Hamilton Spectator: Talking of pawn shops, we rambled on and my friend spoke of Vally, Dicken's pawnbroker in the Old Curiosity shop, and of his wonderful boy Tom, who at any hour of the day or night was to be found standing on his head. And this led my friend to remark that about thirty years ago, soon after he came to Hamilton, he boarded with a man whose name was a veritable name, and who was always standing on his head in the most out-of-the-way places, to the delight of his bystanders and the disgust of his father. That boy is now a grand fabric manufacturer in Toronto.

WOMEN'S MEETING.

Good Gathers in the West and East. A meeting of Mr. Carter's supporters in St. Paul's ward was held last night in Essey hall, Ligar street. The meeting was representative and highly enthusiastic.

The chair was taken shortly after eight by Mr. Thos. Moor who introduced the first speaker, J. J. O'Connell.

Mr. Mowat showed up the flaws in the present system of legislation and the indefiniteness of the right of workingmen to direct representation. He hoped that they would support Mr. Carter heart and soul, and show by untold and determined action that they were in earnest about it.

He believed that professional men do not monopolize the brains. Workingmen can show up in the same direction.

Mr. Alfred Oakley considered that the question has not yet been brought to its proper and foremost with every laboring man. Legislation has always been too favorable towards the wealthy, and should be directed to send a man to parliament who can treat this labor question intelligently.

Mr. Carter was warmly received. He spoke but for a few minutes, but his sentiments called forth repeated rounds of applause. He considered the whole question was limited by the words "capital encroaching on labor." In spite of the advancement of the nineteenth century, that question has not yet been brought to its favorable issue. The working classes are still trodden on by the rich. So long as the poor man submits to the laws which are made by those who have no sympathy with him, so long will such a state of things persist. We have a right to say that our interests be looked after, and we have now an opportunity of saying that we will make our own laws. He would ask them not to vote for J. W. Carter, but for the great cause of labor.

Mr. John Lewis of the seaman's union also addressed the meeting.

Mr. Burke then moved the following resolution: "Resolved that in the opinion of this meeting the time has come when labor should be represented in the legislature, and that this meeting pledge itself to support J. W. Carter in the forthcoming election." This resolution was seconded by Mr. Hawthorne and carried unanimously.

Before closing the meeting Mr. Carter was thanked by the meeting and Mr. Mowat for his services in the chair.

After adjournment committees were formed and canvassed to check to work in the various wards of the ward.

Mr. Heath's Meeting. At Wiggin's hall, Parliament and Gerard streets last night, an encouraging meeting of Mr. Heath's friends was held. Mr. Bedford occupied the chair. Stirring addresses on the workingman's claim to direct representation in parliament were delivered by Mr. Heath, Mr. J. W. Carter and others. The following resolution was unanimously carried: "That this meeting of the friends of Mr. Heath, after hearing the explanation of Mr. Heath, the labor candidate, pledge ourselves to support him as the workingman's representative in the local legislature."

HOW REMEMPT PLAYS.

The Accidents that Stop the Flow of Music.

From the Toronto Star. Edward Remonty, the violin virtuoso, was in the city last week. He played at the opera house. If he had lived in A. D. 64 he could have fiddled Rome into ashes at one-third the time that Nero did. On second thought, he couldn't, for Remonty can't play when there is any bustle or confusion in the audience. This is one of his peculiarities. He says that his old Stradivarius will not respond to his spirituous touch, or words to that effect, unless the music surrounding him is so intense that you can hear a horse-tail.

He opened his concert Wednesday night with Sonata Pathetique, by Beethoven. Everything went along smoothly at first, until he got up into the crescendo part of the Sonata, where the fiddle seemed to be trying to get the audience to understand that, aided by the young man at the piano, it was desecrating the sacred music of a man through a boiler factory. Then Remonty looked puzzled. Something had evidently gone wrong. He felt sure that the fiddle got a box of soap, and he could not account for it, but that there was something mysterious about the soap-box in the air.

Then, as he looked around the building, a sort of Eureka! expression stole over his countenance, and pointing to a stove hole in the wall under the gallery, he asked the ushers to be so kind as to stop it. The ushers in the vestment of the orchestra stopped the soap-box in the air, and the music proceeded until the violinist's expression told that such an interruption could not be tolerated, and that he would resign playing, until a policeman came and closed the stove hole, and also the pipe. He said that the man could get his money back at the door. The music went on, and the violinist's expression told that such an interruption could not be tolerated, and that he would resign playing, until a policeman came and closed the stove hole, and also the pipe. He said that the man could get his money back at the door.

Then the concert proceeded until the violinist's expression told that such an interruption could not be tolerated, and that he would resign playing, until a policeman came and closed the stove hole, and also the pipe. He said that the man could get his money back at the door.
