massive discretionary powers in the hands of administrative agencies obviously requires a comprehensive appeals procedure in order to safeguard the public against the abuse of such powers. The present bill proposes such an elaborate and complicated procedure that decisions may well be tied up for months in one appeal after another. Justice delayed is, indeed, justice denied—a situation that could well face thousands of Canadians under the government's proposed controls program.

The cause of the entire economic situation which presently faces Canadians is spelled out by the government in its 1975-76 booklet "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent". Chapter i tells us that the 1975-76 main estimates propose budgetary expenditures of $28.2 billion. This is $6.2 billion, or—I emphasize this figure—28 per cent more than the 1974-75 main estimates. This booklet is available to all, Mr.

Speaker, and it makes interesting reading. That figure is $2.8 billion, or 11 per cent above the forecast expenditure for 1974-75.

Since this booklet was printed, according to figures placed on the record by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) when he spoke to the House on Tuesday these figures have now escalated to $35 billion. At the same time as the President of the Treasury Board made this figure available to us, he pleaded in his speech that those on this side give him some suggestions as to how to cut this expenditure. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been here a long time and I believe the minister was speaking facetiously, because whenever we do make suggestions in the House and in committee as to how certain expenditures can be curtailed or cut down, to my knowledge no action is ever taken. Despite the proposals we make and the criticisms we render of certain policies, eventually these expenditures are made and we end up in the public accounts committee with someone asking why they were made.

I am prepared to give the minister some serious suggestions that I hope he will consider, for only by getting to the root cause of excessive spending can we hope, in my view, to curb inflation. For example, in the estimates of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) the minister will find a subsidy to the National Arts Centre of $6,892,000 just to keep the doors open. Apparently in the government's view the show must go on. Give them bread and circuses and let the people pay for it. If you check back, Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that Canadians built the building at a cost of something like $50 million. In desperate times of economic recession like those we face in Canada today, I believe this centre could well pay its way. If it cannot, I submit it should close its doors until things improve.

To call it a National Arts Centre is a misnomer in any event, because there are many people in my constituency, and perhaps throughout Nova Scotia, who have never even seen the National Arts Centre, much less attended a show. It is really only for the people of Ottawa. There are centres in Montreal and in Toronto, and not too many people come from regional areas to view the productions that are put on in the National Arts Centre. I think this is one area that could well be examined by the government.

I also submit the expenditures of the CBC should be overhauled. In 1957, when I first came to this House, I remember looking at the subsidy provided the CBC, which at that time was $52 million. I remember making a speech on that item. The Hon. George Nowlan was minister of national revenue responsible to the House for the CBC, and he did not take too kindly to my comments. I criticized the subsidy. I said in a speech I made in the House that it represented $1 million a week and that I felt it should be looked into.

Now what do we find, Mr. Speaker? This year, in addition to all the money that comes in from other sources, the CBC will be subsidized by the amount of $352,895,000. That is almost $1 million a day. Again, the end is nowhere in sight because I understand the amount is supposed to escalate next year on account of the Olympics, when more services from the CBC will be required. Surely, somewhere we must seek a halt. I submit this amount could and should be cut back at least to the 1973 figure, which was $114 million less than the figure listed for this year's expenditures.

I submit we could cut back on the CBC by curtailing programs, for in fact we have a surfeit of TV programs. I am prepared to stick my neck out and state here in this House that following the CBC news at night we could well terminate our TV for that particular day, and I would like to know just how much of a savings this would amount to in dollars and cents to the Canadian taxpayers. I submit we could make that cut without truly affecting the Canadian lifestyle.

Information Canada is listed this year at $9,562,000. I say to this House that it could be abolished. The minister ridiculed our proposal along this line in his speech on Tuesday, and said it would only save $4 million or $5 million. I submit the minister is wrong in making that statement. I checked the record and it is as I stated, $9,562,000, or almost $10 million. I submit this is no small amount. If it is a small amount in the eyes of this cabinet, I would remind the House that I come from an area where shipbuilding, ship operating and fishing operations are paramount. There is a saying in Lunenburg, my home town, that it is the little leaks that sink the ship. I would not call $10 million a little leak but it, along with some of the other leaks we see in governmental expenditures, is sinking this Liberal ship of state. These leaks are very injurious to Canadians; that is our concern and it should be the concern of all hon. members of this House of Commons. I say Information Canada should be abolished.

There is an increase in running the taxation branch of the Department of National Revenue of $45 million this year over last. The cost of Customs and Excise is up $30 million over last year. This should be investigated. There is no rationale, rhyme or reason for there being an increase of $75 million in this one department in one year. This government has been tossing around million dollar expenditures as though there were no tomorrow; but tomorrow has shown up today, which is why our economy is in this terrible condition. Internal overhead, accommodation, rent and maintenance is up over $105 million this year over last year. Why is this? Contingencies alone are up $85 million over last year. Why is that? Surely this can be curtailed.

Consumer and Corporate Affairs, a department which did not even exist prior to the advent of the Prime Minister in 1968, calls for $52,835,000 this year, up $16 million over last year. Why is this? I want to make a sincere proposal to the cabinet, and I hope somebody is listening. Why could we not take some of the bureaucrats and personnel who presently exist in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and utilize them to manage the problems that will accrue to Canadians under Bill C-73? I see a duplication in the requirements as between the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and this bill which should be investigated. This bill states, at page 10, that the Anti-Inflation Board shall:

(a) monitor changes in prices, profits, compensation and dividends in relation to the guidelines and the effectiveness and workability of the guidelines both in general and in their application—

I could read it all, but hon. members can read as well as I can. There is a duplication as between this bill and the responsibilities that have been laid before the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Do we hear anything from the Prime Minister or any member of the cabinet to the effect that we are going to take staff from this department? No, that department is to continue as it is. In fact, it is to have an increase of $16 million over last year. I say to you, sir, that with Mr. Pepin and Mrs. Plumptre monitoring price increases, there should certainly be less for that particular department to do. Surely there could be a cut in the expenditures of the department.

The Canadian International Development Agency is listed as requiring $734 million, up $207 million over two years ago. The activities of this agency are questionable. They have been seriously criticized in the committee, not only by members of the official opposition and not only by members of the NDP and of the Créditiste party, but also by members of the government party. We have all shared concern over the arbitrary actions taken by the director of the Canadian International Development Agency. I submit that these expenditures should be severely examined and curtailed by the present administration.

If you check back on some of my proposals, you will find that they come close to a saving of $1 billion, an amount which I submit could be cut off this year's proposals without in any way hurting the lifestyle of Canadians. There are many, many more, but rather than burdening the record I will let hon. members look at the estimate books themselves. However, instead of following the course I am suggesting that our Prime Minister is running up and down this nation, and instead of explaining his policy to the people he is threatening the labouring man, the businessman and the average Canadian. Instead of going hat in hand and saying, "I did make some mistakes: I did construe your wants as needs and I taxed the people accordingly; I am sorry"—instead of saying something along that line and that he will try to do better, he is out there at the various meeting halls literally threatening Canadians. He is saying, in effect, "You do as I say, or else."

In the press he is reported as having said, "If you get a raise we will tax it away from you directly or we will tax the company and take it away at the source, or we will take it from the company." What hypocrisy this is! This Prime Minister and this government should seek the co-operation of the people and they should provide an example for all of us.

To date the Prime Minister has said nothing about decreasing the staff of bureaucrats in government. He has said nothing about reducing unemployment insurance benefits for those who refuse to work. He has said nothing about tax incentives for small business. He has said nothing about tax incentives for individuals in this nation—and thank God for them—who are willing to work harder. We hear nothing of this nature from the Prime Minister.

I say to you, sir, that the times call for bold, cold and harsh government cuts and for rewarding the output efforts of others so we can compete in world markets. Instead of following this course, the Prime Minister has been fiddle-faddling and fuddle-duddling while the nation is burning. In closing, I would commend the words of that great United States president, Abraham Lincoln, for the consideration of the government, for they are as true today as they were when they were first uttered. He said:

[Mr. Crouse.]

You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help a man permanently by doing for him what he could do for himself.

I urge this government to give these views serious thought, for in these gems of wisdom spoken by a great leader of another country lies Canada's only real hope for a prosperous future.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty as a member of Parliament to express my views on Bill C-73 introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to enforce the contents of the white paper as an attack against rising consumer prices.

In 1968, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) offered to the nation a political program whose first objective was to establish a just society. The people believed in the Liberal party's promises and in the just society for all Canadians of good will. The Liberal party won the election with a very large majority. From that moment, it had the power to legislate to establish a more equitable society in Canada.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, a just society is one that first recognizes to every individual and every family the right to an adequate income to meet its essential needs, that is to say, an income which would enable each family to live above the poverty level, as defined by the Senate Committee report on poverty.

Nature imposes on family heads the sacred duty to feed and provide for their children. It goes even further. Because children resemble their fathers—they are somewhat the continuations of their beings—nature inspires them with the idea that they must provide for their future and create an inheritance which will help them fend for themselves, along the perilous journey of their lives, against the strokes of fate. Is it with minimum wages of $2.60 an hour that the head of a family can live up to his obligations and make his dreams come true? And yet, we have been told that the minimum wage level in the province of Quebec has been frozen at $2.60 an hour.

However, judging from the white paper and the bill under review, I am afraid that small earners will be put at a disadvantage and that the gap which separates them from the privileged of society will grow even wider, which may be a source of social disturbance which will benefit no one.

It is the duty of the state to favour greater co-operation between capital-labour and capital-money. Capital-labour has rights, but it has responsibilities as well. One of these is to provide faithfully all the labour it has agreed to provide under a free and fair contract. It must make every effort to provide a performance of quality which will contribute to lower production costs, as well as facilitate better competition, which would serve to fight effectively against unemployment.

On the other hand, the rich and the businessman must not treat workers as slaves. They should justly respect in them the dignity of man, as well as their human rights. Physical labour is far from being shameful.

On the contrary, it reflects credit on man for it is a means which enables him to earn a living. What is shameful and inhuman is to make use of man as if he were a mere instrument, to esteem him only in relation to his physical strength, which allows the firms to make bigger profits.

The unions' first duty, Mr. Speaker, is to stand up for the workers' rights on wages and working conditions. In general, they fulfill this first duty rather well. However, union leaders should make a point of informing their members of the various wheels of our economic system, particularly in the production and consumption areas, and also of the monetary system whose function is to serve as the link between the work capital-labour and capital-money.

Thus the state has the duty to see that harmony and justice is maintained between those two forms of capitals, which would help a lot to resolve the problems of both inflation and unemployment.

We live in a consumer society which has gone far beyond common sense. Even governments spend without much consideration. Departments and Crown corporations are not in the least economical. In many cases the replacement of equipment which is still fit for use could be regarded as wasteful and the workers who have to carry out those changes are sometimes shocked when they see the government give away at ridiculous prices things that have cost a lot of money and are still in good condition.

Even the public is aware of this waste. The same bad example, Mr. Speaker, is given by the big companies which get contracts from governments, and once again it is the public that foots the bill through taxes which increase all the time and which are one of the causes of inflation.

Let us see what happened in the refurbishing of the Bonaventure. Witnesses appeared before the committee of the House who proved beyond a doubt that millions were spent needlessly, that there were even cases of patronage which cost millions to the Canadian taxpayers.

Considering the bad example given by public powers and big business, how, Mr. Speaker, can the public not be tempted to get rid of things than can still be used though they may not be in the latest fashion? Those things are scrapped, sent by boat to Japan where the Japanese use them to make goods we then buy from them, while in the meantime thousands of Canadians live willingly or unwillingly off unemployment and welfare.

One day, when I was a young man, I went with my father to a meeting which was held in a classroom of the school of my village. The guest speaker told us about the advantages of establishing a caisse populaire Desjardins in our parish. He told us about the good virtue of saving and the advantages we would derive from it if we channelled our savings into such a credit union for our future needs.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if saving is still a virtue, if it must be practised only by the underprivileged groups or if public authorities must also set an example.

At the inauguration of a building which was to become a caisse populaire Desjardins, I told the audience, particularly the young people, that saving was still a virtue to practise, that they would miss later in life the $10 they spent without thinking today and the $20 they refuse to earn today.

How can you honestly ask the Canadian people to tighten their belts when the authorities let super-commercial enterprises make advertisements on the radio, on television, inviting us to spend.

Those ads cost a lot of money and are added to the price the consumer must pay. Ads urge you to spend now and pay later. Finance institutions are taking advantage of that and putting people in the red through loans made at usurious interest rates under the sympathetic eye of authorities. Even governments practice that policy. There is proof in the housing area.

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation makes loans to corporations for housing construction for periods of up to 50 years at very high interest rates, with the result that the public will pay their houses four times and own them only after 50 years. People who will be born in 50 years are being put in the red to pay for services for today's generation; yet at that time they will still have to pay for their own services. That is what you call a sound financial system. I do not understand anymore, Mr. Speaker.

The government is asking people to tighten their belt and workers to refrain from seeking higher wages. How is it possible for them to welcome this message when we witnessed in the last few years, and particularly in the last months, a steady increase in the prices of building materials, oil, natural gas, gas and even the gas tax, utilities, clothing, food, and despite the fact that the farm producer does not get the income he is entitled to.

For example, Mr. Speaker, let us take the prices of farm machinery and spare parts, which increased in a discouraging way for farm producers in the past 12 months. How can one expect those same farm producers to produce more economically and accept a drop in the prices of their products?

Only this morning, Mr. Speaker, we learned on the news that Ontario Hydro is increasing its prices by 25 per cent. Who will pay the bill? After big businesses increased their prices in a comfortable way in anticipation of a possible increase in salaries for 1976 and many workers agreed to wait until 1976 to renew their collective agreement the government now imposes a ceiling on them. That is what made my colleague the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) say, as reported in Montreal's La Presse of October 15, 1975, and I quote:

> Liberal party workers are more bitter than Juneau.

And the article goes on:

> Prosper Boulanger, M.P. who was responsible for the campaign, stated to a journalist from La Presse that "if Juneau was defeated, it was because of that . . . statement made last night".

It was the statement made the night before the election. It is a Liberal member of parliament who condemns his government's policy. Further, it says:

> Other party workers present agreed with "Prosper". Mr. Boulanger even went as far as to say: "It is not Juneau who was defeated, but the government".

Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that in the press throughout the country, the people, especially low-wage earners, find it hard to accept this policy of restraint brought forward by the government, this ceiling policy which will be, as I said earlier, very painful for low-wage earners. This ceiling, in my opinion, hits low income groups harder than the others. As far as I am concerned, I think that the percentage—this is a suggestion I now make to the government—of salary increase should be higher for low-wage earners and lower for high income groups. Let us keep in mind that consumer prices are the same for a family with a $6,000 income as for the one with a $15,000 or $25,000 income. If we want to achieve a distributive justice, we will necessarily have to take means to that end. The white paper makes no mention at all of lower interest rates. Yet, interest rates at existing levels are one of the major causes of inflation and unemployment.

Yet there is an institution responsible for setting interest rates: the Bank of Canada. However, the distinct impression is that chartered banks are the ones that set interest rates. That form of financial dictatorship was exposed more than 40 years ago by Pope Pius XI in the following words:

> In the first place, it is obvious that not only is wealth concentrated in our times but an immense power and despotic economic dictatorship is consolidated in the hands of a few, who often are not owners but only the trustees and managing directors of invested funds which they administer according to their own arbitrary will and pleasure.
> This dictatorship is being most forcibly exercised by those who, since they hold the money and completely control it, control credit also and rule the lending of money. Hence, they regulate the flow, so to speak, of the lifeblood whereby the entire economic system lives, and have so firmly in their grasp the soul, as it were, of economic life, that no one can breathe against their will.

Mr. Speaker, the situation has not changed. To the contrary, the power of banks grew tremendously in the last few years, so much as that on January 1, 1974, chartered banks could grant $57 billion of the nation's credit out of a total money supply of $62,860 million.

The nation, through the Bank of Canada, has created only $5,860 million. This is why I say that the monopolies are getting stronger because they now have their own banks and lend money to each other at exorbitant interest rates, which necessarily increases production costs, and, of course, the consumer foots the bill.

Small businesses suffer from such disloyal competition because they cannot fight on an equal basis. Only the strongest and the less scrupulous can survive.

Mr. Speaker, the gross national income has increased considerably in the last few years, except in 1974, which goes to show the material prosperity of our country. This prosperity must be shared with the low income groups. It provides a golden opportunity for democracy, but democracy must take charge and insure that the distribution is equitable and just, otherwise this prosperity will not last much longer.

If, on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we are generous and open, if we are far-seeing and if we see to it to distribute our wealth fairly and equitably, our country will enjoy great prosperity for a long time.

It is therefore essential that we take unprecedented steps to end abuses, to largely restore material prosperity, to restore the confidence of the millions of Canadian citizens who have been traditionally taught to expect democracy to provide them with opportunities and an ever greater security in this world where science brings more and more material wealth to mankind.

Obviously, therefore, it is important for every healthy individual in the country to be productive, for every factory to operate, for business in general to make reasonable profits. But the government of a country does not exist simply for this purpose. It is not enough to make the wheels turn. Governments must lead mankind towards a greater satisfaction. The most basic aim of a democratic government is to help the greatest possible number of citizens, especially those who need it most, to improve their standard of living, to protect their personal freedom as long as they do not harm their neighbours, and to seek the happiness that security as well as recreation and cultural opportunities provide.

Obviously, those who are concerned about the future of our country are aware that the biggest problem Canadians have to solve is poverty within a wealthy country. This problem consists in distributing to the people all necessary goods and services it is possible to produce. I always thought I should take for granted that there is a social answer and that the rational process consists in identifying the problem first, then finding a solution and finally implementing this solution in a practical and sensible way while keeping in mind the basic characteristics of human nature.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the honorable member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Public Service—Suggestion salary increases for executive category approved at same cabinet meeting as control program approved; the honorable member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—External Affairs—Sale of nuclear reactor to South Korea—Request for debate prior to signing of agreement; the honorable member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Public Service—Suggested denial of right to strike—Government position.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there has been agreement among all parties in the House to proceed with order No. 15 and allow a 15-minute debate on it, to be followed by order No. 30, again with a 15-minute debate. At 5.30 the division bells will ring and if it is agreeable, we will, proceed to a vote at that time on both motions in sequence.

● (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, that is agreed subject to the following: I am prepared to waive my right under Standing Order 48(2) to close the debate within those 15 minutes. I will not reply.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES ON SUBJECT OF ABORTION

The House resumed, from Thursday May 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster):

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General and Ministers of Health of the provinces dealing with the subject of abortion and/or section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, today the House is to discuss the release of documents exchanged between the federal government and the provinces on abortion and Criminal Code section 251.

Once more, we see the opposition using that kind of motion to bring back to this House the basic issue of abortion. I regret that oftentimes indirect means have to be used to do what was agreed by all would not be done. Let us then say that if we are to give a meaningful answer to the question, we must limit ourselves to discussing the question of principle involved, that is disclosure of information.

This government proved quite clearly it wanted to move in that direction when in 1973, on March 15, guidelines were issued by Privy Council. Before that date, the situation concerning disclosure was that papers were published if and only if this did not embarrass the government. With the new guidelines, the government improved the situation by accepting a new set of rules. Any document requested should now be published, unless a basic reason prevents it. Before doing this, the government considered a number of factors and especially the desirability of giving as much information as possible to this House and the general public. However, and I hope colleagues from the other side will understand, in addition to pleasing the general public and quenching the thirst of opposition members, a government must first and above all govern. This involves basic rules to be respected, especially in the matter of federal-provincial relations.

A matter as crucial as abortion should then give rise to numerous exchanges of letters and discussions between the various levels of government. And section 4 of the guidelines issued by the Privy Council is categorical: "Papers, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of federal-provincial relations or the relations of provinces inter se, should be exempt from production".

Once again the opposition is making a further attempt to ask us, through a well-established and generally accepted rule—and I am sure our friends from the NDP voted for and readily accepted those guidelines—to ask us to discuss again by means of that motion the matter of abortion.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to establish positive relationships between the provinces and the government of Canada, I think we should stick in every respect to the 1973 guidelines of the Privy Council.

Finally I wish to raise a point with respect to the substance of the matter our friends from the NDP want to discuss, namely abortion. I believe the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was quoting one of his colleagues whom he deeply admired when he said that we should deal with that matter more rationally than emotionally, and on that point I agree with him entirely. And I wonder, without taking sides one way or the other, whether all those who boast that they can speak objectively on that question on the one hand, and come here with test tubes to show us what is a two, three or four month old foetus, and all those who, on the other hand, come and tell us it is the health, the mental and even sometimes the economical health of the mother which must be considered, I wonder whether those people are really unemotional.

I wish my friends opposite would agree to play the necessary mental game on that question. With so many pressure groups sometimes being insolent, and I mean it, when we are dealing with this issue, and sometimes with groups asking that we totally reject abortion, whatever the reasons urging any medical council to allow it, we should ask such groups whether they are for or against the death sentence. Usually, 90 per cent of them answer that they are for.

Then, if respect for life is an important matter, it remains just as much so for an unborn child who will indeed be born as for an individual who was born but who, due to bad training or education, has not received all the benefits society offers him.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the opposition will once again take good note of my message, namely that we do not do, and this is a good old legal principle, that we do not do indirectly what we cannot do directly.

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) had contributed to this debate in May last year. At that time, he had briefly stated the government position on the matter. Instead of going over his statement, I will elaborate a little more along the line of argumentation he used at that time.

First of all, I should point out that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), with his well known cleverness, has managed to turn this debate on the production of certain papers into a debate on the main issue. I do not intend to discuss the substance of the issue, that is abortion, but to state briefly the grounds which are the basis of the government position in asking the hon. member to withdraw his motion. Perhaps I should point out that since the motion has been tabled, the government has set up the Bagel committee which were instructed to investigate look into the application of section 251 of the Criminal Code in all provinces and report at an early date. The facts as reported by that committee will undoubtedly pave the way for a debate to throw more light on that important question, but the main issue on which we have to take a decision now concerns motion No. 15.

In this motion, the hon. member requests that all correspondence between the Ministers of Justice, the Attorneys General and the Ministers of Health of the provinces concerning the enforcement of Criminal Code section 251 be made public.

The question of the duplication of information by ministers of the Crown, as outlined by the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle), has been discussed several times in recent years. In March 1973, the President of the Privy Council proposed a set of guidelines on that vast question and, as a matter of fact, the whole matter was discussed later on by a committee of the House whose responsibility was to study statutory instruments.

Now, the motion refers precisely to the correspondence between the federal government and the provinces, which obviously falls under section 4 of the guidelines which deals with the refusal to produce government papers, the release of which might be detrimental to federal-provincial relations.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members are fully aware of the particularly complex and ticklish nature of federal-provincial relations. Obviously, in some cases, the prime objective of the government, namely to inform, must give way to other interests, of which the free and open exchange of communications between the federal and provincial governments. It cannot be denied that when information is intended for the people or public debate, its expression often takes a meaning or shading that differs from those that are important to the promotion and preservation of the elements of compromise and understanding, as well as open-mindedness, that are indispensable to a healthy balance in federal-provincial relations.

As pointed out by my hon. colleague for Chambly, Mr. Speaker, with all the perspicacity and intellectual sharpness he is known for, honesty and open-mindedness are truly indispensable requisites for good federal-provincial relations. It is always with an awareness of the difficulties which surround those conditions that we endeavour ceaselessly to give satisfaction to the people. The best way of doing this is not to disclose this kind of information we are talking about today at the risk of jeopardizing the good faith and mutual trust so valuable to ensure a lasting dialogue with the provinces.

On several occasions, Mr. Speaker, reference was made in this House to the Sweedish system of information distribution. The fact is that it provides for exceptions, and rather important ones at that. Which proves that it is not as exhaustive as it looks. Perhaps it would be interesting to quote from or—considering the time limit in this debate—simply refer hon. members to the evidence given by Mr. Donald Rowat, professor at Carleton University, before the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

It might also be noted, Mr. Speaker, that in the United States under the Freedom of Information Act this kind of paper and information also comes under exceptions to the rules of disclosure.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that for the Minister of Justice it is in the interest of hon. members as well as the public to disclose as much information as possible on government activity. But it is obvious that there must be reasonable limits to that rule—and, of course, "reasonable" is the operative word. Reasonable limits are those which allow the government to act with efficiency and in all security. Consequently, the exclusion of all intergovernmental correspondence of the type provided for in the motion is both a motivated and necessary exception. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member kindly to withdraw his motion.

● (1710)

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I might answer the last question first by saying I do not propose to withdraw the motion. Perhaps I should deal very briefly with the reasons.

The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) suggests that there is something the matter with the motivations of a member who brings forward a motion to release correspondence between the Minister of Justice and health ministers and attorneys general of the provinces. He says that this is an excuse to bring the subject of abortion into debate in this House. I categorically deny that.

There is every reason in the world why this government should not hide behind the cloak of confidentiality or the subterfuge of its affecting provincial-federal relations. There is every reason in the world why the public should know what the law is on this subject. In fact, right across this country the law is not being applied in a manner that is consistent. It is applied one way in one province and another way in another province. That is the reason I want to see what the Minister of Justice has been saying to his counterparts about this subject.

The hon. member for Chambly suggests that this is a back door way of getting a debate on abortion. Mr. Speaker, it is the government's responsibility to see that matters of national importance are debated in this House. That subject should have been debated fully in this House a long time ago. We would be a lot better off if it had been. We may then have seen some changes—maybe not changes that we would all like, because there are great differences of opinion on the subject. There seems to be a conspiracy of silence in this House not to talk about this question. It is long overdue that we should talk about it.

The other reason given by the parliamentary secretary is the effect on federal-provincial relations. In fact, the precedents are overwhelming of motions being agreed to and not withdrawn. I could go into a long list of matters where the correspondence has been released. It is past the time for this government to hide behind the cloak of secrecy and confidentiality. That includes the motion on CIDA that we are going to deal with after this one. Exactly the same principle applies. It is not giving the opposition the opportunity to do its job; this government continues to deny that right to opposition members.

I say to all members of this House, regardless of where they stand on the subject matter, that it is time they stood up and were counted and told this government to let us know what is going on.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): The question is on motion No. 15. All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): According to special order made earlier this day, the division on this motion is deferred until 5.30 p.m today. We will now proceed to notice of motion No. 30.

COPIES OF AREA PROGRAM SUMMARIES FOR 1972-75

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

That an order of the House do issue for copies of the Area Program Summaries for the years 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75, covering such areas as Commonwealth Africa, South America, Francophone Africa, and any other area breakdowns for which Area Programs have been prepared.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I want to review briefly the purpose of this motion introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). It asks that the government produce area program summaries of the Canadian International Development Agency for specific years. It is very clear that what the hon. member is asking for is not studies of what CIDA is contemplating or papers relating to delicate negotiations that it is carrying on with countries which may be helped by CIDA; what is being asked for are area program summaries of actual ongoing programs that have been funded by the House of Commons and for which members of parliament have a responsibility.

We want these papers because the CIDA budget is now $933 million for this fiscal year, and according to the intention of the government to follow through with the strategy of international development co-operation for the five years 1975 to 1980, our budget for CIDA will grow to .7 per cent of the gross national product. With normal escalation for the next fiscal year, the figure will go to over $1 billion. When that figure is introduced, I predict that the public will become quite concerned about how the money is being spent at a time of restraint in our society. It is not that we begrudge the normal escalation of the CIDA budget, but at this time it is imperative that we assure ourselves, as members of the public and as members of this House of Commons with responsibility for funding, that the money is well spent and that public support is maintained for the CIDA program.

Obviously, members of parliament cannot travel all over the world to look at 2,000 projects in 76 countries. It is just impossible for us to examine the effectiveness of those programs. But we need more than the publicity material put out by CIDA to make a judgment on the worthiness of those projects. We need a criterion of judgment to fulfil our responsibilities. We need to be able to assure the Canadian people that with respect to this large budget, which is going to get bigger—and I speak as one in favour of its getting larger—the money is being well spent. We need to have a criterion of judgment, and that is what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has sought through this motion.

We find, however, that there is a record of CIDA being rather closed in its disclosure of operating procedures. This fact concerned members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and the new subcommittee on international development. When the Price-Waterhouse management study was commissioned a couple of years ago, it was denied to members of parliament and particularly to members of the committee who had to pass the appropriations for CIDA on the ground that it was an internal matter. Last spring my request for papers relating to CIDA's five-year strategy was denied. Now my colleague is to be denied the area program summaries of ongoing programs. We must ask ourselves, why is CIDA refusing to give to members of this House documentation to which we have a right; documents we need in order to fulfil our responsibilities?

Mr. Paproski: They are hiding something.

Mr. Roche: Last March, the previous parliamentary secretary said, when refusing the motion, that the production of these papers regarding CIDA might be detrimental to the future conduct of Canadian foreign relations. That is an interesting statement. Not only was it rubbish, but it was not even supported by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) who spoke first in the debate last week on behalf of the government. He suggested that the area program documents are part of a whole and that they take into account historical and economic data relating to our programs in these other countries.

This is precisely my point, Mr. Speaker. Because these area program summaries are part of the whole picture of how Canada establishes programs in the first place, it is absolutely essential that they be made available to us in order that we may judge how these programs are actually working. I wish hon. members opposite would get their stories straight. Are we being refused these documents because their production would be detrimental to our foreign relations, or are they being refused because it is felt that members of parliament cannot be trusted with working papers to do with ongoing programs? If the latter is correct, namely, that we cannot be trusted, I can only say that it is absolutely ridiculous to come to members of parliament and ask them to fulfil their legal responsibilities by voting for money without giving them the information they need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Let me say a word about confidential matters. I am positive, and speak with some assurance, when I say that if the government or members of CIDA had come to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) or to me and said, "Look, these are the reasons why these papers cannot be brought into the House" we, as reasonable men, would have said, "All right." But they did not do this. CIDA has not told members on my side of the House why these papers cannot be brought forward. Therefore, we are forced to come to the conclusion that the production of the papers would be a source of embarrassment to CIDA and, possibly, to the government. That, of course, makes it all the more incumbent upon us to press for material which will enable us to fulfil our responsibilities.

I make it clear that I have no desire to hurt CIDA. I have no desire to participate in this debate in a partisan way. I do not want to hurt the ongoing program. Indeed, I want to help it. I know that the speech I am now making will be carefully read by the senior management of CIDA. I say to the senior management of CIDA that the way CIDA is presently being operated involves a certain element of risk with regard to the future of CIDA and, in the next fiscal year, to future programs of CIDA. I say this as CIDA treats members of parliament as people one cannot trust and to whom the organization will not give information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: The new subcommittee on international development is about to begin its work on the new economic order as passed by the seventh special session of the United Nations General Assembly. This, of course, is to be conjoined to Canada's own five-year strategy for international development co-operation. Never before in the history of parliament has there been greater need for a more penetrating and responsible study of Canada's role in international development.

I and other members of the subcommittee want to participate in a non-partisan way in the complete examination of everything involving our relations with developing countries, and CIDA is but one part of this process. We must be able to relate CIDA programs to the multi-dimensional strategy of the five-year program which involves commodities, trade liberalization and industrial co-operation. It will be impossible for this committee to work effectively unless it does its work in a good, non-partisan spirit based on information of what CIDA is doing and what its future plans are.

In conclusion, I say that CIDA is gambling; it is taking a risk. I suggest that CIDA is taking a reckless gamble; it is ignoring members of parliament who will serve on the subcommittee and who have a special responsibility to examine and support the government's five-year strategy. This, of course, is one of the most important things this government has done during the past year, even though the matter has not yet come forward for debate in this House. But it will be debated some time during the next few months. This work relates to the most important problem in the world, global survival. The question involves narrowing the gap between the rich and the developing nations.

Unless CIDA enables us to participate in a way which will allow us to contribute constructively to the government's policy, CIDA risks alienating public support for programs which it wishes to grow and become more meaningful. On our side of the House we stand ready to support those programs, but we will not sit here and be rolled over, as it were, by a government which refuses to produce necessary documents.

The parliamentary secretary suggested that there are reasonable limits governing the production of papers. I suggest that the government itself is transgressing those reasonable limits. We are being reasonable. We need those papers which will help us to do our job. We need them if we are to examine CIDA's programs. It is an organization we wish to continue supporting.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to thank briefly the sponsor of the motion, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), for the kind wishes he extended to me on the 16, when he stated why this motion was being moved. But I was somewhat disappointed when he offered his co-operation provided I would table the papers.

I will now offer him mine, provided he withdraws his motion in a moment. But before I deal directly with the motion, I would like to point out the inaccuracies—not to say unfair comments—voiced on the 16 and also the chafings suggested to me by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) a while ago.

[English]

On October 16, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), speaking in support of the motion requesting the disclosure of documents from CIDA with respect to the regional program, that is, with respect to the area by area summary of programs throughout the world, said things that are grave accusations. I wish to set the record straight and to correct some of his remarks, as I think it is important to do so. He quoted extensively from reports printed in newspapers, some of which had been printed as long ago as last January. That surprised me. I think the hon. member ought to have been more aware of the general level of CIDA projects. He should have kept pace with the changing world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. It being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to the special order made this day it is my duty to interrupt the debate and forthwith put the question on motion No. 15.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich)) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Leggatt) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock I do leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.07 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, I still have a few remarks to bring to the attention of the House and the government before bringing my speech to a close.

Having studied very closely the bill and the white paper, I must say that I have no confidence in the measures proposed. They do not attack the root of the evil. The bill does not say steps will be taken to lower interest rates or brake the exorbitant profits of our banking institutions. Now, on page 5 of the white paper, one can read as follows:

> As to profits and prices, the guidelines set a limit on the increases in prices in general, which is equal to the amounts necessary to cover the added costs.

Now, the interest rates will surely always be taken into account in the added costs. In the same chapter on added costs, no percentage is indicated, whereas percentages are given in other areas, in the area of incomes for instance.

The formula of contemporary economists proved a failure. Why would not the government take the trouble to study the means proposed by Major C. H. Douglas? He is a human being. He is an able man. He made considerable research. He submitted proposals. I think they are as good as those we witnessed. One can always at least take the trouble to consider them, to study them, to see whether they would not point to some element of a solution. The takeover of the emission of credit by the State is Mr. Douglas' first proposal. According to it, for the administration of public expenditures, states, governments should no longer depend on the will of those who control currency and credit. Mr. Douglas proposes that governments cancel the privileges which were given to the banks in the establishment of credit, as far as the emission of new credits is concerned and that these operations are reserved to an institution which would be exclusively controlled by the state and which would be to the benefit of the state.

Banks will continue to play the role they play today with a formidable accounting, nobody denies that, but at least they will be subject to a guideline issued by an institution which will have powers and which will enable the government to plan long term measures with financing means corresponding to our capabilities.

Second, he proposes to distribute a national dividend to Canadian shareholders as a means of raising their income without increasing prices. Then, it is the annual guaranteed income formula under another name if the Canadian people are given a discount, a return for their participation in the gross national product, which would be added to their salary without affecting prices. I think that a government worthy of the name should aim at establishing a certain standard of justice for the redistribution of wealth, so that the least privileged in our society may be at least ensured the bare necessities. This is one means of reaching that goal. Then we should provide a discount on the retail price of Canadian products as a regulator. It is the opposite of a tax.

Not so long ago, an hon. member was scoffing at this Douglas proposal. He said that it was misunderstood by everyone. But the discount formula on milk retail prices was understood and implemented in 1972. It gave results. If it did not take up too much of the House's time, I would quote figures that show that in each province, it was profitable for Canadian families which received considerable amounts. It was related to milk consumption. If a family consumed five quarts a day, it got five times the discount and if it bought only two, it had twice the discount. Then, it was a regulator. This regulator could also apply to all other Canadian products. This last measure would promote the consumption of Canadian products and therefore increase job opportunities in Canada.

Obviously, if we consume more Canadian products, warehouses will become empty, industrialists will be interested in producing more and they will hire workers. Automatically, this measure would fight inflation and also create more jobs.

In the past, Madam Speaker, when Social Crediters proposed this economic and financial philosophy of Major Douglas, the governments rejected it under the pretext that it would create inflation and unemployment, but this is no longer justified.

Now, we do not have a Social Credit government, but we have a debt-credit system, inflation and unemployment. So, we have inflation and unemployment but we do not have Social Credit. Inflation is not due to the Social Credit and neither is unemployment.

I hope that once and for all those who were not aware of it will find out that it has nothing to do with the matter. The system is deficient and obsolete, thus giving rise to inflation and unemployment. We must therefore make some changes.

Some people, because of their ignorance or their thoughtlessness candidly say that the Douglas system is a money printing press. We have often heard that, it is an old story. However, they forget that the present system is a tool to pile up debts and levy taxes. Why should we not restrict debts and taxes if we want to freeze something? Let us also freeze what hurts the Canadian taxpayers.

Therefore, a discount at the retail level would substitute cash purchases to purchases on instalments. Sales are made under pressure when the buyer is almost compelled to buy. This is the one of the evils we are now subjected to and I would like the government to take steps to control that evil which erodes the purchasing power of the people even before they earn a salary.

Pressure sales consist in selling people anything from automobiles to washing machines in an installment credit system. That means that the people as such do not have enough purchasing power to buy those goods on an installment credit basis. They are therefore lead, in a purely logically and inexorable way, to mortgage not only their belongings but also their future earning power. And it is just a matter of time until they can no longer fulfill their commitments, which means another economic collapse of our nation.

This is a matter of serious concern. People are lead through all sorts of means to run into debts to provide for current necessities. Finally, Madam Speaker, a bill should be tabled as soon as possible, a bill which would provide for a guaranteed minimum income to increase the purchasing power of lower income groups and to enable them to take advantage of the huge wealth of our country. I think such a legislation should be introduced as soon as possible to provide increased security for families. If we increase the buying power of people who really need it, they will feel more secure, and this would in my opinion help the Canadian economy get back on its feet.

Third, I consider the government would also be wise to find a new way of financing the public sector which has become a huge burden for Canadian taxpayers. Just look at the considerable increase in our national debt, in the debts of provinces and municipalities, and you will realize that it is a system which no longer meets today's needs and becomes more and more of a burden for taxpayers. Why should we have a nation of debenture holders and slaves rather than a nation of shareholders?

I never could understand that. I have always been astonished that because we work a lot, we sink into debt. It seems to me that in my family when we worked together we used to prosper, we seemed to get out of debt. But because we live together in our society, the more we work the deeper we get into debt! This is beyond my understanding.

We saw that the Plumptre Commission did not work. We got a lot of reports but none with constructive solutions. True, the board had no powers. Its role was to find out, to scrutinize, to visit retail outlets to see whether prices or profits were too high. It was only empowered to review. I said a number of times in this House that the board would have played a much larger part if it had had certain powers. Laws get into our books but are not enforced. If the board had had some teeth built into it, when it was time, maybe we would not be facing the current situation.

Another commission will be created under Bill C-73, and once more regulations will be issued without being submitted to Parliament. There is a gap in our procedures. I submit once more that regulations should be approved by Parliament or one of our committees. Almost every day we face problems with regulations that were issued under one statute or another, and very often we do not recognize the intent of Parliament in the regulations. Parliament's intentions are distorted, the regulations were made to fit the purpose of those who prepared the bill and submitted it to Parliament. They had different ideas than Parliament, and this creates problems. The bill also provides for the signing of agreements with the provinces. I fear this may give rise to new opportunities for the federal government to further centralize at the expense of the provinces, so I caution the government. We have had some of those agreements and because the central government proved to the provinces they were absolutely necessary, the provinces fell for it but later woke up and realized they had lost powers, which led to disputes. It will be remembered, for instance, that during the war the provinces, Quebec at least, yielded jurisdictional areas to the federal. That is what happened when Premier Godbout ceded certain rights to Ottawa. Quebec has been fighting ever since to recover the yielded rights and has much difficulty in succeeding.

Just one more minute and I am through, Madam Speaker. We shall not start another constitutional battle for all that! Time will tell. I also remember the famous wartime prices and trade board. I have not forgotten that companies got rich on the black market while people were rationed.

I would also suggest that consumers' associations be consulted and that members of those associations become members of the board. Surely they should have sensible advice to give, and this would be an additional guarantee for consumers as a whole. So, since it is wished to protect the consumers, let us give them a chance to be heard, to be accepted within the board, so that they can give their opinion and better protect their fellow consumers, often those who are the most exploited.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, we have before us Bill C-73, the so-called Liberal anti-inflation bill or the so-called wage and price control bill which, in the opinion of the New Democratic Party, is one of the most insidious pieces of legislation we have seen before this House in some time. It illustrates very well that Liberal members are without principle because it was only a few months ago that those same members, many of whom owe their election to that fact, argued very strongly against wage and price controls as put forward by the Conservative Party.

● (2020)

In the election last July the New Democratic Party opposed the wage and price freeze proposal of the Conservatives just as we now oppose the wage and price controls put forward by this Liberal government. This bill is unfair and unworkable; it is based on the wrong premise, and does not deserve the support of the people of Canada.

I should like to go into the reasons why we are opposing the bill. I would be interested to hear any Liberal member stand in his place and give the rationale why he opposed wage and price controls in 1974 and is now supporting his government in bringing them forward.

Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office in 1968 we have had a series of bouts with inflation, and mismanagement of the economy. The position has worsened since he and his government were returned in successive elections.

Between September, 1972, and September, 1975, the consumer price index rose by 33 per cent. In 1974 alone the consumer price index increased by 12.4 per cent. The dollar today is worth only 72 cents compared to five years ago. In response to that kind of inflation and mismanagement of the economy we have before us a so-called wage and price control program. I say this program is based on the wrong premise as to what causes inflation. We hear a lot about the rate of inflation but not very much about the causes. I should like to look at some of the chief causes and then examine this program to see whether it will be effective in countering inflation.

One of the factors that most economists will admit contributes to inflation is the changing role of large corporations in our capitalist or so-called free enterprise economy. Today we see large corporations amassing more and more power to the point that they are becoming near monopolies or oligopolies, that is, a few large corporations driving out their competitors and cornering the market.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Because they corner the market they are able to change the balance between supply and demand in their favour and are able to manipulate prices.

In the past competition or over-supply tended to reduce prices in favour of the consumer. But today what is the real difference in price between a Ford or General Motors car, or a Westinghouse refrigerator and a General Electric refrigerator? We begin to see that the large corporations are able to maintain prices to their advantage, and this happens with steel, automobiles, appliances, and to a large extent with the food retailing and manufacturing industries.

This is such a problem that even the Prime Minister and his free enterprise colleagues were forced to name a royal commission a few months ago to look into the problem of monopoly control of our economy. It is to be hoped that the royal commission will produce some constructive recommendations for controlling the monopoly power of big business. That is one cause—the ability of large corporations to manipulate and control prices, to maintain them artificially high in our economy.

The second cause of inflation is certainly government spending. We have had a number of record deficits under the Liberal government. We have seen millions of dollars, literally hundreds of millions, go to business in the form of tax incentives in the hope of creating jobs. What really happens is that the corporations automate and so do not create jobs. I am always intrigued by my friends in the Conservative Party who say "limit government spending" but who do not mention the amount of money that goes to big business without positive effects.

Then there is the expansion of money supply and credit. These are policies of this government which have contributed to inflation. It has got to the point where government spending results in 38 cents of every dollar of our gross national product being passed through government hands. A lot of this is legitimate and necessary, and I would not want to cut it back—I am thinking of old age pensions, family allowances and other schemes to help people on low incomes. At the same time we see government waste left and right, with hundreds of thousands of dollars spent on opening an airport at Mirabel, or on departmental functions such as Information Canada. There are tax concessions and handouts to corporations, and even deferred taxes amounting to some five billion dollars. Government spending is the second cause of inflation.

The third cause is the government's expansion of the money supply through our central bank, as well as an expansion of credit. This expansion has been in excess of the growth of production and, as a result, has contributed to the inflationary spiral.

One thing which the Liberals were offering as a cause for inflation in the 1974 election campaign was the cost of imported goods, but we do not hear so much about that today. In 1974 the claim was—and it is true today—that we cannot control the cost of food and other articles that have to be imported. The cost of bananas or coffee is beyond our control.

We have had to pay very high prices for energy. Because of the lack of a national energy policy the eastern part of Canada has had to import very expensive oil from the Middle East and Venezuela. The price rose from $2.80 per barrel to $12 per barrel in a few years, and so contributed to inflation. So, Madam Speaker, there are four general causes of inflation.

We must make it clear, however, that one thing that is not a cause of inflation is wage demands. It is a popular thing for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and certain newspaper editorialists to point the finger at working people and say their wage demands have caused the terrible inflation we have today. Anyone who takes the time to do an economic and statistical analysis of inflation in Canada in the past three years must conclude that such is not the case, and that wage demands have not pushed up the rate of inflation. As I mentioned earlier, the consumer price index rose by 33 per cent during the past three years but, Madam Speaker, wages rose by 36 per cent, or by just one more per cent each year than the rate at which prices rose.

● (2030)

A few weeks ago the Governor of the Bank of Canada admitted that wage demands have not caused our present inflation. Clearly, most workers were locked in by two or three year contracts. They were forced to accept the rise in prices which took place during the last three years while their wages were fixed by contract. In other words, prices went up before wages went up. It has been the actual experience in Canada that wage demands have always followed increased price demands. That fact is indisputable. Even the Minister of Finance last week during the debate admitted that workers' wage demands had not caused the severe escalation in the cost of living which we have experienced during the past three years.

It may interest hon. members to know that government of Manitoba representatives yesterday, at the finance ministers' conference, used figures compiled by Statistics Canada to demonstrate that since January 75 per cent of today's rise in inflation has been caused by price increases in the fields of transportation, housing, and food.

I admit that unreasonable wage demands can contribute to inflation, and can lead to the inflationary spiral. We oppose, as do others, unjustified wage demands which are not related to parallel increases in productivity or profitability of the company concerned. That situation is the exception in our economy and, as I said previously, the Governor of the Bank of Canada agrees.

The Liberals fought the 1974 election campaign on the theme that they were against controls. But it is interesting to note that in 1972 and 1973, when prices rose dramatically and, hence, profits—average company profits rose by 40 per cent and some oil company profits by as much as 200 per cent—the government did not impose selective price controls to dampen that inflationary spiral. Now, after inflation has got out of hand, the government has been pushed into a corner and has responded by bringing forward the present wage and prices control program.

The Prime Minister has argued that the inflationary psychology of workers, a psychology which has resulted from this government's inaction, is causing workers to demand high wages to catch up. Others are demanding high wages in order to insulate themselves from the inflation which will occur during their next two or three year contracts.

One also hears Liberal cabinet ministers arguing that inflation is caused by too much money chasing too few goods, that we are living beyond our means and that we must begin tightening our belts or in other words, that we must reduce consumer spending. And what will be the effect on the economy of reduced consumer spending?

The government can reduce consumer spending either by increasing taxes of individuals or by controlling wages. Either way the result is less spending money in the hands of people. This means they cannot buy as much, and you will not see too much money chasing too few goods. But when you reduce consumer demand, when you reduce demand for the articles people buy, you affect output. The factories will not produce as much, workers will be laid off, and unemployment will increase. That, exactly, is where we fault the government. It has not thought through properly the implications of the proposed wage controls. They will certainly reduce consumer spending and increase unemployment. And, with 700,000 Canadians presently out of work, unemployment now is bad enough. What is the government thinking? How our people will manage their affairs as we slide further into the recession which the present policy will make worse, I do not know.

The fact is that our economy is not overheated. We are in recession, experiencing our highest levels of unemployment since the great depression. Our manufacturing companies are not, I repeat, are not operating at full capacity. They are not producing all the goods they are capable of producing. For these reasons we say that the government's anti-inflation program is based on false premises, and that its failure to introduce selective price controls during the past three years when prices were running out of control has resulted in our present day inflation.

The present incomes policy which, supposedly, is to control prices but which, as I will demonstrate effectively, will control wages, will force wage earners to pay for the government's lack of policy to control rising prices during the last few years. Actually the Trudeau government will try to fight inflation by controlling wages. The question is: will controls on the scale proposed by the Liberal government work?

I suppose some Liberal members are listening with cynicism. Therefore I will quote one of their favourites, the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner). Only eight months ago he said:

> The experience of many other countries, most particularly the United States and the United Kingdom, suggests that broad and comprehensive wage and price controls not only tend to disrupt economic growth but over time do little to curb inflation and may, in fact, even aggravate it . . . It is an expanding economy that in time will enable us to grow out of inflation by providing the increase in real purchasing power Canadian families need to meet the increased cost of food and energy.

Clearly, eight months ago the former minister of finance argued that the sort of controls we are now contemplating will not, in the long run, control inflation, but aggravate it.

Some may say that the former minister of finance fell into disfavour, resigned his portfolio, and that therefore his views are suspect. For the sake of people holding those views let me quote the Prime Minister himself. On September 29 last he was interviewed by Maclean's magazine.

The interview dealt with wage and price controls, and their effectiveness. Answering a question, the Prime Minister replied that the essence of his position was:

> ... that controls themselves, whether it be a full freeze of control of prices and incomes, do not solve the underlying malaise of people generally trying to get more out of the economy than they put into it. If controls were a proper and effective device to change that psychology, I would say, well, it's easy, let's put on controls, then, one year down the road, we'll take them off and there will be no more inflation. But I think every experience that I know of, most recently the United States and the British experiences, are to the effect that when you take controls off you begin more or less where you were before.

So there the Prime Minister himself is saying that in the long run controls won't control inflation because once you remove them everybody feels they have the right to catch up.

We have a program we are told is going to last three years, and then the Prime Minister, on a great pilgrimage—crusade, I suppose he calls it—says maybe we will have the controls for only one year, that maybe we won't keep them on for three years. The man is contradicting himself left and right. I think it indicative of the way this policy was introduced, in haste, in confusion, with lack of proper planning and, as we are seeing now, with business, labour, and everyone else having so many questions which remain unanswered.

What is wrong, then with the Liberal wage and price control package? I have tried to demonstrate that, first of all, the guidelines are based on a false premise, that they do not meet the four causes of inflation which I have outlined, that the government is going at it in the wrong way. I think the second thing which is wrong with the wage and price control package is that it is unfair, and the third thing is that it is unworkable. Why do we say it is unfair? We can break it down into how it is supposed to control prices and wages. Take a look at prices first.

We find in the guidelines in the white paper and in the bill before us that there will be no direct investigation of price increases. Companies will not be expected to refer price increases to the Anti-Inflation Board. The board will rely on consumers or other interested groups or individuals to report to it what they think are unjustified price increases. In other words, the board is to rely solely upon the complaint system, and there are only 200 on the staff to handle the complaints which will be coming in. I think this is indicative of how dedicated the government is going to be in investigating unjustified price increases when it only has that many on staff.

We already know that telephone calls are coming in to the Anti-Inflation Board at the rate of some 500 calls a day. Even answering those calls will take months of delay at the rate things are going now. The government, then, is not going to hold the lid on prices by investigating every price increase or requiring companies to submit price increases. It is going to be selective. The government is only going to respond when the complaints come pouring in, if it can ever find its way to sort through all these complaints.

The most damning thing about how it is proposed to control prices is, supposedly, by controlling profits. In other words, the government will look at the profit picture of a given company and, if the profits seem excessive, then it may cause a roll-back in the prices. The problem with that, of course, is that you must wait for the end of the year for the financial report of a company to be available. So if there is a rip-off on a consumer item that rip-off will be allowed to continue throughout the whole year until the board has time to look at the annual report and then, a month or two months later after doing an analysis, makes a decision. Therefore the consumer does not have protection throughout the year.

Let us say, that, at the end of the year, plus time for investigation, it is found there has been injustice done by price increase. Suppose it is on a can of beans in a supermarket. How is the consumer ever to get a refund? Can you imagine that Loblaws or, say, Dominion, will have a store clerk standing beside the beans passing out a one cent refund if you bring in all your labels to prove you had purchased them at that store? It is absolutely ridiculous. In other words, the consumer will never get a refund. If an unjustifiable increase can be proved, any refund will come back to the government. Let us not delude ourselves that consumers are going to see an effective control on prices on a day to day basis. We also know that through accounting procedures, an accountant can manipulate profits shown in an annual report. This is done within the confines of our taxation law.

Fees to parent companies can be charged at a greater cost; transfer payments can be made; companies can put money away for future investment and label it as a cost rather than as a profit, in order to show at the end of the year that profit margins are very narrow. This can be done while at the same time increasing the cost of the various items on sale. One can never tell, just by looking at the profit margins, whether or not there was a justified or unjustified price increase.

We also find as we go through the legislation that the loopholes and exemptions which exist as far as price controls are concerned are numerous. First of all we have the provision that when costs go up prices will be allowed to go up. That, of course, is legitimate. But the point is: how will we know for sure that the actual cost of a product went up? Actual costs can be buried in all kinds of accounting procedures.

We also have the grand assurance of the Minister of Finance that if costs go down during the year prices will be expected to go down correspondingly. Well, I wonder if we can really place any confidence in that statement. Consumers will recall that only a year ago, when the price of sugar rose astronomically, one of the arguments the soft drink companies were using to justify the increase in the price of soft drinks was the increase in the price of sugar. They were even applying it to diet soft drinks which did not contain sugar. But we now know the price of sugar has fallen. Has the price for soft drinks come down accordingly? Not at all. I think that is indicative of the hope one should place in prices coming down should the cost of a product be reduced.

We also find in the legislation another loophole in connection with prices. Provisions are made that a compnay can exceed the profit guidelines in the legislation if it experiences unusual productivity gains. That is a phrase vague enough for any company to play with and manipulate, to show that its profit is not abnormal. There is no effective way in which this legislation, by looking at profits, can control prices.

Another exception is interest rates, one of the chief contributors to inflation. Interest rates and mortgage rates will be allowed to rise. Land prices are exempt from any kind of price controls, and we all know that the price of land is such a major component of the cost of housing today. Windfall gains by companies are also exempt from control. If a company experiences a sudden windfall profit, as the oil companies do when the price of oil rises sharply and they have large quantities of oil in storage, that profit is also exempt.

Energy prices are exempt too. The price of oil will continue to rise. That is the government's admitted policy. The price of natural gas was increased a week or so ago. The price of Canadian oil, which now stands at $10.50 a barrel, will be allowed to reach $12 a barrel, and we shall be paying more for gasoline and home heating oil. Utilities are exempt. For example, Ontario Hydro will be allowed its increase of some 25 per cent although, fortunately, with a minority government at Queen's Park the situation is under review. Rent controls are a matter for the provinces. We shall have to wait and see what happens there.

We have also learned that the legislation is supposed to control the profits of 1,500 companies which come under the guidelines. I have since heard that the department has miscalculated, and only 1,000 companies will come under the guidelines in this legislation. What I am saying is that there are so many loopholes on the price controls side of the legislation that, in effect, there will be no real price controls. Prices will rise, hence the cost of living and inflation will continue to rise. On that side of the ledger we say that the price control mechanism is unfair and unworkable.

The other side of the ledger is wage control. The government is implementing a three year program. The maximum increase allowed in the first year is 10 per cent. We have heard some estimates that in the second and third year the maximum allowed increased will be 8 per cent and 6 per cent, though that has not been verified. In other words, the wage controls will hit organized labour, the ordinary working person, the hardest. It is easy to control wages because they are negotiated under a collective bargaining agreement. They are above board and can be seen.

Built into this 10 per cent limit is a very unfair mechanism. At the low end of the wage ladder, workers are limited to a maximum increase of $600. It is not their right to get $600; that is the maximum they can get. You may be lucky enough to negotiate such an increase with your employer if you are earning $6,000 a year. However, if you are an upper income Canadian earning $24,000 a year or above, you will not be limited to $600, as the poor, low income worker is; you can get $2,400. We say that this kind of spread is basically unfair, that it is the people at the low end of the income ladder who need the greater increase, not those who have been able to make a high wage in the past. We think it would be more logical to reverse the situation and give the low income people a maximum increase of $2,400 and the high income people a maximum of $600.

Although you can control wages, Madam Speaker, how are you going to be able to control income from sources such as rents, dividends, interest, capital gains, and professional fees in the form of extras? If an executive gets through his corporation or big business enterprise an extra expense account, stock options, club memberships, or a free trip to Florida, how will this be taken into account under the terms of this legislation? I suggest it will not. Big companies will be able to find other ways of giving their executives benefits in excess of the $2,400, but the ordinary worker will be limited to 10 per cent under the guidelines.

Professional fees are controlled under the program, but the income of professionals is not. The doctor, lawyer, accountant, and architect can increase their total income, in the case of doctors and lawyers simply by seeing more clients, and these people will not be touched by the legislation. That is unfair. Upper income Canadians are treated much more leniently than Canadians of low income. A prime example of this is the mandarins in the civil service, the deputy ministers, who received a $6,000 increase just moments before the Prime Minister announced the new wage and price controls. What I am saying is that those who are not professionals but must bargain with an employer for an increase will have their wages fixed and effectively controlled. This program has obviously been conceived in haste.

There are thousands of workers across the country who have been caught right in the middle of negotiations with their employer. Suddenly the Prime Minister has announced this 10 per cent wage freeze. The Minister of Finance says they should continue bargaining and submit their contracts to the Anti-Inflation Board for final review. But what employer in his right mind will continue to bargain for anything in excess of 10 per cent? No employer will bargain seriously or in good faith because he knows he has the weight of the controls program behind him. Therefore workers who could legitimately show, because of increased productivity or for reasons of catch up, that they deserve an increase of 20 or 30 per cent, are now confronted by employers who say, "No, we have a new ball game, we have to start over. We are not going beyond 10 per cent". The government has thrown a monkey wrench into the conduct of wage negotiations throughout the country.

Let me cite the case of the postal workers as an example. The letter carriers settled for an increase of 36 per cent, I believe it was. Unless they receive exemption the postal workers will be limited to 10 per cent. Fortunately the government has built into the legislation exemptions to permit parallel wage settlements where there are historical relationships.

Let me take another case in point. The majority of the teachers in the province of Ontario have not settled their wage contract. In my riding of Sault Ste. Marie the elementary teachers have settled, the secondary teachers have not. Hence there is a great sense of frustration and inequity among workers caught in this situation. I should like to put on the record a telegram that I have received from the president of district 30 of the OSSTF. It reads as follows:

> ... should be a chance for public input in committee before it becomes law. Ontario teachers have had five years of provincial education ceilings and deserve appropriate catch up settlements. The federal program must exhibit good faith and equity. No wage controls without effective price controls. Out of 34,000 teachers 14,000 have completed negociations, 20,000 are then placed at a disadvantage. Teachers share a concern for inflation and will assist in the development of a program which would be fair and equitable to all in our society.

This is another illustration of how this legislation has been hastily and ill-conceived. Unless there are modifications to it and allowances made for historical relationships, it will not only promote bad feeling among different working groups, such as elementary and secondary school teachers, but will in fact promote injustice and unequal wage settlements.

Teachers in Ontario find their negotiating position has been further complicated by provincial legislation, Bill 100, which places certain time limits on negotiations. Many may be forced into a strike position without a concrete wage offer because this federal legislation conflicts with existing provincial legislation that the teachers accepted in good faith.

The members of the New Democratic Party are against this program. We have argued in the past, as we argue now, for selective price controls on key sectors of our economy, such as energy and certain manufacturing industries. We want tax cuts for people of low income in order to help stimulate employment and give them a break against inflation. We want to build more houses through a massive housing program which will provide adequate shelter for Canadians and get them back to work. In order to do that we must control mortgage rates.

In conclusion, we view this program as a failure even before it is implemented. It is a program that will not get at the root causes of inflation. The price control measures in it are ineffective. What will happen is that inflation will be fought on the backs of workers through effective wage controls. We say the program is unfair, unworkable, and does not deserve support.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the House is asked to consider Bill C-73 entitled: An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada. On second reading of the bill and on the motion to refer it to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I wish to take part in the debate due to the importance of this legislation and its serious unavoidable implications.

I have been sitting in this House for a few years and I also have some experience in the business world. Having heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speak on our national television network on Monday October 13 last, and after having examined Bill C-73, I must conclude that an experienced political observer soon realizes the instability of Canadian economic conditions and the serious course our country is taking by implementing such a policy.

Far away from me the intention of dramatizing the situation or of playing the alarmist by accusing everyone and making of them the scapegoats responsible for all the sins of the world and for all our problems. On the contrary, I want to make an objective criticism of the legislation while emphasizing the mistakes that may have been made. The recommendations that seem logical to me and the safeguards that I consider important, I will point out to the government.

[Mr. Symes.]

I would say at the outset that the government did not have any alternative. It had to do something. It could not let the economy follow any longer the course of events without risking irreparable injury.

Besides, I had already cautioned the former Minister of Finance about that and, I say it again, the present Minister of Finance. It is no longer possible for the government to sit back and wait for the problems to solve themselves one way or another.

Madam Speaker, the government has to realize several things and act accordingly. Even tough the proposed measures may be questionable—

I hope that at least the government is now determined to lead the way in the administration of the country and to take preventive measures, if it is still possible, instead of letting problems get out of control and finally, too late, bringing in solutions that lose some of their effectiveness because they are out of date by the time they are introduced.

In fact, it is mostly through its inaction that the government itself has produced this anticipation psychology making businesses proceed with maximum price hikes in anticipation of maximum wage raises and, on the other hand, workers demand the highest possible raises to protect themselves against price rises. It is the start of a vicious circle, that inevitably feeds the inflation spiral.

In other words, motivated by fear and the wish to take precautions, everybody is asking for more and more, while national productivity lags behind. Therefore, this simply could not last. And whether one is in favour or against the bill, one must at least recognize the merit of the government which is trying to do something to correct a situation which, admittedly, is not easy, and for which remedies are not quite so readily available as some may claim.

Mr. Speaker, history repeats itself. The 10 per cent inflation ceiling which is being applied as a means to control inflation is somewhat similar to what was applied in the United States 4 years ago, namely from December 1971 to January 1973. This is a sort of delayed escalation; in other words wages are allowed to increase at a rate inferior to that of inflation, even if they must be readjusted in case the rate of inflation increases too rapidly. A possible wage increase of 8 per cent, plus 2 per cent to keep up with productivity, is allowed, while the inflation rate is estimated at more than 11 per cent.

Even if circumstances have changed since then and if the economic situation is not what it was in 1971, it must be pointed out that after implementing a similar program for one year, the United States have succeeded in lowering their inflation rate by 2 per cent. If Canada could achieve comparable results within a year, which would reduce our inflation rate to 9 per cent, we could say that these measures have been successful in a first stage. What can be said against those measures is that they are negative in the sense that they do not cure the economy by stimulating it, but rather seek to make it hold longer. In other words, the patient is not cured, but an attempt is made to make his hospital bed more comfortable.

In that sense, what cannot be accepted is the fact that it does not solve the problem of the low-and average-income citizen. On the contrary: the gap between them and the more fortunate grows wider. Once again the small fry will suffer most, and have to pay the bill without being able to do anything about it. That situation is truly demoralizing for those people. The government must absolutely find a way to come to their help if we want that important group of our society to weather through the present crisis.

Anyway, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) pointed out that fact, with considerable logic, in the speech he just made in Montreal on October 20 before the Canadian Club of Montreal. I quote:

> The most intense demoralization is felt among the middle class, among this silent majority of wage earners who ensure the good operation of our institutions. They see their savings melt away, and the value of their stocks and bonds diminish. They are afraid of the collapse of currency which will reduce the value of their property.

I still quote the minister, Mr. Speaker.

> They are concerned about the recession, about unemployment and about their pensions. Inflation forces all of us to be concerned about ourselves.

● (2110)

> It gives rise to resentment. People realize that riches steadily flow from the weaker to the stronger without any consideration of merit, efforts or economic contribution. Inflation lets them see our economic system as unfair and leads them to consider our political system as sheer nonsense.

In fact, the government is establishing two different wage ceilings. One for the poor who may get a $600 increase for a yearly $6,000 income, below which the legislation will not apply, and another for the rich who can get a $2,400 increase for a yearly $24,000 salary. To me, this is sheer discrimination which will only widen the gap between lower and higher income people. We have heard all sorts of speeches in this House since the beginning of the week. We heard people say that the $600 wage increase for the have-not and the $2,400 increase for the richer will bring them closer together in the long run. I do not know where they get their figures from, but in my opinion those salary increases will only widen the gap between them. I think this legislation is merely discriminating. It is one step further away from the now famous just society which the government promised us a few years ago. It looks more like a well-organized injustice to the underprivileged.

It is even more true when you consider forecasts for the year to come, when prices will go on soaring appreciably, while income prospects are limited. The Food Prices Review Board for instance still predicts a 15 per cent jump in food prices during the year to come. If we put it in a concrete form, it means that the same order of groceries which amounted to $100 in 1971 now costs $141.20 and that its price might go up by 15 per cent in 1976-1977.

On the other hand, several problems have been left outstanding or have arisen following the announcements of the measures we are now dealing with. What will become of those who already earn less than the required minimum? Why was the matter of minimum wages not settled before those measures were implemented? How will the guidelines be enforced in the case of doctors, barristers, lawyers and other professionals to whom the guidelines seem difficult to apply? For instance, if a doctor earned $40,000 last year, will he close his office as soon as he reaches $42,400? What will become of those with two jobs or those who count on little extras to make both ends meet? Those are questions that we are asking and the minister will have to answer them in this House or before the committee.

We are very concerned about the efficiency of those measures because a few days after that legislation was announced, the consumer price index is expected to rise by 15 per cent. A 25 per cent increase for natural gas in Quebec and Ontario has been made public as well as a 20 per cent rise in Ontario Hydro rates. That is a first loss of control over prices and this situation could spread to other fields.

As for the price and income control board, it has two strikes against it already. First, the committee has no jurisdiction over importations which are an important part of our economy, be they Japanese television sets, Italian shoes, furniture from the United States, Korean shirts, European cars and what have you.

Second, the responsibility of the committee is already hampered because the importance of those measures will probably be minimized by the current changes. Moreover, 1976 is an election year in the United States, and if the United States government establishes a liberal fiscal policy, that could jeopardize any restrictive Canadian monetary policy and slow down the development of our economy. All this demonstrates that once again things are going too fast for this Liberal government.

Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not accusing them, but I am afraid that the measures contained in Bill C-73 have once again come a bit too late and do not strike at the roots of the problem. Everything started in 1967 when the government passed a law to allow banks to increase at will their interest rates. This was the start of inflation, the start of high interest rates, the start of interest on interest, of credit cards and unpayable debts for the nation and the individuals. This is the sad reality and it must be told.

And today, the action taken by the government is negative and very marginal since it does nothing to stimulate and balance the national economy. Yet, there are several effective things that the government could have done by gaining inspiration from us and listening seriously to the Social Credit proposals, and this in spite of what the young member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) may think. I listened to him recently in the House when he said that the Social Crediters were misunderstood. In passing, Mr. Speaker, what are the Social Creditors doing here if they are misunderstood by the people? I believe that I am well understood in the constituency of Richmond because I am always reelected. I am grateful for this.

Mr. Boulanger: Where are the other Social Crediters? There are none left!

Mr. Beaudoin: I must congratulate this new member for having had at least the courage to stand up in the House, but when he has more experience, when he knows better the practices of the House, when he has more experience of life and the business world, he will become wiser and will understand that when you make important decisions, it is always a good idea to obtain advice from everywhere, and particularly to take this advice in consideration. It is quite normal for a new member to wish to place himself in prominence in all sorts of ways, and we must understand him.

To come back to my subject, Mr. Speaker, the government should have provided immediately concrete action including first of all lower interest rates. And, on this matter, I agree with the senior economist of the CNTU who said, and I quote:

A 'major gap' in the program is that it skips right over interest rates and capital gains, two factors that indeed contribute more than their share to the inflationary spiral.

A large part of the problem is at that level, and the government wrongly played deaf when we told them over and over again for a long time to put an end to mushrooming interest rates.

Steps could have been taken in another area to stimulate the economy, and that is residential construction which provides work for hundreds of thousands of workers and countless supply plants. I do hope the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) will announce soon that he is extending his Assisted Home Ownership Program which offers $500 to first home buyers but I rather fear that he will put an end to all that on October 31. Yet, we should be thinking in terms of a fresh start and not forget that as construction goes so goes the economy. Besides there should be an immediate reduction in the abominable mortgage rate now in effect on new houses. It does not make sense to pay 12 per cent interest to buy a house, specially after the government starts controlling the wages of new owners.

In 1970, Mr. Speaker, an average single family house cost $13.42 a square foot in Montreal; in 1972, it cost $14.83 a square foot; in 1974, it cost $22.08; and in 1975 it is estimated that the cost will jump to $27.00.

Not only must the $500 federal grant not be eliminated but it should be increased and, in addition, mortgage rates should be brought down. In that respect it is worth pointing out that on September 10 the executive council of the Canadian Labour Congress urged the federal government to bring down to its old level the interest rate recently increased by the Bank of Canada, and subsidize low income people by reducing their mortgage rate to 6 per cent on the purchase of a house. I consider that proposal to be positive and logical.

On the other hand, the federal government should hold immediate discussions with retailers to establish a system of 15 or 20 per cent compensated discount financed through the Bank of Canada. This would give immediate results for the benefit of all, without any discrimination for once. Low-wage earners would benefit as much as the rich.

I am pleased at least, Mr. Speaker, that no one blamed the farmers for inflation in this debate. If this should happen, I would raise a question of privilege to set the record straight, because they are more victimized by inflation than anything else. I would like to quote a brief article that appeared in La Terre de Chez nous of 15 October last and has much to say about inflation. I quote:

What is the cause of inflation? The Faculty of Science of Wisconsin University computed the following figures:

Here I would remark these are U.S. figures, but financial trends in Canada have been largely similar during the last 30 years.

—between 1944 and 1974, from October to October, salaries went up from 1250 to 3600 per cent, sugar increased by 512 per cent, coffee by 337 per cent, bread by 300 per cent, steak by 296 per cent, lettuce by 258 per cent, postage stamps by 233 per cent, milk by 169 per cent, butter by 90 per cent and eggs by 31 per cent. The performance in Quebec certainly did not show that much difference. But remarkably, the items produced here such as milk, butter and eggs showed the smallest increases. The price of eggs even increased 100 times less than the salaries with which they are bought. Butter 40 times less.

I believe those figures are eloquent and speak by themselves.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we must admit it: we are experiencing, according to some analysts, apprehended hyper-inflationary conditions and we can expect major changes in our economic policy. The government has just created a review board, but the actual board should have been the government itself. It should have acted before today to prevent problems.

I hope that the economic advisors of the government did not attend the same school as New York City economists because in that case we can expect any thing! Anyway, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing I must emphasize: If we recall how federal taxes were temporarily introduced in wartime and have lasted all this time, we must say that for the government, there is nothing more permanent than temporary measures! And it may be the case with the legislation now before the House.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I suppose at this late stage in the debate we can begin to speculate about the government program, what inspired it, and what it was about the state of the economy that required these draconian measures, draconian certainly in the wage sector.

I scratched my head and told myself, first of all, it could not have been genuinely the problem of inflation because history has told us that these kinds of controls in every modern western industrial society do not work. I then asked myself, why then would this government be so interested in controlling the wage sector? Then I thought of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. If we in this country go ahead with that pipeline we will have to raise tremendous amounts of private capital, and one of the major ways to increase the amount of private capital available is to freeze the wage sector, but to leave alone the question of prices and, in effect, profits. Although the bill apparently attempts to deal with them, in effect you will see profits rise. The result will be, if the scenario is played out, that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline will be able to proceed partly as a result of this bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Ask them what will happen to the Indians.

Mr. Leggatt: I am saying this, as a bit of warning to the public, that before the next federal election I fully expect an announcement that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline will proceed and that it may very well attempt to proceed largely on Canadian capital which will be raised initially as a result of the wage freeze which will allow the private sector to expand ahead of the wage sector, thereby leaving additional amounts of capital available for the project. If I were Machiavellian I might have thought that that was behind it, but one wonders whether, as this government proceeds, it has in fact just stumbled into the Mackenzie Valley money. I do not know.

I notice with some cynicism that we on this side of the House should welcome this legislation with open arms because if ever an albatross has been hung around the neck of the government, it is this bill. This bird will shake around that neck, and ministers can move up and down, but no government in the western industrialized world has survived this kind of legislation, nor can this government survive it in the next election. I do not think it can, for the simple reason that it has opened Pandora's box. The government cannot put it all back together again now.

This reminds me of the story of the sorcerer's apprentice who finally discovered from the sorcerer the magic words. Once he said the magic words, a broom came to life and carried water in a bucket. This was amazing because when the apprentice did not have to work any more, he solved the problem of supplying water with the magic broom. But he forgot to learn the word that shut it off. What the government has done is to find the magic word on inflation—that is "controls"—but how will it shut the controls down in this allegedly free market? The government has opened Pandora's box but it will not be able to close that box.

I have no doubt that at the moment this program is superficially popular. I think there are people in the country who have not examined the program carefully and who are saying, "Thank God something is being done about inflation". Those of us who have looked at it can examine the bill and see that nothing is being done about inflation. If there is any effect at all, it will be extremely marginal if anything.

Some 75 per cent of our inflation is in three areas—rents, food, and energy. Controlling wages in these three sectors will not contribute whatsoever to the savings. First, in the energy area the wage factor is almost insignificant. In the rent area it is the cost of land that is driving rents high—the cost of labour is immaterial. A study was done recently regarding the cost of housing. A house in one end of the country and a similar house in the other end, belonging to people in the same wage bracket, were taken as an example, the first one in British Columbia and the second in Quebec. A house selling for $36,000 in Quebec sells for $55,000 in B.C. for one reason only, the value or the cost of the land. So the government has not tackled inflation in the rental area; it has not tackled inflation in the food area, and it has not tackled it in the energy area. By saying, as it does now, that it is the people who work in those fields who are contributing to major inflation it continues to duck the problem.

What we are going to have is a program which will in fact reduce our real national income and reinforce the misallocation of resources already distorted by a system founded on competition and greed. Controls will continue to contribute to massive unemployment and a massive recession.

I have a feeling that perhaps the government may have known what it is doing. We have speculated about the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Perhaps out of a feeling of frustration it said, "We have to do something to reverse the frustration and rancour building up in working Canadians as a result of many governments' ineptitude in dealing with serious difficulties in the economy." If this is the result of that famous contingency plan, if this is the result of hard research, I really wonder what we can expect from the program.

It was stated in the white paper that there would be 1,500 firms with at least 500 or more employees which would come within the ambit of the guidelines. In fact there are around 1,000 which come within the guidelines. There was a 30 per cent error in the research in the white paper when they named the major companies that would come under the controls. If that is an indication of the kind of research on which the government relies, it is a good indication of the effectiveness of the bill and of the way in which the government will carry out the program. There was a 30 per cent error in trying to identify the number of companies. It is quite ridiculous.

I think that the Conservative party can be forgiven for not having completed its homework when it rushed into the last election with an incomes policy. The Conservative party felt it was necessary, but being in opposition it lacked the human resources to articulate anything more than the bare outlines of the program. It covered itself, to its credit, by proposing an across the board freeze for a short duration which would be time enough for its members to get their hands on the expertise they had been led to believe would be found among the ministers and their deputies. They argued that a freeze would be brutal but rough justice. As their leader has since pointed out, it would pave the way for a more comprehensive program subsequently.

The government had no such excuse. Shortly after the last election it announced it already had a contingency plan, and it was poised to act at the right time. So the anti-inflation bill we are looking at is that plan, and I suppose that according to the wisdom of the government this is the right time, but some of us in this party are agonizing about whether the bill should be amended, improved, tinkered with, or whether we should try to plug holes here and there.

It is my view that the bill is not amendable because it deals with the fundamental principle of wage control without price control. No matter how much rhetoric we hear from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), it clearly places the blame for inflation on the working sector of the economy.

I wish to point out some of the clear inequities and some of the mechanics of the bill which would simply render it useless in terms of the price sector. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was in the House a few moments ago, but I see that he has gone. I believe it was in 1973 that his predecessor, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), introduced an anti excess profits bill which this party looked at with a rather jaundiced eye. Frankly, I did not think it was a bad piece of legislation, and I still do not. I think it may have been one of the more original approaches to excessive profits we have seen in this country, and I commend the former minister for bringing forward what I thought was a fairly interesting approach of selecting companies, examining them, and dealing with profits.

However, within that bill there was a provision which this bill does not contain. That bill contained a mandatory reporting provision for companies which allowed the board to determine whether they were taking more than their share in terms of profits. To the credit of the minister that bill provided that price increases should be telegraphed in. This provision was contained in clause 51(1),—the bill, by the way, was dated April 29, 1974—and it required that any company seeking a price increase must first notify the board. The board then had the opportunity to inquire into the proposed increase. If the board did nothing, the increase came into force; if the board on examination found that the company was taking too much, was raising its price too high or its profits were excessive, then the board would exercise control. There is no such provision in the present legislation. In my view it is completely essential for any meaningful price control legislation that the board have advance notice of the price increases.

Ex post facto regulations simply will not work. What do we do if a woman buys a loaf of bread, and seven or eight months later the board determines that Weston's, or whoever it was, had allowed that price to rise to an inordinate degree? First, we do not know who the woman is who bought the bread. The fact that there is a possibility of a fine—and I will deal with that because the likelihood of a fine is very slim—will not help her very much, her standard of living or her ability to support her family.

Without the necessity of telegraphing price increases in, we do not begin to tackle the question of price control. The idea that somehow this board will be able to monitor prices across the country simply will not bear reasonable examination. In the kind of complicated market system we have it is completely impossible for that to be effective. However, if it were turned around and all prices, before being allowed to increase, had to be telegraphed in, at least there would be the beginning of some sort of price control mechanism. The fact is that that floodgate cannot be opened just a little bit. We cannot say we will deal with these little sections of the economy after prices have gone up.

What will happen is that by next spring the government will be hanging its head because of the inequities which will naturally develop throughout the system.

We in this party have been receiving a lot of mail for a change.

Mr. Darling: In other words, you are the friends of the union. We haven't.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: It is coming by courier service.

Mr. Leggatt: The last piece of mail I received before the shutdown dealt with this matter, and I think it dealt with it in a rather poignant way. It said the following:

We all listened very carefully to the Prime Minister's speech, as well as to Mr. Barett.

This letter obviously came from British Columbia.

We think it is a good move and would like to give our views.

Would it not be more fair to scale the wage demands, like: people making up to $10,000 may ask for 15% increase, from $10,000 to $20,000 may ask for 10%, from $20,000 to $30,000 may ask for 5% and all over $30,000 should set a good example and not ask for any increase?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: The letter goes on:

If the average Canadian realizes that their leaders, business bosses, etc. tighten their belts, you can be sure they will follow.

The country and the Canadian people are beautiful, that's why we decided to become part of it. We would not like to see it destroyed.

The members of this family put their finger on the basic problem behind any kind of control system. There has to be equity and fairness; there cannot be a control system where the rich get ahead on the backs of the poor. If we examine this system we find that the poor will become poorer and the rich will become richer. The rich will fight inflation on the backs of the poor. That is no system by which to develop a consensus. We cannot expect to pull society together, to make people feel as one, as Canadians fighting inflation, when they look around and see a $36,000 carpet in the parliamentary restaurant and subsidized parliamentary meals.

There is nothing in the bill which touches one of the real problems of inflation, which is the credit card philosophy in this country. When we go into a good restaurant we find that a large percentage of those who are eating there are eating on expense accounts. The manager of the restaurant knows his patrons are passing the charge on to their employers, and so the price of his product goes up and there is no resistance to it. The man down the block who runs another restaurant may not have as many expense account customers, but when he sees steaks selling for $10 he figures he can get $7, and then the next man further down who might be selling for $5 raises his to $7. That is not price push, it is price leadership, and it goes all through society. This bill does not tackle that problem.

There is 18 per cent interest charged on credit card accounts, and people have the idea that they can buy anything they want any time. This is one of the major features of inflation, and one of the major reasons for the permissiveness and softness being developed on the Canadian scene.

Someone quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) earlier as saying that the underlying malaise is people trying to get more out of the economy than they are putting in it. I am convinced that is part of our problem. It is a deep problem, a philosophic problem. We are becoming a soft, permissive society, but people are not strengthened by being told to reduce their level of consumption, to pull in their belt exactly one inch. That way the fat man is still in great shape but the man with no room left on his belt collapses from hunger.

We are not being equalitarian in the way we are producing this bill. We are rewarding the rich and penalizing the poor, so there is no reason for the poor to get behind the legislation. If the maximum were made $1,000 across the board that might tackle some of the problem. If the salary rate increase for members of parliament were limited to $1,000, and also to $1,000 for everybody else, that might start to deal with the problem, but we should not expect the Canadian people to develop a consensus of something that is so inherently unfair.

I want to say a few words now about the bill itself because I have had some experience in the law, and this bill is a lawyer's dream. It is a beautiful exercise in the granting of discretionary power. Basically it provides for a board to be set up and allows it to do almost anything it wants—not by legislation but by order in council.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or not to do the thing it does not want to do.

Mr. Leggatt: So in spite of the fact that we are all talking about certain guidelines referred to in the white paper, there is nothing to stop the board, within a week or two, or three weeks, from changing those guidelines entirely and bringing in a whole new program. It could be a program which would not be subject to scrutiny by this House, or which would do absolutely nothing in terms of allowing members of parliament to exercise judgment on whether the guidelines were fair or not.

It is the kind of sweeping power that I thought we had departed from following World War II when most of those involved in law welcomed the return to sanity in legislation. It was almost impossible for people who practised law during the war to find out what the law was. All sorts of people could be pushed around and their rights taken away. This bill will be the beginning of a return to that kind of arbitrary democracy, something that those who are concerned with individual freedom and rights have every reason to challenge.

In clause 44(1) the bill provides penalties, and the press has made a great deal of the fact that people can get up to five years in jail for an indictable offence. Let me read the relevant parts:

> 44. (1) Any person who,
> (c) wilfully, in any manner, evades or attempts to evade compliance with any provision of this act or an order made by the administrator—

Wilfully is a very interesting word. It means that if you are going to put Mr. Weston in jail you have to prove that Mr. Weston wilfully broke the guidelines. Anybody who has done defence work will tell you that in a matter as complicated as setting prices and trying to relate them to unit costs it is almost impossible to establish mens rea. In fact the defences are so voluminous we could spend the rest of the night on them. The first question is: did he know what the cost of the product was? I doubt it. I doubt he knew all the elements in the cost of any particular item. You could make it a capital offence under this, but it would not make any difference. Five years is meaningless, yet we see newspaper reports to the effect that this bill is tough. It is not tough, it is just unenforceable.

I want to talk for a moment now about professional fees because I have had some experience with them as well. I do not make any apologies for lawyers who charge high fees because they work very hard for them. Anybody who suggests that controlling the minimum schedule of fees which lawyers charge will control their incomes does not know anything about the practice of law. If I were in active law practice this bill would not bother me, and it will not bother anybody else in that profession regarding the amount of income they can earn.

Mrs. Sauvé: What if he works doubly hard in that year? Answer that.

Mr. Leggatt: The lawyer has total control over his charges. His hourly rate can be based on the value of the work. Most real estate conveyancing in this country is based on a percentage of the value of the real estate. As the inflationary factor in the country affects the rising costs of houses and land, the lawyers just make more and more money. Their incomes are not going to be affected by this bill. They are getting off scot-free, but the poor are controlled. There is no way to control professional incomes successfully. Lawyers can even get around taxing off.

Mrs. Sauvé: I know how that can happen. You don't have to tell me.

Mr. Leggatt: I thought you would not mind hearing. It is quite simple. If you try to tax off a lawyer's excess income he incorporates a private company and funnels the income into that company. Clearly the sort of company I am talking about does not come within the guidelines, because it is small and because there are no employees. The result is that lawyers will not be controlled at all by this legislation.

● (2150)

An hon. Member: Tell us about the doctors.

Mr. Leggatt: The guys who work in the mill are controlled. I do not want to be too hard on my profession.

Mrs. Sauvé: We know all about lawyers. Deal with somebody else.

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, let's deal with the doctors.

Mr. Leggatt: How are doctors to be controlled under this bill? Doctors will face difficulties. If the bill attempts to control medical fees, but not medical income—and I suggest that this bill will not control income—doctors will pack twice the number of people into twice the number of waiting rooms and cut in half the time spent on each patient. That will be the result if we do not control doctors' incomes. As things now stand, you will affect only the quality of medical service provided to patients.

Mr. Peters: You will lower standards, and that's terrible.

Mr. Leggatt: It is interesting to compare figures. We talk about the inflationary effect of the horrible demands of the postal workers, who allegedly want 71 per cent over three years.

An hon. Member: What do you mean, allegedly?

Mr. Leggatt: All right. They want 71 per cent. But I tell you, the majority award provides for about 14 per cent a year over three years, a percentage which is only slightly larger than last year's inflation percentage. Clearly, suggestions that postal workers are to get fantastic increases are ridiculous. I think the offer is modest. Actually I think the postal workers will accept it, because they happen to be public spirited people like the rest of us here.

An hon. Member: That's why they are on strike.

Mr. Peters: Mackasey's the reason.

Mr. Leggatt: The Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) is the reason for the strike. If the Postmaster General did not insist on seeing his picture in the papers three times a week, and on being on three television shows a week, there would not be a strike. But he wants public bargaining in the public service. I am amazed that the strike has only now begun. I thought the strike would take place at any time during the past year, and every time the postman came to my door I was surprised. Every time I read the newspaper I was told that the strike was imminent. When I saw the postmen I said to them, "Are you not on strike?" They said "No, we want to continue delivering mail." Judging from what you read in the papers, a Post Office strike has been in progress for the past two years. But that is not so. The mails have been delivered.

An hon. Member: You couldn't tell that by the deliveries we have been getting.

Mr. Leggatt: My mail delivery has been good.

An hon. Member: No drinking in the House.

Mr. Leggatt: I assure hon. members that this is the purest water you can get from the tap.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): His name isn't John A. Macdonald, you know.

Mr. Leggatt: Although the postal workers asked for 71 per cent over three years, the award is for 14 per cent a year, which is not particularly generous.

There is something we forget about postmen, something people do not often mention. My dad worked in the Post Office for 36 years. He was proud of his job. He knew all the routes in the community. His work as a postman was challenging, and he worked hard in the postal service. Now, because of the increasing introduction of technology, there is every reason for people in the Post Office to be concerned. Increasingly, Post Office jobs are becoming more boring. The workers are being told to push buttons. Their jobs are becoming more mundane, more boring, and they are mad about it. How would hon. members feel if they were no longer asked to make decisions or exercise judgment, but had to sit here and do nothing?

An hon. Member: That's nothing different.

Mr. Leggatt: It seems to me that the problems of inflation and problems in the Post Office are related. This is not a one-way street. The people in the Post Office are entitled to some dignity. They are entitled to negotiate changes in their working conditions, changes which are negotiated in most industrial sectors. I do not support everything that has happened in the Post Office. I do not think the Montreal situation is good, just as the Post Office does not think it is good. But I do not think it is right to precipitate a strike in the postal service to solve it. Let labour solve its problems itself. The labour movement will do it. The government is not going to do it. You will merely turn these people into martyrs. The labour movement is getting behind them, and I do not think we are adopting the right approach. As I say, there are problems in the Post Office; there are particular difficulties in Montreal, but I submit the government is going about their solution in a wrong-headed way.

Let me return to my theme. I was diverted. I want to deal briefly with an interesting article Walter Gordon wrote in the Toronto Star of October 13, dealing with wage and price controls. In that article he took the trouble to examine oil company profits during the past four years. Apparently between 1970 and 1974 the profits of Imperial Oil increased by 176 per cent. Poor old Gulf made only a 313 per cent increase in the same period, and Shell Canada increased its profits by 178 per cent. Compare that with the 71 per cent the postmen are seeking. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SUGGESTION SALARY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY APPROVED AT SAME CABINET MEETING AS CONTROL PROGRAM APPROVED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, this evening I wish to pursue the question I raised this afternoon with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the timing of the formal and final approval of salary increases for senior civil servants. May I go over the sequence of events?

This afternoon the Prime Minister suggested that the Lambert report was presented to cabinet on March 31 and accepted by the cabinet on July 24. That general approval and acceptance by the cabinet led to the reference of the proposed salary ranges to the cabinet committee. The cabinet committee studied these salary ranges and slotted individuals into those various ranges between that time in question and two weeks ago.

When the Prime Minister responded to my question in the House he said that the final approval given to increases for deputy ministers did not coincide with the cabinet meeting which approved the guidelines affecting all Canadians in this country. The Prime Minister had said that he thought that probably in August not a great deal of work was done, and that the whole matter was carried out between August and two weeks ago. He was referring to the slotting of various individuals into the various salary ranges agreed on and approved by cabinet in its July meeting. Therefore, until two weeks ago the cabinet committee was apparently slotting people into those various salary ranges.

Two weeks ago it was October 9 or thereabouts, and if I take the Prime Minister literally, on that date and thereafter Treasury Board minutes were signed formally ratifying salary increases of deputy ministers. It seems to me that on October 9 the cabinet had already reached a decision to impose wage and price controls on Canadians. At the same time they were giving final and formal approval to the huge increases deputy ministers were about to receive. Some of these increases in the top range are as high as $6,500.

The Prime Minister argued today that the average increase is only 9.3 per cent. But I ask: on what incomes, to begin with? They are incomes ranging from $27,000 to $60,000. As I said, some civil servants have been granted increases of $6,000 or $6,500. This is an increase which is well in excess of the $2,400 limitation imposed on all other Canadians. I do not think this is right. I do not think it is morally right or fair.

I charge that the Prime Minister today was evading answering the question I put to him. I have a source very close to the Prime Minister that tipped me off this morning saying in essence that when the cabinet met for one of the last times before the Prime Minister addressed the nation on October 13, it approved the guidelines he announced, and then turned to some household or routine business, which was the formal ratification of the increases for the deputy ministers. I put that question to the Prime Minister and he said no, it did not occur at the last cabinet meeting. But I suspect, from what I have picked up since, that those increases were, in fact, formally ratified by a cabinet committee, by Treasury Board, and perhaps it took place as the cabinet agreed to apply controls to all other Canadians.

I then asked the Prime Minister whether he would table those Orders in Council, and he replied that the House would eventually see them. I found out later from a reliable source that the authorization had probably taken the form of Treasury Board minutes and that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) is not going to make public either the date or the contents of those minutes. I ask why he doesn't do that and I suspect, from what we have been hearing, and from what someone in the Prime Minister's Office said just today, that they were all ratified in the last two weeks. I can understand the Prime Minister saying, "Well, the authorization was given in July, we farmed it out to a cabinet committee, we didn't really expect controls would be coming into effect." But the Prime Minister left himself open on that point.

He said in the House today that back in July "we were in a sense anticipating the guidelines" and as a result they kept the average increase down to 9.3 per cent. For God's sake, Mr. Speaker, if they were anticipating the guidelines at that time, why in the devil did some of the increases go over $6,000? Why did they not anticipate the ceiling of $2,400 at that time?

So they farmed it out to a committee, and the committee's job is to slot various civil servants into various salary ranges; there was a summer recess so all the work was done in September and was completed two weeks ago on October 9. By that time the cabinet knew the guidelines. It had ratified the guidelines affecting other Canadians and it could very well have instructed that deputy ministers should obey the rules set for everyone else. Yet here is a government which has imposed guidelines on janitors, clerks, waitresses and lower echelon workers and which at the same time is having Treasury Board minutes signed putting into effect some of the salary increases to be enjoyed by deputy ministers.

In the House today the Prime Minister admitted that the slotting was not finished until October 9, two weeks ago. Obviously the Treasury Board minutes were not signed making it formal. We have sources in the PMO which have said this is the case. I do not want any evasive answers from the parliamentary secretary tonight. I want him to respond to my questions. Will they make public those Treasury Board minutes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nystrom: If they do that there will be more co-operation from the public—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nystrom: —and the control program that the government is imposing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in raising this point has very carefully chronicled the sequence of events. The advisory committee on executive compensation looked at the performance of the people concerned in the period between April, 1974, and April, 1975. Recommendations were made to the cabinet early this year. These recommendations were approved on July 24 by the cabinet. The process of implementing the decision which was approved at that time by the cabinet is, as was indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a somewhat cumbersome and time consuming procedure. It involves a review of individual performance, slotting of individuals within the various ranges indicated, and this procedure was completed prior to the adoption of the guidelines by the cabinet.

Mr. Nystrom: The P.M. said two weeks. Check his words.

Mr. Francis: The government's policy in the circumstances is to follow the usual procedures regarding tabling of documents, procedures that have prevailed in every other instance, as indicated by the Prime Minister. I can only repeat that this is the sequence of events and that the documents that were produced by cabinet were prior to the adoption of the guidelines and they implemented a decision of July 24.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—REQUEST FOR DEBATE PRIOR TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last December the Government of Canada authorized Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to negotiate the sale of a CANDU reactor to South Korea. We were told that safeguard arrangements would ensure that Canadian supplied nuclear material would not be used to produce nuclear explosive devices. But we were not told what these safeguards were. We will only learn these, perhaps, when the agreement with South Korea is tabled in the House after the fact.

The government is bent on a course of madness. A cloak of morality has been thrown over this madness. That cloak must be ripped away and the nuclear sale to South Korea exposed and stopped before it is too late.

Thanks to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) unappealing speech to the Canadian Nuclear Association it has suddenly become moral, even obligatory, to share nuclear technology with the developing world. Of course the Prime Minister has worked to achieve a foolproof inspection system to guarantee against nuclear bomb proliferation. The point is that we do not yet have an internationally recognized foolproof system. We have to rely on the good faith of recipient countries that they will not abuse technology. Already South Korea has expressed reticence about Canada's tougher countrols, doubtless slowing down the agreement. Even if South Korea accepts Canada's term there is no guarantee that future governments in that military dictatorship will not abrogate or evade them.

The point I wish to emphasize is that it is folly verging on the criminal to assume that Canada will be able to impose the additional bilateral safeguards it desires. General E.L.M. Burns, respected head of Canadian disarmament teams for many years, warns us against nuclear sales to governments that are autocratic and not stable. If the military in South Korea think they should have nuclear weapons, he says, "no inspection agreement is going to stop it".

In effect, General Burns feels that the government's duty is to do nothing which may lead to the proliferation of nuclear weapons and that this obligation, which is explicit in Article III of the non-proliferation treaty, takes precedence over Canada's desire to assist, through nuclear technology, the underdeveloped nations of the world.

It is true that the CANDU reactor itself is safe in that it cannot be turned into a bomb. But the spent fuel from the Canadian reactor, when reprocessed in the proper way, can produce a bomb. The French have been exporting this very process, and South Korea has recently purchased a $50 million reprocessing plant from France. Moreover, President Park of South Korea has stated that his country will be obliged to develop nuclear weapons if U.S. assurances of nuclear protection against North Korea are ever withdrawn.

How much more evidence do we need to realize that any agreement with South Korea will not be worth the paper it is written on? At the very least, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said some months ago in the House, there should be a moratorium on reactor sales, pending agreement on foolproof safeguards by the six nuclear exporting nations.

Instead of making a quick buck from South Korea under the guise of morality, Canada ought to be leading the way in strengthening and expanding international co-operation in finding safeguard agreements. This work is imperative since by the end of this year there will be 650 nuclear reactors operating in 38 countries. It is precisely because of our superiority in nuclear technology that we must put statesmanship ahead of salesmanship.

[Mr. Roche.]

Finally, I plead with the Canadian government to stop and look at what kind of government we are dealing with in South Korea. It is one of the more repressive regimes on earth today. The Park regime is accused by international observers of economic injustice, corruption, and increasing violation of human rights.

An Amnesty International mission to South Korea said this:

> The mission found torture is frequently used by law enforcement agencies both in an attempt to extract false confessions and as a means of intimidation.

There are also reports of cruel and arbitrary punishment in military life.

Other secular human rights groups have criticized the regime, including the International Commission of Jurists and the International League for the Rights of Man. The World Conference of Religion for Peace has publicly expressed its deep concern about the political repression in South Korea, especially for those who, out of their religious conscience, have expressed their stand against the violation of human rights by the Park government, and who are now in jail. This is the administration the Canadian government says it will trust. What a distortion of morality we are sliding into; what madness!

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my answer on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), I would first of all enlighten his personal judgment concerning the government of the Republic of Korea. His judgment may obviously not be shared by other Canadians whose values are not the same as those of the hon. member. I must ask who are we to pass judgment on political systems under which other people choose to live. That has not been the major line of thought in our commercial dealings with other countries, particularly as regards the sale of nuclear reactors.

[English]

We have attached great importance to that sort of dealing with another country, and no Canadian can question the seriousness of our approach to any international binding agreement.

The Republic of Korea has never abrogated any international agreement it has concluded. We know also that the Republic of Korea is a party to the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty whereby it has undertaken an international treaty commitment to the international community not to develop any nuclear explosive devices, and under the same treaty it has placed its entire nuclear program under the International Atomic Energy Agency.

May I just conclude by saying it is well known to my colleague opposite that it is not the international practice to table treaties before they are signed. They are made public after the text has been cosigned by the governments concerned. I should like to make very clear that the Government of Canada is, with the rest of the international community, trying to find better ways to ensure that nuclear devices are used for a pacific purpose only.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SUGGESTED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in the seven minutes given to me tonight I want to lay before the government again my view on the right to strike in essential services. I think it is very appropriate that this question be placed before the government at this time when we are again in the midst of a national strike by a union which provides an essential service to the people of Canada.

In 1967 when the right to strike was given unions in the public service the principle argument used was that this was a civil right which was given to other groups in labour, and that the public service should have the same civil rights as labour anywhere else. However, I think bitter experience has shown that we must ask tonight whose civil rights need protection. I seriously question whether it is not the people of Canada whose civil rights need protecting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, since I was elected to this House in 1972, not too long ago, my experience is that we have had to legislate the grainhandlers back to work, we have legislated the railroad workers back to work, and I am confident that before too long we will legislate the postal workers back to work.

What is the scenario? We see workers in essential services calling for a strike. It is carried over the media that a strike is imminent. Everybody gears up to it and battens down for the occasion. The first thing the government does when asked how it will solve the strike is to express pious support of the right to strike. Once having expressed that support, the government lets the strike go on. After it has been going on for a while the government realizes that it is an emergency, that it must do something, and then brings in back-to-work legislation. We have had that experience. As members of parliament we become the conciliation and arbitration board as well as the body which sets the wages. At least this has happened in the past.

Whether or not the government says it is committed to the right to strike, in actual fact it breaks that very principle which it espouses and to which, it says, it wants to hold. It is a charade. Tonight while the people of Canada are in the midst of a strike in another essential service, they are sick and tired of the charade. They do not want it any longer. They are saying to the government that they do not want to be held ransom to unions, and will not negotiate with an economic pistol to their heads any longer. There are many people saying today to the government, and to the representatives opposite, that if the postal workers want to go on strike and hold us for ransom then so be it; they can go on strike and stay there.

We might take a look at some of the union leadership we have seen in the last few days by people such as Messrs. Davidson and Parrot. If this is union leadership then no wonder we are in trouble because it is hardly responsible leadership. These people have done immeasurable harm to the working people of Canada who are deserving of pay, but who do not want to have that type of leadership so far as they are concerned.

Mr. Francis: From their own unions.

Mr. Epp: Precisely.

● (2220)

The question then comes back that we want to pay for people who are giving us essential services. I believe that when a person enters the public service he enters it slightly differently than if it were the free market place, and his prime consideration should be to give service. As taxpayers we want to pay for that service, but the prime motivation must be service.

I am saying today that many of the union leaders have lost that motivation. Today all they are looking at is how much they can get out of the grab bag. Today we should ask the question: should those who are in the public service and do not want to go on strike, and do not want to exercise that right, have the right to work? I would like the government to express its views on this. I say the time has come when Canadians demand that the government get off its backside and say what is its position on strikes in essential services, whether it is committed to a process to bring those services back, to bring back productivity in the public service where small groups, who are supposedly in the process of exercising their rights, will not be allowed to take away the rights of other Canadians to make a livelihood and to carry on their own businesses.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) has raised a question concerning the present postal strike.

The Public Service Relations Act provides public service employees, through their bargaining agent, with the right to select a dispute settlement method. There are two: binding arbitration, or the conciliation strike route. The employer has no involvement in the selection process.

Parliament having granted to federal employees the option of the conciliation strike method for dispute settlement, it would be wrong to assume that some employees on occasion would not choose this recourse.

On balance it can be said that the federal government has a most favourable record in terms of the number of strikes which have in fact taken place. Over 300 collective agreements have been signed since collective bargaining was granted to the public service, and there have been 11 legal strikes.

It is not the government's intention at this time to bring forward general legislation which will deny public servants the right to strike. Parliament will, of course, always reserve the right to review specific situations in order to protect the public interest.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON THE DETAILS OF CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF MIRABEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the extraordinary expense to Canadians because of this grandiose, and semi-obsolete in design, airport at Mirabel, the opening of which has been mercifully delayed following the official opening which featured champagne and lobster for the VIPs and tear gas for the local farmers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That the Minister of Transport, in view of the importance of the situation, make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity and appear in the same way before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to deal with the many apparent difficulties in the operational capacity of Mirabel such as the problems and deficiencies in the electrical, plumbing and heating systems and to state unequivocally that he as Minister of Transport has been fully briefed on all details relevant to operational reliability for passengers and equipment as well as employee safety and the purchase and appraisal methods and procedures involved in acquiring land for Mirabel which contains some interesting details, and perhaps the most fundamental of all, that the runway conditions and standards are acceptable by ICAO as set out in Annex 14.

PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE STUDY APPOINTMENT OF OMBUDSMAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a crucial matter.

Considering that the protection of the citizen must be the basic concern of any government, that this basic concern for civil liberties must be evidenced in more tangible terms and that the federal government does not sufficiently endeavour to determine the best means to provide the citizen with the best protection in its relations with the latter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

That this House take the necessary action to consider the possibility of creating a position of ombudsman to improve the protection of the citizen in its relations with the state.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF CHEMICAL ADDITIVES TO FOOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that as many as seven per cent of North American children are thought to be suffering from hyperactivity, and in certain areas the figure may reach 40 per cent; and in view of the fact that not only is hyperactivity a serious social and learning disability for the child, but it often leads to delinquency in the teenager and crime and violence in the adult; and in view of the fact that scientific research has established a casual relationship between hyperactivity and artificial food colours and food flavours; and finally, in view of the fact that some 1800 chemicals are routinely used in the Canadian food supply, and very few of these have ever been tested for the deleterious effects they can have on human health and human behaviour, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the matter of chemical additives in the Canadian food supply be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for immediate consideration, study and report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, before the question period starts, I should like to beg your indulgence for a few minutes and bring to the attention of the House the fact that in my constituency of Lisgar, in southern Manitoba, the post office employees—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that the procedure of the House simply does not provide for the intervention of the hon. member. I have no idea what the point is—

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might raise it briefly by way of a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the Standing Orders of the House under which we have been operating since Easter do not permit points of order or questions of privilege at this time.

POST OFFICE

RESPONSE OF MINISTER TO LETTER FROM UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS SUGGESTING RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I think, Mr. Speaker, I detect a smile on the handsome Irish countenance of the Postmaster General this morning. I do not know whether it results from the demonstration that is taking place in front of the building at this moment by the postal workers who are demonstrating against the strike or the fact that there is some truth in the rumour that a note has been received, in response to the invitation of the minister issued in the House yesterday, informing him that the negotiators from the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are ready to return to the bargaining table. If this is true, is the minister able to give a positive response?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that there was a letter delivered by private courier from the Canadian Union of Postal Workers sometime last evening which I have not had a chance to study this morning.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Peters: Study it. It is two paragraphs.

Mr. Mackasey: The reply to the letter will be sent out sometime today after we have had a chance to fully analyze its contents.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—SUGGESTED COOLING OFF PERIOD AND NEGOTIATION OF PROBLEM OF CASUAL WORKERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, in order that the Canadian public might begin to see light at the end of the long tunnel, I wonder if the minister would accept, in his response, the suggestion that has been put forward from this side of the House that a cooling off period of 90 days be a part of the bargaining process, and that the issue of casual workers be negotiable on the same basis as the very difficult question of technological change which was negotiated and successfully resolved, and in so doing make it possible for the postal workers to go back to work without losing face and ensuring that this essential service is restored in Canada.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I knew I was going to pay very dearly for that compliment. In the negotiations, as the hon. gentleman appreciates, the question of casual workers has been dealt with at great length by the conciliation board chairman. We are prepared to negotiate all issues. I propose to indicate, in a conciliatory tone, to the negotiators for the union that we are ready to resume negotiations almost immediately and it would be very nice if they, as well, would show their concern for the Canadian public by letting workers in their union who want to go back to work go back to work because they are obviously in the majority across this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Many locals have gone back to work in Newfoundland and some in New Brunswick, and obviously this is beginning to spread. I think it is time now for the House to have a little patience with me and for the union to extend the same courtesy until my reply in letter form—certainly not by telephone—and then we will see what emerges.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. On Wednesday the Postmaster General said that the postal strike "does not in the slightest add any pressure on the minister who runs the Post Office". While that may be true, I hope the Acting Prime Minister recognizes the hardship, or pressure if you like, that a long shut down of the post office will mean to many groups and individuals in the country. Unless this dispute is settled through the weekend, is it the government's position that in 90 days or a similar fixed period it will bring a back to work order during which time the Postmaster General could pursue some meaningful settlement in negotiations with the union membership?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There is no change in the government's position. We have no intention at present of introducing any legislation which would require parliament to make a decision as to whether it wanted to interrupt the negotiations that are now going on.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—WILLINGNESS OF GOVERNMENT TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS ON ALL ISSUES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, since the attitude of the negotiators with regard to any potential settlement is absolutely crucial, I should like to ask the minister, in light of his reply to another hon. member in the House yesterday that the government did not provide any ultimatum on the question of wages to the union, whether he stands by that or whether he has checked with the government chief negotiator concerning the conversation he had with the chief union negotiator on Monday night when the union asked for clarification as to whether an ultimatum was involved and the chief negotiator for the government is said to have replied:

[Translation]

You are right, this is indeed an ultimatum, there is no doubt about it.

[English]

I am not yet fluently bilingual, but even to me the translation of that means that this is an ultimatum. What I would like to ask the minister, in view of the response to the letter he has received, whether it is his attitude that the government will resume negotiations now and discuss all the questions that concern the union.

● (1120)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. gentleman. He is close to the labour movement. I would hope that the third conversation between our chief negotiator and the union was the one which was revealed. I would hope they have already taped the first two and will release the complete transcripts of them to put all three together to get the proper perspective on the only one they have released.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question. He has received by hand a message from the postal workers which is only eight lines in length, and he says he has not yet had time to study it. In that letter they say they are prepared to discuss the very serious matter before the country right now in an open-ended way, and they want the government to do the same thing. I would like the minister to answer this question: is the government prepared to do so or not?

Mr. Mackasey: Not only are private telephone conversations revealed, obviously, but private correspondence as well, since the hon. member knows how many lines there were in the letter.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the minister do a service to the House and deal with the questions which are being asked, apart from making snide comments? Would he tell the House whether the government is prepared to have open-ended negotiations, or is it laying down some kind of ultimatum as a condition for those negotiations?

Mr. Mackasey: I am more than pleased to answer that. When the question is phrased precisely whether it is the position of the government that a wage package is an ultimatum, period, the answer is no. We will be ready to put a package together and to put it before the negotiating team of the union after we have had a chance to analyse the letter in relation to the press release which was simultaneously released to the press gallery.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR PROGRAM TO REDUCE MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

With reference to a reply the Minister of Finance gave to a question I asked him last week and in which he indicated that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs would be introducing programs aimed at reducing interest rates in specific cases, could the Minister of State for Urban Affairs advise the House to which particular areas these programs will apply and also when the relevant legislation will be introduced?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not at liberty to indicate the precise nature of the programs themselves, but we will continue to support low and moderate income families for low-cost but very good housing. I hope to be able to make announcements on the program itself at the earliest possible date in November, but it is taking a great deal of work to pull the program together and to update it. However, I can assure the hon. member that it is proceeding with all haste.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—PROSPECTS FOR CO-OPERATION BY PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the indications from the government recently that it expected to have a much clearer idea of the attitude of the provinces toward the anti-inflationary program after the meeting with the provincial ministers of finance, which has taken place in the last couple of days, can the minister tell the House how many, and if possible, which provinces indicated they are prepared to go along firmly and categorically with the government's program, and specifically are prepared to enter into agreements with the federal government to put sectors of provincial jurisdiction under the proposed federal administration?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think a valid summary of the last two days' discussions would be that while there are certain details of the anti-inflation program with which the provincial governments disagreed, and while there were details which they would like us to change and changes which we are prepared to consider, in general I think it is a fair statement of their position that all governments were prepared to support our program and to co-operate.

There will be certain questions, one of which is the question of the determination of professional income, which was recognized as a difficulty and upon which there will have to be additional work done. It was decided by all the provinces that they would assume exclusive responsibility for the control of rents, although there will be an attempt to develop national criteria, so there will not be any invidious comparison from one region to another. With respect to dealing with the public sector, the government of Quebec made it clear that it would be creating its own regime to deal with the public sector within Quebec. The conclusion I draw from the remarks of Mr. McKeough in regard to Ontario, on the other hand, is that Ontario will be opting into the federal tribunal with regard to the public sector.

I think it is fair to say that most of the other provinces at this moment have not given final indication whether all or part of the public sector would be put under federal jurisdiction. I cannot be clear on their intentions at this point.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—INTENTION OF PROVINCES TO FOLLOW FEDERAL GUIDELINES IF THEY SET UP THEIR OWN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. With respect to those provinces that have already, or indicate that at some point in the future they intend, to set up their own administration, has there been any commitment from them that they may be considering this line of procedure? Has there been any commitment that they will follow and adopt the guidelines announced by the federal government in administering the program itself?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the most accurate description would be that they all recognize that failure to adopt essentially national standards could result, in appropriate cases, in employee competition between one province and another. In that sense there was a general recognition of the wisdom of attempting to accord decisions on the basis of national criteria rather than purely locally evolved ones. There was recognition of the fact that as time goes on, with two tribunals dealing with the same subject matter but with differences in individual personality and local facts, there could be a divergence. I think it was generally accepted, however, that every effort should be made to try to avoid that.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSITION OF PROVINCES ON CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Finance indicate whether the provinces accept the constitutional position of the government following these discussions? I ask this question particularly in view of the statement attributed to the Minister of Labour of the province of Quebec reported in Le Devoir as follows:

[Translation]

And I quote Le Devoir:

He said that the bill "appears to disregard completely the legal implications of labour legislation".

On Thursday, concerning labour legislation, he also said:

The bill compels Quebec to review its entire legislation governing collective bargaining, unique in Canada, which covers about 250,000 workers in the province.

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in general, the provinces indicated that there was no contest on their part with respect to the jurisdiction of the government of Canada to put this program forward, and indeed to put forward the bill that is now before parliament. The report the hon. gentleman has referred to does reflect a concern that was expressed, not so much from the constitutional standpoint, but from the legal and practical standpoint of integrating the collective bargaining system which of course will deal with many other things than the compensation level, but which will be importantly affected by compensation levels by adjusting the collective bargaining system to the over-all compensation control program. We recognize that inevitably the judgments of the Anti-Inflation Board, for example in the private sector, are going to have an impact on negotiations within the province of Quebec. We recognize that there will have to be close consultation in this regard. Whether any formal changes in either the Quebec or Federal law, will be required is not clear. It seems to me at this point that the over-all federal administration can effectively be adjusted to the collective bargaining system, whether we are talking about that under the federal jurisdiction or each province.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES TO PLACE MARKETING BOARDS UNDER GUIDELINES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that most marketing boards are under provincial jurisdiction, and in view of the evidence that was presented by the Food Prices Review Board that at least in one area of commodity marketing, the area of chicken broilers, there is evidence of a consumer rip-off, may I ask if the minister has sought or intends to seek agreement from the provinces to place all marketing boards in Canada under the guidelines laid down by the white paper. In conclusion may I ask if he intends to place some restraint on the language of the Minister of Agriculture who described the principal people on the Anti-inflation Baord as a bunch of nuts.

● (1130)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the hon. gentleman's final comment, I hope he understands that I should try to confine myself to the possible rather than to the more difficult mission he has assigned to me.

The question of marketing boards was not, I have to say, prominently discussed at the meeting. There is the recognition that there is a difficult interface to be established here and the demand, as suggested by the hon. gentleman, was not made by me. Yes, this is a question on which, very obviously, we shall need to consult closely.

Mr. McGrath: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the questionable constitutional jurisdiction in this area, if the government intends to direct the Minister of Agriculture immediately to enter into negotiations and discussions with his provincial counterparts, to ensure that provincial marketing boards as well as federal marketing boards adhere to the federal guidelines, so that some of these consumer rip-offs can be ended forthwith?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member's suggestion, that there is any doubt about constitutionality in this particular area. As I say, that doubt was not evinced by any of the ten provincial governments represented at the meeting. With regard to discussions with the provinces, that, as I said, is obviously a matter which will need to be discussed and I think the Minister of Agriculture would be a first-class spokesman in this regard.

HOUSING

MINISTER'S INTENTION WITH REGARD TO MEETING PROVINCIAL MINISTERS PRIOR TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW PROGRAM

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As we have now seen two meetings convened by the present government, one with the premiers and the other with provincial finance ministers, for the purpose of seeking their co-operation for the anti-inflationary program after the program had been decided on—the government did not seek their input prior to its announcement—and as this approach has contributed to public uncertainty regarding the program, will the minister say if he intends to meet with provincial ministers of housing, to discuss his proposed housing measures before they are introduced, in order to avoid further confusions and aggravation in an area of shared jurisdiction.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with all provincial housing ministers, asking if they wanted a meeting in relation to the guidelines. There was no consensus for the holding of such a meeting. Actually, only two ministers wanted it, because they had not attended the last housing ministers meeting. I am prepared to meet with them. I assure the hon. member that the input from the last two or three meetings I had with provincial housing ministers is having a significant impact on new legislation and new proposals which will be presented shortly. I will be pleased to meet with them. Actually, I will be canvassing them again, to see when they wish to have another meeting.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement made in the House yesterday, as reported on page 8473 of Hansard, to the effect that cabinet decided on July 24 to accept the new salary ranges for senior civil servants, and in view of the previous statement made in the House on July 28, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, to the effect that the decision had not yet been reached on July 28, can the Acting Prime Minister, in view of the two different dates which were mentioned, and the contradictions, clarify these obvious contradictions for the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister consulted the records and found that on July 24 the cabinet had decided in principle to adopt certain increases in the salary ranges for senior civil servants. We did not adopt fully the recommendations of the Lambert Commission. We made some independent judgment rather reducing what they had recommended. But I understand from the Prime Minister that he did look up the record, and the decision was made on July 24.

PAY INCREASES FOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY—DATE OF SIGNING OF TREASURY BOARD MINUTES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am happy that the Acting Prime Minister has clarified the matter, since Hansard for July 28 suggests the opposite. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister the following question. In view of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday to the effect that the government was still slotting senior civil servants into the new salary ranges up until two weeks ago, does that mean that the Treasury Board minutes, or some of them, were not signed until at least two weeks ago? If so, can he tell us the relevant dates on which the Treasury Board minutes were signed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot answer that question. The Prime Minister yesterday outlined the facts, that to the extent these matters are published, they will appear. There always has been a reservation to the effect that the individual salaries of senior civil servants should not be published, but simply the ranges themselves within which their salaries are determined. I do not think there is any contradiction. I think the hon. gentleman is trying to create dispute about nothing at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? Does the Prime Minister's statement made in the House yesterday, to the effect that the final slotting for senior civil servants was not completed until two weeks ago, not mean that the Prime Minister really said that the final slotting of civil servants and the signing of the minutes did not occur until after the cabinet had agreed on wage and price guidelines for Canadians?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there is a process for the determination of the salary ranges of senior civil servants and the process was explained by the Prime Minister yesterday. The cabinet decides as to the ranges. One must look at the record of the particular individual, to determine whether he is at the bottom or top of the range. It is a process which continues every year. There was no variation in it this year and there was no need to vary it.

Mr. Nystrom: When was it decided? That is all I am asking.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—SUGGESTION PRIORITY BE GIVEN TO FEDERAL EXPENDITURES ON HIGHWAYS IN NORTHERN PART OF PROVINCE

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: —first, may I thank you for your courtesy and thank all hon. members for the courtesy they showed me this morning. May I direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion? Could he inform the House if it is still federal government policy that DREE money expended on highways in New Brunswick should, as a matter of priority, be spent in northern New Brunswick?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on his election and also for joining us in this House. I want to assure him of my full cooperation and of the special consideration I will give his representations.

As for the particular subject of his question, it is with pleasure that I can assure him that it is precisely one of the concerns and priorities of the government and of my department to see that access ways and highways in northeast New Brunswick be improved as rapidly as possible. To this end, we are currently pursuing intensive negotiations with the government of that province to sign an agreement for carrying out the project that is of concern to you.

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—ADEQUACY OF DEVICES TO MONITOR POLLUTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he satisfied with the adequacy of the devices used to monitor pollution around the Syncrude project in the Athabasca oil sands?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. gentleman asked me whether we are satisfied with the pollution devices around the Syncrude project?

Mr. Gillies: That is right.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to check into this information. I am not familiar with the pollution problem around the Syncrude project, but will check and obtain the information for the hon. gentleman.

TRANSPORT

DREDGING—POSSIBILITY OF NATIONALIZING INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since the minister is unable to receive more than one bid on various dredging jobs, in particular at Île d'Orleans, Cape-de-la-Roche and South Baymouth, and since the bids which he has received are away out of line with departmental estimates, does the minister plan to nationalize this particular industry? If not, why not?

● (1140)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of alternatives which we will want to examine thoroughly. One is the opening of dredging to more extensive competition than has existed in the past. We will, of course, have to look at the alternative of doing some of the work ourselves if we are not satisfied with the results that can be obtained otherwise. I would not rush to that solution if other solutions were more satisfactory.

Mr. Paproski: Is it the intention, for example, to make Public Works the prime contractor and then sub-contract these particular dredging jobs?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is a little hard to say who will do the job until we decide whether the job will be done at all.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED ABANDONMENT OF LIVERPOOL TO YARMOUTH SERVICE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND DETAILS OF BASIS FOR PROPOSAL

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of Transport. On October 16 I asked the minister whether he would investigate the proposal to discontinue CNR rail service between Liverpool and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. He promised to investigate this matter. In view of the public interest shown along the south shore, can the minister now reply to this question?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the procedure provided for in the legislation for a railway to obtain subsidies is a procedure whereby the railway first applies for abandonment. That is the procedure being followed at this time. Therefore, the question of actual continuation of the service is one that will be determined in the ordinary course by the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the importance of the CNR connecting link between Liverpool and Yarmouth and the fact that the railway has indicated it must discontinue this because it is operating at a loss, will the minister investigate the proposed action and inform me of the amount of the stated loss on the operation of this service, the charges made against the service which led to this loss and whether, in light of the economic effect upon this section of Nova Scotia, he will recommend to the CTC the continuation of this service.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the suggestion about representations under consideration. I will attempt to obtain the figures as quickly as possible for the hon. member. I would, however, like to again emphasize that it may be wise for us to look as well at the legislation and the terminology. It might be better if we can provide for an application for a subsidy instead of having to go through the form of application for abandonment which always causes undue concern.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES ON EXPORT AND DOMESTIC PRICES—PAYMENT OF AMOUNT OF INCREASE OVER DELIVERED PRICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as head of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a very serious question in light of the fact that this is a $2 billion industry and the world market price for wheat is now over $5. a bushel. What effect will the anti-inflation program have on two factors; first, the export price of grain which of course is set by contract with the Wheat Board and, second, the domestic price of grain sold in Canada which was previously fixed during this or another session of parliament?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board markets wheat and barley abroad. It does so at world prices. As a result of current prices, it is probably more like a $3 billion than a $2 billion industry. Those prices will continue to be set by the world market. They will be unaffected by any action we have taken. In the case of wheat domestically, there has been a fixed price in terms of the consumer in Canada since the adoption of the two price wheat policy a couple of years ago. As a result, there has been no effect upon the price of bread due to changes in wheat prices in that period. There is, of course, a partial payment from the treasury to the wheat producer which offsets some of the advantage the consumer receives in the lower price for grain. In the case of feed grain, there is basically an open market situation. There, the ordinary supply and demand forces will be allowed to work. That is the implication of our statement that the guidelines do not apply in such a highly competitive area as that of farm products.

Mr. Woolliams: At the time of the combining of grain in western Canada, which used to be referred to as threshing of grain, the country elevator price for wheat was set at approximately $2. I believe that price has now increased to three something. Why was it set at $2? Will those who received $2 when the delivery was made now receive cheques for the increase to $3.50, I believe it is?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The setting of initial prices for the last five years has been done initially on March 1 for August 1 and the subsequent period. In the last three year at least, we reviewed that when more up to date information about marketing conditions was available. We have in each of the last years increased the initial price at that time by an amount of the order of magnitude to which the hon. member refers. Those who delivered grain between August 1 and the time of adjustment receive a payment for the difference as soon as feasible. I should emphasize that this is all the grain producers' own money in the sense that it is anticipated proceeds from the sale of that grain into the market.

FISHERIES

POSSIBILITY OF NEW POLICY ON HUNTING OF SEALS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of State (Fisheries) a question.

In view of the constant uncertainty felt among fishermen who go in for seal hunting in Canada, particularly in eastern Quebec and the Maritimes, and in view of the study undertaken by scientists in his department and by the committee on seals and seal hunting, could the minister tell the House whether he might announce a new policy in this area in the near future?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, indeed new scientific data indicate that the stocks of seals are seriously threatened. Yesterday, I met Professor Keith Ronald, chairman of the committee, and some of the fisheries scientists, who confirm that we will have to consider reducing drastically our catch in the coming season. We undertook a series of consultations with all the interested parties, and in particular with the fishermen, the industry as a whole, and two other countries concerned, namely Norway and Denmark, and I can assure the House that, to the extent where we can protect the interests of our fishermen, we will do so eagerly.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF EXEMPTIONS FROM WAGE GUIDELINES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The white paper provides within it certain exemptions for wage contracts, one being historical relationships and the other contracts signed prior to January 1, 1974. Will the minister clarify whether they are all or nothing exemptions. In other words, will a contract be totally exempt or not exempt or will the board have the discretion to give partial settlements above the guidelines but below any agreed or negotiated settlement?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most helpful way to answer the question is to point out the difference in terminology. The white paper does not indicate exemptions. What it does indicate is that the Anti-Inflation Board may take account of special circumstances and may decide, notwithstanding the guidelines, that those special circumstances dictate different treatment. Having put it in that context, I think it will be obvious to the hon. member that the board can determine that the different treatment might be to go totally to whatever the negotiated level is or to some intermediate range. It is totally the discretion of the board, not only as to whether it should depart from the guidelines, but how far they should depart.

Mr. Leggatt: In view of the discretion the board will apparently have, will the government give consideration to the fact that where the board decides to grant a partial settlement, a strike may result following that with both the employer and employee agreeing there will be a strike, not against the employer, but against the government, similar to the post office situation? Was that possibility given consideration in terms of the mechanics of the legislation?

● (1150)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would agree with the hon. gentleman's analysis. The strike, after all, is against the employer. The full range of economic pressures which can be brought to bear on an employer, namely a withdrawal of services, still exists under either the provincial or the federal law, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition. Therefore, I do not think the hon. gentleman's analysis is correct.

AIR CANADA

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF ESTEY REPORT—SUGGESTION COMPANY OFFICIALS APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since it appears that he has the Estey report in his hands at the present time, can he inform the House when the report will be translated, if it has to be, and when it will be tabled in the House of Commons so that the Canadian public can see what the report contains?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any precise timing for the publication of the report. It is a very lengthy one and therefore translation and printing will take a considerable period of time. I would not want at this point to give a rough estimate of how long.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I have an assurance from the Minister of Transport that when the Estey report is translated and made public, hopefully as soon as possible, the government will agree to allow officials of Air Canada to be brought before parliament for a thorough investigation of the air line?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the intention certainly is to ask parliament for a very full examination of the issues involved. Indeed, I want to assure hon. members that in the interval between receipt of the report and its publication the government will be taking certain action which will permit the putting of proposals before parliament.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

UNITED NATIONS FORCE IN MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBILITY OF REQUEST FOR INCREASED CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Following yesterday's security council vote regarding the United Nations force in the Middle East and also the requirement for augmented forces consequent upon the Egyptian-Israeli Sinai agreement, can the minister indicate whether a request has come to Canada for an increased commitment to this force, can he indicate the response to such request and what is to be the extent and type of our enlarged involvement?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has been no formal request from the United Nations for an enlargement of our contribution to the emergency force.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED UNION POLICY NOT TO ASSIST IN DISTRIBUTION OF BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister had any indication that members of the public service alliance in UIC offices are bound by union policy and are not prepared to assist in the distribution of UIC payments? If this is the case, what steps is the minister's department taking to have UIC payments distributed to Canada's many unemployed?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had no indication of this in any information I have at this moment. I hope this will not be the case because the measures we are taking are the same as those we have taken quite successfully in the past under the circumstances. I have every anticipation that things will continue normally.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, and I should like to congratulate him on his shift in portfolio. Moving from justice to transport, he is uniquely situated now to answer on a topic that has been raised many times in the past year both by myself and other members. On October 14 the Minister of Transport stated that the report on the crash of a Panarctic plane in the Arctic would be released some time this week. Can the minister now produce the report, or have some new forms of obstruction prevented its completion? I would remind the minister that by the end of next week we will have reached the first anniversary of that sad occasion.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for his kind comments and assure him that in my new office I will try to leave the old one behind and seek legal advice from other quarters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I should like to confirm to hon. members opposite, who seem not to understand, that the lawyer members of this government have long found that to be a desirable principle to follow, one, to which we all try to adhere. I would tell the hon. member that the release of the report is imminent.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH INDEPENDENT ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION COMMISSION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following the CBC program on the subject which graphically illustrated the confusion surrounding the attempts to investigate this unfortunate crash, can the minister tell the House when he will be bringing forward legislation to implement the independent accident investigation commission which was promised in the Speech from the Throne?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, work on that legislation is going forward and I am looking forward to bringing it in, though the House is preoccupied with many things these days. At the same time, we have been taking steps to look at and review our regulations touching this area, and some improvements in that regard will be forthcoming as well.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

EFFECT OF REFUSAL OF BID BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED TO TAKE OVER WESTINGHOUSE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT JOBS—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF DEADLINE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a matter that is of some urgency to Canadian Westinghouse. Can the minister advise the House whether the government has made any progress toward the solution that I believe is required prior to October 31, which is the deadline? Has the minister anything to report to the House today?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am very glad to be able to tell the hon. member and the House in general that I met this morning with a number of the principals of one of the companies concerned. I think the hon. member will appreciate that at this moment in time, due to the delicacy of the negotiations, I would prefer not to be too specific. However, I can say that the meeting has resulted in a commitment to a further one within a week. In addition, the principals of two other companies involved will also be consulted by me during the same period.

I would not call this morning's meeting definitive—that is, that there were firm proposals put forward—but I certainly conveyed to all concerned the determination of the government of Canada to ensure that the 2,300 jobs, and incidentally several more ancillary jobs as well, will not be jeopardized and that we will see, to the best of our ability, that they are protected.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The date of October 31 seems to be quite important to General Steel Wares Limited since that is the expiration date of their contract. Will the negotiations be able to meet this deadline or are we talking of an extension of the time? Has the minister any information in that regard?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I inquired this morning whether or not the October 31 date was the finishing date for any options and no positive answer was available at this time. This is one of the questions my officials are now seeking an answer to, namely whether an extension is possible or there is some other means of keeping the application to buy open. I hope that early next week I will be able to provide the hon. member with more details in this connection. At the moment, the information available to me appears to be somewhat vague.

POST OFFICE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF PENSION CHEQUES FROM UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the present impasse in our postal system, and in view of the fact that contingency plans have been implemented by the government to ensure delivery of cheques by various means to recipients of CP, OAS, GIS, UIC and other benefits, may I, ask the Postmaster General whether he would take the necessary action to ensure that United States social security and civil service pensions will be made available to southern Ontario residents, bearing in mind that many pensioners rely heavily and sometimes solely on these cheques for their livelihood?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will accept that representation and see what can be done, but there is already an embargo on mail coming in from the United States. However, I will inquire.

● (1200)

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have served notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege, regarding whether or not the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may be misleading the House in respect of the dates when the agreement was reached in cabinet about senior civil servants' salaries. In view of the statement of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) that the Prime Minister had checked into this, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister is not here, I should like to defer this matter until Monday when the Prime Minister is back in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly have no objection to the hon. member deferring it. I do have some advice for the hon. member in respect of the content of his notice which is as follows:

> I hereby give notice that I intend to raise a question of privilege today regarding the inconsistency between statements made by the Prime Minister in the House yesterday, and in the House on July 28, 1975, regarding salary increases for senior public servants.

That notice, if it accurately describes the question of privilege, would fly directly in the face of precedent which is, of course, that an inconsistency in a statement made either inside or outside the House is a matter of debate and not a matter of privilege. Therefore, I would caution the hon. member that when the point does arise, I would expect him to be able to persuade me very quickly that there is something distinctive about the question of privilege which he proposes to bring forward.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order involving a question raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). He made a statement about a comment I had made, stating that I referred to the present Anti-Inflation Board. I referred to the past Food Prices Review Board, and I stand by what I said, that the report was a kooky report. The report contained some facts but omitted many other important facts, etc., and until the board submits a report with everything in it, I will still call it a kooky report, or a kooky board, too.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to bring to the attention of the House the fact that in my constituency in southern Manitoba the Post Office employees in three towns, being Morden, Winkler and Altona, have refused to go on strike. Consequently, the local mail in these areas is still moving. In view of other action that has been taken in the past few weeks generally by Post Office employees, I feel that in this situation this action by these people in southern Manitoba is very commendable. I would hope the House would agree with me that this is a very commendable course of action for these people to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Arts Centre as follows: The total cost of the programs presented by the Centre during Festival Canada 1975 is estimated at present at $775,000. The Centre deals with many unions, professional associations and artists' agents and operates in a highly competitive field. If it were to be the only theatrical/musical producer in Canada to have to reveal detailed costs of individual productions it would be placed in a position of considerable disadvantage vis-à-vis other producers.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESTRAINT OF PROFIT MARGINS, PRICES, DIVIDENDS AND COMPENSATION

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by stating my support for this bill, its purpose being to legislate the controls segment of the government's prices and incomes policy. I think this policy is on the right track. The House knows that in saying this I speak as someone who, while a supporter of the government, does not always give it blanket approval no matter what it does or fails to do. I state my support for the bill as someone who is willing to speak publicly about the government he supports, at times in critical but always constructive ways. Therefore, while I say that the bill and the policy it reflects deserve the general support of Canadians today, I will be raising some questions which I think should be answered by the government and I will be pointing out some areas where I think the bill could be improved as it moves through the legislative process.

I believe these kinds of questions and areas of concern should be dealt with during our parliamentary consideration of the bill in order for it to have the fullest possible understanding and support of all segments of the Canadian people. This understanding and support is essential if the prices and incomes policy and the government's attack on inflation program as a whole are to succeed in their objectives of protecting the real incomes of Canadians and our competitive position in world markets.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, the prices and incomes policy basically involves a set of guidelines for restraining prices, profit margins, dividends and wages, backed up with a selective enforcement mechanism, that is, a mechanism for selective mandatory controls. I believe the program is on the right track because it reflects the kind of approach I have been advocating for the past 15 months. It is the approach of the anti-profiteering bill. This bill was a key part of the government's election platform and I believe this fact was a major reason for the public's decision to re-elect the government with a clear majority. I believe the voters wanted this measure and voted to re-elect the government in the expectation that it would move promptly after the election to have the anti-profiteering bill made into law.

This was something which, unfortunately, did not happen. I say "unfortunately" because it could well be that if the bill had been presented again to parliament by the government shortly after the election, it might have been possible to have a guidelines program in effect with the mandatory selective controls applying only to prices and profits and not to wages and salaries as well. Some 15 months ago, it could be argued, wage demands had not yet begun accelerating at quite the same rate as appeared to be the case some months later.

Also, the House will recall the government's effort prior to the June 23 budget to have a consensus program for restraint of prices and wages agreed to and followed on a voluntary basis by labour and business. This effort was not successful. However, it might, and probably would have succeeded if the government had been able to assure labour that the burden of restraint would not have fallen unfairly on its shoulders and that there would in fact be an effective means of restraining unwarranted price and profit increases. In other words, I think the program could have worked if it could have been backed up with the anti-profiteering bill.

The NDP is now concerned that not only the new restraint program, that, is, the guidelines, but also the mandatory controls set out in Bill C-73 will apply to a large segment of the labour force. In my view, the NDP bears some responsibility for this state of affairs, and leaders in the labour movement who are NDP oriented should recognize this. I say this because if the NDP has supported the anti-profiteering bill when it was originally presented, the bill would likely have been on the statute books for the past 15 months. As a result, certain elements in the labour sector might not have begun to show a tendency to go beyond even catching up with inflationary price increases and to anticipate the most hypothetically extreme future price increases in their wage demands.

[Mr. Gray.]

In other words, the NDP, in refusing a year and a half ago to support a bill which would have permitted selective controls only on prices and profits, helped create a situation in which there is a case to be made for applying selective controls on part of the wages and salaries area as well as to prices and profits.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) spoke in the House during the special debate on the government's white paper on Tuesday, October 14, he attempted to answer the contention that——in some quarters, both inside and outside the House the government should have taken action long before now to establish some form of prices and incomes policy.

He pointed out—correctly, I think—that "the proposal for imposition of comprehensive, mandatory price and income controls that some urged on us 2½ years ago was very much the wrong policy at the wrong time." Of course, the government is not now proposing that kind of comprehensive, mandatory control. It is not now proposing a total freeze, followed by mandatory controls on every part of the economy as were urged by the Conservatives prior to and during the 1974 election.

The minister went on to present arguments against this kind of comprehensive wage and price control program, but he did not attempt to show there was no case at all, as I understand his argument, for a more limited form of controls over a year ago. In fact, the government itself made the case for it when the government presented the anti-profiteering bill to parliament just before the election. It did so again when it later asked the public to re-elect it so that it could pass the bill into law, something it said during the campaign it had been prevented from doing only by the irresponsible action of the two opposition parties in forcing the election.

The cost of living figures were similar in their double-digit rate of increase in most of the last six months of 1974 to the rate of increase over the past several months. One difference today, of course, is that unemployment is considerably above the level it was a year and a half ago. However, the government now has taken new action. I think it has shown the kind of leadership it promised during the election, by setting out a special economic program it thinks necessary for the well-being of the country at this time and then by proceeding to go out and sell it to the country to mobilize wide public support. It is doing this rather than simply waiting for that public support to develop solely of its own accord to the point where the government is carried along by it in a passive and responsive way.

I believe the government does deserve credit and support for the act of leadership reflected by its attack on inflation program and Bill C-73. However, I want to suggest some areas where improvements could be made in Bill C-73, which does follow the approach of the anti-profiteering bill except that it applies to incomes as well as to prices and profits. I am basing my suggestions on some of the techniques set out in the anti-profiteering bill.

There has been concern expressed in the House that Bill C-73, unlike the anti-profiteering bill, does not provide that before a firm can increase its price it must first give advance notice a substantial period before that increase would go into effect, the result being that for the period of notice the prices in question are frozen, so that there is time for the authorities to see whether the proposed increase might be contrary to the legislation and guidelines. However, there is in fact a clause in the bill before us which, in my view, could be used by the Anti-Inflation Board as authority to require firms to give notice before they increase prices. This is clause 13(2) which says, in effect, that the board can publish a notice in the Canada Gazette requiring all firms or individuals to which it is directed to provide it with certain information.

However, I can see why some speakers feel that the pre-notification provisions found in the anti-profiteering bill are absent from Bill C-73. The language in clause 13(2) is rather obscure. I think, therefore, the clause should be redrafted to follow the clearer and more precise wording of clause 51 of the anti-profiteering bill, to make certain that the board will be able to require a substantial period of advance notice during which prices cannot be increased without the assent of the board.

The anti-profiteering bill provided that the government would have the authority to bring its provisions into effect by declaration to apply to all the firms in the sector named in that declaration. While the application of Bill C-73 is not limited to specific economic sectors as set out in declarations or guidelines, it applies only to private sector employers of commodities and services of more than 500 employees. However, the situation in a particular sector of the economy may be such that a case can be made for applying guidelines and selective mandatory controls, if not to all firms in the sector then at least to firms with a specified number of employees, but fewer than 500. In fact, the guidelines already provide something like that for one case by indicating the rules will apply to all firms with 20 or more employees in the construction industry.

There may be some sectors in which most of the firms have less than 500 employees, and therefore the effect of the prices and incomes guidelines and the mandatory controls would be more limited for them than for other sectors. Or some sectors may be of such importance and significance that all, or most firms in them should be covered in any event.

Bill C-2, the stage one competition policy bill, though approved by this House has not yet been adopted by the Senate. It is still not certain when the second stage bill dealing with the key area of mergers and monopolies detrimental to the public interest will be presented to the House, much less fully approved by parliament. Therefore, the bills are not yet available to assist competitive forces to operate in the economy. As I have said, a whole sector of the economy may be made up primarily of smaller firms. Market imperfections may mean that smaller firms may not, in fact, always face competitive pressures from larger ones covered by the mandatory controls. I doubt if consumers always will be satisfied by an answer that compulsory aspects of the program cannot ever be applied even where a price clearly exceeds the guidelines, simply because the firm has less than 500 employees.

Also, should all firms with less than 500 employees always be able to increase their prices or wages above the guidelines whenever they believe they can do so in the light of the market and competitive situations they face, and because they are not subject to the mandatory controls? Therefore, I think there is room for consideration by the government as to whether it should use the authority of clause 3(2)(v) of the bill to extend the guidelines in some of the ways I have mentioned. If so, I think the government should give its views during the course of the debate. The anti-profiteering bill provided that a declaration applying it to a sector would be in effect for up to 18 months. Bill C-73 will apply for up to three years, initially: it can apply for a longer period with the approval of parliament.

It seems to me that there is an argument for a form of parliamentary review of its application through a special debate in the House or, preferably, through committee hearings once every 12 months. The act provides for a report by the administrator to be tabled in the House annually. I think a similar report by the Anti-Inflation Board, whose terms of reference cover a much wider area than that of the administrator, should also be required. Both such reports could be a suitable basis for an annual committee study of the operations of the act.

The anti-profiteering bill said it would be an offence to withhold goods from the market in order artificially to enhance their price. I can find no similar prohibition in Bill C-73. Its absence, I think, should be explained by the government. What about the procedure for enforcing the guidelines? At first glance, the procedure under the anti-profiteering bill appears to be somewhat simpler and more direct. Under it there is no board which first must try to get voluntary compliance before enforcement action can be taken.

Instead, the director of combines, or in fact a special deputy director, would have had the authority to launch an inquiry any time he had reason to believe there had been a breach of the act, or the act was about to be breached, or any time he had been directed to do so by the minister. He could then bring the matter before a commission. The commission, after affording the parties a reasonable opportunity to be heard, could make the same kind of order as is provided for in Bill C-73.

Bill C-73, however, says in effect that before compulsory enforcement action can be taken, the Anti-Inflation Board must seek voluntary compliance with the guidelines. Who can say how long that will take? There are no time limits provided for this step. If this procedure did not work, the board could then refer the matter to the administrator. The administrator cannot take action on his own initiative; the matter must first be referred to him by the Anti-Inflation Board or by the minister. However, once the matter is referred to him he has very wide powers to carry out an investigation to determine whether the guidelines have been contravened or are likely to be contravened. If this is his conclusion, he himself could issue an order that the unlawful conduct cease and the improper gains be paid back. Bill C-73 makes no provision for a hearing of any kind before such an order is issued.

I believe the administrator should have wide powers to carry out his investigations to determine the facts of the situation, especially so that corporate sleight-of-hand will not be able to disguise price and profit margin increases which are contrary to the guidelines; and, of course, decisions must be made swiftly.

However, when the matter moves from investigation to deciding that an order should be issued, I question whether the law should appear here to exclude all of what the lawyers call the principles of natural justice. These involve the right to a hearing, with the right to hear the evidence against you, the right to call evidence in reply, to cross examine and to be represented by counsel. The anti-profiteering bill used words which enabled these rights to be available before the commission decided on whether an order should be made. These rights are a fundamental part of our judicial system and our democratic tradition. It is true that the administrator's orders can be appealed to an anti-inflation appeal tribunal which can hold sittings across Canada. But one would expect there would be delays before appeals could be heard. Also, it is likely there would be additional expense, which could be a burden, especially where the appeal is on behalf of a worker or a group of workers.

It is interesting to note that the proceedings of the appeal tribunal itself must, according to the bill, be carried out in line with the principles of natural justice. However, the focal point of the enforcement procedure appears to be the making of the order.

Mr. Leggatt: They would never get a conviction, otherwise.

Mr. Gray: One wonders how often the appeals procedure could be used. The government bill should spell out more clearly the procedures which the administrator has to follow in making an order. Perhaps it could provide that the administrator could appoint hearing officers to hold brief, informal hearings before orders are made. Strangely enough, although the powers and the authority of the administrator appear to be very extensive, the words in the bill creating them seem to provide for an escape hatch which could make his enforcement activity meaningless.

Clause 20 of the bill says that the administrator does not have to make such order as he deems otherwise appropriate if he is satisfied that there are, or are likely to be circumstances which, based on the particular facts of the situation, would justify the person's contravention of the guidelines. But what could these circumstances be? The bill itself does not say. These words could enable the administrator, in effect, to create his own set of guidelines totally different from those set forth by the government.

This kind of escape hatch did not appear in the anti-profiteering bill. The anti-inflation bill provides that an injunction can be obtained to prevent a breach of an order of the administrator. However, it has no provision in it for the obtaining of an interim injunction. Such an injunction could be used to prevent the carrying out or continuing of action contrary to the guidelines during a study of the matter by the board and the later investigation leading up to the making of an order by the administrator. In contrast, the anti-profiteering bill provided the authority for the Attorney General to obtain such interim injunctions.

It would seem to me that there is equal, if not greater need under the anti-inflation bill, with its conciliation procedure preceding any enforcement action for the Attorney General, to be able to obtain an injunction to restrain the commission of what could turn out to be breaches of that law. Otherwise, throughout what may be a lengthy procedure leading up to the making of an order a firm could continue to exact what later could be found to be an improper price or profit.

I think the government should provide clarification as to the extent prices received by farmers and fishermen are intended to be dealt with under the prices and incomes program. There should also be similar clarification as to the manner and extent marketing boards are to be covered by this program. On October 16, it was reported in a Canadian Press dispatch that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said in St. Jacob's, Ontario, that while farmers would be exempted from the controls, the government "expects everybody to voluntarily apply the law to themselves". But last Tuesday he said in the House:

> Some hon. members have been critical of the program. They ask how can farmers and fishermen be exempt from the guidelines when the operations of marketing boards must obey the guidelines.

He went on to say:

> There is a simple explanation for having marketing boards under the guidelines and not the farmers.

A Canadian Press dispatch the day before yesterday reported that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in Assiniboia:

> The controls will not apply directly to farmers, small businessmen and others who could only be controlled by a vast bureaucracy.

He went on to say:

> We are going to trust the farmer and fisherman.

These words, like those of the Minister of Agriculture in St. Jacob's, Ontario, could imply to some at least that the guidelines—that is to say, the rules for acceptable price and salary increases—would apply to farmers but would not be enforced against them by the compulsory selective controls provided for in Bill C-73. However, what do the guidelines set out in the white paper actually say about this? On page 18 we see the following, "prices received by farmers and fishermen are exempt from the guidelines". You can see why I say some clarification would be helpful so that we would know whether the words of the Prime Minister in Assiniboia reflect current policy, or whether the words I have quoted from the white paper still apply.

Also, the Minister of Agriculture appeared to say in the House on Tuesday that marketing boards are covered by the guidelines. He also said at that time:

> They cannot inflate prices beyond a fair level because the National Farm Products Marketing Council is the watchdog over national marketing boards and there are representatives of consumers, producers and business on the present council which demands that prices paid to producers be based on the cost of production and the reasonable return for their investment.

The fact is, however, that members of the council who are not linked with the producer interest are only a minority of its membership. One can ask: does that council therefore, have the necessary balance in its membership to provide the reassurance to the general public on this that is necessary? Also, the council deals with only a handful of boards set up under the federal National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. There is a much greater number of boards operating solely under provincial jurisdiction. The white paper says only that their operations will be discussed with provincial governments to ensure they are consistent with the guidelines. It is not clear whether this discussion will be undertaken by the government itself or the Anti-Inflation Board.

Surely, the marketing boards should be subject to the guidelines, and the monitoring of their adherence to them must be handled by the Anti-Inflation Board in the same way as any other segment covered by these guidelines. If marketing boards are subject to the guidelines, they could increase their prices only to the extent necessary to pass on actual increases in cost. But the major cost to them is the price they pay farmers for the product in question. A major factor in such a price is the return to the farmer for his efforts and his investment, and not just the cost of inputs he has to buy, such as the purchase of machinery and seed. This is how the cost of production formula used by the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency is structured to determine egg prices across Canada. One of the costs permitted in that formula is a return to the egg producer which some say could, under that formula, exceed $42,000 a year.

A requirement that a board's price-setting must be consistent with the guidelines would be meaningless if the board could always pass on any increase in the farmer's profit margins as one of the costs which the retailer could then include in higher prices for the consumer.

The Food Prices Review Board was dissolved and disappeared as the Anti-Inflation Board was set up. The latter board is operating temporarily under the authority of the Inquiries Act until Bill C-73, giving it more permanent status, has been adopted. The public may well believe that the Anti-Inflation Board has, or will have all the powers of investigation, report and recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board. However, I submit that this does not appear to be the case when it comes to food prices.

The Food Prices Review Board could get at all the facts behind food prices and could look at any part of the food chain from farmer to processor, to distributor, to retailer. It could look at prices charged by farmers and the inputs that went into them to see whether those prices were justified. However, it would appear that the words of the guidelines, taken together with the words of Bill C-73, mean the Anti-Inflation Board cannot look behind the prices received by farmers and fishermen for their products in the same way as could be done by the Food Prices Review Board.

According to Bill C-73, the Anti-Inflation Board can only look into matters, and I quote, "in relation to the guidelines." These guidelines do not cover prices received by farmers and fishermen. In fact, one could ask why the guidelines should not be applied on a voluntary basis to farmers and fishermen in the same way as for everyone else. This would permit the Anti-Inflation Board to carry out the same kind of study of food prices at all levels, in the same manner that the Food Prices Review Board had been able to do effectively in the best interests of consumers and Canadians generally.

I think farmers themselves would want to be able to confirm to the rest of the Canadian people, through the studies of the Anti-Inflation Board, that they are doing their part in the restraint program and that they are following the price guidelines even though they are, understandably, exempt from the compulsory features of the program. However, the government appears to be saying not only that farm prices should be exempt from the guidelines, but it also seems to be saying in the chapter of the white paper entitled "Structural Policies" that there must be allowed potentially open-ended price increases to farmers for their products, including increases in profits, in order to ensure an adequate supply of food.

On page 10 of the white paper we find this statement:

> —to ensure adequate supply of food, farmers must be assured of a rate of return commensurate with the large investment of labour and capital essential to agricultural production. This return should come from the marketplace, but producers must be given some protection against large losses arising from highly variable and uncertain markets.

Of course farmers must receive a fair rate of return, but so should workers and small businessmen. Where is the evidence that ever increasing farm prices are required to ensure an adequate supply of food in Canada? The problem, instead, is to have an adequate supply at prices which are fair to both producer and consumer. There is no evidence that there are basic shortages of foodstuffs. The evidence is just the opposite. If we were facing such shortages, why would current government policy provide for cutbacks in production, in other words, for quotas of less than productive capacity for eggs and dairy products?

The fact is that there was such a sizeable production of eggs, even at the lower prices which prevailed some months ago, that the government marketing scheme was amended to reduce quotas for egg production, for example, to only 62½ per cent of capacity in Ontario. A recent press report said that there has also been such a sizeable production of industrial milk products at current prices that the government is likely to reduce existing quotas for industrial milk production.

Also, why should the return come entirely from the marketplace? Do these words mean that the government will be phasing out its present subsidy on powdered milk and the other subsidy it pays to farmers on industrial milk? In other words, is it intending to eliminate them as it eliminated the subsidy on fluid milk in the fall of 1974? Having farm prices come entirely from the market means that the burden of higher food prices will fall particularly heavily on lower income Canadians. They pay a higher proportion of their income for foodstuffs than Canadians who are better off. I believe there continues to be a place for properly constituted subsidy programs, since they come from government revenues which are raised through our tax system, which is based on the concept of ability to pay.

Also, what is the rate of return to the farmers the government is talking about in the white paper? How will the government ensure that it is fair to the consumer as well as the producer? It does not say so specifically in the white paper, but surely this is a job for the Anti-Inflation Board. This key section of the government's white paper makes no reference to fair prices for consumers at all. The word "consumer" does not appear anywhere in any of the portions of the white paper dealing with food prices. Does this mean—I hope it does not—that the government has abandoned the commitment on food policy it gave in the throne speech just before the last election and which formed part of the program on which the public based its decision to re-elect the government? This commitment was that it would develop a food policy, the objectives of which would be neither "unduly low prices for farmers" nor "unduly high prices for consumers," and those I think are the exact words. Also on page 10 of the white paper it is stated:

> Many non-food prices may have become unduly rigid as a result of government policies. The federal government intends to focus with some urgency on identifying ways in which supply bottlenecks and price rigidities in its own areas of responsibility can be reduced.

Why does the government express concern only about undue rigidity of non-food prices? What about the rigidities in food prices caused by the government's own policies? The rapid increases in egg and dairy prices over the last several months are considered to have been one important cause of recent increases in the cost of living. This is the very situation the government is now trying to deal with through its anti-inflation program. Still, I am glad the government is presently recognizing the need of having policies to deal with structural problems in the economy which contribute to inflation, as I called for this kind of action in a speech in this House over a year ago.

Why does the government apparently consider higher productivity important only for the agricultural sector, so that to get it the government will allow farmers any return they can extract from the marketplace? Surely, it must also be concerned about maintaining and improving the productivity of other sectors of the economy as well. How does the government intend to encourage and maintain productivity in the non-farm portions of our economy?

I suppose one argument which could be made for exempting farm prices even from the voluntary application of the guidelines and the review procedures of the Anti-Inflation Board is that farm prices are affected, and in many cases set, by international factors. It is argued that, being internationally determined, there cannot be lower prices for many farm products in Canada than those one could obtain for the same products in the United States or elsewhere on world markets. However, farm products are not the only ones produced in Canada which trade internationally and for which Canadian prices are therefore the same as world prices. The guidelines state generally that Canadian prices of such non-agricultural products should conform to the price guidelines, and export prices should be at world levels. In other words, there should be a two-price system, and if a two-price system is not practical, then the guidelines say the government will impose a levy to the extent the Canadian price would be in excess of the price permitted by the guidelines.

Why should there be a two-price system for non-farm products traded internationally, and not for foodstuffs? Further, if farmers increase their Canadian prices to match international prices, why should they keep the entire gain any more than the producer of a non-farm commodity whose goods trade internationally?

The government has not made a definite statement in its white paper as to its objectives for reducing the rate of inflation over the next three years. One could say that these objectives are implicit in the wage targets of 8 per cent for the first year, 6 per cent for the second year, and 4 per cent for the third year. However, there is no definite statement that these are also the government's over-all objectives for reduction of price levels. In fact, if the wage targets are reached, it will not necessarily be the case that the cost of living will decline to the same level. The government admits this in saying that where the cost of living exceeds the basic protection factor in any year, the excess will be added to the basic factor in the next year.

The government intends to exempt increases in the cost of production of energy and some aspects of housing, as well as farm prices, from even the voluntary application of the guidelines and the monitoring which this would entail on the part of the Anti-Inflation Board. This implies possible rises in the cost of living and price levels generally, in spite of wage restraints. It could be argued that inflation was running at only some 7 per cent for several months earlier this year, and that it was government policy which brought about increases in energy costs and in the prices of certain agricultural products which helped to lift the cost of living to double-digit levels once again. A statement of the government's target for the general level of prices over the next three years would help reassure workers that the government is as interested in dealing with prices as it is with incomes.

As I have said, to be successful, the attack on inflation program and the prices and incomes policy requires the support of all Canadians. This means, in particular, that they must be equitable and must be seen to be equitable by wage earning Canadians. It has been suggested that the poverty line for a family of four today is at least $7,000 annually. I think it would be fairer for low income Canadians if the floor below which wages could be increased without reference to the guidelines were raised in a fairly substantial way and the income level to which the floor applies raised as well.

The enforcement of the legislation must be even-handed when it comes to its application to prices and profits and to wages. It cannot be administered in a way which appears to be severe when it comes to wages, and lax when it comes to prices and profits. I think the government could argue that the guidelines themselves are tougher when it comes to prices than they are for wages. The guidelines spell out the percentages by which wages will be allowed to increase. The basic rule for prices, however, is that they can increase only by the amount required to cover actual increases in costs. There is no automatic percentage increase allowed for prices, as for wages. But to make this concept meaningful there must be as strong an enforcement procedure on the price and profits side as on the wage side.

There will be transitional difficulties to be dealt with in administering and applying the controls program as it gets under way. I think that with the application of common sense, sensitivity and good will, these difficulties can be worked out and the program successfully applied. But the program must deal adequately with major areas of expenditure for the average Canadian, including food, housing and energy. So far, the government's program does not appear to reassure individual Canadians to the extent I think it must that the government will do what it reasonably can to restrain price increases in these and other key areas of costs for them.

The government must also be even-handed in its efforts to deal with inflation and recession. Both of these problems are still with us. It would be wrong to overlook the fact that we still have 600,000 Canadians out of work. We must have programs that deal at one and the same time with inflation and recession. Measures to increase production and productivity help solve both the inflation problem and the recession problem, since they touch on a fundamental cause of inflation, an imbalance between the supply of goods and services and the demand for them.

Ultimately, it is more productivity, rather than controls and restrictions, that will get us out of our present difficulties. Controls can, at best, give us a breathing space to take steps to restructure our economy, to take steps to deal with unreasonable expectations, and to take steps to deal with blockages and rigidities whether they are in the private sector or in the public sector.

Let me say that our aim should not be simply to tighten our belts to limit our demands to the capacity of a stagnant economy. Our aim must be to get our economy moving on a path of real growth, and thereby enable all Canadians to share in the increased prosperity that would result. The government's prices and incomes policy is a key part of such an effort. It must be balanced by effective programs to deal with unemployment and slack in the economy. This is what the public expects in terms of leadership from the government. The Canadian people will do their share when motivated by the kind of leadership the government pledged in the last election.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-73 deserves the approval of this House on second reading. With the improvements and clarification that can be provided in committee, the bill will also deserve the final approval of this House and, what is more important, the final approval of all Canadians.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my speech I should like to comment on the speech of the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). I think many of his comments and suggestions are valuable, useful and correct, though I do not share his enthusiasm for the anti-profiteering bill—now, happily, defunct. I can understand his view—he being the author, or father of it to some extent in the last parliament—but it was not much of a bill. I do not think we should spend time arguing about that, however.

I think I heard the hon. member correctly when he referred to the fact that certain details of the enforcement procedure made enforcement ineffective. In my view, the enforcement provisions are an absolute key to the efficiency and effectiveness of any legislation, more particularly this sort of legislation. If you do not have effective enforcement, if you have long delays, if you have inadequate procedures to institute the necessary actions, the whole scheme is bound to collapse.

I would have thought the logic of the hon. member's remarks would bring him to what might be a painful conclusion for him: even that he would be bound to join those in this House who say that an ineffective bill is no solution to the inflation problems of this country, and we should vote against it unless and until we have a bill with adequate enforcement provisions in it. That seems to me to be the logical conclusion, rather than starting with high praise for the bill and its excellent intent, saying he is going to support it, and then giving what I think are effective reasons why we should not support it.

I agree with my colleagues who have said this is basically a wage and salary control measure. I agree that it does provide some pretence of control of profits and prices, but I think it is fairly ineffective. The pretence that there is effective price control in this legislation, or spelled out in the government's white paper on the subject, is completely without foundation. I, personally, would like to repeat the view which I believe the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) expressed, that the scheme is unfair and inequitable on the one hand, and unworkable on the other.

I do not intend to repeat all the arguments that have been made to support this proposition which was very clearly spelled out by my leader and other colleagues, but I want to deal with one subject. I think we are being asked, when presented with this bill for second reading, to give a blank cheque to the government to abdicate our functions. There is practically nothing definite in the legislation. It is just a framework within which we tell the government to go ahead and prepare a scheme. I do not think it is good enough that parliament should be put in that position. This is an extremely important matter and we are considering extremely important legislation. I think we should have a very clear picture of some form of draft regulations, or at least an understanding that until the regulations, which are the key to the scheme, are ready, the bill would not be proclaimed.

This paper "The Attack on inflation," vague as it is in spots, while it is helpful, in my view is not law at all. It is just a statement of the intentions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on the matter. Until we have some indication of what is going into the regulations, we will not know what we are imposing upon the people of Canada; we will not know what we are legislating about.

Certainly the crisis of inflation is no surprise. It is not something that loomed on the horizon a few weeks ago; it has been well known for years. It is worldwide. I would have thought that in the interval the government could have worked out prospective regulations to enable it, when it became necessary to come before the House and ask for this power, to explain clearly the power it was seeking. In my judgment, it would be irresponsible for parliament to pass this bill in its present form.

I now come to the second part of my argument. The major shadow overhanging this bill is the constitutional issue. It has become fashionable to treat the constitution as something which interests lawyers, as something about which the law officers of the Crown consult when the government wants to do something in order that they may assure the government that it can do as it wants. But we live under a constitution. We live under a federal system in Canada which spells out the functions of various governments. The courts have determined questions of constitutional jurisdiction. In the final analysis, the assessment whether this legislation is constitutionally valid or otherwise will depend upon the Supreme Court of Canada. I suggest that the constitutional arguments have not been answered adequately.

There are serious reasons for concern. I will not say what the Supreme Court of Canada may or may not decide. No one can possibly know. The court itself will not know, I think, until confronted with the legislation and the necessity to decide. As I say, there are serious doubts about this bill. Any lawyer, any sort of constitutional expert, will be aware of what happened after the First World War. The federal government of the day passed legislation which had a serious impact on prices. It was known as the board of commerce and fair prices act. The government enacted this law which dealt with prices in a way not altogether dissimilar from what is being proposed today.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in a decision approved over the years by the judicial committee and referred to by the Supreme Court of Canada on many different occasions, reaffirmed that there was no right of intervention by parliament in something which was prima facie within provincial jurisdiction under section 92 of the British North America Act merely because there was some declaration that the bill was for the peace, order and good government of Canada. That is the sort of language one reads in the preamble. The federal act was struck down by the court. I do not say that decision is necessarily final, as circumstances may not remain the same, but the decision has been reaffirmed and is a major obstacle to this bill.

I am aware, as others in the House are, that the tendency has been to interpret section 91(2) of the British North America Act, dealing with the regulation of trade and commerce, in a much broader way than was the case some years ago when the judicial committee was our only court of last resort on constitutional issues. I know that the provision may be expanded, and I am sure excellent arguments can be put forward to justify the law we are considering under the regulation of trade and commerce head. But the constitutional validity of this bill is by no means clear or certain.

I find particularly distressing something the government has not done. In the preamble to the bill there is no indication that the government treats this situation as a national emergency. It is well recognized that if something imperils the future of the country, that matter comes under the peace, order and good government provision of the act and would transcend purely provincial regulation. That is well known. It is also well known that the courts looks at the preamble to a bill to determine whether it was enacted in response to some dire emergency. What do we find when we look at the preamble to the bill now before the House? I think the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) touched on this point.

The first paragraph beginning with "whereas" speaks of inflation. It says it is contrary to the interests of all Canadians, that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern, and that therefore it is necessary to restrain profit margins, etc. But there is no word of an emergency in the preamble. It so happens that such words, or words similar to those in the preamble, have been considered by the courts and the courts have decided that they do not justify federal intervention into the provincial domain. You cannot say that a great many Canadians are concerned, or that something is a matter of serious national concern, or that if affects all Canadians, and bring it within federal competence unless it is within one of the specific heads of section 91. If the matter is within section 92, Canadians must expect the provinces to have authority with respect to it.

The question is, is there a clearcut case of emergency? I am not saying there is no emergency which would justify government intervention. I think the ravages of inflation are so serious and so pervasive that they threaten our whole economy. I argue strongly that there is power to act under the peace, order and good government section. Yet I regret very much that the preamble to the bill, a preamble which the courts will examine, does not indicate that the government itself is treating the situation as a national emergency.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, this would be a good opportunity for me to abandon the party line for a little while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: However, I really do not intend to do so. I was pointing out before lunch that one of the troubles with this legislation is that it envisages a total abdication of parliament's control over highly important legislation. The only serious thing there will be is regulations passed by the governor in council. We do not have any draft regulations; we are asked to say, "You have authority to handle this in any way you like." That is just not good enough. Some draft regulations should have been prepared which would fill in the substance of the legislation we are being asked to pass. It is not healthy for parliament to give blank cheques to the government on a matter of this sort.

The second point I was trying to make is that there is a serious cloud over this legislation by reason of the question of the constitutionality of the bill. This is not just a superficial matter to be shrugged aside or passed off by saying, in a vague way, that some of the law officers think it is all right. There is a formidable case for doubting the validity of the bill. It is not only a question of the final decision; it is the effect on the whole process of effecting the purpose of the legislation.

It is fairly obvious that ordinary wage earners and small businesses are not going to run to the courts to seek delays or to get involved in constitutional issues. That is a much too expensive business for them. However, the attack may well come from some interests who are dissatisfied with the guidelines as a whole and can use the courts and the constitutional issue that is involved for postponing the effective application of the act in their particular cases. It is one more instance where, unwittingly no doubt, the bill leans in favour of those who are in a strong position and against those who are in a weak position.

Apart from the constitutional issues, there are reasons for doubting the effectiveness of the legislation. Before I pass from the constitutional issue, I would say that in a matter of this sort which is seriously in doubt, the government should have referred it—and, indeed, still should—to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to set aside these real doubts as to their powers. They have not done that. They have not drafted the legislation or its preamble in a form to indicate there is a real emergency. That will seriously affect the act as a whole.

There are many other reasons for doubting the effectiveness of the provisions, particularly as they purport to apply to price control. First is the uncontested fact that instead of a direct control over prices, which might be enforceable even though it is not particularly easy, we have some indirect formula of controlling prices through the control of profit margins. In my judgment, that is not the way to control prices: it brings into the equation a lot of highly obscure and difficult accounting questions. Again, it is an opportunity for those who are well organized to get the best accounting advice to escape the provisions of the act.

Mr. Broadbent: Not to mention lawyers.

Mr. Brewin: I did not mention lawyers because in this field the accountant is vastly superior to the lawyer. There may be a few lawyers who are up to accounting standards. I was a little shocked to hear one of my colleagues in the House the other day say that any lawyer worth his salt would know how to falsify the books. Having practised law, I knew quite a few lawyers who were certainly worth their salt, but at no stage of their career did they ever dream of stooping to the practice of falsifying books. However, there is the question of effectiveness by reason of the failure to deal directly with price controls. I know they are mentioned in the bill. However, in the white paper we received it is fairly clear that the present intention of the government is to deal indirectly with prices through the attempt to control profit margins. There are many difficulties involved in that.

In order to initiate any sort of enforcement proceedings, as I understand it there must be an investigation by the Anti-Inflation Board, and I think it will be a miracle if they are not soon swamped with a tremendous backlog of cases. This would be another cause of delay. The individual consumer or citizen, or group of consumers or citizens, has no power whatever to initiate proceedings. The administrator, who is given the main function for enforcement, can act only on advice or on a report by the Anti-Inflation Board or the minister. That is wrong. Even under the old combines investigation acts—although they were not too effective—there were provisions for groups of citizens to initiate proceedings. Experience has shown that to be absolutely necessary. Such a provision should certainly be in this bill. In addition, after the administrator has acted on the advice or report that is made, no doubt after fairly lengthy investigation, he is given certain powers. When his powers have been exercised, they are subject to appeal to an anti-inflation appeal tribunal. Following that procedure, if that is not enough, there is a possible review by the Federal Court.

All of these weapons are weapons of delay, and they are all available to those with the means and the will to try to disrupt enforcement of the act. The machinery that is provided invites delay and obstruction, and this will lead to the ineffectiveness of the whole scheme. I am not saying that there should not be some form of appeal procedure, but I am saying that the procedure is unduly elaborate, quite unnecessarily so, if you really want effective enforcement.

Unless people have confidence that these measures will effectively control prices, they will not get very much public support. I do not think wage earners will be enthusiastic about supporting the measure when they see inflation creeping on notwithstanding the legislation. There are so many exemptions and potential exemptions in the proposed legislation, some inevitable perhaps, that one has serious doubt whether anyone could honestly say that they believe the legislation could be effective.

First of all, I gather that firms with less than 500 employees are not covered under the mandatory provisions of the bill. Secondly, farm and fisheries products are exempted from the provisions of the bill—and this will affect food prices. That may be inevitable, as it may well be inevitable with the provision exempting imported products. When the government says it cannot, or will not control food prices directly, I am afraid we are getting into a situation where confidence in the measure is almost impossible.

As for energy, my understanding is that the federal government proposes to allow the price of oil to rise toward the international price by reason of the provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act. This is another huge gap in the effectiveness of anti-inflation legislation. For example, Ontario Hydro has asked for and received approval of a 27 per cent increase. I understand that this increase is under review by a committee of the Ontario legislature, but nevertheless there is the real prospect of Ontario Hydro receiving this increase. This is one of the organizations that has great influence on prices. Both industrial and consumer use of energy is vital to the maintenance of stable prices, yet the exemption is provided.

There are other exemptions. One group of teachers is covered, another not, by accident of date when the last agreement was signed. During the first day or so of this part of the session we were told by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) that the postal workers were not really covered by the act, though I think other members of the government said that they were. In addition, interest rates and financial institutions generally, such as banks, are more or less exempt from the act. A large field of insurance is exempt.

As for rents, I understand the provinces are trying to work out a joint method of controlling rents. The government proposals will allow some flexibility, which perhaps is necessary and right. But if this flexibility varies from province to province, it will just be one more inequity. As for new structures the rents of which have not yet been established, these will be exempt for five years after date of completion; that is, if rent controls last that long.

There is one clause in the bill which I do not know how to properly interpret. It is the clause which refers to the historic relationship between closely related groups of workers or employees. They are not affected by the legislation and an increase can be given under the guise of historic relationship. I do not know how many historic relationships there are, but I would think there are very few employees anywhere who are not historically related to some other employees in a closely related field. The extent of this gap in coverage is not made clear.

The coverage of the legislation, the scope of the exemptions, and all other matters which presumably will finally be written into the guidelines are not made clear. Even if they are clear, I suggest that no firm over-all plan to stabilize prices is proposed. If prices are not stabilized, we cannot expect wage earners to accept wage controls. These controls would hit particularly hard at people like pensioners, those not earning an adequate minimum wage, those who have no union to bargain for them. These are the real victims of inflation, yet apparently there is no measure in the legislation to assist them. In my riding there are many old age pensioners who will be asking me, while prices continue to rise, as undoubtedly they will, what protection they have. I know there is a cost of living escalator; my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has frequently explained this and I am not going to take the time to detail the matter.

Looking over all these different points, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the government has come up with an inadequate measure to tackle the evil at which it is aimed. I am afraid there is no clear plan to enforce price control to balance attempted enforcement of wage control. As a result, I believe that the longer we pursue this matter, the more dissatisfaction there will be. It is fine to talk about consensus, and it would be nice to have consensus about what we should do to combat inflation, but we cannot have consensus on the basis of a lopsided control that benefits one group and punishes another.

Lastly, let me mention the positive aspects to which reference has been made previously. If we are to deal with inflation, should we not do something about the scarcity of housing? In my constituency, escalation of rents is the most serious concern of many elderly people and people on fixed incomes. A tragic situation has developed, the solution to which is not controls. With a shortage of accommodation within the price range that people can afford to pay, whether by way of rent or mortgage, controls will be evaded. We saw this during the last war when under-the-table payments were made to get people in or out of accommodation. All sorts of indirect methods were devised to extract higher rents from people who were desperate for housing because of the shortage.

One thing we must do if we are really going to solve this problem is provide more housing, and a large portion of that must be public housing because the private system of providing housing is not meeting the needs of the Canadian people. I know the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) says he has some great scheme up his sleeve, and I will be interested to hear what it is, but if it is anything on a par with what he has produced to date or, indeed, what was produced by his predecessor, it will be just another scheme for giving a little bonus to the people in the top one-tenth of the income scale in order that they may buy houses that are far too expensive for the average Canadian to have any possible interest in.

● (1420)

I believe that to produce an unworkable and unbalanced scheme today is a sham and a fraud perpetuated on the people of Canada. We have a real problem that must be solved, but we cannot solve it in the way this bill suggests. It is for these reasons, and the many excellent reasons advanced by my colleagues in the course of the debate, that I say the only proper thing to do is reject this bill and try again.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) spoke on television on October 13, 1975 to announce that the following day he would ask Parliament the authorization to set strict controls on price and income increases, we have heard many comments which were not always very favourable.

The next day, on October 14, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) introduced in the House Bill C-73, An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada. This legislation, which I would say stems from forced voluntarism, has given rise to various reactions throughout the country. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) explained at the beginning of the sitting on October 22 that the absence of a few ministers was justified because they were travelling throughout the country to explain the provisions of Bill C-73.

I hope they will be welcomed everywhere, since sacrifices must be generally accepted by the people in a period of inflation created by a financial system which does not properly take into account the economic conditions of the time.

A Montreal newspaper reported on Wednesday, October 21, that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) had launched a crusade to explain the new restraint program and that on his arrival at the meeting place in Winnipeg, he had been received by demonstrators who seemed more or less prepared to listen to his explanations. It must be added that on that occasion he met more than 750 workers who were concerned about the probable loss of their job.

On Tuesday, October 21, La Presse published an article headlined this way: Anti-Inflation guidelines generate serious injustices. Here is the comment that followed:

> Union leaders seem to recognize the need for restraint one way or another to fight inflation. However, they are concerned about the injustices that the ceiling on wage increases will generate.
> Here are a few examples: Chefs working for the federal government can be grouped either with hospital employees or with general services employees; the former have obtained last spring a salary increase of 21 per cent but the latter are negotiating a new contract and thus will not be able to obtain more than 12 per cent.
> Forest workers with the International Woodworkers of America in British Columbia have just signed a collective agreement which provides for a 30 per cent wage hike over the next two years; their friends of the paper industry refused to sign their collective agreement because they hoped to obtain still more. Now, they will have to be satisfied with 12 per cent.

Postal workers have just turned down the conciliator's recommendation for a 38 per cent wage boost over a 30-month period, the equivalent of the increase postmen obtained last spring.

Very often, groups of workers have been without collective agreements for many months; the postal workers' agreement expired at the end of 1974, the nurses in Quebec have been without a contract since June and the social workers in Alberta have been expecting higher pay since March.

The October 20 issue of the Montreal daily Le Devoir mentioned, on page 6, that the General Council of the National Federation of Quebec Teachers had decided last weekend to ask the CNTU to organize, together with the other trade unions, a counterattack against the anti-inflation measures.

In an atmosphere such as this, one can easily imagine the problems the chairman of the new board and his assistant will have to face. A final decision apparently is still pending on their respective salaries, but I have great reasons to believe that both will have a lot of work to do. I have no doubt about the competence of the chairman who has to his credit a lot of experience in the business field. I hope that his generally smiling approach will survive the inevitable problems which will certainly arise during his term of office. In his televised speech, the Prime Minister mentioned that people all over the world are caught in the grip of the revolution of rising expectations.

We have come to the point where we think that, by virtue of some magic formula, we can provide ourselves cheaply and in plenty, while constantly improving our standard of living, with food, energy, housing and government's services. We feel that all that is due to us without any respect for the collective increase in goods and services. That is the point the Prime Minister made after having advised every Canadian to live within their means.

However, I share the opinion put forward by newspaperman Normand Girard who wrote on October 18:

Mr. Trudeau, it appears, has overlooked in his guidelines one of the most important factors responsible for the cost of living hike in Canada: publicity.

How could such an exhortation by Mr. Trudeau, be it televised across the country, compete with the constant exhortation to spending imposed on Canadian homes by the manufacturers of everything consumable?

At one time we are shown the most beautiful car, at another time we are shown the biggest car. Later we have the latest in furs before our eyes;

Department stores go as far as offering consumers credit cards by telephone. In short, everything in our society of consumerism encourages people to live beyond their means.

Therefore, would it not have been consistent for the Canadian government to include some restrictions on advertisement which encourages spending?

The "ordinary people" who will choose not to abide by the anti-inflation measures will be put in prison, but television, radio, newspapers and magazines will be allowed to continue in all impunity to encourage them to do so.

Is not the ordinary person sometimes right to question the consistency and seriousness of his governments?

On October 14, here in the House of Commons, my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) quoted the definition of the word "inflation" given by the Larousse dictionary at page 543:

Inflation: Déséquilibre économique caractérisé par une hausse générale des prix, et qui provient de l'excès de pouvoir d'achat de la masse des consommateurs (particulier entreprises . . .) et des services mis à leur disposition.

And he added this:

As members of Parliament, we have to ask ourselves very seriously, not facetiously, but as responsible people, if there is really inflation in Canada. Is there an excess of services offered to people, is there an excess of potatoes, tomatoes, pork, milk, butter, cheese?

In the same speech to the House, the hon. member for Bellechasse pointed out the increase in the national debt since 1867: $30 billion to October 1, 1973, and $58 billion to July 1, 1974. Realizing that situation of constantly heavier indebtedness, one can easily understand that the problems which confront the government are mostly money problems. This makes it that much more difficult to understand why supposedly competent administrators are still hesitating about making the required changes in the monetary system which is the cause of most of the difficulties we are encoutering.

Repeatedly, at the House, I have said that any progress in our productivity should bring in dividends to the shareholders of Canada, the Canadians. To that end, the government should, on behalf of the company, issue and distribute new money to finance new activities.

But when the financing of progress is left to the banks which loan with interest, the credit so created, progress, can do nothing other financially than become a debt.

We have reached the stage where we no longer hear of the possibility of paying back the debt of the country, too high a percentage of the incomes being used to pay off the interest that amounts to over $1 billion a year.

The government of the country does exactly what the law normally prevents any citizen from doing—not to pay his debts. Our learned politicians can claim they are knowledgeable but they seem to forget that the modern monetary system is first a system of accountancy and that the first quality to be expected of it is the exactness of the volume of credit in circulation. Since this credit is the means of payment, it is clear that it must bear some relation to the goods available. We borrow in 1975 to pay for debts made several years ago. Of all the dictatorships enumerated in history, of all those at least which have effects today, the most important is certainly the dictatorship of money. The moment a country enters civilization, it comes under the domination of the financial dictator. And this kind of dictatorship made more victims, imposed more deprivations, caused more sufferings, washed away more talents and broke more homes than any other.

It caused more moral and material ruins than any war, however disastrous in history. Parties that follow one another to power do not change the situation. The government seems to exist for the sole purpose of enforcing taxation, restrictions and hardships, even though our country has all the required resources for everyone to live at ease.

The same monetary policy is imposed by the same system to the leaders of whatever party. It does not mean that financiers invented political parties, not at all. But once political parties were established with election funds, meagre at first, then replenished by the protégés of public contracts financiers saw this as an excellent means to control public matters. Election funds took tremendous proportions, but they also created obligations. Any financial credit originates from the bank by minting national credit, on behalf of government, on debentures; the bank makes the government—whatever its color—a perpetual debtor. By minting the capacity to produce of big companies to which it advances credit created in this way the bank joins those who feed the election funds to get the protection of the law. We see that directly or indirectly the banking system places the government under trusteeship; it would be time I think for people concerned for the good of this country to find other ways of doing things.

The media inform us that the city of New York is threatened with bankruptcy because of a system of this kind. It is serious enough to think about it. We heard here in this country the words "economic crisis" brought about by financiers through the stock market. We had deflation, inflation, regression—and I forget some—but in the final analysis it is always a money problem. The demoralizing situation that prevailed in 1929 left unforgettable traces which have repercussions today. Politicians of all stripes can no longer count on people resigning themselves to accepting their unforgivable negligences; they will have to realize that the present financial system is obsolete, that it must be replaced with a system aimed at serving and not enslaving the human being.

Yet there is a way to foresee a logical solution with simpler methods. Unfortunately, our politicians are looking for complications; with a multitude of means available to them they multiply difficulties, no doubt to show the flexibility of their imagination.

● (1440)

However, we are facing all kinds of problems: poverty, strikes, bankruptcies, thefts, crimes, unemployment and our leaders continues to grovel before financiers, the masters of this unthinkable situation: wealthy country, poor inhabitants.

Last October 17 my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) submitted to hon. members of this House practical suggestions based on a retail discount formula. He said:

> Our industrial system rests on work already done by a number of generations. We, as inheritors of that complex system of production, can view it as our real credit.
> Unfortunately, we cannot produce at full capacity because of the credit formation monopoly held by the banks. The real credit must be "monetized", so the people can reap now the benefits of their inheritance. It must achieve the growth needed to produce the maximum amount of goods and services required.
> The instrument capable of monetizing our real credit is the people's bank, that is, the Bank of Canada.

Why should we pay in 20 years from now three times the value of what we received only once? Why should we pay $1 million 20 years hence for a school that cost us $500,000 when it was built? Is it because financiers wish to make us work 75 per cent of our life just for them? We build a school that costs $500,000 and we pay back to banks the value of more than two schools. One school for us and two schools for banks, one mile of sidewalks for us and two miles of sidewalks for banks, one water supply system for us and two for banks: 40 to 70 per cent of municipal budgets are used to pay interests to banks. Banks are growing bigger every day while people are growing thiner. Financial institutions are gnawing at them like a cancer.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

I take this opportunity to quote here the founder of the economic philosophy of Social Credit, Major Douglas:

> Social Credit is a new strategy for an old battle between the will of the tyrant to dominate and the will of the individual to be free.

The government should by all means aim its decisions at altering a system under which we are constantly running into debts—

Mr. Boulanger: In what year did he say that?

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Major Douglas started saying that over and over from the moment he understood the shortcomings of the present system. However, should I repeat that 25 times, I don't think the hon. member would understand. It would take him 100 times to understand.

An hon. Member: He is too thick-headed!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Otherwise we will find ourselves in the midst of a bureaucratic nightmare which will bring about more nuisances than positive results.

We have just realized that four new members will assume full-time responsibilities on the Anti-Inflation Board. Two chartered accountants, one of which sat on the committee on Bankruptcy... He in the right place: if things do not work out he will at least know what it is all about. Another one was a member of a royal inquiry commission. He is probably quite experienced in the matter of bureaucratic procedures. The third one is a former minister of social affairs, a Liberal well used to putting social welfare recipients on short allowances. The fourth was born and studied in Britain. He has already dealt with working class activities, and he will hopefully remember that when it is time to make practical suggestions about workers wages.

The salaries of those people will probably not be affected by the restrictions of the new anti-inflation plan. They will feel quite comfortable to determine the levels of food prices and workers wages in Canada as they pave the way for a type of socialist economic dictatorship.

In an excellent speech on October 22, the Social Credit member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) called the attention of hon. members to the disastrous results of controlled policy experiments by different countries and outlined clearly the causes of inflation. There are enough examples of all types of events elsewhere for us to be able to do something different before it is too late.

The common sense and the logic of the Social Credit may put to shame those who have always preached the opposite. They can hurt those who have noticed the weakness of the system but who lack the courage to denounce it. But the pride of these people does not make the Social Credit ridiculous. Any citizen who examines the proposals of the Social Credit can easily judge for himself if it is ridiculous or logical to want as we do that people eat their fill of the products which are placed in abundance before them. He can also judge if it is ridiculous or logical to give like the Social Crediters more importance to food, clothing and housing than to the figures written on pieces of paper.

Social justice does not consist in taxing the honest man for the benefit of financial interests. As long as we believe that production is aimed at consumption, this inevitably implies that we have a duty to find a way to give the consumers access to our abundant products. Since the child when he is born is naturally entitled to live, it is not normal to burden him with debts caused by the financial system of the country. Instead, he should be entitled to the heritage left to him by the previous generations.

It is unthinkable that people who believe themselves to be serious can assert that good results can come from wrong methods, that freedom can emerge from bureaucracy or regimentation or that our abundant production can be distributed through a short money supply system. All types of boards have been established, which enables the government to protect its friends. I would not be surprised if one day one of our politicians, of whatever party, makes a suggestion that he will undoubtedly find brilliant, that of establishing another board to study the role of the numerous boards already in existence. What we should really establish is a monetary board which would enable Canadians to get out of this ridiculous social situation which allows poverty to exist in spite of abundance.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I thought that after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had heard the persuasive speeches of members of the NDP, it would not be necessary for me to make this speech. But the jolly green giant of the cabinet apparently is not persuaded at this stage, and therefore it is necessary for me to make my speech. In all the speeches that have been made during this debate, and in the discussions that have taken place across the country, there has been one common trend throughout; that is, agreement that Canada is in its worst period of inflation, recession and unemployment since World War II.

Mr. Baldwin: And bad government.

Mr. Gilbert: I think this is the reason we have to address ourselves to this problem, which is not only a national problem but an international one. When you think of the low inflation we had in the 1960s, 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent, and the high inflation we are having in the 1970s, 11 per cent to 12 per cent, the enormity of the problem becomes clear.

With regard to recession, we have not been able to gear our productive capaticy to a point where we are meeting the needs, demands and expectations of most Canadians, and therefore we are in a recession period. We are also in the highest unemployment period that Canada has experienced. I notice that one of the Ottawa members nods his head. I thought he was going to say it is even higher than during the Conservative regime form 1958 to 1962.

At the end of September we had a seasonly adjusted unemployment figure of 732,000, indicating a 7.2 per cent rate. When you look at the distribution of the unemployment rate, you find that in the province of Newfoundland it is 18.8 per cent; in New Brunswick it is 10.4 per cent; in Quebec, 9.3 per cent; and in British Columbia, 9.6 per cent. This underlines the problem of unemployment across the country. If there is anything that the former minister of finance bequeathed to the present Minister of Finance, it is that today we have the highest unemployment ever, the highest food prices, the highest interest rate and the highest rate of inflation.

Hon. members may recall that when the former minister of finance resigned, the question in the minds of many Canadians was who would replace him. Now we have the present Minister of Finance. His was an unexpected appointment, for most Canadians, although I might say it was probably a good appointment when we consider the other cabinet material which was available. The Minister of Finance has come forward with his own and the cabinet's solution to the problems of inflation, recession and unemployment. We in the New Democratic Party have said that his response to these problems is both unfair and unworkable. We have said that it will not build any new houses, it will not provide reasonable food costs, it will not combat the shrinking purchasing power of those on fixed incomes, it will not increase production, and it will not put Canadians back to work.

There have been many analytical reasons put forward as to why we have inflation, but I think we are all agreed that ours is not the traditional supply and demand type of inflation. It was rather interesting to glance at Walter Gordon's book in which he says that inflation today is not caused by the marketplace machinery, but by monopolies which set the price of most consumer goods. In his recent book "Storm Signals" he sets forth his reasons for saying that Canadian consumer prices are set by monopolies which operate in the marketplace. They are not concerning themselves with the problems of supply and demand but, instead, with the demand for their particular products, and setting prices not in relation to the cost factor but in relation to their administered prices of which profit is the foremost factor.

I was interested in what Mr. Gordon said with regard to the monopolistic companies which control the Canadian economy. I will list a few of them to indicate the strength of his reasoning. The petroleum field is not controlled by Canadian companies but by monopolistic foreign companies. The companies are Imperial Oil, Gulf Canada, Shell Canada, Texaco Canada, and BP Canada. When it comes to mining, again there is monopolistic control by companies outside Canada which operate the firms of International Nickel, Falconbridge Nickel, Noranda Mines, Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, and Rio Algom.

With regard to forest products, again we have monopolistic companies the ownership of which is outside Canada. Those companies are Canadian International Paper, Abitibi and its subsidiary, Price Company, MacMillan Bloedel, and Crown Zellerbach, Canada. We know that the automobile industry is controlled by General Motors of Canada, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors. With regard to computers, there is IBM. When it comes to aluminum, there is Alcan Aluminum. The liquor industry is controlled by Seagrams, Hiram Walker, Godderham, and so on. Beer is controlled by Labatt's, Molson's, Carling and O'Keefe. With regard to tobacco, we have IMASCO, MacDonald's Tobacco and Rothmans. That is just a short list of the control which monopolistic companies have with regard to consumer products which Canadians must have to enjoy a certain quality of life, and this indicates the problem the government is facing in controlling these multinational companies.

I usually analyse the shortcomings of a bill before giving the New Democratic Party remedies to the problem, but this time I will reverse the order and give the remedies of my party to the problems of inflation, recession and unemployment. I will capsulize them for reasons of time, and I hope for the persuasion of hon. members. The first remedy of the New Democratic Party would be to impose selective action to stop unnecessary price increases. The first prices all of us can think of would be oil and gas. We would pass legislation rescinding the 10-cent excise tax on gasoline. With regard to the oil and gas industry, the zooming profits of recent years should be brought to the attention of hon. members. With regard to Imperial Oil, Gulf Canada and Shell Canada, there are figures available on their profits and their percentage of return.

In the years 1970 to 1974, Imperial Oil had a net income increase of 176 per cent and a rate of return of 22 per cent. Gulf Canada had an increase of net income, in the years 1970 to 1974, of 313 per cent and a rate of return up to 20 per cent. Shell Canada had an increase of net income from 1970 to 1974 of 178 per cent and a rate of return of 16 per cent. These figures indicate the necessity of controlling oil and gas companies across the country. Their profits are unconscionable and the government has done little or nothing to stem that tide. I might say that this bill will do little or nothing to control the rate of return of oil and gas companies.

This pattern applies across the board and includes financial institutions and the large corporations which operate in Canada. Recent figures for banks have shown very sharp increases in profits in the past few years. The same is true for large corporations. Therefore, to combat this problem we would set up a prices control board with power to investigate and roll back increases which are not justified.

The second approach would be this. We would make sure that the impact of inflation on those who suffer the most from its effects would be cushioned. I am speaking of people on low incomes and fixed incomes. We would increase old age pensions and veterans allowances so that the recipients could meet some of the high costs they are experiencing today. It is not sufficient to say that a cost of living increase is part of their pension. What is necessary is a pension which is adequate to meet the demands of the day.

The federal government should give leadership by amending the Minimum Wages Act. This would benefit people on low incomes in that they would have sufficient money to provide necessities for their families. Over and above that, there are people who have personal hardships. We must devise programs which will meet these personal hardships. With the extra money they would have, we could increase the demand for goods and services, which would have the effect of helping the unemployment problem and also the problem of production.

Our third method of solving the problems of inflation, recession and unemployment, would be to have a massive housing program. I am looking forward to the programs the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) now has on the drawing board. I hope he will bring them forward very soon. The programs he has brought forth have had a little effect but not a substantial effect on this problem. In the final analysis I think the federal government has to give the initiative and leadership to parliament to control housing and earnings across the country. We have suggested that the government should increase its allotment of money for land assembly and direct construction and, more directly, with regard to the control of mortgage rates.

Neither in Bill C-73 nor more especially in the white paper has the government taken the real initiative with regard to controlling interest rates. It has stated that it will let them fluctuate because of the international demands for money.

I hope that I can persuade the Minister of Finance that there are three types of interest. There are consumer loans which have a particular rate of interest, business loans which have a particular rate of interest, and mortgage loans which have a particular rate of interest, and they are all different. There is no reason why the government cannot direct the financial institutions to set aside a certain allocation of their investment moneys for housing at a particular, low interest rate. This is a social responsibility and it is up to the government to direct the financial institutions to take this action.

We have said that the interest rate should be fixed at 6 per cent. Of course 6 per cent would operate to the detriment of the profit and loss statement of the banks, but it is absolutely necessary if we are to combat the high cost of housing and high rents that prevail. There is a certain persuasion in the suggestion of the members of the Conservative party that an income tax allowance be made concerning the high interest rate after a maximum of 8 per cent, but in the ultimate analysis if we are going to talk about a reduction in the cost of housing we have to strike the main components, land and interest. Interest is the most flagrant abuse of the profit power. Therefore I think the government has to take the initiative. I am rather disappointed that the white paper did not spell out the necessity of controlling interest rates at a moderate figure.

Those are the three main approaches that the New Democratic Party would take on these vital problems, Madam Speaker. My colleagues have done an excellent job of analysing the shortcomings of Bill C-73. I would only remind the House that the Liberal response to inflation was set forth by the Minister of Finance, who said that we must distribute the burden equally across Canada. This is an attempt to perpetrate a cruel hoax on Canadians. The minister knows that the weight falls heavily on people with low incomes.

When I was younger I remember reading the works of George Bernard Shaw. He said there is one thing about rich people, they will do anything except get off the backs of the poor. I think it is the same today—they will do anything except get off the backs or out of the pockets of the ordinary working people.

The philosophy of the minister's approach is wrong. He comes from the riding adjacent to mine so we have many things in common. There are working people, and people of many different ethnic origins, who are attempting to develop a quality of life of which they can be proud. He and I have a certain consensus on what should be done regarding housing and so forth, so I hope he will take note of what we are saying and take some action. But I see no sign of it in this bill and I am not the only one who cannot see it.

When I see the minister's approach to profits, limiting them to 90 per cent of the average net pre-tax profits over the preceding five years with special exemption for export products, then I look at the oil companies—Imperial, 176 per cent in the last five years; Gulf, 313 per cent; and Shell 178 per cent. They will continue to enjoy the high prices and profits they have enjoyed in the last few years; they have the strength, the power, the corporate sleight of hand to protect themselves fully. This also applies to banks and large corporations. There are too many exemptions, too many loopholes with regard to the profits of corporations across the country.

It has been announced that wages will be restricted to an 8 per cent increase in the first year 6 per cent in the second year, and 4 per cent in the third year, with a minimum of $600 and a maximum of $2,400. I am sure most Canadians feel this should be reversed so that people on low incomes should get $2,400 and people on high incomes should get $600.

I notice the new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) is in the House. I want to congratulate him on his appointment; it is an excellent one. I believe he is a man of competence, ability, and compassion. I would hope he will find a way to reverse that approach of $2,400 for people on high incomes and $600 for people on low incomes. How can people even get the $600 if they do not belong to a union? How can people on low incomes attempt to get it? What bargaining power do they have? And what about pensioners, what about veterans? There is no assurance that the Minister of Finance is going to make a statement that these people will get the minimum of $600.

We have had a statement about rents. Following the meeting of the provincial ministers of finance the Ontario treasurer, Darcy McKeough, stated that the Ontario government is going to wait to impose rent controls. I am sure that the Minister of Finance wants the Ontario government to move, and move quickly, because there are many people within his riding, and all Ontario ridings who have been directly affected by high rents. I hope he will take his usual strong, tough, attitude which he displays at times, and tell the Ontario treasurer that his approach is not good enough and that these measures must be taken immediately to give protection to the people of Ontario in regard to high rents.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I should like to refer to the board itself. It is a very difficult and cumbersome board to operate. I am sure the chairman and its members are going to encounter real difficulties in regard to appeal board procedure, going to the Federal Court and then to the cabinet. This just means it will be cumbersome and complicated, and cause delays. It does not give me confidence that it can solve our problems.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, from the Prime Minister's statement one could take it that it is possible that changes will take place. I suppose this is as a result of his dialogue and the speeches he has made across the country. Most of his speeches have been made to high income groups. Every time he goes to a meeting where trade unions are involved he is rejected.

Speeches which members of the New Democratic, Conservative, and Créditiste parties have made across the country will, no doubt, influence the Prime Minister, to make changes. But I can just hear what he will say—"We will increase the minimum exemption for wage earners from $600 to $800, and we will not impose heavy restrictions on dividends, as the corporations are exerting pressure." Really, that is not good enough. I hope the Minister of Finance will not adopt a sphinx-like attitude and say, "That is all we can do now; when times are better we shall make changes." He may suggest amending the Income Tax Act just before the next election in order to help people. I hope that will not be his attitude. I hope he will take positive initiatives and will not do some of the things he suggested he may do. As I say, I hope he adopts some of the remedies the NDP has mentioned. I say that because I am sure all Canadians agree that only by working together can we make this a better country, a country where all Canadians can live a better life.

Members of the NDP, in common with many Canadians, feel that Bill C-73 will not be adequate for dealing with the problems of inflation, recession, and unemployment. That is why we will not hesitate to vote against this bill as it stands. We hope the minister will introduce changes which will incorporate some of our ideas, and thus make this a better country in which to live.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it was appropriate for this bill to be introduced by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Finance, as I think it reflects the thinking of people who are fortunate enough to live in affluent parts of the country, like Rosedale.

I am not from Rosedale, Mr. Speaker, and I want to bring to the government's attention the thinking and concerns of people who are not lucky enough to live in affluent places like Rosedale or Mount Royal. I shall take my examples from the north, but what I am about to say will apply equally to the Maritimes or the east end of Vancouver. In those areas few will need to worry about the government's ceiling of $2,400 on raises. Not many people in those areas make that kind of money.

The average income of most working families in the Northwest Territories, my part of the country, is around $8,000 per year. Most of us are used to the idea of buying gasoline at a high price. The average price of gas in my part of the country is just about $1 per gallon. It is not at all unusual to pay $1 for a quart of milk. So you might say that we knew about inflation long before the word became fashionable in Montreal or Toronto. Therefore, when I talk to the government about these problems, I sometimes feel tempted to charge consultant's fees.

We in the north have spent a lot of money learning about inflation and should be given special consideration, possibly in the form of special tax concessions. For instance, people who live north of the sixtieth parallel should be allowed special allowances. These might induce more physicians to practice in the area. I suggest that there should be more adequate recognition of conditions in the high Arctic, especially economic conditions which are not the same as in the rest of the country.

The government has created many of our economic difficulties. It has proposed wage and profit controls as a solution to these difficulties. In its wisdom the government has lumped all our economic problems under the catchword inflation. It has said that we should now knock the wind out of inflation, and it proposes to attack inflation by controlling our wages.

What is the government doing to solve other problems like unemployment, monopolistic market structures, and in housing and transportation? Housing and transportation, particularly, are important matters for my constituents, as well as for many others in this country.

Over and over again you hear members of this House talking about the problems in housing and problems in transportation. I tell them that transportation is one of the big problems in my area. The high cost of transportation has led to the very high cost of living with which people must cope in the part of the country I represent. Even though the government refuses to acknowledge these problems, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that they exist. The white paper which preceded this legislation touched, at one point, on these problems. It is too bad that the concern shown was not translated into legislation. The part to which I refer was near the beginning of the white paper, in that section dealing with the infrastructure of our economy.

The job market is one of the structures of our economy. What is happening in the job market? The national rate of unemployment is over 7 per cent; in some parts of the country it is over 20 per cent. Statistics show that the unemployment rate for native people in northern Alberta is about 65 per cent. I guess unemployment is not much of a problem in constituencies like Rosedale or Mount Royal.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Or Broadview.

Mr. Firth: What about the housing problem? One can see many problems in the housing part of our economy. Housing costs take a big chunk out of peoples' take home pay, and the percentage lately has been getting bigger, faster. I suggest that these increased costs have nothing to do with the wage demands of a tin bash or of a swamper. No, Mr. Speaker, high costs have much to do with high mortgage rates.

In Yellowknife a house costs almost twice as much as a comparable house costs in Edmonton, although the two centres are only 1,000 miles apart. In Rankin Inlet, in the Northwest Territories, the problem is even worse. People who do not have a government job cannot buy, rent, steal, or borrow a house. I guess hon. members opposite and to my right would explain this in capitalist terms by saying that in Rankin Inlet there is a seller's market. Anyone who manages to put up a small, poorly insulated house in Rankin Inlet could ask for the price of the moon as rent, and get it. That will show you how bad things are in Rankin Inlet. As I said, we in the Northwest Territories know about inflation. That is why I say this bill will do little or nothing to solve the problems I mentioned, problems existing in my part of the country.

[Mr. Firth.]

Transportation is another part of our economic infrastructure. Hon. members may be surprised to learn that the Northwest Territories are served with bus lines. The bus provides a cheap link between Edmonton and Yellowknife. It moves people and goods cheaply between those two centres. Actually, most of us in the north depend on air transportation, although merchants use the bus system to ship small items from the south. The price of shipping by bus recently rose by 30 per cent. As the increase took place on October 1, this legislation will not roll it back. That 30 per cent price increase will be borne by people like Jerry Rieman who runs the camera store in Yellowknife. Jerry will pass the increase on to his customers, and they will pay it. We shall see increases in the cost of aviation fuel, and other increases in transportation costs. We know they are coming. This legislation will permit them and they will be passed on to the consumer. Those increases will be inflationary. This bill will do nothing to stop them.

This bill does not stop the inflation problems of the ordinary consumer. It does stop the inflation problem of those who live in places like Mount Royal and Rosedale. What is that problem? The problem is trying to stop paying more and more for wages. People who live in places such as Rosedale and Mount Royal are more likely to be employers than employees.

The government has solved one inflation problem for a few people. However, when prices go up because of higher transportation costs, higher housing costs, or anything else that will fit through a loophole in this bill, other people will pay. They will pay for it out of take home pay that has been frozen, frozen because the elected representatives from Rosedale and Mount Royal think that controlling wages is the only answer to inflation in our economy. As I said, some people in other parts of the country do not agree with them.

I am sure some members opposite are about ready to tell me that the price controls outlined in the bill will stop inflationary price increases. Before they do that, let us look at what will happen when the price of gas will again go up.

Pacific Western Airlines, which operates out of British Columbia and Alberta into the western Arctic, will be forced to increase its rates on merchandise being shipped to a wholesaler in Yellowknife. That wholesaler will have to raise his price on goods going to Snowdrift, Fort Simpson, or wherever. Retail outlets in these places will have to raise their prices and the consumer will have to pay the increase out of his controlled wages. That is just a simple example.

Into the picture comes the Anti-Inflation Board. Let us say they get there three or four months after the initial increase and their investigation goes on for a month. After that time they may decide the airline was not justified in increasing its freight rates. Is the board going to see to it that the consumers in smaller communities, who for months have been paying five or ten cents more for items will be reimbursed? I seriously doubt that.

The board will not be able to stop all the other five and ten cent increases that are bound to occur, not even if they had 5,000 employees instead of 500. They will not be able to do that because this bill only stops increases in wages.

To sum up, I wish to emphasize that the inflation problems of most Canadians are not solved by this bill. They are caused by a limited supply of housing, trends on the international commodity markets, and the concentration of market power in the hands of fewer and fewer corporations. These problems are also caused by the inability of the government to show any economic leadership.

I hope that the leaders of the business community who live in places like Rosedale and Mount Royal are happy with their elected representatives. I know that people in many other parts of the country, especially those in the Northwest Territories, are not happy with such members.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Before recognizing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), I must advise the House that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before I start on the substance of my report I wish to refer to the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) who on half a dozen occasions chose to refer to my constituency as being particularly affluent, and indicated that therefore I would bring to this question a rather narrow viewpoint. I think it is unfair to put to the hon. member for Northwest Territories the requirement that he know in detail all aspects of the country. He has a lot of ground to cover himself.

I can understand that the hon. member might not know my constituency very well. But he obviously was not listening to his colleague the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), who spoke just five minutes before, pointing out how similar his electorate was to mine, that is Broadview and Rosedale. I am going to say about the characterization that if I am a fat cat, I guess the hon. member for Broadview is as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member for Northwest Territories does not have to listen to me or visit my constituency, but he should listen to the hon. member for Broadview. He is a man of excellent spirit and sentiment, even if from time to time I disagree with some of his judgments.

In reply, I would like to state that since I last had an opportunity to participate at second reading I have discussed the white paper and Bill C-73 with the provincial governments in the two-day federal-provincial meeting. I wish to refer briefly to that meeting and also to some of the points made during the debate.

With regard to the federal-provincial meeting, the provinces really agreed on three essential points. First, they agreed with our expression of concern about the current economic situation, in particular with regard to the trend in the rates of inflation as requiring special action; second, that the initiative for this action must appropriately and properly be taken at the federal level and by this government; third, that while there may be certain details of the program we put forward with which they disagree, and upon which they would like to see changes—as I said in question period today, we will certainly consider changes and I will refer to those in a moment—in general they are prepared to support and co-operate with these particular proposals.

One of the points that emerged at that meeting and which should be pointed out in this debate is that a policy with regard to prices and incomes, by definition cannot possibly deal with all of the economic issues in Canada. There are many serious questions with which we have to be concerned. The question of regional disparity has been referred to by a number of my colleagues on this side. There is also the question of range of incomes within the community in a vertical sense, and the kinds of changes we should have particularly when dealing with those on fixed income.

The first point is that we cannot and should not by this policy alone try to overcome the problem of regional disparity. We should continue to try to improve the policies that have been and are being followed by my colleagues in that area. On the other hand, we should not by this program seek to make the disparity any worse. It is for that reason I have to reject, for example, the suggestion of the treasurer of Ontario that there should be cuts in the DREE program. This is a question which has also been raised in the House.

With regard to government expenditures, obviously there will have to be some hard decisions taken in connection with the 1976-77 estimates. There will have to be some cuts which will be painful in certain parts of the country. However, with regard to certain policies, Regional Economic Expansion is one we should seek to make more efficient, but we should certainly not make it a particular victim of our inflationary concern.

The second point is that over the years there have grown into our economy and society inequalities in incomes. Some of these have come about directly as a result of collective bargaining. Under our system the trade unions have been in a position to bargain for more favourable treatment, not only to create difference as between different worker groups in our community, but within the structure of a union itself, a scale of compensations. So one cannot hope to overcome by a prices and income program alone differences in economic return to various people in Canada.

Governments in Canada essentially over the years have assumed responsibility for providing basic standards of income for the unorganized, for example through the minimum wage laws both at federal and provincial levels. As I had an opportunity to say in this House yesterday, my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), had the opportunity yesterday afternoon to continue the federal-provincial discussion of the minimum wage in Canada.

It is a fair observation that in the past there has been a certain ambivalence among the various provinces in regard to this matter. On the one hand there is the very legitimate concern of people elected in public life to try to divert their efforts specifically at those at the bottom of the income scale. There has been the equal concern often expressed at these meetings that a too rapid increase by the federal government will put pressures on those in certain of the provinces who are not under federal jurisdiction. My colleague will be in a position to report on these discussions in due course, but the question of the minimum wages is one that has been covered during the last 24 hours at the federal-provincial meeting.

In addition to that, as I have said to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, under the old age security plan, the guranteed income supplement, the Canada Assistance Plan, and now under the new and more recent provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act we have provided for other groups in our community that are not in a position through economic power or through collective bargaining to take care of themselves.

After all of these speeches in this debate are in, however, the basic problem will still remain, and that is the one with which I started off the debate, namely that if those with economic power can obtain higher and higher levels of compensation, then there are two inevitable results. In the first place, given that the quantity of additional resources in Canada is finite, there will be less and less available for those who are without economic power. Secondly, higher returns for those in a position of economic power, whether you talk about doctors or lawyers, corporate executives or public servants, steel workers or auto workers, landlords or corporations—those increases have to be paid for by somebody in the community. They are in fact paid for by everybody. They become a net cost increase for all of us in the community. When that occurs and they become a net cost increase, they therefore, in part at least, become the responsibility of those at the bottom of the income scale, among others, to have to pay.

It seems to me that those basic facts are ones that we as a nation have to come to terms with in this proposal. As I said in opening, we are not going to join in the argument about whether or not the wage increases and catch up increases of the past are responsible for inflation. We are insisting, however, that if all major groups with power insist on big increases, or on leap frogging ahead for the future, in the long run there will be a net cost for all of us to pay which will have to be passed on, and in due course it will be borne by the economy and will result in another inflationary increase.

During the course of the federal-provincial conference a number of problem areas arose, and I will refer briefly to them. Reference was made this afternoon to rents. May I say in fairness to the provincial treasurer of Ontario that he was not averse to taking early action on rents. However, he did accede to representations made by other provinces that the provinces as a whole should proceed together on the basis of national criteria. The fear, of course, was that if there are different regimes from province to province, this could have an adverse comparative effect with regard to investment in new accommodation. In fairness to Mr. McKeough, he was not the dilatory person in this particular discussion. I think it can be said that no one was. But there was a basic problem of trying to get some national standards followed by each of the provincial governments in carrying forward this part of the price control program which will be carried out under provincial jurisdiction.

The second point that was difficult and which has been much raised in this debate, for example by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) last night, is that of professional income. This is one of the most difficult of the questions that were raised. I do not think that anyone would claim that those of professional income who, relatively speaking in terms of numbers, are not a substantial percentage of the work force, are alone responsible for dramatic increases in incomes. Rather there is the comparative problem that if they do not seem to be covered by this program then the program looks unfair. It would want that quality of equity in which all appear to share in restraint.

In this discussion we recognized a lot of the frailties put forward by the hon. member. I think, without coming to any final conclusion on this, that there was a recognition yesterday that possibly there would have to be in the first place, between the federal and provincial governments—particularly with the provincial government participation since the concept of a self-governing profession is established under provincial law—some agreement on appropriate fee schedules, and possibly, to reinforce this question and the equity of the matter, a surtax might have to be considered and perhaps imposed at the federal level.

With regard to the medical profession—not the profession of the hon. member for New Westminster or my own—we recognized that in some ways we would be working against some of our other objectives in public policy if we were too restrictive in terms of what we did. If we said that there would be limits on income from the existing level of effort but that for additional hours put in, or additional patients seen, there could be a further increment, we would run into financial problems, to say nothing of a health and safety problem with a practitioner who sees half as many patients again as he saw last year, which would likely mean he would not do as good a job for his patients as he should.

Mr. Broadbent: In case of lawyers it would be good if they stopped working.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Additional work for lawyers would seem to suggest that there would be a rampant crime wave in this country, but I will be objective enough not to wish that upon the country in the interests of my own profession.

The third element that was much discussed in this debate, one that has been discussed in the Liberal caucus and was very effectively referred to by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), is the appropriate maximum level for those at the lower end of the income scale, the $600 limit. It appears both from the federal-provincial meetings and from the debate here that there is some consensus that the $600 limit is not appropriate. What is lacking, however, is consensus on an appropriate alternative method. On behalf of the government obviously I will have to pursue this question with my colleague to see whether we can find some satisfaction in this respect, particularly in light of minimum wage discussions.

As for prices, it has been asserted long and repeatedly that there is no way that prices can be effectively monitored and controlled.

Mr. Broadbent: Or accurately controlled.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, accurately controlled. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) feels that in my new character I should not get involved in debate and I am trying to reform, but may I remind him again very gently of what I said on second reading, namely, that those in the group he now leads did not always think it was impossible to control prices.

I think it is fair to point out that many prices can be controlled in advance. Indeed, the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board has set about doing just that by requiring notification in advance of a price increase, and by requiring justification before any price goes up. That is the kind of regime that we had over the past two years with regard to petroleum pricing in Canada at the crude level. With regard to certain other products, particularly with consumer durables, automobiles, household goods, white goods and goods of that kind, the cost factor is such that it is reasonable to expect that justification will be required first.

An hon. Member: Is that going to be the case in respect of automobiles?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The price justification in that particular case would present no difficulty, and I think that should be done. I see no difficulty in doing that, nor with regard to certain services such as those covered by bank charges, once again there seems to be no effective argument against requiring justification in advance for that kind of change.

On the other hand, a real problem arises in a sector that affects every family in Canada every week, and that is, of course, with regard to the marketing of food products through the supermarkets. In this regard, as I have said elsewhere, it is not possible to have a policeman behind every bottle of marmalade, so there will be difficulties involved in the change of basic food prices from week to week. It will be very hard to have this kind of justification. We would try to control that in respect of gross profit margins by applying the same kind of test that this industry applies to itself for its own purposes.

Finally, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) in his speech said the banking and financial institutions would not be dealt with in this measure, but I would point out that they will be dealt with and in fact are covered in the white paper, and I include the insurance companies and chartered banks. The same cost pass through formula I just mentioned a moment ago would apply to them, therefore they would be restricted in respect of their increases in rates in the same way.

Before taking my seat, Madam Speaker, there were several questions of a legal nature raised which I should like to deal with now if I may. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) raised a question as to whether the Canadian Bill of Rights would apply to this particular bill. The answer is that indeed it would as there is no provision in here exempting the application of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Indeed, it is because of the obligation under that Bill of Rights not to deprive a person of property or liberty without due process of law that the formula covering, first, the appellate review, and then a judicial review of the work of the administrator is provided under this particular bill.

The question was raised at several points, by the hon. member for Peace River and by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), as to whether it would be proper at some interval before the termination date of the bill to provide for a fresh parliamentary opportunity, perhaps by way of an affirmative resolution, to debate the matter. For my part I would have no difficulty in accepting an amendment of that kind.

Having regard to the reports, I would think one of the essential elements of the work of the Anti-Inflation Board would be that there should be an extensive public report of its findings, and I am sure the board and the chairman will seek to do that. In addition to those reports there is a provision in the bill that reports from the administrator are to be made from time to time to the minister, and they are to be put before parliament. In conclusion, Madam Speaker, that deals with some of the broader questions on the implications of the program.

A number of serious questions as to detail were raised. I would be pleased to attend with legal counsel at the committee proceedings to discuss these questions. I have in mind the constitutional question raised by the hon. member for Greenwood. I would be prepared to discuss some of the other legal questions raised by hon. members, particularly the one raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I agree it would be desirable to have other officials, in addition to legal ones, on the financial side appear to answer questions both as to the bill and as to the concept of its administration.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a very simple question? He referred during his speech to the question of cuts in government expenditures for 1976-77. To make it plain, does the minister mean there will be actual cuts below the present amounts of money being spent by the government, or simply reductions in the rate of increase?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, in the estimates process the proposals for the coming fiscal year are already before the Treasury Board and there will be cuts from those particular proposals. Whether there is an absolute decrease will depend on the depth of the cuts.

While I have the floor might I say that I think there has been some agreement that, if it is decided the House should divide on this question, the actual taking of the division should be postponed until eight o'clock on Monday next. If it is appropriate perhaps I might recommend a House order to that effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The question is on the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the wish of the House that the members be called in now or that the vote be deferred?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I wonder if the House might agree that the vote should be deferred until eight o'clock on Monday night.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that the vote be deferred until Monday night at eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CORPORATION

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (for the Minister of Communications) moved that Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS TO LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for President of Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-23, to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors, reported with amendments by the Standing Committee on Miscelleaneous Estimates, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker—

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to advise the hon. member, but at this stage of the report, no debate is supposed to take place. A debate can be allowed only on third reading.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that Bill C-23 be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Corbin: Madam Speaker, I would like to assure my colleagues, especially the Parliamentary Secretary to the House leader, that he does not have to take a pill, I will be brief and his bill will be passed shortly.

However, I would like to take this opportunity to repeat what some of my colleagues and I have already said during the consideration of the bill in committee. We pointed out to the President of Treasury Board, mainly responsible for the introduction and passage of that bill that in our opinion, he did not go far enough as far as the pensions of Lieutenant Governors are concerned.

In committee, we tried to convince the President of the Treasury Board to change the text of the bill itself to take into account the particularly difficult circumstances under which the lieutenant governors of Quebec and their families took over the functions they now assume.

But the bureaucrats won that inning and, unfortunately, the President of the Treasury Board refused to follow the advice shared by most of the members of the committee. He won. But I am giving him another chance, and urge him to reconsider his position, Madam Speaker, because of the unfairness of the situation. Of course, I am speaking in relative terms with regard to the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick who fills his post, in some regards, at his own expense. He has to dig in his pockets to pay some of the expenses incurred in the course of his duties, duties which he has to perform and which he is expected to perform in view of his position.

I should have been remiss in my duty had I not pointed this out today. I know that several of my colleagues from New Brunswick on the other side support the stand we have taken, and I think it is most unfortunate that the procedure should not allow us to amend the bill as we would have wished with regard to the lieutenant governors of New Brunswick and Quebec.

One of my colleagues may wish to add to what I have said. That is why, Madam Speaker, I now bring my remarks to a close.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I will speak without the sound system operating. I wish to concur in the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), and say I too regret that the bill has not been amended. I think the incumbents of the positions to which he referred have given over a long period dedicated public service, and I regret that the amendments are not made.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I thought I should let the House know, now that we have given second reading to the bill on the anti-inflationary measures, that on Monday we will be beginning the debate on Bill C-69 dealing with unemployment insurance.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND THE ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINANTS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, may I say there have been some discussions between the minister, myself, and others in the House relative to some of the amendments which appear on the order paper, commencing with that in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), who unfortunately is absent delivering mail in that constituency. My understanding is that the minister has some comments she would like to make. I simply rise on a point of order to ask the unanimous consent of the House to make some amendments to the amendments which appear on the order paper. The minister will deal with the first of those. I make this request now on a point of order in order that I might retain my right to speak after the minister has spoken.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Indeed, Madam Speaker, we have had discussions on the amendments proposed to this bill. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) has consulted his colleagues and we both agreed that I would accept one of the amendments he proposed, the one appearing as subparagraph (6). The hon. member for Rocky Mountain himself would withdraw subparagraph (5) and subparagraph (6) would be amended as follows in accordance with the hon. member's views and mine. Therefore, this subparagraph would read as follows:

(5) A committee appointed pursuant to subsection (4) shall make public its reports and recommendations and the reasons that justify them and by renumbering subsequent subclauses accordingly.

You will note that the word "inquiries" has been deleted and that the words: "and the reasons that justify them" are added.

Therefore, if the hon. member agrees, I would move this amendment as I have just read it.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Madam Speaker, I agree with the amendments moved by the hon. minister. I hope this House will find it possible to support the amendment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This, of course, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed that the amendment proposed by the minister carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mrs. Sauvé) agreed to.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) I would request the unanimous consent of the House that I be allowed to withdraw amendment No. 2 standing in his name.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Wenman) withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 3.

Mr. Clark: I wonder, Madam Speaker, if I might call it four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that we call it four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Is the motion allowed to stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): All parties of the House have agreed to proceed with motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard).

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION STUDY TO IMPROVE SAFETY OF PASSENGERS AND EMPLOYEES

The House resumed, from October 28, 1974, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should study the advisability of establishing a Royal Commission on the notable shortcomings of Canadian railways and in particular CNR to increase the protection of the public in general and that of the employees in particular and to eliminate accidents and derailments of freight or passenger trains.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I seem to be once more on familiar grounds—

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point order, Madam Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that the floor is being sought by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), whose particular motion this is.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. We are resuming the debate from last October 28 at which time the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) had the floor.

[Translation]

So the hon. member has the floor.

We resume the debate and when it was interrupted, the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) had spoken to the bill.

[English]

Mr. Pearsall: Madam Speaker, I seem to be once more on familiar grounds, or should I say familiar rails, in rising to speak again on this motion brought before the House by the hon. member for Rimouski. I am very much aware of the deep concern expressed by my worthy friend, but again I must answer him as I did last October 28 when he brought the matter before the House in practically the same words.

This matter of railway safety which the hon. member has brought up for discussion, continues to be a principal concern of the government, particularly as rail transportation received strong emphasis in the new transportation policy tabled in the House last June. However, it is still our position that the way to improve the safety performance of the railroad is not to appoint a royal commission, as the hon. member for Rimouski has suggested.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) has pointed out, royal commissions take a long time to prepare their reports, and their recommendations are seldom implemented. When they are included in legislation or regulations, which is a rare occurrence, this usually happens some years after a report is brought down. No, I do not think a royal commission would expedite what the hon. member is suggesting in his motion, which reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should study the advisability of establishing a royal commission on the notable shortcomings of the Canadian railways and in particular of CNR to increase the protection of the public in general and that of the employees in particular and to eliminate accidents and derailments of freight or passenger trains.

Rather than wait for lengthy reports and studies, it is our view that specific and immediate steps must take place to improve safety on the railways. The key channel to which such improvements can be made is, of course, the Railway Safety Advisory Committee.

The committee's most recent progress report contains several specific decisions made with respect to resolving the difficulties related to rail accidents. It has, for example, established an improved system of disclosures of accident information to the Canadian Transport Commission for analysis and action. All railway accidents are now reported directly to the Canadian Transport Commission which is responsible for follow-up investigations and for public reporting. A "tighten-up" program with regard to the fitness of operating employees reporting for duty—a result of CTC order 20191—is proving effective. This involves stricter surveillance procedures by supervisors whose responsibility it is to ensure that operating employees on duty are fit, able, and alert.

A signal training program has been developed for signal construction, maintenance and operating personnel. Through on the job training, classroom instruction and home study, the program covers many areas, from general knowledge of train operation and railway signalling to studies of specific topics such as track circuits and railway highway crossing protection circuits. Employees must pass both written and practical examinations.

Minimum track standards and standards for operating rights of way are being developed. A special subcommittee was established to this end. They have to date defined specific priorities and have the agreement of Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways to submit standards to accomplish these priorities. The CTC will also carry out research and furnish draft standards. A study for test rules improvement and signal inspection is also under way.

This is the type of positive action that is necessary. We do not need more studies or a royal commission. We need to move on the studies that have already been made. In fact preliminary figures supplied by the major railways for 1975 show to date an improvement over 1974 statistics. Crossing accidents continue to be the most serious problem. Money and research are continually going into development construction of better signal and protective devices for the safety and convenience of the public at level crossings.

The accident level to date is about the same level as in 1973. The very fact, however, that statistics do exist indicates that steps must be taken to ensure safety on the railways. We must ensure that the good working relationship between the Railway Safety Advisory Committee, which includes the unions, and the CTC and MOT officials continues, and that improvements in railway safety continue to be the result.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association is also actively interested in the work and suggestions of the Railway Safety Advisory Committee. The priority matters they have indicated for the committee's working groups include the construction, maintenance and inspection of track standards; a revision of the air brake inspection and maintenance rules; the development of a uniform code of operating rules; and regulations governing minimum training standards for those railway employees whom the RTC has designated as having duties which affect safety in the movement of trains. The hon. member for Rimouski has brought up that matter in the past. The union has also asked for a review and updating of the RTC operations, engineering and general orders, and for a review of the sections of the Railway Act having to do with the safety of operation.

I might draw to hon. members' attention the on-going improvements that are being made in the CN system as a result of maintenance, installation of new facilities, and research. New rail is being installed, and a lot of work is being done in northern Ontario and in the western provinces. In order to improve safety and capacity, CN is installing new signalling and communication facilities. Radio communications continue to be improved. As well as being active in its own search for new and improved techniques and solutions to its operating problems, it is involved in joint programs to these ends with the Department of Transport and CPR.

Mr. Oberle: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Pearsall: I did.

I can assure hon. members that the government and MOT will continue to strive to reduce the number of accidents and to improve the safety and standards of our railways. It will take a good deal of money to renew, rebuild, and expand the rail network to accommodate the larger, heavier type of equipment that will be required in the next 10 or 15 years, but it must be done with an eye to the safety of people, both those operating the railroads and the general public. We recognize that there is much to do and that human error will always be with us.

I support the intent and principle of the motion, except that I believe we now have the necessary procedures in operation. We have only to ensure that they are working. I do not feel that a royal commission at this time would in any way help to resolve the problems which have been so well outlined by the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to enter into the debate on the motion moved by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) with regard to the shortcomings of the Canadian railways. I welcome this because for many years I have been involved in the frustration of trying to deal with the freight rates of the Canadian railways, especially in the interior of British Columbia, whether it be in the south central interior or the northern interior.

One of the reasons why we are debating a motion that we should have a royal commission is that there is a lack of direction coming from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), from his office, and from the federal government. This has been especially noticeable since I have been here, which now has been three years. We know that the minister came in, threw up his hands and said that the government did not have a transportation policy. It would not be difficult to deduce from that that the railways are not paying any attention to the Minister of Transport, his department, or the federal government, and that there is really no control.

Who is running Canada, the railways or the federal government? When we consider freight rates, especially in my area, and try to understand them or to be even remotely familiar with them, we have great difficulty because the Department of Transport is very complex.

It is not difficult to understand that over the years the railways have been taking whatever the traffic will bear, especially when there is little competition. Between my riding and Vancouver there was a time when there was no competition, and it was very costly to send our apples and soft fruits to Vancouver. Then there was a highway built connecting my riding and Vancouver, and there was competition from trucking. However, it was not very long until the large railway companies were able to buy out the major truck organizations, and then the competition was more or less stunted.

We gained much experience in hauling our produce into the United States, putting it on a railway car in the United States, shipping to a point south of Regina and Assiniboia, unloading the car, putting it back on to a truck and taking it to Regina. That was cheaper than sending it by a Canadian railway. I notice that the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin Mr. Pearsall is paying a great deal of attention to what I am saying, and what I am saying is factual.

We were at one time able to bring about competition, and then we were able to come to an agreement with the railways to have a competitive price. I remember that at one time we could load a can of apples in Kelowna, send it to Winnipeg, take it off the car, put it in cold storage, take it out of cold storage, put it back on to a car, ship it to Florida and obtain a rebate on our freight rates.

Hon. members may wonder why I am citing these examples of what used to happen. I am doing so because it is happening again today. One can send a box of apples from Washington state, which is just south of the Okanagan valley, into the eastern markets of Toronto and Montreal for 43 cents a box less than one can from Kelowna to the same markets on Canadian railways.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Whittaker: We are asked to buy Canadian. We are considering an advertising program in Canada to promote the sale of Canadian apples, but how on earth are we to compete with this kind of competition, which is mainly generated by our own railways, when they demand and take more money than competitive lines in the United States to haul the produce of Canada from one area to the other? Forty-three cents a box may not sound like very much money to hon. members, but it is a lot of money to the producer. The person who must absorb this amount of money is the producer. No one takes any less in Canada, and it goes right back to the producer. He has to take less for his product.

I used the examples of apples and produce, but those are not the only commodities involved in the interior of British Columbia. Commodities can be shipped from eastern Canada to Vancouver and then into Prince George for less than it can be done on a direct line which runs from Edmonton to Prince George. Someone must explain why these things happen. The ordinary layman does not have the opportunity to find out. The Department of Transport throws its hands up and says transportation policy is a mess. The department does nothing. It is time there was a royal commission.

Imagine the advantage the railways in Canada are taking with their freight rates. It does not cost the railways any more to ship commodities to these interior points, and it is not more difficult to do so. It is not any farther, but this happens because of some philosophy that it is competitive. Is this the way we are to build Canada? This is the way we have been trying to build Canada. This is the way we have been trying to have secondary industry, and this is one of the reasons why we are drawers of water. We do not have a transportation system which gives us the opportunity to compete within the framework of Canada itself. You can find all kinds of examples in Ontario especially. In Coast Chilcotin and the Prince George area many job opportunities have been lost because plants have closed.

In my riding in the interior of British Columbia a company got an area intensive grant from the federal government through DREE and established a plant which was competitive in every way. Their product was good, but they found that a large part of their market was in eastern Canada. Of course we know that is where the population is, and we know we get discriminated against in many instances.

Because of the change in freight rates last year this company could not compete with the American markets and so lost business. There was a stipulation that they must have so many pounds per car of a certain type of product, and so on, yet the COMINCO smelter at Trail, which is a subsidiary of the railway, was charged less. The company I speak of did not get the lesser rate because it was too small and it is not a subsidiary of the railway. There was a danger that they would have to go out of business and the DREE moneys would be lost, but luckily the market improved and they were able to pay the extra freight. They are at the mercy of these freight rates set by the railways who do not worry if somebody loses a job or goes out of business.

The former minister of transport said the department is in a mess, but we have a new minister now and I wish him well. He has a parliamentary secretary who has the interests of western Canadians at heart, but I do not think either he or the minister can do too much because they belong to a government that is not strong enough to bring the railways into line. They do not want to do it, they do not have the strength to do it, and I do not believe they are able to do it. In my opinion the motion of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) is a good one and I hope the government will support it.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to support the motion of my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Allard) concerning the establishment of a royal commission on railways. If I remember correctly, Madam Speaker, on January 4, 1974, the hon. member for Rimouski requested the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to discuss this motion.

As usual, his motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 did not receive the unanimous consent of the House. In spite of this, he noted with great pleasure that March 21 of the same year was set aside for the long hoped for railway improvement study. Taking the first opportunity to urge again the government to try and find answers in order to reduce the number of railway accidents, especially in view of the many derailments in the last few years, the hon. member for Rimouski even suggested that a royal inquiry be made on the railway administrations in an attempt to solve the problems caused by the shocking deterioration of this vital and nationally important service as soon as possible. Unfortunately, the matter was forgotten as soon as it was raised. However, my colleague for Rimouski made a fresh attempt on October 28 of the same year by asking—as I have done many times with regard to the railway service in the Saguenay Lac-Saint-Jean area—that an inquiry be made into the activities of the national railways.

Once again, I should like to ask all the hon. members who are here this afternoon to listen very carefully to what I will say during the few minutes allotted to me, so that I may state the reasons for my request and for supporting my colleague from Rimouski. Undoubtedly, Madam Speaker, the main reason for this request is that, as the member for Roberval, I have been aware throughout the years of many railway accidents, including derailments. In addition to those in my own riding, I could mention those which occurred in the riding of one of my colleagues from the Eastern Townships, in the province of Quebec. I intend to deal with the accidents in the passenger and freight transport services, without omitting necessarily all those which may have occurred throughout Canada.

I feel therefore it is my duty to ask again the House of Commons to set up a royal board of inquiry into the administration of our national railways, an inquiry which would certainly come up with adequate means to patch the many faults which now exist in this service of prime necessity and public interest.

In spite of all the studies which have been carried out to date, Madam Speaker, I am still convinced that such a royal board of inquiry is necessary, for such an inquiry, as I see it, would recognize the need to provide more safety and protection to passengers and railway workers alike.

● (1630)

At present I consider that the Transport and Communication Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission did not put enough emphasis on the inadequacies of the security standards set out in the railway area.

Referring to the report released following the 1970 general survey of railway tracks and prepared by the railway transport committee on can read the following on the first page of appendix 3:

The number of derailments in 1972 caused by the condition of Canadian National and Canadian Pacific tracks tripled since 1969, and nearly doubled since 1970.

It is easy to verify that the situation is not that bright because if one refers tothe 1959 figures one sees that there were 40 derailments, 69 in 1969, and 132 in 1972. That gives an average increase for the three years of 90 per cent. What a shame!

I continue quoting from the same report:

> Because of that continued increase in derailments it must be concluded that in a near future the number of derailments caused by the condition of the track will continue to increase as will the number of dead and wounded unless immediate steps are taken.

And those immediate steps would be to set up a serious royal inquiry that would no doubt enlighten us about the faults of the present administration and bring in corrective measures.

It is very important to know how to distinguish between accidental and localized administrative faults which can be corrected on the spot, and structural, basic faults which would require a complete overhaul of the organizations involved. So, Madam Speaker, this is a matter of momentous importance which deserves all our attention and all our energy if we want to get in line with current and future requirements and restore to our railways their reputation of yesteryear which was recognized throughout the whole world. Because we know that for a long time our railway were the pride of Canadians, financiers, administrators, employees and all the external traffic. But today, instead of boasting a futuristic railway network we make do with a very poor system. We were unable to maintain our railroads and the rolling stock. I should like to quote some examples of derailments that occurred, mainly in Quebec as I cannot mention all the derailments that were reported throughout the country. I should draw to your attention several derailments that occurred in my area last year, about 70 miles from Mont-Joli and more precisely in Routhierville, where about twenty cars loaded with oil and several other goods ran off the line. There was also another derailment within the same year between Mont-Joli and Rimouski, several cars loaded with passengers. Fortunately there was no fatality but it was a pity to see so much material damages. And I remember the accident I already mentioned to this House: between Montreal and Chambord during the winter a train with almost 100 passengers left the tracks at three o'clock in the morning. The passengers had to stay in the train without anything to eat and I had to phone Montreal to get the authorization to give some food to those people and to call for buses that arrived only at two o'clock in the afternoon. Can you imagine all those people waiting in the train? Madam Speaker, when such derailments happen the passengers are not ready to take another CN train the day after. They always say never again!

Madam Speaker, the accidents I just mentioned are rather important. And in the long term, they are vey costly if you consider the large number of derailments in Canada in recent years.

Finally, hon. members will agree that if the Canadian Transport Commission has found it wise to recommend to the Canadian National Railways to reduce the speed of passenger trains to 40 miles an hour, and often to 20 to 25 miles an hour, all year long yet, it was to bring down as much as possible the number of accidents on their railways.

I can then say that this coincides perfectly with the aim of this motion, which is simply to find serious solutions to that great number of derailments. For I remember that not so long ago, derailments could be counted on the fingers of one hand, whereas now they can hardly be counted with a calculating machine.

No doubt, Madam Speaker, accidents used to be less frequent, quite simply because tracks were well-maintained. In fact, for every seven miles of railway tracks, there were four employees responsible for maintaining and looking after those tracks.

Moreover, tracks were inspected everyday and frequently after the passing of passenger or freight trains. It has now been thought wise to increase sections to about 20 miles, while at the same time reducing the number of personnel in charge of the maintenance and surveillance of those tracks.

Funniest of all about railroad inspection, employees and maintenance crews most of the time travel the section they are in charge of by car on the highway. And they claim they have inspected railway tracks. I would rather say they go for a sunday drive.

Madam Speaker, it is my sincere belief that utter mismanagement of the Canadian National results in undue expenses and shameful waste.

Think also of CN senior executives who are provided with company cars and credit cards with unlimited coverage. I think I am justified in requesting in my own name and in the name of my colleague, with respect to the activities of the national railways, the institution of the famous royal inquiry commission.

Before concluding, Madam Speaker, I wish to remark that before engaging into secondary ventures as the building of towers, the development of shopping centres and real estate such as luxury hotels, our railways should first give an assurance they will adequately maintain facilities and services and also, since we are on this matter, keep a large number of cars and locomotives in railway service.

Let me speak of what happens and the noise that surrounds the trains. Doing repair work in a milk car, which is very often the case, on the heating system that is always out of service or the brakes that do not work most of the time, it is very complicated matter. Repairs used to be done locally. In Chambord, there was a repair shop. But today, if a button does not work, if there is a power failure, if there is no heating in some car, the latter must be sent to Montreal for repair.

In the meantime everybody gets cold in the train, and that is the kind of service we are getting in our trains. For this reason, I am pleased to support the motion of my colleague, and I hope the government will take good note and attempt to give the CN the men or technicians needed to guarantee better service to the people.

[English]

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I wish to emphasize the importance that we place on the matter raised by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), and we thank him for his efforts and appropriate comments.

Before going any further I should make it clear that if anyone is waiting for the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas) to start handing out plaudits and bouquets to either of our national railway companies, they are going to have to wait for many a moon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Many people in my area, as well as members from my area, saw the railways fold up their cabooses and all other facilities about five or six years ago. They simply removed them from my area. It might be very proper for those who have passenger trains to talk about them and their safety. However, we do not even have passenger trains.

It is of the utmost importance that safety be maintained throughout our rail transportation system. However, I am concerned. I feel that asking for a royal commission, as my colleague has stated, will not result soon enough in specific and decisive action which is required to ensure safety on our railway system or to improve the very poor system we have at the present time.

In addition, a royal commission at this time would cost $1 million, $2 million or $3 million. What is the price of a royal commission? What is the length of time it will be in effect? Will it be one, two, or three years? There are many programs that should be in effect now. In fact, many of them were needed a year ago or even before that.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Let us wait and see what will happen with our new Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I believe he is a sincere person, one who will do his level best to ensure that Canada has the best type of freight or passenger service, whether it is by air or water. If we get a train in Wiarton, I will invite the hon. member to be the second man on, because I am going to be the first!

One member spoke earlier about the respect and admiration the railways had at one time. I agree that at one time the railways did hold the respect and esteem of people right across this country. However, I ask hon. members; who was it that lost that respect and esteem? It was the railways through actions such as we saw in our part of the country when passenger service was taken out without sufficient reason for doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): I do not think that a royal commission will bring back that respect. It is something that has to be undertaken by the railways, Canadian National, Canadian Pacific, and every man Jack that works for them. They are the people who provide the service and the safety.

I am sure that every member who represents a rural area has received complaints from farmers in his area about bush and brush growing along the sides of railway tracks. This is not cut back. Therefore people driving along our highways and byways cannot see when a train is approaching. There have been numerous instances in my area, particularly since the beginning of the oil train runs from Montreal to the Douglas Point nuclear power development, of trains travelling late at night and early into the morning. People have driven right up to these railways crossings only to find suddenly there is a train on them. They cannot see far enough down the track to have an adequate stopping distance when traffic is on the line. The railways could rectify this by simply getting the crews out to clear the brush, fences, and waste that are piling up along the rights of way. I am not sure this will come about even with a royal commission, but members of parliament must let the railways know the feelings of the people they represent.

With regard to the runs from Montreal which carry bunker oil to the nuclear power station, I was surprised to find that the railways supply the lines and the engines, but somebody else supplies the cars. I have been successful with regard to having the oil cars marked. When I tried to pursue this further as to who was responsible, I found out that it was not the railways that are responsible for marking the cars, but those who own them. You must go through a devious route to find out who owns the cars and who is responsible for marking them. This is something the safety people should look into.

There should be better illumination of the markings, particularly on the black oil cars that travel the width and breadth of this country, so that during the dark hours those approaching a crossing will have their lights reflected and know that there is a moving obstacle. In many cases people have driven right into the side of a moving car.

I think that positive steps are being taken by the railway safety advisory committee, and this is the route we should continue to follow. The Ministry of Transport, however, sees the railway safety matter as necessitating a multi-faceted program of which this committee is one part. We are thus presently pursuing many other programs which will lead to the improvement of safety on the railways.

It is on these other programs that I wish to take a few minutes to elaborate. There is the transportation policy on rail system development and financing. The transport policy which is now being prepared for legislation provides for ongoing financing to ensure that a viable railway system is available for Canadian transportation.

We in this House talk about the improvements we would like to see. We talk about brushing, a new road system, overpasses, underpasses, and tunnels. However, we must realize that this is going to cost money. The money must be provided for this type of safety endeavour before it can be put into effect.

The program will ensure that ongoing financing is available to that sector. This naturally provides for a high level of maintenance which leads to improved safety of operations. The Hall and Snavely Commissions are assisting us in our program on the whole matter of grain transport with the objective of providing a high quality rail transportation system.

● (1650)

Many people travel throughout the world and see a number of different railway systems in Europe and in England from which we can learn many things. I also think we can learn of some of the pitfalls and problems.

Often not enough consideration is given to railways in rural areas. I think members from rural areas will back me up in that. People used to see the 9.20 train going through at 9.20 in the morning and returning at 8.30 at night. The action really started when the railways stopped running on time. People in the area knew when the train went through, and then they started running late and everyone became confused. The first thing you knew was that people along the track thought the 9.20 had gone through, perhaps they could not see down the right of way as far as they should, and the next thing is it is 9.45 and they are hit.

Mr. Jarvis: The roadbed is so bad they cannot keep on running.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Well let us talk about roadbeds for a moment. Anyone who was present near the end of the transport meetings last year will certainly have seen some of the roadbeds in western Canada and in eastern Canada which need upgrading and which are not fit for the type of traffic they are expected to carry. Let us do something about them, but setting up a royal commission which might take three years to report is not going to do much to solve the problem right now.

Purchase of railway cars for grain is also something we can talk about, as well as grain transportation generally. The government has either ordered or purchased 4,000 covered hopper cars for the transportation of grain. This, in addition to providing capacity for the movement of grain, I believe leads to a safer operation in grain transportation. Any kind of operation that must be speedy leads to danger somewhere along the route. The covered hopper cars are easily loaded at the elevators and unloaded at the terminals without the use of shovels, grain doors and so on, and they certainly upgrade the system.

In addition to this improved safety factor by the terminal operators, there is a rail operational consideration whereby these cars lead to the displacement of some of the obsolete boxcar type of equipment. One covered hopper car replaces two of these obsolete cars. The latest design provides for a much safer train and yard movement operation. I am sure many hon. members realize, if they see some of the 100 and even 200 car trains travelling through cities and across Canada, that if these trains are cut in half safety factors will be improved, whether these trains are carrying grain, oil, or any other type of material.

With regard to providing more money for capital acquisition of necessary equipment for upgrading railway lines, this to some is one of the top priorities that should be undertaken at the present time. In the analyses of CN budgets great consideration is given to the financial resources needed to ensure that CN can maintain the system they have. It may not be very good, but they do at least want to maintain what they have. This ensures that they have the capability to operate in a safe manner. Particular emphasis is placed on ensuring that railway yards and facilities receive maintenance on a regular basis and that funds are made available for the purchase of equipment to replace obsolete equipment and the maintenance of railway equipment on hand.

With regard to development of a railway monitoring system to identify specific problems and develop reasonable solutions, as an ongoing program the CNR has been making progress in the use of hot journal box detectors. At one time this was one of the primary causes of derailment and other troubles, particularly with passenger cars. These detectors can do much to assist in making rail stock safer so far as passenger and freight trains are concerned. They now have these sensing devices on main routes across Canada, as hon. members probably know. The railways are now experimenting with 24 detectors reporting to a computer via Bell telephone, and the results are so favourable that they are progressing with this program on the rest of the route and it is expected to be completed by the middle of next year. During the balance of this year they will be refined even further. The computer has been found to be much more critical and thorough in its reading of the situation than any manpower.

As for joint participation of rail capacity development, the ministry of transport is taking the lead in working with the railways to develop programs and alternatives to provide for an orderly development of rail transportation infrastructure in Canada. Through these programs we are able to ensure that new rail lines and improvements to existing routes as well as terminals are planned and developed in such a way as to give the best possible system for the funds that are applied.

Once again I want to congratulate the hon. member for Rimouski for raising this very important item this afternoon, particularly since it concerns so many of us. But I should have liked to see the matter go even further, as we must also take a look not only at rail transportation but at all facets of transportation in this country, including air and sea. We must examine every alternative so as to develop a better rail system.

I agree with what the hon. member said earlier that the development of this country has depended, during the century that we have been in existence, on our railways. It is on this type of service that we can build and make Canada a much better country for all to live in, one of which we will all be justly proud.

USE BY ELDORADO NUCLEAR OF IMPORTED WORKERS TO FILL VACANCIES AT MINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. I ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion, namely:

That this House protest the fact that residents of northern Saskatchewan are denied employment, and in particular the unemployed Indians and Metis, by reason of the action being taken by Eldorado Nuclear Limited in Uranium City, by importing 70 Europeans to fill current vacancies in the mine at Uranium City, there being 126 residents located within that immediate area, most of whom have been on the employment waiting list for over a year.

Furthermore that this House calls on Eldorado Nuclear Limited to reverse its refusal to meet with the agencies of the Northern Saskatchewan Employment Committee and to work out appropriate ways of satisfying the company's employment requirements among local unemployed persons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 this motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of this House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF PROCEDURE FOLLOWED BY COMMITTEE IN AWARDING CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of recent reports of irregularities in the awarding of contracts by the Olympic Organizing Committee, COJO, the most recent being the awarding of a contract for the manufacture of olympic medallions to a Swiss Firm, SwissCon Canada Ltd., despite the fact that several qualified Canadian firms, including mints in three provinces, had not been asked to submit bids and in view of the federal government's responsibilities in this area arising out of the substantial indirect financial support being provided through the coin and stamp programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the government to initiate an investigation into the procedures followed by COJO in the awarding of contracts, with special reference to the circumstances surrounding the awarding of the contract for the manufacture of olympic medallions, and, further that the House instruct the government to withhold further financial support to the olympics, direct or indirect, until it has been established that the tendering procedures are responsible and fair.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising from the opening to be made by the Prime Minister of November 5 of the Raven Gallery of the National Museum of Man here in Ottawa. I move, seconded by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That the Prime Minister advise the House in connection with the official opening on November 5 of the recreation of Skidgate Village from western Canada to be known as the Raven Gallery of the National Museum of Man why none of Canada's native people, particularly the decendants of the original creators of the village, have been included on the invitation list for the opening ceremonies and that the Prime Minister also guarantee the House, first, that this slight will immediately be rectified and, second, that the present plan to hold the opening ceremonies almost entirely in the French language will be changed forthwith to provide for bilingual opening ceremonies in accordance with the government's supposed policy of supporting the principles of the Official Languages Act.

employees of the finance section of Air Canada at Winnipeg manifested by their walkout for a study session and their mandate for a strike their membership has given, as well as the fact that the company has been slow to answer the commissioner's report, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the House instruct the Minister of Labour to take immediate steps to have Air Canada deal with the report and make every effort to avert any further labour disputes before a strike occurs.

THE LATE GORDON DUBROY

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the question period, hon. members, I hope, will bear with me while I report to them the rather tragic news of the death last night in an Ottawa hospital of Gordon Dubroy. As I had indicated earlier, there was every intention, following Mr. Dubroy's retirement last spring, to honour him at the opening of parliament on October 14. He had accepted our invitation to come here and to receive what we know would have been glowing tributes paid to him by all parties in the House.

I intend to speak personally, in attempting on your behalf to somehow describe the affection and respect in which this former servant of the House of Commons was held, by saying that when I was first elected to this very honoured position, I made a personal request that he postpone his retirement in order that my first year in this office be supported by his expertise, his advice and counsel. He was good enough to do that, I think, for two reasons: first of all, because of his interest in seeing as good a performance from any Speaker as possible, and he knew that his advice would be of some assistance; and second, I think, because although he was eligible at the time for retirement, he wanted to continue to play the active and important role that he had played in advising all of us on procedures of the House. Therefore, he stayed on, much to the betterment of the performance of the incumbent in this office and much to the betterment, of course, of the precedures of parliament during that time.

He had spent some 35 years in the service of the House of Commons, and I know that he will be deeply missed by all of us. I hope I have somehow adequately expressed on your behalf the regret that we feel. May I ask all hon. members to rise and observe one minute of silence as a tribute to him.

[Whereupon the House stood in silence for one minute.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ORDER IN WHICH ISSUES NEGOTIATED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, but before I do, I should like to say that I am pleased to see him back in the House despite the reports of ill health over the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: If I may presume to give a little advice, I suggest that the Postmaster General not make too many demands upon his health, and ultimately he will come to the same conclusion I did: that there is no one who is really indispensable.

I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether upon resuming negotiations the union has accepted what has appeared to be a condition imposed by the Treasury Board and those negotiating on behalf of the government that the union should accept the conciliation board report with regard to salaries and salary ranges before there be any further negotiation of the other elements in dispute.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his kind wishes and remind him that there is a saying with which the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert will agree, and that is that only the good die young, so I take solace from that.

Mr. Fairweather: I think you'd better take the rest of the afternoon off.

An hon. Member: You'll live to be a hundred.

Mr. Mackasey: Negotiations resumed today at two o'clock. We have agreed to negotiate in whatever order or fashion the union thinks preferable. I must remind the House that we do not have the right to lock workers out. Whether or not the union felt that we had delivered an ultimatum that was hardly a reason for calling a strike. In any event since we are prepared to negotiate money later on rather than immediately, it goes without saying that the sum of $1.70 for 30 months is something the union may or may not be able to eventually negotiate.

Mr. Stanfield: Are the government negotiators no longer taking the position that the union has to accept this wage package before negotiating other questions?

Mr. Mackasey: We are also taking the position that $1.70 for 30 months is not necessarily automatically available in so far as the workers are concerned, and depending on other issues they could conceivably end up with a much lesser sum of money.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—POSSIBILITY OF RETURN TO WORK AS PREREQUISITE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Has the government advised the union that a return to work order is a prerequisite to continuing negotiations in good faith?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): There are many workers who want to go back to work and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia is an example. Provided their democratic right to work is not interfered with by goons, I suspect many people will go back to work on their own.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—SETTLEMENT SUBJECT TO APPROVAL OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government decided on the length of time that the postal strike will be allowed to go on with or without continuing negotiations before back to work legislation will be introduced? If so, what is the length of time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary question. Is it still the position of the government that any settlement reached in the current negotiations will be subject to the approval of the Anti-Inflation Board?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, that will be the law as soon as this legislation has been approved by this parliament.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO REASONS FOR INVOKING WAR MEASURES ACT IN OCTOBER, 1970

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that during the course of a CBC television program last night, Premier Bourassa and the Hon. Eric Kierans, who was a member of the federal cabinet in 1970, said that at the time of the invocation of the War Measures Act five years ago there was not at that time an apprehended insurrection in the province of Quebec, and considering that the act in question led to the most serious denial of basic civil liberties for many Canadians, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, in view of those serious statements by responsible people directly involved, if, with the provision of this new information the government would, under the Inquiries Act, bring about an investigation into the causes and justification for the invocation of the War Measures Act in October, 1970?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by way of reply may I read one or two sentences from the letter written to the Prime Minister of Canada by the Premier of Quebec on October 16, 1970:

> The Quebec government is convinced that such powers are necessary to meet the present emergency. Not only are two completely innocent men threatened with death, but we are also faced with an attempt by a minority to destroy social order through criminal action; it is for those reasons that our government is making the present request.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the reading of that quotation deals not one whit with the question I asked—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: It does not at all even though a particular minister of the Crown may think it does. I would refer to the point that apparently Mr. Bourassa said something quite different last night than was written then, and perhaps verbally even said something different at the time. I know not. Considering the statements made last night by the Premier of Quebec, and considering also the statement made in the House of Commons by the then minister of justice on October 16, recorded at page 215 of Hansard as follows:

> It is my hope that some day the full details of the intelligence upon which the government acted can be made public, because until that day comes the people of Canada will not be able fully to appraise the course of action which has been taken by the government.

Given that expressed desire by the minister of justice at the time and the lapse of a five year period, I should like to repeat the question to the Acting Prime Minister: would the government not now consider making the full inquiry that is possible only within the terms of the Inquiries Act?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the government's intention. I should say to the hon. gentleman, however, that at the time the government did indicate its desire to have a better instrument for dealing with crises and emergencies in peace time other than the War Measures Act, and it is still the intention of the government to bring forward a measure of that kind for consideration by parliament.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the Acting Prime Minister saying that, notwithstanding the expressed desire of the then minister of justice and, if I remember correctly, other ministers of the Crown at the time, that after a period of time elapsed there was a desire to provide full details which presumably would have justified the government's action, the government does not under any circumstances plan to conduct such an inquiry?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to answer a question which says "under any considerable circumstances" but it is not the intention now of the government to have such an inquiry.

Mr. Stanfield: You can bet your life on that one.

OLYMPIC GAMES

MEASURES TO LESSEN THE BURDEN OF DEBT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Because of the increasing cost of the Olympic Games facilities and the enormous deficits that will accumulate and fall back on the shoulders of the Montreal ratepayers, can he tell the House whether he intends to introduce measures to lessen that burden?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

As the Olympic Games are national in character, whether we want to or not, and as their image reflects on the whole country, can the minister give the House the assurance that the necessary steps will be taken to ensure that Messrs. Jean Drapeau, mayor of Montreal, and Robert Bourassa, premier of Quebec, for whom the Olympic Games have become a matter of personal prestige, are required to give a public explanation of the situation, so that the public can know what is really going on, and more specifically to say what they intend to do about the deficits incurred through the construction of the Olympic site?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the government has indicated to the House what steps it was prepared to take with regard to the Olympic Games, and what share of the financial burden it is willing to assume. We have no other assurance to give in that regard.

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF WORKERS BY RCMP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a last supplementary to put to the Solicitor General.

In view of the general trend which the Olympic Games seem to take, can he tell us by what right and by virtue of what principle the agents of the Montreal police force and some federal officers, accompany and watch the Olympic site workers to make sure that the deadlines are met, thus creating a totally abnormal situation? Would he also tell us whether he is willing to advise the Quebec Minister of Justice of the incomprehensible behaviour on the part of those policemen towards the Olympic Games site workers?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know we have no responsibility for that matter.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL—POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION OF CONSULTANTS' FEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the increasing public awareness of the situation at Mirabel, does the minister now feel that he is fully briefed and in a position to confirm that investigations are being carried out with respect to certain aspects of the airport, and is he also able to say whether any of the consultant fees have been held up pending results of any investigations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think often the public is aware of a falsely reported rumour concerning Mirabel rather than facts and, certainly, a good deal of what was depicted last night was not founded on fact. I have been adequately briefed and am able to confirm that to hon. members. Also, one often hears loose talk, since any time anybody voices a complaint a certain kind of investigation follows that complaint, however ill-founded it may be. That, in itself, amounts to very little. I know of no truth to the allegation regarding consultants' fees to which the hon. member referred.

MIRABEL—CONFORMATION OF RUNWAYS TO ICAO STANDARDS—DIFFICULTIES WITH PASSENGER TRANSFER VEHICLES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his answer. Can he assure the House that Mirabel runway designs and specifications conform with Annex 14 which, as the minister knows, dictates the requirements for ICAO operational safety standards. Also, can he confirm that severe operational difficulties are already becoming apparent with respect to the 14 passenger transport vehicles purchased for Mirabel against the advice of many knowledgeable people.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there was a well publicized difficulty about a vehicle which contained important guests, but I think it was a matter of somebody not knowing which switch to pull at the right time. I can confirm to hon. members that not only do the runways conform to ICAO standards; they conform to the much higher standards which Canada ordinarily applies. I was informed of that firmly during tight cross-examination this morning.

MIRABEL—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT IN DESIGNING RUNWAYS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, of which I gave notice. Did the Ministry of Transport staff do the design and engineering work for Mirabel airport runways, aprons and taxiways.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, they did a good deal of that work, but I should want to be very specific about specific jobs. I understand that the Ministry of Transport did about a third of the design, in the over-all operation of the airport. I think the design was heavily related to the airport's runways and taxiways.

Mr. Huntington: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister can explain why the official BANAIM list of consultants shows the Department of Transport as the only agency involved in the design of runways, aprons and taxiways.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I indicated in my earlier reply that I should be glad to check specifically whether anybody else was involved. They were certainly heavily involved in that particular work. If the hon. member will give me a bit of time, I will check and confirm whether they were actually totally involved and no one else was involved in any part of the consultation in relation to them. That is the only limitation I would make in my answer.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—TYPE OF MEASURE USED TO STRENGTHEN CONTROLS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of earlier questions raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party. The Prime Minister is reported as having stated that unless the so-called voluntary restraints provided under the bill now before the House are effective, the government intends to take stern measures. Having regard to the fact that there is this war legislation which was improperly invoked in 1970 and the Prime Minister says that the government has in mind stern legislation, will the Acting Prime Minister advise whether it is something in the nature of the War Measures Act which will deny civil liberties when there is an infraction on the part of those who do not live entirely within the provisions of the bill now before parliament when it becomes law?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we hope this will not be necessary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: If it is necessary to strengthen the controls that are included in the bill that is now before parliament, it will be the intention of the government—and I of course hope this will not happen—to introduce another piece of legislation. The government would not depend upon the War Measures Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer leaves a lot unanswered. I simply ask him this: Having regard to the fact that the bill now before the House does pretty well insofar as those covered by it are denied their civil rights, will the minister advise whether if that is not sufficient, the government has a measure already drafted and considered whereby measures equivalent to those permitted under the War Measures Act will be brought into effect.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. member knows, under the War Measures Act, it is possible in these circumstances to supplant parliament. During wartime, nearly all the control legislation was enacted under the War Measures Act. The government has no intention of anything of this kind. If it is desirable to beef up the controls, that will be done by this parliament.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF ACTION TO RESTRICT GROWTH IN MONEY SUPPLY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the United States government has achieved such satisfactory results in reducing inflation by restricting the annual increase in the money supply to between 5 per cent and 7½ per cent, is the government considering a policy of keeping the annual rate of increase of our money supply to a comparable range of increase, at least until the rate of inflation has been reduced to a satisfactory level?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are really two separate questions here. The first is restricting the rate of increase in the money supply and, second, setting out in advance the specific rate to which the increase will be kept. With regard to the first part, as indicated in the announcement of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in September, there will be an effort to restrict the rate of increase in the money supply. While from month to month there may be variations in this, the long run goal over a year will be to have a very much less substantial increase. I am advised, for example, that the effects in the payment system caused by the postal strike this month will produce an increase in the money supply. However, it is anticipated that over the year, the rate of increase will be reduced.

On the second point as to whether a specific goal will be announced in advance, this has been much discussed at length both here and in the United States. I gather there is some debate as to the soundness of the policy adopted by the federal reserve system. At the moment, the government is not advocating such a statement, although the American experience is being closely watched.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on commitments that both the Prime Minister and the minister made to workers in Winnipeg who have been laid off from the CPR shops. In view of the commitments that both gentlemen made to these workers last week to the effect that they would look into the matter to see what could be done, is there anything the minister can now say with regard to the reinstatement in their employment of these 760 railway workers?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Nothing specific at the moment, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is quite correct. I said, as did the Prime Minister, that we will look into the situation and try to come up with some curative for what is obviously a very serious situation causing hardship to a good number of people. I discussed this with the Minister of Manpower. I hope to have further discussions this week with my colleagues, including the Minister of Transport, on the question. I hope to be more specific later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that telegrams from representatives of these unemployed railway workers were sent last night or this morning to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport, can we be assured that these telegrams will be answered as quickly as possible?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

In calling attention to the presence of this very distinguished delegation in the gallery, I want to indicate that this is the first occasion since our pronounced intention to strengthen our bonds with the European Parliament that we have been honoured by a national delegation from the European Parliament. BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF EDUCATIONAL TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Communications. Has the minister been made aware of the request of the B.C. School Trustees Association, transmitted by letter to the Minister of Communications on October 6, 1975, that the federal government's educational technology program be reinstated and, if so, what consideration has been given this request?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to check into this and report back to the hon. member.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

PUBLISHING

SALE OF WORKS OF CANADIAN AUTHORS IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES WITHOUT PAYMENT OF ROYALTIES— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What steps has the minister taken to protect Canadian authors whose works are published in the United States and sold in Canada without the author or the Canadian publisher being entitled to either royalty or commission? This matter was first raised some months ago and the minister promised action. Have any charges been laid?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question was discussed several months ago. The Minister of National Revenue then issued some guidelines to cope with the situation. We had been asked, if you remember, that an amendment be brought to the legislation. I had rejected that suggestion leaving to understand that the consumers' interest should prevail and that it was not the best solution. I think that some administrative action has been taken by the Department of National Revenue to solve some aspects of the matter.

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that just last week the situation had not been remedied and authors were suffering because of this, what steps has the minister taken to end what is clearly an illegal and immoral situation.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the conclusions reached by the hon. member. I will not say this is news to me. Until I have a little more thorough grasp of the situation, I would not like to commit myself.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO USE OF CANADIAN SHIPS TO MOVE OIL FROM ARCTIC

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the Minister of Transport up north for a few minutes. Will the minister give some indication as to the intention of his department with regard to the closing of the Arctic to Canadian vessels for the purpose of extractive industries? I ask this in light of the discovery by Panarctic of what appears to be a commercial amount of oil, their intention to deliver that oil by vessel and against the background of their having gone to Europe for planning and technology with regard to ships with a northern capability of removing this oil. What are we doing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have a couple of efforts underway. One is in relation to the development of ice-breaking cargo vessels. We are in the final stages of a decision with regard to one leg of that. In addition, we have been continuing some advance feasibility studies in relation to far northern ice breaking capability of ice breakers of a new and very superior kind. Of course, the next steps in that regard will take some time.

● (1440)

Mr. Forrestall: Perhaps I could put the question more directly to the minister. Can he tell us whether or not it is the intention of the government to close the Arctic to Canadian ships and Canadian crews for the purpose of removing extractive oils and minerals which are there?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of such a suggestion.

Mr. Forrestall: One final supplementary question. Would the minister kindly have a conversation with the former minister to see whether he can learn something about the protection which is required with respect to the north? I ask the minister very seriously whether or not he has advised himself of the practicalities and of the past commitments by the government with respect to the closing of the Arctic, the high Arctic, those waters above 60 degrees north parallel, for the purpose of removing Canadian ores and Canadian oils by Canadian ships?

Mr. Lang: My difficulty is that the hon. member is now asking whether we are proposing to close the Arctic to Canadian ships, and I am not sure if we are on the same wavelength.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF PHASE II—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the President of the Treasury Board, wherever he has gone. In his absence, however, I am prepared to put it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the National Joint Council over the weekend dealing with the implementation of the controversial Phase II of the bilingualism program for the public service, would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether the government is now prepared to approve the position taken by the National Joint Council that no part of that program is to be implemented unless and until there has been full consultation with the staff associations, and is the government through the President of Treasury Board prepared to make a statement in the House with respect to this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member himself has said, we have received these representations and I will see whether it will be possible for a reply to be made to Members of the House.

IMPLEMENTATION OF PHASE II—REASON DECISION TO PAY BONUSES FOR SECOND LANGUAGE NOT ANNOUNCED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Again to the Acting Prime Minister. As part of the implementation program the government has devised a scheme whereby financial bonuses will be paid to employees based on second language skills. Would the minister please inform the House why this decision, which was apparently made by cabinet on April 17, 1975, was never communicated to parliament and whether it is now the intention of the government to proceed with this program, one which provides for subjective testing and could lead to misunderstandings and unfairness in the public service? If the Acting Prime Minister is not prepared to deal with this matter today, could he arrange to have a statement on motions made in the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would say to the hon. member that the program which has been put in hand is one which is in accordance with the declarations and statements of policy which have been made in this House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the statement just made by the Acting Prime Minister, perhaps I should inform him that that is precisely why the National Joint Council had to meet—because the decision was not in accordance with the declarations made by this House in June of 1973. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister should inform himself of the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: That is a matter of opinion.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACCURACY OF DEVICES FOR MEASURING POLLUTION AT SYNCRUDE PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Environment. Is the government satisfied with the accuracy of the devices used for measuring pollution around the Syncrude project in the Athabasca tar sands?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for this particular area is definitely that of the Alberta government. However, because of the expertise we have gained in the administration of the Clean Air Act, the Alberta government has asked us to review a study prepared by Syncrude. We indicated at the time that we are dissatisfied with this study which did not comply with our requirements as to possible pollution hazards, and we informed the Alberta government of our point of view. Moreover, in order to help this government meet the conditions which are indispensable to protect the atmosphere, we have agreed with the Alberta government to carry out a study of the environment hazards resulting from the planned development of the Athabasca oil sands. This study may cost up to $40 million. The cost will be shared equally by the Alberta government and the federal government, over a period of five years.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns a recent release by his department of a report with respect to the air disaster at Rae Point in the Arctic last year. In view of the fact that the report places the blame for the accident on the pilot in charge of the flight and in view of the fact that this same pilot was classified as qualified to fly the Queen in the Arctic in the summer of 1969—although he did not, in fact, do so because his aircraft was unserviceable—would the minister take immediate steps to see that a full public inquiry is made into this disaster?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I would not wish to associate myself with specific words which seek to determine where blame should be placed. I think I would rely upon the report as having spoken for itself and put the matter rather more technically: as far as transport safety is concerned we are satisfied with what has come out during the investigation and what we can learn about flying in remote areas. There are, of course, other proceedings going on at which further matters can be raised and dealt with and at this point in time I would think those proceedings would be adequate.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. F. I should like to ask the minister whether, since assuming his portfolio, he has found it possible to address himself to the situation affecting British Columbia where the program has never worked, and particularly to the problem of the inability to sell the program to that particular provincial government?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that, although we did face some difficulties in our negotiations prior to the signature of the agreement, since then negotiations that have taken place on the contingent signature of an auxiliary agreement have followed their normal course and we hope to be able to take part in the next few months with the local government of British Columbia in some projects which are considered as top priority by the two governments and which are now under consideration.

Bearing in mind that United States courts will render a decision this week establishing a precedent that may be followed in Canada concerning the rights of parents to discontinue the preservation of a child's life by artificial means when that child has suffered irreversible brain damage and is in a comatose state, will the Minister of Justice give immediate consideration to directing the Law Reform Commission to immediately study and report at their earliest convenience on this matter involving the right to life and the extent of the duty to preserve it?

SUGGESTED DEFERRAL OF INCOME TAX ON ADJUSTMENT PAYMENTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board on October 17 to a question put to him by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, stating that he was looking into the question of allowing producers to elect to defer income tax on adjustment payments on grain sales prior to October 9, would the minister advise whether he has made a decision, and will he bring in the necessary legislation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it was not in my mind at that stage that this involved a question of legislation, but a question as to whether under the existing law it might be possible to act in a certain way to produce that result for at least certain of the producers who would want that. We have been conducting discussions, particularly with the Department of National Revenue, in that connection, but these discussions are not yet completed.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. At the conclusion of the debate on Bill C-73, I asked the Minister of Finance about the government's intention with regard to constraints on its own spending and I got the usual meaningless answer about the matter being in the hands of the President of the Treasury Board. I now ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government, before the debate on Bill C-73 is concluded at all stages in parliament, to indicate with precision precisely the extent to which it is prepared to make sacrifices in order that it will show an example for the rest of Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Read the budget of June.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be possible to cross all the t's and dot all the i's before the estimates are presented to parliament at the usual time. I do know that the particular cuts announced in the budget in June have gone into effect.

Mr. Baldwin: They were not cuts.

REQUEST THAT THERE BE NO REDUCTION IN PATROLS ON WEST COAST

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc), I want to put a question to the Minister of the Environment.

Can the minister assure the House and the nation in a non equivocal way that the vessels whose task is to guard and protect our fishing resources will keep on doing their job without interruption or reduction, that is in their usual way, in the days and months to come, in spite of the restrictions announced lately by the government.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have never shrunk from our duty to protect fishermen and the areas where they are entitled to fish.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In light of the answer given by the minister, I should like to ask her how she can reconcile this answer with the fact that there is only one patrol boat on the west coast although there are 19 foreign fishing boats, Polish, Japanese, Korean and Russian boats, within the zone limit.

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member probably thinks that one vessel is not enough to control 19 boats. Nevertheless, the Minister responsible for this control should decide how many boats are necessary in the circumstances.

Mr. G. H. Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): None at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTION TAX REMOVAL BE APPLICABLE TO USED FARM MACHINERY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question as well to the Minister of Agriculture. I noted during the course of the summer that there was a special tax to be taken off new machinery purchased by farmers. In view of the representation or suggestion that failure to remove it in respect of used machinery will discriminate against small farmers and devalue used farm machinery, will the minister give consideration to having that same tax relief applied to used as well as new machinery?

AIR CANADA

DISPUTE WITH EMPLOYEES OF FINANCE BRANCH IN WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, over the past three years there has been continuous labour unrest at the finance branch of Air Canada in Winnipeg. I have raised this matter in the House on numerous occasions, bringing it to the attention of the present Minister of Labour and the former Minister of Transport, neither of whom was able to solve the job description and job security issues. Will the minister investigate this three year old problem to see whether he can negotiate a satisfactory solution between Air Canada and its finance employees before they go on strike? Perhaps he might consider tabling the Estey report on the investigation he conducted into these problems of the finance branch, thus assisting all members on both sides of the House to perhaps help find a solution to this problem.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly see what I can do to find a solution to this problem. Of course, the Estey report cannot be made public until it is translated and printed, and that will require some time.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MEDALLIONS MINTED IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of Olympic coin sales falling badly behind schedule and the intention to mint and distribute cheaper Olympic medallions, will the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that these or any other medallions for the purpose of raising funds for the Olympic games will be minted in Canada and not by a Swiss firm which has already received the go ahead by COJO?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not know all the implications of the hon. member's question, but obviously COJO will have to comply with the policies established by Parliament regarding the financing of the Olympic Games. If that decision is not covered by the act, it will have to be considered.

[Mr. Malone.]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of National Revenue but he has left the Chamber.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

REPORT OF ROBERT GRASLEY ON AVAILABILITY OF RISK CAPITAL FOR TECHNOLOGICAL INNOVATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the recess the Minister of State for Science and Technology released a report by Mr. Robert Grasley on the availability of risk capital for technological innovation. In view of the many important and very valid recommendations and observations contained in this report, will the minister give an indication to the House as to the disposition of the report and any government action that will or has resulted from it?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the report having been translated was published with a view to seeking public comment. We are now in the process of receiving those comments, and when a reasonable time has elapsed the proposals, if any, will be made by the government.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in order that this very well done study which contains a number of very important recommendations does not end up gathering dust on the shelf, as many other similar government reports have in the past, would the minister consider referring the report to an appropriate standing committee of the House with the reference that it develop a plan of action for the implementation of the recommendations in this report?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give consideration to that representation, but I think it is perhaps a little early yet to do that.

● (1500)

Mr. Nystrom: I notified you last week, Mr. Speaker, of my intention to raise a question of privilege. Unfortunately, however, the Prime Minister again could not be here. With respect to the Prime Minister, I want to defer that question until he returns tomorrow.

GUIDELINES APPLIED FOR THE PROCUREMENT OF ANTIQUES AND CANADIANA

Question No. 2,304—Mr. Towers:

1. What guidelines are applied in the procurement of antiques and Canadiana by Heritage Canada, the National Museum of Man or any other government agency or department for public viewing?

2. At what level are decisions made as to the choice of such purchases?

3. Are export permits required to sell antiques and Canadiana beyond Canadian borders and, if so (a) on what basis (b) on how many occasions have such restrictions been imposed?

4. Does the government compete with bids received by dealers and/or individuals, for instance, from the United States, for antiques and Canadiana?

5. Is there a maximum amount allowed for the purchase of any single item by the government when attempting to retain these in Canada and, if so, what is such amount?

6. Does the government automatically purchase such items when their export is prevented and, if not, what incentives are there for vendors to retain antiques or Canadiana rather than sell to the higher foreign bidder?

7. (a) What protection does the antique dealer or individual have if he is denied the right to export to a prospective purchaser outside Canada (b) is the right to export denied only because the government will purchase the item or items in question?

8. Is emphasis centered on any specific region of Canada when purchasing antiques or Canadiana such as the Maritimes, Quebec, Ontario or the Western Provinces and, if not, does the government make periodic assessments of the proportion of such displays representing each area?

9. By what means is the government assured that each province is represented on an equitable basis in federal museums or other displays?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is concerned: 1. Procurement of antiques and Canadiana by the National Historic Parks and Sites Branch of Parks Canada is confined to the acquisition of artifacts required for the period furnishing of structures which have been declared of national historic significance on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada.

2. Recommendations for procurement are made by the curator qualified in the pertinent field of expertise. Approval for acquisition is made at the appropriate level of financial responsibility.

3. The Secretary of State is sponsoring legislation relating to the export of antiques and Canadiana.

4. Yes.

5. No, each individual item is assessed on its own merits.

6. See reply to 3 above.

7. See reply to 3 above.

8. No.

9. National Historic Parks and Sites are in operation and/or under development in all the provinces and territories.

In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State and the National Museums of Canada are concerned: 1. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums and institutions (the National Gallery of Canada, the National Museum of Man, the National Museum of Natural Sciences, the National Museum of Science and Technology and the Canadian Conservation Institute): the guidelines are extensive and vary according to the different requirements of each institution and according to the nature of the article to be purchased; on major purchases curators with expertise in the relevant period examine the article to be purchased or outside expert advice is considered before purchase.

2. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums: decisions are made by several senior officials and others, according to the circumstances and amount of funds required.

3. At the present time export permits are not required. Until such time as Bill C-33 is proclaimed there are no restrictions.

4. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums: Yes.

5. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums: no, only availability of funds at the time limits maximum to be spent on approved items.

6. The answer to the first part of the question is no, not at the present time. The Emergency Purchase Fund is used to purchase heritage items in danger of leaving the country.

7. The question does not apply.

8. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums: the board of trustees, through the director of each national museum, continually attempts to ensure that the museum collections are balanced and representative within the limitations of the budget. Artifacts in the museums are categorized in many ways including by place of origin.

9. On behalf of the National Museums of Canada and its component museums: we try to assure this representation by appointments to the board of trustees, to the consultative committee and to other advisory committees of Canadians from all across Canada. In the allocation of grants we are careful always to consult the appropriate provincial official. Above all the Secretary General of the National Museums of Canada and the directors of the component museums are conscious that they are administering a federal institution.

AIR CANADA—TERMINAL II, TORONTO

Question No. 2,816—Mr. MacKay:

1. Was an authority for expenditure bearing reference number YYZKK-02-74 dated January 3, 1974, processed in the amount of $1,204,216 of funds, paid to the Department of Transport for rental of space in Terminal II of the Toronto International Airport and, if so, was this approved and authorized according to regular financial control procedures and authorized by the proper official of Air Canada?

2. At the time in question, was any conclusive and accurate determination of the space and facilities in question detailed in the form of a lease, or was this payment merely "on account" in lieu of regular formal arrangements?

3. In the interim, have precise negotiated rates been formalized in the form of a lease and, if so, what is the monthly rental currently being paid by Air Canada for space in Terminal II?

4. Is such rental in accordance with rates being charged other tenants?

5. How does the rate per sq. ft. compare with that paid by other airlines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. An Air Canada authority for expenditure bearing reference number 37-727-02 was raised in accordance with regular financial procedures in January, 1974 for the amount of $1,204,216 to cover interim rental billing from the Ministry of Transport for Air Canada's occupancy of Toronto Terminal II. Because the terms and conditions of the lease were found to be not acceptable, the AFE was not approved and the payment not made.

2. A detailed lease was being negotiated at that time describing the space and facilities in question.

The Ministry of Transport advises as follows: 3. Yes. Rental is $109,364 per month.

4. Yes.

5. Rates per square foot are on the average of 17 per cent higher than those paid by other airlines in Terminal Building I.

PERSONALLY IDENTIFIABLE INFORMATION ON CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS

Question No. 3,091—Mr. Beatty:

1. Since 1970, has (a) Statistics Canada (b) the Department of National Revenue received any requests from third parties (i) within (ii) outside the government for personally identifiable information about individuals which was collected from those individuals under the threat of penalties for failure to disclose the information to the government?

2. In each case, what was the response of Statistics Canada or the Department of National Revenue to such requests?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada and the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1. (a) and (b) (i) Yes; (ii) Yes.

2. The response from Statistics Canada in each case was that unless permitted under Section 16 of the Statistics Act, the confidentiality of identifiable information is guaranteed by law and accordingly all such requests were denied. No records are maintained in the Department of National Revenue which would provide the information necessary to answer this part of the question. However, as a matter of general policy, (a) information is provided to other federal agencies and provincial governments in accordance with legal entitlements. (b) Identifiable information concerning individuals is not provided to third parties outside government except in cases of subpoenas from competent courts in criminal matters and in cases of information exchange with governments of other countries under reciprocal income tax treaties.

BUDGET OF THE COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Question No. 3,158—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What was the budget of the Commissioner of Official Languages for (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974?

2. How many employees worked directly for the Commissioner in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 and, in each case, how many (i) were bilingual (ii) had English as their mother tongue (iii) had French as their mother tongue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be put to him directly.

DRUG CASES IN COURTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 3,161—Mr. Reynolds:

Is there a back log of heroin and other drug cases in the courts of British Columbia and, if so, will the Minister advise what action he plans to take to solve this problem?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, and the Minister of Justice is reviewing the matter as a priority item with legal officers of the Department of Justice with a view to determining the necessary measures required to rectify the problem.

FARRIS REPORT

Question No. 3,166—Mr. Reynolds:

Does the Solicitor General have a copy of the Farris report in his possession and, if so, on what date will it be tabled in the House of Commons?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes. As indicated by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries in a press release issued on June 13, 1975, criminal court proceedings are in progress in respect of this occurrence and three inmates are charged with non-capital murder. He also indicated that it was his intention to eventually publish the report of the Commission of Inquiry except for information affecting employees personally as well as the security of penitentiaries, once the matters now before the court have been resolved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, is the minister going to stand up before I do?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) will really be very angry if I get my licks in first. I am sure he will have some constructive and other types of measures to suggest.

The bill before us which is designed to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act is one that deserves very serious consideration. The basic act provides short-term income support to unemployed workers while facilitating their quick re-employment. In this way, and in addition to that very important need of personal and individual help, the program assists in the proper functioning of the labour market, the stabilization of the economy, particularly in times like these, and the redistribution of income where it is needed.

Since the labour market is constantly subject to change and adjustment, as the needs of the economy and the composition of the working population alter, the act will be subject to adjustment in order to respond smoothly and effectively to those changes. I think that is doubly important when one considers the great significance of the amount of the transfer funds committed to this program, of which we are all aware.

I have mentioned on a number of occasions that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is conducting a comprehensive review of this legislation and its administration to ensure that the policy remains responsive to our needs. In July, of course, the government introduced the bill before us, Bill C-69, based on the first results of that comprehensive review. Bill C-69 is intended to complement measures outlined in the June 23 budget and is in accordance with our efforts to provide a more rational allocation of government resources. It has been developed to reflect the spirit of the 1971 act and to contribute to the achievement of one of the fundamental objectives of the ongoing social security review which is to rationalize the various schemes of income maintenance in this country. At the same time, the amendments are directed toward improving the influence of the act on the relationship between supply and demand of workers and, in addition, to deal with some of the inequities and complexities in the act.

I should like to emphasize that the changes contained in this bill which is being presented to parliament are the results of the first findings of our review of the legislation. However, as is proper with a program of such significance, this comprehensive examination is continuing, particularly in relationship to two parallel policy developments. I mentioned one, the over-all harmonization of all our social security programs. The other is the evolution of an integrated and more comprehensive manpower policy.

We may determine that further changes will become necessary, which we will present to this House. For the present, in this bill we propose the following amendments. First, to double the maximum period of disqualification from benefits for claimants who leave their employment voluntarily, without good cause, and for those who refuse suitable employment or who are dismissed for misconduct. Under the existing act, as hon. members will recall, there is a maximum three-week period, which now will be increased in the measures contained in Bill C-69 to a maximum of six weeks. This means that, added to the mandatory two-week waiting period for all claimants, this could result in a maximum period of eight weeks in which no benefits are paid to disqualified claimants.

This amendment is being made because the number of disqualifications based on voluntary quits has been running at an alarmingly high average of approximately 250,000, plus, per year. Job refusals accounted for what could amount to an annual rate of 26,000 for the first six months of 1975. These trends have been developing in spite of high unemployment and a low ratio—a descending ratio—of job vacancies to the number of unemployed workers. To us, these facts indicate that the present period of disqualification has not been effective and needs to be increased.

We realize, and the commission recognizes, that people very definitely have the right to improve their situation and a right to secure better jobs. We do not intend to penalize those who presently want, and are seeking, work. Claimants who are disqualified under this section will continue to have the right to present their case to their insurance agent within the commission to show that they left their job for good cause. Decisions of the commission on this basis will continue to be based on long established—about 30 years—jurisprudence, so that they are not made simply at the whim of the commission officials or employers; and, of course, all these decisions will continue to be subject to appeal.

If a claimant shows that under the terms of the legislation and the jurisprudence long established in connection with it, he has good cause for his action, he will not be penalized. However, we intend to make certain that Canadians who are working hard to maintain self-sufficiency, to maintain the momentum of this country's economy, and who are contributing to the unemployment insurance program, do not have to carry the added burden of supporting able-bodied people who do not want to work.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Another amendment eliminates the special benefit rate of 75 per cent of insurable earnings for claimants with dependants. That rate is paid to claimants in the extended benefit period, and to those earning less than one-third of the maximum weekly insurable earnings, in the initial benefit period. Now, under the amendment proposed, that benefit rate is being brought into line with the standard rate of 66⅔ per cent. The 1971 act acknowledged that the longer people were on claim, the greater would be their non-deferrable expenses, particularly if they had dependants. However, since 1970 a number of much more appropriate measures have been taken to increase support for people with families.

Most notable of these, of course, is the family allowance, which has tripled since 1971. For example, a man with three children between the ages of one and six, who received $18 a month in family allowance support in 1971, may now expect $66.24. That allowance, too, has now been indexed to rise with the cost of living. That increase, combined with the indexing of income tax, eliminates the justification for a special benefit rate for claimants with dependants.

I feel very strongly, not in any way denying the income need relative to size of family, that the use of demogrants—in this particular case, family allowances—is a much more appropriate way to recognize the legitimate additional need based on family size, rather than through the unemployment insurance plan under which benefits are—and, I strongly believe, should be—essentially wage-related.

Another amendment reduces the age from its present level of 70 years to 65 years at which people will no longer be covered by the unemployment insurance plan. That reduces overlapping of the program with others which are more appropriate, and provides improved support to this age group. People of this age will no longer be required to contribute to the plan, nor will they be eligible to receive benefits. The special retirement benefit, however, will be made available to persons at the age of 65 under the current conditions, that is, if they have a major attachment to the labour force, whether or not they have stopped working.

Members of the House will note that the removal of the earnings test for those who apply for a retirement pension under the Canada Pension Plan, the indexing of old age security and taxation, and the enrichment of the guaranteed income supplement which have taken place since 1971, will all combine to provide support for persons aged 65 and over, again, in my opinion, through much more appropriate methods.

Increases in these programs have been substantial since the introduction of the act in 1971. For example, the maximum retirement pension available under the Canada Pension Plan increases from $65 to approximately $130 on July 1 of this year. Old age security increased from $80 in 1971 to about $126 in 1975. The guaranteed income supplement also increased from roughly $34 for a single person in 1971 to $88 this year. In addition, the personal income tax exemption was increased by $1,000 for persons aged 65 to 70 in 1972. Last year, that exemption was indexed to rise with increases in the cost of living. Another consideration relates to the fact that it is virtually impossible—indeed, at times almost brutal—to apply those aspects of the act which relate to availability and active job search in an effective manner to persons in this age group. The fact is that most of them have, in effect, withdrawn from the active labour force.

I know that the argument is made on occasion that these persons, having contributed premiums most of their working lives, are entitled to draw benefits from the program at the end of their careers. However, this is a fallacious argument. Unemployment insurance is like term insurance. It was designed to protect against certain situations which result in a temporary interruption of earnings. The entitlement to this benefit is subject to that and certain other specific conditions in the act. Equity, the payment of premiums, no matter for how long, does not carry forward entitlement beyond the conditions stated in the plan.

The principle of the termination of the need to pay premiums, and entitlement to benefits at a certain age, has been established for years. The Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 set that termination date for premiums and entitlement at 70 years of age. That corresponded formerly to the age of eligibility of old age security, pensions, and so on. In all these programs, this was gradually reduced to the age of 65 which is now the age at which nearly all senior citizens enjoy state income-support programs.

Another important amendment will allow an extension of the period during which insurable earnings may be counted for benefit entitlement beyond the present 52 weeks to a maximum of 104 weeks for specified groups of claimants who find themselves out of the active labour force for periods of time due to reasons beyond their control. These groups include persons who are incapable of work because of sickness, disability or quarantine, persons receiving workmen's compensation, those claimants on approved training courses, and those who were inmates of penal institutions, all of whom can find themselves unable to get work after the period of their involuntary withdrawal from the labour force and when they are ready and able to rejoin the labour force.

It had originally been thought that the shorter eligibility requirement introduced in 1971 would obviate the need for such an extension. But experience has shown us in these last four years that a number of insured persons still have a requirement for it, and in order to ensure that these groups of people have full access to unployment insurance, this amendment is being introduced. Another feature of this amendment provides for an extension of the benefit period to 104 weeks for persons receiving workmen's compensation and for inmates of penal institutions.

The fifth important amendment to which I wish to refer is one to make the availability of sickness benefits more flexible so that we will allow major attachment claimants to draw up to 15 weeks of sickness benefits during both the initial and the re-established benefit periods—a total of 39 weeks instead of the present limitation of the first 29 weeks.

Another feature of the amendment eliminates the present element of rigidity whereby the drawing of regular benefits results in a reduction of entitlement to sickness benefits. Under the new proposal, a claimant can draw up to ten weeks of regular benefits without reducing his entitlement to sickness benefits.

● (1520)

A further amendment under section 28 removes the provision for advance payment of benefits to major attachment claimants. In order to provide a strong incentive for claimants to find work quickly during the early weeks of their claim and draw no subsequent benefits, an advance payment equal to three weeks of benefits was made available to major attachment claimants in the 1971 act.

Mr. Peters: It applies to hardly anyone.

Mr. Andras: This was provided without reference to whether they had earnings in that period, and the active job search and availability obligations were waived for that period. We found, however that in practice in 1974, for example, 85 per cent of the recipients of the advance payments were still on claim in the sixth week, whereas only 66.2 per cent of non-recipients of advance payments remained on claim at that point. Quite clearly the original purpose of the advance payment was not being served, and in order to encourage these people to find work more quickly it was decided that the provision should be removed from the legislation.

We are introducing an amendment which will allow claimants to terminate a claim voluntarily. I think this will considerably enhance the fairness and the flexibility of the program. This change is designed to accommodate certain claimants who would find it to their advantage to terminate an existing claim and establish a new one. For example, persons may establish a claim for benefit and then return insurable employment for 20 or more weeks. Under the present act, they cannot terminate their existing claim and establish a new one, so they are ineligible for sickness and maternity benefits which are only payable in the initial phase of a claim. The amendment will allow the claimant to terminate a claim where it is in his own interests and, in the process, remove an inadvertent but practical disincentive to work.

In view of the importance this government is placing on job creation in the current budget, it is appropriate that one of the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act—this was recommended by all sides of the House—will permit the extension of coverage to sponsors of job creation programs like the Local Initiatives Program and the Local Employment Assistance Program. I have heard from all parties that it is discriminatory; the employee on a local initiative project can obtain unemployment insurance but the sponsor cannot because of the contractual relationship that person has with the government.

Another amendment which at least one member of the official opposition will welcome relates to the issuing of social insurance numbers. It authorizes the issuance of new numbers in several specified situations; for example, where SIN cards have been lost or stolen and fraudulently used. In such cases, where a second SIN number is issued the first number will become void. I have made a commitment to one member of the opposition to let him present the first new card with regard to a rather famous case which caught some attention a year or two ago.

A number of additional amendments are proposed to reduce some of the inequities and complexities which now exist in the act. One of these changes will clarify and formalize a number of powers which are currently given to the commission, through regulations, by embodying them in the act itself. These are fundamentally important and I invite hon. members, when in committee, to consider them carefully because they concern the rights and obligations of claimants.

Another amendment will allow the commission to pay the travelling expenses of persons and their representatives to attend hearings of the umpire in cases concerning coverage under the act which are up for appeal. These umpire hearings are usually held in large centres, and this change will allow appellants from remote areas to attend without imposing undue financial hardship on them.

These amendments are complemented by administrative measures which are constantly being improved and refined to make the program more effective in terms of service, control and cost. An example is the commission's special job finding and placement drive, set up a year ago last April in co-operation with the Department of Manpower and Immigration to ensure that as many claimants as possible take advantage of all the services of Canada Manpower centres. In this way, it not only assists claimants to find jobs as quickly as possible but it ensures that those who are not meeting their obligations under the act do not receive benefits.

In the 14 or 16 months of the operation of this program, some significant results have been achieved: 429,000 claimants were exposed to the program; 33,000 claimants were placed in jobs by CMC; 46,000 claimants found jobs on their own after exposure to CMC counselling; 3,000 claimants were placed on training courses; and 144,000 claimants were disqualified or disentitled from receiving benefits following Manpower reports indicating that they were not actively seeking work or had refused to take suitable jobs when offered.

The commission also achieved a number of administrative economies last year. The unit costs of performing such functions as issuing benefit warrants, processing claims, collecting overpayments and conducting benefit control investigations were all significantly reduced in 1974 in comparison with the previous year. Efforts to continue and to improve this kind of cost-saving remain a primary administrative aim of the commission.

A major amendment has to do with the formula for financing the unemployment insurance program. This program has remained unchanged for almost four years—years which have seen a very rapid and dramatic change in Canadian society and in the structure of the labour market. We believe it is now time to face practical needs for adjusting the application of the financing methods and to bring them into line with current economic reality.

When the current Unemployment Insurance Act was proposed in the white paper of 1970, it was stated that costs of the plan over and above the self-financing component would be assumed by the government in recognition of its share of responsibility for dealing with the problems which cause unemployment. At that time, a threshold of 4 per cent unemployment was set as the level above which the government would assume the additional costs for unemployment insurance benefits.

That 4 per cent threshold was related to the economic conditions in the decade preceding 1970. The basic financing principle continues to hold true. Nevertheless, under social insurance principles, normal cost under the unemployment insurance program should be financed as much as possible through contributions from employers and employees. That principle was the basis for the formula in 1971, and remains the basis now, but economic conditions have changed considerably in the past five years, not only here but in most countries of the world, and it is now time to update that benchmark for calculating the self-financing component of the plan. The new threshold will be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a moving average of monthly unemployment rates over the preceding eight-year period.

Applying this formula in 1976, the benchmark for the year will be about 5.6 per cent, a level based on average monthly rates of unemployment in the eight years preceding June 30, 1975. The regular adjustment of the benchmark will relate only to the sharing of the costs of initial regular benefits payable. The cost of extended benefits payable to those who are unemployed for longer periods will continue to be financed entirely by the federal government from the consolidated revenue fund.

Excluding the threshold change and the premium change, if the proposed amendments are fully implemented as of January 1, 1976, we can expect a net saving of $170 million in 1976 at a 7 per cent rate of unemployment. On the basis of the same assumption—and it does vary by rate of unemployment—the net increase in employee-employer cost for 1976 would be approximately $490 million, while a net reduction in government cost on these two measures in combination would be approximately $660 million.

Obviously, in consideration of the threshold to which I refer, it will be necessary to increase the rate of premiums paid by employers and employees in 1976. The employee rate, which presently stands at $1.40 per $100 of weekly insurable earnings, can be expected to rise to a level between $1.60 and $1.70. Assuming that the ceiling for 1976 will be raised to around $200 through the operation of the statutory earnings index, then the resulting maximum weekly employee premium during 1976 could range from $3.20 to $3.40. Based on these assumptions, the premium rate for employers should increase from its current level of $1.96 per $100 of insurable earnings to a level between $2.25 and $2.40. Applying the $200 a week maximum insurable earnings which we anticipate for 1976, the maximum weekly employer premium would range from $4.50 to $4.80.

The precise employee rate and maximum weekly employee premium will, in accordance with past procedures, be announced shortly, bearing in mind the requirement that the accumulated deficit in the unemployment insurance account must be reduced or eliminated, which we anticipate will be the case next year. In 1977 and subsequent years, there could be relatively small increases or decreases in premiums, depending on the trend of the eight year moving average of unemployment rates.

I said earlier that requirements for additional changes may emerge as our review continues. For example, I have mentioned in the past that we have been examining such important parts of the program as the benefit structure. To sum up, the unemployment insurance program continues to play a vital role in the Canadian economy in terms of the protection it gives unemployed workers. The measures which are being proposed in Bill C-69 will in no way undermine that important function. Indeed, they will contribute substantially to the over-all effectiveness of this program by eliminating some rigidities and inequities, by removing some disincentives to quickly return to work, and by cost reductions and better allocation of resources.

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, all of us have looked forward very eagerly to the introduction of the so-called amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I want to thank the minister for giving us the details of what he thinks the act will do. He spelled out about 11 amendments and then summarized them. What I find most interesting is that the minister, perhaps conveniently, did not spell out what the future holds with respect to further investigation. It was unlike him not to mention the 12-week period we had talked about in terms of eligibility. This leads me to believe that the minister is going to move in this direction. According to recent reports, he is thinking very seriously of relating the eligibility to the number of weeks work in a year.

In view of the minister's last statement, I believe he is perhaps thinking of the amount of benefit when he talks about benefit structure, and is going to give serious consideration to whether the amount of benefit is a disincentive. When he said, in concluding, that he has attempted to remove the disincentives to work, the minister—like all other ministers who sit on the front bench—suddenly saw the light. This party has been talking about the act being a disincentive to work. We have continually indicated to the government that of its own free will it has almost totally destroyed the work ethic of this country as a result of this act.

Why did the minister not mention the projected cost of UIC for 1975? He would not tell you, Mr. Speaker, but I will. It is $4 billion.

Mr. Andras: That is not correct.

Mr. Alexander: Having listened patiently, and with very little interruption, to the minister's speech, we on this side of the House believe that what we see now is a cosmetic, ad hoc approach to a very serious problem. That is reason enough to fight this bill on second reading. Let me go further, however. The minister talked about actual savings, and at long last we have some indication of the figure—$660 million. With all due respect, I do not believe the minister or anybody else on the front benches when it comes to the projection of figures. We see what a mess we are in now as a result of the projection of the minister's predecessor. I do not know what he is talking about in terms of savings. This bill is fighting the unemployment insurance irregularities on the backs of the poor, those who can least afford it.

Mr. Rodriguez: You are on both sides of the fence now.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will let me continue. If he wants to take me to task later, let him do so, but I ask him to give me the opportunity to make my speech now. Let him pick on the minister. Why pick on me? It is the minister who is messing this country up with a bill that is inequitable and will cost the employee too much.

Let me get to the meat of my speech and talk about these amendments. On this side of the House we do not know whether they go to the root of the problem. The problem is whether this is an insurance act or whether it is a welfare scheme, and what the amendments do in this regard. No matter what the minister says about the new benchmark and this threshold, we take a dim view of this new approach of the government. It seems to me they opted out of their responsibility when they moved that benchmark over an eight-year average.

● (1540)

The minister suggests that the government will involve itself with the scheme when unemployment reaches 5.6 per cent. Clearly, it is abdicating its responsibility to create employment. Previously, the government said it would intervene when unemployment reached 4 per cent, but it did nothing significant to reduce unemployment. Why does the minister think we shall support this new concept providing for government intervention when unemployment is somewhat over 5 per cent? I suggest that the new level will provide the government with even less incentive to involve itself with the creation of employment.

The regressive tax the government is imposing means that the government is opting out of its responsibility for creating jobs. The government's approach to the problem will make it difficult to determine if the system is being abused. Obviously, the government does not care. Unemployment insurance premiums really are a regressive tax. The minister said that employee-employer contributions would increase by some 35 per cent. I tell the minister that we intend to vote against the bill on second reading, for the reasons just suggested. Unless the minister comes forward with hard facts, hard information and credible statistics, we may not support the bill at the report stage or on third reading.

I want the minister to know that this time the government will not snow us. We asked previously what was wrong with the $800 million ceiling. The removal of the ceiling was a snow job; members of this House and the people of Canada were unable to find out what was happening with regard to unemployment insurance. Any information we obtained was after the fact. The legislation ought to have spelled out the supremacy of parliament. The government ought to have come to this House and said, "We need more money, even though we boobed, as usual." But as matters now stand they need not explain anything to us. We learn about what happens after the fact. The money is spent, and somehow we discover what has gone on when we attend the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Stanfield: We discover it about ten years later.

Mr. Alexander: We learn the facts about ten years later.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member speaks like a true PC.

Mr. Alexander: I hear the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) saying something. He is a member of the class of '68. Let me digress for a moment. I was glad to see that this government recognized his abilities. I hope that as Minister of National Revenue he will do a good job. We of the class of '68 do not want to be disappointed. So far, members on my side have not thought the minister's job all that important. I do not want to be mean, but they are not even asking questions of the minister. Therefore, I hope the Minister of National Revenue will mind his business and let me mind mine.

Let me bring to the attention of the House some general thoughts about unemployment insurance. We must ask some questions about its fundamental role. Is it an insurance program or an income redistribution scheme? If it is an insurance program, then surely we ought to be considering a program which is designed to protect bona fide members of the work force from the effects of unexpected unemployment. If it is an insurance program, it ought to be placed on an actuarially sound footing. If it is an income redistribution program, then of course it is just that. Any program of income redistribution may be defined as a program designed by the government to shift resources from one group or level of society to another, according to predetermined guidelines. Income redistribution, by definition, considers what is normal, not what is unexpected, and takes account of actuarial principles.

If we consider whether the program should be one of insurance or one of income redistribution, we should honestly conclude that unemployment insurance should be exactly that—unemployment insurance. To interpret unemployment insurance as social security, however noble, is to misrepresent the constitutional underpinnings of the unemployment insurance concept. Canada has a plethora of other programs specifically designed for the ends of social security. The minister mentioned some of them. They form the income maintenance and social security component of our social welfare programs.

Finally, I suggest that unemployment insurance as a means of wealth redistribution is extremely regressive because all wage earners grossing more than the maximum insurable earnings pay the same premium rate. Therefore, this concept lacks progressiveness. The suggested provisions for raising the benchmark or unemployment level above which the government will intervene, will make the situation even more regressive. The current premium scale is already highly regressive as it establishes the maximum pay-in at a relatively low income level. Accordingly, the brunt of financing the program's costs will be carried not only by the upper income groups; it will be carried also by the lower middle and middle classes. Therefore, the suggested regressive financing of this income redistribution program really runs counter to every principle which the Liberals opposite hold to be true.

The other point worth raising concerns the maximum pay-out figures. The minister mentioned a period between 52 and 104 weeks for pay-out. We shall need to examine that more closely. Allowing a person to remain on unemployment insurance for a full year because suitable employment could not be found for a full 12 months or, even worse, allowing a person to collect weekly cheques for one year while that person's feelings of dignity and self-worth go down the drain, is totally unacceptable to me, and to my party, I suggest.

It should be our view, except in the most exceptional circumstances, that unless an unemployed person can find a job within a relatively short period—say, six months—that person does not possess the requisite skill to be employable and is, in fact, unemployable. In that case, we face what economists call a structural problem. It is far better, it seems to me, to face this fact and insist on retraining, relocation or whatever is necessary, instead of letting the person sit at home and become, in fact, a new member of the welfare state at enormous cost.

It is interesting to note that the United States, which has a population ten times the size of Canada's, spent $4 billion on unemployment insurance in 1973. On the other hand, we in Canada will spend approximately the same amount in 1975 in that area. I point out that between 1940 and 1970 we spent a total of $6 million on unemployment insurance. That is how much we spent in 30 years. On the other hand, between January, 1971, and December, 1975, our unemployment insurance costs, as predicted, will rise to some $10 billion.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Alexander: The question the Canadian people must ask is, can we at any time afford such a plan which is costing $10 billion? The answer is no. Let me compare UIC pay-outs with the gross national product. In 1974, UIC payments made up 1.51 per cent of the gross national product. In 1975, total payments will amount to $4 billion, or 2.72 per cent of the gross national product. In other words, pay-outs will have increased by 186.3 per cent. These figures have not been put before the Canadian people, but they show clearly what has been the result of this government's approach to unemployment insurance, particularly that of minister's predecessor who now serves as Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) and who I was happy to see sitting here this afternoon. That minister and his officials where less than honest with the Canadian people in 1971. That is why we are in such a mess.

● (1550)

Do you know why I say that? Let me just review some of the white paper prognostications and projections, as the case may be. In the white paper, the then minister, now the Postmaster General, in an attempt to exhibit his government's knowledge of the issue made some predictions the nature of which history has proved quite erroneous. The following represents his administrative cost projections compared with actual expenditures. These figures are very important. This is another reason why I do not believe the minister when he talks about $600 million. The minister talked very definitely about the projection of $600 million. I have heard that baloney before about savings in costs. I will not sit here and accept what that minister states unless he comes out encompassed in gold and blessed by the Almighty. I say that with all due respect to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The minister knows I have high regard for him. However, when it comes to unemployment insurance, he is a disaster. I will get on with my speech. I want to talk about the administrative cost projections compared with actual expenditures. I know the minister does not want to hear this. He gets embarrassed when he hears these figures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I will ignore them and talk through you, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the class of '68. This is what the white paper, the minister's predecessors and the bureaucracy behind them, projected.

An hon. Member: Hurry up.

Mr. Alexander: Don't tell me to hurry up; I have unlimited time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Would the hon. member please address the Chair.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was dropped as parliamentary secretary and that is why he is so miffed. I cannot help it if he did not make any significant contribution to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Don't blame me, Mr. Speaker.

The administrative cost projected in the white paper by the former minister, for 1972 was $71 million. Do you know what it actually was? You would not guess; nobody would. I will tell you what it was. It was $120 million. There was a difference of $49 million. What about 1973? The projected cost in the white paper was $73 million. Do you know what it was? It was $141 million, a difference of $68 million.

What about 1974? These are the projections that this government gave to the Canadian people. The projected administrative cost for 1974 was $74 million. What did it end up to be? You would not guess, again, sir, with all due respect. It was $162 million, a difference of $88 million. Let us now go to 1975. I see the minister and his parliamentary secretary laughing. They are having a great time with this thing. This is important to the Canadian people. The minister should be paying attention to my remarks because these are the figures which he has conveniently forgotten about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I have many more figures here. I know the minister will turn red with embarrassment. He would not tell this, so it is up to the opposition to tell the truth. In 1975, according to the white paper, the projected figure was $77 million. What is the actual figure? Together with my colleague, I pulled this out of the minister in the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration. That was in May, 1975. What did we pull out? In the first quarter—January, February and March—the administrative costs were $62 million. Look at the minister smile. He knows I am telling the truth. Multiply that figure by four and you get a projected administrative cost of $248 million. In terms of 1975, that means a projected difference of $171 million. In four years, that represents an expenditure of $376 million over the estimated cost of administrative operation—and the minister wants me to believe that this bill will cost $600 million. Rubbish!

Let me move on. The now Postmaster General at that time declared, in general, that contributions would be lower for both employers and employees participating in the unemployment insurance program. That was in 1971. The statement was in large measure true. Both employers and employees covered under the former act were paying $1.40 per $100 of insurable earnings up to a maximum of $100. Since then, however, premium rates have risen substantially. The following displays this increase. I want to again show how this government is deceitful and less than honest with the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I want to show the weekly employer-employee premium rates as envisaged from 1972 to 1974. In 1972, with respect to employees, it was 90 cents per $100 up to a maximum of $1.33. In 1973, it made a significant jump to $1, with a maximum of $1.63. In 1974, it jumped from $1.40 per $100 to $2.59. Those were significant changes which we called then, and still do, regressive taxation. It is an unwarranted tax upon the taxpayers of this country who do not seem to get any compassion or sympathy from this government.

What about the employer? It is not up to me to come to the rescue of employers, but in terms of small businesses they have made a significant contribution to the development of this country. This government is removing the incentive from small businesses. It is hard to say just where we shall end up. In 1972, they paid $1.26 per $100 and it could go up to a maximum premium of $1.86. In 1973, it jumped to $1.40, with a maximum of $2.28. In 1974, it jumped to $1.96, with a maximum premium of $3.63. This increase in premium contribution represents a 55 per cent escalation for employees and employers over a period of just three years.

Mr. Andras: What was it under the old act?

Mr. Alexander: I am talking about the act the minister foisted on the Canadian people. Furthermore, by removing the 4 per cent benchmark on federal financing, contributions will increase, again, by anywhere from 20 per cent to 35 per cent. In real dollar terms, this will mean an employee premium rate of between $1.69 and $1.89 per $100 of insurable earnings, and between $2.37 and $2.65 per $100 for employers. In summary, then, premium pay-outs, under the changes recommended in Bill C-69, will have almost doubled by January 1, 1976 over that which was being experienced during the first year of operation under the new act.

While individual pay-outs have increased markedly, the aggregate increase and the increase concerning government expenditure is equally phenomenal. The following is an approximate breakdown of this outlay since 1970. The 1970 total was $695,221,000, of which the government's contribution was $224 million and the employer-employee contribution $471 million. Notwithstanding what the minister's predecessor said, these are the figures. They are very important. In 1971, the total was $890,594,000, of which the government's contribution was $333 million and the employer-employee contribution $557 million.

Now, here is where we are getting into trouble. In 1972, it was $1,871,808,000, with a government contribution of $717,000,000 and employer-employee contributions amounting to $1,154,000,000. Listen to the figures for 1973. The total was $2,004,216,000. The government's contribution came to $573,000,000 and the employer-employee contribution was $1,431,000,000. Now for 1974: that was really a wingding year. The total was more than $2 billion—$2,119,212,000—made up of $700,000,000 in government contributions and $1,500,000,000 in employer-employee contributions.

But the year 1975 is the year that really grabs us. Have you noticed, Mr. Speaker, the sudden and dramatic escalation in terms of costs during while the government sat on its fanny for years without even considering amendments, without even considering whether the country could afford it? But now they are talking about restraint. They created a monster and did not even have it by the tail. In my humble opinion, they still do not have it by the tail. In 1975, it is expected that the total will reach $3,750,000,000. Of that, $1,750,000,000 will be the government contribution, with $2 billion forthcoming from employer-employee contributions.

In his budget address of June 23, the then minister of finance lamented this massive increase and stated that restraint would have to be introduced. However, the point to emphasize here is that the government was not really concerned about the direction the Unemployment Insurance Act was taking. On July 28, 1970, the hon. member for Verdun, who as minister of labour was responsible for the birth of this monster, prematurely declared that unemployment in Canada has passed the turning point and would thereafter show constant improvement. In 1970, 5.9 per cent of the labour force, or 495,000 people, were unemployed. This year, unemployment is running at 7.2 per cent and is expected to exceed 8 per cent, which would result in up to 800,000 Canadians becoming potential unemployment insurance recipients.

In the Financial Post of February 26, 1972, the present Postmaster General, then minister of labour, was quoted as saying that the extra costs "don't present me or the government with any problem." I can remember his saying that. Commenting on the announcement of a $700 million Unemployment Insurance Commission deficit in 1972, the Prime Minister declared:

> I don't see any scandal... What if it (the fund) needs another million, a hundred million or two hundred million? What's the magic in numbers?

I will tell him what is the magic in numbers. The Canadian people are just tired of paying through the nose. Again, on May 25, 1971, appearing before the appropriate committee of this House, the minister of labour of that day said:

> There is no reason for alarm and I certainly feel no reason for alarm.

Today, though, there is a great deal of alarm, to judge from the minister's statements. He says that the act as presently drafted is riddled with disincentives and he wants them removed. We on this side, accepting our responsibilities, have continuously stressed the fact that the legislation contained far too many disincentives.

The statements I have quoted show quite clearly that if members of the government were aware of the problems involved in the Unemployment Insurance Act, they were certainly not ready to admit to them, much less to deal with them. As indicated in the budgetary address of the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), the situation was allowed to deteriorate and it is now being dealt with in a post facto fashion. However, although the government was not ready to grapple with problems which by then had become apparent, others were quite willing to point them out. In a press release on September 25, 1972, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) put his finger on the situation. He stated:

> The situation created by the government in respect of those who are working is simply this: expenditures on unemployment insurance are said to be monstrously out of hand . . . The cost to individual taxpayers will be staggering.

This year, Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance will cost every taxpayer in Canada an average of $175 above the regular premiums. My hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, went on to say:

> By its economic policy, its legislation, and by the Prime Minister's own "non-work ethic" dissertations the government has been undeniably responsible for putting so many Canadians in both these situations—unemployment due to work disincentives, and staggering taxation.

Despite these warnings, it took the former minister of finance almost a full three years to recognize that, in his words, some features of the new system, that is to say, the post-1970 arrangements, have "undesirable effects on work incentives".

I wish, now, to deal with another area. Less than a month before the June 23 budget was brought down, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) dealing with the possibility of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, stated:

> The fundamental reasons why we have not brought them (the amendments) in yet is because parallel to the development of these amendments there is a very serious consideration on the part of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the provincial ministers of health and welfare.

He went on to say:

> Increasingly it is becoming apparent that there is at some stage going to be a reconciliation and a harmonization of the interface between the unemployment insurance benefit program particularly and the ramifications of it and the rationalization of the income security system.

The minister merely touched on this particular aspect—the harmonization of the two programs and the rationalization of the income security system. As I say, this address to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration was delivered less than one month before the presentation of the budget. It is difficult to believe that in one short month the executive of the present government was able to reconcile, harmonize and rationalize the working of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the health and welfare ministers' proposed income security system. If it has been able to do so, where is the minister's orange paper?

It is even harder to believe that proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act were meant to dovetail with the primary objective as stated in the orange paper, because on his own admission the Minister of Manpower and Immigration believed it would be 2½ years before the orange paper would become legislation. I think this calls for some emphasis—2½ years. In the absence of the required dovetailing, I say this is an ad hoc, cosmetic approach to a serious situation. I refer to the bill which the minister has introduced for second reading. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration continued:

> As we get more deeply into the subject (changes in the UIC) we find that almost every action we are contemplating would have some effect (on income security).

Yet, less than a month later, changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act are proposed. This is why I have some hesitation about believing what the minister says when he asks us to believe in the justice of these amendments to the act. Since we are led to believe that any changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act will invariably affect the entire income security system, where are the parallel changes in the income security system? There is no dovetailing. In fact, it appears that as of May 27 of this year, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration had no inkling that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were proposed in the budget.

Speaking about Bill C-125 of the last parliament, a bill concerning unemployment insurance which died on the order paper, the minister said:

> I felt the measures introduced in that bill had gone too far and were not measures I wanted to see introduced . . . As I gained experience in the portfolio I did not wish to proceed with the Draconian measures which were in the bill.

Yet we now see very similar "Draconian measures" being introduced in the budget, especially those which are aimed at the so-called low income claimants and the aged. The bill before us is directed toward these groups. If the minister believes that these are the people who are ripping off the system under the present act, well and good; but he will have to show us that our senior citizens are so involved. I understand there are only about 5,000 or 10,000 who would be affected by this suggestion.

The then minister of finance in his budget address bemoaned the failure of consensus. It is no wonder consensus failed when there does not even appear to be consultation among cabinet members, let alone the provinces or members of labour, business and other interest groups.

In fact, the Canadian Labour Congress, an organization which will be greatly affected by these changes, was surprised and shocked that any such revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act would be contained in the budget. They have claimed that the budgetary revisions planned for the Unemployment Insurance Act are but "a political sleight of hand" and yet another attempt by the government to shift the blame for unemployment on to the unemployed. Indeed, in face of a budgetary deficit of almost $4 billion, the government's proposal to implement expenditures restraint can be looked upon as being at the expense of the aged and the poor and is tantamount to folly. It is a cruel trick on the Canadian people. If the minister has evidence that these are the groups causing or helping to contribute to the $4 billion deficit, we are prepared to listen.

The government has proposed—the minister has gone through them—five basic changes in the operation of unemployment insurance on the grounds that the cost to the government is becoming unwieldy and that the present act contains some features which have undesirable effects on work incentives. There can be little argument that the cost of operating the Unemployment Insurance Act is becoming prohibitive. As I have said, total benefit payments in 1974-75 amounted to $2.3 billion, with the government picking up $700 million. However, benefit payments in 1975-76 are expected to exceed $3.75 billion, placing a total cost on the government of approximately $1.75 billion, an increase of 150 per cent over the previous year.

This total increase reflects in part the increase in unemployment. Unemployment in 1974 averaged 5.4 per cent, and has been running this year at an annual rate of 7.1 per cent—an increase of 31 per cent—and there are indications it will rise to at least 8 per cent by the end of the year. However, unemployment statistics as such do not account for all the increases in pay-outs. While unemployment rose by 31 per cent, the total cost of UIC from April, 1974, to April, 1975, rose 69 per cent. More important is the fact that the length of benefit periods for recipients increased by some 51 per cent over the same period. This factor, therefore, can be interpreted as being the result of either the mismanagement of the unemployment insurance fund or a growing trend in which people feel more secure collecting unemployment insurance benefits than in the work environment.

Because of that last supposition, we in the official opposition still call for an independent inquiry into the operation of this act. Such an inquiry should examine the efficacy of the act as now constituted, and its administration. It should envisage whether changes in the legislation are required, as well as investigate in particular the administration with a view to maintaining an adequate program of unemployment insurance while avoiding disincentives to employment and excessive costs to contributors and taxpayers.

We feel there should be a fully independent inquiry, and not some in-housekeeping sort of thing about which the minister was speaking on the part of the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Council. We feel there should be a fully independent inquiry into the workings of the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to determine whether in fact this is an insurance scheme, a welfare scheme or a combination of both, and in order to determine whether there are abuses and, to the extent there are abuses, how to get rid of them. It should inquire into the extent of disincentives and recommend how best we can remove them. This should be a full-blown, independent inquiry, and not something the minister can play hanky-panky with whenever he feels the heat is too much. We want an independent group to look at this very serious matter.

The principle we should all adhere to is that any scheme such as the one we are dealing with now should be very difficult for one to take advantage of, but it should be very easy to administer. It should be difficult to get on the recipient roll of such a scheme, and very easy to get off. Apparently this is not the case now, as these amendments would indicate.

The government has destroyed the work ethic as a result of these disincentives. This, in turn, results primarily from a statement the Prime Minister made some time ago. He said: You do not have to work for money, because there are other amenities in life which are so meaningful. I should like to ask what they are and who is going to pay the shot. I do not mind these theories, principles and political philosophies, but I know somebody has to work in order to pay the shot. We cannot have that sort of attitude, that one does not have to work.

Furthermore, while the government pays lip service to the issue of disincentives, it only offers one point that even remotely deals with the problem, and that is the penalty period being increased by 100 per cent, from three weeks to six weeks. This would mean a waiting period of eight weeks including the two-week waiting period. This party has suggested for some time that eligibility for unemployment insurance should be based on an extended period in the work force. We still stand by that suggestion. Such an extension would ensure that unemployment insurance was directed to those who were securely tied to the work force, and as such it would be unemployment insurance and not just another welfare program open to public abuse.

The latest figures of June, 1975, revealed, in terms of trying to determine whether we should move from eight weeks to 12 weeks or to 20 weeks, that of the total UIC caseload, 15.1 per cent only have an 8 to 12-week attachment to the work force, while 34.8 per cent have an 8 to 20-week attachment. Since all recipients with less than a 20-week exposure to the work force qualify as minor claimants, that is, a 15-week entitlement, we can conclude that by extending eligibility to 12 weeks we could save $487.4 million, or 12.2 per cent of the expected outlay for 1975; or by extending eligibility to 20 weeks we could save $1.123 billion, or 28.1 per cent of the expected outlay for 1975, based on average weekly claims of $82.77 for July, 1975.

We are not saying this is the answer, but we are saying we will have to look into the eligibility period. I think that is just what the minister is doing. He said earlier that they were looking into the benefit structure. When he said that he caught my attention and my eye. However, the fatal flaw in the analysis of the issue by the Minister of Finance rests on the fact that the problems of unemployment cost in terms of disincentives are inexplicably bound together with the government's inability to deal with the real problem of unemployment and job creation.

The minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission has stated that the commission has a double mandate, the first of which is——to ensure that workers who suffer an interruption of earning receive the temporary income support to which the Unemployment Insurance Act entitles them—

The second mandate—

—to facilitate the quick and effective reabsorption of unemployment workers into the labour force, thereby protecting the integrity of the scheme.

It is becoming very clear that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is fulfilling the first part of its mandate of providing some sort of support. This can be seen merely by looking at the massive increase in payments. However, it is failing miserably at facilitating a quick and effective reabsorption of unemployed workers into the labour force. Therefore, the problem is not only one of costs per se, but it is also one of unemployment and inefficient job creation.

We all know that the Unemployment Insurance Commission would not cost the government anything if unemployment were 4 per cent; that is, employer-employee contributions would make it self-sufficient. It therefore becomes very clear that the mismanagement of the UIC is only a manifestation of the larger mismanagement of the economy and the government's inability to attack the task of job creation in any systematic fashion.

We have had some discussions regarding the minister's five-point reform program, and I would like to run through a few of them. The first is an increase from three to six weeks for the period of disqualification for those who have quit or have been fired from their jobs or refused suitable employment. This is something that is really difficult to criticize. As a matter of fact, I do not think we can criticize it at all, because this is what has been needed. But the government certainly has taken its time in bringing in such an amendment.

One of the amendments refers to payment of premiums and receipt of benefits terminating at age 65. The minister will have to explain this to my party. If he feels these are the people who are ripping off the fund, he will have to provide a good deal of proof. I do not like the minister talking about demogrants when it comes to unemployment insurance. Surely, if I have $1 million in the bank and receive income through working, that income would not be taken into consideration. Because I have income from $1 million and have lost my job, I would not receive unemployment insurance. That is what the minister is trying to say with regard to these demogrants. That has nothing to do with earnings and a man's entitlement to unemployment insurance.

Then we are told that the provision with respect to the special benefit rate of 75 per cent to low income claimants with dependants eligible for extended benefits will be brought into line with the standard benefit rate of 66 2/3 per cent. Once again, the minister talks about demogrants and family allowances. What has that to do with the next proposal, whereby the premium a person shall receive can be up to 75 per cent? The family allowance meant is to be spent for the children. That is what the minister has failed to tell the House and the Canadian people. He wants to confuse the issue and say that because the children are receiving the money, it is not necessary to give the man any money. The minister will have to explain that much better than what he has done this afternoon.

Mr. Nystrom: That is bad grammar.

Mr. Alexander: Never mind the grammar; I am making my points. There is the person who wants to be a leader of the New Democratic Association. The youngest member of the House of Commons complains about my grammar. It has not prevented my winning three successive elections.

Let me continue, Mr. Speaker. So far as I am concerned, the points I have mentioned, the special benefit rate of 75 per cent and the payment of premiums and benefits to those 65 years of age, seem to constitute the total of the restraint program of the former minister of finance concerning the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It seems to me they are almost exclusively aimed at the aged and the poor.

People over age 65 who are unemployed are not even listed in the Statistics Canada publication. This group has a 10 per cent participation rate, and it can be estimated that this cutback will affect, at the maximum, 5,000 senior citizens. Therefore, even if this entire group were receiving unemployment insurance benefits at the average Canadian rate of $74.61 per week for 15.9 weeks—and all of these points are highly unlikely and overestimated—the total saving to the government would be $2.77 million, or .07 per cent of this year's deficit.

Mr. Andras: No.

Mr. Alexander: The minister says no. Perhaps my research is wrong. I am always prepared to listen to the minister in committee, but he did not tell me how much it would cost when he made his speech today in which he said nothing. Moreover, this reform removes entirely any insurance and security for those elderly persons who wish to remain in the job market. Is the government saying that it does not want anyone 65 years of age in the work force? Is it forced retirement the government wants? Perhaps it is.

An hon. Member: Did you forget your lines?

Mr. Alexander: No, I did not forget my lines. I just want to bring some points to the member's attention. Then there is the provision concerning the extension of the period during which a claim can be made and benefits received for those suffering temporary disabilities or special training courses. I am not too sure what that means. This section is so nebulous as to be incoherent. We know that in due time the minister will explain this.

Then we have the change in which the claiming procedure for sickness benefits will be made more flexible by allowing eligible recipients to receive such benefits at any time during the first 25 weeks on claim, rather than the first 15 weeks. This change is really no change at all. It is merely an added courtesy to those workers who fall ill, by allowing them the option to choose when they wish to receive benefits. In no way does this provide for restraint. It could result in a slight increase in expenditure.

In respect of the new government-employee adjustment procedure, as mentioned, unemployment insurance operates entirely on the basis of employee-employer contributions when unemployment is 4 per cent or less. The present minister has claimed that an unemployment scheme like ours does have a crucial role to play in keeping the economic ship afloat in an industrialized country, and that this is something we should recognize when we examine the cost of a program like this. This was referred to on May 27, 1975, when the minister appeared before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Given the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act as outlined in the budget, it is apparent that the government has abdicated its belief in the worthiness of unemployment insurance for those who truly need it; that it has reneged on its commitment to fight unemployment, and that it is incapable of stimulating creative job creation programs. By changing the 4 per cent unemployment benchmark to an eight-year moving average, and by doing so during a recession, the government is ensuring that little or nothing of the additional cost of unemployment insurance which accrues from its inability to deal with unemployment will fall on the federal treasury in years ahead.

Since this reneging of the clearly established benchmark of 1971 makes it apparent that the government is no longer committed to 4 per cent unemployment, and since a great need still exists for unemployment insurance irrespective of the government's posture, it is safe to assume that the total cost of unemployment insurance will remain exorbitant and will probably even increase. The point is that now the burden for the government's ineptitude will fall directly on the shoulders of the taxpayer through what is in fact a new form of payroll taxation and, at that, regressive taxation of the worst ilk.

Don McGillivray, a financial analyst, writing for the Financial Times estimates that the change in unemployment insurance financing faces Canadian employees and employers with an additional tax burden at least twice as heavy as the extra tax on gasoline, and that this extra payroll tax under the new formula may reach $800 million to $1 billion next year. This new tax load will amount to an average of $89 or more a year from the wages and salaries of all Canadians who work for a pay cheque.

In addition, since the eight-year averaging formula will progress with time, it is safe to assume that this tax burden will increase as the formula moves, becoming more subject to the government's abysmal unemployment record. Even more alarming is the fact that this new form of taxation is highly regressive. Since premiums paid are based on a maximum insurable income of $185 per week—a level which is below the average Canadian income at present—anyone making $9,620 or more annually will be subject to the same tax. Therefore, this innovation shifts the balance of the tax system away from the income tax, which is termed progressive, to a payroll tax which bears most heavily on the poor because they are levied at flat rates and have a ceiling beyond which no additional tax is paid no matter how high the income. Mr. McGillivray stated in his article:

Sooner or later, Canadians will have to ask themselves whether they want to finance such plans from taxes which bear most heavily on those least able to pay.

There are several other minor revisions on which I would like to comment briefly with respect to the minister's major amendments. The minister said that someone on this side of the House indicated that sponsors of government programs such as LIP and LEAP will now be insurable and eligible to collect unemployment insurance benefits. I do not understand that thinking and I will have to drag it out of the minister. Here the minister and his government create unemployment, which is something we certainly do not accept, and in creating unemployment they tell people what to do and how to do it by way of short-term employment, and after that they want to pay them unemployment insurance. I do not accept that and the minister will have to explain to me in no uncertain terms why this approach is viable and necessary.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that under exceptional circumstances a member of the work force can now receive a second social insurance number, under section 34. This section makes provision to eliminate the possibility of two persons having the same number, one person having two numbers, or the fraudulent use of another person's number. Social insurance cards will also serve as a form of national identification without which no job can be obtained or held. We welcome that. It is through the tenacity and the aggressiveness of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) that this amendment has been pulled from the minister's clutches, in light of the hardship suffered when someone had his social insurance card stolen.

I will conclude by stating that we on this side of the House do not believe these amendments go to the root of the problem. We certainly endorse amendments which we believe will bring insurance principles back to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but at the same time, when it comes to spending $4 billion we want to move with caution. We remember well when we wanted to move with caution with respect to the removal of the $800 million ceiling, and the government wanted to hurry the bill through the House because otherwise, they said, the unemployed would not get their cheques. We will not be fooled again in the same way and we will certainly take our time.

Many of my colleagues want to take part in the debate on this bill. They will have more to say on the various matters which I have brought to the attention of the House but—this is most important—when the bill goes to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration we want to make sure that as a result of amendments the minister will bring in an unemployment insurance act that is an insurance act per se.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it used to be quite refreshing to listen to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) when he spoke on unemployment insurance matters, but having listened to him for three years it has become monotonous. I wonder whether the hon. member has ever gone east, where unemployment in Newfoundland is between 16 per cent and 20 per cent; to Nova Scotia where it is about 9.1 per cent; to New Brunswick where it is about 10 per cent; and to Quebec where it is 9.3 per cent to 9.5 per cent and I wonder whether he has made these great speeches about the work ethic and how the unemployment insurance pay-out is part of the great rip-off which cost the rest of the Canadian taxpayers $2 billion last year in pay-outs to benefit recipients.

I dare say they keep the hon. member on campuses at universities where he can safely make these great, statistical speeches, because I have heard other members of his party from the disadvantaged areas of the east and the north speak in favour of unemployment insurance benefits and even ask for extensions for their constituents.

We hear all these numbers thrown out, billions of dollars mentioned, statistics quoted. Let me point out, however, that the unemployed are not statistics. To be unemployed is a real and cruel experience. Remember that these people are unemployed through no fault of their own. Often their unemployment results from action by federal, provincial or municipal governments, or, in the private sector, because a corporation has changed its pattern of production in the interest of higher profits.

The hon. member for Hamilton West spoke about the work ethic. I always thought the idea was to teach our children to use their abilities to their best advantage in whatever situation they found themselves. Surely it is not above reason to expect that a person who embarks on a job should get satisfaction and enjoyment from it as well as remuneration. Surely it is not only work for the sake of working; there must be some enjoyment that one gets out of work. On the other hand, the minister was reading from what the Unemployment Insurance Commission had typed up for him. He came here and read it in a deadpan way as if he were trying to downplay the whole issue.

My party is not prepared to have its members make one or two speeches and then let the issue die, because the issue is more important than the unemployment insurance fund; it is far more fundamental than the fact that we have to put $2 billion or $900 million, or whatever the figure may be, into the fund. Surely the question is what the government is prepared to do about unemployment. The problem for the House is not to sit down and devise the finest and most perfect unemployment insurance act, but it lies—and the government must bear full responsibility for it—in the whole question of employment.

The government must accept fully responsibility for having failed working Canadian people because we have to pay for those who are not working, as well as the unemployed who have to face unemployment with limited incomes and must wade through the bureaucracy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which often makes them wait for weeks before they get their benefits. I know something about this because it happens in my riding. I see the commissioner up in the gallery, smiling away. It is not a smiling matter at all. Surely, if these unemployed people are entitled to benefits there ought to be no delay. Though I must say, about that gentleman, that he has been most co-operative in dealing with some of my more serious cases.

When I see the government proposing Bill C-69, it reminds me of the story of the robin. A certain robin thought, when the fall came, that he would stay up north because the weather was very mild: there was a warm spell and he thought he would not fly south, although that was what his fellow robins did. As the fall progressed, the weather became colder, until December came and it was extremely cold. At that point the robin decided he could not stick around any longer and he ought to fly south. He went up into the air and started flying south. Of course, the air was cold and his wings became frozen. As he started to fall toward the earth, his wings being iced up, he said to himself; "I know I am going to die; the end is near."

● (1640)

The robin fell into the barnyard of a farmer in my riding. As he lay there on the frozen ground, eking out his last breath of life, he thought that the moment had come when he would die. The along came the farmer's horse and defecated on the robin. Then robin started to feel the warmth spreading through his wings and the ice started to melt. He was feeling so good about this that he began to whistle, because that is what robins do when they are happy and warm. The farmer's cat happened to be prowling through the barnyard, and as soon as the cat heard the whistling he tracked the robin down under the mound and popped him into his mouth. There are two morals to this story which Liberals and Conservatives ought to keep in mind: not everyone who defecates on you is your enemy, and not everyone who digs you out is your friend.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Darling: Now let's have your speech; let's have the gospel.

An hon. Member: Where's the punch line?

Mr. Rodriguez: There is a meaning there, and when we think about it both sides of the House will see the connection between that little story and what this government is offering us in Bill C-69. The history of what is proposed by the government with respect to the Employment Insurance Act began back in 1971. Hon. members will recall that that was the year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) fought his first fight against inflation, and of course it was quite a battle. At that time he said:

> I'm afraid there are a lot of people in this country who are bargaining that, oh well, this government can't hang tough (in its fight against inflation) too long because it will be frightened when it sees unemployment go up to 6 per cent . . . But if the people think we are going to lose our nerve because of that, they should think again; we're not.

That is what the Prime Minister said when he began the first salvos against inflation—and inflation is always fought on the backs of workers, poor workers and workers who are not organized. That battle was fought, but lo and behold, the gentleman who is now the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) came like the white knight on a charger and delivered to parliament an unemployment insurance bill in 1971. He was like the horse. We had before us unemployment insurance legislation which widened the scope of unemployment insurance coverage for that great battle with inflation. At that time, the threshold for unemployment was set at 4 per cent, and it was argued that anything beyond that 4 per cent would be picked up by the government and paid out of the general operating revenues. We know what happened: the 4 per cent unemployment figure became an unrealistic figure. We must remember that one of the arguments put forward by the then minister of manpower and immigration who was responsible for the legislation was as follows:

> Our system is really on trial if we cannot operate on the basis of lower rates of unemployment that have been traditional.

As a matter of fact, he was saying that that 4 per cent threshold would indeed act as an incentive to the government so that it could go about creating employment and so that there would not be a drain on the fund and on the taxpayers of Canada if unemployment should go over 4 per cent. I must say, some incentive!

What is being proposed? Since that threshold has not been an incentive, and of course the government and the minister may not want to be trapped into any such predicament in the future, what is the government prepared to do now? It is prepared to adjust the situation based on the previous eight years of unemployment rates, and of course that figure will float upward as has been the case in the past. It never floats downward, it floats upward, and of course more and more of the cost will be picked up by those who are working. It seems to me that this is a very regressive form of taxation. Those who are working will pick up more and more of the cost of the program. The government will shift from its shoulders the responsibility for its bad planning and for the lack of programs which it ought to hring into this House with respect to employment.

What is the government going to shift in this particular amendment? It is going to shift its estimated $900 million for 1976 on to the shoulders of small businessmen and those who are working. This is a very regressive form of legislation. It is only one of three pieces of regressive legislation we have seen emanating from the June 23 budget. We saw one which imposed a 10 per cent excise tax on gasoline. That tax penalized the working poor, the handicapped and those who live great distances from their jobs. We fought that legislation, but the government had its way.

The second regressive move is the announcement that the government is limiting its contribution to increases in the cost of medicare. Again, taxpayers face an indirect form of taxation; again a regressive taxation will be foisted upon the working poor.

Then there is this particular bill, and I suppose these three items could all be summed up under what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has called "rough justice". First, the government creates unemployment, in the true Keynesian fashion, to fight inflation. Then the people start collecting unemployment insurance benefits; and now they are being blamed for their own predicament and being told that the government has to get tough with them.

We have seen how the government gets tough. The government can get tough when it deals with the little people, but when it deals with large corporations it sets up committees to study their structures but never to come to grips with the problems. It seems to me that when it comes to that kind of fighting, the government is great at doing battle with those who can least defend themselves. I find this very strange indeed. Here we have a government which just last week brought in an anti-inflation program which, according to the government, will fight to keep the lid on wages and prices. It turns out that it is only a lid on wages and not on prices at all. Prices can keep going up. In fact, the Prime Minister told one lady that prices will go up. That is small comfort for the unemployed and for those who are not organized in unions and probably earning only the minimum wage.

Even where there is an organized operation, such as that at Elliot Lake, the conditions are such that workers are forced to accept them or, I suppose, to refuse to work and be counted in that 23,907 the minister rhymed off in his blurb as "having refused employment". It seems to me that this is the situation: it is great to restrain poor people, but when we come to the rich and the powerful it is another story.

As I have said, the new proposal will change the level at which government contributions are triggered from 4 per cent to an average in the last eight years. It seems to me that in 1976, if the present unemployment rise continues, we could see a benchmark of 6 per cent in 1977. In just the same way the government argued that keeping a 4 per cent ceiling was an incentive for the government to keep unemployment down, it appears to me that putting it on a floating scale would just be opting out of their responsibilities completely. They are using it as an escape-hatch from their responsibilities, knowing they did not show any concern when they were taking it out of general revenues. Surely now, when they are proposing a system to take care of those increases automatically, they will show even less concern.

I should like now to look at the question of who is going to pay, and why this party claims this is a regressive tax. The present maximum earnings which are insurable are approximately $8,500. Since about two-thirds of the work force is unorganized and most earn below $8,500, these are the people who are going to pay increased contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. That is why this party takes the position that this is a regressive step. The bosses get the benefits. So far, all we have heard from the official opposition is how the unemployed take the fund to the cleaners. The unemployment insurance fund provides employers with an opportunity to make changes in structure and lay-off people for a period of time and then recall them when they are ready. It is a subsidy situation for the corporation, more than the rip-off situation for the hundreds of thousands of people collecting unemployment insurance benefits that the hon. member for Hamilton West would have us believe.

The second aspect of the bill which we find objectionable is this disqualification of workers who quit jobs "without just cause," or who refuse "suitable employment" or who are "discharged". This is going to be a bureaucratic delight. I have had a very difficult time getting a definition for such phrases as "without just cause", "suitable employment" and "discharged", from the unemployment insurance office. What is "just cause"? There are examples of people who have been given a three-week disqualification period by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and in almost every instance these persons are the unorganized. Organized workers have grievance procedures and the benefit of union officials who are well acquainted with this very confusing act and the regulations. The unorganized people do not have this kind of help and invariably they suffer as a result of such disqualification.

I always thought that in our system you were innocent until proven guilty. At the present time, the bureaucracy slaps on the three-week disqualification and then a person may appeal and go through the board of referees, but if they are unorganized they have to get the permission of the board of referees' chairman before they can go to the umpire. Let us take the case of Miss "X", where an employer demanded to know the dates of her menstrual cycle. She refused to discuss the matter with him, and he told her to leave. That is just one incident. There is another one of a waitress behind the counter, and when the boss passes, his hands are too free so she quits.

Mrs. Campagnolo: That is "just cause".

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. But my point is that they apply the disqualification first and then you have to prove "just cause". How does one prove that? It is the woman's word against the employer's word. Whose word does the bureaucracy take? Certainly not the woman's. They would just say she was one of those women who worked for eight weeks and then wanted to collect benefits. That is the kind of mentality that permeates the UIC bureaucracy. It actually happens that the disqualification is imposed first and then the worker has to prove that it is in fact "just cause". What is "just cause"? It is very difficult to prove. The bureaucracy has had a heyday with it.

Also, the phrase "suitable employment"—there is terminology to delight the bureaucrats. The definition of "suitable employment" may be very clear to those at the top, but when it gets down to the level of bureaucracy that deals with the public, it takes on colour depending upon who is interpreting it. The government says the proposed change to six weeks is due to the alarmingly high number of persons leaving their employment. In the white paper that the government issued with the amendments, it says that "despite high rates of unemployment and low ratios of job vacancies to the number of unemployed workers, the number of persons leaving their employment without good cause and refusing suitable employment remain at alarmingly high levels."

The figures indicate that 250,000 people quit their jobs in 1974. That is 2.5 per cent of the labour force. I should like further information on that. Surely it is important to know why they quit and in what sectors of the economy these quittings occurred. Most likely, the people included are some who have been referred to Denison Mines at Elliot Lake, and when they saw the conditions and learned of the impact of silicosis and the measures both levels of government have taken to clean it up, they refused the job and now are included in the 250,000 figure.

The minister is throwing around these figures to justify his argument. I suppose this and the other bill before the House with respect to cutting back the government's contributions in any increased cost of the medicare program could be termed law and order amendments. He is making a big pitch that the government is going to tighten up the Unemployment Insurance Act, when what it is doing is coming down hard on those people who can least defend themselves. They do not belong to a union and have no procedure for expressing dissatisfaction for their working conditions. They do not have the benefit of counselling, so have no option but to quit.

Most non-union workers do not bother to appeal a disqualification. First of all, the appeal is probably heard miles away from where they live and, secondly, the language of the notice from the unemployment insurance office, the significance of the regulations and everything about them, is very confusing and the unemployed feel threatened. When they phone the UIC office there is no one there to help them prepare an appeal. Even though the Unemployment Insurance Commission thinks that the appointment of some kind of ombudsman to help people prepare an appeal is a good idea, it has not appointed one. Further, if the unorganized worker loses an appeal to the board of referees, he cannot go to the umpire unless he first gets the permission of the chairman of the board of referees. On the other hand, we well know that in the case of organized workers the appeal goes automatically to the umpire.

● (1700)

Clearly, the bill discriminates against those who are unorganized. Do we want to force those who are unemployed and unorganized to accept dangerous jobs, to accept frustrating and low paying jobs? It seems to me that the minister is delivering these workers to those kinds of employers who pay the minimum wage or less than the minimum—whose working conditions are less than safe! He is locking these workers into such jobs because they will need to wait for six weeks, if disqualified, plus an additional two weeks waiting period. This means that those people will be without benefits for two months, if they become unemployed under the conditions of this Bill C-69.

I suggest that the act of 1971 was more flexible. It provided more support to those who were working. The virtue of that act was this: it forced employers to improve working conditions of workers who were not happy because of long hours or low pay. It forced certain employers to do what is done in other sectors of the economy where there are proper working conditions and fair rates of pay. It seems to me that was one of the good aspects of the 1971 act.

What has the minister done now? I know what was at the back of his mind. I know the sort of advice he was getting. I remember what happened during the last election, when he attended a so-called great big meeting at Chelmsford arena in Nickel Belt. I know who came to see him.

An hon. Member: A robin, that's who.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, it was not a robin. I have heard him called worse names. It was a fellow who owned a great lumber company at Island Lake, near Chapleau, north of my riding in northern Ontario. This fellow was incensed because workers could get more on unemployment insurance than by working for him. He said that the Unemployment Insurance Act worked as a disincentive to work. So he came to his father confessor the minister over there, and told him about the problem. He said that he wanted to pay workers $2.50 an hour and determine conditions covering meals and living conditions, etc. Father confessor listened and listened, and the result is this legislation. Surely he knows that some of these fellows, some of these employers, impose on their workers the very worst working conditions it is possible to imagine Yet here he is bringing forward this kind of bill. It can only tighten the control of such employers over their employees.

An hon. Member: You mean, he is a friend of the employers?

Mr. Rodriguez: I suppose he is. It is interesting to note that the government has not moved to increase the federal minimum wage. Oh, we have heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) promising that the government will consider raising the federal minimum wage. So far, it has not gone up. In relation to average industrial income, it has gone down. Between July, 1970, and July, 1975, the federal minimum wage increased by 58 per cent. In the same period, earnings in manufacturing increased by 70 per cent. Therefore, it seems to me that the government is ensuring a large pool of lowly paid workers for employers. These workers must work to support their families. We are providing many employees to employers who are not prepared to institute improved working conditions and fair rates of pay.

The other aspect of this bill my party finds objectionable is that amendment dealing with the dependency rate of benefit. At present, the act provides for 75 per cent of the weekly wage to a claimant with dependants, and 66⅔ per cent to a claimant without dependants. This bill contemplates eliminating the 75 per cent dependency rate and allowing only the 66⅔ per cent, the rationale being that the government has introduced all sorts of programs for the benefit of families and that the claims for dependants can therefore be eliminated.

I happened to be looking at some documents and, lo and behold, I found a 1972 memo entitled "Some background notes on the unemployment insurance program." The memo set forth arguments to justify the then proposed dependency rate. The argument used then could be equally used now to justify the retention of the dependency benefit. The memo read in part:

> Studies indicated that the benefit structure should permit the unemployed worker to meet at least non-deferable expenses while in search of new work. Economists estimated that about one third of a family's expenses could be deferred for a short time and it is for this reason that benefit payments in the initial stages of the program are set at two thirds of a claimant's average weekly earnings.
> In the later stages, benefits can be raised to 75 per cent of average earnings if the claimant had dependants, because non-deferable expenses become more critical if unemployment persists.
> As well, the low income groups, i.e. those earning $50 a week or less at the time they become unemployed, are permitted the dependency rate from the outset of their claim in recognition of their lesser capability to absorb a drop in income.

That argument is still valid, yet the minister has seen fit to eliminate the dependency benefit. That is a regressive move designed, I suggest, to make it difficult for unorganized workers to jump from job to job in the areas of Canada suffering from a slowdown in economic growth despite DREE programs and other programs which effectively accelerate technological change and increase profits but do little to create jobs.

The other amendment we cannot accept is the reduction in age from 70 years to 65 years of those eligible to pay UIC premiums and to receive UIC benefits. So far we have talked strictly about how this bill relates to people, to the unemployed. You cannot just consider statistics, whether there are 5,000 people of 65 or over who are unemployed, 100 such people, or only one person. If the bill discriminates against anyone 65 or over, it discriminates against all. Of course, the minister said that the government had considered benefits available under the Canada Pension Plan, old age security provisions and supplementary benefits to this age group are quite adequate. Do not forget, Madam Speaker, that two-thirds of working Canadians are not in unions. Hence, they do not participate in pension plans. Organized workers contribute to pension plans. Sometimes the employer only makes the contributions on behalf of the workers. As any economist will tell you, any worker who is not organized and who therefore does not participate in some kind of pension plan cannot quit work at age 65. It is not a matter of whether such workers want to work. The fact is that such workers must continue working. All our old age programs, supplementary benefit programs and what-have-you provide no more than $3,000, at maximum.

What is the poverty level in this country? It is approximately $4,800. The minister says they have given us the Canada Pension Plan and the old age supplement program, so we should be satisfied and get off their backs. That is not good enough. As I pointed out, for many 65 year olds, retirement is not a matter of taking your ease at the summer cottage or in a condominium in Florida. For many, it is a matter of economics. They do not continue working because they like it.

How many people do we know who have marked off the day of their retirement? I know many workers in my community who have marked the days on the calendar up to the date of their retirement. There are others who must still be available for work. Those people will be eliminated from the UIC rolls. All they can hope for is a low paying job that younger Canadians with higher expectations will not accept.

Even the three-week retirement benefit has gone out the window. In some companies, a person eligible for retirement at age 68 cannot get the three-week retirement benefit. This particular aspect of the bill discriminates against the elderly who are poor. This is a miserly, miserable, mean and insensitive proposal by the minister.

The minister represents a part of Canada where there is a great deal of unemployment—northern Ontario. There are a great many of these cases in his area. I am surprised that he is asking this House and this party to support Bill C-69. We on this side are not prepared to support it. We will fight against the bill as hard as we can. Our difference with the minister on this question is different from the position taken by the official opposition, which is that this bill should possibly be tightened up even more with still more people being cut off the unemployment rolls.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Before recognizing the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), I would like to inform the House of the questions to be considered tonight.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, it is with some apprehension that I speak on the bill introduced this afternoon. I carefully listened to the minister and having known him for many years as an honest and just man, I was wondering what he was really thinking while making his statement. I am sure that if the minister had drafted the bill himself, it would be completely different, that is more much human and just. It would be a bill where the financial considerations would surely not override the human factors. However, what can you expect, like everybody else the minister is struggling in our false and so-called democratic system, while we live under an omnipresent bureaucracy headed by a technocracy serving financial powers which still allow us to live in Canada for a few years. That is why I want the minister to know that my remarks are more directed at the system than at himself, for I hold him in high esteem.

Before dealing with Bill C-69, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, we must keep in mind that the purpose of this bill is to lighten the burden of small wage-earners. It is quite the opposite, since this bill stems from the fifth great element in the program of the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to limit public involvement in connection with unemployment insurance. If I make this statement in my opening remarks, it is to caution my readers not to fall for the misleading representations in the act which, it so happens, reads:

RECOMMENDATION

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 to add, in the manner provided, a new class to the existing classes of insurable employment; to provide, in the manner prescribed, for changes in qualifying periods, benefit periods, entitlement to benefits and, rates of benefits; to provide, in the manner prescribed, for a new basis for the calculation that determines the proportion of the basic cost of benefit for a year that will be borne by the Government; to make the employer's premiums of Her Majesty in right of Canada payable by statute; and to provide for the payment of allowances to persons or their representatives who attend before an umpire on an appeal from a decision of the Minister.

All the newspapers which were probably well paid to publicize the fact that the federal government had finally decided to lead the way in reducing federal expenses have left out the fact that all of this would probably be achieved at the expenses of minimum wage workers. We must recognize that those who claim to keep the Canadian public well informed are unwilling or unable to admit that the victims of the example given by the federal government are those who earn $6,000 or less per year. And it is precisely to those unemployed that the minister is saying:

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

We have felt it necessary to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to give it more adaptability and fairness. The minister dares talk about justice when he proposes to cut off unemployment benefits to those who are 65 years of age or over, the very persons who have paid premiums right from the beginning of the unemployment insurance program and have never put in any claim. Why? We were told this afternoon that it was because old age pensions had been increased.

● (1720)

But, Madam Speaker, did he figure out that the higher old age pension fell far short of the cost of living increase since 1971. The minister dares speak of justice when he wants to raise the small wage earner's premiums. There are 5 per cent unemployed who earned only the minimum wage, that is $2.60 an hour in Quebec, without any possibility of indexation. Is it just to penalize a person with six weeks' waiting when a worker quits his job for personal reasons? Because it so happens, Madam Speaker, that a worker has personal reasons as is often the case when an employer discharges a worker. In my opinion, it is an injustice in the Russian manner. Is it just to give a claimant with one or more dependants only 66⅔ when the old law was granting him 75 per cent, after the escalation of the cost of living due to the government's blunders and carelessness. To excuse the government, the minister talks of more generous family allowances. He very well knows that they are not making up the difference since 1971. He knows it but he cannot say it. It is merely social injustice which is reigning supreme since this government is in power and which they are mistaking for justice, because of their parliamentary majority.

I have stated before, with supporting evidence, that 80 per cent of the so-called social legislation passed through the House was clearly anti-social, and this bill is new proof of that. This bill is presented almost as a favour granted to people, a favour granted to the unemployed, like a bunch of flowers offered by a perfect valet. But looking at it more closely, what is it there to see, Madam Speaker? We bear in mind the minister's disconcerting promises of justice and equity, but the more deeply we examine the bill, the more we realize the discrimination which will result from it if no major amendment is moved before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. To illustrate more clearly my remarks, I will draw hon. members' attention to a few actual experiences which will highlight all the imposture hidden under this complacent literary style.

Take, for example, the question of illness and pregnancy. The bill provides for an increase or rather an extension of the period of coverage in case of illness or pregnancy. But if the minister keeps the same regulations, and that is the point, all diseases will be well codified and the officer's decisions will be mandatory. What will be the use of such an extension, then? If the regulations made by the bureaucrats who are now listening to me and approved by the minister without the reelected members of this House having a word to say and being even able to read them, determine, for instance, that an appendectomy requires three weeks' coverage, as though all surgery cases were similar, what will that extension mean? It all becomes a practical joke. Since 1971, we of the Social Credit Party ask the government to acknowledge in priority the attending physician's diagnosis.

We are always confronted with a fait accompli, that is to say that the civil servant reverses the medical opinion to conform with he standards approved by the minister and the dictates of the bureaucracy.

Is there anything more antisocial and more ridiculous? Not one word dealing with that urgent problem is to be found in Bill C-69! The minister will object saying that the unemployed who is sick can always ask for a second, a third or even a fourth certificate. That is precisely what is ridiculous, Madam Speaker, since the surgeon or attending physician has stated that such and such a patient must rest for five, six or seven weeks, because of the seriousness of the operation and resulting convalescence. That this same doctor should have to sign two, three, four or even five certificates confirming the original prescription because a civil servant devoid of any medical knowledge has made a decision instead of the responsible person, the attending physician. Again the minister may object that some technocrats have done so or that the commission has its own physician.

Do you sincerely believe that the physician designated by the minister can appraise all the cases in his office in Montreal or elsewhere? There is nothing more ridiculous when civil servants say in such cases that it is Dr. Dunn's or someone else's decision. Let us put an end to this practical joke.

We, of the Social Credit, advise the minister to put forward an amendment so that the physician's diagnosis can only be reversed by an ad hoc medical board.

This afternoon I thought the minister would reduce the number of weeks for eligibility in case of illness, but he did nothing. People will still have to work for 20 weeks before being eligible for unemployment insurance benefits in case of illness. However, if there is a worker who needs money, it is the worker who is ill. The number of weeks for eligibility should be the same as for a worker in perfect health. The minister hinted that he would introduce further amendments and we hope that he will pay particular attention to the case I have just mentioned.

Another shortcoming in this bill is that it fails to mention anything new regarding entitlement to benefits nor does it set a limit date to establish entitlement in case of complications and dispute with the employer. It is the case when an employer refuses to pay for the stamps of an employee who has worked for several weeks for this employer, he then quits and goes to work for another boss who offers him higher wages and better working conditions.

I have solved several problems of this kind but it was only after forceful discussions and two or three months' waiting that I finally won the argument on behalf of the applicants. Let us sympathize over the plight of a bread winner who has to wait two or three months for his case to be settled. That, is a serious matter!

Right now, I still know another case which is pending, from which I infer either that officials do not receive clear instructions, or that they do not have the authority to settle on the spot the case of employers who are trying to punish workers for not accepting starvation wages.

The most peculiar thing in this case, which has been pending for a few months, is that civil servants believed the statements of the employer, his wife, his children, his whole family, while they seem to ignore completely the statements made under oath by the worker himself, his fellow workers and all those who cannot talk, when faced with dismissal. In brief, one accepts without hesitation the employer's statement and considers the worker as a liar when all his companions declare before the commission or the civil servants that he was actually doing such work during so many weeks, then the employer says no, because he was paying him cash every Saturday night. Those problems and tricks are found particularly in restaurants.

In my opinion, this problem should be considered by the government. That is why I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what brings the civil servants to deny so casually the statements made under oath by a worker against an employer's false statement. Maybe the unemployed will win his case. But this poor unemployed, who is sick to boot, has been waiting for more than two months and a half for the civil servants' decision. That is why we ask the minister to bring an amendment if necessary so that civil servants will have more authority to take actions vis-à-vis employers who fail to acknowledge the amount of time worked for them and to pay their employees the stamps for the weeks worked.

Madam Speaker, I had an unfortunate experience respecting hundreds of workers. This was another situation. All of them had been working for the Quebec Department of Lands and Forest. Only after action was taken against the Quebec government which had had the work classified as non-insurable employment by the Department of Revenue did all those workers win their case after waiting for a year. Only after a year was justice done to those workers employed by the government of Quebec. How is that for logic?

An amendment will therefore have to be introduced with respect to those governments in order to compel provinces to determine, before works start, whether such works, or workers will or will not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

The bill does not deal either with lumberjacks—another serious problem in our parts—lumberjacks who are discriminated against as compared with other industrial workers. Indeed, if a lumberjack does not complete four weeks, the contractor has a right to give him no stamp at all, whereas in the rest of industry, if a worker is working for one, two or three weeks, he gets his stamps. Unscrupulous contractors can therefore take advantage of that measure by abusing it or even better by pestering the worker to have him leave the working site before completing the four weeks and therefore not qualify. Moreover, he gets disqualified for three weeks, and that disqualification will be extended to six weeks with the new bill. Do you know that in a whole winter, some contractors save hundreds of dollars through a form of legal injustice?

An amendment should be introduced to put the forest industry on equal footing with any other industry. We see every day that, contrary to the minister of manpower's own recommendations, the government appears to be acting unilaterally. They ignore representations by serious bodies such as "Action-Chômage" in Montreal. I even wonder if bureaucrats in Ottawa took the time to read the latter's brief, otherwise Bill C-69 would be quite different. I am referring here to claims for overpayment. Very often these overpayments are caused by ignorance of both statute and regulations. Even members of Parliament do not know these regulations, which are not submitted to them. How can workers find their way through that maze? The regulations are four times as bulky as the act itself, and they simply deprive the latter of any of its potentially good effects.

The government is proud of the $4 million of overpayment it got back. Who but the victims know of all the inequities caused by the exaction of forced declarations during house inquest, by threats of legal action or by intimidation. Over the last few years, the department doubled its army of inspectors sent to force declarations out of claimants. First, claimants were told they were being helped. Somebody came to their house, supposedly to help, and scribbled something on a piece of paper the claimant had to sign without any explanation, without any mention of consequences.

After these inquests, claimants received a benefit cancellation notice or a note of overpayment. The minister just admitted this afternoon that 144,000 unemployed were struck off the list in this way. Talk about a victory! There is a section on accounting errors. But there are also errors by omission, when the minister does not instruct his officials to explain the act and all the regulations, nor to fully inform workers and employers. There is a definite gap there.

It is ignorance of regulations on the part of both the employer and the worker. We say they are not allowed to ignore the law but, Madam Speaker, we are not allowed to ignore regulations yet they are not submitted to us, to this House for approval. And this is where the situation is serious. I think that you will obtain much more efficiency and honesty if you turn your staff into social workers instead of policemen looking for new victims that will only fill up the coffers of the government. The minister is not interested in giving justice to the unemployed, but only in boasting a fat unemployment insurance fund.

To this end, he will double the contributions if needed to have an unemployment insurance program financially self-sufficient. When the government grants almost half a million dollars to the CBC to hire actors at enormous salaries where is its concern about self-sufficiency? Yet the Unemployment Insurance Commsision has a social role to fulfill much more urgent than the CBC.

And, all those grants that the government allots for research or so-called manpower incentives—I could give you many examples of it—and that are nothing but political patronage. Let us not forget that all those selective grants are taken from the consolidated revenue fund, that is to say from the pockets and from the pay cheques of the workers. The minister had the honesty to admit it this afternoon.

The former Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said that it was necessary to change the way to calculate the part of unemployment insurance benefits financed by contributors. And he added that the cost of the program beyond the self-supported part was a burden for the state. The basis of his tabulations was then an unemployment rate of 4 per cent. But is it the workers' responsibility if unemployment has reached the present levels? Then why should the small earners support the burden of government mismanagement?

One only has to consider that in Quebec alone out of a labour force of 2,729,000 at the end of September only 2,476,000 workers were working, which means that 203,000 are unemployed. After all the increases in premiums and the restrictions on benefit payments, how does one dare talk about justice for workers? Is this really the time to restrict expenditures for unemployment insurance when we are facing the hardest winter in many years?

The minister was sincere when he admitted he agreed entirely with the principles of the unemployment insurance program. It provides, the former Minister of Finance used to say, a steady income to workers who are unfortunate enough to lose their jobs, and reduces the anxieties caused by unemployment. Well, I learned from certain bureaucrats that the new orders are that benefits are to be paid so the unemployed will look for work first.

I am under the impression that technocrats give orders to officials who must obey under penalty of tough sanctions although they are aware that those anticipated orders, to say the least, are in conflict with the very spirit of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

One may fool the public for a while, Madam Speaker, but not indefinitely. Today, the majority of workers have organized so they will not be bamboozled by the government. That is why we are not surprised to hear the protests of the leaders, the large unions, now able to detect all the double dealings hidden in a text of law. For example, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress stated that all small workers will bear the weight of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and confirmed that 75 per cent of all unemployment insurance claimants earn $6,000 a year or less.

Madam Speaker, it seems to me the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a service to the public. What do we find out, after we have been promised two years ago that we would have independent offices in the riding of Roberval, offices where decisions could be taken on the spot in order to provide personal service to persons unemployed for 15 days at most?

What did we get? A limited staff whose only task is to receive complaints and refer them to the regional office. These poor officials are there only to hear the complaints and often the insults voiced by unemployed people who have had it up to here, simply because those officials have no decision power. On two occasions, I was nevertheless promised that everything would be settled, but we are still waiting for those services.

Far be it from me to put the blame on the regional office which is overworked and cannot therefore give adequate service. Anyway, the persons responsible for that office look forward to the day when the minister will finally decide to give the services asked for many months ago.

Madam Speaker, there are many other points with which I should like to deal, such as the four weeks without benefits, for instance, but my time is running short. I want to ask the minister to read my remarks carefully and then, to introduce himself the required amendments to this House, if he really wants, as he said again this afternoon, to treat the unemployed fairly.

As a consolation prize, the minister tells us that in the future he will issue a new insurance number to those who have lost theirs. I believe this is already current practice because it has happened several times in my riding: I had no trouble getting another number for those people who had problems with their numbers.

Madam Speaker, those who are entitled to benefits and were denied those rights by decisions of civil servants can finally have their travelling expenses paid, when they will have to appear before the board of referees, while they used to pay all their expenses. In future, I am pleased to see that the minister has announced this slight improvement which is not much. Last year, I think that at least ten of my constituents had to refer to arbitration. Thus, very little is granted, only peanuts!

An hon. Member: It is not all that bad!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I solve the cases myself. If you come in my constituency and we will convince you. But above all, the minister admitted this afternoon that his department will save—this is the best gift—some $170 million with his new bill. I leave the conclusion to the 700,000 unemployed Canadians.

[English]

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think it is indeed a unique occasion when members of this House can speak on an unemployment insurance bill because it seems to me that most members of parliament spend a good deal of time assisting constituents through the sometimes intricate maze that is dependent upon their getting their benefits through that commission. As a result of the comprehensive review of that act, certain complexities and inequities have become very apparent. That is what Bill C-69 has come to grips with now.

For almost two years unemployment insurance has been the subject of comprehensive review to determine whether it continues to meet its mandate in the most effective way possible in a dynamic modern economy. A number of complexities and inequities have come to light through the four years of experience which are now on record with the act, and through the results of the review.

One important inequity which has been brought forward relates to a degree of rigidity in the maternity benefits provided under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The 1971 act limited the payment of maternity benefits to a set 15-week period, with eight weeks immediately preceding the week of confinement and six weeks following it. This called for a very precise estimate of the date of birth by a woman's physician and took little account of the vagaries of nature. Thus women often lost several weeks of benefit if the birth of their child was either premature, or miscalculated. Thus the spirit of the provision of maternity benefits through the Unemployment Insurance Commission was often frustrated by a simple matter of biology.

I should like to make particular reference to those women of northern and less populous areas who must often arrange to leave their homes in advance of a birth in order to bear their child in a modern medical facility. There was no differential possible in the previous legislation for such circumstances, circumstances which often cost them considerable loss of benefits not lost by their southern sisters.

We made the elimination of this inequity part of the omnibus bill, C-16, on which I was privileged to speak on May 29 in this House. That bill, which received Royal Assent on July 30, will be implemented the first week of February 1976, and its provisions will provide a measure of flexibility to maternity benefits which will guarantee that the mother will receive the full benefit to which she is entitled, without placing her unborn child on notice to be born on a pre-ordained Unemployment Insurance Commission schedule.

There have been inequities evident in the provision of sickness benefits as well, and a similar degree of flexibility will be introduced into the payment of these benefits by Bill C-69. Under the present legislation, sickness benefits are only payable during the first 15 weeks of a claim for which benefits are payable. As a result, a person who has been on claim for some weeks and then falls ill and becomes incapable of working must face either a much reduced eligibility for sickness benefits, or in some cases may find himself without any protection at all at a time when it is most desperately needed.

Bill C-69 proposes to redress this inequity by making sickness benefits payable for a maximum of 15 weeks during all initial periods of a claim that has been established. Thus, instead of limiting these benefits to the first 15 weeks for which benefits are payable, they may now be payable during the first 25 compensable weeks which may be paid at any time during the first 39 weeks of a claim. This almost doubles the degree of flexibility for sickness benefits and is expected to resolve a problem encountered by many claimants, one which has proved a real hardship for far too many Canadians.

A related problem, and one which my constituents have drawn to my attention on a number of occasions, relates to the fact that claimants may not under the present act terminate their claim, even when it is in their own interest to do so. This is particularly important in the case of special benefits, such as sickness and maternity, which are only payable in the initial stages of the claim. For example, claimants who draw several weeks of benefit, return to work for 20 or more weeks, and then fall ill, find themselves ineligible to receive sickness benefits because they are out of the initial benefit period of their claim. Bill C-69 will permit such claimants to terminate their existing claim and establish a new one on the basis of the 20 or more weeks that they worked, thus enabling them to establish eligibility for special benefits.

Prior to 1971 the Unemployment Insurance Act contained a provision allowing claimants who had been out of the labour market involuntarily to be granted an extension in their qualifying period so that they could have the protection of unemployment insurance during the crucial period of their re-entry into the work force. For example, persons who had been working in insurable employment and then fell ill for a year or more so that they could not work, or who were incarcerated in a penal institution, could have their qualifying period extended to enable them to establish eligibility for benefits once they were ready to return to the work force.

The 1971 legislation reduced the qualifying period to the point where people needed only eight weeks of insurable employment in the preceding 52, or since their last claim, to become eligible for benefits. It was thought that the eight week period would be short enough to allow people who had been out of the work force to re-establish their eligibility quickly. Unfortunately, however, experience shows that despite this easing of the qualifying conditions, situations still exist where persons are unable to qualify for benefits because of a lengthy absence from the active labour force. Bill C-69 proposes to extend the qualifying period to 104 weeks from the current 52 for persons in these unique situations who are actively seeking to re-establish themselves in the productive sphere of living by earning the means to pay their way.

In addition to extending the qualifying period, the bill also proposes to extend the benefit period for such people. That means that people who have established a claim for benefit and then lose their eligibility because of an involuntary withdrawal from the work force will be able to qualify for an extension of their benefit period when they are ready to seek employment again.

Groups which will benefit from this proposal include claimants on approved training courses, persons who are incapable of working for reasons of sickness or disability, those who receive temporary workmen's compensation, and inmates of penal institutions.

I do not know why it was at that point that I suddenly thought of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), but the hon. member really aroused my curiosity to a high degree when he mentioned that family allowance was for the children. I wondered if he really did give family allowance cheques to his children. I think the government made a very wise decision when it decided who the trustee for family allowance would be. It is the wife, not the husband, and with good reason, because allowances are issued for the benefit of the family and not as pin money in lieu of allowances. This is done by thousands and thousands of wise and thrifty women across this country.

Under the present act persons working on local initiatives and assistance program projects are eligible for employment insurance coverage. However, the project sponsors, that is, those who develop and obtain funding for projects and who often supervise the projects, spearheading them in many ways toward realization, these spark plugs, if you will, Madam Speaker, are not eligible. This is an inequity which this bill proposes to redress. This proposal is in support of the importance which the federal government is placing on job training, in particular on LEAP and LIP which have, from their inception, actively encouraged the participation of the unemployed in the creation and management of labour intensive projects.

The historic reason for criticism of LIP and LEAP escapes me, but I think it must be because so many members of the House are representatives of large urban areas, and in those areas which are not gigantic cities LIP and LEAP have become a veritable touchstone of improvement in small places. They are visible and tangible assets to them. In non-urban areas of Canada you can look at recreation centres erected where they would never be erected any under any other program; you can look at the finishing of housing, at the erection of fire halls, and the establishment of senior citizens' help programs. I inspected one yesterday in the Queen Charlotte Islands. It was one that our federal and B.C. governmental agencies considered and said was impossible because it would cost probably $1 million, so of course it could not be done. It is an erosion control system which keeps the Pacific ocean from eroding village land. The people there put out a LIP project and during the first phase for a mere $27,000, with some voluntary and some paid work, have begun to make this possible.

I would like to continue, Madam Speaker, but I see it is six o'clock, so I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith), that the debate now be adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight at which time, may I remind hon. members, that pursuant to the order made prior to adjournment on October 24, 1975, the House will proceed to the taking of a recorded division in relation to the second reading and references to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-73, an act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think my name may have been inadvertently called during the taking of the vote. I did not vote. I do not think the government has yet presented its case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) is absolutely right. He did not rise during the voting. I was able to observe that from here. However, I did hear his name being called inadvertently. The record will be amended to delete his name from the vote.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, when I left off at six o'clock I was describing some of the more successful and outstanding LIP projects. I do not want it to appear on the record as though there were only a few. On further research I have discovered that the few are those that are not successful.

Contrary to the popular history engendered by members opposite, LIP projects have been proceeding in an even greater and much more effective pattern in recent years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I was describing a particularly successful project that I noted yesterday in my travels in the Queen Charlotte Islands where governments, both federal and provincial—hon. members will notice my lack of partisanship—estimated the amount in the excess of $1 million. The people in that particular village, through successive LIP projects, will have been able to complete the project at a cost in the area of $50,000, in just over two years. That was done with not only paid workers but with volunteer workers as well.

These are the kind of people we are talking about in this particular bill. We are talking about the sponsors of the bill, those who bring the projects to fruition and those who supply the energy and know-how behind the projects. Those are the ones I am talking about this evening. As I said, that is one example. There are a great many others. The program is working, and working very well.

For those who represent the very large cities which have vast amounts of money, it perhaps does not matter that a sea-wall has been built in a very small village in Canada. However, let me say that when you have 17.43 per cent unemployment, as Skeena does, you do not sneer at LIP and you do not deny the sponsor UIC benefits.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been trying to hear what the hon. lady has to say; however, her colleagues are busy chewing the fat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) has the floor. All remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the only fat I would like to see my colleagues chew are some of the fat cats over there, who pretend to be saviours of labour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Equal treatment is what I am talking about under the Unemployment Insurance Act, equal treatment for the worker and the sponsor under LIP and LEAP projects vis-à-vis unemployment coverage. This is justice! I appreciate the member opposite giving me the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Benjamin: Tell that to the people in Regina-Lake Centre.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I was in Regina-Lake Centre last week. I found that a lot of people there are unemployed. Therefore I am sure the hon. member appreciates LIP projects as I do.

There has been concern expressed about the appeal system. The appeal system is an integral part of the whole unemployment insurance plan. It has been in existence since 1941, providing an effective recourse for both claimants and employers.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) talked today very knowingly about the sweet little waitress who had the misfortune of having a boss who put his hands where they should not be. He forgets there is legal recourse for this kind of thing. Most of the women I know would not be above putting him in his place, going to court and getting a successful judgment against the offender and claiming their UIC benefits as a result.

Cases are heard by the Federal Court of Canada, the umpire if you will. I think "umpire" is a very good term. I think it puts succinctly what we were discussing earlier in this debate today. This is fed back into the eligibility determinations made by the commission. Thus the appeal system is crucial not only in terms of offering an effective channel through which to challenge bureaucratic decisions but also as keeping the program responsive and attuned to the judiciary's interpretation of the way the program should operate. And challenging bureaucratic decisions is a process which I am sure hon. members opposite are as happy to see as I am and, that includes members of the New Democratic Party.

● (2040)

An important amendment in Bill C-69 provides for the payment of travelling expenses by the UIC for its clients and their representatives attending hearings of the umpire in cases concerning coverage under the act. The legislation provides for the payment of expenses of appellants who are appealing cases concerning benefit. The proposed amendment increases the accessibility of the appeal system to persons who disagree with decisions of the commission.

I am sure members opposite who have small disagreements with the minister over this bill will bring them to the fore in the committee.

I think I would be really remiss in winding up this discussion tonight were I to do so without saying how much I appreciate the efforts of those in the field who administer the present legislation and who will administer Bill C-19 when it becomes an act. These are the men and women who deal day after day with the ordinary people we are supposed to represent here. We hear all too often from members opposite that there is nothing but a giant bureaucracy out there with no feeling for human beings. It is our job to make sure this is not the case. If the people at the bureaucratic level fail it is because we have failed to bring the message to them, and that is what I am asking you to do tonight. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the U.I.C. people in the field, who are dealing with the conflicts and human problems are faced every day by many people in this country, some of whom never dreamed they would ever be out of a job—they felt they were beyond the pale, that they would never need to call upon the resources of the country to protect them. More and more they find that this, indeed, can happen, and I would like especially to remember those who deal with them on a day to day basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this is a most timely opportunity to talk about Bill C-69, a bill with unemployment insurance, because we are at almost the same time dealing with inflation and discussing inflation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested last weekend that union leaders who do not obey guidelines might well be put in jail in order to help the process.

I should like to quote something about the attitude of the public as stated by R. S. Malone in the Globe and Mail of today, Monday, October 27. Speaking of inflation he had this to say:

> But what about some of the larger and even more "untouchable" items? What about the staggering annual costs in unemployment benefits? All Canadians are aware that this program has become a national scandal to which Ottawa closes its eyes. Surely a time has come to bring a halt to the massive cheating and moonlighting which goes on, costing the taxpayers millions a month.
> Some strict screening, individual investigation, regular monthly reviews, effective penalties and allowance cuts when reasonable work is refused, are long overdue.

This may be an extreme view but it is typical of the view held by many among the public. On the other hand of course, we, as members of parliament, tend to come into contact with many cases in which there appear to be an element of injustice following the application of unemployment insurance regulations.

As one who was involved with the legislation in 1971, I think I can say that as a result of the changes which were made then the whole plan was removed farther away from the concept of a general insurance plan. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the most important aspect of this legislation is the change being made in the bench mark rather than the regulations we have been discussing.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), when he was minister of labour, had this to say when he brought forward his white paper:

> The government is not only willing to help provide a system of income support during an adjustment process; it is also ready to assume the cost of extra unemployment insurance benefits when the national unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent. This policy is perhaps one of the most interesting in the entire proposal. It clearly establishes the government's responsibility for the financial support of a national unemployment insurance program over and above the self-financing aspect.

With this change in the guidelines and the bench marks it is quite obvious the government has changed the whole goal of unemployment insurance. Now, as time goes on, bringing us into a moving average of the previous eight years of employment, within a few years employers and employees will be paying almost the full shot and, in turn, the government will be making the rules by which the money is spent. It seems to me important that we decide whether we are running a reasonable insurance program, or whether we are running a social welfare or social benefit program. If it is an insurance program then it is probably fair and reasonable that the employers and employees should pay for it. If it is a social welfare program surely the government of the day, the public exchequer, is the agency which must take a hand in it and put up a lot of the money.

What about the philosophy behind unemployment insurance? At first glance social justice should be the principal supporting argument in favour of unemployment insurance. It appears unfair that those least capable of bearing the burden of unemployment and least responsible for its causes, should suffer hardship. It might be felt, too, that productivity would increase because of an increased feeling of security among workers. Superficially, at least, unemployment seems to conform to the tests of an insurable risk: it applies to a sufficiently large group of people and over a sufficiently wide range of operations to permit the operation of the law of averages, and, theoretically, the economic loss can be compensated for, wholly or partially, by indemnifying an idle worker on the basis of former earnings.

It should be noted that voluntary unemployment insurance plans, widely prevalent in Europe in the early part of this century, broke down because they were not actuarially sound. The same can now be said of our own unemployment insurance system. Further, in the event of major calamity or depression, the strain of cyclical unemployment of a severe sort will lead to the complete collapse of our way of handling payments to the unemployed. To some extent this has happened causing the federal treasury to step in.

There are certain inherent features which are detrimental to the unemployment insurance concept. In circumstances of severe unemployment the fund is likely not great enough to carry the excess load, and even if an enormous reserve were to be accumulated its sudden disposal on the money market would depress business.

There are bound to be all kinds of bad side effects attached to any unemployment insurance program. The contributions of employees tend to increase costs and prices, and the contributions of employers lead to increased wage demands. Then, too reliance on unemployment insurance in times of need curtails the incentive to save. This reduces savings which are necessary for our economy to prosper. The unemployment insurance program is detrimental to employees' loyalty and increases labour turnover. As well, the psychological side effects of unemployment insurance are harmful. Work is increasingly looked upon as being purely optional instead of being viewed as a vital necessity in order to survive.

Unemployment insurance promotes evasion of responsibility; governments turn a blind eye to all kinds of abuses; workers believe they have only rights, no duties; and employers are given no incentive to maintain employment. A true insurance program would have to offer financial rewards to employees who would build up credit in the form of reduced premiums by not applying for unemployment insurance payments, and to employers who maintain payrolls and do not lay off employees unnecessarily.

● (2050)

It is obvious now that there must be a recognition of the key here: "Unemployment exists", according to John Maynard Keynes, "because employers are deprived of profit". Therefore the only real improvement in the unemployment situation lies in preventing unemployment, not in expedience for distributing the loss occasioned by it. Obviously compassion and justice require assistance for those truly in need. By and large the working public would gladly support any such proposal.

Having given some thought to what pitfalls are in a truly insurance proposal, we may follow along to discuss some of the changes that occurred in 1971 when the new Unemployment Insurance Act was brought forward.

It is obvious that the government miscalculated when it brought forward this proposal. As one who was on the committee I might say that the government was obviously flying blind. It did not know or have any reasonable concept of what the cost of the program would be in the years to come. At that time the unemployment pay-out was based on 43 per cent of the average worker's income, and rising as high as 50 per cent in certain cases.

The minister in charge of the unemployment insurance legislation and his officials obviously had no real forecast of what the expenditures would be. First of all they were presented with evidence to show that there would be a shortfall of at least $350 million, a minimum figure based on conditions existing in the year ending March 31, 1970, when unemployment was 4.8 per cent. The government made errors in its calculations and concluded there would only be an increase in the pay-out rate from 43 per cent to 66⅔ per cent of the income of claimants generally, ignoring the fact that there would be a considerable cost in the form of additional benefits during the phase calling for 75 per cent of income.

The government did not calculate that the ceiling benefit of $53 a week then would increase to $100 per week under the new amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Furthermore the government proposed that the waiting period be extended from one to two weeks. The unemployment insurance people estimated this change would give rise to a saving in benefits of $160 million. That figure was impossible. It did not take into account that following the two weeks waiting period that the claimant would be paid three weeks's benefits. The only ceiling that would arise in this case was where a new job was found within the two weeks, but the white paper acknowledges that normally this takes from three to five weeks.

No allowance has been made for an obvious increase in benefit costs that would occur as a result of the shortened eligibility period of eight weeks. Certainly this is considered to amount to more that $65 million.

At that time facts and figures in respect of unemployment insurance in the 1970's were presented to the parliamentary committee. Following the estimate of what the cost of unemployment insurance would be in 1975 at a rate of 7 per cent, the estimate then based on 1972 figures would bring this to $1,081 million.

We have now an unemployment rate of only slightly more than 7 per cent; 7.2 per cent to 7.5 per cent, yet the cost of unemployment insurance is $4 billion. Even allowing for an increase in the average weekly wage from the $150 in 1970 to something like $200 now, the government's estimate was not even close. If its estimate had been accurate, the cost of unemployment insurance this year would be something in the neighbourhood of $1,500 million, a far cry from the $4 billion it is actually costing us. Never mind what happened to the fellow with the fishes and the loaves feeding the multitude. No one could have been more wrong than the unemployment officials and the minister in estimating the cost which has now reached $4 billion.

In the intervening period the minister kept saying there would not be an increase in the cost. It is perhaps difficult to relate unemployment insurance costs to the general economy because of the rapid inflation and the variation in the unemployment rate. It is difficult to relate this in constant dollars. We can only look back and compare it with what has gone before. Perhaps it would be beneficial to make a comparison between our gross national product at the market price and unemployment pay-outs. This might be illuminating and of some value.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

For instance in 1964 the gross national product was about $50 billion and the unemployment insurance pay-out was $324 million, or 0.65 per cent. That percentage pay-out held fairly steady during the 1960's. In 1965 it was 0.57 per cent of the gross national product, in 1967 it was 0.54 per cent, in 1968 it was 0.61 per cent, in 1970 it was 0.82 per cent, and in 1971 it was 0.95 per cent. Then we came to 1972 when it suddenly jumped to 1.81 per cent. In other words, with the change to the Unemployment Insurance Act we had a doubling of the pay-out under the unemployment insurance fund in comparison to the gross national product. This has increased until at the present time we have a pay-out of nearly $1 billion and our gross national product is estimated at approximately $140 billion, or 2.92 per cent.

There has obviously been a fundamental change in respect of unemployment insurance. Some might suggest that the additional people brought in under the act in 1971 made the difference, but certainly these people would not normally be unemployed then or now. This includes government workers, federal, provincial and municipal, and certainly government workers are not usually unemployed. In fact a government employee almost has to be guilty of moral turpitude to be discharged.

Teachers were brought in, but I am sure they would not increase the unemployment rate. I think most members will have found it is almost impossible for a teacher to collect unemployment insurance. Employees of hospitals and charitable institutions were covered. Perhaps there might have been a slight increase in respect of workers in lower skilled jobs, but those in highly skilled jobs, I am sure, did not contribute to the increase. It also covered the armed forces, police forces, and professional athletes. Surely those people have not changed the pattern of pay-out under unemployment insurance.

When questioning the minister who appeared before the committee on May 25, 1971, I asked:

> Mr. Minister, I would just like clarification of this saving on the first week of $160 million, on that paper you kindly sent around.

Later I asked:

> —by increasing the waiting period from one to two weeks, you are saving about 45 per cent of the regular unemployment, based on a 4 per cent rate.
> MR. MACKASEY: But the money is going elsewhere into the plan. We have increased benefits, we have lowered eligibility to the eight weeks, despite the two weeks. It is really a distribution on the table. As I recall, this table shows were we save and where we spend, and we show that we increase the costs by $65 million by lowering eligibility.
>
> MR. RITCHIE: Mr. Minister, what astounds me is that by increasing the waiting period from one to two weeks, you are saving about 45 per cent of the regular unemployment, based on a 4 per cent rate.
>
> MR. MACKASEY: Unemployment is really front-loaded. Even in the month of January this year, at the height of all that high unemployment, over 110,000 or 120,000 people went back to work.

● (2100)

At the time the government passed the Unemployment Insurance Act it had no concept of the cost of this program. Furthermore, there is intense feeling that unemployment insurance is a great rip-off and that people are collecting benefits unnecessarily, to the detriment of the working fabric of our enonomy. This may or may not be true, but I think it can be said that when benefits are available a worker is entitled to manage his affairs so as to obtain them if he so decides.

At a time of statistically high unemployment I was astounded to hear tonight of a riding that was awarded nearly $1 million in LIP grants which is based on the unemployment rate, while in my rural area riding the total was $155,000. One wonders how accurate are the unemployment statistics. At a time of statistically high unemployment workers are difficult to obtain for industry. There has been a lack of available workers, particularly in agricultural and other basic industries such as forestry and mining. This is particularly true in respect of jobs which are not too pleasant.

In some of these cases I do not think it is because sufficient money is not being offered. There may be many unemployed workers, but they are unemployed because they cannot find the particular jobs they would like to have. If the economy is to function, then the jobs which are not too pleasant must be filled. If we are to have a healthy and vigourous economy we might ask whether unemployment insurance contributes to this.

In respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and certainly its administration, it has been one of my contentions that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is unnecessarily severe in respect of certain people who are not protected through belonging to a large union or a large company. I cannot help but feel at times that in a rural area it is unnecessarily severe in administering regulations concerning small people who are not likely to be able to fight back. The cases brought to my attention always involve people who do not belong to a large union or a large corporation.

Many people in my area, in the small hamlets and villages, cannot obtain unemployment insurance benefits because the officials have ruled that they must move to work centres a good many miles away. The distance rule at times is being applied very severely, and sometimes I feel unfairly. For this reason I maintain that many people who pay unemployment insurance dues and live in rural areas in fact are virtually excluded from receiving benefits because of the residence rule. I do not know whether this is fair. Generally the unemployment insurance officers rule that they must go many miles away. This really is impracticable.

Indeed Unemployment Insurance officials today I say would depopulate many hamlets and villages by moving workers to larger urban centres. Obviously in order to control abuses of the fund the officials apply the regulations very severely. Unfortunately in my area they seem to apply them to the casual people and those least able to cope.

These people to whom I refer are doing jobs which no one else wants. They are farm labourers, camp cooks, and people who work away from home on road work. It seems to me that before this bill is passed we should recognize there should be a thorough-going inquiry into the working philosophy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. What the government has proposed will not materially change the thrust of the Unemployment Insurance Act, other than shift it from a government role to a private role so far as paying for it is concerned. In fact, with the government still making the rules and regulations there will be a tendency on the part of politicians to increase benefits since the public treasury will not have to bear the full cost. We need to know whether or not unemployment insurance is to be viewed in terms of true unemployment insurance, as income redistribution, or social welfare.

A recent publication of Statistics Canada gives an idea of what income redistribution has been in the country as a whole. I think this is quite interesting. For instance, for the month of July Newfoundland received $12 million in payments; New Brunswick received $11 million; Quebec received almost $95 million; Ontario received $80 million; Manitoba received $4 million; Saskatchewan received $3 million, Alberta almost $7 million, and British Columbia almost $32 million. When one examines these figures one finds a wide variation in the amount of money received relative to the population of each province. The total paid out was $256 million. Had it been paid out in Canada on the basis of Manitoba's insurance pay-out the total payment would have amounted to something like $88 million, while in respect of Saskatchewan it would have been even better at something like $70 million.

I ask what effect income redistribution has on the structure of our economy and our society. We have a very contrived country. The government works on rules which are based on political expediency rather than on the state of the market. So I think we should examine the effect redistribution has had on the growth of our country. We have paid out vast amounts of money in DREE and other grants to entice industry to backward areas or areas in which industries do not seem to thrive.

Does unemployment insurance aid and abet the failure of industries to establish and thrive in certain backward areas? Why should there be such a large discrepancy between one area and another? This is not entirely explained by the good or bad times which occur in our economy in selected regions, from time to time. Do the methods used in respect of employment vary from area to area? Do the criteria in respect of payment vary more in one area than in another? Certainly from my experience with unemployment insurance claims in my area I can say the officials could cause the spending or the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars in a year by applying the regulations severely or not so severely.

Does unemployment insurance encourage workers to remain unnecessarily in a high unemployment area? We must look at this particularly because of the extended benefits policy whereby a person with only eight weeks attachment to the labour force may receive benefits of up to 52 weeks if conditions are right.

We might look at the question of whether or not unemployment insurance benefits are too high at 66⅔ per cent. We cannot blame any worker today who takes advantage of these benefits if it is in his interest to do so. If the system allows a payment then the worker is entitled to this payment. If the rate is 66⅔ of a man's average weekly earnings, then particularly if he has a cold job in this cold country he may want to take advantage of it. His costs are increased if he has to buy extra clothes, or drive his car a long way and he is not able to start it in the freeze up. This is where the figure of 66⅔ must be seriously considered.

In his recent budget the former minister of finance stated that unemployment insurance would be changed, and he proposed five basic changes on the basis that the cost to the government is becoming unwieldy and that the present act contains undesirable features. He pointed out the fact that the act was too expensive in its operations, and that the present cost to the government is almost double the amount that the government had forecast in view of the rate of unemployment back in 1972. Benefit payments in 1975-76 are expected to exceed $3.75 billion, placing a total cost on the government of approximately $1.75 billion. This is cause for considerable alarm.

Unemployment in 1974 averaged 5.4 per cent and has been running this year at an annual rate of 7.2 per cent. It may well be that due to the state of the economy the rate of unemployment may well reach 8 per cent by the end of the year. But unemployment statistics do not account for all the increases in pay-outs. While unemployment benefits rose by 31 per cent from April, 1974, to April, 1975, the total cost of UIC rose 69 per cent. More important is the fact that the length of the benefit period for recipients increased by 51 per cent over the same period. In other words, people did not go back to work at the same rate as they did previously. This factor can be interpreted as the result of either the mismanagement of the unemployment insurance fund or a growing trend where people feel more secure collecting unemployment insurance benefits than working. Needless to say, the former minister of finance has tended to place the blame more on the latter than on the former.

With regard to disincentives let me say that I have not seen much evidence one way or another. In fact in a report put out by the Department of Manpower and Immigration entitled "Canadian Work Values" the following conclusion is stated clearly:

> Clearly, Canadians are committed to work— Canadians see themselves as industrious people to whom work contributes a feeling of success and, for a large proportion, of personal fulfilment.

While this is a fact, it is true that more and more people confine themselves to work which they like. This is human, it is what we would all like to do, namely, work at jobs we feel we like. But in practice all sectors of our economy must be covered and some people must do jobs which they do not find too interesting.

I should now like to discuss briefly some of the solutions the government has proposed. First, the government proposes an increase from three to six weeks in the period of disqualification for those who have quit or been fired from their jobs, or have refused suitable employment. Superficially one cannot critize this proposal, but certainly I feel strongly that certain people who leave their jobs, who quit or who are fired, do so for good reason. We all have personality problems. Very often it is not the boss who is the reason for a person quitting his job, it is his fellow workers or some difficult situation, perhaps a personal situation. Therefore, it seems to me there is place here for providing some recourse for the one who is fired or who quits if the reason for his quitting was beyond his control.

The second government proposal is that the payments of premiums and the receipt of benefits will terminate at age 65. Again it seems to me that the government is saying to people 65 and over, "We do not want you in the labour force any longer". Perhaps due to the high rate of unemployment this can be tolerated at present, but we are fast approaching an era in which we will need those who are 65 and over in our work force.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

In other societies in Europe and in Russia people over 65 years of age are wanted in the work force. It would seem to be practical that some arrangements be made to allow these people to collect unemployment insurance if they wish. Many people over that age do not want to work because they have worked a lifetime and they do not want to continue. But I believe that within reason we should encourage people over 65 to remain in the labour force, and especially those people who do not draw unnecessarily on the fund should be allowed to continue. Perhaps one solution might be to give them an option of whether or not they draw on unemployment insurance.

I would like to make a few comments now on the new government employee adjustment procedure. Unemployment insurance currently operates on the basis of employee-employer contributions covering costs when unemployment is 4 per cent or less. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) stated to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration on May 27, 1975:

> An unemployment scheme like ours does have a crucial role to play in keeping the economy ship afloat in an industrialized country and that is something that we should recognize when we examine the cost of a program like this one of ours.

What the government is proposing is a fundamental change. By changing the 4 per cent unemployment benchmark to an eight year moving average, and by doing so during a recession, the government is ensuring that little or none of the additional cost of unemployment insurance, which accrues from its inability to deal with unemployment, will fall on the federal treasury in years ahead. Since this renegation of the clearly established benchmark of 1971 makes it apparent that the government is no longer committed to 4 per cent unemployment, and since a great need exists for unemployment insurance, irrespective of the government's posture, it is safe to assume that the total cost of unemployment insurance will remain exorbitant and probably will even increase.

I should like to read to you what the present Postmaster General, the former minister of labour, had to say when he was giving evidence on 25 June, 1971, before the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. He said:

> . . . The point I was making . . . which is a valid one, I think, is that if we had no unemployment insurance plan, or if the government was not seized under this bill with the responsibility of providing the features beyond the 4 per cent, despite Mr. Thomas' arguments, which were good arguments, in that event governments would have to assume their legal and moral responsibility to reward the unemployed in this country. If you had a 10 per cent period for instance of unemployment at 7 per cent you would certainly have an added burden on the general revenue or on the Treasury to provide some financial assistance to people.

In other words, the minister of that day was adamant that the 4 per cent was necessary, that the country had a social obligation to shoulder the burden, and that it would be a good thing because it would provide the government with an incentive to reduce unemployment. Now, however, the burden created by the ineptitude of the government will fall directly on the shoulders of the taxpayer through what is in fact a new form of payroll taxation, and at that, regressive taxation of the worst ilk.

This may have been quoted previously, but Don McGillivray, a financial analyst writing for the Financial Times, wrote the following:

> . . . the change in unemployment insurance financing faces Canadian employees and employers with an additional tax burden at least twice as heavy as the extra tax on gasoline . . . this extra payroll tax under the new formulae may reach $800 million to $1 billion next year.

The important thing is that this is merely a transfer of tax from the federal treasury to the employee and the employer, but is it in effect a scheme of viable insurance, or does it carry a large element of welfare? Employers and employees would be reasonably happy to carry a scheme which is a true insurance program, but when it is a welfare scheme or where there is a large element of welfare involved, surely it becomes the decision of the government of the day to modify it as to what pattern they shall pay.

Leaving aside the points which have been debated, the important thing is the changing of the bench mark which reduces the cost to the government and increases the cost to employers and employees, while in effect the same pay-outs and the same difficulties remain in the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in taking part in this important debate on Bill C-69.

This most important bill was tabled for first reading on July 8,1975, and I hope that, with the cooperation of all members of this House, it will be passed without a delay which might impede the application of measures designed to provide more efficient administration for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Since 1940, thousands of Canadians have taken advantage of this program, but it was not until 1971 that workers have been granted an unprecedented protection when benefits passed from 40 per cent of their weekly earnings to 66⅔ per cent.

Previously, if a worker was so unfortunate as to become ill, he could not receive any benefits under the act. An applicant had to accumulate 30 weeks out of the last 104 to be entitled to benefits, which according to several members of all parties in the House, made the policy outdated and discriminatory for thousands of Canadian workers. And especially those who live in areas where the unemployment rate is higher, such as in the Maritimes, in Quebec or some locations in the prairies or Ontario. Therefore the 1971 legislation compensated for several injustices, reducing to eight the number of weeks required to qualify for some benefits and to twenty weeks for all benefits such as the allowance in the case of illness or maternity and granting a maximum of 51 weeks of benefits.

It is therefore obvious that the new unemployment insurance scheme is fairer and more efficient and allows a better distribution of incomes than before 1971. However, Mr. Speaker, since the coming into force of the new legislation, several members, especially in the government caucus, have made representations and recommendations to have the unemployment insurance legislation amended to correct some problems which according to them create injustices for workers who are disallowed benefits for some rather technical reasons as well as the problem due to abuses by some workers.

According to current legislation, a person is not subject to pay any premium on reaching age 70 or when he or she is entitled to a retirement pension or a pension under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan.

Since 1971, both federal and provincial programs have been substantially improved, among other things the income supplement for persons 65 years or over. The most important improvements include the indexation of old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement, the indexation of tax exemptions and the increase in the retirement pension under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. For instance, the monthly old age security pension has gone up from $80 in 1971 to about $126 in 1975. The monthly guaranteed income supplement has also risen from $34 for a single person in 1971 to $88 this year. Particularly, the retirement pension paid in accordance with the Canada Pension Plan has increased from $65 in 1971 to $130 a month on July 1, 1975.

Considering all those improvements, the programs would unnecessarily overlap if persons having age 65 were still covered by the unemployment insurance plan. We must also take notice of the fact that it is almost impossible to apply effectively the provisions of the law pertaining to availability and active search for a job to persons of that age since a great many of them are no longer members of the labour force.

In Bill C-69, it is proposed that persons attaining the age of 65 cease to be insured and pay unemployment insurance premiums. Thus persons who will be 65 years of age and will have had at least 20 weeks of insurable employment will receive a special retirement benefit equal to not less than three times the weekly rate of benefit, or an amount of not less than three weekly benefits, if the benefit period has already been established for the claimant.

Mr. Speaker, the old law specified that the age limit would be 70 mainly because at that time that was the age at which people became eligible for old age pension.

I think it would have been more realistic, in all those years, if unemployment insurance had ceased at 69 when people 69 years of age became eligible for pension and so on, gradually lowering each year until 65, which would have made it unnecessary to pass this legislation. However, the main objective was to provide income until retirement. In those days it was believed that the desirable retirement age was 70. And yet, there have been improvements in this area.

● (2130)

It is a fact that whenever the House was dealing with pensions, a number of hon. members, either from the Social Credit Party of Canada or the Progressive Conservative Party, and especially the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), claimed that, in their opinion, the purpose was for workers to become pensioners when they reached age 60. Their main argument was to create jobs when people retired from the labour force at age 60.

What I can hardly understand, although people are invited to retire at age 65, is that these people want to keep on working. Therefore, when they ask to create jobs for people 60 years of age, they are not using the same argument. I wish people who retire at age 60 could have decent lives. If there is a responsibility for people who are 65 years old or over and who are employed, it is not that of an insurance. I see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is in the House. It is his duty and that of provinces to look after that. We, members of this party, feel that the people who are 65 years of age have worked enough. They deserve a well earned rest after all these many years of working.

Moreover, to allow people of 65 to receive a pension in order to retire more easily, in 1971, those who quit their jobs, at least those who wanted to continue to receive unemployment insurance benefits, were not entitled to do so while being covered by the Canada Pension Plan. That has been corrected since then. Today, at 65, the person who retires is entitled to receive the old age security pension, the full amount of the Canada Pension Plan. Nothing is taken off, except perhaps in one province, and I hope that in that province amendments will be made rapidly to eliminate discrimination against Quebec workers, for instance, whose contributions to the Quebec Pension Plan will be reduced, if they are still working at 65, according to their income, which does not apply in all other provinces of Canada. I wish an amendment in that respect will soon be voted in Quebec.

The age limit for eligibility for unemployment insurance has long been a feature of European plans. In the Federal Republic of Germany, the insured cease to be eligible for benefits when they are 65. Mention is often made of Sweden by our friends of the opposition. There are many plans in that country that are managed by unions, and eligibility for benefits cease at age 65. In Great Britain, for a long time now, the age limit has been tied to the date of eligibility for a pension under the national plan. In Italy, unemployment insurance benefits cease at 60 for men and 55 for women. In all those countries, the age limit is roughly the same as that which is understood in Bill C-69. Unemployment insurance is meant to protect the worker during his active life, and in many European countries, as in Canada, it is felt that other social programs must ensure financial assistance after normal retirement age.

The act as it stands now provides, in the case of persons and dependents, a special rate equal to 75 per cent of the average weekly insurable salary. That rate applies to all those who benefit from unemployment insurance payments during the period of extended payments, and to those who earn the equivalent of or less than a third of the maximum insurable salary during the initial period of benefits.

Since 1971, the government has taken steps to increase the assistance given those who have dependents. The most striking example is family allowances: they have tripled since 1971. For instance, a person with three children aged one to six who used to get $18 a month in 1971 now receives $66.24. In addition, those allowances have been indexed to the cost of living. Those changes, added to higher old age security payments and the guaranteed income supplement meet, far more efficiently, the needs of people with dependents; they also do away with the reason for a special rate of benefits in their case.

The situation as it exists now in the United States as regards the payment of higher benefits to the recipients with one dependent or more supports the proposal made in Bill C-69. In 41 of the 52 states which have an unemployment insurance plan, benefits are paid at a single rate and the benefits are equivalent to a fixed percentage of the claimant's salary during the qualifying period. In the 11 states which make provision for the dependents, the weekly benefits are nearing or equal to two-thirds of the salary. The rate does not change with the length of demand or the sum of the gains in any state.

The act which was in force before June 27, 1971 provided for an exclusion period of up to six weeks for applicants who left their employment of their own will, lost their job for misbehaviour or refused a suitable job. Normally, this exclusion did not reduce the number of weekly payments the insured person could get; it only delayed the payment of benefits for a period of up to six weeks.

When the new act was enacted in 1971, the maximum period of disqualification was reduced from six to three weeks. The number of weekly benefits payable to claimants was therefore reduced by three. Since 1971, experience has shown that the reduction to three weeks of the disqualification period did not reach its goal, which was to reduce the number of cases where claimants voluntarily left their jobs without reasonable cause, were laid off for cause or refused a suitable job. The number of disqualifications in one year, which is around 300,000, remains dangerously high despite high rates of unemployment and a small proportion of jobs versus number of unemployed.

In view of the proposed amendment to the Canadian program, it is interesting to see how in other countries claimants are disqualified in cases of voluntarily departure without sufficient reason, loss of employment due to misconduct or refusal to accept a suitable job. In the United States, penalties range from simple deferment of benefits for a specified period to complete loss of these benefits.

In other countries, the plan is less harsh, with a reduction in benefits that would otherwise be payable. Certain countries will not pay benefits during the unemployment period or longer, while requiring the claimant to work for a further period in order to requalify. In certain European countries, as Sweden and the Netherlands, the worker who voluntarily leaves his job without sufficient reason does not qualify for benefits. In other countries, the penalty in such cases varies according to the number of occurrences, being more severe on a second or a third voluntary departure.

In a country such as Canada, where unemployment insurance is aimed at favouring manpower mobility, such a formula would not be suitable. The insured persons must of course pay the consequences of loss of revenues through voluntary departure or job refusal. But after some time, they must be able to qualify again under the plan. Another recommendation involves the new threshold for the computation of the government's part of the cost of initial benefits. The principles embodied in the 1971 act, concerning the sharing of the cost between the government and the private sector, are that the private sector must pay for the share of the basic cost of the plan that relates more directly to the insurance part, and the government for that share of the cost that is more in the nature of a transfer payment. In fact, the federal government assumes the whole cost of those extended benefits paid to training allowance recipients and fishermen.

The private sector takes charge of the whole cost of sickness and maternity benefits, special severance benefits and administrative expenses. The private sector also pays the cost of common initial benefits as long as the unemployment rate is not in excess of 4 per cent. The public sector only pays for those benefits when the unemployment rate is in excess of 4 per cent. The 4 per cent threshold was inferred from comparable costs of the former and new plans for the 1960 to 1969 period. The government think the basic approach of 1971 as well as the concept of the 4 per cent threshold still are valid. However, the 4 per cent threshold stemmed from the economic situation of the decade preceding the introduction of the new legislation.

Since then of course, deep economic and social changes have greatly affected the labour market in general and the unemployment insurance plan in particular. Unemployment rates as well as the cost of unemployment insurance have consequently had a relative tendency to rise. Therefore, if the necessary association between the government and the private sector is to be maintained, in practice as well as in theory, a new sharing concept has to be developed that will be more in keeping with the changing patterns of the social and economic situation.

In view of those remarks, a new unemployment threshold is being proposed to achieve a better balance of initial benefit costs between the government and the private sector. The new rate will be based on the average of monthly rates for each eight years' unemployment period ending on the 30th of June of the year preceding the year for which the threshold is being determined. This moving average will reflect conditions much more closely than the present formula. At the same time it will offer some protection against any abrupt change from year to year. The regular adjustment of the threshold will only affect the division of the cost of initial ordinary payable benefits. The extension benefits to those who are unemployed for a longer period of time will remain entirely payable by the federal government.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) referred to this new cost of taxation. He accused the government of transferring $800 million to workers. First, there is no such amount as $800 million. I think the government is still going to save $600 million. That is accurate because in that $600 million they will be able to save about $170 million under all the recommendations included in the amendments to Bill C-69, and the part that employee and employer are going to have to pay is not $800 million but actually $490 million. In that $490 million the workers will not be the only ones paying but they will pay about $210 million. That would be more accurate than $800 million. Employers or corporations or all those employing them will pay 1.4 of that, which means about $280 million that they would have to pay for a figure of $490 million and not $800 million being thrown in, as mentioned earlier.

The financing of unemployment insurance plans in other countries—

I see an hon. member interrupting. He will have his chance to talk afterwards, and I will not interrupt when he is talking.

—especially in the United States of America, is of some interest because of the high rate of unemployment in that country. Many states are having difficulty financing their plans. Every state has a fund. That is where they take their benefits. The reserve of this fund generally increases during periods when unemployment is low and diminishes when it is high. Already 14 states had to borrow money from the federal government to meet their obligations to the unemployed, their reserve being used up. In 16 other states it is estimated that revenues might not be sufficient to pays benefits by the end of December 1976. Those facts show the important effects of high unemployment rates on unemployment insurance funds.

We see how much the protection given through unemployment insurance has changed in the Unites States if we compare the $4.2 billion paid to claimants in 1970 and the $20 billion that are going to be paid in 1975. In the United States, the programs also lay upon the federal government the obligation to pay a part of the benefit costs during high unemployment periods and to help people unemployed during an extended period.

Then, Madam Speaker, the principles underlying unemployment insurance are very similar in every country. However, their implementation should be adapted and modified in view of the changing situation in each country to offer constantly improved protection to the public. The Canadian system compares favourably not only to systems in other countries but also as we can see in Bill C-69, it is adapted to meet existing needs.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to see the minister in the House at this late hour, and delighted to see the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), as I wish to refer to what these two hon. members said in the second reading debate on this bill. The minister used such jargon as "income support," "income maintenance," and "term insurance" to describe the Unemployment Insurance Act. But he did not increase our understanding of the act or reconcile the paradoxes underlying the Unemployment Insurance Act.

About the only positive thing the minister said in his introduction on second reading was that there will need to be further changes to the unemployment insurance program. Indeed I assure you that there will need to be further changes before we can be excited about some of the things the minister proposed.

I am delighted to see my colleague from Skeena, and was interested to hear her assessment of the minister's speech. I have a good deal in common with the hon. lady. She represents a constituency similar to mine.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): And she is good looking.

Mr. Oberle: It was interesting to listen to the way she dealt with some of the obvious discrepancies in the act, discrepancies which apply to the areas we represent. It will be interesting to note what she tells the loggers of Skeena and the service industry of the area. It will be interesting to note the enthusiasm with which the industries of the area learn that not only must they compete for people on the labour market, but that they must compete with the unemployment insurance fund, as people will receive unemployment insurance after the LIP and LEAP programs run out, as will people who have come out of jail.

Industry is facing an awful time trying to find people to work. At the same time the unemployment rate in some localities is between 20 per cent and 22 per cent. I agree with my colleague. She ought to make every effort today and next week to obtain as much LIP money as possible before the program runs out. I agree that the people of the area suffer from problems, but I suggest that those problems have little to do with unemployment. They are of a social nature, and unemployment insurance really should not be involved.

The bill before the House indicates to us that, as with the case of inflation, the government is adjusting its sails to the prevailing winds of political expediency in dealing with unemployment. It indicates that the government has identified the monster for what it is, and is now asking the House, by introducing Bill C-69, to arm itself with a slingshot with which to attack the beast. The bill, as my colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), indicated, will do little to bring the flood under control. And, of all horror stories, that of the government's financial bungling of the UIC fund truly takes the cake.

In 1970 the total outlay in this field was $695 million. The government's contribution was $224 million. In 1975 we expect to be presented with a voucher amounting to $1,150,000,000 in public money. That is the amount needed to sustain the UIC fund if unemployment rises in excess of 4 per cent. Employers and employees are expected to come up with another $2 billion in the current year.

The government with the introduction of Bill C-69 has now, in addition to removing any checks and ceilings from the funds, also abandoned the commitment to strive for a maximum rate of unemployment of 4 per cent in Canada.

Administrative costs as well have kept pace with the orgy of spending. The former minister's white paper of 1970 projected costs of administration of the fund which, over a three-year period, were exceeded by over 100 per cent. Administration costs for 1974 estimated at $74 million actually cost $162 million. I will not bore the House with long lists of the shameful performance of the government.

The hon. member for Skeena made reference to daily dealings with the unemployment office by talking of bureaucrats who try to administer. It was interesting to note how excited she became about travel expenses being paid to people to get their appeal referred to the umpire. In her part of the country and mine, people cannot get to the appeal board. Some must travel 700 miles—and then there is always a unanimous decision by the appeal board.

We have told the minister that people cannot get their appeals heard. For those in the northern parts of Canada, there is no such thing as an appeal to the Unemployment Insurance Commission or the appeal board. How, not having been able to get to the appeal board, having been turned down before the appeal gets started, will they go to the umpire, particularly when the decision is always unanimous, as it is in Prince George? The chairman will not consider having the appeal referred to some other tribunal.

With regard to the orgy in spending, for those of us who daily deal with the UIC office, this does not come as a surprise. Armies of dedicated managers, adjudicators, counsellors, commissioners, agents, clerks, and janitors man the regional, district and local offices, carrying out the intent of an act, the intention of which has never been defined. Are they employees of an insurance corporation, or is it a social service they are providing? Is it a Manpower management agency or a relief agency for those who can either not find work or have no intention of working as long as benefits flow freely from the UIC commission?

A major division of the UIC army deals with abuses of the act. All of us know that abuses of the act present the major outlay, not only in the administration but also in benefits paid.

I wish to examine some of the obvious abuses. I will put them in two categories. The first deals with abuses permissible under the act. Unless the government addresses itself to this question, the flood will continue to flow over the dam. I have concerned myself with this question for some time.

In 1973 I canvassed my constituents with a questionnaire that asked some very serious questions. For example, I asked "How do you look at the unemployment insurance program (1) as similar to a savings program where you should eventually get something back?" Thirty-four per cent replied "yes". They felt that if you pay into the scheme, you should get something back. The other part of the question was "(2) as a life insurance policy where nothing is paid unless you are out of work involuntarily." The greater percentage, 72 per cent, was honest and said it should indeed be the intention of the act.

I also asked, "Do you consider the services of Canada Manpower adequate in matching job seekers with jobs?" Sixty-one per cent said no because it simply does not work. The services in my part of the country are not synchronized, nor are they anywhere else. I also asked, "Do you feel the services of Canada Manpower and of the Unemployment Insurance Commission should be combined?" to which 71 per cent replied yes.

Some people in Canada use the service as a bank, storing up leisure time. Let me give some examples of what I mean. The first is a family I know who live in the city of Victoria, British Columbia. This is no reflection on my colleague from British Columbia because the story is not very pretty. The man has reached middle age and is in a better than middle income category, earning between $35,000 and $40,000 a year. The children have left home and the wife is bored. The husband travels a lot and she is home alone.

To overcome her boredom she works in the local butcher shop for about eight months of the year. When her husband is home, she likes to be with him. She has an agreement with her employer whereby she quits her job and for four months of the year collects unemployment insurance. She does not necessarily want the unemployment insurance or to make an abuse of the fund, but she is trapped in the system. What alternative does she have?

Another example involves some friends we were visiting in Prince George in the constituency of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mrs. Campagnolo). The woman told me to observe what was going on across the street. A middle aged couple were loading a car and a very expensive silver trailer. They were about to embark on a journey to an undisclosed destination. It was not that cold, but the woman had on a fancy mink coat, apparently wanting to protect herself between the house and the car. The husband, a fisherman, earned about $40,000 a year. He is a good fisherman and deserves that income. The wife works in a supermarket. At the time they left Prince George, they were both receiving unemployment insurance. This is one of the permissible abuses.

I have just one more example. It involves construction workers in Powell River. Because of climatic conditions, they have cyclical employment, working seven, eight or nine months of the year. Because of the make-up of their jobs, the income they earn is much higher than that of someone who works all year. In addition to earning between $25,000 and $30,000 a year, they collect unemployment for four months. That is another example of permissible abuses. May I call it ten o'clock, Madam Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL COMMUNICATIONS—SUGGESTED RESUMPTION OF STUDY BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, at the outset of this short debate I should like to state that I question the use of the French language as a means of air traffic control. While sympathetic to the cultural aims of Canada's linguistic minority I believe that the highly technical field of aviation, with its critical safety factor, is no proper arena for the introduction of bilingualism in the pursuit of social ends.

Until I, and a good many people like myself, can be convinced otherwise, I cannot accept or condone the concept of bilingual air to ground communication. Introduction of such a concept would compromise aviation safety and in aviation the aim is, surely, to remove any compromise with safety. I believe there is a real danger involved in the continued and wider use of two languages in air-ground communications. One should not be so much concerned with personal or collective language rights to be found in the Official Languages Act as with personal or collective responsibility toward safety.

The demand in one specialized sector that the use of French be authorized for regional aviation operations is dangerous. Superficially, it might appear harmless for the Ministry of Transport to allow the use of French, say, between Baie Comeau control tower and a member of the local airplane club, but it is neither desirable nor possible to work out a system catering to local pride in language without coming into hazardous conflict with general practice.

For whatever motives the newly organized group of air traffic controllers in Quebec wants French to be given equal recognition with English, it is willing to close its eyes to world-wide procedures designed to make aviation safer by eliminating language conflicts in communications. If choosing English discriminates against the French of French Canada it is also unfair to the Germans, Dutch, Spanish, Italians, Portuguese and members of all other language groups who must communicate with pilots or control towers during split second take-offs and landings in international flights. It appears that the Quebec controllers are aiming for a change in the Official Languages Act to expand the use of French.

All this may sound rather bigoted against the use of French but I assure you, Madam Speaker, that it is not. The main thing we must all keep first and foremost in our minds is the importance of aviation safety. I happen to feel that to compromise aviation safety by using a language other than English is at some point in time likely to be detrimental or fatal to the Canadian flying public. I believe that to make an exception for Quebec will merely isolate private pilots in that province who are described as the main beneficiaries of the proposals, making it more difficult for them ever to fly outside the province of Quebec. Regardless of a natural pride in one's mother tongue, English is the language of communication in aviation, as it is at sea.

What concerns many people is the question of what would happen if the use of the French language were to be expanded to more than the five airports presently employing it. What about the major airports in the Province of Quebec? For that matter, what about the rest of Canada?

It is interesting to note—and the government may attach some importance to it—that the Flying Farmers of Canada, a large organization composed of farm people using light aircraft in all the provinces across Canada, has come out full square in favour of the use of the English language in air-ground communications. The association has passed a resolution stating that it would prefer all air traffic controllers to be instructed in English only. The association makes it clear that the flying farmers are not speaking out against French but against the use of any language other than English—the universal language of aviation.

I would urge the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale), who is in his place, to come clean in the debate tonight and to state the government's intentions. The committee (BILCOM) has failed and it appears it is divided not on the safety factor but on the language factor. We see a minority report coming out of Project BILCOM advocating the use of the French language much more extensively than at the present time. The writer of that report talks more about the Official Languages Act than he does about air safety.

I cannot and will not condone what is taking place at the present time in the province of Quebec in terms of air safety. I believe that if the experiment is allowed to continue lives may be lost, and an even greater fear is that at some point in time the Ministry of Transport may be talked into allowing the use of the French language to expand throughout the province of Quebec to the major international airports.

For these reasons I would urge the government to reverse its stand on the aspect of bilingual air-ground communications before someone is seriously hurt.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, let me say as I begin to reply to the hon. member this evening that I very much agree with his general concern for safety, and I assure him that the minister and the Ministry of Transport do so as well. However, I cannot agree with the hon. member's interpretation of the facts in the particular case to which he has referred.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) intends to continue investigation into the safety aspect of the use of two languages during air-ground communications, and consultation with the aviation community in that regard. The decision to introduce further changes to the existing language situation will not be made before the most exhaustive examination indicates clearly that such changes will appear to be safe and will in fact be safe.

The minister has said in reply to the hon. member's earlier question that while, where convenient and possible, the ministry would want to make French language facilities available to pilots, the uppermost consideration must be conditions of safety in flight. The minister further indicated that discussions would be continued with all interested groups involved in the air industry to demonstrate that this is what we are trying to accomplish.

Prior to its dissolution, the safety committee to which the hon. member has referred agreed on the provision of bilingual advisory service by air radio stations in the province of Quebec. The ministry has prepared a plan to implement this service but intends to brief the aviation associations prior to implementation.

Any extension of bilingual VFR control beyond the present five airport areas in the province of Quebec will be the subject of separate consultation with aviation associations, and will be contemplated only where fully consistent with safety.

The areas of Dorval and Mirabel airports will continue to be excluded from any such consideration of expansion. The more complex problem of the introduction of the French language into air-ground communications during flight operations under instrument flight rules will require extensive study and use of the air traffic service simulator and the joint participation of the aviation community before it can be determined that this change is feasible.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BILL RELATING TO HONG KONG AND EUROPEAN PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, July 29, as recorded in Hansard at page 8023, I put this question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

Will the minister consider tabling, before the House rises for its recess, the government's bill implementing the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs with respect to Canadian prisoners of war, both Hong Kong and European?

The minister's reply was to the effect that the recess was just about upon us and he doubted if it would be possible to meet my request before we rose for the summer. However, he did say this in respect of the legislation about which I questioned him:

It is being prepared, for presentation to cabinet.

Sometime later, on Wednesday, October 15, I put another question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in which I reminded him of the exchange on July 29 to which I have just referred. I concluded by asking him my question in these words:

Can he say whether a bill implementing these recommendations will be introduced shortly?

The minister replied, as it appears on page 8229, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the report referred to by the hon. member is presently under consideration by the government.

● (2210)

Perhaps I might take a moment or two to indicate what that report was all about. All of us are familiar with it but it might be well to have its terms on the record briefly at this point. It is a report which was approved unanimously by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. It was submitted to the House on Thursday, June 12. The report followed an extensive study of the Hermann report on the whole question of what we should be doing for Canadians who were prisoners of war in Europe, and also whether we should be improving the pensions of Canadians who were prisoners of war in Hong Kong.

We made four recommendations. The first was that there should be a new act of parliament to deal specifically with the case of former prisoners of war. Second, we proposed that the compensation arrangements to veterans who were prisoners of the Japanese should be improved. At the present time there is a 50 per cent pension guaranteed to anyone who was a prisoner of the Japanese, but anyone who already has an assessed disability pension does not receive it on top of that 50 per cent. Our recommendation is that the 50 per cent would be given everyone who was at Hong Kong and that any assessed disability pension should be on top of that 50 per cent, with a ceiling of 100 per cent on the total pension.

Our third recommendation is that there should be established scales of pensions for those who were prisoners of war in Europe. We arrived at a formula which suggested that in respect of incarceration up to one and one-half years it should be 10 per cent, in respect of incarceration for a period from one and one-half years to two and one-half years it should be 15 per cent, and in the case of incarceration for a period of two and one-half years or over it should be 20 per cent. An assessed disability pension would be on top of these percentages.

Our fourth recommendation was that a basic change should be made in the provision of pensions for widows of veterans. The general rule now is that unless a veteran's disability pension is 50 per cent or more—and for a technical reason that is the same as 48 per cent—there is no survivor's pension as a right for the widow. We are recommending this be changed and that there be in effect a pro rata pension for the widow of any veteran on a disability pension.

I am not arguing the case for these four points tonight. I do not think this is necessary. I simply felt they should be part of what is on the record at this point. We think we did a good job in the committee. We heard many witnesses. We sorted all the evidence and tried to arrive at a compromise where there were differences.

One thing which pleases me is that the member of the committee who happened to move the motion which received the unanimous support of the committee, who then was a private member, is now a member of the cabinet. I refer to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), now Minister of National Revenue. I welcome the smile on the face of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) because in him he knows he has a supporter for this cause.

My plea to the minister tonight is a straightforward one. I do not stand here arguing with him. I believe he is just as anxious for this legislation as I am, but it is a matter of deep concern that so many months can go by before action is taken in respect of a matter of this kind. The Hermann report was dated 1973 although we did not receive it until 1974. The recommendation of the standing committee was made on June 12, 1975, and here we are almost at the end of October. These veterans, especially the Hong King veterans, literally die off because of their experience as prisoners of war. There were many who were prisoners of war in Europe who were encouraged by the report of our committee, but what they need is for the legislation to come into effect.

I am happy that the minister has been able to say to me on two occasions that the matter is before cabinet. I hope he knows that he has the support of the entire House, and if he cannot tell us tonight on what day cabinet will let him bring in the legislation, I hope he will be ready to give that answer the next time I put the question to him, because he knows that if he does not bring it in soon there certainly will be a next time for this same question.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to reply to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) requesting a bill relating to Canadian prisoners or war in Europe and Hong Kong.

Hon. members will recall that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs at its meeting on June 22, 1972, requested that a study be undertaken to identify any physiological or psychological long term effects which their incarceration may have had on ex-prisoners of war of the European theatre, numbering approximately 7,500. The government accepted this recommendation and on January 31, 1973, the study was undertaken by Dr. J. Douglas Hermann, a distinguished Canadian surgeon. Dr. Hermann's report was received by the government and tabled in the House of Commons on Monday, November 18, 1974. It was subsequently referred to the standing committee for study on Wednesday, March 26, 1975, and the committee reported back to the House on Thursday, June 12, 1975.

In the meantime I have held consultations on this very important subject with my colleagues. At the present time this, along with other government proposals, must be examined carefully in the light of the recently announced guidelines. I would hope, as would other members of the House, that the request for compensation for ex-prisoners of war will not become a victim of our financial restrictions.

I hope to have something more definite to announce before too long.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TREATMENT OF EMPLOYEES TAKING FRENCH LANGUAGE TRAINING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, on October 16 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with regard to the application of the Official Languages Act vis-à-vis CNR employees of the passenger sales department at Winnipeg and the unjust treatment they were receiving under the Official Languages Act, and also respecting the 1973 resolution which was to protect unilingual civil servants but which is offering no protection to them at all.

I have received a letter from the minister in which he says that as a result of changes in the transcontinental train schedule the hours of service to the public of the Winnipeg ticket and reservation offices were reduced. This resulted in a decrease in two counter and three telephone positions. The necessary advance notice was provided to the brotherhood in accordance with the existing arrangement on operation changes.

There is confusion here because the brotherhood has contacted the members of the CNR department in Winnipeg and they have told him they are not covered by the 1973 resolution which was passed in parliament. The spokesmen for the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Workers state that CNR is in the throes of establishing six bilingual positions in Winnipeg, but so far they have designated only three.

The minister went on to say that as regards language rating only two ticket office personnel have completed the presently available French courses and they are considered bilingual for the positions they occupy. No employees who have taken any of the language training have been notified that they are bilingual, and if they had been designated bilingual it would not be necessary for CNR to hire bilingual persons off the street to take positions in this department, with job security, and to get all the overtime in the department. That is why this ridiculous document was passed in June of 1973, a document not worth the paper it is written on. It was never intended to protect unilingual civil servants at all. If the government had any intention of protecting them, it would have made this document part of the Official Languages Act, and made it law.

● (2220)

I would like to point out that I voted against the Official Languages Act. This is one of the reasons why we pointed out at the time that the federal government had no intention of protecting unilingual civil servants, and that is why I did not support it at that time, and I have been proven right to date.

The letter from the minister goes on to say that CN has had more than 10 years of a very strong language training program. If the CNR had a very strong language training program, it would be providing these employees with the 12 month training which is called for in the 1973 resolution, but it is not doing this.

The minister goes on to say that they will allow language training which allows for training as long as it is deemed necessary for the position in question and remains within the spirit and intent of the resolution referred to by me.

However, the CNR is not providing this 12 month training. It is hiring people off the street to take these bilingual positions. I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he give the message to the Minister of Transport that it would certainly improve employee relations, and departmental efficiency and morale, if CNR officials met with these employees. This has not been done. There has been no contact with them at all, and I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that the CNR officials have not provided the minister with the proper information. I would say that he has been sold a bill of goods. This letter I have been provided with is contradictory and does not cover any of the points I have raised.

One French person has just quit the CNR, and the CNR will not offer this position to any of the men in that department. This letter says that two of them are declared bilingual. Why will they not give them this position if two of the employees have been declared bilingual?

Further, five workers whose jobs were abolished last month were not given the opportunity to exercise their seniority over bilingual workers in the same department, and I should also like to point out that every one of these employees is willing to take this French language training. They want to take the 12 month training program so that they can hang on to their jobs.

There is absolutely no requirement for the French language to be used at all in the Winnipeg office. I am told by these employees that they would be better off if they were learning German, so whatever training they get is just an absolute waste of money, and the whole operation is just another farce and a sham.

These employees have had to find jobs elsewhere within the railroad. One girl had to take a job driving a truck because she was not allowed to stay in her department, and she wants to take this 12 month training course.

In 1973 the passenger service centre hired three French speaking workers. Railway officials assured other workers that the hirings would not affect their job security, but it is doing so. Up to two months ago they were telling us that everything would be all right. However, more lay-offs or job transfers are feared in the near future.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will ask the minister to get back to Mr. Bandeen, the president of CNR, just to find out what is going on in this particular department.

There were assurances from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) back in 1968. He stated that unilingual civil servants would be protected. He said that despite the extension of the bilingual system in the public service, protection would be given to unilingual civil servants. He said that achievement of federal bilingual plans must not involve any prejudice to the careers of civil servants who are not bilingual and who have devoted many years to the public service. This is not in effect in this passenger service department of the CNR in Winnipeg. I will point it out again, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will recommend to the Minister of Transport, that he should raise the issue in cabinet. If he is sincere in protecting unilingual civil servants he will have this resolution made law and become a part of the Official Languages Act.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am very interested in many of the comments of the hon. member but I regret that I must disagree pretty strongly with the tenor in which he delivered them. I do not think they convey an accurate assessment of the situation regarding CNR employees in Winnipeg, which I think requires some clarification.

As the hon. member mentioned, the minister has written to him in considerable detail on the points he raised in the House on other occasions. It must be made clear that there have in fact been no lay-offs in this particular department. As a result of changes in the transcontinental train schedule, the hours of service to the public of the Winnipeg ticket and reservation offices were reduced. This resulted in a decrease in two counter and three telephone positions. The necessary advance notice was provided the brotherhood in accordance with the existing arrangements on operational change. The incumbents involved in the staff reductions have since secured employment in other departments.

With reference to points raised by the hon. member on language training, the two ticket office personnel have completed the present available French courses. They are considered bilingual for the positions they occupy.

I was interested in the hon. member's assertion that these particular employees had not been officially advised of their status. I will certainly take notice of that and pursue it to see what is involved. The CN has had language training programs for over ten years. These programs allow for training for as long as is deemed necessary for the position in question, and remain within the spirit and intent of the resolution passed by parliament in June, 1973.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I think it would be useful to point out that CN has in fact established three positions above and beyond the union agreement which require fluent French. Only one of these positions is presently vacant and the employees in question in the sales department did not apply for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF FEDERAL PROGRAMS WHICH MIGHT PREVENT FURTHER UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's last program and under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the earlier unwillingness of the Minister of Transport to prevent an escalation in railway freight rates as indicated by him on October 15, and in light of the remarks of the Minister of Finance on October 21 refusing to provide for flexibility or discretion in the reductions of federal expenditures in areas of large and growing unemployment, such as the Atlantic region, which in some instances is as high as 30 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House recommend that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion be instructed to review and monitor all federal programs which might possibly be altered in order to prevent or even offset further unemployment in regions of persistently high unemployment during a period of national fiscal restraint.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED EARLY INTRODUCTION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the tragedies that have occurred, first, at Brampton and now at Ottawa involving the use of unrestricted weapons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House direct the Minister of Justice and the Government House Leader

(1) to place a higher priority on the introduction of proposed gun law changes by introducing the proposed gun legislation to first reading by next week;

(2) to include in such legislation provisions for vicarious liability for gun owners who negligently allow their weapons to fall into unstable or criminal hands; and

(3) that special provision for security of storage of weapons be included in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CONTROL VIOLENT CRIME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

In view of the alarming increase in Canada of violence of all kinds and at every level, from the common assault to murder, especially among young people, as shown once again by the drama which occurred yesterday in Ottawa, as the result of which two teenagers were killed and several others were wounded, and since those conditions cannot be tolerated because they could reach alarming levels unless the government and the authorities give them special consideration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House do now consider the serious problem of rising violence and criminality in our country, in order to fully identify the matter so that the government may take immediate action on it, with a knowledge of all the facts and taking into account recommendations from opposition parties to take as soon as possible remedial measures.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF MERCURY POISONING AMONG INDIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recent medical evidence clearly indicates that mercury poisoning exists among native people, and epidemiological studies suggest that the problem could develop into epidemic proportions.

In view of the fact that the federal government has not demonstrated leadership in resolving the severe socio-economic problems associated with mercury poisoning, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the matter of mercury poisoning vis-à-vis the native people be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ORGANIZATION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

My motion is based on the fact that the organization and implementation of plans for the 1976 Olympics are obviously out of control, as evidenced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), who does not even know the chief of security or what security costs will be; or the fact that Canadian manufacturers are being deprived of the opportunity to bid for major contracts; and on the fact that over-all costs now seem certain to exceed $1 billion notwithstanding the many direct and indirect federal government commitments.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government order an immediate full scale public inquiry into the organization and implementation of the 1976 Olympics in order to reduce any further unnecessary expenditures and so that public confidence in these games can be restored and the games assured of the success Canadians wish them to be.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before presentation of this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REASON FOR DELAY IN INTRODUCTION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General on the question of legislation concerning gun control. In so doing I do not wish to exaggerate the reduction of violent crimes or events which could be accomplished through gun control or to suggest that gun control would necessarily have avoided the tragedies of yesterday, but ministers expressed concern about existing legislation as long ago as January 17, 1973, when the former minister of justice said that the government had this under constant review.

I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he can give the House any valid reason why the government has not long since presented to the House its views and its version of gun control legislation which should be adopted.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the government approved a series of measures with respect to gun control a short while ago, and the Minister of Justice and I discussed these measures just last Friday in Halifax with the attorneys general of the provinces. We wanted to get their reactions before proceeding further because much of the work of enforcement with respect to these laws would have to be carried out by the provinces. We now know the reactions of the attorneys general, and we will proceed to work further on these measures. We hope to announce these measures within a short period of time in the House and to introduce the bill soon afterwards.

POSSIBILITY THAT GUN CONTROL PROVISION WILL BE INCLUDED WITH OTHER AMENDMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Solicitor General indicate whether the gun control legislation will deal with that and nothing else or is one of the reasons for the delay in presentation of legislation the government's desire to package gun control legislation along with a lot of other things and with something else in mind than simply getting gun control legislation through the House?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. It is likely, however, that the gun control legislation would be in an omnibus bill with other Criminal Code amendments—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: —but very unlikely with capital punishment.

Mr. Wagner: Great courage!

Mr. Allmand: So, Mr. Speaker, it is likely we would see it in an omnibus bill with other Criminal Code amendments, such as was done the last time when the government tightened up on the gun control laws but it is unlikely that we would combine it with capital punishment.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I think the delay is inexcusable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON GUN CONTROL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): It seems to me there is a great deal of confusion in the public mind as to what additional gun control legislation can accomplish. In view of this I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he is prepared to table in the House the report resulting from the special committee of a task force in his own department that he commissioned?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the delay, I should point out to the House that during the period I have been advocating tougher gun controls more opposition has come from the opposition party represented by the hon. member than any other party in the House. With respect to the report, Mr. Speaker, there is no formal report by the study group working within my department. They presented their views to me verbally and by a memorandum which went to cabinet as a cabinet memorandum.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement a few moments ago that he now has the approval of the attorney general, and particularly in view of the inadequacy of the answers given by his colleague the Minister of Justice to the right hon. member for Prince Albert on October 16 and to me on October 20 with respect to the stages through which the legislation had advanced, is the minister telling the House today that the legislation has in fact been drafted and the decisions made? If that is so, can the minister inform the House today what rules are going to apply with respect to gun control as to sale, ownership, possession and use of firearms? Is it not possible under the circumstances for him to inform the House that the legislation has been drafted and basically what it contains?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the legislation has not been drafted. I told the previous questioner that we presented the attorneys general with certain proposals—a series of proposals and got their reactions to these proposals. We will now make a revision of the proposals to a certain extent in view of what the attorneys general had to say, then announce the proposals and put them in the form of legislation. We hope this can be done this fall.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that this matter has been going on for some period of time—almost a year as the Leader of the Opposition has just said—and that the government's own statistics seem to indicate that violent crime has increased in the first quarter of 1975 over the same period in 1974 by 4.5 per cent nationally and 9.2 per cent in the province of Ontario, does the minister not think it is high time this legislation was ready? Does this government, which has the courage to control wages, not have the courage to control guns?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Sick!

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think this is a very important matter and I have been pressing this House for several years to take action. I am now happy to see that the Conservative opposition will support us in stronger gun control.

● (1420)

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF VICARIOUS LIABILITY SECTION IN GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, who has responsibility for introducing changes to the Criminal Code concerning guns. In view of the delay in introducing the legislation, continuing problems in the community and tragedies such as those which occurred at Brampton, Ottawa and other places, will the minister at least inform the public by informing this House if, in the proposed legislation, there is to be included a vicarious liability section under which those who own guns will be responsible for keeping them out of the hands of unstable people or people with a criminal history.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it is desirable for the Code to be amended in such a way as to create stricter criminal liability. Measures to establish stricter civil liability or to attach civil consequences to the ownership of guns lie largely within the purview of provincial governments and provincial negligence acts. So I answer, first, that I think it desirable to amend the appropriate sections of the Criminal Code in order to increase strict criminal liability for incidents resulting from gun ownership. Also, I think provincial governments should be urged to amend their laws relating to vicarious civil liability along the lines of their motor vehicle acts. These provisions would relate to the owners of guns.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should still like a basic answer to my question. In a sense, the minister sidestepped it by dealing with the civil aspect. The minister, being a lawyer, knows that charges of criminal negligence can arise under the Criminal Code in relation to the question of security of storage of weapons and that when a violation occurs, when, because of inadequate security of storage an unstable person commits a crime or an act which causes harm to the public, a further penalty can be imposed. Basically, I ask the minister to direct his attention to this question: will the Code itself be amended, not the civil law but the criminal law, so that those who do not properly secure their weapons will be made responsible if those weapons are involved in crime or homicide.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member misunderstood my answer. The answer to the first part of the question is, yes. I think that it is desirable and possible to amend the Code in order to create stricter liability.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

In 1972 and 1973, there was a federal program called Winter Capital Projects Funds Program which, in co-operation with the provinces, aimed at helping municipalities fight against unemployment throughout the year and especially during winter. Could the Minister of Finance indicate today how things stand, whether there are any funds available from the Winter Capital Projects Funds and, if not, could the Minister assure the House that he will hold meetings or discussions with his provincial counterparts to revive this important program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire concerning the hon. member's question and reply later.

INCREASE IN VIOLENT CRIME—POSSIBILITY OF STUDY TO DETERMINE CAUSE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General? As the unfortunate incident which took place at Ottawa, yesterday, is somewhat similar to the earlier Brampton incident, may I ask the Solicitor General if his department is undertaking studies into the causes underlying the increases in rates of violent crime in Canada? According to Statistics Canada, during the first quarter of this year violent crime involving firearms and offensive weapons increased by more than 42 per cent. Has the minister's department conducted studies, to determine the cause and if, perhaps, the media may have some impact on the cause?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yes, we are conducting studies into separate areas of violent crime and we are continuing with our work. As for the terrible crime which took place yesterday in Ottawa, we have been in touch with the Ottawa police and are awaiting the results of the coroner's inquest in order to obtain more information on the causes of that particular incident.

INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION TO RESTRICT GROWTH AND AMOUNT OF RESTRICTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As the minister stated yesterday that an effort would be made to restrict the rate of increase of our money supply, will the minister indicate when this restrictive action will start, bearing in mind that we heard about restraint in the June 23 budget but that our money supply, since then, has been allowed to grow at the unbeliavable annual rate of 27 per cent.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I again remind the hon. member that he might be well advised to note the increase in interest rates announced by the governor of the Bank of Canada early in September, and the statements which accompanied the governor's decision at that time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement, will he indicate why the government feels they can only make an effort to control the growth of the money supply? Who is in control? Who is at least responsible for the growth of our money system if it is not the government? Will the minister also indicate if the report in the morning press that by restricted money growth the government has in mind restricting it to the rate of our inflationary increase is true?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I say, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might do well to read the governor's statement in this regard. Under our system, the Bank of Canada can of course control the growth of our money supply over the longer period. It cannot under our system have an immediate impact on short-term swings.

ATTENDANCE OF CANADA AT RESTRICTED ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING IN FRANCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Will the minister indicate if we have been invited to the restricted economic summit meeting in France in mid-November, bearing in mind that monetary questions are to be raised there. If not, will he explain why we have been snubbed when there will be nations in attendance that have less at stake than Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs has been involved in those discussions. The hon. member might like to address his question to my colleague.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why have we been snubbed with respect to the restricted economic summit meeting in France in mid-November in that we believe that to date we have not received an invitation to attend?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the final decisions have not been taken with respect to attendance at the summit.

Canada has expressed, and is continuing to express, its interest. The hon. member will recall that Canada has received quite important public support for its presence from the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. We are still awaiting a decision that we hope will make it possible for us to attend.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FREE VOTE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BILL

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader which is supplementary to some questions asked earlier. In view of the interesting answer of the Solicitor General that it is highly unlikely that capital punishment will be tied to an omnibus bill, regardless of some of the answers given to questions last week which indicated the minister did not know, has there been a decision on whether the question of capital punishment will be decided by a free vote or will the whips lay it on?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we have had some discussion on the matter. A final decision has not been taken. That will be announced when the legislation is presented.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for part of that answer. Contrary to what the Solicitor General started to intimate earlier concerning the delay of this measure, and in view of the very real concern of the public about administration of justice—the question of capital punishment has been symbolic of administration of justice—can the House leader some time this week state in the House whether capital punishment will be separate from an omnibus criminal bill covering everything from slot machines to bail reform and gun control and so on and whether there will be a free vote. If we have to wait for the bill, there may be another parliament before any action is taken.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the time to make such an announcement is when the bill is presented to parliament, otherwise the hon. member may not know what I am talking about.

COST OF COMPUTERIZED CASH REGISTERS IN CAFETERIA

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board? Bearing in mind that the government is making every effort to cut its own costs while at the same time remaining conscious of the need to increase job opportunities, can the minister inform us of the actual cost of the computerized cash registers now installed in the cafeterias on Parliament Hill and, in human terms, the cost in job availability for stock room clerks?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED LACK OF EFFECTIVE PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Since the principal weakness in the program the minister has brought forward to deal with inflation arises from the fact that while it controls wages and salaries no provision is made for effective control over prices, I should like to ask whether the government has given any further consideration to dealing with prices, either by following the example of the government of British Columbia and bringing in an immediate price freeze or by following the suggestion of the premier of Saskatchewan which would result in freezing the prices of certain key commodities and require subsequent notification and justification of any desire to increase the prices of those commodities?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I might point out to the hon. gentleman that he is wrong in his preamble. I understand that in the case of many commodities, already there can be an effective requirement of advance notification and justification. The Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board has already so signified to a number of firms.

With regard to the plan in British Columbia, it seems to me that the principal weakness of that proposal is that absolutely no mechanism has been provided in order to make certain that the declaration of a freeze will be carried out in practice. This seems to me to be a critical weakness in the proposal.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—FACTORS CONSIDERED IN CONTROLLING PRICE OF AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Without agreeing with the comments the minister has made on the British Columbia plan, may I point out that the minister did not deal with the Saskatchewan proposal in the course of his reply; perhaps he will do so when answering my second question. He indicated that the government would require some justification in advance in respect of certain proposals to increase prices. In reply to a question I put to him concerning automobiles in the course of the speech he made winding up the debate on Friday, he indicated that in this sector of the economy advance notification would be required.

May I ask what factors will be considered in terms of prices of automobiles, something which affects Canadian consumers to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars annually? What criteria does the government intend to apply? Will it take into consideration simply its own guidelines in this respect or will it follow the urgings of the former minister of industry, trade and commerce and deal with the question of price parity in the industry, comparing prices of cars produced and sold in Canada with prices of the same models sold in the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): With regard to the Saskatchewan proposals, as soon as we receive copies from the government of Saskatchewan I shall be glad to consider them and see whether a comment is required. It would have been helpful in the cases of both British Columbia and Saskatchewan if the ministers from those provinces had given us some indication of their intentions in this regard when they met with me last week. We have sent an official to British Columbia to obtain information about their program, if we can. When we have it I will analyze it and be glad to comment. With regard to the pricing of automobiles, as with other commodities, the cost pass-through criterion will be used.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR LIST OF COMMODITIES ON WHICH JUSTIFICATION FOR PRICE INCREASE REQUIRED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Can the minister tell us if and when the government will be providing for the benefit of hon. members, and thus for the people of Canada, a list of commodities in addition to automobiles on which the government will be applying, if I understand him correctly, an effective price freeze until justification for future increases can be provided?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): That, of course, would be most wisely done by the Anti-Inflation Board. The question is one which could certainly be canvassed in the course of the committee hearings. But, of course, definitive action in this connection will not be possible until the bill receives Royal Assent.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POWERS OF REVIEW BOARDS TO DEAL WITH UTILITY RATES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Finance about price control.

Mr. Speaker, may I thank my colleagues from all sides of the House for their warm welcome. Be assured I deeply appreciate it.

To come back to the Minister of Finance and to the price control policy, we were advised last week that Quebec Hydro wants to raise electricity rates by 25 per cent. Ontario Hydro, I believe, started to apply a 25 per cent increase yesterday, and the natural gas company is announcing a 30 per cent increase. Was the minister consulted by the provinces on that question and what action does he intend to take to protect consumers against those price rises?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the applause indicates that all hon. members welcome, as I do, the hon. member back to the House, and that they are happy to see him hale and hearty.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

In reply to his question about Quebec, I would say that the government of that province has decided to have its provincial commission set the price of public utilities, such as electricity and gas, in the public sector. So, it is up to the Quebec commission to determine, as agreed, the proper level of cost increases for such services.

With regard to Ontario, if the government of that province decides to give the federal government of Canada and the federal board the responsibility for setting price rates for Ontario Hydro, then the Anti-Inflation Board is responsible. In that case, it must consider what costs Ontario Hydro has incurred during the past year.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Does not the commission which is supposed to be organized in Quebec consult with the Anti-Inflation Board before proceeding on an increase such as is now being asked in Quebec? Have we reached a point where there will be 10 different boards on price and wage control in Canada or will the national board have authority over the provincial boards?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. We prefer a single federal board to control both public and private sectors. But we have recognized that there are provinces, like Quebec and perhaps others, which would rather have their own board to control the public sector and Quebec indicated its preference in this regard.

We hope, however, that there will be close contact between the Quebec board and the boards of the other provinces and the federal board.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary to the Minister of Finance relating to a previous question—I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has the information I require. Has he knowledge as to when the New Democratic Party acquired its enthusiastic support for a general price freeze as opposed to the stand it took during the last election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I have some detailed quotations from Mr. David Lewis in this regard but in my new conformation as a non-partisan statesman I shall not be able to give them here in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR PROVISION TO PREVENT TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES TO ESCAPE PAYMENT OF TAX

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue whom I should like to congratulate on his appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: At the present time it is possible to strip the surpluses of companies and transfer those assets to other countries without paying corporate income tax on the funds. Since some $4.2 million owing by six taxpayers have been written off since 1972 because the men concerned are no longer resident in Canada, would the minister take this fact under consideration and advise the House whether he and his staff are considering the early introduction of legislation to put a stop to this particular practice?

● (1440)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for his good wishes. I would say to the non-partisan statesman holding the office of Minister of Finance that, given the tools, we will finish the job. We do not bring in the legislation, we simply administer it; but most assuredly we are working in close consort with finance on that particular problem.

POST OFFICE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF SAVINGS BOND DIVIDEND CHEQUES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Has provision been made in the postal contingency plan for delivery of registered Canada savings bonds dividend cheques which are due on November 1, in three days, to 450,000 trusting citizens of Canada? Many senior citizens are dependent on these cheques to supplement their meager pensions, and I should like to know whether arrangements have been made for delivery.

AIR TRANSPORT

CHANGES IN REGULATIONS GOVERNING NON-COMMERCIAL FLIGHTS IN THE ARCTIC

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it follows on his answer to a question from the hon. member for Northwest Territories yesterday concerning the report on the Panarctic air crash. In his reply the minister suggested some sort of satisfaction with the report, though there seems to me little room for satisfaction in that department. Considering the serious nature of the comments regarding inadequate safety measures and checks on flights to the Arctic contained in the report, would the minister enlighten the House as to exactly what steps have been taken to tighten up regulations concerning these flights? Are these to await the inquest or are they in place now; and have some changes been made?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it quite fair of the hon. member to twist words in that fashion. I indicated that what I was satisfied with was that we had, from the point of view of the Department of Transport, the information that we needed as a result of the investigation. I wish the hon. member would restrict himself to the words that were used. I had indicated as well that the Department of Transport some months ago formulated potential changes to the regulations to further control the private air sector; that is to say, the non-commercial sector. These draft proposals have been in the hands of the persons affected for some time and their comments are to be back in our hands by the middle of next month, at which time we will begin the drafting of the regulations.

MEASURES TO PREVENT OBSTRUCTION OF INQUESTS INTO ACCIDENTS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister suggested a day or two ago that there would be legislative changes to bring forward the independent accident investigation commission. At the same time is the minister, or his colleague in justice, considering changes that would prevent the kind of delay and obstruction in an inquest that was cited in the Northwest Territories? Will there be legislation that will permit the inquest there to subpoena witnesses from any part of Canada or from outside the country?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can answer only in relation to the legislation referred to. We do have plans, as I indicated to the hon. member previously, to bring forward legislation to set up an independent accident investigation and examination board.

Has the minister ordered a complete and full inquiry into the circumstances pertaining to the fire on Air Canada flight 211 departing Halifax at 8.50 a.m. on October 18 with 97 passengers aboard, and also the L-1011 engine explosion during take-off at Toronto airport on October 22?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into those two cases and see where they stand.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Has COJO contacted the Canadian Mint to have a medallion struck in commemoration of the 1976 Olympics before granting a contract to a company operating in Switzerland?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Mint has received no request from COJO and surely if it did, it would investigate all possibilities of designing such a medallion in Canada. At any rate I am sure Canadian industry would be very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the manufacture of a medallion to celebrate the Olympics.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ESTABLISH STEEL MAKING COMPLEX IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that many, many months have gone by since the Canstel report was commissioned and tabled, can the minister advise what steps his department and the government are taking to bring the proposed new steel complex to Cape Breton Island?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I cannot report to the hon. gentleman specific progress regarding the report of Canstel, but as he knows we have engaged in a study of the location. We will have to wait for a further report before we can decide on any course of action.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the Liberal candidate in my riding during the last election said that this steel complex was coming to Cape Breton Island, and in view of the fact that a cabinet minister intimated the same thing, would the minister now advise me what meetings he has scheduled with Premier Regan of Nova Scotia and what cooperation he is getting from Premier Regan with regard to the proposed complex, or is Mr. Regan still having pipedreams in between his overseas travels?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that if personal commitments were made by condidates at the time of an election, they were certainly not binding up on the government as such. But with regard to our negotiations with the government of Nova Scotia, I can report that they are still under way, and although I do not think I will meet Premier Regan within the next few days, I will surely have the opportunity to meet with him on this subject within the next few months.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST OF UNITED MINE WORKERS FOR INVESTIGATION OF MANAGEMENT OF CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Late this summer or early fall the Prime Minister had a request from one of the locals of the United Mine Workers in Cape Breton, after a fire in a coal mine temporarily took away many jobs, for an investigation by the government of the top management division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. This request also came from the district 26 executive of the United Mine Workers. Would the Acting Prime Minister please inform me and the House whether the government has definitely turned down this request once and for all?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no, no such request has been definitely turned down. As my hon. friend knows, the Minister of Labour continues to have a close interest in the safety of mines.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will direct to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the Acting Prime Minister's reply—he does not seem to know that the Prime Minister has received a telegram saying there was going to be—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hogan: Given the evident frustration expressed by the union in its request, would the minister consider, given his responsibility as the one in charge of reporting to parliament for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, trying to bring together in a closed meeting the executive of district 26 of the United Mine Workers Union and each president of the four mine locals in the Cape Breton area with DEVCO's top coal management in an all day session that will include detailed investigation and discussion of the district executive office's charges, so as to bring closer co-operation in this industry at a very crucial time in the history of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia?

● (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question of the hon. member is pretty close to being totally out of order up until this point, but the minister might like to give some sort of reply.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can say one thing. I believe the government, and indeed I, as the minister, have full confidence in the officials at DEVCO down in Cape Breton. As to the specific request, I can say I look forward to meeting with these people if such a meeting can be arranged. This may not be in the immediate months ahead, but I will be looking forward to going to Cape Breton and meeting with these people with a view to finding the best solution to the difficulties we have been facing. The accident happened in June, with the closing of one colliery, Number 26, after the fire occurred.

AWARENESS OF SNAULEY COMMISSION OF MINISTER'S POSITION ON CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Snauley Commission investigating transportation costs and rates on the prairies been advised of the government's position as stated Sunday on the CTV program "Question Period", namely, that the government is prepared to subsidize the railways over and above the revenue now received from the Crowsnest Pass rates.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try to get the transcript of the program for the hon. member so that he will have exactly what I said. I do not know whether the commission received any word of that. Maybe they got an accurate version if they listened to the program.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the assistance of the minister in offering to get the transcript. I heard the program, but I will read the transcript when I have it. Are we to believe that the Snauley Commission will not be investigating the Crowsnest Pass rates as to whether or not they are revenue producing and to the extent that they cover the variable costs of the railways.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will try to help the hon. member a little more by indicating what I think I said. The philosophy of the MacPherson Commission, which he may or may not agree with, would have supported those payments and I know he was in the House when he stopped those payments becoming a possibility in 1967, which was a very serious mistake. However, the scope of the investigation of the Snauley Commission is rather specifically into the cost of moving grain. The Crowsnest Pass rates are, of course, on the revenue side and may be used in comparison, but the specific terms of reference relate to the cost of moving grain.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN CONNECTION WITH MIRABEL CONTRACTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question.

Yesterday, my colleague from Central Nova asked the Minister of Transport a question on an alleged fraud related to the Mirabel project, and the minister replied that those allegations were without any foundation. Immediately after that, the Solicitor General was confirming to a Montreal daily that an inquiry was set up regarding allegations of a fraud amounting to $60 million. In the light of this confirmation by the Solicitor General, is he able to tell much more concrete things than his colleague the Minister of Transport? Is he prepared to make a statement on this matter and when will he make such a statement?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did not say there was an inquiry into those matters. I said that the allegations had been transmitted to the RCMP and that at the present time they were evaluating the allegations. If they found there was sufficient substance to the allegations they would undertake an investigation, but there is no investigation at the present time.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT'S POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the Acting Prime Minister told the House that the government had not decided on the length of time the postal strike would be allowed to continue before back-to-work legislation would be introduced. In view of the fact that negotiations have broken off and recommenced again since that answer was given, I should like now to ask what consideration has been given by the government to any measures to restore the postal service which is so vital to all Canadians or is it the government's policy that postal service will not be restored before the labour dispute is settled.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the government's view that the postal workers should resume work when the settlement is reached. I am sure the hon. member agrees with that. These negotiations are under way now, and I do not think I should say anything that would interfere with their success.

SUGGESTED ASSESSMENT OF IMPACT OF REDUCED FEDERAL EXPENDITURES ON UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC REGION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I should like to ask him a question following the motion I presented today. Has he been asked by his colleagues in cabinet to monitor any alteration in federal expenditures or programs which would have a negative impact on programs of regional development administered by his department or over which his department might have an interest and responsibility.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a request having been made to my department.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could indicate if his officials have made any assessment of the impact of any potential reductions or alterations in federal programs or expenditures, particularly as they might affect areas of chronic high unemployment such as the Atlantic provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, the implications of the department activities are always regularly analysed by the officers to correct the shortcomings, if need be, and to improve the program. It is a permanent process with the department: it has been done six months or a year ago, and I think it is worth maintaining it.

DEVELOPMENT OF OLD PORT OF MONTREAL—REASONS FOR CONTINUING TO FILL RIVER AROUND VICTORIA AND JACQUES-CARTIER QUAYS

Can he inform the House whether or not he has recently met with the representatives of the city of Montreal to follow up the development project of the old port of Montreal, and if so, why the filling work of the river between Victoria and Jacques-Cartier quays could not be stopped, as requested by the Minister of Indian Affairs?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did meet with the mayor of Montreal, Mr. Lamarre and other officials and with other officials from the federal government to talk about the entire question of redevelopment of the urban area of old Montreal. We are in discussion with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but I also believe there is a very intense involvement by the National Harbours Board. Their intention is the preservation of that area to open it up for the residents of Montreal because it is a very valuable historic asset for Canada. We have just had a study done by a firm of planners which is being studied by my officials and it is one I am following very closely. I met with Mayor Drapeau a week ago yesterday and he continues to take an interest in the development of this area. We are working very closely with him. However, I will have to check specifically on some aspects of this which I understand are causing some concern to Montreal.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF INSTITUTIONS IN DISTRICT OF STURGEON IN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question and a short supplementary for the Solicitor General. It is in respect of the proposed medium and maximum security institutions, a staff training college and rifle range in the municipal district of Sturgeon in Alberta. In view of the fact that the residents of this area are already over-burdened with numerous rehabilitation centres and are strongly opposed to these being situated in the proposed area mainly because the area is only one-quarter of a mile from the school and is to occupy 328 acres of prime agricultural land, would the minister please bring the House up to date concerning what conclusion his department has reached about establishing this institution in this location.

● (1500)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, before we picked that particular site we consulted the government of Alberta and the local authorities and they gave their approval in principle. Since that time, however, there has been some objection and we have decided to have further discussions with the people in the area. We will await the outcome of these discussions.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Has the minister's department given any consideration to moving the site somewhat to the north and east to more marginal land, and in view of the fact that the department's first proposal did not include a maximum security institution and rifle range, and originally was to occupy only 160 acres instead of 320 acres, is the department planning to hold hearings again? Would the minister also be so kind as to instruct his officials to keep the member of parliament concerned informed of the department's intention?

Mr. Allmand: As I mentioned in my last answer, we will have further discussions with the people in the area, and I believe they will be held at a public meeting. In addition, I do not think we would want to pick any particular site, whether north, east or south, without consulting with the provincial government because the provincial government had given us the authority to proceed on the site which was picked, but we will consult with them further and with the people in the area and I will be pleased to meet with the hon. member and give him more information.

2. (a) What is the estimated total cost involved in construction of the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive, including all items of construction or alterations made necessary as a result of such an addition (b) what portion of these costs is being paid by (i) the taxpayers (ii) private donors?

Order Paper Questions

3. What are the names and addresses of all private donors involved in this project, including exact amounts donated, pledged, or promised in each case?

4. Was any examination conducted by the government into the identity, business connections, political connections, etc. of all persons involved with this project and (a) if so, on what date and what are the full details (b) if not, for what reason?

5. (a) What are the names and addresses of all designers, architects, interior decorators, contractors, etc. involved in this project (b) in each case, specifically by whom were they chosen and/or recommended (c) were any tenders called and (i) if so, on what dates, by what public advertisements and what are the names and amounts of all tenders received (ii) if not, what are all the reasons?

6. (a) What is the identity and job designation of the highest government authority accepting full or partial donation of the swimming pool (b) on what date was acceptance finalized (c) what is the name and address of the person to whom acceptance was communicated on behalf of the government?

7. (a) What are full details of the Prime Minister's involvement in this enterprise including any involvement on his behalf by members of his family or personal staff (b) on what date did the Prime Minister first become aware of the proposed project and by whom was he approached or informed (c) who are all persons that he has dealt with directly or indirectly in regard to the project (d) what are the details of the Prime Minister's part in all decisions pertaining to this project?

8. What are all reasons that the government and/or the Prime Minister did not from the outset make full disclosure of details pertaining to this project in order to establish clearly that no improprieties or conflict of interest factors are involved?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In 1974, after carefully considering the factors, the Prime Minister agreed to accept from a representative group of Canadians the gift of a swimming pool for the official residence at 24 Sussex Drive. In Canada as in most other countries, the making of donations to the state is a common practice and many public buildings have been built as a result of this tradition. The group of donors was concerned that the Prime Minister and his successors have ready access to adequate physical fitness facilities without being confronted with the obvious security and privacy difficulties. The Prime Minister agreed to be one of the contributors. He also chose not to ask for the names of the other contributors, except for their trustee, Dr. W. H. Fader, of 395 Brooks Street, Toronto, lest he be influenced or give the appearance of being influenced by them. The donations, if a properly documented tax return is filed, entitle the contributors to the deductions provided for under Section 110(1)(b) of the Income Tax Act. Given statutory provisions extant which ensure confidentiality of income tax returns, the government is not in a position to disclose the names of the contributors. The service of Herbert Brune Construction of Ottawa was engaged by the trustee for the donors to install the swimming pool at the official residence. As the costs incurred by that firm have been assumed by private donors, they are not of government record. Since these proposed fitness facilities were to be built on crown-owned land, the Department of Public Works assigned one of its architects to design the pool and related facilities subject to conformity with requirements of the National Capital Commission and the latter's approval at various stages of progress of work. Design costs incurred by the Department of Public Works are the responsibility of the government and are covered by vote 10. As to the operational costs of the facilities, (and related expenditures by departments concerned), they will be included in the overall cost of the administration of the Prime Minister's residence under the relevant statutory provisions and will therefore, in the usual way, be open to the scrutiny of parliament. To confirm or complement the above statement, see, inter alia, the following: House of Commons Debate for February 5, 1975, page 2933; March 26, 1975, page 4505 and May 22, page 6009. STATISTICS CANADA REPORTS

Question No. 2,031—Mr. Kaplan:

Did Statistics Canada carry out analyses for any of its statistical reports to determine (a) the time delay between the period covered and the date of the report (b) the length of delays which are acceptable to users of particular statistics (c) whether any of the reports are too late to be of significant use and, if so, what are the results, if any, of such analyses?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that, although it has not been satisfied with the timeliness of certain publications in the past, the data has not been rendered unusable by reason of delay in publication. Statistics Canada endeavours to satisfy users' data needs as quickly as possible, and it should be noted that publication release dates are not truly indicative of the service that is provided. For many statistical series, as soon as data becomes available, notice of that availability is announced in service bulletins; the Statistics Canada Daily (Cat. No. 11-001E) or Informat (Cat. No. 11-002). Many users are subsequently provided with the specific information they require without having to wait for the complete publication. Wherever possible, advance statistics and preliminary figures are also published. In addition there is a continuous effort to improve the timing of both data collection and production, without risking the reliability of the statistical product, and improvements in release dates of many publications reflect the results of these efforts.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Question No. 2,120—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Prime Minister make certain remarks concerning the War Measures Act in a press interview recently in London, England and, did he state that it was the government's intention to replace the Act with new legislation which might include special provisions in the Criminal Code?

2. (a) What are the full details of government policy on this matter (b) when will changes be proposed to Parliament (c) what will be the nature of such changes?

3. Will any changes proposed include safeguards against government infringement on civil liberties and will they include safeguards to prevent any government acting in a panic or for political purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Yes, in the following terms: Question: Mr. Trudeau, in Bonn your visit coincided with the Berlin kidnapping and you told us that the senior German leaders had remarked to you their approval and complimentary views of the way you had handled the Cross and Laporte kidnapping in 1970. Then, in the Chalfont interview the other night, you gave a long account of the democratic principles implicit in your government's actions. Do I take it from the things that you didn't say in connection with this that you now believe that the Canadian government must retain the range of powers in the War Measures Act and you've given up all intentions of legislating a less thorough Act for emergency powers? Answer: No, not at all. I think our policy would be still to have an act which would be of considerably less scope than the War Measures Act, which could be invoked in certain cases of emergency, well short of war, and which would perhaps be incorporated in special provisions of the Criminal Code, to be brought into effect by declaration, debatable in parliament and so on. The kind of idea we were putting to parliament after the revocation or the end of the special measure which then followed the War Measures Act back at the end of '70 and beginning of '71. This is still a preferable step that I personally believe in. Question: When? Answer: When we have parliamentary time; when we find that there is a general agreement amongst the opposition that this is a better way of proceeding; when we have general support amongst the pundits of the press to urge us to go in this direction; when the rationality of our approach has been accepted by those who have sometimes voiced excessive opinions on the subject in the past.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Subject to provisions of the Financial Administration Act, consultants are selected and the terms and duration of their contract are determined by their qualifications and specific requirements of the two offices concerned, that cannot be met by existing staff and which are of such nature that the hiring of permanent staff would not be justified.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, through you, that at the beginning of this session I had on the order paper some 80 questions on CIDA which were not answered, under the guise of restraints, because the Secretary of State for External Affairs said it would cost too much to answer all these questions. I deleted the questions after discussion with the minister and an agreement that if I put any ten of them on the order paper, he would have no problem in answering them. I should like to put that on the record. I am sure, now these ten questions are on the order paper, that they will be answered within the next couple of weeks.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed, from Monday, October 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, just before I called it ten o'clock last night I was dealing with a number of abuses of the Unemployment Insurance Act and I had categorized them into permissible abuses and those which are not permissible. When I described the case of the fisherman who was embarking upon a holiday trip and loading up his car and his silver trailer, having earned $40,000 that year and having established his status for unemployment insurance benefits for himself and his wife, it was inadvertently recorded in yesterday's Hansard that this particular fisherman came from the city of Prince George. There are no such rich people in Prince George. The fisherman actually came from the city of Prince Rupert, in the riding of my colleague the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo).

During my speech the minister objected to some of the estimates I had placed on the record with regard to the cost to parliament and the country this year of the unemployment insurance fund. I inadvertently mentioned the figure of $2 billion. My notes contained the figure of $1.5 billion, but since my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) had earlier mentioned the figure of $1.5 billion, and since four hours had expired from the time he spoke until I had the floor, I thought it would be only fair for me to increase the figure a little because costs are going up steadily.

To get back to the people who in my opinion abuse the Unemployment Insurance Act, and speaking about the various segments of our society which use the act for their own purposes, I would like to demonstrate how, in the opinion of the minister, the bill addresses itself to this problem. It proposes to increase the eligibility period from eight weeks to twelve weeks. Rather than reiterate the effect in monetary saving that this would have on the public purse, I will tell the House what this would mean in money and time saved by a person who works in a sausage shop in Victoria. Since she is only suffering from boredom while her husband is away from home, this bill will not have any effect on her. She actually works six to eight months per year, and after that she has an arrangement with her employer to let her go, because her work is usually during the winter months when her employer has problems in obtaining employees.

Also, this bill does not affect fishermen on the west coast with whom I have talked, nor does it affect construction workers whose cases I have described. In the case of fishermen, they have special arrangements with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and construction workers work longer than the period prescribed in the act. A vast number of Canadians find the services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission convenient when they decide to change jobs frequently just for something to do and without regard to where they will next find employment. The bill addresses itself to that problem as well by extending the waiting period, or disqualification period, from three weeks to six weeks. This means that Canadians who practice frequent job migration will have to wait two months, if clause 16 of the bill is passed, before they qualify for benefits. While this may act as a deterrent to some offenders, it will place unbearable hardship on those people who for just reason, and probably for the first time in their life, leave their employment.

I ask the minister how many Canadians he considers are in a position today to be without income for such a prolonged period of time, particularly in cases where the claimant supports a family. Of all the proposed changes, I find clause 16 the most offensive, for this reason, particularly since there are other ways in which this problem could have been avoided. In most cases people will find it necessary to opt for some form of social assistance in order to bridge the gap. This means, of course—I am sure the minister is aware of this—that the burden of sustaining such a family for the two-month period is shifted partially to the provincial governments.

Before I attempt to suggest solutions to some of the problems I have enumerated—I have done this on previous occasions directly to the minister—I wish to deal with the second category of offenders who benefit from the act illegally. During the last postal strike the minister was surprised to learn that in the Toronto area alone, 6,000 people did not pick up their weekly unemployment insurance cheques at the designated places. One can only speculate that these people had good reason for not presenting themselves to the commission. I am sure some were receiving several weekly payments. Others may have had trouble getting time off from work to collect their cheques. At least that is one positive aspect of a postal strike. Next, there are those who forget to declare earnings from other sources, and those who deliberately make themselves scarce, avoiding offers of employment. The list is seemingly endless, as endless as the army of investigators and adjudicators who roam the regions of our land spying out the guilty but usually only succeeding in punishing the innocent.

I said earlier that the government has not defined for Canadians, or for business or labour in particular, any basic underlying philosophy to the Unemployment Insurance Act. A consultation with business and management, for instance, would reveal that they consider the act to be viewed in the context of insurance only. They have, therefore, considered premiums to be based on a risk factor. The construction workers whom I mentioned would have to pay a higher premium to compensate for their heavy demand on the service.

Labour leaders tell us that they view unemployment insurance as social security and, as such, a redistribution of the general wealth. Based on these predilections, labour is more concerned that all legitimate claims are met and that the system runs at peak proficiency. The total cost is therefore not of concern to labour. Labour would be prepared to trade off the act for some sort of guaranteed income scheme. Little wonder my constituents are confused.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Oberle: It can be seen that the members of the NDP are also confused. Little wonder that senior citizens, who are now denied access to the benefits of the act, and low income earners who must now pay a higher premium and find their benefit rate reduced, are confused. In light of recent developments, it is surely reasonable to ask the government how much longer it will allow this horrendous disease to go unchecked.

With the implementation of wage and price guidelines, the government has established a precedent which could also apply to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Stern emergency powers are requested by the government to deal with the economic crisis in Canada. The government not only hopes to check but also plans to bring serious budgetary and trade deficits under control. Canadians will be compelled to do certain things and to adhere to certain things. These strong measures became necessary because it was found that restraint did not come voluntarily. Is it not time to insist on similar action with regard to the unemployment situation? After all, it is the single, most contributory factor to the need for deficit financing in our country today.

There are two areas which should be considered immediately. First, we should consider establishing a ceiling of allowable annual earnings beyond which benefits would either not be paid or would have to be refunded with the income tax return. It simply does not make sense to me that a person earning in excess of twice the average Canadian's income should be entitled also to collect UIC benefits for part of the year. Certain professional groups, such as teachers, are already assessed on a 12-month average. Furthermore, serious consideration should be given to restricting the fund to the head of a household in cases where the combined income of wife and husband exceeds a certain level.

I understand and appreciate the desire of the government to make the program universal and equitable, but the new features in Bill C-69 are anything but that. A significant number of Canadians have reached middle-age and their families have struck out on their own. The husband has reached a peak in his career and enjoys a middle or upper income bracket. The wife, unable to cope with being idle and not having anyone left to care for, opts for some form of employment to keep her busy. She considers it a hobby job, to which she does not wish to become permanently attached. I suspect some of my colleagues in the House of Commons have wives with the same problem who take some kind of job to keep them from becoming bored. My wife does not fit into that category; she does not wish to be a burden on the public purse by accepting any form of income assistance, because she does not need it. I suggest that a number of my colleagues find themselves in the same situation.

It should be our aim to assure a climate of work opportunity in which everyone can find fulfilment; but is it really necessary also to pay benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act during periods when the hobby loses its novelty and it is no longer convenient to go to work? In my case, that is the time I spend in the summer months talking with my constituents in British Columbia.

During our discussion with business and labour it became apparent that due to lack of any kind of demographic profile we were unable to identify these obvious areas of abuse. Also, during our dialogue with business and labour there was no argument when we advanced ideas to consolidate the services of Canada Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This brings me to the second area with which the government must concern itself if we ever hope to have a check on UIC spending. It will become imperative to develop a better system of matching jobs with workers.

In a statement to the standing committee on November 26, 1973, the minister stated that the current paradox in Canada, of high unemployment and increasing labour shortages—I am quoting his words— indicates clearly that employers as well as workers may have special problems. I say they do have special problems in Canada. The minister also stated that the heart of any employment service is the technique it uses to match jobs with available workers. He went on to say that in Canada we have used, and used well, the traditional approach to job matching followed by other advanced countries. Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could be further from the truth. The left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. In a survey conducted in my riding we found that Canada Manpower satisfied only 7 per cent to 10 per cent of the available jobs. Only 15 per cent of employers in both the industrial and service sectors consult Manpower at all.

● (1520)

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, what is needed is a complete, and at all times current job inventory. I know these are strong words, but they are not out of season when we talk about some of the other measures the government finally had to bring in. It must be made compulsory for employers to report their total capacity, and any changes thereto, on a weekly basis. Annual forecasts should also be filed with the commission.

The computer would, as it does in other industrial countries which the minister talked about, compile and reconcile the bank of employment opportunities against those who are looking for work. In that way we would not have to question the honesty and integrity of those who find it necessary to cash in on the unemployment insurance scheme. We would know whether he or she was making himself or herself available for work. We would have information as to the number of jobs available and the types of jobs, and the location would be at the fingertips of the counsellor who dealt with the claim in the first instance. There would be no further need for claim adjudicators and spies to roam around trying to keep everyone honest.

Mr. Speaker, I have advanced these ideas in the form of a private bill to the House and also in a private letter to the minister, pointing out to him the results of my surveys and how other countries cope with the problem. I would like, for the record, to quote a portion of the minister's reply to my submissions. He wrote:

> As you may know, enabling legislation exists in the Unemployment Insurance Act to require employers to report job vacancies to my department. This legislation was not repealed after World War II and it remains, as intended, as an instrument to be used in national emergencies.

That is contemporary rhetoric, something we have heard for the last couple of years every time we discuss the economy. He went on:

> Measures designed to compel employers to list all job vacancies with the CMC are not compatible, in my opinion, with the current social and economic climate of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I said in my opening remarks that I hope the government will adjust its sails to the prevailing winds in Canada, as they have with the demands Canadians are putting on the economic sea. Bill C-69 fails in this regard. The letter continues:

> We are committed to improving departmental services and programs so that employers and workers alike will voluntarily use the CMCs to satisfy their manpower and employment needs.
> As I stated to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee on November 22, 1973, we are now into the first stages of a plan to revitalize the placement service by adopting a more flexible and dynamic approach in the delivery of our services. This approach includes "self-service" job information centres for job ready workers where workers can see up-to-date listings of job vacancies and training opportunities. To date, 18 job information centres have been installed and in these areas placements have increased by 25 per cent. It is planned to introduce these "self-service" JICs in all Canada Manpower Centres across Canada as quickly as possible.

The letter concludes by saying:

> All these efforts are directed to giving better service to employers and workers and the experience to date, with the new approach, indicates that we are indeed on the right track.

The letter was written on December 21, 1973. To date, experience indicates that the minister's efforts have been a dismal failure. Mr. Speaker, all of us here know better, of course, and with Bill C-69 the minister admits defeat. He has now decided to shift the burden of costs which he can no longer control to someone else, and he is adjusting his sights as to the rate of unemployment we should aim for in Canada.

[Mr. Oberle.]

It must be a matter of serious concern to us when we see the government's attempts to achieve that by regressive taxation, placing the additional burden on those unfortunate Canadians who can least afford it. It is also a matter of serious concern that we should surrender unconditionally and without a fight to the shortcomings of our economic situation, the improvement of which is the only real solution to the heavy costs in human misery and degradation inherent in unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, as in other fields, this government is failing its people miserably in the area of employment security. The only positive thing the minister suggests in introducing the bill is that in his opinion further changes are absolutely essential. I agree with him on that.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape-Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the major argument I have against this bill and the proposed amendments concerns the change in the 4 per cent maximum that the government has used since 1971 as the full employment norm. They changed the ball game completely with regard to economic policy relating to employment policy and the possibility of overcoming unemployment.

This situation has to be viewed against the history of the last 10 or 15 years. In 1965 the Economic Council of Canada made its first report. Dr. Deutsch and his companions defined full employment as an unemployment rate of 3 per cent. Due to the changes in the economy by 1971, the norm was viewed as 4 per cent. With the 1975 budget and the amendments introduced in Bill C-69, the norm is set at an 8 per cent moving average. Actually, nobody can say for sure, now, what the government's full employment norm is. We do know, however, that in June, according to the then minister of finance, it could have been 5.3 per cent and now it would be about 5.7 per cent. It is likely that it will go as high as 6 per cent or 6.5 per cent in the next few years. This is not only reneging on the 1971 white paper but on the definition of the norm of full employment.

I find the government's position interesting. When it introduced its anti-inflation bill, it said that it wanted to see the consumer price index rise by no more than 4 per cent per year in three years. But it refuses to tell us its goals with respect to unemployment. Apparently, according to the bill before us, the government defines full employment as a situation when there is 5.3 per cent unemployment or more.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mostly more.

Mr. Hogan: The minister and the parliamentary secretary yesterday suggested that as economic conditions have changed so much since 1971, this changed definition as to what constitutes full employment, or the norm in unemployment, is needed. We all know that under this government inflation has reached double-digit levels. We all know that unemployment has risen from an average of some 4.5 per cent in 1970 to an adjusted annual average of 7.2 per cent or 7.3 per cent. This winter, unemployment could easily reach 8 per cent.

It has always been difficult to define what is full employment, and unemployment. Those who represent areas of traditionally high unemployment know that many workers become discouraged and no longer seek jobs. When this happens, when they no longer collect unemployment insurance, they are considered as being out of the labour market and are not counted among the unemployed. As native people are not defined as part of this country's labour force, it is clear that when you talk about 7 per cent or 8 per cent unemployment you are really talking about a total unemployment rate of 10 per cent, 11 per cent or more. The discouraged workers who no longer seek jobs are not included in the labour force survey; they do not count as workers making up the normal part of the labour force in all parts of Canada.

In the 1971 act, the government assumed responsibility for payments when unemployment rose above 4 per cent. Under the present bill, the government will assume responsibility when unemployment rises somewhat above 5 per cent, depending on the eight-year moving average. Clearly the minister, who does not like to be told these things, will make things worse by introducing Bill C-69. The government's response to the present crisis is like the government's ostrich-like response to the housing crisis, a response made evident in the June budget. It is satisfied with glib generalizations and glib clichés like "the changing evolution of our economic realities" which hon. members opposite used yesterday.

The fact is that the unemployed are surplus workers, whether or not they are included in official statistics. The income needs of workers remain the same, even when they are unemployed. It does not matter how bureaucrats define workers as forming part of the official labour force; any unemployed worker has less money to spend. This decreased purchasing power means that we must forgo, in this country, millions of dollars worth of consumption and, therefore, of production. We hear government supporters and members of the official opposition talking about the number of man-days of production lost through strikes, but we never hear them talk of the billions and billions of dollars in goods and services that we could produce if unemployment were kept to within 4 per cent.

We want price stability; we want prices to rise by no more than 4 per cent a year. I cannot understand why we cannot establish a 4 per cent unemployment rate as our goal. But the government has not done this. As I have said, it has done what is politically convenient and it has camouflaged the real situation. Consequently, if we are to get price stability at 4 per cent per year, we might have to settle for an unemployment rate of 7 per cent or 8 per cent as normal. Of course, the minister and his colleagues do not seem to give a darn; they are not on unemployment insurance and most of the middle and high income people they represent are not on unemployment insurance.

The Atlantic provinces and other low income areas of this country will bear the brunt of this legislation. As I see it, our policy-makers are following the lead of Mr. Simon and Arthur Burns in the United States and are content to let unemployment rise to 8 per cent or 9 per cent in order to achieve the goal of prices rising no more than 4 per cent a year. They must know that policies of tight money, high interest rates and fiscal restraint will generate more unemployment. They decided, as is evident from perusal of this bill, to abandon the concept of 4 per cent unemployment as the norm. They decided to switch the extra burden of the unemployment insurance program to the working poor and other low income groups, worsening the situation of people in low income regions like the Atlantic region.

They did this by introducing a regressive payroll tax, whereas the money ought to be taken from general revenues. In short, this program ought to be based on the progressive income tax concept. The present bill does not say much for present-day liberalism. It is based on basic economic conservatism, a conservatism which is part and parcel of the approach shown by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to our problems. I have become even more convinced of the truth of this contention since hearing yesterday's interesting exchange between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) on the relationship between the money supply and price levels in the economy.

The Minister of Finance struck me as a struggling lawyer trying to understand what the economists, monetarists, bureaucrats and the Bank of Canada are saying, and trying to determine what the whole game is about. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings implied in his question that an increased money supply, more than anything, boosts inflation in the short run. The minister seemed to indicate that the Bank of Canada was seriously considering adopting the monetarist point of view and making it part of policy, although he suggested, I understand, that the rules would not be adhered to rigorously as far as economic grant was concerned. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that before he and Governor Bouey become too enamoured of the monetarist view with which Arthur Burns and the federal reserve system of the United States have been toying, they should read the October 20 edition of Business Week, pages 16 and 17. I say this in view of what the minister said yesterday in his exchange with the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. The editor of Business Week—it is hardly a socialist magazine—stated:

Monetarist economics came into its own back in 1970 when the Fed's open market committee adopted moderate growth of the money supply as a major policy goal. Since then the monetarists, who generally subscribe to Milton Friedman's—

He is a professor at Chicago University.

—dictum that "inflation is at all times and everywhere a monetary phenomenon," have made numerous converts in the canyons of Wall Street and the executive suites of American business—

Also, I might say, in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada.

—so much so that any significant pickup in monetary growth is now taken by many observers as a harbinger of higher inflation.

A newly released study by the prestigious Conference Board, however, suggests that the Fed's preoccupation with gradual monetary growth rests on shaky empirical grounds. In ongoing research reported in the October issue of the Conference Board Record, economist Michael E. Levy employed several equations to explain the inflationary patterns of the past 21 years. Levey found that purely monetarist equations linking short-term monetary growth directly with inflation were the least reliable predictors of subsequent price behaviour.

Therefore, I would advise the Minister of Finance to again get together with Mr. Bouey before making announcements about the latter in effect following the line of Arthur Burns and the federal reserve of the United States. My conclusion at this point is that this government's policies as envisaged in this bill and the one dealing with anti-inflation will create more unemployment. I also have emphasized that the government has given up the notion of getting back to a 4 per cent level of unemployment in the life of this parliament. They decided then that they had better shift the greater share of the premium-paying for unemployment insurance, since this is bound to go up, to a payroll tax, which falls on the working poor and lower income groups proportionately harder than on middle and upper income taxpayers. We in the Atlantic region, who have so many in the poverty category and the low and middle income groups of this country, will once again be indirectly shafted by the policies of this government which at the same time is protesting they are doing so much through DREE.

I want to discuss for a few minutes the relationship between unemployment insurance and the work ethic, something that was introduced indirectly into this debate yesterday by the minister and picked up by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). The minister led off this matter with his clause to amend section 43 of the act which refers to disqualification of workers" who leave their jobs without just cause, who refuse suitable employment and who are discharged." He wants the disqualification period changed, raising it from three weeks to six weeks. The proposed changes result from what he called the alarmingly high number of persons leaving their employment. He referred to the annual voluntary quits as being 250,000. I would like to know whether that figure, presumably arrived at after serious study, compared with the ten million people in the labour force, is really alarming. He also seems to think that the figure of 21,000 who annually refuse suitable employment is quite high. It seems to me to be extremely low when you compare 21,000 with a labour force of ten million.

Mr. Darling: Two hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. Hogan: There are 250,000 voluntary quits, and 21,000 who refuse to take suitable employment. The hon. member for Hamilton West dealt more fully with this point in the debate. I want, for his edification and possibly that of the minister—although I shall be more humble in his regard because he has had an opportunity, to do research—through his specialized personnel, to refer to an article by Harold Greer in the Toronto Star this summer, entitled "Matching Jobs and People". This refers to Ontario. I quote:

> One of the curious paradoxes of the Canadian labor market in the last few years, especially in this province, has been the phenomenon of high unemployment rates while job opportunities go begging.
> It has, of course, been a paradox with highly political implications, in that it invites the conclusion that work is available for anyone who wants it and those who don't are job-dodgers sustained by unemployment insurance benefits. P. E. Trudeau exploited that idea very adroitly in the last federal election campaign, even as he cracked down on claimants for the expanded benefits introduced by his government in 1971.
>
> It is not, however, a conclusion supported by a research study by the Ontario ministry of labor. In a paper entitled "The Paradox of Unemployment and Job Vacancies—Some Theories Confronted by Data," M. L. Skolnik and F. Siddiqui of the ministry's research branch find little evidence for, and much against, the theory that laziness and unemployment insurance explain the coexistence of unemployment and manpower shortages.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Going away from Ontario to those parts of the country where you would expect the most abuses because unemployment has been around so long, I want to refer to discussion paper No. 33 of a study by the Economic Council of Canada for the Council of Maritime Premiers last year. In that document, which studied the relationship of unemployment insurance to labour market activities, among other areas, there is a chapter entitled "The Effect of the Unemployment Insurance System" of 1971 and the increased benefits of labour force activity in the Atlantic region. I will just use a short quote from the conclusion of the chapter:

> The greater generosity of the unemployment insurance system has not decreased true labour force participation in the maritimes.

● (1550)

In other words, rather than the bias of those who are trying constantly to say there are too many people using unemployment insurance in the Atlantic region, this study strongly suggests that if the jobs are there, the people will take the jobs. They want the jobs. Of course, this flies in the face of those who say there is a disappearing work ethic as far as Canada is concerned, even in parts of Canada where there is heavy unemployment constantly, as in the Atlantic region.

One of the amendments the minister suggested yesterday which seems eminently fair is that which extends the choice of weeks for a pregnant employee. An amendment I should like the House to consider arises out of an experience we had, admittedly in an emergency situation, in my constituency this summer. Perhaps I can best introduce it by reading part of a letter from Mr. Daniel White, vice-president of local 4520 of the United Mine Workers of America, district 26, after a fire in the only coal mine in Glace Bay had resulted in the loss of 775 jobs and pushed unemployment as recorded in the Glace Bay unemployment insurance office up to between 26 and 29 per cent. Mr. White wrote:

> The membership of No. 26 local union 4520 are requesting the assistance of your office in helping us to determine whether we have been unjustly treated under the UIC Act with regard to the disqualification of a week's waiting period which followed the fire at No. 26 colliery on June 19, 1975.
> The week following this date the men had no work and were putting in a week's waiting period under the UIC Act. However, retroactive money due to the men dating back to January 1, 1975, was paid to the miners on the Thursday of that week. According to the UIC Act this disqualified the men from a week's waiting period. The membership feel this was an abnormal situation and this retroactive pay was issued early due to the unforeseen circumstances.

The background to this is that the last contract negotiated between the United Mine Workers and the Cape Breton Development Corporation included a clause giving the miners benefits in case of lay-offs. The terms of the agreement provided for $100 for the first week and $20 a day for the second week, up to a maximum of $200. This was certainly a step forward and both the mine union and DEVCO should be commended for it. It was put in to help the men get by their two-week waiting period for UIC benefits. Unfortunately, the unemployment insurance regulations under section 172, "determination of earnings for benefit purposes", section 1 and 2(a), defeat the purpose of this arrangement by treating the payment as "income of a claimant arising out of any employment".

As the act now stands, this $200 payment would have penalized the miners in the eyes of the UIC if it had been paid during the first two weeks. To prevent this happening, DEVCO, in conjunction with the union, worked out a plan under which the unemployed men would be paid a special advance at the rate of $15 per week. Under the circumstances, this was the best way of giving the miners the money due to them, with the least penalization.

The upshot was that the $30 for the first two weeks was deducted from the first UIC payment on the third week. This is because any money received during the two-week waiting period is deducted from the claimant's first UIC cheque. The balance of the $15 payments to the claimants by DEVCO did not affect UIC payments because such a sum is below the minimum allowable earnings received while collecting UIC. To give an example, a miner eligible for $100 in UIC benefits would have received $15 from DEVCO in the first week, $15 from DEVCO in the second week, and $70 from UIC in the third week along with DEVCO'S $15. In the fourth week he would have received the full $100 from UIC, plus $15 from DEVCO. The additional payment of $15 from Devco would have continued until the miner had received a total of $200.

Mr. Speaker, the miners effectively lost $30 of their benefit because it was deducted from their first UIC cheque. This is regrettable. But far more disturbing, in the eyes of the miners, is that they cannot collect this special payment during the first two weeks when they need it most. Admittedly, a fire in the mine—which is what caused these lay-offs—is an emergency which does not occur every day, but things like this ought to be provided for under appropriate regulations of the UIC. It is intolerable that UIC regulations should conspire against a good agreement worked out between management and union to help the unemployed miner.

The regulations should be changed so as to allow DEVCO miners and other workers with similar agreements to draw special payments during the waiting period without being penalized. In such urgent cases, the waiting period should be drastically cut or eliminated completely. There is also a need to clarify whether or not forgiveable loans from the company in times of hardship or emergency should really be computed as earnings by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I want to conclude by saying that the amendments embodied in Bill C-69, especially the regressive tax elements in it as well as the change of the 4 per cent norm, lead us to realize that over on the other side is not a government of compassionate liberalism but a government of confusion in objectives and means to obtain its objectives, with more than a little bias against low income workers and low income regions. This is all underscored in the government's anti-inflation program and the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which the minister introduced yesterday.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the bill presented in the House on July 20, 1975 includes amendments meant more particularly to protect the fund than the worker confronted with the unemployment problem, a social evil hitting too many well disposed persons. As a result many problems crop up and often lead to poverty with its usual consequences.

It is proper to examine for a moment the situation of an individual tackling with the unemployment problem. The head of the family who loses his job feels that it is the end of everything. He cannot bear facing his wife, his children and his friends. If he does find temporary employment it will usually be a semi-skilled job with low wages. He is deprived of the necessaries of life and he is also suffering from psychological deprivation. He got a better salary in his previous job and was proud of his work, whereas he feels humiliated in his new position. He feels rejected, his pride withers.

When the head of the family is at home all day long and has to face financial troubles and feels sorry and helpless, he sometimes becomes irritable and difficult to put up with, and his family life suffers as a consequence. He feels sorry for himself and guilty at the same time. His situation gets even worse when he sees prosperity around him. After six months or maybe a little more, his standard of living deteriorates and he becomes one of the unprivileged. If he has completed only primary or secondary studies, is unskilled and over 45, he has but little hope to find a satisfactory job and his chances get smaller and smaller every day.

Let me by the way mention that aspect of unemployment which I call dangerous. It can become explosive if handled by opportunists, mind you. In these days of hardship, the executives and personnel of news media, the employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and manpower centres should perform their task in a totally unbiassed way, and be careful not to let themselves be prompted into a provoking answer which might increase existing social tensions. We, in this Parliament, should use every parliamentary procedure to have the government start with all the means at its disposal looking for real solutions to the great problems of today. We should provide the civil servants who assume responsibility for enforcing the bills we pass with the appropriate means to really help the unemployed who show their good will. They have been hit by a hard enough blow when they left their employment. Let them not be submitted to endless vexations before they can be paid benefits.

When referring to the July 8 memo, I find that the amendments in Bill C-69, which are important in some ways, are mainly changes aimed at smoothing out some of the drawbacks inherent in the enforcement of the act. I notice in the documentory notes given to us on July 8 a reference to a number of supplementary changes proposed to reduce as much as possible the injustices and complexities now existing. I notice this reference and I hope that fuller changes will be introduced without too much delay.

As regards persons who take part in job creation projects, such as local initiatives program promoters, it is normal that they take part in the benefits as well as inconveniences deriving from the Unemployment Insurance Act. The proposed changes also mention that claimants may be allowed to terminate a current benefit period and establish a new one, if it is in their interest to do so.

This procedure might be profitable, especially in the case of payments for an illness, since there is always the question of an initial phase. About this kind of benefits, changes are also suggested to ease somewhat the eligibility conditions. The problem of medical certificates will have to be settled, and the certificates provided by local physicians will have to be deemed as valid for eligibility purposes without any need for confirmation by other physicians at the head office of the commission who do not know anything of the patient's illness.

I have here a photocopy of a letter adressed to a claimant who had incurred an illness during the initial period. I think it is appropriate to quote from it a paragraph which shows the difficulties which result from the act and the related regulations. It reads:

The claimant submitted a second application for the week of December 22, 1974. She provided us with an employment record with eight weeks of insurable employment between December 9, 1973 and February 2, 1974. However, she needed 8 weeks between December 23, 1973 and December 28, 1974, which was her reference period, that is to say 52 weeks from the date of her second application.

This is a real mathematical problem and the result is a big zero for total payment. Insurable period, initial period, reference period are so many words used by officials to try explain the periods when there is no payment at all.

I have often said in the House that the Unemployment Insurance Act, while providing a necessary help to unemployed people, is also set up first of all to protect the fund. We see clearly an example of such a financial cooperation in this provision regarding the benefit disentitlement after the age of 65, since the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) himself announced this feature in his budget speech last June 23. We cannot be blind to the fact that those workers have contributed to the unemployment insurance scheme for many years, in the hope of keeping their entitlement to benefits till the age of 70. It is an injustice for this group of workers, and we do not think the savings permitted by this measure will contribute significantly to balance the budget.

Most of those workers re poor people who would deserve better treatment at an age when they are still available and eager to do some work according to their skill. Representations have already been made by representatives of various associations on behalf of their group, and it would be advisable that this discretionary measure be completely deleted from the bill under study.

If the technocrats who drafted Bill C-69 had really been concerned about the workers, they would have found, at the very least, a solution to the transfer of the contributions, either to the Quebec Pension Plan or the Canada Pension Plan, in order to increase appreciably the inome of the workers in the event where they were forced into retirement. It is inconceivable that workers who for years have contributed to maintain an insurance fund should be faced with the denial of their right to benefits when they are still available on the labour market, and without compensation from a fund to which they have contributed for many a year.

I therefore urge the minister to at least find a solution that is more humane.

On September 22, 1975, the Quebec newspaper Le Soleil reported that the delegates of the golden age at the close of the convention of the federation attended by delegates of 802 affiliated clubs, representing 90,000 members of the federation, expressed the wish that their federation exert pressures on the government to convince it of withdrawing Bill C-69 through which persons over 65 will be denied the right to unemployment insurance benefits.

On September 5, 1975, the secretary of the Quebec Retired Civil Servants Association Incorporated sent the members of parliament and the news media copy of the resolution passed at a meeting of the administrative council of the association convened on September 2, 1975.

Here are some extracts of the whereases in their resolution:

That the proposed amendment is unfair and discriminatory for those who are 65 or more and who, because they do not have sufficient income to live comfortably in these inflation times, have a job and hope to be able to get unemployment insurance benefits in a more or less distant future after they have contributed to the fund for many years.

That the government established a program called "New Horizons" aimed at keeping active those who are 65 or more by encouraging them to have a job to stay in good health as long as possible.

That the government spent in this regard $10 million and that a sound and fair philosophy ensures that those who take part in this program are not penalized, as would be the case if the bill were enacted.

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is drafting legislation to make courses available to the unemployed so that they can have a new training to get a job, thus integrating manpower training programs into the unemployment insurance program.

That a pilot project is now on trial in Newfoundland, under which a larger number of unemployed would receive both unemployment insurance benefits and some training, which would create, if the experience were successful, a glaring contradiction with the provisions of Bill C-69.

It is therefore proposed and resolved unanimously that the government of Canada be urged to delete in this bill all provisions relating to the non-eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits of people aged 65 or more, in order that the latter, as in the past, be entitled to eventually receive total benefits after termination of employment.

I have in hand the text of a communiqué appearing in Le Droit of Ottawa on Friday, September 19, 1975, signed by Mrs. Wilbrod Dufour, from Sainte-Foy and entitled: "The hell with people aged 65 or more". It is a good opportunity during this debate to quote the whole text of that communiqué, which summarizes so well the situation:

This title may seem a little startling but in my view it faithfully reflects the federal government's attitude towards older workers. Indeed we read in the budget speech that the applicants' age limit will be lowered from 70 to 65.

What is the rationale? To keep afloat the unemployment insurance fund which is supposed to be in the red. If the unemployment insurance is poorly administered, one cannot blame it on the older workers.

I support this statement 100 per cent.

What is meant by "older worker"? It is someone who has reached or will shortly reach the age of 65. He is about to be dismissed from his job because he has reached the compulsory retirement age which is enforced in the business where he is employed. He may be entitled to a meagre pension or he may not. And surely the old age pension cannot fill the grap and provide him with decent livelihood. Therefore he has to work.

Many of these people enjoy good health and are perfectly capable of working. They are bona fide workers as defined in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is precisely because they make many contacts to find a job that they need unemployment benefits. Nevertheless the government has just arbitrarily decided that at 65 a man has no right to work, in a word no right to live. Yet most of them have contributed to the unemployment insurance fund for 34 years—since 1941—and in many instances have never collected benefits.

This important group of people, made up of elderly workers and their families, is compelled to judge very harshly the governing body for wanting to treat them in such a way.

Is there anything more enlightening than to hear our federal ministers utter, on every possible occasion, pious wishes with regard to our senior citizens: they built our society, they deserve our respect, our regards, our consideration, etc.

But when it is time for action they merely think of getting the Unemployment Insurance Fund out of the red at the expense of the elderly workers, those who built it by contributing to it for 34 years.

It is obvious that all those who contributed for many years to the Unemployment Insurance Fund deserve a lot of attention from the administration. They are not responsible for the administrative complexities resulting from a legislation and regulations that should be improved on the basis of the needs of everyone of its participants.

Most of these workers are poor people who should deserve a better treatment at an age where they are still available and ready to work within their capabilities. We do not believe that the savings resulting from this measure will be useful in balancing the budget.

I am convinced that this measure will not help balance the budget. However, it can easily be seen that a legislation with a too sophisticated phraseology brings out regulations which often are inapplicable. Insurability problems could be eliminated to a degree with some appropriate amendment to the multiplication of the waiting and qualifying period, the extended period and the length of the employment period and to the total earnings with the same employer.

The four consecutive weeks of ineligibility, although it might be due to four weeks of work, is a feature which has to come out of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It contributes to discourage the unemployed to go back to work.

Recently, in my riding the employees of the Moto-ski plant had been called back to work by their employer for a four week period and when they re-established their claim they lost in its entirety the unemployment insurance to which they were legitimately entitled simply because of the formulation of a section of the act that did not mean anything.

These difficulties arising out of a poorly written act might sometimes lead to illogical decisions on the part of an officialdom qost in that complexe red tape.

I shall give you an example of what happened when eligibility to pregnancy benefit had to be determined. Here is the answer given by an employee of the Commission to a claimant: That claimant does not meet the eligibility requirements for pregnancy benefits. She does not have, as mentioned in the regulation, the 10 insurable employment weeks during the 20 week period immediately preceding the thirtieth week before her delivery. During this period, she made no contribution and, as a result, she received no payments. Can you imagine such administrative complications?

● (1620)

As concerns job searching, it is sometimes revolting to see what happens. Unemployed workers are required to visit employers who are having extreme difficulty remaining in operation in an industry like the furniture industry, because of higher transport rates between provinces, like the leather goods industry which must bear the fluctuations of custom rates, like the wood industry in general which is half paralysed. The type of cooperation which must exist between manpower employees and Unemployment Insurance Commission employees should help the unemployed instead of giving them trouble.

To give an idea of the answers given concerning job searching, I would like to read question No. 2095 placed on the order paper on March 21, 1975, at the request of my colleague from Abitibi. It is as follows:

QUESTION: Does the Unemployment Insurance Commission have daily data on the number and type of jobs available in a region and, if so, how does the Commission inform the concerned citizen?

ANSWER: Yes but these data are maintained by district office rather than region to enable the Commission's local offices to provide a more effective service to UIC claimants as distinct from the concerned citizen at large. This information is used for adjudication purposes and to assist claimants in meeting their obligation to seek and find work.

That gives an idea of the problem caused by the regulations concerning job searching. It is obvious that the commission has required the unemployed to search for more jobs than there can possibly be available at certain times of the year. It must be noted that the cost of advisory services in job reference or research is evaluated at $1,345,730 for Canada and at $427 million for Quebec.

I believe that these sums would have been better used if more projects had been accepted through the Local Initiatives or the Opportunities for Youth Programs. All the preparation work had required different types of research and this was not costing the government a penny, and the projects in most cases were valid ones. This would have provided work for many unemployed anxious to work. The same thing will happen again there.

In my area 82 projects were submitted. We have $1,077,-000 to distribute and there are projects for over $3 million. So imagine that some will have to be told that their projects are not accepted. And the unemployment rate in our area varies from 17 to 25 per cent based on the calculations usually used by the officials of various boards under the Department of Labour. I have never been against the idea of implementing the Local Initiative Program, it was fantastic, it required preparation work on the part of people. The spirit of initiative was being discovered in workers, well-intentioned people. But at the same time provision should have been made for sufficient amounts to accept at least two thirds of the projects. We cannot accept more than one third.

This year some advertising was done to encourage people to submit projects. Yes, there is a lot of unemployment. A lot of money was paid to advertise and then discourage people because most projects are not accepted. That was a way of solving the unemployment. That avoided the red tape complications of an overly complicated legislation.

The consideration of a bill whose object is to reduce the demoralizing effects of inflation should not take us away from another objective whose purpose would be to take the appropriate means to organize work so more citizens can participate each according to his tastes, skills, aspirations and knowledge. There is so much work to do in a young country like ours.

I would not suggest there is nothing good in Bill C-69. Only I wanted to show the act's deficiencies in general, as I had reasons to believe more sections would be amended. However, I recognize extending the eligibility period will help some unemployed persons. Those that suffer from an accident will receive certain benefits. But I note these various clauses are still couched in a way that makes them very complicated and difficult to understand by the majority of unemployed workers. It is hoped the bill will be amended, either in committee or elsewhere, to become acceptable.

I still feel officials from the department and the UIC do not adequately consult labour representatives before they prepare this kind of legislation. For this reason, and unduly large proportion of unemployed are victimized under the act, which does not relate to present day needs.

Extending the disqualification period for those who leave their jobs without good reason or refuse suitable employment may have serious repercussions. I do not approve of a worker leaving his job without a good reason or refusing suitable employment. However, we should consider the circumstances and the kind of employment offered. This is where arbitrary decisions will happen.

It may be said that the unemployed can always appeal, but that is a long and complicated process. We should certainly add something that would force the officials to scrutinize the case before they render a decision. I do not criticize the officials as a whole, because most of them are relatively well inclined. However, let us make it easier for them. The legislation is so complicated they are sometimes compelled to take attitudes contrary to common sense. According to my information, the commission employs 118 investigators for the province of Quebec and 26 liaison officers. By comparing the number of investigators and liaison officers, one can conclude that the commission is taking more interest in investigations than on information given to claimants about their entitlements and liabilities.

On several occasions, I mentioned that complications have multiplied when the commission appealed to the income tax office to determine the insurability, this fact has caused many a headache. And if that continues, no one knows when it will end. I have in hand an advertisement published in newspapers indicating the computing methods to use for reimbursing to the Department of National Revenue the overpayments of unemployment benefits. A whole page, 8½ by 14 inches, just to explain how to pay back the overpayments. A fine example of cooperation, indeed, which does more for the unemployment insurance funds than for the interests of the unemployed. We seldom see the commission advertise to explain to the unemployed how to get an adjustment of their benefits in case of miscalculations. No wonder the Unemployment Insurance Act is the target of so many criticisms. I attempted to explain that it is mainly because it is often written in quite an incomprehensible manner.

I have here an editorial by CJRC dated October 10, 1975 and entitled "The Unemployment Insurance Scandal". I would like to quote in part. It reads as follows:

> It is an open secret that thousands of unemployed draw unemployment insurance benefits to which they are not entitled, through the help or the ignorance of some UIC officials, while thousands of others who would be entitled to those benefits have seen the payment of benefits being refused, through arbritrary action of officials, both intransigent and arrogant!

And one reads further down:

> Let me quote now the content of a memorandum adressed to UIC officials by insurance director D. R. Brown, which, however unlikely it may seem, reads as follows:
>
> "It is not the responsibility of commission officials to inform the parties concerned that the time may have come for them to submit a claim for benefits, nor to invite them to submit one, NOR TO KEEP THEM INFORMED OF THEIR POSSIBLE BENEFIT ENTITLEMENT.
> The insured who claims that he or she did now know the provisions of the act, nor his or her resulting duties and obligations HAS NO ADMISSIBLE EXCUSE IN CASE OF NEGLIGENCE". This confidential document has fallen into our hands; it is reproduced in its integrity for your information. You will certainly ask yourselves, as we do, if the unemployment insurance scheme is not a poor joke, and if the UIC is not mocking benefit recipients who are at its mercy.

I should like to conclude by insisting on the employment search problem. For some time and especially since last fall, commission officials have certainly given instructions to their employees as to the recipient's obligation to search for employment. I am not against commission employees suggesting the unemployed ways and means to find employment. Let's not go too far however. Various factors must be taken into account with regard to job seeking. First the unemployment rate in the area, the number of industries likely to need manpower; the season in the case of forestry, farm, fisheries workers or of any other seasonal industry; besides, and this is very important, the working and wage conditions that prevail in the area where the worker is sent; travelling expenses, the approximate duration of the job and that must be checked by people well informed of the prevailing working conditions in the area suggested to the unemployed.

It is well known that those directives resulted in forcing unemployed to seek jobs in areas where manpower centre employees had no job to offer. Those bureaucratic requirements do not solve the unemployment problem, but rather help wear out the patience, and I repeat it, the patience of overstaffed employers and of unemployed who lose heart when they see the results of their efforts.

I conclude by expressing the hope that the bill will nonetheless be revised, re-examined and, after consideration in committee, practical suggestions will be made and most of all studied by those in power so there will be major amendments to improve a little the sometimes complex relations that result from a legislation drafted in a way that is not suitable to those who are out of work.

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: I think that applause indicates that hon. members have been waiting a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: The applause must mean that they would like me to finish as quickly as possible.

There was one sentence, particularly, in the speech the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) made to the House yesterday which caught my attention and which, it appears from Hansard, received considerable commendation in the House. That sentence is as follows:

—we intend to make certain that Canadians who are working hard to maintain self-sufficiency, to maintain the momentum of this country's economy, and who are contributing to the unemployment insurance program, do not have to carry the added burden of supporting able-bodied people who do not want to work.

That is an indication by the minister that he is concerned about the problem colloquially called a rip-off but perhaps more accurately called abuses which attach not only to the Unemployment Insurance Commission but to many progams both inside and outside government. There are problems of cheaters and chisellers in relation to avoiding Customs, as we all know. There was even cheating and chiselling with regard to the guaranteed income supplement, though we do not talk about that very much. These cheaters and chisellers are a small proportion of those who might benefit from any program.

If I understood the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) earlier, he suggested that perhaps the number was not terribly significant and that we should not worry overly about this kind of abuse of the program. I suppose it would be easy to reply that as long as any abuse is taking place, members of parliament should be concerned with saving taxpayers money. However, even more important, I think it would be fair to suggest that it is important that the unemployment insurance program should have the credibility which requires those who abuse the system to be cut to the absolute minimum and that the cheaters and chisellers be sought after and, hopefully, caught. It is not simply a question of absolute numbers. It is a question that the program must not only be just but it must appear to the public to be one in which the interest of the public is protected through efficiency and through concern about those who might abuse the system.

Where I would agree with the hon. member is that we should not, in that tired old phrase, throw out the baby with the bath water. In concerning ourselves with abuses and the necessity of restricting them, we must make sure not to limit the benefits under the program for those who are genuinely deserving of them. In bureaucratic jargon, concern about abuses is translated into the phrase "the disincentive to work problem." That is a phenomenon we have had to deal with in terms of unemployment insurance since the inauguration of the scheme in 1941.

There is a continuing dilemma with regard to this program. On one hand, benefits under the system must be adequate in order to meet the primary objective of offering adequate income replacement to those who are unemployed, but in so doing we must keep in mind the disincentive to work. If these benefits are too high, they may cause people to try to take advantage of them when they are not entitled to do so.

One way of dealing with the problem of disincentive to work would be to ensure that the benefits under the program were so small that people would not have an incentive to leave work and accept the benefits. That would certainly minimize the problem. If benefits were reduced to an extremely low level—I am sure no one in this House would like to see that happen—individuals would be forced back into the labour market and obliged to take any kind of work because of the inadequacy of the benefits under the program.

However, the effect of taking the action of reducing benefits would be dramatic in its influence on Canada's labour force and on the economy. It is desirable for highly skilled people to retain their skills, but they would be forced to accept less skilled, or unskilled jobs in order to survive. The social investment and their investment in their training and education, and the effect of their education would be lost to the labour market.

Clearly, the effects of the disincentive to work in any unemployment insurance scheme must be weighed carefully against the need to maintain the stability of the labour market, to protect skills and to maintain a pool of trained workers from which the economy can draw in times of high productivity. Many employers are forced to have periods of lay-off. They need, and it is desirable, to have their work force readily available when production resumes. It would be costly and damaging if the work force of those employers was unavailable because of inadequate unemployment insurance protection which would force them to disperse what would otherwise be a skilled work force.

Clearly, what we must do is try and draw a balance in dealing with the disincentive to work problem between the needs of maintaining high levels to protect those who are legitimately without work and to find, also, mechanisms which will discourage those who might be tempted to cheat on the system, who might be tempted to try to find ways of claiming benefits when they are not genuinely those which the act has in mind as beneficiaries.

I was pleased to see that the minister, in bringing forth this legislation—though he did not deal with this in great length in his speech to the House—has taken steps to deter individuals from unfairly battening on to the system. The most significant of these changes is the proposal that those who voluntarily quit their jobs without good cause, those who are discharged for misconduct, those who refuse suitable employment, and those who refuse to upgrade their skills by taking courses of instruction, will be disqualified from receiving benefits up to a maximum of six weeks.

This is not simply an extension of the maximum; it is, in effect, a doubling of the penalties under the existing act. Those under the existing act who were penalized by one week's disqualification would now face two weeks disqualification, those with two weeks would face four, and those with three would face six. It is perhaps misleading to say that it is an extension of the maximum disqualification; it is, in effect, a doubling of the disqualification under the existing act.

● (1640)

Under the old Unemployment Insurance Act, the disqualification was simply a deferment of benefits, not a reduction in the number of weeks payable. The Gill committee, which studied the Unemployment Insurance Act more than ten years ago, recommended that the penalty be a loss in benefits rather than a deferment, and that provision was introduced in 1971. With the current proposal, people who quit their job without good cause face up to eight weeks, including the two-week waiting period, without benefits. I hope this will be a disincentive to those who might be tempted to take advantage of the system.

I know there are some members on the other side of the House, and perhaps even on this side, who consider six weeks disqualification to be harsh. There will be some who under some circumstances—and I might put myself in this category—feel that it is not harsh enough. There are jurisdictions in which those who leave employment voluntarily or are discharged for misconduct, and so on, lose all entitlement to benefit and must requalify through working in insurable employment.

Mr. Leggatt: Spain.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman across the way is knowledgeable of activities in Spain, but one can look closer than that, to the United States, and see that they have that kind of provision.

The government has decided that approach would be unduly harsh, and feel that the provision they have brought forward meets the middle ground. It is a more desirable disqualification, and more generous than the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) would like to see followed. I hope it will have the effect of retarding unjustified demands on the system which we, as representatives of the taxpayers, should be concerned about.

The second provision in the legislation which I support relates to the three weeks' lump sum advance payment of benefits to claimants, which does not have to be repaid in the event that they find work immediately. This was introduced in the 1971 act and we on this side supported it because it was felt that we were adding an incentive to those who were unemployed to get back to the work force quickly. It was conceived as an incentive to re-enter the work force. It was assumed that this kind of lump payment would be a bonus on top of the salary an individual would receive, and so he would be extra active in efforts to find work quickly.

Unfortunately, the opposite proved to be the case. Rather than being an incentive to early return to work, advance payments of unemployment insurance in many cases seems to have resulted in a disincentive. There appears to be evidence that those receiving the payment did not return to the work force more quickly than other people. It appears that the 1971 legislation conferred incentives and benefits which did not have the intended effect, so it seems logical to discontinue them.

In summary, Madam Speaker, one of the reasons I am anxious to support this legislation is that it takes steps to reduce the disincentive to work which, perhaps unfairly, in the public mind has been associated with the unemployment insurance program. These are useful steps to diminish the kind of cheating that could take place, and I think they will assure the public that we are concerned about that problem.

I hope the minister will not be complacent in the administration of this legislation. In the last three years I know there have been considerable improvements in the consideration of the act and improved liaison between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Canada Manpower division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. There are now better procedures, however, to ensure that persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits are made aware of and are given the option of suitable job opportunities as early as possible. The commission has developed an active job search program. This means that persons in receipt of benefits must prove they are making reasonable and customary efforts to find jobs during the time they are receiving the benefits.

There have been improvements in the administration of the program, but I do not believe the minister should be sanguine or content or overly satisfied with the administrative application of this program. My concern is not for the basis of the program, which I support entirely. My concern is that since such a large proportion of public funds is involved, the program should be operated with the utmost efficiency. Those who are not entitled to benefits under the program should not receive them: public support for the program will thus be maintained.

I think it is a necessary program and we must maintain its credibility. That can be done through effective enforcement of the present procedures and the steps the minister has shown he is prepared to take to dissuade those who might feel they can get away with ripping off such a program.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I have listened with keen interest to the debate thus far. While it is obvious that there are some problems with the suggested amendments, as referred to by many members, particularly from this side of the House, I should like to address myself to the few points relating to some amendments which should have been included in the bill but for some reason were not.

I refer to the inequities which have always existed in the Unemployment Insurance Act as related to fishermen. To me, it is entirely inexcusable that after so very many promises made over the past few years to bring in an income support program for fishermen, there is still no sign of anything realistic happening in this area. Until the government comes up with that type of income support program, interim amendments should be introduced to satisfy the needs of the fishermen and to overcome the inequities and discrimination which exist in the present act. The only reference to fishermen that I have found is contained in the information papers on Bill C-69, issued by the minister, dealing with the exclusion of fishermen from the general rule of employer-employee relationships. Unfortunately, this is always the case and is always referred to.

If I may digress for a moment, Madam Speaker, I wonder why a clear definition cannot be made between a fisherman employer and an employee. When is a fisherman going to get equal consideration with others in the work force? It is true that a fisherman who owns a longliner and his sharemen can be considered as self-employed, but in the general rule the act is discriminatory toward those who contribute. If the department responsible, and the Department of National Revenue, consider fishermen eligible to pay premiums, then surely they should be entitled to equal benefits.

Many suggestions have been made along the following lines from interested parties in all areas of the country: One is that fishermen would be eligible on the same basis as at present, that is, with eight weekly contributions. However, eight contributions entitle fishermen to benefits for 12 weeks. Each additional week of contributions should entitle a fisherman to 1½ weeks of benefits, to a maximum of 24 weeks. The period of eligibility should be extended by two months. This would give the fishermen greater flexibility in determining when they would draw benefits, and would be more realistic in view of the fact that the normal fishing season varies in different parts of the country, particularly in the province of Newfoundland. The amount of benefits should be calculated by averaging all weekly contributions, and trawler fishermen should be placed on the same basis as regular employees. At the present time, claims may be established between the week in which December 1 falls and the week in which May 15 falls, and the benefit period runs from the week in which the claim is established to the week in which May 15 next falls, unless benefits are exhausted at an earlier date.

● (1650)

We have been told time and time again that an income support program will be forthcoming. This process even went to the extent that early in 1974 the previous minister of the environment, the Hon. Jack Davis, wrote to provincial ministers asking for their views on the contemplated income support program. In their reply, the Newfoundland government urged the implementation of the program to be no later than the start of the fishing season in 1975, and requested that they be involved in formulating the administrative and implementation details.

The province recommended that in the event of a delay certain changes should be introduced in the intervening period. Further, they suggested modifications which were compatible with the proposed income support program and their adoption of it. They suggested that this would ease the transition from the unemployment insurance program to the income support scheme, as follows. The effect of adopting their suggestions would be to increase the flexibility of the defined employment and benefit periods. They stated that current definitions are too rigid and preclude consideration of the variability of local fishing seasons. It was suggested that the beginning and end of the fishing season should be determined each year and for each geographic zone on the basis of weather and ice conditions in each zone. The length of the fishing season could be determined jointly with the federal Department of Fisheries after consultation with local fishermen, union officials and members of the industry. The method for determining the number of benefit weeks should be the same for fishermen as for regular claimants. The rule that the total number of benefit weeks cannot exceed five-sixths of the insured employment period should therefore be eliminated. The only limitation should be this, that no benefits may be paid to any fishermen in any zone during the defined fishing season in that zone.

I suggest that the limit of $170 per week on a fisherman's maximum insured earnings should also be eliminated. Currently, maximum insurable earnings are determined on a weekly and annual basis. I think the figure used for an annual basis is $8,840. Fishing income is highly variable, and if a fisherman is lucky he can earn $2,000 in a couple of weeks. But only $340 of the sum earned in two weeks is counted as insurable earnings. This inequity, under which the extra amount earned is excluded, should be corrected because the fisherman might earn no more for the rest of the year. That amount may represent his total earnings for the year.

So, here we are, almost at the end of 1975, still lacking income support legislation. The minister indicated that legislation would soon be introduced to provide for an income support program. I only hope that this will happen. If it does not, I suggest that it is incumbent on the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), who is responsible for unemployment insurance matters, to amend Bill C-69 in the way I have suggested. There is still opportunity for him to introduce such amendments.

The other point I want to make concerns discrimination against women in the fishing industry. In this regard, it is obvious that those responsible for the equality of status of women have completely missed evidence of discrimination against women who are or can be employed in the fishing industry. The Unemployment Insurance Act discriminates in its provision for benefits. Why do I say that? At certain times of the year, certain species of fish are in abundance. Then, manpower on an emergency basis is needed to process certain delicate species such as scallops.

To illustrate the disparity, let me refer to an incident which took place in a remote area of Newfoundland. In order to process the scallops, manpower is needed. Naturally, the people of the area found it impossible to contact a Manpower centre 200 or 300 miles away in order to apply for personnel for processing the scallops. Therefore, it naturally fell on the fishermen to hire their families and wives. Before doing so, they checked with the Department of National Revenue and were told by an official that they could not hire their wives. A fisherman could only hire his neighbour's wife. In turn, that neighbour could hire the fisherman's own wife. The people of the area accepted this decision made by a responsible official, but the decision was overruled by superiors. The result was overpayments of UIC benefits to many individuals, to say nothing of the resulting embarrassment and financial difficulties.

This situation has continued for almost two years and stems from ridiculous regulations which neither the UIC nor the Department of National Revenue can reconcile, despite their supposed expertise. As I say, no attempt has been made to clarify this predicament or to correct the regulations. Neither was any reference made to this inequity in Bill C-16. I suggest that an amendment to Bill C-16 could have corrected the situation. I only hope that the ministers responsible will address themselves to this serious discrepancy and I hope the government will act to wipe out overpayments made to the innocent victims concerned.

May I comment on the bill itself, Madam Speaker? I think the minister should be taking a harder look at the uniformity with which the regulations are applied, particularly in view of varying conditions existing in different regions of the country, conditions to do with the geographic, economic and social situation of the area concerned. Certainly, the number of grievances with which members of parliament are daily inundated should indicate that something is wrong with the system. For example, I ask the minister to refer to section 39 of the act, which authorizes the commission to refer claimants to approved courses of instruction and to waive the requirement for the claimant to be capable of and available for work while attending the course. At present, an individual who earnestly takes any kind of job, then applies for and is accepted in a government-sponsored course of instruction which will enable him to better himself and upgrade his capabilities in trade, is bound by the present regulations and must waive his claim for assistance. This is particularly true of students who must attend a provincially-sponsored course. Hardship is created because pay is so minuscule that the student cannot even meet minimum living standards. My point is that the commission is therefore hindering the initiative of the individual.

The minister should also consider and explain something else. If it is the aim of his department to help people to upgrade their ability to enter the work force and thus ensure a reduction in the unemployment rate, why has the minister seen fit in the past few years to reduce drastically the number of Manpower seats purchased in vocational and training schools in some parts of Canada? The minister should also take a good look at some of the conditions students must contend with because of the low rates paid to them under provincial rates of pay while they undergo course training.

Another inequity arises under section 25 of the act, which requires the claimant to be capable of, available for and actively seeking work. Let me give you an example of a ridiculous situation in order to demonstrate this hypocrisy. A partially blind citizen of my district was working in a restaurant and had to leave because her husband became sick and required care. When she applied for benefits she was turned down because it was deemed that because of blindness she was not capable of working in a restaurant—even though she had performed her duties for months to the satisfaction of her employer. Similarly, claimants living in isolated areas are disqualified from benefits if they refuse to take a job miles away from where they live. In such cases, after they pay for their travels to and from work, for board, etc., it costs them more to work than it would cost to stay at home or if they did not work. Yet the present system disqualifies them from benefits under the "just cause for refusing to work" provision.

Those examples indicate the weakness in our system, the inflexibility and the lack of individual attention paid by those responsible to Canadians who most need that individual attention. Under the present bill, the government can do whatever it wants with regard to increasing disqualification periods. It can put all it wants into the act on disentitlement. It can put in all the benefit control system it wants. They can keep adding new clauses. They can refer to just causes all they want; but the just causes have to be just, and at present it is obvious that they are not.

I was a bit surprised to read in the report of the advisory committee that they were satisfied the benefit control system was working well. I was even more surprised with the evidence presented by officials of the head office that the benefit control system was working to the benefit of the claimant. This statement of fact indicates a complete lack of recognition of the countless hundreds of thousands of grievances submitted to me and other members of parliament. It proves my point that it is useless to write to the commissioner to inquire into a claim that has been adjudicated against a claimant at the lower level.

It is useless for claimants to appeal their cases. I venture to say that in 99 per cent of the cases—and I am only using a rough figure—the decisions of the local office are turned down. I would like to know the percentage of cases submitted for appeal that were judged in favour of the client, compared with the percentage against.

It is obvious that the purpose of Bill C-69 is to stop the runaway costs of unemployment insurance. It was recently pointed out by a responsible official of an interested group that it is almost impossible to imagine that the cost of our Canadian system is almost equal to that of the United States. When one compares the population figures, something has to be wrong.

It is true, and everyone is aware of this, that as a result of the inefficiency of those responsible for designing the act, rip-offs are occurring. What is really happening is that in the confusion and attempts of the unemployment insurance commission to correct their projections, as pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), costs have gone beyond the capability of the imagination as to how anyone responsible can be so inadequate that the stopgap measures introduced are hurting the innocent.

To emphasize this point, I refer to the amendment which discriminates against senior citizens and the indignity it inflicts. The government is really saying to those aged 65, "You had better quit working now. You had better stop contributing to Canada. Just stop what you are doing and get out of the mainstream of opportunity, because we do not need you any more. Even though you have been contributing to society and unemployment insurance for many years, we are going to give you $129.28 a month or, if you have a wife and are in need, $419.62 a month." The government thanks them for the contribution and then tells them to get out of the way. For someone receiving a Canada Pension Plan benefit, this is deducted from the amount he is eligible to receive.

I realize that the minister has a tough job to do as a result of the Unemployment Insurance Act that has been developed over the years. He has the important job of having to correct the inequities. I sympathize with him. However, it is surely inexcusable that in his thrust to stop the runaway and rampant cost increases, the low income earner, the underemployed and the aged should be the ones to suffer most. I feel the minister is doing his best and is as concerned as myself and other members about the hurt that will be inflicted on the innocent as a result of the jungle of inequities that exists.

I hope that the referral of the bill at the committee stage, and the subjective and responsible criticisms that have been offered during the second reading debate, will give the minister an opportunity to reflect on those inequities, and that he will consider and introduce further amendments to produce a corrected bill on third reading which will be fair and just to all Canadians.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate concerning an issue that has been very much to the fore in the last two federal election campaigns. Just a week or two ago someone said it was the politicians who made the Unemployment Insurance Commission an issue in the 1972 campaign. From my experience, I would totally reject that remark. It was made an issue by the people involved. Anyone who was a candidate in the 1972 campaign in the constituency that I represent could not avoid hearing about the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the problems it created. Every time one stopped at a business that was run by a small operator, be it a gas station, restaurant or motel, one had the proprietor of the business crying on his shoulder by the hour about the problems being created for him by the methods and means adopted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

As I listened to them throughout that campaign, I realized this was one of the issues that would give the Progressive Conservative Party considerable impetus in the west. As it turned out, it did. Speaking from our own point of view, it was unfortunate that in the subsequent election of 1974 some of the attention was diverted from that issue to the one that has just been before the House in a rather ironic fashion, namely wage and price controls.

The people about whom I am talking, the class of small entrepreneurs, are seldom given credit by this government for the role they play. Unemployment insurance as it has been constituted in this country has made their role even more difficult. They serve a very useful training function, not as part of any subsidized school system, provincial or federal, but simply as people in small towns, villages and communities who hire local young people to work for them. In the course of that first or second job, these people are trained to function in a gas station, wait at table in a restaurant, or take care of a motel. One of the great frustrations of these entrepreneurs is that following the eight-week training period, the trainee immediately—or soon after—leaves the job, not because he has become terribly efficient at it but to draw unemployment insurance. That is one of the examples I had repeated to me over and over again during that campaign. As one restaurant operator explained to me, it means the loss of full-time jobs for adults who could be employed full time.

● (1710)

One thing many of these operators have learned is to hire high school students to work part time, because they can keep high school students for two years until they graduate from school to continue their education elsewhere or take jobs with the permanent labour force. They get more out of the training period that way than by hiring employees full-time, only to see them ready to leave after a short while.

One of the reasons I heard a great deal about the more pressing problems connected with unemployment insurance is that my own constituency is one of those gloriously beautiful mountain constituencies embracing some of the finest scenery to be found anywhere in the world. A common complaint made to me concerned the skiing holiday. A person would work half the year, or two-thirds of the year and then, when the snow on the mountains became deep enough to provide good skiing, would leave his or her job and finance his skiing through the Unemployment Insurance Commission, returning to work some time in the spring or when the payments ran out. The skiing holiday paid for by the UIC is something I heard about over and over again. One begins by discounting stories of this kind, thinking them to be invented or exaggerated. But when you hear them over and over again from a variety of ski areas and from people who feel very strongly about these circumstances, you realize they are a key factor in the whole picture.

I shall not comment further on the cost factors involved in this scheme. There has, surely, been an enormous temptation built in to quit a job or to refuse a job which has been offered. It seems to me that a course which ought to be taken and which might return to the Unemployment Insurance Commission a much needed sense of discipline lies in extending the period of time for which a person must work in order to establish eligibility. In recent years we have seen an erosion of the kind of restraint, discipline and loyalty in a work force which used to be an important part of job holding.

I feel that various programs established by the government opposite have contributed to this lack of restraint, this lack of discipline. Too much money has been made available too easily to people in this country. When the decision was made to alter the nature of the unemployment insurance scheme, making it a kind of guaranteed annual income or a scheme for the redistribution of income, both the scheme and the country were in trouble.

There is one group of people in particular to whom I should like to make reference, because even as one criticizes the scheme for being too easy and for permitting people who have worked for only a short period of time to draw benefit for extremely long periods, one must have regard for cases brought to one's attention where real injustice is done to certain people who find themselves disqualified although they know they are entitled to benefit. I am thinking particularly about the older woman, the long-time faithful employee, the one who has never drawn unemployment insurance in her life, the one who has not quit, who has been loyal, who has worked 10, 20 or 25 years, who is laid off through no fault of her own and who finds herself disentitled while knowing from her own experience that others who learned early how to make the system work have been drawing benefits annually or biannually, year after year—they have made a business of getting something out of the scheme.

The older woman I have in mind, brought up in a generation which possessed a somewhat deeper sense of responsibility, a somewhat greater degree of independence, has refused to take advantage of her situation, feeling there would be something wrong about doing so, only to find, in her time of need, when she was laid off and when the reward for being faithful should come to her, that there was really no insurance aspect about the scheme at all. She had merely been paying another tax all those years, a tax that returned nothing except the knowledge that virtue was its own reward in the unemployment insurance business as in other areas of life.

There are certain things I feel the department should not do. It should not promote the break-up of marriages, particularly long-term marriages. It is a common thing in our society for wives to live longer than their husbands and for husbands to retire before their wives are eligible for old age security pensions or retirement pensions. Also, it is a common feature of retirement for families to make a move, often a move from our crowded cities to the countryside or to the smaller towns. Working wives in this position resent the letters they receive telling them they are unemployed voluntarily. And so do I. It seems to me that short of separation or divorce, such a move cannot be avoided by them; it is not the result of any frivolous choice, nor has a job held for a long time been given up as a result of a mere whim. There is too much involved here for the department to put itself in the position of forcing or promoting separation.

Neither should the department involve itself in depopulating small towns. This is something that has been decried in this country for many years. I know it is a natural trend for people today to leave our small centres and go to urban areas, but we do not need any incentive to do so from the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Both sexes do this, but particularly women in small towns who find themselves unemployed, again through no fault of their own, who apply and are disentitled because they are not prepared to move long distances and resettle in a larger centre. It seems to me they are entitled to some pay-out, having contributed to what is supposed to be an insurance scheme for them.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission should not confuse the search for work with work itself. I find this sort of confusion very prevalent, particularly in the attitude to women who lose their jobs and place their names with Manpower—perhaps there is a certain humour there. These women feel that this should count for something. They search for work with which they are familiar but they are unable to find any, and at that time they become disentitled because they are told that their search has been inadequate.

One case that comes most forcefully to mind concerned someone who was 59 years of age and who had worked in one job for many years. She went to all the equivalent employers in town searching for work, without success. She placed her name with Manpower but was told she had not done enough. She then went through an extended period of time walking up and down the main street of town presenting herself to potential employers. She was in the position of having to tell them that she was 59 years of age but knew nothing about any job they might have. At that point her chances were zero, and the Manpower department knew it. Nevertheless, what they said to her, in effect, was this, "We won't pay you unemployment insurance but we will pay you for the hours that you march up and down the street"—in, of course, a vain search for work. They said, "If you put in enough time, we might consider giving you an entitlement". I feel that kind of treatment is inequitable. It is not the kind of complaint that is made to me by a male worker; it is particularly a feminine problem.

They should not force an applicant into accepting a job below the minimum wage and then disentitle him or her because that job is turned down. I am not a proponent, and never have been, of high minimum wages, and I realize the subject of minimum wages is a sort of sacred cow of our economic system. One does not talk about them much, but if we are going to have them, they must mean something. It seems to me that one of the ultimate indignities to inflict on any woman seeking a job and who turns one down because it pays below the minimum wage is for her then to receive a letter from an official of the UIC telling her that that is the reason she is being disentitled from payments that are hers.

I listened to the speech made last night by the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) and was disappointed that she did not apply herself to the sort of problem that has been brought to my attention and, I am sure, to the attention of members right across the country. I utterly reject the kind of letter sent by the minister's department stating that an insurance principle is involved here; that when a person contributes to unemployment insurance he is buying a year's insurance, that it is like term insurance with no carry over. I do not follow that reasoning and cannot accept it.

Term or fire insurance have certain specialties about them. For one thing, they are not compulsory, nobody has to buy life insurance or term insurance. You do not have to have fire insurance on your building. You take a chance; if the building burns down you do not collect any insurance. One thing about life insurance, term insurance or any other kind of life insurance is that you collect it only once. But I do not accept that a woman who has paid into a compulsory scheme for 24 years should be told that she cannot collect because there is an insurance principle involved and that she has voluntarily put herself into a position where she cannot find work. She is then at the point when she needs insurance for the very first time, yet when she needs it the most she finds that for her there is no insurance.

In many occupations, sick leave is allowed to accumulate. Then at the end of 35 or 40 years of faithful service, recognition is given that sick leave in the form of a bonus on retirement. I am sure all hon. members know that unemployment insurance is sometimes paid out at the end of a long period as a kind of retirement gift.

I am pleased to see that women are now more militant than they were, but they need to be a lot more militant. I found, when in this House seven years ago, that it was almost impossible to get a woman to take her case to the appeal board. They deemed it an example of throwing good money after bad. Very often a very long trip was involved if a woman did not want to hire a lawyer to present her case for her, or could not afford to do so. She would hear from others that it was a hopeless cause anyway, that she would not get anything even if she did appeal, and as a result it was very difficult to persuade a woman to take her case to the first board of appeal.

I am very happy to see that women are now more prepared to appeal their case, but even so there are problems. In addition, I am concerned about the number of women who sit on appeal boards across the country; the women still tend to get turned down pretty regularly. During the summer recess I was talking to one woman who had written to me and told me she had been reinstated. She said there were at least six others in the same position but they would not appeal their case, so I suspect that those who do appeal are just the tip of the iceberg. The problem is that once the appeal has gone against them, they cannot take the matter to the umpire because the only person who can pass the appeal on is the chairman of the very board that turned the appeal down. I find such people are very reluctant to send to the umpire a case on which they have given a negative ruling. It seems to me there could be some reform undertaken there which would make the umpire more truly an umpire than that official is at the present time.

● (1730)

There is another area on which I should like to spend a little time. It is a little different than what I have been discussing. I listened with interest last evening as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Portelance) spoke. He talked about the decision to take anyone over age 65 out of the scheme altogether. The excuse he gave is most interesting. As recorded at page 8593 of Hansard he mentioned there are other programs for elderly people, and then said:

> Considering all those improvements, the programs would unnecessarily overlap if persons having age 65 were still covered by the unemployment insurance plan.

That is a laugh. At one time Manpower and the UIC were one. The decision was made in the 27th Parliament to divorce the two. If there are any bureaux or offices which overlap they are the Manpower offices and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. If the Unemployment Insurance Commission is so concerned about overlapping then I suggest action be taken, as quickly as possible, to put the two parts of what should be one body back together again. That would end the overlap that is there.

It might also end the other factor where a person who puts his or her name in at the Manpower office, assuming that has some meaning, finds that not even the Unemployment Insurance Commission pays any attention to that. The woman who puts her name in at the Manpower office is told that her search for work is inadequate. This is one of the scandals in the way the Manpower offices and Unemployment Insurance Commission offices operate at the present time. So, I find it all a little amusing when the parliamentary secretary refers to an overlapping. The only thing which counts these days at a time of double digit inflation in Canada when one is over 65 is dollars and cents.

I would like to know, and I would like to know if the department knows, whether the senior citizens of 65 years of age will be better off by this change. That is the only argument to justify it. We need some figures to tell us whether that is true.

I can well believe the second part of the parliamentary secretary's speech when he said it is almost impossible to apply effectively the provisions of the law pertaining to availability and active search for a job to persons of that age since a great many of them are no longer members of the labour force. That goes along with the argument I presented earlier. I contend that that sentence has been applied by the Unemployment Insurance Commission for a very long time to the woman between age 55 and age 65. She is the one who has found it almost impossible to convince the commission that she is part of the labour force any longer. God knows, if the fact that she is in that age category is a problem, then the problem for those over age 65 must be almost insurmountable. One thing which may make it easier for them might be an extension in the period required for eligibility because that extension would show their connection to the labour force more clearly than anything else.

There is another thing about which I wonder. What would happen to the employer who employs only people over age 65? Would he or she be freed of the obligation of paying anything into the unemployment insurance scheme, and how long could that employer function? I am sure there are many employers who could get along very nicely for long periods with a staff composed entirely of people over age 65. The savings to them in not having to contribute anything to the scheme would be significant. I should like to know whether any thought has been given to that. These days one knows that the margin between profit and loss for a great many businesses, especially small businesses, is not the market but rather the government and its various forms of taxation required of companies.

I think I would have more respect for the parliamentary secretary if he had said in his remarks that this action had to be taken to make those people over age 65 more employable by offering that sort of negative bonus to anyone who employed them, since they would no longer have to continue any share to the UIC. If that was the reason behind it, it would make some sense. However, if it is the other way arround and the real reason is to divorce them further from any hope of being hired, and in effect they are being told they should not clutter up the employment picture and should not cause headaches to the UIC in determining whether or not they are truly part of the work force, that would really be a negative aspect of this part of the bill because, it seems to me, that if we can encourage our senior citizens to function normally and usefully in our society we should do so.

I should like to have a clear explanation of the reasons. I should like to hear the minister, or someone from his department, tell me that this change will mean more money in the hands of people over age 65, because if it means there will be less for them, this is not the time to introduce that step since inflation has eroded the position of these people to a very great extent, and there are too many of them who for too long have paid the price of inflation.

So, Madam Speaker, while there are some parts of this bill which meet with approval it is not the total second look at the Unemployment Insurance Commission that this party promised during the last election campaign. That was one of the issues on which we campaigned. Were we elected there would be a total review by a royal commission, I believe, of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That is what I believe is needed at the present time, a very serious and a very top level lengthy re-thinking of the whole matter so that representations could be heard from anyone with an interest in it, and so that there could be representations from women's groups, senior citizens, and the working men of this country.

I have a feeling that what we are doing now is tinkering with the scheme, and that the effect of the passage of this bill will be not to improve the scheme but rather to work hardships on some of the people who can least afford to have any more hardship thrust upon them.

● (1740)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the speech made by the minister as well as in the speech of the hon. member who is the candidate for the Ontario Liberal leadership, and I was particularly interested in the simple facts which both stressed and the others which they overlooked. They stressed the abuses of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the fact that the government has had to make payments in excess of what was necessary, and so they wanted to strengthen the benefit control section.

Yet the minister, in talking about this bill, never referred to the fact that 4 per cent unemployment is totally unacceptable to the majority of thinking Canadians, and that probably even 2 per cent unemployment would be a higher unemployment rate in Canada than most people would want to accept. What the minister said in effect was that because the government has not been able to provide employment for Canadians, it wants to divest itself of this responsibility and lay it on the shoulders of the working people and of the employers, with the result that unemployment will probably be raised to 6 per cent. This year it will be around 5 per cent, but with the record of this government it is foreseeable that it will be 6 per cent or 7 per cent, and that it will continue to grow.

That is really what we should be talking about, namely, what we should do to solve the problems of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The easiest way to solve these problems is to provide employment for all Canadians. The people in my area are no different from the people in the minister's area. His people also are unemployed seasonally and are not able to find full employment. They look to unemployment insurance as a stopgap because the government has not been fair to them in providing a climate of full employment. When there are jobs, they work; when there are no jobs they would like to get some assistance, but they do not want that assistance to be paid entirely to them; they want all the people of the country to share in the responsibility.

We considered that it was a complete distortion of the principle to have the floor based on 4 per cent unemployment, and now the minister has based it on a sliding scale so that there is no incentive to stop unemployment from growing, and no incentive for the government to provide full employment.

We hear members saying that there are abuses of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Sure there are abuses. There are abuses among my constituents in Timiskaming, although not many. There have been some frauds that have been reported, and action has been taken on them. I am sure the same is true in the riding of my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), and even in the minister's own riding in northern Ontario, but what prospects do we have as Canadians?

A question was asked this afternoon in the House about the six Canadians who reportedly stole $4 million and are now enjoying themselves in the sunshine. Is the government worried about that? Has it sent anyone down to try to do anything about that? No, but it would surely send someone 200 or 300 miles to Timiskaming, Thunder Bay, or Geraldton, or any of these places in the hinterland, to look for some little guy who may have taken three days off to go hunting when he was supposed to be looking for work. When it is all settled, they will take away from him unemployment insurance for the three days, and then they will find out he was looking for work on the other days.

No one considers the cost of having a benefit control officer travel 200 or 300 miles and of his being wined and dined. He may be away two or three days and then he may have a great report written up when he comes back, because many places to which he went are hardly on the map and he has never been there before, but he has been wined and dined at the expense of the taxpayers. I have had difficulty myself in getting to some of these places on occasion.

There are many roads around there and many communities in the bush area where roads go in all directions. You can drive for five or six miles and finally see the same shack or the same building, and then you know you are going around in circles. There are no real roads in these areas, but the benefit control officer will try to go there to catch a person and then find he is not able to look after himself. But everybody is quite proud of him. The minister has mentioned that there have been 250,000 disqualifications out of ten million claims. Is that very many?

Mr. Andras: It is two million.

Mr. Peters: Let us say it is two million, although I doubt whether the minister is right. In my opinion there are not that many disqualifications because it is a simple fact about unemployment insurance that those who continue to abuse the system know the rules and do not get into any trouble.

The previous hon. member who spoke referred to a lady who went down the street to every place on the street asking for a job although she knew she was not employable in that community and she knew every job available there. After she had gone 10 or 12 times to the same employers asking them for a job, which they had already told her they did not have, she knew there was nothing more to do and that she could not get a job even if these employers needed someone. That is a fact.

Our bureaucracy is stupid because the officials know all about this, and the commission has been told about this many times. They know they could telephone Manpower and find out if there are any jobs in Geraldton for a woman who had been employed for a considerable period of time in the office of the local lumber company and was then laid off. They would know there are no jobs for women in that category in Geraldton. They do not need to have her traipse around to a hotel looking for the job of a waitress because those jobs are also filled. Yet they still disqualify her if she has not gone to five or six places in that week looking for a job, although she knows there is no job for her there, and the stupid officials know that also.

Everyone involved knows that, and yet they continue to say she has to go to these six places again. Quite often they are so dumb that they will telephone to ask if she has been to a certain place. We should not treat people who are looking for work as if they had no brains at all, and yet that is what these officials do. We really do not do much for them as a government either when we say to people they have to look for a job in a certain area even though Manpower says there is no work there.

The previous speaker mentioned—and perhaps the minister was not listening so I will repeat it—that one of the things that the minister must do if he is going to do anything to improve the unemployment situation, to improve the functioning of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and to improve the functioning of Manpower, is to put those two agencies together. The present minister without portfolio (Mr. Marchand) is the cause of the division of these departments. At one time he had one of the departments under him and he did not want the other one, so they broke them up and created a new department. That department should never have been broken up.

I remember going to the offices in the old set-up. One went to one side—perhaps the minister knows this, but if he does not I will repeat it—if you were looking for a job, and if you could not find it you went over to the other side where they accepted your application for benefits and where they paid you your benefits. The next week you would be back looking for a job there, and if there were no jobs the same people who were handling both divisions would speak to each other and know what your situation was, so one hand knew what the other was doing. When the departments were divided, orders were given that the officials should not talk to each other. Manpower was not to help fill out an unemployment insurance form. Unemployment Insurance was to have nothing to do with employment.

What has happened? The minister knows what the problem is because he has played around with the hiring set up, and he has in fact placed a number of people. I believe he said the other day that his department, through unemployment insurance, had placed 45,000 people in jobs. I give him full credit for doing that, but the minister will have failed the Canadian people, those looking for jobs and those who apply for benefits, if he does not unite those two functions and connect the person who is looking for benefits with the agency which can supply him with a job or inform him that there are no jobs available. If there are no jobs available, he should receive benefits. If there are jobs, then he should take a job.

We are not interested in defending people who abuse the system, but we are less interested in defending a system which is stupid, and the system is often plain stupid. One of the reasons why I say that is that we, as members of parliament, know particular areas, the peculiarities of particular communities, the employment picture in those communities, and the transportation facilities. When we bring that information to the insurance appeal officer after a case has gone through the appeal structure and all of the crap that it must go through, and he has that new information, he makes the right decision and the person is reinstated.

This raises the whole problem of appeals. A person appealing without the help of a union, some other official, a lawyer, or a member of parliament, cannot go to a tribunal with any hope of winning his case. If he could, all he would need to do is write out the reason why he thinks he should not be disqualified. That is sent to the insurance officer who considers it, and if that information is sufficient to override the information which warranted the disqualification, he will cancel it.

I can honestly say that in my years of dealing with unemployment insurance, and particularly in the last seven or eight years, I have developed a great respect for the insurance officers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I have seldom seen information given to an insurance officer when it came through on appeal, or when it became public information at a hearing, which would have justified a decision other than the decision made by the insurance officer.

I wrote a letter to a judge some time ago, to which I did not receive a reply. He was on a tribunal, and I told him what I thought of him and the system because he simply sat on that tribunal and endorsed the decision which had been made, without any means of deciding whether the claimant had any justification for appealing his disqualification. The claimant had no ability to appeal. He just said that he was entitled and therefore appealed, and the judge took that and made his decision on it. He is dishonest and could not possibly be a judge. How can one judge after hearing only one side of a case?

We have discussed this with the chairman of the commission, and he is quite interested in setting up an appellate agency. I am not in favour of setting it up on a legal basis where there are lawyers involved, but I believe that if we have the money to send out a benefit control officer to disadvantage a claimant further when the claimant feels he has already been treated unjustly and unfairly, the tribunal should at least have the right to send out an official to ask the claimant on what basis he believes he was unjustly treated so that on that basis it can be decided whether the claimant is entitled to transportation, whether he has been looking for work, or whether there should be someone to care of the claimant's baby if it is a maternity benefit. Surely it is not asking too much for that judge, who says he is an honourable person, to hear the claimant's side of the story.

The minister is doing a great job. He has provided for transportation, but transportation is not really important. Why should claimants go through the process of sitting in Sudbury all day, driving 250 miles, perhaps staying in a hotel room, and listening to many cases which he cannot understand? The procedure was very formal when I was there, and very like a courtroom. They might as well wear gowns and wigs. Obviously there are people there asking nasty questions with a view to calling claimants liars because they have already been disqualified. The claimant has already met the benefit control officer, and that is enough of an experience for most people.

We have been through this before. Everyone knows that this tribunal is a farce. Going to an umpire should not be allowed unless it is on a case of law. I do not think there should be an appeal unless there is an allegation of dishonesty. I am not prepared to say that there is dishonesty. I think these people are incompetent, but I do not think they are dishonest.

I will say to the whole country that I think the labour representatives on most of the tribunals are a damned disgrace; that they do not represent the claimant any better than the employer, and in some cases are worse than the company. They become part of that little club. They meet every few days, and have nice little meetings. I know some of these people personally. I worked with some of them, I was in the same union with some of them, and I have told them that I think it is a disgrace. They do not ask questions which should be asked, on behalf of the claimant, even when the claimant is there. Madam Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour I was raising with the minister the problems we are having in relation to appeals and the appeal tribunal. I tried to make the point that I have tried to make in the last number of years since unemployment insurance was separated from the national employment agency. I think most people will agree that there was a good deal of merit in the procedure when one went and reported to the employment agency and asked for a job. If no job was available you just went over to the other side and collected your benefits. There was a very clear relationship between the job market and the availability of benefits.

The system we have now hardly takes the employment agency into consideration, and while it is true that in order to draw unemployment insurance benefits you must be registered with Manpower there does not seem to be any relationship between the functions of paying benefits and providing employment.

We have had seven or eight years to see the mistakes that arose from separating our employment policy and our unemployment insurance benefits. It seems to me that the minister has an obligation to consider what the public believes to be an abuse when the person drawing benefits is not really looking for work. The system reflects detrimentally on the rural areas, particularly those where no employment is available. It is foolish to disqualify people on the basis that they are not actively seeking work when they know full well that there is no work.

Two clauses in the present bill will have to be given a new interpretation. One of them is "just cause"—I think the minister referred to it as "good reason". Just cause has not been interpreted as a simple, good reason. The application has been very strict and very detrimental, and many people seeking unemployment insurance benefits are being hurt.

The second problem arises with the average person who says that the people drawing benefits are not looking for work. An argument used by many small employers is that they cannot afford to hire anybody because the unemployment insurance benefits are too high. I think the minister has an obligation to see that the minimum wage paid for menial jobs and unorganized occupations is at least as high as unemployment insurance benefits. In many cases there is the legitimate complaint that people will not work in a certain plant because they can draw more from unemployment insurance benefits than they would earn. I do not think unemployment insurance should pay more than the minimum wage, and in a modern society the obvious solution to that problem is to increase the minimum wage to compare favourably with unemployment insurance benefits.

There was a former member of this House who never impressed me very much until I heard him explain unemployment insurance one night, and that was the late Joe Habel. He said that if you paid insurance on your car for 20 or 30 years as he had, and never collected on it, that was a good thing because it meant you never had an accident. Using that principle, if you pay unemployment insurance and do not collect, that means you have never been unemployed. From my point of view that is an ideal condition.

To reduce the age to 65 is commendable, but it raises a number of problems. I have talked to a number of people who work for the railroad and in other places and who face mandatory retirement at 65 even though their physical or mental condition does not really require it. They can work and want to work. They know nothing else.

● (2010)

I suggest that the minister and the department will need to consider the question of retirement itself. In this country there are no federal or provincial programs to qualify people for retirement. In future people will not retire at age 65. Retirement age will be reduced to age 60, and even lower, as automation and computers play an ever larger role in our lives. No longer will people work from the age of 14 or 15 until 70 or 75. They will enter the labour force in their 20's and retire at 60. Unless they retire early other people who want to enter the labour market will not find jobs. Therefore we must create programs which will train people for retirement.

Interestingly, railroaders retire at age 65, but, on average, live no more than two years after retirement. One day they are operating the train on the run they have known all their working lives, and the next day they are retired with nothing to do. I think it is wrong to cut off unemployment insurance benefits at age 65. Under this legislation, it will become mandatory for people to retire at age 65.

It is no good telling any man to retire if you have not introduced some kind of program which will train him for his retirement and allow him to pursue some interest, some hobby or recreational activity which will occupy his time. I suppose railroaders are a particular group, as they sleep and eat at odd hours, knowing they can be called at any time of day or night. They have so many hours to reply to the call, or book off sick; otherwise they must work. Their lifestyle does not allow for social activities of the sort enjoyed by people with normal working hours. Consequently retirement weighs more heavily on them than it does on others. One can see that we are creating great difficulties if we insist on retiring people at age 65.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Peters: I believe we are obligated to train people for retirement, to allow them to pursue meaningful activities. Yet really this bill says that after age 65 you are no longer on the labour market. Clearly we must help people who must retire because of age but whose physical and mental condition enables them to go on working. The bill says that they are not entitled to unemployment insurance after age 65. We must remember that not all people who reach 65 or 70 want to retire. Some find it difficult to retire. For that reason the government must act. So far it has lacked the courage or desire to institute training programs which will help people in their retirement.

May I now say a word about manpower programs. I remember a program known as program 5 under which people could train for various occupations, and the standards were applied nationally. Training was provided with a view to employment, beginning often at high school level. The program continued in that manner until Quebec kicked up a fuss about control, as it was entitled to do under the constitution.

As I say, the standards applying to subjects taught under program 5 applied right across the country. That meant that if you trained as a plumber in Ontario, you could work as as a plumber in British Columbia, Nova Scotia, or pretty well anywhere else in the country, because the federal government was instrumental in providing the jobs, and that federal program trained people to meet job requirements. We were well on the way to establishing national standards. I raise this point for this reason that our manpower centres do not always send employers qualified employees. Take the case of the truck driver.

I remember an experiment which was tried by the Manpower office in my area, in conjunction with Simard Beaudry, who was working on a large project. The office put pressure on him to accept truck drivers they sent to him. Simard Beaudry put those men in a large truck and said, "If you can drive the truck, you can have the job; if you cannot drive the truck, you are not a truck driver". It turned out that most applicants could not drive heavy construction trucks. They had driven half ton trucks on the farm, but they are completely different from the sort of trucks used during the construction of a large dam.

Usually the Department of Manpower office cannot assure the employer that the applicant sent to the job is qualified. As a result, Manpower offices have fallen into disrepute with employers. Under program 5, the employment office could assure the employer of the employee's qualifications, because the department was in the position to train the employee, and did. That is no longer the case.

We must make many changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Certainly abuses should be eliminated, but it is unfair to expect people living in high unemployment areas to go without benefits for six weeks, on grounds that they may be ripping off the system. Clearly we must change the act, to provide benefits immediately to those who are truly seeking work but cannot find it. I think the minister is well aware of this problem. I am surprised that so far he has done nothing about it.

Another problem concerns the definition of suitable employment. What is suitable employment? For instance, what is suitable employment for a teacher who cannot renew a contract? Is her suitable employment work as a clerk in a store? After four or five weeks, does she have to take that kind of job at the minimum wage because she is not able to get a contract as a teacher at a fairly good salary?

I think this "suitable employment" has been badly abused. Surely we can work out some kind of system that allows a person to drop his standard as the months go by. It may be in this country that unemployment will go so high that people will be glad to dig ditches because there is no other job available to them, no matter what their education or ability may be.

I remember the last depression. We hired someone to work on the farm who had an electrical engineering degree from Queen's University. That young fellow worked on the farm for $25 a month plus room and board, and he was glad to get the job. He left shortly after that. My father was instrumental in getting him a job with Northern-Hydro in Quebec. He started as an oiler and within a few months he was running one of their plants. The next time I saw him he was in charge of the Commonwealth program at the electrical school at St. Thomas. He was responsible for the electrical training of airforce personnel. It was not because he did not have the ability or education that he was glad to work for $25 a month on the farm.

If the Liberal government stays in power long enough it may be that suitable employment will be building an airport for ten cents a day, plus tobacco once a week, and a pair of pants when you can scrounge them. That is what some people received during the last depression. That is not what we are hoping will happen, but is the kind of criteria being used now for those who are unemployed. Those who are unemployed today are having just as difficult a time in making an adjustment as people did during the depression. When you ask someone to go from a good paying job, without the opportunity of having a reasonable period to obtain similar employment, to a job that does not pay nearly as well, you really are not doing anything for them.

Many people are in favour of any change that will cut down the number of people on unemployment insurance. If it were up to those who are complaining about minor abuses by those seeking unemployment insurance, I am sure they would be very much in favour of supporting the proposition of having full employment in this country.

This change in the act will remove the ceiling, floor, or whatever it is called, the 4 per cent benchmark of unemployment insurance. It says in effect that the government and the private sector will participate in the extended benefits, but up to the 4 per cent level it will be the responsibility of the employer and the employee. I remember when that 4 per cent was put in there. It was considered at that time that a reasonable level of unemployment would be 2 per cent. It has now been raised to considerably above 4 per cent. It is on a sliding scale. The minister said that, as far as his government is concerned, unemployment not only is going to be with us but will increase, and the workers with their employers will have to carry the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate on the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We have a good unemployment insurance plan in this country and we must continually strive to make it better.

Unemployment insurance is important. All Canadians recognize that. Some say it is being abused. Obviously that is so in some cases, but I think it is in the minority of cases. It is to be hoped that the amendments now before us will rectify some of those abuses. However, in my riding, Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance is used rather than abused, and used to a great degree because we have one of the highest rates of unemployment in Canada, with well over 20 per cent. Many of my people depend on unemployment insurance and will continue to do so for some time to come. They depend on it because in most cases their occupations are seasonal, and for a portion of the year there is no cash income. That is not to say that they are idle.

The people of my riding are not afraid of work and never have been. There is adequate evidence to show that Newfoundlanders and Labradorians have always been a proud and independent people, a self-reliant people who have worked hard for a living. They still want to work hard for a living. I do not believe for a minute that they want to exist solely on handouts. They want to work, and in fact surveys show that the work ethic is strong all across the country. In spite of the fact that we have a relatively high rate of unemployment, I feel that most of those people are not working through no fault of their own. I believe the majority want jobs and will take jobs when we offer them.

Unemployment insurance is the first line of defence against unemployment, but the best form of defence is often attack. I think this was referred to by some speakers before the supper break and, indeed, afterwards. That is the case here. Unemployment insurance can only be clearly seen in relation to its more important counterpart, employment insurance. This is the most important phrase. That is the key phrase that sums up the philosophy that we should be pursuing and that we are pursuing, for one of the great successes of this government and the Department of Manpower and Immigration, of which the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a partner, is its job creation programs.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) referred to the split-off in the department of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the difficulty of integrating the two aspects of the department. I want to tell him that those two branches are working very closely together. In fact Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission in many cases work as one.

The evidence of this is the Newfoundland project where over a two-year period about 2,000 unemployed, including people chronically on unemployment insurance and people on welfare, are being given positive training in vocational schools and in industry while they continue to receive unemployment insurance. This project recognizes that a defence against unemployment is not enough, and that there must be attack. It recognizes that it is not enough to keep people, because in many cases this means keeping them down, keeping them in a rut, keeping them in a section of society which has the welfare syndrome. Those chronically unemployed are often there not because they do not want to work, or because they are lazy. There are some in that category, it is true, but I do not believe they are in the majority. I believe a great many of the unemployed are thus because they are disabled for some reason, or because they do not have the skills or the education to get and hold meaningful jobs.

Many people, more and more in fact, are getting caught in the rapidly changing job patterns caused by advancing technology. The machine age is rolling right along, but in its path it is crushing many men and women who formerly trained for years to gain a marketable skill. Therefore we must continually improve and expand our training programs because in the long run I believe that it is only through these training and retraining programs, together with our job creation programs, that we can deal effectively with the unemployment problem.

The Newfoundland project is an attempt at this type of training and retraining. It is a unique experiment wherein those receiving unemployment insurance are placed in training programs according to their skill level and their expectations. Manpower tops off unemployment insurance where necessary and provides other programs of its own, such as travel and housing allowances. This project is being monitored closely, and hopefully it can be implemented elsewhere in Canada. It illustrates that the UIC is not simply a body which hands out cheques. This project shows that they are interested in the growth and development of people. I can attest to that, having worked closely with the commission. A great deal of credit is due the commission for the positive attitude it has fostered in its administrators and its employees, and credit is due to its chairman for the dedicated way in which he has worked toward this end.

There are other success stories in job creation—the attack on unemployment at its source. The LIP program is a Godsend to a province like Newfoundland and Labrador, and to a riding like mine where work is largely seasonal. If members of the House could come to my riding and see the projects which have been completed by men and women who would otherwise be unemployed they would appreciate the value of the program. I can show them community halls, slipways, wharves, breakwaters, town halls, roads and many other things—things they regard as essential—which otherwise they would not have. The only difficulty is that there is never enough money to fund the many worthwhile projects in communities which desperately need them.

Even though my riding received $1.5 million this year there were still projects turned down in communities where there will be no other work this winter, and where men and women will have to get by on unemployment insurance or welfare. The fact is, of course, that the federal government will be funding many of these people in one way or another. I believe that what we should do is to design a winter works program along the lines of the project now going on in Newfoundland so that people are not simply kept but are doing something meaningful in return for the money they receive. I believe they want this. There are always many times the number of applications we can fund under LIP. People want to work; they want to improve their community. We are spending federal money in these communities anyway, so their potential should be put to a positive end.

An even more successful program within the department is LEAP. I believe that in the long run this program has more potential than LIP when it comes to alleviating chronic unemployment. I should like to refer to many projects which are now under way but I will confine myself to mentioning three which are now in progress in my riding where this program is well on its way to solving the chronic unemployment problem.

It is a program which gives people training on the job, plus a chance to become productive in the long run and acquire skills which will be marketable for years to come. I am thinking, for example, of 13 farmers in the Green Bay area who have been working under a LEAP program; their wages have been paid for two years and at the end of the coming year they can go on to become self-supporting. I am thinking, too, about a boat building project, and about a fishing operation under the LEAP program. Each of them represents a meaningful attack on the problem of unemployment.

A further program which is at work in my riding is the community employment strategy. This is presently operating in the southern portion of Labrador in my province, where a number of communities have organized under the guidance of the job creation branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration to determine the directions in which government programs of all kinds are succeeding or failing, where amendments or modifications should be made to them, and where new programs are needed. These people are attempting to decide for themselves what resources they possess, what kind of jobs can reasonably be created in their communities, what help is needed, and what training or skill development is needed.

The main point here is that government, hopefully, will become what it ought to be—the servant of the people. The people will decide where they are going and how they will get there. And government will give them support, and follow in the direction they wish to take. This is decentralization of decision-making taken to its extreme. But it is absolutely the right approach. For once the local people have an opportunity to make the bureaucracy work for them. It is still too early to assess the situation, but the initial signs are good and I am hoping the strategy will work. It must work if we are to attack chronic unemployment effectively.

I have tried to show that there must be not simply a defence against unemployment but an attack upon unemployment. Unemployment insurance and other funds coming from the government can be used in a meaningful way, not simply to keep people going but to get them back as productive citizens. So the best defence, to my mind, is attack. This does not mean, however, that we do not need defence. Unemployment insurance is the first line of defence against unemployment, the first defence against temporary loss of income. Hon. members might note that word temporary. It is not a defence against permanent loss of income. We have other means of looking after the elderly, the disabled, and single parent families. This is an insurance plan against temporary unemployment and in that sense it is like any other term insurance plan.

I note too that the hon. member for Timiskaming referred to this aspect in his speech and remarked that if, at the end of his career, a worker had paid into the scheme without deriving any monetary return from it he could get some satisfaction at least from the fact that he had never lost his job. Unemployment insurance is an insurance plan, and it is like term insurance plans. Now the premium to be charged is going up, as are the premiums of other insurance plans. But I do not see how we can avoid this if the tripartite nature of the plan is to be retained.

From the beginning the unemployment insurance plan has been tripartite in concept. When it was developed in 1940 the administration of the act was entrusted to a commission composed of a chief commissioner, a commissioner representing employers, and one representing employees. This arrangement, symbolizing the tripartite nature of the plan, has persisted to the present day. There are three partners—the employees, the employers, and the government.

A partnership arrangement was set up which provided that the employer and the employee would pay an equal contribution, and that the government would pay an additional amount equal to 20 per cent of the sum collected from employers and employees. In addition the government was to pay for the administration of the program. In 1962 the Gill Committee recommended that the costs of benefits be shared equally by employers and employees, and that there be no contribution by the general taxpayer toward the basic insurance plan. This idea is carried to an extreme in the United States where employers pay the entire cost of the insurance plan, with the exception of extended benefits during periods of very high unemployment. These benefits are totally paid by the state or federal governments.

In this country, however, the original principle of tripartite participation has been retained. It has been altered, though, so that the government might adjust its share of the cost to varying rates of national employment. What is really being proposed in the present instance is a similar operation. But in this case, as in previous cases, the government will pay for benefits extended due to high regional or national rates of unemployment.

What is being proposed is a change in the threshold of 4 per cent. The proposal is that the threshold not be fixed but that it be made flexible and allowed to rise and fall with the national unemployment rate. This principle of coupling thresholds and limits to moving averages which reflect current trends is one that is followed elsewhere, for example, in the calculation of the old age pension, in salary matters, in cost of living clauses, in family allowances. What is proposed now is to apply this principle to premiums paid for unemployment insurance.

It should be noted that the calculation of maximum insurable earnings, and therefore the maximum benefit payable, is based now on an eight year moving average of the industrial composite wage index. Here again the principle of limits being tied to a moving average reflecting economic trends is evident. It would seem reasonable, therefore, that the calculation of the participation of the private sector in the program should be made in a similar way.

The tripartite arrangement for sharing the cost of the unemployment insurance program is an extremely good one. It provides for the active participation by both employers and employees in a program which benefits them both, while at the same time providing for the federal government to acknowledge its effect on the labour market through its monetary and fiscal policy, and thus on the cost of unemployment insurance benefits.

The proposal in Bill C-69 to relate the threshold at which government participation starts more realistically to prevailing economic conditions is consistent with this tripartite formula. It reflects the principles embodied in the 1971 legislation which state that the private sector should be expected to pay the basic costs of the scheme which are more directly related to insurance, and the government should assume responsibility for those costs which are more in the nature of income transfer or income support.

The proposed eight year moving average threshold rate will not only reinforce these principles but will also provide for an automatic adjustment in the participation formula which can respond to changing economic conditions. The only alternative, of course, would have been an increase in taxes, drawing the additional cost of the program from general tax revenues, which again would be a departure from the user-pay principle and would impose upon people who did not use the plan the cost of the plan. Besides that, I believe that the major increase in cost will be borne by the employers, not in fact by the employees, certainly not those in the lower income brackets.

There are other amendments to the act that I think are good in principle, and on which I should like to comment. One increases the penalty for those who quit their jobs for no good reason. This idea is good in principle. The waiting time is being doubled. Although it is a good idea in principle, I hope that the application of it in some areas will be with an understanding of local conditions.

For example, there are many people in my riding who have no choice but to work away from home since there are no local jobs for them. In many of these cases they leave their families at home while they go away for many months at a time to areas far away. I would not want to do that and I do not think many members of this House would either. I can understand why men would want to leave a job under those conditions, especially if housing is inadequate and the amenities of life that they expect to find in the communities are not there. So I think, generally speaking, the penalty for quitting a job without good reason is a sound principle; but let us get at the cause rather than at the symptom.

I think we can solve a lot of these problems if in northern and remote communities, and in industrially rich communities, we do provide proper housing and amenities. If that is the case and these men can take their families with them they would have no reason to quit the job. We must examine the cause of why a person quits his job, and come up with a solution, such as the provision of proper housing.

I am also glad to see the amendment that would provide unemployment insurance benefits to sponsors of LIP and LEAP projects. Quite often in small rural communities the sponsors of such projects are in fact themselves unemployed. I have had cases in the past in my own riding where sponsors of LIP projects did not receive unemployment insurance benefits, so there is very little incentive for them to apply for them in the first place.

Another matter I want to mention is that raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), namely, unemployment insurance for fishermen. At the present time fishermen feel discriminated against. They cannot draw unemployment insurance benefits for as long as other workers; the maximum is something like 23 weeks, with eight weeks of contribution. Other workers can draw almost 51 weeks.

I know the history of this plan and why it is this way. I think there are inequities in it, and I agree with my colleague who spoke this afternoon that the fishermen are not fairly treated. They cannot draw benefits until December. A fisherman may finish work in September, for example, but he cannot draw unemployment insurance benefits until December. Thereafter he can draw them until May, but not after May, yet the fishing season may not open until June or July. These inequities in the program must be remedied.

[Mr. Rompkey.]

We have been working to change them, but not within the unemployment insurance program. The Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) has promised to bring into the House this winter, during this session, an income support plan for the fisheries. It would be meaningless to make amendments at the present time to the bill on behalf of the fishermen, much as they are needed, when this plan is in the offing. The best we can do is to wait for the fishermen's income support plan to be brought in by the Minister of State (Fisheries), and hopefully we can get it through parliament and in effect before the next fishing season. The present unemployment insurance scheme for fishermen is with us now for this year, bad as it is, but having lived with it for this long we can live with it for a few more months until the new income support plan is put in place.

I do not want to go into the details of this new plan and what it contains; that will come in a later debate. I recognize the problem is a real and serious one. The fishermen have been waiting patiently for the new plan and they must be given meaningful help. We must have a new scheme or we can say goodbye to the inshore fishery. The fishermen must be adequately supported during the off season, and they are not at the present time.

These are difficult times. Like all countries in the world, we are experiencing economic difficulty. One of the effects of that difficulty is an unemployment rate that is unacceptable. It is doubly important, therefore, that we ensure that we have an unemployment insurance plan that guards against erosion of the work ethic while at the same time it provides adequate protection to people when and as they need it. I welcome the flexibility that these amendments introduce into the plan. I believe they will be for the better and will improve the service that the plan provides to our people.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my contribution to this debate on the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971, I must say I took some interest in the remarks of my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. He heaped high accolades upon these amendments, the unemployment insurance program as it now exists, and the job creation program of the government which as he says operates in conjunction with this unemployment insurance program. If I remember correctly, his statement was that unemployment insurance is the first line of defence against unemployment.

However, prior to this the government had created a lot of work programs to help the worker in his every day life. It rather reminds me of the boy scout who was very late home from school. As the evening grew longer and it got dark his mother became very worried that he was not home. Finally after dinner he showed up. His mother asked him why he was home from school so late, and he said that he had been helping this little old lady across the street. So his mother said: "Well, what took so long?" He replied: "Well, she didn't want to go".

That is the impression I get of the government and its program. It parades around like a boy scout helping out everyone, but helping them out in ways in which they do not want to be helped. It seems to me that part of the problem with our economy is that the government is so busy trying to help people out that it will not let them help themselves. If the government would let them help themselves, the economy would be far ahead of where it is today.

I am pleased that the minister is bringing forward these amendments. I have a great deal of regard for him and I think he is trying to do a good piece of work in his portfolio. He has been given a sizeable job by his predecessor and he has a lot of cleaning up to do. So I not only admire him, I feel sorry for him in the work that he has to do.

In a sense I have no quarrel with the need for some of these amendments. In some cases I suspect they do not go far enough. But it is encouraging to find the government realizing that there is a need to upgrade the UIC program. I would seriously question the timing of the legislation, coming as it does in a period when we have 7.2 per cent of the work force unemployed. It seems that the minister is changing the rules of the game right in the middle of the game. The government engaged in a program of over-indulgence and over-generous policy for a number of years while we had high employment, during which time it encouraged workers to assume that benefits would come continuously. Any time a worker became unemployed there would only be a short waiting period, if any waiting period at all, before he would be in the chips again. Many people never prepared themselves for a period of extended unemployment such as they are facing today. Yet the government adopted an attitude of paternalism toward the worker, an attitude of encouraging dependency on government. There was no need to plan for an emergency, but now the minister introduces amendments which tighten up the regulations.

● (2050)

At a time when more people than ever need help, they are faced with these new restrictions. I support these restrictions, such as the restriction for extending the period of disqualification from three weeks to six weeks. In fact I wonder whether it should be a longer period. I remember years ago speaking to a gas station operator. He told me he had some youngsters, gas jockeys, working for him and they practically begged him to lay them off so that they could take the lumps of the two-week waiting period and have unemployment insurance coming to them and do what they wanted. That experience, I am sure, is repeated time and time again across the country. The system is abused by people who do not treat the program as unemployment insurance.

Now I should like to draw attention to the minister's statement in the folder that was distributed to all members. He said:

> This amendment is being proposed because of the alarmingly high number of persons leaving their employment without good cause and refusing suitable employment. The number of voluntary quits has been averaging approximately 250,000 per year and job refusals for the first four months of 1975 would amount to an annual rate of 21,000. This is taking place despite the current unemployment situation, and the low ratio of job vacancies to the number of unemployed workers.
> Thus it is clear that the present period of disqualification has not been sufficiently effective and needs to be increased. Workers' rights will continue to be fully protected; they will continue to be able to present their side of the case to their insurance agent, and have full recourse to the appeal system.

I ask, where were the departmental officials in 1971 when this program was planned? Do they have no capability for prediction? Could they not anticipate a little how this system would be abused? Did they have no ability to assess the possible way in which people could use that particular measure? This department has been profligate in its abuse of the taxpayers' money. It has been callous in not planning for this amendment at a time of low unemployment, and thus was not in a position to forewarn workers to prepare for the unpleasant prospects of unemployment. So, while this amendment is necessary, and in some way I suppose even welcome, it seems tragic indeed that it comes at a time when workers across Canada need unemployment insurance more than at any time in the last few years.

There is another reason why I question this legislation. I refer to the uneven administration of the program. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) pointed out that the department has a curious ability to close a blind eye to the rip-off artists in the urban areas and then harry across the country the individual who tries to live within the rules.

Mr. Alexander: That is the truth.

Mr. Friesen: I recieved a phone call from an elderly man in my riding a few months ago. He was approaching retirement years and thought he would do what others do. He thought he would take advantage of the unemployment insurance fund into which he had paid for the last many years of his employment. So, he quit his job and applied to the UIC. The UIC did what it does in respect of most unemployed people. It set about to answer the inquiries by prospective employers. So he was sent all over the valley to look at these job prospects provided by the UIC and Manpower. He is 55 years of age. He is a hardworking man who believes in the work ethic. He does not want to rip off the government. So he goes everywhere the Manpower office sends him. He tries to do the work. He does it.

Whenever a job is over he goes to the UIC and they send him to another job. The poor man cannot do what many other younger people are able to do. Finally he is working with a crew, a group of young bucks, and it begins to sprinkle rain. They go to the beer parlor because they do not want to get wet, and on the way they go to the social service to get a cheque to tide them over. This is an example of a man who deserves the benefit of unemployment insurance but he cannot collect it simply because he is honest.

Then I think of a lady who wrote me. She has poor vision and cannot drive. She has spent much time working in nursing homes. The only job that was available to her was 36 miles away. She was unable to find commuting facilities in order to get to this employment at the time when the nursing home wanted her. She applied for unemployment insurance because she could not take the job that was offered her.

I think of another man in retirement years. He had been working all his life in a sawmill. He was retired and wanted to do something else. He went to Quesnel and looked around for work. He was not part of the bureaucracy and was not someone ripping off the UIC. Therefore he did not know the procedure used by some other people to rip off the UIC. He did not know that it was necessary to report every day when he went to Quesnel. The upshot is that he did not get work at Quesnel and did not receive the unemployment insurance benefits either because he did not follow the bureaucratic procedure outlined for him.

This man's case was taken to the appeal board. I am sure the members of the appeal board gave him as good a hearing as possible but, as the other hon. member pointed out, at no time was this man ever in a position where he could state his case personally to that tribunal and have it heard.

I have a very interesting letter from an employer of a man. This firm had a very good accountant who kept track of the man's work record. He began work on November 12, 1974. The last day he worked was December 30, 1974. Including those days, and excluding one week during which the shop was closed for Christmas, he could have worked some 30 days. The number of days in which he did work all or part of a day was 22. He thus missed some 26.7 per cent of the days on which he could have worked all or part of a day. The total available hours during those 30 days is computed to have been 240. He worked 169¼ of these, representing only 70.5 per cent of the total available.

The letter states that this company is a manufacturing plant with an assembly-line operation and thus it is essential that each employee maintain a good attendance record. It further points out that each employee has this fact pointed out to him or her, and that there is no misunderstanding concerning what is expected. They say this man attended some 70 per cent to 75 per cent of the time when he was needed, and they found the level of attendance to be unsatisfactory in the extreme and stated that this accounted for the term used on the separation certificate, "unreliable". What does this man do when he is laid off? He goes to the unemployment insurance office. The next procedure obviously is that the employer has to fill out a questionnaire advising the Unemployment Insurance Commission of the reason for this man's suspension. They point out that he is unreliable.

As I look into it a little further I find that the man apparently told the foreman that he had been sick. I suppose that if he has been sick, there is good reason for him to have a very hyphenated employment record, but then if he has been sick it seems to me that he should not get unemployment insurance. If in fact he needs that kind of help—and I for one would not deny him such help—perhaps he needs some kind of social welfare, but certainly not unemployment insurance. That is one of the grave problems of the unemployment insurance program.

The next thing I notice about the amendment is the ambiguous phrase, to say the least, "who refuse suitable employment". I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what does "suitable" mean? In what kind of subjective terms can you describe that? Suitable in whose judgment? Is it in the judgment,of a man who is unemployed and, theoretically at least, looking for employment, or is it suitable to the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

Is it suitable in terms of the salary that is being offered? Is it suitable in terms of the working conditions, the kind of job that is being offered, or the location of that job? What does suitable mean?

I suppose I have the disadvantage of many other members of the House to remember the "dirty 30's" when we lived in Saskatchewan at the height of the depression and, I suppose, the height of unemployment. I remember very clearly that every summer during those depression years my father would go to British Columbia and find seasonal work there. He would go to the lower mainland of the Fraser Valley and get a job haying, working in the tobacco fields or wherever there was work to be had. He would take his bicycle along and pedal around the Fraser Valley looking for work. It did not matter if the work was for a week or two hulling strawberries, hoeing hay, or doing anything that would provide employment and an income. Toward the end of the summer he would come back to Saskatchewan just in time for the harvest season and do day work in the fields of Saskatchewan.

Now when I think back to those times I cannot help but think that any of the jobs that my dad took during those depression years was suitable. It was not very suitable for him to leave for three months of the year to go out to a job paying $1 or $2 a day in British Columbia; it was not suitable to the rest of the family, perhaps even demeaning in many ways, but somehow it was not as demeaning as looking for a handout when he could work. Any job was suitable so long as it was honourable.

I remember that the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) pointed out that one of the main problems of UIC is that it is not even UIC any more. It is called insurance, but actually the problem is that it is treated as if it were social welfare. Perhaps it is time we drew the comparisons to show just how ludicrous and anachronistic the term has become. Again I still remember hearing the words of my friend from Labrador when he pointed out that this was a good insurance program. Let us compare it with an ordinary insurance program to see whether it really is insurance.

First of all, as the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay pointed out, insurance programs are voluntary; no one has to take out a life or fire insurance policy if he does not want to do so. Second, insurance policies are pooled investment for real emergencies, and I mean real emergencies not inconveniences. The startling difference is that insurance companies by the law of the land and the law of this government have to be actuarially sound. When we take a look at the unemployment insurance program we realize that if any private company operated an insurance program the way this government operates unemployment insurance, it would be drummed out of business.

Think of the billion dollars or more that the UIC program has in deficit and then wonder if it is possible to make an honest and accurate comparison actuarially between UIC and an insurance company. Furthermore, insurance policies are very specific. Any riders mean additional costs to the premiums and you pay for each one of those riders. It is the person who buys the insurance who makes that payment.

UIC has many riders and all of these are good, but not necessarily relevant to unemployment insurance. For example, sickness benefits are very good riders and I for one would not criticize the need to provide for the workers for that eventuality when they are sick and need those benefits to carry them over through the period of sickness, but I do not know how you can correlate sickness benefits with other requirements of unemployment insurance, such as being available for work. I sense a constradiction there and I think it is time we called a spade a spade. There is a place for UIC and there is a place for social welfare, and I think the first priority of the government should be to draw a distinction between the two and make this into honest legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: What the government has done is to train a whole generation of people to live on welfare, calling it UIC.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Friesen: I think the government would do well to redesign its program to make unemployment insurance into insurance in fact. While there may be need for social welfare in some other form and through some other medium, the Canadian people should know what they are getting and what they are paying for.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, it may be relevant to point out that the present speaker on Bill C-69 is quite obviously female but rather less obviously an ex-chairman of the board of referees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I feel that in human terms this is one of the most important pieces of legislation we have seen before the House in recent times. The ramifications of the proposals are considerable and complex, but at this time I will limit myself only to the consideration of clauses 14 and 16. As regards the former, I welcome it wholeheartedly.

In the past, sickness benefits have proven to be an administrative nightmare for the commission and the cause of very great frustration for the recipients. Under the old act the establishment of a sickness claim started what might be termed a clockwork action and in many cases, even though the recipient recovered and returned to work, the clock continued its futile course with resultant loss of benefit when benefits were again needed. This was all the more prevalent in the case of maternity benefits. The new act will allow the claimant to terminate the claim voluntarily or, to repeat the metaphor, to stop the clock. This innovation is, therefore, to be welcomed.

I mentioned the effect on maternity benefits. In this respect I would urge a further improvement. I refer to the pregnant woman who loses her employment because of labour disputes and therefore may not be entitled to receive maternity benefits because of section 44(1). Under this provision if a pregnant woman is a member of a grade or class of workers on strike, she is disqualified from receiving maternity benefits, especially in cases where the termination of the stoppage of work is not fulfilled when she becomes eligible for maternity benefits.

This section would appear to affect adversely the unionized woman, whereas it will have no bearing on her non-unionized sister. I see a possible dichotomy here, and I strongly recommend that the provisions of section 44(1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act be inapplicable in respect to maternity benefits.

Let us now consider clause 16 of Bill C-69, and its implications. On the surface it looks like a toughening up measure such as those long advocated by the people who will spend so much time and effort in decrying the weaknesses of the system that they have little energy to devote to the essential good offered to genuine recipients by the unemployment insurance scheme.

We must now ask ourselves: who will be the objects of the new and more stringent punitive measures? The answer is our youth and our women, two groups with whom I have particular sympathy. Why youth and women? It is because administrative statistics have proven conclusively that the rate of voluntary quitting is considerably higher among those two categories of employees.

Perhaps we should now ask ourselves why youth and women are more likely to quit. I believe the reasons are various and complex, and many of these are common to both groups. It would be very easy to assume that women are more likely than men to quit their jobs because of family responsibilities, but if they do, it is probable they do not ask the taxpayer to pay for their decision. In fact, of the women disqualified under the old act for reasons of non-availability, job refusal, and inadequate job search, a higher percentage of women with no dependants was registered than was the case for women with dependants. However, the difference was not so considerable as to constitute terms for debate.

In studying these and other results, it is of great importance to consider relevant aspects and to ask ourselves many questions such as: why do young people work? Why do women work? What is the importance of job satisfaction? Is job satisfaction itself a polemic which condemns too much, or a vision which promises too much?

A report entitled "Canadian Work Values" gives us the findings of the Department of Manpower and Immigration on a work ethic survey and a job satisfaction survey. I hope that in the national interest similar and ongoing initiatives will be undertaken. I suggest that in few other fields do attitudes change with such rapidity as in this. Consider, for example, the following statement: "60 per cent of Canadians still believe that a woman's place is in the home." This statement was recorded in 1975. We are also informed that this attitude is considerably less prevalent among higher educated and younger members of the population. It would be interesting, therefore, to see what is the more prevalent attitude in, say, another ten years.

There is a tendency for both women and men to believe that women should not have to work unless they choose to do so. Here again younger and more highly educated members of society feel they should.

What we are experiencing is quite obviously an evolution of attitudes. However, there is one area in which age and education make no difference. Regardless of age or education, women are more inclined than men to believe that women in general should supplement the household income.

Let us now consider the case of a woman with dependants. She has probably received much more formal education than her mother. She has probably raised a family and has accumulated a wealth of experience as an administrator, economist, nurse, teacher, psychologist and arbitrator of disputes, to name only a few. She then decides to return to the labour market, probably to full time work, and if her children are young, more because of financial than any other need. What are her prospects? Is the labour force likely to recognize the full potential of this woman and justly evaluate her contribution? Unfortunately, the chances of her true worth being recognized are not good. All too often she will be offered jobs which are intellectually bankrupt. Because of her absence from the labour force during the time she looked after her children, her chances of promotion are limited, irrespective of her merit.

I believe that seniority in itself is a fine thing, but if it is used as the sole criterion for promotion at the expense of merit, then not only is it unrealistic, but it is positively dangerous to the economy as a whole.

This last point will also and perhaps particularly apply to our youth. We must remember that they too have an average education far superior to that of their fathers. Education widens one's horizons and also stimulates expectation. The resultant disillusionment and discouragement add another dimension to our mosaic of human frustration and miseries.

What of the working woman with no dependants, the one who preferred not to marry? Can she hope to achieve job satisfaction and promotion more easily than her married sister? The reality of the situation is not encouraging. If she is gentle and thoughtful, chances are she will be considered weak and quite expendable. To gain respect as a peer will almost inevitably require time, perseverance, and an extraordinary amount of patience.

If, instead, she is aggressive, she soon becomes the object of endless and often distasteful speculation, analysis, and innuendo. The recent case of an internationally successful female journalist is a prime example. During an interview published by Time magazine Signorina Fallaci was asked whether she is a lesbian. I know of few male writers since Oscar Wilde who have been subjected to such base sensationalism and whose private lives have been so dissected, and at the same time I fail to see what bearing her sexual preferences have on her undoubted ability as a journalist.

Administrative statistics have pointed out another interesting factor. It appears that the largest numbers of people who have abused the system come from clerical and related occupations. Here again I feel that employers must understand that if they hope to attract better educated personnel, they must make infinitely better efforts to provide in those jobs the challenge and prestige which education itself demands. Study has been devoted, and rightly so, to problems of alienation in assembly plants, but far too little is known of the numbing effects of months and years passed in the mindless atmosphere of a typing pool.

If there is one burning issue in this bill, an issue which will reverberate on the productivity of the entire nation, then surely it is the lesson that we are quickly learning that higher education will, of its very nature, lead to greater expectations. We cannot ignore these signs which are already unmistakeably evident. Whether industry will accept the challenge and attempt to rectify the situation in the economic if not in the human interest, only time will tell. With this bill government will treat many of the symptoms but it certainly will not, and indeed cannot, cure the disease.

Many, many more thoughts could be and should be propounded on this argument but time simply does not permit. And so we ask why, despite compassion for and understanding of this problem facing our youth and women, will people such as I vote for and even advocate the punitive effects of this bill? It is quite simply because I feel that mature responsibility must, in the national and collective interest, take precedence over personal desires, legitimate though those desires may be.

Unemployment insurance is what it says—an insurance program much like any other. We will find people who do not like their houses but who would never dream of burning them down just to collect fire insurance. No, they will either tolerate them or look for alternative accommodation. So it should be with jobs and unemployment insurance.

In the interest of our national economy I would strongly urge employers to evaluate seriously the enormous wealth and human potential which, through lack of care and even minimal understanding, they continue to dissipate at an alarming rate.

At this very moment in time we are demonstrating an admirable and sincere concern for the conservation of natural resources. The time has come to include in the study of those resources the immeasurable riches of our undeveloped and under-employed human element.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, when we have the former minister of finance advocating changes in the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission on the grounds that "the cost to the government is becoming unwieldy" and admitting "that the act has some undesirable effects on work incentives", and when the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) tells us that "additional amendments are proposed to reduce some of the inequities and complexities which now exist," then I feel that we have the right to be gravely apprehensive about the operation of that commission.

I guess you could call it unwieldy when the increase of the cost of operating this act has risen by 150 per cent over the past year. Yet just three years ago we had the then minister of manpower and immigration telling us that "the extra costs present no problem to the government," and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself commenting on the $700 million deficit of that same year, saying that he "saw no scandal in that . . . What if the fund needs another $100 million or $200 million . . . ?"

When the cost to the government and to the contributors has increased threefold since that time, I say that we do have a problem and that we do have a scandalous situation.

At the very time that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Prime Minister were not alarmed and saw no scandal, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was warning that expenditures on this program were "very much out of hand from both the government's and the contributors' points of view." However, it was a case of a warning falling on deaf ears again.

The government continues to display the most astonishing lack of realism in the present situation but an abundance of it in hindsight. This hindsight of the Unemployment Insurance Commission difficulty bears a remarkable similarity to the government's presentation of price controls, more than a year after they were proposed by the party which I have the honour to represent.

Every member of this House must know that the largest number of complaints that he and his staff have to deal with are those which pertain to unemployment insurance matters. Such letters far outnumber those about any other problem on a continuous basis.

The most dominant areas of complaint, of criticism, of distress and dissatisfaction are with this branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Day after day, at least until we had the postal strike, letters of anger and frustration with this commission flowed in. Constituents forward us volumes of correspondence which they have received from the UIC, and ask that we assist them to help to untangle the unintelligible mess. Applications whose format is unbelievably complicated, and letters which are thoroughly incomprehensible spew forth from this department. There are so many abuses and injustices in the Unemployment Insurance Act that it ought to be scrapped and a totally new concept undertaken.

The way in which the act has been mismanaged has caused it to deviate entirely from the meaning of insurance. It could more accurately be referred to as payment assurance. It is regarded by contributors as some sort of investment or savings account, and that if they have put money into it then they are entitled to get it back. It is about as logical as expecting to be reimbursed for premiums paid out for car insurance, if one chooses to drive one's car no longer. That is exactly the way many in the work force are thinking today. They feel that if they do not choose to work, then they are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. The only thing that will ensure, Mr. Speaker, is that a number of people are going to try to beat the system, and it is being done with great success very often.

It is no longer true insurance against the time when one is unemployed, but another con game in which the smart operator can pick the public pocket. The serious job searcher often finds himself strangled in the maze of red tape. Many times a recipient of benefits is informed that he has been receiving benefits for which he does not qualify after all, and that he must repay the commission as much as $1,000 or there will be dire consequences. If there are cases of overpayment, of no entitlement, then why were benefits paid out for so long? Who is causing these errors?

Let us change the name, the concept, and the reality to an employment insurance commission—a commission that will encourage employment rather than one which has built-in disincentives to work. Only when it becomes more profitable to work and be gainfully employed than to live as well, or even better, when unemployed are we going to have a society in which the prestige of the work ethic will regain its rightful position as a desirable attribute. Work has become another four letter word, a dirty word in the vocabulary and thinking of too many people. And the present administration has fostered that attitude.

The puny amendments which are proposed to the act are a farce as far as alleviating the existing problems is concerned. The senior citizen is going to be ineligible for benefits, and the lower salaried will have to pay the same premium as many who are higher salaried, at a minimal saving to the government. Does the Minister of Manpower and Immigration consider discrimination against the elderly and the poor to be a reduction in inequity, because that is what will happen if the proposed regulations do go into effect?

There is absolutely no consistency or logic in the way in which UIC matters are handled or mishandled within the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It is absolutely essential that there be more co-operation and liaison between these two sectors so that they work in harmony. Is the problem of unemployment not linked with finding jobs or training people to new skills to fit developing opportunities?

Manpower is woefully inadequate in its purpose to create and locate jobs for those in need of them. Stress must be laid on getting those who are without work back into the work force as quickly as possible so that they can be a contributing unit to the welfare of Canada, rather than a drain upon it. Far too many are allowed to exist in relative comfort as they wait to have cheques delivered to them from schemes and plans spawned by the federal government.

The industrious contributors are becoming demoralized by carrying the double burden of higher premium payments to the UIC as well as increased taxes to the government to handle its share of the UIC pie. We may see the day when the workers become so demoralized at carrying the drones in our society that they will either rebel against the system or decide that it would be much smarter to join them. Then we will experience the ultimate strike.

● (2130)

The Unemployment Insurance Act is urgently in need of complete rebuilding. The time for band-aid remedies is long past. I heard the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) extolling in her partisan way the supposed benefits of the present legislation. She expounded on the benefits of the Local Initiatives Program, benefits which I do not deny, as the program fulfills a need in society. But it is a stop gap program. Let me tell hon. members about an application made by the residents of the township of Flatbush in my constituency. They made an honest application to the government. They asked for only $2,873.

An hon. Member: It was too small.

Mr. Elzinga: The request was too small, as my hon. friend says. Despite their honesty, they were refused. And why did they apply for this money? They needed it because the government has mismanaged the beef industry of this country. When the government is so involved in the beef industry that, in a two-year period, it introduces 29 different policies and programs, I say the government does not know what it is doing.

Before concluding may I refer to what my party said during the past election campaign, to show that it is consistent. I shall also refer to what the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said in the present debate. I shall refer to our policy commitments made in the 1974 campaign, and to the somewhat similar statement made by the hon. member for Hamilton West, to show that my party is consistent in its thinking, and that when we make commitments and statements we are willing to abide by them, which is more than you can say of the party opposite.

We, of the official opposition, still call for an independent inquiry into the operation of this act. Such an inquiry should examine the effectiveness of the act as now constituted, and its administration. It should envisage whether changes in the legislation are required, and investigate in particular the administration, with a view to maintaining an adequate program of unemployment insurance while avoiding disincentives to employment and excessive costs to contributors and taxpayers. This request is consistent with what we said during the election campaign and with my party's position. We feel, in short, that there should be a fully independent inquiry and not some sort of in-house inquiry about which the minister spoke, involving the unemployment insurance advisory council.

Further, we feel that there should be a fully independent inquiry into the workings of the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to determine whether it is an insurance scheme, a welfare scheme, or a combination of both, and if there are abuses, how to get rid of them. The inquiry should delve into the extent of disincentives, and recommend how best to remove them. The inquiry should be full blown and independent, and not something with which the minister can play hanky panky whenever he feels too much heat. In other words, we want an independent group to look at this serious matter.

The principle to which we should adhere is that any scheme such as the one we are considering should be a difficult one for any person to take advantage of, easy to administer, and easy to leave. In other words, it ought to be hard to get on the recipient rolls, and easy to get off. This, apparently, is not the case now, as this amending bill indicates.

By introducing disincentives to work the government has destroyed the work ethic. This is the result of a statement the Prime Minister made some time ago. He said that you do not have to work for money because there are other things in life which are so meaningful. That may be true, but it is the individual's responsibility to pay for those other things himself.

The hon. member for Hamilton West, my party's UIC critic, compared the situation in our country with that in the United States. His comparison was startling, and for that reason I shall quote a part of his speech made yesterday on October 27. He said, as reported at page 8572 of Hansard:

> It is interesting to note that the United States, which has a population ten times the size of Canada's, spent $4 billion on unemployment insurance in 1973. On the other hand, we in Canada will spend approximately the same amount in 1975.

I have told the House what the government has done about the situation. My party has outlined what should be done. Unfortunately now, as in the past, our advice is falling on deaf ears.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as Bill C-69 which deals with unemployment insurance will become one of the most important bills this House will discuss during the present session, may I at this time congratulate colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party who made such excellent contributions to this debate.

The subject of unemployment insurance and the operation of the commission have been of major concern to Canadians for a number of years. Clearly a major overhaul of our UIC program is long overdue. You could say that UIC recipients are almost like members of another profession. The commission in Canada has attracted thousands of Canadians to its doors. They come for the generous pay-outs. Some groups have formed UIC ski teams, and wear jerseys on which appear the words "UIC ski team." On the backs of other jerseys are printed the words, "Thanks, Pierre". I hope the minister is taking the necessary measures to stop UIC ski teams from being formed this winter, ski teams which will be financed by the Canadian taxpayer.

I shall now refer to a Gallup poll. It is a public opinion report on the UIC. The question the researchers asked was, "Do you think that the government has been strict enough, or not, in checking on applicants for unemployment insurance benefits?"

Canadians are watching for evidence of a program ensuring stricter control of unemployment insurance payments. While most people approve the increased benefits, provided they go to those who really need them, they give almost a three-to-one verdict that, at present, the screening of applicants for UIC payments is not satisfactory. Nationally 59 per cent hold this opinion, compared to 24 per cent who think the controls are satisfactory. Another 17 per cent are undecided.

These national levels of opinion are echoed in homes for all occupational segments in much the same degree. Conviction that supervision is not sound enough in accepting applicants is highest, however, among executive and professional workers and their families, with 61 per cent believing stricter controls are necessary, versus only 20 per cent who disagree. Argument is more closely debated in skilled and unskilled labour, with 63 per cent thinking supervision is too lax, and 27 per cent saying it is not. Only 10 per cent of those in the homes of labour are undecided about the issue, compared to 19 per cent among executives and professionals or sales and clerical workers, and 23 per cent among farmers and others.

I now touch on the work ethic. The work ethic in Canada has been destroyed by successive Liberal governments. No wonder it has been destroyed, considering the sorts of statements the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made. For instance, the Prime Minister has said in the past, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of March 20, 1972:

> I say that the most sacred law is that a man who lives in society should be able to enjoy his own possibilities to the maximum, but work is perhaps not the way to do it.
> If we are lucky, we will move toward a leisure society where we will work less. The aim of man in society is not to work, it is to realize his own potential to the maximum.

● (2140)

> He went even beyond this philosophical musing to the point of suggesting that there is nothing wrong with a deliberate decision to collect unemployment insurance rather than work.
>
> "There should be no stigma attached to that. They paid their unemployment insurance premiums," Trudeau said of those who "prefer" not to work.
>
> All this, of course, is pretty strong stuff from the leader of a country whose traditions are still deeply rooted in the work-oriented Protestant ethic.
> To the extent that it suggests unemployment is rampant in Canada by the people's choice, it's also downright misleading. The . . . majority of Canada's . . . unemployed want a job now, and couldn't care less about some future ideal of a leisure society.

I wish to quote from a letter that I received from the vice-president of Firestone Tire & Rubber Company of Canada Limited about the difficulties they are encountering in hiring people to work for their company. I quote:

> —our Plant Employment Office interviewed 2,521 potential plant employees for our Hamilton Tire Plant. Of that total, we hired 224 (acceptable candidates who were able to pass our medical examination). As of today's date, there are 110 of these 224 employees who are still working in our plant.
> From our experiences, we have noticed a new breed of 'unemployed' person. When answering our newspaper advertisements, many applicants possess one of the following attitudes:
> 1. They are content to sit through the interview and be shown the job and then not appear for the mandatory medical examination. We conclude that at least 10-15 per cent of the people tentatively hired refuse to accept the job in this manner.
> 2. They are content to appear for the interview and behave in such a manner that would not be acceptable to any company. The candidate actually appears relieved when informed that he does not qualify to fill the job vacancy.

This certainly indicates that the job ethic in this country is deteriorating. He went on to say:

> To us, this growing trend towards 'acceptable unemployment' is the direct result of relaxed regulations and attractive unemployment benefits.
>
> How can we as a corporation or our employees as taxpayers cover these rising unemployment costs? As a corporation, we can hope to increase our productivity. But how can we do so when we cannot fill our vacant jobs with responsible people? How can we increase our productivity if we cannot attract applicants and retain them as employees when they can easily receive large sums of money from our government NOT TO WORK?
>
> As for our employees, how can we increase their take-home pay to compensate for these new insurance payments when we are unable to increase our productivity and thus warrant these payroll increases?
>
> It is our considered opinion that immediate action is necessary. We strongly recommend:
>
> 1. The Unemployment Insurance Offices and the Manpower Offices should be integrated.
> 2. The eight week qualifying period for insurance benefits should be increased to 20 weeks.
>
> 3. And whereas the currently 20 hours a week in a week qualifies as one of the eight weeks required, this should be increased to 24 times the minimum wage of that jurisdiction concerned.
> These last two proposals would eliminate from the Unemployment Insurance Plan some of the people who have only a casual or part-time attachment to the Canadian work force.

They are not only complaining and making suggestions, but attempting to do something about it. I hope the minister will pay particular attention to what I will now read. I think the vice-president has an excellent idea. He stated, and I quote:

Unemployment Insurance Act

Attached, please find a copy of a form letter that we are now using in co-operation with the Hamilton office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It is our intention to work closely with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and assist them and their staff to discover violators and habitual offenders that defraud Canadians of millions of tax-paid dollars.

We sincerely believe that government action should begin immediately. With every company reporting similar information to their local Unemployment Insurance Commission office and revised legislation amending the regulations, maybe then we could eliminate the abusers of the system. A concerted drive must be started at once to clear up this disorder. The time is now to once again elevate the status of the Commission, permitting it once again to assist those Canadians who honestly and deservedly need this assistance. Let's correct our worst energy crisis, "The lack of energy of the unemployment rolls".

I hope the minister will consider contacting all firms across Canada with regard to providing the Unemployment Insurance Commission with this type of information on offenders. Mismanagement of the Unemployment Insurance Commission has been of concern to the official opposition. I wish to give an example of our concern.

Here is a report of a $3.2 million loss in overpayments at an Unemployment Insurance Commission office. I quote:

More than a quarter of the $12.1 million in overpayments by the Unemployment Insurance Commission's Montreal office in the past two fiscal years has not been recovered, Manpower Minister Robert Andras said yesterday.

Overpayments in 1971-72 totalled $2.43 million, and $1.79 million of this was recovered. In 1972-73, overpayments were $9.68 million, of which $7.03 million was recovered.

This makes total overpayments of $12.11 million in the two fiscal years. The total recovered was $8.82 million, leaving an outstanding balance of $3.29 million.

It must be very time consuming and costly to recover these overpayments. That is an example of just one UIC office. If they were all totalled, I wonder what the amount would be.

Mr. Andras: It is all in the reports.

Mr. McKenzie: I wish to read some comments by a former minister of national revenue, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), made prior to the last election. He stated:

—a Liberal government would amend federal unemployment legislation if re-elected July 8.

"The basic problem is not unemployment insurance, it's unemployment,"—

He went on to say:

—however, because of high unemployment the government "rushed into the program too quickly."

"Admittedly, there are holes we could drive a truck through."

I hope the minister is closing up those large holes. There are further shocking figures with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In 1974 Unemployment Insurance Commission payments made up 1.51 per cent of the gross national product. In 1975 total payments will amount to $4 billion, or 2.72 per cent of the gross national product. In other words, pay-outs will have increased by 186.3 per cent.

Here is where we are getting into trouble. In 1972 it was $1,871,808,000 with a government contribution of $717 million and employer-employee contributions amounting to $1,154 million. Listen to the figures for 1973. The total was $2,004,216,000. The government's contribution came to $573 million and the employer-employee contribution came to $1,431 million. Now for 1974 the figures are staggering. The total was $2,119,212,000, made up of $700 million in government contributions and $1,500 million in employer-employee contributions.

In 1975 it is expected that the total will reach $3,750 million. Of that, $1,750 million will be the government contribution, with $2 billion forthcoming from employer-employee contributions.

● (2150)

In closing, if Bill C-69 goes to committee a concerted effort must be made by the members and the minister to find out how the Unemployment Insurance Commission can be made self-sustaining financially, and not obliged to call continually for increases in premiums which amount to just another tax on the Canadian public.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that my friends on the benches opposite have not taken this sterling opportunity to speak out on this important bill. I am sure Canadians living in their constituencies are every bit as upset and alarmed at this horrible mess called the UIC as are Canadians in constituencies represented by members who support this party.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission can only be called a mess. Indeed that is too gentle a word to describe the operations of this program. If one had to identify any single government program or government action which was more responsible than another for the near defeat of the Liberal party in October, 1972, it would be the Unemployment Insurance Act brought in by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey).

In a sense I suppose I owe the government a vote of thanks because there is no question but that the issue of the Unemployment Insurance Commission made it much easier for me to get elected for the first time in 1972. The famous Unemployment Insurance Commission ski team T-shirts were very much in evidence in my constituency, in the town of Banff as well as on the ski hills. The evidence of rip-offs at the expense of this scheme was very prevalent and known to a large number of people in the constituency and the backlash of that stupid government legislation contributed greatly to my victory in 1972. I should like to think that my victory in 1974 was more attributable to the record of the member in the previous period.

It is too bad it has taken so long for the government to respond by bringing in even these modest amendments to the act. Members opposite did recognize they had created a monster—that the act they had amended in 1970 was, in fact, a monster. The Speech from the Throne in January, 1973, promised amendments, but under the threats of the then leader of the New Democratic Party the government did not feel it could muster sufficient courage to implement that promise, feeling no doubt that though it would cost the Canadian public a few hundred million extra dollars to do so, the Canadian public would willingly pay that sum in order to maintain a Liberal government in office. I am sure that at this point in time the Canadian people, especially after hearing the Thanksgiving Day message, must have second thoughts about this.

The change which was made removing the limit was, really, a shocking mistake. Removing the limit on the amount the treasury could contribute to the fund opened up frightening possibilities, and many of us in this party regret we did not put up a more vigorous opposition to that particular amendment.

I am sure the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) was paying attention to the remarks of my illustrious colleague from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), who very tersely and very concisely offered the minister a number of positive suggestions as to how this bill could be improved. I am sure the hon. gentleman took note of those suggestions and that when the bill goes through the committee there will be a willingness on the part of those opposite to accommodate them. If this is done, the minister's own responsibilities will be that much easier to bear; the Canadian people will be called upon to bear a lesser burden than would otherwise be the case, and we shall all, in short, be a lot better off. I notice the minister is smiling and I take that smile as expressing concurrence in my remarks.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act since this issue is one of great interest to many people in my riding. The Canadian people have now had four years in which to judge the effectiveness of the legislation since the previous amendment in 1971. Indeed, there are a lot more Canadians who are capable of forming opinions about the Unemployment Insurance Commission as a direct result of their own experience. In 1971 unemployment was running at 5.9 per cent, and roughly 495,000 were unemployed. Today, the figure is running at 7.2 per cent and some 800,000 Canadians are clients of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I am sure every member of this House has a dossier full of horror stories which they have received from their constituents in the course of trying to help them work their way through the bureaucratic maze. I am sure, too, that every member can also document cases where individuals are ripping off the system by receiving benefits which are really not due to them, or would not be forthcoming if, in fact, the act were carrying out the purpose for which it was intended. May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

OLYMPIC GAMES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MEDALLIONS MINTED IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, tonight I intend to pursue my question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) of October 27 dealing with the possibility of minting Olympic commemorative medallions to supplement the drastically sagging sales of Olympic silver coins.

The concern which obviously arises in this connection stems from the fact that private Canadian mints such as the Lombardo mint in Quebec, the Jacques Cartier mint in Toronto, and others which did not get a chance to bid on the commemorative medals were all bypassed by COJO in favour of a Swiss firm whose so-called Canadian subsidiary Suissecon Watch Company Limited is found not to be an incorporated company in either the Dominion of Canada or any of the provinces.

The sad part of the matter is that the example just given is only one of the many ways in which qualified Canadian firms have been effectively shut out and prevented from taking part in the production and development of products for the Olympic Games.

I realize that the government's answer to my request for intervention by the federal government for the benefit of Canadian manufacturers and Canadians in general will be that COJO's business affairs are out of the federal government's jurisdiction. Let me point out, however, that the Olympic coin program is totally under the jurisdiction of the federal government and that the commemorative medal proposals are directly connected with the coin program. Allow me for the sake of clarification to quote, Mr. Speaker, from a coin program tender signed jointly by Gerry Snyder, vice-president/revenue of COJO, and Mr. Austin Page, managing director of the Olympic coin program, directly responsible to the federal government:

A description of the marketing program you are prepared to implement for the distribution and sale of coins and medals in the United States, Canada and overseas. This description should include order of magnitude marketing budgets proposed for each element of the marketing program and estimates of anticipated sales of coins and medals for each element. It should be noted that sales of coins should be restricted to the United States while sale of medals should be worldwide. The organizing committee and the coin program in this respect will develop with you a list of potential international distributors of the official medals.

You would have noted, Mr. Speaker, that reference in the quote is made not only to Olympic coins but to medals as well, which go hand in hand with the coins. There is no question, therefore, that to me this reflects the fact that since the medals and coins are part of the same category under the coin program, which is the sole responsibility of the federal government, it is the economic and moral duty, indeed the obligation, of the federal government to take immediate steps to intervene in COJO's decision to have these and other products manufacted abroad without giving Canadian businessmen a fair opportunity to manufacture them.

This is just one of the many reasons why I have today called upon the government to initiate a full scale public inquiry into the organization and conduct of the 1976 Olympics, in order to reduce any further unnecessary expenditure and so that public confidence in the games will be restored and the games assured of the success Canadians wish them to have.

As I have said, this is just one of the many reasons why an investigation is necessary. The fact that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) does not even know the man who will head the mammoth security forces, estimated to cost the federal taxpayer $90 million, is another reason. The fact that some maniacal terrorists are planning to use the Olympics as the stage for their political insanities is another reason. The fact that the cost of the games themselves are expected to reach an estimated $1 billion, compared with the original estimate of $310 million, is another. The fact that the direct federal commitments will reach, in my opinion, $250 million before the end of the Olympic Games, is yet another.

For example, I have here figures in a document produced by the immigration department, figures that to this date have not been made public, estimating that $3.2 million is reserved in that department to pay for Olympic immigration over and above the regular budget. The fact that there presently exists six million pieces of finished and unsold silver coins in the vaults of the Mint to the value of approximately $50 million is another reason.

In the time allotted me this evening I do not have time to expound on all the other reasons why it is necessary to have an investigation. The fact of the matter is that the time has come for the federal government to come clean with the people of Canada by making all the obvious irregularities public through an inquiry such as I have proposed; and perhaps even at this late date we as Canadians can end up being proud of hosting the Olympic Games.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the sale of medallions to which the hon. member refers is a project of the committee responsible for the Olympic Games. It is not, I repeat, a federal responsibility.

Mr. Jelinek: You were not listening.

Mr. Francis: I was listening very carefully, Mr. Speaker, to everything that the hon. member had to say, and I would ask that he would extend to me the same courtesy. The project for the sale of Olympic coins was authorized by a special act of this parliament.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) was consulted from the beginning about the program in respect of the medallions. He was assured there are two separate and distinct programs and that one does not compete with the other. All the expenses of COJO, the committee responsible for the games, and its purchasing policies are directly the responsibility of the co-ordinating committee established for this purpose. I repeat that the federal government does not have jurisdiction or authority to dictate to the committee responsible for the games its policies in this respect. No provision of federal law governing the Olympics applies in this specific situation.

TRANSPORT—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION THAT COMMISSION PORTS GIVE GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, for the past year I have been drawing the matter of the Surrey container port facilities to the attention of the Minister of Transport. I would hope tonight that the parliamentary secretary would speak directly to the issue of the Scott report and its recommendations, and give us more than simply departmental generalizations and public relations statements on this matter, because this is a matter of great import to the thousands of people in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I have spoken to the former minister, in this forum as well as in personal conversation, about the matter, and on a number of occasions he has assured me that the Scott report will be the final answer to the problems of the municipalities as they relate to the commission port facilities across Canada. I have been assured on many occasions that the Scott report will be included in the recommendations and that the commission ports will pay grants in lieu of taxes.

The container port facilities operated by the Fraser River Harbor Commission of New Westminster were opened last December in Surrey. I should first of all compliment the commission on the excellent facilities, on the excellent operation, the very efficient operation and, I might add, the prosperous operation. It is making money. That is something to be commended. When any government operation makes money I think we should stop and take note, especially in contrast to the facilities of the National Harbours Board. As I have said, these facilities were opened last December, almost a year ago now. All we have had in the meantime is a vague assurance that something will be done, that the Scott report will be handed down and that it will be the answer. I should like to point out to the minister what this kind of dalliance means to the taxpayers of Surrey.

I have with me an estimate from the municipal engineer of Surrey concerning what it will cost Surrey to make sure that the access facilities to the container port facility will be up to the standards required. It will have to upgrade a number of roads. There will have to be Robson and Plywood roads with an asphalt overlay at a cost of $40,000. There will have to be 2,100 feet of two roads, Tannery—Scott to Timberland reconstructed at a cost of $125,000. There will have to be 900 feet of Timberland and Old Yale covered with an overlay at a cost of $60,000.

There you have a total cost for the roads alone of $225,000. This is no small item when you consider the soil conditions in the area. They are extremely poor. There is a very high water content and the soil in that area is peat. There is a large engineering cost involved in this project. Since it is a port facility it is obvious that on the low land of the river there will have to be drainage. The reconstruction of the ditch enclosures for these facilities will represent something in the area of $420,000. To bring up the access and drainage facilities will cost $645,000 to the taxpayer of Surrey. So much for the expenses to the taxpayers, but on the other side of the ledger is the revenue that should be accruing to the taxpayer, and there are four pieces of property involved in this facility.

The taxes that should be coming to the municipality of Surrey each year beginning in 1975, followed by the increments, should be $205,851.28. Those are the projected taxes for 1975. When you combine the lost revenue with the projected expenses, you have the total of $850,851.28. This is what it means to the taxpayer of Surrey municipality because this government had made promises and had said recommendations will be coming which would take the pressure off.

If the government is really concerned about equity, justice, and fairness, then I think it will make the recommendations of the Scott report known to the Canadian people and to the Surrey municipality, and will ensure that the government there will receive the tax dollars it deserves so that it can service the facilities it has within its boundaries.

I underscore the fact that we welcome the facilities which are excellent and job producing, but if we want to make them the kind of facilities they should be in terms of services, then it will cost the taxpayer; and if the federal government insists on putting facilities within the boundaries of a municipality which create a burden to the taxpayers, it is only right that it share in the burden of paying for services for those facilities.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I begin let me say that I appreciate hearing the hon. member's kind words about the quality of the facility that has been installed in this case. I hope that in my remarks this evening I will be able to shed a little more light on some of the questions which he has raised.

As the House knows, last June the Scott report recommended that the government pull together the administration of ports in this country into a more unified system. It also recommended that further study be done on the financial administration of ports.

The government has since announced its new policy to create a Canadian ports commission as well as some 25 semi-autonomous local port commissions. This commission would be within the marine administration of the Ministry of Transport, and would have responsibility to exercise the federal mandate for ports, including ports planning, capital development, and financial control. To bring this policy into being, a ports task force has been appointed to prepare instructions for the drafting of new legislation, and to provide answers to a number of financial and organizational questions, including the matter of grants in lieu of taxes.

On the basis of this task force report the government will bring forward a new Canada ports act for consideration by parliament. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) stated in the House, it is not possible to determine the exact timing of the changes which have to be made, in particular with reference to the changes mentioned by the hon. member. Implementation of the new policy and of the new financial arrangements, however, will immediately follow the passage of the required legislation.

GRAIN—ALLEGATION WHEAT BOARD PUTS EXPORT GRAIN IN NON-BOARD CATEGORY AND DISTRIBUTES TO EASTERN FARMERS BUT NOT WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, on July 4, 1975, I put a question to the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) that dealt with a distribution discrepancy.

Apparently non-board wheat can be made available to eastern farmers but not to those in the west. This has been brought to my attention by several concerned groups in western Canada. They have stated that they cannot purchase non-board grain at non-board grain prices but what they can purchase is grain from the Wheat Board at Wheat Board prices. However, in the east Wheat Board grain is turned over into the category of non-board grain and the non-board grain sells for considerably less than the Wheat Board grain. This is just one area in which I feel that there is a certain amount of discrimination in regard to the grain situation as it now exists in Canada.

There are several other matters with which I wish to deal in making this brief presentation because there are many areas of dissatisfaction in western Canada, and I should like to mention a few of these this evening. I am aware that in the few moments the hon. gentleman has to respond to what I have to say, he will state that this is not the case, but let me remind hon. members that that is exactly what was stated throughout the 1974 election in regard to wage and price controls. How quickly hon. members opposite change their minds, and how quickly they can change their opinions to suit their personal expediency.

While dealing with this issue I do not just wish to deal with the narrow aspects of it, but I should like to include some other areas in which western people feel they have not received a fair deal in confederation. This feeling has been constant throughout history, and is there any wonder that there is such ill feeling when they in the western regions have been looked upon as a colonial state for the purpose of supporting the golden triangle of Ontario?

Agricultural economies throughout the world have always been poor. Consider the southern hemisphere in all the developing nations. Consider every industrial nation of the world, and where there are within them agricultural regions those are the poor regions, and yet agriculture is the most essential of all industries. Consider Canada. The agricultural regions are poor unless they have some other resource. That has been the history of the prairies and the maritime provinces of this country.

To some Canadians the west has been a source of agitation recently. Some have made the comment that Alberta is trying to get out of confederation. They saw one issue correctly. There is agitation, and there is a feeling of uneasiness, but they read the signs wrongly and gave the wrong interpretation to the facts of the matter. What is really happening is that the west is trying to get into confederation. That is what I hope I can convey through the parliamentary secretary to the minister this evening.

Just to give a bit of an over view on how the regions of this country have been treated by the federal government for the past 100 years, central Canada has had the protection of tariffs. The colonial regions paid more than did central Canada for textiles, automobiles, farm machinery, and manufactured products. This is very nice for central Canada, but the producers see it as pickpocketing. If we are truly a confederation, then the confederation must be two way. If we are to have cheap oil across the country and if we are to have cheaper food products across the country, then the federal government must consider the well being of all of Canada and not just that of central Canada. It must talk of Canada as being a whole nation from sea to sea.

If the government really feels it has been responsive to the regions, then we can ask legitimate questions. I ask hon. members opposite how it was that they accepted the fact that the great depression lasted a full three years longer on the prairies than it did in central Canada?

Let me ask hon. members opposite to justify why western Canada pays twice as much to bring manufactured rapeseed back from Toronto to Lethbridge than it does to ship raw rapeseed per ton from Lethbridge to Toronto? Why is it that iron and steel products from Toronto are cheaper when shipped to Vancouver than when shipped to Saskatoon?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I wish to bring to his attention that although this is a limited debate with regard to time, and although there have been no points of order, I think he still should abide by the rule under Standing Order 42 which says that no matter should be debated during the 30 minutes allowed for the adjournment debate unless notice has been given. The hon. member gave notice of one specific question with regard to grain which is distributed to eastern farmers and not to western farmers. Of course he might relate that to many other differences in the country, but I hope he will come back to the question he raised and of which he has given notice.

Mr. Elzinga: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you do not deduct that from my time. I was dealing with rapeseed, and that is considered a grain. I hope it is appreciated that we must relate these things to various other commodities. If we are to talk about what is good for Canada, let us talk about what is good for all of Canada. These are questions which must be answered. The prairie regions which are agricultural are treated only with crisis concept policies.

Another example is that it is cheaper to ship live western cattle to Ontario and to feed them there with grain which was grown in the west and shipped to the east under subsidy at low rates than to slaughter the cattle in the west and send them east for consumption. That documents another case where industry has been taken away, but according to the federal government it is the business of the west to supply the resources for central Canada and then in turn to be a market for central Canadian industries.

While we are talking about what is good for Canada, let me ask this: why cannot the Wheat Board have its headquarters in western Canada? Why cannot the salt fish committee operate in the maritimes? Why cannot the National Energy Board be based in Calgary since, every time they have a meeting, that is where 80 per cent of the delegates come from? What I am trying to put on the record is the fact that we are not talking about just one issue—but about the whole complexity of how we fit into confederation.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to launch into a fairly lengthy dissertation on the issue the hon. member has touched upon, and the general subject which perhaps some of us westerners too grandly call "western alienation". I will try to resist that temptation, however, bearing in mind Your Honour's earlier admonition.

I want to begin by correcting one comment with which the hon. member concluded his remarks. The headquarters of the Canadian Wheat Board are most definitely in western Canada, in the city of Winnipeg.

I must confess a certain degree of uncertainty with respect to the precise point the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) is attempting to make this evening. In studying the Hansard report of his original question on July 4 last it appears that the hon. member had in fact been satisfied. He went on to refer to a written inquiry which he had placed earlier in a letter to the minister on the same subject. The minister's reply, although dispatched to the hon. member prior to his question in the House, apparently did not reach him until after July 4. That written response—and it bears repeating here—demonstrated that the hon. member's suspicions about discrimination in the feed grain policy were unfounded. That policy was developed to remove pre-existing discrimination and to provide a fair, equitable, and common base for prices of feed grains across Canada. The suggestion that somehow farmers in eastern Canada have an access to western feed grains on the open market which is not available to western producers, simply is not accurate.

The facts of the matter show that western farmers enjoy more options—a greater freedom of choice if you like—in purchasing feed grains.

Generally speaking, in practice easterners purchase their western grain supplies in the open market past Thunder Bay from the grain trade at prices determined through the operation of the futures and cash markets of the Winnipeg Commodity Exchange. Meanwhile the western farmer can buy his feed grain from other western producers at a negotiated price, or from elevator companies at the cash price as reflected by the operations of the Winnipeg Commodity Exchange, or from the Canadian Wheat Board at the board's export price.

In order to smooth the flow of grain and to avoid unnecessary surpluses in some areas and shortages in others within the western region, the board does have a switching ability to meet local needs and reduce useless movement of stocks.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me say I appreciate the hon. member's comments with respect to the freight rate problem affecting the movement of feed grains vis-à-vis beef. The government is committed to a correction of that situation. I think the hon. member may look forward to more specific news on this point in the near future.

I would simply mention here that the minister tried very hard two years ago to direct public discussion in western Canada to this very essential point. At that time most commentators preferred to resort to rather hysterical outbursts about some alleged, but totally fallacious undermining of the effectiveness of the Canadian Wheat Board. That nonsense unfortunately diverted serious attention from the real difficulties in connection with the freight rate issues. If we had heard and been given the benefit of considered and thoughtful discussion of feed grain freight rates beginning at that point in time two years ago, we would have been further along the road to a real solution now.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER BE REQUIRED TO DISCLOSE ALL DETAILS CONNECTED WITH CONSTRUCTION OF SWIMMING POOL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising from the arrogant and incomplete answers given yesterday to questions on the order paper concerning the swimming pool constructed at the official residence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at 24 Sussex Drive, and also arising from the fact that this House has every right to find unacceptable continued evasion and misleading information on the matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

With specific reference to the answer of yesterday to question 1,233 which asked for numerous details concerning construction of and donors to the swimming pool at the Prime Minister's official residence at 24 Sussex Drive along with the answers to questions 1,684, 1,686 and 1,687 on the same subject, it is the opinion of this House that the Prime Minister is withholding legitimate information from the elected representatives of the people, and that this constitutes not only an affront to parliament and the people of Canada, but also indicates the grave possibility that severe improprieties and conflict of interest factors most definitely do exist with regard to this matter; and finally, the House calls on the Prime Minister to forthwith make full disclosure and tell the entire truth to parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE OUTLINE ALTERNATIVES TO ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of widespread public confusion over the implementation of the government's controls program, and in view of the statement by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) reported on CBC radio this morning to the effect that the government's program is unlikely to work because of the absence of public support, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House congratulate the minister on his acute political perception, and further, that the House urges the minister to make a statement on motions outlining alternative policies which he intends to place before his cabinet colleagues for their consideration.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED GREATER CONTROL OF EXPENDITURES BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce an important and urgent motion.

Since the costs of the 1976 Olympic Games, which were supposed to be moderate, have become astronomical if not disastrous and since the matter concerns and should concern all Canadians, especially at a time when the government is endeavouring to control inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House recommend that the government instruct the prices and incomes control commission to investigate the expenditures incurred up to now for the Montreal Olympic Games and to control other expenditures to be incurred till the games are held and even afterwards. In addition, that it recommend that the government take a direct part in financing the games through other new means.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH INNUIT OF QUEBEC FOR ONE MONTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Northern Quebec Innuit Association representing the Eskimos north of the 55th parallel in Quebec have been negotiating in good faith an agreement in principle signed on November 19, 1974, which is to be executed on November 1 of this week.

Despite satisfactory progress the Northern Quebec Innuit Association has requested that the negotiations be extended for one month to resolve outstanding differences. These negotiations are unique in that the Innuit in Canada for the first time are negotiating a way of life indigenous to northern Quebec for better than 4,000 years. This request for an additional month does not affect negotiations that have taken place to date nor affect developments occurring in northern Quebec, nor is it related to matters such as working conditions or hourly wages, but I must emphasize they are negotiating their future in Canada.

In view of the reasonable and responsible request to extend the negotiations for one month, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who represents the government of Canada in these negotiations take immediate action to have the negotiations extended by one month.

Mr. Speaker: This motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION COMMITTEE HEAR GRIEVANCES OF QUEBEC INNUIT CONCERNING CURRENT NEGOTIATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the motion made under Standing Order 43 by the previous speaker is an example of the concern that I share. The Northern Quebec Innuit are now less than 48 hours away from negotiating an agreement in principle affecting their life style. I think it is important that they be allowed to extend the negotiations for at least one month as they have requested.

I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That representatives of the Northern Quebec Inuit Association be called before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development prior to November 1, 1975 with the objective of hearing their grievances regarding current negotiations between themselves and governments with the view to making specific recommendations to the minister forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

APPLICABILITY OF FEDERAL WAGE GUIDELINES TO METRO TORONTO TEACHERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the widespread public confusion over the implementation and implications of the government's controls program, and in view of a statement by the Ontario minister of education, Mr. Wells, with respect to negotiations involving Metro Toronto teachers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House instructs the Minister of Finance to make a statement on motions explaining the applicability of the federal guidelines in the case of Metro Toronto teachers and, in particular, making clear the government's position with respect to Mr. Well's suggestion that negotiations should proceed as if the federal guidelines did not exist, that the employer should commence the payment of higher salaries as soon as a contract is concluded and before any intervention by the federal authorities, and that, in any event, any final determination by the federal government on the Anti-Inflation Board, in view of the lengthy appeal procedures and the number of cases with which the board will be deluged, would take at least 1½ years.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—CONTINGENCY PLAN IN EVENT LABOUR FAILS TO COMPLY WITH PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance? In light of reports coming from allegedly reliable government sources, to the effect that the government has a contingency anti-inflation plan involving a prices and incomes freeze which will be used if union opposition stymies the present program before the House, will the minister confirm whether the government has such a contingency plan?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no such plan to either indicate or bring forward at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister did not answer my question. I asked whether he had such a contingency plan. As the Prime Minister during his tour last week said repeatedly that the government would not hesitate to use stronger methods if organized labour stymies the anti-inflation program, will the minister explain why the government is making these threats regarding union compliance, since, obviously, the significant, large and stronger unions are already subject to the compulsory income guidelines?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman may be misquoting the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister indicated that if the present, selective measures do not over a period of time take effect to bring down the rate of inflation in Canada, it may be necessary to resort to more comprehensive and encompassing measures of the kind from time to time described by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect, I think the Prime Minister's remarks were directed to compliance by organized labour. May I ask the minister if his tough sounding talk is simply bluster, so far as organized labour is concerned? Can the minister indicate to the House what further compulsory measures would be imposed on union wages that are not already in the compulsory guidelines?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman could have been referring to comments of the Prime Minister misreported in the Globe and Mail and corrected by that newspaper yesterday, to the effect that in the bill now before parliament there are provisions enabling action to be taken against individuals, whether they be union leaders, heads of businesses or others, who wilfully defy the instructions of parliament in this regard. He was not, as the Globe and Mail pointed out yesterday, confining these remarks to union leaders. As I said, all this is in the bill presently before parliament and I commend the reading of that bill to the hon. gentleman.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—KNOWLEDGE OF PROVINCES OF CONTINGENCY PLAN IN EVENT LABOUR FAILS TO COMPLY WITH PROGRAM—FURTHER MEETINGS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? As the minister has indicated that the government might have to resort to more comprehensive measures in connection with its anti-inflation program, will the minister indicate if he has informed the provinces what those comprehensive measures may be? More specifically, has the federal government scheduled a further meeting with the provinces, at which time full and decisive positions can be taken? If such a meeting is to be scheduled, on what date will it take place? If it has not been scheduled, why has it not been scheduled?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in replying to the Leader of the Opposition, measures of that kind would only be put forward after the present proposed selective measures have been given a full and fair trial in restricting the rate of growth of inflation in Canada. With respect to the further meeting with the provinces, we have suggested a further meeting with the provinces at a time convenient to them, but no date has yet been set. We feel it would be useful, if further provincial measures are to be taken, if the provinces come to the meeting prepared to advise us of them. From our standpoint, we are quite prepared to meet them just as soon as the several working parties have completed their task.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF REFERENCE TO "TAXING AWAY PROVISIONS"

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister, during his tour, has created confusion by referring to taxing away provisions he intends to institute with respect to excessive wage gains or increases, will the Minister of Finance indicate if this is just terminology? Did the Prime Minister actually mean that these taxing away provisions are already in the bill before the House, or was he contemplating further legislative measures for taxing away gains and increases to which he referred?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was referring to the provisions of the bill which would enable the Crown to take away from corporations, for example, which instituted unjustifiably increased prices the amount of the increase.

● (1420)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister expressed his intention of consulting the former Minister of Finance on important issues, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether he has discussed the anti-inflation program with the former Minister of Finance and whether the former minister endorsed the plan as well as the way it has been carried out?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hardly find it necessary to point out to the hon. member that I am not the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY OF PRICE GUIDELINES TO FIRMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA FOLLOWING REMOVAL OF PROVINCIAL FREEZE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Some of us might be excused for thinking it is a toss-up. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a statement by the Minister of Justice and quoted in yesterday's Vancouver Province. It seems to clearly indicate that that minister does not believe the government's price control policy will be effective. The Minister of Justice is quoted as saying that "the British Columbia government's price freeze on essential goods and services invites a sudden, wild increase in prices once the freeze is lifted January 1." Can the minister advise whether the federal government's price guidelines will apply to firms in British Columbia that are affected by the temporary price freeze, and whether he expects those guidelines to be effective in limiting price increases to those that may be required strictly on the basis of increased costs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as has just been pointed out, the effect of the B.C. proposal is that it will dam up actual cost increases for a period of several months but then, under the guidelines, cost increases if justified may be passed on to the customer. In that respect, it seems that the observations of the Minister of Justice, if fairly quoted by the hon. member, are indeed sound.

Mr. Broadbent: To be perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that the only increases in price that can be justified in these essential goods and services in the province of British Columbia after January 1 are those related precisely to and not more than the increase in costs? Is that correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is what the white paper says and what we have been saying for the past two weeks. I again confirm it to the hon. member.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUIREMENT OF PRIOR NOTIFICATION OF PRICE INCREASES BY BRITISH COLUMBIA FIRMS FOLLOWING REMOVAL OF PROVINCIAL FREEZE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In view of the special circumstances that apply in British Columbia, and in view of the minister's repeated assurances that prior notification and authorization will be required in the case of some proposed price increases, such as those for automobiles, can the minister assure the House that all B.C. firms in essential services who are affected by the price freeze in that province will be required to give prior notification to the anti-inflation board of any proposed price increases after January 1?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, many of those firms, as I recall, particularly B.C. Hydro and the British Columbia Petroleum Corporation, are under the jurisdiction of the province. If British Columbia chooses to participate in the federal program, then increases there will be affected by the guidelines and judgments of the anti-inflation board. As to any other essential services, I would have to look at the list the hon. member has in mind. In general terms, firms with over 500 employees, and I am specifically thinking of petroleum companies, will be affected by the guidelines.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED PARTICIPATION OF ALL CANADIANS IN COST

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, I wish to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Considering that the Olympic Games will cost roughly $1 billion and will probably end up with a deficit of several hundred million, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to take measures so that the deficit incurred for the games will be shared by all Canadians, since all Canada is benefitting from the publicity and international prestige of the games?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): There has been no change in the government's policy in this respect. The Prime Minister indicated from the outset that the federal government did not assume any obligation toward these costs. It was prepared to put into effect legislation to help with the financing of the games—and it has done so—but not at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH NORTHERN QUEBEC INNUIT ASSOCIATION—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR ONE MONTH

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and is related to the matter I raised earlier in connection with Standing Order 43. Did the minister receive a request to meet with the Northern Quebec Innuit Association yesterday and was such a meeting, in fact, held?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Such a request was made. I did not meet with them but I did discuss the situation with Charlie Watt, the President of the Northern Quebec Innuit Association at midnight last night. I am happy to report that they had a good day yesterday and indicated they had made substantial progress toward an agreement.

Mr. Holmes: I welcome the minister's comments. Has the hon. gentleman held additional discussions with the other parties involved in the negotiations with a view to extending the time frame for one month. Bearing in mind that the Northern Quebec Innuit Association has indicated that the outstanding issues can be settled within one month, will the minister take immediate action to extend the period of negotiation?

Mr. Buchanan: Basically we are not unsympathetic to the idea of extending the period, but the Grand Council of the Cree is absolutely opposed to any extension and is adamant that we sign the agreement on November 1. I might make an additional point, though. A procedure is being established in the agreement which is being negotiated which will provide for a period of 60 or 90 days during which a referendum would be held among the various communities to determine whether they are in favour of the agreement or against it.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Since there has been a marked slow down in the negotiations brought about by the necessity of translating from Cree to Innuit—some of the volumes are about 800 pages in length—would the minister consider granting the Innuit people an extension of 30 days, apart from the Cree? In making this request I would point out that any precedent set here is likely to be followed for generations, and might possibly set a precedent for developments in the Northwest Territories also.

Mr. Buchanan: As I have just stated, the government is not unsympathetic to the idea. But there are seven signatories to the original agreement in principle and there is a proviso that all seven signers must agree. As I pointed out in reply to the previous question, the Cree are opposed to any extension, so we are hung up on that issue.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED OBJECTION BY FRANCE TO ATTENDANCE OF CANADA AT ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING—VIEW OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise the House whether reports from Canadian officials in Washington are exact when they state that the President of France is still objecting very strongly to Canada's proposed participation in the economic summit to be held in November?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm any such reports with respect to the position taken by the President of France. The facts are that Canada's candidacy is being supported by a number of the countries already invited to the summit. Not all of them have taken that position, and I understand that one of them which is still outstanding in that respect is France. I hope that any remaining objection will be cleared away. I understand there is concern as to the ultimate size of any such meeting.

Mr. Wagner: Would the minister confirm that President Ford is most favourable to inviting Canada to Paris.

Mr. MacEachen: The Secretary of State, Dr. Kissinger, made it clear when he was in Ottawa that in his view Canada should attend. That policy, obviously, is the policy of the President of the United States also.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON REASONS FOR INVOKING WAR MEASURES ACT IN OCTOBER, 1970—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and has to do with the shocking revelations made the other evening in an unusually good piece of work by the CBC in connection with the FLQ difficulties of five years ago. In view of the fact that both the premier of Quebec and also the former minister, the Hon. Mr. Kierans, have clearly stated to the people of Canada that there was no serious basis for the action that was taken, and in view of the detriment to freedom in consequence of what was done, will the minister arrange to set aside a date for the House to find out the true facts in connection with what took place?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the interest of hon. members opposite indicates that what I am speaking about has no relationship to their thinking. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister stated some years ago that ultimately the true facts would come out, since they have now done so over the CBC will parliament have the opportunity of discussing a matter which today has all the appearances of applied tyranny?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept necessarily the description that the right hon. gentleman has given of the action taken by our former colleague Mr. Kierans, but I would recommend that he read once again the letter that Premier Bourassa wrote to the Prime Minister which is to be found in Hansard for October, 1970. It sets out fully the reasons that the premier of Quebec, the mayor of Montreal and all those who had responsibility at that time made a very strong plea to the Canadian government to invoke the War Measures Act. They may have changed their minds now but at that time they were very clear. Perhaps one of the problems is that people do forget the circumstances at the time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is the first time there has been the revelation that the mayor of Montreal and the premier of Quebec determine the course of the people of Canada through the government. The minister still has not answered my question. In order to clarify the matter, not in the ex parte way the minister dealt with the question just now but in order to get the facts and to have Mr. Kierans and the premier of Quebec here, would the minister allow a date to be set aside so we can discuss the matter and determine the facts? Would he also tell the people of Canada whether the strategic operations centre that was described during that broadcast and which took over responsibility from the cabinet for what was called "crisis management"—a kind of CIA—is still in existence today?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I deal first of all with the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman to set aside a day. I would point out to him that, of course, there are a number of opposition days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: If the party of my right hon. friend would like to designate one of those days to bring in a motion dealing with this subject, it would have to be accepted by the House and would be a privilege that does not have to be extended by the government. May I also say to the right hon. member quite seriously that it is the intention of the government to bring forward legislation to replace the War Measures Act to deal with civil disorders, at which time the right hon. gentleman and any other member who wants to take part in the debate can go back to history and go forward into the future as they see fit.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PETAWAWA—POSSIBILITY OF EXPANDING CAMP AREA INTO QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH LOCAL MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the efficient Minister of National Defence. Further to the meeting held last night and the discussions with his officials and others interested in the possibility of expansion of the Petawawa armed forces base, perhaps into Pontiac county on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River, would the minister assure the House that if such expansion is contemplated the local elected councils will be consulted before such plans are finalized?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did visit Petawawa base yesterday and it is true that we do need to improve and possibly to expand the training area. However, there are no plans to expand the base across the river to the Quebec side. I can assure the hon. member that if in the future there are plans to expand across the river, the consultation that he has asked for will be provided to any officials in the communities that have an interest in the matter.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO ENABLE LOCAL GROUPS TO PARTICIPATE IN HEARINGS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of energy may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the National Energy Board pipeline hearings. In view of the fact that the proposed pipeline would have enormous social, economic and environmental effects on the Mackenzie valley, and in view of the fact that certain groups qualified to represent these concerns are prohibited from full participation in the hearings because of lack of funds, would the Acting Prime Minister undertake to supply these groups with sufficient money to enable them to participate fully in the hearings?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has used the word "prohibition" which I am sure, on reflection, he would not want to use. As I understand it, the National Energy Board is ready to hear any representations. These may be limited by lack of funds; many of us are limited in that way too. However, I would say to the hon. gentleman that the government does not intend to contribute public funds for this particular purpose.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF NEW PROGRAM

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the government's $500 grant to new home owners has been extended to December 31 of this year in so far as occupancy only is concerned, what sort of program does the minister propose to replace the present program? Will the new comprehensive housing program be introduced into the House, what are the details of such a program, and when will the program be put into effect?

Mr. Speaker: I trust that the minister, in attempting to answer, will skip the part of the question concerning the details of the program.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be making an announcement next week, and if I indicated what the announcement was now I would be making the announcement this week.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF MORE STRINGENT BAIL PROVISIONS THAN THOSE IN BILL C-71

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of public concern about the increase in crime and the fact that Bill C-71 calls for tougher laws in relation to applications for bail, will the Minister of Justice now advise the House whether he intends to amend the law to a greater extent than called for in Bill C-71, particularly in view of his recent statement to the effect that he intends to toughen up the regulations in respect of these bail applications?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there are important provisions in Bill C-71 and discussions are taking place among leaders of the House regarding the passage of that and other bills from this House into committee so we can deal with them. I would hope that Bill C-71 can get to the committee quickly. As to whether I intend to amend Bill C-71 further, at this point this is still a matter of consideration.

CRIMINAL CODE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SEPARATE BILL TO DEAL WITH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In light of the fact the Minister of Justice has admitted that his jurisdiction extends to bringing in amendments to the code, and in light of the fact the Solicitor General has responsibility for the commutation of death sentences to life sentences, will the minister now without equivocation answer the question I asked earlier in the week, namely, if he brings in a bill to abolish capital punishment will he assure the House that it will not be mixed in with amendments to other laws, particularly an amendment involving gun control?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I answered yesterday that it is likely that such a bill would not be put in with gun controls.

Mr. Woolliams: This is the second time the minister has used the word "unlikely", Mr. Speaker. Will the minister without equivocation answer yes or no to this very simple question instead of acting like a wet nurse?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when a final decision is made it will be made known to the House. The reason no final decision has been made as yet is that we are still receiving representations on both sides of the question, not only from this party but from members of his party as well.

An hon. Member: That is an unequivocal "maybe".

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF SEAL HUNT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the scientific data acquired by the Department of Fisheries in respect of the threat to the seal hunt, will the minister indicate what action he is taking to develop a method of protecting this seal hunt in the future?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me notice, and also to take this first opportunity of congratulating him on becoming his party's fisheries critic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I can confirm that the scientific assessment of seal stocks is pessimistic. However, I have asked that this be reviewed and reviewed thoroughly. I have had a meeting with the industry, and met yesterday with the Minister of Fisheries for Newfoundland, and also a delegation from the government of Quebec. These are the two provinces most affected. I have asked that our evidence be double checked and triple checked before a decision is made which would affect the fishermen, and I will keep the hon. member informed as we go along.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the further discussions the minister is going to have with Norway and Denmark in this regard, will he take into consideration the importance of the seal fishery and the quotas to landsmen who depend on the seal fishers to supplement their meagre income? Will he assure the House that this will be taken into consideration?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for reminding me that we do have complicated international negotiations with Norway and Denmark. These meetings will take place in mid-November. As for tilting the program in favour of the landsmen, the hon. member has understood my instincts. I agree with him.

FINANCE

PARTICIPATION OF REPRESENTATIVES OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FINANCE MINISTERS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Welcome back.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to disappoint my colleagues opposite, but I assure them I am not announcing my intention to run for leadership.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: My question is directed to the Minister of Finance but it could just as well be directed to the Solicitor General as it refers to the upcoming conference of Attorneys General. Keeping in mind the conference between the provincial Ministers of Finance and the federal government in respect of the so-called attack on inflation, I am wondering how the minister intends to involve the Canadian citizens in the Yukon and Northwest Territories? Have the elected representatives of the people in those territories, through their legislative bodies, been invited to participate in this conference, or is it the intention of the government to impose whatever conclusions or decisions they reach on the people above the 60th parallel from on high here in Ottawa?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that there are some elected representatives in this House from that area north of 60. Of course, the interests of those people are represented in this parliament through its jurisdiction over the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I would be glad to confirm with the federal-provincial relations secretariat what arrangements customarily have been made in this regard. My recollection is that in the past there have not, at these meetings of Ministers of Finance, been separate representatives, but I would be glad to investigate the question.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to consult with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this respect and to urge upon him the likelihood of gaining a good deal more co-operation in the implementation of his program in the Yukon and Northwest Territories if he would involve the people through the local elected representatives of their legislative bodies, as he is doing with the provinces.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comment.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO USE OF CANADIAN SHIPS TO MOVE OIL FROM ARCTIC

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Transport has had two or three days to catch up on the nomenclature of Maritime activities for which he is responsible, I would ask whether it is the intention of the government to close the Arctic exclusively for Canadian shipping in terms of the extractive resource industries there?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we certainly would not close the Arctic to all but Canadian ships. My colleague and I are still not speaking exactly the same language. It is, of course, a matter of importance for us to attempt to have as much Canadian shipping as possible in that development, and that is the general proposition and remains our policy. I would not want to become completely specific by suggesting in absolute terms that no other ship would ever be encouraged there.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Transport whether it is government policy at this point in time not to interfere with Panarctic's intention to go offshore to Scandinavian countries for the purpose of purchasing three ships in the eventuality of commercial oil being moved from the Arctic to a refinery located somewhere south of the 60th parallel?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would properly treat that as a hypothetical question which at some point I might discuss with my colleague, the minister responsible in respect of Panarctic. However, I would not want to rule out the specific purchase or use of ships from offshore in any circumstance, and I want to say that frankly to the hon. member. After all, there are times when our Canadian shipbuilding facilities may be fully taxed, and at that particular point one would encourage going offshore in order to have the ships. I just use that as an example.

ABORTION

INCLUSION OF STUDY OF FAMILY PLANNING FACILITIES IN TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMITTEE ON ABORTION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice regarding the new committee studying therapeutic abortions in Canada over the next six months. Will the committee equally be studying the adequacy of family planning facilities in all areas as a means of preventing the need for abortions in the first place?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the other day I tabled the terms of reference of the committee, and there is consideration being given in those terms of reference to that issue.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ALLEGED SCRAPPING OF FREIGHT CARS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him if he would investigate the fact that CPR has been reducing its rolling stock by scrapping freight cars every day, many of them in good condition, a program which is contrary to the understanding which the minister had with the railways and which has led to the layoffs of almost 1,000 people in Winnipeg?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did some preliminary investigation when we purchased hopper cars. It was, of course, with the understanding contained in the subsequent agreement that the removal of regular cars could not be accelerated. It was never contemplated that all cars would be kept in service. I am told that so far as the CNR is concerned that agreement is being adhered to, and I believe it may also be true in relation to CPR, but we are looking further into that.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that there have been virtually no layoffs by the CNR but substantial layoffs in many cities in Canada by CPR, would the minister look into the question of whether CPR is in fact adhering to the agreement at which they arrived with the minister three years ago or whether CPR is exempt from following agreements and understandings which they made with the Government of Canada in good faith?

Mr. Lang: Of course, they are not exempt, and I have indicated I have begun and will continue to look into that question. The layoff situation on the railways is in part due to the economic slow down in the economy and therefore a modification in the use of cars. When cars are used to a lesser extent, the repair required for those cars is also reduced. I think that explains some of the layoffs.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ACTION TO DEAL WITH VIOLENCE IN HOCKEY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Will the minister be communicating with his provincial counterparts in light of the strong representations made with respect to violence in hockey in light of the protest by Bobby Hull last weekend? Will he be conferring with his provincial counterparts to ensure that similar action is taken in the various other provinces?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I understand that what Mr. McMurtry has done has been to instruct Crown counsel and police to take action under the existing law to deal with the question of violence in hockey. I would urge that all other attorneys general follow Mr. McMurtry's lead in this, but so far as I understand the situation Mr. McMurtry is not requesting of me any change in the criminal code. He is simply asking officers within his jurisdiction to enforce the law, and that would seem to be a good idea.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am very pleased at the answer of the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that his own feelings are identified with those of the attorney general of Ontario, would he take the time and trouble to clarify this matter with the other provincial ministers who are responsible in this area in order that definite action be taken with respect to what has grown to be a very difficult and bad example for young people all across this country?

Mr. Basford: In respect of the proper jurisdiction of provincial attorneys general, all that would be appropriate for me to do would be to draw the attention of the provincial attorneys to the remarks of Mr. McMurtry.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TO MAINTAIN PRICE OF BEEF—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that last year the federal government, in agreement with the provinces, helped the beef producers because the price of beef was too low and that this year the price of calves is still lower than last year, could the minister advise us whether he proposes to meet his provincial counterparts to discuss this matter, in order to restore reasonable prices or to give a reasonable subsidy to the producers so that they can continue their production this year?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the program that I announced the other day is similar to the one we had last year. That one, instead of finishing next August, is finishing this year, December 31, and a new program will be drafted beginning January 1, for the fiscal year. I understand that a consultative committee made up of deputy provincial ministers will be meeting in Ottawa to discuss this and other stabilization programs for agriculture.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Would the minister tell the House whether this new program the federal government will establish with the provinces will be a long term program aimed at compensating the producers for the chaos they were in in recent years as far as beef production is concerned?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the general principle of proper stabilization is to take the bust and boom out of agriculture.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED APPLICATION OF WAGE GUIDELINES TO DIVIDENDS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Is the government reconsidering its guidelines relating to dividends and specifically is it now on the point of agreeing to the suggestion I made in the House on October 16 to the effect that the freeze on dividends be lifted and that dividends and wages be subjected to the same sort of guidelines, that is 10 per cent and $2,400?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that we have been considering a number of changes in the guidelines and that the representations with respect to dividends, among others, are under consideration. I hope to be able to make an announcement, probably in the course of committee hearings on the bill next week.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF SAVINGS BOND DIVIDEND CHEQUES IN VIEW OF POSTAL STRIKE

Hon. Donald S. We do indeed have under negotiation with the chartered banks an alternate system for getting the November 1 interest payments on Canada savings bonds into the hands of the recipients, we hope, by the end of this week or early next week.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DURATION OF STRIKE AND POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister about progress in the negotiations on the postal strike. Since the statements by the Postmaster General indicate that the major issues have not yet been dealt with, can the Acting Prime Minister give the House an estimate of how long negotiations will continue, and would the government reconsider its refusal to restore postal service while negotiations are going on?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the negotiations are proceeding. They broke off today about noon and will be resumed at four o'clock. Progress is being made. I think that a statement such as the hon. gentleman asks me to make at this time would do nothing to advance the negotiations.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY FOR SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has he had an opportunity since the time of his appointment to acquaint himself with the problems of the people of southwestern Ontario who have been without adequate public transportation since the government allowed the railways in 1971 to discontinue passenger service in the area and, if so, when will he be making the government's long awaited and much promised announcement of a public transportation policy for the area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to look at quite a number of aspects of transportation in the southwestern Ontario area. There are some studies going on into a variety of questions there, including questions of improved rail service and studies with the province of Ontario in relation to transport in that area. Of course, the province of Ontario has significant responsibilities in the field as well and that should not be forgotten. At this point I do not have a date and I cannot predict the time of the announcement of further measures, but I can assure the hon. member that we are looking at the over-all situation very closely.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

EFFECT OF REFUSAL OF BID BY WHITE CONSOLIDATED TO TAKE OVER WESTINGHOUSE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT JOBS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister regarding the gun that White Consolidated Industries is pointing at the head of the government with regard to the deal of Westinghouse. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, in light of the urgency and importance of the matter, whether he and members of the cabinet have met with White Consolidated, General Steel Wares, Westinghouse and the union involved and, if so, whether this entire matter has been resolved to ensure the protection of 2,300 jobs. Can he report anything in that regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I cannot report it quite as definitely as the hon. gentleman has asked for in his question. However, various members of the government have been concerned about this issue, and we have had some consultations collectively about it. I am not certain what the next step should be. We have been in touch with some of the parties concerned, but we have not met them collectively.

● (1500)

Mr. Alexander: I am very surprised that the Acting Prime Minister should indicate he is not sure what the next step should be, keeping in mind that this matter must be resolved by October 31, which is the deadline in terms of the option to purchase. After all the discussions the minister has had, can he now assure this House that this matter will be resolved by October 31? If not, this whole contract will be frustrated, and therefore 2,300 jobs will be in jeopardy. Can he assure this House that the matter will be determined by the 31st of this month?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: I would like to be able to give that assurance; however, as the hon. gentleman knows, we do not have the necessary authority. For example, we had certain authority, in connection with the takeover bid, to make a decision. I do not think because of a lack of constitutional and legal authority we have authority to require any of the parties to take any particular action. However, we are trying as much as we can to bring about the same objective as the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order with respect to what is anticipated to be the controversial report of Mr. Justice Bayda on west coast grain handling. On October 17, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), in response to a question asked by me, indicated in the House that he would be tabling this report within a week. I now discover that the report, which suggests a special tribunal be set up to enforce stiff penalties on management of labour groups involved in illegal grain handling disputes, has in fact been leaked. It seems to me that if this report is in fact ready, the government has an obligation to lay it upon the table so that all members of parliament and the public may see it in the ordinary course of events, rather than having it come through some kind of leak through the press.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the report referred to by the hon. member has been received and is being reviewed by the department. It should be tabled within a few days.

SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA

Question No. 3,053—Mr. Brisco:

1. Has the Department of the Secretary of State or the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs ever asked the Department of National Revenue to investigate the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, for what reason?

2. What form of investigation has been conducted by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs into the affairs and business practices of the Society and what were its findings?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) Consumer and Corporate Affairs has not requested the Department of National Revenue to investigate the affairs of the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada. (b) Consumer and Corporate Affairs had no reason or justification to request such an investigation.

2. Consumer and Corporate Affairs has conducted an accounting investigation into the affairs of the company. Except as noted hereunder, a complete audit of the company's books and records failed to disclose any irregularity or impropriety, including the grants obtained from the Secretary of State. One particular transaction, however, deserves closer scrutiny and the Superintendent of Bankruptcy has requested the R.C.M.P. to investigate.

1 and 2. The Department of the Secretary of State has not asked the Department of National Revenue to investigate the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada. The reason for this is that the Society, in receiving funds from the department in previous fiscal years, met the required procedures in submitting budgetary and other necessary information, before and after their projects took place.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (1971)

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock last evening I was reminding the minister that during the speeches given by my colleagues, and especially during the speech given by the spokesman for our party on this issue, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), there were numerous very positive, reasonable and worth-while suggestions made as to how this legislation might be further improved. I suggested to the minister that he would be serving his own interests, the interests of the country and the interests of all Canadians if in fact during the course of the committee deliberations he were to look favourably on these suggestions which would improve the legislation even further.

These amendments are certainly necessary. It is agreed that the Unemployment Insurance Act as introduced in 1971 can only be described as a mess. It has cost the Canadian public many hundreds of millions of dollars, and improvement is long overdue. I am sure that no member of parliament or, for that matter, many Canadians, would seriously quarrel with the principle of unemployment insurance, that is, the principle that insurance should be provided to deal with the consequences of involuntary unemployment. However, I believe there has grown up amongst the Canadian people a vast amount of confusion and, indeed, resentment over vacillating government policies which on one hand give at one period of time, and on the other hand take away at another time.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his Thanksgiving Day speech to the nation calling for severe restraint, stated:

> All over the world, people are caught in the grip of what some have called the revolution of rising expectations. We have come to expect that there is some magic by which we can have cheap and plentiful food, energy, housing and government services, together with an ever improving standard of living. We expect this as a matter of right, regardless of how successful or unsuccessful we are in increasing our production of goods and services.

It is my opinion, and I am certain this feeling is shared by a great many citizens of Canada, that this Liberal government must take the major share of the responsibility for these rising expectations of the people of Canada. The Unemployment Insurance Act is only one example of Liberal government policies which have led the Canadian people to raise their expectations of government services to the point where the government is now calling for a program of restraint which, as the Prime Minister stated, is the heaviest imposed upon Canadians since the Second World War.

There are three measures in the proposed legislation which embody the principle of restraint. The first is an increase from three to six weeks in the period of disqualification for those who have quit, have been fired from their jobs or have refused suitable employment. I believe this provision is an improvement over the present legislation; it will undoubtedly reduce the number of abuses in respect of unemployment insurance benefits. The other two measures, termination of benefits at age 65 and the reduction of benefits to low income claimants, while contributing to restraint to some extent cannot, I feel, be justified on either economic or ethical grounds.

Let me expand on this point. Those in the labour force over age 65 have only a 10 per cent participation rate in the unemployment insurance scheme. Even if this entire group was receiving unemployment insurance benefits at the average Canadian rate of $74.61 per week for 15.9 weeks—and I emphasize that all these points are highly unlikely and have been overestimated—the total saving to the Government of Canada would be $2.77 million, or .07 per cent of this year's deficit. That is hardly significant, Mr. Speaker, in terms of employed persons over age 65. I believe the benefits to the government, whatever they may be, do not outweigh the detrimental effects felt by these persons. The provision to do away with the special benefit rate for low income claimants will affect those in dire circumstances, those to whom the benefits are most useful. In these three amendments we see measures which embody the principle of restraint. But can this restraint be justified when it affects the poor and the aged, those least able to bear the added restraint?

When the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were debated in committee in 1971, some opposition was expressed to the provision of retirement benefits since these were not seen as falling within the principle of unemployment insurance with respect to interruption of earnings. This opposition was brushed aside by the government, however, and the provision for retirement benefits was passed. I do not wish to seem unconcerned about the plight of our senior citizens; indeed, this concern has been expressed a great many times. But I wish to make the point that this is a concrete example of the government's contribution to the "revolution of rising expectations". The government puts the blame on the Canadian people for their rising expectations, while their policies contribute directly to this attitude: they give with one hand and take away with the other.

I have said that I approve of the provision to increase the disqualification period from three weeks to six weeks as I feel it is, taken over-all, a valid vehicle for restraint. Moreover, I feel it will contribute to shoring up the Unemployment Insurance Act in the badly needed area of work incentives. Indeed, this is the only amendment proposed for the Unemployment Insurance Act which is designed to deal with the problem of work incentives. The inclusion of work incentives goes back to the basic principle of unemployment insurance, one which has been debated many times over the past few years but which has become even more pressing as the cost of operating the Unemployment Insurance Act becomes more and more prohibitive. This principle concerns, of course, whether the payment of unemployment insurance benefits should be regarded as strictly insurance or whether it should include aspects of income supplement.

My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, and others who have spoken in this debate have asked to what degree the Unemployment Insurance Act as presently constituted has undermined the work ethic in this country. The idea has been pooh-poohed by some, but not by those who have looked objectively at the effect on unemployment insurance. The destruction of the work ethic is something all Canadians should be concerned about. It represents a change in our society which is not an improvement.

Concern has been expressed about young people who show no concern for their future, about the degree of vandalism which is apparent, and about the disrespect for many features in our system. The statistics are alarming. I would not suggest that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is causing this, but I think it would be foolhardy not to recognize that the change in our sense of responsibility, in our appreciation of the importance of work, in the importance of initiative, and of being responsible each for his own welfare, has contributed to a general breakdown in our traditional patterns. If there is any improvement in conditions at all, it is an accident and is not due to the clear direction of this government.

The other aspect of the deterioration of the work ethic in this country is the drop in productivity of Canadian labour. Recent statistics show that the drop has been dramatic in the last couple of years, and in fact is negative for the first time since figures have been recorded. The effects on our economy and our standard of living are extremely serious. It would be unfortunate if those in charge neglected the possibility that misconstrued and maladministered programs such as the UIC have contributed directly to that drop in productivity.

I would suggest that this government are taking an about-turn on the principle of unemployment insurance, not on the basis that they are concerned about the work ethic but, rather, on the grounds that the cost to the government is unwieldy and that the present act contains features which have undesirable effects on the work ethic. There is no question that the cost of the Unemployment Insurance program is becoming prohibitive. Benefit payments in 1974-75 amounted to $2.3 billion, with the government picking up $700 million. Benefit payments in 1975-76 are expected to exceed $3.75 billion, placing a total cost on the government of approximately $1.75 billion, an increase of 150 per cent over the previous year.

As to work incentives, while we support the extended disqualification period, the Progressive Conservative Party has proposed a measure which we feel would more directly contribute to fostering the incentive to work. We have suggested for some time that eligibility for unemployment insurance be based on an extended period in the work force. In the 1971 debate on amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, we proposed that the eligibility period should be at least 12 weeks and not the eight weeks that is currently required. This extension would ensure that unemployment insurance would be directed to those who were securely tied to the work force, and as such it would be unemployment insurance and not just another welfare program open to public abuse. Such a measure would also contribute to restraint in a way that would be universal, and would not bear only on those least able to pay, as in the case of the aged and the poor.

I believe that the most valid criticism of the current proposals to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act can be made on the basis that the government openly courted rising expectations on the part of the Canadian people by opening the terms of reference of unemployment insurance benefits to include welfare payments as well as insurance against involuntary employment. Now that they have reaped the harvest of their policy, prohibitive costs and abuses due to work disincentive, they turn around and call for restraint on the part of the people of Canada. These restraints, however, would affect those least in a position to practice restraint.

In addition, the government has abdicated its responsibility for rising unemployment in Canada and the ensuing rising cost of unemployment insurance benefits. This has been accomplished by establishing a new unemployment benchmark, thereby ensuring that little or none of the additional cost of unemployment insurance will fall on the federal treasury in years ahead. Originally, the government arranged to lift the ceiling on its contribution to unemployment insurance benefits as the true cost of their 1971 amendments started rolling in and the ineffectiveness of their economic policies began to show up in unemployment figures, and now they have arranged to bury federal government contributions by adding them as a direct tax on the Canadian people. It has been estimated that this new tax in the form of increased UIC payments will amount to $89 or more annually on the wages and salaries of Canadians.

If the government were really concerned about workers in Canadian society it would use all its expertise and experience to devise means for bringing more Canadians back into the work force. It would do this by utilizing all the resources of Manpower, by encouraging work and by incentives, and not, as can be seen in these amendments, merely by working out ways to finance unemployment insurance schemes at the expense of people who are low on the wage scale.

As justice must be seen to be done, and not merely done, so the government must devise amendments to the act which will instil confidence in all Canadians, those who are working and paying for these benefits, employers and those who are in the unfortunate position of having to collect benefits. Measures are needed to tighten the eligibility for benefit. More effort must be put into finding jobs for the unemployed, and the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act must be improved for the sake of those rightfully receiving unemployment benefits.

Additional provisions must be enacted to curb abuses of the unemployment insurance system. One method that would accomplish this would be to base eligibility on both earnings, and the number of weeks employed during the full 52 weeks of the previous year. This provision would have the advantage of removing from the unemployment insurance rolls those seasonal workers who earn as much for working several months of the year as do some workers who work a full year and are laid off. This amendment, I feel, would bring a semblance of equity into the act, which is long overdue in the eyes of the Canadian public, employees and employers. I think most members could tell stories about people in their constituencies whose incomes are very healthy indeed. Because these people earn their income in less than a full year, they are entitled to go on unemployment insurance for the remainder of the year when they are not working. Technically, I suppose, these are not abuses because the act allows it to happen. Nonetheless, one can see that this is unfair. It creates a great deal of resentment on the part of those not so fortunate as to take advantage of the act in this way.

Secondly, the UIC must put more effort into the quick and effective reabsorption of unemployed workers into the labour force. This it can do only with a fully integrated program with the Department of Manpower. We have all, undoubtedly, as members of parliament, had brought to our attention numerous cases of the damage done to our constituents by the inability of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower department to provide assistance to the jobless in finding employment. In some cases this has been caused by lack of integration of programs and, on the other hand, by duplication of programs. These anomalies could be erased somewhat if the Manpower department and the Unemployment Insurance Commission were to merge and if the unemployed receiving benefits were counselled on a regular basis.

The final point I should like to make regarding the present amendments to this act is on the question of administration. Even if the legislation were to contain all the amendments proposed on both sides of the House, I say that unless the act is well administered it is of no practical use. During the last couple of years the administration of the present act has been a source of numerous complaints. I have been a member of this House since 1972, and—I am sure other members will agree—by far the largest percentage of our constituency mail involves complaints about the payment of UIC claims. Surely, some simplification of procedures and forms can be instituted in the department to allow the average citizen to complete the requirements of the department without such difficulty. As it stands now, you must practically have had a higher education to fulfill the requirements of the commission.

I have outlined some of the features of which I think the government should take serious note. These are not paltry objections but, rather, ones which concern all Canadians, especially all Canadian taxpayers who are confused and resentful of the government's policies and the objects of the unemployment insurance scheme. I hope and trust that the government will give my views and the views of my colleagues their careful consideration, and that our joint discussions will result in a more equitable unemployment insurance scheme. As I said at the beginning, the majority of Canadians support a true insurance scheme which protects those who, through no fault of their own, are unemployed. By the same token, abuses made possible by mismanagement in the past and poor administration have built up a huge reservoir of resentment. This resentment must be removed. These abuses have deteriorated the sense of worth and purpose in this country and they have deteriorated the work ethic. The side effects have been serious.

The difficulty will be resolved, I suggest, if the government gives serious consideration to our suggestions. If it does, I suggest that this bill will receive quick and easy passage through the committee stage and all Canadians will benefit. But until we see a willingness on the part of the government to listen, I can only echo the remarks of my colleague from Hamilton West. We intend to vote against this legislation on second reading. Nevertheless, we hope that the committee deliberations will encourage us to vote in favour of the bill on third reading.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I put on the record this afternoon some of my thoughts concerning the UIC program and this bill. Surely amendments brought forward at present and in future are designed to streamline and clarify the law. We need to cut down abuses and to shift some of the benefits of the program from those who are casually attached to the labour force to those who are permanently attached to the labour force. This bill deserves the support of the members from all parties, for we must help those who need help most.

I am disturbed to hear some of the bitter attacks made on the UIC both inside and outside this House. What is the alternative to UIC? I wonder if municipalities in parts of the country where unemployment is high have the tax base to fund the type of welfare program which would be needed in the absence of UIC. I suspect that the strongest supporters of UIC are municipal councillors across Canada.

I hope I can make clear that we are considering some of the first amendments which will be brought down, for the act will be under continuous review. In future, there will be additional amendments to the UIC program which will need consideration. I certainly support the amendments presently being brought forward. These amendments are designed to eliminate the inequities and complexities inherent in the act. I agree with the hon. member who spoke previously: the act is complex and difficult to administer. These complexities and difficulties have given rise to many borderline cases, as the act does not always define clearly who is or who is not eligible for benefit. This lack of clarity has meant that people in our constituency offices, our staffs in the House and people in UIC offices, must spend much of their time dealing with marginal cases. Sometimes it is difficult to determine who qualifies for benefits.

I am particularly pleased with the amendment designed to eliminate disincentives—disincentives which, perhaps, may be associated with the present legislation. It is essential for the UIC program to be credible; its success depends to a large extent on public support and public opinion. I trust that these amendments will do much to increase public support.

I am concerned about the treatment of people leaving jobs voluntarily. It is apparent that some people engage in job misconduct. They are subsequently fired, only to receive benefits. I am concerned, also, about the high percentage of people refusing job opportunities. The present bill deals with these matters. Surely it should be the basic approach of the UIC program that we shall provide income to those who are unemployed against their will, provided that they have qualified for entitlement to benefits through previous attachment to the work force. That, surely, is what the amendments and the bill are all about.

I do not have as much difficulty with the amendments to the act as some members, in terms of eliminating from the act some of the provisions covered in other social legislation. If we approve of the amendments put forward, our Unemployment Insurance Act will be improved considerably. These amendments provide a greater amount of assurance against unemployment, as opposed to compensating someone with retirement income or the many other things factored into it. In this manner, assurance against unemployment will lead to stronger public support, in effect, this means the UIC act will be considerably easier to administer.

I am particularly pleased that introduced in the amendments is the payments of improved sick benefits. Nearly every other member of this House, plus myself, made representations on this amendment. Some of the most difficult and time-consuming cases we as members of parliament deal with are those pregnancy leaves where difficulties after the birth occur, or where a person has been sick, returns to work and gets sick again. Experience seems to indicate that the second illness may be more severe and prolonged than the initial one. This works great hardship on the individual concerned. Many times these people have no other income protection for sickness. It is a great step forward that improved more flexible sick benefits are included in the amendments.

If I may, I wish to raise another issue in which I am keenly interested. Who are the unemployed? In this area, we should be more definitive when answering that question. My understanding is that a survey is being conducted on 30,000 households to find out who is classified as being unemployed. There should be no quarrel with that number because statistically the number is large. Such a survey should yield a very accurate sample and response. However, what I take issue with is the question asked: Are you unemployed, and are you actively looking for work? It seems that many government policies are set and based upon the unemployment rate. In fact, many of our economic policies also rely upon the unemployment act. For this reason, we should have more detailed information as to who are the unemployed.

My suggestion is to change the survey so that the response indicates what percentage of the people unemployed are the principal wage earners of the household. That would be a very different figure from the total unemployed. In this survey we should also be exploring why these people are unemployed, whether these people left the job or whether these people are a new entry into the work force. That is a particularly significant statistic. We should also determine whether these people were laid off on a recall basis, or laid off without any recall possibility. That type of statistic would further define who are the unemployed, and possibly where we should be directing more of the benefits. I would like to see also, the weekly survey turn up information that will identify the number of new entries into the work force, the number of people who had a major attachment to the work force, and are now unemployed, and the number of people who had a rather casual attachment to the work force.

During this debate there has been a lot of talk concerning the over-all administration of unemployment insurance benefits. I have also heard that more emphasis should be placed on the role played by the Department of Manpower. In the offices where the Unemployment Insurance Commission works extremely well and UIC is extremely well handled, UIC is in fact performing some of the functions that we would ordinarily expect the Department of Manpower to perform. If it is in order, I wish to commend the Unemployment Insurance Commission office in Barrie which services part of my constituency. An activity that I think UIC officers should be performing, supported strongly by Manpower, is monitoring the job situation very carefully so that the UIC officers are aware of any significant lay-offs prior to such a happening.

At the time of the lay-off, the UIC officers are present along with the union and management people to sort out all the difficulties in establishing claims. Most important, by monitoring the work opportunities as closely as the UIC officers do, the UIC officers know ahead of time exactly when the callbacks are scheduled and where other opportunities exist. Therefore, those on benefits are very quickly directed to other opportunities. This drastically cuts down the number on benefits and gives the appearance that the UIC operation is sincerely concerned with employment rather than just the payment of benefits to the unemployed.

I know there are great variations across Canada in the nature of communities and problems. In some areas there is a multitude of employment opportunities, with a great variety and number of industries. In another area there may be only one employer. The program should provide that where there is little or no alternate employment after a certain period of time, it is proper that Manpower retraining be supported by the UIC benefit. That would be a better use of the money and the individual's time than to be on benefit without any real opportunity of obtaining work in the near future. I support the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) who on a number of occasions has advocated that the name "unemployment insurance" be changed to "employment insurance." That would be a worth-while amendment to be considered at some time in the future.

I wonder a bit about the amendment with regard to the situation where people lose jobs due to self-initiated misconduct, voluntary leaving without just cause, or refusal to apply for or accept a suitable job. The bill proposes lengthening from three to six weeks the period to become eligible for benefits, and in fact losing benefits for three weeks. Possibly the onus should be on the individual to prove that one of these three situations is not the case. If he is able to prove that, he should have the same benefit as anyone else under the act. However, the onus should be on him to establish the fact that he did not leave because of misconduct, that there was just cause for him to leave for some very valid reason or that he could not accept a job.

Members opposite have been proposing a 12-week period. The amendment speaks of an additional three weeks. I believe the entire onus should be on the individual to establish whether in fact he is entitled to regular benefits. Having done so, they should be available to him.

I support the amendment to delete the provision with regard to advance payments. I do not say that because it may or may not be an incentive to get back into the work force. I do not know whether you do an individual a favour by giving him an advance payment. The money may be claimed back after the person has spent it. I have seen cases where this has caused tremendous hardship. Certainly, many hours of my time are spent dealing with people who have had an advance payment, it is claimed back and they have neither the money nor the credit to get it. It would be better if they had not received the money in the first place.

I support the approach in the bill which, in effect, decreases benefits and increases the difficulty of getting benefits for those marginally attached to the work force, and increases benefits and decreases the difficulty in getting benefits for those who have a continuous attachment to the work force. Another amendment that I am glad to see speaks to the problem of social insurance. I am sure that many of the numbers we hear from time to time of people obtaining social insurance are exaggerated. Nevertheless, we must acknowledge that there are abuses and that people do get social insurance improperly. This is a problem that does no one a service; everyone is hurt by it, the employer and the employee.

● (1540)

Those people obtaining social insurance numbers by illegal means will in most cases end up in employment which is paying the minimum wage or even less. I hope that the social insurance number provision in here will help correct this problem. I would like to have the assurance that this provision would, if possible, almost totally correct any abuse where people might be able to get social insurance numbers improperly.

I see my time is just about up, and I would like to conclude by commending the amendments in the legislation. Speaking to the illness benefits, as everyone in the House knows, the present provision provides that illness benefits are payable only during the initial benefit period of a claim and are not payable during the re-establishment or extended benefit periods of any claim. It goes on in terms of regulations respecting the difference between a major attachment and a minor attachment. I find no difficulty with that part, but I think the major provision, whereby illness benefits are only payable during the initial benefit period, really works a tremendous hardship on a lot of people. We must all be aware of people who have been injured, who have been working with Workmen's Compensation rehabilitation programs, and so on, and have gone back to work only to find they have a recurrence of the illness or their injury is not sufficiently healed. In fact, they may well be off work longer the second time than they were the first time.

Many of these people have no other income protection for this eventuality, and because they cannot file a claim I think it works a good deal of hardship upon them, even if people had only used a small amount of their eligibility in terms of their 15 weeks. So by making it more flexible and allowing more latitude, this is a social measure I strongly support. I hope all members in the House share my opinion. To extend the period during which the eligibility for benefits may be established, to persons who have left the labour force for periods of time for reasons clearly beyond their control, like serious sickness or serious injury with resulting disability, seems to me to call for the unanimous consent of the House.

The other point I mentioned previously and I would like to comment on it again. I am an engineer, not a doctor like my good friend from Halton (Mr. Philbrook). It has always amazed me that the medical profession can predict the accurate date of birth. Whether they are as accurate as they pretend to be, I have no idea, but most certainly they all do in many cases where birth has in fact been premature, so that a person did not have an opportunity earlier to lay claim for that eight-week period. It seems that sometimes these women have serious difficulty and the six-week period afterwards does not adequately cover that problem. By taking the 14-week period and making it more flexible as to when a person can take advantage of it is surely a fair thing that should be available to any woman who has need of pregnancy leave.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying I am pleased the minister has brought the bill forward and that these amendments are contained in it. I would hope that the bill is only stage one of a review of the act, because it is a large act and affects many people across Canada. I think it is worthy of being continuously under review.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in anyone's mind that the unemployment insurance law is one of those measures which has to be reviewed by parliament from time to time. The present Unemployment Insurance Act obviously has within it certain inherent weaknesses. I imagine there is not a member of this House who has not been called upon to deal with problems arising from those weaknesses, shortcomings and anomalies. Indeed, not a week goes by without our having to deal with questions arising from the administration of this statute.

So there is no doubt in anybody's mind that the present law needs tightening up. Certain of the provisions in the bill now before us address themselves to the shortcomings and anomalies to which I have referred. If that were the extent of the legislation, the bill would receive easy and speedy passage because we are all agreed on the need to take whatever steps may be necessary to prevent a small minority in our society abusing this legislation.

I am glad to see that some of the punitive sections of the act are being tightened up and that steps are to be taken to reduce, at least, the scope of the abuses which take place frequently. As I say, if this were the extent of the bill, it would secure an easy passage through the House. Obviously, our job as members of parliament would be made easier because the workload in our offices would be reduced. The most extensive problems we have to deal with, especially in our constituency offices, relate to unemployment insurance.

What concerns me are those provisions in the bill which lean heavily upon two groups in our society which already suffer most as a consequence of inflation. I refer specifically to old age pensioners and to low income earners with dependent children. First, let us take the case of low-income earners with dependent children. The bill proposes to end the secial privilege they now enjoy under the statute and to give them the same benefits as anybody else receives, notwithstanding the fact that their obligations are greater than those of others.

I listened to the argument put forward by the minister when he introduced the bill with respect to the new amendments to the Family Allowance Act which provide for increased family allowance payments. The minister suggested that these arrangements would look after the particular group to which I have just referred. He used much the same argument with regard to the position of old age pensioners. But let us take the case of an unemployment insurance recipient who has five dependent children. After this bill becomes law, he will receive the same benefits as everybody else—66⅔ per cent of his income as opposed to the 75 per cent he formerly received. He would be entitled to receive $100 a month, in round figures, in family allowance benefits. But that sum in no way covers the expenses he must incur in providing food, clothing, shelter and other necessities of life for his family. Why should the low income earner with a large family be discriminated against in this way? Why lean on him? This is precisely what the bill attempts to do.

● (1550)

In my province we have the highest rate of unemployment in the country, the second lowest per capita income in the country, the highest rate of inflation in the country and the largest families in the country. Given these statistics, the bill is going to take a particularly heavy toll of the 18 per cent of the work force currently unemployed in the province of Newfoundland. The majority of the people who are unemployed, statistics tell us, are the very group that the bill will lean on most heavily—the group with dependent children.

The minister has done a great job of administering the LIP program. He has involved members of parliament in LIP decision-making and as a result has taken away some of the administrative burden from his own shoulders. He has involved us all in the LIP program. But I would tell him that this is not the way to reform the Unemployment Insurance Act. This is not the kind of reform that the members of this House want. Indeed, I would say that the majority of the members of the House, if they voted according to their conscience, would vote against that particular provision in the bill. The people who will be affected by it the most are those who live in provinces where unemployment is highest, namely, the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec.

Coincidentally, these are the provinces where the largest families reside. According to statistics, families are larger in Quebec, Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces generally than any other part of Canada. These are the people who will be hurt the most by this particular provision in the bill, and I hope that before the bill is given third reading the minister will reconsider it.

While it is true to say that inflation hurts us all, it hurts the low income earner the most. I reject the argument that because a man is receiving unemployment insurance the state has discharged its obligation to him. Notwithstanding that he may be receiving unemployment insurance and family allowance benefits, the fact is that he has to devote a disproportionately greater amount of his disposable income, the little that he has, to the purchase of food. Food inflation in Canada is taking its highest toll at the present time.

A man in receipt of $75 a week unemployment insurance and $25 a week family allowance, which means he would have to have five children, has $100 a week to buy food, clothing, shelter, transportation and education for himself, his wife and his five dependent children. I ask members of this House, given the situation that we have in Canada today, with high food prices, high fuel prices, with the cost of everything disproportionately high as a result of the inflation that we are suffering, to try to imagine how anyone can live adequately and provide their children with an adequate diet on $100 a week.

For this reason, I hope the minister will reconsider this unjust and iniquitous provision of the bill. It will do great injustice to this particular group in society which is already suffering the most—the low income earner with a large family. He cannot help it if he is unemployed. He does not want to be unemployed. He did not bring on the monetary and fiscal situation in Canada that has created the recession we are now experiencing—7.3 per cent unemployment nationally, in excess of 10 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and 18 per cent in Newfoundland—but he has to suffer the consequences of it. Why should we increase the price that he has to pay by reducing the little extra benefit that parliament in its wisdom put into the act to take account of the extra burden he has to bear owing to his low income and the large family that he has to support?

The other group that equally cries out for justice is the old age pensioners. They suffer even more because their income is fixed. I know their pensions are now indexed, which does help them in some small way, but nevertheless they watch their limited pensions being reduced in spending power monthly by an inflationary situation in Canada with which we have yet to come to grips. Take the case of the old age pensioner, man or woman, whether they worked all their lives or made a contribution in some other way: the fact of the matter is that in this bill we are adding to their burden by eliminating them from the unemployment insurance rolls. Secondly, and equally unjustly and iniquitously, we are removing the incentive that we presently provide these people, with their accumulated fund of knowledge and experience, to stay in the work force.

Many old age pensioners in this country write to members of parliament pointing out that they fail to understand how their representatives here can consider putting such a provision as this in an unemployment insurance bill, let alone pass it into law. The old age pensioners of this country are entitled to unemployment insurance as of right because they have paid for it. Their desire is to continue to be part of the work force. Obviously, the provisions of the act cannot apply to old age pensioners who are no longer part of the work force, and no one would want the act to apply to them. But what about the thousands of old age pensioners in Canada who are forced to retire at the age of 65? They want to continue to work, they register for employment with Manpower, and they rightly feel, having paid into this scheme all their working lives, that they are entitled to its benefits while waiting for the government to find them new employment. Yet these are the people we are eliminating from the unemployment insurance rolls of this country. This is unjust, unfair and cruel, and I hope the minister and his government will reconsider this provision.

The third aspect of this bill that has disturbed me is the changing of the benchmark, which will have the concomitant effect of increasing unemployment insurance deductions. Once again, who will have to bear the heaviest burden of this increase? Who will have to pay the highest price? Who will have to suffer most as a consequence? The answer to these questions is, the low income earner of this country and the person on fixed income who spends such a disproportionate amount of his disposable income on food, clothing and shelter and who sees his income dwindling still further by having to pay increased unemployment insurance contributions. This will be the situation if the provisions of this bill go through the House. These are the three aspects of the bill that bother me.

I hope hon. members will sufficiently impress the minister so that he will reconsider this measure in this period of high inflation and high unemployment. We all hope there will come a time somewhere down the road when we will have inflation and unemployment controlled at acceptable levels. Perhaps then, and only then, should we consider bringing in this punitive type of legislation which will rest so heavily on the working poor, pensioners and those on fixed incomes in this country.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my participation in this debate today will not be lengthy. At the outset, I want to point out to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who made a rather impassioned plea on behalf of the unemployed in his province, that we have in place in this country various other social assistance programs designed to provide aid to the needy—and that is not supposed to be the function of unemployment insurance. Perhaps he should talk to his Tory colleagues in St. John's about increasing the social assistance benefits to those in his province who are going to be excluded.

An hon. Member: The same old story.

Mr. McGrath: What about your own province?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I should like to begin by commenting on some of the specific amendments proposed in Bill C-69. I think it is proper and sensible that sponsors of Local Initiatives and Local Employment Assistance Programs should now become eligible for coverage and benefits. It has always seemed incongruous to me that governments should provide funds for the purpose of alleviating unemployment at the local level, and then penalize those who take the initiative to sponsor such programs by making them ineligible for unemployment benefits. If, indeed, the government places importance on job creation for the unemployed in the creation and management of projects, then it has no choice but to bring in this kind of amendment. It will now afford equal treatment to both the individual worker and the individual sponsor under LIP and LEAP projects vis-à-vis unemployment insurance coverage.

With reference to the amendment in respect of coverage of workers 65 years of age and over, I must say that I, too, have some reservations. I can agree quite readily that anyone between age 65 and 70 who is receiving old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and Canada or Quebec Pension Plan benefits should certainly be ineligible to receive unemployment insurance benefits over an extended period of time. However, there are many people who choose, through desire or necessity, to continue active employment after age 65, and while old age security benefits are payable upon application to everyone who has attained age 65, that does not apply to the guaranteed income supplement or Canada Pension Plan benefits.

An hon. Member: It does now.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It does now—automatically?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am sorry.

Mr. Oberle: You want to be a little more careful.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I will try. Therefore, it would seem to me that people who are not receiving a guaranteed income supplement should be eligible to pay into and receive benefits from the unemployment insurance fund. May I remind this House that many people between age 65 and 70 are still supporting dependent children or other relatives who may well be attending university or other institutions of higher learning or who may, through sickness or accident, be unable to assist themselves. I do not believe that any government action, especially action by a Liberal government, should deprive such people of the expectations and historical rights which they have had under this act. I would, therefore, urge that this proposed amendment be redrafted in such a way as to make an exception of those whose attachment to the labour force and whose need for benefit is demonstrated to local officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I find it necessary, also, to say a few words regarding the amendments, in respect of the manner and conditions for claiming benefits. While the present legislation provides authority for the commission to regulate the manner in which a claim for benefit may be made, and while such procedure may be contrary to the basic principle that a regulation may only purport to explain the law or help in administering it, it must be pointed out that legislation is much more rigid than regulation. Therefore, it may well be that experience will prove that legislating the manner and conditions for claiming benefits is so rigid that no allowance is made for special circumstances. If, however, the legislation can be drafted in such a way as to allow for some flexibility in the administration of the act, then I have no objection to it.

I believe the amendments under the clauses dealing with the extension of the qualifying period and the benefit period are beneficial and sensible and I give them my full support. There is, however, one disincentive to work contained in the act to which this bill does not seem to address itself. I refer to the disentitlement of a claimant who takes a part-time job while still receiving unemployment insurance benefits—a job that lasts four or more weeks. After working for four weeks, the claim is discontinued and the claimant finds himself in a position of not being eligible to continue drawing benefits, even though through his own initiative and desire to work he has saved the Unemployment Insurance Commission the payment of four weeks' benefits. The incentive here is to encourage such people not to accept part-time work while receiving benefits. I suspect this is an oversight in the drafting of the bill. I strongly urge that new legislation be proposed to allow claimants to take such short-term employment and, at the end of this employment, be able once again to continue to receive benefits and to renew their claims.

The interpretation of the regulations at present seriously affects one particular group of prospective claimants in the province of New Brunswick. I do not know whether the same applies in other provinces, but several instances of this faulty interpretation of the regulations have been brought to my attention. It is simply this: in the province of New Brunswick, teachers' contracts are dated to coincide with the dates of the school year; that is to say, from July 1 to the following June 30.

Because of the interpretation given by the commission, any individual who signs a teachers's contract in New Brunswick is automatically disentitled to unemployment insurance benefits from July 1 of the year in which the contract is signed, even though the actual pay period for teachers in New Brunswick does not commence until September 1. Consequently, it is entirely possible in fact, it has happened that legitimate claimants have been deprived of unemployment insurance benefits for the months of July and August because they signed a contract while they were receiving unemployment insurance benefits to which they had every entitlement. I might point out that this applies even if an individual signed a contract in the middle of August; he would then be required to pay back all the benefits he received from July 1 to that time.

Of course, I am not referring to teachers who are on continuing contracts from year to year, but to those who are just entering the profession for the first time or are just returning to it after a period of absence. I suspect that this is an administrative blunder made simply by people who do not really understand the peculiar circumstances of the situation, and I sincerely hope this anomaly will be corrected without waiting for the passage of this bill. I need not remind the House that teachers very strongly opposed being included in the unemployment insurance scheme. But since they have been included, and rightly so, no teacher should be deprived of benefits to which he or she has a just claim.

I stress that this is not a complaint against the local officials of the UIC in the area which I have the honour to represent. In fact, I have found the manager of the local unemployment insurance office to be extremely well informed, very capable and most co-operative: I do not want to pass up this opportunity of saying a good word for the oft maligned bureaucrats whose responsibility it is to administer the laws of the country which have a direct effect on the lives of so many of us.

I hoped that Bill C-69 might have included some provision to take into the unemployment insurance scheme seasonal, self-employed persons other than fishermen. There are many individual truckers, for instance particularly in the areas of the country hardest hit by unemployment, who can only work part time because their business is dependent on other business operations whose nature is also seasonal. Because of this, many of them are left with the necessity of supporting themselves and their families as well as making payments on equipment during fairly extended periods of time when they have no income.

I respectfully suggest that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) give more consideration to this problem than it has received to date. This is not to suggest that fishermen who are already covered by the act should not be entitled to the benefits they receive but, rather, that there are other groups of seasonal, self-employed workers who find themselves in very much the same situation as fishermen. In my opinion, the government should be prepared to offer them the same kind of benefits as any other group in our society.

Having said all that, I want it borne in mind that this bill will receive my full support because it does go a long way toward correcting anomalies and injustices which have appeared through the administration of the 1971 act. It has consistently been the policy of successive Liberal governments in this country that government must be prepared to help those in our society who, through no fault of their own, find themselves in the position of being unable to help themselves. This, indeed, is the basic principle underlying all the social legislation passed by the governments of MacKenzie King, Louis St. Laurent, Lester Pearson and Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I am convinced that this is the spirit of liberalism to which the minister has addressed himself in this bill.

An hon. Member: You mean the spirit of evil.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I see that the sanctimonious soldiers of socialism are becoming excited. Although the bill may not be perfect to all eyes, it certainly follows the noble tradition of social justice displayed by the governments of social conscience to whom I have just referred. It is a significant and important piece of legislation and I urge its speedy passage and implementation.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to participate in today's debate on Bill C-69 along with members from all sides of the House, and I welcome the presence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) throughout this debate. Let me say at the outset that, despite my many apprehensions concerning the government's management of the Unemployment Insurance Act, I am in complete agreement with the retention of an adequate wage-loss compensation plan. I fully support the true concept of unemployment insurance.

Unfortunately, however, the plan as we now know it bears little resemblance to what it was set out to be in the original act, namely, a plan of insurance for those whose salary or wages are suddenly interrupted through an unexpected job loss. Bill C-69 does little, if anything, to regain this proper perspective of an actual insurance program. Because benefits are not rigorously tied to employment records, the insurance principle is subverted and the whole scheme becomes largely a plan of social welfare and wage distribution rather than one of unemployment insurance. Because of the high and extremely appealing benefit rate structure, the risk of unemployment is no longer an integral factor in the decision to work or not to work. The traditional work ethic has been seriously jeopardized at a time in our economic life when the country can ill afford it.

What is needed, Mr. Speaker, is a redefinition of the work week and the benefits structure in order that these basic principles can be put back into practice. Without accepting this philosophy, not only in theory but in practice, almost anything the government attempts to do in amending the Unemployment Insurance Act becomes useless. So, in spite of a sprinkled hint of reform here and there, the main thing that can be said about the introduction of Bill C-69 is that its provisions are superfluous to the real problem confronting unemployment insurance today.

In fact, I may even be accused of being overly generous to the government in this regard. On closer examination it would appear that the main thrust of this bill is in the adjustment of the benchmark, the point at which the government agrees to contribute to the fund. This is clearly a regressive step in that it greatly increases the burden of premium payments to employer and employee, yet without an adequate distinction between those who are high-risk insurees and those who are low risk. Surely, this should be basic to any organized plan of insurance, unemployment or otherwise.

What would make far greater sense would be a formula for reducing, on a percentage basis, the amount of premiums paid by those who compile a steady and continuous employment record and who are thus proven to be low risks as potential claimants of benefits. Such a system, if implemented, would be far more equitable than the one we have at present, in that those whose contributions are most reliable—indeed, those who are most conscientious—would not be continually forced to carry those who are not. Admittedly, this would not eliminate all imbalances but it would certainly be a good deal fairer than the present scheme, especially in view of the fact that the government proposes to raise the premium payments of employees through the new benchmark proviso in Bill C-69.

In the same vein, there is need to look at retirement benefits under the unemployment insurance program. As it stands now, one who has been actively employed all his or her working life, one who has contributed the maximum amount in the way of premiums, has little to look forward to in the way of a deserved retirement award. It is time for an adequate retirement clause to be incorporated into the act so that this inequity may be rectified. This would be a welcome addition to Bill C-69.

The very fact that the government deemed it necessary to adjust the benchmark is in itself a self-admission of failure in its handling of the unemployment insurance program. Things have clearly got out of hand and determined action is needed to straighten out the situation. Unfortunately, we can see nothing in Bill C-69 toward this end. It is another case of pulling a drowning man out of the water, then tossing him in again without first teaching him how to swim.

I have already noted that because benefits are not sufficiently connected to employment records, and because benefit rate structures are so appealing, the tendency to a disincentive to work becomes apparent. This obvious shortcoming could be overcome, Mr. Speaker, by redefining the work week and the benefit structure. Where in Bill C-69 do we see a concrete proposal to abandon the work week in favour of a more reliable work year? Rather than calculating benefits on the basis of weekly insurable earnings, why not calculate them on a yearly basis? Initial eligibility need not be affected, but the initial benefit rate could be calculated on both earnings and the number of weeks employed in the previous year.

If an employee had worked a full year prior to a claim, then his benefit rate would be substantially higher than a worker who had a much shorter attachment to the labour force. This scheme would have the obvious advantage of providing work incentives and it would guarantee that the original insurance principles of unemployment insurance were upheld.

I do not wish to go on record, Mr. Speaker, as being opposed to all the provisions of Bill C-69. Some of these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act may prove useful and are worthy of mention. They include, first, extension of the period during which a claim can be made and benefits received for those suffering temporary disability or those who are on special training courses and, second, extension of the time for claiming from 15 weeks to 25 for those entitled to sickness benefits.

It would have been equally constructive to tie maternity benefits to sickness benefits because of the difficulties and unfairness in the calculation of maternity benefits due to the use of the confinement date. I would suggest a set period for maternity benefits or, better still, including as a sickness claim the length, depending upon the doctor's estimate, of temporary disability.

With regard to the increase from three to six weeks of the period of disqualification for those who quit, are fired or refuse suitable employment, one hopes that this extended disqualification period will not only serve to differentiate between those who quit or are fired and those who are laid off or terminated for reasons beyond their control, but will also provide scope for more thorough investigation into the job search being conducted by claimants before they are allowed to collect any benefits at all.

It is a well known fact that many are receiving benefits who, although unemployed, are not conducting an honest job search. In some cases such claimants have no intention whatsoever of working. They are ripping off the system at the expense of honest taxpayers and are being allowed to get away with it. I know of cases where claimants have collected benefits for extended periods of time without ever being asked if they were conducting active job searches. For example, job search reports appear to be sent only to a random selection of claimants. Clearly, a more comprehensive investigative machinery is required. With six weeks available before some claims become payable, it is imperative that all such claimants prove to the Unemployment Insurance Commission that they are actively seeking employment. The burden of proof must be on the claimant, and the standard of proof must be raised.

One way in which this kind of reform can be more easily accomplished is through much further decentralization of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Lack of decentralization has been one of the prime failings of the operation for many years, and I am indeed sorry that no definite amendments are present in Bill C-69 relating to this problem.

I believe that greater understanding between UIC officers and individual claimants, most of whose claims are perfectly legitimate, could be achieved through decentralization. Similarly, there can be no doubt concerning the need for higher quality performance at all levels. Such an undertaking, that is, decentralization, could also offer additional impetus to the promotion of relocation of those among the unemployed who find it impossible to locate work within their own area or territory.

The commission must be encouraged to develop more uniformity in its decisions. Most members of parliament deal with a great many UIC cases and most are acutely aware of the tragic lack of uniformity which mars the performance of most offices. I do not refer simply to the lack of uniformity between offices, but within offices as well. There is a multitude of unfortunate cases on record in which identical claims were processed in differing manners and the outcome of the claims differed considerably. While I have emphasized that more vigilance must be exercised in weeding out those who abuse unemployment insurance, I wish also to reiterate that those who are honest, legitimate and needy claimants must be treated with greater dispatch and in a more uniform manner. As I said previously, this can be most easily accomplished through decentralization and through stronger ties between the commission and Canada Manpower centres.

I recognize that last year the department undertook to increase co-operation between these two agencies. This co-operation has yet to bear fruit. In other words, those who collect benefits because they are unable to find jobs have been given little help by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. While it is true that counselling on job placement is given to most clients, it is felt that a more active role must be undertaken to locate jobs for those unable to find work.

Bill C-69 is a mere drop in the bucket. A comprehensive investigation into the whole scheme of unemployment insurance is overdue. With Bill C-69 as an example of the inability of the government to cope with the problem, perhaps it is time for an objective investigation in order that some truly effective recommendations may be placed before us.

I note that there is no reference in Bill C-69 to occasional workers employed in the agricultural industry. This is a very troublesome problem, particularly in southern Ontario. A heavy percentage of these people are relatives, friends and sometimes neighbours of farmers who may work for one or perhaps two months at a time, thus working over 25 days and earning more than $250. A great majority of these people have no intention of availing themselves of benefits or of taking other jobs, yet they are forced to pay premiums into a fund from which they will never, or seldom, collect. As these workers have no interest in unemployment insurance, it would only be logical that they be exempt from paying premiums if they should so choose. It would be far more equitable to give them the option of contributing or opting out, rather than requiring mandatory payments as is the case now.

I should like to add a few words about seasonal workers of another sort entirely, those in industries who earn better than average incomes over an eight or nine-month period and are well aware in advance of their idle months. Many of these workers earn in excess of $15,000, and even $20,000, during the period they are actively employed. Why, then, are they permitted to collect unemployment insurance benefits?

Once again we return to the basic principle of unemployment insurance, and that is as insurance against job and income loss. In these particular cases jobs are not lost; they are only temporarily suspended. Perhaps more important, there is no unnecessary financial hardship imposed upon the individual worker. In accordance with these facts, it is my suggestion that a ceiling be placed on yearly earnings for which one is eligible to collect unemployment insurance, provided that the job interruption is on a temporary basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wise: Amendments such as these would bring more equality and justice to the Unemployment Insurance Act, yet there is not a hint of them in the legislation of the government—only a few morsels scattered here and there amongst the ruins. Obviously, the government has not given this issue a thorough study. Indeed, insufficient investigation, and thus misguided action, has been the regular practice not only for this particular department but for the government as a whole. It is time for a much longer look at the unemployment insurance problem.

In conclusion, I can support some of the provisions of Bill C-69. In principle, though, I must protest, not so much about what is included in the bill—excepting the benchmark—but, rather, to what is not included in the bill. Many constructive suggestions have been made, particularly by my colleagues on this side of the House, and it would be well for the government to examine them seriously and carefully. I sincerely hope that more amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be forthcoming and that a change in attitude will soon sweep the department, for to neglect the many ills which still exist would represent conduct on the part of the government which could only be viewed as misguided and irresponsible.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, as I read the speech of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) which began debate on this bill, I was struck by the tremendous difference between it and the speech made by the former minister of manpower and immigration who introduced amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in April, 1971. This minister's speech was apologetic, offensive and pessimistic. He obviously forsees a long-term, persistent and high rate of unemployment. The former minister was hopeful, optimistic and obviously expected that the rate of unemployment which prevailed at that time could be drastically reduced.

The best example of the difference to which I have referred can be seen by comparing the parts of the two speeches which deal with the point at which the percentage of unemployment brings the government into the funding of the unemployment insurance scheme. On Monday, October 27, when introducing the bill the present minister referred to the 1971 proposals. He said:

> At that time, a threshold of 4 per cent unemployment was set as the level above which the government would assume the additional costs for unemployment insurance benefits.
> That 4 per cent threshold was related to the economic conditions in the decade preceding 1970. The basic financing principle continues to hold true. Nevertheless, under social insurance principles, normal cost under the unemployment insurance program should be financed as much as possible through contributions from employers and employees.

He went on to say:

> Applying this formula in 1976, the benchmark for the year will be about 5.6 per cent, a level based on average monthly rates of unemployment in the eight years preceding June 30, 1975.

Later he said:

> —the premium change, if the proposed amendments are fully implemented as of January 1, 1976, we can expect a net saving of $170 million in 1976 at a 7 per cent rate of unemployment.

In other words, the minister accepts 7 per cent unemployment as normal. In fact, we have had higher than 7 per cent for almost a year, and the predictions for the next couple of years are that it will go still higher. What did the former minister say when he introduced his amendments in 1971? He said:

Since the figure of 4 per cent has attracted a good deal of attention, I imagine somebody is going to suggest that the government has determined 4 per cent to be an acceptable rate of unemployment in Canada. Well, it is not my criterion. Like everybody else, I believe the acceptable rate of unemployment is the least possible rate.

He continued:

—We have used the 4 per cent figure because 4 per cent according to our computer estimates, triggers the government's contribution to the fund at a realistic level.

Then he said the government would have every inducement, if unemployment was at 6 per cent, to take measures to cut back the rate of employment because it would cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars to help finance unemployment insurance benefits. He was much too optimistic. Since 1971, the average rate of unemployment has only been below 5 per cent for one month. In 1971, the average rate of unemployment was 6.4 per cent; in 1972, it was 6.3 per cent; in 1974 it was 5.4 per cent; and each month this year it has been over 7 per cent, the highest rate of unemployment since 1961.

If there is one thing that the columnists are agreed upon, it is that the government's proposed anti-inflation measures will force the rate of unemployment even higher. They are divided on the scale, but most agree that the rate of employment will rise between one-half per cent and 1½ per cent in 1976. Because of the government's mistaken economic policies, the unemployment rate is expected to reach 8 per cent or more.

In 1971 the government had to put $700 million into the fund because the unemployment rate was more than 4 per cent and the contribution of employers and employees only met the expenses of the fund up to a rate of 4 per cent. This year, the cost to the people of Canada is likely to be $3½ billion, and in 1976 it is estimated it will cost $5 billion.

Under the existing legislation, $2 billion of the 1975 pay-out would come from employer-employee contributions, and $1½ billion from the government. The government is committed to absorb the extra costs of unemployment beyond 4 per cent under the present legislation, but it will have difficulty explaining that kind of deficit to the Canadian people. It cannot admit, of course, that the deficit is to a large extent the result of its own stupid economic policy, so in typical Liberal fashion it has found an ingenious way to solve the problem: it will tax the ordinary citizen. The unemployment insurance premium of workers will be raised from $1.40 per $100 to $1.60 or $1.70, so about $500 million will be shifted on to the backs of employers and employees in 1976.

On June 30, 1975, the Financial Times estimated that premiums are likely to be closer to $2 per $100 and that the government will be shifting closer to $800 million on to employers and employees in 1976. As the unemployment rate goes up, then the potential pay-out of the government goes up as well. In other words, if the ordinary citizen pays more, the government pays less. We should keep in mind that, like so many other tax proposals of Liberal governments, this proposal is especially regressive. The Unemployment Insurance Commission could affect all incomes at the same rate. There is a fairly low ceiling on contributions, so premiums represent a bigger proportion of the income of lower paid workers than of higher paid workers. The increase will come primarily out of the pockets of the lower paid workers, and there are more of them.

We oppose the minister's present proposals. As I have said, we think this is the wrong tax put on the wrong people at the wrong time. Right now, when the rate of inflation shows no sign of abating and when the cost of living is so high after the enormous increases of the past two or three years, the government wants to tax precisely those who can least afford to pay. As I said earlier, when the former minister talked about the government bearing the cost of unemployment insurance when unemployment rose above the 4 per cent threshold, unemployment was much lower. In 1971, the unemployment rate was 6.4 per cent; in 1972 it was 6.3 per cent; in 1973 it was 5.6 per cent; in 1974 it was 5.4 per cent; but this year it is over 7 per cent. Surely, the government should not now ask the people of this country to pay more unemployment insurance to relieve the effects of unemployment which the government itself created.

There is something even more pernicious in the current proposal. By making everyone pay this extra tax, the government is saying that all workers, including those who work all the time, will pay more. Clearly, the government thinks, as do some members of the opposition including the hon. member who spoke before me, that many drawing unemployment insurance do not want to work and are not trying to find jobs. Many hon. members receive complaints almost daily from constituents who have drawn unemployment insurance and been cut off from benefits because, in the opinion of the benefit control officer, they have not looked energetically enough for work.

Although the commission has intensified its aggressive investigation of people drawing benefits to make sure that benefits are only paid to those with bona fide entitlement, to those looking for and available for work, and although the commission has disqualified and cut off from benefits thousands who had been drawing unemployment insurance, the government obviously believes that many are drawing benefits who ought not to be.

I do not suggest for a moment that there are not people drawing benefits who ought not to be drawing them. I do not suggest that all on unemployment insurance are actively looking for work, as I am sure some are not. But I believe the number in that category is small. The government and some opposition members obviously believe that the number is large. The minister therefore proposes that those who are unlikely ever to be unemployed shall pay a substantially increased weekly premium because a few people are ripping off the system.

Is that not a strange view of the just society? Is it right to ask people who work steadily, who contribute to the fund and who many never draw benefits, to pay larger premiums? The government thinks this is necessary—partly because the government's misguided economic policies have led to the highest levels of unemployment since the beginning of World War II, and partly because it thinks some people are ripping off the system.

Let me voice further objections to the government's proposals. I object strongly to the provision under which people who voluntarily leave their employment will be disqualified from benefit for a certain extra period. According to the minister, about 25,000 people per year voluntarily leave their jobs. That is less than 2.5 per cent of our labour force—hardly an alarming figure to justify so harsh an amendment. We shall never know how much hardship that provision will create, as we shall not know how many workers would quit their jobs but for this amendment. For example, a worker may work in a plant in which the high dust level is a hazard to health. I can tell the minister that during the last three or four years CPR workers have complained to me about unbelievably high dust levels in the repair shops. All their complaints to the federal Department of Labour have been to no avail.

We know—I will not make a long speech about it—about the dangers arising from asbestos dust in Arvida and other towns in Quebec. We know about workers at Elliot Lake who have fallen victim to cancer. If the worker decides that his job is a health hazard and that he must quit, to look for another job, he will be penalized unless he can satisfy some faceless bureaucrat of the Unemployment Insurance Commission that he had a legitimate reason for quitting.

I will not be overly critical of Unemployment Insurance Commission employees. They are trying to do their job, but they are only human; they can make mistakes. I wonder how they will deal with the extra burden of appeals this legislation will impose on them. I, for one, am not prepared to see the kind of decision-making I have spoken of relegated to some commission employee in Winnipeg, Vancouver or Toronto. I do not think the government needs to introduce so draconian an amendment to cover the 2.5 per cent of our labour force who quit their jobs voluntarily. If that particular provision is passed, many workers who have legitimate reason to be dissatisfied or unhappy with their jobs will not be able to quit. Many cannot afford the penalty of forgoing three weeks of unemployment insurance benefit while they look for a job. Therefore, they will stay on a job they do not like, a job to which they are not suited, and there will be adverse effects on health. Frankly, I am amazed that the minister would propose that kind of amendment.

The bill proposes the reduction of benefit rates paid to claimants with dependants. It would reduce the rate from 75 per cent of regular earnings to 66⅔ per cent. The 75 per cent only applied to claimants whose earnings were less than the maximum of $185 per week or less than $62 in benefits. The government's reasoning that family benefit payments have increased since the act came into force is surely not sufficient to justify this amendment.

● (1650)

The area I represent is not particularly low wage in character. Therefore, I cannot speak with the same personal knowledge and experience as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who spoke earlier today. However, this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who talked so eloquently and frequently in earlier times about his concept of a just society, and this government should not be bringing in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which will have the effect of cutting back drastically the benefits of those who need them most in order to meet the most minimal living expenses.

I want to register my opposition to the amendment which terminates unemployment insurance coverage for those 65 years old and defers Canada Pension Plan benefits during the permissible three-week lump sum termination payment. Improved federal and provincial income support programs for workers aged 65 and over should not be an excuse for depriving them of their unemployment insurance benefits. This amendment hits hardest those with low incomes who are not covered by a private pension plan and whose payments under the Canada Pension Plan are inadequate. Those who for economic or other reasons must continue work after age 65 will not be able to draw unemployment insurance benefits, as has been the case in the past.

In my years as a member of parliament I have been approached by dozens of people who have paid unemployment insurance premiums since the day the plan began in 1940 and were never unemployed and never received a penny in unemployment insurance benefits. I have heard the argument that this is an insurance plan and they are lucky if they have never been unemployed and have not received any benefits. If one is dealing solely with statistics, that is a good argument. However, we are not dealing with statistics; we are dealing with people who have contributed to the plan for 30 or more years and are entitled to some benefits.

We live in an age where it is believed that a person aged 65, 67 or 63 should be required to retire on a fixed day because it is better for both the individual and the company. However, we are beginning to realize that if it ever was a good idea, it is no longer. People should have the option of retiring from active work when they feel it is good for them and their employer. I do not mean that a person should be able to retire at age 35 or 40, but we should be aiming for a situation where a person can choose when to retire from age 60 on.

If we believe that some people should retire at age 60, and it is better for others to work until they are 66, 67 or 69, we should make our system as flexible as possible. People ought not to be told that if they work past age 65 they will not be entitled to receive the benefits of the unemployment insurance plan to which they contributed for so many years.

I began my speech by pointing out how different the approach of this minister was in introducing this bill from the approach of the former minister of manpower when introducing the bill dealing with unemployment insurance benefits in 1971. The former minister was hopeful, optimistic and cheerful. We went along with him. We did not think the 1971 bill was perfect, that it was another commandment which would last for all time; however, we thought it was a good move in the right direction. We had some criticisms and we made some suggestions for improvements, some of which were accepted and many of which were rejected. On the whole, the bill was an improvement and we supported it.

If there are any improvements in this bill, they are almost accidental. On the whole, it is a disaster from the first word to the last. The four provisions which I have outlined are bad. There are others that I have not dealt with which are equally bad. These will be dealt with by other members of the New Democratic Party. The bill in its present form leaves us no alternative but to oppose it on second reading. We will try to amend it in committee.

Unless there is a substantial change of heart on the part of the government, we will oppose it on third reading.

What the minister is saying is that the government, having promoted measures which, as was predicted by many both inside and outside the House, have increased the rate of unemployment to the highest it has been in 15 years and the second highest since 1940, now expects the people of Canada to pay for its mistakes by higher taxes in the form of higher contributions by employers and employees to the unemployment insurance fund. We cannot support such a proposal and we will oppose it as much as we can.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to rise at this time in the debate on second reading of the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971. I was really anxious to speak on this bill because of the personal experiences of my fellow citizens in the riding I have the honour of representing who may have had problems with the Unemployment Insurance Commission since 1971.

First of all, I want to say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), who is now present in the House that all is not rotten with the commission, and that it is with a positive attitude that I want to approach the bill now before the House.

Madam Speaker, I should like to synthesize my remarks, though I may come back to some at a later stage in the processing of the bill. I should first of all stress the fact, to the minister, that there is much criticism, much abuse, not in the act itself but in its practical application where benefits are concerned. This in turn involves human relations, within the system of structures of the unemployment insurance offices, between the employee who receives the claims and the claimant.

Everyone will admit with me that this legislation is very complicated. Its characteristic before being satisfactory is to be complicated. It is so complicated that the employees of various unemployment insurance offices do not agree on its interpretation and most of the problems experienced by my own claimants are specifically due to the fact that communications between a given unemployment insurance office and the claimant are difficult and generally badly organized. And then the Unemployment Insurance Act has never been popularized or simplified in every day words that the claimant can understand. I will give you only one example to show how the legislation is complicated.

I have seen a number of cases, Madam Speaker, where a mother on the labour market was advised by her physician to quit work because she was pregnant. However this woman cannot draw any benefit because she is in the re-established portion of her benefit period. That is why she cannot draw unemployment insurance benefits throughout her pregnancy.

Now what is that re-establishment period? Madam Speaker, I have taken a count during four months and the figures were checked by the local Drummondville office. The figures which I will quote are accurate. I received at my Victoriaville office 1095 complaints concerning unemployment insurance, that is only for half of my constituency. And of those 1095 complaints referred to the minister, most were the victims of a misunderstanding or a wrong interpretation of the legislation.

In either case, Madam Speaker, I do not care who is at fault. The important thing to note at this point in the debate is that it is always best for legislators to simplify, give a thorough explanation of measures passed if they are to achieve their purpose.

Madam Speaker, the first problem that cannot escape my notice is the centralization of payments. I know very well that the matter is not included in amendments to the act before us and it is unfortunate. It concerns the internal organization of the commission and is related so closely to the effectiveness of the implementation of the legislation introduced by the minister that I cannot help bringing it up.

Such a centralized payment system has been established that each province has only one distributing office. In the province of Quebec, for instance, the only office authorized to pay benefits to any unemployed person is located in Montreal.

If a problem arises, for example delays in the payment of benefits, an error in the punched cards which makes the computer in Montreal unable to digest them, it will result in the claimant having to wait for two, three, four, five, eight and sometimes ten weeks or more before getting his first cheque.

Madam Speaker, I think this is now the main problem with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The delays regarding payments. Let us forget for a moment the two-week waiting period in the case of ordinary unemployment or the three-week waiting period, according to the former legislation, in the case of a worker who has voluntarily quit his job. This period would be doubled under the amendments now proposed. It remains, Madam Speaker, that given our experience of this legislation since 1971, because of this bad centralization, the average claimant will have to suffer a two-week waiting period. He will get paid only at the end of the fourth week or after a four-week unemployment period. Now, the computer in Montreal, the payment centre for the whole province, does not issue cheques at the end of the fourth week. This will take in general one or two weeks, in addition to the waiting period and to the two weeks of unemployment before the person receives the first benefit cheque.

It then no longer is a good organization. This has terrible consequences on the situation of the family, on the income of the family and the worker. Not all Canadian workers can afford to wait for six or seven weeks before they receive the first benefits.

The main problem is that these payments are unduly delayed because of centralization. Madam Speaker, I take advantage of the minister's presence to bring this problem to his attention. I wish the commission would revise its position in that respect and accept to divide the province of Quebec into two or three payment regions, in order to speed up things.

At the present time, we unfortunately have a postal strike. We can imagine the vast organization the department has had to set up in Montreal to deliver benefits across Quebec. It is absolutely unbelievable what efforts have to be made to reach an unemployed in Baie-Comeau, Sainte-Croix of Lotbinière, Chicoutimi, Sherbrooke, or Sainte-Marie of Beauce, by bus or otherwise, and see to it that he gets his unemployment insurance.

When there is a strike, the minister has to set up emergency offices here and there throughout the province because of the communications problem. I want to say to the minister that even when the situation is normal, when there is no strike, undue delays are still blamed on this payment centre.

Doubtless several hon. members know that it takes only one claimant's card to block the whole system in the province of Quebec.

Madam Speaker, the day the problem will be dealt with, there will be a delay of two to three weeks to recover the punched card of the claimant and to pay him. So, when we communicate with them they answer: give us two weeks to be able to issue the first allowance cheque. Then the machine is so peeved by the intervention of a third party that it churns out order payments for 3,4,5,8, or 10 cheques, supposedly for the arrears for the claimant which very often do not correspond to the real weeks of unemployment.

Thus, there is overpayment. Hence, Madam Speaker, there is a second problem stemming from the centralization of payments, namely that overpayments—and I am anxious to see the statistical analysis of the minister in this regard—are generally due to the fact that two or three extra weeks are paid with the arrears. So, later not only will this man have to wait for two or even three weeks when he is again unemployed. He will also have to make without the allowances for 2,3 or 4 weeks, namely the equivalent of the overpayment received during the previous period of unemployment.

One may say it is very complicated. Yet it is very simple. All that need be done, technically, is to divide in a logical way the present regional unemployment insurance offices into decentralized pay centres, regionalized for the whole province. Thus, delays could be prevented.

It must be remembered that this legislation covers workers with lower income in general and that when they are on unemployment for the first waiting weeks that is a two-week waiting period and two weeks payable at the end, they use up their savings if they happen to have some. Unemployment is a dramatic situation for a family. Those unemployed must not be the victims of a machine which decides who gets what. Concluding on this first point, I urge the minister to accept at least investigation, a study on the speed at which payments are made, on the profitability and efficiency of the centralized system in operation since 1971. This would be a definite improvement which will be reflected in the opinion people have of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I would say that 80 per cent of the criticisms directed at the commission involve delays in receiving benefits. The remaining 20 per cent is due to either the overcomplexity or the underpopularization of the act. But, if the former shortcomings, involving 80 per cent of the complaints, could be corrected, Madam Speaker, I am sure many hon. members of this House, at any rate those from Quebec would be very pleased to have that much less office work. I have experienced that I can receive as many as 25 or 30 calls in a single day in my office in Victoriaville, and upon examination of the complaints I invariably realize they concern overdue benefits. All this because of the Montreal computer.

Madam Speaker, the other problem that I wanted to bring forward from the beginning concerns civil servants. There are some unemployment insurance officers—I suppose in every local office has a few—who assume a haughty and domineering attitude in their dealings with the applicants. I wish to congratulate the minister for accepting to alter the inquiry procedure. It is a well known fact that, until now, a claim officer had the authority to call unexpectedly on an applicant and simply start the process of investigation. We all know how easy it is to have somebody tell anything to anyone, it all depends on the way to put the question. Consequently, some people, by their statements during a friendly discussion with the officer, would virtually hang themselves just because they were being too friendly with the person taking the statement.

The minister recently said that this method would be abolished, that the individual making the statement would be entitled to have a witness and that he will not have to sign the statement as it could turn against him later because he ignores the law.

Madam Speaker, I think that, at that time the minister was courageous, that he actually broke this system of provocation, of police and inquests and that, on that point, he deserves congratulations. Let us hope that the system will work well.

The third point that I wanted to make concerns illness. Madam Speaker, I believe that there are three possibilities: ordinary unemployment, unemployment because of pregnancy and unemployment because of illness. For my part, I believe that the most dramatic and the most serious type of unemployment is the one which occurs when the claimant loses or quits his job because of illness.

In that case, Madam Speaker, even the new legislation introduced today by the minister changes practically nothing in the situation except to extend the admissibility period from 29 to 39 weeks. But the problem is that the UIC officer always has authority to determine the length of the claimant's illness. The officer, who is not a physician, is given this authority in the present legislation, and I am sorry that the minister is not amending this provision. The officer, and the physician designated by the commission have the authority to determine the length of the illness, regardless of the report of the claimant's personal physician.

Madam Speaker, I believe that we should have some confidence in the physicians and their professional ethics. When the claimant has a liver attack on the job and his physician states that he is unable to work and that he must be hospitalised to have an operation and tells him that he will have to remain at home in convalescence during a fixed period, such as 20 weeks, the commission has the authority after two, three, five, seven or ten weeks, in spite of the report of the claimant's personal physician, to say that claims are not paid for more than eight, ten or twelve weeks in the case of liver trouble.

It is completely ridiculous to have given such excessive discretionary powers to the officer to allow him to determine the length of an illness when the person involved is unable to defend himself. He is sick and cannot go to the regional office to state his case to the officer. He cannot complete a statement since he is in hospital or on the operating table, and it is precisely this part of the legislation which is the most rigorous. There is no leniency in a case of illness at the UIC.

People who have a heart attack are entitled to be sick for 15 weeks, people who have a liver attack are entitled to so many weeks, those who have the flu are entitled to so many weeks, regardless of the fact that it is broncho-pneumonia, or that the flu was followed by laryngitis or that there were other sequelae.

The official does not care about that. Neither does the act. Under the act, if you have a slight cough, you are entitled to two weeks, whether or not your sore throat turns into a lung disease or if you lose one or both lungs.

Madam Speaker, this is a ridiculous situation. And when the claimant wants to speak in his own defence and appeals to the arbitration board to try and get more, supposing of course he is physically able to appear in court, the doctor in attendance very seldom has time to go and explain himself his decision.

Let me also add, Madam Speaker, that generally, doctors appointed by the Commission to complete a medical certificate in the name of the Commission very frequently do so, and I know this is very serious, without even examining the patient, without having ever seen him. How can the doctor appointed by the Commission, who has never seen the claimant, who does not sound his chest either, who examines him only superficially, say that a person will need a two, three or five week convalescence?

Madam Speaker, such situations occur every day in Lotbinière, in Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean, in the Beauce area, and throughout the country. I know from numerous cases that it is a human problem that people find revolting and which I submit to the minister through you, Madam Speaker. As I said earlier, claimants who are ill are not in a position where they can take their own defence by the very reason of their illness.

Madam Speaker, the minister has taken a small step forward by extending the qualifying period in the case of illness from 29 to 39 weeks. However, this is almost meaningless. In the past, an individual who received standard unemployment benefits and who after weeks had a relapse and was unemployed, was entitled to benefits for that incomplete qualifying period.

The minister has taken a very small and not very courageous step by extending that period to 39 weeks and thus, Madam Speaker, it will still be possible in that case, in spite of that supposedly tremendous legislation, to find pregnant women who are unable to work on the advice of their physician and who having received standard unemployment benefits for one, two, three or five weeks will be denied any before their confinement, because the qualifying period is not long enough and because the condition of that individual will not have been taken into consideration.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Madam Speaker, there are only two answers: either we encourage birth either we encourage abortion. And if the minister does not change that part of the legislation concerning pregnancy I think it will encourage abortion as, in most cases, pregnant women who received benefits during winter cannot receive them anymore.

I believe and I sincerely hope that the minister will entirely revise the part of the legislation concerning sickness and that during each stage of the debate and particularly the committee stage we will try to improve that part of the legislation. Thus we respect sick people, we help them when they most need help and, in case of pregnancy, we stop pussyfooting around and say once for all that we believe in the family and encourage mothers to have their child by paying them their 15 weeks of unemployment benefits for the period of confinement without bothering them and taking into account the other periods in the 104-week qualifying period mentioned by the minister in the bill.

I do not wish to say anything more on the subject. I think I clearly expressed what I had to say to the minister and I sincerely hope he will take it into account.

The third point that troubles me before I come to the positive aspects of the legislation in pension at 65. Through this act, the minister unacknowledgedly imposes pension at 65. He does it in the way retirement was imposed at 70. He does not say so, of course, as it would be unpopular. But when you deprive workers 65 years old or more from all their rights under the pretext that they receive retirement benefits plus a supplement, the minister misleads us and does not take the actual situation into account. He says that does not affect many people. I got in touch with Statistics Canada in that respect; I wanted to know just how many workers between the ages of 65 and 69 were still on the labour market. And the answer is 619,940 workers between the ages of 65 and 69, a figure I got yesterday afternoon from Statistics Canada. Between 65 and 70, in all that is including everyone up to 75, 1,124,000 workers will be in that situation, meaning they will lose entirely their rights to unemployment insurance although they worked for 25, 30, 40 and 50 years and conformed to all government legislation, good or bad, during all their lives.

Madam Speaker, the minister is too intelligent not to be aware of the consequences of his legislation and not to have foreseen them. In short, he imposes mandatory retirement at 65. He says under the same legislation, if you want to continue to work, you are free to do so, but do not count on us to protect you. As far as we are concerned, you no longer have any rights, you are a worker and you are such a nuisance to us, we want you out of the labour market so much that we are taking your rights away from you. That is the situation in which we are going to place people aged 65 or more.

The minister simply wants to push out of the labour market anyone aged 65 or more. When he introduced his bill on second reading, the minister said this was because those people received OAS and guaranteed income supplement increases. As I understand OAS schedules, a worker is not entitled to the supplement because of his earnings. He generally gets the maximum amount of pension and a few dollars of supplement. Therefore, the minister's suggestion that a person in the labour force can get a pension over $200 is misleading. The Quebec offices of the official, Mr. Gérard Turbide, can confirm that. The supplement is granted according to revenues. The basic pension is paid equally to every citizen. The minister wants to persuade workers over 65 to retire, because OAS pensions are based not on the current year's revenues but on those of the previous year. This tends to show how unfair the minister's proposal is. The income supplement given a worker in 1975 is based on his 1974 revenues. Assuming a worker aged 65 retired on January 1, 1976, he would be without revenues other than the basic old age security pension. He would then get a supplement application form in which he would have to declare his 1974 revenues. Therefore, he would not be entitled to supplement for that year as of 1976, so long as a new computation was not made. Such is the current situation. I hear some members opposite say this is not true. Well, I will not debate this. Tomorrow, I shall try to meet them and show them examples I have of this. It would be astounding if they wished to remedy this, because it is schedules.

An hon. Member: That is optional.

Mr. Fortin: That may be optional, however, that is compulsory retirement. I wonder if the minister checked in the labour market to get employers' opinion. A number of employers will regret that. People of 65 who still want to work and still have the courage to do so are generally excellent workers who give great satisfaction to their employers. This is a recognized fact. Most of them work not for the fun of it, but only because they have insufficient means.

Madam Speaker, I hope that the minister will take it upon himself to withdraw completely this proposal and leave things as they are. We should respect the worker who has worked all his life and leave the age at 70. Of course, if the minister does not want to do it himself, I shall be forced to oppose the bill completely in view of the enormous social repercussions that it will have on those who are 65.

As the previous speaker said, we have been using ringing phrases like "just society". Can a single member of the government tell me that it is just, after 50 or 40 years of work, to take away all the rights of a worker only because to his age even if he still wants to work for the good of his country? If they can justify this bill from the point of view of justice and fairness, Madam Speaker, I shall have to accept it since they have the majority, and this would be regrettable. But I do not believe that the government members can defend this bill.

The last point I wanted to make is as follows: in 1974, at least 265,831 workers were penalized for having voluntarily quit their job. In the legislation proposed by the minister, the waiting period is doubled, which means that any one quitting his job will, in principle, have to wait eight weeks before receiving his first cheque. Madam Speaker, I have myself very often been before the arbitration board with my fellow citizens to defend their rights.

● (1730)

In almost 99.9 per cent of all cases where my people were accused of quitting voluntarily, we won our case and the commission ruled in our favour. But in all cases, never did an employer come himself to give his own version. Two weeks ago, I went before the board of referees in Drummondville. A certain employer maintained that a young lady had quit her job in a beauty parlor. That employer had sent a letter to downgrade completely the young hairdresser. When we showed up before the board of referees, there were the members of the board, the claimant, the secretary of the board and myself. The employer was not there. Even though he had condemned the young lady and had put her in a defensive position before the board, under an unduly complicated law, that man was absent. He had not even been invited or summoned. To have his revenge because he was losing a good employee and I suppose because he had not accepted the wage demands of the employee—another possible reason—the employer had written a letter which was against the interest of a young lady who had worked for him for three years.

In any case, Madam Speaker, that proves that if the minister really wants to have a truly effective legislation, which will prompt workers to keep their job, he must give claimants better protection against those who could abuse.

If we are going to adopt that part of the legislation against which I have nothing in principle, it remains that employers now wield an extraordinary weapon. They will be able to provoke their employees particularly where there is no union and we know that in my riding in Quebec many workers are not organized. Employers will be able to provoke their employees for any kind of reason knowing full well that no employee will dare quit his job lest he lose his income for eight weeks. And as the claimant has the onus of proving that he did not leave his job voluntarily and without cause, inevitably any fault is considered his but never the employer's.

I deplore, I must admit, such coercive measures which are very harsh and in which the employer has no role to play. When an employee is hired there are always two persons involved, he and the employer. When people work in factories, there are always two groups, the employers and the employees. But when somebody is laid off, the decision rests on one, the employer while the employee depends on this decision.

If an employee leaves his job, here again we find two parties—the employer and the employee. Who decided the employee should leave? To be fair in applying such a rigorous legislation, one should instruct each employer that every time an employee voluntarily leaves his job he should produce his version of the facts and even appear before the board of referees and justify the reasons why the employee left and why he was put by the employer in a situation where he was forced to leave his job.

With this eight-week system, we are going to see a number of abuses, particularly among the workers, if we fail to give them the protection they require. Madam Speaker, I was reading, I cannot remember exactly where, that last year 144,000 unemployment insurance claimants had been declared ineligible by the CMC because they had not looked for a job, a decision which was taken on the strength of a single report. A number of members of this House have certainly heard of similar cases. After a certain unemployment period, the Commission communicates with the CMC officers and ask them to look for a job to propose one to the unemployed or to check if the claimants are actually looking for one.

One unilateral report from an anonymous manpower centre is enough to disentitle a claimant. All of a sudden the claimant sees himself deprived of all his rights. And the appeal procedure starts all over again. When the claimant appears before the board of referees to prove he made efforts to find a job, the manpower centre does not attend the board of referees' hearing either.

Madam Speaker, everything is set in a complex legislation so that the claimant is always the one who has the onus of proving his innocence, so to speak. In the board of referees procedure mentioned in the legislation, the minister will have to add provisions about employers who make all kinds of reports. I learned that in 1974, as many as 32,382 workers lost their jobs on account of misconduct. Alcohol or the irresponsibility of the employee may be the causes of misconduct, but it could also be due to an employer who exploits his employee. And yet, I think that there is not even 2 per cent of those cases of misconduct where the employer is required to give evidence before the board of referees.

Thus the claimant, and only the claimant, has to face the three members of the board of referees and has to put up his own defence against the Unemployment Insurance Commission, its act and regulations, and God knows how involved some of them are, and against an employer who has charged him with misconduct when he entered the word "misconduct" on his separation certificate. The employer is merely required to put down his firm name, the number of weeks worked and the word "misconduct". That is the employer's sole obligation. This means that any employer could put down the word "misconduct" on any employee's separation certificate and thus create a social tragedy, a human tragedy for a claimant when actually there may have been no misconduct at all. There again, the claimant has the onus of proving it while there is none for the employer.

I think that this is one of the act's serious shortcomings. I will conclude my remarks on this, Madam Speaker. I would still have many more to make, but I will limit myself to these on second reading, and I will perhaps hark back to it before the committee, at the report and third reading stages. I would like to summarize and say that the part dealing with 65 is-year-olds is, to us, absolutely inacceptable, unfair, and is even provocative for workers of 65 or over. It does not recognize their rights. It systematically withdraws them.

Madam Speaker, the second point is the decentralization of unemployment insurance benefit payments. I think that the minister cannot justify, defend or continue to defend such centralization in payments. The third point is the review process, that is the appeal process provided in the act. Provisions should be added so that employers and manpower centres that make reports on workers be also required by law to give their own views on the facts to ensure that the act is not a cause of inequity but a source of satisfaction and justice for workers.

I think the appeal procedure, the arbitration at the board of referees or before an umpire is an important means of checking whether there has been an error of judgment. As far as I know, before any court, there are always two parties. I think that before the board of referees, which is not a court but a place where people try to understand each other as well as possible, there should be as many statements of facts as possible.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, those of my colleagues who preceded me this afternoon in the debate on Bill C-69 pointed out, some of them with great eloquence I felt, the weaknesses in present operation of UIC offices. They also highlighted, rather spectacularly, I thought, and here I am thinking of the hon. members for St. John East (Mr. McGrath) and Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), the effects some of the provisions of the bill will have, in their opinion, on Canadians.

I should like to take the next few minutes to introduce also into this debate a note which, I think, will make the statements more consistent with everyday occurrences in Canada. Before doing so, I wish to remind you, Madam Speaker, that the unemployment insurance plan has been in effect for 35 years in Canada.

Canada did not break new ground in the field of unemployment insurance. Several European countries have had unemployment insurance for more than five centuries. Several even brought it in early in the 20th century. In Canada, the legislator became conscious of his role and of his responsibility to adopt income support measures only after the great economic depression of the thirties.

The first legislation on investments and social insurance passed in 1935 gave rise to many debates and even to conflicts of jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, some provinces had questioned the authority of the federal government to legislate in the field of unemployment insurance. A decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council was required to define whether the Canadian government had full jurisdiction in the field of insurance.

But this legislation of 1935, the Investment and Social Insurance Act, was an act which sanctioned inequality to some extent. First, inequality concerning the age and also concerning facts. For instance, a young woman aged 16 or 17 could not receive weekly benefits exceeding $1.50 while a man 21 or over could receive more than $6 a week. Those figures, Madam Speaker, may seem a little ridiculous in the context of today's income scale, but they do shed light on the evolution of mentalities, priorities and, mostly, responsibilities of the Canadian government. No need to recall that current weekly benefits can amount to $123 and that they are based in the insurable income of the claimant during the qualifying period.

Madam Speaker, the role of unemployment insurance in Canada, is essential to maintain a certain economic stability. There are many factors in favour of maintaining unemployment insurance. One only has to bear in mind that the level of relative wealth in the various regions of Canada varies throughout the country, that social, geographical and even climatic conditions play a prominent part in the income scale of Canadians.

Madam Speaker, it is interesting to bear in mind that over 2.1 per cent of the gross national product in Canada is made up of unemployment insurance benefits. You will agree with me to what extent unemployment insurance benefits have a stabilizing effect on the income level and growth of the Canadian people in the Maritimes, in the North, in all areas of this country with different climatic conditions from one season to another.

Indeed, Madam Speaker, it must be known and kept in mind that unemployment benefits are not intended only as income support for claimants, they are also designed to maintain a decent income level within a community, to maintain, for example, within a particular community the level of public expenditures, the level of consumer expenditures, the level of rents, the level of owner expenditures at an acceptable rate.

And that is why, Madam Speaker, in the present situation, even with an excessively high rate of unemployment exceeding 7 per cent, and my colleagues referred to it this afternoon, that is why, Madam Speaker, in countries as important as the United States where there are more than eight million jobless, that is why also in countries like Japan, western countries like Great Britain, France, where the total number of unemployed now exceeds 14 million, in those countries there is no social unrest similar to that we experienced during the thirties or even similar to that Germany experienced, for example, during the twenties.

Unemployment benefits and unemployment insurance indeed play a significant stabilizing part in every industrialised nation, a stabilizing part which affects not only the economy but social life as well. And I believe that in discussing amendments to unemployment insurance it is essential to bear in mind their possible impact on the social atmosphere.

Of course, Madam Speaker, the plan in force since 1935 has been extensively overhauled. The law enacted in 1971, in particular, provided for automatic and annual equalization between premium rates and amounts of insurable earnings. Each year, therefore, the amount of insurable earnings of each Canadian worker and the premium he must contribute to the plan and to the unemployment insurance account are continually readjusted.

Madam Speaker, looking at those amendments which are before us today, I think we should be pleased to see that to a certain extent the minister and the government are conscious of their responsibility in continuously improving the unemployment insurance scheme. And before I comment on some of the proposed amendments which raise more questions than others, I think it is essential that I should repeat that at least three of them tend to achieve a balance which will prove beneficial to the entire system.

The first of these wise and desirable amendments, in my opinion, concerns the payment of travelling expenses incurred by a claimant or his representative when they have to appear before the board of referees. My honorable colleagues have mentioned and shown most convincingly how difficult it is in many instances for a worker to appear before a board of referees. If, on top of having to prove his case, the claimant has to pay for expenses incurred by his representative, I think there is an anomaly which should be corrected. As a matter of fact, in civil as well as criminal cases, some of the expenses of the parties who manage to prove their case are assumed by the court and by the departments of Justice.

Madam Speaker, I think in this instance, it is quite logical for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay for the expenses of the claimant or his representative, whether he be a lawyer, a union representative or even a member of parliament as in the case of the hon. member for Lotbinière. And I think it should be stressed that this amendment brings into the system an element of fairness which we all welcome.

The second amendment which, in our opinion, also relates to the desire for a balanced income, is the one which deals with qualification for benefits for a supplementary period of 104 weeks. Many Canadian workers find themselves in situations which disqualify or would disqualify them because they cannot complete that 104-week period. For instance, someone who must serve a jail sentence, who is temporarily disabled or who for various reasons, sickness or quarantine, must stay away from his job. I think that the amendment designed to complete that 104-week period restores the balance and the justice we wish to see in the system.

There are also more specific details in the definition of some terms that will also restore the balance. For instance, the definition and the details of the expression "suitable employment", the extension of benefit period in case of sickness and the authorization for the claimant to withdraw a claim will certainly contribute to restore that basic justice, the natural justice that was lacking during the trial periods of the system since 1971. Obviously, we have not heard the last of it and all the reforms needed are not contained in Bill C-69. It is easy to see for instance that one of the main defects which is not corrected in the bill concerns the consolidation of arbitration awards.

Having completed law studies, you know as well as I do, Madam Speaker, that one of the judicial guarantees is the knowledge by law officers of decisions rendered by the courts in earlier cases. It is important that workers and insured persons may eventually have access to an office consolidation of arbitration awards. I believe this would bring some uniformity into the plan, because it is realized that counsel, judges and arbitrators may have a different perception, different practices and various degrees of knowledge of the law from one area to the other. I believe it is important to standardize the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I will not insist on the complexity of the act. Every member in this House knows how many interpretation "unexpectabilities" must be faced when advising a voter or a citizen that consults us on the act. I believe the first guarantee we should seek to add to this legislation is precisely that of an administrative consolidation of arbitration awards, or at least a data centre on decisions awarded on the most stupid points, the most questioned ones or those that give rise to the largest number of problems with the insured.

A second amendment that should be introduced involves the number of days during which an employee, a worker has not worked at his job but may have returned to some part-time employment. It is realized that these periods of disqualification, these loss of benefit periods very often induce claimants not to apply for employment or make any effort to accept temporary work. I believe the regulations should be reviewed at that level. This would bring some measure of justice that would better account for the desire of Canadians to work, as evidenced by the extra 104-week period applying to Canadian workers who had to momentarily leave the labour market.

Madam Speaker, this legislation aimed at giving the Unemployment Insurance Commission some credibility in the eyes of the Canadian people was not the only one passed since 1971. Previous speakers in this debate have shown to what extent the government's estimates of unemployment insurance administration costs have been wrong or low during the years which followed the amendment of the plan in 1971. I refer my colleagues to the estimates for 1973-74 where they will find that there was only a difference of 0.3 per cent between the costs anticipated in 1972 and the costs incurred in 1973. I believe, Madam Speaker, that in the case of a plan as complex as unemployment insurance, there is now some misunderstanding and a certain administration control which can lead us to think that we are on the right track.

Moreover, Madam Speaker, especially in 1972, bitter criticism has been heaped on the workers about the rip-off artists, about the people who collected benefits without trying hard enough to find employment. An article published in the Globe and Mail in April 1975 reported that more than 50,000 claimants would be prosecuted or have to return money within the next months. Madam Speaker, I think that if Canadians are to maintain their confidence in the system, not only must they be assured that justice is done within the system but also that justice appears to be done. In that sense, Madam Speaker, there is also room for important amendments. My colleagues have noted how employers seldom appear before boards of referees and how very little they have to do with the application procedures of the system.

I would like to say, Madam Speaker, that many employers fail or refuse to send their employment statement formula in the time prescribed under the program. If the program must be tightened, or if it must show fairness to those who do get undeserved benefits, I think it must also be severe and just as inflexible against those employers who do not comply with conditions and provisions of the law.

In my opinion, Madam Speaker, if this system is to be balanced, this also applies to employers, and I am sure that the amendments under consideration will not remain a dead letter in the minister's ear.

In fact, the minister has showed such availability and openmindedness in recent years that we are sympathetic to any amendment that could be proposed in this system.

Of course Bill C-69 still features three amendments that give rise to questions. These amendments, Madam Speaker, concern the disqualification of people aged 65. I do not support my colleagues's opinion that disqualifying people who reach age 65 deprives them of the right to work.

True, Madam Speaker, such disqualification prevents them from getting unemployment insurance benefits. In my opinion, Madam Speaker, if we want to have a true picture of the situation, we must pay more heed to the statistics referred to by my colleague. Madam Speaker, I am eager to acquaint you with Statistics Canada figures concerning people over 65. The persons who took part in the survey conducted by Statistics Canada stated unanimously that there are fewer workers who report as unemployed than there are claimants.

This seems to indicate that those people tell the investigators that they are not seeking employment and are not interested in working, while at the same time collecting benefits and telling the Commission they are actively looking for a job.

Therefore, it is becoming more and more difficult from an administrative point of view to ascertain whether or not unemployed over 65 really wish to find a job. The situation is as follows, Madam Speaker. In Quebec, for instance, some 16,000 claimants aged 65 or over now get unemployment insurance benefits. According to a survey made by Statistics Canada, about 8,000 of them, that is 50 per cent are in fact looking for work, and are actually interested in getting a job.

Consequently, we have this imbalance in the very objectives of the program which, of course, are to support income while also encouraging the unemployed to seek out work, and the will of the claimants who have reached the age of 65 to look for work and get a job.

The bill as proposed by the minister is a drastic one. It automatically excludes all persons who have reached the age of 65 and who get a pension from either the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. Madam Speaker, I think there is a happy medium which would probably allow us to solve the problem where the average claimant, of over 65 wants to withdraw from the working force while, on the other hand, wanting to get the maximum benefits to which he is entitled; and considering current contributions, that could amount to $6,373. I believe there must be a middle course to answer the purpose of the system. The bill, as proposed by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, provides that any worker who is 65 and receives the pension benefits be given compensation equivalent to three weeks' unemployment insurance benefits.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that a worker who is 65 should be able to choose whether he wants to receive at 65 these three weeks of benefits proposed in the bill of the minister or to carry on within the system. In that latter case, he should be subject to all the controls and conditions of the bill. It has been found out, Madam Speaker, under the administration in recent months, that since 1971 half the claimants were not actually looking for jobs but that the commission officials, responsible for controls and investigation, hesitated to sue a 66-year-old employee because he had not taken the trouble to fill the necessary forms or to actually look for a job. Obviously, to harass someone who is 68 years old and who depends for his living on the unemployment insurance payments seems particularly odious and unbearable. But Madam Speaker, I believe that in this situation, there must be a middle course to be found and I believe it should be considered if we want this legislation to pass bringing more equity, the necessary support and incentives to work. I believe, Madam Speaker, that it is 6 o'clock.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGATION AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which has occupied a great deal of attention in this chamber during the past year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Minister of Labour, fresh from his triumphal appearance at St. John's, Newfoundland, report to the House at the earliest opportunity on the progress of the investigation which he announced in this House on May 21, 1975 into problems surrounding the SIU and put an end to persistent reports that the investigation has been shelved and that Mr. Carson, the respected gentleman appointed to head the inquiry, has been removed from that post.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED PARTICIPATION OF ALL CANADIANS IN COST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a case of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Olympic Games in Montreal in 1976 will cost about $1 billion and probably will be in the red by several hundred million dollars, which should normally be absorbed by all Canadians, that the whole of Canada will benefit from the fame and international prestige of the games and that some programs which are essential to the development of the city of Montreal, such as the extension of the subway and the purifying of water supplies, may be placed in jeopardy on account of the games, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House take the necessary measures to ensure that the deficit incurred by the Olympic Games, which are due to take place in Montreal in 1976, be borne by all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House, for the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SEARCH FOR LABOUR SUPPORT OF GOVERNMENT'S ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity arises from the profound need of the government to find any possible support from any possible element of the trade union movement for its anti-inflation program which heretofor, for some inexplicable reason, has been endorsed only by big business and chambers of commerce across the land. There has also been the related profound need of CBC television news to find the slightest bit of such support for the government so that it could convey such a surprising development to the people of Canada.

I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House compliments the government in obtaining the support for its program from Senator Lawson and further wishes to commend those responsible for the CBC national television news for their gifted insight into the fact that a Liberal appointed Senator announcing support for a Liberal government program constitutes a major breakthrough for the government and thus should be the lead item on the national news.

The House further urges the Minister of Labour, accompanied by CBC television cameras, to travel to New York in order to obtain additional support from their one other friend in labour, Mr. Hal Banks.

SUGGESTED REFUSAL BY MEMBERS OF SALARY INCREASES FOR 1976—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I rise to present a motion considered necessary and urgent in this inflationary period. In light of the government's proposals to initiate an attack on inflation, and in view of the election promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that a Liberal government would implement leadership during its next mandate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House deny the provisions of section 3 of the members' salaries act, Bill C-44, granting a 7 per cent pay increase effective January 1, 1976, for members of this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUESTED RETRACTION OF PORTRAYAL OF HUNTERS AS RUTHLESS KILLERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On the CBC program "Earthwatch" aired last evening, the sportsmen of Canada were portrayed as ruthless killers using aircraft and snowmobiles to track and shoot their quarry. As both these methods are unlawful in Canada, as all ethical sportsmen deplore them and as this film sequence grossly distorted facts presented to the general public, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the government immediately order the CBC either to substantiate the facts depicted by the film, or to make an immediate retraction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion arising from the government's expressed need to cut government expenditures in the fight against inflation, and also arising from the millions of dollars being spent on the Prime Minister's personal sacred cow, bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. No doubt the hon. member is aware that an opposition motion on precisely the same subject is to be debated today and it would, I think, make a mockery of our procedures if we were to ask the House to give unanimous consent to debate a motion dealing with the same subject which the House is to debate at three o'clock.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO PROCEDURE FOR AWARDING CONTRACTS AND ASSURED OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL CANADIAN FIRMS TO SUBMIT BIDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the failure of the Olympic Organizing Committee to invite bids from qualified Canadian firms for the manufacture and distribution of Olympic medallions, and in view of the awarding of that licence to a Swiss company, one of the principals of which is also involved in the building of the Olympic Village and in the manufacture and distribution of Olympic souvenirs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House record its view that qualified Canadian firms should have an opportunity to submit bids on all projects in connection with the 1976 Olympics and, further, that it instruct the government to initiate forthwith a comprehensive inquiry into all aspects of the procedure followed by COJO in awarding contracts and licences.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF MEANS OF STOPPING STRIKES IN PUBLIC SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

In view of the constant conflicts between employers and employees degenerating into strikes which disturb the economy and the social balance of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the government appoint a special parliamentary committee whose object would be to find means to control strikes at least in the public and semi-public fields and thus set the example.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion therefore cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SOURCE OF LIST OF FIRMS WITH WHICH BOARD COMMUNICATED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising from the list of firms to which the Anti-Inflation Board has written about the enforcement of the government's price and profit guidelines. Could the minister confirm that the government was forced to purchase this list, in whole or in part, from outside commercial sources because it did not itself have the necessary information available?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had not heard that suggestion before, but I will be glad to inquire.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REASON FOR OMISSION OF SOME FIRMS FROM LIST OF THOSE COVERED BY GUIDELINES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Can the minister explain why a number of the major corporations in categories supposedly covered by the government's guidelines are not on the list? For example, three of Canada's largest development companies—Bramalea, Consolidated Building and McLaughlin—are not on the list. I ask this in view of the fact we have been told this list was to cover even the smallest construction firms.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly the source of the list, but I understand there was not information available exactly corresponding to the guidelines. Indeed, some firms were included which should not have been and others were left off. I understand that upon public response, the board has since gone out to remedy these deficiencies.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Since the names of many of the major corporate power centres in this country, including this government's great friend, Power Corporation, are missing from the list, is it government policy that such companies will be free to manipulate management fees and other inter-corporate relationships with their various subsidiaries without any active surveillance by the Anti-Inflation Board? Was that the policy of the government in the preparation of this list?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member might observe in reading the bill, where a corporation has consolidated its financial reports into a single one, where there is this control as deemed by the Income Tax Act, that applies to the company and all of its corporate affiliates. Of course, they all would be covered. Whether the corporation which the hon. member mentioned did that or not, I will look into that. Indeed, I was proposing to lay the list before the committee. However, I would point out to the hon. member that the response to the final part of his question is decidedly not.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—MEMBERS SUBJECT TO CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that a number of the members of the new Anti-Inflation Board hold directorships in a number of corporations, is it the view of the government that these members of the board shall be subject to the government guidelines of conflict of interest and accordingly resign these directorships forthwith?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the general answer is yes. I have not looked into each particular case, but those members of the board whom I did contact personally raised this matter with me. It was understood that they would resign the directorships.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—INQUIRY WHETHER REPORTS AND ACTIVITIES WILL BE PUBLIC OR PRIVATE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the fact that the success of the board will depend largely upon the degree of public support it is able to generate across the country, is it the intention of the government to ensure that the board reports from time to time to the public and operates generally within the public domain, given the wide discretionary powers that it has, or is it the view of the government that the board should operate in secrecy and report to the government in the same vein?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance tells me this is already provided for in the bill, namely that there will be public reports and public activities. The Anti-Inflation Board is perceived as an organization that will go out and help people understand about inflation, its causes and how they are trying to remedy it. I see the board very much like the former Food Prices Review Board under Mrs. Plumptre which had a great effect on persuading the public of its activities and communicating with them.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INVOCATION OF WAR MEASURES ACT IN 1970—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Following recent statements by Premier Bourassa and the Hon. Eric Kierans, a member of the federal cabinet in 1970, to the effect that neither of these gentlemen believed that an apprehended insurrection or state that would be appropriately described by that phrase existed in the province of Quebec at the time of invocation of the War Mesures Act, and since such action involved a major infringement upon the civil liberties of Canadians, is it the intention of the government to proceed with an inquiry under the Inquiries Act which could lead to a full investigation into the justification for the invocation of that act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly what Mr. Bourassa or Mr. Kierans have recently been thinking or saying.

● (1420)

But I do know what they said at the time the War Measures Act was invoked. From Premier Bourassa we had a letter which I believe was read by the President of the Privy Council for the record a few days ago, a letter which specified that he as well as the authorities of the City of Montreal apprehended insurrection, and they were asking us to take these strong measures so that they could do their proper job of maintaining the peace.

In the case of Mr. Kierans, he was a member of the cabinet and he supported the cabinet at the time.

INVOCATION OF WAR MEASURES ACT IN 1970—BELIEF OF PRIME MINISTER THAT STATE OF APPREHENDED INSURRECTION EXISTED IN QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Since, as the Prime Minister knows, ultimate responsibility for the invocation of such an act rests with the federal government, no matter what a particular provincial government might request, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is still his view that a state appropriately described as an apprehended insurrection existed in the Province of Quebec in the fall of 1970.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can say quite clearly that if people in Quebec, the government of that province and the administration of the City of Montreal, had not told us they were convinced that there was a state of apprehended insurrection we would probably have looked twice before invoking the War Measures Act. But they did make this statement quite clearly to us; it was our judgment that they were right, that they were well informed; it was our judgment that there was a state of apprehended insurrection and therefore we declared the War Measures Act.

Mr. Broadbent: Since the then Minister of Justice and other ministers of the Crown said they hoped that after some time had elapsed a full revelation of all the facts which led to the government's decision could be made, given that kind of commitment, which was no more than an asserted plan of intention, does the Prime Minister not feel, now, that in the light of recent statements by Premier Bourassa in particular, the man who was then, as he is now, premier of the province, to the effect that his view was wrong, that if not under the Inquiries Act then in some other way a full public investigation of all the circumstances leading to the original decision should be made?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, I do not know exactly what Premier Bourassa thinks about this, but I do not take for granted the hon. member's assertion that he is now saying there was not a state of apprehended insurrection. It would surprise me greatly if he were to say that.

An hon. Member: He said it on TV over the CBC.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Trudeau: He said the contrary in writing, and I would be very surprised if he were to say the contrary now if one listened to everything he had to say.

Mr. Broadbent: He did.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, will the hon. member send me a record of what he said on Sunday night?

An hon. Member: You were more interested in Kojak!

Mr. Trudeau: As somebody said, Mr. Speaker, I was more interested in Kojak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: With regard to the other part of the question as to what certain cabinet ministers think, the hon. member is free to ask Mr. Kierans. I do know I stated publicly both at that time and since, that the essence of the reason we invoked that act lay in a circumstance of which everyone was aware because I read a document to the House saying there was a state of apprehended insurrection in the minds of the authorities of the Province of Quebec. Our judgment was that they were making the right estimation at the time, and therefore we acted. I am not asking for any hidden evidence to support our action. It is all on the record and I will debate the subject any time with the hon. member.

OLYMPIC GAMES

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN COST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

In answer to a question asked by my colleague from Rimouski yesterday, the Acting Prime Minister stated that the federal government would not assume any obligation toward the anticipated deficit of the Olympic Games. Therefore, I would ask the Prime Minister whether this decision is irrevocable and whether one should take it for granted that there will not be any kind of monetary participation in financing the games. In other words, does the government accept that these games, involving all of Canada, does he accept in principle that Montrealers or the province of Quebec should assume the cost of the games?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a misunderstanding. The hon. member suggested that the federal government is taking no share of the cost of the games. That is of course a false impression. The federal government is contributing to the organization of the games in several ways: through military and police support, diplomatic services, housing assistance and so on, which amount to tens of millions of dollars.

As to the financing of the games, the hon. member also knows that the federal government—our government—introduced legislation that allowed the games to be self-financing: measures relating to coins, stamps, the lottery and so on. Therefore, it would be spreading a falsehood to say that the federal government is not supporting the Olympic Games. What we are saying is that the Quebec government and the Montreal administration agreed with us, several years ago, that they would not ask us to take up the deficit, if there was any.

It was claimed at that time that there would be no deficit. However, it was agreed that we would not be asked to make it up, should there be one. Not so long ago, the Prime Minister stated again that he did not intend to ask the federal government to help them make good the deficit. However, if the hon. member insists that we spend money financing projects to which we are not required to contribute, let him say so bluntly, but neither Premier Bourassa, nor Mayor Drapeau, nor any of the COJO people have asked us to make up any part of the deficit. They know that we have already contributed very substantially and continue to contribute to the Olympic Games, for which they are very grateful.

AIR CANADA

ESTEY REPORT—SUGGESTED EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Because of increasing media speculation, such as the current article in the Financial Post, concerning the contents of Judge Estey's report, realizing full well the government's difficulties in terms of translation, and also keeping in mind that the government itself knows the contents of Judge Estey's report, will the minister not agree that it would be best to make a decision on the report's recommendations soon instead of waiting for the official tabling, which could take many weeks?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated in answer to the first question concerning the report, I believe last week, that it would be our intention to consider the contents of the report even during the period that printing and translating were underway.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am reassured by the minister's answer, and I repeat that I realize the government has problems and that I do not expect the minister to perform miracles in getting the report before the House. But again I ask, is not the minister willing to concede that a lot of harm is being done in many ways to the airline by continuing to delay releasing the report? Once again may I ask him whether he will consider taking definite steps to implement some of the recommendations on a matter of great importance affecting this country's national airline?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, certainly I am concerned that any harm may be done, and indeed I may have to consider making some comment about the clear and sound nature of the airline operation which emerges. However, I will reflect on that as I read the press statements referred to.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF INCENTIVES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada has stated in his latest report that Canada's productivity is almost the lowest of all industrial nations, and as output per man hour in Canada actually decreased last year, the first decline in the last 15 years, would the Prime Minister give consideration to introducing industrial incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity so as to make possible lower costs and prices, reduce inflation and promote greater sales of Canadian products both in Canada and in the export markets?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the spirit of the question is valuable and constructive. I think the importance of increasing productivity is very great. I would not argue the details as to why at this particular term of their productivity cycle certain European countries are higher than we are. As the hon. member knows, when there is an upsurge in the cycle productivity tends to increase. We are confident this will happen in Canada. The suggestion in respect of incentives is a valuable one. Knowing of the hon. member's concern with this I asked our people in the Privy Council and the Department of Finance to examine it.

The hon. member will note that of course there already are in the guidelines, as we published them, productivity incentives in the market place for those firms which do increase their productivity. We will examine other constructive methods of achieving that result. It is very important that we realize that we have to make serious improvements in productivity.

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF CERTAIN CANADIANS OF ARAB DESCENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General which is prompted by a news item, with which he is familiar, in the Globe and Mail that casts the shadow of subversion or worse over thousands of decent Canadians of Arab descent. Will the minister clarify the situation outlined in the story and at least indicate if the 14 persons are under surveillance, as the recently discovered security director Mr. Toupin states, or are not under surveillance, as the minister has stated?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has told me there is no plot among Arab Canadians such as outlined in the Globe and Mail story published the other day. The RCMP has informed me it is continually on guard against any type of terrorist plot in Canada, particularly in view of the Olympic games coming up next year. At the present time there is no such plot as set out in that article.

RESOURCES

SUGGESTION CANADIAN STEEL COMPANIES ESTABLISH IRON ORE PELLET SOURCE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the three large steel companies in Canada, that is Stelco, Dofasco and Algoma, have made the decision to tie into the high cost iron ore pellet source from the United States, has the government made any approach to the governments of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to push for an integrated pelletizing operation in northwestern Ontario so we can keep our steel prices lower in Canada than in the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that there have been discussions in respect of certain deposits in northern Ontario which might be used by Canadian mills in various parts of Canada, not just from Ontario. As to whether those particular firms have given recent consideration to the proposal put forward by the hon. member, I cannot say, but I would be very pleased to find out and let him know.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when the minister is looking into this subject will he discuss with officials of his own department, who I know for the last two or three years have been supporting this type of integrated operation with the steel plants in the three prairie provinces, the possibility of gaining access to these very rich iron ore deposits in northwestern Ontario?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we have already had this kind of discussion.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—STATEMENT BY MR. WELLS THAT TEACHERS SHOULD IGNORE WAGE GUIDELINES DURING NEGOTIATIONS—MINISTER'S POSITIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and arises from remarks by the Ontario Minister of Education, Mr. Wells, in connection with contract negotiations involving Metro-Toronto teachers. Can the minister inform the House whether, in the case of Toronto teachers and, indeed, in other similar situations, he endorses Mr. Wells' view that contract negotiations should proceed between employers and their employees without regard, at least initially, to potential complications that may arise from the federal government's guidelines on wage and salary increases?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps put it in a different way. I would say that the fact that we do have the guidelines and the restraint program outstanding should not prevent parties from getting down to the bargaining table. We hope they will be guided at the bargaining table by the fact that the guidelines and the request have been put out to all Canadians to restrain their demands on the economy. Of course, when they do have a completed contract, and this is on the assumption, firstly, that the bill is approved by the House and, secondly, that the Ontario government is prepared to enter into an agreement under the bill to give responsibility to the federal government in this area, that contract should be brought forward for the scrutiny of the Anti-Inflation Board, if that seems appropriate at the time.

[Mr. Allmand.]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—ADVISABILITY OF PAYING WAGES HIGHER THAN GUIDELINES WITHOUT CONSENT OF BOARD

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree with Mr. Wells in saying that once an agreement is reached between the school board and the teachers the school board should pay the higher compensation without the consent of the Anti-Inflation Board?

Hon. Donald Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my advice to the school boards or, indeed, to any other organization in Canada, is that if there be any doubt in this regard in respect of the contract being entered into they should confine themselves to the payment of the guideline limits and should be seeking advice as to any excess that might be payable.

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe they started discussing it last July.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—LENGTH OF TIME TO DEAL WITH APPEALS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree with Mr. Wells that it will take approximately a year and a half before a case can go before the Anti-Inflation Board because of the lengthy appeal procedures?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the Ontario minister misunderstood the procedure. The board can, of course, conduct a quick scrutiny of the situation and, in appropriate cases, refer the matter to the administrator. The onus will then be on the party ordered against to change the decision, but the decision will stand and the party will be bound by it until the appeal tribunal determines otherwise.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Solicitor General does fund projects in respect of juvenile delinquents and assists groups in finding work for ex-inmates. Whether the groups in the hon. member's constituency would be eligible depends on the applications. I would suggest that they forward their applications which will be considered in the usual way.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get some clarification on an answer that was given to me recently by the Minister of the Environment. For that reason, I will put my question to the Minister of State for Fisheries.

Could the minister assure the House that patrol vessels which protect our fisheries have resumed their usual activity or does he have to admit that those patrols have been substantially reduced, which could cause irreparable damage to our fisheries as well as to our claims under the law of the sea convention?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, if there has been some reduction, it was because the Tanu needed repair and it was several days before it could put back to the sea again. Six out of 17 of our patrol ships have resumed their activity or will next week to check herring stocks. I must say to the hon. member that it is normal at the end of the salmon fishing season to assemble the fleet, either to allow certain crews to go on leave or to rearrange the schedule of some other crews. I agree with him that there are some financing difficulties and that we must maintain a stock for spring fishing especially herring during the month of March, but I can assure him that it is not our intention at all to leave that part of the sea unprotected.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF SAVINGS BOND DIVIDEND CHEQUES IN VIEW OF POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in reply to a previous question of mine the minister said they were negotiating with the chartered banks an alternate system for getting the November 1 interest payments on Canada Savings Bonds into the hands of the recipients. I understand the negotiations have been successful. Can the minister give us any details that would clear up the question of how the savings bond holder is to get the interest payment?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Victoria for his consideration and initiative in this regard. As he indicated, we have now completed arrangements with the chartered banks whereby recipients of interest payments on the Canada savings bonds falling due November 1 may obtain payment of those amounts by application to the chartered bank, credit union or other financial institution with which they deal. In this respect persons should contact their appropriate fiscal representative of that kind, indicating their full identity, and the government will make every effort as soon as possible to get those cheques into the hands of the financial institutions for payment to those individuals.

OPPOSITION OF QUEBEC LABOUR LEADERS TO ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the statements made yesterday by the leaders of the two most influential unions in Quebec, the CNTU and the QFL, who went as far as calling the minister an "arrant liar", statements with which I do not associate myself, can the minister tell the House if he maintains his assertion that he unofficially has the support of the Quebec union officials for his anti-inflation measures and, if so, is he willing to name the leaders who have assured him of their support?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that in fact I did not speak to those two Quebec unions leaders. What I said in Montreal was that, I myself, as well as some of my colleagues, have spoken to many union members who support the government program. I also pointed out the fact that some other union leaders, and I mentioned for instance Mr. Joe Morris, have indicated, privately and publicly, that they were against them. But actually I did not mention the two union leaders the hon. member has referred to, nor am I thinking of them in my remarks.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Would he be prepared to agree with the suggestions of the union leaders in Quebec and meet them in a public debate to discuss the relevancy of the anti-inflation measures?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not necessarily against such a debate but it seems to me more progressive to have private meetings. If they can make useful suggestions to fight inflation, I would be prepared to see these two gentlemen.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF GENERAL QUANG—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I would like to know whether it is now the policy of the government to allow aliens who have been involved in drug trafficking abroad to remain in Canada on so-called humanitarian grounds because they might face prosecution if they were deported. I say this in reference to General Dang Van Quang who has been under a deportation order for nearly four months which order the minister has not carried out.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the deportation of General Quang it is a matter of record of course that discussions are taking place, most particularly with the United States authorities to see whether there is any possibility they will accept him under their immigration law and there has not been a refusal on that score as yet.

Very frankly and candidly I would much prefer to see the deportation of this person, as unacceptable as he is for reasons already stated, effected to that country rather than face the final decision as to whether or not to send him back to South Vietnam. While that possibility has any reasonable chance of coming forth I would prefer to delay, even though it may take a few more months for a decision to be rendered.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if in the final analysis there is no other country that will take Quang will he assure the House that he will carry out that deportation order to South Vietnam.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will make that decision when the matter of other alternatives is clarified.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware a number of meetings have been carried on in recent days. As of this morning I instructed my deputy minister to suggest to General Steel Wares, the potential purchasers, that they seek an extension. I am waiting until after the question period to meet with my deputy. I have no reason to believe that that extension will not be sought. I have had representations from various groups which the Minister of Labour has brought here and I have given them that assurance that we will look for the extension. ALLEGED REQUEST OF ONTARIO CORONER FOR ASSISTANCE IN INVESTIGATING SHOOTING INCIDENT IN OTTAWA—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In light of recent tragic events and the concern expressed publicly by the supervising coroner of Ontario, would the Solicitor General undertake to give the assistance of his department to the supervising coroner of Ontario, should he request it, with regard to the tragic events which took place in Ottawa just recently?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the House that I have not yet received any invitation from the coroner either by telegram, telephone or by any other method whatsoever. I find it rather unusual that he should issue invitations to me in a challenging way through the public press. If we do receive an invitation, we would consider it seriously.

AIRPORTS

TERMINATION OF AGREEMENT WITH PORTERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SAVE EMPLOYMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the minister in charge of Air Canada, among other things. When I was in Toronto this morning porters brought to my attention the fact that as a result of the cancellation of the porter agreement which has taken place, these porters, despite in some cases many years of good service—some up to 20 years and beyond—have received notices of dismissal. Will the minister look into this matter? Apparently an American company has taken the place of a Canadian company, and these porters are naturally deeply concerned that a month from now, their notice having been received today, they will be out of work.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into the matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF REPORT OF DR. HALL ON PENSIONS OF RAILWAYMEN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister indicate whether we might soon see the report of Dr. Noel Hall concerning all aspects of railway pensions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am as eager as the hon. member to find out the results, which I hope will be very soon.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF ENRICHED URANIUM PLANT IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I would like to know about the progress of the talks with the province of Quebec on the establishment of the enriched uranium plant. Has Quebec given up this file or its responsibilities to the government, or has the minister recently met with the minister responsible in Quebec to reach a conclusion?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of conversations between officials of my department and Quebec government officials. I think the arrangement which has been worked out is that the Quebec government will proceed with its own particular feasibility or pre-feasibility study. For our part we will be undertaking a particular study dealing with economics and other factors which come into play for that major proposed project.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Last week, Mr. Villeneuve, Hydro Quebec's representative and director of transportation, said before Mr. Farmer, a spokesman for the National Energy Board of the federal government, that Ottawa could force Hydro Quebec to sell its power. He also said that a request made fifteen months ago by Hydro Quebec is still pending before the National Energy Board. Can the minister tell the House if Ottawa proposes to force Quebec to increase its rates? Also, can he say whether Quebec will soon get an answer?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we are not interested in forcing anyone to do anything.

OLYMPIC GAMES

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF CONTRACT PROCEDURES AND COSTS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to an earlier question asked of the Prime Minister about the Olympics. I was pleased to note, from the Prime Minister's answers to earlier questions, his interest in the Olympics now, which seems to be in contrast with the time he emphatically stated that the federal government would not pay one cent toward the games.

In view of the many difficulties and irregularities in the letting of contracts, security and other problems as well as the continual increase in the cost, which is expected now to reach $1 billion, notwithstanding over $200 million in direct grants by the federal government, would the Prime Minister be prepared to have the government initiate a detailed investigation into the letting of contracts, rising costs and all of the other problems in order to try to at least curb this runaway situation, and could he make a report available to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it was not intentional, but the hon. member just misled the House by saying that I had said the government would not pay a single cent. As a matter of fact, in my initial statement in parliament when I responded to the request of Mayor Drapeau and COJO, I made it quite clear that we would not pick up deficits, and so on, but that we would pay certain costs which result from federal participation. I mentioned specifically CBC, police, army, diplomatic services and so on, so the hon. member should not try to convey the impression that I am changing our position. It is the same position it was initially.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we step in to try to control and be prepared to pay part of the deficit, I am sure there are many Canadians who would support him, but I wish he would make his position clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Before I come to my supplementary I should like to clarify my suggestion. I was not trying to mislead the House, but I was under the impression that before the original Olympic bill came before the House the Prime Minister was quoted as saying that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: My supplementary is actually the same question. Because of all the problems Montreal and COJO are experiencing, I ask the Prime Minister whether he would be prepared to initiate an investigation in order to help them out and in order to curb the runaway problems which Montreal and COJO are experiencing.

Mr. Trudeau: That is really part of the same question the hon. member asked previously, but I put it to him that if we want to investigate and control costs, supervise the contracts and sign them ourselves, the hon. member is really suggesting that we do share part of the responsibility for the deficit. If this is his position, he should state it clearly on behalf of his party, and we will consider it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—INCREASE IN RATES ON CONTAINERS FROM HALIFAX—SUGGESTED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Transport. What action does the government propose to take with respect to the additional 10 per cent plus 5 per cent increases in freight rates for containers moving out of the port of Halifax into central Canada? These increases come into effect very shortly and will bring to a total of 73 per cent the increases in freight rates in the last five or six years for that particular item.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the House in answer to earlier questions, all proposed freight rate increases will now have to be tested against the guidelines. There are some complicated questions involved in determining the application of those guidelines to such complex matters as freight rates, and we are looking into the question of the exact nature of those guidelines now.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder if I can assume from the welcome response of the minister that some action will be taken to defer or delay the implementation of further freight rate increases in instances such as this until such time as the review board has procedures in place to deal with them and to consider them properly.

● (1500)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to forecast the specific details until I am rather more sure about the nature of the application of the guidelines to freight increases.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week. I watched him counting on his fingers the number of shopping days to Christmas, so perhaps he will tell us what he dreams of finding hung on his legislative Christmas tree on, say, December 19.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the House leader for the official opposition has indicated, the House leaders have had some discussion about the program of measures the government would like to have dealt with by the House before Christmas. There is universal, enthusiastic support for a fixed day for the beginning of the Christmas break, which we all agree should be, if possible, December 19. In order to realize these various objectives, it will be necessary to manage the time devoted to the various measures before us and, particularly, to move bills into standing committees as expeditiously as possible.

With that in mind, I am announcing a program which the House leaders believe is manageable, and would not unduly restrain debate on any particular measure, for the period Friday, October 31, to Friday, November 7, inclusive. This program would cover the following items: second reading of bills C-28, C-21 and S-10; the remaining stages of Bill C-25; second reading of Bill C-69; second reading of Bill C-65 and its consideration in committee of the whole; second reading of Bill C-52.

Hon. members will note that this package of measures includes some that might be called housekeeping items which are not likely to involve much by way of debate, some relatively non-contentious bills, and the conclusion of the second reading debate on Bill C-69 relative to unemployment insurance. The intention is that debate on second reading of Bill C-69 will resume on Monday, November 3. There has been agreement among House leaders that in order to have some prospect of reaching our objectives, we should agree now to reduce somewhat the time limitation on speeches upon resumption of second reading.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That when the House resumes consideration of the second reading stage of Government Order No. 69, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, all speeches be limited to 30 minutes during the debate on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I am not mistaken, the motion refers to Government Order No. 69. In fact, it also refers to Bill C-69. I do not know whether there is some confusion. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, while we are all getting along so famously, I wonder if the minister could clarify the government's intention with regard to November 10, respecting which there was a measure of agreement, so that the House can make certain that this will be a fait accompli?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House one day last week, there is a general desire that the House should not sit on November 10, this being the day before one of the legal holidays. That has been agreed, and I intend to bring forward an order to add some time to government days in order to make up for the time lost. I did make another suggestion to the House leader of the official opposition, but I hesitate to mention it in case he turns it down.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as will be clear, we have agreed to certain matters which have already been mentioned. However, may I ask the government House Leader my weekly question about two pieces of legislation? I realize that in the discussions yesterday, reference was made to the bill to amend the Government Annuities Act. Can we be assured that that bill will be before us in time for it to be dealt with before Christmas? Also, can the minister say whether the bill based on the report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs regarding Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war will be before us so that we can get it passed before Christmas?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in cabinet today we dealt with both of those measures. We agreed on the terms of the bill to amend the Government Annuities Act and it will come forward in the next few days. We also discussed the terms of the other bill but did not reach a final conclusion, although things are moving.

The question concerns the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive and the fact that certain questions, particularly No. 1,233, have been answered with non-answers. I ask the Prime Minister, on this point of order, if he can now assure the House beyond any doubt that there is no impropriety, no conflict of interest or anything existing in regard to the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member may know, he probably does not have a valid point of order; and even if he does, it does not permit him to ask questions beyond the question period.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT SPENDING—IMPLEMENTATION OF WILSON REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That in the view of this House, the government should set an example to other Canadians by forthwith indicating the nature and extent of the restraints on government spending and should also introduce without further delay measures to implement the Wilson report on the office of the Auditor General as an indication of its willingness to eliminate waste and extravagance.

He said: Madam Speaker, in this motion put forward by my party today we are asking the government to set an example for Canadians in the matter of restraints. The government should also take specific action in relation to the office of the Auditor General. During most of my remarks I intend to deal with the restraint aspect of the motion, under two headings. Others will deal specifically with the office of the Auditor General and recommendations will be made in that regard.

● (1510)

As I say, it is of great importance to the country that the government itself set an example to the people, in two ways. First, there must be real restraint. Here there is no room for new tricks with mirrors, or old juggling acts. Second, the public must perceive that the government has changed its own style of living, really believes in modesty of operation and is committed to it as a long-term way of life. So far, in the flurry and confusion of the first 17 days of the new renaissance, I have not seen examples of the government's determination to proceed on either of those necessary courses, let alone on both. The government seems to be in the middle of the ocean and trying to build a boat at the same time. It seems to be so preoccupied with its dilemma that it has not got around to charting any evident course.

Speaking on my first point, that of the government setting an example by real restraint, let me make it clear at the outset that I am not simply talking about amounts being spent. Much of the problem created by the government results from the way in which money is spent. I think this area is a prime target if any attempt at restraint is intended to be meaningful. The government, clearly, has a record—and therefore a reputation—of getting little bang for the taxpayers' buck. Money somehow gets thrown around inefficiently and ineffectively. This is very evident in relation to DREE programs. This fact has always caused me a great deal of concern.

Mr. Chrétien: Tell us where you would make cuts.

Mr. Stanfield: Madam Speaker, if the minister will bear with me, we shall try to set him straight.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to set the tone of the debate.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister says he wants to set the tone.

Mr. Chrétien: Tell us where you would make cuts.

Mr. Stanfield: I want to talk for a moment about DREE, as large-scale funds are devoted to DREE programs. In all the years this government has tried to tackle the problem of regional disparity, it has never given us any coherent or consistent plan. There has not been any coherent plan within DREE itself. For example, DREE programs have not been co-ordinated with transportation policies. Frequently, one or several ministries of government do things which run counter to the purposes of DREE. That this is so is evident from the fiscal and monetary policies and programs this government has adopted from time to time.

I have always been concerned that the lack of effectiveness of DREE expenditures would weaken the willingness of those in the more prosperous parts of the country to continue supporting the high level of contributions being made to this kind of program. I became very concerned a few years ago when a minister formerly in charge of DREE said in the House that DREE could be defended as successful because the gap between the maritimes and Ontario had been narrowed—narrowed because the maritimes were still as they had been, in absolute terms, but the economy of Ontario had been depressed by the federal government's economic slowdown of 1969 and 1970.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to see the fight against regional disparity lessened one whit, but I do not want to see things go on as stupidly as they have. Particularly, I do not want to hear again any defence of DREE similar to defences made in the past. I believe we can put up a much better fight against regional disparity and get far better results from the proportion of the national pie we have devoted to programs like those of DREE. I want to see some examples of that, Madam Speaker, as I know it can be done. With regard to the impact of government activities, the white paper stated:

> The government will ask each of its departments or agencies to assess the probable impact of their policies and programs on both short-term and long-term price trends.

It went on to say:

> The government intends to reassess the costs to the private sector of many government rules and regulations in the context of their benefits to society at large.

On reading those statements, I must say that at first glance I was struck by the fact that the government was again handing out my cigars. In the 1974 campaign, the Progressive Conservative party, as part of our economic stabilization program, said that in government it would subject all programs to an inflation impact test. We also said we wanted to cut away a good deal of bureaucratic underbrush because realities required nothing less. While I am encouraged to see these words in the white paper, I am not at all sure that these promises are serious. I have good reason for doubt. This government, for example, still refuses—I want the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) to listen carefully—to submit the unemployment insurance program to any kind of independent inquiry.

Mr. Chrétien: We have submitted it to the House.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister says that the matter was submitted to the House. The government knows full well that the legislation presently before the House does not address itself in any fundamental way to the concerns about this program in terms of cost and productivity in the economy. I ask the President of the Treasury Board why a program which parliament was told would cost $20 per capita annually for unemployment insurance, when unemployment was assumed to be at 6.5 per cent per annum, a few short years later costs $200 per capita annually.

Mr. Baldwin: Shocking!

Mr. Stanfield: Why have we gone, in a few short years, from a cost figure of $20 per capita to one of $200 per capita, a figure ten times greater? That question, I think, must be answered. An independent inquiry is obviously the most honest and satisfactory way of getting an answer. We put forward proposals which would have resulted in significant economies, but these are no substitute for an independent inquiry and will not tell us why a program we were told would cost Canadians $20 per capita is now costing $200 per capita.

I want to make it clear that when I talk about an inquiry, I have no intention of implying a witch-hunt or simply a crackdown on abuses. Some administrative tightening up has already taken place, but more can be done along those lines. Leaving aside administration and control of abuses, I want to see an inquiry into unemployment insurance programs which will really get to the roots of the program and come up with concrete answers to a number of basic questions. One is, why is the program costing Canadians $200 per capita per annum when we had been assured that it would cost about $20 per capita? We have been seeking such an inquiry for more than two years. If the inquiry had been started when we wanted it, it would have been completed by now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And the government would not be in office.

Mr. Stanfield: We are talking in terms of billions of dollars. Think of the pressure put on the individual working Canadian by rising prices, unemployment insurance payments and taxes of all sorts. When the government puts a control program before the Canadian people, asking them to accept certain restraints with regard to remuneration, wages and salaries, I have to ask whether the government is prepared to commit itself not to take more of the people's incomes through such period of restraint.

● (1520)

We see the weasel statement in the white paper in which the government says it recognizes the importance of having its expenditures follow the same trend as the gross national product—a statement that does not mean anything at all. When the Canadian people are being asked to adopt a program of restraint for a period of perhaps three, four or more years, they are entitled to some pretty firm statements from the government as to how restrained it is prepared to be in putting its hands into their pockets to take away even more of their restricted earnings. You have to think of the sacrifice being asked of the individual arising out of the policy the government has announced. How can so much be asked, on the one hand, and so little answered on the other?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That is no recipe for stimulating co-operation and support for the program. It is a recipe for inciting resistance, exactly the opposite of what is required. The only example of any substantial or significant effort by the government to impose restraint is in connection with the health care program, where the government has decided, unilaterally,to place a ceiling on its expenditures, passing the buck to the provinces rather than making any real effort to achieve control within the program. It is a unilateral solution being imposed upon the provinces.

On the matter of creating public perception that restraint is a sincere intention of the government, the going will be very tough. Anyone with a vivid memory of Liberal television advertising during the 1974 election campaign might be inclined to say that the ghosts of all those gassed chickens have come home to roost.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) now tosses out phrases like "living beyond our means" as he lectures, threatens and exhorts his way around the country. That is interesting. It is most interesting that he neglects to mention that before his administration took office, Canadians generally relied on the federal government to tell them what were their means. The Prime Minister talks about people demanding services from government, and in the same breath he talks about leadership. In 1974 he made $4 billion to $5 billion worth of promises, all the while talking about leadership. In 1972 he talked about goodies and candy.

His government has changed the whole nature of responsibility in administering the means of Canadians. It has betrayed the essence of federal economic leadership: it has almost made the word itself meaningless. What the government is doing now is not providing leadership; it is purely and simply a case of reaction in desperation. Whether the desperation was more keenly felt about the nation's economy, or about some vote that might take place at a Liberal convention, I do not know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That is an example of how little stock I am prepared to put in the sincerity of their actions. What are these means within which we should be prepared to live? The government will not even tell the House and the country the current state of the country's deficit. I say it will not tell us because I am not prepared to believe that it cannot tell us. When I was involved in provincial government I had nowhere near the sophisticated apparatus available to me that this government has, but I always had a ballpark fix on what the years' financial results were going to be. Therefore, no one opposite can pretend they do not know the latest forecast of the budget deficit.

How is anyone going to trust a government which, in today's circumstances, will not tell us how far it is extended beyond its own means but says, "You must learn to live within your means", when its means are only provided through our means in the first place? There are reports that the deficit for the current fiscal year will be $7 billion or more. We cannot get any response from the minister. There are also reports, which seem to be well founded, that the deficit for the next fiscal year will be substantially larger than that.

People living in New York city at least know what they are up against. At this moment, Canadians are not even being given a clue. They are threatened by the government. They are told to live within their means or court being subjected to a further terrible economic thumbscrew. They are told this by a government which takes their tax money today and says it will given an accounting later, a government that asks them to adopt a program today and says they will tell the story later. This attitude, in itself, makes a farce of the Prime Minister's admonitions about changing attitudes. The Prime Minister gives the impression that it really does not matter much to him whether he has a government in a permissive society or an authoritarian society. Whatever became of the just society seems to be just an academic question today.

This perception has to be changed and it will only be changed by changing the reality of the situation. The government has finally admitted that the problem of inflationary expectations in Canada is self-feeding. It has finally abandoned the myth that our problem is largely international and, therefore, beyond our control. Having taken that giant step into reality, after two years of denying the evidence and the indicators, it has to go all the way if it wants to be believed. The truth extended only up to a point just will not do. The whole truth, and nothing but the truth, must be added as requirements for credibility. These people have said so many things which have devalued the currency of their credibility that they cannot afford to be less than frank today. There certainly must be no restraint on the truth.

Government Spending

When the Prime Minister talks about the revolution of rising expectations he should, with equal candour, be prepared to talk about the revolution of diminishing credibility which his party and his administration have brought about in relation to parliament, to government and to the process of politics generally. The reversals, U-turns and flip-flops which have been exhibited to Canadians by the present government are beyond redemption through the art of alibi. This is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said in his Rosedale victory celebration on July 8, 1974:

● (1530)

Leadership was the issue in this election... Inflation was a great concern but this was not a vote for or against inflation. Everybody's against inflation. It was a vote against direct controls. The voters rejected wage controls and the notion that government spending was responsible for inflation at this time, which I have to regard as a sensible judgement.

I suppose the Minister of Finance believed in what he said at that time. I don't know what he believes in today. Along with the Prime Minister and the other ministers of the government, he is trying to tell us that times have changed: yesterday's white is today's black; yesterday's thorn is today a rose. They spent years of their careers in the cabinet accusing my party and myself of being prophets of doom and gloom. Madam Speaker, it is now clear that we were not false prophets. The false prophets were those with positions of leadership within the government and within the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: They should have known better and they should have behaved better. But they chose the primrose path. They chose expediency over responsibility. They chose excess instead of sufficiency as a hallmark of their trappings of office. I get the feeling that many of them are numbed, now, by the realization of where this has led the country and the mood of the country. But shock by itself is not repentance, and retrenchment is not restraint. They talk about changing attitudes in the country. Let them confess who made a major contribution to breeding those attitudes they now want to change. Sackcloth has no credibility in its own right; and it certainly has no meaning at all when it cloaks a creature with a forked tongue.

Let somebody in the government have the courage to say that its laissez-faire approach to spending money on frills and peacockery was a mistake. Office renovations alone have put the government in a position where the public knows that many ministers and officials are going to tough out this war on inflation in pretty sumptuous bunkers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Those who are on the firing line, those who are urged to accept restraints which are not very pleasant to bear, are not going to be impressed by chocolate soldiers. Everywhere a Canadian looks, he sees things like the lavish reception at Mirabel. There are those on the other side who will say these things do not really mean very much, that they represent only a very small fraction of total government expenditure. Mr. Speaker, it is exactly that kind of thinking which is ruining the government's credibility and makes it appear unworthy of trust. Unhappily, it is the kind of thinking which appears to prevail among members of the government today.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

In closing, I say there are great areas of government expenditure which need looking into. I mention the unemployment insurance fund particularly, where costs are now running at $200 per capita instead of $20 per capita as they were supposed to be. In many respects, the signs of lavishness are perhaps more important, in terms of the public acceptance of restraint, than reasonable expenditures on larger programs. With so many examples of government spending on luxuries rather than on good, plain fare, how can hon. gentlemen opposite seriously expect the public to accept restraint? How can the government seriously expect the public to take it seriously?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it is Thursday today, yet as I listened to that demonical sermon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) I had the feeling it must be Sunday. It is difficult for me to get up and defend the government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: —at this point because yesterday, when I was replying to a question, the same man who was talking about the virtue of not spending shouted across the floor to me, calling me Scrooge because I was not spending enough.

Mr. Stanfield: No.

Mr. Chrétien: When I hear these sanctimonious sermons in the House I am simply amazed. The other day we sat here minute after minute waiting to hear their proposals for reducing expenditure. All we heard was a lot of hot air. The hon. gentleman mentioned the reception at Mirabel. Let me remind him that we are dealing with a budget of $34 billion. Perhaps we did spend a little too much on the opening of Mirabel.

What else has been referred to? The only other matter concerned unemployment insurance. Well, there was a debate on this very subject in the House yesterday. At the end of that debate the bill will be sent to committee for full examination. Yet the opposition is still asking for an inquiry. Madam Speaker, if members of the opposition have an accusation to make, let them get up in the House and make it. Let them go before the committee and show where money is being wasted on the government's unemployment insurance program. It is useless simply to make general statements of the kind they are making.

The other day in the House the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) asked me to put more money into the LIP program. A little later he made the same request of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). Within half an hour the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) got up and said we should cut the LIP program. I suggest hon. members opposite should get together in caucus before making statements like that in the House. Today they are asking us to reduce expenditures. Look at Hansard. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was on his feet on October 21 asking the government to spend more money on the cow-calf operation.

Mr. Mazankowski: Simply because your own minister said he would do it.

Mr. Chrétien: He called for more money for that operation. Then on the same day, October 21, the hon. member for Joliette asked for more money for the LIP program.

● (1540)

Mr. La Salle: Dépensez l'argent à la bonne place.

Mr. Chrétien: Don't try and say things out of both sides of your mouth. According to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, we are spending too much. I do not say that; I am quoting the official opposition. I do not know whether he is wrong or right. I am trying to illustrate the unity of this party on major policy. In the first allotted day that they have in this House, the opposition members are asking us to cut expenditures.

Mr. Mazankowski: Tell us about Mirabel and the 20,000 bucks spent on booze.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) wanted the government to extend the French program for a longer period. I do not say he is wrong, but he should have talked to his leader before his leader made his speech. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—I do not know which party he belongs to—wants us to put more money into research programs for agriculture. That would not be cutting expenditure.

As for the party at Mirabel, another nice gentleman got up on his feet the other day and talked about that. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) suggested an amendment to increase expenditure in the fisheries department to cover fishermen. I do not say he is right or wrong; I am just telling him to ask his leader what he thinks about that before asking the question. I have with me a pile of questions which are asked in this House by hon. members opposite every day. The Leader of the Opposition wanted an inquiry into the unemployment insurance program. He should go to the committee and ask that question.

Mr. Forrestall: Go to the committee? Be credible.

Mr. Chrétien: When we did not have a committee, hon. members were complaining because we did not provide them with the information on which to ask questions. The officials are there, and hon. members can have the director of the program there to answer questions.

Mr. Woolliams: I have never heard such nonsense in my life.

Mr. Chrétien: You are referring to the speech that your leader made a few minutes ago, are you?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I must remind hon. members at this time that they are supposed to address the Chair, not each other across the aisle.

Mr. Yewchuk: Say something positive.

Mr. Chrétien: The Leader of the Opposition made a general accusation today. I expected him to be precise. He said he was not asking the government to cut the DREE program, but he was asking that it be made more efficient. There is, of course, room for more efficiency in many areas; I do not deny that. But he did not suggest that we cut one cent from the program. Out of the $34 billion budget of the government, not one item was identified by the Leader of the Opposition apart from the party that was held at Mirabel two weeks ago, which I could not attend anyway, so I did not benefit from it. Hon. members should be more precise. In the budget last June—

Mr. Fairweather: Whose budget was that, and where is he?

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. gentleman was here a minute ago.

Mr. Baldwin: Now you see him, now you don't.

Mr. Chrétien: We have proposed a series of cuts amounting to $967 million.

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense.

Mr. Chrétien: It is not nonsense. I can go through each department that has had to make cuts. I have received representations from members on the other side of the House asking me to make more money available for the small craft harbours program. Some members of the opposition asked me not to cut that program. We have made cuts in agriculture and in communications. If hon. members have not read this list that has been published, I could table it. It would take me five minutes to read it. They make statements dealing in generalities, without being specific on anything. They do not have the guts to be specific.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) claims I am not spending enough and neither is the government. He is not asking us to make cuts. I do not like to hear the official opposition asking us today to cut expenditure, when in every question period that we have one of them gets up and asks us to spend a little more money here and a little more money there. They should be logical. As I say, we have cut $967 million from the budget brought down in June.

Mr. Crouse: Be honest.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the fact. I will table the list, if you have not read it; but hon. members opposite do not want it printed in Hansard. I can read all five pages of it, if you want me to do so.

Mr. MacEachen: Read it through, Jean.

Mr. Chrétien: These are the expenditure reductions. Department of Agriculture, Canadian Dairy Commission, $14 million; multipurpose exhibition facilities, $2.5 million; Farm Credit Corporation, $20 million; Department of Communications, professional and special services, $200,000; Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, $2.9 million; Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, energy, research and development—

Mr. Forrestall: Come on, say something.

Mr. Chrétien: I have 120, lines to go through, and I have only dealt with five.

Mr. Fairweather: That is all faked, and you know it.

Mr. Chrétien: No, it is not. This is money that the department were going to spend but which we have now cut, so it is not faked.

Mr. Fairweather: That is part of your problem, credibility.

Mr. Chrétien: In 1973-74 and 1974-75 the increase in the civil service was, on average, 6 per cent to 7 per cent a year. In the blue book that I have tabled for this fiscal year I stated it would be reduced to 4.1 per cent. In the budget of the previous minister of finance he and I proposed to reduce it further, by 1 per cent to 3.1 per cent. In the program for next year we see the growth of the public service as 1.5 per cent over this year. Every department is affected. Hon. members should visit Treasury Board where every week departments are asking us for more money and more man-years.

Mr. Forrestall: How big will the deficit be?

Mr. Chrétien: When I tabled the estimates in January, I said that the increase in expenditure this year compared with the previous year would be less than 16 per cent. Many members on the other side said that in light of the history of the government, that was not possible. I am telling them today that not only will it be less than 16 per cent, but it will be less than 15 per cent next year. I have a list of all these government expenditures. In the budget, the previous minister of finance said that the cash requirements of the government would be around $35 billion, if I recall the figure correctly. That total remains unchanged. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has some fresh announcement to make, then he will make it; but we are still sticking by the budget predictions of July.

The government is proposing $32.2 billion of expenditure. Legislation passed by this House of Commons accounts for 56 per cent of that total. Who is proposing that we do not pay old age security? Who is proposing that we do not pay the interest on the public debt? Who is proposing that we do not pay the provinces the fiscal transfer payments that the legislation of this House has guaranteed them? Who is proposing in this House that we do not pay family allowances? All these programs were voted for in this House; hon. members on all sides voted for them.

● (1550)

An hon. Member: Who proposes to cut out medicare?

Mr. Chrétien: Who proposes that this year we do not pay for hospital care? Who proposes that we do not pay unemployment insurance benefits? Who are those that propose we do not meet our medicare obligations?

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Chrétien: Who are those that do not agree we should pay Canada Assistance Plan benefits, post-secondary education assistance, military pensions, railway subsidies for the maintenance of branch lines, and so on? Who is proposing that we cut all these? I would like those members to get up and say that these programs are the ones that are no damned good and we should cut them. In his speech, the Leader of the Opposition did not propose one thing that we should cut from the budget of $32 billion. The list I have just enumerated represents 56 per cent of the budget of the government.

We have certain contractual payments. Who is proposing that we do not pay for Manpower training programs in this land? Who does not want us to keep on paying $252 million for sewage treatment plants and public housing projects under CMHC? Who is proposing that we do not make fiscal transfer payments to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories? By the way, I am glad to see that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is back in the House. We were right in appointing a Liberal senator in order to bring him back to Ottawa, as we have not seen him for a long time. Who is proposing that we not pay public service employee fringe benefits to the extent of $95 million? Who is proposing that we cut legal aid grants to the provinces? This is another contractual payment. I would like hon. members to tell us which of these programs we should cut. Hon. members on the other side are silent. Get up and tell me which ones you want us to cut.

Mr. Howie: I don't want you to cut any of them, but isn't your minister of health trying to cut back on medicare?

Mr. Chrétien: No, I am talking about this fiscal year. Hon. members do not want to say. Let us go to another area.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must challenge the statement the minister has just made. Only last Thursday in this House, when speaking on Bill C-73—

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

Mr. Crouse: If the hon. member over there will keep quiet for a moment I will explain the point of order. If he will be as patient with me as I am with him, I will outline the point. It is simply this: the minister has said that no one from this side of the House has at any time offered any suggestion in respect of cuts that would be reasonable and would not affect the lifestyle of Canadians. Last Thursday, when speaking on Bill C-73, as recorded at page 8491 of Hansard I made concrete suggestions in this House which would cut at least $500 million from the present budget. The minister has made no comment in respect of those suggestions. I ask him now if he will sincerely consider those proposals and, hopefully, take advantage of some of them.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. This is clearly a matter of debate and not a point of order. The hon. member may wish to participate later in the debate.

Mr. Chrétien: In reply to the hon. member, what he is referring to is the consultants' fees referred to in the book published by my department. He suggested the amount involved was $1 billion, but when I got to my feet I explained to him that there was an amount of $486 million included in that to cover Manpower training programs. I would ask hon. members whether we should cut that. I have indicated, in respect of professional consultants being hired by the government, that I ordered a reduction this year of 10 per cent over what was predicted; and we have accomplished that.

Mr. Crouse: Those are not the recommendations I made to you, sir.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member asked me about consultants' fees and I said that, included in that item, were the Manpower training transfer payments to the provinces.

An hon. Member: You are not listening.

Mr. Chrétien: What about the payments made in respect of veterans' allowances amounting to $516 million? What about CIDA grants in the amount of $481 million? What about municipal grants in lieu of taxes, amounting to $76 million? What about grants to international organizations, in the amount of $36 million? We have to meet those contractual obligations, and no one is suggesting to us that we should not. I could carry on and on. For example, we are spending 8 per cent of the total budget of the government for national defence. I see the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) in his seat. I would like him to tell me if he would want us to cut the defence budget even more. He is the official critic of the opposition with respect to national defence. Should we cut the $2.432 billion we are spending for national defence?

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the minister has asked me a question and I should like to answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member will have an opportunity to participate when the minister has resumed his seat.

Mr. McKinnon: He has asked me a question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: I hope I will hear that the hon. member wants us to cut that expenditure.

Mr. McKinnon: You could cut out the $11 million the department has paid two American companies for a study it does not intend to use.

An hon. Member: That is $11 million; think about it.

Mr. Chrétien: It is $11 million of a budget of $2.432 billion.

An hon. Member: What's $11 million?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know about this case; I will investigate it. But the hon. member knows that is not hurting the real expenditures for national defence. This is the background on which we are working.

I would like hon. members to be precise about these so-called cuts to programs. They should stop speaking from both sides of their mouths. If they want us to make cuts, they should advise us where we should make them. We have to meet the budget. We get the funds, and we will defend our expenditures. I do not like this business of members of the official opposition and other opposition members asking for more money, then the Leader of the Opposition asking us to cut expenditures, when the only precise thing he can refer to is the opening of the Mirabel airport at Montreal.

An hon. Member: You have just heard two examples from two members.

Mr. Chrétien: Hon. members are talking pure nonsense. I would like them to be precise about these cuts, because people expect a better effort on the part of opposition members; they expect them to be more precise and to suggest more concrete things. At least the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) makes no bones about it; he wants us to put everything under government control, without any more room for private enterprise in the market place. That is his position. I do not agree with him, but at least he stands by his words and is not speaking from both sides of his mouth.

Mr. McKenzie: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I never made any such statement. The minister referred to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member is not in his seat.

Mr. Chrétien: I am terriby sorry. I am sure you do not want to be referred to as that hon. member and I am sure he does not want to be referred to as you. I apologize.

Mr. Woolliams: I have to agree with that statement.

Mr. Chrétien: I will make sure I do not refer to the hon. member for the other riding in Winnipeg. Madam Speaker, I should like to speak for a few minutes on the other aspect of the resolution. The Leader of the Opposition did not mention anything about it; he suggested that other members would refer to the Wilson commission. We received the report from that commission a few months ago. I am glad to report that we are on the verge of a final decision by cabinet in that regard. Some 95 per cent of the recommendations are absolutely acceptable to me and are likely to be acceptable to my colleagues in the cabinet. A final decision of the cabinet will be made within a few weeks. Following that, a bill will be drafted by the Department of Justice. The commission has worked very effectively in this area for many months and has made all sorts of very far reaching recommendations which have to be analysed by the government. These recommendations were presented to the House of Commons in the month of May.

Mr. Baldwin: In April, if not in March. You got them in March and we got them in April.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not have the precise date, but I will try to find it. It was quite late in the session. Both you and I are wrong on the date; it was actually April 14. The legislation will be available as soon as possible. I have had occasion to discuss some aspects of this report with the Auditor General and I am quite confident that when the whole process is completed the Auditor General will be satisfied with the bill I will introduce in this House. I said, when this report was tabled in April, that I hoped the government would be able to make up its mind before the end of the year. I am satisfied the government will have made a final decision by the end of the year and that long before that the bill will be ready for the House to study and make changes as need be.

● (1600)

Madam Speaker, I just want to reiterate the position of the government on expenditures. This year we have already cut $967 million in expenditures from the budget. These had been approved by the cabinet. The government has done this in order to make a contribution to the restraint program. We said, also, that for next year we will reduce to only 1.5 per cent the increase in the number of public servants to be hired by the government. We said that many of the other expenditures will be controlled. We said, for instance, that there will be no buying of new furniture for public servants next year and that there will be no buying of new automobiles. We also mentioned that there will be no first-class travel for public servants, and so on.

In response to the request of the Leader of the Opposition, these are some of the things we are doing. We are doing our utmost to make cuts. I wish the Leader of the Opposition would not pick out a single item such as one of the biggest airports in the world. I am disappointed that the Leader of the Opposition did not give us some very concrete suggestions about where cuts should be brought about, rather than referring to a point like that.

[Translation]

Under these circumstances, Madam Speaker, it is quite easy to make a speech such as this. I thought the leader of the opposition would be a lot more specific and his colleagues would enlighten us about the truly outstanding areas where we might have set the example. At no time, however, have they come up with concrete propositions.

Perhaps it would be indicated for me at this time to recommend to the leader of the opposition to start having discussions with his rank and file, so that I may not have to note every day: some opposition members rose to ask the government for additional expenses. If they want us to spend more, let them say so, but let them refrain rising every other week to ask us to cut out government spending. There is not one day, Madam Speaker, where members of the opposition which I have begun to name, do not stand up to ask the government to spend considerable sums of money for projects that are important to them. I do not blame them for it; it is normal. But when they do so, they must bear in mind the implications of their demands. If we accept them, the government will have to increase its spending. If a member asks one day that the government increase its expenditures, he must not—if he is consistent—stand up the next day to ask to reduce them. Members should make up their minds. Then we could listen to them. But as long as they will keep putting such inconsistent requests, it will be difficult to do so. That is why, Madam Speaker, the Canadian people are not so eager to put them in power.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, simply with regard to the minister's reference to my calling him a Scrooge. The minister disappointed me in this respect. I often criticize him, but I have always found him to be straightforward. He knows perfectly well that my reference to him as a Scrooge is a bit of a joke between us, and, I am a little disappointed that he should try to convert that into a public argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, I enjoyed most of the rhetorical outburst of the minister in his castigation of the official opposition for not presenting in detail any proposed budget cuts. If I listened accurately—I certainly listened with care—that was the gist of his speech. He made two points. I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong. One was that the official opposition did not document in any specific way its own general claim that there should be cutbacks. I am in agreement with that. In addition, he went on to suggest in some specific way what the government is doing. I shall deal, in the main body of my comments, with precisely what the government is and is not doing. He referred to the kind of cutbacks the government made in its last budget. In the course of my comments I will deal with parts of that budget and, specifically, the cutbacks in the medicare and hospitalization programs. I should like to hear the minister defend his position in this respect.

The second point is this. At no time since the recess, and nowhere in the white paper, has the government indicated it wants to cut back any specific program other than those mentioned last spring. My understanding is that proposals came forward to the minister from the Department of Finance—they subsequently went to the cabinet—concerning specific cutbacks in departments and areas. There was a suggestion that some things were not needed and they should be scrapped or modified. The fact is that the government has not announced, since we resumed this sitting this fall, any cutbacks in any programs. I think the minister will agree that, factually, this is the case.

In case the minister might turn to me and levy the same charge that he did to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), I will make specific points about the kind of cuts we think should be made in government expenditures. In doing so, I say that we do not share the view that over-all cutbacks in the government sector alone are necessary in terms of dealing with the economy. However, there is no doubt that certain specific programs should be either entirely cut out or substantially reduced.

What are some of the things the New Democratic Party suggest? First of all, we oppose the hundreds of millions of dollars now being spent annually in consultants' fees for studies done by private individuals outside the government. It is almost impossible for an opposition party to see the internal operations of a department. However, I have no doubt that if the government were tough-minded about it, hundreds of millions of dollars could be saved partly, but not exclusively, by the Department of Urban Affairs. In some cases the work that is being done could be performed by public servants already on the payroll. We contend further efforts should be made to reduce the amount of money spent on outside consultants.

An hon. Member: Mr. Blakeney could use that advice.

Mr. Broadbent: He not only uses it; he follows it. He has taken steps to do just that. The second point is that government outlay in respect of the salaries of senior civil servants is wrong, in two respects: first, in terms of dollars spent and, second, in that it increases the gap between upper income and low income Canadians. This is bad in terms of fairness with relation to income distribution in Canada. In terms of net outlay, the minister would say that does not involve many millions of dollars and therefore does not directly—

● (1610)

Mr. Chrétien: Oh, come on.

Mr. Broadbent: Never mind; I am dealing with the federal government.

Mr. Chrétien: Oh, come on.

Mr. Broadbent: I took the argument of the minister seriously. I hope he takes mine seriously and does not go off at a tangent. I do not have to agree with everything our provincial governments do, nor do I expect the minister to do so, especially having regard to what provincial Liberal governments do.

Let us deal with the federal government. Apart from the unfairness of increasing the salaries of senior civil servants in the $50,000 and $60,000 range, which is bad in terms of distribution of income in Canada and its inflationary effect, it is much more serious because it sets the pattern for the whole economy. I am sure the minister is aware of that argument. In terms of its impact on the economy, it has been much more serious and negative than the inherent unfairness of giving an increasing amount of our total income to an increasingly smaller proportion of our population. It has a major inflationary effect on the private sector and provincial governments which have to increase the salaries of the top 10 per cent of their employees. For that, this government must be held responsible. We have opposed these vast increases for senior civil servants in terms of justice and in terms of the multiplier effect on the economy as a whole.

Third, we are, and have been, highly critical of what we have described as the alphabet soup type of programs designed to provide assistance to industry. The New Democratic Party, independent economists and, indeed, some of the commissions appointed by the government to conduct studies, have pointed out that approximately $250 million per year spent on programs such as DIP, IRDIA, PAIT, and so on, is money down the drain. If all of them were scrapped, it would have a positive effect on employment because there would be a more rational allocation of resources. We would scrap all those programs. We have provided a list before, and I would be glad to add to the few I have just mentioned for the benefit of the minister.

Mr. Chrétien: Schreyer asks us for more money.

Mr. Broadbent: That is another point. If we were to talk about the need for national planning of the whole economy, the problems of Mr. Schreyer might be seen in a different context. However, I would like the minister to stay within the context of federal politics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Government Spending

Mr. Broadbent: The fourth point I should like to make is that the millions of dollars the federal government has virtually given to the oil industry and the Syncrude project, both directly and by way of tax concessions, is not the kind of error, both in terms of spending and in terms of national economic independence, in which the New Democratic Party would have indulged.

Fifth, we would scrap entirely Information Canada, an agency we think is without justification. It duplicates the information services performed by information officers in virtually every government department. We would scrap that agency and save the taxpayers some money.

Sixth, both in the House and outside we have criticized the $250 million, approximately, which the federal government has poured into the aircraft industry in Montreal and Toronto in recent years.

Mr. Chrétien: And Winnipeg.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister adds Winnipeg, and I agree. This money has been spent without producing a plan for rationalizing the aircraft industry in Canada. The government will probably embark upon a major blunder in the next few weeks by making a decision to produce fighter aircraft which will have absolutely nothing to do with a national plan developed for the aircraft industry. That $250 million has gone down the drain.

In short, we in this party are in favour of cutbacks in certain areas of government spending and, as I am doing now, we have in the past attempted in the House to suggest some examples. The minister did not deal with this issue in terms of the Canadian economy and I think it has been wrongly argued by the Conservatives, though I understand their argument. The real issue is not more, or less, government spending; it seems to me that the real issue we must face in a mixed economy is not government spending versus private spending, but where spending is going on in the economy, and with what net economic consequences.

To put money into shopping centres and into a whole range of private investment at a time of inflation is no more, or less, inflationary than government spending. So the whole issue of the control of spending, management and planning of spending in the economy is at stake here. It is a wrongly perceived view held by the Conservatives simply to concentrate on government spending; and, if I may say so, it is a wrong-headed defence by the government to reply to the general argument of the Conservatives without dealing with the much more serious and fundamental question of spending within the whole economy. What must be analysed and what we need from the government is a comprehensive approach to the spending of funds both in the private and public sector, and that is not what we have received from the government.

I come now to the statement of the minister about government spending. He says, with some pride, that in the white paper it says there is a ceiling being imposed across the board for next year in respect of federal government spending, although not on a selective basis. We reject that approach. We think it is wrong-headed because it cuts out or reduces good government programs, some of which should be extended instead of reduced or levelled out. It does not deal with the possibility of the need for total elimination of certain other programs. In other words, it is a cop-out. The minister accused the official opposition of not being specific in proposing programs. I now turn the argument back to the minister and say that his own approach for next year which sets a general level of cutback in terms of government spending is itself a cop-out which treats good government programs in the same way that it treats bad ones. In the opinion of the New Democratic Party, that is irresponsible.

If I read the message correctly, it means that programs with regard to health and welfare, family allowances, pensions, unemployment insurance, transfer payments and all spending in which the government is involved, will be affected. Those areas which I have just mentioned should not be included in the general cutback. In our view, the government is irresponsible in taking the position that for the coming year there has to be a general cutback.

Let me now deal with two specific areas in which the government indicated in its budget of last spring and in debates inside and outside the House so far this fall that it will cut back. I refer to hospitalization and medicare. We disagree with this. The government has told the provinces that specific ceilings will be set on the financing of medicare, and in the case of hospitalization it plans to phase out its contribution entirely. I cannot think of a worse approach to dealing with inflation than to take it out on the health of Canadians. That is the way I read that message. The government is indicating that it will cut back on medicare, and surely everyone in Canada would regard this as an essential human service. In an affluent society such as ours, to effect a cutback in an area of profound human need such as hospital and medical care is not only wrong in principle but is also false economy in many respects. Let me say what I mean by that. In some instances, increased expenditure in the medical field could lead to a long-range reduction in costs. It is shortsighted to argue that across the board cuts in medical expenditure will lead to long-range savings.

I give the province of Quebec credit for what it has done in the material field. In one sense it has led the country in the development of community clinics to head off medical problems. Surely from the point of view of costs, not to speak of humanity, that is a much better approach. Money spent on community clinics across the country would have long-range benefits which are obvious. In St. Gabriel de Brandon, for instance a community clinic discovered that children in the town kept getting a certain kind of skin infection or disease. They were "cured" time after time; then the cycle was repeated. Through the community clinic there was an investigation into the cause of the ailment and it was discovered that something in the water in which the children swam was responsible. The water was cleaned up and there was no repetition of the infection on the children in that area; consequently, the demand for medical services was lessened. That kind of community clinic which practises preventive medicine cuts down on long-range expenditure. The whole area of preventive medicine in Canada needs more, not less, money. Surely, when dealing with conditions in factories and mines it makes sense to head-off diseases like asbestosis and cancer. It makes more sense to spend money ahead of time rather than after men and women get the diseases, in many cases when no cure is possible.

Another example of sensible spending comes from the province of Saskatchewan. Instead of money going into elaborate hospitals, it has been found that a high percentage of cases can be adequately provided for in alternative facilities, thereby reducing the cost of treatment up to 200 per cent or 300 per cent, if not more. It makes sense both at the provincial and the federal level for government to spend more money creating alternatives to hospitalization. The long-range effect will be reduction of hospital and medical costs. It seems to me that the moral is obvious: in certain areas such as medicare we need more spending, not less.

Similarly, we need more, not less, government spending on housing. If there ever was a sector that could be singled out where government spending would be deflationary, it is the housing sector now. If the government had the guts to force banks to put up mortgage money at lower rates, and the political commitment to allocate funds to increase the supply of housing, there would be a substantial reduction in the cost of living. Increasing supply and reducing mortgage rates would have a positive effect for those who rent and those who want to buy accommodation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The time allotted to the hon. member can only be extended by unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Increased government spending on housing would provide a human necessity and jobs for many of the more than 700,000 Canadians presently unemployed. It would also have a deflationary effect on the economy. So the moral is more government spending in this sector, not less.

Before I conclude I should like to say that in terms of the over-all approach to the economy, I am apprehensive that the government is on the wrong course in its restrictive income and prices restraint program. Inside and outside this House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that we must live within our means; that is the phrase he has used. The fact is that we are not living up to our means. In the manufacturing sector alone we are operating at only about 85 per cent capacity. If the government really wants to come to grips with inflation, what we need is a program designed to stimulate increased production. We have unemployment and slackness in the economy, but that is not the source of the inflation. What we need is stimulation by the government. The government has not brought in any imaginative programs to show leadership in making the economy more productive.

The issue is not simply one of more, or less, government spending; the issue is one of over-all spending in the economy by both the private and the public sector. The government must assume a great deal of responsibility for making decisions in such spending for both the private and the public sector. Many programs could be cut out, and I have listed them. Other government programs should have increased budgets. But over-all, this government should be concerned about getting rid of the slack in the economy so that we can have virtually full employment. In my view that, more than anything else, would eliminate inflation.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to speak to the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), all the more so that, to my mind, this motion really tests seriously the sincerity of the government with regard to its policy on price and wage freeze. Indeed, from the way the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) replied to the speech of the leader of the opposition, we saw that he had little else to say but to try to deceive the House by refusing to make a distinction between waste and expenditures. The minister seems to assume that the two terms are synonymous. Spending is not necessarily being wasteful. I doubt that the leader of the opposition meant that no hon. member could ask or recommend that the government spend some moneys for the collective good.

Then, once again, I think it is my duty to point out that, if the government were expressing its view through the President of Treasury Board, it was completely beside the track because, Madam Speaker, even if one tried to ignore this squandering, one could not because it is too glaring. It would indeed be silly to deny it, that would mean contradicting the Auditor General himself, whose responsibility it is to keep a watchful eye, to study figures and tell us what is going on in the administrative circles of the country, what expenditures are excessive, which ones are downright wasteful, what were the oversights of the various government departments, and so forth. I do not intend to enumerate here all the facts that one can easily learn simply by reading the Auditor General's report.

Therefore, it is no use for the government to try to defend itself by accusing the opposition of pressing for increased expenditures, thereby hoping to conceal its own extravagance. If the government wishes to be honest and candid, it should tell the House which measures it intends to adopt to put an end to the squandering of public money, when this is the case, for it is very important to distinguish between wastefulness and legitimate expenditures. To cut down on expenses, just for the kick of it, or because it was proclaimed, might turn out to be a remedy worse than the evil, the effects of which might be worse than not interfering at all and letting things go as they are. Hence, the important point in my view is not so much to know what must be reduced and where but rather to ascertain which needs are real, essential and indispensable because we cannot tergiversate on this matter, Mr. Speaker. We cannot cut essential spending.

I think this distinction is absolutely necessary if we are to appraise adequately the value of the administrative policies the government may order. This is why, of course, I support such a motion. Well, it is easy to talk about the importance of government restraints but from the start the government should have told us how it wanted to apply these restraints, where they would be applied instead of sticking to generalities. Of course, I would not support any cut in expenditure relating to essential public needs. On the other hand, we would support cuts in useless spending. And here we would have liked to know how the government really wanted to apply these restraints to prevent the waisting denounced every year when nothing is done to remedy the situation.

A debate like today's shows, Mr. Speaker, how urgent it is to operate the required changes in our political views for, if there is any government spending, it is because the administration of the nation normally requires it. So there is no need to talk about cuts. If we do, it is because we admit that we indulge in wasteful spending. Of course, there is wasteful spending. May I point out one particular sector, which, I think, should cut its spending, that is the Department of National Defence.

I sincerely believe that a country such as ours needs a brave and alert army. I am not against it, it is a must but I think we do not need that much armament. In my opinion, we should have stopped long ago purchasing bombers, shells and all those devices which are never used and if, unfortunately, we ever had to use them, it would be because of a world catastrophy, when everyone here in Canada would be helpless.

Our geographical position between the world's two giants has been frequently mentioned and everyone knows that we will never compete with either the Soviets or the Americans.

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker, I would consider it a reasonable cut to drop from the national defence budget all expenditures relating to armament equipment for which we do not have much need. It is a justifiable cut, in my opinion.

And I should also take this opportunity to point out how a whole series of expenditures made by the government could be avoided if there were not a systematic tendency to set up in this country some sort of socialism without saying so.

Mr. Speaker, we know that when the state interferes in business which could normally be dealt with by individuals themselves, that always cost a lot of money, that is always much more expensive, we understand and we recognize the need for the state to step in where necessary to make up for possible deficiencies in private enterprise, free enterprise or individual themselves. But apart from that the tendency of the government to impose controls where people themselves could exercise them leads to cost increases, and those increases could be avoided and certain cuts made by avoiding that kind of policy.

Of course, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, ill chosen restrictions could be excessively damageable. For example, there can be no haggling over the need to give old people the money they need to meet their essential requirements. There is no question about that. But there are sometimes other kinds of restrictions which by ricochet could tend to increase precisely what we want to reduce, inflation. That is one of the reasons, once again, to justify this motion blaming the government for not having indicated from the start how it intended to restrict its expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult and complicated to try to come out of a situation that has become absolutely dramatic when the actual causes of that situation lie in the very system which generates them. And it is regrettable to see that in that war consumers and the producer will be forced to reduce prices, the worker, the wage earner will be forced to accept less money but we know quite well that it will be complicated and difficult on both sides, and sometimes it could also cost a lot to check those things, to control them, as the benefit that one would want to draw from it. It is not easy, of course, to fight inflation, since I imagine we are intelligent enough to understand that, when one admits that the primary causes which are the cause of all those difficulties are due to a defect in the system itself.

For example, in all that war of price controls, wage controls, restrictions, government cuts, how is it that at no time is there talk about the chief and basic reduction and control of interest rates. There is no mention of that, but how are price increases to be controlled if interest rates are not? How can a firm reduce its costs if it must borrow at astronomical rates? There will be no other way out other than forcing these firms out of business, thereby fanning inflation. It is amazing that they will not tackle that sore. Stepping out to control credit, that is the crux of the matter, and they ignored it. I do not wish to utter evil prophecies, however I must say that everything done now to prevent the current situation from getting worse is useless. I fear they will wait till the very last moment to realize the need to deal with the real problem.

Fighting inflation, practising restraints, all that sounds very nice. If they stopped and took the time to do some real and serious thinking, they would realize that even if we spent nothing, we would still have to live, to eat, to clothe ourselves and sleep somewhere. There are no cuts to be made there. If we need a lot of money to get good food, good clothing, good housing and the minimum of comfort to which we are entitled in a country as rich as ours, if it is only a question of monies, all we have to do is issue ourselves the money needed. We will never repeat that too often.

There lies the true problem, the only way to fight inflation. If we could produce everything we needed through adequate credit, prices would go down. And if prices went down, there would be less reason to fight for higher wages.

This is why I regret this sad situation. With all the goodwill in the world, we know very well that these government restrictions will be to no avail. What does it mean to cut off a few millions here and there!

We should simply arrive at a better administration and avoid the terrible wasteful spending that we witness much too often. If we could today make the government understand the need to find ways to avoid wasteful spending, we could make the policy healthier. But, and I would like to conclude on this note, a few cuts will not solve the problem of inflation. A few cuts in expenditures will not solve the problems which the government will have to face, and it knows it. These problems will only become more serious and more dangerous in a few weeks or a few months because their roots are not being attacked.

I therefore wish that because of this new awareness, the government may, at a given moment, consider the possibility of getting to the roots of the problem of inflation by thinking first of all about reducing the interest rates.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, let me first congratulate the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) for being the first member of the House since the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) spoke to pick up the nature and the quality of the motion standing in the name of my leader. I pay tribute to his reaction to it. I will in due course deal with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien). The hon. member for Champlain opened his remarks by saying that this motion constitutes a test of the government's intentions. He is quite right. It is a test that so far the President of the Treasury Board has failed dismally to meet.

As for the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), he as usual gave us the characteristic, neanderthal socialist policies going back to the reactionary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: That is the most reactionary party in this House. They are espousing policies that were fashionable 60 or 70 years ago. They simply have not caught up with modern times. It is a pity that such a bright young man should be wedded to such a dismal and dispirited cause.

I want to say this about the hon. member for Champlain. He also took up the question of the nature of the requests made by members of the House from time to time. Of course there has been a need, and there will always be a need, for members to suggest that the government should change the emphasis in its spending. I would not adequately represent my constituency if I did not think that funds might better be directed in some other way than they are at present. That is the nature of these requests which are made to the government from time to time.

● (1650)

The President of the Treasury Board has given us his usual dull, listless, limp speech. I have heard it at least six times in the House recently. Having heard it again, I feel deeply discouraged. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came in today, he looked grim and dispirited. I know he has had a cold and I sympathize with him on that score, but there are other reasons for his apparent discouragement. He and some of his ministers have been away on an individual and collective economic safari, with themselves as beaters, gun carriers and spear bearers. After wandering across the length and breadth of Canada trying to sell a very difficult program—and I can appreciate the difficulties they encountered—a certain grimness of mood is understandable. After all, on October 12, 1975, the economy was in good condition. Inflation was not worrying anyone—certainly not anyone on the government side. The fiscal and monetary calculations established by the budget of the former minister of finance in June were right on line. Everything was fine; there was nothing to worry about at all.

Then suddenly, on October 13, tragedy. We are faced with inflation, or "apprehended" inflation, if I may borrow the famous word used in 1970. The Prime Minister finds himself confronted with what is likely to be the most formidable task of his career, that of persuading the people of Canada to support the program he has put forward and, what is more difficult still, to believe in the government's sincerity.

I am shocked at the line taken by the President of the Treasury Board. Surely, there are members of his staff who have read our motion. We are not saying that cuts should be made here, or there, or somewhere else. The minister's own colleagues have been going around the country telling us that the economy is in a dangerous situation, that the Canadian people must realize the seriousness of the position, and that the government, as proof of its sincerity, intends to do something about it. What we are saying is: show us. This is the test.

Members opposite have the unparallelled audacity to ask the people of Canada to make the sacrifices which will be necessary to accommodate government policy, while lacking the nerve, the energy or the wit to come before parliament and say, "Here is what we intend to do when it comes to restraining our own spending." Do not talk about the restraint shown in the budget of June, 1975. All that happened then was that the former minister of finance, beating his breast, told us, "I had to do a terrible thing; I had to tell my colleagues they could not get all the money they were asking for. I had to cut them down." But we never saw the comparative figures. He did not tell us what the original figures were. His protestations were a load of garbage, and the minister knows it. If he had tabled the original requests and shown how they were cut down, we might have had some respect for his decision. But all he told us was that he had made these cuts. We do not accept that. It is a lot of nonsense.

Even if our motion had been couched along those lines, the minister's response was a flop. But it was not couched in those terms. It states that the government should set an example to other Canadians by forthwith indicating the nature and the extent of the restraints it was prepared to accept. That is what we are asking: either put up or shut up. If the government is prepared to exercise restraint, let the House and the country be told by what means. Until the government does so, no one will believe what it says.

I say, in all sincerity, that I do not like the government's program in detail. I do not think it will work as presently set up. But I am one of those who took part in the debate and said I was prepared to make an effort to bring about a bill which would work; and we need a bill which is going to work because the country cannot continue much longer under the type of fiscal and monetary programs the government has foisted upon us. I know the President of the Treasury Board did not have much time in which to prepare for this debate. But, equally, we did not have much time in which to put down our motion. I should have thought the minister would have guessed this was the kind of motion the official opposition would put forward under present conditions. But if the minister had come here today and instead of his tired old speech had given us a firm indication of what he was going to do, the position would be vastly improved. However, he does not intend to, and the reason is that he does not know how; he hasn't the faintest idea.

Mr. Chrétien: What about the reduction in man-years for next year—1.5 per cent?

Mr. Woolliams: That is like going out to buy a Cadillac and ending up with a Chevy: you have saved money.

Mr. Baldwin: The trouble is there are too many of these artful dodgers, and artful dodgers cannot easily sell a program of the kind the government has brought down. But unless they do, the program is doomed to failure. I am not going to deal with them per se because they are now in committee, but I can deal with what is collateral to the proposal in the bill, namely, fiscal and monetary policy.

● (1700)

We are dealing with fiscal policy here, in the sense that there has to be some restraint. If the government cannot do any better two months from now than it is doing today, then this program is going to be a sham, a failure and the country is going to be in a mess. What will the government do then? This is why we have provided this opportunity for the government to give us some earnest ideas of its determination and its intentions with regard to these issues.

This is a public relations exercise with gigantic stakes—the survival of this country as an effective economic unit for a great many years to come. They are the stakes that exist in this program the government has put forward. If the government can do no better than the minister has today, then it will be in trouble. I can understand why the public and the press reaction to the attempts of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and others to make the program stand up and to appear to be a reasonable and logical one has been universally so negative. I feel that this is at the root of the issue we are now facing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you now going to tell us what Senator Lawson said?

Mr. Baldwin: I think that is an irrelevant question. My friend probably knows him a lot better than I do, and I am sure he can deal with Senator Lawson. I dealt with his leader; he can deal with the senator. But I should not say too much about the other place in front of the hon. member. In any event, I just want to touch for a moment on the budget and on the budgetary deficit. I think the President of the Treasury Board, perhaps quite naïvely and innocently, misrepresented or misstated certain facts and possibilities. In the first place, I support what my leader said and I challenge the minister to tell us what the deficit will be. Both he and I know that supplementary estimates will be brought in. What will they be, and how much? I challenge the minister to put those facts on the record.

My belief is that the government will be very careful not to bring into the House the total package of supplementary estimates before Bill C-73 has been passed. We would only be looking at that part of the iceberg that is above the water, not at the gigantic part that lies below. I suggest to the members of this House that the total amount of supplementary estimates the government will be bringing in will substantially alter the balance of payments and the fiscal situation of the treasury, making it look completely different from the one envisaged by the former minister of finance. This is one of the reasons we are not being given the supplementary estimates and why we will not get the total package until this program is out of the House and out of this parliament.

In June of 1975, the minister indicated that there would be a budgetary deficit of $3.175 billion. The President of the Treasury Board never gives us the correct facts because he is never listening when he is being told something factual. We were told the budgetary revenues would be $25.725 billion and budgetary expenditures $28.9 billion, leaving a deficit, which I think even the minister would be able to calculate, of $3.175 billion. My leader was talking about deficits, and the President of the Treasury Board responded in those terms. I can only gather that he was so excited at the successful speech of my leader that he was not able to direct his attention to the true facts. I believe, assuming that collection and spending patterns remain the same and that there are no major alterations in federal fiscal policy in mid-year, the past patterns of financial operation can be applied to existing revenue and expenditure figures for the first four months of fiscal year 1976. Actual revenues can be expected to be $25,508 million, and expenditures $33,232 million.

From that we draw the inference that there is a very serious likelihood that the budgetary deficit will not be $3.175 billion, but $7.724 billion. This information the government is either hiding or is ignorant of. In either case it deserves to be severely castigated for its failure to come clean with the country, in view of the very serious situation we are facing at this time in our history. In this situation, with this knowledge behind the government, it is no wonder the Prime Minister and his colleagues cannot summon the sincerity that is absolutely essential to convince the people of Canada that the government means what it says and intends to involve itself in some form of restraint.

May I just take another two or three minutes to finish what I have to say. My colleague from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) is going to deal in some detail with the latter part of our motion, but I want to put on record a couple of sentences or so about it. The minister said today that he would be bringing in a bill shortly, or within several weeks. I hope he is right. If this motion does nothing other than compel the government to do this, then it will at least have been valuable.

It is ten years ago that we first asked that there be legislation to deal with the Auditor General, some form of separate legislation. We have been up and down the scale, year in and year out, with the government hiding, with the government being guilty of deception, with ministers like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) who are very gun-shy of the Auditor General, using all their power and authority to prevent such a bill being brought in. We have been fooled and deceived too often and I would warn the minister, as I warned the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), that we intend to keep on at this and see that legislation is brought in.

After all, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Champlain said, waste and extravagance may not amount to so many billions of dollars; but when I go into a supermarket, as others of my colleagues do from time to time, and see harried men and women concerned and anxious, people who with their families must pay every attention to their expenditures, then it is essential that as an earnest of the government's intentions it bring in this legislation within two or three weeks. We will then know that the government is attempting to show the people of this country that their money is being properly and wisely expended.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said he had heard the speech of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) six times. I must say that the only new thing I learned from the hon. member's speech was that he does his shopping with his wife on weekends. In fact, his speech is a repetition of many of the things we have heard in the past.

Mr. Baldwin: Not only on weekends.

Mr. Breau: That is even better. This motion gives me the opportunity of putting forward my views on government spending and on the myth being spread by some prominent members of the Conservative party, perhaps because of events to occur next February, that government spending is inflationary and so bad for society. I think that is a myth. The President of the Treasury Board indicated earlier this afternoon the percentage of government spending that is statutory, which means it is provided for already by legislation. He also pointed out many cost-sharing programs which we have with the provinces.

● (1710)

Putting aside for a minute the conventional questioning about government spending to regulate the income and the impact of government spending on inflation and the cost of living, one can see that there is little room in this country for more government spending to have the necessary impact on the economy. Just under 20 per cent of the federal budget this year is directly related to operational and capital expenditures. In other words, any amount of money that you cut must come from those areas of operational and capital expenditures controlled by the federal government. That is the only area you have to work on. For that reason, I suggest those people who speak about the possibility of substantial cuts in government expenditure cannot be serious unless they are referring to statutory programs.

If these members are referring to those programs, they must keep in mind that this would drastically change our social structure and our federal-provincial relationships. Surely, this would bring us back to the situation that existed 10, 15 or 20 years ago when a lot of people in this country were living without opportunity, and many in misery.

The role of government in society has changed. Following the Second World War, the western world concentrated its efforts toward economic development. Then the 1960s and the 1970s came along and everyone realized that in order to maintain a stable society in which people could live a decent life, governments would have to attack many serious problems. Governments had to be more concerned with social development. This is why we spend so much money today on statutory programs, and it is why we have such a high investment in social programs today. This is directly the result of the changing role of government in modern society.

Let me deal very briefly with what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) had to say. Let me refer to his comments in respect of DREE, in the context of government spending. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition is aware of the danger this type of criticism may have for some parts of the country. Some parts of the country might become overly concerned with such dramatic references to DREE, as happened in 1971 and 1972, and this can only hurt the program. I know the Leader of the Opposition does not want that.

Mr. Stanfield: That is why you had better develop a decent program.

Mr. Breau: I would like to remind the hon. gentleman of the danger created by this type of dramatic statement. This is an area which is very costly and is very difficult to administer. Development is not easy in this country, just as it is not easy anywhere else in the world. There are hundreds of examples that anyone could find, in respect of DREE, of money not being spent in accordance with the normal rules and procedures. But that is the price you have to pay for development. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will be careful, when discussing government spending in the next few years, not to start again the kind of debate we had in 1971 and 1972 which resulted in such harm to the program. Most of the examples being dramatized were exaggerated and most of them, on consideration, could be easily explained.

The Leader of the Opposition and a number of his colleagues referred to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the last week or so during the debate on Bill C-69. I intend to speak on that bill next week, so I will not deal with it at length this afternoon. Let me just remind hon. members that the amount involved is not $4 billion but is more like $3.6 billion for this year. Many hon. members were not being entirely honest when they compared that figure with the old program, in that they did not mention that much of this money is recoverable through income tax because the system has now been made more equitable. Benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Commission are now taxable.

It is difficult to determine what amount is recoverable in taxes. I am attempting a study in this regard in the hope of coming up with an approximate figure. Surely, hon. members who want to be entirely honest when referring to the $3.6 billion going out in unemployment insurance benefits this year should mention that a proportion of it is coming back in the form of income tax.

Mr. Baldwin: And administration costs are up 100 per cent.

Mr. Breau: I am not suggesting that; I am suggesting that if hon. members want to be entirely honest they should mention the amount that is recoverable through our income tax system. They cannot refer to an actual figure, but they could mention the fact that a lot of this money is recovered in income tax. As a matter of fact, I have made a study of this. I understand that this year, if you take into account the amount that is recoverable through income taxes, the UIC program is close to self-sufficient. Perhaps in this way contributions by employers and employees would not be required to be increased and the government contribution would be less.

This being a political forum, I can understand that members make political arguments. They want to embarrass the government and use figures that confirm their arguments. I just want to put on the record the fact that when hon. members talk about the $3.6 billion being spent on unemployment insurance benefits, this is actually less the amount recovered through income tax. When people talk about contributions by employers and employees, the figures should reflect the amounts being allowed as deductions from income tax following the adoption of a more equitable tax in 1971.

I was happy to hear the tone of the speech by the Leader of the Opposition. I have always thought he has a moderating influence in this House and a moderating influence on his party. The real force behind a motion like this is the force evident in those members who feel the government should not intervene as much in society, and in those who are against the kind of statutory programs we have adopted in this House in the last ten years, such as medicare, the Canada Assistance Plan, UIC and all the others.

Of course these programs are inflationary. Everyone knew that when they were adopted. I have admitted before parliamentary committees, as have ministers of this government, that if you cut taxes for low income people and increase old age pensions and family allowances, this will have an inflationary effect. There are some inflationary aspects of these programs, and we all know that. What we are saying is that this is worth the price. A lot of people get too upset about inflation, and they exaggerate. One of the things we must do is make sure that those less capable of looking after themselves are assisted in adapting to inflation. If your costs are increasing by $1,000 a year and your salary is increasing by $1,200, I do not see any reason for individual concern.

We have built-in inflation in our system because we adopted many of these social projects, many of them when the Tories were in power. The Tories approved of them at that time. The same trend existed in the United States. The Johnson administration was after the same thing because it had been decided by western democracies that income should be distributed.

● (1720)

How is income distributed? There are many ways to do it. We may disagree on the means, but it was clearly decided in the course of the 1960s and 1970s that it was necessary to distribute income in democracies and in our society because there was no way we could tolerate the kind of social situations which we saw. Not one member on the other side wanted to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am one member who is entitled to challenge the hon. member, because I was a member who ten years ago placed on the record a clause which stated, in effect, that our payments for things of this kind should be geared to our productive capacity and our ability to pay for them.

Mr. Breau: That is right. I hope nothing I have said will contradict that. I do not want to become involved in an argument with hon. members. I have not yet dealt with that matter in my speech. I hear an hon. member opposite giving a very simplistic definition of inflation. There can be different kinds of inflation. There can be inflation caused by lack of productivity and there can be demand inflation. Many of these programs are inflationary in nature.

If we distribute income and give money to sectors of society which, because of their nature, may not spend it as wisely as if it were invested in the national interest, of course it will be inflationary. Particularly in a country like Canada, where income is distributed in sectors not only in terms of people but also geographically, of course inflation will be created in some parts of the country. I agree with the hon. member for Peace River that we should try to relate this as much as possible to productivity, but the fact is that we have done so as much as possible in the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. Baldwin: Then what is the Prime Minister doing trotting around the country?

Mr. Breau: I will answer that interjection from the hon. member for Peace River who is now on his way out of the chamber.

Mr. Paproski: He is just answering a telephone call.

Mr. Breau: He is just answering a telephone call, I am told. I know that he is a very assiduous member of this House. I will answer the question by saying I do not want to deal with the new anti-inflation program of the government, because this is not the nature of the motion. The hon. member for Peace River spent much time talking about economic and fiscal policy, while the motion does not deal with that. So I do not want to be carried away into a debate on economic policy.

The speech of the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon had a moderating effect. We have heard in public that many people within his party, because of future events, want to have less intervention and less of these statutory social programs. I am not one who wants that. There is no way a man could have been the premier of Nova Scotia or could even have been elected in the Atlantic provinces if he did not think that government intervention in society is good. So I was happy to hear the tone of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, because I think he agrees with me that in a modern society, one who speaks of restricting government spending and restricting government intervention must be out of his mind. If we want more technology in order to compete better in the world, there will have to be dislocation of workers; therefore, there is need for training assistance, government intervention and government spending.

If we want to have a high degree of productivity and to be one of the most technically advanced nations in the world, we will have to transform our industries. There is an example in my constituency. It is one of the things the government of New Brunswick has done. It has rationalized its forest management policy. In that context, DREE has been involved. The federal government has been very substantially involved in studying this whole question and coming up with a new approach to forest management policy. The centre of this was the construction of a new lumber mill. Unfortunately, the timing was not too good because the lumber market has been depressed. Because we want to be more efficient and more productive, this mill, which is highly technological and very sophisticated, has a relatively small labour force in relation to the volume of lumber it will produce, compared to the old type of family-owned sawmill, and so on, that has been in existence in New Brunswick.

Here is a case of the government of New Brunswick and the government of Canada, in the national interest perhaps creating unemployment because there is a desire to be more productive and to produce lumber at the best price and volume for export to the United States. Many of the small mills, particularly because of the depressed lumber market, are not able to compete with the prices this new mill charges for the lumber it is placing on the market. They have been unable to compete, and in future we will have to transform the lumber industry of New Brunswick in order to have a more rational use of the trees in our forests. That is good for the country. In the long-term it is good for northern New Brunswick and the whole of New Brunswick.

But in the process many workers will be dislocated. This will apply to the small, family-owned mills. Many workers will be dislocated in the cutting industry because many of them use traditional or conventional types of machinery to cut the trees, while it is new equipment that is being used now. This is a case in which we have a trade-off between protecting maybe 125 good jobs for the future that will be competitive and in respect of which a government handout will never be required. That is good. In the process, however, we must look after the people who have been dislocated. This can be done in society only by government intervention through Manpower Programs, Local Employment Assistance Programs, Canada Assistance Programs and many similar programs.

I am glad the Leader of the Opposition did not take a stand today to support those within his party who publicly in the last few months have suggested that the government should intervene less in society. I am glad the former premier of Nova Scotia is not the type of politician who would get on a bandwagon which is so popular in some places in Canada today and say that government spending should be restricted. There is no question that so far as the 56 per cent of structural spending is concerned, this is where a cut could be made that would have an impact on inflation and on the economy. But anyone who suggests we can have a drastic cut in the structural spending of the federal government is out of his mind, because it is a complete contradiction of what society is all about.

I should like to deal very briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) who first of all described the government's anti-inflation program as restrictive. I agree there is restriction in some cases. There is restriction in respect of big unions and the powerful in society, but there is no restriction so far as the low income wage earner is concerned, because without this program he could not catch up and the big powerful unions would continue the galloping increases of 18 per cent and 25 per cent. So we should not call this a restrictive policy.

With regard to some of the industry programs the hon. member mentioned, and some other programs, my comment is that he cannot be serious when he suggests that when government has to intervene on the social side, it must not also intervene on the industry side to make sure, first of all, that industry becomes efficient, productive, follows the technology used in the world and is co-operative. Being an academic, I can only say that he might have a conflict of interest, because instead of industry he wants academicians to do the work. However, there is no question that the government must work closely with industry in research programs and with that kind of intervention.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT SPENDING—IMPLEMENTATION OF WILSON REPORT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That in the view of this House, the government should set an example to other Canadians by forthwith indicating the nature and extent of the restraints on government spending and should also introduce without further delay measures to implement the Wilson Report on the office of the Auditor General as an indication of its willingness to eliminate waste and extravagance.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this supply motion, especially the part which states that the government should "introduce without further delay measures to implement the Wilson Report on the office of the Auditor General as an indication of its willingness to eliminate waste and extravagance."

Before I deal with the main body of my speech, quite frankly I listened with some amazement and concern to the speech made today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) as he repeated over and over again that members of the Official Opposition never give him any concrete suggestions for curtailing expenditures, but keep asking him for more and more.

I do not wish to be overly repetitious in debate, but when speaking in the House on October 23, 1975, I gave in some detail a number of concrete proposals covering cuts in expenditures which, if implemented only in part, would cut back some half a billion dollars from government expenditures without basically affecting the lifestyle of Canadians.

Obviously the minister is not interested in receiving sincere, concrete proposals; rather, he can only list a group of expenditures, which he did today, which he claims cannot in any way be curtailed. I will ask him again to refer to page 8491 of Hansard for October 23, 1975, and at least give consideration to the proposals I made, which I hope will be helpful.

The credibility of the government is at stake, and its credibility is strained. There is no question in anyone's mind why this should be so. All one has to do is to look at the Ottawa Journal of October 29 to read that the cost of renovating the former LaSalle Academy on Sussex Drive as headquarters for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) doubled between January, 1973, and December, 1974, according to a Department of Public Works spokesman. The additional cost of restoring the historic building was estimated at $4.3 million. By December, 1974, Treasury Board had approved expenditures totalling $8.3 million.

Mr. Baldwin: Shocking.

Mr. Crouse: This type of expenditure, a mismanagement of government funds, puts us as Canadians in the position we are today.

The present powers of the Auditor General of Canada are derived from sections 56 through 65 of the Financial Administration Act. The office, of course, predates confederation. Numerous attempts have been made to draft new legislation in order to resolve the controversy between the previous Auditor General and the ministry. Some were prepared at the instigation of the then president of the treasury board, one was drafted by the Auditor General himself, and two had their origins in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. None of these drafts envisaged any change in the role of the Auditor General. Instead, all were largely concerned with housekeeping details.

A large number of the recommendations submitted by the Independent Review Committee can only be implemented by legislation or by some other form of executive action. In all of them, however, there is an underlying purpose, namely, to strengthen the office of the Auditor General of Canada, a purpose which the Public Accounts Committee must fully support.

There are some who would argue that strengthening the office of the Auditor General would provide a temporary improvement in the positions of political parties currently in opposition. However, I believe it would also ultimately strengthen the parliamentary system, and surely this should be a goal which is shared by all members of parliament regardless of their political affiliation.

On Monday, June 2, 1975, there was a debate in this House on the subject of strengthening the office of the Auditor General. The general consensus reached by all parties on that occasion was that the present Auditor General is carrying out his mandate in an objective and systematic manner. However, in order that he can discharge his responsibilities more effectively and efficiently, his office must be strengthened by legislation and/or by executive action, if public spending is to be controlled and accountability to parliament is to be preserved.

The Independent Review Committee was established immediately after the present Auditor General, Mr. James Macdonell, took office in July of 1973. It consisted of three members: Mr. J. R. Wilson, chairman; Mr. Marcel Bélanger, and Mr. Lorne Campbell. Their work began in October, 1973, with the approval of the chairman and vice-chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and their report was finally tabled by the then minister of finance on April 8, 1975.

The Wilson Report, as it is sometimes called, is in both official languages. It is divided into three parts, entitled Background, Responsibilities, and finally Relationship, Resources and Independence.

Chapter 10 embodies the conclusions of the report and a useful summary of the major recommendations of the Independent Review Committee.

In reviewing the 47 recommendations made by the committee, it became clear that approximately 27 require legislation, eight request action either by the cabinet or the Treasury Board, and two by the Public Accounts Committee or other committees of the House. Nine recommendations have been or are being implemented by the audit office. So far only one imposes a problem of implementation.

The important recommendations can briefly be grouped as follows:

1. What the Auditor General is expected to report to the House of Commons should be more clearly defined and, in particular, should include the right to report on expenditures where value for money has not been obtained. To discharge this and other responsibilities the Auditor General should have the freedom to examine any accounts and records he considers necessary.

2. The major financial statements of the Government of Canada that are presented in the Public Accounts should be expanded to include a "sources and applications of funds" statement and the Auditor General should provide an opinion as to whether or not they are in accordance with stated accounting policies that have been applied on a consistent basis from year to year.

3. Procedural changes should be made to reduce the lag in considering the annual report of the Auditor General by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons.

4. The Auditor General should be able to recruit and retain the numbers and kind of professional staff that he needs to discharge his responsibilities.

5. The personal independence of the Auditor General must be ensured and Parliament must be certain he could not be vulnerable to administrative pressures that would hamper him in carrying out the examinations necessary to the discharge of his responsibilities.

Perhaps the most significant of all the recommendations presented by the Wilson Committee is the one in which it is proposed that the Auditor General should have the right to report to parliament on expenditures for which value for money has not been obtained. This proposal transcends all the others, and I venture to say it will cause more debate within this ministry than any of the other proposals made so far.

Generally speaking, the present situation is as follows: the Financial Administration Act requires the Auditor General to perform certain specific tasks. It also provides that he is to report, "any other case the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons." These last words are the ramp from which Mr. Maxwell Henderson launched his attack on unproductive expenditures. It was with Mr. Henderson's right to comment on such expenditures that the then president of the treasury board took issue.

The Wilson Report proposes that the Auditor General abandon the concept of non productive expenditures and, in its stead, be specifically empowered to assess whether the public is getting value for money expended. The concept of value for money, according to the report, involves three interrelated components: whether the money is expended economically and efficiently, and whether the program on which it is expended is effective in meeting its objectives.

The position taken by the Wilson Committee is that the cabinet and the bureaucracy act as a kind of trustee of public funds, and that the Auditor General can be viewed as a kind of monitor of this trusteeship. Although the report does not elaborate, these three concepts are usually defined as follows: economically means the acquisition of the program inputs of a given quantity at the lowest possible price; efficiency means that the inputs were of such a kind or deployed in such a way as to produce the largest possible tangible output of a given quality for the dollars expended; effectiveness means that the objectives of the program were achieved at the lowest possible cost, or the desired results were obtained to the greatest possible extent commensurate with the resources provided.

Although the term "unproductive expenditure" has still to be properly defined, I believe it has come to mean any expenditure that did not result in a final product, however useless that product might be.

Two examples of unproductive expenditures that come to mind are the plans for the Prince Edward Island causeway and the refit of HMCS Bonaventure. In the case of the former it was a payment for a feasibility study that concluded that a particular proposed project was not warranted. In the case of the Bonaventure the right hand obviously did not know what the left hand was doing. Repairs were carried out on a ship declared surplus to our needs. In both cases tens of millions of dollars were wasted, and it is this type of waste that has led to our present explosive economic situation.

There may be some difficulty on the part of the department to accept the concept that the administration should be viewed as a trustee of public funds. However, it is important to recognize that the administration, unlike the usual trustee, does not have a clear direction as to what it is entrusted to do.

In my view the report's basic proposals with respect to the Auditor General's right to report on economy, efficiency, and effectiveness are sound if properly interpreted. Perhaps it would have been preferable if the argument had been expressed in terms of the public's right to know rather than in terms of the rights of beneficiaries under a trust. After all, the fundamental reason why the Auditor General should report to parliament on these matters is that it is obviously not in the interest of the department to make such information available when the results are unfavourable.

Moreover, given the degree of secrecy a government administration can maintain, the opposition parties or the electorate usually do not have enough insight or knowledge to ask questions that would elicit the relevant information, even when they have the right to obtain it. Thus the adoption of these recommendations with respect to value for money is a means of breaking through the present secrecy barrier of the department, and a means of informing the Canadian taxpayers of the stewardship of their money.

It would be incorrect to say that the adoption of these recommendations would resolve the endless controversy that surrounds government expenditures. Through more disclosure and more public debate, however, it would help the public to assess the efficiency and effectiveness of government programs.

Furthermore, it would be incorrect to expect that the Auditor General would use his staff to carry out efficiency and effectiveness studies; rather Wilson suggests that he should report on such questions as whether departments are undertaking efficiency and effectiveness studies on their programs and, if not, why not? All too often the basic data required to which these methods could be applied are not being collected, much less analysed. If the studies have been conducted, have the results been made public? If not, why not? And do the data used and the methodologies applied give results that are reliable and justifiable within certain cost constraints and potential cost savings?

Finally, the most important danger to the audit office, if it were to engage in such studies, would be the lack of consensus about data and methodologies in which these studies would inevitably embroil the Auditor General. They could lead to intensive political controversy, and thus eventually threaten the integrity of the office itself.

I cannot help but conclude that although the department may be unwilling to legislate the value for money concept, the Auditor General under the existing provisions in the Financial Administration Act can adopt the Wilson report's recommendation in this regard and, with the committee's support, proceed to report those cases where value for money has not been obtained.

The adoption of the Wilson recommendations in this area would be a useful advance for parliamentarians in their review of the public accounts, and for students of public finance. One would hope too that the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants would set up some permanent committee to concern itself with government accounting principles, and would seek to monitor their introduction and implementation by government departments and agencies.

Already the Auditor General has formed a task force of professional accountants from the private sector to study this problem within government departments, and the formation of government accounting principles by an independent body would greatly assist his current endeavours in this regard.

The third recommendation, that procedural changes be considered that would reduce the delay in the consideration of the Auditor General's annual report by parliament should be of some concern to the Public Accounts Committee. The Auditor General does not report to the House of Commons for at least six months after the end of the fiscal year. And there have been delays of six months or more before the committee has had an opportunity to begin considering his findings.

Because the Auditor General's annual report is invariably bad news for any department, there is little doubt that the executive has little interest in speeding up the program and, indeed, has something to gain by the delay. Criticism of transactions that took place two years before, are less biting than those dealing with current decisions.

The Wilson committee, in my view, clearly did not want to affront parliament by making a firm recommendation about its own procedures, but it is clear that the present arrangement is favourable to the department and should be tightened to reduce the degree of discretion it presently enjoys. The recommendation for an automatic referral, therefore, would be one practical proposal for the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to consider and recommend to the Procedure and Organization Committee for inclusion in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

At the same time the Public Accounts Committee should consider very seriously the automatic referral of the Public Accounts of Canada on the same basis as the Auditor General's annual report. This point was not raised in the Wilson report because it was considered outside their terms of reference. However, as was experienced by the Public Accounts Committee during the current session of parliament when the public accounts for the fiscal year 1974 were not referred to them, the committee's power to examine government expenditures was greatly reduced. This in turn made the systematic review of departmental accounts more difficult and less penetrating for all members of the committee, not only opposition members, in their examinations. In my opinion the recommendation for an automatic referral would therefore improve the committee's effectiveness in its reviewing procedures.

The Wilson report describes what transpired in the most neutral possible manner, and makes a number of recommendations. In my view the most important is the proposal that the Auditor General be given separate status so that he could classify his own positions and thus be free of the authority of the personnel policy branch of the Treasury Board.

In the past two years Mr. Macdonnell has introduced major innovations in his office. He has published his annual reports to parliament within the appropriate nine months of the end of the fiscal year on March 31, and has streamlined his reports so that the Public Accounts Committee can deal with them more quickly. Mr. Macdonnell tells me he hopes within a year or two to speed up publication so reports can be tabled in the Commons at the beginning of the fall session in October, a move that would further assist the committee.

Another new approach adopted by the audit office has been to recommend changes to government departments following wasteful ways, and to report the results. The audit staff will be returning to these departments to ensure that the recommended changes have been put into practice.

As previously mentioned, a third important innovation recently introduced has been the creation of a special audit branch within the audit office for the conduct of special studies. Using private sector professional accountants on the public service executive interchange program, the Auditor General has sent highly qualified staff into Crown corporations, government departments and agencies, to investigate their internal financial management control systems.

The adoption of this private sector approach has been the main theme of the independent review committee whose recommendations, we have seen, are practical, logical, and necessary if the office of the Auditor General is to increase its effectiveness and efficiency in its examination of public spending.

Reports so far indicate that the government favours introducing legislation to redefine the role and responsibilities of the office of the Auditor General, but so far there is no indication when it will appear on the legislative timetable. One thing is certain. Any legislation introduced may well be non-controversial, which suggests that the "value for money" concept might not be included. I hope that in this regard my assumption is incorrect. Notwithstanding this provision the Auditor General, now supported by the Wilson report, has an opportunity to do Canada an enormous service while serving as watchdog of the public treasury. That, obviously, is an important duty, especially in light of the financial revelations we have received from the Auditor General.

● (1750)

The Auditor General can also help to increase the degree of public acceptance of decisions reached under our existing parliamentary system. We must do our level best to eliminate waste and extravagance, not only to make this government credible but to make the present parliamentary system credible to the Canadian people. Judging from the unrest we see portrayed on national television and in our daily newspapers, we have a long way to go if we want to win this particular battle.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, opposition members who rose this afternoon seemed to resent the kind of answer they got from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), but I am not surprised at all, because the terms of the motion undeniably may lead to some confusion. It is a threefold motion, which reads as follows: First,

That in the view of this House, the government should set an example to other Canadians by forthwith indicating the nature and extent of the restraints on government spending—

Second,

—and should also introduce without further delay measures to implement the Wilson Report on the office of the Auditor General—

[Mr. Crouse.]

Which has nothing to do with the foregoing. And third——as an indication of its willingness to eliminate waste and extravagance.

And while the leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) indicated it was a test for the Liberal party regarding anti-inflation measures, I do not think there is any indication of a test in the motion, especially as opposition members themselves seem to be somewhat confused, since the previous speaker mentioned only the Wilson report a few minutes ago. He made absolutely no mention of the other two points of that motion which in my opinion are nevertheless quite important.

Therefore, it cannot be said that this is a test respecting anti-inflation measures which the government intends to take. It can be said that it is a waste of energy on the part of this House to discuss such a blurry motion, a motion of strictly political meaning which, in my opinion, is demagogic since no particular subject can be dealt with and since the motion bears on three very important elements. It is clear, however, that the Wilson report is very important, that the restraints announced are very important, that the measures to eliminate waste and extravagance also are very important, all of which is written in the motion.

I feel that, considering the 25 days allotted to it, the opposition could surely have found something more appropriate to discuss and it could perhaps have separated the motion into three parts. Today we could have discussed a test for the anti-inflation program. The motion could have stopped after the words—

—the restraints on government spending—

Then, the President of the Treasury Board would surely have replied differently because the motion before him would have indicated some restrictions on government spending.

But that is not the case; at one and the same time the Wilson report and the question of waste are also introduced.

So, Mr. Speaker, if we are to try to discuss all that, the time at our disposal is obviously too short; that would take at least three to four days of debate.

To my mind, the opposition muffed it with regard to its motion. To my mind, it is in no way a test of our restriction program. This motion was not thought out before being placed on the order paper and, of course, this creates problems when we, of the government party, wish to make a contribution and reply to the objections made either by the members of the official opposition, or by the NDP members or by the members of the Social Credit.

I especially liked one of the contributions of the Social Credit explaining the difference between expenditures and wasteful spending. These are obviously not the same thing, and this is why I said a while ago that I do not see how you can in the same motion talk about expenditures and wasteful spending because the government and Parliament have absolute authority as concerns expenditures through the estimates which are submitted to the House and to the various committees where opposition members spend many hours discussing government expenses and voting for them most of the time. When they have objections about expenditures, they make them during the review of the estimates, and that is when I believe they must state their arguments and tell the government what other action it should take to try to limit its expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to call it six o'clock? It is agreed.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying when the House took recess at six o'clock, the motion introduced by the members of the loyal opposition and presented by the leader himself, who will no longer be the leader in February, contains three specific points which were creating confusion for the Progressive Conservatives and everyone else. It was even reported that this motion was very important because it was putting the government to the test to find out whether the restrictive measures are related to the offensive against inflation. If such is the case, as the leader of the opposition himself pointed out as well as the opposition leader in this House, if such is the case I am wondering how it is that the Progressive Conservative leadership candidates—there are quite a few and they are indeed members of parliament—were not present this afternoon and they are not here now. It does not seem to me, that the motion introduced by Progressive Conservatives is all that important since the leadership candidates, one of whom will be the main opponent of the Liberal party in a few months, even these candidates are not in the House to hear their present leader discuss the test that he wants to put to the party in power and they are not here to take steps either. Members of the opposition cannot take a position, and I understand; they cannot take a position because very soon they will be selling something to their supporters and even to people who will not support them. Of course they do not want to stick their necks out at the present time in a case which, according to the leader of the official opposition, is a very important test for the party in power, to know whether the party really means to implement measures against inflation.

All this does not seem very serious to me, Mr. Speaker, and unfortunately, they are attempting to confuse things by introducing a motion which covers three very important subjects of debate. I do not see anything serious in this and as to waste, I think they are the ones who are now wasting the time of the House putting before it a motion that not even they intend to support.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They themselves are not convinced!

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Our party whip says that they themselves are not convinced, and I fully share his opinion.

Before the House took recess, I was dealing with the control over our national expenses and the checking after expenses are incurred. There is a very important difference. The estimates were studied in the House by Parliament, not only by the government, from March 1 to May 31; they were then reviewed in committee where we spent a great many hours considering government expenses. Since March, there is a new and temporary agreement between the parties. We even try something new when the Committee of the Whole House meets. Estimates are studied, and the opposition has every opportunity to discuss expenses control.

If this is the gist of the motion, I think there will be no problem, for the opposition may use the devil's or God's eye to examine government expenses. It is its responsibility to exercise its privilege.

Now, the Canadian people itself has access to very important documents through the booklet entitled How your tax dollar is spent, where they can see where their tax dollar goes. It is not very efficient to speak afterwards, when the spending is done, even if we talk of stopping wastage.

Once the spending is done, we have a watchdog called the Auditor General who is responsible for indicating the deficiencies which may appear in the exercise of some functions. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, there may be some errors in the administration of a budget of some $30 billion in about 30 departments; it is very human. Nobody can claim that there will not be any wasteful expenditures occasionally. That is why we have an Auditor General who goes over all the details once the spending is done. Later, he issues a report which is referred to the Committee on Public Accounts on which I have been sitting for almost 12 years already.

We then very carefully consider the propositions brought forward by the Auditor General concerning expenses which are at times extravagant and we table the report in the House. The public accounts committee is presided over by a friend of mine who happens to be away at the moment. He delivered a very good speech this afternoon dealing in particular with the Auditor General's duties and responsibilities. The report is written by the public accounts committee and tabled in the House. Later, the Treasury Board uses it to correct whatever shortcoming there may be, but when you are dealing with such massive expenditures, which by the way are necessary, I think you should expect once in a while some to be picked up by the Auditor General because they were not made according to the proper procedure and must be corrected.

And I should mention, I think, for the benefit of the newcomers that the C. D. Howe Research Institute published a very interesting review concerning government spending and wastefulness under the title Policy Review and Outlook 1975 Restructuring the Incentive System, edited by Judd Maxwell. In this very interesting book, there is an article entitled The Control of Government Spending.

This book is surely not partisan. It says that some government expenditures are controllable and others are not. It also shows the difference between controllable and uncontrollable expenditures. Among the latter there are, for instance, and I quote:

● (2010)

[English]

Old age pensions are established by law under the Old Age Pensions Act and the government would have to amend the act before it could alter its spending either to increase or reduce pensions. In the long run, pension payments are controllable in the sense that the law can be changed by parliament, but for the moment we will classify these legal or statutory commitments as uncontrollable.

[Translation]

There are also so-called controllable expenditures among which the salaries paid to government employees, and I think that to a certain extent there is nevertheless an uncontrollable aspect in those expenditures. However, if you only consider what are classified as uncontrollable expenditures 58 per cent of all government estimates are uncontrollable, which leaves only, as mentioned here on page 39, and I quote:

[English]

The obvious corollary of this increase is that controllable spending has been shrinking so that it now represents only 42 per cent of government activity.

[Translation]

Now I find it difficult then to blame the government for its lack of control and its wastefulness. Moreover, among them they have a very devoted individual who is a candidate to the leadership. He was a member of the Committee on Public Accounts and he once put quite interesting questions to the Auditor General about the Glassco report. You know that the Glassco report governs at present the manner in which the federal government must control its expenditures and avoid waste. And this Progressive Conservative colleague asked the Auditor General: "Do you not think that since the Glassco report was published some ten years ago, it would be advisable to set up a new commission to give instructions to the government?

The Auditor General said that he does not think that this is necessary because for the moment he was using the "inter-exchange" program. He recruited 36 people from the private sector, all of them extremely well qualified experts doing research within the various departments who will report and bring forward some considerations with a view to trying to set up different control methods if the present methods do not work properly.

Besides, as someone said earlier this afternoon, the new Auditor General himself appointed in 1973 a non partisan committee, an expert committee instructed to review his status and examine the possibility of modifying the position of the Auditor General vis-à-vis Parliament, and this was published in a report entitled "Report of the independent review committee on the Auditor General's functions", the Wilson Report, named after the committee chairman.

This report, Mr. Speaker, contains 47 recommendations, all of them very valuable. In committee someone asked the question to the Auditor General to see if he agreed with the recommendations in that report, and the Auditor General mentioned that he agreed with all the recommendations. And he also mentioned something else. Most of the recommendations here can be implemented without enabling legislation from the government. Quite interestingly, since that time the Auditor General, as he said before the public accounts committee, already implemented several of the recommendations contained in that report himself. I think that may meet the opinion of the leader of the opposition and his colleagues, that the Wilson report should be implemented as soon as possible by the government.

Of course, that report contains things which do not necessarily rally the opinion of everyone. On the other hand, I think that we would agree with most recommendations but if I look at the brief which was submitted by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, of which I have the honour of being a member, I note that there are perhaps certain recommendations on which the Institute of Chartered Accountants does not agree, like this one, for example:

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like, since we are continuing after the supper hour, carefully to put on the record the motion that we are debating. It is as follows:

That in the view of this House, the government should set an example to other Canadians by forthwith indicating the nature and extent of the restraints on government spending and should also introduce without further delay measures to implement the Wilson Report on the office of the Auditor General as an indication of its willingness to eliminate waste and extravagance.

I have been in the House all afternoon and have listened to the speeches made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), and lastly the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), and I should like to deal in these introductory remarks with what was said by the hon. member for Laurier.

Before my leader came into the House, the hon. member was talking about our "great leader" and indicated that he was still Leader of the Opposition. I am very happy that I have the opportunity to sit on the front bench along with our leader. During the last election campaign we came out with an incomes policy, which was to be a freeze for a short period followed by a period of more flexible controls, and other monetary considerations which we felt would combat inflation.

During the election campaign my hon. friends opposite told the farmers that the Conservatives were going to control the farmers' prices. Then when they went to industrial ridings and spoke to labour they said we were going to control wages. They never discussed the two items together; they only discussed one, depending on the kind of constituency they were visiting. I believe the hon. member used the right adjective and I certainly use it in its proper sense, but this is why our great leader is sitting on this side of the House. I remind the hon. member for Laurier that it is probably better—indeed, I am sure it is better—to sit on this side of the House with our principles than be over there without any principles at all, considering what has happened during the last two weeks when hon. members opposite totally reversed themselves.

I was really amused to hear the President of the Treasury Board asking us today to give him instances of cuts that we would make in expenditures, but before I deal with that matter I should like to talk about something else that we are discussing tonight.

Mr. McKenzie: Why don't you ask them to listen to what you are saying? They never listen to anything.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has the floor.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is his own member making all the noise over there.

Mr. McKenzie: You be quiet and listen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. The hon. member for Calgary North has the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is my favourite speaker. A fellow always has to have one favourite speaker.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. The hon. member for St. Boniface is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that it was the hon. member for Winnipeg South making all the noise, not a member on this side. We are willing to listen to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. McKenzie: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not from Winnipeg South, and I think that the President of the Treasury Board should show some respect for the members of the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate this. Here I am arousing people and I have not really begun my remarks. The two points that we are making are straightforward. During the last 12 months the government has increased the supply of money by 15 per cent, and is continuing to do this in the binge it has been on for a long period of time. Secondly, we are suggesting a reduction in government expenditure.

I have one point I want to make at the outset. We are asking Canadians to follow certain guidelines and to accept certain restraints. In fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went so far as to say in Toronto, "If you are not going to do this voluntarily and accept our controls, we will have an authoritarian kind of government and force you to". Our point is that if the government is to have credibility, it must set the example, and that is really the tone of my remarks tonight.

Coming back to the speech of the President of the Treasury Board, it reminded me of a conversation that took place between an Englishman and an American who were flying from London, England, to Kennedy airport. They had not got very far out over the Atlantic when the pilot came on and said, "I am sorry, ladies and gentlemen, we have lost engine number one, there will be an hour's delay". They then went along a little bit further and the pilot came on again and said, "I am sorry, ladies and gentlemen, we have lost engine number two and we will be delayed two hours". They went on for another half an hour and the pilot came on again and said, "I am sorry, there will be a really serious delay because we have just lost engine number three". The Englishman turned to the American and said, "If we lose engine number four, we are going to be a day late"!

That, of course, makes just about as much sense as the speech that the President of the Treasury Board delivered this afternoon in asking us to set out emphatically some of the cuts that we would make. He is a lawyer, and he knows that before we could produce that kind of evidence we would have to have every one of the estimates audited.

● (2030)

There are a few things I could say to the President of the Treasury Board. I am rather shocked to know that his government went ahead in its attempt to build a new airport in the province of Ontario and spent $100 million, without having an agreement with the provincial government.

Mr. Chrétien: We had one.

Mr. Woolliams: The government then scrapped the whole project.

Mr. Chrétien: We had an agreement.

Mr. Woolliams: If the government had an agreement then I have learned one fact tonight.

Mr. Chrétien: We had an agreement. The government of Ontario gave its word on that.

Mr. Woolliams: If you had an agreement then you also had an obligation to carry out that agreement, which has so far cost the Canadian people $100 million.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Let me make my second point, and I am now getting to the meat of this argument. If we are to find out what actually took place in respect of the Mirabel airport we will require a complete audit. I am confident that if the government hired accountants in Canada to do a complete audit of that project and gave them 50 per cent of the find, they would make the biggest treasures of their lives. I am sure of that in view of what has taken place in the building of that airport.

An hon. Member: Hanky-panky.

Mr. Woolliams: Those are just two incidents of wasted money on the part of the government, and a person could go on and deal with incidents of the sort all night. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) referred to a study in respect of national defence. He pointed that out when the President of the Treasury Board said we did not make any suggestions where cuts could be made. That study cost $11 million which was paid to two United States companies. The study was then shelved and has never been used. I suggest this was all done because the government wanted to delay things for two years as it had no policy at all. What did the President of the Treasury Board say when the hon. member for Victoria raised that point this afternoon? The minister said: Don't talk about peanuts; it is only $11 million. That is the attitude that runs throughout this whole government and that is why we are having this debate tonight. We say that the government should put its house in order because, if it did so, that might add credibility to its program, and Canadians would then accept the program and for nationalistic purposes carry it out.

Some years ago the Liberals hired a truth squad headed by Judy LaMarsh. I recall something that happened at a meeting during the time of that truth squad. The right hon. gentleman and member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was giving that truth squad what it deserved, and he was telling the truth about its activities. Some man at the back of the hall, incidentally in my leader's province, said, "Give them hell, John". The right hon. gentleman then replied, "When I am telling the truth about the Liberals it sounds like hell to them." That is about the truth of the situation. There is no credibility as far as this government is concerned with its ministers of today.

An hon. Member: You are still grinning, Eldon.

Mr. Woolliams: I suggest that you should stop dreaming.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: It is a shame, all right; it is a damn shame. The truth is that the government has been on an economic binge for the past seven years. The departments of government actually run this government. The President of the Treasury Board is a friend of mine, I hope, but I wonder about the experience of that man who now holds one of the most important jobs in this country. I may be wrong, and I hope I am, but I doubt that before he entered the House of Commons as a young man he had ever met with his banker to make sure he had enough capital in an enterprise to meet a payroll or to avoid going bankrupt, yet today he is the President of the Treasury Board and talks about credibility. We say there is no credibility, yet this minister is helping to run the biggest business in this nation.

The government is spending $32 billion this year. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) pointed out that there would be a deficit of something in the order of $3 billion. I suggest it is likely to be closer to $7.7 billion. Every budgetary prediction I have heard since the Liberals came back to office in 1965 has been out by 50 per cent to 100 per cent. The Liberals were never very good at predicting anything. They have been on a binge ever since the Pearson government and throughout the Trudeau government.

Mr. Chrétien: You should remember the budget of 1959-60.

An hon. Member: They don't want to remember that.

Mr. Woolliams: I would ask what experience the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has had in his new field? He was the dean of a faculty at the Saskatchewan university. This was a respectable academic who became the Minister of Justice. Now he is the Minister of Transport. Does he really have the business experience necessary to analyze transportation problems?

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Woolliams: I am coming on, and I will come on a lot stronger. I wish you would listen to me.

An hon. Member: Will you be louder, too?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I wish you would listen. Does this minister have the experience required to analyze the facts?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: You can shout loud and I will still answer; you do not have to worry about that. I always know when I am bothering the Grits' conscience by the noise they make. Have these ministers the experience to analyze the facts given them by the civil servants who basically run the government? These senior civil servants have just received a big increase in salary, up to $6,000 a year. That certainly is an example of the government's restraint.

An hon. Member: Some restraint.

Mr. Woolliams: Have any of these ministers had the experience before they came to the House which would enable them to accept the responsibilities they now hold? They may all be academics, and I would not question the marks they got at their universities, but do they have the business experience to run the government? I suggest they do not, and that is the reason why we are today facing such economic chaos.

Mr. Chrétien: I am a lawyer like you, Eldon.

Mr. Woolliams: I listened to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), the President of the Treasury Board, and other Liberals today talk about uncontrollable expenses. These are the people who started these grandiose assistance plans.

Mr. Chrétien: You voted for them.

Mr. Woolliams: There are several I did not vote for. This government started these grandiose plans. Let us refer back to the debate on medicare. The Hall report pointed out that this grandiose scheme would cost the Canadian people approximately $600 million. Mr. Hall also stated that if the government did certain things it wanted to do, the plan could cost $2 billion.

When I pointed out these facts to the government at the time of the debate I was told that we should not worry about the expense because everyone was in favour of some kind of health coverage. The government went ahead with this grandiose plan.

The same thing happened in respect of the unemployment insurance fund. I remember in 1962 when the opposition abused the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert and his government for spending $300 million in one year more than was collected from the fund. Today the government is spending about $3.5 billion, and more likely $4 billion. In addition, the rate of contribution on the part of employers and employees has more than doubled. This is no longer an insurance plan but a grandiose scheme brought in by the Liberals, who are now paying for their sins.

When votes cease to be important they will no longer be bought by the Grits, and that boils down the present situation. This government has presented these schemes without any thought about administration, without the basis of any business experience, and is now faced with uncontrollable costs. This government cannot even control the costs that are controllable. Spending by this government is now out of hand. This government's philosophy is to spend, spend, spend; and tax, tax, tax. The philosophy of this government today is not to tax the people for services but to tax the people because the Liberals think it is right that they should be taxed. The quantum that is paid does not matter. They will pay either from their income or their profits. That is then passed on to the consumer. It becomes a vicious circle. This is what created the economic mess we are in today.

● (2040)

That is an example of the credibility we are talking about when we ask the government to cut down the extravagance now and set aside some of its ideas about grandiose schemes. The government should cut down on those expenses which are still controllable. I know one thing—the President of the Treasury Board has never read a speech of mine in which I asked the government to spend more. We are not saying the government should cut out all expenses. We are saying, however, that it should spend the taxpayers' money wisely with proper constraint.

Mr. Harquail: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression that today is an opposition day. I am wondering where the members of the official opposition are. I see about six Conservatives in the House. I am wondering where the Conservatives are today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order please.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I detest that type of statement from a new member in this chamber when other members are attending committee meetings. I think that it is a shame that a new member should make such a statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Many members of this House serve on committees. I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) carry on.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much. I have never had so much help when making a speech and I appreciate the support I am getting. However, I should like to answer that. There is one thing that has been said in this House which bears repeating for the benefit of a new member. When one goes out big-game hunting one does not follow rabbit tracks.

Mr. Harquail: Who is the rabbit?

An hon. Member: You are. You have a lot to learn, sonny.

Mr. Woolliams: We ask the government what the deficit will be. We predict that it will be more than $7,000,000,000. It might be up to $8,000,000,000. The government will not, as the hon. member for Peace River has said, bring in its supplementary estimates until it has attempted to get its anti-inflation program rammed through the committee by the 11th or 12th of November. That is where our members are at the present time. They are fighting a battle for the taxpayers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Woolliams: How much time have I had, Mr. Speaker? I started at 8:30.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): You are allotted 20 minutes, sir, and have spoken for 20 minutes.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some modest trepidation after the wonderful and perceptive speech given by my hon. friend and colleague from Calgary North. I feel that anything I may add will be a little anti-climatic. On the other hand I do wish to make a contribution to this particular debate. I wish to voice some concerns and opinions I have with respect to the government's policy concerning the whole question of spending, and lack of control and restraint in that area.

One of the features of the so-called program of the government to fight inflation as represented by the white paper tabled in the House by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is an obvious lack of enthusiasm with respect to any sort of meaningful policy of restraint in the area of government expenditures.

Some three pages of the white paper are devoted to government expenditure policies largely for the purpose of justifying the increase in government spending and the present level of expenditure. There is an admission that federal government expenditures have risen at a greater rate than that at which the economy has grown, but then it is pointed out that the rising trend has not been unique to the federal level of government, and that a very large proportion of federal government expenditure is under the statutory programs and other arrangements where there is little flexibility.

The bankruptcy of initiative in this most important area of restraint, if we are to have any realistic program to control inflation, as confirmed by the statement made by the Minister of Finance that there is little scope for the government to reduce expenditures. All I can say to that type of approach is that there is a certain touch of lunacy in the proposition when on the one hand the government is attempting to introduce severe limitations on the working men and women of this country, many of whom can scarcely afford the basic necessities of life, and on the other hand it adopts a rather cavalier approach to any suggestion of restraint on its own expenditures.

Government Spending

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of the cabinet have started to criss-cross the country in some sort of crusade to convince Canadians that they must co-operate with the policy of controls imposed on them by the government. There is no question that they have a very big job on their hands to establish the credibility of this program, when one looks back at the history of vehement attacks made by the Prime Minister and his colleagues against any suggestion of price and incomes control. But having come round a full 180 degrees in their attitude, and having then embraced a policy of long-term controls on prices and wages, they in effect grant themselves an exemption from restraint.

The Prime Minister keeps telling us that the people of Canada have been calling for leadership in economic matters and that this is the reason why the new program has been put into place. He apparently does not understand that part of this leadership that the people of the country are looking for is restraint and responsibility in that area in which the government has direct control, which is the area of government spending. But let us put the matter of government spending into perspective.

In the first place, one does not have to be an economist or even a close observer of government affairs to see that spending in government has gone virtually out of control. Between 1973 and 1974 federal government expenditures increased from $22,402 million to $28,715 million, a spending increase of $6,313 million in one year. The amount of this spending increase is greater than the total of federal government expenditures for 1958, which was $6,176 million. If all federal government expenditures during the first 77 years of confederation were added together, the total amount of $27,806 million would be less than what the federal government spent during the last fiscal year.

From 1867 to 1974 federal government expenditures have increased 209,247.6 per cent. Federal government expenditures in 1974 were twice the size they were in 1969, nearly three times the amount spent in 1961, and over 12 times the 1950 level. If expenditures were to continue to grow at the rate achieved between 1973 and 1974 they would double in less than three years.

● (2050)

From 1969 to 1974 the general price level in the economy increased something in the vicinity of 44 per cent. Prices paid by consumers increased by 34 per cent, and prices for imports by some 43 per cent. At the same time prices paid by governments increased by some 50 per cent or 51 per cent, which indicates that the government has been more tolerant of price increases than any other sector and has contributed more to inflation than any other sector.

In 1974 federal government expenditure represented a daily spending of something in the vicinity of $78.7 million; and in terms of hours and minutes this works out to 3.3 million every hour, $54,600 per minute, or $910.50 per second. This is more than a cash flow; it is a cash flood.

With respect to the size of the civil service, in 1970 there was one federal civil servant for every 78 Canadians. In 1974 that ratio was reduced to one civil servant for every 67 Canadians.

Finally, on an average basis every Canadian man, woman, and child paid $1.06 per day in personal taxes to the federal government in 1970. In 1974 every Canadian paid an average of $2.08 per day in federal income tax.

With this history of almost mind boggling growth in government expenditures, it is inconceivable to me that the government can simply brush off any fundamental re-examination of its own spending habits.

The Attack on Inflation Paper takes some pains in trying to show that government expenditures cannot be reduced, or their growth even significantly moderated without adversely affecting transfer payments, aid programs, and the level of service to the public. Such a view ignores the question of whether a cutback in government programs may be necessary to achieve the more important goal of moderating inflation. Since inflation disrupts government programs it may be necessary to reduce the level of service in order to maintain service in an orderly manner.

The idea put forward in this white paper that growth in government expenditures cannot be moderated is, I suggest, unsatisfactory and far from conclusive. What the government has in mind in connection with moderating expenditures is a good question, and the answer is virtually nothing of consequence.

If one reviews the points raised by the Minister of Finance in this paper, trying to determine in what areas the government intends to make a reduction in expenditures, one comes up with the conclusion, I am afraid, that it is not going to have very much success, or that it is not very interested in that final result.

The reduction of federal employment growth to 1.5 per cent still will allow increasing of the federal public service by more than 5,000. However, the statement concerning the reduction in the rate of growth of federal employment is immediately qualified by a reference to the necessity to accommodate additional personnel required in connection with the implementation of the wage and price control program and other so-called essential services.

During the course of debate the Minister of Finance has indicated that he anticipates a complement of something in the vicinity of 200 persons in connection with the anti-inflation review board's activities. With the propensity of the government to use Parkinson's law as the basis of its employment policies and projections, I can well imagine that this will merely be a springboard figure for this particular body.

The government is committed to a program of controls on every segment of our society, and the Prime Minister has made his intentions abundantly clear in this connection. It appears more and more certain that before too long the government will be obliged to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that this program is made applicable to everyone in Canada, as opposed to the selected groups and individuals now referred to in the legislation before us these days. We seem to be grinding on toward the most massive intervention into the affairs of individual citizens we have experienced in our country at any time, except possibly during war time, and the administration required to put this program into place will, therefore, also be required to be massive. This administrative nightmare will involve an extraordinary demand for personnel, and I anticipate that this in turn will cause extraordinary pressure against any meaningful reduction in the growth of the public service.

When this additional personnel is added to the additional workload to be placed on existing government departments, the pressure on those departments affected to increase personnel will also be very great. The Minister of Finance, in response to questions concerning the operation of the control plan, has said that the process of policing increased salaries and profits will be affected through the existing tax collection department. He indicated that the Department of National Revenue has done a very good job in the matter of taxation of income, and he intimated that this department would therefore be involved in the process of monitoring and policing excessive wage and profit increases.

As I have stated there will, therefore, be that kind of additional pressure put on existing departments, and one can almost guarantee that the projected limitation on increasing the civil service will not be met by virtue of the wage and price control program alone. I see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) talking to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), and there is no doubt in my mind that he is already asking for more help in policing this program.

What are we left with in regard to a reduction of expenditures? The whole thrust of the supposed reductions leaves us with the pathetic proposition that the government will limit the normal replacement of office furniture, the use of first class travel by air, and suspend normal schedules for replacement of departmental automobiles. Will anyone in this country take seriously the resolve of the government to give leadership in the area of restraint with these preposterously insufficient measures?

I want to discuss the matter of first class travel because it is of interest to me. On July 10 of this year I asked the government for statistics for 1973, 1974, and to the end of June, 1975, with respect to air flights taken by public servants through the Canadian government central travel service and the number and value of first class flights. The answer received from the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) indicated a total number of air flights for 1973 of 104,100. In 1974 this went up to 153,795 and there were 94,146 to the end of June of this year. The total dollar value of all flights was $16,099,290 for 1973; $24,847,415 in 1974, and $16,037,950 to the end of June of 1975.

However, the minister did not answer the question about how many of those flights were first class or what the dollar value of first class was because, as he stated, records of first class flights taken were not maintained by the government or its agency. How then was the government able to determine in the first place what savings it would make by prohibiting first class air travel? And in any event, assuming the government cut out all travel, there would hardly be a dent in the total and complete budget of this country. However, if we take only that portion which we have to guess at with regard to first class—and perhaps the reason we are not getting that information is that there was an excessive amount of that kind of travel in the first place—I do not understand exactly why the government has made such a big issue about air travel and the reduction of air travel. It is simply a cosmetic or tokenism type of approach to the reduction of expenditure.

● (2100)

Finally, of course, with air travel a good portion of this money will be going to Air Canada, a Crown corporation, which will receive the benefit of these travels by civil servants.

I understand that even the rank and file Liberal member of parliament is anxious that there be restraint in government spending as a tangible example to the country, if we are to believe what is quoted in the press.

In the Toronto Star of October 14, 1975, an article appears, headed "Liberal MPs offer to give up Raise". The article goes on to say:

> Liberal MPs last night indicated they are prepared to forgo a 7 per cent cost of living increase as an example to the country.
>
> Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau mentioned the cost of living adjustment to the MPs is due on January 1 when he briefed the Liberal caucus last night on the government's anti-inflation program—
> Trudeau, who told the MPs they were faced with a difficult decision was greeted with cries of "Wipe it out" and "Let's drop it now".

This attitude amongst the supporters of the government is a hopeful sign. However, when one considers that the Prime Minister, on the immediately preceeding Friday announced the appointment of no less than 27 parliamentary secretaries who get something like $5,300 extra per year, the enthusiasm of the caucus may be due to the fact that most of the members of that caucus have now been given jobs under which they receive substantial additional moneys.

Finally the "Attack on Inflation" paper indicates that the President of the Treasury Board will also require the re-imposition of the 10 per cent reduction in travel expenditures and expenditures on consultants. I should like to make some comment regarding consultants. The Liberal government has increasingly resorted to the use of outside consultants in the preparation of working papers, policy formulation, and studies in general. Many of these studies and analyses could have been readily carried out by the respective branches of the various departments. However, the government has repeatedly shelved this approach.

Many of the projects presently being undertaken by consultants are questionable, as are the credentials and validity of some of the consulting firms. Undoubtedly the patronage principle has been utilized to the utmost by the government in relation to some of these consulting firms.

A severe reduction in the use of consultants at this time should be seriously examined in the fight against inflation. The utilization of consulting services should be kept to an absolute minimum. Instead the government should fully utilize the services and resources afforded by the trained personnel of the various government departments. Such a move will not only help to check inflation but will also strengthen morale within the echelons of the civil service, a morale which has been continually down-graded with the acquisition of power by the Trudeau government.

Because of the way in which the government has presented its information on consultants it would appear to be impossible to discover just how much the government is spending on consultants each year. The figures for consultants are included in the figures for professional and special services. An indication, however, can be gained from some information which we have.

Government Spending

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I was just noticing the time and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan).

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals are fond of telling Canadians that they are good administrators, that in fact only they are capable of running this country.

My experience and observations are that the Liberals may be pretty good in dealing with cultural matters such as Canadian unity, and I guess that is because of the historic relationship of the Liberal Party with Quebec, but when it comes to the economy they just cannot cope.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Ask him why he left the church.

Mr. Hogan: You keep the church out of that, Joe. You should have more sense than to introduce it.

When it comes to inflation they admitted until recently they were powerless to deal with it, blaming it all on international forces. They should have stuck with that line. What has been proposed now, wage control, has been almost universally dismissed as the wrong solution to the problems facing the Canadian economy today.

Seeing the Liberals floundering so badly in trying to solve the country's economic problems, we in the New Democratic Party produced a number of suggestions for useful measures which could be brought in to reduce inflation and to temper its effects, for example, a selective price controls and prices review board with teeth in it; measures like public assembly of land for housing to eliminate the speculative factor that is driving up housing costs; projects like orderly public development of our energy resources to ensure that we have a constant and reasonably priced supply; a two price system on selected commodities, although they seem to have adopted that one in the anti-inflation legislation. But the Liberals generally refuse to take sensible measures seriously. Instead they are subject to the wildest of notions on how to control inflation. For example, reading in the financial pages that it is imperative to cut down on government spending in order to control inflation, they seem to respond uncritically.

Look how they do it. We read in the June budget that some $800 million is to be saved by cutting the budgets of federal government departments. What programs in what departments are being sacrificed? There is no indication in the budget that any thought was given to priorities in government spending. Instead we were treated in some cases to hysterical strokes of the pen.

Take the small crafts and harbours expenditures. Over the last ten years the government managed to bring expenditures for small crafts and harbours, which affect so many small communities on the west coast and the east coast, from $12 million to $30 million. In the June budget this year the then minister of finance took $10 million away and the government let him do it despite the fact that so many small fishing communities will suffer terribly as a result. They will suffer not only because of the multiplier effect of that money being taken out of local economies but because they will not have the means, such as harbours and so on, to improve their productive capacity and help supply some of the protein that Canada and the world needs. The people in all those villages on the west coast and on the east coast lost $10 million on that deal, and the cabinet approved it.

Again, finding that due to continuing high unemployment rates more government money is being spent on unemployment insurance than originally predicted, they contrive to shift the cost of UIC away from the federal government to the employers and workers. They accomplish this by increasing the payroll tax and the premiums paid by those who are working and by their employers. This scheme will save the federal government hundreds of millions of dollars, but it will also remove an important incentive for keeping unemployment rates low. But unemployment of 7 per cent to 8 per cent does not seem to worry the cabinet.

Not only are the results of some of this policy of slashing government spending socially odious such as I mentioned in regard to the small crafts and harbours case, but the thinking behind the policy is misguided. I say that because in the first quarter of 1975 the public sector spent some $4 billion in gross fixed capital formation. In comparison, the private sector spent over five times as much—$21 billion.

If one is concerned about spending and ensuring that the investment which occurs in the economy is of the type which produces the goods and services we need and not simply contributes to great inflation, then it makes more sense to ensure that spending in the private sector increases so that we can achieve public interest goals.

● (2110)

Cutting necessary public spending on the pretext of fighting inflation may be damaging. For example, let me refer to something that happened before the last federal election. Just before the election the Department of National Health and Welfare published a document which was to be a new perspective on the health of Canadians. The report emphasized that if we were to improve our health standards we must spend more money and devote more resources to preventive medicine, rather than trying to repair the damage at the last minute, long after it has been done. That sounds like a sensible approach, does it not? In other words, don't wait until the man is half dead from lung cancer, from breathing asbestos fibres, or coal dust every day at work, and then try to lengthen his life with surgery. Make an early diagnosis of his condition by using social devices, such as community health centres which are stuffed to provide the service. Treat him, and remove the source of the polluted air.

I point out that the federal government did not come up with this as an original idea. New Democratic Party provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, have long said to the federal Liberals that Canadians need more health facilities, not less, and that it costs less in the long run to catch disease at an early stage and treat it in health centres or convalescent homes where costs per bed are not as high as in acute treatment hospitals. Although these programs are expensive to implement at the beginning, there are savings in terms of lives as well as dollars.

We argue in favour of necessary government spending, but this is not to say that one cannot point at blatant examples of waste and misuse of funds at the federal and provincial levels. Again and again the Liberals allow themselves to be taken in by sharp operators. It is a wonder that any self-respecting businessman can have any respect for the federal government, as it seems to be so lacking in business sense. Consider, for example, the case of Microsystems. The government invested $36.7 million in this company, receiving no equity in the company nor any appointments to the board of directors. The company has been liquidated under unusual circumstances, with the government losing at least $30 million of its investment. And what has the government done? Nothing.

Consider also the aircraft industry. During the next few months the government will consider purchasing $3 billion worth of aircraft for the military. At present $47 million worth of CF-5s are in storage, presumably because the aircraft are not suitable for use. We are not assured that the new purchases the government intends to make will be useful either, especially as they are being linked to the offers of several multinational aircraft companies to rationalize the Canadian aircraft industry. They intend to do this by generously taking over all the money the government has invested in the industry by way of grants and loans. They intend to produce a line of aircraft which are suitable for the international marketing demands of the company involved, but not to the needs of the Department of National Defence. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will look into this and stop that nonsense before it goes any further.

Thirdly, consider housing. We are told that the government is to propose new housing measures soon, as part of the control program. We heard much about housing during the last election campaign, but what did the proposals for housing achieve? As any economist will tell you, the government increased the demand for housing, but not the supply. The result is that house prices in Canada are so high that most, whether they live in Toronto, or Montreal, or Halifax, various areas of the Maritimes, or St. John's, Newfoundland, cannot afford a house. The Liberals will probably want to give the private sector more incentive for building houses. This past spring they introduced amendments to the National Housing Act to provide more subsidies to builders of rental housing. The results are neglibible. Apartment starts are still low and the increasing demand from tenants and from provinces for effective rent control shows just how serious the supply problem remains.

In the November, 1974 budget, doctors and lawyers were given a tax break, to encourage them to invest in rental housing. But we have seen nothing significant in the way of new starts. In addition, the government estimated that it would lose $20 million in taxes, both personal and corporate, by virtue of this tax break. That amount is almost double the federal government's 1974 contribution of $13 million to senior citizens' housing, and less than the $18.9 million paid in subsidies for federal-provincial rental housing in that same year.

Government Spending

An hon. member mentioned Mirabel, and one immediately thinks of allegations of corruption in connection with the airport. I say this to draw attention to the unbelievable amounts of money that were spent on consultant services and feasibility studies in connection with Mirabel. On July 15 the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. McKay) put on the order paper a question concerning consulting fees and feasibility studies with respect to Mirabel. I do not want to be accused of bringing this matter up from racist motives—we heard accusations to that effect last year. No, I am bringing the matter up simply because it is an example of government waste. The answer to the hon. member's question indicated that since 1968 the Department of Transport has awarded 105 contracts for consulting services and feasibility studies for the Mirable airport, and that the total amount of money involved is $41,022,658.34. Surely even the most died in the wool Grit will admit that there is something drastically wrong. No wonder we shall see all kinds of investigations concerning contracts awarded in connection with Mirabel.

In conclusion I wish to say that in a mixed economy such as ours, the government has a most important role to play. I suggest that the government's anti-inflation bill is essentially a wage control program. Hopefully it will be amended so that working people of this country can be convinced that the government wants to control prices as well. At present we are sure merely that it is a wage control program. Broadcasting on the night of October 13, the Prime Minister said we are all trying to take too much out of the economy and that the people must reduce consumption. But consumption accounts for about 60 per cent of our gross national product. If you cut consumption and reduce government spending, you are relying on the other two sectors of the economy to prevent unemployment from rising to 9 per cent or 10 per cent while you look for lower prices. You are relying on business sector spending, and on export sector spending.

We know that business sector spending will probably remain high. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) said in so many words that although the government will control dividends for the first year of the program it will not disapprove unduly if profits are ploughed back into the company. I suggest that we need not worry about the capital accumulation of such companies; accumulation will continue, despite the anti-inflation program. In a way that is healthy. We do not want the private capital formation to go too low. Nevertheless it may be that what the government is finally depending upon is the growth of the American and other economies, so that the export sector will carry us along while the consumption and government sector is being used to dampen the economy in order to fight a one sided fight against inflation and hope that unemployment will not rise. However, it is bound to rise. I suggest it will go to 8 per cent this winter. Unless there are radical changes in the government's policy in the next six months, 8 per cent to 9 per cent will be typical next year.

Some people get tired of hearing me talk of unemployment. It is not just that I come from a part of the Atlantic region where we are used to being the poor cousins in confederation. At the present time it is not only the unskilled workers who will feel the brunt of unemployment in Canada. Tuesday's Globe and Mail quoted Dr. John Sheppard, Executive Director, Science Council of Canada, as saying:

> People with Ph.D.'s in science are no strangers to unemployment and a federal anti-inflation program will make their job situation worse—
> We are, therefore, in a typical boom and bust cycle which is unfair to the student, hideously wasteful to the taxpayer and damaging to our potential as a technology-based nation. There are at present about 1,700 surplus Ph.D.'s in Canada and the education of each has cost taxpayers $50,000. It's time for industry, the federal Manpower Department and the universities to get together and begin planning for future job market needs.

It is time that the government and the progressive elements in the cabinet paid more than lip service to the word planning, making it a more meaningful project for all Canadians, especially those who live in the shadow of regional disparity from the beginning to the end of their lives. Indeed, this government on its spending policy and other policies needs to stop confusing the people and must begin to give us acceptable and competent management of our economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I am glad to take part in the debate and to go on with the debate on the basis on which the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), the chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, has carried on with the debate this afternoon.

I should like to take this opportunity to point out the outstanding work he is doing as chairman of this committee which, as I will show later, has a very special place within our parliamentary system, and also the great tact, the cleverness, the spirit of neutrality and impartiality with which he presides over the destinies of this committee.

Indeed, since the start of the 30th Parliament, the committee has tabled three reports in the House, the fourth is now being revised and doubtless we will manage to discharge our responsibilities in the time allotted to us.

Still, Madam Speaker, I have a few remarks to make at this time which all parties may not find pleasing. Since I have had the opportunity of participating in the proceedings of the Committee on Public Accounts, I have noticed that one party in the House has never sent any of its members to its meetings. I am speaking of the Social Credit party of Canada. I regret it all the more as when we have debates such as those held today, those hon. members are often the most eager to rise and criticize the government on the way it manages its programs, on the fact that budgets are not high enough, and on the fact that there is a shameless waste of public funds.

It is very easy, Madam Speaker, on an opposition day, to come to the House and cry before the press and the public that the government spends too much on local initiatives projects, that its national defence programs are ill used, that it spends too much on office supplies. Now, when the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is sitting or when the Auditor General's report is tabled in the House, it so happens that those members are not attending. Even if we give them notice of those sittings, they never come to discuss spendings where decisions are really made.

[Mr. Hogan.]

I regret, Madam Speaker, to have to say that there is another party in the House which very rarely takes part in the proceedings of the public accounts committee. It is the New Democratic Party. I regret it all the more, because some members of this party are among those who attend the House most regularly, and who best know the procedure of Parliament. But why, when it comes to control government expenditures or to discuss the Auditor General's report, is this party not represented on the public accounts committee.

I think the first responsibility we have as members of Parliament is of course to be in the House on opposition days, but even more to be present in committees when decisions are made. This is the first remark I wanted to make, and I regret having to do it because I have always tried to place my speeches in this House on parameters of neutrality. I would not want my next remarks about the very nature of this Committee on Public Accounts to smack of partisanship. I think, Madam Speaker, that I had to report to the House that this committee suffers from poor attendance and that the political parties who delegate members to this committee should ensure that they have as many seats as are allowed under the rules.

The second remark I should like to make, Madam Speaker, concerns the politicization of the role of the Auditor General of Canada. Since Mr. James Macdonell was appointed Auditor General, we have witnessed a complete reversal in the attitude and the sense of responsibility of the Auditor General. His predecesssor saw fit to taint his actions with political overtones in order to be efficient. The present Auditor, on the other hand, found it more effective to carry out his responsibilities in a more professional way, more consistent with the principles of public accounting than his predecessor.

Madam Speaker, when Mr. Macdonell was appointed Auditor General of Canada, his first task was to establish an independent committee to review the functions, powers and role of the Auditor General of Canada, and especially the way Parliament is carrying out its duty to control public spending. This committee sat and presented a report; members of parliament have had the opportunity to read it and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) informed us this afternoon that there is now a bill being drafted and that next session we would likely be able to discuss and adopt it. That is positive action. The minister did not limit himself to being guest speaker at dinners of social or philanthropic clubs across the country. I prefer an official who has the sense of responsibility and takes immediate action to improve the system. I do not believe it is necessary to limit oneself or that the Auditor General of Canada has a calling to attend every dinner conference across Canada to denounce government extravagances.

● (2130)

On taking office, the Auditor General of Canada realized that until 1962 when the Glassco Commission settled down to the task, there had never been a comprehensive review of the government's administration. He did not fuss about it, did not call at the Canadian Club or at the Rotary Club, he simply made the decision to contact the Public Service Commission Chairman and ask him if he would participate in the exchange program with private industry. This resulted in the hiring of 32 accountants representing the largest chartered accountants firms in the country whose responsibilities would be to review completely the financial performance and the administrative controls of the government.

Madam Speaker, that work lasted a year. It resulted in the publication of a 500-page report which the government ministers have received and which will be tabled at the same time as the yearly report from the Auditor General of Canada, that is in early December. This report reviews the administrative performance of 28 government departments.

It is useless for me, Madam Speaker, to list the 28 government departments. However, I can assure you that another task force made up of 28 accountants from the private sector is presently investigating the administration of Crown agencies. When the Auditor General presents his next report, we will be able to see how the Crown agencies are administered and how the public funds are spent within those agencies.

Of course, Madam Speaker, 500-page report on government management tabled in the House may seem voluminous. Let me only mention that his review deals especially with budget preparation and control.

Madam Speaker, since your election, you had the opportunity, as I had, to receive what we call the blue book. Who in the House can make an efficient and intelligent use of that blue book? The manner in which government expenditures are presently recorded in this book makes it impossible for members of the House to use it.

It was essential that a group of qualified people examine the way the expenses are reported an accounted for, as well as the way the government allocates the various funds within the programs. I believe, Madam Speaker, that the first objective of the study conducted by the Auditor General was precisely to strengthen the control of the House over government spending.

As previously mentioned, Madam Speaker, I think it is much more difficult to criticize the way the blue book is drafted than to give dinner speeches across Canada.

The second element of the study conducted by the Auditor General was the financial reporting systems. We know for a fact that deparments and Crown agencies must submit interim reports periodically on the progress and amount of government revenue and expenses. Again the Auditor General has directed that a study be conducted which will allow us to scrutinize public spending more closely and more directly. He has also directed that this study include financial control of government expenses and income, assets and liabilities.

Then again, Madam Speaker, it is one of the essential tools available to both sides of the House to make sure that the expenditures are consistent with the purpose of the legislation passed in the House. Of course, are also included all aspects of the internal auditing, staffing and the flow charts of all departments. That 500-page study will be summarized in a 125-page document, and all the responsible ministers will have the opportunity to appear before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and to answer for the comments reported in the Auditor General's report and in that study which I just mentioned.

I think that thanks to the sense of responsibility of the present Auditor General of Canada and the manner in which he views his duties, we can be sure that the administrative and miscellaneous government expenditures are properly scrutinized. And I am sure that all members who have attended the meetings of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts since the beginning of the 30th Parliament, readily acknowledged that the present Auditor General will be the most outstanding incumbent of that office.

And this explains why Mr. Wilson who attended the annual Auditor General conference last September mentioned that most of his recommendations could be almost readily accepted by the government and the Auditor General.

My colleague, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, said this afternoon that many of those recommendations could be adopted and implemented and would not require any new legislation. And at least nine of these recommendations have already resulted in initiatives and action from the Office of the Auditor General.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that the way the situation evolved since about a year ago is somewhat reassuring at least as far as administrative controls are concerned. I think that if we have to be accountable for something, it is more or less for the way the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is operating. And this is why I wish to draw your attention on the way this committee has changed in recent years.

I think that the Public Accounts Committee has a special role to play, a special job to do. It does not hold discussions nor does it get its orders directly from the government. It is not a committee which deals with bills or has work of an irregular nature to do. The terms of reference of this committee are closely related to the daily administrative chores of the government. Consequently, I think that the nature of that committee and its functions should encourage us to change its approach entirely. It is a committee which has a near judicial status, that is to say with a membership that should never submit to individual party lines or show political bias. And I said before that the chairman of the committee, since he has been appointed to that office, has tried to conduct the debates without reference to the political options represented by everyone in this House.

I think that the members of the committee should first attend the meetings and then stay on the committee for more than the duration of a session. In fact, as in the case of a court, a judicial institution, just like the judges, its members should not be affected by political pressures or have terms of office too short to let them fulfill their functions satisfactorily.

Consequently, the first amendment that should be made would be to set the Public Accounts Committee on a permanent basis. This committee should sit as long as required by its work and as long as the report of the Auditor General and the financial statements of the government have not been discussed at length. Moreover, the members of this committee should be appointed for at least four years and should not be changed except under exceptional circumstances. Also, the committee's calendar should not necessarily coincide with that of the session of the House. During a fiscal year, the House might sit for only six months while the committee should be able to meet over a period of at least eight months to be able to implement the recommendations and carry out the mandates specified in the Auditor General's report.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that it would be appropriate to amend the rules of the House so that the report of the Auditor General of Canada could be automatically referred to this committee as soon as it is tabled, whether or not Parliament is sitting. I also believe that one of the duties of this committee should be to ensure that the recommendations can be immediately implemented by the government.

Indeed, it is useless to have allotted days like this one where any member may stand up and say either that the government is spending too much or is not spending enough, or even that it is spending just enough. It is absolutely useless to have such debates. I believe that if we want to be efficient, we should instead, as concerns the 33 paragraphs of the Auditor General's Report which did not bring about any change in our administrative procedure, ask each minister responsible for these paragraphs why no action was taken within his or her department to implement the recommendations made by the Auditor General. This would seem much more positive, more effective and more in line with the interest of Canadians. This would be better than simply pointing out the construction of a pool, the purchase of two cars, whether they be Cadillacs or Volkwagens, or exaggerated expenses for the fitting of an aircraft carrier or something else.

A Cadillac does not mean much in a $14 million budget. The important is that the administration that has made such a decision should follow the correct procedure and the instructions given by the controlling authorities within the department making the purchase. Once the ticket is bought, once the expense has been made, it is all very well to come and say: the government spent too much. It is much more demanding before making the expense to control the decision which was taken when the budgetary estimate was made.

Has anyone in this House questioned the estimates of the Department of Supply and Services when the money to be spent on that car was accounted for? Not one member of this House pointed out that an item in the estimates should have been deleted. And yet, once the money is spent, they are shocked and they make of it a matter of nationwide proportions. Madam Speaker, it is not an indication of departmental or public responsibility to question after the fact decisions one has been partly responsible for through one's silence and submissiveness.

Madam Speaker, if we are to amend our procedure, I think we should do so at the decision-making level before expenses are actually effected. Madam Speaker, if the Committee on Public Accounts is to prove useful, I think its report should not be tabled in this House when its sittings are completed and remain a dead letter. We should in fact discuss the third report of the Committee on Public Accounts, which was tabled in the House in March and was never debated by opposition members. No one ever requested the minister mentioned in one of those recommendations to appear in this House. Madam Speaker, if opposition days are to serve some purpose, they should be used to improve the administrative procedures and the manner in which financial controls are exercised within departments.

It is utopian to believe that a minister today controls every decision made in his department. Quite often the minister does not know how the expenses provided for in the estimates are effected. Only after the fact is the general public informed that such or such expense was carried out according to the budgetary estimates passed by this House.

I think, Madam Speaker, that one of the major amendments this House and the opposition should suggest—and I do not think there is any objection on this side of the House—would be precisely to use one of the opposition days to implement the recommendations in the report of the Auditor General which have not already prompted changes and amendments from the departments concerned.

I think, Madam Speaker, we already made a step in that direction: 55 paragraphs of last year's report of the Auditor General have already given rise to changes and amendments. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) wrote to the Auditor General of Canada and told him that 55 paragraphs had been immediately acted upon by the departments concerned; 11 paragraphs were also being examined. Eventually, action would be taken but 33 paragraphs remained untouched. That is what troubles me, Madam Speaker: a committee sits for six months, the report is tabled, it contains a list of government expenditures, the opposition leaves it on the table but when it comes to talking about extravagant government expenditures we are told a lot of rubbish and the discussion is not based on actual expenditures and actual faults of the administration. I think, Madam Speaker, that if we want to be consistent with the institutions of this House, if we want to give them the responsibility, the respect they must have in our parliamentary system it is by coming to grips with reforms like those and leaving for the gallery all other expenditures which are little more than drops of water in an administrative reform whose first object is the interest of Canadians.

● (2140)

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I take part in this opposition day resulting from a motion introduced by our party and which blames the government for certain extravagant expenditures and asks that an end be put to a certain waste.

I was quite impressed by the comments of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). He pointed out the importance of very specific subjects. I was also very surprised to learn that ministers did not exercise strict control over certain expenditures. I think it is all to his credit to have said so in the House and that is what concerns me, that lack of control, those exaggerated expenditures, that waste.

A number of members dealt with various matters, such as wasteful spending. There was also reference to overly prolonged mismanagement, maladministration, and inadequate policies falling short of objectives. I recall the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) mentioned earlier this week the wrong direction taken by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and badly prepared forecasts. We know the results. I believe this also is wasteful spending.

Since 1968, the government had been re-elected with 175,000 unemployed. We now have 500,000. We hear repeated every day, and we have been told again today by members opposite how often legislation was enacted, how many suggestions tendered, how many efforts and attempts made to improve the situation.

But after ten years, it is realized not only in Quebec but across Canada that the government's credibility is challenged. The public's confidence is getting dangerously low. I hope nobody will say this is our doing.

This opposition day allows us of course to stress these shortcomings, these problems, the Canadian public's concerns.

We blame the government for certain extravagant expenditures. The President of the Treasury Board said this afternoon that I myself enquired about possibilities of extra money in the area of local initiative programs.

Therefore, I was favouring extra expenditures. I think we should look at the advertisement for LIP projects. Since 80 per cent of these projects are refused because of lack of money, maybe savings could be made on advertising expenses, so that more projects may be undertaken.

I think there is much more publicity for so little results. I feel that it is an unnecessary expenditure. On the whole, the government is supposed to invest those funds judiciously. This is a proof after ten years that the social climate is unhealthy, that the people are angry and ill-disposed, even if an attempt was made recently with Bill C-73 to correct this situation.

The Canadian people have seen the government ridicule our party in the House, when we suggested controls two years ago. Four years ago, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Stanfield) during a trip throughout Canada asked the government to take concrete steps and even introduce strict legislation, as we were already referring to inflation control.

Therefore, we were ridiculous, Madam Speaker, but by various devices the government succeeded in frightening the people with the war measures when it was not with something else, but always under the pretext of a national crisis, they convinced the Canadian people that we were wrong.

But today, we have to admit and we do realize that the government must take action. Recently, one of our ministers resigned, the former Minister of Finance, who had obviously, according to our information, already recommended to his government certain restrictive measures. When the government failed to comply with his request on a short term, he resigned.

Recently, the government introduced Bill C-73 which corresponds in principle to a desire that we expressed a few years ago, and especially in 1974.

Already some years ago, there were discussions with reference to controls, mostly in 1974. However, the Prime Minister was perhaps a little ill at ease when he said he had negotiated with the provinces and had been assured of their support as well as that of the unions, etc.

● (2150)

Today still, we realize that labour organizations are setting up resistance movements, that the provinces are not in agreement. There has been no consultation, Madam Speaker. We were not assured beforehand that the cooperation of those organizations and of the provinces would obviously be a prerequisite to the implementation of the legislation. We agree in principle with control measures, though there must be some assurance that the controls can work. It was misleading information when we were told that the support of essential bodies was secured.

As this requires extensive travels in Canada by members of the government and renewed consultations without delay, considering the resistance of some organizations and provinces, I say that also is a waste of public funds. Perhaps that waste is what I want to make the government aware of, a waste which makes the people of Canada lose confidence in their government.

It is not necessarily the purchase of a Cadillac, but I think the measures introduced during the last ten years, the social context in which we live, the social climate which is terribly disrupted, are a waste on the part of the government. They have not been able to bring in legislation capable of reflecting reality and solving problems. For instance, in the area of unemployment, the government is trying more than ever before to make us accept as a fact of life an unemployment level ranging from 600,000 to 700,000. We certainly cannot accept that.

We have mentioned the possible lowering of the old age security pension entitlement age to 60, which would permit people 60 years of age to retire if they wanted to. I have felt in the past and I still do that this would open the labour market to a great many young people whom we maintain in an unemployment situation and support through social security benefits or other means. Although they carry interesting diplomas, these young people are dissatisfied because they are still unemployed. We still believe that the government should have allowed a few thousand Canadians to retire after 40-odd years of deserving work. The government is saying no to this. I think this would be a way to save a lot of money and correct the social climate. The government says not to this. Although it has taken a very shy step in respect of a group of people, the aged, it is unfair for other groups.

We shall deal with unemployment insurance again this week and we shall try, through the bill under review, to recuperate $250 million from the pockets of the small earners. This is not the way to encourage people to believe in a sound administration. The social unrest which cannot be appeared by such measures force us, of course, to take advantage of this day to blame the government and ask it to think seriously of means to correct the situation. I am led to believe that the government has lost its head, as our people would say. It makes mistake over mistake, with the result that the public in general is not only disappointed, but also deeply worried.

Lately, in May, I cannot say that the government lied deliberately to certain groups of people, I think, for instance, of milk producers, to whom promises had been made and who lost a part of their income because of arrangements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) or by the Canadian Dairy Commission. Their income was not sufficient to cover their production cost, and that had lasted for a year. Such measures do not lead them to congratulate the government. And it is still going on.

I think we must realize the economic failure the government is facing at the moment. The Department of Economic Regional Expansion made incredible efforts. To what extent did it make sure that it had sufficient funds to maintain existing industries and to modernize and improve those that could stay in the market, while trying to create new ones?

I feel that while good work was done to create new industries, the jobs that already exist were somewhat neglected. It is all very well to create new jobs; but the basic principle should first assure that present jobs are maintained. And so, the more we have inadequate legislation, the more our modern social climate degrades a concerned people. Of course, we will be accused of making political hay with such allotted days, but I feel that it behoves us to ask the government to introduce measures capable of solving present day problems.

Thought should also be given to the economy we could build. The Solicitor General speaks increasingly of improving the prisons and the parole system, and what it would cost the government. To my mind, we have the right to ask that the people on welfare, the handicapped, be taken care of before making our prisons into living rooms. I think that would be a good investment too. Those are as many things that explain why the people are losing confidence in the government.

And we saw recently that the Canadian people loses confidence in the government. Today the Canadian people want bread and butter on the table. For ten years Canadians have been satisfied with what they had, the majority of Canadians were patient perhaps because of the good image the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could give on television, because of a few interesting measures, which could also be pleasing, but I think that the honeymoon of the government is now over. The government must put some bread and butter on the table of Canadians and I think they will demand this. I think this is a warning for this government.

Personally, I take the opportunity to ask them to introduce measures which meet the needs of society.

Mr. Béchard: This is demagogy!

Mr. La Salle: This is demagogy, Madam Speaker! And they would like us to congratulate the government when we know full well that the Canadian people suffer. This is demagogy.

Mr. Stanfield: Hochelaga!

Mr. La Salle: I did not want to mention it but it demonstrates that people want the government measures geared to their needs and the Hochelaga election may prove to be a first class example of a constituency where the voters turned down a minister to warn the government it had better come back down to earth and present legislation to correct the situation.

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Béchard: It was only one riding. The hon. member is making a big fuss over nothing!

Mr. La Salle: I hope today's speeches—and we heard some very smart ones from both sides of the House—will make the government understand that people will put up with things for only so long and can kick the government out if the situation does not improve.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being ten o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Section (11) of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—SUGGESTED DEFERRAL FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES OF INTERIM PAYMENTS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight in this adjournment debate refer to my question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board on October 17 as recorded at pages 8302 and 8303 of Hansard. The question concerned the adjustment payments by the Wheat Board announced on October 9 of this year.

Earlier the Wheat Board had issued an urgent plea for early and large deliveries of grain, especially wheat, in western Canada, to help the Wheat Board meet some of its export commitments. This was an understandable request in view of the very low position of our grain stocks in storage anywhere in Canada available for export. Western grain farmers responded very positively to the Wheat Board's call for stepped-up deliveries, to the extent that approximately three times as much grain has already been delivered to country elevators as compared to a year ago.

It seems obvious to me that this excellent response by western farmers was to a considerable degree due to the understanding that they would have at least the option of deferment of these adjustment payments for income tax purposes. Current tax regulations do permit deferral of the initial grain payment, but the minister's response indicated this is not possible for the adjustment payments due to a need for a "change in the law". In his response the minister said, "—it should be clear that the increase in initial price can in fact be deferred in relation to grain delivered after October 9 when the increase took place".

● (2200)

After October 9 of course the initial price includes the adjustment price, and this higher initial price can indeed be deferred. Surely, Mr. Speaker, for the period prior to October 9, just because the farmer receives two amounts that total the same as the new initial price after October 9, this is no valid argument to deny the producer the option to defer the adjusted payment.

The minister also suggested that the Wheat Board's extreme need for grain deliveries was not a factor in not allowing this tax deferral. I suggest it most certainly was since any farmer who made the decision to deliver early and not wait until the new year with the board's promise of deferral for his traditional price would most certainly have assumed that it would include his total initial price, that is, including the adjustment amount. Can the parliamentary secretary to the minister positively advise if regulations covering this specific situation were posted, or otherwise were available in country elevators when farmers delivered their grain this fall?

Failing a revised regulation giving the farmer the option of deferral, would the Wheat Board consider allowing this deferral provided the initial payment was also deferred; that is, both initial and adjusted payments would have to be treated the same way with the option open for both payments together?

I know the minister has received strong representation on this subject in support of the position I have just outlined from individual farmers, farm organizations, and western members of parliament on behalf of the farmers in western Canada. I hope the minister's parliamentary secretary does not respond by saying that it cannot be done because of the law or that the act would have to be changed. This is what we are here for, and it can be done. Could it be that the government is concerned about other agricultural commodity groups such as cattlemen asking for the same deferral privileges? The deferral precedent is now established so it is appropriate to ask simply "Why not?". I know the minister's parliamentary secretary was in attendance at, and spoke to, the Canada Grains Council meeting in Toronto this morning. I am sure this subject of adjustment price deferral was mentioned at that meeting. I would guess there was considerable support for the position I have taken tonight in this adjournment debate.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): May I begin by saying how pleased I am to be able to respond this evening to the very pertinent and well spoken comments of my hon. friend from Medicine Hat. He raises a point of considerable concern for many western grain producers.

As he mentioned, just this morning I had the privilege to attend and represent the minister at the semi-annual meeting of the Canada Grains Council in Toronto. In a question and answer period with the delegates in attendance it was clear that this issue of deferring adjustment payments is a matter of interest to many farmers. Opinions of Canadian producers, however, differed on the subject. They varied from those who argue "defer at all costs" to those who say: "No; don't defer at all; we need the cash now." The situation is therefore not unmixed. In any contemplated deferral system it would be important to be able to distinguish the one group of producers from the other.

As the minister advised the House on October 27 we have been conducting discussions to see if and how producers could defer adjustment payment income. These discussions are still continuing but a practical means has not yet been found to separate those producers who wish to defer this income from those who wish to receive it as soon as possible.

About 30 per cent of deliveries in the current crop year to date have been on a deferred cash ticket basis. However, one cannot always assume because a producer has delivered on a deferred cash ticket basis that he would also wish to defer his adjustment payment. For example, it is possible that certain producers may have anticipated an adjustment to the initial price and planned their deferrals and cash flow pattern with the anticipated receipt of an adjustment payment in this taxation year in mind. Others, of course, may simply be in a cash short position and may indeed want to receive that cash as quickly as possible. Accordingly, it would have to be ascertained with each producer whether he wishes to receive or to defer his adjustment payment.

If the onus were merely placed on the producer to advise the board to defer issuance of his adjustment payment until 1976, we would of course want to ensure that each producer was aware that he had this option. I think the hon. member referred to that point in reverse fashion. Otherwise, undoubtedly there would be many cases of producers not knowing of the option until after they had received their adjustment cheques and then perhaps attempting to return cheques to the Canadian Wheat Board for deferral.

The procedure required to determine which producers wish to defer income, and to ensure that payments are made this calendar year only to those who wish payment would involve extra time and administrative costs and could perhaps make it impossible to make the adjustment payments to any producers before January 1. Generally, our problems in this regard have been aggravated by the disruption of the postal service at the present moment.

In any event I simply want to assure the hon. member that we are aware of the problem he raises. We are working on it now. I cannot guarantee a successful solution to it for the present year, although we are trying very hard. For the longer run I hope we will have a well known, well understood and well advertised mechanism in place to deal with this sort of situation before another year comes around.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—REQUEST OF UNITED MINE WORKERS FOR INVESTIGATION OF MANAGEMENT OF CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I was glad to hear the new Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), who is responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, on Tuesday telling us that he is willing to attend a meeting between DEVCO coal people and the UMW district executive and the four local union presidents in the area to listen to the criticisms which they have published, especially in the case of the union.

In talking privately to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), he has made it clear to me that there will be no formal investigation of the DEVCO coal management team by his government. I therefore suggest to the minister that when he goes down to meet with the representatives of the miners and the DEVCO coal officials, he might suggest that they invite Mr. Alex Brown, former special adviser to the federal government on the coal industry, a Cape Breton native and long time friend of Cape Breton coal miners, to chair the meeting between the groups.

In fact I would go so far as to suggest to the new minister that he try to bring the parties together in an all day session under the chairmanship of Mr. Brown to discuss the production and marketing problems of DEVCO, as well as the safety and industrial relations problems. Such a meeting would do a considerable amount to improve the relations between DEVCO and the union, which fell to a bit of a low after the fire in No. 26 mine and the temporary lay-off of some 750 men, of whom I understand all but 275 are now back to work.

The end of this month or early in December seems to be a good time for such a meeting and an airing of mutual problems, suspicions, criticisms, and goals. While I have a good deal of respect for what Mr. Kent has done in comparison with past executives of DEVCO, I feel that some of Mr. Marsh's complaints, which he aired publicly after the No. 26 mine fire, should be seriously considered. Mr. Marsh, the president of district 26 of the UMW since about 1958, has asked for the opening of three coal mines. Mr. Kent has said that there would be only one more new coal mine opened to 1980 which would mean production of some five million tons.

It seems to me that at least two mines in the area could be added—given the uncertainty of No. 26 even under the best of circumstances—and given the high unemployment rate in the area. Likewise, I think that Mr. Marsh's complaint that the present Minister of Finance's (Mr. Macdonald) alleged remark when he was minister of energy, mines and resources that Nova Scotia should depend more for its power on nuclear energy than on coal, should be clarified and explained.

There are many other union management concerns such as safety and industrial relations, that at this particular time should be seriously debated under the direction and guidance of Mr. Brown. I say this because the Cape Breton coal industry is at a turning point where it can go from being an industry totally dependent on the Canadian taxpayer to one in which it can tend toward the breakeven point and indeed even have an operating profit within the next several years. That conclusion can only become a reality if there is an extremely high degree of co-operation on means and ends by labour and management in the Cape Breton coal industry. Given the situation of the past few months I strongly urge the new minister to do everything in his power to get the two groups together at an early date, and preferably under the guidance and direction of Mr. Brown in a closed meeting.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I am sure we all regret that the progress of the Cape Breton coal industry has suffered a setback because of the fire last June in a newly developed section of Number 26 colliery. But the setback, though serious, is only temporary. It does not in any way change Devco's policy for the modernization of the industry, and the government's approval of the program is unchanged.

[Mr. Hogan.]

It is regrettable but understandable that the setback should have produced some doubt and misunderstanding particularly among the workers. In that situation the suggested meeting seems to be a good idea. I understand that it would be a break from the long standing precedents in the industry, whereby only the top union officials meet with top management, and the locals with management at the individual mines. To get all levels together around one table would, I know, be warmly welcomed by the corporation, and I hope that they and the union will arrange it.

I certainly want to visit Cape Breton as soon as possible to see the industry, to go down the mine and speak with the workers and their leaders. I am not sure at this point in time, however, whether it would be the best thing for me to go and have this meeting. Nevertheless, I think the meeting should be arranged, and if I am not able to attend I will do my utmost to be there as soon as possible afterward to discuss matters.

As to the involvement of Mr. Brown as suggested by the hon. member, I understand that he is an experienced and able man now retired from his position with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would certainly think he could be helpful as an independent participant if that is the wish of both groups.

I will do my best to make sure that this meeting takes place as soon as possible, and take all steps to see that Mr. Brown participates if all parties agree. As suggested, it might be a good idea for Mr. Brown to chair that meeting as an independent participant.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PRISONERS OF WAR—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I collaborated on questions put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) on October 15 to find out the position of the government with regard to the proposed legislation under a new act of parliament to compensate veterans who were former prisoners of war.

There is not much that I can add to what my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in the House on October 27, when he took the matter up, only to try to impress again on the government through the minister and to appeal to him again that this legislation be brought forward as soon as possible and, hopefully, before the Christmas recess.

Since I have the time, Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat the recommendations that came about as a result of long study of the Hermann report and the many representations that came before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. The committee recommended in part, as recorded on page 628 of Votes and Proceedings for June 12, 1975:

(1) That a new act of parliament be enacted to provide compensation to all former prisoners of war. The effect of this would be to retain the principle in the Pension Act that payment of wartime disability pension be restricted to those instances where injury or disease or aggravation thereof was attributable to or incurred during military service, and that special compensation for the maltreatment, indignities and residual disabilities resulting from prisoner of war incarceration which cannot be recognized or identified would be payable under a separate act.

(2) That the formula for compensation payable to former prisoners of war of the Japanese be changed to provide that each such former prisoner of war will receive compensation equivalent to 50 per cent pension to which will be added the amount of pension payable under the Pension Act on account of his assessed disability to a maximum total of 100 per cent—

(3) The prisoners of war of other powers of World War II or who were captured by hostile forces subsequent to World War II be awarded compensation in accordance with the following schedule:

Incarcerated 0-1½ years	10 per cent
Incarcerated 1½-2½ years	15 per cent
Incarcerated 2½ years or over	20 per cent

To this compensation would be added the amount of pension payable under the Pension Act on account of an assessed pensionable disability to a maximum total of 100 per cent.

With regard to the widows of pensioners the committee recommended as follows:

When at the time of death of the prisoner he was, or would have been in receipt of a pension assessed at 47 per cent or less, that pension be paid to the widow in double proportion to the assessed degree of the prisoner's disability as it relates to the basic pension granted to widows.

At the present time a full widow's pension is paid when the pensioner's death was attributable to or was incurred during wartime military service, or in the case of peacetime forces if it arose out of or was directly connected with service; or when the pensioner's disability was assessed at 48 per cent or more at the time of death. The effect of this would be that because 100 per cent widow's pension is payable when the disability pensioner was paid pension at the 50 per cent rate, a double proportion would be payable if his disability was assessed at a lesser rate, so that, for example, the widow of a 40 per cent pensioner would be awarded 80 per cent of the normal widow's pension.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought this matter to the minister's attention. The only matter of contention that I have to relate tonight, Madam Speaker, is that time is of the essence, and while I agree with my colleague in addressing a point to the minister, that he was as anxious as we on the standing committee were to make sure that this legislation is introduced immediately, I say that we have heard these stories before. I noted with interest today that the government House leader indicated progress in cabinet with the review of the recommendations, but I have also heard the House leader say the same things before with regard to veterans affairs.

Strangely enough, every prisoner of war association across the country is depending on the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs to come through with this bill. We on the standing committee can only try to impress on the minister and his government that any delays in introducing this legislation will again result in a lack of faith by veterans' organizations across the country. I am sure that I can promise on behalf of my party that the legislation would go through all stages in record time and that it would receive co-operation from all parties on this side.

I watch with interest the many speeches the minister makes to veterans organizations across this country. During the summer recess when members of parliament were supposed to be on holiday, I too made speeches to veterans' organizations. The first thing they say, whether they be former prisoners of war or not, is that it is imperative that this legislation be introduced as soon as possible.

While the recommendations are all vital to show our support of prisoners of war, the most vital have to do with widows' pensions and widows who are restricted from receiving a pension if their husband was receiving less than 48 per cent. This section in particular is discriminatory, stupid and ridiculous because it is these widows who most need the help.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to reply to the question by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) requesting a bill relating to Canadian prisoners of war in Europe and Hong Kong.

Hon. members will recall that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs at its meeting of June 22, 1972, requested that a study be undertaken to identify any physiological or psychological long-term effects which their incarceration may have had on ex-prisoners of war of the European theatre, numbering approximately 7,500. The government accepted this recommendation and on January 31, 1973, the study was undertaken by Dr. J. Douglas Hermann, a distinguished Canadian surgeon. Dr. Hermann's report was tabled in the House of Commons on Monday, November 18, 1974. It was subsequently referred to the standing committee for study on Wednesday, March 26, 1975, and the committee reported back to the House on Thursday, June 12, 1975.

I ask the hon. member to listen carefully to the last paragraph because couched in its terms he might find some of the answers he is seeking.

In the meantime the Minister of Veterans Affairs has held consultations on this very important subject with his colleagues. At the present time this, along with other government proposals, must be examined carefully in the light of the recently announced guidelines. The minister would hope, therefore, that the request for compensation for ex-POW will not become a victim of our financial restrictions.

As hon. members are aware, the House leader referred to this in the House today. I would like to be more positive, but neither the minister nor I can give the hon. member any further information except that the matter is under close consideration.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:27 p.m.
